PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE ELEVENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, MAY 22, 1809.

MONDAY, May 22, 1809.

Conformably to the act passed at the last session, entitled "An act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress," the first session of the eleventh Congress commenced this day, and the Senate assembled in their Chamber, at the City of Washington.

PRESENT:

GEORGE CLINTON, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

NICHOLAS GILMAN and NAHUM PARKER, from New Hampshire.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, from Massachusetts.

JAMES HILLHOUSE and CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, from Connecticut.

ELISEA MATHEWSON and FRANCIS MALBONE, from Rhode Island.

JONATHAN ROBINSON, from Vermont.

JOHN LAMBERT, from New Jersey.

ANDREW GREGG and MICHAEL LEIB, from Pennsylvania.

SAMUEL WHITE, from Delaware.

SAMUEL SMITH, from Maryland.

WILLIAM B. GILES, from Virginia.

JESSE FRANKLIN and JAMES TURNER, from North Carolina.

JOHN GAILLARD, from South Carolina.

BUCKNER THRUSTON, from Kentucky.

RETURN JONATHAN MEIGS, jun., from Ohio.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last; and OBADIAH GERMAN, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New York, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, severally produced their credentials, which were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to them, they took their seats in the Senate.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with three such newspapers, printed in any of the States, as he may choose, provided that the same be furnished at the usual rate for the annual charge of such papers: and, provided, also, that if any Senator shall choose to take any newspapers other than daily papers, he shall be supplied with as many such papers as shall not exceed the price of three daily papers.

Resolved, That James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper to the Senate; and that the sum of twenty-eight dollars be allowed him weekly for that purpose, to commence with, and remain during the session, and for twenty days after.

Messrs. ANDERSON and GILMAN were appointed a committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives on their part, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House is assembled, and that the House have elected JOSEPH B. VARNUM, Esq. one of the Representatives for the State of Massachusetts, their Speaker, and are ready to proceed to business. The House of Representatives have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with the committee on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

TUESDAY, May 23.

Mr. ANDERSON reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses at 12 o'clock this day.

JAMES LLOYD, jr., appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, for six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, attended and produced his credentials; which were read.

On motion, by Mr. FRANKLIN,

Ordered, That General Arthur St. Clair have leave to withdraw his petition presented the last session, together with the papers therein referred to.

Mr. LEIB presented the petition of Edward Pennington and others, sugar refiners in the city of Philadelphia, praying that a law may be passed granting a drawback on refined sugar exported, equal to the duties paid on the importation of brown sugar, for reasons mentioned in the petition; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

On motion, by Mr. WHITE,

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

On this first occasion of meeting you, it affords me much satisfaction to be able to communicate the commencement of a favorable change in our foreign relations, the critical state of which induced a session of Congress at this early period.

In consequence of the provisions of the act interdicting commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, our Ministers at London and Paris were, without delay, instructed to let it be understood by the French and British Governments that the authority vested in the Executive to renew commercial intercourse with their respective nations would be exercised in the case specified by that act.

Soon after these instructions were dispatched, it was found that the British Government, anticipating from early proceedings of Congress, at their last session, the state of our laws, which has had the effect of placing the two belligerent Powers on a footing of equal restrictions, and, relying on the conciliatory disposition of the United States, had transmitted to their Legation here provisional instructions, not only to offer satisfaction for the attack on the frigate Chesapeake, and to make known the determination of His Britannic Majesty to send an Envoy Extraordinary, with powers to conclude a treaty on all the points between the two countries; but, moreover, to signify his willingness, in the mean time, to withdraw his Orders in Council, in the persuasion that the intercourse with Great Britain would be renewed on the part of the United States.

These steps of the British Government led to the correspondence and the proclamation now laid before you, by virtue of which the commerce between the two countries will be renewable after the 10th day of June next.

Whilst I take pleasure in doing justice to the Councils of His Britannic Majesty, which, no longer adhering to the policy which made an abandonment by France of her decrees a prerequisite to a revocation of the British Orders, have substituted the amicable course which has issued thus happily, I cannot do less than refer to the proposal heretofore made on the part of the United States, embracing a like restoration of the suspended commerce, as a proof of the spirit of accommodation which has at no time been intermitted, and to the result which now calls for our congratulations, as corroborating the principles by which the public Councils have been guided during a period of the most trying embarrassments.

The discontinuance of the British Orders, as they respect the United States, having been thus arranged, a communication of the event has been forwarded in one of our public vessels to our Minister Plenipotentiary at Paris, with instructions to avail himself of the important addition thereby made to the considerations which press on the justice of the French Government a revocation of its decrees, or such a modification of them as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States.

The revision of our commercial laws, proper to adapt them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain, will doubtless engage the early attention of Congress. It will be worthy, at the same time, of their just and provident care, to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture, which have been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of our citizens.

Under the existing aspect of our affairs, I have thought it not inconsistent with a just precaution, to have the gunboats, with the exception of those at New Orleans, placed in a situation incurring no expense beyond that requisite for their preservation and convenience for future service, and to have the crews of those at New Orleans reduced to the number required for their navigation and safety.

I have thought, also, that our citizens, detached in quotas of militia, amounting to one hundred thousand, under the act of March, one thousand eight hundred and eight, might not improperly be relieved from the state in which they were held for immediate service. A discharge of them has been accordingly directed.

The progress made in raising and organizing the additional military force, for which provision was made by the act of April, one thousand eight hundred and eight, together with the disposition of the troops, will appear by a report which the Secretary of War is preparing, and which will be laid before you.

Of the additional frigates required by an act of the last session to be fitted for actual service, two are in readiness, one nearly so, and the fourth is expected to be ready in the month of July. A report which the Secretary of the Navy is preparing on the subject, to be laid before Congress, will show, at the same time, the progress made in officering and manning these ships. It will show, also, the degree in which the provisions of the act relating to the other public armed ships have been carried into execution.

It will rest with the judgment of Congress to decide how far the change in our external prospects may authorize any modifications of the laws relating to the Army and Navy Establishments.

The works of defence for our seaport towns and harbors have proceeded with as much activity as the season of the year and other circumstances would admit. It is necessary, however, to state that the appropriations hitherto made being found to be deficient, a further provision will claim the early consideration of Congress.

MAY, 1809.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

The whole of the eight per cent. stock remaining due by the United States, amounting to five millions three hundred thousand dollars, had been reimbursed on the last day of the year 1808. And, on the first day of April last, the sum in the Treasury exceeded nine and a half millions of dollars. This, together with the receipts of the current year on account of former revenue bonds, will probably be nearly, if not altogether, sufficient to defray the expenses of the year. But the suspension of exports, and the consequent decrease of importations, during the last twelve months, will necessarily cause a great diminution in the receipts of the year one thousand eight hundred and ten. After that year, should our foreign relations be undisturbed, the revenue will again be more than commensurate to all the expenditures.

Aware of the inconveniences of a protracted session, at the present season of the year, I forbear to call the attention of the Legislature to any matters not particularly urgent. It remains, therefore, only to assure you of the fidelity and alacrity with which I shall cooperate for the welfare and happiness of our country; and to pray that it may experience a continuance of the divine blessings by which it has been so signally favored.

JAMES MADISON.

The Message and papers accompanying it were read and five hundred copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, May 24.

JOHN CONDIT, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of New Jersey, in the place of Aaron Kitchel, resigned, took his seat, and his credentials were read; and the President administered the oath to him as the law prescribes.

JOHN POPE, from the State of Kentucky, attended.

Mr. GILES submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to a revision of our commercial laws, for the purpose of adapting them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine the same and report thereon to the Senate; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The following motion was submitted for consideration by Mr. GILES:

Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the defence of our seaport towns and harbors be referred to a select committee, with instruction to examine the same and report thereon to the Senate; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The following motion was also submitted by Mr. GILES for consideration:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire whether it be expedient, at this time, to make any modifications of the laws relating to the Army and Navy of the United States; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution sent from the Senate, for the appointment of Chaplains to Congress during the present session.

On motion by Mr. WHITE, the Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on their part, in pursuance of the resolution of the two Houses, and the whole number of votes collected was 21, of which the Rev. Mr. WILNER had 11, and was accordingly elected.

THURSDAY, May 25.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing a statement of the vessels belonging to the Navy of the United States, and of the gunboats; which was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday, that so much of the President's Message as relates to the revision of our commercial laws, for the purpose of adapting them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine the same and report thereon to the Senate, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and, having agreed thereto, Messrs. GILES, SMITH of Maryland, POPE, LLOYD, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday, that so much of the President's Message as relates to the defence of our seaport towns and harbors be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine the same and report thereon to the Senate, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and having agreed thereto, Messrs. GERMAN, GILMAN, MALBONE, SMITH of Maryland, and LEIB, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday, that a select committee be appointed to inquire whether it be expedient at this time to make any modification of the laws relating to the Army and Navy of the United States, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and, having adopted the motion, Messrs. ANDERSON, HILLHOUSE, TURNER, WHITE, and FRANKLIN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. POPE gave notice that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of William White and others.

FRIDAY, May 26.

JENKIN WHITESIDE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, for two years, commencing on the fourth of March last, in place of Daniel Smith, resigned, took his seat, and his credentials were read; and the President administered the oath to him as the law prescribes.

RICHARD BRENT, from the State of Virginia, attended.

Mr. POPE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of William White and others; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. POPE presented a resolution to the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky, expressive of their opinion that strong garrisons at Michillimakinac, St. Louis, and near the mouth of the Ohio, would be of great public utility, and particularly aid in the protection of the frontiers; and the resolution was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the committee appointed yesterday on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the defence of our seaport towns and harbors, to consider and report thereon.

MONDAY, May 29.

The bill for the relief of William White and others was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. POPE, GREGG, HILLHOUSE, FRANKLIN, and MALBORN, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. THRUSTON presented the petition of John Mason and others, inhabitants of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, praying that such part of "An act supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," as exempts the City of Washington from taxation by the Levy Court of Washington county, be repealed, for reasons mentioned in the petition; which was read, and referred to Messrs. THRUSTON, ANDERSON, and BRENT, to consider and report thereon.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I now lay before Congress the report of the Secretary of War, showing the progress made in carrying into effect the act of April, 1808, for raising an additional military force, and the disposition of the troops.

MAY 26, 1809.

JAMES MADISON.

The Message and report were read and ordered to lie for consideration.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Mr. SMITH of Maryland, stating that being appointed by the Executive of that State a Senator in conformity with the Constitution, until the next meeting of the Legislature, which will take place on the 5th day of June next, he submits to the determination of the Senate the question, whether an appointment under the Executive of Maryland, to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, will or will not cease on the first day of the meeting of the Legislature thereof? and the letter was read; and, after debate, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. GILES gave notice that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed the Rev. JESSE LEW a Chaplain to Congress on their part during the present session. They have appointed a committee on their part, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to inquire what business is necessary to be done during the present session. The House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act respecting the ships and vessels owned by citizens or subjects of foreign nations, with which commercial intercourse is permitted;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and, by unanimous consent, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. LLOYD, GILES, and ANDERSON, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. LLOYD, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment; and it was read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

The resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to consider the business necessary to be acted on this session, was read for consideration.

Ordered, That Messrs. MALBORN, FRANKLIN, and GILMAN, be a committee agreeably to the 22d rule for conducting business in the Senate.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the revision of our commercial laws, for the purpose of adapting them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain, reported a bill to amend and continue in force the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes;" which was read; and, on motion by Mr. LLOYD, the bill was amended by unanimous consent, and passed to the second reading. The bill is as follows:

A Bill to amend and continue in force the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, and the act to enforce and make more effectual, an act, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States; and also the thirteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes, be, and the same are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That all penalties and forfeitures, which have been incurred on account of any infraction of any of the said acts or sections, shall be recovered and distributed in like manner as if the said acts and sections had continued in full force and virtue.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes, as is not repealed by this act, shall continue in force until the end of the next session of Congress: Provided That nothing therein contained shall be construed to prohibit any trade or commercial intercourse which has been or may be permitted in conformity with the provisions of the eleventh section of the said act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, during the continuance of this act, no ship or vessel shall be permitted to depart for any foreign port or place with which commercial intercourse has not been or may not be permitted by the last mentioned act: and no ship or vessel, bound to a foreign port or place with which commercial intercourse has been or may be permitted by virtue of the said act, shall be allowed to depart, unless the owner or owners, consignee, or factor, of such ship or vessel shall, with the master, have given bond, with one or more sureties, to the United States, in a sum double the value of the vessel and cargo, that the vessel shall not proceed to any port or place with which commercial intercourse is not permitted by virtue of the said act, nor be directly or indirectly engaged during the voyage, in any trade with such port or place, nor shall put any article on board of any other vessel destined for such port or place. And if any ship or vessel shall, contrary to the provisions of this section, proceed to any such prohibited port or place, or be directly or indirectly engaged in any trade with such port or place, or shall depart from any port of the United States, without clearance, or without having given bond in the manner above-mentioned, such ship or vessel, together with her cargo, shall be wholly forfeited, and the owner or owners, agent, freighter or factors, master or commander of such ship or vessel shall, severally, forfeit and pay a sum equal to the value of the ship or vessel and of the cargo put on board the same: Provided always, That the provisions of the eleventh section of the last mentioned act, shall extend to the prohibitions imposed by this section; which prohibition shall cease to operate in the manner and under the limitations prescribed by the eleventh section aforesaid in relation to any nation with which commercial intercourse may hereafter be permitted, in conformity with the provisions of the eleventh section aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all penalties or forfeitures arising under, or incurred by virtue of this act, shall be recovered and distributed, and may be remitted or mitigated, in the manner prescribed by the act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes.

Sec. 5 And be it further enacted, That all the vessels which may have arrived at any port or place within the United States, from Great Britain, her colonies or dependencies, since the twentieth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and nine, or which may arrive before the tenth of June next, shall be exempted from all the forfeitures and penalties incurred in consequence of any violation of any of the provisions of the said act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies.

TUESDAY, May 30.

Mr. GILES asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill to amend and continue in force the act, entitled, "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," was read the second time; and on motion, by Mr. GILES, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be the order of the day for Thursday next.

The Senate resumed the resolution for appointing a joint committee on the business requisite to be done during the present session. On motion, by Mr. LAMB, to postpone the consideration thereof for one week, it was determined in the negative; and the resolution was agreed to.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, FRANKLIN, and HILLHOUSE, be the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. POPE submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether it be expedient, at this time, to pass a law for taking the census of the inhabitants of the United States and Territories thereof.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the letter from Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, communicated yesterday. And, on motion of Mr. GILES, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the 5th of June next.

WEDNESDAY, May 31.

STEPHEN R. BRADLEY, from the State of Vermont, attended.

Mr. GILES presented the memorial of Edward Livingston, of New Orleans, stating that, for a long time prior to the 25th January, 1804, he was in peaceable possession of a parcel of land called the Bature, in front of the suburb of St. Mary's, in the city of New Orleans. That, on the 25th of January, he was forcibly removed by the Marshal of the district, under the orders of the President of the United States, notwithstanding an injunction had been granted by the superior court against the execution of the warrant; and praying that the possession may be restored to him, and that such measures may be pursued as the wisdom of Congress may devise, for providing a legal decision on the title of the United States, if it shall be supposed they have any, to the property in question; and the memorial was read, and referred to Messrs. GILES, ANDERSON, HILLHOUSE, WHITE, and WHITESIDE, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday for a committee to inquire into the expediency of taking the census of the inhabitants of the United States and Territories; and, the motion being amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether it be expedient, at this time, to pass a law for taking the census of the inhabitants of the United States and Territories thereof; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. POPE, MEIGS, and ANDERSON, be the committee.

The bill to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress was read the second time as in Committee of the Whole. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. MALBONE gave notice that he should, tomorrow ask leave to bring in a bill for extending the benefit of drawback upon exportation of all goods, wares, and merchandise, entitled thereto, which may, be transported by land from Newport, Rhode Island, to Boston, and from Boston to Newport.

THURSDAY, June 1.

Mr. MALBONE, from the committee, reported the bill to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress correctly engrossed: and the bill was read the third time, and the further consideration thereof postponed until Monday next.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to amend and continue in force the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GILES offered the following amendment to the first section, to be inserted after the word "assembled:"

"That the provisions of the two first sections of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes, shall extend to all public armed ships and vessels of all foreign nations, and the same shall be, and are hereby, continued and made permanent, subject, nevertheless, to any modifications and regulations which may hereafter be made by treaty.'"

Mr. G. said, he felt himself constrained to move this amendment at this time, because he found it impossible to avoid a consideration of the subject involved in it, although he had heretofore hoped that it would not necessarily pass in review during the present session. He said this necessity arose from the limitation of these sections of the act at the last session. The connexion of these sections with the commercial non-intercourse system, was contrary to his opinion at that time; he then wished the subject to be taken up and acted upon in a separate bill, and made the permanent law of the land. His opinion then gave way to the respect he felt for the opinion of others. This will appear from the resolution he then moved, "to extend the interdiction to the public armed ships and vessels of all foreign nations." In consequence of connecting that subject with the general commercial non-intercourse, and limiting its duration with that act, it was now rendered a very delicate question. His proposition, however, was, to do now, what it was right to have done at the last session. He said that the proposition was founded upon the principle, that the United States had as absolute and unqualified a right to exclusive jurisdiction over the marine leagues usually attached to independent nations, as to their territorial jurisdiction, and as a consequence from that principle, foreign nations had no more right to send armed ships within our acknowledged marine jurisdiction, than they had to send an army within our territorial jurisdiction. This proposition is, therefore, merely municipal, formed upon an unquestionable right, and it is dictated by the same spirit of impartiality as that which dictated the original non-intercourse law. Indeed, it appeared to him the only impartial course now left us, as it respects the belligerents. It ought to preserve the most perfect impartiality, which, Mr. Canning so justly tells us, "is the essence of neutrality."

Mr. G. said, it could not escape observation, that, in the overtures made by the British Cabinet for the revocation of the Orders in Council of the 7th of January and the 11th of November, the obligation to protect our neutral rights against France, heretofore offered on the part of our Government, in case of her perseverance in her hostile edicts, had been entirely overlooked, or unconditionally dispensed with. He said he derived much satisfaction from this liberal conduct on the part of the British Government, because it manifested a confidence in the honor and firmness of our Government, which must be peculiarly gratifying to every American; but it rather increased than lessened the obligation to persevere in protecting our neutral rights against French aggressions, if they should be persevered in, contrary to his expectation.

The motive or ground of resisting the aggressions of France cannot, under this overture, be mistaken. In the former case, it might have seemed as if the resistance was dictated by a stipulated obligation to Great Britain to make it in this; it can only be dictated by a just sense of our own honor, character, and interests, which is left perfectly uncontrolled by the British overture. As this latter motive is the more honorable, it ought to be the more scrupulously adhered to and enforced. He had no hesitation in saying he had uniformly been influenced by this motive alone, entirely disconnected with any stipulated obligation to Great Britain; and, under this influence alone, he would be found at all times as ready to resist the aggressions of France, as he had at any time been those of Great Britain, if they should, unfortunately, be persevered in; but, at the same time, he wished to take away every pretext for such perseverance, by persevering in a conduct of the strictest and most scrupulous impartiality toward all the belligerents.

At the last session he had supposed, under the general interdiction of all foreign armed vessels some regulations and modifications, as exceptions from the general rule, might be made by law, but further reflection had satisfied him that the preferable mode was by treaty.

He would state two or three reasons for this preference:

1. It will tend to avoid collisions with all foreign nations. Regulations made by law might not suit the views of foreign nations, whereas their consent would be necessary in treaties.

2. It will give us the aid of a stipulated obligation on the part of the foreign nation making the treaty, to enforce the arrangement. In the case of Great Britain this consideration is of great importance. Its importance results from the strength of her navy, compared with the weakness of ours.

3. By treaty we may obtain what the lawyers call a quid pro quo. We may want, at some future time, the use of some British ports, which she would readily give for the use of ours. He said he would act liberally with her in this respect; and, he believed, considering Great Britain now at war, and the United States at peace, it would rather accelerate than retard the expected negotiation. He said he was as much opposed to throwing any impediment in the way of the expected negotiation as any gentleman in the United States.

Non-Intercourse.

Great Britain cannot, and will not complain. The municipal right now proposed to be carried into effect, is admitted by Great Britain in its broadest extent, and will not be disputed by Mr. Canning at the present moment. This will appear from Mr. Canning's declarations in the debates of the last session of Parliament. He said he did not know whether it was correct to read newspapers in evidence, to ascertain the opinions and expressions of the speaker, but if the Senate would be content with this species of evidence, contained in a Ministerial paper, he would read it for their information. Mr. C. then read the following extract of Mr. Canning's speech, taken from a British Ministerial paper:

Extract from Mr. Canning's speech in Parliament.

* At the time the application for a compromise had been made by the American Government, there was an order in force excluding British ships of war from the American ports, while French ships of war were admitted into them; and, consequently, if the terms offered by America had been accepted, our commerce would have been permitted to America without a ship of war to protect it, while the French commerce would be excluded, at the same time that French ships of war would be admitted if they could succeed in getting there. The ports of America would become nests for French privateers against British commerce. As to the tendency of the measures in agitation in America, he could afford the right honorable gentleman some consolation, by assuring him that they would not have all the ill consequences he seemed to apprehend. A circumstance appeared by the report of the committee of Congress, though clothed in hostile language, which, if made known to His Majesty's Government in amicable terms, might have led to the acceptance of the terms proposed. The circumstance he alluded to was the resolution for excluding from American ports the ships of war not of Great Britain, but of the belligerents. The Americans, in their character of neutrals, had unquestionably a right to exclude the ships of war of both belligerents from their ports, but could not confine them exclusively to those of one of the belligerents without a violation of that impartiality which is the essence of the neutral character. Yet, when that proposition should be disposed of, the whole of the difficulty would not be surmounted, as much would still remain to be accommodated. Another point, in which fault had been charged upon his conduct with respect to America, was his having stated that the system would not be given up while the smallest link of the confederation against Great Britain existed."

It will be observed that two important conclusions may be deduced from these observations: 1. That the exercise of this municipal right is unquestionable. 2. That Mr. Canning's objection to its former exercise by proclamation was to its limitation, not its extension.

His objection is to its exercise against Great Britain exclusively and not against her enemies.

At the time of making this speech, Mr. Canning thought the interdiction was extended to all the belligerents; in which case, so far from complaining of its exercise, he says it would furnish an inducement to an accommodation, and his instructions to Mr. Erskine, were, no doubt, given under this expectation. This was the ground taken by the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, in the last session, and the Senate went further, by extending the interdiction to the public armed ships of all foreign nations; those of peace as well as those of war. This gave the transaction more strongly the character of a mere municipal regulation. This principle was narrowed down, in this bill, to apply merely to Great Britain and France, and left out altogether the other belligerent Powers. Mr. Canning will probably be much surprised at this limitation; and conceive hostility more pointed than he had anticipated; some of the points may, however, be a little blunted by including France, the most operating and unmanageable of her enemies. He said he did not wish to go one atom beyond Mr. Canning's opinion upon this occasion. He took great pleasure in concurring with Mr. Canning upon this point. It was the first instance in which he had concurred in opinion with the gentleman; but he hoped it would not be the last, especially when the opinion favored the rights and promoted the interest of the United States.

Mr. Canning must have acted under this impression when he agreed to make the honorable reparation he had done for the unauthorized attack upon the Chesapeake, without requiring a previous revocation of the interdiction of British ships. As this revocation was not demanded nor promised, the arrangement now ought to be made on general principles of justice. He said, without feeling or expressing any regret, at anything he had said or proposed at the last session, he was now as willing as any gentleman to reciprocate the temper lately manifested by the British Government, so opposite in its character and tendency from that manifested by the Cabinet for several years preceding. He said that no gentleman had yet manifested an intention of removing the interdiction upon British armed ships, until she had actually executed her promise of reparation; and, if the execution of the promise were to precede the revocation of the interdiction, the mode of revocation by treaty, as pointed out by his proposition, would be nearly cotemporaneous with that proposed by gentlemen, if now enacted into a law, and it would have an evident advantage, as it respected the feelings of Great Britain. The mode recommended by gentlemen is founded upon a want of confidence in the promise of Great Britain, and an ungracious demand for its execution, as a preliminary to the revocation, while the mode pointed out by treaty, is founded upon a confidence in the promise; and, without requiring its execution, will insure our own safety by the mere exercise of municipal right; a right which is unquestionable; vouched to be so by Mr. Canning, and the exercise of which is impartial toward all nations, by extending its provisions equally to all. He said that almost all the injuries and insults sustained by the United States from public armed ships of the belligerents within our waters, were attributable to an inattention to the exercise of this right, and, relax the interdiction when you may, without a stipulated obligation on the part of the belligerents, to respect your neutrality, and your marine jurisdiction, they will be renewed and continued.

The principle contended for is not new. It has been before the Senate several times, and was adopted at the last session in its broadest extent, as will appear from the following resolution, which he then had the honor of moving. It does not appear from the Journals of the Senate, that there was any opposition to the following resolution, which was adopted on the 15th of February last:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 8th instant, that provision ought to be made by law for interdicting all foreign armed ships from the waters of the United States; and, having agreed thereto, ordered that it be referred to Mr. Giles, Mr. Smith, of Maryland, Mr. Crawford," &c.

He said he was extremely happy to find the spirit of harmony and conciliation which had hitherto characterized the Senate, and he should endeavor to preserve and continue it; and, while he was strongly impressed with the propriety and policy of the amendment, yet he was willing to listen to any other which might be more agreeable to gentlemen, provided it was founded upon a principle of strict impartiality toward the belligerents, which he could not be induced to depart from under any circumstances.

When Mr. G. had concluded, the further consideration of the subject was postponed until tomorrow.

FRIDAY, JUNE 2.

PHILIP REED, from the State of Maryland, attended.

STANLEY GRISWOLD, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Ohio, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Edward Tiffin, was qualified, and took his seat.

JOHN SMITH, from the State of New York, attended.

Mr. MALBONE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for extending the benefit of a drawback of the duties upon exportation on all goods, wares, and merchandise, subject thereto, that may be transported by land from the port of Newport to the port of Boston, and from said Boston to said Newport; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to amend and continue in force the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," together with the amendment submitted yesterday; and, on motion of Mr. PICKERING, further to amend the bill, it was ordered that the bill, together with the amendments, be recommitted to Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, GILES, LLOYD, POPE, and GREGG, to consider generally and report thereon.

Mr. GERMAN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 25th of May last, so much of the President's Message as relates to the defence of our seaport towns and harbors; and, on the 26th, the resolution of the State of Kentucky, relative to garrisons on the Western waters, reported a bill making further appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States, and to erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the protection of the Northern and Western frontiers of the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the act entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department;" and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

MONDAY, JUNE 5.

Mr. MATHEWSON announced the death of his colleague, FRANCIS MALBONE, who deceased yesterday morning.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD,

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of FRANCIS MALBONE, this afternoon, at five o'clock, from his late residence; that notice thereof be given to the House of Representatives, and that a committee be appointed for superintending the funeral.

Ordered, That Messrs LLOYD, GILMAN, and WHITE, be the committee.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD,

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing their respect to the memory of FRANCIS MALBONE, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing a crape round the left arm; and that a sum not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars be applied out of the contingent fund for placing a neat slab or monument, with a suitable inscription, over his tomb.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD,

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of FRANCIS MALBONE, the Senate now adjourn.

And the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 6.

Mr. GILES, from the joint committee appointed on the part of the Senate to consider and report the business requisite to be acted on during the present session, made a report; which was read for consideration.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the letter of Mr. SMITH, a Senator from the State of Maryland; and

Mr. GILES submitted a resolution, which was amended, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Honorable SAMUEL SMITH, a Senator appointed by the Executive of the State of Maryland to fill the vacancy which happened in the office of Senator for that State, is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States during the session of the Legislature of Maryland, which, by the proclamation of the Governor of said State, was to commence on the 5th day of the present month of June; unless said Legislature shall fill such vacancy by the appointment of a Senator, and this Senate be officially informed thereof.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, to amend the motion, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting:

"That any Senator of this body, who holds a seat under an Executive appointment, cannot, according to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, be entitled to continue to hold his seat as a member of this body, after the meeting of the Legislature of the State from which such Senator may be a member.

And a division of the motion for amendment was called for, and the question having been taken on striking out, it passed in the negative; and the motion for amendment having been lost, the original motion was agreed to—yeas 19, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Griawold, Hillhouse, Lambert, Mathewson, Meigs, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Thurston, White, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Leib, Lloyd, Parker, Pickering, and Turner.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD,

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be requested to notify the Executive of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations of the death of FRANCIS MALBONE, late a Senator of the United States from that State.

The bill for extending the benefit of a drawback of the duties upon exportation on all goods, wares, and merchandise, subject thereto, that may be transported by land from the district of Newport to the port of Boston, and from said Boston to said Newport, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. LLOYD, MATHEWSON, and GILMAN, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed on the 25th of May, to inquire whether it be expedient at this time to make any modification of the laws relating to the Army and Navy of the United States, reported in part a bill to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress was resumed, and the blank filled with "fourth Monday of November."

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to fix the time of the next meeting of Congress."

Mr. POPE, from the committee appointed to inquire whether it be expedient at this time to pass a law for taking the census of the inhabitants of the United States and the Territories thereof, reported a bill providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. ANDERSON, it was agreed to reconsider the vote for the second reading of the bill; and, on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until the fourth Monday in November next.

The bill making further appropriation to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the protection of the Northern and Western frontiers of the United States, was read the second time, and the further consideration thereof postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7.

JAMES A. BAYARD, from the State of Delaware, attended.

The bill to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill making further appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States, and to erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the protection of the Northern and Western frontiers of the United States; and, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to continue John Dempsie as an engrossing clerk, in his office, for another quarter, to commence on the first day of April last, notwithstanding the present state of his health.

THURSDAY, JUNE 8.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, from the State of Georgia, attended.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee, reported the bill to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee, reported the bill making further appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States, and to erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the protection of the Northern and Western frontiers of the United States, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and the blank filled with "seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act making further appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States, and to erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the protection of the Northern and Western frontiers of the United States."

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of an agent for the land office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk;" a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw tribe of Indians,' and to establish a land office in the Mississippi Territory;" also, a bill, entitled "An act declaring the assent of Congress to a certain act of the State of South Carolina, passed the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and four;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. MEIGS,

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of an agent for the land office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to Messrs. MEIGS, PICKERING, and POPE, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. LLOYD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill for extending the benefit of a drawback of the duties upon exportation on all goods, wares, and merchandise, subject thereto, that may be transported by land from the port of Newport to the port of Boston, and from said Boston to said Newport, reported the bill without amendment; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. HILLHOUSE submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a Committee of Elections be appointed, to examine and report on the credentials and qualifications of the members returned to serve in the Senate, since the third day of March, 1803.

GUNBOATS.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed on the 25th of May, to inquire whether it be expedient at this time to make any modification of the laws relating to the Army and Navy of the United States, reported in part a bill to direct the sale of gunboats; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. A. also reported sundry documents on the subject referred to the consideration of the committee, which were read, as follows:

Documents accompanying the bill providing for the sale of gunboats, reported by Mr. Anderson to the Senate, June 8, 1809.

COMMITTEE ROOM, May 29, 1809.

SIR: The committee to whom has been referred a resolution of Senate, authorizing the committee to inquire whether it be expedient at this time to make any modifications of the laws relating to the Army and Navy of the United States, have directed me to ask information of you, upon the following points:

How many gunboats have been built under the existing laws?

What has been the average, or aggregate cost of building them?

In what situation are they now placed or contemplated to be placed?

How many of them laid up, and how many in actual service, and where stationed?

What will be the annual expense of taking care of those laid up?

What the annual expense of those to be continued in actual service?

What will be the probable state of those gunboats at the end of one year, which may be laid up or unemployed?

What will be the probable state of those, at the end of one year, which may be kept in service, on the coasts or in the harbors?

Which would best promote the true interest of the nation, and of the Navy Department; to continue the system of gunboats hitherto adopted, and dispose of them in the manner now authorized by law, or to authorize the President to cause them to be sold, except so many as he may think expedient to be retained in service?

What would be the difference in the expense of keeping one or more frigates on our coasts, or sending them to the Mediterranean, should it be considered expedient to keep any armed vessels in the Mediterranean seas?

Upon the foregoing points the committee wish you to give as full a view as you can, from such data as you now possess.

Is it at this time expedient to make any modification of the laws of the United States, in relation to her Navy Department?

If so, what are the modifications you deem expedient, so far as you have had time and opportunity to examine them?

Accept assurances of my high consideration,

JOS. ANDERSON,

Chairman of the Committee.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, June 6, 1809.

SIR: I have received your letter of 29th ultimo, requesting information, which I have now the honor to give upon the points therein stated.

There have been built under the existing laws, one hundred and seventy-six gunboats and bombs; and the average cost of building them may be calculated at nine thousand dollars.

The paper A, herewith sent, affords the requisite information as to the situation in which these boats are now placed; the number laid up, the number in actual service, and where stationed.

Paper B, is an exhibit of "the annual expense of taking care of those laid up."

Paper C, is an exhibit of the annual expense of maintaining one gunboat, and twenty-four of them on one station; for instance, New Orleans, in actual service.

As to the "probable state of those gunboats at the end of one year, which may be laid up, or unemployed," I will observe, that, with all the care that can be taken of them, they will unavoidably decay in a greater or less degree; those built of green, will of course decay much sooner than those built of seasoned timber. To keep a gunboat in a state of preparation for service, we shall very frequently be subjected to the expense of repairing her; an expense to an amount which cannot be foreseen. The sails, and standing and running rigging, at present belonging to those laid up, will probably, at the end of one year, be so much injured

Gunboats.

SENATE.

as to be unfit for use; their small boats and water casks, unless well protected from the rain and sun, will sustain considerable injury in the course of the same time; and they cannot be so protected without expense. If a gunboat is suffered to lie in port for one year, without giving her any repair, she will probably be found, at the expiration of that year, wholly unworthy of being repaired.

With respect to those kept in service, they also will decay, if not occasionally repaired; though it is observed by professional men, that vessels in service, especially in salt water, are less subject to decay than they are lying in port, and universal experience does, I believe, sanction this idea.

In reply to your query respecting the gunboat system, as relating to the "interest of the nation and of the Navy Department," and as to the propriety of continuing that system or the abandoning of it by a sale of the boats, I am to observe that much must depend on the species of policy which, in the event of a war, may be adopted. If that event should shortly occur, and it is determined that a plan of operations merely defensive shall be pursued, there can be no doubt that gunboats will aid materially, if properly stationed; but if, on the contrary, our marine should be directed against a foreign trade, and to the convoying and protection of our own, a system of well-armed sailing frigates, and smaller cruisers, would, on every principle, be preferable in point of effect; and, comparatively, rated per gun and number of men to be employed, would be much less costly. It must also be observed, that it is only on board of vessels suited for sea service, that good seamen are to be formed, and that those calculated merely for ports, afford no opportunity for improvement in naval science. As to the expediency of selling or retaining the gunboats, reference to the preceding exhibits affords some information; but I beg leave to remark, that nothing short of a knowledge of the policy which events may induce could enable me to give a decided opinion on this point.

"The difference of the expense of keeping one or more frigates on our own coast, and sending them to the Mediterranean," would, in my opinion, be considerable. On our own coast, they will, especially in the Winter and Spring months, be subject to numerous accidents, from causes universally known, and not existing, it is believed, in an equal degree, in any other part of the world, such as frequent and sudden heavy squalls of wind, numerous shoals, thick fogs, and the irregularity of the motion of the Gulf Stream, which, in misty weather, renders the approach to our coast peculiarly hazardous. For our vessels stationed in the Mediterranean we should be subject to the expense of transporting certain articles of provisions and naval stores, not to be obtained in that sea; but this, I believe, the only additional expense to which they would be subjected, and this expense may be more than counterbalanced by the accidents to which our vessels would be subject on our own coast, and the comparative cheapness of certain supplies which can be obtained in the Mediterranean ports; and I am persuaded that, if Congress would authorize the building of a suitable vessel for the transportation of provisions from this country to the Mediterranean, for the use of any of our vessels that might be stationed in that sea, the expense of maintaining them there would be less than the expense of maintaining them on our own coast.

As you have not required my opinion on the expediency of sending some of our frigates to the Mediterranean, I will only venture to suggest for consideration, that we have in that sea a valuable trade at stake, subject to the depredations of a lawless people, whose dispositions might be effectually restrained by the presence of a few vessels of respectable force; and that I consider professional knowledge, on the part of our officers, which can best be acquired abroad, as of high national importance.

With respect to the expediency of modifying the laws in relation to the Navy Department, it appears to me that some alterations are necessary.

By the act authorizing the employment of an additional naval force, passed at the last session of Congress, it appears that the Executive is restricted from sending our vessels equipped under that act, beyond our coast. If it shall now be deemed expedient to send any of them to the Mediterranean, or any other foreign station, this restriction ought to be removed, or so modified as to give to the Executive power adequate to the purpose.

I avail myself of this occasion, respectfully to submit to consideration the memorial of the officers of the Navy, some time since presented to Congress, a copy of which, with copies of a letter from my predecessor to Mr. Montgomery, chairman of a committee of the House of Representatives, dated the first of April, one thousand eight hundred and eight, and of a letter from Captain Bainbridge to me, upon the same subject, are herewith transmitted, and marked D. Having attentively perused this memorial, I cannot withhold the expression of my opinion that the prayer thereof is perfectly reasonable. National considerations ought, surely, to induce us to foster that just and honorable pride, that truly patriotic ambition, to which our navy officers, and especially those well skilled in seamanship, obviously sacrifice their pecuniary interests.

To another and not an uninteresting subject, embraced by the queries which you have propounded to me, I will also invite your serious attention. By the act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, it is provided that the commissions to navy agents shall not exceed one per centum, nor in any instance the compensation allowed by law to the purveyor of public supplies. The Treasury construction of this statute will appear by the papers E. and F., herewith sent. That construction prohibits any allowance, under any circumstances, for either clerk-hire, porters, office rent, fuel, or stationery. The whole receipts of the agents are confined to one per centum, and the produce of that per centage is limited to $2,000 per annum.

In our large seaport towns, and especially in Norfolk, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, our purchases will necessarily be extensive; often so much so, as to occupy exclusively the time of the agent. In these places clerks must be indispensable, and porters highly useful; and wherever we have an agent, it appears to me proper that the public should allow whatever the agent may reasonably pay for office rent, fuel, and stationery. It is not probable that the commissions to the agents will, in any other places than those mentioned, viz: Norfolk, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, amount to two thousand dollars; and in neither of these places will the clear receipts of either of the agents amount to more than five hundred and fifty dollars per annum, as will more particularly appear by the accompanying exhibit marked G. In other places the commissions will not amount to as much as is now given to the most common clerk in a merchant's counting-house.

SENATE.

Gunboats.

JUNE, 1869.

To make the commissions amount to two thousand dollars, it would require that two hundred thousand dollars should be disbursed; and if an agent should disburse one million of dollars, or any sum exceeding that, the gross amount of his pay for such disbursements, is limited to two thousand dollars; the net amount of which cannot reasonably be calculated at more than five hundred and fifty dollars.

With this view of the subject, I cannot rely upon the present agents' continuing to hold their appointments, or upon other fit persons accepting such appointments, without the law in question being so modified as to make them a reasonable allowance for their services, and the expenses inseparably connected with the discharge of their official duties. In disbursing so large a sum of money, as an agent must disburse, to entitle him to the small compensation of five hundred and fifty dollars per annum, he hazards the loss of ten times as much from irregularity in vouchers, erroneous calculations, misinterpretation of instructions, for not strictly conforming in each and every purchase to the specific restrictions of the existing law, and from various causes to which the most correct men are, and ever will be liable, in a greater or less degree.

The copy of a letter from General Stricker, navy agent at Baltimore, a gentleman justly of a high standing in society, and I am told as good an agent as could be procured in any country, herewith sent, and marked H, will explain to you his situation under the existing law; and other agents, of equal merit, are similarly situated.

Deeming it my duty, under the latitude you have allowed, to be perfectly explicit and full in my communication to you upon this subject, and being sincerely anxious to manage the business of the department in such manner as to promote the interests of the nation, I trust I shall not be thought presumptuous when I suggest the indispensable necessity of being aided by able agents.

I flatter myself, sir, with a belief that I have afforded the information required, and I regret that I have not been able to do it at an earlier moment.

I am, with great respect, &c.

PAUL HAMILTON.

As one gunboat will cost $11,500 per annum, twenty-four gunboats will cost $276,000

Estimate of the annual expense of maintaining in actual service twenty-four gunboats at New Orleans.

One captain commanding, one hundred dollars per month, sixteen rations per day	$2,268
Five surgeons, fifty dollars per month	3,000
One purser, forty dollars per month	480
Four surgeons' mates, thirty dollars per month	1,440
Five thousand one hundred and ten rations, at twenty cents	1,022
	$8,510

Annual expense of twenty-four gunboats, not including the above essential officers - 276,000

Total amount of expense of twenty-four gunboats in actual service at New Orleans - $284,310

NOTE.—In the above estimate, full crews are allowed to the gunboats; but orders have been given to reduce the crews of the gunboats at New Orleans to a number merely sufficient for their navigation and safety. The reduction is left to the commanding officer at New Orleans, who, from a full view of all circumstances, can form the most satisfactory judgment upon this point. We have not had time to hear from him what the actual reduction has been; but we may estimate that this reduction, from the time it shall be made, will reduce their annual expense to $250,000.

FRIDAY, JUNE 9.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee, reported the bill for extending the benefit of a drawback of the duties upon exportation on all goods, wares and merchandise, subject thereto, that may be transported by land from the port of Newport to the port of Boston, and from said Boston to said Newport, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

that may be transported by land from the port of Newport to the port of Boston, and from said Boston to said Newport."

The bill to direct the sale of gunboats was read the second time, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act to continue in force 'An act declaring the assent of Congress to a certain act of the State of South Carolina, passed the 21st of December, 1804,'" was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. GAILLARD, GILES, and GILMAN, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw tribe of Indians,' and to establish a land office in the Mississippi Territory," was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been offered, the bill was ordered to the third reading.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee to whom was referred the bill to amend and continue in force the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," together with the amendments proposed thereto, reported a new draught, as a substitute for the original bill, which was read and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MEIGS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of an agent for the land office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk," reported the bill amended.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment, as in Committee of the Whole; and having agreed thereto, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the bill was ordered to a third reading as amended.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee, reported the amendment correctly engrossed, and the bill was read the third time as amended, by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. GILES submitted a resolution authorizing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives to adjourn their respective Houses, and the resolution was twice read by unanimous consent. On the question, Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the request of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, I transmit to Congress a copy of certain of its proceedings, communicated for the purpose by the Governor of that State.

JAMES MADISON.

JUNE 4, 1809.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday, which, being amended, was agreed, to, as follows:

11th CON. 1st SESS.—2

Resolved, That a Committee of Elections be appointed.

Ordered, That Messrs. HILLHOUSE, GILES, CRAWFORD, FRANKLIN, and ROBINSON, be the committee.

On motion, by Mr. HILLHOUSE,

FOREIGN ARMED VESSELS.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee, appointed on the 20th instant, to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the exclusion of foreign armed vessels from the ports and harbors of the United States, made report; which was read, as follows:

"That, in the opinion of this committee, such an interdiction is within the just and neutral rights of the United States, and, under other circumstances, would be highly expedient and proper. So long as a neutral nation shall confine itself to strict measures of impartiality, allowing no benefit to one belligerent, not stipulated by treaty, which it shall refuse to another, no cause whatever is afforded for exception or complaint. The right to admit an armed force into a neutral territory, belongs exclusively to the neutral; and when not guaranteed by treaty, as is oftentimes the case, such admission compromises the neutrality of the nation, which permits to one belligerent alone such an indulgence.

"As a measure of safety as well as peace, it is incumbent upon the United States to carry into effect such a provision. So long as we are without a competent force to protect our jurisdiction from violation, and our citizens from outrage, and our flag from insult, so long ought no asylum to be given, but in distress, to the armed vessels of any nation. The committee will not bring into view the many injuries and insults which the United States have sustained from the hospitable grant of their ports and harbors to belligerents; nor the facility which has thereby been afforded to them to lay our commerce under contribution. It is sufficient to remark, that great injuries have been sustained, and that imperious duty requires arrangements at our hands to guard our country in future from similar aggressions.

"The United States are, at this moment, under no obligation to withhold restraints, within their power, upon the admission of foreign armed vessels into their ports; but the committee are too strongly impressed with the propriety of avoiding any legislative interference at this time, which, by any possibility, might be construed into a desire to throw difficulties in the way of promised and pending negotiations. They are desirous that a fair experiment may be made to adjust our differences with the two belligerent nations, and that no provisions be interwoven in our laws which shall furnish a pretext for delay, or a refusal to yield to our just and honorable demands.

"Calculating that the overtures which have been made by Great Britain will be executed in good faith, the committee are willing to believe that the stipulated arrangements will be of such a character as to guard our flag from insult, our jurisdiction from aggression, our citizens from violation, and our mercantile property from spoliation. Under these impressions, which the committee have stated as briefly as possible, they beg leave to submit to the consideration of the Senate the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the further consideration of the subject be postponed until the next session of Congress."

SATURDAY, JUNE 24.

The bill freeing from postage all letters and packets from Thomas Jefferson was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for defraying the expense of stationery, printing, and all other contingent expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives, during the present session of Congress, and an additional appropriation for the purchase of books, maps, and charts, for the Library of Congress," reported an amendment to the bill.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, to expunge the second section of the bill, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the sum of one thousand dollars annually appropriated by the act of February twenty-one, one thousand eight hundred and six, for the term of five years thereafter ensuing, there be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, a further annual sum of four thousand dollars for the purchase of books, maps, and charts, for the Library of Congress, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of a joint committee of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed every session of Congress, during the continuance of this appropriation."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Franklin, German, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith of New York, Turner, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Crawford, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Thruston, and White.

And the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House as amended.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading. Mr. FRANKLIN reported the amendment correctly engrossed, and the bill was read the third time by unanimous consent, and the title amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the amendment reported by the select committee to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt.'"

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee, reported the bill freeing from postage all letters and packets from Thomas Jefferson, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

MONDAY, JUNE 26.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides; and the honorable ANDREW GREGG was elected.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and acquaint him that the Senate have, in the absence of the Vice President, elected the honorable ANDREW GREGG President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary make a like communication to the House of Representatives.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the amendments reported by the select committee to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt;'" and the President reported to the House that the Committee of the Whole had disagreed to the said amendments, but that they had agreed to amend the bill.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, to add a new section to the bill, as follows:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered, from and after the passing of this act, until the first day of January next ensuing, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding three millions five hundred thousand dollars, whenever, in his opinion, it may be expedient to borrow said sum, or any part thereof, in order to provide for the expenses of Government. And that for the more fully carrying into effect the objects of this act, the same powers, regulations, and restrictions, which apply to loans made by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, under the tenth section of the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt,' be, and the same are hereby, vested in, and imposed on, the Secretary of the Treasury. And it shall be lawful for him to make any loan or loans hereby

It was determined in the negative—yeas 3, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Goodrich, Hillhouse, and Lloyd.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Brent, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, German, Giles, Gilman, Gregg, Griswold, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith of New York, Thruston, Turner, White, and Whiteaide.

On the question, Shall this bill pass to a third reading as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Condit, Franklin, Giles, Gregg, Griswold, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Thruston, Turner, and Whiteaide.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Crawford, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and White.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Naval Establishment," reported the bill without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment having been proposed thereto, the bill was ordered to the third reading.

On motion, the bill was read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

The bill in addition to the "Act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. GERMAN, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of John Murray and Sons, reported that the consideration thereof be postponed until the first Monday of December next; and the report was agreed to.

TUESDAY, June 27.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee, reported the bill in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt,'" was read the third time as amended.

On motion, by Mr. HILLHOUSE, to postpone the further consideration thereof until the first Monday in November next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Condit, Franklin, Giles, Gregg, Griswold, Lambert, Meigs, Parker, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Thruston, and Whiteaide.

Ordered, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, June 28.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend and continue in force certain parts of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,'" with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to amend and continue in force certain parts of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,'" and concurred therein.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt.'"

On the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Turner, and Whiteaide.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Crawford, German, Gilman, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and White.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Mr. GAILLARD presented the petition of John Rinaldi, praying to be exonerated from the penalty of the act prohibiting the importation of slaves, for reasons mentioned in the petition; which was read.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from B. H. Latrobe, respecting arrangements in the new Senate Chamber; which was read.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the letter of B. H. Latrobe, of this date, and to give such directions respecting the finishing of the new Senate Chamber as they may judge will best promote the convenience of the Senate; and

Ordered, That Messrs. LLOYD, THRUSTON, and ANDERSON, be the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, entitled "An act to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the remission of certain penalties and forfeitures, and for other purposes," with amendments, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service;" and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for the remission of certain penalties and forfeitures, and for other purposes;" and concurred therein.

The Senate then adjourned to six o'clock this evening.

Six o'clock in the Evening.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Joseph Wilkinson, jun., from his imprisonment;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill brought up for concurrence was read three times by unanimous consent, and passed.

Resolved, That Messrs. POPE and BRENT be a committee on the part of the Senate, with such as the House of Representatives may join, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he may have any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith, and request the appointment of a committee on their part.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a committee on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the intended recess of Congress.

Mr. POPE, from the committee, reported that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress.

On motion, by Mr. THRUSTON, that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of this House, to Tobias Simpson, Elkanah Henley, and Henry Miller, the sum of twenty-five dollars each, in addition to their usual compensation: it was objected to by Mr. PICKERING, as against the rule.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

The Secretary having performed that duty, the PRESIDENT adjourned the Senate, to meet on the fourth Monday of November.

From Ohio—Jeremiah Morrow.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER, &c.

A quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number, being present, the House proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a Speaker.

Messrs. N. R. MOORE, CUTTS, and PORTER, were appointed tellers of the votes.

Mr. N. R. MOORE reported that the result of the ballot was, that there were—

For Joseph B. Varnum, 60; Nathaniel Macon, 36; Timothy Pitkin, junior, 20; Roger Nelson, 1; C. W. Goldsborough, 1; blank ballots, 2.

Mr. VARNUM having 60 votes, it was submitted to the decision of the House by the tellers whether the blank ballots could be considered as votes; if not, there being but 118 votes, Mr. VARNUM having 60, had a majority.

Mr. W. ALSTON conceived that there could be no doubt on the subject; that blank pieces of paper could not be considered as votes. He instanced the case which occurred in the famous balloting for President in the year 1801; at which time, after a number of ballotings, the State of Maryland, which was divided, gave in four blank votes, and thus decided the election.

Mr. MACON thought there could be no question on the subject; he also recollected the case of the Presidential election instanced by his colleague, and was of opinion that blank ballots could not be counted. He hoped that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. VARNUM) would be conducted to the Chair.

Mr. RANDOLPH said this was no ordinary question which the House were about to determine, at the instance of his friend, (Mr. MACON,) in his opinion, in a very irregular manner; and Mr. R. said that he was certain, if his friend were not himself implicated in the question, he would have been one of the last men in the House to give such a decision against himself; but perhaps this was a peculiarity in his friend's character. Are we, gentlemen, (said Mr. R.) to have a Speaker of the House of Representatives without any election? The committee have not reported that one of the persons voted for had a majority of the whole number of votes given; on the contrary, they have expressly reported that no one had a majority. And will the House consent in this manner to choose a Speaker to preside over this body, and perhaps eventually over the destinies of this nation?—for perchance the Speaker might become President of the United States. With respect to the precedent in the case of the election of the President of the United States, there was not, he said, the smallest analogy between the two cases. What was that case? It was on a question whether or not there should exist in this country a Government, that this device had been used, after some forty or fifty ballotings. In order to give a President to the United States, certain gentlemen had thought proper not to vote at all. But, said Mr. R., is time now so precious? Is the Secretary of the President of the United States knocking at the door for admittance? Is the enemy at the gate? Is there not time, I beseech you, gentlemen, to proceed in the regular mode to the election of our officers? Or, shall we, to avoid the trouble of writing a name twice, establish a precedent, which, if established, may put an end to this Government, which is founded on the principle that the majority shall govern? Mr. R. said he was more free in expressing his ideas, because he believed that a second ballot would not affect the result; and he put it to his friend (Mr. MACON) to say whether he himself would consent to take the Chair on the vote of a minority. He said he knew him too well; he would not consent to it. He conceived that there was no question before the House, that they had not elected their Speaker; and that it was their business to proceed to an election. They were certainly competent, he said, to elect the officers of their own body; and he hoped they would do it more majorum—after the fashion of their ancestors.

Mr. STANFORD denied that the case which had been cited from the Presidential election in 1801 had any bearing on the present question. That was a case in which, a State being divided, one-half the representation voted blank, and left to the other half of the representation the right of voting for the State. As, at the same time, a gentleman now from Kentucky, (Mr. LYON,) then the only representative present from Vermont, had, by his single vote, his colleague being absent, decided the vote of that State, he thought there was no analogy.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the House proceed to ballot a second time for Speaker.

The Clerk having put the question, it was carried—67 to 43.

Mr. MACON said he certainly felt a sense of gratitude towards those who had voted for him; but he should be obliged to them to vote for some other person. He had rather remain on the floor of the House than be placed in the Chair. He had experienced the difficulties of the situation; besides, by an illness during last winter, his lungs had been so affected that he did not feel himself adequate to the task. As his declining the situation might be unexpected to some gentlemen, to accommodate them he would ask a postponement of the ballot for a time. He considered the office of Speaker of the House as one of the most honorable in the nation. Perhaps none was more so, after that of President and Vice President. Notwithstanding this, were there a probability of his being chosen, he must decline being placed in the Chair.

Mr. STANFORD moved to postpone a further balloting until two o'clock—Negatived; six gentlemen only rising in the affirmative.

The House then proceeded to a further ballot; and Mr. N. R. MOORE reported the result to be:

For Mr. Varnum, 65; Mr. Macon, 45; Mr. Pitkin, 6; Mr. Howard, 1; Mr. Nelson, 1, and Mr. Goldsborough, 1.

Mr. VARNUM having a majority of votes was declared elected, and conducted to the Chair; whence he addressed the House as follows:

“Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

“The continued manifestation of the national confidence in me, expressed by the Representatives of the people on this occasion, fills my heart with grateful sensibility. In obedience to the call of my country, I accept the office assigned me, and will endeavor to discharge the duties of it according to the best of my abilities, and agreeably to the wishes of the House.”

The SPEAKER having been sworn, the oath to support the Constitution of the United States was by him administered to the members, by States.

The House then proceeded to the choice of a Clerk, by ballot. The votes having been counted, there were—

For Patrick Magruder, 63; Daniel Brent, 38; Nicholas B. Van Zandt, 14; William Lambert, 7, and Mr. Scott, 1.

Mr. Magruder having a majority of votes, was declared to be re-elected.

Mr. GEORGE POINDEXTER having appeared and produced his credentials, as the Delegate from the Mississippi Territory of the United States, the oath was administered to him by the Speaker.

Mr. MACON, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States,

Standing Committees.

reported that the committee had performed the service assigned to them, and that the President signified that he would make a communication to Congress to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that that body was formed, and ready to proceed to business; and that they had appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States, in conjunction with such committee as the House should appoint, to inform him that they were ready to receive any communication he might have to make.

On motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON, a committee was appointed to act with the committee of the Senate. Messrs. MACON and JACKSON were named as the committee.

On motion of Mr. HOLLAND, it was resolved, that the rules and orders of the House in existence at the last session, should be the rules and orders for the present session, until otherwise directed by the House.

The House, after hearing a memorial from Joseph Wheaton, stating his services, and praying a reinstatement in the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, from which he had been ejected, proceeded to the choice of a Sergeant-at-Arms. The whole number was 122, of which Thomas Dunn had 80. He was therefore declared to be re-elected.

On balloting for a Doorkeeper, the whole number of votes was 116, of which Thomas Claxton had 115. He was therefore declared re-elected.

On balloting for an Assistant Doorkeeper, there were—

For Benjamin Burch, 68; Jesse Edwards, 50.

Mr. Burch was therefore elected.

Mr. DAWSON.—Before we adjourn, it will be necessary to fix on some hour at which we shall meet; that hour heretofore has been eleven; but, as the mornings are now long, as some of the reasons which caused the present session have probably ceased, as the select committees will have but little to do, and every gentleman must be anxious to end the session and return home, I would prefer an earlier hour, and therefore offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That unless otherwise directed, the hour of meeting during the present session shall be at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

Agreed to, 52 to 39; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 23.

Several other members, to wit: From Massachusetts, SAMUEL TAGGART; from New York, VINCENT MATTHEWS; from Pennsylvania, DANIEL HEISTER; and from North Carolina, JOSEPH PEARSON; appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings having been read—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to amend it, so as to record the precise state of the two ballots for a Speaker, with a view to a correct understanding of the case, if it should ever be drawn into precedent hereafter.

After a discussion of nearly two hours on the subject of the decision of yesterday, and the analogy betwixt it and the case of the Presidential election of 1801, Mr. RANDOLPH'S motion was agreed to—ayes 70.

The SPEAKER laid before the House several letters from the Governor of the State of Virginia, enclosing certificates of the election of the Representatives of that State in the Eleventh Congress of the United States.

Ordered, That the said certificates, together with the credentials of the members of the House from the several States and Territories, be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with three newspapers to each member, such as the members, respectively, shall choose, to be delivered at their lodgings; and that if any member shall choose to take any newspaper other than a daily paper he shall be furnished with as many of such papers as shall not exceed the price of a daily paper.

The Message of the President of the United States was received, agreeably to the intimation given by the President yesterday to the committee appointed to wait on him. The Message having been read, was referred to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, and 5,000 copies ordered to be printed of the Message, with the documents accompanying it. [See Senate proceedings of this date, ante page 11, for this Message.]

A message was received from the Senate proposing the appointment of two Chaplains of different denominations, to interchange weekly between the two Houses. The proposition was concurred in—ayes 81.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. W. ALSTON moved that the standing committees of the House, viz: the Committee of Ways and Means, Commerce and Manufactures, Public Lands, Claims, Elections, Revisal and Unfinished Business, and of the District of Columbia, be now appointed.

Mr. LYON moved to amend the motion by inserting at the end of it, the words "by ballot." The reasons which he assigned for this motion were, that the course proposed by it would be more respectful to the nation; and that the persons so appointed would feel a greater responsibility to the House. He declared that he should have made the same motion, had the person for whom he had voted been elected to the Chair—having no personal views in proposing it.

Mr. GARDENIER supported the motion. He was in favor of it on the principle of this Government, that the many ruled, in contradistinction to that of monarchical or aristocratical Governments, where one or a few bore sway. He thought it consistent with the republican mode of proceeding and thinking proper for this country, that on all practical occasions this rule should be regarded where the many were as competent as the few or the one, and without meaning the least disrespect to the present Speaker, he conceived that the members of this House were as competent to choose their own organs as the Speaker, whoever might fill the Chair.

Mr. LYON's motion for amendment was negatived, by yeas and nays—67 to 41, as follows:

YEAS—Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Daniel Blaisdell, John Campbell, John C. Chamberlain, William Chamberlin, Matthew Clay, Howell Cobb, James Cochran, John Dawson, James Emott, John W. Eppes, Earent Gardenier, Thomas R. Gold, Edwin Gray, Nathaniel A. Haven, Daniel Heister, James Holland, Robert Jenkins, Walter Jones, Thomas Kenan, Philip B. Key, Herman Knickerbacker, Joseph Lewis, jun., Robert Le Roy Livingston, Matthew Lyon, Vincent Mathews, Archibald McBride, Pleasant M. Miller, William Milnor, Joseph Pearson, John Randolph Lemuel Sawyer, Daniel Sheffey, Samuel Smith, Richard Stanford, John Stanley, James Stephenson, Archibald Van Horn, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, and Laban Wheaton.

NAYS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Adam Boyd, James Breckenridge, John Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, Epaphroditus Champion, James Cox, William Crawford, Henry Crist, Richard Cutts, Joseph Desha, William Findley, Jonathan Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Barzillai Gannett, Gideon Gardner, Thomas Gholson, jr., Peterson Goodwyn, Benjamin Howard, Jacob Hufty, John G. Jackson, Richard M. Johnson, William Kennedy, John Love, Aaron Lyle, Nathaniel Macon, Robert Marion, Samuel McKee, John Montgomery, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Roger Nelson, Thomas Newbold, Thos. Newton, John Nicholson, Benjamin Pickman, jun., John Porter, Peter B. Porter, Josiah Quincy, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Matthias Richards, John Roane, John Ross, Ebenezer Sage, Thomas Sammons, Ebenezer Seaver, Samuel Shaw, George Smith, John Smith, Henry Southard, William Stedman, Lewis B. Sturges, Jacob Swoope, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, John Taylor, John Thompson Uri Tracy, Robert Whitehill, and Robert Witherspoon.

Mr. MACON, in the course of some observations on the motion for appointing the standing committees, declared that he should vote for it under the impression that the House would at this time proceed on general business, and thus avoid a meeting in the winter, except the public service should particularly call for it. Such a course would be a saving of the public money, and also a convenience to the members of Congress. If it were intended merely to take up those subjects expressly recommended, he could not see the propriety of appointing the standing committees. He made a number of observations going to show that frequent and long sessions not only increased the public expense, but would prevent those who were best fitted for the public service, particularly in the Southern and Western States, from consenting to serve as Representatives. The Constitution, he said, had wisely provided that on any emergency Congress might be convened by proclamation. Without bringing into question the subject of confidence, every man must have sufficient confidence in the Executive to believe that he would convene Congress together if the public service required it. He therefore was in favor of going through the unfinished business at this time, and intermitting the usual winter session, unless some extraordinary occasion should require the aid of Congress.

Mr. W. ALSTON said that for himself he was opposed to having a long session at this time, and yet he believed it would be necessary to appoint Committees of Ways and Means and of Commerce and Manufactures. He believed that the good of the nation required that Congress should not make a long session, for they were not possessed of sufficient information to act on several important questions. No one, however, would say that each one of these committees might not be wanted for the dispatch of business.

Mr. LYON was for going on with the business now. At this season of the year he said more business could be done in one month, than could be done in three months in the winter, when the days were so short, and gentlemen, instead of attending to business, were warming themselves at the fire.

Mr. ALSTON's motion for appointing the committees, was carried without a division.

Whereupon, the following standing Committees were appointed, viz.

Committee of Elections—Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. CLAY, Mr. STURGES, Mr. TROUP, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, and Mr. GANNETT,

Committee of Claims—Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. SEEVER, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. PITKIN, Mr. ROBERT BROWN, Mr. JONES, and Mr. STANLEY.

Committee of Commerce and Manufactures—Mr. NEWTON, Mr. DANA, Mr. MARION, Mr. CUTTS, Mr. MUMFORD, Mr. JOHN PORTER, and Mr. McKIM.

Committee of Ways and Means—Mr. EPPES, Mr. WILLIS ALSTON, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. BACON, Mr. REA of Pennsylvania, and Mr. HAVEN.

Committee on the Public Lands—Mr. MORROW, Mr. GOODWYN, Mr. BIBB, Mr. ELY, Mr. BOYD, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. SAMMONS.

Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business—Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. RICHARD JACKSON, and Mr. SHAW.

Committee of Accounts—Mr. NICHOLAS R. MOORE, Mr. STEDMAN, and Mr. MILNOR.

Committee for the District of Columbia—Mr. LOVE, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. VAN HORN, Mr. LEMUEL J. ALSTON, Mr. NEWBOLD, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, and Mr. GARDENIER.

Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads—Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, Mr. HELMS, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. DESHA, Mr. KENAN, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. SMELT, Mr. MORROW, Mr. DAVENPORT, Mr. CHITTENDEN, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. WHITEHILL, Mr. POTTER, Mr. JOHN SMITH, Mr. UPHAM, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. BARD.

WEDNESDAY, May 24.

Another member, to wit: GURDON S. MUMFORD, from New York, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

MAY, 1809.

Reduction of the Army.

H. OF R.

A motion was made by Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, to amend the Journal of yesterday, by inserting, after the reference of the Message from the President of the United States, the following order:

"Ordered, That five thousand copies of the said Message and documents be printed for the use of the members of Congress."

And the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BACON presented a petition of Charles Turner, junior, of the district of Plymouth, and State of Massachusetts, praying that William Baylies, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Massachusetts, may be declared not duly elected, and that he may be admitted to a seat in the House as the Representative in the place of the said William Baylies, whose election and return he declares to be illegal.

Mr. BACON also presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the said district of Plymouth, praying that the above named petitioner, Charles Turner, junior, may be admitted to his seat in the House, he being, in their opinion, fairly, legally, and constitutionally elected.—The petitions were referred to the Committee of Elections.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have elected the Reverend Mr. WILMER, Chaplain to Congress, on their part.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he rose for the purpose of making two motions, the nature and tendency of which he took occasion to explain. It would be perceived that, in his Message, the President of the United States had, with great delicacy and propriety, as it might be conceived, omitted giving any opinion on some of our important national concerns. But, from the silence observed, it might perhaps be inferred, that it was not similar to that which he trusted was the opinion of a majority of this House and of Congress. He said he alluded particularly to that part of the President's Message, in which he spoke on the subject of the late augmentation of our standing army. It would be recollected by many present, that, on a former occasion, a motion had been made in the House for the purpose of arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States. It would also be recollected that the very limited appropriation of only two hundred thousand dollars made for that object, grew out of the very large appropriation made for this standing army and for gunboats—for at that time (the session before the last) the additional appropriation on account of the Navy had not been made. He believed that the people of the United States generally—he spoke particularly in reference to those whom he had the honor to represent—were not satisfied with the disposition at that time made of the public resources. He believed that they were not content, and never would be, to see a standing army fully equipped, armed, and disciplined, while the militia, our natural resource against internal as well as external enemies, remained unarmed and defenceless. I know, said he, that I speak the sentiments of those whom I represent, and I have no cause to believe that it is not the general sentiment of the country; that the most popular act with which the present Administration could follow up the very popular measure which has so materially changed the state of the foreign relations of this country, would be to put down the standing army of the United States, and arm the militia. I know it, sir. And when I speak of putting down the standing army of the United States, I very well know how the general opinion is, nor do I presume myself to differ from that opinion, that we ought to have some regular force for garrisoning the posts on our frontier, and preventing collisions between our frontier settlers and the aboriginal savages. I feel myself, as it were, on the brink of opening a question, which, for the present, I will not touch. My idea is this, sir, that if ever we are to have a respectable regular force, we must, to use a phrase common in our new settled country, begin again from the stump. The old levy will not do. I believe that I have proofs in my possession of the fact, that the old army will not do. I speak particularly with reference to testimony taken down verbatim, of which I presume seven or eight literal copies are in possession of different gentlemen of different political persuasions—testimony before the grand jury at Richmond, which found a true bill against Aaron Burr, Herman Blannerhasset, &c., which testimony I never brought with me to this place till now, and which can be collated and compared by others. It will prove that the old army is rotten to the core; that it is not the safe depository of the sword of this nation; that intrigue and corruption had cankered it to the very heart. Under these circumstances, as we have raised another army, it is left to the wisdom of Congress to say which of the two it will put down. Mr. R. said he presumed it would be in the power of the House, if part of the army was to be disbanded, to retain such as were most trustworthy. He was not sufficiently conversant in military matters to decide that question. This much he knew, that it was in evidence before the grand jury at Richmond, and elsewhere, he believed, and the impression was produced by the evidence of the Commander-in-Chief and his witness, Dunbaugh, that one of the officers, viz: the person who commanded at Fort Massac, was the tool of Aaron Burr; and yet Mr. R. said he had subsequently seen an address—and he did not wish to make any charge against this person; he would not condemn him upon such testimony, much less unheard—an address from this very officer and others, approbatory of the conduct of the Commander-in-Chief; and he had seen this very officer appointed, he presumed with the approbation of the Commander-in-Chief, to a higher command. What were they to think of the Commander-in-Chief, when he came forward and stated what he believed, and fortified it by the testimony of a witness on whom he relied, going to prove that a particular officer was an accomplice of Aaron Burr; and when they saw that very officer putting his name to an address of approbation to the Commander-in-Chief, and afterwards promoted in the Army? What could they conceive but that it was a commutation of so much solid pudding for so much empty praise? Again: Mr. R. said it had been in proof before that jury that the officer who had commanded at Chickasaw Bluff was so far implicated as to permit Aaron Burr to take arms from the public arsenal at that place for his expedition. The name of the officer he said he could not recollect. In short, he repeated again to the House, that if the grand jury had been governed by the impressions made upon them by the testimony laid before them, they would have been of opinion that scarcely a man in the Army was exempt. Even those who would not agree to file a bill against the Commander-in-Chief for misprision of treason, believed that though A or B might stand clear, there were few who were not the tools of the Commander-in-Chief or Aaron Burr, for the two were so closely identified through the transaction, that it was scarcely possible to separate them. The object of his first motion, then, was a reduction of the Army generally, which he should attempt, were he certain that every man, down to the meanest individual in that Army, was like Cæsar's wife, not only guiltless, but unsuspected. It had also for its object the giving an opportunity to the Government of the United States to separate the sound from the unsound part of the present Army, which might reduce it to the number at which it stood when the late President of the United States came into office.

The other motion which Mr. R. had to make, he said, was in relation to a subject to which he thought the attention of the House ought to be drawn. When the late Administration had come into power, it had been in quality of reformers. Their object was to sweep with the besom of scrutiny every part of this Government. He thought it due to the character of every administration that a scrutiny into its money transactions should take place. A motion on this subject, made at the first session of the seventh Congress, would be well recollected; and when Mr. Wolcott went out of office, Mr. R. said he believed that he had invited an inquiry into the state of the Treasury. Mr. R. said he should therefore move the following:

Resolved, That the troops raised under the act of the twelfth of April, one thousand eight hundred and eight, entitled "An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force," be immediately disbanded; and that the balance of appropriation remaining unexpended in relation to the same, and any balance of appropriation for gunboats which may remain unexpended, be applied towards arming and equipping the whole body of the Militia of the United States.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether moneys drawn from the Treasury since the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and one, have been faithfully applied to the objects for which they were appropriated, and whether the same have been regularly accounted for; and to report, likewise, whether any further arrangements are necessary to promote economy, enforce adherence to Legislative restrictions, and secure the accountability of persons entrusted with public money.

The House agreed to consider these motions, by yeas and nays, unanimously—116 members voting.

Mr. EPPES suggested the propriety of the gentleman's modifying his first motion so as to meet the ideas expressed by himself, viz: that more confidence was to be placed in the new than in the old army. At present his resolution went to retain the old army and disband that in which he placed most confidence. He had rather have seen a general resolution that the Army should have been reduced to a certain number of men. Such a mode of procedure would give an opportunity of selecting those which were most proper to retain. As to the second resolution, Mr. E. conceived it to clash with the powers of the Committee of Ways and Means, whose duties he quoted from the rules of the House. The gentleman from Virginia cannot have forgotten that, in the year 1802, on this very subject, I submitted a resolution almost in the same words. He was at that time at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, and my motion was opposed by him and overruled by the House on the ground that it was on a subject exclusively appropriated by the rules of the House to the Committee of Ways and Means. I assure the gentlemen, however, that though I would adhere to the rules of the House, yet were there any specified case of expenditure in which he supposed the laws had been violated and money improperly drawn, I should not have the slightest objection to the resolution taking that form, that he may have an opportunity of investigating the subject fully.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he felt himself called up by what had fallen from the gentleman on his right. He said he was not apprized of the existence of the Committee of Ways and Means, whose duty it was to inquire into this subject; nor was he apprized of the same fact at the time (the 14th December, 1801) when his friend from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) then, but no longer—to his great regret and the detriment of the public—a member of this House, made a motion, from which the present was copied verbatim. I was then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and yet saw no impropriety in the motion. With due deference to the gentleman from Virginia, and his memory too, I think he has not exactly recollected the motion which he made on a former occasion, and which he says was overruled. This, however, is but of little moment. I recollect perfectly well the gentleman's making a motion which did imply, if anything, a want of confidence in the Committee of Ways and Means, and that I opposed the motion on that ground. But I had thought, sir, that a precedent from the first session of the sixth Congress, the first under the late Presidency—that a precedent from those days would not be rejected in these. The Committee of Ways and Means were appointed on the 7th day of December. On the Monday following, one week after precisely, a motion was made by Mr. NICHOLSON that a committee be appointed to inquire and report, &c. And it was ordered that Mr. N., and another gentleman, both, at the same time, members of the Committee of Ways and Means, should, with others, compose that committee. I am very unwell, sir; and will conclude what I have to say at this time by observing, that if the gentleman supposes me to be electioneering for the place of chairman of a committee, he is much mistaken. If I have ambition, it flies at nobler game. And, again: the state of my health, and particularly of my eyes, would unfit me from acting on any committee where much writing was necessary, even if I had interest enough with the Chair to be appointed on such a committee, for certainly I had contemplated, in case the SPEAKER should put me on either of the committees which I hope will grow out of my own motions, to request to be excused from serving, for it is a lamentable fact, that, while I was quoting the Journal a few minutes ago, I could scarcely see to read it. As to any particular instance of malversation of public money, I do not pretend to say that I know of none, because, at the last session, I recollect that I brought some such matters before the House. I certainly suspect others; and though I might act as a humble assistant to a committee to point their inquiries that way or the other, it would be impossible for me to undertake business where much writing was involved, and more especially where figures were necessary.

MAY, 1809.

H. OF R.

Mr. EPPES said he was sorry, on this subject, to occupy the time of the House. He had only performed a duty in saying what had already fallen from him. The gentleman had stated the fact correctly, but he should have recollected that it was long after the adoption of Mr. NICHOLSON'S resolution that this duty had been especially assigned to the Committee of Ways and Means; it was not till after that famous investigating committee had made their report. As to any imputation or indirect attack on the motives of the gentleman from Virginia, I am above it. In my conduct in public and private life, it is always my wish, it always has been, and ever will be my wish, to extend to every one that civility which one gentleman owes to another. And I never have in these walls wounded the feelings of any man except circumstances justified it, nor ever will.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he well recollected the time at which the alteration had been made in the rule for appointing a Committee of Ways and Means. But he asked, whether the rule was not before sufficiently broad to have enabled the Committee of Ways and Means to go into every research which the investigating motion pointed to? But again: Does the gentleman from Virginia remember, notwithstanding that very rule was quoted at the time he made his motion, he did pertinaciously persist in support of it, as the journals, I believe, will show? It is equally my desire, with the gentleman from Virginia, or any other, to avoid hurting the feelings of those with whom I have always the honor, and sometimes the pleasure, to act. But it will be recollected by my colleague, (Mr. EPPES,) that the state of things to which he alludes was materially different from the present. The committee of investigation, out of which this new rule for the Committee of Ways and Means grew, had made their report. The examination into the state of the departments was finished; the Augean stable was in a manner cleansed, and the task remaining to be performed was more within the compass of the powers of the Committee of Ways and Means, burdened as it is with other important business. Another thing I may be permitted to name without wounding the feelings of the gentleman from Virginia, certainly without intending to do so. The person who filled the chair of the Committee of Ways and Means, at that time, was not a person whom any considerations of delicacy could affect. I was not in the House this morning when the Journal was read, but I conceive the worthy gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) to be the chairman of the present Committee of Ways and Means, because I saw a paper handed from the Clerk to him. I would ask him, sir, if I am not acting towards him with peculiar delicacy in raising another committee to investigate the transactions of an Administration with whom that gentleman was so intimately and so delicately connected?

A motion having been made to refer these resolutions to a Committee of the Whole—

Mr. MACON said he could not see the object of referring the first motion at all. Where was the propriety of referring a motion for inquiring into a particular subject? He was in favor of the object of the motion, thinking it a good rule to establish, that, whenever a President went out of office, a committee should be appointed to investigate the money transactions of his Administration. When General WASHINGTON went out of office there was no such committee appointed; and, indeed, it might be admitted as truth that he was considered as an exception. No single individual thought of a scrutiny into his conduct; he was considered a man of all parties. When Mr. Adams went out, a committee was appointed to examine into the money transactions of his Administration. The time was come, Mr. M. said, when a majority, holding the same principles as the Administration whose term of service has just expired, should inquire into its money transactions. Shall we not do to ourselves that which we did to others? I think it right in all cases to investigate; and when I say this, I feel no hesitation in saying that the nation will never be blessed with such another Administration as the last. When a man goes out of office, notwithstanding the existence of the Committee of Ways and Means, I would appoint a committee solely to that object. It is a sort of ordeal which every man ought to undergo. Some nation, of which I have read, had a law to try their chiefs after they were dead. When a man goes out of office he is politically dead; and I would establish it as a rule never to be departed from, that whenever a man went out of office, there should be an investigation into the money transactions conducted by him. Could anything redound more to the honor of a former Chief Magistrate, when he is again a private citizen, than to have his money transactions brought into view, and for that branch of the Legislature which is particularly the guardian of public money to say, that he has deserved well of his country? And should the fact prove to be so, it would certainly add more to his reputation than anything which could be done while he was in office. I think it a custom which should never be departed from. I wish it were a part of the national Constitution. There is no such thing as a perfect man in creation. Every man is liable to error; intention only makes it criminal. I would have conduct scrutinized. But I cannot see the propriety of referring this motion to a committee in the first instance.

Mr. RANDOLPH varied his motion so as to move a concurrence in the second resolution proposed by him, and a reference of the first to a select committee, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. LYON said he was opposed to disbanding the Army. Though he had been opposed to raising so large an Army in the first instance, he was not for disbanding it at this moment. The people on the northwestern frontier, in the Territory of Indiana, were now alarmed for the safety of that country, and a regiment at least was necessary in that quarter. Should we, then, now disband the Army? He did not conceive that our foreign affairs were quite settled. Could they say that our Southern frontier was safe? That there was no danger there? It could not be said. He was pleased with the present peaceable aspect of affairs; but he had no idea that we ought to lay down our arms when the state of the whole world was as it now is. Thus much he would say to show that he was not to be carried away by a peace mania any more than a war mania.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said it would be perceived from the Message of the President, that he had called the attention of Congress to the very subject of the first resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, in these words: "It will rest with the judgment of Congress to decide how far the change in our external prospects may authorize any modifications of the laws relating to the Army and Navy establishments." Inasmuch as a committee would be raised on the Message, and the House were to have a report on this subject from the War Department, without which they could not act understandingly, the motion he conceived to be premature. It narrowed the field of inquiry too much. There would be, if the motion were agreed to, one committee appointed particularly to inquire into the propriety of a reduction of the Army, and another committee to inquire generally into the subject of the Army. In relation to the second resolution, he had no objection to it, but that it proposed usurping powers already given to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that he possibly might not have understood the President's Message; but unquestionably the President of the United States had not given any opinion on the subject of a reduction of the military force. Now, suppose the House were to go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the Message of the President was dissected secundum artem, cut up into various business for committees. How much would be referred to the committee to whom is referred "so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our Military and Naval Establishments?" What would be before them? The President's opinion that the Army should be augmented, or diminished, or kept up? Nothing of that sort. He had said that he left it to Congress to determine what should be done with this matter. Where the President recommended any measure to Congress, it might be referred to a committee. Suppose the President had said something of this kind—"I forbear, gentlemen, to call your attention to any particular objects, relying on your patriotism to adopt such measures as shall conduce to the public weal." Would the House refer any particular part of it? No; and yet quo ad this subject, such was the late Message. When the President, at the session before the last, had called particularly for troops, which Mr. R. thought he had at one time done, the Message was referred to a committee, because it had an express object in view.

Mr. R. again mentioned the motion of Mr. EPES, in 1802; and observed that the gentleman's recollection of it was correct. It is equally true (said he) that disagreeable consequences grew out of it—that my colleague persisted in saying his motion was proper, and I that it was improper; that he was for it, and I against it; and now I make this motion and vote for it, and he against it. If this prove anything, it is precisely that we have changed our opinions quo ad hoc, supposing the cases to be analogous. But they are not analogous. That period was not the era of a new Administration of the Government of this country. Sure I am that there existed no connexion between the then Executive and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means which renders it delicate in him to make a rigorous investigation, or which might be presumed to arrest the chairman of the committee in the rigorous discharge of his duty. I have no right to suppose, sir, that such is the case with the gentleman from Virginia. But let me ask him if an acquittal on his verdict would operate to the same extent on the public mind as if on that of any other person? I wish to be distinctly understood—it would be putting the reputation of the late Administration on that sort of game, which children call "cross I win, pile I lose"—because the Administration had nothing to gain by an investigation so conducted. My friend from North Carolina (Mr. MAÇON) differs from both of us, taking a middle course, as it were, between us. I agree perfectly with the gentleman from North Carolina as to one part of his declaration. Without the slightest disposition to create unpleasant sensations, to go back upon the footsteps of the last four years, I do unequivocally say that I believe the country will never see such another Administration as the last; it had my hearty approbation for one half of its career—as to my opinion of the remainder of it, it has been no secret. The lean kine of Pharaoh devoured the fat kine; the last four years, with the embargo in their train, eat up the rich harvest of the first four; and if we had not had some Joseph to have stepped in and changed the state of things, what would have been now the condition of the country? I repeat it—never has there been any Administration which went out of office, and left the nation in a state so deplorable and calamitous as the last. And should I, having expressed this opinion, be afraid to express it now? Let us not look back sir; let the evil of the late Administration be buried with it—let its good deeds alone be inscribed on its monument. Let us look forward, and take especial care that no attempt to bolster up its dignity, to add lustre to its deeds, prevent us from acting with a single eye to the public good. As if no such Administration had existed, let us begin de novo. I do most cordially congratulate the nation on the change which has taken place, and I shall be willing, I trust, to co-operate in every measure let it come whence it will, which shall be for the public good. I am for putting down the standing army; for arming the militia; for ferreting out rats in the public departments. If this be done, it is immaterial by whom; and if faithfully performed, it is perfectly immaterial whether it be on a motion of myself or any other gentleman, or in any other way. Let us get the substance, and not be satisfied with the shadow. When I say that the saving from the two inordinate sources of expense (army and gunboats) shall be applied towards arming of the militia, do gentlemen suppose that I will be content to receive that for the full quota? No, sir; as one of the militia of the United States, I never will, so help me God! as a freeholder of Virginia, vote for any man, to any office, who will not arm every citizen in the nation capable of bearing arms. I consider, sir, that we have acted with a supineness disgraceful to a free people. We have been voting millions for standing armies, millions for gunboats, millions for a navy; and for arming the militia, we have voted two hundred thousand dollars, not twenty cents a head, to put a musket and bayonet into the hands of every man in the nation. If it be said—why do you not force them, as they do in the Eastern States, to arm themselves? My answer is this: If money can be wasted on standing armies, let us (even admitting it to be a waste) waste some on the owners of the soil, the real sovereigns of this country. We have been guilty, I repeat, of a supineness disgraceful to a free people, and I say it without imputation on this man or that man, this Administration, or that. The people who will consent to remain unarmed whilst arms are put into the hands of a standing army governed by martial law, and commanded, I will not say by whom, are ripe for a master. But our people are not ripe for it—it is their contempt for military force, and that only, which has rendered them quiet. They feel the security of strength, not always the best reliance. But I will never rest as a member of this House, and when I cease to be a member as a freeholder, till I see the object accomplished, or in a fair way of being accomplished, of putting a musket into the hands of every man capable of bearing it. And then, sir, there will be no more alarms of invasions from Canada, of Colonel Burr on the Southern frontier, nor any alarm, unless indeed the people are their own worst enemies; nor any more of the use made of Colonel Burr, and that party. We shall have no more enforcing embargo laws, no more bills for suspending the writ of habeas corpus, no more new editions of the law of treason. The House of Hanover were called into Britain—for what? To make the nation free, to guard against popery, for that was the religious age, as this is the political; and no sooner was the House of Hanover placed on the throne, than by means of the Pope and the Pretender, the nation was bullied into acts which we all know led to the prostration of their liberties. In short, sir, I hope hereafter, to see questions tried on their own merit, and that, like naughty boys in a nursery, we shall not be frightened into measures by tales of the ascendancy of this or that party, or this or that man. For, in the course of my political experience, I have found but two parties in all States—the ins and outs; the ins desirous so to construe the charter of the Government as to give themselves the greatest possible degree of patronage and wealth; and the outs striving so to construe it as to circumscribe—what? Their own power? No, sir; their adversaries' power. But let the outs get in, and lay hold of the artillery of Government, and you will find their Constitutional scruples and arguments vanish like dew before the morning sun. No, sir; I have no faith in the declarations of parties, and, if we mean to guard the liberties of this State, we must watch the ins, be they who they may, be they Federalists, or be they Republicans. When I say we, sir, I speak of us, the people, who cannot be the ins, and thus are fair umpires both between the ins and the outs.

Reduction of the Army.

Mr. LYON did not believe that this first resolution would ultimately have any effect; but it would raise expectations in the nation that the Army was to be abandoned. Mr. L. said, we were not, upon a few favorable words coming from Great Britain, without any other atonement for the affair of the Chesapeake, to throw down our arms. He hoped the House would not agree to it. He was willing to agree to some modification of the Army, to make removals of such officers as had lost the confidence of the nation. He would make a reduction, but not in this way.

Mr. W. ALSTON said, the resolution respecting the Army certainly could not be acted upon until the report could be received which was mentioned in the Message of the President of the United States. The mode proposed for the disposition of the motion was irregular. He said it would be more like the House of Representatives to lay it on the table till the Message had been taken up, and then to have referred it to the committee raised on that particular subject.

The question was taken on referring Mr. RANDOLPH'S first resolution to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and carried, ayes 81. The question now being on concurrence in the second resolution—

Mr. EPPES moved so to amend it as to inquire into the application of all moneys under the late Administration. When up before, he had done what he conceived to be his duty; the House had assigned certain duties to committees, to which he thought it proper to adhere; but when we heard the gentleman from North Carolina suggest that this was a motion to pass in review all transactions of the former Administration; it impressed him very differently from what it had before done. If the gentleman was disposed to make such a motion, he should not take the very words of the rule establishing the Committee of Ways and Means; more especially there was no occasion for the latter part of the motion, which goes to the directing the committee to propose a plan which it was the express duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into. Mr. E. moved so to vary the motion as to make it a motion for the appointment of a committee to inquire how far moneys appropriated since the 4th of March, 1801, have been faithfully applied.

Mr. RANDOLPH consented to the modification, though it had not been his intention to have gone so far back.

Mr. MAGON made a few remarks in addition to those which he had before made. He said that he differed totally from the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) on the subject of the embargo; and if this were the proper time to go into it, he thought he could convince even him of its wisdom.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON expressed his coincidence in the opinion that it was the duty of the House of Representatives to inquire rigorously into the disbursement of public moneys. He thought it was the duty of the House of Representatives to raise a committee every year to inquire into the subject, and thus to take evil by the forelock, if any existed.

Mr. TAYLOR said, he should not have risen but that the observations which had fallen from different gentlemen seemed to have looked everywhere but within the walls of the House. When, said he, we are about to inquire whether an Administration has done right or wrong, whether money appropriated has been honestly applied to the purposes for which it is appropriated, we seem to have forgotten that we also have to look into our own conduct, to review especially, according to the powers vested in the Committee of Ways and Means, their acts. We are about to inquire not only into the conduct of the Administration proper, the Executive and Heads of Departments, but also whether the committee of this House having the care of money concerns have done their duty. I like the motion the better for it. I am unwilling to institute a stricter scrutiny into the conduct of the other departments than of our own; and if the rat-catchers of former sessions have not caught the animals, we will turn in and not only ferret out the rats, but hunt the lazy cats who let them live. Mr. T. said, he felt no hesitation in going into the investigation and cleansing the Augean stable, as it had been styled; and it was principally to draw off the attention of the House from the individuality which seemed to be attached to the inquiry, that he had risen. He was the more willing to adopt it, because it had been a course usually adopted to appoint on such a committee, gentlemen of different political opinions, the ins and the outs; those willing to keep in, and those willing to drive them out and take their places. It is due to ourselves, said he, to do to ourselves what we did to others on a former occasion; and I am therefore gratified that the motion is made.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, he could assure the gentleman from South Carolina, that when he drew up the resolution, he was aware of its bearings; and that he was willing to endure any judgment that a fair trial under the resolution should lead to. He was sorry to have excited so much feeling on this occasion; he did not mean it—it arose perhaps from a defect in his nature that would not permit him to suppress his ideas. He explained the epithet of "rats" to have been one which some years ago was applied, in the newspapers and elsewhere, to public defaulters. But since that time he had heard nothing of defaulters, but from those papers, he had nearly said persons, who were the friends of the rats of that day. I felt the full force of my motion, said Mr. R.; and does the gentleman think that it might not, in addition to other considerations, have influenced my opinion when I declined being considered as chairman of the committee. If I have acted the part of a lazy cat, I am willing to suffer. Whatever may be brought against the Committee of Ways and Means, or whatever may be said of their inertness, certainly nothing of wilful misdeed can be charged upon them; and there is a wide difference, as I understand, between a Committee of this House failing in its duty to make a thorough investigation into the conduct of the officers of the Government and the misdeeds committed by those officers—the one being an act of omission or carelessness, and the other of wilful wrong. In all instances, in my recollection, where the public money was improperly applied, the committee did execute their duty; I believe they were suspected of an intention to execute it too harshly. The subcommittee of accounts of this House was a committee instituted at their suggestion, to guard expenditures, because their other duties would not permit the Committee of Ways and Means to pay sufficient attention to it. Mr. R. said, that the proposed investigation would apply to the expenditures of this and the other House as well as to the expenditures of the officers of the Government—to the contingent expenses particularly. The late President of the United States, said Mr. R.—it would give me pleasure to do any man justice, and more especially him—I will do him the justice to say that it was not his fault that reforms were not pushed farther—that an investigation was not made, not only into the expenditures of this, but of all the other departments of the Government. I speak of contingent expenses. He came into this Government the friend of reform and economy, and continued to practise economy as much as any man could who had the command of a fleet of gunboats, a standing army, and resources cut off by an embargo. And, sir, though this is not the time, and I hope not the place, to take up the gauntlet thrown down by my friend from North Carolina (Mr. MAÇON) on the embargo question—[Mr. MAÇON said, he certainly understood the gentleman from Virginia to have thrown the gauntlet first.] Since I see my friend before me, continued Mr. R., I call upon him (Mr. MAÇON) to say that it was not the late President's fault that reforms were not made, and that he commented with extraordinary severity on the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress; to which I trust the attention of the proposed committee will be drawn.

The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH'S second resolution, as amended, on motion of Mr. EPPES, and carried unanimously, one hundred and twenty-four members voting.

After the resolution had been agreed to, it appeared from some observations made by Messrs. EPPES and JACKSON, that they had understood, in voting for the motion, that the last clause of the resolution had been stricken out. This not having been done, Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved to reconsider the resolution for the purpose of amending it. After some debate, the House agreed to reconsider it, 55 to 53; but before the proposed amendment could be made, a motion made by Mr. NELSON to adjourn, was carried, 65 to 43.

THURSDAY, May 25.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report of the state and disposition, at this time, of the vessels belonging to the Navy of the United States, and of the gunboats; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the manufacturers of hats residing in Fredericktown, State of Maryland, praying that an additional duty may be laid on the importation of hats of foreign manufacture, or that the importation thereof may be entirely prohibited.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. FINDLEY presented a memorial of Arthur St. Clair, a Major General in the Army of the United States, during the Revolutionary War with Great Britain, praying the reimbursement of a sum of money advanced by him on public account, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, for the purpose of re-enlisting the troops then in service in the Northern Department, in order to form the permanent army then organizing agreeably to a resolution of Congress. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

SWEDISH AND PORTUGUESE VESSELS.

Mr. NEWTON offered a resolution to instruct the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into and report on the expediency of permitting vessels of those nations with whom intercourse was permitted, to take cargoes, &c. He stated to the House that at present vessels of Sweden and Portugal, with whom intercourse is permitted, could not load and depart; and on this subject a letter was read from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BURWELL said there was another subject connected with the resolution, which ought to be taken into consideration. The proclamation of the President declares that on the 10th of June next, the operation of the non-intercourse law, as relates to Great Britain, shall cease. It went into operation on the 20th of this month. Of course there were many vessels on the coast which could not get in before the 20th of May. He submitted it to the Chairman of the Committee, whether it would not be proper at once to do away all restriction, because the policy of its existence had ceased in relation to Great Britain from the restoration of harmony with her; and if the goods on our coast were not permitted to be regularly landed, they might be smuggled in, and injure the revenue. He thought it would be proper to inquire into the expediency of doing away at once, by law, all interdiction of commerce.

Mr. NEWTON said he had no objection to act on the subject mentioned by his colleague, but he did not conceive it to be connected with the present motion.

Mr. NEWTON'S motion having been agreed to, he immediately reported "a bill respecting the ships or vessels owned by citizens of foreign nations with whom commercial intercourse is permitted."—Twice read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

NON-INTERCOURSE ACT.

Mr. LIVERMORE said that he did not distinctly hear all that fell from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) but, from what he had heard, he apprehended that it was on a subject of great importance. There were many vessels on the coast, which, were they to enter our harbors, would fall within the description of the 4th, 5th, and 6th sections of the non-intercourse act. From the happy commencement of the settlement of our differences with Great Britain, he did not believe it was the design of any gentleman that the non-intercourse should be enforced in this particular. He therefore offered a resolution for suspending the act, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the operation of so much of the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies," as inhibits the importation of goods from Great Britain and its dependencies, be suspended until the tenth day of June next.

The said resolution was read, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, with leave to report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

DOCTRINE OF LIBELS.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that among the various topics of difference between the two great contending parties in the United States, during the Administration of Mr. Adams, there had been none perhaps of greater magnitude in the public estimation than a celebrated act commonly called the Sedition Act; and there had been none perhaps which had more tended to the downfall and overthrow of the Administration under which it was enacted. The question then made by the people of the United States was not whether that law contained a good law of libel or not; whether that clause of the Constitution, contained in one of its amendments, declaring that Congress should make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, did not completely foreclose Congress, and preclude them from legislating on the subject at all. And, said he, by a very great body of the American people, as I understand, a verdict has been given that Congress do not possess the right of passing any act on this subject whatever; and I trust and believe that there will never exist another Congress which will have the temerity and hardihood to meddle with the rights of the people and the States on this point. There are some of us, sir, who were members of the House of Representatives at the time the law in question expired. I well recollect, and probably you do also, Mr. Speaker, the very splendid and beautiful declamation with which a member at that time from South Carolina (Mr. HARPER) exhorted the majority of this House to re-enact that law, on the ground that it would be a shield and protection to them, as going out of power, against their adversaries, into whose hands power was about to be transferred, as the sedition law would allow them to give the truth in evidence, and the common law does not. And he then foretold, what I confess I listened to with the most perfect incredulity, that prosecutions for libel would be commenced and carried on in the courts of the United States at common law. Sir, I was not only incredulous myself at that moment, but had the uncharitableness to think that the gentleman himself did not believe in the opinion which he advanced. I believed it impossible for an Administration coming into power on the terms on which the last did, ever to sanction a prosecution at common law for a libel where the truth could not be given in evidence. The doctrine contended for by the Federal party, and ably supported by a member, (Mr. BAYARD,) who is now translated to the other House, that the common law of England is the law of the United States, was a doctrine more abhorrent, if possible, to the feelings of the Republican party in the United States, than the law itself. For if the sedition law was objectionable because it established a law of libel which permitted the truth to be given in evidence, a fortiori, the common law doctrine was more so, which not only established a law of libel the more hideous, because the truth was not permitted to be given in evidence, but established the whole system of penal laws in the British books which might be found in relation to the subject. Accordingly, the best pens and the ablest minds in the party to which you and I had the honor to belong, were employed in attempting to refute the heresy and against the sedition law. It is unnecessary to call to your recollection the writings of Hortensius, the resolutions of Colonel John Taylor, of Caroline, and the still more illustrious report of the present Chief Magistrate, going to explode the doctrine by irresistible arguments. To this succeeded a tract by a gentleman of no obscure fame, who has rendered himself somewhat conspicuous as a law character by his commentaries on that great commentator, Sir William Blackstone, still going to show that the common law of England was not the law of the United States; that, although it has been adopted by the several States with various modifications, it is no further law than as they have adopted it, and under the limitations made to it by each State; but that as a law of the United States in their federal capacity, it has no validity—since, if it had, of the different common laws in the United States, which should we adopt? Or should we take the common law of England, of a monarchy, founded upon an hereditary nobility, and a great hierarchy, unsuited to the genius of a republican Government? But, sir, such unhappily is the difference between men out of power, and men in power, that, if we are to believe the representations made at the last session of Congress, by a member from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) the correctness of which I presume no man would have the hardihood to doubt, prosecutions for libels at common law have been entertained in the courts of the United States against citizens, and consequently have been carried on by the attorneys for the districts wherein such prosecutions commenced. Yes, sir, such is the difference between men in power and men out of power; such the difference between profession and practice; and yet, to my infinite surprise, this awful truth—this fact—which never came to my knowledge before, appeared scarcely to excite a sensation either in this assembly or the public—in the men who were most clamorous against the sedition law. Yes, sir, we did execrate, and most justly execrate, the sedition law. I for one had as thorough a contempt for some of those who fell under its penalties, as the judge who inflicted them. The question was not whether James Thompson Callender was not an infamous libeller, any more than the famous Middlesex question was, whether John Wilkes was an infamous character; but it was a question as to the deprivation of the birthright of the citizen in one case, and the subject in the other, and the people wisely discriminated between the persons who were the subjects of prosecution, and their own best and dearest interests. We said that Congress had no right to pass any law at all on the subject. It cannot be denied, that if we are to have a federal law of libel, that which permits the truth to be given in evidence is as good as any. It was not to the nature of the law that we objected, but to the having a federal law of libel at all; though indeed, sir, the permission to give the truth in evidence is but an idle mockery when we consider that the officer, whose duty it is to provide an impartial jury, is but the breath of the nostrils of the prosecutor. You ought to recollect that in all cases where the Government becomes a party, whether pro or con, you too often have an administration of politics, instead of an administration of law and justice. It is true, that the Constitution does declare that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; but if Congress, or the courts below, can at once saddle us with the common law of England, there is no necessity for prohibiting the abridgement of the freedom of speech, or of the press. We know what the common law of England is—an unlimited license to print, and an almost equally unlimited license to punish. This restriction of the Constitution, therefore, is wholly nugatory, if the courts are permitted to entertain prosecutions for libels. Sir, that the present Chief Magistrate of the United States should permit an attorney of the United States to hold his office one second after having commenced a prosecution in a court of common law for libel, is what I will not believe, for he could not do it without libelling, by that act of omission, the fairest page of the history of his own life, to wit: his celebrated report made in the session of the Virginia Assembly, which commenced in December, 1799. But I am willing to have some better security than the disposition of any Executive, for what I conceive one of the highest, proudest attributes of American freemen. I know it may be said, as it once was, when the writ of habeas corpus was set at defiance, that forasmuch as the right is contained in the Constitution and supported by it, all legislative provision on that subject would be a mere work of supererogation; and yet, sir, who has heard of any recovery under the Constitution for the violation of the best, dearest, most invaluable right of a citizen? In fact, take away the writ of habeas corpus to-morrow, and I would not give a pinch of snuff for our Constitution, for without it, every man may be imprisoned at pleasure. Government might possibly demand a forced loan, with which, if the citizen did not comply, he might be carried to jail. There is no free government where this wonderful contrivance, this best hope of man, this sheet-anchor of freedom, the writ of habeas corpus, is not found. And yet we may be told that, as the freedom of the speech and press is secured by the Constitution, all legislative provision on the subject is not merely superfluous, but not respectful to the Constitution; and so our citizens are to go on to be prosecuted at common law, and when they get no remedy, they are told their rights are guaranteed by the Constitution, but receive no satisfaction. I therefore think it would be a very wise provision on our part, at this time, to prevent a recurrence of similar cases, guarding against the future by woeful experience, a school in which it is said a fool himself must learn, although he will learn in no other; and, as far as that epithet may be considered as applying to myself, I do most candidly confess that I have been compelled to learn from this school; for when the gentleman from South Carolina uttered that brilliant declamation in order to induce this House to reenact the sedition law, and hang it over their heads as a shield from prosecution, I really thought it a mere speech for the people, for I had no conception that a court of the United States would ever entertain a prosecution for libel at common law. I therefore submit to you the following resolution, premising, before I conclude, that my object will be, finding the Constitution inert on this subject, as it only contains an acknowledgment of the right to administer wholesome fine and imprisonment to those who shall hereafter undertake to carry on such prosecutions:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any and what prosecutions have been entertained by the courts of the United States for libels at common law, and to report such provisions as in their opinion may be necessary for securing the freedom of speech and of the press.

Mr. DANA said perhaps that the resolution, as now expressed, did not go to the whole extent to which the gentleman intended. That prosecutions had been instituted for supposed slanders or for supposed seditious words, was unquestionable. For two, three, or four years past, prosecutions of this character had been pending in the circuit court of the United States, in the district of Connecticut. That some of the prosecutions attempted to establish the imputation of crime against individuals, and in cases not comprehended under the provisions of the statute so much reprobated under the name of the sedition act, was unquestionable. Prior to the institution of these prosecutions, however, from an apprehension of what might be done by men who had professed much zeal for liberty, but not in practice given stronger instances of regard for it than those who professed less, in the State of Connecticut a bill was introduced into the Legislature for securing the freedom of the press. That bill consisted of one section, which was copied from the reprobated sedition act—that very section which provided that the truth should be given in evidence; and it was called an act for securing the freedom of the press. And before any prosecutions were instituted, when only a district judge presided in the court, that judge declared that he should consider the act of the State of Connecticut relative to giving the truth in evidence, as binding on the Federal court in that State. This was the opinion of one judge; there was some question how it would be ultimately decided before a full court. Such a law formed a more abundant protection against any persecution which might be directed against individuals under the form of a prosecution, than any proessions whatever. In the State of Connecticut, said Mr. D., there is one further security: that our jurors are designated by lot. The names of freeholders selected by certain officers in the towns are put into a box, and then selected by lot. There have been seven or eight prosecutions commenced, I scarcely know for what, whether for libellous or seditious words, against clergymen and public preachers, for words uttered by them; and very considerable expenses have been incurred by them. But I cannot say that any man ever suffered any further than this; that they were at a very great expense in defending themselves. They had a great security in one respect: that the talents of the bar were against these prosecutions; and there was such a peculiar talent of going backwards in the prosecution, that the suits generally went out of court with a nolle prosequi, from some error in the indictment, some defect in professional skill, or some error in clerkship. The only case in which there seemed to be any possibility of conviction, was one in which a question was made as to the power of the court to take cognizance of the subject. The question was on the prosecution of a printer there, for publishing what had appeared with perfect safety in another State. The judges declared themselves divided in opinion on the question of jurisdiction. That diversity of opinion was certified, and the question expected to be brought before the Supreme Court last February. On applying to the judge, I found that the clerk of the circuit court had not forwarded the certificate, and of course the case did not come up here as expected. I suppose that the whole thing will die without any noise. Another reason why the persons in Connecticut were not disposed to make very much noise about it while prosecutions were depending, was, that the State was not a large one; that it could not be supposed to be in great favor at the palace. It was supposed, sir, (whether correctly or not I will not undertake to say, but I rather incline to the opinion that it was an erroneous supposition) considering the manner in which appointments were made in that State, and under the belief that it was through the means of certain influential characters, that the District Attorney did institute those prosecutions with the approbation of the Administration of the United States. This was an opinion in the State; and, supposing the influence of the Executive to be exerted, they felt that it would be in vain to make much clamor, and rather chose to contend alone against it. As the prosecutions are now at an end, I think it very desirable that the subject should be investigated. As respects the District Attorney's not being removed, I do not think that he is much to be censured in this case. I am not certain that he acted altogether on his own opinion; I rather suppose that he was impelled by the influence of certain persons who are generally supposed to have the chief weight in appointments under the United States in that State, and who are therefore by some called the council of appointment; and I suppose that the District Attorney could scarcely oppose the will and pleasure of these gentlemen. I very much question, therefore, whether any peculiar degree of fault is to be attributed to him, except his putting the United States to so much expense without ever bringing the question to a decision. This, sir, is about the general state of the business. As it cannot be said that the court has in fact entertained the prosecutions, and some of them have been dismissed, the substitution of the word instituted instead of entertained, may accomplish the gentleman's wishes.

Mr. RANDOLPH consented to the amendment.

Mr. BACON said he was, for one, by no means displeased with the introduction of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia. He took occasion to remark that it was with some pain that he perceived any remaining particles of this political heresy in any part of our country. He was happy that there were so few remnants. He had known of no instances, except those mentioned by the gentleman from Connecticut. He could not account for their appearance in that State only; whether it was because this doctrine of common law jurisdiction in the courts of the United States was there planted in a more congenial soil, he could not say. Certain it was, it had not pervaded any other State in the Union. I have understood, said Mr. B., that it is not through the peculiar instrumentality of the District Attorney that these suits were commenced. As I understand it, the District Attorney has no power to entertain suits; that he has no power but to reduce to form indictments of the grand jury. It is certainly the case in the State in which I am a Representative, and, I presume, in Connecticut also. It is a mere clerical office to reduce to form presentments of the grand jury. With respect to the courts, I understand that the question was first brought before the district judge of Connecticut. Whatsoever was his opinion, he said he considered the law as settled by his betters, by the judges of the Supreme Court; and he did not consider it incumbent on him to reverse that opinion until it should be done by a court of equal authority, leaving the question, however, open to appeal by the parties. I will only observe that I am very happy this motion is brought forward, and hope that, as we succeeded in getting rid of the sedition law, we shall get rid of all the political heresies of former times, and shall succeed in rooting out this obnoxious weed from the territory of Connecticut.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed, that he had understood, long ago, that prosecutions of this sort had been entertained in the federal courts, under the administration of Mr. Adams; and he had been one of those who had supposed that when that administration had been turned out of office, and a new one inducted, there would be an end, substantially, of these prosecutions at common law, as much as of the sedition law, although on the vote, whether the sedition law should be engrossed for a third reading on its proposed re-enactment, there was only a majority of three or four in the negative. During the prosecution of Mr.

Chase before the Senate, said Mr. R., I had a paper put into my hands by a member of that honorable House, stating that a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and one who, I believe, is considered an ornament to his profession, even with all his political heresies thick upon him, had entertained a prosecution for a libel at common law in the district of Vermont, and stated that such was the law as settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. I could not tell for what purpose this paper was put into my hands, unless under the idea that it would induce me to bring forward a motion for the impeachment of the gentleman in question. It was no business of mine that this was done by one of the persons sworn to judge the case of impeachment, if instituted—every man is the keeper of his own conscience. Neither was it my desire to divert the public mind from the steady view of justice in relation to the gentleman then under prosecution by bringing any other before the House; nor did I know, nor do I now know that the opinion that the common law is the law of the United States, is an unpardonable offence; because you may have heard gentlemen of the first legal erudition on this floor, support the doctrine. I allude particularly to a late member from the State of Delaware (Mr. Bayard.) But my object in making this motion was to go back to the institution of the Government itself, and bring into view every case in which prosecutions at common law for libel had been entertained by the courts of the United States, by way of showing the necessity of providing some legal provision on this subject. The gentleman from Massachusetts, with his usual accuracy, has declared that the District Attorney is but the instrument of the grand jury. But, sir, the grand jury is selected by the Marshal, and the Marshal and the District Attorney are appointed—how? Removable—how? I am perfectly convinced, sir, that, in all cases of libel, in all cases where, too often, politics and not law or justice preside, it is idle to expect impartiality of trial. If the Government or judge take part for or against a prosecution, it is perfectly idle to expect justice. To guard against evil, I hold, sir, in my hand a resolution, which, if the House agree to that which is under consideration, I shall lay on the table:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to secure the right of an impartial jury, in all cases, civil and criminal, maintained in the courts of the United States."

But, before I sit down, I will make one observation on what has fallen from the gentleman from Connecticut. He says he feels no disposition to censure the District Attorney. I am happy to say that I know not the District Attorney, his name, or person. I am equally ignorant of the name or person of the district judge; nor do I know that I am acquainted with the circuit judge. On this subject, I am happy to be ignorant, because I am sure that I am in a better state to act impartially than if I were acquainted with his person or politics; for, whatever may be said of an unbiassed mind, human nature will have its way. Whether the Attorney General be blame-worthy or not, will depend much upon the fact whether he held these opinions anterior or posterior to his induction into office. If he was one of the federalists of the old school, if he was an Essex man, and held that the common law was supreme, I cannot blame him for executing his duty. But if he was one of those who held up his hands against that doctrine, and protested against the men who supported it, then, I say, that he is blameable—for I will not acknowledge the right of any man to make a commutation of principles and the good of this country for his office; or that he is bound by the instructions of his superior to do that which he conceives illegal, unconstitutional, and unjust. As an honest man, he would give up his office rather than his principle. And, I trust, sir, that we live in a state of society in which a man acting in that manner will always meet with confidence and support.

Mr. LIVERMORE said that, for his own part, he had no idea that a District Attorney was the mere officer of a grand jury, or in any way dependent on the grand jury. He was an officer as independent of the grand jury as the grand jury were of him. He is, said Mr. L., an officer appointed by the United States to prosecute all offences against the United States. If the common law of England be admitted in the courts of the United States, if it be taken as a rule of proceeding, I conceive it should be taken in all its parts. The District Attorney may not only prosecute by indictment but by presentment. Although a prosecution be generally instituted by indictment, it does not follow that it must be so, for it may be by information lodged by the District Attorney in which the grand jury has no kind of agency. If the prosecution be by indictment, the authority of the District Attorney must come in aid of it, or no prosecution can proceed; it can have no effect until it receive the sanction of the District Attorney, who has equal authority to put an end to it at any instant, without accounting for it. In short, he has the whole control in suits in behalf of the United States. He is, therefore, an Executive officer, made use of to prosecute, on behalf of the United States, or to persecute, if he chooses to submit to superior influence. Far be it from me, sir, to say that this is the case; but, I conceive that there is a possibility of making provision by law to prevent persecution in this way. It is high time some law was provided to punish those who make such egregious abuses of power; it is high time there was some law to punish those who prostrate the laws of the United States to such purposes. I shall, therefore, vote for the appointment of this committee; and I hope they will be able to point out some mode to prevent such abuses in future. As to the sedition law, that has passed away; I do not know that it is necessary for "an Essex man," or any other, to defend it. It had one excellent feature in it; that one relative to libels. It is no great injury to any man to be prosecuted for a libel if he be admitted to give the truth in evidence on his defence. When it was the practice, as it was ten or twelve years ago, to tell infamous lies without being subject to prosecution, it was necessary that some remedy should be applied. If the citizen were allowed to give the truth in evidence, he could suffer no injury from an impartial jury of his country.

Mr. DANA said, that if it was intended that this resolution should be adopted with the peculiar view of liberating the soil of Connecticut from its crop of political heresy, he should be averse to having this favor forced upon them. I feel no particular obligation, said Mr. D., to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) or any other, who wishes to reform the heresies of the people of Connecticut, with a view that they should be adopted into his political church. As to the prosecutions in that State, however, it might be well to inquire into them, and to put a stop to them; or, if we do not put a stop to them, to assure to the people the liberty of giving the truth in evidence. It would be well now, sir; but it would have been better while the prosecutions were pending, and before they were all defeated. Three years have elapsed since this subject was mentioned in the House by myself, and a call made for an account of the expenses which had been incurred in certain prosecutions at common law, and they were laid on the table and printed, I think, two sessions before the last. I made a motion at the time in respect to the subject; but, from the pressure of business, it was not ultimately acted on. I was not very solicitous to press it; but chose to give public information on the subject, that the experiment might pass before the public whether, when this information was made public, the Government would undertake to arrest the prosecution. I am not certain that it was not known prior to that time. Certain I am that I mentioned it to one of the heads of departments at that session. The prosecutions were not arrested; and really, sir, there must have been something peculiarly bad in that soil, which wanted the culture of such a District Attorney as was placed at the head of it. As to the District Attorney, I acquit him of any peculiar malignity in this business; I had rather supposed that he was impelled by such influence as appointed him; that the persons concerned in appointing him, or others connected with them, were desirous of instituting these prosecutions, and that he had not the firmness to resist them. As to the seditious law, for my constituents, I ask but one privilege; that, when they are prosecuted for libels, they may have the liberty to prove the truth of what they publish; and, if they do not prove the truth, let them suffer. I ask nothing further for them. I should wrong their opinion of the respect which is due to truth, if I asked for them any greater liberty than that of proving the truth of what they utter. As to their being peculiarly attached to what is called common law, it is not the common law of the British empire, but that portion of unwritten law which they have found at once adapted to convenience, conformable to the principles of moral rectitude, favorable to the support of Government, and of the principles of civil liberty. So much they choose to adopt, whether it come from beyond the Atlantic, or out of our own soil, they find it at once conducive to their happiness, conducive to moral order, to the good of society, and to the perpetuity of Government; this is the common law, which chastises guilt and protects innocence, and to this they are attached.

Mr. BACON asked whether any prosecutions had been commenced in the State of Connecticut in any other manner than by indictment?

Mr. DANA.—Certainly not.

Mr. GOLD made some observations upon the duty of an Attorney General. He said that this officer looked to the jury for facts; but, if law combined with fact, they were bound to look to him for their guide. In offences against the public peace, they wanted no guide but their own eyes and ears; indictments for such offences flowed from the grand jury alone, from their own conviction; but, when otherwise, that officer was immediately referred to. Having had occasion to observe something in relation to the course which had been pursued in cases of criminal prosecutions, Mr. G. said, he had thought proper to state thus much. He noticed another observation made by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) in relation to the prosecutions having been produced from the peculiar soil of Connecticut. In repelling this remark, if, indeed, there were anything to be repelled in it, it was proper to observe that, when a question of justice, especially of that kind to be obtained by prosecution, was brought before the House, nothing could be more unfortunate than for a moment to connect it with party. Justice, Mr. G. said, had a nobler view; it defied such weapons. He conceived the public justice of the country to have been wounded, and that the wound was aggravated when it was carried on the narrowed theatre of politics. He thought it peculiarly unfortunate, not only as respected the reputation of the Administration, but as respected the expense, that of six or eight prosecutions, the whole should have fallen to the ground, without one of them having been put to an issue. After all, if the persons implicated were guilty, a rod had been held over them, which had never fallen; and, if innocent, a great expense had been incurred, and it was right, at least, that they should have an opportunity, before a jury of their country, to be compensated. It seemed, he said, that the persons prosecuted had been defended, and he had no doubt, well defended. He believed that justice demanded that their expenses, in consequence of the prosecutions, should be refunded to them.

Mr. TROUP said that he was so sensibly alive to whatever might directly or indirectly affect the reputation of the late President of the United States, that he could not forbear expressing a hope that, whatever might be done, directly or indirectly, affecting his character, might be so done that the truth, and all the truth, in relation to it, might be in possession of the House. If he had understood the gentleman from Connecticut correctly, he had declared himself ignorant what was the nature of the prosecutions directed to be instituted. He conceived the inquiry to be important, not only as to what was the nature of the prosecutions, but, as to the fact whether the prosecutions were directed to be instituted, and by whom they were so directed.

Doctrine of Libels.

Mr. DANA observed, in explanation, that it was supposed, in the State of Connecticut, that the prosecutions were produced by the influence of the administration of the United States; that he himself doubted the correctness of that opinion. The fact had been known, two sessions ago, for he had then mentioned it to an officer of the Government, who, when it was mentioned, appeared at that time to have been entirely ignorant of it.

Mr. TROUP said he was happy at the explanation of the gentleman from Connecticut; and he, as he was sure the House did also, felt indebted to him for the liberality which he had displayed. It was important to understand on what ground the prosecutions had been commenced; if upon the common law doctrine of libel, and the prosecutions were criminal, the defendant was precluded from giving the truth in evidence; but if they were actions for libellous or slanderous words spoken, even by the common law doctrine of England, the defendants were permitted to give the truth of the words so spoken in evidence. It therefore resulted as material to the inquiry, to know not only what was the nature of the prosecutions, but by what authority they had been instituted. On that account, he moved to amend the motion, so as to inquire not only by what authority the actions had been instituted, but who were the institutors of these actions.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had no objection to the amendment. His object was to come at the truth, to do justice, and secure the liberty of the citizen; and, if that was done, it was perfectly indifferent to him by whom it was done, or who had the credit of it, whose reputation was tarnished, or whose brightened by it. One thing he knew, that he would never attack the reputation of any man by any indirect mode; and, he conceived, it would become the duty of the Committee to sift into the particulars. With respect to actions for slander commenced in the Federal courts of the United States, in which the defendant was permitted to put in the dangerous plea of justification, he never heard of any; nor did he believe there was an instance, in which they had been instituted. He spoke, in the resolution before the House, of prosecutions at common law for libel. On what species of plea could the Federal court get jurisdiction of a case of that nature between the two parties? As he understood the Constitution, Mr. R. said, the circuit court had no such jurisdiction. They might as well attempt to punish murder, because the man killed, lived in one State, and the murderer in a different State. Even the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) had never pushed his argument to the length that Federal courts had cognizance of murder or felony committed within the jurisdiction of the State courts. He, therefore, had no kind of reference to actions of slander, in the resolution, and he assured his friend from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) that he should feel a pleasure, not much inferior to his, at seeing the reputation of the party involved, whomsoever that party might be, the late President of the United States, the District Attorney, or the District Judge, rescued from any imputation which, what had fallen from the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) at the last session, might have a tendency to cast upon it. Mr. R. here most solemnly avowed, that the mention made of this subject by the gentleman from Connecticut, at the last session, was the first time that he ever had what he deemed creditable evidence of the fact. He had, indeed, seen intimations of the kind in the newspapers; but, on inquiring if they were true, he had been told that they were Federal lies; and, accordingly, he had set them down as Federal lies; he meant of the editors of the Federal newspapers; for, indeed, it was known that newspapers were not confined to the truth, and that those people in the United States who could afford to take but one paper, or whose prejudice was so strong that they would read but one side of the question, stood but little chance of knowing the real state of affairs.

Mr. R. stated the circumstances under which he had moved an inquiry into the conduct of Samuel Chase, as being similar to those under which he moved the present inquiry. When the fact had been stated by the gentleman from Connecticut at the last session, he said, he had been astonished that it had created so little sensation in the House or in the nation. If he, a Representative of the nation, who had an opportunity of seeing various publications and having access to various information which others had not, was until then ignorant of the fact, was it not possible, nay, more than probable, that the great mass of the American people were, at the moment he was speaking, in perfect ignorance of the fact? If we are to preserve our Republic pure, said Mr. R., we must often recur to fundamental principles, look frequently over our file of precedents, and expunge those which are not salutary, and those especially which we find to be unconstitutional; especially, we should draw the pen over all made in hard and unconstitutional times. With regard to one observation made by the gentleman from Connecticut, that he wishes his constituents to have no other law of libel or of justice than that which they find under the sedition act, viz: the privilege of giving the truth in evidence, I will remark that, however proper this principle might be in a single integral government, it varies when we apply it to a Federal Government, exercising only certain specified powers, and having an aspect principally to foreign affairs. To what purpose does the Constitution declare that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of the press, if Congress can make laws, such as the sedition law, or, if the courts can entertain prosecutions at common law for libels? That there should be power on this subject somewhere is one thing; but that the General Government should possess that power, which, however inherent in an integral government, is denied to that government by the Constitution, is another thing. It was a weapon wielded with great force against us at the time of the discussion on the sedition law, that men who told seditious lies ought to be liable to punishment; and, I suppose, sir, the difference was not perceived between the men who wrote libels being liable to punishment, and their being subject to punishment in the Federal courts. The question was not whether there should not be a punishment for libels, but whether the Government of the United States had or could have, agreeably to the Constitution, any law of libel. Mr. R. asked of the House, if it was not now right to reform the abuses which had taken place, to set about the work. An attempt had been made in the other House, and failed, like an attempt to promote economy and enforce accountability. You know very well, said Mr. R., that there were many of us, and I was one, who thought that, at the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's administration, it would be proper for us to pass a sort of declaratory act on the subject of the sedition law, something analogous to Mr. Fox's celebrated declaratory bill on the subject of libels, which did not so much enact a new law as declare that Lord Mansfield's law was not law—but, on this subject, as well the reduction of the Army below its then standard, as on some others, I had the honor (or dishonor as some might esteem it) to be in the minority. I had thought that we ought to have returned the fines of all those who suffered under the law; that we should have followed the example of that precedent which rescinded all the resolutions in relation to the Middlesex election; that we should have made whole, as far as in our power, the persons who came under the lash of that law. But, you know that it was said that we came in as reformers; that we should not do too much; that we should go on by little and little; that we should fire minute-guns, I think was the expression; which produced no other effect, that I ever found, than the keeping up a spirit of irritation, which might have been, and ought to have been long ago allayed. I would have acted in that case, as, I presume, the master of a family would act if offended by his children; I would first have punished, and then forgot—and it is in this manner alone that a State or family can be kept in due subjection to the father of that State or family, without, at the same time, having their confidence impaired. But if the father will not punish, but will continue to remember the fault, he alienates the child. If he will continue to twit him in the teeth with his wrong doings, he must count upon losing his confidence. It is better to give him his due, and then forget that he has offended, and reinstate him in his affections. I am sorry to have said so much, sir, but I owed it to myself. Among the different charges which have been made against me, one was that I had no projects—no projects, I think, was the term. I trust that, before the session is ended, I shall satisfy the House that I am at least as full of projects as they could have wished me to be.

Mr. TROUP said that the gentleman from Virginia was wholly mistaken in his ideas, for he, Mr. T., was no less friendly to the motion than the gentleman from Virginia himself; and, as to motives, he had no hesitation in declaring that he believed those of the gentleman to be pure and worthy as those of any man, and that the gentleman was utterly incapable of making a dishonest attack on any man. But I wish the gentleman to understand the distinction which I took, said Mr. T., and remark the obvious difference which might result from the mode in which the inquiry was to be conducted. If, after a certain mode, it might lead to this result: that the President of the United States had instructed the District Attorney to institute criminal prosecutions under the English common law doctrine against a citizen for the purpose of oppression, while the defendant was prevented from giving in evidence the truth of his words or writings. In such a case, I have no hesitation in saying that I would consider the President giving such an order as not only highly censurable, but as meriting an impeachment, as guilty of high crime and misdemeanor. But if a different result should convince me that, so far from being directed by the President of the United States, the prosecutions were made by the mere voluntary motion of the District Attorney, the criminality would not rest with the President of the United States, but with the District Attorney; but more especially if not only unauthorized but unsanctioned.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that he had not said that he suspected this or that man. If his own impression was worth anything, he did not believe that any direction on this subject had been given by the late President of the United States. But this was his mere belief; and it was impossible to say where the blame rested.

Mr. PITKIN said he rose not to enter into the discussion, but to state a fact which had not been mentioned. Reference has been made to the grand jury and the district attorney; said Mr. P., and the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to suppose that the district attorney is the mere agent of the grand jury. Whatever is the law on this point is totally immaterial at present; the gentleman, however, is mistaken as to the origin of these suits. I understand the fact to have been that the district judge, who was appointed under the late Administration, was sole acting judge in the court in consequence of the absence of the other judge. In his charge to the grand jury he particularly called their attention to libellous publications against the Government of the United States. That charge was printed in one of the newspapers of that State; in that one, I believe, in which the laws of the United States are printed. In consequence of what was delivered to the grand jury, they took the subject into consideration and made the presentments. I merely state this as the fact.

A motion was now made by Mr. GHOLSON to

MAY, 1809.

President's Message.

insert the word "criminal" before the word "prosecutions" in the resolution, which produced a desultory debate of more than an hour on the powers of the Federal and State courts, turning chiefly on the construction of the words of the first part of the 2d section of the 3d article of the Constitution of the United States. Messrs. J. G. JACKSON, RANDOLPH, GHOLSON, LOVE, and NELSON, partook of the debate; in the course of which

Mr. TALLMADGE took occasion to quote the journals, to show that several motions on the subject of those prosecutions had been made in this House in January, 1807; and he observed, that after this, how any gentleman in public life could to this day have remained ignorant of the fact, was to him astonishing. He expressed himself highly pleased that this subject was at length taken up, and hoped that no delay would obstruct an inquiry or prevent the passage of a law for the protection of the citizen in future.

Mr. GHOLSON withdrew his motion to insert the word "criminal;" and the motion was agreed to unanimously, by yeas and nays, 124 voting in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. DANA, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. TRACY, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH then laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, to secure the right to an impartial jury, in all cases, civil and criminal, maintained in the courts of the United States.

FRIDAY, May 26.

Another member to wit: ROBERT WEAKLEY, from Tennessee, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Virginia, enclosing the certificate of the election of JOHN G. JACKSON to serve as one of the Representatives for that State in the Eleventh Congress of the United States; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

On motion of Mr. MORROW, the Committee on the Public Lands were directed to inquire what further provision is necessary to be made for the disposal of the public lands in the Mississippi Territory, ceded by the Cherokees and Chickasaws; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. MORROW,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the appointment of an agent, whose duty it shall be to appear before the Board of Commissioners for adjusting the claims to land in the District of Kaskaskia, in behalf of the United States, to investigate the claims for lands, and to oppose all such as may appear to be fraudulent and unfounded; and, also, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, additional compensation ought to be allowed the said Commissioners and their Clerk, for services rendered in the year one thousand eight hundred and eight; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. LOVE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, praying that a company be incorporated for the purpose of opening a turnpike road from the City of Washington to the boundary of the District of Columbia, so as to communicate with a turnpike road proposed to be open from the said boundary to the city of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. McKIM presented a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in the city of Baltimore, to the like effect, with a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in Fredericktown, presented on the twenty-fifth instant.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN, the Committee for the District of Columbia were instructed to inquire what amendments are necessary in the act concerning the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH,
Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, to whom was committed on the twenty-fourth instant, a resolution proposed by Mr. RANDOLPH for immediately disbanding the troops raised by virtue of "An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force," and for applying any balance of appropriation remaining unexpended in relation to the same, and any unexpended balance of appropriation for gunboats, towards arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the same be referred to the committee last appointed.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the following:

1. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as respects our relations with foreign nations, be referred to a select committee.

2. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to a revision of our commercial laws, for the purpose of protecting and fostering the manufactures of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

3. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the modifications of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

4. Resolved, That so much of the Message from the President of the United States as relates to the fortification of our seaport towns, be referred to a select committee.

5. Resolved, That so much of the Message from the President of the United States as relates to the revenue and expenditures of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolutions; and, the same being again read, were agreed to by the House.

Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, Mr. MAOON, Mr. THOMAS MOORE, Mr. MOSELY, Mr. QUINCY, Mr. TROUP, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. FISK, and Mr. ANDERSON, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the first resolution.

Mr. CUTTS, Mr. BASSETT, Mr. MILNOR, Mr. SAWYER, Mr. HALE, Mr. JOHN BROWN, and Mr. SAGE, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the third resolution.

Mr. BURWELL, Mr. KEY, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. GEORGE SMITH, Mr. PETER B. PORTER, Mr. GARDNER, and Mr. WILLIAM CHAMBERLIN, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the fourth resolution.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH,
Ordered, That the committee this day appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the modifications of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States, be discharged from the consideration of that part of the subject referred to them which relates to the modifications of the Military Establishment; and that the same be referred to Mr. NELSON, Mr. DAWSON, Mr. CHAMPION, Mr. LYON, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon.

On motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON, the letter and report yesterday received from the Secretary of the Navy were referred to the committee this day appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments.

GUNBOATS.

Mr. PITKIN observed that by a report received yesterday from the Navy Department, the House were informed of the state and condition of most of the frigates and other armed vessels of the United States. The House had heretofore, from calls made on the Secretary of the Navy, information laid before them of the expense of building and repairing these frigates and other armed vessels; but never, to his recollection, had any statement from the Department of the expense of building the gunboats, or any account of their actual expense while in service, been laid before them. Various estimates had been made of their expense while in service, but the House never had before them any statement of the actual expense. For the purpose of obtaining this information, he asked leave to move

"That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to lay before the House a statement of the number of gunboats which have been built, and the expense of building the same; also of the number employed in actual service, the time they have been employed, and their expense while in actual service."

This motion, after some conversation between Messrs. DAWSON, DANA, PITKIN, LYON, MAOON, and W. ALSTON, was agreed to without a division.

VOTE OF APPROBATION.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that for the last eight years or thereabouts an alteration had taken place in the manner of doing business at the commencement of each session of Congress. He said he recollected when the first Congress under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson had met at this place, instead of Congress being opened as heretofore by the President in person and by a speech, a note in these words had been received by the Speaker, enclosing a Message from the President:

"DECEMBER 8, 1801.

"SIR: The circumstances under which we find ourselves at this place rendering inconvenient the mode heretofore practised, of making by personal address the first communications between the Legislative and Executive branches, I have adopted that by Message, as used on all subsequent occasions through the session. In doing this I have had a principal regard to the convenience of the Legislature, to the economy of their time, to their relief from the embarrassment of immediate answers on subjects not yet fully before them, and to the benefits thence resulting to the public affairs. Trusting that a procedure founded in these motives will meet their approbation, I beg leave through you, sir, to communicate the enclosed Message," &c.

It is unnecessary, I believe, (said Mr. R.) to state that the hint contained in the Message that no answer was to be expected, was taken by the House; and from that day no answers have been given to the Messages of the President at the opening of Congress. It would ill become me, sir, who so highly approved then, and who so highly approve now the change introduced by communicating to the two Houses by message instead of by speech, to say anything that might imply a disapprobation of it. I like it, sir. To tell the truth, the style of communicating by speech was more in the style of the opening of the British Parliament by the King. I therefore like the mode of communication by message. But I am not so clear, though we were then half-right, that we were wholly right; though on this subject I do not mean to give a definite opinion. No man can turn over the journals of the first six Congresses of the United States without being sickened, fairly sickened with the adulation often replied by the Houses of Congress to the President's communication. But nevertheless the answer to an address, although that answer might finally contain the most exceptionable passages, was in fact the greatest opportunity which the opposition to the measures of the Administration had of canvassing and sifting its measures; and, in my mind, whatever goes to take away this opportunity, goes so far to narrow down the rights of the minority or opposition, commonly so called, and in fact to enlarge the rights of the majority and the Administration party so called; and I beg leave not to be understood as speaking of the state of parties at this time, but of that which has always existed. This opportunity of discussion of the answer to an address, however exceptionable the address might be when it had received the last seasoning for the Presidential palate, did afford the best opportunity to take a review of the measures of the

Administration, to canvass them fully and fairly, without there being any question raised whether the gentlemen was in order or not; and I believe the time spent in canvassing the answer to a speech was at least as well spent as a great deal that we have expended since we discontinued the practice. I do not say that any answer is proper or ought to be given; but I do believe that when this House goes into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it is for purposes a little more elevated than to dissect the Message of the President of the United States, or to strip it up and transfer it to select and standing committees. If that be the whole object of going into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I can see no reason for having any such committee, nor why the Message should not be taken in the first instance, dissected by the knife of the operator most in the fashion of the day, and referred to different committees. And it has a tendency to cast a sort of ridicule on our proceedings, when this august assembly resolves itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resolves that the Message shall be referred to such and such committees; and would induce shallow observers to believe that in fact there is little or no use for such a committee. But whatever may be my opinion on the subject of opening the two Houses by message, I do think that there are occasions, and that this is one, on which it behoves this assembly to express its opinion on the state of public affairs. I will not recall to your recollection, sir, because perhaps, and most probably it passed over your mind without making any impression, that sometime during the last session of Congress, I stated that if the gentleman in whose hand the reins of Government were about to be placed did not even tolerably perform the task assigned to him, some allowance ought to be made for the state in which he found the nation. And, sir, when I see the situation of the country so materially changed for the better, am I and is this House to sit still and regard it but as newspaper talk of the day, and express no opinion on it? And what is our opinion? It is either in approbation or disapprobation of the conduct of the Executive. In my opinion it is due to the Executive that he have an expression of sentiment on this subject. In the part of the country in which I live, dinners have been given, feasts have been held, and the song and toast have passed round in commemoration of the event: and is this House to be insensible, and to leave the President of the United States in ignorance or doubt whether his conduct has or has not received the sanction of their approbation? Or is he to get that information from unofficial sources? I hope not. I hope he will get it from ourselves. I therefore move you—

“That the promptitude and frankness with which the President of the United States has met the overtures of the Government of Great Britain, towards the restoration of harmony and free commercial intercourse between the two nations, meets the approbation of this House.”

Mr. FINDLEY said that this proposition contemplated a novelty in the legislative proceedings of this country. Where would it end if the House were now to make a solemn resolution approving of the conduct of the President? The answer returned to the speech of the King in monarchical Governments committed the House making it to all that was contained in it. The practice in this country had been long considered an evil; indeed he thought he could show by the journals one instance in which the discussion of a single section in an answer occupied the House fourteen or fifteen days. It was a practice, too, which introduced at the very opening of the session all that irritation that commonly arose in the course of a session. Mr. F. said he supposed there was not a member in the House but did approve of the President's exercise of the authority vested in him. He presumed that they approved equally also of the same offer heretofore made to the Court of London. If the House were to approbate the conduct of one President, they must approbate that of others; and the conduct of the different Administrations under the Constitution might be brought into view. Mr. F. was totally against this motion, or any other of the kind.

Mr. DANA said that at the present time he should certainly not be for adopting the resolution. The adopting it at this time would certainly not comport with the object professed by the mover, which he had understood to be, to present a question on which there might be a general view of the conduct of the Executive in relation to the object in question. If the object was to bring up the question in a regular form, that gentlemen might express themselves fully in relation to our affairs, it was very proper that this subject should be discussed in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. For himself, Mr. D. said that he thought the mode of answering speeches might do very well in such a Government as this, and whatever might be said of economy of time, by an attention to the actual expense it would be found that in fact very little time was lost by it. At the last session of Congress a committee had reported a resolution to which there was but two dissentients; the discussion occupied nearly three weeks. All agreed as to the result, but gentlemen combated each other's arguments. And undoubtedly, Mr. D. said, the rapidity with which the Message was shot through a Committee of the Whole, was rather a farcical piece of business—and, indeed, it was not without some little surprise that, when he had come to the House this morning, he found the whole subject disposed of. If he had a convenient opportunity, Mr. D. said, he should have no objection to express some of his opinions on points in the conduct of the Administration. Yet he was not certain that an abstract proposition of this kind was a desirable thing to be adopted; although he admitted that it was desirable that there should be some mode of expressing an opinion on the measures adopted by the Executive during the recess, without being narrowed in the discussion by the rules of order.

Mr. W. ALSTON said, that when a resolution like the one proposed was presented to him, the substance of which met his approbation, if he was compelled to vote directly upon it, he would rather vote for it than against it. But if it were the object to bring before the House a discussion upon the Message of the President, and to return an answer to his Excellency's most gracious Message, he should certainly be opposed to it. If ever there had been one particular part of the conduct of the former Administration which had met the approbation of the Republicans of this country generally, it was the discontinuance of this practice. The result of the alteration was, that although more was done during the sessions of the Republican Congresses, they terminated them three or four weeks sooner than ever had been done before. As to the opportunity which the answers afforded for debate, could any one say that sufficient latitude had not been taken in debate? Had not gentlemen even called others by name, and introduced every subject on any question? Mr. A. said he was pleased with what had been done, and he could not vote that he was not pleased; but he was certainly opposed to entering into a full discussion, at the opening of each session, of everything which was to come under the consideration of the House. If they were to take up this resolution, they might as well take some abstract act of Mr. Adams's, he being still living, and discuss his political life. WASHINGTON, at least he hoped, having departed from us, would be permitted to rest in peace.

H. OF R.

Vote of Approval.

Mr. BACON said, that with other gentlemen, he could not but regret that this proposition had been brought forward. If he were brought to vote upon it, he need not tell the House that he should cordially vote for it; but it was really one of the last observations which he had expected to have heard from any gentleman that we wanted field for debate. He had thought that the grievance was the other way; that the cause of complaint was, that they consumed too much time in debate. He said he should certainly vote for the resolution, were it brought to a direct vote; but, for the purpose of placing before the House the view of the subject which he entertained, he should take the liberty to move an amendment to it, and then move to refer it to a Committee of the Whole. The amendment was in these words, proposed to be added to the motion:—"And furnishes an additional proof of the spirit of accommodation on the part of the Government of the United States, which has at no time been intermitted."

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved that the whole subject be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that as an indefinite postponement was considered as tantamount to a rejection—for it prevents a renewal of the subject during the session, and a rejection does nothing more, as the House had heretofore had a woful experience in the case of certain very pertinacious petitioners; and, as he was afraid, they would again have from a certain body of petitioners, who, he presumed, had not entirely given up their hopes of quartering themselves on the public property—an indefinite postponement, then, being equivalent to a rejection, he certainly was opposed to the rejection of his own motion.

He could not have believed that this motion would have been rejected by the House, though he said he had certainly calculated on its being opposed by those who condemned the promptitude and frankness with which the President had proceeded to restore, as far as depended on him, the intercourse between the two nations. It is this part of the conduct of the President of the United States, said Mr. R., on which I mean to give an opinion—"By the President of the United States, a proclamation"—and in that proclamation, in my opinion, he has deserved well of his country. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY,) if he is near enough to hear me in this vast room, when I have proposed bringing in review the whole measures of former Administrations; when have I proposed an answer to an address to the two Houses? I have proposed no such thing, sir, although my motion is nearly tantamount to it; because it so happens that the only act of which we have any knowledge, except the laying up the gunboats in dry dock, which I also most cordially approbate, is this very thing. Now, I have not the slightest objection, if the gentleman chooses, that the honorable and worthy gentleman from Massachusetts should insist on a venire on the conduct of any former President of the United States, but I beg myself to be excused from serving on it. As an unqualified juror, I choose to except myself; for, really, as to one of those Presidents, his career does not yet seem to be finished. It would seem as if he meditated another batch of midnight judges, and another midnight retreat from the Capitol. I do, therefore, except to myself as a juror as to him or any other President. De mortuis nil nisi bonum. Agreed, sir. Let the good that men do live after them, and the evil be interred in their graves. But, I would ask the gentleman from Connecticut, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, also, if this be one of their abstract propositions? How abstract, I pray you? Or, if it be one of those unmeaning propositions, the discussion of which could answer no good to this House? It would be idle in us now to be trying Mr. Adams on the merits of the sedition law, the eight per cent. loans, or any other such act. It would answer no purpose; and it would be equally idle and futile to pass any opinion on the merits or demerits of the first four or last four years of the late Administration, for this plain reason, the question bolts upon you, cui bono? What earthly good can result from it? But is that the case in relation to the Executive, on whose future dispositions rest the best interests of this nation? Is that a mere idle discussion? And is it come to this? Is this House so sunk in the Executive opinion (I trust not, sir; I abhor the idea,) that its approbation of a great course of national policy is to pass for nothing; is to have no influence on the conduct of the Executive of the United States? This, sir, is taking higher doctrine than was ever advanced by those who wished to see the President open Parliament by a speech from the throne. It is taking higher ground than the Minister of that country from which the precedent was derived. The weight of the House of Commons is felt too sensibly there for their inclinations not to be sounded by motions from their Chancellor of the Exchequer, and their members of opposition, in relation to the great course of foreign affairs. And, sir, shall we now be told that it is a mere matter of moonshine, a thing of no moment, whether this House really does approve the conduct of the Administration of the Government of the United States, or disapproves it? Praise, in my opinion, properly and not prodigally bestowed, is one of the best resources of a nation. Why is this House called upon, and I am sorry to say it is, too often, and too lightly, to give its sanction to the conduct of individuals in the public service, if its approbation is estimated so trivially? No, sir; this is a great question which I have presented to you, and gentlemen may hamper it with as many amendments as they please; they cannot keep the question out of sight. Some may be against it because they are for it; some because it does harm, and some because it does no good. The question cannot be kept out of sight; it has been presented to the American people and they have decided it, decide you how you may.

Vote of Approbation.

H. OF R.

With respect to the gentleman's amendment, I need not tell him, I presume, that I shall vote most pointedly against it, because, in my opinion, it does not contain the truth. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) will be among the last of the members of this House to attribute to me an improper sentiment in regard to him, when I say that it does not contain the truth. If the gentleman from Massachusetts chooses, in imitation of another Eastern nation—not those who tried their Kings after they were entombed, but those who consigned to one common grave the living and the dead; if he be willing to attack the sound, healthy body of the present Administration—healthy so far, and, I trust, fortifying itself against contagions—to the dead corpse of the last, let him. He shall not have my assistance in doing it; nor have I the least desire to draw a marked distinction between the two Administrations. The gentleman will hardly suspect that I am seeking favor at Court. My object is plain. It is to say to the President that, in issuing that proclamation, he has acted wisely, and we approve of it. I know, sir, that there are men who condemn the conduct of the President in issuing the proclamation; and why? They say he was precipitate. Where was the necessity, they will tell you, of declaring that the Orders in Council will have been withdrawn? This is the language of objection. There is a difference of opinion subsisting in this country on these two points. There are men who condemn this proclamation, and men who condemn the construction given by the Executive to the non-intercourse law. I approve both. I wish the President of the United States to have the approving sentiment of this House, and to have that approbation as a guide to his future conduct; and I put it to the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it be fair to mingle it with the old,

stale, refuse stuff of the embargo? No, sir; let him not put his new wine into old bottles. There is a difference of opinion in this country. The President of the United States stands condemned by men in this nation, and, as I believe, in this House, for having issued that proclamation, and put that construction on the non-intercourse law. I wish to see by how many he is thus condemned. I do not wish to see the question shirked—to see it blinked. If there be a majority of the House, as I believe there is, in favor of the conduct of the President, I wish him to have that approbation expressed as a guide to his future, and a support to his present conduct. It is due to him. Sir, have I moved you a nauseous, sickening resolution, stuffed with adulation? Nothing like it; but, a resolution that the promptitude and frankness with which the President of the United States has met the overtures of the British Government towards a restoration of the ancient state of things between the two countries—the state prior to the memorable non-importation act of 1806—meets the approbation of this House. Either it does, or it does not. If it does, let us say so. If it does not, let us say so. If gentlemen think this House never ought to express an opinion, but leave the President to grope in the dark as to our views, or get them through unofficial channels, I presume the previous question will be taken, or a motion made that the resolution lie upon the table. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says, shall we go back, and approve of what he conceives to be similar conduct of the late President of the United States in relation to the embargo? I hope not, sir. But if a majority of this House choose to do so, let them. I shall say no. But, why mingle two subjects together, on which there does exist—and I am afraid it will leak out on this very vote of indefinite postponement—so very material a difference of opinion in different parts of the House? For example: I do not think of the offer about the embargo as the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania think; and I think it probable that those two gentlemen do not think of this proclamation and the construction given to the non-intercourse law, as I think. And why should we make a sort of hotch-potch of two subjects, on which we do not think alike, for the purpose of getting us all united against both? It is an old adage, and a very homely one, perhaps too much so for the delicate ears of this assembly, that if you put one addled egg into a pudding, you may add fresh ones, ad infinitum, but you can never sweeten it. And, sir, I defy the gentleman from Massachusetts, with all his political cookery, by pouring out of the jar of our present situation into the old mess, to sweeten it. I am here prepared to prove, as I conceive that gentlemen deny it, that the conduct of the two Administrations has been radically, essentially, and vitally different; that owing to this difference is the change which we now experience in the state of our foreign affairs; that there is no sort of analogy between the offer to suspend the embargo as it respected Great Britain, and the situation in which we put ourselves in relation to France and Great Britain, by the suspension of the non-intercourse act towards the latter. And to the promptitude and frankness with which the President met the overtures of the British Ministry do we chiefly owe the difference in the situation of the country. For, might not the President of the United States, instead of proclaiming that the Orders in Council will have been withdrawn, have proclaimed that, when they shall be withdrawn, a renewal of intercourse shall take place? And here, too, comes the construction given to the non-intercourse act. On the question whether the renewal of intercourse on the 10th day of June, applied to a vessel clearing out hence, or to her arrival in England, our Government, (and I am obliged to them for it,) decided that it applied to the time when the vessel should arrive in England. Then, sir, if we take the time which will be required for a voyage hence to Europe, it is lucè clarius that the non-intercourse will never have been in force at all as to trade of export. Is that nothing? And, lest the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any other gentleman in this House may get alarmed at my approbation of the administration of the Government of the United States, I will state to them I do not wish to terrify them out of their opinions; I wish them to judge the Administration upon its merits, without reference to persons, as I have judged of the proclamation, without reference to the parties concerned in the manufacture of it. Lest they should be too much alarmed at that approbation, I will state that my idea is, that the President of the United States has but done his duty; and that the Minister of Great Britain has no cause to put on sackcloth and ashes for any concessions which he may have unwarily made to our Government. If my strength will hold me out, sir, I will state why.

In the year 1806, we passed that miserable old non-importation act, which last session we repealed; and really, sir, we got rid of it with an adroitness which pleased me exceedingly. Never was an obnoxious measure more handsomely smothered by its avowed friends. Gentlemen said it was merged in the non-intercourse act, and therefore, as a matter of indifference, they would repeal it; and, when the non-intercourse act shall expire by its own limitation, at the end of this session, or be suspended by the President's proclamation, as it is in relation to Great Britain, there is an end of both; and thus, the old measure, the old, original sin to which we owed our first difficulties, was as much gotten rid of as if a majority of this House had declared it an unwise measure, and therefore repealed it. I do recollect to have heard one gentleman (Mr. EPPES) say, that unless the section repealing this law were stricken out, he should be compelled to vote against the bill. He conjured the House to cling to the old non-importation act as the last vestige and symbol of resistance to British oppression; but the House was deaf to his call, and the non-importation act was plunged beneath the wave, never, I trust, to rise again. When, therefore, the late President of the United States made an offer to Great Britain to suspend the embargo as to her, provided she would withdraw her Orders in Council, I will suppose that she had accepted that offer. In what situation would she have stood in relation to the United States? Her fine cloths, her leather, her watches, her this, and her that, would have been prohibited admittance into this country under the old non-importation act of 1806, which would have been in force. That act, in point of fact, had no operation on her adversary. Her ships would have been prohibited the use of our waters, whilst the ships of war of her enemy were admitted. Did that make no difference? That, sir, would have been the situation of the two countries, provided she had accepted the offer to suspend the embargo as to herself—the old non-importation act in operation, her ships of war excluded, and her rival's admitted. I pray you, was not that the condition of the country when Mr. Rose arrived? Was there not some difficulty, under the proclamation, in the admission of the Statira frigate, bearing that Minister into our waters? And were not French ships of war then, and have they not since been riding quietly at Annapolis, Norfolk, and elsewhere? Has not, in fact, the gallant Captain Decatur taken our own seamen out of one of them? And, yet, sir, the offer at that time made by us has been identified with the negotiation between Mr. Secretary Smith and Mr. Erskine. What then was her situation? The non-importation act in force, her ships excluded and those of France admitted, and nothing in force in relation to France except the embargo. What is now the situation of affairs? Trade with her is restored to the same situation, in point of fact, in which it stood when Congress met here in 1805, and 1806—at the memorable first session of the ninth Congress, which generated the old non-importation act of 1806. Her ships of war are admitted into our waters, her trade is freed from embarrassment, while the ships of her adversary are excluded, and the trade between us and her adversary forbidden by law. While, therefore, I am ready and willing to approve the conduct of the present Administration, it is not because I conceive that they have effected anything so very difficult—that they have obtained any such mighty concession—but, because they have done their duty. Yes, sir; we all recollect that the objections made to the treaty negotiated by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, on two great leading accounts: 1st. That it contained no express provision against the impressment of seamen. Is there any provision now made? No, sir. The next objection to the treaty was the note attached to it by Lords Holland and Auckland. What, sir, did gentlemen on this floor say was the purport of this note? That its object was to put us in a state of amity in respect to Great Britain, at the expense of the risk of collision with France. On account of this note, the treaty and the treaty-makers have been politically damned. And yet, we are now, in point of fact, in that very situation, in relation to the two nations, in which it was said that the British Commissioners, by the note, aimed to place us, and which was a sufficient reason, according to the arguments of gentlemen, for rejecting the treaty. The note was a sort of lien, gentlemen said, that would put us in a state of hostility with regard to France, and amity with regard to England. We refused to give our bond, for such it was represented (however unjustly) to be, to be sure, sir; but we have paid the money. We have done the very thing which gentlemen say the note aimed to induce us to do. We have put ourselves in a situation endangering collision with France, and almost insuring amity with England. We have destroyed the old non-importation act. The non-intercourse act is suspended as to her. Trade is again free. There is nothing now to prohibit her ships, whether for commerce or war, from coming into our waters, whilst our trade with France is completely cut off, and her ships excluded from our waters. I cannot too often call the attention of the House to this fact, on which I am compelled to dwell and dilate to get rid of this merciless motion, which kills while it professes to cure. When Mr. Rose came into this country, French ships of war were freely admitted; English ships were excluded.

As "the physician, in spite of himself" says in one of Moliere's best comedies, on a changé tout cela—the thing is wholly reversed. We are likely to be on good terms with England, maugre the best exertions of some of our politicians. Trade with Great Britain is unshackled, her ships are admitted, trade with France is forbidden; and French ships excluded, as far as it can be done by paper. Now, in the name of common sense, what more could Mr. Canning himself want, than to produce this very striking and sudden change in the relations between the two countries? For a long time previous, it was the ships of England that were excluded, while those of her adversaries were admitted. And we know that we could not have touched her in a more jealous point than in her navy. Things are now reversed—we have dextrously shuffled the non-importation act out of the pack, renewed trade with her, admitted her ships, and excluded those of France. And what, I ask this House, has the British Minister given us in requital for this change of our position in relation to him and his rival belligerent? The revocation of the Orders in Council—this is the mighty boon. For, with respect to his offer in relation to satisfaction for the attack on the Chesapeake, he made that offer to Mr. Monroe spontaneously, on the spur of the occasion, and there is not a doubt in my mind but that we had nothing to do but receive it at that time, provided the instructions of our Minister had permitted him to receive it; but perchance, sir, if he had received it, we might have been at this day discussing his message, and not the message of another President. All that Mr. Canning has given this country is a reiteration of his offer to make reparation for the affair of the Chesapeake, and his withdrawal of the Orders in Council; and to what did they amount? So soon as you, by your own law, cut off your trade with France, he agrees to revoke the orders interfering with it. Mr. Canning might as well have withdrawn blank paper. They had nothing left to operate upon. The body upon which they were to operate was destroyed by our own act, to wit, the trade of France. And, sir, while I compliment the present state of things, and the conduct on the part of our Government which has led to it, I cannot say that we have greatly overreached Mr. Canning in this bargain, in making an exchange of the old non-importation act with the admission of English, and exclusion of French ships and trade, for the Orders in Council. Mr. Canning obtained as good a bargain out of us as he could have expected to obtain; and those gentlemen who speak of his having heretofore had it in his power to have done the same, did not take into calculation the material difference between the situation in which we now stand, and the situation in which we before stood—to say nothing at all of Great Britain's having taken a stand against the embargo, having declared that she had nothing to offer in exchange for it; that we might keep it as long as we pleased. If she had accepted our offer, as I before stated, the old non-importation law would have been in operation, her ships of war would have been excluded, whilst those of France were admitted. Now, the non-importation act is not in force, her ships are permitted to enter our waters, and those of France excluded. And what has this sarcastic Minister of Great Britain given us in exchange? The Orders in Council, which had completely ceased to operate by the cutting off of the trade between us and France. Let me state this argument in a shape most favorable to ourselves, and least so to the British Government. I speak as to argument; for, as to friendship between nations, there is no friendship in trade. We ought to get the best bargain out of them that we could, and it was the duty of their Minister to get the best out of us. Let us throw out of view the exclusion of French ships and French commerce. Is the removal of the non-importation act, and the admission of British vessels, nothing? What has Mr. Canning given you in return? The Orders in Council—and what were they worth to him? Not a straw.

If, sir, we are not to have a full discussion of the conduct of the present Administration, and it is to be blended and identified with the conduct of the last—which I very much deprecate, because I see nothing but a most striking difference between the two—we must take into view the situation of the two countries, Great Britain and America, at the time the first session of the ninth Congress commenced, in the beginning of the winter of 1805, that unhappy year of schism. Were those orders then in force which Mr. Canning has withdrawn? No, sir. What was then the language of gentlemen in this House? That something must be done; and that unhappy opinion that something must be done, that some medicine must be taken, has destroyed many a patient, political, as well as individual: that something turned out to be the old non-importation act. After that, the disease, instead of yielding to the remedy, only became exasperated by it. Something more must be done. What was that, sir? The Embargo. When that was laid, was the existence of the British Orders in Council known? It was not; and I take the opportunity of saying so here, because I see it has been asserted in the British Parliament, by a gentleman of the first respectability for talents and character, that they were known here. They were not, as was, in my opinion, unequivocally demonstrated, on Saturday night, the 17th, and Sunday, the 18th December last, although that debate has been suppressed. I say they were not. The embargo was laid on the receipt of the documents expressing the determination of the French Government to enforce the Berlin decree, and the copy of the proclamation of the King of England, which last was cut out of a newspaper. I again repeat what I said and repeated that night, unknowing whether it will go to the public or not, that, in my opinion, the President of the United States acted with perfect propriety in sending us that newspaper information; that, though it was unofficial, it was proper to have been laid before this House as a guide to its decision; and it is an irrefragable proof, the President having sent us that paper, that he did not possess information, official or unofficial, on the subject of the Orders in Council, when he recommended, and we received, the proposition of the embargo. It cannot be gotten over, unless gentlemen are willing to admit, which I, totis viribus, deny, that the President of the United States was deficient in his duty, or that the newspapers of this place have earlier and more correct information on the subject of our foreign relations than our Government. I say, that by a recurrence to that message of the President of the United States it will be found that there was no knowledge in the Cabinet of the existence of those Orders in Council; for, although we received the British proclamation, we did not receive any information, of those Orders in Council, though I presume that something might have been apprehended without distinctly knowing what it was. The non-importation act was passed previous to the Orders in Council, and consequently did not grow out of them; and the embargo, though posterior, was recommended and received by this House before they were known either to the President or to this House, as the Journal and a comparison of that file of the National Intelligencer brought into this House on a former occasion will show. The non-importation and embargo acts were passed. They no longer exist—the one no longer exists at all; the other no longer exists as to Great Britain—and the removal of these obstructions was the alleged and true reason of the revocation of the Orders in Council, which were not moving considerations to passing the non-importation act or laying the embargo. This is the truth.

The withdrawal of the Orders in Council, out of which the non-importation and the embargo did not arise, may be considered as the cause of doing away both the non-importation and the embargo, and the non-intercourse act besides; for the non-intercourse act did grow out of the Orders in Council and the affair of the Chesapeake—there is no doubt about that; or, more properly speaking, sir, the non-intercourse act grew out of the embargo; for, really, smarting under the tortures of that most wretched measure, this House and the nation were goaded to that pitch of madness, that a declaration of war from any quarter would, by many have been considered better than our then situation. We were in a situation, in which if something be not administered to the suffering patient, he must die—and we took the non-intercourse act. We rejected, and (thank God for it!) not without some little of my instrumentality, the proposition to issue letters of marque and reprisal, which, if adopted, I leave to you and the House to decide whether we should have met in our present agreeable situation. Yes, sir, with the embargo, like a blister-plaster upon our backs, we were in such a situation that the Committee of Foreign Relations said, and we affirmed their decree, we must be disgraced or fight all the nations of the earth—fight all, fight nobly, fight like demi-gods. A worthy gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) now not a member of the House, also thought that we must fight everybody—but he thought better of it, and was content to fight one, and to choose his antagonist. Gentlemen in the other House were of the same opinion; and they alleged they could not get at France, they chose to fight Great Britain. This was the situation in which we were placed by the operation of the embargo on the public mind. Sir, if we were not quite cool, like Sir Anthony Absolute, who has been quoted on the floor of the British House of Commons as the prototype of the British Minister, we were something like honest Bob Acres—fighting Bob, who was not sensible, till he was put to the pinch, how little he liked, really liked fighting—our fighting disposition, like his, oozed out of our finger ends, or rather our tongues' ends—and we are at peace. It is for these reasons that I hope this slur will not be cast on the Government of the United States, though I do not conceive that they greatly overreached their antagonist. But I am willing to concede they have done their duty, and to give them my approbation for having so done. Mr. Canning, to be sure, most dextrously seized upon our situation, but still our Government have shown how easy it is for men, when they set about it bona fide, with honest intentions, to make up a difference; and I have not the least doubt, that if His Majesty, the Emperor of France and King of Italy, will meet our Pacificus, a much more honorable designation than any in the long list of His Majesty's titles, that we shall be placed in the same state of amity in relation to France, in which we are in relation to Great Britain, in which we were five years ago, and from which we have, for reasons which gentlemen no doubt are prepared to give, so wantonly strayed. After all our friskings and curvettings, we have come back to the same point. All my fear is, sir, lest the cure be not complete—lest some political wizard should discover that, inasmuch as in 1805, prior to the existence of the Orders in Council, we stood in need of the non-importation act, and as in 1807-8, prior to a knowledge of the Orders in Council, we stood in need of an embargo, for the same reasons we now stand in need of some other substitute—not the same, sir; for I undertake to say that we never shall have another embargo without limitation of time—it was indeed a horse medicine, but it has worked a complete cure. Really, sir, if we could have been brought to believe in 1805-6, that we could do as well without a non-importation act as we can now; in 1807-8, that we could have dispensed with the embargo as well as we can now—and, more especially, if we could have been brought to accept the treaty negotiated by our Commissioners at London, which treaty, to say the worst of it that its enemies ever pretended to allege, was only deficient as containing no express stipulation on the subject of impressment, and redundant as containing this note by way of rider, the object of which I have explained to the House, and which has been accomplished already, by undoing the non-intercourse, withdrawing the prohibition of our waters to British ships, and repealing the old non-importation act—if we had consented at that time to accept the treaty, we should not only have saved ourselves the price of the embargo—how many hundred millions our Secretary himself, great a financier and able a calculator as he is, cannot tell; I do not believe he could come within a hundred—but have avoided other disagreeable consequences.

Yes, sir; as to the note attached to that treaty, the object of that has been attained. The state of the two countries is materially changed for the better, as it regards England; and for the worse as it respects France. We should then have had the colonial trade placed in a most eligible situation—our East India trade placed on a better basis than our Commissioners were instructed to have it placed upon, viz: on the footing of the most favored nation. For, if Great Britain be, as we have heard, at war with Sweden, what are the terms on which the most favored nation is admitted? No terms at all. The terms obtained, therefore, were unquestionably better than the footing of the most favored nation. We should also have had an excellent stipulation as to the sea-lize; but, above all, a practical arrangement of the great question of impressment. It now remains to be seen whether we shall obtain better terms in relation to impressment than that informal understanding. It now remains to be seen whether we shall obtain better terms from the Portland and Canning administration, than we have heretofore been unwilling to accept from the Grenvilles and the Foxes. If we do, sir, I shall most cordially rejoice at it; and I will, if gentlemen will tell me to which of the causes they ascribe it, whether to the promptness and frankness of our Executive in meeting the British Government half way, which I much applaud, or to the defeat of the British arms in Spain—if they will but make up their minds how these better terms shall have been obtained, I will agree to the cause which they shall assign. If they scout the idea of their being ascribable to the present Administration, I will agree to ascribe them to the defeat of the English in Spain. I will only beg of them, when they wish to touch the chord of our good old Revolutionary principles, that they will not ascribe it to the defeats in Spain, and on the next occasion when their object is to do honor and blazon forth the merits of the men who conduct our affairs, that they will not ascribe it to the wise and most excellent measures of our former most sapient and virtuous Administration. I am willing to take either as the cause, but I will not subscribe to both, and as it shall suit their purpose. I protest against gentlemen's coming out upon us with the Spanish successes, and the wisdom of the Administration at the same time.

I am sensible, sir, of having detained your attention and that of the House, not only now but on many former occasions, much beyond what I had a right to do. It is an offence, and I am willing to confess it; but it grew out of the unprecedented manner in which I conceive a very unexceptionable motion has been met by gentlemen of this House. You cannot be ignorant, sir, that there are gentlemen in this House who, when their object is to obtain the passage of any motion however reasonable, certainly have to encounter greater difficulties than others; and who, when they see anything like opposition arising in a certain quarter of the House, like counsel addressing a jury supposed to be somewhat prejudiced against their cause, have to labor their points and to impress them much more than the counsel who knows that the ear of those to whom he speaks is attuned like that of a partial mistress to his addresses, and will pat the most favorable construction upon them.

This subject which I have opened in regard to the renewal of intercourse with one of the belligerents, which I hope in time to see renewed with the other—and then, sir, we shall have choice whether we will begin again the cotillion of non-importation, embargo, and non-intercourse, or reap the rich harvest of neutrality like men of sense; whether we shall put the interests of the nation at stake, for the purpose of making very grand and warlike speeches on this floor—this change, on which I most cordially congratulate the nation, is a subject which I should not have opened at this time and in this manner if gentlemen had been willing to take my motion for what it is worth. If my motion had been taken at its current and actual value, I should have waited until I could have presented the points which I have endeavored to enforce in a more condensed form—for I have not even a note—and nothing but the manner in which this motion has been received has compelled me to endeavor to show that the motion ought not to be indefinitely postponed, to show that there does exist a difference of opinion in the nation and in the House in relation to the proclamation and the construction of the non-intercourse law, and to show the means resorted to, and very ingeniously too, to smother and keep out of sight that difference of opinion. Those who think that America ought to take warning by all nations who have first resisted and soon after succumbed to the power of France, and that we ought, therefore, to bend the knee whilst we can do it with a good grace—and there are those who think so, for you see that opinion expressed in papers of a high character for their influence, (of no other character;) in one edited by an officer holding a high rank in your public armies—I believe I have the extract in my desk; I will read it—We have been told that “our bane and antidote [speaking of England and France] are both before us, and that after ‘the examples of the nations of Europe who ‘have first resisted and then succumbed to Napoleon, the people of the United States would be ‘fools indeed if they did not see their course,”—which, I presume, sir, is succumbing first, without resistance. I see “the little State Governments” denounced too, and I confess I tremble; I see this country told that it is time to put them down; for that reason, and not from any deliberate hostility which I believe the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Gholson) entertains for the State Governments, it was, that I was alarmed when I yesterday heard the doctrines of 1800 revived, that we ought to have little Federal courts for the trial of every possible controversy, that the State courts were not even to be trusted with the decision of suits to the amount of five pounds or even five shillings. If gentlemen suppose I throw out this in the spirit of an adversary they are much mistaken. Let us rally around the State Governments—pronounce with my friend from North Carolina (Mr. MAcon) oblivion to former distinctions. Let us, if we do approve the policy by which the Administration have so much to their honor changed the affairs of this country—so much to their honor as to the quo animo, not as to the quid pro quo or value received—let us express it in moderate, decent terms, that it may be a guide to the Administration of the country hereafter, that it may be a sort of pacific pledge from ourselves to ourselves. I know the aversion of my friend on my left (Mr. MAcon) to pledges—I hope he will excuse me. But do not let us give the thing the go-by, though the motion for so doing come from a member connected with the Administration (Mr. J. G. JACKSON.) If the President have done well, let us say so; if not, let us say nothing. If the majority be of opinion that the President has not done well, I am agreed so to decide. But I think the President ought to take a vote for indefinite postponement, as an expression of our opinion that we disapprove of his conduct, but will not directly express that opinion to him, from motives of delicacy.

Mr. HOLLAND said he had no doubt that the President had done his duty in the case referred to in the proposition under consideration; and as he had entertained no doubt but the President would, on this and every other occasion, do his duty, he said he felt no excessive joy on the occasion. It was only an ordinary act of duty well performed, and therefore he was not willing to distinguish it from those numerous acts which he trusted would be, as they had heretofore been performed, by the Executive. Were he the author of the proposition, he should have many scruples as to the propriety of offering such a one. Were the precedent to be set by the passage of this resolution, the House might hereafter witness a struggle on the floor to determine who should be first to come forward with a proposition expressive of approbation. The human mind might be so operated upon that the Executive might feel himself under an obligation to promote the person bringing forward such a motion. I, said Mr. H., would be one of the last to introduce such a motion were I a friend to the President; and if I were not a friend to the President, I would not bring it forward, lest it should be thought that I was courting favor in his eyes. But why, sir, should this House give an expression of approbation of the President? Because, we are told, it may be a guide to him hereafter. Let this House be careful how it acts, and attend to its own duties. The President does not stand in need of this kind of support. I never will step forward, as a member of this House, to excite him to his duty by a vote of this kind. I believe he possesses an attachment to his duty sufficient to induce him to perform it. I believe that the voice of the people of the United States such, in relation to the present and late President, that they believe they were well disposed to do their duty, and that they have done their duty; but it does not follow that we ought to express our approbation as to any particular act. The gentleman himself says that the President has only done his duty. Is it not surprising, then, that we are called upon to give him the approbation of this House? What would be inferred from this procedure? Why, that it is so seldom our Presidents have done their duty, that, in the very first instance in which they have done it, the House of Representatives had discovered and applauded it. If the gentleman thinks so, I wholly disagree with him. If our officers do their duty properly, they will receive the thanks of the nation; and where is the propriety of singling out for approbation or disapprobation this particular act? I see none. It is asked, will you leave the President of the United States to grope in the dark, and not let him know whether he has received our approbation or not? And is the President to judge from the thanks of the House that he has done his duty? How is he to know that they have expressed their sense of his conduct from proper motives? Would he not be right to suspect those who vote for, and more especially those who bring forward such a proposition, of improper motives? He would be left still worse to grope in the dark. It has been said that former Presidents have been deceived in consequence of votes of approbation; and the same would again occur. On every ground I am opposed to the passing such resolutions on principle, and shall therefore vote for indefinite postponement.

Vote of Approbation.

H. OF R.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observed that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia was, that the promptitude and frankness with which the President of the United States has met the overtures of the Government of Great Britain, towards a restoration of harmony and a free commercial intercourse between the two nations, received the approbation of this House; and that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts declared that it furnished an additional proof of the spirit of accommodation on the part of the Government of the United States, which has at no time been intermitted. I do not hesitate to declare my firm conviction, said Mr. JACKSON, that the propositions contained in the motion and amendment are true; that, if it be necessary or proper for this House as a part of their duty to express an opinion on them, they ought to be adopted. If a direct vote must be taken, I shall be in the affirmative; but, notwithstanding my belief that the facts alleged are irrefragable, I am opposed to a deviation from what I conceive to be the duty, and becoming the dignity of this House, by expressing them. It is true, sir, that the assertion contained in the amendment has been denied in some of the partisan newspapers of this country; but hitherto I had understood and believed that it was, as far as respected the opinions of members on this floor, unquestionable; and it is not without some surprise that I have just heard the gentleman from Virginia denying it in the most unequivocal manner. It is not because I fear the result of a vote on the amendment that I am unwilling to have it taken; my objections are of a different character. I think the House have nobler duties to perform than passing abstract resolutions, out of which no legislative act is contemplated, merely for the purpose of pouring the oil of adulation upon the head of the Chief Magistrate; and, according to my conception, the gentleman from Virginia has made an attack on the principles he professes, and upon the independence of this House, which will, as a precedent, be productive of lasting injury. If the course he proposes be a correct one, and we are to pass votes of approbation upon all the leading measures of the Executive, who among us, that may happen hereafter to disapprove any, will venture to oppose, without endangering his standing with the people? I take a wide distinction between the propriety of approving, and the right of condemning. If the President, or any other high officer of the Government, violate his duty, it becomes ours to animadvert upon his conduct; but we ought to leave to the people, whose province it is, and who are competent to judge for themselves, whose discernment is not to be eluded by our votes approbatory of a bad measure, or condemnatory of a good one, that decision which they have already pronounced in a style as emphatic as it is audible. And what good, I pray you, can result from this resolution? Those who had always denied that the Administration possess any patriotism or virtue, will, to be consistent, find it necessary to oppose votes of this kind, and, instead of doing the ordinary bu-ness of legislation, we shall employ our whole time in discussing propositions capable of doing no good, likely to produce much evil. But we are already met with a charge that we condemn the accommodation, and are afraid to meet the question. I repeat, sir, I am not inimical to it, for I am highly pleased, and the friends of Administration derive a triumph from it, that the spirit of accommodation, which has at no time been intermitted on the part of our Government, was met at last by a correspondent disposition on the part of Great Britain.

I did not expect, sir, admitting gentlemen were of opinion that there has not been a spirit of accommodation displayed on the part of the Government at all times, and that they have even acted with duplicity, that we were now to enter into an examination of the measures of this country for five or six years past; and it will be with much reluctance that I shall follow the gentleman by touching, however lightly, on the various topics discussed in the wide range that he has taken; nor did I expect from that gentleman an eulogium on the non-intercourse law, which he pronounced, only three months ago, to be fraught with much evil, and which, to-day, he affirms, by placing the two belligerents on an equal footing, was the cause of the rescission of the Orders in Council, inasmuch as it admitted the British Government to treat without inflicting a wound on their pride. It is asserted by the gentleman that the recent arrangement is entered into by Great Britain on very different terms from those offered last summer through our Minister at London; because, first, the non-importation law is now repealed; and, secondly, that, having prohibited British ships alone by the proclamation of the President from entering our ports, it was highly offensive to Great Britain, and we have done away the discrimination which existed between them and French vessels. I contend, sir, that the gentleman is wrong in his position, and that the offer made to Great Britain, and rejected, was not worse, but better, as regards her pride or interest, than that now accepted; and the offer of Mr. Pinkney by order of the President, was, of itself, a strong proof of the spirit of accommodation which has been evinced by the Government. In the offer made to Mr. Canning, the American Government proposed to suspend the embargo so far as related to Great Britain, on a revocation of the Orders in Council merely as respected us—to renew our trade with them, and prohibit it with France. It was not only contumeliously rejected, but Mr. Canning declared that the formal abandonment (a tacit relinquishment of them was not sufficient, but a formal abandonment) by France of her decrees was an indispensable prerequisite to a repeal of the British Orders in Council.

There is no mention made of the French decrees or of our non-intercourse with France in the late correspondence, and his Britannic Majesty withdraws his orders of January and November, merely on condition that we will renew the intercourse with Great Britain. The indispensable prerequisite is forgotten, all mention of France is pretermitted, and in that view the late accommodation has given up more than we asked in September last. How, then, can the gentleman insist that the terms on which the late adjustment was made are more favorable to Great Britain than those rejected last summer? He relies, however, upon the repeal of the non-importation law, and the merger of the proclamation issued in consequence of the affair of the Chesapeake; in the general prohibition of British and French ships of war as materially changing the state of our relations with Great Britain, and by placing her on a footing of equality with France, has given an opportunity to propose terms. Sir, I did not suppose that the affair of the Chesapeake, and the proclamation which grew out of it, would have been introduced here as a proof of the want of a spirit of accommodation on our part. Am I mistaken in supposing that the gentleman himself did on this floor condemn the President for not calling Congress together sooner to take higher ground, under the idea that the proclamation was a weak measure? [Mr. RANDOLPH stated he had never said so.] Sir, it seems I am mistaken in ascribing such a declaration to the gentleman. I ask you, sir, if the indignation of the people could, without difficulty, be appeased with the measure, such as it was, and whether it would have been consistent with that honorable feeling to have revoked it for the purpose of preventing a tax on our exports imposed by the Orders in Council? Let it be recollected, sir, that the affair of the Chesapeake was treated of distinct from all others, and never blended with any other, except that with which it was necessarily connected, viz: a provision against impressment from on board of vessels sailing under the American flag, and that connexion was disregarded in compliance with the wish of Great Britain.

The equality in the restrictions imposed by us grew out of posterior acts of the French Government. France had not invaded our national jurisdiction, had not murdered Pierce, or taken the Chesapeake; even admitting her other attacks were equally flagitious with those of Great Britain—and the only discrimination made as consequent on those injuries, was the partial non-importation law, and the prohibition to enter our waters with their armed vessels—afterwards, when France, to the extent of her power, attacked our rights, we prohibited the vessels of both nations, and their manufactures, from entering our harbors; and how an exclusion of all articles and all vessels by law, was a more favorable state of things to Great Britain than the partial exclusion of either, at a time when the few French that ventured upon the ocean, and escaped capture, were admitted, it remains for that gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) to demonstrate. In the very sentence wherein the gentleman approves of the conduct of Government, he tells us that Great Britain has conceded nothing. We have obtained an important concession, inasmuch as reparation is made for the attack on the Chesapeake, and

Mr. Erskine was instructed to offer an abandonment of the Orders in Council without a repeal of her decrees by France, or a promise to refuse trading with her, but merely on a renewal of intercourse, with Great Britain; which, I repeat it, is obtaining better terms than we offered to accept. Then we were told that, unless the French decrees were formally rescinded, the orders would be adhered to. Now, the British orders are abandoned, whilst the French decrees are unrevoked. Mr. Monroe's Treaty is drawn into discussion, and the gentleman says that the objection to it was, because there was no provision against impressing seamen; and we, nevertheless, come to an accommodation now without any such provision. Does the gentleman recollect that, when the affair of the Chesapeake took place, all negotiation had been suspended for some time, and, except in relation to it and the Orders in Council, has never been renewed? The affair of the Chesapeake was a barrier to all other negotiation; it was impossible, at a time when the blood of our citizens was crying for vengeance, and the survivors were confined in slavery worse than death, it was impossible to sit down coolly and calculate how far the East India or Colonial trade could be given up by us. Nothing could be done in relation to minor points of difference, when higher paramount concerns pressed upon us. But does it follow, sir, because these points are not now settled, that the seamen are to be abandoned, that the West India trade is to be given up? That all points of collision are to be considered as conceded? The negotiators have wisely deferred the subject, for we are informed that a Minister, with ample powers, will be sent here to negotiate a treaty, and we ought to suspend our opinions until it is concluded. The gentleman says that another objection to the treaty was on account of the British note, that it was opposed, because it tended to bring us in collision with France, and now we have done what it required of us. Sir, there were various objections to that note; one was, that Great Britain attempted to bully us into the course she wished us to pursue, to compel us to give "security to His Majesty," that we would not submit to the attack made by France on our rights. Now, although we did not and would not submit, we could not tolerate such arrogance in Great Britain.

The note, however, says the gentleman, was no part of the treaty. It was certainly communicated by the British Government as forming an indispensable condition of it; and the British Commissioners in the correspondence with Mr. Canning, which I read to the House at the last session, stated expressly that the treaty was a perfect instrument, no reservation was annexed to it, except the note in question, which maintained the right to chastise us in case we did not resist France; and Mr. Canning repeats the assertion to our Ministers. The gentleman has gone on to say that Mr. Monroe could have received reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake, if his instructions concerning seamen, which were blended with it, had permitted him. On this point

H. OF R.

I have the correspondence before me, which must satisfy the gentleman that it is wrong. As soon as the attack on the Chesapeake was known, the President issued his proclamation, and on receipt of it, Mr Canning wrote a letter to Mr. Monroe, in which he says:

"Before I proceed to observe upon that part of it which relates more immediately to the question now at issue between our two Governments, I am commanded, in the first instance, to express the surprise which is felt at the total omission of a subject, upon which I had already been commanded to apply to you for information; the proclamation purported to have been issued by the President of the United States. Of this paper, when last I addressed you upon it, you professed not to have any knowledge, beyond what the ordinary channels of public information afforded, nor any authority to declare it to be authentic.

"I feel it an indispensable duty to renew my inquiry on this subject. The answer which I may receive from you is by no means unimportant to the settlement of the discussion which has arisen from the encounter between the Leopard and the Chesapeake."

And he goes on to urge the impropriety of making any atonement during the existence of the proclamation. And I ask again, sir, would the nation have been reconciled to the apathy of the President if he had neglected to breathe forth its spirit, feebly as it was done, in the forbidding British armed vessels the use of our waters? Whilst the men (except the one whom they hung in Halifax) were retained in bondage, and the outrage had the sanction of a high officer of the British Government, which induced the belief that it was with its authority that the act was committed, could the proclamation have been rescinded or a less friendly measure have been resorted to?

The gentleman says, the Orders in Council were made inoperative by our measures, and to give them up was, in fact, to yield nothing; that they were to prevent our trade to France, and we have prevented it ourselves, and therefore Great Britain conceded nothing on that point. It was not upon a trade to France alone that the orders operated, but upon all nations from whose ports the British flag was excluded, and even from some who never had made any such regulations; but, independent of this, suppose France, without relaxing in her hostility towards Great Britain, admitted our vessels freely, although they had entered a British port, and been spoken by a British cruiser, and in consequence of such relaxation the trade with her was renewed; what, then, would have been the effect of the British Orders? We should still be subjected to the payment of tribute. We are not now compelled to go first to Great Britain, pay tribute, and receive His Majesty's license to carry on our accustomed trade, therefore a repeal of the orders is a most important measure. Sir, in the wide range of debate the gentleman has repeated his old argument, that the Orders in Council were not known in this country when the embargo was laid. Afterwards he qualified it, by saying they were not known in the Cabinet at the time the President recommended the embargo. If, sir, the Executive knew nothing of them it is surprising, because the purport of them had been published in the National Intelligencer in this city, and in two or three papers printed in New York and Philadelphia, which were received here previous to the Message of the President. They even stated the date at which his Britannic Majesty's signature would be affixed to the orders, and gave minutely the purport of them. The President, in his Message, not only referred to the papers then enclosed, but "the great and increasing dangers" to which our commerce was exposed, thereby alluding to what had come to his knowledge through the medium of the newspapers, as understood to have been determined on by the British Government, but not known so formally as to authorize express mention of it.

Sir, the people of the United States are enlightened and intelligent, they do not wait for this House to spirit them on to an examination and decision of great national questions, and our vote of approbation or disapprobation will never check or lull their spirit of inquiry; they have already approved the act of the President, and, whether they have or not, it is improper for us to enter into abstract resolutions, regardless of our Legislative duties, and thereby establish a precedent alike dangerous and invasive of our independence.

Mr. J. concluded his observations by remarking, that he could not conjecture what the dangerous doctrine, said to have been advanced by him yesterday, had to do with the question. He controverted the opinion of Mr. R., however, in relation to the doctrine of Federal judicial power as conferred by the Constitution, and made some remarks on the subject of State and Federal rights.

Mr. FINDLEY said, if he was not mistaken, the motion now before the House was for postponing indefinitely the resolution submitted by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) I will vote, sir, said Mr. F., for the postponement, and for the same reasons that I opposed the novel resolution when it was first submitted for consideration to the House; but, believing the impropriety of the resolution to be on the very first impression so evident as to require little explanation, it is probable that my objections were offered in so concise or so confused a manner as not to be well understood. Indeed, they were the hasty result of the moment, excited by such a resolution as I believe no member of Congress ever offered before, and which there was no reason to expect on this occasion. I am opposed to it on correct Legislative principles.

It is, sir, my opinion, that the resolution is wholly out of order; that it ought not to have been made; that it ought not, when offered, to have been considered or discussed by the House.

This House is one branch of the Legislature of the United States, it possesses no powers but what are transferred and specifically prescribed; they do not possess general powers on all cases not specially excepted, as the State Legislatures do.

In this I know the honorable mover, from Virginia, will agree with me. I then ask, by what article or section of the Constitution we are authorized to approbate, discuss, or censure the conduct of the Executive? But, leaving the Constitution for a moment as a dead letter, and resorting solely to the rules of the House, I ask, by what rule are we authorized to decide on this resolution, or for what purpose?

This House is one branch of the Federal Legislature, authorized to originate laws, or to concur with such as may be originated by the Senatorial branch; these laws may be passed in the form of bills or of Legislative resolutions; but, in either case, they must be agreed to by both Houses, and approved by the President. The House has, indeed, other incidental powers; they are judges of the elections and qualifications of their own members, and are authorized to punish or to expel a member. These powers are necessary towards carrying their Legislative powers into effect, and therefore, even if they had not been expressly vested, they were necessarily implied. They are also invested with the powers of impeaching public officers, and of sustaining the character of prosecutors before the Senate. These are all the powers I can find vested in this House by the Constitution.

This resolution is not even professed to be the foundation of a law, or to have any effect as a rule of conduct for the citizens, nor to be for impeaching the President, or any other public officer, nor does it relate to the proceedings of our own House, or the conduct of our own members; therefore it is not, it cannot be constitutionally before the House. The people of the United States have, by the Constitution, vested this House with the power of disapproving the conduct of public officers by impeachment, and by that only; or of the measures recommended by the President, by rejecting them, or treating them with neglect; this has probably been done by every Congress: but the people have reserved the right of addresses of approbation or censure in their own hands, and assuming it by this House would be a usurpation of powers, and a precedent for other usurpations.

Mr. Speaker, if I am mistaken in this, every Congress, since the commencement of this Government, has been also mistaken. I am confident the honorable gentleman from Virginia cannot lay his hand on such a resolution in the Journals of Congress. He has admitted on this floor that, in this case, the President did his duty, but not more than his duty; that, in so far as the law authorized discretion, as it certainly did with respect to time and manner, and the confidence to be placed in the declaration of the British Minister, he has acted with propriety; he has also highly applauded on this floor the first four years' Administration of the late President; but he himself nor any other member, it is believed, never submitted a resolution to the House for a Legislative approbation of his conduct, during even that four years of perfection; no such resolution was submitted or passed respecting the conduct of WASHINGTON, with respect to the choice of whom there were no parties; no such resolution was submitted or passed with respect to Adams by the majority, who were the friends and supporters of his Administration; in short, there is no example of the kind on the Journals; therefore, I am justified in calling this resolution a novelty. But it may be asked, has this House no method within its power of approving of the Executive measures? It certainly has.

Let Congress, sir, pass laws to carry the measures of the Executive into effect, as to correspond with them. This, and this only, is a Legislative expression of approbation, and the highest that can be given. Law is the only language of a Legislature; it is the only language that can command obedience or respect. Any equal number of citizens met in a tavern, and there passing a resolution of approbation, would have equal force with such a resolution passed in this House, and would be more in character. For, admitting and discussing this resolution, the House is not acting in its legislative character, but as individual citizens, and in fact degrading the legislative character. They are acting without authority from the Constitution or the rules of this House.

When this Government commenced, after the example of the British Parliament, the President made his communication to both Houses at the opening of a session, in a speech, to which the Houses prepared an answer; and frequently such an answer as anticipated the most prominent measures of the session, to which such amendments were generally moved and discussed, as brought forward all the party artillery and irritation which the House contained, before any progress was made in the proper business of the Legislature. We have seen, sir, two weeks of the beginning of a session spent in this way, and party irritation excited to the greatest height, not only in but out of the House, before legislation commenced. I confess I rejoiced when this method of corresponding with the Executive was changed.

In support of the resolution, however, the gentleman states that there is a difference of opinion on this subject, both within and without this House, and to prove this has read part of a paragraph out of a newspaper, conducted by an influential military officer; but I confess so much of this as he read comes short of proving the truth of this, in my opinion. I have said when I was up before, and I repeat it again, that I know of no such difference of opinion, and since the measure was made public, I have conversed with many citizens of different counties and States, and read many newspapers. All I have conversed with agree that the President did his duty in exercising the authority vested in him by Congress on this occasion, and as far as I am acquainted, it is the general opinion that the late President equally discharged his duty with respect to the same subject; this is fully testified by the present President in the correspondence with the British Minister. If this is true, as I certainly believe it is, he is equally entitled to a vote of approbation as the present President. But the gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) has exerted his ingenuity to prove that this is not true. Here is a difference of opinion, but not such as can have any effect on the measures now before Congress.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

If we sanction this resolution by our vote, where will it end? In what instances shall we give a vote of approbation, or in what shall we withhold it? The gentleman knows well that, by voting in the negative, it will appear to be a vote of censure against what we really approve. It would be easy, in the course of a session, to promote twenty or fifty such votes. If we have a right to pass abstract votes of approbation, we have the same right to pass votes of censure, and to condemn, unheard, by a hasty resolution of one House, and, by so doing, turn this House into a council of censors. Such Pennsylvania once had, in which I sat, but it had the power of censure only, and not of approbation; this the people kept in their own hands, and officially expressed it at their elections.

Is the gentleman (Mr. R.) really so fond of party contests as to urge this unprecedented resolution, merely for curiosity, to find some new source of party divisions? This will be fairly put to the test on passing the laws on the subjects already referred to select committees, for carrying the measures communicated by the President into effect, on which, I trust, there will be little difference of opinion. I will vote for postponement; if not postponed, for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The members will certainly take time to deliberate before they vote for such a useless and such a dangerous precedent; they will reflect that such resolutions as these, not warranted by the Constitution, are not subject to the revision of the other branch, nor to that course of deliberation in this House that is necessary on passing laws. They will reflect that agreeing to the resolution can do no good, but that the example, if drawn into precedent, must do much harm. With respect to individual members, they have abundant opportunity of censuring or of approbating in their debates on the floor, of which they frequently avail themselves with little restraint.

When Mr. F. had concluded, an adjournment was called for, and carried.

SATURDAY, May 27.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, a committee was appointed, jointly, with a committee of the Senate, to inquire what business it is requisite should be done at the present session, and report to the House. Mr. BASSETT, Mr. RICHARDS, Mr. WHEATON, Mr. COX, and Mr. CRIST, were appointed the committee.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. QUINCY presented a petition of the sugar refiners in the town of Boston, State of Massachusetts, praying that a law may be passed granting a drawback on refined sugar exported to any foreign port or place, equal to the duties paid on the importation of brown sugar.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a report of the Land Commissioners West of Pearl River, in the Mississippi Territory, together with abstracts of their decisions in the case of non-resident British grants; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLAS R. MOORE,

Resolved, That Thomas Claxton be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ, under his immediate direction, one additional assistant, five servants, and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services and duties as are usually required by the House of Representatives, during the present and next session of Congress, and for four days after the terminations of each; and that he be allowed therefor nine dollars per day, and be paid out the fund appropriated for the contingent expenses of the House.

On motion of Mr. BURWELL,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the Secretary of War to lay before this House an estimate of the sums necessary to complete the fortifications commenced or contemplated; and, also, the amount of any deficiency of former appropriations for this object.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the unfinished business depending yesterday at the time of adjournment was ordered to lie on the table.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill respecting the ships or vessels owned by citizens or subjects of foreign nations with which commercial intercourse is permitted; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time this day.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on their part; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Rev. JESSE LEE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives:

I now lay before Congress the report of the Secretary of War, showing the progress made in carrying into effect the act of April, one thousand eight hundred and eight, for raising an additional military force, and the disposition of the troops.

JAMES MADISON.

MAY 26, 1809.

The Message and report were read, and referred to the committee on that part of the Message of the President of the United States which relates to the Military Establishment.

An engrossed bill respecting the ships or vessels owned by citizens or subjects of foreign nations, with which commercial intercourse is permitted, was read the third time, and passed.

Sufferers under the Sedition Law.

MAY, 1800.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, a committee was appointed to take into consideration the act, entitled "An act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States," and to report whether any, and what, alteration it is expedient to make in the same.

Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. STANFORD, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. HEISTER, Mr. GOLD, Mr. PICKMAN, and Mr. HURTY, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution, with leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

VOTE OF APPROBATION.

Mr. RANDOLPH called for the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday; and on the question, will the House resume the consideration of the subject, the House divided 54 to 54; and the Speaker voting in the negative, the motion was lost. Mr. RANDOLPH subsequently gave notice that he should call it up every day during the session if he had an opportunity, and require the yeas and nays each time, unless the House should agree to take it up.

SEDITION LAW.

Mr. STANFORD said he had risen to offer a resolution, which he wanted to have offered immediately after that which had been offered by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) and adopted by the House, on the subject of prosecutions for libel at common law; but not being able to get the floor, he would now beg leave to move his by way of instruction to the same committee. That committee, Mr. S. said, had been charged with an inquiry into what prosecutions for libel at common law had been instituted in the courts of the United States, which he hoped the committee would duly make, and lay before the House. Thus the House would see what system of persecution, if any, had been resorted to, and cherished by the late Administration or its friends, in any part of the United States; and he equally hoped some remedy might be devised at this time, the beginning of a new Administration, to obviate any like occurrence in future. But, said Mr. S., let it not be that anything be done partially. While we are about to bring to our view all the cases of prosecution for libel under the common law, we are not likely to know anything about prosecutions for libel, which had occurred under the sedition law, and that too under a different Administration. We have not authorized any such inquiry. That abuses have occurred under both, is but too probable, and I think it will be liberal, as it is just and fair, to make the inquiry more general on the subject. If any citizen has been oppressed or injured by such prosecutions, let it be known, and let justice be done him; even now, if with propriety, any way can be devised to do so. Inquiry, however, is all that is asked for the present.

It may be perceived, said Mr. S., and if not, I wish it should be understood, when I speak of justice being done, that I speak with rather peculiar reference to a gentleman of this House, who has been a principal sufferer under the well known sedition law. I think it never too late to do justice, under whatever circumstances or motives of policy it may have been withheld for a time. I trust no gentleman will, upon this occasion, suspect me of a design to excite any party feelings. It certainly is not my wish, whatever may be the effect. The resolution I am about to offer is not so framed, nor would it necessarily involve the question of the constitutionality of the law. I feel persuaded, therefore, that the different gentlemen of the House may, from a spirit of liberality and fair concession, indulge the inquiry asked for.

But, sir, said he, since the other inquiry has been gone into, it cannot be unfair to say that the majority of the House owe it to themselves to extend the inquiry, as well to cases of prosecution under the sedition law, as to those under the common law; and I shall be permitted to say also, they owe it as well to the feelings and sufferings of the gentleman to whom I have alluded. Whatever may be the aspect of political opinions and parties now, it is known to you, sir, and a few others on this floor, that to him much is due for the present ascendancy of the majority; perhaps to no one more, to the extent of his sphere of action and influence. In the famous contested election for President in this House, eight or nine years ago, he gave the vote of a State, which sufficed to decide the contest; and more especially so, if the blank votes of the State of Maryland could have rendered that vote doubtful. But, however such considerations may or may not avail, nothing is more clear to me than that the inquiry should be indulged on the most liberal principles.

Resolved, That the committee, appointed to inquire into what prosecutions for libels at common law have been instituted before the courts of the United States, be instructed to inquire what prosecutions for libels have been instituted before the courts of the United States under the second section of the act entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,'" passed the 14th day of July, 1798, and the expediency of remunerating the sufferers under such prosecutions.

Mr. SAWYER moved to amend the resolution by adding, at the end of it, the words "and that the committee also inquire whether any and what private compensation has been made to such suffering persons."

Mr. MACON said he did not know how the committee could go about to make such an inquiry as that contemplated by the amendment. The gentleman must be well satisfied that the Government could not rightfully inquire into transactions between individuals.

Mr. DANA said that he had no particular objection to meet this inquiry. As to the disclosure of facts as to the reimbursement by individual contribution, it might be amusing, if this House had authority to make it. He said he should like to know who contributed to the relief of James Thompson Callender, when he was prosecuted; but he had some doubt whether it was proper to enter into any inquiry or whether it was proper to pass the resolution pointing to the remuneration of sufferers under the sedition law. He should have supposed that it might be proper to leave it at large for the committee to report. He said he had certainly no objection to inquire, though he conceived that prosecutions at common law and under the sedition law were essentially different; because, supposing the Congress of the United States to pass such a law, the courts of the United States might take cognizance of it; but, without such a law, it did not belong to the judiciary to extend its care to the protection of the Government from slander. Such was the decision of Judge Chase (said Mr. D.) who decided that the court had no jurisdiction at common law in suits for libel; and the Supreme Court of the United States never did decide the question. The strong contrast is this; that while there was a description of men who said that no prosecution could be had at common law for libel, nor under the statute which modified the common law so as to allow the truth to be given in evidence—who, while they excited indignation against this statute, should afterwards undertake to institute prosecutions at common law where there was no limitation in favor of the defendant. There is this difference in the cases; that we find practice precisely different from professions. I do not say that the heads of departments were instrumental in instituting these prosecutions; but it marks some of the subordinate men who were active in making professions. I am very willing that the proposed inquiry should be made; but I cannot see the propriety of our undertaking to give any opinion as to remunerating those who suffered.

Mr. STANFORD said:—Mr. Speaker, I would ask if my colleague's motion of amendment can be in order? It is no concern of this House, or of the Government, what private contributions may have been made to the gentleman from Kentucky; and, if it was, the inquiry is impossible. [The SPEAKER said, not being able to enter into the views of the mover of the amendment, he considered the motion in order.] Then, said Mr. S., if my colleague is anxious to know what he could not otherwise know, I will tell him I had contributed a small sum to the gentleman from Kentucky, as a sufferer in what was then considered a common cause; but, upon his return to his seat in the House, he could not brook the idea of such a contribution, and returned the amount to myself I know, and to others I believe. My colleague would do well to tell us how much he contributed. It was well known contributions were made in a quarter not far from him; and if he did not, I am well persuaded it was not for the want of sympathy on his part, or extreme zeal in the democratic cause; for I am confident I have seen as much or more seditious matter from under his pen, than I ever saw from under that of the gentlemen from Kentucky. Be that, however, as it may, I am for one willing, if no Constitutional difficulty can be shown, to emigrate the sufferers—at least to take such money out of the Treasury, and restore it to its original, rightful owners; and if it cannot be consistently done, why the inquiry can do no harm. But, indeed, we have great examples in the case before us. Did not the late President, when he came into place, refuse to let such money come into the Treasury in the case of the worthless Callender? As the proper authority, he thrust it from him as unworthy the coffers of his country; and did not his doing so meet general approbation? I confess it met mine most cordially, and I believe it did that of my colleague also. Have we not, moreover, the best recorded proof that the present President holds similar opinions on this subject? His splendid opposition to the sedition law is the proof to which I allude, and is, in my mind, conclusive on this subject. But if it were not, where is the impropriety of an inquiry? The House will be better able to decide when the whole matter shall come fairly before them.

Mr. QUINCY said this appeared to be a proposition to aid a single individual; and, by the amendment, gentlemen who had aided that individual were anxious to prevent him from gaining more than he had paid. It was a kind of application to the House to repay to those persons who relieved the sufferers under the sedition act, the sums which they had paid. If this were the object, Mr. Q. suggested whether it would not be proper for them to come forward and lay their claim in the ordinary form before the House.

Mr. SAWYER said he was, as he always had been, willing to contribute his mite to the relief of the sufferers; but he did not wish to see them remunerated from the public Treasury.

Mr. LYON.—I have for some time been in suspense whether I ought, or ought not to make any observations on the subject before the House; delicacy on the one hand bids me be silent, while a duty I owe to myself, to my family, and to the nation, requires (that since my particular case has been alluded to,) the members of this House and the public should be made acquainted with many of the circumstances of that case, which have either never come to their knowledge, or have long been buried up among the consumed heap of political occurrences, disputations and publications of these days. Besides, sir, I have it in my power to throw much light on the subject of the inquiry wished for, by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. SAWYER) who has proposed the amendment under consideration, and I will assure the gentleman that I shall not be backward in doing so. It is true, sir, that I was unjustly condemned to pay a fine of one thousand dollars and to suffer an ignominious imprisonment of four months in a loathsome dungeon—the common receptacle of felons, runaway negroes, or the vilest malefactors—and this when I was the Representative of the people of Vermont in this House of Congress. It cannot be said there was no other room in the prison; there were rooms enough; yes, sir, one of my judges during my imprisonment found another room in the same jail to be imprisoned for debt in, until he gave bonds for the liberty of the yard. To heighten the picture exhibited by official tyranny, and to add to the cruel vexation of this transaction; I was carried out of the county in which I lived, fifty miles from my family, kept six weeks without fire in the months of October and November; nearly the whole of which time the Northwest wind had free admittance into the dungeon, through the same aperture that admitted the light of heaven into that dreary cell. And let it be asked, in these days of the mild reign of Republicanism, for what crime was all this extraordinary, this ignominious punishment inflicted?

I hold a copy of the indictment in my hand which includes the charge against me. I will not trouble the House with a recital of the technical jargon and tedious repetition of words, of course, which constitute the bulk of such instruments. No, sir, but I will read the identical words of the charge, which says, that on the 20th of June 1798, Matthew Lyon wrote a letter to Alden Spooner of Windsor, Vermont, in which he said, "as to the Executive, when I shall see the efforts of that power bent on the promotion of the comfort, the happiness, and accommodation of the people, that Executive shall have my zealous and uniform support. But whenever I shall, on the part of the Executive, see every consideration of the public welfare swallowed up in a continual grasp for power, in an unbounded thirst for ridiculous pomp, foolish adulation, and selfish avarice—when I shall behold men of real merit daily turned out of office for no other cause but independence of sentiment—when I shall see men of firmness, merit, years, abilities, and experience, discarded in their application for offices for fear they possess that independence; and men of meanness preferred for the ease with which they take up and advocate opinions the consequence of which they know but little of—when I shall see the sacred name of religion employed as a state engine to make mankind hate and persecute one another, I shall not be their humble advocate."

This is the whole of my crime, and what do those words amount to. Who is here that hears these words, but what approves the sentiment they contain? What do I say in these words, other, or more, or less, than that when the Executive is doing right, I will support him—when doing wrong I will not be his humble advocate? This ought to be the creed of every member who enters these walls. Was there to be an oath or abjuration added to the Constitutional oath to be taken by the members of this House, can any person who hears me, devise a better, or one more proper? Could any person who really thought Mr. Adams quite clear from all those improprieties, as merely possible from the nature of man, mentioned in my letter, have thought of my libelling the President by this declaration? I presume not, sir. Yet this, my crime, received one of the condemnations which you are called upon by this motion to constitute an inquiry into—an inquiry I cannot persuade myself will be refused. The letter, sir, was an answer to a violent invective against me, published in the same paper a short time before, in which besides a number of other charges against me, it was imputed to me as a crime that I acted in opposition to the Executive.

I did not begin the altercation. A person who was a friend to the Adams' administration, in the act of libelling me, (one of the constituted authorities,) ushered the Executive into his performance. My character, ever dearer to me than life, was concerned. I deigned to answer him, after expostulating with him on my right as one of the constituted authorities of the nation to exercise my own judgment in my official conduct, and showing that my merely differing with the Executive proved no more than that the Executive differed with me. I incidentally proceeded in the words for which I was indicted, the very words I just now read. I was charged with neither more or less as coming from my pen. As if to outrage every principle of law and every sentiment of decency and propriety, this indictment, founded on the sedition law passed on the 14th day of July, 1798, charges me with having in Philadelphia on the 20th of June prior, written a letter to Alden Spooner of Vermont, which contained those words I have been reciting. My letter was produced in court and carried the Philadelphia post-mark of some day in the same June, I do not recollect which day; Judge Patterson himself admitted this fact, and that it was out of my power and control in the June before the sedition law was passed. Thus the indictment, which was the foundation of the barbarous treatment I received, carried on its front its own condemnation; but this defect was remedied by the ingenuity of the party judge, who dextrously mingled his assertions that the crime was cognizable under the common law, with his admonitions to a pliant jury not to be deterred from finding a verdict where the man who wrote was a member of Congress, and knew the sedition law was about to be passed, and probably hurried his letter to evade the law.

It may be said, sir, that I was charged in the indictment with publishing a copy of a letter, from an American diplomatic character in France, to a member of Congress, commonly called the Barlow letter. I was so, and there was a third count in the indictment for aiding and abetting in the publication of said letter. The words selected as seditious were as follow: "The misunderstanding between the two Governments has become extremely alarming; confidence is completely destroyed; mistrust, jealousy, and a wrong attribution of motives, are so apparent as to require the utmost caution in every word and action that are to come from your Executive; I mean if your object is to avoid hostilities. Had this truth been understood with you before the recall of Monroe, before the coming and the second coming of Pinkney, had it guided the pens that wrote the bullying speech of your President, and the stupid answer of your Senate, in November last, I should probably have had no occasion to address you this letter; but when we found him borrowing the language of Edmund Burke, and telling the world that although he should succeed in treating with the French, there was no dependence to be placed on their engagements; that their religion or morality was at an end, and they had turned pirates and plunderers; and it would be necessary to be perpetually armed against them, though you were at peace, we wondered that the answer of 'both Houses had not been an order to send him to a mad-house! Instead of this, the Senate have echoed his speech with more servility than ever George the Third experienced from either house of Parliament." No proof appeared on the trial of my printing, or aiding or abetting in printing, or circulating a printed copy of this famous letter. I had read the copy of the letter in company, but the advocates of the sedition law would never admit that such reading was punishable by that law. The printer who printed the letter, swore that he had been anxious to get the letter from me, and that I had refused to suffer it to be printed, and repelled every attempt to persuade me to the printing; that he had obtained the copy of the letter in my absence. The fact was, that my wife was persuaded by a gentleman who is now a member of this House, that the Republican cause and my election (which was pending) would be injured if the letter was not published; and, as I understood, she gave it to him, the letter was printed, and that gentleman had some of the copies before I came home. I suppressed the remainder of the edition. The judge, finding no proof to support this part of the charge, directed the jury to find a verdict of guilty generally, as there could be no doubt of my being guilty on the first count. I had acknowledged my having written the letter to Alden Spooner. They did so. I will not detain the House by going into a detail of the manner in which that jury was packed. After all the care and management in the original selection, there was one man on it whose honesty my persecutors feared; and, to get him off, a wretch falsely swore that the summoned jurymen had expressed to him something like an opinion that I could not be found guilty. I will not here dwell upon the judge's denial to me of a challenge upon the jury—as great a crime as any Judge Chase was charged with. I look for an investigation of this business when all the features of it shall come fairly to public view. Should that investigation be refused at this time, I shall not fail to look for it at some future time. I can never forgive the unjust stigma that has been placed on my character; and should justice be refused me during my whole life, I will leave it with my children and theirs to seek it. When my enemies wounded my feelings, robbed me of my property, and affected temporarily my reputation, I consoled myself that my friends would soon be in power, and they would make everything right. My wounded honor would be consoled; the wound would be healed—a share at least of the property of which I had been deprived, would be reimbursed. How cruelly have I been thus far disappointed! Generous men, at the time I suffered, said it is enough for you to bear the mortification of the temporary insult—we will share with you the loss of property. Under this impression much money was collected, the greater part of which went to relieve oppressed Republican printers—it has all been charged to me. I never asked, nor would I have received a cent of this gratuity, could I have avoided it without insulting the benevolent views of the good man

(Gen. Stevens Thompson Mason, deceased) who set the subscription on foot. That good man gave me a list of those to whom he considered me beholden, and the amount; while the thing was fresh in every one's mind I made a compliment, to every one of those on that list that was within my reach; to those few that remain on that list uncompensated, I feel beholden and much indebted. As the thing has grown old, and as I have come in contact with those gentlemen, I have felt myself in an embarrassed, awkward situation, from which I wished to be relieved by being able to say to them, the public have restored your money—here it is—it is yours, not mine. Judging other men to have feelings like myself, I am at a loss how to get rid of the obligation I feel, in any other way than the restoration of their money when it comes in a way they cannot refuse it. From this source my anxiety for the restoration of the money unjustly taken from me, arises more than any other; and on every review of the subject, I am bound to say that I have been more cruelly treated by the neglect of a duty to which my friends had pledged themselves, when they declared me innocent and patriotic, than by enemies who thought me guilty, and found me goading them in their progress toward the destruction of the liberty and republicanism of this country. As if to make their cruelty more insupportable, insult is added to the injury, by daily insinuations that I am bound by gratitude to stand by those who call themselves Republicans, in all their projects, right or wrong. Before I was elected a member of Congress from the State of Kentucky, I sent to a member of this House, who had promised me to bring it forward, a petition to be laid before the House of Representatives for redress in this case. He returned the petition to my son in a letter, which I have in my hand—in which he says, "I am sorry and ashamed that I have not presented the petition. I have not wrote to your father, and confess I am ashamed; pray you, the first time you write to Colonel Lyon, do endeavor to make an excuse for me." Such I believe was the impression of most of those I had acted with in the reign of terror, as we called it; but that impression has been wearing off, it seems, while my feelings have been every day increasing in their poignancy at their neglect of a duty, to which they had solemnly pledged themselves, while they were struggling with their adversaries for pre-eminence and power. Happily the awful silence which surrounded this extraordinary business has been broken. I consider this a prelude to investigation and a correct issue; and, let the event of the vote now about to be taken be what it may, I shall not despair.

I shall at this time say no more on this subject than to declare I wish not to have my case singled out for reparation. I wish the investigation general; the provision for remuneration general, to all who suffered under the lash of that unconstitutional sedition law.

Mr. SAWYER's amendment was negatived without a division.

H. OF R.

Sufferers under the Sedition Law.

Mr. Ross rose to propose another amendment to the resolution. It was a fact, he said, well known in almost every part of the United States, that the people in the district from which he had just been returned, had suffered as much in the cause of democracy as that of any other; that they had presented as firm a barrier to Federal oppression, and perhaps had as just claims as any other people in the United States to remuneration for losses in the cause. It was well known that at the time that high-handed measures were taken in this country, an insurrection had taken place in Pennsylvania, commonly known by the name of the Hot-water Insurrection; that it occurred in consequence of the oppression of the law for the collection of a direct tax. Many persons who had opposed the law, under the idea of its being unconstitutional, were prosecuted, punished, and some of them, in consequence of those prosecutions and the sentence resulting from them, expired in prison. To some who remained after the aspect of the affairs of the country was changed, mercy was extended by the United States; but to those whose prosecutions and convictions were of an earlier date, lenity was not extended; they were compelled to pay their fines before they could be relieved from imprisonment. Mr. R. declared his object in rising to be, to move to amend the resolution in such a way as to instruct the committee to inquire whether any, and if any, what compensation and remuneration should be made to the persons who suffered and were punished in consequence of an act to lay and collect a direct tax in the United States.

Mr. DANA said the gentleman's amendment contemplated remunerating those who suffered by their opposition to a statute. He would propose an amendment to inquire into the propriety of remunerating those who had suffered by their submission (not by their opposition) to the several acts respecting the embargo, certainly so much more meritorious conduct than that of opposition. As respected the whole of this subject, he said he was very free to declare that as regarded those who had been prosecuted at common law in the State of Connecticut, who had certainly been at very considerable expense, their defence perhaps having cost them several thousand dollars, yet, on the principle of correct legislation, he had not the least idea of remunerating them. Where shall we stop, said Mr. D., if we tread back on the steps of each other. We shall have opportunity enough for censure in reviewing our own conduct. Perhaps it might be as well to draw the veil of oblivion over past transactions, and learn from experience to err no more.

Mr. JOHNSON said, that however much the act laying a direct tax was disapproved, and arose from measures which were improper, yet he had never deemed it an unconstitutional law, as he had the sedition law. He should therefore vote against the amendment and for the resolution.

Mr. GARDNER suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, since he had brought the subject before the House, the propriety of going the whole length of his principle. To my mind it is very clear, said he, that if those who oppose the law are to be remunerated, for what it cost them in consequence of prosecution, you must go only on the principle that the direct tax never ought to have been laid at all. If the law was right, it was improper to oppose it. If it was improper, perhaps according to modern democracy, it might be proper to oppose it by force. That to my mind, is a very dangerous doctrine for legislators to broach; it is a doctrine to which I myself can never agree, for it is making Government a nullity. The suggestion which I wish to make is this: that if those men who suffered in the Hot-water Insurrection are to be remunerated, it is no more than fair that those should be remunerated who have quietly paid this tax. They were at least respectful to the laws. The committee therefore ought to be instructed to inquire into the propriety of repaying to the several contributors in the various States the direct tax, collected from them, unless there be something so admirable, so lovely, so worthy of encouragement in insurrection, that those concerned in it have peculiar claims to encouragement by Government. If that be the case, the gentleman stopped at the proper point. If there was nothing in insurrection, however, which the Legislature would feel it proper to cherish, the gentleman should either go the whole length of his principle or not touch it at all.

Mr. Ross said he had not undertaken to state any principle at all. His object was to refer the subject to a committee to decide upon. He had not said that he considered the original resolution to contain a correct principle; it was a point left for the committee to consider and for the House to determine on. But if it was a correct principle that those who suffered under the sedition law should be remunerated, he said he had no hesitation in saying that his constituents, who had suffered as materially and as much as any for the democratic interest in this country, should be placed on the same ground as those who were asking for the favor of the House for no better reason; and when the gentleman calls upon me, said Mr. R., to go the whole length of a principle which he states, it is calling upon me to do that which is consequent on a principle which I have not assumed. The gentleman from Kentucky conceives that there is a difference between the cases alluded to in my amendment and the cases arising under the sedition law. Where is the difference, sir? In both cases they were laws of the United States: in both cases the judges of the courts of the United States were authorized to proceed. In neither of the cases did they decide the law unconstitutional. If, then, persons were punished by the sedition law in its full operation, carried into effect by the constituted authorities, where, I ask, is the distinction between that and any other law? To all the purposes of legality, that law is as much legal as that under which the direct tax was instituted. Whether the law under which a direct tax was collected, was Constitutional or not, has it not as equally received the disapprobation of the Republicans of the United States as the sedition law? If then it was the object of the democratic party to rid the country of such a law, as much as of the sedition law, I ask whether those who suffered under each law have not equal claims? There can be no legal claim upon the House under either law; but we know that it was the hardy yeomanry who presented a firm phalanx to the irresistible torrent of injurious laws of the Federal Administration, and who gave the present party the ascendancy, and many of them have not, as the gentleman from Kentucky has been, compensated for their suffering by a long continuance in an honorable and lucrative office which he enjoys by the confidence of his constituents.

Mr. POTTER declared himself at a loss to know whether the House was sitting here as a branch of the Legislature to pass laws, or as a body to remunerate those concerned in the violation of them. The House sit here to make laws and not to encourage those who resisted them; but if they determined to give premiums for the violations of laws, they had better depart home at once.

Mr. RHEA wished the House to get rid of this motion and the amendment as speedily as possible. If the House were to go on as it had commenced the session, the whole time of the House would be spent about nothing, discussing propositions which could not possibly produce good to the nation. He therefore moved to postpone the whole subject indefinitely.

Mr. MACON said he had in been hopes when this motion had been made, that it would be one of the happy days of the House; that the question proposed would occupy the whole day in debate, and that all would agree in it at last. As to comparing this case with that of the direct tax, it was notorious that the discussion on the sedition law and the public opinion also took a very different turn from that which it took on any other law. The whole discussion (said Mr. M.) as well as I recollect, turned upon the constitutionality of the law. Then, if it is still believed that the law was unconstitutional, I leave it to gentlemen to say whether it can be viewed in the same light as a law, the constitutionality of which is not disputed. In the one case, trials took place for speaking and writing; in the other case for opposing the execution of a law. I wish this question to be settled for this reason. In all Governments where liberty and freedom have existed, parties also have had existence. Thinking honestly produces parties. That those gentlemen who were in power when the sedition law was passed, should step a little too far, was not so much to be wondered at as that those who came after them should do so; because they were making the first experiment of the instrument. I then believed, and do still believe, that the law was unconstitutional. Taking up this question, the original resolution of my colleague is, that remuneration should be made to those people who suffered under it; but seeing that the question with respect to the constitutionality of the law had always been matter of dispute, it proposes that a committee shall inquire into the subject. The House is no farther committed by passing this resolution, than to consent to the inquiry being made. I submit it to the candor and reflection of gentlemen of all parties, whether this thing, in a national point of view, can produce any evil—on the contrary, may it not produce good? All that has been said about the direct tax laws can have no other effect than to draw off the attention of the House from the true question before them. The question on this law, in my mind, is a different one from any other law which has been passed. I feel no hesitation in acknowledging that it is my opinion that all the sufferers ought to be remunerated, both those who suffered under the sedition law, and those who suffered under the common law. It is the business of all parties to settle amicably as they can any subject of contention between persons of different political persuasions. If this first resolution should be referred to a committee, and they report that the law was unconstitutional, I will venture to pronounce that no majority will ever again make a law of that kind. If, sir, the sufferers under the sedition law did suffer contrary to the Constitution, ought not their expenses to be reimbursed? On the subject of contribution, I know that that party to which I was attached, did contribute, and did consider it an honorable cause. I was willing (and there are gentlemen in this House who know it) to open my purse when a man of a very different political creed from myself, Peter Porcupine, was oppressed. I care not of what party a man be that is oppressed. I can prove that the party opposed to me in politics have also subscribed. It is all no more than the subscriptions for printing speeches which are occasionally made in the House, in which gentlemen of all parties unite. Suppose that the whole fine in any particular case had been paid by individual subscription, what has the Government to do with that? Will it be contended, because an old soldier who received a pension also received individual contributions, that the pension should be taken from him, or that the Government is thereby acquitted of what it owed him? Surely not; the Government has nothing to do with transactions between individuals. As to the particular gentleman brought into this discussion, I believe that every man that contributed anything towards paying the fine levied on him, was remunerated to his satisfaction. I have thought proper to state these opinions of mine, and to avow myself in favor of reimbursing the sufferers. But before I sit down, I must say that my opinion of modern democracy is very different from that of the gentleman from New York. I consider it as neither leading to insurrection, rebellion, or any such thing. I believe that the true principle of every modern democrat, is, that the law constitutionally made is supreme, and is to be obeyed; that it has nothing to do with riots, rebellion, and insurrection. I know very well, and shall not deny it, that there are times when insurrection is a holy thing, but it is not peculiarly attributable to democracy. With us, elections put everything to rights; and on them every man of pure democratic principles depends. It is doubtful whether the question of the constitutionality of the sedition law can be settled in a more easy way, and in a mode less liable to irritation, than that proposed by my colleague. If the committee report as I wish, it is well; if not, it settles the question for ever; and it is surely desirable that the question should be settled. However gentlemen may differ as to the principle proposed to be investigated, they might with propriety vote for the inquiry, as it is the ordinary course of every day. I do not consider this as proposing to give a premium to violators of the laws. I know that much depends in this world on names; and that if you give any man or thing a bad name, whether merited or not, it is difficult to get rid of it. I hope the House will not be deterred from this inquiry by any name attempted to be given to it. It is proper that this question should be settled; and if considered now, it will be settled by a body which did not partake of the heats of those times, and when, to say the least of it, there is a little division in the great parties of the nation; and it seems to me that the gentleman who moved it has been fortunate in the selection of his time. Eight years have elapsed, a new President is just inducted, and the question is now brought up for our decision. I am sorry that any member of this House should make a motion with no other view but for procrastination. I do not believe that my colleague who made this motion is more in the habit of procrastinating the public business than other members of the House; and I was in hopes that there would have been no dissentient voice to his motion. He only asks of you to let the inquiry be made. He does not ask a single member of the House to commit himself upon the question, but merely asks that a committee may be permitted to inquire into it; and this, it seems to me is no extraordinary request. I hope that the resolution, without being trammelled with any extraneous matter, will be passed.

Some further observations were made by Messrs. GOLD, PICKMAN, PORTER, and RHEA, against the resolution; and by Mr. STANFORD in favor of it.

Mr. KEY said he should vote for indefinite postponement of the resolution. What good purpose could its adoption answer, unless the House had the power to take money from the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of remunerating any person who had suffered? Had Congress that power? He apprehended not. He could see no such power amongst those delegated to Congress. The gentleman from North Carolina admitted the House were under no obligation to remunerate the sufferers; and if the gentleman would turn to the rules laid down for the definition of the powers of Congress, he would see that there was no authority to draw money from the Treasury for this purpose. Under that view of the Constitution, Mr. K. said he must vote for indefinite postponement.

Mr. MACON asked under what clause of the Constitution Captain Murray and others had been remunerated? Under what clause money paid into the Treasury had been returned in various instances? The right to take, gave the right to return that which was taken. In many instances this principle had been practised on. There was no law to authorize the punishment of a man for robbing the mail; but it was derived from the power of establishing post roads. The power of refunding money was one which had been often exercised.

Mr. GARDENIER was in favor of an inquiry. It was not only proper that an inquiry should be made, but it was the bounden duty of the House to make it. A member of the House in his place had stated facts which if true undoubtedly entitled him to their interference. Our duty (said Mr. G.) is imperative. The case of the gentleman does not rest upon the question whether the sedition law was Constitutional or unconstitutional, but upon the fact that he was not a proper object for the exercise of that law. For, if the statement made be correct, he was punished for uttering a creed which would not be improper for every member of the House; and I will say that subsequent events have shown the sincerity with which the gentleman did make it; that he has kept his promise most religiously; that it was not applicable to those men, or that time, any more than to the present, but was a creed on which he practised before and ever since, so far as his political course is known to me. It is a case in which the privileges of the members of this House are materially concerned. If under the sedition law for a letter written by a member of this House to his constituents, giving his view of public measures, he has been punished, it concerns the safety of this House that complete and perfect remuneration should be made. It is as important that every member should be permitted to speak freely to his constituents, as that he should without restraint address the Chair of the House. It was a case, therefore, which never ought to have been the subject of a judicial investigation, much less considered as a crime. The gentleman at the time followed the dictates of his conscience. To his conscience and his God alone should he be responsible. Sir, should we refuse an inquiry into this case, when we know that the fine of James Thompson Callender, for one of the most atrocious libels ever written in the United States, was remitted? When we know that it was remitted by the President of the United States, after the money had been received by the proper receiving officer of the United States, when it had passed out of the hands of James Thompson Callender into the hands of the officer of Government, and was, to all intents and purposes, in the Treasury of the United States, because there is no such thing as a treasury in which money is actually deposited—for a libel, too, in which the great Father of his Country was treated with a shameless indignity, which could not but have gone to the heart of every man? When the President of the United States was in that libel called a hoary-headed incendiary, should that fine be returned, and shall a gentleman in this House be fined and imprisoned for that which was not even improper? Shall we not restore to him that which others have been suffered to retain, and for which we have not brought to question him who restored it after it was in possession of the receiving officer of the United States—in fact, after it was in the Treasury? Let us not be guilty of this inconsistency. If the sedition law has gone to the tomb of the Capulets, and I believe it has, I am not one who wishes to bear up against the people's voice; the Government is theirs, and when they speak we obey. If under that law the Government has received money for an act which really, if the statement of the gentleman be true, could scarcely be considered an offence within the purview of that law, will you not give it back to him? Either give back the money in the case, or take measures to recover that money which was given back in the other. I am not for making fish of one and flesh of another. Whilst on this subject I will declare that I never did consider the sedition law as unconstitutional. Congress were competent to pass it. But, that parties will sometimes in the ardor of their course exceed the limits of discretion, and do violence to the milder feelings of the community in which they live, has been proved in the Adams Administration, and in that which has lately disappeared; and when they have cooled down, it is but rendering justice to the sense of the country to acknowledge their errors. No, sir, I am satisfied that all prosecutions for libels on the Government should be at least very hesitatingly sustained. You cannot draw a precise line by which you shall limit the right of investigation. The two things are so blended together that you cannot separate them. You must either make the Government supreme or the people supreme. I am for the latter. As Dr. Johnson makes Lord Chesterfield say, liberty and licentiousness are blended like the colors in the rainbow; it is impossible to tell where one ends and the other begins. Licentiousness is a speck on the eye of the political body, which you can never touch without injuring the eye itself. I hope and trust that with this investigation will be connected an inquiry into the prosecutions at common law in Connecticut. I have seen in the State of New York, but not under the present Administration, a defendant coming into court, begging only to be permitted to prove that what he had said was true; I have seen also an Attorney General rise to prevent it: I have seen the truth smothered on the trial by men who were as clamorous against the sedition law as any loud-mouthed patriot in the country. I have seen them bringing almost to the block the victim who may only wish to prove the truth of what he said—which was denied him. I mention this to show that where parties are contending against each other, where there is a majority on one hand and a minority on the other, that which appears on paper proper for the protection of the Government, turns out to be for the oppression of the minority. In the nature of parties it cannot be otherwise. Therefore, in my opinion, the Government of the United States cannot render a greater service than by declaring it will not be necessary to any diminution of the rights of the citizen; that free investigation shall in all cases be permitted. Mr. G. made some further observations on the particular case of Mr. LYON, and concluded by expressing his hope that the resolution would pass.

The question that the resolution be postponed indefinitely, was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 69, nays 50, as follows:

VOICE OF APPROBATION.

Mr. RANDOLPH called for the consideration of his resolution on the subject of the conduct of the President in the late accommodation with Great Britain.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion was not in order, inasmuch as it was a settled practice of the House to devote the first hour of each day's session to the receiving petitions, reports, &c. Mr. RANDOLPH appealed from his decision, and

The hour having more than passed,

Mr. RANDOLPH again called for the consideration of his resolution, and the House agreed to take it up by yeas and nays, 66 to 62.

The motion pending at the time of adjournment on Friday last, was for an indefinite postponement of the subject.

Mr. DANA protested against the indefinite postponement. Whatever he might think of the propriety of adopting the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, he was certainly against postponing it indefinitely. What would be the effect of such a course? That the subject could not be acted upon during the present session.

Why should a subject be postponed from one session to another? If it were premature to act upon it this session, it might be proper to dispose of it in this manner; but such reasoning could not apply to the motion in question. If it could be ever proper to adopt a measure of this kind, it must be peculiarly proper that it should be done at the present session of Congress.

There can be, said he, but one further reason why it should be postponed indefinitely; and that is, that we are against the proposition itself, and postponing it is a more delicate mode of rejection, than a vote meeting it directly. I do not wish to avoid the question. If my opinion be against the President of the United States, I have certainly nothing to fear from him so as to prevent me from expressing that opinion; if it be in favor of him, I have certainly nothing to hope for from him, so as to tempt me to express it improperly. In my place here, sir, I cannot, for one moment, admit that the President, or any member of the Cabinet, would suppose that I should be induced by any fear or hope to vary in the least from the course which I deem proper in the performance of the trust with which I am honored by the freemen who sent me here. Whether the present President be the person whom, in preference to all others, I would have wished to see placed in the Presidential chair, it is not for me to express at this time. It is enough, that he is placed at the head of the nation according to the Constitution; and, in my place as a public man, it becomes me to observe that decorum towards him which is due from the Legislature to the Executive Magistrate.

On the general question, respecting the propriety or expediency of passing the tribute of approbation to our officers on any occasion, I have listened with much attention to the objections; and it is very true, in my opinion, that, in the ordinary course of public affairs, it would be unworthy of the Legislature to express approbation of the conduct of the Executive, especially in every instance in which he may be supposed to have acted correctly. If he has performed merely an ordinary duty, at an ordinary time, it is needless to say anything about it; and yet I do not say that I would always refuse approbation when he has done his duty. Neither do I admit, if it be proper to express approbation at any time, that the converse is true, that we may express censure. As respects the conduct of gentlemen holding commissions in the Army or Navy, who have done their duty in a manner useful to their country and creditable to themselves, or affording good examples to others, the Legislature may express its approbation, when every gentleman composing it may reprobate an adulatory address.

The real question, therefore, as to the propriety or impropriety of adopting the resolution is, whether there be anything, either in the nature of the time or in the character of the transaction, which renders it proper for the Legislature to express an opinion on the subject? If it were but an ordinary time, and if the Chief Magistrate has only performed an ordinary Executive duty with ordinary propriety, it must be admitted that there is nothing in this case worthy of being distinguished by the Legislature's approbation. Is there, then, anything observable in the nature of the time? What was the state of things prior to this act of the Executive, both in relation to domestic and foreign concerns? What was it in relation to the constituted authorities of the country? Were not questions agitated of the most serious import? Were we not presenting to the world the afflictive spectacle of a nation rent by internal discord? Did it not seem as if the potent spell of some mighty enchanter had arrested our faculties of action? What has been the result of the recent arrangements? The reproaches of party, and the stigmatizing imputations of attachment to one or another foreign Power, have been hushed; industry is revived; mutual gratulations have succeeded to the voice of reproach. The joy of hope succeeds to apprehension and anxiety throughout the nation. And all this is witnessed soon after the accession of a new Chief Magistrate to the head of affairs. Can there be named any one act of any Chief Magistrate of the United States, which has made a greater change than this?

The character of the transaction is not that of an ordinary performance of an ordinary Executive trust. What, sir, are the powers which the President has undertaken to execute? One is, the power in relation to the restoration of intercourse between this country and the British dominions. By statute, this intercourse was interdicted. The President was authorized by the same statute to declare the renewal of intercourse on certain conditions: he was thus authorized to suspend the operation of an act of Congress. Has he, then, exercised this dispensing power according to the conditions limited in the act? This being the nature of the transaction, there seems to be a propriety in the Legislature's expressing an opinion, because, in the execution of his duty, his act was to have a legislative effect.

By the section of the non-intercourse act under which the President issued his late proclamation, "in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify their edicts as that they shall cease to violate the lawful commerce of the United States," the President of the United States is authorized "to declare the same by proclamation; after which the trade of the United States may be renewed with the nation so doing." On this phraseology arises the question: Was the President authorized to proclaim the existence of a fact after its taking place, or was he to predict that a fact could exist? Was he to declare an actual revocation of the Orders in Council, or to predict that they would be revoked? Look at the section, sir! Authority was given to the President of the United States to declare the fact by proclamation, in case Britain or France should revoke or modify their edicts so as not to violate the neutral commerce of the United States. Must not the fact have existed before he could legally declare it? Yet, at the time when the President issued his proclamation, Great Britain had not revoked or modified her edicts at all. The question therefore is, whether this section authorized him to proclaim the renewal of the trade, as he has done? I am not saying that he has not conformed to the spirit of the act. I am not disposed to pronounce a censure on his conduct. But the question is, sir, whether his procedure be strictly legal? If it be not, and we approbate his conduct, it might, perhaps, be proper to pass some act giving validity to what he has done; in the same manner, as when the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the late President, expended several hundred thousand dollars for naval supplies, for which no appropriation had been made, we passed a law giving validity to the transaction. An assurance was given by the British Minister Plenipotentiary, that the Orders in Council will have been withdrawn, as respects the United States, on the tenth day of June next. Was the President of the United States authorized to accept the assurance instead of the fact? I admit that it was scarcely to be expected that an actual revocation should be made a long time prior to a renewal of intercourse, and I should suppose that the phraseology of this section must have occasioned difficulty in negotiation. How the fact was, I do not pretend to have any information. I am perfectly willing to give the officers concerned full credit for attempting to avoid the difficulty arising from the terms of the law; and if the proceeding was not strictly legal, I am willing to give the President of the United States full credit for the disposition which he has manifested; and if the state of things had been anticipated by Congress, I presume they would have been willing to adopt provisions proper for giving validity to the transaction. When I reflect on the great variety of constructions given to this non-intercourse act, I admit it to be so confused and obscure, that even the first officer of the Treasury Department has given opinions on some of its sections completely contradictory, and some of the constructions given to the act have made the Congress guilty of extravagant absurdity; to remedy part of which we have already passed one act this session; such, for instance, as the construction which permitted foreign vessels to return home with cargoes; but if they were bound elsewhere, compelled them to give bond and security not to go home. If the President has done a substantial benefit to the country in the spirit of the law, although in correctness of legal construction the act of Congress did not give him the power, I would approbate the spirit in which he has acted.

So much, sir, as respects one part of the subject to which the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia refers. On examination of the resolution, I find it expressed with a precision which completely applies to the two great acts of the President of the United States; one of which is the opening of intercourse with Great Britain, and the other is the adjusting of the controversy as to the frigate Chesapeake. With respect to the latter case, I should have considered that, while remaining unsatisfied and unatoned, as an insuperable obstacle to the adjustment of other matters in question between the two countries: It was an obstacle presenting itself at the threshold of every negotiation; and we could not, with propriety, negotiate on other matters while that remained unadjusted. It was, perhaps, one of the first questions of the kind that ever occurred under the Constitution of the United States. It respected an attack on the honor of the national flag, which, if unexpiated, would be considered in the national estimation as sufficient cause for public war, an attack which would authorize active measures of hostility as much as an attack on a garrison within our frontiers; an attack, which, in its nature, is to be completely distinguished from the searching of private merchant vessels, on board of which no public authority was exercised by the Government, and for which the Government is not responsible.

In what branch of the Government, sir, is vested the full power of accepting national satisfaction for an injury to our national flag? In what branch is vested the authority of accepting reparation for an insult which might be complete justification of war on our part? We know full well that, in Governments where the Chief Magistrate wears the diadem or the crown, his dignity and the honor of his flag are supposed to be affected by an insult or outrage from a foreign Power. But here the question concerns the dignity of the United States and the honor of the national flag. To whom has the Constitution given the power of deciding the question of war and of peace, on the part of the United States? Certainly the power of making war does not constitutionally appertain to the President; neither can he make a valid treaty of peace, except by concurrence of the Senate. Yet we know that negotiations must be conducted by means of the Executive as the organ of communication with foreign Powers. As the President has not the authority to make war and peace exclusively, has he the exclusive power to accept satisfaction for an outrage which, if unatoned, might be valid cause of war? The general question therefore is, whether it would or would not be proper, when the President has undertaken to accept such satisfaction, to confirm his acceptance by the legislative sanction? Is this an ordinary case, to be considered as an affair of course? We have to reflect whether it should be declared, in consequence of the public reparation, that the attack on the Chesapeake frigate shall no longer be noticed as a question in any difference between the United States and Great Britain, but that it shall never hereafter be brought into account. By approbating the acceptance of satisfaction, the transaction is finished on the part of Congress. If it be not approbated, the President himself is pledged in good faith not to give his consent to any act making war or authorizing hostility on account of their outrage. But if the Congress approbate the accommodation, it becomes unquestionably complete.

So much, sir, as respects the question relative to the acceptance of satisfaction for an insult to the national flag of the United States. There remains a more particular view of the subject, with respect to the terms of satisfaction which have been accepted by the President now in office.

If they were precisely the whole terms which had been formerly demanded, there might be less reason for expressing our opinion as it respects the particular terms of satisfaction. But it will be recollected that, formerly, the Minister of the United States at the Court of London had demanded reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake, when first heard of; and that he thought it improper to mingle other subjects with this more serious cause of complaint. His instructions, subsequently received, directed him to introduce with this subject that of impressment from merchant vessels; and, in obedience to his instructions, he made additions to his demands. The points on which he was instructed to insist, were a formal disavowal of the attack, the restoration of the men taken from the frigate Chesapeake, an entire abolition of impressment from vessels under the flag of the United States, and the solemnity of a legation extraordinary for completing the reparation.

To require the suppression of impressments as the condition of being admitted to make honorable reparation for an acknowledged injury, was a demand which, in the language of the British Government, could be answered no otherwise than by an unqualified refusal. A Minister Extraordinary was afterwards sent to this country; and then the suppression of impressments was not specifically insisted on as an indispensable condition of any adjustment. But it was proposed, on the part of the late Administration of the United States, that the British Minister Extraordinary should disclose the terms of reparation on which he was authorized to agree; and if they should appear to be satisfactory, then the President would consider them as a pledge for preventing other alleged abuses, and that the interdictory proclamation against the British navy might then be revoked by an act of the same date with the act of reparation. We now find that terms of reparation are accepted, without any stipulation as to the suppression of impressments, and without considering these terms as a pledge for giving satisfaction on any other point.

The terms accepted being thus variant from the terms formerly insisted on, is there not peculiar reason for expressing our opinion upon the change which has taken place? For myself, although the difference has not been accommodated in a style so highly honorable as I could have wished, I much doubt whether reasonable men, under the circumstances ultimately attending the case, would insist on terms more advantageous than those which the President in office has accepted; for doubtless there was difficulty in settling them. The main points desirable were, that the inadmissible pretension, which gave rise to the attack on the Chesapeake, should be solemnly disclaimed forever; and that the adjustment should be so finished as that neither nation should experience any sentiment of peculiar mortification or debasement in consequence of the settlement. I incline to the opinion, sir, that when the subject came to be examined, it was so circumstanced that no reasonable man could have expected it to be settled on better terms than it had been, for the United States. I therefore am ready to declare my approbation of the conduct of the President of the United States in relation to the promptitude and frankness with which he has met the overtures of the British Government.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it was no part of his intention now to enter into anything like a consideration of the great points supposed to be in dispute between those who approved the conduct of the President of the United States in issuing his proclamation, and giving the construction which he had given to the non-intercourse act. And, indeed, if, on the last vote which had been taken, (for considering his motion,) he could with any sense of decorum or propriety have voted against himself, if he could have voted in the negative on his own motion, he should have taken a pleasure in so doing. For he, as much as any member of this House, wished to hear the communications lying on the table, but he was also anxious to see a question of right with respect to himself decided; and to his perfect satisfaction, the House had supported the decision of the Chair, and yet the course which the business would take was precisely the same as if the House had admitted his motion in the first instance to be in order, except that some three-quarters of an hour or more had been occupied in discussing the point of order. I wish (said Mr. R.) to make some answer to the objections of a very venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FURLEY,) on the motion which it is now proposed to postpone. I think the principal objection of that gentleman was, that it was improper at any time to discuss or entertain such propositions—that motions in approbation or disapprobation of the conduct of the Executive of the United States ought not to be agitated here; that they are wrong in principle; and that how much soever he might be disposed to applaud the conduct of the President in this or in that particular, he would not countenance a motion approving that conduct. What weight it will have with the other members of this House (said Mr. R.) I know not, but there is a precedent on file which ought not to be destitute of weight with that gentleman, from the first session of the third Congress, which met at Philadelphia in November, 1793, soon after the late General WASHINGTON had issued his celebrated proclamation of neutrality; and I beg the House to carry along with them in their minds the similitude of the two occasions, and the dissimilitude too, and to keep in recollection that wherever there is a difference between the two cases, the advantage is on the side of the motion which I have had the honor to lay before you. For example: in the year 1793, previous to the first session of the third Congress, the late General WASHINGTON, conceiving himself to be required by his duty as President of the United States to issue a certain proclamation—and recollect that the present motion is relative to a proclamation, and hinges entirely on it—which proclamation General WASHINGTON was not required to issue by any law of the land; I find that at that time the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and another gentleman from Pennsylvania, an ancient colleague of his, (Mr. SMITH,) and several other members of the present Congress, were then members of the House of Representatives; and it appears on the Journal, that on that day the Committee of Elections did report that the credentials of these gentlemen entitled them to their seats. I am consequently to suppose their presence, except I were to suppose (what I have no right or disposition to do) that there was some dereliction of duty on their part, and that they were absent from their seats. The yeas and nays, indeed, were not taken; but on Friday the 26th, the House resolved unanimously to address the President of the United States in the words following—I do not mean to fatigue the House or myself with reading the whole of it, but will read extracts:

“The United States having taken no part in the war which had embraced in Europe the Powers with whom they have the most extensive relations, the maintenance of peace was justly to be regarded as one of the most important duties of the magistrate charged with the faithful execution of the laws. We accordingly witnessed with approbation and pleasure the vigilance with which you have guarded against an interruption of that blessing by your proclamation, admonishing our citizens of the consequences of illicit or hostile acts towards the belligerent parties, and promoting by a declaration of the existing legal state of things an easier admission of our right to the immunities belonging to our situation.”

Now here, sir, is a vote of approbation proposed on the subject of a proclamation which the President of the United States was called upon by no law of the land to issue, and on the execution of which duty, in a manner comporting with their sense of that duty, depended the approbation or disapprobation of this House; and surely, sir, if it was competent for the House of Representatives in the year 1793, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and other gentlemen, now members of this House, to approve the conduct of President WASHINGTON in issuing that proclamation, which he was not required to do by any specific statute, it is surely at least as proper now to approve the conduct of President Madison in a case in which it was his special duty to do it. Where there is a variance between the two cases, it is in favor of the motion which I have the honor to submit. But perhaps I shall be told by some of those youthful spirits who have lately made their appearance in this House, that this is a precedent taken from federal times, and therefore ought not to be relied on by good Democrats. But, sir, it unfortunately happens for those gentlemen who would thus evade the force of it, that in the very zenith of democracy, a precedent perfectly analogous, or even stronger than the one now contended for, was entered upon our Journal. At the second session of the seventh Congress, (the first which convened after the election of Mr. Jefferson to the Chief Magistracy,) the House of Representatives were moved to come to the following resolution in relation to the obstruction of the navigation of the river Mississippi, and of the right of deposit at New Orleans by the Spanish government of Louisiana :

" Resolved, That this House receive with great sensibility the information of a disposition in certain officers of the Spanish government at New Orleans to obstruct the navigation of the river Mississippi, as secured to the United States by the most solemn stipulations :

" That, adhering to that humane and wise policy which ought ever to characterize a free people, and by which the United States have always professed to be governed; willing at the same time to ascribe this breach of compact to the unauthorized misconduct of certain individuals, rather than to a want of good faith on the part of His Catholic Majesty, and relying with perfect confidence on the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive, they will wait the issue of such measures as that department of the Government shall have pursued for asserting the rights and vindicating the injuries of the United States; holding it to be their duty at the same time to express their unalterable determination to maintain the boundaries and the rights of navigation and commerce through the river Mississippi, as established by existing treaties."

On that occasion it did unfortunately happen that there were gentlemen in this House who had no disposition to express any such confidence in the President of the United States, as I am afraid, and do verily and in my conscience believe, there are now gentlemen who have no disposition to express approbation (because they feel none) of the late conduct of the President of the United States. These gentlemen then moved to strike out these words, (the words in italic in the above resolution,) which passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 53. Mr. R. here read the names of those who had voted for or against. Now, he said, he was not at all surprised that the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) and others, who did not feel that confidence in the late President, therefore voted against expressing it; and now, also, he presumed, the gentleman would vote, as others would, according to the sentiment he felt. But, said Mr. R., we, who did feel confidence, and had none of that punctilious repugnance at expressing what we felt, and could not see anything in principle against expressing it, (not having at that time the benefit of the light shed on this subject by the venerable and reverend gentleman from Pennsylvania,) voted in the negative. So much upon the question, whether there ever existed a case in which this House undertook to approve the conduct of the Executive of the United States in a delicate and critical juncture, particularly of our foreign affairs; the evidence which I have produced is conclusive; and the fact is, that if we get rid of this motion after the precedents which have been cited—I do not say that they are binding; I do not feel them so; if I thought it wrong I should vote against it without reference to former precedent—but if we do become all of a sudden, and, in this particular point, so very squeamish, the fact is, that the President of the United States, if endowed with half the penetration which I presume he does possess, must take the hint; he must feel that there exists in this body a disapprobation of his conduct, although there be no disposition to express that disapprobation. For, sir, we should not have to go far back to seek for precedent to find a case where, in point of practice, a decision is condemned, and in point of vote upheld.

We have gotten all of a sudden, sir, into a sort of phobia of abstract proposition; we hear a great deal of passing votes, out of which nothing is to grow. I would ask the worthy gentleman from Pennsylvania—I would not put that question to any other member but the worthy gentleman from Pennsylvania, because I understand his ground to be, that there does not exist the right, if there exists the power, in this House to enter into a series of propositions which lead to no law. Now, sir, at the last session, when a member got up and moved that the thanks of the House be given to the Speaker for the faithful and able discharge and so forth of his duties, that was not intended to originate a bill; nothing was to grow out of it, except a very unpleasant situation to the House and the gentleman in the Chair. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania then have contended that such a motion was inadmissible, and therefore ought to be indefinitely postponed? If I am not much misinformed, there was a motion indefinitely to postpone that proposition, which was negatived. Then it seems, sir, that we have an unlimited power of complimenting ourselves; that we may be guilty of self-flattery to any extent—for what is the Speaker of this House, in fact, but ourself? He is the creature of the House; they make him. When they compliment the Speaker, they compliment their own sagacity in selecting a person so competent to the discharge of his duty. For what does the Speaker say when conducted to the Chair? That he will discharge the duties of his office agreeably to the wishes of the House; for which, I presume, he receives the vote of thanks. Now, in this case, the President of the United States has discharged the duties of his office, if not agreeably to the wishes of the House, certainly agreeably to mine; and, therefore, I would express my approbation—why? That it may stand on the Journals as an expression of my opinion; although, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that some twenty or thirty years hence, when the little bickerings of this day are past and forgotten, that vote will be of value. It will tell; it will weigh heavily in the estimate of the character of the person in respect to whom it is passed; for when we go back to the Journals, and look at the Administration of General WASHINGTON, twenty years ago, do we think of the little party disputes of that time? We scarcely give ourselves trouble to consider how men were moved to their actions. It is of consequence to posterity too. What will the historian do in relation to the transactions of this Administration? He will find that the first act was to restore harmony and intercourse between the United States and a foreign nation. Is he to be met at the threshold; is this conduct to be qualified by a vote upon your Journals, from which he will inevitably draw this inference, that although there did not exist a disposition openly to condemn the Ministry, there existed a majority of a different way of thinking; and who therefore got rid of this question as dexterously as they could? No, sir; this vote (I hope I shall be pardoned for saying so) differs to its advantage from the vote for returning thanks to the Speaker of this House at the end of the last session of Congress. It is a vote out of which some practical good is to grow—a vote by which the President of the United States is to be strengthened in the course which he is now pursuing, and encouraged and invigorated in persisting in that course hereafter. It is not a mere motion in course, like a motion for a vote of thanks to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, which is at last considered as a matter of form, and has ceased to be a source of anything but unpleasant sensation to the House; for I believe that from the time of the first Speaker, a member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MUHLENBURG,) who was succeeded by a member from Connecticut, (Mr. TRUMBULL,) and afterwards by a gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) subsequently by a colleague of yours, Mr. Speaker, (Mr. SEDGWICK,) and finally until the last Congress, by my worthy friend from North Carolina, in every case this motion of thanks to the Speaker, which, if my motion be abstract, is equally abstract, has been made and carried; although I believe that the first time the motion was made after I obtained a seat in Congress, it was merely accidental that it was carried at all, although no practical result upon gentlemen's own principles could ensue, and it ought therefore (as they say) to have been quashed. I, on the contrary, contend that practical good can ensue from my motion, and I think that my friend from North Carolina, whom I do not see in his place, (and I am glad that he is not in his place,) must have felt his toils in the Chair, and even a broken constitution, to have been amply compensated by three distinct and unanimous votes of three several Houses of Congress, returning thanks to him for his able and impartial conduct in the Chair.

Although, sir, it be no part of my intention, as I said when I rose, to enter into the merits of the main question, I think it necessary to say a few words in explanation of what fell from me a few days ago, when unprepared to discuss this subject, when, perhaps, I was misunderstood, and, very probably, because I may not have expressed myself as accurately as I could have wished. It has been stated that this offer on the part of the British Government and acceptance on the part of ours—this truce, or call it what you will, patched up between the two countries, is more disadvantageous to Great Britain than the late offer to suspend the embargo as to Great Britain, and keep it on as to France, would have been if accepted. This is one of the cases in which my argument is fairly met—as far at least as it can be met by mere assertion; and, after the decision of this motion for indefinite postponement (which I perceive will be lost) on the discussion of the main question, all I ask of gentlemen is to state the argument as it really was offered; and if they refute it they shall have my best thanks; I shall listen to them with a mind perfectly open to conviction. But if gentlemen state something else, they cannot suppose that I will interrupt them in the course of their career of success against arguments not of my creation but of their own. I shall, therefore, in the course of my discussion, take no kind of notice of any statement of my argument that can be made unless it be a perfectly fair statement, and the true matter be met, any further than finally to recapitulate by way of reply what I conceive to be the true points in dispute. Here is one point: that as far as we have gone in the present adjustment, it is more disadvantageous to Great Britain than the proposal for suspending the embargo. That is a fact on which every man in the House is competent to decide, and one on which I deem the arguments offered by me to you to be so irresistibly conclusive that I will not notice anything in the way of assertion on this point farther than to suggest that this has been thrown out in the spirit of the proverb, that good wine needs no bush. Nothing is more common, in the State which I represent, than for a horse-dealer, having two horses to dispose of, to give praise to the most indifferent, in proportion precisely as it is inferior to the other, because it is supposed that the good horse will always sell himself, and it is necessary to recommend the other by all the address of which that sort of people are never destitute. Now, in the present case of the late adjustment, of which nobody complains, it is supposed to be one which meets so general an approbation that it is not worth while to say much in its commendation. Now, sir, as this old horse is to be linked in the same team, if the jockey can once establish that he is a better nag than the grey mare, than that which is generally acknowledged to be good, his point is gained. That is the question in dispute; and until I hear the argument which I submitted to you last week answered, I shall say not one word upon it. To be sure, sir, if we allow that the proposition to suspend the embargo as to Great Britain was more advantageous for her than the late one, we must admit that it is more advantageous to Great Britain to have her ships excluded from our waters than admitted into them; that it is more advantageous to have the old non-importation act in force than to have it repealed; that it is more advantageous for her to have a difficult and hampered trade, and her ships of war excluded, whilst those of France were admitted in perfect freedom, than to have her trade with us put on the footing on which it stood prior to the old non-importation act, and our trade to France cut off and French ships excluded. If gentlemen believe this it is very well; I admire their faith. There is a point of fact on which it unfortunately happens that there has been and does exist in this House too much difference of opinion. It is a fact which can be established conclusively by your Journals; and the reading of the documents received from the Executive when he recommended the embargo will convince gentlemen of it. Gentlemen say that the fact of the existence of the Orders in Council was known here, when they are compelled to confess the President intimated nothing of it in his Message. Produce the National Intelligencer; produce the passage so often alluded to in relation to these orders; and what conclusion is to be drawn from it? Why, sir, that some speculation might have been hazarded on the subject, something in the way of conjecture. Do gentlemen believe that the late President of the United States had a peculiar diffidence in the National Intelligencer? Had he any peculiar diffidence in that paper, of all the papers in the world, that, when he sent the proclamation, cut out of a British newspaper, he would not have sent us a file of the National Intelligencer, or that article from it which they say went to establish the existence of the Orders in Council? Had he any cause for peculiar diffidence in the National Intelligencer, that he would not send us an extract from that paper while he sent us extracts from others—even British papers? Or, are gentlemen prepared to say that the conductors of that gazette have more certain information on the subject of our foreign concerns than is possessed by the President of the United States himself? I hope not, sir. The fact of the Orders in Council being known in this country by our Government, they might have been known by the British Minister; but their being known by our Government and by us, and the embargo growing out of them, is the point at issue. A gentleman told me the other day, "you forget that though they were not known, the probability of them was known." This is a new discovery; what kind of knowledge is this same knowledge of probability, sir? Their probability might have been conjecture; but did that imply a knowledge that such orders had issued, or would issue? And can you assume that fact without throwing on the late President of the United States a degree of odium which, in my opinion, he is not fairly entitled to? I think it is treating him unjustly and cruelly to suppose that they were known. For, in supposing it, you presuppose that he has failed in his duty in communicating it in that Message which recommended the embargo. The Orders in Council were not known in this city or in this House when the President of the United States recommended that embargo. I protest upon my honor that they were not known to me; nor did I hear them mentioned on that day. As to their having been known in New York, you might as well say that they were known in Quebec or Halifax, or even London itself. What does the fact of their having been known in New York prove but that they were known in New York? Could that knowledge at New York be a rule of conduct for us? If the Orders in Council were known at the time that the President recommended the embargo, let the proofs be produced; and though I should not be willing to vote either approbation or disapprobation on this subject, I should be at a loss how to refuse a vote of disapprobation on the conduct of the late President of the United States for neglecting to apprize us of their existence. But he did his duty. He knew not of any Orders in Council, and mentioned none; the embargo grew out of the state of affairs which existed when we were in perfect ignorance of the Orders in Council, out of the correspondence from Paris, in relation to the Berlin decree, and the British proclamation respecting seamen.

Sir, in speaking of the amendment moved by the worthy gentleman from Massachusetts, whom I see in his place, and my reluctance to vote for it, my meaning may have been misunderstood, and probably because it was not very correctly expressed. When we speak of the Government of the United States, what do we mean? Do we mean the President of the United States and his Secretaries, or the Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary, but more especially the Executive and Legislature? Now, when I spoke of the disposition of the Government of the United States, I had particularly in my eye the manifestation of a spirit in the other House of Congress, and in this also, which demonstrated most conclusively to my mind that notwithstanding our celebrated vote of "and France"—bringing up France in the rear like a needless Alexandria, like the latter part of a wounded snake, dragging its slow length along—that there did, under all this smoke of hostility to both belligerents, exist a cool, deliberate disposition to go to war with one only; and I take motions made in the other branch of the Legislature, and motions and speeches made on this floor, and on record, as a proof of such disposition. I infer the disposition of Government not merely from declarations of the President of the United States himself, but from the semi-official oracular sayings of gentlemen supposed to be, and in fact known to be, in his confidence. I did hear, and I confess I heard it with some pleasure, that there existed a difference of opinion on this subject in the Cabinet at the late session of Congress; and that the late President of the United States (God bless him for it!) on that question was with us, and would not be driven into a war with England; and that the leaders of the war party were deplorably chagrined and disappointed by it. So, when I speak of the Government of the United States, I wish not to be understood as alluding to any disposition which the late President of the United States had to go to war with Great Britain. But, sir, I do think, after hearing the report of the late Committee of Foreign Relations, declaring that there were but two alternatives, embargo or war, and seeing all the members but two vote to this effect, that war with one of these nations was submission, and submission the most base and abject, too, to the other; and then hearing gentlemen declare they were for war with one of those nations, the conclusion is irresistible that they were for making that abject submission to the other nation, or that it was mere hollow hypocrisy for covering the design of going to war with one of those belligerents, and succumbing to the other. I should be childish not to believe that there did exist a disposition such as the gentleman from Virginia

(Mr. JACKSON) intimates did not exist in what he calls the Government of the United States.

One other subject I must touch before I sit down. The change in the relations of the United States is ascribed to the non-intercourse law. Against that law I most certainly voted. If the merit of that change is to be ascribed to the non-intercourse law, be it so. I have no objection. But who were the advocates of that poor miserable measure? Our worthy chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. EPPES) portrayed in hideous colors the horrible features of that law; and another gentleman from the same State (Mr. JACKSON) made motion after motion till a very late hour in the night to defeat the law, whilst I sat still voting in its favor until the last stage; and I voted against it eventually, not because I felt any opposition to the law on the grounds which those gentlemen did, but because I believed if we had not got rid of the embargo on these terms, that we should have got rid of it on better. Mine was a sort of negative opposition to the law; theirs positive and unqualified; they said it was absolute disgrace. Now, therefore, sir, if the change in our foreign relations is to be ascribed to that law, I wish the advocates of it to rise up and assert their share in it in the presence of the House. The fact is, that nobody would advocate it; that though it was carried by a majority of two to one, those who finally voted for it condemned it, and all parties seemed ashamed of it; and that, prior to the late restoration of good understanding, all the high-toned men and high-toned presses in this country denounced the majority of this House for passing that law, as having utterly disgraced themselves. If, therefore, any credit be due to the non-intercourse law, I do not wish it to be run away with by those who were enemies to the measure. I voted against the law because I thought we could have got rid of the embargo on better terms. Are those to have the credit of it who said that, if their opinion was followed, they were for immediate war, and with Great Britain; but who, finding their friends could not be screwed up to the war-pitch, had made a sort of compromise of their wishes, and agreed to accept this stupid unmeaning non-intercourse law by way of appearing to be doing something? No, sir. Are those to have the merit of the reconciliation who moved to issue letters of marque and reprisal—a scheme which, thank God, I had some share in defeating? Are those to have the merit of the good consequences which are alleged to have flowed from the non-intercourse law? Certainly not. I really think, sir, that if there be any merit anywhere, it belongs to those men who prevented a powerful and energetic party in this and the other House of Congress—a party, too, standing high in Executive confidence—from dragging the Executive, against his will, and this House, and this nation, into a war with Great Britain. It is those men who deserve the credit; and I, for one, although a desultory kind of partisan, acting on my own impulse, claim my share; for if the great leaders could have been gratified, according to their own showing, they would have dragged this country into a war with Great Britain, which certainly would have closed the door to the present happy arrangement. Their war-speeches were printed by subscription and bound up; and I venture to say that some fifty years hence they will form a curiosity in literature; they stand on record against their authors. Now, to be sure, sir, those persons who undertook to stop their wild career were composed of heterogeneous materials—even those who have been designated (I know not why) as ultra-federalists and citra-federalists, if any such there be, united on this vote. There were minority men, caucus men, protesters—in fact, sir, all parties, Catholics, Protestants, Seceders, and all, were united in the effort to prevent the leaders of both Houses from plunging the nation into a war with one power, and knuckling to the other—from rivetting the chains of French influence, perhaps of French alliance, upon us. Thank God that their designs were proclaimed to the nation, that the President did not give his consent, which would have made us kick the beam. Yes, sir, federalists, minority men, protesters and all would have kicked the beam if it had ever emanated from the Cabinet that the President was for war. It was as much as old Nestor, with trusty Sthenelus by his side, and all the train could do, to arrest those fiery hotheaded steeds, who were hurrying the state-carriage down the precipice of French alliance. Suppose that we had given them the reins, where should we have been, and what doing, at this time, sir? We should have been here, indeed—discussing abstract propositions, as they are called? No, sir, we should have been voting supplies; we should have gone in full committee of supply and of ways and means, and come out of it almost as soon as we did out of the Committee on the state of the Union on the President's Message; for our whole art of raising money appears to consist in borrowing; loans, loans, loans, are the alpha and omega, the sum and substance of our system of political economy; and the worthy gentleman who presides at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means would now have been calling for loans with all his might. We should have been marching troops to Canada, passing acts for the relief of sufferers in the bombardment of New York, discussing whether the owners of slaves stolen from the seaboard should be compensated by the General Government or not. This is the situation in which we should have been in fact, instead of being in the situation in which we now are—the merit of which, if any there be, is not due to those who arrogate it to themselves, but to the late President of the United States and that majority, however discordant the materials composing it, who defeated the cabal in the two Houses of Congress, that was determined to plunge us into a war; who restrained what have been called (and it is no nomenclature of mine) the Invincibles; who curbed what has been called (and I am not the sponsor) the Family Compact.

Before I sit down, sir, permit me to state expressly and unequivocally, and I deem it more especially my duty to state it because the gentleman is not present, that in the course of that discussion and the votes on the subject, the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) did act, as I conceived, a consistent and open part; that after declaring that we could not go to war without going to a war with both France and England, that we could not go to war with one without the most abject submission to the other; he was not willing, if I understood him aright, to make that submission by going to war with that other. Other gentlemen, perhaps, to whom my attention was not so much called, not being placed in so conspicuous a station in the House as that gentleman, may have done the same. There was another gentleman in the House, in respect to whom I feel it incumbent on me to say something. He was one of those who have been marked and branded, and are suspected of being minority men. I allude particularly to a worthy friend of mine, now no longer a member of this House, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) than whom, I believe, there is not a more honest man breathing, who was not only a minority man, but, worse than all that, "one of the protesters," and whose speech was very much relied on as the best speech made in favor of the war party. Sir, you recollect that that gentleman declared his disposition, together with my friend who sits before me, of clinging to the embargo, and that was the great point of difference between us; and as to the gentleman who sits before me, (Mr. MACON,) it is only the third point in which I have had the misfortune to differ with him since I came into public life. When they, therefore, advocated this warlike doctrine, it was under the belief that nothing was left, if the embargo was raised, but submission or war; and they preferred the embargo to war, but they preferred war to submission. It was particularly the doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina who is no longer a member of this House, and to whom, these observations, loose and unsatisfactory as they may be, are more especially applied. But there is no other point of contact, as far as within my knowledge, but his partiality to the embargo, and his disposition to go to war, if it were raised, between him and those who, thank God, defeated the war purposes.

On the subject of a desire to excite a war spirit, I think it necessary to state that motions and speeches were not only made with that tendency, but with that avowed disposition in both Houses of Congress. And I repeat it, to whatever source the present situation of the country is to be ascribed, it is not to those who were termed thorough-going men in this House in the last Congress, nor to those of the same description in the Senate, though they have been checked, to be sure, by an opposition of the strangest kind; but, it is unimportant of what materials it was composed, since it had the effect of saving the nation from war with one of the belligerents, and of producing the present state of things, which gentlemen themselves tell us was the consequence of our having avoided war.

When Mr. RANDOLPH concluded, a motion was made by Mr. SMILIE to adjourn, and carried—yeas 70.

TUESDAY, May 30.

A motion was made by Mr. RANDOLPH, to expunge from the journal of the proceedings of yesterday, so much of that part of the Speaker's decision as is contained in the following words: "As the hour which the House had usually appropriated for the presentation of petitions and communications had not elapsed; and that he had some communications to lay before the House 'from some of the Executive Departments:'"

And the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. LEWIS presented a memorial of manufacturers of hats, in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the like effect with a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in Fredericktown, State of Maryland, presented to the House on the twenty-fifth instant.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Virginia, enclosing the certificate of the election of John Dawson, to serve as one of the Representatives of that State in the Eleventh Congress of the United States; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, and to establish a Land Office in the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, from the committee appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States as respects our foreign relations, presented a bill to repeal the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, and to revive and amend the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. SAY presented a petition of the sugar refiners in the city of Philadelphia, of the like tenor and to the same effect with a petition of the sugar refiners of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, presented on the twenty-seventh instant.

Mr. SAY also presented a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in the city and county of Philadelphia, to the like effect with the petitions from the manufacturers of hats before-stated.

Mr. MCKIM presented a memorial of the manufacturers of cotton goods in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, praying that an additional duty may be imposed on the importation from any foreign port or place of articles manufactured from cotton.

Third Census—American Seamen.

H. OF R.

Mr. MUMFORD presented two memorials of the manufacturers of hats in the city of New York, to the like effect with the memorials from the manufacturers of hats before stated.

Mr. JOHN PORTER presented a petition of sundry manufacturers and bottlers of malt liquors, in the city of Philadelphia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, praying that black glass bottles may be imported free of duty; and that so much of a law which prohibits the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, and which prevents the introduction of malt liquors from foreign countries, may be continued in force, or that an additional duty may be imposed upon the importation thereof.

Ordered, That the said memorials and petitions be severally referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed Mr. GILES, Mr. FRANKLIN, and Mr. HILLHOUSE, a committee on their part, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of this House, to inquire what business it is requisite should be done at the present session.

Mr. WITHERSPOON presented a petition of John Ervine, on behalf of himself, James Gregg, and Roger Roberts, of the State of South Carolina, praying to be paid the amount of his account as principal assessor, and of the accounts of the said Gregg and Roberts, as assistant assessors, under the act laying and collecting a direct tax within the United States, for the county of Liberty, in the said State of South Carolina.

The petition was read and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. GOLD presented the petition of Mrs. Hamilton, widow of the late General Alexander Hamilton of New York, stating that her husband was a Colonel during the Revolutionary war, and as such entitled to half pay; but that from his delicate situation as a member of Congress he had relinquished his claim, the amount of which the petitioner prays may be allowed to her. Mr. GOLD moved a reference to the Committee of Claims. Mr. GHOLSON moved to refer the petition, together with one which he conceived to be similar, to a select committee. On this motion a debate of near two hours, upon the subject of claims generally, took place, in which Messrs. GHOLSON, GOLD, MACON, SOUTHBARD, LYON, TALLMADGE, NELSON, QUINCY, SMILIE, GARDENER, and RANDOLPH, partook. The petition was eventually referred to the Committee of Claims by a small majority.

THIRD CENSUS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that it was now precisely ten years since he had the honor of being a member of this House. The first session of the sixth Congress was held at Philadelphia in December, '99; and at that session a law was passed for taking the second census of the inhabitants of the United States. It had been then allowed on all hands that that law was delayed so long, that the marshals had not time to make the proper enumeration in as accurate and faithful manner as it ought to have been done. On the third census of the people of the United States would depend not merely the gross numbers of this House, but the relative weight of the Southern and Western, and, in fact, of the Middle and Eastern States, for perhaps none were increasing with greater rapidity than the two great Middle States of New York and Pennsylvania. He thought it proper that provision should be made at this session for taking the third census. Such a provision could not accelerate the time, but would enable the officers of the United States to take proper means to insure the excellence of the work. He, therefore, moved—

“That provision ought to be made by law for taking the third census of the inhabitants of the United States.”

Mr. LYON expressed his pleasure at seeing this proposition introduced. He said it was important that the people of the United States should be represented according to their numbers. The district which he had the honor to represent contained more than 100,000 souls. The State of Ohio had by this time a population of 200,000 souls, and had but one Representative; the State of Tennessee had perhaps doubled its population. It behooved Congress to set about the business as soon as they could.

Mr. W. ALSTON conceived that it was necessary that the census should be taken in every part of the Union as nearly at the same time as possible. Were the law now to be passed, it might be taken in some parts of the United States between now and January next, and in other parts in not less than three years. He hoped, he said, that the House would not be thus troubled with unnecessary business. If the passage of the law were deferred for a session or two, the different parts would be more equally represented, though an immediate census might be favorable to his part of the country, because he was convinced that it was losing ground in the general scale of population of the United States.

On the suggestion of Mr. QUINCY, with the consent of Mr. RANDOLPH, the motion was ordered to lie on the table—yeas 101.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. DANA said that he rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to a subject which could not but be interesting to the Councils of the nation. It related to American seamen. He wished to propose a resolution, the object of which was to designate American seamen, and to insure to them the benefits properly appertaining to that character. It was a proposition which could not impede any object which the Administration could have in view, or embarrass any negotiation with foreign Powers. He was the more desirous to bring up this subject, because it was extremely difficult to ascertain the number of foreign seamen in the service of the United States. In answer to an inquiry made at the last session, with a view to ascertain the number of foreign seamen who had been naturalized, an answer had been received, which, although he knew much deception had been practised, astonished him. He said it might be presumed that there were on board American shipping, between ten and twenty thousand seamen, who were not natives of America. In the course of twelve years, the whole number of persons naturalized according to the laws of the United States, and registered as seamen, did not amount to four hundred and fifty! It might be set down for fact, Mr. D. said, that under our existing laws not less than ten thousand certificates of protection are annually afloat, which are obtained by fals swearing. To this fraud he wished to put an end. At present vessels might claim the privilege of carrying the American flag, without a single American mariner on board, a permission contrary to the usage of all civilized nations. For the security and encouragement of our seamen, therefore, he proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That, for the benefit of the seamen of the United States, it is proper to make provision, that registered ships or vessels shall not be entitled to the privilege of ships or vessels of the United States, unless a certain proportion of mariners on board the same shall be citizens of the United States.

On the suggestion of Mr. BURWELL, with the consent of Mr. DANA, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

ARMED TRADE.

Mr. DANA said he wished to propose another resolution, the object of which contemplated a provision for arming the commerce of the United States, not as against any particular Power, but it was an attempt to draw a line of discrimination between armaments for defence and armaments for attack, between the principle of resistance to aggression of foreign nations, and the principle of reprisal; in fact, an attempt at experiment, whether we could not transfer to the water that system which exists on the land, for a practical demonstration of which he would refer to gentlemen from the Western country, where he understood that the citizens, individually or combined, armed for their defence against predatory incursions or attack. This was a species of arming distinct from arming for attack or plunder. The resolution which he held in his hand was similar to one proposed at a late day last session; it was however directed against one principle, and that was the principle of blockade by proclamation. It completely contravened the principle of the French decrees as to British ports, and the principle of the British Orders in Council. The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to make provision, by law, to allow merchant vessels of the United States to be armed for defence in voyages to ports of Europe, the West Indies, and Atlantic coast of America, and, accordingly, to furnish the documentary evidence, which may be proper in any such case to manifest the defensive character of the armament allowed; and at the same time by law to require securities for the vessels respectively, that they will not proceed to any part known to be actually blockaded, nor carry articles contraband of war to the dominions of a belligerent Power, nor violate the laws or treaties of the United States, or the rules of public law by them acknowledged, but will observe the instructions which may be given by the President of the United States for preventing all such violations, and that due satisfaction shall be made for all damages and injuries, if any should be committed in contravention thereof.

It was referred to a Committee of the Whole, on Friday next, on motion of Mr. DANA.

VOTE OF APPROBATION.

The unfinished business of yesterday was resumed, ayes 63.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON withdrew his motion for indefinite postponement, and Mr. NELSON renewed it.

Mr. JOHNSON said that at this extra session he had fondly hoped he should have had it in his power to be a silent member, but he regretted that duty compelled him to address the Speaker at this late hour of the day, when all must be fatigued, and upon a subject that had involved a discussion unpleasant, unprofitable, and even mischievous. The Executive in his communication to us, said Mr. J., has avoided detail upon the subject of the expected negotiation in the late settlement of our differences, and we should avoid it as much as possible. But this motion has been introduced for the laudable purpose of discovering the difference of opinion in this place upon the late transaction respecting our foreign relations with Great Britain, by the settlement of the affair of the Chesapeake, and the renewal of commercial intercourse. The gentleman from Virginia believes there are men in this House who disapprove the conduct of the President. I disbelieve it, because I have no evidence of it. I have heard in this body, and out of doors, universal approbation. The prospect of peace has been hailed as a political jubilee. No difference does exist upon the subject. But, sir, there is a diversity of sentiment or expectation how the promised negotiation with Great Britain will ultimate. Some are more, and others less sanguine. And, when we consult the volume of experience, and recollect the many important subjects of settlement, it is not wonderful if we should have our fears and our hopes on the subject in different degrees. Let us hope for good, but be prepared for evil, that a reverse of the present prospect may not change excessive joy into deep mourning.

The mover of this resolution has attempted to draw a line of distinction between the late and the present Administration in respect to our foreign relations. The two Administrations, so far as Mr. Madison has progressed, are the same in principle, and the same in conduct, animated by the same spirit of moderation, firmness, and justice towards other nations. But the mover of this motion says the propositions under the two Administrations were different, and that the late adjustment is more advantageous to Great Britain. The propositions made by Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison were the same. In the first instance

Vote of Approbation.

H. OF R.

they were rejected by Mr. Canning with a sneering contempt unworthy a great man. The proposition in each case, was this: Rescind your Orders in Council, and we will suspend the laws interdicting the commercial intercourse between the two nations. Upon what principle did Mr. Canning reject this just offer? Because Bonaparte had blockaded the Continent, and he was determined that the present and future generations should see that Great Britain would never relinquish her Orders in Council until the policy of Bonaparte should be abandoned—that the honor and power of the British Government rested in some good degree upon it. But now, the same propositions have been accepted, although the Continent is more completely blockaded than when the same proposition had been rejected; for, even Spain and Portugal, upon which British hopes rested, are now closed. Those who opposed the wise measures of our Government may say, to shield themselves, that we have yielded. We have not yielded. Great Britain has abandoned her unjust system of restriction upon our commerce; and the United States stand redeemed from any charge of inconsistency. It will be a difficult task to convince the enlightened citizens of the United States that there has been a difference in the conduct of the present and the late illustrious President. So far from the shadow of proof that such a difference does exist, the very act of the present Chief Magistrate grew out of the law of Congress passed under Mr. Jefferson's Administration. This law gave certain powers, and imposed certain duties, to be exercised and performed upon certain and defined contingencies. Upon the happening of these contingencies, viz: the rescinding the Orders in Council, &c., Mr. Madison promptly performed his duty by suspending our non-intercourse system as to Great Britain, for the renewal of our commerce. Who is so sagacious in the powers of discrimination as to draw a line of distinction, when the conduct of the Administrations are so united and identified that the act of one grew out of the law of the other? But, the measures of our Government which have produced such happy results are likely to be popular, and it is necessary for those who thought we took too high ground, to secure a retreat in their defeat by endeavoring to draw this nice distinction.

But it is said that the late adjustment is more advantageous to Great Britain than the former proposal by us, because our waters are not interdicted to British armed vessels, and because French armed vessels are prohibited. Sir, the interdict which excludes British and French armed vessels still remains in full force and virtue. It has not been taken off as to British armed vessels. The proclamation of the President has only made the trade renewable on the 10th of June. He had no control over the interdict; nor did the British Minister make it a sine qua non, as did Mr. Rose, in settling the affair of the Chesapeake. Here again we have remained firm, and Great Britain has yielded the improper ground which she had previously taken. It is said that French armed vessels are now excluded our waters, and this was not the case when former propositions were made to the British Ministry; and that we are now in the situation, as it respects France, that Great Britain wished. Admit all this, and what is the result? That France had done nothing to induce an interdict of her armed vessels when the attack was made on the Chesapeake, which was the principal, though not the only event which produced the proclamation of interdict against Great Britain—and certainly no American would wish to take hostile measures against a nation without previous aggression. After this proclamation of interdict, Bonaparte executed his Berlin decree, issued his Milan decree, burnt our vessels upon the high seas, interrupted our commerce in the Mediterranean and the Channel. Congress convened, and, in consequence of those aggressions, we passed a law extending the interdict to French and English armed vessels. Governed by the same policy, we proceeded against both nations as our injuries multiplied, and not because either nation required it against the other. The measures of this Government have been opposed in this House because it seemed to some that their effects would be more injurious to Great Britain than France. I presume gentlemen will now be satisfied of the strict line of neutral conduct which has characterized the American people towards the two rival Powers of Europe; or that our measures were equally hostile as it respected both nations, since it has been asserted even in the Parliament of Great Britain. It has not only been proclaimed in the Parliament, but by the Government of Great Britain, through their Ministers at this place in the late negotiations. This is a triumph to good principles.

It is a painful subject, sir, but I must speak of the conduct of the opposition, since they modestly assume to themselves the credit of saving this nation from impending calamity. It is novel, though not surprising, (for nothing now is to be wondered at,) that those who vote against measures should claim the credit of the good arising from them, while those who supported those measures only should bear the blame, and be responsible for all the evils which naturally result from the best measures. This doctrine once established will make a new code of politics: Those who oppose measures are entitled to all the good resulting from them; and those who voted for them, are to be responsible to the nation for all the evil they produce. This claim is too absurd and ridiculous to need a comment. But let us examine the conduct connected with the politics of the opposition. We were advised to repeal the partial non-importation law; to rescind the proclamation of interdict against British armed vessels; to repeal the embargo; and, in short, to retrace our steps and undo everything we had done to resist the aggressions of Great Britain. In addition to this, we were told by the opposition that Great Britain was fighting for existence; that in fact she was fighting our battles; that she would never yield to our restrictive system; that we had no just cause of complaint against Great Britain; that this Government were in the wrong; that we should unfurl the republican banners against the imperial standard, and much more such language. What humiliation do we find here! The mind of every member of the American community should sicken at the recital. What terms of accommodation would this course have produced? I will not condescend to conjecture them.

But now, sir, of the particular course recommended by the mover of this resolution (Mr. RANDOLPH)—what was his policy? At one particular period he recommended giving aid to the Spanish patriots against Bonaparte, and fighting Great Britain by taking the Canadas. But when the gentleman matured his system and reduced it to writing, he was for arming your merchant vessels. This was war with our hands tied, the most ineffectual war. Will any gentleman deny that this would have produced war of the most disastrous kind if Great Britain had not yielded? And still that gentleman claims part of the credit on keeping this nation out of war. The Republicans did not want war, they preferred the embargo. But they preferred war to submission, when they discovered that the embargo could not be continued, owing to the clamor and infamous conduct of those who violated it. I shall always think war a blessing compared with submission to be taxed by a foreign Government. It was that manly stand, it was that warlike attitude which produced the happy result which all are willing to appraise. When the British Ministry sent their acceptance to our propositions, did they know of the partial repeal? They did not. They had before them the report of the committee, which declared that we would not submit to foreign outrage. They had before them the proposition from the Secretary of War for raising 50,000 volunteers. They had before them the speeches made upon the extra meeting of Congress, which declared our object to be justice or war.

I have not only voted my own sentiments but the sentiments of my native State upon the measures which have produced so much good to this nation. But these measures have been pronounced by many in this House as ruinous and destructive, and by those, too, who are now anxious to approbate the result of those measures.

Sir, I am happy to find this a day of reformation, I wish to see it continue. When I voted to make an appropriation for the purchase of supplies after the attack on the Chesapeake, I was wrong; when I voted for the embargo, I was wrong; when I voted for 6,000 regulars to defend Orleans and our frontier settlements against hostile savages, and when the British armed vessels hovered on our coast in hostile array, I was wrong; when I voted to give power to the President to suspend the embargo, if Great Britain would rescind her Orders in Council, I was wrong. The first session ended and the second commenced, and the same word continually assailed my ear. When I voted to enforce the embargo, I was wrong; when I voted for letters of marque and reprisals, I was wrong; and what was most extraordinary with those who denounced these measures, every measure was the very worst measure. And now, sir, we are rejoicing in the happy change produced by these very measures—and rejoicing, too, when we had reason to expect, from the predictions of gentlemen, that before this period another Volney might have seated himself upon the ruins of this splendid building, and mourned the downfall of the Great Republic! We were told in the same style that the Republican Administration had departed from Whig principles; but no time could be agreed upon by gentlemen on which this departure from good principles took place. Some gentlemen declared that Republicans quit the true faith in 1805–6, others that it was 1807–8. But the greatest number dated this departure from the time Mr. Jefferson was inducted into office. I have reflected on this subject, and this is my conclusion:—That the same principles have governed the whole of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, and if there has been a departure from Whig principles it commenced in 1801. Let the nation then judge what Administration they prefer, the Federal or Republican. The policy of Mr. Jefferson has been peace and economy. The principles of many who oppose this policy would involve us in external war, in search after that phantom the balance of power, which has desolated Europe without any practical good. Neutrality has been the favorite theme of Republicans; and the balance has been held with a steady hand. When we are driven into war it must be for our own wrongs; and when we make peace, we must have no Power to consult, no common cause, no alliances. Separated as we are from the whole of Europe it would be madness to fight France because England is weak, or fight England because France is weak. We do not hold our independence by such a tenure. The folly of such politics for the United States may be illustrated by the example before us in the war of 1756, and other coalitions put down at the battle of Marengo, Austerlitz, and Jena. Public debts, taxes, armies, and famine and death, are the fruits of these contests.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) stated that there was a strong war party in this House who wanted to select Great Britain as their antagonist, which would have produced alliance with France. A gentleman from South Carolina, the particular friend of the gentleman, was, I believe the only republican who expressed a wish on this floor to make a selection of Great Britain. The republicans were of opinion that honor required that we should fight both rather than make a selection, while both nations continued their aggressions. But it will be recollected that the federal gentlemen asserted and repeated that we ought to make a selection, and an ingenious gentleman from Connecticut almost demonstrated that a triangular war would be an absurdity. I am in favor of an indefinite postponement. But if we vote upon the resolution. I will vote for it, because I approbate the conduct of the President.

But this is an improper place to introduce such a resolution, as it takes up much time upon a subject not connected with our duties of Legislation.

When Mr. J. had concluded, several members rising to speak, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried, ayes 66.

WEDNESDAY, May 31.

JULIAN POYDRAS appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat, as the Delegate for the Territory of Orleans.

Mr. McKIM presented a petition of thirty-five American citizens confined at Carthage, in South America, under sentence of slavery, stating that, through means of falsehood and deception, they were induced to engage in the unlawful expedition of Miranda, fitted out from the city of New York, in the year one thousand eight hundred and six, and that they were captured by the Spaniards, and condemned to slavery, and praying that Congress will take their distressing case into consideration, and effect their release and return to their native country.—Referred to Mr. McKIM, Mr. SAY, Mr. EMOTT, Mr. ROANE, and Mr. COCHRAN, to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, made a report, in part, of such laws as have expired, or are near expiring; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LIVERMORE presented a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in the towns of Newburyport and Newbury, in the State of Massachusetts, of the like effect with several memorials of the manufacturers of hats before stated.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. MARION,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing in force the act passed on the twenty-eighth of March, one thousand eight hundred and six, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of South Carolina, passed on the twenty-first day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, so far as the same relates to authorizing the City Council of Charleston to impose and collect a duty on the tonnage of vessels from foreign ports."

Mr. MUMFORD presented a petition of the sugar refiners in the city of New York, to the same effect with a petition of the sugar refiners of Boston, presented on the twenty-seventh instant.

Mr. NEWTON presented a petition of the sugar refiners in the town of Alexandria, to the same effect with the petition last stated.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill authorizing the Accounting officers of the Treasury Department to give credit to certain Collectors of the Customs for allowances paid by them to the owners and crews of fishing vessels; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

11th CON. 1st Sess.—6

A motion was made by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands do inquire into the expediency of laying off and describing, by certain metes and bounds, a tract of country to which the Indian title is extinguished, within the limits of Louisiana, and to include all the settlements within the said Territory, and of having the said tract of country laid off into townships and sections, half and quarter sections, agreeably to the several laws heretofore made for surveying the public lands of the United States; and also to inquire into the expediency of granting one quarter of a section to every free male white person who now resides thereon, or who will, within — years, actually improve and reside thereon.

This resolution was supported by Mr. RHEA, on the ground that the settlements in that country were much exposed, and that the speedy settlement of it would give security to the frontiers, and form a barrier between the American settlers and the Indian nations on the frontier. It was opposed by Mr. ELY, on the ground that the subject had for several sessions been before the Committee of Public Lands, who, however disposed to act on it, had never been able to perceive that any good was to result from it; and by Mr. LYON, on the ground, that the very reference of the subject to a committee would be an injury to the United States and a vexation to the people, delaying them from purchasing lands, under the idea that Congress were about to give them to the settlers.

The motion was negatived—52 to 44.

A motion was made by Mr. LEWIS, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of removing from West Point the Corps of Engineers, constituting the Military Academy, to the City of Washington; and that leave be given to report by bill, or otherwise.

And on the question that the House do proceed to take the said proposed resolution into consideration, it was determined in the negative.—51 to 47.

Mr. BACON, moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to prepare and report to this House, at their next session, a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress, for the purpose of protecting and fostering the manufactures of the United States, together with a statement of the several manufacturing establishments which have been commenced, the progress which has been made in them, and the success with which they have been attended; and such other information as, in the opinion of the Secretary, shall be material in exhibiting a general view of the manufactures of the United States.

A motion having been made to print the resolution,

Mr. LYON opposed the printing of it. He said that something should be done at this session for the benefit of the manufacturers. It was cold comfort to them to tell them that they should have a report on the subject at the next session.

He would not postpone a consideration of the subject, for the fear of giving offence to the British Government by manufacturing for ourselves. He would proclaim to the world our intention to encourage manufactures.

Mr. BACON concurred heartily in the patriotic views of the gentleman from Kentucky in encouraging the manufactures of our country. He had no idea by this motion of interfering with any particular measure which the gentleman wished to adopt in relation to manufactures; he merely looked forward to the establishment of some practical system for the encouragement of manufactures.

It was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDS presented a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in the borough of Reading, and State of Pennsylvania, to the like effect with the memorials from sundry other manufacturers of hats, before stated—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late Revolutionary army, and of the present army of the United States; with leave to report by bill, or otherwise. Mr. NELSON, Mr. BLAISDELL, Mr. BAYLIES, Mr. MATTHEWS, and Mr. SHEFFEY, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee appointed on the twenty-seventh instant, presented a bill to authorize the citizens of Madison county, in the Mississippi Territory, to elect one Representative to the General Assembly of said Territory; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Ordered, That Mr. BURWELL and Mr. GARDNER be appointed a committee to present to the President of the United States a resolution agreed to by this House on the twenty-seventh instant.

On motion of Mr. DANA, the resolution proposed by him on the thirtieth instant, relating to American seamen, was referred to Mr. DANA, Mr. BURWELL, Mr. COOK, Mr. COBB, and Mr. N. R. MOORE, with leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

The resolution for appointing a committee to inquire into the application of public moneys, heretofore agreed to by the House, but reconsidered for the purpose of amendment, was amended so as to limit the duties of the committee to an investigation of the money transactions of the last eight years, and passed; and Messrs. RANDOLPH, MACON, SMILIE, J. C. CHAMBERLAIN, SEAVER, HOWARD, and SOUTHARD, were appointed the committee.

PROCESS AGAINST MARSHALS.

Mr. RANDOLPH, after making a number of remarks on the subject of the present session, in favor of doing the ordinary business of the annual session at this time, and hereafter holding the annual sessions in the Spring instead of the Winter, stated that he should proceed to the ordinary business of an annual session, until the House should come to some definite conclusion as to what time they would adjourn. He then stated that by a letter which he had received from the Marshal of the district of Virginia, and which from its being printed he believed to be a circular, he learnt that there was no provision by the laws of the United States for a summary process for the purpose of recovering from the marshals and their deputies, moneys paid to them, and by them detained by those to whom it was due. It appeared that the judges had decided that they were bound in their proceedings by no State laws in the respective States, except such as were in force when the United States' courts were first organized, those laws then in existence in the several States having been adopted by Congress. If this was the case, it was certainly a casus omissus, and one to which the attention of Congress ought to be turned. He therefore moved,

"That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any and what provision ought to be made by law for enforcing a summary mode of proceeding against marshals and their deputies who have received money by virtue of executions issued from the Courts of the United States."

After some observations from Mr. BASSETT, on the probability of a short session, and from Mr. LIVERMORE, going to show that the resolution was supererogatory, it was agreed to without a division, and Messrs. RANDOLPH, STANFORD, LIVERMORE, KNICKERBACKER, and LYLE, appointed the committee.

VOTE OF APPROBATION.

The House then resumed the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. ROSS said, that when he heard reasons assigned and principles stated as a ground of action for adopting or rejecting the resolution now submitted to the consideration of the House, which were in his opinion erroneous, he could not omit offering to the consideration of the House those views which he entertained on the subject. He said he should not on this occasion either pledge his life or appeal to his God for the veracity of his declarations; but he hoped the House would do him the justice to believe that he was equally as sincere as if he had made those pledges. I shall not on this occasion, said Mr. R., deny that this House possesses common law jurisdiction, and then declare that common law is founded on common sense; because, if I did, I believe that the good sense of the House would revolt at such a proposition. I shall not insult the feelings of this House by saying that all the propositions which I offer or state are true, and correct, and that every man of common honesty and common sense would say with me; for I have too great a deference for the opinion of others to be guilty of such indecorum.

I have endeavored, sir, as far as I have been able to collect, from the different members who have spoken, the points of objection taken to this resolution. I would, had I powers and abilities, endeavor to examine them, and to throw that light upon it which I think its importance deserves. It is, and perhaps will remain, one of the wonders of the world, that a resolution, which it was said every man agreed to the truth of the statements therein contained, and the conclusions drawn therefrom no one pretended to doubt, should, after this admission, maintain a discussion, consuming day after day and week after week, in the debate whether it should be adopted or not. But, strange as this is, it is nevertheless true.

The first objection which has presented itself to my consideration, as having been urged against the adoption of the resolution, is, that every member of the House, and every person in the United States agree precisely in the sentiments expressed in that resolution. I am not prepared to say, if this assertion be correct in point of fact, that it is a conclusive argument against adopting the resolution, for I find that those gentlemen who compose the opposition to this resolution, on a former occasion, did not think it valid. I refer to the first resolution attached to the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations at the last session. That resolution was contended to be a self-evident proposition, and one on which it was not necessary to legislate; and yet those members who then urged its passage, and demonstrated its propriety to my conviction, as an individual out of doors, and unquestionably with success to the then House, are now opposed to the adoption of this resolution because it is a self-evident proposition. That resolution was as follows: "That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France." One would suppose, sir, that if it was necessary to express an opinion upon a subject of the nature contained in the resolution I have just read, which it would have been madness in any citizen of the United States to have doubted, that it would never be considered a good reason for rejecting this resolution, because there is an unanimous opinion in favor of it. But if it be true, as the honorable mover has mentioned, and I have no reason to doubt his word, I put implicit confidence in what he stated, as I should hold myself bound to do in any member who rose and stated a matter in his place—if it be true that there are persons who do not approve the conduct of the President for acts which he has done, for the promptitude with which he met the conciliatory disposition of Great Britain, it becomes doubly proper to express the sentiments of this House in relation to this subject. If further proof were necessary that such a difference of opinion does exist, that proof can be found in the public prints. Already is the poison attempted to be infused into the public mind; already is the rankling suspicion spread abroad, and the Administration arraigned, directly or indirectly, and that too in prints possessing great control over the people of this country. If I can show that there is an attempt to infuse an improper sentiment in the minds of the people, and that the matter of the proposition before the House be correct, it becomes the House to give their weight and sanction to this proceeding. The publications to which Mr. R. said he alluded, was one in the Aurora of the 25th of the month, purporting to be copied from the Trenton True American, and another in the Baltimore Whig, which he quoted from those papers. I repeat, said Mr. R., that if it be not a reason for rejecting a resolution that every one agrees in the truth of the matter it contains, there is strong reason for adopting it when it has become necessary to counteract the course of abuse which has been commenced. Therefore, I shall not trouble the House any further with this objection, but proceed to what I consider the next objection, made, I think, by my colleague from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY.) It was this: that there is no precedent for it; that it was improper to introduce a new precedent, and that it necessarily tended to produce irritation at the outset of the session.

Mr. FINDLEY said that he had stated that the usual course of replying to the President's speech had heretofore produced irritation at the commencement of the session.

Mr. ROSS.—I have been accustomed to think and act for myself. I should not adopt an opinion merely because it proceeds from the most respectable authority. I always should, however, distrust my own judgment and opinion till I had thoroughly weighed the objections from respectable authority. The age, experience, and integrity of my colleague, entitle his opinion to great weight; and therefore I would not adopt an opinion different from that drawn from his experience until I considered it well. I may perhaps entertain some heretical opinions on the score of politics. Be it so; they must remain my opinions, until I am satisfied that they are wrong. It never has appeared to me, sir, that the mode of communication adopted by the President for the last eight years was a more democratic mode than that adopted the preceding sessions. I never could bring my mind to believe that he who waited on you with information acted with less respect or equality than he who sent his message by a footman or a lackey. I am not ready myself to reject a procedure which is democratical because the King of England acts in the same manner. I should not reject the use of the knife or fork because an emperor or king also makes use of them. We ought not to be hurried into the adoption or rejection of measures by mere names, but should examine on what principle they hang. As to the tendency that this may have to produce irritation at the commencement of a session, or to make a waste of time, let us see if that irritation at the beginning of a session is not better calculated to do good than evil; more particularly so at the commencement of a session immediately after the election of a new Congress. During the heat of electioneering contests and strifes, the minds of the wisest and best statesmen become irritated and their tempers destroyed; perhaps, by slander and abuse, and the heat accumulated in such conflicts wants an opportunity of exploding; after which, we could go to business with coolness. My idea is, that it is best to let it evaporate at the commencement of a session, and we could then come to business coolly and deliberately. What is the mode adopted by the professed horse racer? (And in this simile I mean no disrespect to the House. We know that the best poets, Homer and others, have compared their heroes to steeds.) In order that horses should keep up their mettle, they are always held in, the first heat—for what? That they may have fire and spirit through the whole course. Thus the effect of refusing the members from different quarters of the Union an opportunity to vent whatever disagreeable sensations they have on their minds, is only treasuring it up to leak out on all occasions to disturb the tranquillity of the House. Therefore, I conclude, with all due respect to my colleague, that, as it respects the evil which he supposes to result from the irritation produced by an early debate, the very reverse is the correct state of the case.

The honorable gentleman who moved this resolution has shown to the House, on the different occasions on which he has addressed you on this subject, that this is not a novel proposition. He has produced precedents from the first Administration of the present Government; cases of a similar nature from the second, and from the third, also; that which is looked up to as the test of political truth by the party to which I have the honor to belong. But it may be said, in reply to this, that these Administrations are politically dead. That which was conducted by the immortal WASHINGTON is politically dead; and, alas for his country, he himself is no more! And it may be said that the preceding Administrations are politically dead, and do not furnish an example for the living. Have we on this occasion any reason to appeal to the dead for the correctness of our procedure, or may not precedents of our procedure be drawn from the living? Have they not been brought forward by men high in the Republican party, and in the most democratic States in the Union; in States, to question the democracy of which, would be heresy indeed? I refer to the late resolutions and address of the Pennsylvania Legislature. If it would be pleasing or gratifying, and it appears so to have been considered by the late President of the United States, for a Legislature of a State to come forward approving the measures of last year, can it be less agreeable to the present President to have the approbation of the Representatives of the people expressed in this House? Surely not; and to me this precedent appears conclusive. Lest it should be said that this case is from a middle State, not possessing the true principles of democracy, I refer to another precedent in the case of certain resolutions of the State of North Carolina, presented to Congress at the last session. Other resolutions, approving the conduct of this House and the measures of Government, may be produced from other States. Will it be said that these States have anything in their respective constitutions directing this to be done? No, sir; it was the spontaneous and voluntary expression of the confidence of those States in the measures of the General Government. I shall therefore conclude, as far as precedent goes on this subject, that it is in favor of the resolution on the table, and that there is no reason for rejecting it as a novelty. In relation to answering addresses, have those sessions which succeeded the omission to answer addresses been less tedious or more dispassionate than the sessions which preceded them? If not, I shall conclude that there is no evidence before this House from experience that the omission to answer addresses has been productive of any good consequences.

The third objection made to the adoption of the resolution before the House is, that it may have an improper influence on the mind of the President. May not the denial to do it have an improper influence on his mind? Shall cold, chilling silence, be the only salutation on the great change which has taken place in our political affairs? One of the strongest incentives to do well is, that he who so does shall receive the plaudits of his fellow-citizens. Say, then, that you will not give praise where it is due, and you take away one of the strongest motives to induce a man to deserve well. We well know that every man is frail, and it may not, on all occasions, be a sufficient satisfaction to him that his own conscience approbates him, but he may look, and justly and honorably look, for the approbation of the nation.

The fourth objection is, that the House of Representatives have no authority to pass the resolution; that there is nothing in the law or Constitution of the country which can justify its adoption. Let me ask, sir, what there is in the law or the Constitution which authorized the House to adopt an abstract resolution during the last session, which was reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations? Nothing is so easy as for ingenuity to raise objections to any principle, however correct, if it be desirable to get rid of a motion. Sir, let us see whether we have scrutinized resolutions on all occasions with this critical eye; whether my friend from Pennsylvania has on all occasions observed this nicety with regard to the powers of this House. I apprehend not. Have not the House, at this session, chosen a Chaplain, and put their hands in the public purse for his compensation? And is there anything in the law or Constitution which authorizes it? If there be, I am ignorant of it: and yet we are told that this House can only speak by law. Was there any scrutiny as to the Constitutional powers of the House when that motion was adopted? Is it absolutely necessary to the due performance of the functions of this House that a Chaplain should be elected? I do hold that it is not necessary. I see nothing to prevent the daily proceedings of this House going on as well precisely, and with as much promptitude, as at present, if we were to omit to choose a Chaplain. Here, then, is evidence that this House has not always looked to the Constitution for the ground on which it acts. Is this all, sir? Where is the law which says that each member shall be furnished with three papers during the session? There may be such a law, but I know not of it. And yet, sir, on that question, which also puts your hand into the Treasury, none of these nice susceptibilities as respects the Constitutional right and power of the House were displayed. These examples bring strong corroborating proof to my mind that there is some secret objection to the adoption of the resolution.

It is said, sir, that men generally have two motives; one which they keep to themselves, and which is the motive of action; and the other which they avow, but which is not the motive of action. Far be it from me to attribute these motives to gentlemen; yet I cannot see through the mystery why this resolution is objected to. It is involved in such impenetrable darkness that I cannot see the reasons of those who approve the conduct of the President, for opposing this resolution going to express that approbation.

The fifth objection is, that it is constituting this House a council of censors to approve or disapprove the measures of the President. The mover of this resolution, when he first addressed the House, showed the use of such a discussion as this in such strong and energetic terms, that it appears to me to be useless to say anything further on the occasion. If anything need be said, it might be asked, has the gentleman shewn to the House that the censure of the people expressed by their Representatives, would be injurious? Before he can assume this position, he must have shewn to the House that the expression of disapprobation would be improper. If it be not improper, the whole fabric which he has raised on that supposition tumbles to the ground.

The sixth and last objection is to me a very unpleasant one, and I wish on that account the present discussion had been omitted. But seeing that it has been commenced, and that a latitude has been taken in debate, I trust that I shall never be found to shrink from any question propounded to me. It is said that the proposition is calculated to reflect on the proceedings of the last Administration. If that was the object of the honorable mover of the resolution, I think clearly that he will fail; that he has certainly missed his aim. Unquestionably, so far from reflecting on the last Administration by this, it goes the full length of approbating it. We have heard, from what has been said, that there appears to be three distinct opinions in the House. Some say that we should worship the rising sun; some that, if we do, we ought to worship the setting sun also; some that we should worship none at all. It is necessary to examine the three, and see the different bearings of the proposition now on the table. As to the first, then, and those who say that we should worship the rising sun alone—let us see how that principle stands. Here is a resolution approbating in the strongest terms the promptitude and frankness with which the President has met the late overtures of the British Government. Is not approbating his conduct approbating all he said on the subject? And has not the President, in his late Message to the House, said substantially the same as is contained in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON?) The President of the United States, communicating the late overture, himself in the secrets of the Government, says that the Government has never intermitted similar dispositions. I say, then, if such a disposition did really exist, that those who suppose, when they adopt this resolution, that they do not approve the former Administration, are totally mistaken, or that I am mistaken. I only mean to give it as my idea, that the adoption of this proposition, taken with the communication which has produced it, does in the most conclusive manner say that, at no time, did the Administration omit a similar disposition. It was to my mind satisfactorily observed, that the withdrawal of the proclamation was not in the present instance made a preliminary to negotiation, and that formerly it had been, and that this is all the difference between the two cases. When this resolution was offered, I supposed, from the opposition made to it and from the quarter whence it proceeded, that it was intended to reflect on the late President. I am happy to hear that the gentleman who moved the resolution has declared on the floor of the House, that had it not been for the late President, we should have been involved in a war. He has taken away from my mind all objections to the adoption of the resolution. Whatever I had thought, when a gentleman rises and says that he considers himself as not pure enough to sit as a juror on the former Administration, and that had it not been for the late President we should have been involved in a war, it brings the question home, and enables me to say that it shall be adopted either with or without the amendment. I do not think it is right, sir, for gentlemen to appeal to the new members of the House to decide who was right and who was wrong respecting their conduct during the last Winter. I should, myself, have wished for one to have avoided the discussion. We have not a full view of the whole ground, and must consume much time to obtain it. On each side of the House the gauntlet has been thrown as to the propriety of the embargo. For myself, I was in favor of the embargo when first laid, and against it when it assumed a permanent aspect. I then thought it destructive in its effects. That it was destructive to the interests of the country in which I live, I have no doubt. For myself, I think it ought to be buried in oblivion by the democrats of this country. The day of the passage of the embargo, and the day of the passage of the enforcing embargo law, might be hailed as the days of resurrection of federalism in this country. For however proper the laws; however difficult for wisdom to have adopted a better measure, the appeal has been made to the people, and had it been pursued six months longer, there is scarcely a man on the floor who does not believe that it would have revolutionized the Government, and placed our opponents in power, whether correctly or not, I will not decide. I agree that whenever the people do decide, this Government emanating from them, it is the duty of good Democrats to bend to their will. This I conceive they have done, and I hope that, on this occasion, those who are desirous of guarding, entrenching or shielding the embargo measures from censure, will not be found on this floor. Let it be buried in oblivion, where it has gone, unless our opponents disturb its ashes. It is not now a measure on which we are called upon to decide. It is not involved in the resolution on the table, and has been improperly lugged into the discussion. I should have said this, and no more, on the subject of the embargo, had not my former impressions been wrong. I had supposed, from the prodigious clamor which has gone through the country, that the late President of the United States was more disposed to make terms with France than with England. I am now satisfied, from what the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has said, that I was mistaken; as I was, sir, when I inquired impatiently on my arrival in the city for the dry docks, and to my astonishment found that there was no dry dock! Having been mistaken in these points, I will not say that my other opinions are perfectly correct.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) observed to you yesterday, that the system pursued here had been approved on the floor of the House of Commons in England. I hope it will never be said that the conduct of the British or French Government has been approbated on the floor of Congress; and yet I am fearful that some Grenville, anxious for power, and opposed to the Administration of his country, will be found here. I presume that whatever the excluded Minister, Grenville, may have said, would have been said against any Administration to make his own way into power; and should be no guide for us, in support of that which the people have declared to be a pernicious system.

I hope, sir, that what I have said on this subject may be considered with candor. I have no disposition to press the House into my opinions, and I ask the same indulgence from others which I am disposed to give to them.

Mr. FISK said it was with great sincerity that he now declared that he was glad that this unfinished business was taken up by the House at this time; and he should speak with equal sincerity were he to say that he should be glad that the House might finish it before they adjourned. Nor did he speak with less sincerity when he declared his reluctance to offer any remarks on the subject. Nothing but the extraordinary resolution and the still more extraordinary course the discussion had taken, should have induced him, young and inexperienced as he was in the business of the House, at this time to have trespassed on its patience. As an individual or private citizen, said Mr. F., I have no objection to the sentiments contained in that resolution as originally proposed, nor to the amendments suggested. I do not know that there is any difference of opinion on this subject; and I did regret to see a proposition introduced which might look like a distrust of the unanimity which I believe at this time prevails in the nation. I, for one, have not heard any murmuring or complaints of the conduct of the President in meeting the overtures of the British Government, but yet I should be unwilling to give my vote as a Representative of the people upon this resolution or any other of like description. I consider it to be derogating from the dignity of a Representative of the people, to give my approbation to the President, or any other officer, however meritorious, when he has performed no works of supererogation, but merely a duty clearly defined by the express letter of the law; which, if he had not done, it might have called not for the voluntary, but for the Constitutional interposition of this House. And so long as this House is organized with the powers and duties which are vested in it by the Constitution, giving it the sole power of impeachment, I should think we ought to act with great caution in giving votes of approbation of an officer whose conduct in the execution of his office it may become our duty constitutionally to inquire into. I could, therefore, have satisfied myself with giving a silent vote on postponing it, which I was willing to do, not only indefinitely, but I was content that the time of its postponement should be co-extensive with the existence of our free Government. I was unwilling, for one, to be converting this splendid hall of Legislative deliberation, into a temple for offering up adulation to the Executive shrine. I was willing for another consideration to postpone the consideration, viz: to save the time of the House and of the nation; for, whatever idea some gentlemen may entertain with respect to the necessity of transacting all the ordinary business of the nation at this session, and whatever belief they may have that there is no Constitutional objection to it, I must beg leave to say that I entertain a very different opinion; and, looking into the Constitution for my guide, carries me back to the time when it was proposed, and to the Convention who did propose it. A great proportion of that body was, as the greatest proportion of Congress always has been and always will be, farmers. Certainly, when reasoning upon the time when it would be most expedient to convene Congress, they fixed upon a period more convenient to the agricultural interests of the country than any other; and at that time I think it would be proper still to meet. I believe, sir, that it was the general impression of the nation, not only when the law convening Congress was passed, but when the time of meeting had arrived, that their attention would be directed to those objects and those only which obviously and imperiously demanded their attention; and I hope that this House, equally with the President of the United States, will be "aware of the inconveniences attending a protracted session at this season of the year." And sorry am I to hear any one, especially one from the Southern parts of the United States, say that he shall go on to transact the ordinary business of the session; but not so much do I regret to bear this, as to hear him declare that he wishes to try the strength of the South and West against that of the East and North. I am aware, and so must be every member of this House, of the out-door insinuations about the influence of different sections of the Union. I believe nothing of it; and I am sorry that so vile a calumny should receive the countenance of any member of the House. I never wish to see any measure brought forward which shall try the strength of the comparative parts of the Union. I should wish that geographical distinctions should be no more heard of, but that we should consider the interest of different sections of the country as the interest of the whole.

Another and a principal consideration with me for wishing to postpone the discussion of the question at this time was, that it would lead to the very (as I conceive it) improper examination or discussion of our foreign relations. This argument seemed to have considerable weight on the first day's discussion; but the gentleman from Virginia came forward afterwards to fortify his claim to the attention of the House by exhibiting precedents showing the conduct of former Administrations. Precedents are sometimes entitled to consideration and deserving of weight. They are of two kinds, one establishing a form of procedure, and the other a principle of action. To the former there is no objection, if it be not obviously improper; but to the latter we pay no attention, unless convinced that the principle is correct. What are the precedents on which the gentleman relies? Are they analogous or are they not? The first precedent, upon which the gentleman who introduced it with an air of triumph seemed to rely, was that of a vote of thanks and an expression of approbation of the conduct of the Father of his Country in one of his last though not least useful measures (the proclamation of neutrality) conducive to the interest and happiness, and perhaps to the preservation and salvation of his country. But what, let me ask this House to consider for a moment, was the situation of the country at the time that proclamation was issued? Was it not different from the present? Unfortunate, perhaps, was it for the citizens of this country, that, in 1793, they had not got rid of impressions, made during the Revolution, hostile to England and favorable to France. Whether justly or unjustly made, it is not now my purpose to inquire. Suffice it, that they did exist. There was a disposition in the country at that time to hail the French Revolution as the dawn of liberty to the European States. Scarcely could our people be restrained, and indeed they were not restrained, from celebrating it by festivals, songs, and toasts, to the success of the French patriots. About this time war commenced between England and France. It then became a question with the Administration, more than with the people, for their zeal for French success would perhaps, unless restrained, have hurried them to take a part with those whom they considered to be fighting the battles of liberty, and to whom they considered themselves under so many and so great obligations—it became a question what was the duty of this country towards France. In this situation of things, the President, not directed how to act by the plain letter of statute, and doubting his power and his duty in this respect, convenes the Heads of Departments—and I believe I should not err were I to say that a diversity of opinion existed even there as to what course should be pursued; but the opinion and judgment of the President prevailed. His course was that of neutrality. A proclamation was issued. What was its effect? Did it meet universal approbation, as in the case of the present measure? Did the people give it their hearty and unequivocal consent? No, sir; there were murmurs—and even the conduct of WASHINGTON was questioned. In this situation of things, shortly after, Congress convened. The interest of the nation as it were, required the expression of the opinion of this House; and that measure they did not hesitate to take, and commended the Executive for the course which he took. Hence I conceive, sir, that there was no analogy between that case and the present. This authority is not sufficient to convince me that it is my duty to vote for this resolution.

The next precedent adduced was the expression of the opinion which this House entertained in relation to another subject, viz: the obstruction of the navigation of the river Mississippi. You, sir, with every other member, will recollect the sensation which was excited, not only among our Western brethren, but throughout the nation, on this occasion; that doubts were entertained whether our rights were invaded by an unauthorized act of a Spanish officer, or by an act of the Spanish Government itself. Doubts were also entertained as to what course should be pursued. In this state of the public mind, Congress found it necessary to give their opinion, and expressed not only confidence in the wisdom of the Executive, but declared that they believed the act to have been unauthorized on the part of Spain. This expression of the sense of the House seemed at this time really to be demanded by the situation of the nation. Is this the case with the question now before us? I cannot see it in that light. This precedent, therefore, with the other, is not sufficient to convince me of the propriety of voting for this resolution and amendment, or even of discussing it. But it seems, sir, with the rules of this House, and the common law practice in it, there is something which compels us to go into this discussion. Nolens volens we must be driven into it; fas aut nefas, it must be discussed.

What objection is made to indefinite postponement? The gentleman does not object to his own resolution, but objects to the amendment. Now, sir, if there be any propriety in any part of the business, I conceive the amendment necessary to define the meaning, and convey more distinctly the sense of the original resolution. For, with all the little powers of discrimination which I possess, I have not been able to make a distinction between the system pursued by the present and late President in relation to this particular subject. And speaking, as I shall, on the three objections made to the amendment, I shall not be guided by any impressions made on me from having participated in the discussion of last Winter. I shall speak from impressions made on my mind in common with the people of the district which I have the honor to represent, and, I believe I might say, upon the minds of the majority of the people of the United States. The gentleman who introduced this resolution has told us that he could not vote for the amendment, because he cannot consent to attach the healthy body of the present Administration to the lifeless corpse of the late Administration; that we should not bring it up to view; that its evil deeds should be buried with it, and its good deeds alone be inscribed on its monument. If, sir, its monument is to be inscribed, and the sentiments of the gentleman from Virginia prevail, I would say, as was said on another occasion—let not the monument be inscribed until other days and other men can do justice to its merits. Another comparison the gentleman made: He said he was willing to vote for the original resolution, and opposed to the amendment, the introduction of which, he said, reminded him of a certain description of persons in Virginia, who, when they had a pair of horses, one bad and the other good, praised the poor animal in proportion to its deficiency. The gentleman told us, too, the other day, among many instructions which he gave us, and the young members particularly, whom he called youthful sprites, that we might object to the proposition, because a precedent for it was derived from Federal times. Sir, I never have, and hope I never shall object to anything merely on account of its name. The gentleman told us, too, that the error in reasoning did not lie in the inferences so much as in the premises. Apply this remark to the present case: If, sir, the present Administration be the good horse, and needs no commendation, why introduce this resolution of approbation? I am not capable of understanding this, sir.

This resolution met an objection on account of its being an abstract proposition, and, as such, not deserving the attention of this House in a legislative capacity. The answer given was, that it was a common practice of the House, at the close of every session, to thank the Speaker. This practice is but a mere expression of courtesy, confined to the officers of this House, and not extended to the other departments of the Government, and there can be no impropriety in this. But, if it be considered as a precedent, what will be the effect of it? It has been so long established, not only in this body, but in different States, as a matter of course, that the omission of it would be considered, at least, as a censure on the individual filling the Chair. And are we, at the commencement of this session, about to establish this precedent, to be venerated as such at each subsequent session? Are we to establish that it shall hereafter be considered a matter of course, when we come to the Capitol, to make our bow to the President, and express our approbation of his conduct, or have our silence construed into a mark of disapprobation? Surely not, sir. So much for this argument, urged in favor of the resolution, but which convinces me of the impropriety of adopting it.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) requested that when any member rose to answer his argument, they should state it and meet it fairly. I am not gifted with any extraordinary powers of recollection, but, if my memory will serve me, I will endeavor to take up the gauntlet as respects two arguments advanced by the gentleman to show his aversion to the amendment; and, one of them, though not novel, is rather extraordinary; that the embargo, that measure which he considers so ruinous to his country, was laid at a time when the British Orders in Council were not known in this country; he afterward narrowed his assertion by saying that they might have been known in New York, but were not known here. As at that time I had not the honor of a seat in this House, I cannot declare what was known here. But this I can say, that twelve or fifteen days before the embargo was known, it was known in New York that it was the intention of the British Government to issue these orders; that they were agreed to on the 11th of November, and would be published on the 14th. But the gentleman says that, even if they were known, they were not officially known. What information does the gentleman require to authorize him to act? Official information regulates but a small proportion of the acts of this body. The Constitution has made it the duty of the President to lay before Congress such information as he may possess in relation to the affairs of the nation. In ordinary times, he calls the attention of Congress to the interest of the nation generally; and from the information which they bring with them do they generally act. Yet this information is not official. But, what idea are we to attach to this House to suppose that, on important occasions, they will not act without it? I would suppose a case: A messenger runs in and tells you that the north wing of this building is on fire. Would you wait for official information of the event from the President before you seek for safety? Of this fact, of the intention of the British Government, there was sufficient evidence, short of positive proof, not only to the Executive, but to this House. In the Message of the President of the United States, accompanying the documents called the correspondence between Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Champagny, we find this passage:

"The communications now made, showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened on the high seas and elsewhere from the belligerent Powers," &c.

What belligerent Powers? Who were the belligerents (more than one, observe) to whom the President in this language referred? Can it be said that he meant France and Spain, or did he not mean France and England? Take this, with another fact, that it was known as early as the correspondence between Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Champagny was received, that it was the intention of the French Government, (about one year after the date of the Berlin decree,) to extend it to American vessels.

This first information was a fact from which another fact was to be inferred. The Orders in Council (issued seven days after the treaty was signed) contained a practical exposition by the British Government of the Berlin decree, and a declaration that if its operation was extended to neutrals, Great Britain would, for self-preservation, retaliate those decrees, unless neutral Powers would resist. No doubt could remain with the American Government on comparing the information from Mr. Armstrong with the proclamation, of the intention to issue such orders. But, if this be not sufficient to establish the fact that these orders were known to the Government, it is the fact that they were known at New York long before the embargo; and as only three days are required for the passage of the mail from New York to this place, it is fair to presume that it was not only known to the Government, but to every gentleman of observation at this place, what the course was which the British Government intended to pursue. I find that the information was published in a New York paper of the 13th of December. In the evidence given at the bar of the House of Commons, Mr. Martin says that, on the 12th of November, he wrote a circular to his American correspondents, that such was the intention of the British Government, and that Orders in Council to such effect would be issued, and, on the 14th November, published in the gazette; and he produced a New York paper at the bar of the House, of the 13th December, containing the extract from his letter. This shows that the purport of these orders was published in New York on the 13th December. But this is immaterial. I should suppose that the objection, if founded in fact, would be of very inconsiderable weight if this was a good measure, because it was found afterward that the orders did exist and would have gone into operation had not the embargo been passed, had our vessels been permitted to prosecute their rights on the high seas. Certainly, to my mind, it is quite immaterial whether it was "a lucky hit or the dictate of wisdom." But the gentleman from Virginia says that the embargo has been a measure calculated only to work the ruin of this country; that its operation has been confined to America; that its pernicious effects have been felt here and here only. This, sir, is very different language from that which has been held on the floor of the British House of Commons and of the House of Lords, by statesmen of the first respectability in that country; and I should suppose that a citizen of the British nation, feeling an interest in its prosperity, would, at least, be as capable of judging of the effects of such a measure, as a citizen of this country, remaining here, while its effects were operating there. I will beg leave, for a moment, to call the attention of the House to what Lord Grenville says on this measure, and he incidentally mentions another fact, which had been contradicted in this country and even in this House. [Mr. F. here quoted parts of Lord Gren-ville's speech, published in No. 1.338 of the National Intelligencer.] He states that he views the embargo to have been alarming in its effects; he states it in his place in the British House of Lords. It will not, after this, be contended, I presume, even by those who say that the measure was ruinous to this country, that it was not injurious to Great Britain, who was really the aggressor upon the indisputable rights of this country. The embargo, however, was a measure which the honorable mover of the resolution had the honor to oppose. He was for giving up this system of restriction; it was the same system which had been commenced in 1805 '06, which he considers one of the most disastrous periods, and the most disastrous system which the country ever witnessed or realized; and, since the system received his zealous opposition throughout, is he, therefore, desirous now to depreciate its effects, as ruinous to this country? He was opposed to the non-importation act, passed in 1806? Why was this act passed? This country found itself bound to do something for the protection of commerce. What was the state to which this country was reduced? New principles, it was said, had been interpolated in the laws of nations; the Admiralty Courts had made such decisions as to authorize the capture of every neutral vessel on the high seas; first, by deciding that touching at neutral ports did not legalize the voyage, but that it ought to be considered as a direct voyage from the hostile colony to Europe. Upon this construction, the Mercury, with a cargo of sugars from the Havana, having touched at Charleston, and bound to Europe, was condemned in 1802. Under this decision, unexpected as it was novel, much of our merchants' property was captured and condemned.

Next, the British Admiralty Courts held it requisite to show that the cargo had been landed in the neutral port, and the duties on importation paid, and also that the first insurance had been made for a voyage to terminate in the neutral country. Then it was held, as in the case of the Essex, condemned in May, 1805, that the duties on importation should be actually paid in the neutral country; that to secure them by bond, and subject to a drawback on exportation, was not sufficient. These extraordinary decisions surprised many of your merchants, and subjected much more of their property to capture and condemnation. It was invading their rights from a quarter least expected, and in a manner they were utterly unprepared to meet. Under these various unfounded constructions of maritime law, your merchants were extremely embarrassed—and what was their language upon the occasion? This House was filled with memorials and remonstrances, of merchants and others, from one end of the country to the other, protesting, in the bold language of free and independent men, against these aggressions. Congress found it necessary to have recourse to some measure which would, by affecting the interest of the aggressor, be likely to prevent future outrages of this kind. This non-importation act was, with this view, passed. Although it had more advocates than opponents, there were opponents to it, and the gentleman was one of them. He would not fight for the merchants, he would not contend with the Periwinkles of the Strand, I think, was his expression then. It was also said, that the British Government was that of a high-spirited nation, and would never treat with you while this "rod" was held over her head. She did treat, or rather, she did condescend to treat, (to use language more consonant to the ideas of the opponents of these measures,) notwithstanding this prediction. The treaty of Mr. Monroe was formed during the existence, I will not say operation, of this measure. It was continued. What said our Ministers? And the gentleman from Virginia will consider their declaration, at least that of one of them, as good testimony. Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney said, and the British Government did not appear to view it differently, (in speaking of the non-impotation act:)

"The ground which Congress have taken in this just and salutary measure, we are far from wishing to abandon; but to suspend and abandon are very different things. The last would wound deeply the honor of the nation, and prostrate the character of the Government; but the first is in perfect conformity with the spirit and purpose of the law, and, while it would furnish a signal proof of the equity and moderation of our public councils, would preserve unimpaired that firm and dignified attitude which it becomes us at all times, but now more especially, to maintain."

But there is one other argument, or, perhaps, sir, I may more properly call it a remark, made by the gentleman in debate, one day last week, to show his reasons for the aversion he feels to the late Administration, and I was sorry to hear it. It was this: that if our Government had accepted that treaty in 1806, we should have avoided all the evils we suffered under the embargo. I was sorry to hear this, but more so, to hear the declaration which followed; and I do not believe the gentleman himself could, on reflection, entertain the opinion, "that the Government would never get a better treaty." Are these declarations discreet, and becoming an American, and intended to have a beneficial effect on that nation in the contemplated negotiation? Will the declaration that we cannot obtain a better treaty answer any valuable purpose; that we cannot get a better treaty than that which, in fact, was no treaty at all, because it contained provision for violating it, if the British Government saw fit—a salvo repugnant to the feelings of every American; and the principal subject of dispute, the impressment of our seamen, a subject of great interest and anxiety, was wholly omitted? What reason has this nation to believe that a better treaty will not be concluded? We shall have a better treaty, sir. I am warranted in saying that such will be the result. I will not question the sincerity of either Government on this occasion, because I believe it to be the interest of both to form a treaty that will be acceptable to each. I am authorized to say, from the correspondence between Mr. Erskine and Mr. Smith, that we shall have a treaty which will be satisfactory and different from that of 1806; and what authority have I for this? It is said by the British Minister that His Majesty will send a Minister, not to treat but "to conclude a treaty" on all the points of the relations between the two countries. This is sufficient to justify me in saying that all the points in difference or at issue between the two countries will be settled.

But there was one other remark, and the gentleman urged it as though he was really serious. Although among the last he made, it was not the least extraordinary. I had heard it made before I came to this House, but thought it was intended merely to answer electioneering purposes, and not believed by those who made it. It was to this effect: that the present prospect, so fair, was the result of the exertions of the minority in this country, and particularly in Congress. I never did believe that gentlemen who claimed this as due to the exertions of the minority were or could be serious; and, when I heard it thrown out, on this floor since, it could not but remind me of the fly, placed on the chariot wheel, exclaiming "Lo, what a dust we flies make!" It is really surprising to me, and I am willing to confess it, to those (and there are many,) who have more experience in legislation than I have, how a minority can control the majority. It is the first time that ever I heard a minority in a representative Government claim the merit of a system which that minority, call them Federalists, "ultra or citra," "Federalists," protesters, or what not, opposed, to the extent of their ability. It is repugnant to the very meaning of the term "minority" in the English language. For a moment, let me ask you, sir, what system did they advise? Even the last measure, adopted on the subject of our foreign relations, viz: the non-intercourse law, was opposed by them; and, really, among the comparisons with which the gentleman from Virginia enlightens the members of this House, I recollect one in relation to that bill, in which he said that it reminded him of the man who had invented a mode of "letting off his gun, by degrees." He not only disapproved of the measure but ridiculed it. Who adopted the measure, sir? Who, had it proved disastrous, would have been called to account for it? The minority? No, sir; the majority. In all popular governments and assemblies, there will be minorities. There were minorities in our Revolution; but, after our independence was achieved, we did not hear them claim the honor of it. There was a minority in the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States; but we have not heard this minority say that it was owing to their exertions that this charter of our liberties was adopted. Really, sir, as it strikes my mind, an argument of this kind scarcely merits an attempt at serious refutation. Let me ask, sir, did the minority elect Mr. Jefferson? Did they or the protesters elect Mr. Madison? The gentleman said, I recollect, that he does not consider the President as the Administration? Do the minority constitute it, then? With whom are treaties formed? with the Administration or with individuals? It really appears to me that the gentleman cannot urge this claim again; and I should not have made these remarks, if it had not been one of the most extraordinary assertions which I ever recollect to have been made on the floor of this House.

Another reason assigned by the gentleman for his opposition was, that the present state of things was owing to a change of measures. And, quoting one of Moliere's best comedies, "nous avons changee tout cela,"—[Mr. RANDOLPH said, that the gentleman's French was neither his French nor Moliere's French.] What I understood the gentleman to mean, said Mr. F., was, "we have changed all that." Now, sir, were he to say that they (the British Government) have changed the state of things, I should not object to it, be it whose French it may. And as an evidence that there was no change of disposition on our part, I refer to the Message of the President, if his opinion be deserving of any weight in the estimation of the gentleman from Virginia. He says, that "he cannot do less than refer to the proposal heretofore made on the part of the United States, embracing a like restoration of the suspended commerce, as a proof of the spirit of accommodation which has at no time been intermitted, and to the result which now calls for our congratulations as corroborating the principles by which the public councils have been guided during a period of the most trying embarrassments."

Lord Grenville, in corroboration, acknowledges that the same offer was made in August last. But, says the gentleman, the state of things is not now the same as when that offer was made, and Great Britain has better terms. I will not attempt to examine, at length, the propriety of the gentleman's reasoning—but, if she has better terms, is it owing to us? Is it because the aggressions of France required us to place that nation on the same footing with Great Britain in relation to us, or that we have changed to accommodate England? At the time the embargo was laid, French depredations had not gone to that length to which they afterward extended; at that time she had not burnt our ships or imprisoned our citizens, as she afterward did. And, shall it be stated as matter of complaint against us, that we found it necessary to adopt this measure with respect to France, and place her on an equal footing with Great Britain—and that Great Britain, in consequence of this, altered her system toward us? Shall it be said that we placed her on a better footing, and that the change in our relations is attributable to a change of sentiment in this Government? This argument is not correct. If she stands on a better footing now, it is not owing to a change which we have made, but to a change in the French system, and an alteration in her own; and shall we not resist the French Government, because, if Great Britain should see fit to accept the terms she has once refused, it would place her in a better situation? Yet this seems to be the principal reason assigned for opposing the resolution as amended. This argument of the gentlemen, then, does not operate with sufficient force to induce me to reject the proposed amendment, or to adopt his motion.

Although, sir, I am opposed to voting on this resolution in any other manner than for indefinite postponement, it is not from any objection to the conduct of the present or last Administration. I do believe that passing the resolution would establish a precedent which would be productive of the most injurious consequences; and I think that we ought to look with a single eye to our Constitutional duties, and, as seldom as possible, to go out of the plain path pointed out by the Constitution. And for these considerations I am opposed to it. I believe it a measure altogether unnecessary in the present situation of the nation, not required by our political relations at home or abroad, and out of the line of our duty as legislators; and, unless compelled by necessity, I will not vote on this or any similar resolution in any other manner than that it shall be indefinitely postponed.

THURSDAY, June 1.

A motion was made by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Public Lands do inquire into the expediency of laying off and describing, by certain metes and bounds, a tract of country to which the Indian title is extinguished, within the limits of the Territory of Orleans, and to include all the settlements within the said Territory, and of having the said tract of country laid off into townships and sections, half and quarter sections, agreeably to the several laws heretofore made for surveying the public lands of the United States, and also to inquire into the expediency of granting one quarter of a section to every free male white person who now resides thereon, or who will, within ——— years, actually improve and reside thereon.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. QUINCY presented two memorials, one from the manufacturers of hats, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the other from the journeymen hatters in Boston, to the same effect with sundry other memorials of hatters before stated.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill authorizing the appointment of an agent for the Land Office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. VAN HORN, moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of modifying or repealing the laws relative to drawback; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise:

And on the question that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the resolution, it was determined in the negative—58 to 42.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the House proceeded to consider the resolution proposed by him on the thirtieth ultimo, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for taking the third census of the inhabitants of the United States:

And the question being taken that the House do agree to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said resolution be referred to Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. DESHA, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. TRACY, and Mr. PICKMAN.

A motion was made by Mr. LEWIS, that the House do now proceed to the consideration of a resolution proposed by him on the thirty-first ultimo, relative to a removal of the Military Academy from West Point to the City of Washington. And the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. SOUTHARD, moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of passing a law to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

A motion was made by Mr. GARDENIER, to amend the said resolution by striking out the words "a committee be appointed," and to insert, in lieu thereof, the words, "the Committee of Elections be directed:" And the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative. The question was then taken to agree to the original resolution, and resolved in the affirmative; and Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. CLAY, Mr. MCKEE, Mr. COBB, and Mr. STURGES, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the House proceeded to consider the resolution proposed by him on the twenty-fifth ultimo, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to secure the right to an impartial jury in all cases, civil and criminal, maintained in the Courts of the United States:

And the question being taken that the House do agree to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said resolution be referred to Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. WHEATON, Mr. SMILE, Mr. BIBB, and Mr. RHEA of Tennessee.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

Mr. LYON said he felt himself called upon, by the resolution laid on the table yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, to propose a resolution. He had not himself been in favor of encouraging manufactures by laying an embargo; but the House had done so, and he was not for deserting them all at once. The enumeration of articles mentioned in the following resolution might be defective, but he wished to try the principle:

Resolved, That for the protection of those who have commenced, and the encouragement of those who may be disposed to set on foot, manufactures within the United States of the articles hereafter enumerated, as well as for the encouragement of the cultivation of the productions necessary for such manufactures, provision ought forthwith to be made by law to subject to additional duties on their importation into the United States all articles of which leather is the material of chief value; hemp and cotton and all articles of which they or either of them are the material of chief value; woollen cloths whose invoice prices shall exceed six shillings sterling per square yard; woollen hosiery, window glass, silver and plated wares, paper of every description, nails, spikes and tacks, hats, clothing ready made, millinery of all kinds, beer, ale, and porter.

Mr. MILNOR observed that this resolution contemplated a duty on what was not at present and probably could not be manufactured in this country. He had no objection to Congress pursuing such measures as might judiciously encourage manufactures; but it was a subject which required serious consideration. He believed that among the manias to which the gentleman himself had alluded the other day, the mania for encouraging manufactures might also arise to a dangerous degree. The gentleman contemplated a duty on all cloths above six shillings sterling a square yard. Mr. M. said it was well known that in this country, although the coarser cloths were manufactured to a great extent in domestic circles, we could not get into the manufacture of fine cloths. There were not materials for it. He was happy to have seen a disposition to improve the breed of sheep; but at this time the country was not competent to the manufacture of these articles. If the gentleman from Kentucky was in possession of information which he might have obtained, Mr. M. said he would have known that the present price of wool in England, and the situation of their manufacturers, had raised the price of fine cloths so much as nearly to stop their importation into this country, without the impediment of a duty. He had no objection to seeing manufactures encouraged by a determination in gentlemen to wear domestic fabrics, even at a greater expense, in preference to any other; but he would not encourage them by law. Manufactures had already been commenced in the Eastern States before the embargo, and which, without any additional duties, had grown to a considerable extent. They were establishments in which a great number of hands were employed at low wages, the emoluments of the business going into the pockets of a few individuals, were already enriched by them; and the laying an additional duty would only throw so much money into the pockets of those individuals, who alone would benefit by it. Mr. M. stated the article of tacks to have risen in price during the embargo, and as being necessary to many manufactures; and taxing them, he said, would be in fact to tax the manufacturers, whom it was proposed to encourage. He approved of the plan proposed by Mr. BACON, for calling for a report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject; and moved that this resolution be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as related to this subject.

Mr. NEWTON observed that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures already had this subject under consideration, by order of the House.

Mr. LYON said he had no objection to the reference of this resolution to the committee as an instruction; for that was the course which he had designed to give to it. He said he was once himself a great manufacturer in iron, but had failed of success from the want of encouragement. Fine woollens, Mr. L. said, were not necessary in this country; there were coats in the House that cost less than six shillings the square yard; and he questioned whether that which he wore cost so much. In reply to Mr. MILNOR's observations about tacks, Mr. L. said that there was a manufactory of tacks in the capital of the State from which the gentleman was a representative, which made these articles much more expeditiously than they were ever made before, and much cheaper than they could be imported. From the merchants of the great cities objections had always been made to these duties, and always would be made, because they raised the price of goods, and consequently lessened the importation, and diminished their profits; and if Congress were to wait till they consented to this measure, it would never be done. But he could see no excuse for this House evading a vote on this subject, or for their neglecting to take some measures for the encouragement of manufactures.

Mr. MACON said he was opposed to referring this motion to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, excepting the House should think proper to refer it as an instruction, for he believed that the Committee would not report this session. In the country in which he lived, the people wanted no protecting duties to encourage domestic manufactures; the only way to encourage them was for our great people, for instance the President and Heads of Departments, to make them fashionable. Until domestic manufacture was thus encouraged, it would not thrive; laying a tax on foreign goods would but tax the many for the benefit of the few. He had no idea of laying taxes to induce men to work in iron, leather, or any other article. He wished not to refer this resolution, because he wished to meet the question. Let it be referred, and it would be claimed as the commencement of a system, and as an earnest of what was to be done. When the merchants of this country had too much capital to employ it in the commerce of the United States, they would either employ it in the improvement of the country, or convert it into manufactories; and until this was the case, men of capital would not employ it in manufactures. All that could be done in manufactures in this country, Mr. M. said, was already done in the domestic way. Before there is a surplus of capital, you cannot go to manufactures. Any attempt to do it before that time, would be like an attempt to raise vegetables in a hot-house. The people who were in favor of the embargo, did not look upon it as the gentleman did, as an encouragement to manufacturing; they avowed the object which they had in view, and that was not the encouragement of manufactures. Of what advantage was it to the community to tax themselves to make the articles mentioned in the resolution? So long as there were so many other ways of making a living, people would not go into manufacturing houses. Whilst the present Constitution remained to the United States, Mr. M. said it was utterly impossible for the United States to become a manufacturing nation. The Government must be materially changed before it could succeed; laws must be passed to prevent workmen from conspiring to raise their wages; and all the laws on this subject in existence in England, would become necessary here. Since the tax had been laid on leather manufactures imported, the price of articles of leather had nearly doubled in this country, and the quality was not as good as before. Going into this system he feared would encourage smuggling—and what then would become of manufactures? They would be destroyed. Mr. M. concluded his observations by expressing his wish that a decision should now be made on the subject.

Mr. PICKMAN followed Mr. MACON on the same side of the question. He said he certainly was in favor of encouraging manufactures; but it ought to be recollected that there were other interests also, and they ought not to suffer their zeal for manufactures to injure the more important interests of agriculture or commerce. He considered agriculture as the greatest interest and the most honorable and useful employment, as the most favorable to health and congenial to happiness; and he feared an essential injury might be done to the country by converting agriculturists into manufacturers. We ought also to consider (said he) that we now hold out considerable encouragement to manufactures, for almost all the revenue of the United States is derived from imposts on foreign manufactures, the duties on which already average thirty per cent., and that is surely sufficient. Mr. P. said he was much alarmed when he found this motion predicated on the old non-importation act, which he considered the most absurd and impolitic measure that had ever been enacted. It had prohibited such goods as, if not necessities of life, habit and long usage had made necessary for comfort—and what was the consequence? The articles had risen to most enormous prices—and what resulted from this? The goods had been smuggled into the country, and instead of paying money to the Treasury, had been paying it to unprincipled smugglers. It was not perfectly true in political arithmetic that two and two make four; for by doubling the duty they would not double the revenue, but very probably much diminish it. He said he did believe that some manufactures deserved encouragement; but the House should proceed cautiously. The subject could not be discussed at this short session, and the very agitation of the question, by inducing men to establish manufactures, in expectation of encouragement, might do great injury.

Mr. HOLLAND thought very differently from his colleague (Mr. MACON) on this subject. He thought manufactures ought to be encouraged, and that this nation would never be completely independent till they were fostered in preference to other systems. The gentleman had asked what good was to be derived from the establishment of manufactures? Mr. H. said he would answer him that it would place the Government in a state of independence of all the casualties of the ocean and of external commerce; we should not then be convulsed by the storms of Europe. We ought not, he said, to encourage foreign enterprise, when, with the same enterprise at home, we could be equally happy and less subject to disasters. From external commerce had arisen all our difficulties; from that source were derived all our navy and army bills. We should comparatively stand in need of no revenue if we were to turn our attention to the cultivation of our own resources. We were, he said, distant from the scenes of war, and nothing was necessary to make us happy but the encouragement of our own manufactures. It was unjust not to protect them, for we could not protect our commerce on the ocean, and ought to turn our eyes to the measures which would make us comfortable and happy; and this was one of them. With this nation, Mr. H. said, agriculture was the first, manufactures the second, and external commerce a minor consideration. The situation of Great Britain rendered external commerce absolutely necessary to her existence; but we were differently situated and could do without. Without her wooden walls, Great Britain would long before this time have become a province of the Continent. But was this the situation of America? No; we had our own resources, independent of the world, and ought to cultivate them.

Mr. LOVE made some remarks going to show that this was an important subject, but that the attention of the House had been prematurely and in an irregular manner called to it.

The question for reference to the Committee was lost, 56 to 49.

VOTE OF APPROBATION.

The House took up the unfinished business of yesterday (the resolution approving the conduct of the Executive.)

Mr. RUSA said he was gratified to perceive how desirous the gentleman who moved the resolution was to approve the President of the United States, for his late conduct respecting the relations of the United States with Great Britain. He was disposed as much as any gentleman to approve the conduct of the President in this case, and, with the mover of the resolution, manifest the confidence he had in the first officer of this nation; that although he might agree substantially with the gentleman who introduced the resolution, so far as related to approving the President only, he did not agree with him in the manner. It did not appear to be his duty, as a Representative of the sovereign people, to be employed offering the sacrifice of adulation in this manner; and more so, as it is said the President has only done his duty. It is urged that if the resolution be adopted, it will be a support to the President in his present conduct, and a guide for him in his future conduct. If this is anything, it is a reason that the resolution should not be adopted. The Executive of the United States is a distinct department of the Government, and in this case does not require a resolution of this nature for his support. The House of Representatives by the Constitution is not authorized to interfere with the treaty-making power; that power, vested in the President and Senate by the Constitution, is to be where it is unbiased, unprejudiced, and not in opinion foreclosed by any resolution or vote of this House. An attempt to influence that power in any manner virtually contemplated by this resolution, is derogatory to the dignity of this House, if adopted will be an encroachment on the treaty-making power, and eventually may be injurious to the best interests of this nation. Hence (he observed) it will appear that he was in favor of postponing the resolution.

The conduct of the late Administration and of the present did not to him appear different. The act for doing whereof the resolution is proposed, is an effect in consequence of the measures adopted in the time of the late Administration. The authority to issue the proclamation for renewal of commercial intercourse was given by the non-intercourse law, and that law was enacted in the time of the late President; if he had continued to be President, he, no doubt, would have acted in a similar manner; there is the more reason so to believe, because the propositions now offered by Great Britain are, so far as they go, the same which the late President insisted on. It might have been as well if the resolution had not been introduced; the discussion arising therefrom might as well not have been made necessary, because it leads to a recapitulation of things, the recollection whereof may not be attended with any good. Better and more conducive to the interest of this nation would it have been, to have adopted the sentiment so candidly and honorably expressed by the British Minister in his letter of the seventeenth of April last, in the beginning of the correspondence between him and the Secretary of State, and thereby at this time not have afforded cause to recapitulate any existing differences of any kind relative to the relations of the United States with Great Britain, and to have confined the discussion of all differences to the department authorized by the Constitution to act thereon.

In examining the merits of the resolution, it certainly is not necessary to inquire to what cause the partial old non-importation law, the proclamation of the President interdicting British armed ships and vessels from the ports, waters, and hospitality of the United States, the embargo laws, and non-intercourse law, are to be ascribed. No patriot citizen of the United States will assert, that all or any of the same laws and proclamation were or was the effect of, or originated from a cause or causes altogether intrinsic and limited within the United States, and entirely distinct from the conduct of foreign Powers. If there be any citizen who so thinks let him speak out. It is unpleasant to mention, but it is an indisputable fact, that long previous to the existence of the old non-importation law, the aggressions of Great Britain, by impressing citizen seamen, and by capturing and condemning the ships and property of citizens, by violating the neutral rights and sovereignty of the United States, had been frequent and many. The continued remonstrating of the American Minister against the same aggressions of the British Government had no effect; the impressed citizen seamen were not restored, the captured property was not indemnified for. These things being so, the partial non-importation law was enacted. That law was the first operative movement of the United States against the many aggressions of Great Britain. It was the only law acting exclusively against Great Britain at the time the unprovoked, outrageous attack on the unsuspecting frigate Chesapeake was made—that ship was not only in time of peace attacked, but obliged to strike the flag of the United States. A neutral nation has a right to exclude from its waters, ports, harbors, and hospitality, the armed ships and vessels of all the belligerent Powers. If the neutral Power, confiding in the honor of the belligerents, does not exercise that right, but permits the armed ships and vessels of all the belligerents to enter, it may do so. Previous to the time of the attack on the Chesapeake frigate, the waters, ports, harbors, and hospitality of the United States were open to the armed ships and vessels of Great Britain and France. They continued open to those of Great Britain, even after the murder of innocent Pierce, after the destruction of the French ship of war Impetueux within the jurisdiction of the United States, and until the attack on the Chesapeake. Then, and not till then, were the British armed ships and vessels excluded by the proclamation of the President. A similar proclamation was not extended to French armed ships or vessels; the reason was, that no innocent Pierce was murdered, no British ship of war was destroyed within the jurisdiction of the United States, no Chesapeake frigate was attacked, subdued, and robbed of her seamen, by any armed ship or vessel of France; and will any patriot citizen assert that the proclamation alluded to was a wanton, unprovoked effusion of power on the part of the President of the United States, or that it was without just cause? If there be one who says so, let him speak out plain.

It has conclusively been made to appear that the substance of the Orders in Council of the British Government was known in the United States, previous to the day that the law laying the embargo was enacted. It is scarcely necessary now to take any further notice of that subject. The undisputed fact is, that the same Orders in Council were actually issued on the day they were expected and believed to have issued. That they ought to have been officially known to the Government of the United States before the law laying the embargo was enacted, will not prove that that law ought not to have been enacted. The faculty of acquiring a knowledge of passing events, otherwise than officially, is with every civilized nation, and more particularly with the Government. If no embargo had been laid, and a number of the merchant vessels of the United States with their cargoes had been captured by the cruisers of Great Britain, and sent into port for adjudication, ignorance of the Orders in Council would not have been admitted an excuse to prevent condemnation. If no law laying an embargo had been enacted until the Orders in Council had been officially known, the commerce of the United States, widely spread on the ocean, would have become a prey to British capture; and in that case there would have been a loud criminating cry against the President of the United States, because he did not advise laying an embargo, although he did not officially know that the Orders in Council were issued, or about to be issued. In that case every proof and reason would have been adduced to make appear, that he not only knew what the substance of the Orders in Council was, but also that they actually were or would have been issued on the day appointed. Why then so much disputation in endeavoring to discriminate between official and inofficial knowledge? If the Chief Magistrate of a nation is informed in a manner he can confide in, it is sufficient; and if he do not act on that information he is blameable. The causes which induced the embargo are now well known to the people of the United States, and although that embargo was attended with many privations, it was and is approved by a great majority of the citizens. If the embargo had been rigidly adhered to, its merits as they are, would have been greater. It frequently happens, and it is to be lamented, that for certain reasons there may be a voluntary occlusion of light.

As parties exist in every nation, the measures of the Government will be approved and disapproved; hence it is, that there may be approbation and disapprobation of the late proclamation of the President, declaring the renewal of commercial intercourse with Great Britain; this is the less to be surprised at, because the non-intercourse law, which authorized the issuing that proclamation, was not well spoken of by many holding different political opinions in the United States. The patriot citizen whose bosom is warmed with the love of his country, approves the proclamation—he hails it as the harbinger of peace, and rejoices in the destinies of the nation he belongs to.

An opinion, that the President of the United States would by the adoption of this resolution be the more influenced to do his duty, and that the non-adoption of this resolution would prevent him from doing his duty, is unworthy of him, and not to be for a moment entertained. The President of the United States will perform his Constitutional duties; he has been elected for that purpose; and they who elected him have full and entire confidence in him that he will not omit anything which he may judge best for the happiness and prosperity of this nation, although the House of Representatives may not think fit to adopt this resolution. Whether the law called the non-intercourse law, has any merit, or was about to have, or would have had, any merit, considered merely in a commercial view and actually operating in fact on commerce in its relation to Great Britain, cannot now be ascertained, the British Government having, previous to the day on which commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and its dependencies was by that law interdicted, offered proposals to the United States, for renewal of commerce so interdicted, and the proposals so offered have been received by the President, and his proclamation is issued accordingly. Some cause has operated inducing Great Britain to change her measures respecting the United States. Great Britain, by her Minister, has offered specified reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake frigate, if the United States would accept it. That Power, by her Minister, has stipulated and promised, that on a day certain the obnoxious Orders in Council, so far as respects the United States, will have been repealed, if the United States will renew commercial intercourse with her. So far has Great Britain returned to the practice of the principles of justice, which also are the principles of honor, towards the United States, desirous to remain neutral and at peace with all the world, and thereby has done honorably. For this conduct, so far exhibited, Great Britain (said Mr. РНЕА) has, on behalf of my country and on behalf of suffering humanity, my sincere praise; but, notwithstanding this, I am not prepared to vote for this resolution. Honorable reparation has been offered for the outrageous attack on the Chesapeake frigate, but the seamen, citizens of the United States, who in that unprovoked attack were murdered, cannot be restored to life. The officer, in consequence of whose orders that attack was made, has not been deservedly punished, but goes at large, stained with the blood of the citizens who were murdered in that attack; and if the late accounts be true, although he has been withdrawn from the American station, he is appointed to a very important command in the British navy. It is true, Great Britain has disavowed the act. So far it is well and honorable; but the disavowal of that act is a reason inducing the punishment of him who offended against the laws of nature, of nations, and of reason. The President of the United States deemed it proper to accept the so far made offers of Great Britain, and forbears to insist on the punishment of the offending officers; he nevertheless expresses his sensibility of the justice and utility of such an example, as due from his Britannic Majesty to his own honor; as is stated in the letter of the seventh of April last, from Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, to Mr. Erskine, the British Minister. The adoption of this resolution would, in a certain degree, oppose that sensibility and expression of the President. This is a reason why it ought not to be adopted.

The case between the United States and Great Britain, somehow or other, has been considered as if the United States were the aggressor, and had done wrong in opposing in any manner the conduct of the British Government towards them. That mode of considering the case is incorrect. The United States are not the aggressor in any instance. It is well known that in consequence of the orders of the British Government, some thousands of seamen, citizens of the United States, were impressed, and that property amounting in value to many millions of dollars, of the citizens of the United States, was captured by British armed ships and vessels, and condemned; that the citizens so impressed were reclaimed, and indemnification for the captured property demanded by the Ministers of the United States, and refused or delayed to be restored and indemnified for by the British Government. An amicable adjustment of all differences was earnestly insisted on, but could not be obtained. These things occurred previous to the enacting of the old partial non-importation law. That was the first law enacted by the United States, prohibiting the importation of British merchandise, and operating in a commercial view directly on Great Britain. Several violations of the sovereignty of the United States were perpetrated by British armed vessels prior to the attack on the Chesapeake; after that hostile attack, the President issued the proclamation of interdiction. Afterwards the British Government issued their Orders in Council, afterwards the law laying the embargo was enacted; and at the same session of Congress a law was enacted authorizing the President, on certain conditions, to suspend the embargo laws as they respected either Great Britain or France. The terms were proposed to Great Britain, and by that Power rejected. At the subsequent session of Congress, the so much talked about non-intercourse law was enacted. The consequences of these measures are now well known, and the prospects of peace and happiness to the United States are become more promising. In this view of the subject no aggression can be charged to the United States. The so long cherished unfounded idea of partiality to France is abandoned, and it is admitted that the United States have continued their impartial neutral position. All the measures of the United States adopted in their own defence were regularly opposed, as if Great Britain had a right to legislate for the United States. If the United States had adopted no measure in their own defence, colonization of commerce under Great Britain might have been the consequence; and if the opposition had prevailed, probably no defensive measure would have been adopted. But it has been said, and may be said again, that if the rejected treaty had been accepted and ratified, it would have saved us from all these difficulties. Would it, indeed? No; it would not. That treaty was an expression of permission only, and not of mutual equal reciprocity. It would, if ratified, have bound the United States in a species of commercial subjection to Great Britain. It is admitted that the note subjoined to that treaty would have put the United States into a state of difficulty with France; that is, if the United States had not joined in the war against France, Great Britain would not have considered that treaty obligatory—this of itself was sufficient reason to reject that treaty. It has been intimated that the United States are now in the same state, as to Great Britain and France, that that note would have placed them in. This proposition is not admitted to be correct. The obligation of the note followed the ratification of the treaty; the treaty would have bound the United States in a kind of commercial subjection to Great Britain, and the note would have placed the United States in a state of difficulty, that is, of war with France. That state of relations does not now exist. That treaty is not obligatory on the United States, they are not in a state of difficulty or war with France. Great Britain heretofore was endeavoring to impose unfriendly and hostile restrictions on the United States; that Power has now offered friendly and honorable propositions of accommodation, for renewal of commercial intercourse, and an amicable adjustment of all differences. The people of the United States know that Great Britain has made these friendly propositions—the people of the British empire will soon know the same, and that the Government of the United States has accepted them as the pledges of justice and honor. Great Britain is bound solemnly, in justice and honor, to go on until all differences with the United States are accommodated. Mr. R. observed, that he would not say that Great Britain, by making the same propositions, had descended from its dignity; nor would he admit that that Power had condescended, (because the United States are on a scale of equality with any nation on earth;) but he would say that Great Britain in offering the same propositions had ascended to dignity and honor—from injustice to justice—from political vice to political virtue; from a determination to disturb and injure a peaceable and neutral nation, to a determination to make honorable and just reparation for all injuries to that nation. But let not Great Britain retrace or turn back; the eye of the people of the United States is upon her; the eye of the people of the British empire is upon her—a recurrence to former hostile practices will be fatal. Let her progress on the principles of justice and honor until the work of reconciliation with the United States is completely and unequivocally finished, and then she will merit the grateful remembrance of every man, woman, and child, in the United States, and in the British empire.

Vote of Approbation.

What the cause was which induced Great Britain to adopt the friendly disposition to offer honorable specific reparation for the attack on the Cheapeake, and to revoke the Orders in Council so far as they respect the United States, and to propose friendly negotiation, is made a matter of inquiry. How unimportant soever that inquiry may be, the human mind, prone to investigate, will occupy itself with the subject. The disposition has been ascribed to the embargo, it has been ascribed to the defeat in Spain, and it has been ascribed to the provisions of the non-intercourse law. To the provisions which that law was expected to embrace, the British Government, by its Ministers, in the late correspondence, appears to attribute that disposition. It is of no great importance to contend or to know whether the disposition alluded to proceeded from all or any of the same causes. It may reasonably be concluded that the old partial non-importation law, the proclamation of the President interdicting British armed vessels, the embargo laws, the defeat in Spain, and the expected provisions of the non-intercourse law severally had their influence in promoting that disposition.

Several objects may have influenced the British Government to carry on the war in Spain. The expulsion of the French from that extensive and fertile country, would have conduced to preserve the dominion of the ocean, and that monopoly of commerce—the obtaining whereof had employed the energies of that Government for centuries. The late disastrous defeat has, in a great degree, excluded the hope of success in that country. The non-intercourse law had not gone into operation, but, by the operation of the embargo laws, the British Government was by experience enabled to form an opinion of the effect which a perpetual continuance of the embargo system, as was expected to be provided by the non-intercourse system, would have had on the British empire. That Government had also experienced the effects of the partial old non-importation law, and of the proclamation of the President, and from all these by experience were enabled to understand what effects would have resulted from a complete and general interdiction of all the produce and merchandise, of all the ships and vessels, armed and unarmed, of the British empire, from the ports, waters, harbors, and hospitality of the United States, as intended by the provisions expected to be contained in the non-intercourse law. The consideration of the effects which an absolute non-intercourse system would have had on the British empire, certainly had influence in disposing that Power to make the offered propositions to the United States; that it had in some manner an influence, is manifested in the written communication of the British Minister to the Secretary of State, before alluded to. The examination of this subject, however, is not very important. The prospect of peace and happiness and prosperity to the United States is become more promising. The sound and noise of war as it respects them, it is to be hoped, will cease. They are far removed in the depths of the wilderness in the West, from the bloody fields of Europe, and have no business with the war of vengeance, which for years past has existed with unrelenting fury, and continues to exist in that quarter of the earth. The disposition of friendship lately manifested by Great Britain towards the United States may be ascribed to a fixed determination to return to the principles of justice, of public law, and reason, which are also the principles of honor. But there is a cause, said Mr. R., to whom truly and properly is to be attributed the change of the relations between the United States and Great Britain, namely, the Great First Cause, the Almighty Ruler of the Universe, who holds the destinies of nations, and manifests himself the protecting guardian of these United States.

It is intimated that all the British Minister has given for a change of our position is a revocation of the Orders in Council—old moth-eaten parchment, for reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake was previously offered; very well, let that be examined. When or what time was honorable reparation offered for the attack on the Chesapeake—previous to the offer honorably and candidly made by Mr. Erskine, the British Minister? The diplomatic proceedings on that subject do not evidence that any reparation was previously offered; let them be examined. No reparation was offered in Great Britain; and it is well known that the Envoy, Mr. Rose, although it was rumored that he came for that very purpose, offered no reparation, nor did he specify any; and not that only, but he refused to inform the Government of the United States what the intended to be offered reparation would be, except the Government did previously rescind the proclamation interdicting British armed vessels. The Government very justly and properly refused previously to rescind that proclamation; thereupon Mr. Rose refused to offer or specify any reparation, and so he returned to Great Britain, without having accomplished any known object. But the British Minister has given us nothing for a change of our position but a revocation of the Orders in Council, old moth-eaten parchment. If then the revocation of the Orders in Council be nothing but the old moth-eaten parchment and of no benefit, the resolution under consideration ought not to be agreed to by this House.

The British Government constantly declared that the Orders in Council were issued to retaliate on France. Whatever the real objects of the Orders in Council were, it never was pretended that they were issued directly against the United States; that would have been a declaration rather too bold and explicit; the orders, however, had the same effect as if they had been so declared to have been issued. They are the long-intended, fatal, all-comprehending, everywhere-extending orders, by the operation whereof Great Britain designed to colonize and to make tributary all the commerce of all the world. The same Orders in Council, so far as they respect the United States, are to be rescinded. Mr. Erskine, the British Minister, on behalf of his Government, has offered and stipulated with the Government of the United States, that the same Orders in Council will have been rescinded on a certain day if the Government of the United States will renew commercial intercourse with Great Britain. That offer of the British Ministry is accepted, and a proclamation of the President to that effect issued accordingly, and Great Britain is bound to perform. This is more than a destroying of old moth-eaten neglected parchment. The Orders in Council being revoked, the commerce of the United States will again float on the great highway of nations, untrammelled, unshackled, unfettered with the chains which were forged out for it, and contained in the so much deplored, rejected treaty, subject only to the laws of justice, honor, and public reason. The British Minister has no reason to put on sackcloth and ashes. He is the organ of his Government, and for what, by the directions of his Government he has done, he ought to put on the vestment of honor and the mantle of glory. Let him illumine his mind with the splendid rays of sunshine, satisfaction, and complacency, for he has broken down the wall of division which separated two great nations, and commenced the glorious work of reconciliation. He, making justice and honor the foundation, has begun to build an edifice, which, if his Government will authorize him to perfect, may endure until the pyramids of Egypt are mouldered in ruin, and Old Time himself render up his existence. War has been prevented, and it appears to have become a question, who prevented it? The investigation of this question, in this House, appears unnecessary. It is too much like children contending for, "who did it?" The citizens of the United States will, for themselves, investigate it. They will form correct opinions respecting it, and will for themselves determine the question, and duly appreciate the merits. At this time, when reconciliation is the order of the day, it might be as well to omit in this House every circumstance which may help to fan the flame of party and disunion. Party in the political world is like evil in the moral world—a destroyer of the peace and happiness of mankind. Let the chief study be, who shall do most good, and the liberty, sovereignty, and union of this nation, will be perpetual.

It does not appear necessary to adopt this resolution. It has not been made to appear that any good will flow from it. The citizens of the United States will testify their approbation of the conduct of the President, and when their Representatives return home let them also in their individual capacity, join their fellow-citizens in the general voice of approbation.

The resolution "that the promptitude and frankness with which the President of the United States has met the overtures of the Government of Great Britain towards a restoration of harmony and free commercial intercourse between the two nations, meets the approbation of this House," contains two propositions; the one express, the other implied. The express proposition approbates the conduct of the President of the United States: the implied one, approbates the conduct of Great Britain; for the conduct of the President cannot be approbated in this case without approbating the conduct of Great Britain, and in approbating the conduct of the President the conduct of Great Britain also is approbated. But the approbation intended by this resolution for the President is confined to the particular case—the approbation impliedly intended by the resolution for Great Britain is general. This is going further than may be proper at this time. If the President of the United States, in this particular case, be approbated, the late President of the United States ought also to be approbated; for this plain reason, that the measures adopted on the part of the United States, which could have had any influence in promoting a friendly disposition on the part of Great Britain, were all adopted during the Administration of the late President; and hence it follows that the objects of the late President have so far been carried into effect. In approbating the effect, the cause ought not to be kept out of view, or thrown in the back ground; it ought also to be approbated unless it can be made appear that an effect can be without a cause. The resolution is capable of an unfavorable construction; by the form of it, it may be concluded, that Great Britain heretofore has been in the constant habit of making the same overtures to the United States, and that they were not accepted by the President. This is not admitted to be correct, and to show that it is not correct, there is no necessity again to repeat what already has been urged on this subject.

This resolution, if adopted by the House, will virtually have a tendency to invade the treaty-making power—a power which by the Constitution is exclusively confided to the President and Senate of the United States. It may become a dangerous engine in the hands of Great Britain, operating in favor of that Power, and against the best interests of the United States, in any negotiation that may hereafter be carried on for the purpose of making a commercial treaty between the United States and Great Britain. For these and other reasons, not necessary to be recapitulated, it may be most proper to postpone this resolution.

Mr. McKEE said, that after the lengthy discussion which had taken place on this subject, he did not rise to enter at large into an examination of it; but there were one or two remarks which he would offer to the House. The question, when first submitted to the House, had appeared to him to be one of no importance, to be one that could excite no interest, whether decided in the negative or affirmative; but by lying on the table for a day or two, it had increased in magnitude. Why so much importance was attached to it he could not see. I am, said he, opposed to the adoption of the resolution, and in favor of indefinite postponement, because I cannot see any good consequences which can possibly result from the adoption of it. I consider it more proper for the Legislature of the nation to apply its time and resources to objects of utility, than to descend to useless debate on a subject which can be of no importance. What is the object of the resolution? Is it to communicate information which shall regulate the conduct of the President of the United States in the detail of the negotiation, the basis of which is formed? If so, the President can obtain it from a proper source. Holding, as the President of the United States certainly does, an extensive patronage, which is to be distributed to individuals who may meet his approbation, a suspicion must arise that the mover, or perhaps advocates of such a resolution as this, were candidates for the loaves and fishes. And does this House possess the information on our foreign relations which the President must possess? Or do we possess that knowledge of the sentiments of our constituents which would warrant us in voting for the motion, if it were expedient so to do? We do not, sir. I can speak for myself and the delegation from Kentucky, that we do not know the sense of the people on this subject, and our votes will be but individual votes, and not expressive of the will of the people. I see no good, and do see a possible mischief which may arise from the adoption of the motion. Why should expressions of joy be uttered? What great victory has been achieved? What great good has the Executive obtained? Is it anything more than an acknowledgment of our rights? I presume not; and our joy can only be similar to that which an individual feels when he has obtained from an unjust debtor his right. There is not cause for more of exultation, and the same course of conduct which produces an effect on individuals, will produce the same effect on nations. If joy be loudly proclaimed, may it not have a tendency to create difficulties in the detail of the negotiation? It certainly may produce that effect. I therefore draw the conclusion that it is not good policy to adopt the resolution, and I conceive it to be without a precedent in the history of this country, at least in the history of the last Administration.

The gentleman from Virginia has produced a case which he is willing to draw into precedent. I think that an examination will show, that it is essentially different from the present case, and predicated upon the same principle as that nauseous stuff which the gentleman dislikes, and which was offered up to the Executive by the Legislatures prior to the commencement of the late Administration. It will be found to be an address to President WASHINGTON, which recognised his conduct in issuing the proclamation of neutrality in 1793. That case was very dissimilar to the late act of President Madison, which was but a duty he was expected to perform. He has done it with ability and integrity, and there was not a citizen of the United States but expected it of him. President WASHINGTON had done an act which he was not directed to do by the Legislature; he had issued a proclamation on his own mere motion. I mention with great diffidence that it was questioned whether this measure was not a stretch of Executive power; and if it was so, it was necessary for the Legislature to recognise the act, inasmuch as it was one of the highest importance. Therefore I say that the case is not a precedent.

Several other reasons have been mentioned in favor of the resolution, which have been so ably answered by the gentleman from New York that I shall not notice them. Here might be an end to the discussion, was it not for the manner in which the subject has been discussed by the gentleman from Virginia, and I think it fair to answer him in his own way. He seems to contend for the credit of the late accommodation—with whom? I have not understood that the Republican party have claimed any merit from it. It has not been said that this or that party should be entitled to the merit. No such claim, as far as I have any knowledge, has been set up in this country. It will then be fair to examine, on this subject, whether the gentleman's right to the credit which he claims is fairly made out. We are told that it is owing to the passage of the non-intercourse law that the overtures were made by Great Britain. The gentleman from Virginia has told you that he was opposed to the passage of that law, not from any dislike to it, but because he supposed that he might get clear of the embargo wholly. Suppose the gentleman had succeeded in his vote upon the non-intercourse, and then repealed the embargo, there would then have been existing no measure of resistance to British oppression. The Orders in Council would have been acquiesced in by this Government. Suppose that the disposition of the British Government to accommodate with America be ascribed to her misfortunes in Spain; I ask whether she would have had any inducement to withdraw her Orders in Council in this state of things? The reverse in Spain having produced a disposition to accommodate, yet, no measure of hostility being presented to the Orders in Council, why would Great Britain have withdrawn them? Is it to be supposed that the British Government is so very ignorant of the situation in which she was placed by the Orders in Council, that she would have withdrawn them? It cannot be attributed to this motive. If not, to what? Will you suppose, sir, that she has feelings of such sympathy towards America that she would have done it? I need only call to my aid the history of that nation from 1774 to the present day, for proof of a contrary disposition; for she could not withdraw a law in relation to this country, much less advantageous to her than her Orders in Council, until its fields were stained with the best blood of the country. It is then to be ascribed to the non-intercourse. If the embargo had been repealed without the latter, we should to this day been groaning under the Orders in Council, and perhaps our situation would have presented as mournful an aspect at the meeting of Congress, as the gentleman so feelingly described us, voting supplies, marching to Canada, &c.; for, sir, what would then have been our situation, if we had at the last session repealed the embargo wholly? We should have been retracing our steps, or plunging the nation into war, hesitating between the one and the other, exhibiting a stain on the American character, which years could not have effaced. Is this picture too highly colored? Is not the consequence which I have portrayed fairly resulting? Or will this visionary phantom, which I have raised, vanish into air at the slightest examination? Did not the gentleman vote against the embargo, against non-intercourse, against everything? What measure did he advocate to resist taxation? [Mr. RANDOLPH.—Arming our merchantmen.] Arming our merchantmen! I ask that gentleman and this House, sir, to determine whether that was not a measure of hostility fraught with greater inconvenience than any other; and whether it would not have produced the voting of supplies for the bombardment of New York, as certainly as any other mode of warfare? It is to my mind as clear that arming these merchantmen would have produced war, as the radiant orb of day is to my sight. How then does the gentleman obtain his title to the credit of the present peaceful situation of our country? I conceive that his claim will not be supported by this House or the nation. I should have been happy, for the gentleman's sake and for my own, that this subject had never been presented for discussion. But as it has, I have thought it my duty to express my sentiments on it. Those feelings under which a young speaker necessarily labors, have deprived me of much of the matter, and most of the manner, of what I intended to say. I have given most of the reasons which will induce me to vote for indefinite postponement; if that does not carry, to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and finally as those events will place it in my power.

Mr. GARDENIER said, that having been one of those who had looked up to the elevation of the present Chief Magistrate as one of the most calamitous events to this country that could take place, he rose to make that atonement which was in his power for that error. Yes, sir, said Mr. G., this tree, from which I honestly expected so much bad fruit, is bearing fruit of gladness and rejoicing for our country. I am not only willing but take pleasure in making this avowal. The first important act of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, is one, which, while it calls for the confidence of the nation, demands no less the expression of it by this House. Being of the old school, sir, I am not of course very much frightened at the speech—not from the throne; thank God we have none, and I hope we shall long be without any—but by the idea of the terrors which are carried in the countenance of the Executive magistrate. If he would favor us with his presence to make his speech, my poor eyes would stand the dazzling glare of such an exhibition. Even in the British Parliament I have never understood that a speech from the throne humbles that body. I have never seen in their debate that the minority have been abashed by it; for, notwithstanding the speech, they have carried the terrors of their eloquence to the throne itself, and they have carried it by means of the answer to the speech from the throne. On that occasion it is, that the rights of the minority are unrestrained; it is then that they speak to the throne in language of freemen—for the House of Commons, elected by the people, though irregularly, constitute the democratic and consequently free part of the English constitution. If you were to exclude them from the right of expressing their opinion on public measures, they would say with great justice that an ancient and Constitutional right was withheld from them. They would protest against any measures calculated to deprive them of the right of speaking with freedom of the measures of the Ministry and King. The course which has been here pursued, in theory though pleasant to the eye, has in practice been a course which has fortified the Executive magistrate, and built around him a wall which prevented approach, through which the measures of his Administration could not be reviewed by any members of this House; because, forsooth, the House might be disposed to press a flattering reply upon him—but, in point of fact that this minority, a strong, ungovernable animal, might be muzzled. Your President was not unwilling to turn the delighted ear to the addresses of citizens assembled in meetings; and at no time has he frowned with severity at that courtly adulation of the Legislatures who have sung his own language in his own ears. He has thanked them for their patriotism, and republicanism too, in addressing him in this way. But if the Executive magistrate was, under the good old practice, flattered by these addresses in answer to his speeches, it was here to be canvassed whether he was entitled to that incense to be offered up by the majority; and I much doubt, when the praise of the majority was mixed up with the dispraise of the minority, if the bitter did not prevail over the sweet. The practice of communicating by message was one I will not say gone into for the purpose of precluding debate, but the effect has been that if we ever did examine the measures of administration, we were obliged to examine them piece-meal. We could not take them all in one view, to make that impression which is so proper for keeping in check the Executive branch of the Government. There might have been an apology made for the late President of the United States, which, if my late information be correct, could hardly be made for the present. I understand that in Great Britain the King can speak but cannot write. Now I think it very well there that the King should have at least something to do in public concerns, and inasmuch as he cannot write, let him speak (for the King of England was never remarkable for great natural gifts) what others have written for him. And if we have had a President of the United States who would write but could not speak, it was very well to reverse the usual order of proceeding under this Government. Whenever, sir, we have a President who can first write his speech and then deliver it to the House, I should like to see it, because it would show our superiority as a nation in point of talents. I wish to put down monarchy, sir—I am a republican, sir, and wish to show the men who will live the slaves of monarchy that they have nothing to boast of. It is, therefore, with these views of the subject that I could have been very well satisfied to have seen revived the good old way, of the Executive magistrate of the people meeting the Representatives of the people face to face. I should like to receive a communication from the Executive, into which he could throw something of his own soul. On the other hand, when a message is sent, what practical good results from the change? I presume to say none at all. The only principle on which it could be excused, is, that the President could not read it to so august a body as this. If this were the case, it might be excused, but on that principle alone.

However, sir, be the practice of the Executive what it may, I stand upon the rights of the House, and I will never give up any portion of my right to speak of public men and public measures. I am rejoiced, therefore, that the gentleman from Virginia has laid before the House the resolution now under debate, because it enables us not to sing Io Pæans, not to offer up incense to the Executive, but to bring back to this House the right, which it ought never to have parted with, of animadverting upon the course of public measures, upon things which have passed. I would not tie myself down to approbate the conduct of the President, be it what it might; but when the President has done well, I will claim the right of approving him. I would say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant;" and in so doing, I am permitted to say, if I please, "Ill done, thou bad and faithless servant." Where we have a right to praise, we have a right to dispraise, and vice versa; and will any one say that there is anything in censuring misconduct which is inconsistent with a republican form of Government? No, sir; whoever may feel it, no one will say so. I am, therefore, against a postponement of the question.

As to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I do not know precisely what he means by it; and, therefore, know not whether I am for or against it. I find language almost literally accordant with it in the Message of the President of the United States. Now, sir, if this be meant as a mere echo of the President's Message, that I do call adulation; that I do not like; it is too kingly even for me; I do not want these echoes. I wish the House to express its opinion; but, after receiving the Message of the President of the United States, to breathe it back upon him is really nauseous. I believe the gentleman is a good republican; I extend to him the same charity which I ask for myself. This is a mere error into which he was led from the situation into which the House was drawn. To let the resolution pass entire, would not do; there was no objection to the substance of it, but that it should be adopted as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) moved it, there were a variety of reasons which I will not detail, which rendered it manifestly unjust. It was, therefore, proper to move an amendment. In this point of view I object to it.

But, in another view, (as I cannot clearly comprehend the idea intended to be conveyed,) I will explain my difficulty to the House. "And furnishes additional evidence of the spirit of accom'modation on the part of our Government, which 'has at no time been intermitted.' Now, I agree with this, it is true; and I am surprised that it escaped the sagacity of the gentleman from Virginia, that, as an amendment, there can be no objection to it. Has it been intermitted? Intermission necessarily implies commencement.—Now, sir, since it commenced, has it ever been interrupted? The Government of the United States, since it began to entertain that spirit, has not intermitted it. This is all true, and I cannot object to the spirit of it; but I am afraid that I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment, because it is not republican—it is too much of an echo.

Now for the original resolution. I do much like the two words promptitude and frankness. The compliment contained in them is highly merited; and I will proceed to show it, according to my way of judging upon this subject. We have just emerged from that dreadful night of embargo which plunged in utter darkness, distress, and consternation, this great nation. Yes, sir, we have emerged from it. It is well, now, after having escaped so great a calamity, that we should retrace the causes of that calamity, and the means which have been happily employed ultimately to avert it. The original cause of this calamity may be distinctly traced to the issuing of the Berlin decree of the 21st November, 1806, and to the conduct of the American Government subsequently to that period in relation to that decree—a conduct (I am free to express my opinion) not calculated for peace, and as little for war—calculated to produce no other practical effect than the ruin of ourselves. By issuing the Berlin decree, the French Government infringed the rights of the American Republic and of the British Government. They did an act which, by the laws of nations, they had no right to do, either as it regarded this country, or as it regarded England. It was a mode of attack, as it regarded England, to which France had no right to resort. If I may be permitted to simplify this idea, it was as improper for her to have recourse to this mode, as it would be, in fair boxing, to knock an adversary after he was down. There are laws of war as well as of peace between nations. You are not permitted, legally, to do everything which you have the physical power to do. This need but be mentioned to be clearly perceived by every gentleman. France had not a right to assail her adversary through a neutral and friendly Power. France had committed an act unauthorized towards England by the Berlin decree. The interests of Great Britain and of the United States were both injured by the Berlin decree. Their interests and their rights, then, being mutually attacked, it was a mutual concern necessarily between the two countries. Both were interested in repelling this infraction of neutral rights; and the study of our Government should have been, as to this Berlin decree, and as to that only, to have made a common cause with Great Britain, and resisted the decree. If that common cause had been so made, a great deal of distress and ruin which has fallen upon the country would have been avoided. Our Government, however, was silent upon this subject, though it was, in the nature of the thing, a common matter between this country and England; and I beg pardon of any fastidious gentleman, that I should think it possible that America and England could have common rights. As Great Britain could not be reached but through us, when she was so reached, both had one object: both were assailed, and ought to have made common cause. But, what did the Government of the United States? Did it show, at that time, a manly front to French injustice and arrogance? Did it consult with the British Government what measures should be taken to repel this assault? No, sir, but it took steps—strange to tell—precisely of an opposite character. The Berlin decree was issued on the 21st of November, 1806; the treaty negotiated between Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney and the British Commissioners was signed on the 31st December of the same year—say forty days after the issuing the Berlin decree. Did the Government of Great Britain, willing to ruin your commerce, (and many hold out this idea,) make use of this pretext, at that time, to retaliate upon you? No, sir; but what was the actual state of things? The Berlin decree had been issued; a treaty was digested and signed by the Commissioners of the two Governments of America and Great Britain, and there was much of friendly intercourse between the two countries. I would demand the manner in which the American Government received this decree. And much, I say, (for I am not afraid to speak the truth,) was to be expected from the American Government, placing itself as a fair and impartial neutral between the two Governments. Do you recollect that the British Ministers annexed to the treaty a note, in which—pointing to the consideration already mentioned, as regarded themselves, and the right of France to issue the decree—they said: "Such principles 'are in themselves extravagant, and repugnant 'to the law of nations; and the pretensions found- 'ed on them, though professedly directed solely 'against Great Britain, tend to alter the practice 'of war among civilized nations, and utterly to 'subvert the rights and independence of neutral 'Powers." Did not the Berlin decree tend to do this? And was it not an injury of a new, and, at the same time, of a most frightful character, as regarded Great Britain? In this situation, when an attempt was made by her antagonist to keep from her her best customer—and this attempt was an injury to her customer as well as to her—was it a point on which it could have been expected that the British Government would have been silent? Would not the British Commissioners have forfeited all claims to the confidence of the British nation, if, upon such a decree, they had not done something for themselves? Certainly. I speak of the time when they had only promulgated the decree. They signed a note, in which they said, that "They proceed to the signature 'under the full persuasion, that, before the treaty 'shall be returned from America, with the ratifi- 'cation of the United States, the enemy will either

' have formally abandoned or tacitly relinquished ' his unjust pretensions." Was this an unreasonable expectation? Was it unreasonable to hope that the system of injustice which the first nation in the world was, for the first time, practising against her, should be abandoned? Certainly not. But, if it was not, what next did she express a desire to have done? "Or (as the British Commissioners said) that the Government of the ' United States, by its conduct or assurances, will ' have given security to His Majesty that it will ' not submit to such innovations in the established ' system of maritime law." Was there anything wrong in this request, sir? It cannot be controverted, that, upon this matter, we had a common cause with Great Britain, whether we chose to make it so, or not. She said, "Do you declare, either by your conduct or assurances, that you will resist the decree—do something that looks towards it? We do not require a specific pledge, but, as we are so deeply interested in the manner in which you shall conduct, it becomes important to us to know what you will do about it." If such assurances had been given—if steps becoming the dignity of this Government had been pursued, would the British Orders in Council have been issued? There never would have been occasion for them. But this is not all contained in that note, for it continues thus: "The undersigned have presented this note from an anxious ' wish that it should be clearly understood, on both ' sides, that, without such an abandonment on the ' part of the enemy, or such assurances or such ' conduct on the part of the United States, His ' Majesty will not consider himself bound by the ' present signature of his Commissioners to ratify ' the treaty, or precluded from adopting such mea- ' sures as may seem necessary for counteracting ' the designs of his enemy." Now, sir, was not all this fair? If we consider that Great Britain has rights as well as we—that one great right was in jeopardy in regard to her interest as well as ours—was this arrogance? Was it not reasonable? Having common cause with her, should we not have made that answer which she wished? But, what answer did we make? Was the Government of the United States content with being merely silent? No, sir; so far from giving any intimation that it meant to defend itself, the very circumstance of this note was made one of the causes for the rejection of this treaty, as the President of the United States, at the subsequent session of Congress, declared. He declares, that there was one consideration, independent of this note, which induced him to reject the treaty; thereby, clearly showing that the annexion of that note was considered as so offensive as to have induced him to reject the treaty, if there had been no other cause for it. After this, what in fairness could the British Ministers, bound to assert the rights of their own country, do? The United States never gave any intimation of the course which they intended to take. In the next place, the President had told Congress that their speaking to him was so offensive, that on that account, if on no other, he should have considered himself warranted in rejecting the treaty. Were the British Ministry to expect, after this, that the President would have recommended a resistance of the French decrees? No sir; it would have been giving more faith than we generally give to them or they to us.

Now, sir, to carry you with me a little in the order of time, I would call the attention of the House to a letter, dated at London on the 22d of April, 1807. If my frequent recurrence to documents should fatigue the House, I beg them to bear in mind that, in these documents, they may find truth as well as the arts of able diplomatists. On the 31st of December, 1806, then, the note was annexed to the treaty. On the 22d of April, 1807, Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, in their letter to the Secretary of State, inform him that they had an interview with Mr. Canning: "As ' soon, however, (say they) as we glanced at the ' objects of this interview, he observed that he ' had just received intelligence, which, if true, ' would make it unnecessary for us to enter at ' present on any of the topics alluded to; that it ' had been represented to him that an officer just ' arrived from America, had that morning inform- ' ed the Admiralty that the treaty which had ' been lately concluded here had been rejected by ' our Government," &c. He observed that "such ' an event would place the relations of the coun- ' tries in an embarrassing situation," &c. Here now it will be proper to bear in mind that this treaty was framed by the Ministry, one of whom made that fine speech in Parliament, which the gentleman from New York read, the Ministry most friendly to this country, if there be any such thing as friendship toward us, which I very much doubt. This treaty, thus made, was sent back immediately after the issuing of the Berlin decree, which so closely connected, in one respect, the interests of the two countries. Was this not a fair cause of suspicion? Well might Mr. Canning hesitate as to what he should do in this new state of things. But, to complete his disappointment and confusion on this subject, the American Ministers, on the 24th July, 1807, addressed to Mr. Canning another note. This was the first answer which was ever given in any way whatever to the inquiry as to what the American Government meant to do in relation to the Berlin decree. It was as follows:

"There is another object to which the undersigned have the orders of the President to invite the attention of His Majesty's Government, as affecting materially, and giving a new and unexpected character to the proposed treaty. They allude to the written declaration, relative to the French decree of the 21st of November last, by which His Majesty's Plenipotentiaries accompanied their signature of the treaty; a declaration which, in its actual form, creates unnecessary embarrassments in the way of an acceptance of the treaty by the United States. The undersigned persuade themselves that, as this proceeding, to which no sanction was given on their part, imposed on the United States no new obligation, could only be intended to declare that, in signing or ratifying the treaty, it was understood by Great Britain that nothing contained in it would be a bar to any measure, which, if no such treaty had been signed, would be lawful as a measure of retaliation against her enemy, and as the occasion which produced it does not appear to exist as then supposed, it will not be thought that anything is sacrificed by withdrawing it as unnecessary."

Yes, sir, an inquiry made by Great Britain in a most perilous conjuncture was answered by a cool and very sarcastic desire, that her inquiries on that subject might be withdrawn. This was the answer which they received to an inquiry as to any disposition of the American Government to acquiesce in the Berlin decree. It is not to be wondered at that this answer was unsatisfactory. It cannot be wondered at. There is another letter from the same gentlemen of the 22d October, 1807, to the Secretary of State, to which I will refer, in which it is stated that, in the course of a conference with Mr. Canning, he asked an explanation of their former answer to the note on the subject of the Berlin decree, which answer they agreed to give in writing. Mr. Canning closed the interview by saying that it would be necessary to postpone what he had further to communicate to another opportunity. No information, no explanation was given, sir; nothing partaking of the nature or quality of conciliation having been resorted to. A deathlike silence was observed on this point of critical interest to the nation. A note was delivered, attempting to prove that the occasion which produced the note annexed to the treaty had disappeared; and what ground was taken in that note, sir?

"Great anxiety having been excited by a construction which many believed the decree to be susceptible of, the Minister of the United States at Paris requested of the Minister of Marine, who was charged with its execution, an explanation of the sense in which it was understood by his Government, who assured him that it was not intended that it should in any degree interfere with the provisions of the Treaty of 1800, between the United States and France. We relied, also, upon the fact, not only that no countenance had been given by any practice or judicial decision, in France, to a different construction, but that the practice was in precise conformity with the view above suggested, and that in a cause in which the question had been formally brought into discussion, the Court had sanctioned the conclusion that the treaty between the two nations was to be exactly fulfilled, and that the decree was to be so construed as not to infringe it."

This was the answer given, to this amount: "Your solicitude about the operation of the decree is extremely idle, because we are perfectly satisfied, and you should be too, that the principle on which it goes will never be carried into execution."

It is easy to conceive how very far such a declaration fell short of what was requested in the note of Lords Auckland and Holland. It came to this point: either that the British Government was to be satisfied, or to go on to the alternative which was threatened. It did go on to it. The British Government did not trust to these favorable appearances, which it suited France to hold out. Who, then, was wrong, we or they? Did France act upon that decree, or did she not? For the whole point of this miserably conducted argument, turned upon this at last: that if there was sufficient ground to calculate that the French Government would not execute its decree, then the British Government ought to be silent; but if she did execute it, that the British Government should take care of its own preservation. How was the fact? France did execute the decree; and from that moment there could be no doubt that resistance was justifiable. But it appears that Great Britain did not know it was carried into execution before she issued her Orders in Council. If so, Great Britain displayed more knowledge of the character of nations than falls to our share. I have read, in a speech made in the other House, as to the embargo, that, if the Orders in Council were not known, yet the embargo was a lucky hit. Then, sir, if Great Britain did not know that the Berlin decree was executed, the Orders in Council were a lucky hit. And, sir, as to the question whether the Orders in Council were known here when the embargo was laid, I will just step aside to notice it. In a letter, dated February 19, 1808, to our Minister at London, we find this passage: "My last, which was committed to the British packet, enclosed a copy of the act of embargo, and explained the policy of the measure. Among the considerations which enforced it was"—What? The knowledge of the Orders in Council? No, sir; "the probability of such decrees as were issued by the British Government of November 11," &c. Now, I do hope that, after this, we shall not have any more sophistical wire-drawn reasoning to show how they might have been known, when Mr. Madison himself has told our Minister at London that the Orders in Council were supposed to be meditated, and that their appearance afterward justified the embargo. But I think that gentlemen are carrying this point too far. Let them not go the whole length of saying that the Orders in Council were known before the embargo. It is giving the lie to Mr. Madison most indecently; and as to this way of complimenting him, though I have very little to expect from him, I cannot concur in it. Not only, sir, am I willing to allow, in the language of this letter, that there was a probability of the issuing the Orders in Council, not only that the language of the British gazettes left little doubt of it; but I feel justified in going a great deal further, and say, that the celebrated note rendered it improbable to suppose that anything else could have happened. The British Government said, "we desire that France should abandon her system, or, if not, that you will take some measure which will defend us." If we expected that the British Ministers would keep their word, we might safely swear that the Orders in Council would issue. It is not necessary to the purpose of my argument at this time to say that Great Britain did right in issuing these Orders in Council, though I am free to acknowledge that, for the promotion of her own interest, it was right; but it is my purpose to show that the ground has been yielded, and that it has, is one of the reasons why we find ourselves in a situation so comparatively happy.

H. OF R.

Permit me, to go to the proof of this, to state, as my conception, that there were three things which prevented that accommodation between the two countries, which was so essential to the prosperity of both. They were these: the proclamation, the refusal to coalesce with Great Britain in resistance to the Berlin decree; and, lastly, the refusal to repeal the embargo. These are the three reasons which prevented the accomplishment of that good of which the President has put us in possession. Great Britain demanded that we should intimate by our conduct or assurances that we would not submit to the innovations on maritime law, attempted by the Berlin decree, and, throughout the whole of this correspondence, made it a point that she would never give up her Orders in Council until she had some pledge to that effect from us. She now has that pledge, and it is a great misfortune that it was not given before. Yes, sir, the first resolution reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations last winter, adopting the language of Lords Holland and Auckland, declares that the United States cannot submit to the French decrees. I am disposed, on this part of the subject, to give the present President credit for his adroitness. I should not be surprised, sir, were the secret history of the Cabinet ever to be written, if it should turn out that, without the knowledge of the then President of the United States, the present President had, by making a very surly face at Great Britain, caused a demand to be made of France that she should revoke her decree, and given that very pledge which Great Britain demanded of us. Great Britain issued her Orders in Council to keep us from France. It was said that we could not go with any safety on the ocean between the French decrees and British orders. Now was supposed to be the happy time, when the planets were auspicious, for involving us in a British war: but, it did so happen that, in the nature of things, we could not declare the British orders to be unlawful, without declaring the French decrees to be unlawful, also. We could not oppose one without also opposing the other. The very moment that we fought both Great Britain and France, Great Britain did not want any quarrel with us. If we had put ourselves in opposition to France, when the question was raised, in the note attached to the treaty, we should never have had the Orders in Council. But we had them. We did declare, after we had them, that we would give the pledge. It was rendered indispensably necessary, by our refusing to give a pledge of resistance to the Berlin decree, that the Orders in Council should be issued. That pledge now having been given, it became as necessary that the orders should be withdrawn. It was folly for Great Britain to have continued them. We were fighting Great Britain (on paper)—for what? Because she joined us in the maintenance of our neutral rights. We acknowledged that, as soon as the Berlin decree was acted on, it was cause of war, but felt too proud to vindicate ourselves from the imputation of submitting to it, because Great Britain had asked it of us. When we had passed the non-intercourse law as to France, and excluded French ships from our harbors, we were placed in a situation which disabled us from submitting to the Berlin decree, and are now in that situation. I would observe that, at the time these measures were agitated, we had all a little sand in our eyes; we did not understand the subject as completely at that time as we do now; and I am pretty well satisfied that, when the secret history of the two last years is divulged, it will be found that while the former President was endeavoring to fan the flames of war, the Secretary of State, by originating these resolutions, &c., was smoothing the way for the happy discharge of his Presidential duties when he should come to the Chair. I think it did him honor. The ground, then, having been taken, we, standing pledged, in the face of the world, to resist French injustice, have done what we were required to give a pledge to do. There is, therefore, no further difficulty on the part of Great Britain, in relation to us. She withdraws her Orders in Council, and leaves us precisely in the situation in which she first asked of us to place ourselves. All the difference is, that the Orders in Council are enforced now by us instead of herself. In bringing about this state of things, I yield my hearty approbation to the President of the United States; and I believe that, when I could not see the end of our troubles, the President was secretly conducting us to the late happy result.

But, says one gentleman, the embargo has so humbled the British nation, and the terrors of the non-intercourse law have performed such miracles, that she is willing to fall at our feet, and the equal footing on which the two countries was placed, was a pretence, and nothing more, for their change of position. Now, let us examine it; for I do consider it extremely important that the fact should be ascertained and established whether the embargo was such a machine as to produce all these consequences; for, if it was, let us never forget that we had it, and have recourse to it on every future occasion. If it was, sir, let us inscribe it in golden characters over your head, that it may stare us in the face, whenever we rise to address you. But, if the late change be not ascribable to that, but to the abandonment of that pernicious system of which the embargo formed a principal feature; if it be ascribable to the frankness and promptitude with which the President met the late overtures, let us say so. The medicine has operated, and it is correct that we should ascertain by what physician the cure was performed. That medicine, which had like to have killed us, will never be resorted to again.

The proclamation was another stumbling block, in the consideration of which I must again have recourse to the volume of truth. It will be recollected, sir, that when the affair of the Chesapeake first became public at London, it was known to the British Minister before it was known to our Ministers. While things were going on very smoothly, in relation to that matter, information was received that the President of the United States had issued a proclamation in-terdicting the entrance of our waters to British vessels, and objection was made to it—on what ground? That the United States had no right by the law of nations to exclude armed vessels from their waters? No, sir, that was a ground which was never contested. For, in point of right, foreign armed vessels can no more claim permission to come within our waters than their armies can claim a right to encamp on the terra firma of our country. The right is enjoyed but by indulgence. But, if the armies of France and England were engaged upon our frontiers, and we should permit the army of one to receive accommodation and comfort within our territorial limits, and were to exclude the other, we should violate the neutral character by aiding one to the depression of the other, taking, so far as this partiality extended, a part in the war; we should, in fact, be doing a hostile act. On the other hand, if we permitted both to come into our territories and fight it out, we still keep our neutral character, impartiality being of the essence of neutrality. When, therefore, the proclamation interdicting British vessels was issued, it was complained of only on this ground:

“The total exclusion of all ships of war belonging to one of two belligerent parties, while the ships of war of the other were protected by the harbors of the neutral Power, would furnish no light ground of complaint against that neutral, if considered in any other point of view than as a matter of retaliation for previous injury; and, so considered, it cannot but be necessary to take it into account in the adjustment of the original dispute.”

If the House will give me a little attention, they will see that the objection to the proclamation did not go on the ground simply that British vessels were prohibited from entering, but that while British vessels were prohibited, French were admitted. It was admitting the army of one belligerent to occupy your territory while that of the other was prevented. Therefore, the giving the use of our waters to one belligerent and refusing it to the other, was a fair and just cause of complaint; and, until both were admitted or both excluded, Great Britain refused to treat or make reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake. Mr. Rose came forward afterward with a long letter on the same subject, and we find that he comes to the same conclusion. This point, wherever the subject is treated, is not lost sight of. You find it afterward, in the reply which was given by Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney, when Mr. Pinkney made the famous proposal to the British Government, that if they would withdraw the Orders in Council, the embargo should be suspended as regarded them. One reason of refusal was, that British vessels were interdicted while French were admitted. She wished that both should be admitted or both excluded. She never would enter into any negotiation until that equality was produced. She has not talked as much as we have, to be sure, but she has acted more. Now, sir, by the non-intercourse act, this demand of placing both nations on an equality is complied with, and she offers that reparation which she has hitherto refused.

But it is said that the proposal made by Mr. Pinkney last summer embraced the same terms. And how? What did Mr. Pinkney offer at that time? After talking about and about the subject, Mr. Canning not understanding him, desired him to commit his ideas to paper. He wrote it. “I have the honor to state, says Mr. P., that it was the intention,”—it was (not, it is) the intention of the President of the United States to suspend the embargo as to Great Britain in case she should withdraw her Orders in Council, &c. And Mr. Pinkney then makes no pledge that the embargo shall be continued as to France, but goes into an argument on the subject. Was this the pledge required by the British Government? No, sir; we find, till that demand was complied with, she never would come to a settlement. Now, if the Orders in Council had been then repealed, would it have produced those consequences subsequently produced by her perseverance? No, sir. In the first place there was then no pledge on record that we would resist the French decrees; our Government having studiously avoided such a pledge. The Government was not pledged by Mr. Pinkney even to keep the embargo in operation in relation to France. They were not yet willing to pledge themselves to resist France. They would not act a manly part even then. It was not enough that France disregarded all neutral rights and the obligations of a sacred treaty. We would not then give intimation that we would resist France, but all we said, was, that if France persisted in her decrees, we would continue the embargo as to her. On this ground the Orders in Council were asked to be withdrawn. British vessels would still have been excluded whilst French were admitted. But at last that state of things has arrived, as to the pledge that this country will not submit to the French decrees, and as to both nations being placed on an equality in relation to armed ships, in which we ought first to have placed ourselves. The proclamation being removed is no impediment to that adjustment. It never would have been an impediment, if this Government had been willing to do originally what it at last consented to do.

The third, last, and only impediment was the existence of the embargo. As long as that remained in force, the British Government stood pledged not to withdraw the Orders in Council. The embargo is given up. But the address and adroitness of the Government is distinguishable there too; for while they killed the life and soul of the embargo, they held up the lifeless corpse as though in full life and vigor. The great argument in favor of the embargo was, that it would starve our adversary. Now we had repealed the embargo, except as to Great Britain and France; we had come down on our knees, and thus broke our fall. It was said to our merchants, you shall not go to Great Britain; but you shall go to St. Bartholomews, and thence Great Britain may get your produce. As soon as you said that, sir, you abandoned the principle on which the embargo went. It was no longer an embargo to that purpose for which it was designed. But it was better for our own interests to have permitted direct exportation, as I shall prove; for it is a material consideration with Great Britain to have her shipping employed. If we had exported our produce immediately from this country to Great Britain, I see very plainly that British shipping would not have been employed; but as it was, in striving to affect, and perhaps injure Great Britain, we gave employment to her seamen and ships which she would not otherwise have had. But I say that the principle of the embargo was completely abandoned as soon as Congress consented to give vent to the productions of the country by a partial repeal of the embargo. This measure was adopted on the ground that Great Britain stood so much in need of our produce and raw materials that she could not live without them; and the moment that we repealed it in this manner, the embargo was destroyed. It looked well to have the embargo continued as to Great Britain and France, because it saved appearances. I do not know that the Government was to blame. In the same letter of Mr. Canning to which I have alluded, there is an expression, the import of which plainly is, that if the British Government could restore friendly relations between the two countries without appearing to deprecate the embargo as a measure of dreadful hostility, she would have been very willing to have treated with you. If the embargo had remained to this day, would you not have remained without a step being taken? But we did repeal the embargo, notwithstanding the name which was left, so much that it could not be supposed by anybody to operate on Great Britain so as to be injurious to her. Those who saved appearances by a partial repeal of the embargo, granted what she wanted in this respect.

When these three impediments were removed, and by our Government too, when the door was fairly opened, Great Britain walked in and offered to the President of the United States that, since we had done all that she could reasonably desire, and we did nothing more, she was willing to do all that we could reasonably desire. It is for the promptitude and frankness with which the President met the late overture that I thank him most cordially for my country. I approve it most heartily. When Secretary of State, he satisfied me that when he wanted to keep off accommodation, no man was more competent; for instance, when reparation was offered in London, and our Government had as lief have taken poison as accepted it. I know that the President of the United States, in the course of diplomatic discussion, could have produced delay in such a manner that no one could well have decided what prevented the arrangement from coming to a happy conclusion. But he chose, when he came into power, to dispel that darkness which the Administration of his predecessor had spread around. He acted with promptitude and frankness, and merits the gratitude of the nation for it, and it is the duty of the House of Representatives to give their approbation of that act. And I am willing to join in it, not because I am in the habit of pouring out the incense of adulation—for I will tell gentlemen very frankly, that if any one who is so averse to praise, were to blame the President for his conduct relating to the resistance to the laws in Pennsylvania, I would join him; but whilst I express my disapprobation that he has not repressed rebellion, that he has not detailed the causes out of which it grew, and the manner in which it was composed, I must express approbation of his conduct in relation to the subject now before us. I must, indeed, regret that the President has not even submitted it to the consideration of Congress, when there was a rebellion, in the heart of the Government, a rebellion against the judicial authority of the United States. I shall not make a motion to express my disapprobation; but if other gentlemen did, I might vote for it.

A colleague of mine (Mr. FISK) yesterday undertook to instruct us by reading part of the speech of a British nobleman, instead of listening to the dictates of his own judgment. As to this same Lord Grenville, I have a word or two to say. Perhaps my colleague does not know that in Great Britain they understand the game of ins and outs as well as here; that there, as well as here, men have one set of political connexions to-day, and a new set of political connexions and principles to-morrow. But the little knowledge which I possess of British corruption (I am sure I shall be applauded for that word) enables me to say that there are men in Great Britain who do not practise what they think, who make speeches for the mere purpose of putting the ins out, and themselves in. And though I would not put Lord Grenville, my worthy friend's friend, on his trial here; yet, since he is brought in, I choose to pay my respects to him. You have heard me read the note attached to the treaty. Would you believe, after hearing his speech, that this same Lord Grenville was one of the British ministry who pledged the British nation by that note to the Orders in Council which were subsequently issued, in failure of the conditions stated? And this man is to be appealed to as authority that the offer of Mr. Pinkney in relation to the embargo was really fair, and such as the Government should have consented to! Will the gentleman go the whole length with his British friend? He says that when the offer to repeal the embargo was made, then the Orders in Council ought to have been rescinded. In the opinion of Lord Grenville, the Orders in Council only became unlawful when the British Government refused the offer of the American Minister. Is it fair to bring the arguments of the British minority to prove that the American majority are right? It might be right if it would not cut both ways. How would it operate? I am a Representative of 33,000 souls, a situation which I feel as honorable as to be a British peer, and, therefore, am on an equality with a member of the British House of Lords. I have said that the Orders in Council were fairly justifiable. Now, suppose that a British subject were to quote my argument as evidence that they were lawful—

I have no doubt that Lord Grenville would make a pretty speech on the occasion. And this shows the absurdity of quoting arguments used by the minority there, as decisive on the subject of measures which it is a part of their plan to deery.

I think, after this very fair exposition, there can be no doubt in this House that there is a great merit which much attach somewhere or to somebody, in bringing us to this blaze of light from that scene of utter darkness, in which we groped so long. I cannot reconcile it to my mind to give credit for it to any one but the President of the United States. It is not the embargo which has done it, or the embargo might have a sort of posthumous merit, the merit of doing that when dead which it could not accomplish whilst living. As to the non-intercourse, no body ever dreamt that the non-intercourse would have more power than the embargo, which I think I have shown to have had none. It is, therefore, owing and solely due to the proper temper with which the overtures were received. And it is now in proof before us, as I have always said, and contended, that nothing was wanting but a proper spirit of conciliation and fair and honorable dealing on the part of this country, to bring to a happy issue all the fictitious differences between this country and Great Britain; and that is now acknowledged to be true, for saying which I was so much censured—censured because, in saying it, it was supposed that I had an opinion of the British Government which did not become an American citizen. Let me be understood that I have not that confidence, that I am no advocate of Great Britain. A mutual dependence of interests one upon the other rendered it a point of interest for Great Britain to be in a state of amity with us when it could be done consistently with a sense of her own right. But I praise not Great Britain, nor give her any eulogy for it. It is her interest which actuated her; and on this account alone should this country have produced this state of things long ago. It long ago might have been produced, if we had not made a fictitious quarrel with Great Britain, which gave much room for political dispute, and has been the means of dreadful destruction to the United States. I wish not to discuss the point whether this or that party is entitled to the credit of the present state of things. I do not see the necessity of it. But if it were necessary, I might ask, at the last session who was it in their speeches that endeavored to soften the public temper, to bring it down to a medium which was necessary to induce the British Government to meet us? You remember, sir, that there was in this House a party, who, revolving round the Executive, derived light from him; who cried out "war! give us war!" Who, when they found they could not get us into war, begged for letters of marque and reprisal; and who, when they could get neither, wished for a continuance of the embargo. No, said others—(and I believe, sir, that you yourself had some share in it,) the people began to open their eyes, and some gentlemen became convinced that if they did not stop their course the people would stop them from coming here again. There were protesters, Republicans, and a little handful of we poor Federalists, few in number at that time, who formed a class, No. 2, which would not have war, letters of marque and reprisal, or embargo. There were some who were as well content as any of us not to do anything in point of substance, but who wished to take to themselves the credit of proposing a substitute; and they certainly took as mild a one as could be expected. We had heretofore endeavored to coerce Great Britain by non-exportation; but now we tried another novelty. It was non-exportation before; and we changed it for non-importation. What coercive or other effect was expected from that, I never heard. The men revolving round the Executive came down to the measure because the House would not go higher; it was the most hostile measure they could get, as they avowed as their reason for voting for it. This is the true exposition of the whole thing. Would you, after this, say that the embargo brought about the accommodation? The Gog and Magog of the party were shivered to pieces. The non-intercourse law was not a measure of the Administration, but a measure of compromise between the hot and the cool. And, after all our troubles, we may be permitted to laugh a little that our relief was brought about by this poor non-intercourse law. The President has made good use of it. Therefore, I say, let praise be given to the Executive for the promptitude and frankness with which he has acted.

I would now, sir, as we are arrived at an era in which we have a right to look forward to the same prosperity and happiness for which our country was distinguished under the Administration of WASHINGTON and ADAMS—the two first years of Mr. Adams's Administration I mean—I would hope for an abandonment of political intolerance, which misguides men themselves and by which they misguide others; that the contentious spirit of party, which has made so many blind to their own errors, will cease; and that from this time a new party, a party bent upon promotion of the prosperity of the country and the preservation of the public liberty may succeed—a party of the country and the Constitution. Both parties have run wild so long, that it is perhaps fair to say, as it is certainly true, that neither is exactly right.

"When public contest lasts so very long,
No side is wholly right or wholly wrong."

Let us return to the steady sober principles of the WASHINGTON Administration, as well as to our foreign relations as to our internal concerns. We had enough of Mr. Adams's system of sedition laws, &c., during his Administration, and enough of the palaver of philosophy since. I wish to have the golden age of WASHINGTON revived. It was then usual to speak freely. Let us do it now.

As it regards the motion now before the House, let us take into view this consideration, and I recommend it to the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McKEE;) that if General WASHINGTON issued a proclamation not authorized by any existing law, but so much calculated to promote the public prosperity and to call for public consent, so in the present case did President Madison; for there is no law authorizing the proclamation which he issued, and which I so much approve. It is not expressly warranted by law, but it is in the spirit of the law. Suppose that a vessel should sail from the United States, after the 1st of June, to Great Britain, and it should be found, on a legal investigation, that the proclamation had not suspended the law, not being issued in conformity thereto, and the merchant was to be prosecuted for a breach of law—could that proclamation be pleaded in bar of recovery? Certainly not; because it was only authorized to be issued after the revocation. It is not only necessary that the proclamation should be approved, but that a law should be passed giving validity to it. We should not, therefore, be content with merely giving this approbation, but should go on and pass laws upon it. If we last Winter got upon some notion of passing abstract propositions against which I voted, I can show that I preserve consistency in voting for this, by showing, as I have done, that a law may be founded on it.

In every point of view, whether gentlemen on one hand are willing to do justice to the Executive, or to heal the wounds of party which have bled so long; if they are willing with the returning prosperity of the country to restore to social intercourse that harmony without which life and liberty are of so little value, let us go with them. Let them not be so frightened by our praise as to draw back, or how are we ever to approach them? I entreat gentlemen, therefore, not to be afraid of us. We are an honorable party, not guided by party zeal alone. When the Administration deserve credit, we will give it to them; and when they deserve censure, I believe gentlemen will give us the credit of not being too sparing of it.

Another member, to wit: JOHN CLOPTON, from Virginia, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. LOVE presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Potomac Company, praying that an act may be passed authorizing a lottery in the District of Columbia, to raise the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be applied to the improvement of the navigation of the Potomac and Shenandoah rivers.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to continue in force "An act declaring the assent of Congress to a certain act of the State of South Carolina, passed the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and four; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. McKIM presented a petition of the sugar refiners in the city of Baltimore, to the same effect with petitions from sundry other sugar refiners within the United States, before stated.

Mr. MONTGOMERY presented a petition of sundry distillers and other citizens of the United States, praying that the importation of foreign spirits distilled from grain may be wholly prohibited, and that additional duties may be imposed on the introduction into the United States of foreign spirits distilled from other materials.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, compensation ought to be made to Major Zebulon M. Pike, and his companions, for their services in exploring the Mississippi river, and in their late expedition to the sources of the Osage, Arkansas, and La-Platte rivers, together with their tour through New Spain; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. ROBERT, BROWN, Mr. GHOLSON, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. KENNEDY, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report, prepared in obedience to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department;" which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. POINDEXTER observed that, in consequence of the frequent and wanton exercise of the power given by the ordinance of 1787 to the Territorial Governors, to prorogue and dissolve the General Assembly, he thought it his duty to present a resolution. He said he did not expect it would be acted on, but he thought it his duty not to let a session pass over without attempting to expunge this foul stain from the statute book of the United States. The following is the resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the ordinance for the government of the several Territories of the United States, as empowers the Governors thereof to prorogue and dissolve the Legislature.

Mr. TROUP had no objection to the appointment of a committee, but he trusted that the committee when appointed would take especial care not to interfere despotically with the articles of cession, or any articles of agreement between the State of Georgia and the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER said the gentleman certainly could not wish to retain this principle, which had been borrowed from the worst features of monarchical government of Great Britain. When a bill was reported, if the gentleman thought the people of the Mississippi Territory were exclusively to be ruled in this manner because that Territory had once been attached to the State of Georgia, he might prevail upon the House to except that Territory from the benefits to be granted to other Territories.

Mr. TROUP said it would be recollected that this question had been stirred at the last session, debated at considerable length, and that the same proposition as this was rejected by a respectable majority as he believed, and exclusively on the ground of such a repeal being an interference in the articles of compact between Georgia and the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER wished to state the fact, that it had then been postponed indefinitely, not rejected, by a majority of only three votes.

The resolution was agreed to—57 to 32; and Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. TROUP, Mr. GOLD, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. MCKEE, were appointed a committee pursuant thereto.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

On motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON the unfinished business of yesterday (Mr. RANDOLPH'S motion for a vote of approbation) was ordered to lie on the table, 54 to 41; and,

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BASSETT in the Chair, on the bill continuing in force and amending the non-intercourse law. A motion was made by Mr. GARDENIER that the Committee rise for the purpose of recommending the bill, to amend it so as wholly to repeal the non-intercourse law, and re-enact that part of the system which it was judged would be proper to retain, in a separate bill.

Messrs. QUINCY, LIVERMORE, and GARDENIER supported the motion.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said that the whole system comprised in this bill was proper in itself, and that there was no such difficulty as had been described. All the provisions respecting our foreign relations, except the non-intercourse act, were continued in it, and three of the sections of that act were contemplated to be repealed by this. All construction of the law is confined to the sections of this bill, and the sections of the non-intercourse law revived by it, which may as well be re-enacted by this law, if the principle be correct, as to have them introduced at length into the bill itself.

It will be seen that this bill contains two great features. 1. Non-intercourse with France, subject to the provisions of the eleventh section of the non-intercourse act, which authorizes the suspension of the law. 2. The exclusion of the armed ships of both France and England.*

The first is the result of our own sense of consistency, dignity, and propriety of conduct. Is it proper to continue the course which has been commenced? Will you prohibit intercourse with France till she, like Great Britain, either does us justice, or gives us authoritative assurances that she will do it? I am glad that it is in our power to discuss this question coolly and deliberately; that there is nothing like a positive obligation on the Government to do this act. The course we are asked by this bill to take, implies an expectation that France will do us justice. If so, trade with her will be renewed. Until then, we shall have no trade whatever with France. The language held out at the last session, until we hear from France, as we have heard from England, shall be continued towards the former; and when an answer is received, such ulterior measures will be pursued by the Government as shall be consistent with the honor and rights of the nation. I am glad that it was not required by Great Britain, as in the obnoxious note attached to the treaty, or promised on the part of the United States, as proposed through our Minister at London, heretofore, to resist France; that we are not, on the one hand, subject to menace, or on the other, under the obligation of a promise; but that we will do thus because we conceive it to be right. We display to Great Britain, by the prohibition of intercourse with France, a determination to manifest impartiality in our conduct, notwithstanding all the clamors raised at the last session, and repeated at this, that we are unwilling so to act. It was said yesterday, that we had shown a willingness to submit to the Berlin decree; that we had not evinced a disposition to resist it, and that therefore the Orders in Council were justified. I deny that our non-resistance would have been a justification of them. But how often must this charge be exposed and refuted? We did resist the decree, not in the way required by Great Britain. We did not send a hostage by way of surety, to be immolated at the caprice of a foreign Power. We did not give "security to His Majesty;" but we did manifest a disposition to maintain our rights, and resist the usurpation of Bonaparte. Let the gentleman recur to the subject, and he will find that, immediately on issuing the Berlin decree, a letter was written by General Armstrong to one of the Ministers to whose care the execution of the decree was confided, (the Minister of Foreign Affairs being then at Berlin with Bonaparte,) and it was answered, the operation of the decree would not interfere with the treaty between the United States and France, and the practice conformed to the profession, till the famous or infamous case of the vessel wrecked at Morlaix. We then had, by our conduct, manifested a disposition to resist the Berlin decree. But, sir, I rejoice that we are not bound by the engagements of the American Government, or the requisition of Great Britain to pursue this course, though I conceive that our character, honor, and rights, require of us to persevere in the system commenced, and that there is an implied engagement similar to a debt of honor, which, although we are not legally, we are morally, bound to discharge; that we will not renew intercourse with her while her decrees are in force any more than we would with England while her Orders in Council were in existence. We did not desire, at the last session, to go to war with England or France, as was stated the other day; and, by the by, I will now notice a suggestion of a gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER) that it was the wish of the ex-President to involve the country in war, and that the proclamation was issued for that purpose. I appeal to his own recollection, that there never was and never will be a more unequivocal manifestation of a disposition to preserve peace than was made by that proclamation. On that occasion, when the news of the outrage arrived, one general burst of indignation was heard from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, all vying who should express the greatest indignation. Then was the moment for war, if enmity to Britain had existed in the bosom of the Executive. If Congress had been convened, and a recommendation to that effect had been made by the President, unless gentlemen are more inconsistent than it is possible to conceive of, a vote of war would have been immediately obtained. For, even after Congress met in October, and such communications had been received from the President as were calculated to allay the fermentation of our minds, some of the members were for making a descent on Jamaica, and marching to Canada; they thought it a fair opportunity for taking possession of the Northern provinces. And this alone should prove to the gentleman his mistake.

To return to the subject before the House—I say that the course now recommended by this bill is consistent with that of the last Winter, which was not war, but the reverse. There was a proposition to go to war on demand and refusal of either Power to rescind its decrees; but it was not the object of the mover of that amendment to go to war with Great Britain or France immediately, but, after demand made and refusal on the part of His Britannic Majesty, or the Emperor of France to withdraw his decrees, to authorize the President of the United States to grant letters of marque and reprisal. And strange it is, that, by some curious manœuvre of legislation, the very gentlemen who are complaining against us for manifesting this disposition of hostility against Great Britain, voted for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS) for striking out the condition on which letters of marque and reprisal should be issued, thus making it a proposition for immediate war. [Here Mr. J. referred to the Journal, page 443.] This bill I conceive to comprise the course proper for us to pursue. I would say to France that intercourse shall be prohibited with her unless she rescinded her decrees violating our neutral rights; and, in the event of her refusal so to do, I would refer the question back to the American people to decide what course they will then take.

The second proposition contained in this bill is to exclude the armed ships of both nations. This is a question on which there is a great diversity of opinion, and which, on account of its delicacy, it is extremely difficult to treat with that minuteness which its importance demands. I will endeavor, consistently with the feelings that are predominant in my breast, with the hope that the fortunate commencement of the late accommodation will eventuate happily, and that the rights and honor of each nation will be respected, to discuss this question calmly and without prejudice. I subscribe most heartily to the doctrine advanced yesterday, that the exclusion of the armed vessels of one belligerent, and the admission of those of the other, is an act of hostility. The principle is perfectly orthodox, and by the way, it does me pleasure to give the gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDENIER) credit for any orthodox doctrine he may happen to advance. He, with great propriety, illustrated his position by likening it to the case of two armies on the frontier of the United States contending with each other, and one being suffered to encamp within our limits while the other was excluded. So with regard to armed vessels. If the armed vessels of any one nation engage at sea with those of another, and fly to our port as a place of refuge, and we receive them while the others are excluded, it is an abandonment of our neutrality. We cannot permit a foreign nation to carry on war within our territorial limits, or take refuge from the attacks of superior force, and enjoy any immunities which are not equally extended to both belligerents, without such abandonment.

But it may be said, why did the United States assume such an attitude in relation to Great Britain? It is admitted that the proclamation was a hostile act. And why, sir, would you do away that measure caused by a series of hostile acts, which to this day have not been atoned? The proclamation was a hostile act preceded by one more hostile, which I am pleased to see placed in a train of settlement as it has been, because the spirit in which the offer of reparation was received, proves to the world that this country will be satisfied with even half justice. Our Government has not insisted on the punishment of the offender, or even that he shall be stripped of the honors with which he is clothed; and thus they have manifested that they are willing to accept of half reparation. It being conceded by gentlemen in opposition, that the exclusion of the armed ships of one belligerent, and the admission of those of another, would be war against the former, I wish to ask the House is it proper now to take that attitude towards France? Perhaps it may be said that we were last Winter in favor of taking that step. I answer this as I did before, that it was only after demand made, and refusal by France, that we would have consented to make war. I think it is not now proper, and for the same reason that I thought so at the last session of Congress; because we have not, since that time, received any information from France to enable us to determine what course will be pursued by the Government of that country in relation to the United States, and particularly consequent on the arrangement with Great Britain. We have a right to expect an adjustment with France when we recur to the Milan decree, which declares that, in the event of Great Britain receding from her Orders in Council, and unjust decrees, violating the rights of neutral commerce, that Bonaparte will follow the example. And, when we consider the effect which a settlement of our differences with France will have on our trade, and that we have nothing to expect from war but the loss of all our commerce on the Continent, I think we ought not to plunge the nation rashly into it without affording to our Government an opportunity of knowing what determination has been made by the French Government in consequence of the antecedent measures of this. We are informed by the Message of the President that a vessel has been dispatched with communications to France; and, of course, it is naturally to be expected, and such, I presume, is the expectation of the Executive, that while he is sending the harbinger of peace and accommodation, we will not commit an act of hostility by discriminating between the armed vessels of the two nations, and especially when we know there has been a recent manifestation of an amicable disposition on the part of France. I refer to the permission to embargoed vessels to depart from French ports, and to the relaxation by the King of Holland of his decrees; for, though independent of France in name and form, he is not so in fact. Now, I ask whether it be proper, in a crisis like this, unauthorized by any information from France, at a time too when we look for communications from that country of a favorable complexion, to adopt any measure leading to war? What are the merchants to expect from a war with France? They are anxious for a trade to that country. It is there that they find a profitable market for colonial produce, tobacco, &c., it is upon the Continent of Europe alone, all the countries of which are either under the dominion of France, or satellites of Bonaparte, or in a state of war with him, that we find a market for these articles, and for flour, fish, &c. It is a notorious fact, that, notwithstanding the repeal of the embargo, and authorizing the departure of vessels for British ports, tobacco is only three or four dollars per hundred, whereas, when the continental market is open, it is twice that price.

But, sir, for what purpose do gentlemen wish this course to be pursued? Great Britain does not require it; it is not made a condition in the arrangement of Mr. Erskine. No mention is made of it. And is it necessary to do an act of courtesy to that nation which will involve us in war with another? Is it necessary, after the many proofs we have given of a disposition to accommodate with Great Britain, to compromise our peace and the interests of the country by giving a double assurance of it? I say that Great Britain does not ask or require it—it has not been required at any time. All that they have asked, is, to be placed on a footing of equal restrictions. Mr. Erskine says, in the correspondence, that the overture which he was instructed to make, was grounded on the knowledge that the United States were about to pass certain laws placing the belligerents in a state of equality, and not on the repeal of the embargo, as was yesterday said by a gentleman from New York. The rejection of the offer made through Mr. Pinkney by our Government last Summer was attributed by the gentleman (Mr. GARDENIER) to the enactment of the embargo laws; but, the reason assigned for the overture by Great Britain, was, the passage of laws which enforced the embargo, excluded British vessels, and interdicted commercial intercourse with her; for, such was the course we had then resolved upon. The gentleman has forgotten that we are three or four thousand miles separated from Great Britain; that they had not a knowledge of our proceedings, whereby we retraced our steps, and shrunk from the ground we had taken—proceedings which probably had not taken place at the time their messenger left England. For, after determining to enforce the embargo, (of which determination they had knowledge;) after passing a law for that purpose, which, I acknowledge, strained the Constitution to its greatest capacity; we turned about, without a pretext for it, and abandoned the embargo. All that was asked by Great Britain—all the ground on which the overture was made—was, that both the belligerents should be placed on an equality.

But, it may be said, that our re-enacting a part of this law, which otherwise expires by its own limitation at the end of the present session of Congress, will have an unfavorable aspect, and that it will display a hostile front towards her. This is an inference directly in the teeth of the fact; for, the most conclusive proof of that spirit of accommodation was contained in the proclamation of the President of the United States, which, I admit, was beyond the letter of the law, but was conceived in the spirit of it, and was evidence, therefore, as strong as proof of holy writ, that the Government of this country was desirous of meeting frankly, and with promptitude, any overtures tending to an honorable accommodation of our differences. By the by, the admission in form of French vessels within the waters under the jurisdiction of the United States is not much in substance; for, of the few vessels which have within a few years escaped the British fleets, and arrived within our waters, one was burned by the British, within our jurisdictional limits, on the coast of North Carolina. If proof be wanting of the spirit of the people in relation to the late accommodation, it may be found in their approbation of it, by the proposed meetings, on the 10th of June, in the newspapers, and in the effusions of our Congressional and pulpit orators; for, it was only last Sunday, that the minister officiating in this department offered up thanks for our release from the restrictions on our commerce, &c. I do not believe that gentlemen are correct in supposing that there is any difference of opinion on this subject. There may be a few individuals, American in name, but not in sentiment, who were opposed to the accommodation. We are a generous nation, sir, and soon forget injuries inflicted on us. We remember the good and forget the evil, and, like old friends who have fallen out in consequence of some bickerings, whether founded in reason or not, we are unwilling to permit the gratification with which we receive a renewal of friendship to be alloyed by any recollection of former differences. Although we feel this sensation—an honorable and rational feeling, characteristic of the American people—I hope in God that we shall beware not to abuse it by such extravaant joy. I should then regret it as a triumph, not of American principles, but of feeling over principle, prostrated by it.

I ask, why should we discriminate? I am sorry, that, in the investigation of this point, I am compelled to turn over a leaf on which, for one, I should rejoice that a tear could fall, and blot out the record forever. But, when gentlemen are desirous of changing the relations of this country, so as to bring us in hostility with France and alliance with Britain, it is necessary that we should look at the sins of each, to remember them, if only to enable us to preserve the neutral station which we ought to occupy. It is a delicate and painful task. I have no feeling adverse to friendship for Great Britain. I am willing to "be to her faults a little blind, and to her virtues very kind." But, when gentlemen wish us to discriminate, it is proper to inquire, what has France and what has Great Britain done? I shall not dwell long on the subject, because, if I do, I may be considered as contravening an opinion, which I most religiously entertain, that our differences should be forgotten, and that the two nations should be united in the bonds of friendship. But, notwithstanding all this, justice must not be strangled by feeling. What has France done? Plundered our property, to an enormous amount; burnt our vessels on the high seas; blockaded all the world, without any vessels of war to blockade any part of it; passed a decree which condemns all our vessels spoken by British cruisers; "consecrated the liberty of the seas" by adding confiscation to shipwreck, in the case of the vessel stranded at Morlaix; and imprisoned our seamen, after driving them into the interior. We have, therefore, just cause of war against her. What has Great Britain done? I will "nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice." Sir, she has impressed and detained three thousand, and more, of our seamen; cut off the colonial trade under aggravated circumstances, which induced the mercantile interest (and particularly from that part of the country mostly opposed to the Administration) to remonstrate, and pledge their lives and sacred honor to resist the tyranny; she has blockaded a coast of a thousand miles in extent, without stationing any vessels which could have annoyed the entrance of the principal waters; she has cut off our trade from port to port belonging to the same or two nations, one or both of which were her enemies; she has committed the murder of a citizen (Pierce) within your waters; one of her officers has claimed jurisdiction within reach of his buoys in the harbor of New York; she has burnt the Impetueux on the shore of North Carolina, which in fact was an act of war waged in our territory against her enemy, which we could not, consistently with our relations with both nations, pass over with impunity; add to this black catalogue the outrage of Love and the affair of the Chesapeake, which (thank God) we may now forget; as likewise the late case of the Melampus firing on one of our vessels, and giving as an excuse that she thought it was a French privateer, which, had it been the case, would have been no excuse, because, being within our jurisdictional limits, she would have been exempt from attack.

The affair of the Chesapeake, and the Orders in Council, are settled, or at least promised to be settled, and I confide in the promise. I am unwilling to enter with gentlemen into the dispute to what cause the removal of the Orders in Council is to be attributed; I regret that the inquiry has been forced upon us; I receive it now regardless of the motive. God be praised for so much! but there are a long catalogue of injuries existing antecedent to these, for which I hope we shall receive full and entire satisfaction. Are they not equal to the actual injuries inflicted by France? If the Emperor of France were to blockade the moon, by a decree issued from Vienna, Berlin, or elsewhere, merely to let posterity know that he was in character of a conqueror at such a place, it is but (as his decrees were called by a gentleman from Maryland, Mr. KEY) mere brutum fulmen. I speak of their actual effects upon us. France, without a single ship that can float on the ocean without skulking from port to port, with all her decrees, has not done us more injury than Great Britain, before she issued any orders. The injuries which the latter has done to us, independent of this species, are great and numerous. They grind the fortunes and happiness of many to atoms—they touch the feelings and lives of thousands, till many die broken-hearted under the lash, are cast into the ocean, swallowed by the waves, food for the sharks, and are heard of no more, except in the wretched hovels of their widows and orphans who depended upon them for bread. It might as well be asked of Britain to surrender up all the seamen on board her vessels, as to ask of us to discriminate between her armed vessels and those of France. It would be answered to such a request on our part: No; the Governments are about to treat; let them enter into such friendly stipulation as may be conducive to the honor and interest of both.

Great Britain does not ask of us an exclusive admission into our ports, but only an equal attitude to be preserved. This is the language of Mr. Erskine here, of the British Government, of the Ministerial orators on the floor of Parliament and of Mr. Canning in his letter on the subject of the affair of the Chesapeake. He says that to exclude the armed vessels of either belligerent is a hostile act, but that to exclude all is not. I am willing to exclude them both; and am pleased with a proposition, made in the other branch of the Legislature, for a permanent exclusion of armed vessels from our waters. I will state a case. Suppose, during a war with the savages on our frontier, after they had invaded our territory and murdered our citizens, a party of our hardy backwoodsmen were to pursue them, and they were to retreat within the Spanish lines. Would it be possible to arrest our brave countrymen in an attempt to kill the enemy whilst they were carrying off some of their relatives prisoners, and scalps of others whom they had murdered? Would the charged rifle and tomahawk fall harmless at their feet the moment the line was crossed over? No, sir; it is not in human nature to be arrested by artificial or nominal boundaries in the heat of action. So in the case of an engagement on our coast. The vessel of one belligerent engages that of another and kills many of her seamen; but, finding at length that she is inferior in force, retreats within our limits. Do you suppose, before the party which has suffered so much pursues her, that they will stop to take an observation and calculate the latitude and longitude? No, sir; blood will have blood, and there will be no end of it if you allow your waters to be a place of refuge for armed vessels. Let us then exclude all. If we admit them, and they commit offences against national law or our own statutes, within our waters, can we check them? Yes, call out our militia with rifles and tomahawks to attack a 74 gun ship. We might as well attempt to check the howling winds, the war of elements, the inundations of the Ohio, or the waters of the Mississippi. As well say, as Joshua did of old, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou moon in the valley of Ajalon," as to attempt to eject a 74 gun ship by militia; and it seems to be determined that we shall not have an effectual naval force. I confess, sir, though heretofore somewhat of a navy man, I am almost a convert to the doctrine of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Macon,) that it is the rotten part of our system; and, that if some salutary regulation like this were adopted, we should not have much occasion for frigates in time of peace. If we have war and are attacked, I would be armed at all points; I would fight the shark at sea and the tiger on the land. But in peace I know of no better regulation than to exclude all armed vessels, except such as are admitted by express stipulation. And it appears to me to be for the interest of Great Britain to exclude them, because she has ports near us, and it was the ground on which Great Britain sent instructions to her Minister to negotiate. Suppose Joseph Bonaparte obtains peaceable possession of Spain, and that, in consequence of that event, a contest should arise between him and Great Britain about the Spanish possessions in South America. Would it not be a most material object with Great Britain to prevent the vessels of Spain, belonging then to her enemy, from taking refuge in our ports? Certainly it would. And this idea is the more striking, when we reflect on the possibility of a war carried on in that manner between those Powers in the adjacent colonies of America. Great Britain views the exclusion of vessels of war belonging to her, whilst others are admitted, as an evidence of hostility; the gentleman from New York urged the argument; and Mr Rose considered it so hostile as to preclude all negotiation till removed. If then it was considered by Great Britain an act of so hostile a character as to prevent accommodation, a case which she acknowledged to be "decidedly a wrong act," how may not this language be reverberated by Mr. Champagny, if this discrimination be made between Great Britain and France? You have by finesse, as gentlemen say, done away the interdic-tory proclamation. Great Britain, in consequence of the equality produced, has thought proper to make that reparation which she declares she was at all times willing to make. Whilst this language is held by Great Britain, you ask of France to do us the justice under the operation of a measure which Great Britain declared the honor of that nation forbade her to do, when enforced against her.

And it may be said, that the exclusion of British vessels argues a want of confidence in Great Britain. I have no such want; I confide in her following up the course she has commenced till all difficulties are accommodated, because it is her interest to do so.

If our ports are open at all times to foreign armed vessels, it must unquestionably be oftentimes dangerous to us. Is it necessary to refer to examples in support of this? The case of Copenhagen is very recent and conclusive. If vessels of war of foreign nations may enter your ports without limitation as to number and time, the first evidence of hostile intention after they have entered, may be the conflagration of your towns, the destruction of their wealth, and the ruin of the inhabitants.

A gentleman from New York (Mr GARDNER) yesterday claimed credit for himself and his friends for having softened the public temper. Let them have it; I am unwilling to dispute their claim; let them have the quiet enjoyment of it. But let us restrain those gentlemen, and soften the public laws, so as to permit them to wear a hostile front, till we are called upon to assume it by a regard to our own honor. Let us wait the result of the appeal to France, or the return of the vessel dispatched. This is the course I proposed to pursue at the last session, and which I wish to pursue now. And in what I say I am only expressing my opinion. I disclaim any title to being the "oracular organ" of the Administration. I am a Representative of a portion of the American people, and unwilling to have my rights invaded by an insinuation of that kind. It affords me pleasure at all times to agree with those with whom I have not always the honor to act. I hope, however, that I shall always possess independence of mind sufficient to act for myself, regardless of that consideration, and I wish it to be understood distinctly that the insinuation is incorrect; and that no repetition of it will prevent me from doing what I believe to be my duty. Denouncing a measure, as fostering "the cant of modern philosophy," will not make me abandon what I conceive interest, impartiality, and respect for our own character, require of us.

I have done, sir. I have made this representation to do away any imputation of hostility towards Great Britain. I deduce my inferences from documents and facts in the possession of the House and the nation; and whether we are expected or required to pursue this course or not, I believe it to be such as will promote the best interests of the country, and will preserve us in peace as long as it is attainable, or unite and justify us in war, if that must be the resort.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. RANDOLPH commenced a speech, but a question arising on a point of order, and some irritation being caused by it, after a reversal by the Committee of the Chairman's decision on the point of order, the Committee rose and reported progress, and at three o'clock the House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, June 5.

Two other members, to wit: EZRA WHITMAN, from Massachusetts, and RICHARD WINN, from South Carolina, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate having been informed of the death of the Honorable FRANCIS MALBONE, one of the Senators from the State of Rhode Island, have directed the same to be communicated to this House.

On motion of Mr. POTTER,

Resolved, unanimously, That this House will attend the funeral of FRANCIS MALBONE, Esquire, late a member of the Senate of the United States.

Resolved, unanimously, That this House do wear mourning on the left arm for the space of one month, in testimony of their respect for the memory of the deceased.

TUESDAY, June 6.

Another member to wit: WILSON C. NICHOLAS, from Virginia, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. BASSETT, from the joint committee appointed to inquire and report what business it is requisite should be done by Congress in their present session, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS,

Ordered, That the following petitions, to wit: Of the Common Council of Alexandria, presented on the twenty-first of November last;

Of the President and Directors of the Washington Bridge Company, presented on the ninth of December last;

Of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the City of Washington, presented on the fifteenth of December last;

Of the Commissioners of the Levy Court of Washington county, in the District of Columbia, presented on the fifteenth of December last:

Of the Presbyterian Congregation in Alexandria, presented on the tenth of January last;

Of the Episcopal Church in Alexandria, presented on the eighteenth of November last; and

Of the Washington and Alexandria Turnpike Company, presented on the twenty-second of November last; be severally referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented a memorial from the manufacturers of hats in the township of Woodbridge, in the State of New Jersey, to the same effect with a petition of the manufacturers of hats in Fredericktown, State of Maryland, presented on the twenty-fifth ultimo.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in Hagerstown, State of Maryland, to the same effect with the memorial last stated.

Ordered, That the said memorials be severally referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

A motion was made by Mr. SAWYER, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a standing committee be appointed, to be called "The Committee of Manufactures," whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all such petitions, matters, and things, touching the manufactures of the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their opinion thereon.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. NELSON,

Resolved, That the communications of the President of the United States, on the subject of the road from Cumberland, in Maryland, to the Ohio, received on the nineteenth of February, one thousand eight hundred and eight, and on the twenty-third of December last, with the accompanying documents, be referred to a select committee; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. NELSON, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. WINN, Mr. LYON, and Mr. MORROW, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. FISK presented a petition of Andrew Foster and Jacob P. Giraud, merchants of the city of New York, stating that, in the month of January last, their ship called the Clara, sailed from New York to New Orleans, and that, after her clearance, and without their knowledge, the master took on board two negro slaves, and landed the same in New Orleans, in violation of the act passed the second of March, one thousand eight hundred and seven, and that, in consequence thereof, the said vessel has been libelled and condemned as forfeited to the United States, and praying a restitution of the same, or such provision in the case as, to the wisdom of Congress, shall seem just and proper.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, the petitions of the President and Directors of the Commercial Company of the city of Washington, and of the President and Directors of the Bank of Alexandria, presented on the eighth and twentieth of December last, were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

A motion was made by Mr. LEWIS, that the House do now proceed to the consideration of a resolution proposed by him on the thirty-first ultimo, relative to a removal of the Military Academy from West Point to the city of Washington: And the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. HELMS, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of John Heard, presented a bill authorizing the discharge of John Heard from his imprisonment; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. HELMS, from the same committee, also presented a detailed report; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the thirty-first ultimo, presented a bill authorizing a summary mode of proceeding against marshals and their deputies who have received money by virtue of executions issued from the courts of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Secretary of War, of the sums necessary to complete the fortifications commenced or contemplated, and of the amount of any deficiency of former appropriations for this object, made in obedience to a resolution of the twenty-seventh ultimo; which was read, and referred to the committee on so much of the President's Message as relates to the Military Establishment.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to fix the time of the next meeting of Congress;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A motion was made by Mr. GARDENIER that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient that all such provisions in the several acts which relate to the laying and enforcing the embargo, and prohibiting foreign armed vessels from entering the ports and harbors of the United States, and for prohibiting intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, as ought to be kept in force, should be reduced into one act, and that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for that purpose.

And on the question that the House do proceed to the consideration of the said resolution, it was determined in the negative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the appointment of an agent for the land office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and concurred in by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to a certain act of the State of South Carolina, passed the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and four. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw tribe of Indians," and to establish a land office in the Mississippi Territory. No amendment being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. EPPEs, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt."—[This bill is reported according to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, to explain the act authorizing the borrowing of money, if necessary, to discharge the annual instalments of the public debt.] Twice read and committed.

Mr. PITKIN, after some observations on the state of the Treasury, and the necessity of diminishing the expenses of Government, moved "That the Committee on the Naval Establishment be instructed to inquire into the expediency of selling such of the gunboats belonging to the United States as are not necessary to be employed in actual service."

On motion of Mr. MACON, Mr. PITKIN's motion was so modified as to insert the words "public armed vessels and" before the word "gunboats;" and, after a short debate between Messrs. CUTTS, DANA, LYON, RANDOLPH, MACON, and TROUP, agreed to—ayes 70.

On motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON the Committee of the Whole was discharged, unanimously—yeas 130—from the further consideration of the bill for amending and continuing in force the non-intercourse, &c., and it was recommitted for amendment.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

A motion was made by Mr. GARDENIER that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to intercourse with foreign nations, be instructed to bring in a bill to reduce into one act all such provisions of the several acts which relate to the laying and enforcing the embargo, and for prohibiting foreign armed vessels from entering the ports and harbors of the United States, and for prohibiting intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, as ought to be kept in force.

And, on the question that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the said resolution, it was determined in the negative—yeas 59, nays 66, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7.

Another member, to wit: ERASTUS ROOT, from New York, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, the petitions of Samuel Carson, of Alexandria, and of sundry inhabitants of Washington county, in the District of Columbia, presented on the tenth and nineteenth of January last, were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, made a further report, in part, of such matters of business as were depending and undetermined at the close of the last session of Congress; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURWELL, from the committee appointed on that part of the Message from the President of the United States which relates "to the fortifications of our seaport towns," presented a bill making further appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States, and to erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the protection of the Northern and Western frontiers of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD presented a petition of sundry manufacturers of hemp into linen, residing in the State of Kentucky, praying that such additional duties may be imposed by law upon the importation of hemp and coarse linens from foreign countries, as will effectually encourage the manufacture of those articles within the United States, and prevent their introduction into the United States from abroad.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for defraying the expense of stationery, printing, and all other contingent expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives, during the present session of Congress; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

An engrossed bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw tribe of Indians," and to establish a land office in the Mississippi Territory, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill authorizing the appointment of an agent for the land office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to a certain act of the State of South Carolina, passed the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and four, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. LOVE having made some observations on the uncertainty with which any committee would now present business to the House until some decision was had as to the time at which Congress should adjourn, moved the following resolution, with a view to regulate the conduct of a committee of the House in preparing business:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to report what subjects referred to them it will be necessary to act on during the present session."

After some opposition from Messrs. PITKIN, SMILIE, BIBB, DANA, and BASSETT, on the ground of the propriety of shortening the session, instead of extending it, and reply by Messrs. LOVE and VAN HORN, the motion was negatived.

Mr. DANA reported a bill for the benefit of the seamen of the United States. [This bill requires the mate, and at least a majority of the mariners on board any vessel, to be citizens of the United States, in order to entitle the vessel to the benefits of a vessel of the United States; and prescribes various amendments to the navigation laws of the United States, so as to accommodate them to the proposed regulation.] Twice read and committed.

Mr. LEWIS asked (the fourth time) for the consideration of the resolution for appointing a committee to inquire into the propriety of removing the Military Academy from West Point to Washington. On the question for considering it, thirty-two gentlemen only rose in the affirmative.

Mr. LIVERMORE, with a view of limiting the business to be done during the session, moved "that no petition of a private nature shall be received by this House after Monday next, during the present session of Congress." This motion was opposed by Mr. J. G. JACKSON on the ground of inexpediency as well as unconstitutionality; for he contended that the Constitution, securing the right of the people peaceably to petition for a redress of grievances, prohibited the House from refusing to receive their petitions. It was replied by Messrs. LIVERMORE and GOLD that it might as well be urged, from the Constitution, that Congress should never adjourn while a petition or grievance could be offered to the House; that the petitions would be in fact merely laid on the table, which was the ordinary course of every day. The motion was negatived by yeas and nays—yeas 17, nays 104.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of stationery, printing, &c., for the two Houses of Congress during the present session.—Twice read and committed.

Mr. SAWYER called for the consideration of his resolution, laid on the table yesterday, for appointing a standing committee to be called the Committee of Manufactures. The House refused to consider it—yeas 35.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution proposed by Mr. BACON, on the thirty-first ultimo, to wit:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to prepare and report to this House, at their next session, a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress, for the purpose of protecting and fostering the manufactures of the United States; together with a statement of the several manufacturing establishments which have been commenced, the progress which has been made in them, and the success with which they have been attended; and such other information as in the opinion of the Secretary shall be material in exhibiting a general view of the manufactures of the United States.

Mr. BACON remarked that if the House had any disposition to do anything towards the advancement of manufactures of the country, the proper course would be to call for information on which they could act, as proposed by the resolution. For himself, however desirous to aid manufactures without information on which he could rely, he did not feel himself prepared to act.

Mr. LYON remarked that twenty years ago a similar reference of the subject had been made to the Secretary of the Treasury, and a long report had been received, on which no proceedings were had. And this would be the case with the proposed report. It was intended but to allay by procrastination the little zeal which was now displayed by some members in favor of manufactures. If nothing was done now, he said he should despair of anything ever being done to encourage manufactures; and this motion was evidently intended to give the subject the go-by.

Mr. LYON moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "at their next session," the time at which the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to report to the House a plan for the encouragement of manufactures; with a view to make the resolution obligatory on the Secretary to report during the present session.

The motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. VAN HORN moved to amend the resolution by striking out all that part requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report a plan. He stated his reasons to be that he wished not to vote upon a plan reported by any Head of Department, however great confidence he might have in them; for he thought the House were competent themselves to originate a plan. He feared too that some plan might be proposed which would injure the agricultural interest; and the weight of a recommendation from so respectable an authority he well knew. He thought that Congress could themselves, by amending and regulating duties and drawbacks, sufficiently encourage manufactures, without any specific plan being laid down.

Mr. BACON said it had long ago been decided in this Government that when a call was made for information on the Heads of Departments, it was also within the rules of correct proceeding to require the officer so called upon to prepare and digest a plan on the subject on which information was called for. And he feared no injury which would result from such a course, though much good might.

After some observations from Messrs. QUINCY and DANA, against the amendment, and Mr. BIBB in support of it, Mr. VAN HORN's motion was negatived, yeas 19.

Mr. KENNEDY having called for the yeas and nays, on the passage of the resolution—

Messrs. GARDENIER and RANDOLPH opposed it at length, on the general ground of the inexpediency of legislative interference for the encouragement of manufactures; each gentleman appearing to consider it as a pledge, or commencement of a system, for fostering manufactures by legislative acts.

Mr. QUINCY supported it, as calling for information on which the House might legislate; as they could not properly legislate on any subject without information.

The question was then taken to agree to the said resolution, as originally proposed, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 38, as follows:

THURSDAY, JUNE 8.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee appointed on the sixth instant, presented a bill in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. LOVB, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to amend the charter of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. GARDNER presented petitions from sundry manufacturers of salt, within the State of Massachusetts, praying that a duty be imposed by law on the importation of salt from foreign places.

Mr. MILNOR presented a petition from the manufacturers of hats residing in the borough of Lancaster, State of Pennsylvania, to the same effect with a petition of the manufacturers of hats in Fredericktown, State of Maryland.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Navy, upon the subject of the gunboats belonging to the Navy of the United States, made in obedience to a resolution of the 26th ultimo.—Referred to the committee appointed on that part of the Message from the President which relates to the Naval Establishments.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to suspend, for a limited time, the recruiting service," was read twice, and referred to the committee appointed on that part of the Message from the President of the United States which relates to the Military Establishment.

A communication was received from the Secretary of the Navy, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of the 26th ultimo, requiring an account of the actual expense of the equipment of gunboats, as well as a statement of their number, and the time that they have been actually employed.—Referred to the Committee on Naval Establishments.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred, during the present session, the petition of Charles Turner, Jr., and petitions from sundry inhabitants of the district of Plymouth, in the State of Massachusetts, contesting the election of William Baylies, returned to serve as one of the members of this House for the said State, made a report thereon; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

"That they have, according to order, examined the petitions and the documents which accompany them. The petitions, signed by 1,231 inhabitants of the district, state that, at an election held for a member of Congress for the district of Plymouth, in the State of Massachusetts, agreeably to the law of that State, directing the time, place, and manner, of electing members of Congress, on the first Monday of November, 1808, the whole number of votes given was 3,719, of which, agreeably to the laws of that State, 1,860 were necessary to make a choice. Of these there were given for Charles Turner, Jr., Esq., 1,443 votes, and for Charles Turner, Esq., 430 votes, amounting, if for the same candidate, to 1,873, which, being a majority of the whole number of votes, decided the election in favor of Mr. Turner, the candidate for whom the petitioners claim the seat, if he was the same person intended to be voted for, by the name and addition of Charles Turner, Jr., Esq., and Charles Turner, Esq. The petitioners assert that Charles Turner, in whose behalf they claim the seat, is the same person, for whom the votes were given, with the additions of Esq. and Junior, Esq.; and in proof of this, they assert that the laws of Massachusetts direct that the candidates voted for must be inhabitants of the district for which they may be elected, and that there was no other person legally qualified to be a candidate for a seat in Congress, inhabiting that district at the time of the election; but the same Charles Turner, for whom the petitioners claim the seat in Congress.

"These assertions of the petitioners are proposed to be supported by testimony taken after due notice given to the sitting member, which have been admitted by the Committee, as correctly taken, but not acted on with respect to the merits of the case.

"It appears that, by a law of Massachusetts, the Executive of that State decides on the election of members of Congress, and certifies the return; and that, in this instance, the selectmen, who appear, by the laws and customs of that State, to be official election officers in their respective towns or districts, had set down the votes received for Charles Turner, Jr., Esq., and for Charles Turner, Esq., separate from each other; and that the Executive, in deciding on the election, had considered the votes as given for different candidates, and that, on this supposition, none of the candidates had a majority of the whole number of votes given, and therefore directed that another election should be held in Plymouth district, on the 19th of January, 1809, at which the sitting member had the majority of votes, and, in consequence of which, he was returned to Congress, by a certificate signed by the Governor.

"Before the committee examined maturely the document, or deliberated on the merits of the case, the sitting member requested a postponement of the decision until the next session of Congress; in support of which he alleged, that it is necessary to a full and fair investigation of the case, and to acquaint himself with the facts, and to be able to produce all the evidence material to a correct decision of the question; that he was notified that his election would be contested but a short time previous to the meeting of Congress, and that he considered depositions taken without the direction of the House or their committee as taken without authority of law; that these circumstances prevented him from preparing himself in such a manner as to be able at this time to do justice to the cause, or to those who had honored him with their suffrages.

"Without examining the merits of the case, the question was taken in the committee, on the request of the sitting member, to have the decision postponed for the reasons hereinbefore stated, and carried in the affirmative."

FORTIFICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. BURWELL, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to make appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States, and to erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the protection of the Northern and Western frontiers of the United States.

Mr. BURWELL moved to fill the blank in the bill, for the sum to be appropriated, with the words one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. He said he deemed it proper to observe, that by referring to the letter of the Secretary of War, it would be found, that, of $50,000 appropriated, there remained unexpended, $185,000. The sum of $150,000, in addition to this, would make about $335,000 for the expenditure of this year. At the last session of Congress, when the situation of the country was extremely different from what it now was, only the sum of $450,000 had been appropriated; so that $150,000 would not, with the surplus remaining unexpended, be too little for the service of the remainder of this year. And on the other hand, as it was contemplated to retrench somewhat the expenses of the Military and Naval Establishments, it would not exceed the general estimate of the expense of defensive operations for the present year. From the movements among the Indians, and the resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, calling on the Government for the erection of fortifications on the Western and Northern frontier, it had been thought proper to give the President a discretionary power to erect new fortifications there. It would scarcely be necessary to say anything to the House on the propriety of finishing those already commenced. Were Congress to stop at this time, it would be very evident that they would tumble into ruins, and the money so expended would in fact be thrown away.

Mr. HOLLAND said he was certainly opposed to filling the blank in the bill with so large a sum. It was generally allowed that we should stand in need of all the money in the Treasury, and not a single cent ought to be appropriated but for matters of the first necessity. Where was the necessity of appropriating so large a sum of money to complete the works already begun? If it was necessary to complete them, he conceived that there was a way in which they could be erected at a less expense than at present, and that was, by the standing force of the country. There were upwards of six thousand troops in the service of the United States, who passed their time in perfect idleness—why had not a part of their time been devoted to this object? They certainly could not be better employed. A small portion of the time of the soldiers thus employed would conduce to their health; it would also reconcile the people to the military, and contribute to do away the odium attached to them. Mr. H. concluded by moving to fill the blank with $15,000, which, with $185,000 unexpended, would make $200,000—sufficient to expend before the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. COOK was in favor of a larger sum than that proposed. He did not know that the military were not already employed on fortifications; but, even if they were, the expenses for materials were much greater than the expense of workmanship. The best mode of preventing war, he said, would be to be prepared for it. And, if not, should our preparations be now relaxed, until we had better assurances of peace with foreign nations? He hoped not.

Mr. FIXE said he found, by the report of the Secretary of War, that the sum of $750,000 would be sufficient to cover the expenditures of the present year, and, most probably, to complete the fortifications already commenced. It was now said by the chairman of the committee, (Mr. BURWELL,) that only $150,000 were now wanted. Mr. F. said it surely would not be necessary for him to remark, that the season for carrying on the works would have expired at the commencement of the next session of Congress, and that whatever could be expended in the present year must be before the next meeting of Congress. He was in favor of the sum called for by the Secretary of War, viz: $750,000. He observed that he spoke from his own knowledge, when he said that the United States embarrassed their agents and contractors for the public works by the scanty appropriations which they made. The fortifications of New York had been commenced, as was justly observed, on an enlarged and permanent plan. What had given rise to this extension of the plan? Danger of war, certainly. And had the storm of war already subsided? And should fortifications be abandoned because there was a hope that it might blow over? He said he too believed it the best policy of the nation, in peace, to make preparations for war. It was the wish of the nation that the country should be fortified. The Secre-ary had called for $750,000 for the present year. If $150,000 only were appropriated, it would amount to an abandonment of the works already commenced: the artists employed must be discharged, and it would be almost impossible to get them together again. It did not follow, that, if $750,000 should be more than necessary, the money would be drawn from the Treasury. On the contrary, there was now an unexpended balance of $185,000, remaining in the Treasury, of the last appropriation. He moved to fill the blank with $750,000.

[At this moment a bill was received from the Senate, making an appropriation for fortifications, &c.]

The Committee rose, and the bill from the Senate was committed to the same Committee, which immediately took it into consideration.

[The bill appropriates $750,000 for completing the fortifications commenced, and erecting new fortifications on the Northern and Western frontiers.]

Mr. NEWTON moved to amend the bill by inserting the Eastern between the words Northern and and, with a view to the erection of fortifications in Virginia and elsewhere.—Negatived.

Mr. BURWELL moved to strike out seven, and insert one hundred and fifty, &c. This motion was negatived in the Committee; and the bill having been reported to the House, it was renewed.

Mr. ROSS said he was not disposed to let this question pass without expressing his ideas upon it. He was opposed to striking out the sum proposed, because he apprehended that it would not be more than adequate to the purpose for which it was designed. He apprehended that there was a wide difference between parsimony and true economy; that parsimony tended to destroy those institutions which a wise policy ought to foster; that economy was calculated to keep them in proper action. He did not suppose that it would be economy in a farmer to fence his fields but half round. If a farmer, sitting down to calculate the expense of rails, should, in order to avoid expense, appropriate only half the sum necessary, and thereby prevent the fence from being placed in good order, he apprehended that it would not be pursuing good economy, because the design for which the fence was made would not be accomplished. Parsimony in a Government, with regard to institutions for the protection of the rights and safety of a country, might destroy it. It had been said that there was no immediate occasion for fortifications to be placed in complete repair, or placed in a state of perfection, and therefore gentlemen would omit to do so at present. Would that be pursuing a prudent policy? Would a wise government adopt that policy on other occasions? What was the universal conduct in cities where a wise policy was pursued? To guard against fire, the inhabitants furnished themselves with engines, fire-buckets, and every preparation necessary for extinguishing it. Did they wait till there was occasion to use them? Would it be prudent in them so to do? He apprehended not. Apply the force of this reasoning to the observations of gentlemen against now completing the fortifications. Mr. R. said he would, on this occasion, be for placing the country in complete safety, as far as fortifications could do it; and, after fortifying every point in which the country was vulnerable, he would pray to God that we might never have occasion to make use of them, just as he would in relation to fire engines and buckets, prepared for the protection of a city from fire. It had been said that, if this money should be appropriated, it would no doubt be expended in the course of the Summer, but that a much less sum might be expended in such a way as to be productive of beneficial purposes. If these fortifications had been commenced, and the sum mentioned in the bill was necessary to complete them, he asked in what way they could be completed short of that sum? Was it intended that the work should be stopped by a contracted appropriation? Or that the appropriations should be so narrowed as to destroy the original design with which the fortifications were undertaken? Surely not; but such would be the effect of restricting the appropriation. He, therefore, hoped the House would grant the sum mentioned in the bill as the smallest possible sum that ought to be expended on this occasion.

Mr. GARDENIER said he had no fear that the House would agree to the motion, because the Government was pledged as completely as a Government could be pledged, to fortify the ports and harbors of the United States. Applications had been made to this House for that purpose for several years, but without effect, because, in a time of profound peace, and when no danger was apprehended, it had been deemed unnecessary to fortify the ports and harbors. At length, however, there had appeared a speck of war in the horizon; danger lowered around, and the Government of the United States gave its attention to this object, so vitally important. A million was appropriated the Winter before the last, and the Government was not content merely with appropriating for fortifications; but that the seaport towns and harbors might be effectually defended, that they might have the benefit of all that which experience sanctioned as safe, and that which theory seemed to propose as much better than the other, there was a large sum of money appropriated for gunboats, not for the purpose of encouraging the Navy of the United States, but for the protection of the ports and harbors of the United States; to come in aid of the batteries on shore. Now can it be possible that this Committee will hesitate about allowing the sum expressed in the bill from the Senate, at a time when all, I presume, have come to the conclusion that we are to dispense with the auxiliary aid of our gunboats? A year ago, so great an object was the defence of the seaports, that not only gunboats, but fortifications also, were promoted. Now that the gunboats are taken away, and the style of expenditure is to be changed, is it not a total abandonment of that object to which the Government has pledged itself? I think it is, and argues a capriciousness which would ill become a Government, and which would deprive it of that confidence of the people which is so necessary to its support. Or, are we about to act upon the very unwise and short-sighted policy, that, because the danger has disappeared, therefore we are never to expect danger again? If the fears of that period of which I spoke had been realized, the ports and harbors of the United States being without fortifications, what would then have been their situation? How much cause would there not have been to regret that the business of fortifications had not been taken up in due time! Instead of relaxing our attention to that object, now is the time to proceed. If we wait until we have war, we cannot fortify to any good effect; it will be locking the stable door after the horse is stolen. Now is the favored time for completing the work, because it can be done effectually, with coolness, and without apprehension of invasion. If we now refuse, we shall be much in the situation of a man who finished his house all but the roof; and when asked by a neighbor why he did not complete it, the reason he gave was, that when it was pleasant weather he did not want the roof, and when it rained he could not build it; and yet, sir, no man will say that he was a very wise man. It is a short-sighted policy which leaves the country undefended, because at the moment there is no danger, and under an idea that there is never afterwards to be any danger. But it is fortunate for the country, at least for that portion of it which I represent, that the ice has been broken, that the great bulk of expense has been gone into. Fortifications have been commenced upon a pretty liberal scale. I do remember very well that when this question was agitated before, and other gentlemen wished that the appropriations should far exceed the sum actually agreed to, it was then said by those who were not for giving all that we asked, that they would give sufficient to commence the work upon a liberal scale. It was frequently said that more money than was granted could not be expended within the year, and that there was no necessity to appropriate more; but a promise was held out to us, that if we would be content with that appropriation, further appropriations should from time to time be made. Now, when we want this appropriation of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, we are told that we shall have one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and it will then turn out that all the money which has been expended will have been expended for no purpose, unless a future Congress shall complete the fortifications at a much greater expense after they have been exposed to all the effects of the weather, natural decay and neglect. The people of the city of New York in particular have an eye on this subject which cannot be averted from your deliberations, and look to your acts with an anxiety which I cannot express, and with a claim upon your justice which no gentleman in the House can resist. From that city of New York perhaps one-third of the money which flows into the Treasury of the United States is derived. From its being in this respect so serviceable it has a right to protection. As good economists it becomes the Government of the United States to take especial care that the source of revenue shall be secure. If we listen to the demands of justice, on the one hand, or the dictates of a wise economy on the other, the result will be the same. It has been said by some that the danger even now is not past. With politicians of that description, the argument must be naturally as strong to go on with fortifications as it ever has been, provided that the proper incentive to go on is danger. If Great Britain is insincere, and if appearances are illusory; if, in our actual position, there be little change, I call upon all gentlemen who think so to act up to their opinions, and to protect us against the danger which they themselves, at the present moment, continue to apprehend. But as to others, who can see that all works of this kind can be prosecuted and finished in time of peace, I call upon all such to come forward and protect this great and increasing source of revenue to the United States.

In fact, sir, in reflecting on this subject, I am at a loss to comprehend why there is any difficulty. We know that fortifications are of essential service to the defence of the coast and of the seaports particularly, because the great danger to be apprehended from any enemy is a predatory war. Until the French can find their way across the water there is little fear of any invasion that shall endanger the safety of the country. If we have war, plunder will be the object of our enemy, and the cities, the rich depots, will be the points at which they will make a dash. They will destroy the shipping, the banks, the capital, which produces to the United States such great interest, and all that is valuable in the cities. Whenever an attempt is made to invade the country with a view to subjugation, the whole body of the militia must be called out. I do not look upon even an attempt of this kind as probable. The war in which we must be engaged, if in any, will be one in which the seaports will be attacked; and, if successfully, they will enrich the enemy with new means of assailing you, and deprive you of that defence which you have. The defence of the country may be made at the expense of very little money, comparatively speaking. It was upon the principle of doing everything possible to be done for this protection that I was in favor of gunboats. Though I could not see the use of those machines, yet with all that humility which we all feel for great and philosophic men, I thought they might be of service. Other gentlemen voted for them because they had confidence in them. Now, it seems, we are going to sell them. You have withdrawn this sum of one million seven hundred thousand dollars (I believe that is the gross amount of expense incurred for gunboats) from the protection of the seaports and harbors—and will you give nothing to replace what you have taken away? If you give up one set of machines, either give the cities the value of them in another species of defence, or abandon them to their fate altogether. Let us know what you will do with us. If you are taking thus much from us, do not drive us to despair by giving us nothing. Or is the policy of fortifying our ports and harbors changed? If it be, let us know it, for our rights are so strong, justice is so impetuous that the Government ought to fortify us. If not, the State of New York has means, and it will do it. It is not in New York a question of party; it is one in which the State is so much interested as to obliterate the lines which distinguish parties. I am willing to accept the appropriation in the bill, though it is not enough; but trusting to the generosity and justice of future Legislatures to go on with the work; and then the Government will have (what on no other condition they are entitled to) the allegiance and support of the people whom they protect. It is not the cities alone that are interested in their fortification, but the country too; because it is there that they find their market, and exchange their own produce for the necessaries of life. It is a matter, therefore, in which every description of persons is interested individually. A nation is never so glorious as when placed in such a situation that no hostile foot can invade it. For the sake of a few millions shall the depots of wealth remain exposed to total destruction? Can it be the policy of enlightened men to continue them subject to this exposure, when, in the train of their ruin follows the distress of every class of people? If we now go on and complete the work, in the hour of danger we shall be blessed for it. If there never be any danger, the expense never will be felt. I hope, therefore, it will be recollected by gentlemen that every part of the country is entitled to protection. I could not rest without expressing my anxiety that an example of liberality should be presented. We know that in this country we fall very naturally into the distinction of Southern and Northern. The only way in which these prejudices can be done away, if they exist at all, is for the South to do justice to the North, to vie rather each with the other in supporting each other, than in thus lopping off and curtailing measures of defence. Let us proceed hereafter on this great principle; that the whole country is entitled to protection. Let us foster every part, and be assured the whole will be satisfied.

Mr. HOLLAND said he hoped the motion for striking out would prevail. It was an unenlightened policy in this Government to expend on any object more money than is absolutely necessary. It was urged by the gentleman from New York that the whole of this extensive Continent ought to be fortified. If such a thing as this was possible, it certainly would be improper to attempt the measure at this time, or even to go on as extensively as we have begun. It would be improper, because there was a deficiency in the revenue. Let me put the question to any single individual, whether there be any danger of an invasion. I believe not. For my part, sir, I never apprehended it; I always thought this country perfectly secure from invasion by England or France. I never for a moment believed that they would attempt it, and therefore have been generally opposed to draining the Treasury by extravagant appropriations for fortifications, because I believed the money could be applied to better purposes. I believe it is impracticable to fortify the whole coast of the United States so as to be perfectly secure, were an invasion to be attempted. The good to result from these works would not equal the expense. We are told that from New York we derive one-third of our revenue. Does the gentleman mean that that city is therefore to be particularly defended? If he does, let him attend to the documents, and he will find that the moneys expended in New York have been equal to almost all the moneys expended in every other quarter. The gentleman has no reason to complain, even supposing one-third of the revenue of the United States to be derived thence. The whole amount now called for is $750,000, of which $340,000 are for New York. But the gentleman says further, that New York will be fortified. Does the gentleman mean to coerce the House to grant the whole of the money called for? If not, why say this? I take it to be extremely indecorous for a gentleman to rise and tell the House that a particular State will effect a particular measure. The State of New York has never betrayed sentiments of this kind, and I trust never will. New York is perfectly satisfied with its portion of the whole. But if New York be so anxious, so exceedingly powerful, and so very wealthy, would not equity and conscience induce her to fortify herself?

The only argument in favor of a large appropriation, which is worthy of notice, is, that the whole of the works will go to ruin and decay, if not completed. If they will not go to decay, there is no occasion for the large appropriation contained in the bill from the Senate. It has been said that all the fortifications are of a permanent nature. If so, time will not destroy them so very much as has been represented.

We always find those gentlemen living on the seacoast strong advocates for large appropriations. The modest gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NEWTON) said that Virginia had not her full share. He did not say that she needed it, but he was willing to give it to his State. The gentleman from York, too, last session, wanted three millions for fortifications. [Mr. GARDNER said that the gentleman was mistaken; he had wanted four millions.] My mistake, said Mr. H., was in the gentleman's favor. The gentleman talks about short-sighted policy; and this is his long-sighted policy, I suppose, wholly to drain the Treasury for at least a doubtful expedient. I hope that the amendment proposed will be adopted, and that no appropriation will be made. The sum already unexpended is sufficient for the raw materials for the military to work on. Will not $185,000 purchase stones, mortar, and clay, to make brick? Certainly it will; there is therefore no necessity for so large an appropriation. It is true that this bill is sent from the Senate. That is no argument in its favor. I recollect other bills which have come from that body

H. OF R.

Fortifications.

JUNE, 1869.

Navy bills have been repeatedly sent. The last bill of that kind succeeded. And what is the consequence? Have the frigates been of any use whatever to the nation? No, sir; nor will the works be of any use which are to be paid for by the immense appropriation in this bill. I hope it will be stricken out.

Mr. W. ALSTON said that the arguments on this subject might be reduced to a very narrow compass. The only question was, whether it was necessary to complete the fortifications commenced? If it was necessary to complete them, it would be much better always to keep a sufficient sum appropriated to employ the persons engaged in carrying on the work, than to employ a sum which would not be sufficient. The expense necessary for carrying on the work, as respects all officers and agents engaged in it, would be no more if seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars were appropriated, than if but one hundred and fifty were to be expended. Besides, such was the difficulty of procuring laborers, that it would be a great inconvenience now to discharge those employed. Last session (said Mr. A.) a million was appropriated for this purpose by this House, and struck out by the Senate, because they had before them no particular estimate. Now an estimate is laid before us from the Secretary of War, who tells us that in this little time nearly the whole money appropriated has been expended. The $185,000 remaining, with $150,000 proposed to be substituted for the sum proposed by the Senate, cannot last till next session. It therefore appears to me to be more wise in us to appropriate a sum which in all human probability will be sufficient to keep the work in progression, than so small a sum as would not keep the workmen together. If, however, a majority should be of opinion that it is not proper to complete the works, there is no necessity to appropriate a single cent.

Mr. NEWTON agreed with gentlemen who had preceded him, that true economy called for the largest appropriation. There was not a fortification in the United States which had received the last finishing stroke; and it was necessary at this time that the fortifications of the United States should be put in the best possible condition. What was our situation in relation to foreign Powers? Could it be said that we were at peace with all the world? It is certainly not in our power to say so, said Mr. N. We have yet a treaty to make with Great Britain; we do not know how we stand in respect to France; and no gentleman can say how long the United States will be suffered to remain in peace. It is, therefore, necessary, the whole world being in confusion, to place ourselves in the most formidable state of defence. Having this belief, I shall not travel over the ground gentlemen have taken, but give my decided vote against striking out the sum. One word in relation to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HOLLAND.) In the course of his remarks he has distinguished me by the appellation of "the modest gentleman from Virginia." I hope I ever shall possess this quality, so amiable in private life, so essential in public bodies; and as it seems that I possess so great a portion of it, I have no objection to make a transfer of a part of it to that honorable gentleman.

Mr. DANA observed that it had been said that there was no probability of an invasion, and that, therefore, there was no necessity for fortifications. He said he must be permitted to observe that it was perfectly incomprehensible to him, on any principle of military or naval combat, how 100,000 militia could be employed, except in case of invasion; for very certain he was that militia could not constitutionally be required to march beyond the frontier. When, therefore, the President of the United States had detached 100,000 militia, it was sporting with the feelings and understandings of the country, if there was no possibility of invasion. He said he would leave it to gentlemen to settle the question between the practice of the late President of the United States and their own respect for his opinion. Mr. D. said he would admit that fortifications would not constitute a security against invasion by a large army; but he considered them proper to guard us against those collisions which might ultimately involve us in war. He considered them to be such a security as would prevent insolent persons from menacing the peace of our waters. In the same manner as garrisons in the interior would discourage the savages from attempting to plunder or murder our citizens, so fortifications on the seaboard would constitute some security against maritime marauders. He would rest the security of the peace of the country on this ground; that no enemy might ever be tempted to invade by an expectation to acquire plunder without combat, or victory without effusion of blood. He objected to striking out the sum in the bill. The gunboats had cost the United States at least $1,500,000. It was proposed to sell them. He was not disposed to think that the business had been so ingeniously conducted that they would sell for less than fifty per cent. of their original cost. The proceeds then of the sale of this species of defence taken away would just amount to the sum proposed to be added to another species.

The Committee of the Whole refused to strike out the sum, yeas 33. The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

Mr. BURWELL renewed his motion for striking out the sum for the purpose of inserting a smaller. If the House should refuse to accommodate him, he said he felt no hesitation in saying that he should vote against the bill. The idea of securing this country from foreign invasion or attack by a cordon of fortifications round it, appeared to him to be so perfectly absurd, that he was astonished, whilst gentlemen were zealously engaged in ferreting out one species of mania, that they should introduce another. When the gentleman from New York, said Mr. B., tells the House that one-third of our revenue is derived from the city of New York, does he mean it to be understood that the people pay this duty, or only that the merchants import articles to this amount which are consumed in other parts of the country, on which of course the duty really falls? Every man of the smallest information knows that these goods, instead of being consumed in that city; are instead in every part of the United States. This subject of fortifications is no new thing. We all agree that we should fortify our most exposed points from predatory incursions; but no man supposes that we can establish fortifications which will effectually repel the invasion of a large force. If we were to collect all our revenue for twenty years back, and sell all our real and personal property, and expend the proceeds of it, we should find all these sums thrown away in an attempt completely to fortify the whole coast of the United States. But I wish gentlemen to state whether the conduct of this Government towards the city of New York and every seaport town has not been such as to exhibit a disposition to defend the country. Suppose the strongest fortifications possible to be erected at New York, would they prevent an army from landing in New Jersey or Connecticut, and going round to the city of New York? From whatever cause, we are in no danger now; and whatever may be said in this House, the embargo has caused a conviction in the British Government of the advantage of a mutual trade between the two countries. They are convinced now, as I have always been, that we want nothing else from them. But, if this House, when danger was believed by all to exist, could not be prevailed upon to appropriate more than $450,000 at the last session for fortifications, with what kind of consistency are they now called upon to appropriate $750,000 to that object?

Fortifications.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ross) asks us, whether it would be prudent policy in a farmer to half-fence his fields? Certainly not. But, if a farmer were to attempt to fence in a whole tract of country to secure a little lot, he would not act more ridiculously than we should do in expending extravagant sums of money on an object which can never be attained.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDNER) says that he wishes to destroy geographical distinctions, and to extend protection to every part. I contend, sir, that, so far as a solicitude has been shown for the protection of any particular part of the country, it has been for the Eastern country exclusively. Every one at all conversant with the subject, knows that very little has been done elsewhere. I admit that New York should be fortified; but the question is, whether we shall, at this particular time, devote the whole revenue of the country to that object; whether it will be an inconvenience to New York or any other town if it be not fortified by the next meeting of Congress, when we are in a state of peace, and there is a prospect of its continuance? I wish not, by large appropriations, to induce the Secretary of War to expend money too precipitately; for, if we do, we shall have still more money to appropriate. We know very well that the appropriations of former years for this purpose have scarcely ever been expended; and how can it be expected that, in addition to the $185,000 remaining unexpended, the Secretary of War will be able to disburse $750,000 more? I consider the great bulk of expense for this object to have been already encountered, and that almost all the materials are already prepared. The remaining part of the expense must be comparatively inconsiderable, viz: for the employment of men to make use of the materials, which, in works of this kind, constitute the greater part of the expense. The sum with which I propose to fill the blank, will give the War Department until the next session, $300,000, as much as can be judiciously expended, as much as we can spare, as much as the exigency of the country will require; and I hope the House will not consent to impoverish the Treasury by appropriating more, when it can answer no proper purpose.

Mr. GOLD observed that he would not detain the House long on this subject. He expressed himself happy at the demonstration already given of a disposition to go through with the fortifications begun. It was a subject in which New York was much interested, and on which, therefore, the Representatives from that State were particularly anxious. Many remarks had been made as to the calculations, on which so much money could be expended in a given time. He acknowledged himself to be completely ignorant of what was done, and of what might be necessary to be done in a given time. Was any gentleman prepared to say, on his responsibility, how far a just economy would authorize the House to go? For his part, he had confidence in the estimate of our public officers, and he perceived with pleasure that many in the House had the same; from other gentlemen, however, he had expected less jealousy in relation to them than had been displayed. It must be acknowledged, on all hands, that the Department which had made the estimate of the appropriation, was much better apprized of the extent to which it would be necessary to go, than the members of the House. It has been remarked, said Mr. G., that the moneys heretofore appropriated to this object have not been wholly expended. What results from this fact? That economy has been observed; that the Government has not been disposed to go to the utmost length when we gave them an opportunity; and shows that we have the greater reason now to give them our confidence. On the subject of fortifications, with all due deference to the gentleman from Virginia, I must be disposed to give greater attention to the report of the officer at the head of the War Department, than to the fruits of the hasty deliberations of any gentleman. There is a well-grounded expectation that New York may be fortified. The gentleman says that an army may land in Connecticut or New Jersey, and proceed to New York. I answer that they may; but, before they can reach New York, they will find more blows than plunder. There is no danger of an army's being landed in the State of New York, though there is of an attack from sea.

H. of R.

Fortifications.

JUNE, 1809.

Some allusion has been made to an observation made by my colleague, which seemed to assert too strongly the claim of New York. Some such expression may have fallen from the gentleman, in the warmth of debate; but the people of New York do not impose claims on this subject, but appear as petitioners.

The observations in relation to our being always prepared for events, are not mere observations of course. I say it is the duty of all nations, and the writers on the policy of nations have not failed to bestow on that system of policy due approbation. It is not fit that the inhabitants of the seaports, by our waiting until danger approaches, should be left in a situation to be thrown into convulsions, at the caprice of any foreign Power. Their exposure is just ground for an apprehension which they ought not to feel, and which ought to be removed by the Legislature of the Union. It is a subject of no small consideration that the inhabitants of our seaports should be so frequently subject to alarm; I am persuaded that the gentleman from North Carolina would not like to be placed in that situation. I hope, on this subject, that we have no danger to apprehend; that the confidence heretofore placed in the Heads of Departments not having been abused, we shall now place reliance on their estimates.

It has been observed that the State of New York has funds, and might do something to the defence of its own city. And she has done her share, sir. I am not able to state the sum already expended, not having documents which will show it, but it has been considerable. And though they do think it somewhat unreasonable that they should have to expend the funds necessary for the support of Government in the fortification of that harbor, they would rather expend the last farthing of their funds than let it be undefended.

Mr. GHOLSON said that, if he had no further information on this subject than was furnished by the report of the Secretary of War, he could not be induced to vote the appropriation required. On adverting to the report, said he, it seems that $450,000 were appropriated at the last session for the present year; and that of that sum as much as could be, had been expended, viz: $265,000, leaving a balance of near $200,000. If $255,000 only could be expended in one half year, according to what sort of calculation are $900,000 to be expended for the remaining half year? The Secretary himself tells you that he cannot precisely estimate the proper sum; he is new in office, and perhaps by the next session will be more conversant than he is now in the details of his office. Had he given a detailed statement of sums necessary for each place, I might have placed confidence in it; but when he thus reports in gross, I cannot place that confidence in his report. At the last session the largest sum thought of by those most sanguine in favor of fortifications was one million of dollars, in a time of impending war, which sum was struck out by the Senate; and now, in a time of peace, they want $1,200,000; that is, $750,000 in addition to $450,000 before appropriated, a sum far exceeding the sum then thought of. I do not know what can have made this revolution in the minds of the Senate. I suppose that, for the two last years the possibility of invasion did not enter into the calculations of members of both Houses, and therefore the militia were detached, the Army and Marine increased, and fortifications established; and now, when there is a prospect of peace, the detachment of one hundred thousand militia is disbanded, the Senate have passed a bill authorizing the suspension of enlistments, and while every preparation is relaxing, we are to persevere with increased ardor in the expenditure for fortifications, when there is not a dollar in the Treasury to spare. This is an inconsistency which I cannot reconcile to myself. I am willing to go on with fortifications; but I cannot consent, in time of peace, to borrow money, (a very unrepudicant practice at any time,) for the purpose of erecting fortifications, when all the rest of our conduct demonstrates to the world that we do not expect invasion.

Mr. TALLMADGE said that the question was not now whether the city of New York, Norfolk, Charleston, Boston, or any other place, should be defended, but whether the Government should have the sum contemplated to complete the fortifications already begun, or put them in such a state that they may be preserved. In discussing this question, said he, I shall not take up the great question of the embargo, which is brought in on every question, nor will I contend, because the gunboats are about to be given up, that therefore fortifications should be increased; for, since I have been a member of this Government, I feel conscious that I have never advocated them even as an aid to fortifications. I have always believed that fortifications would be necessary to protect the gunboats. I wish to see the Government grant that sum which shall be necessary to place the fortifications in such a state as, whether in peace or war, shall defend the ports and harbors of the United States. From the remarks which some gentlemen have offered to the House on this subject, I am induced to believe that they have not a practical understanding of military tactics. Some gentlemen seem to suppose, because we have a military force, that it will be competent to do the manual labor on the fortifications. Do gentlemen, when they make these remarks, perceive the material difference between works of defence for active war and for permanent defence? On my late journey to the seat of Government, I examined the fortification now erecting on Governor's Island, opposite the city of New York, and it exhibited, in my judgment, a skill in engineering, and a specimen of superior workmanship, highly honorable to those who have been engaged in it. Although the quality of the stone which has been used in the construction of that fort, might be inferior to those which compose this Capitol, yet, in point of workmanship, it was but little inferior to the walls of this splendid dome. Although our troops might be usefully employed in many parts of such fortifications, yet, where it was found necessary to erect such regular works, to be constructed principally of hewn stone, the Government must employ skilful mechanics. This would be a sufficient answer to those gentlemen who suppose that our regular army is competent to this duty, and therefore that no further aid is necessary from the Government.

Fortifications.

As to the question of the sum which it is proper to appropriate, it does appear that some gentlemen think we have not got an overflowing Treasury, and therefore they will not appropriate money for this species of defence. If this be true, the observation will equally apply to any other expenditure. If the erection of fortifications be necessary, whether the money comes in by imposts or loans, it shall have my support. If it be not of importance to fortify the country, and obtain money for this purpose, let the Government say so, and let the fortifications go to decay. We have fortifications in an incipient state, and the question is, shall we leave them as they are, to go back to the earth whence they came, or shall we complete them? For one, I am free to declare that in a time of the most profound peace which a Government can see, and I hope and trust that we are on the eve of it, I would fortify and defend the nation most permanently and completely, and would grant all the means necessary to that purpose. When I say this I do not mean that I would appropriate as large a sum of money as we have heretofore done; but when I consider that $750,000 is the maximum which the Secretary of War has thought proper to offer for the consideration of the House, I do not wish to diminish it. I am willing to come precisely up to the mark; and should it not be found necessary to expend the whole, I have not the smallest doubt that it will remain in the Treasury, subject to the appropriation of Government. Under all the views of the subject which I can take, I am unwilling to diminish the sum proposed by the Senate, and am therefore opposed to the motion.

Mr. QUINCY said that it appeared to him that gentlemen had not taken that point of view which ought solely to occupy this question, which was, not whether it was proper to begin the fortifications, but whether it was proper to complete them in the mode and in the various places in which they had been commenced. Upon this question he said he did not perceive that there appeared to be any difficulty. Gentlemen did not say that it would be improper to make them complete. In reply to the argument that the money would not be expended there was but one answer, and that was complete, viz: that the Secretary of War says, in his opinion that it can be done. Mr. Q. said he wished gentlemen to remember that whenever a less sum was granted than was necessary to carry on the work, the House would thereby convey an intimation that it was not their intention to complete them. And whilst there was a scramble, amongst the advocates for different fortifications, for their share of a small appropriation, what would be the situation of the Secretary of War? He must either totally omit applying it, or divide it, not according to the interests of the United States, or to the contracts made, but according to the amount appropriated, in an insufficient and inevitably partial manner.

Mr. FRANK said he would add but little to what had been already said in opposition to the motion for striking out; for the objections had been many and the arguments in favor of it but few, the principal argument being that the situation of the country did not require the appropriation. The Secretary of War had estimated the sum necessary for New York at $340,000, a sum considerably larger than the whole sum proposed to be appropriated by the mover of the amendment. He said he did not know what works were carrying on, but he knew that considerable fortifications had been commenced and were in a state of forwardness in New York and at other places. When the whole sum proposed by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) was divided between the different places to be fortified, it would be found that there was not an opportunity for the agents to make contracts, as every man of prudence would do in a work of this kind. We are told (said Mr. F.) that we are in no danger, that we are secure. The way to be secure is to be prepared for danger. The permanent, solid, substantial defence of the seacoast must be fortifications; and we are told that we are not to carry them on—why? Because the Treasury will not permit it. This is not a good reason against it; the spirit of the nation calls for it, and its resources are sufficient. We know that estimates have generally fallen short of the actual expense, and that it has been necessary to appropriate money to supply the deficiency in many cases. I rather suppose that the present estimate does not exceed the amount to be applied, but probably falls short of it. What is the use of calling for information if you will not take it as a guide, especially when gentlemen are not able to show that it is incorrect? My object is not only to make New York but the whole country more secure. I never knew that any one contemplated making a cordon round us, like the wall betwixt the Tartars and Chinese, or that the nation was competent to do it; but it is the opinion of practical men that New York may be completely fortified. It is asked why New York has not contributed to her own defence. I cannot put my hands on documents on the subject, but at different times money has been appropriated by the State of New York, to a large amount. It is said that the Treasury cannot meet this expenditure unless we resort to loans, and that they are anti-republican. I do not know that they are, when necessary for purposes of public utility, and I should not be incorrect to hazard the assertion that in fifty hours we might borrow fifty millions on account of the United States at five per cent. I merely rose to call the attention of the House to the amount of appropriation. The daily appropriation for the works at New York is $1,000; and there is no doubt but the share of appropriation for that city will be expended before the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. EMOTT observed that the sum of $450,000 was appropriated only last February, of which $265,000 had already been expended. If this sum had been expended in so short a time, he might say that he conceived that at least the sum in the bill would be necessary before the next meeting of Congress. A word as to the necessity of the expenditure.—Was it necessary to go on to complete the fortifications? Gentlemen had said that the nation is now in a state of peace. Was it recollected that but a day or two ago a bill had been reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, the purport of which was to place us in a posture of resistance towards France? If this bill were passed, was it not possible that the French Emperor might think that we had done him an injury? If it was ever in his power to do anything to injure us, would it not be by sending out a fleet of armed ships of war, if they could outstrip the English fleet? And were not our seaports to be put in a state of defence against such armaments? There was an absolute necessity for this appropriation. If ever there existed a necessity that the ports and harbors should be fortified, the work having been commenced, it existed peculiarly at this moment. Why would gentlemen, after appropriating so much money, now say that fortifications were not necessary? Why would they not complete those which had been commenced? After having given a pledge to fortify the seaports by commencing the works, he hoped the House would not withdraw it by refusing to complete them.

On the question of striking out the word seven, with a view to insert one, the vote stood, yeas 47, nays 84, as follows:

So that the House refused to insert a smaller sum than seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. And the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, JUNE 9.

Another member, to wit: NICHOLAS VAN DYKE, from Delaware, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. LOVE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill respecting the circuit courts of the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of an agent for the land office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk," with amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for extending the benefit of a drawback of the duties upon exportation on all goods, wares, and merchandise, subject thereto, that may be transported by land from the district of Newport to the port of Boston, and from said Boston to said Newport;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presented a bill to alter and establish certain post roads; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Military Establishment and Mr. RANDOLPH'S resolution for disbanding the troops lately raised, reported "that under existing circumstances it would be impolitic and unwise to disband any part of the Military Establishment of the United States."

Report referred to a Committee of the Whole.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States, and to erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the protection of the Northern and Western frontiers of the United States," was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 43, as follows:

MIRANDA'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. McKIM, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of the United States confined at Carthage, in South America, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred, on the 31st ult., the petition of sundry American prisoners, confined under sentence of slavery at Carthage, in South America, report:

That it appears, from the statement of the petitioners, they were, by various misrepresentations and deceptions, incautiously drawn into the service of General Miranda in an expedition, hostile in its intention, against some of the Spanish settlements in South America; that they were engaged under various pretences of serving their country, and acting in conformity to its laws—some ostensibly were to go to New Orleans and act as guards to the United States mail, others were to follow their different mechanical professions in that country, and the residue were engaged for a direct voyage to St. Domingo and back to New York—and that they had no suspicion that they were engaging in a hostile enterprise against a nation in amity with the United States.

That, accordingly, the petitioners were embarked at New York, in the month of February, 1806, on board the ship Leander, Thomas Lewis, commander; that, when the vessel had got to sea, General Miranda, by the name of Martin, assumed the chief command, and several other persons, till then unknown to the petitioners, appeared as officers on board; that the petitioners were carried to Jacmel, in the island of St. Domingo, where they were exercised in military duty by Miranda and his officers, under the most arbitrary stretch of power; that, at Jacmel, several attempts were made to escape, which proved abortive, guards having been placed in all the passes, and every precaution taken to prevent it.

That, at Jacmel, Miranda procured two schooners, on board of which the petitioners were placed; which schooners, together with the Leander, proceeded, about the last of March in the same year, under the command of Miranda, for the northern parts of South America, and arrived on the coast of Terra Firma the latter part of April following.

That, on their arrival at the said coast, the two schooners, on board of which the petitioners were placed, were captured by two Spanish armed vessels; that the petitioners, together with ten others, were convicted by the Spanish tribunal at Porto Cavallo of piracy, from the circumstances of suspicion that attached to their situation, and not from any act of that kind committed by them. That the ten others above mentioned were sentenced to death, and the petitioners, some of them to eight and others ten years slavery—the punishment of which sentence they are now suffering, under heavy irons, and other circumstances of distress, painful to the feelings of humanity to relate.

The committee, under a persuasion that the facts stated by the petitioners are substantially true, and on a full view of all the circumstances of this case, are induced to submit the following resolution for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to adopt the most immediate and efficacious means in his power to obtain the liberation of the petitioners, if it shall appear, to his satisfaction, that they were involuntarily drawn into the unlawful enterprise in which they were engaged; and that — dollars be appropriated to that purpose.

OLMSTEAD'S CASE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In consequence of the request of the Legislature of Pennsylvania I transmit to Congress a copy of certain of its proceedings, communicated for the purpose by the Governor of that State.

JAMES MADISON.

JUNE 4, 1809.

[The enclosed document was the detailed report of the Legislature, with the instructions of the Legislature to the Senators and Representatives.]

And on motion made to print the Message and document, Mr. LYON objected to the motion.

Mr. J. PORTER advocated it on the ground of its being the usual course pursued by the House in all communications from the constituted authority of a State.

Mr. MILNOR opposed the printing, principally because no act was now to grow out of it. The paper had been drafted to meet a case then pending, and difficulties which then had existed. Since the adoption of these resolves, these difficulties had been done away by an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. It appeared to Mr. M. also that no proceedings would be necessary in consequence of those papers, if only necessary to prevent the recurrence of similar cases in future.

Every one who had attended to the reading of these papers must have seen that they related to a case of difficulty which had arisen when this Government was merely a confederation of States, when its powers were confined within such narrow limits that Congress could not enforce its decrees, when its acts were nothing more than recommendations to the State Legislatures. At that period this question had arisen from a dispute between the United States and the State of Pennsylvania, how far each had jurisdiction in the Courts of Admiralty and courts of appeal. No such case could in future arise, because the Constitution had been framed by the people of the States which vested in the Congress of the United States the entire power of appointing courts of admiralty jurisdiction. No State could now take cognizance of admiralty cases; in future there could be no clashing of jurisdiction on this subject. Whether the courts of the United States or those of Pennsylvania were correct in the principles which they had set up in the case under consideration, appeared to him to be a question which it was not necessary to examine at this moment. The case had been completely settled by the payment of the money to Gideon Olmstead. He had hoped that the dispute had been by that means wholly put to rest; and from a belief that it ought to be so, he did not wish his document to be printed, but merely to lie on the table. The resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania which recommended to the Representatives and instructed the Senators from that State to endeavor to effect such an alteration in the Constitution as should establish an independent tribunal for the trial of such causes, had been produced by the idea that the case of Olmstead was a dispute between the United States and the State of Pennsylvania. It had never appeared otherwise to him than as a dispute between the Judiciary of the United States and the constituted authority of the State of Pennsylvania. On the part of the Judiciary of the United States it was an attempt to carry what it believed to be its legal powers into effect. Resistance was made by the constituted authority of Pennsylvania, under the idea that this conduct of the Judiciary of the United States was in consequence of a power assumed by them, a power not delegated by the Constitution or the institution of their office. If the judges of the Courts of the United States had misconceived their authority, if in their decisions they had acted contrary to the Constitution or the laws, then are they liable to impeachment for the conduct which they have pursued; but it could not be said that it was a contest between the Governments. The Government of the United States never interfered. The process issued from the courts of the United States. The marshal executed it; and in compliance with the process the money had been paid. The case appeared to be completely at rest; and the resolutions of the Legislature appeared to be bottomed on a false foundation, so far as they contemplated a difference between the United States and Pennsylvania. The Judiciary of the United States must in this case have been as impartial as any tribunal could be. There was not, in this case, one cent claimed by the United States or any officer of the United States; the judges were not interested by any affinity with the parties claiming it; and, if not in this case free from prejudice, it was impossible that they ever should be so. Believing, if the judges of the courts of the United States had erred, it was an error in judgment and not from corrupt motives, he could never consent that, in a case of this kind, the Congress of the United States should proceed to any further act. He hoped therefore that the papers would not be printed, but would be ordered to lie on the table.

No other gentleman rising to speak, the motion for printing was negatived, 63 to 50; and the Message and documents ordered to lie on the table.

BARRED CLAIMS.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, made several reports on petitions; amongst which were two or three on petitions of old soldiers, &c. On these the committee reported, without entering into the merits of the several cases, that they were barred by the statute of limitations, and therefore recommended that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted. A report similar to this having been made on the petition of Hannah Forster of Philadelphia, widow of a Revolutionary officer, it was negatived by the House.

A motion was made to reconsider this report, on the suggestion of Mr. STANLEY that the question had not been understood by the House.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH opposed the motion. He hoped the House would not sanction by its vote the broad principle that every claim, however just, should be barred by the statute of limitations; but that they would decide that it should be no bar to the payment by Congress of all just claims.

Mr. JOHNSON (the Chairman of the Committee of Claims) expressed his satisfaction that this question had been brought up for the consideration of the House, that by its decision the Committee of Claims might be guided in its future conduct. The committee were every day presented with cases of hardship which created painful sensations in the breasts of the committee, but which they were compelled, from the uniform conduct of the Committee of Claims heretofore, to reject because they were barred by the statute of limitations. Thus in the present case the committee had reported, not that the claim was not just, but that they had not examined it because barred by the statute. He should feel happy at a decision which should open the statute to particular claimants, and should not, as a member of the committee, ever shrink from the investigation of them. He found himself bound to vote for a reconsideration of the vote on this report, because if the statute was to be opened to particular cases, it should be done by some general rule, and not by a decision on a single case.

Messrs. HOLLAND and NELSON said that they never had believed that Congress were barred by the statute of limitations; they believed it was only intended to bar a settlement at the Treasury of document claims—of claims against which the length of time that they had been suffered to sleep was strong presumptive proof. If this principle set up by the Committee of Claims was to be adhered to, to what purpose was any claim referred to a committee? The reason why these petitions were presented to the House was, that the claims were barred by the statute; for, if not barred, they would long ago have been settled at the Treasury Department. These reports of the Committee of Claims had long been considered as reflecting dishonor on the House; and it was believed that the Committee of Claims ought to examine into the equity of cases presented to them, without reference to the statute of limitations. If that was to bar all claimants, there was a much more ready way of obtaining their answer than by a report of a Committee of the House; on application to the Treasury, their claims would be rejected without delay.

The House refused to reconsider the report, 50 to 42; and

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the report was re-committed to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to report on the merits of the case, 68 to 38.

[This decision is understood to operate as an instruction to the Committee of Claims in future to report on the merits of all cases, without considering the statute of limitations as a bar to their liquidation by Congress.]

FINANCES.

On motion of Mr. EPPES the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act entitled an act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt. This bill provides—

“That the powers vested in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, by the tenth section of the act to which this act is as supplement, shall extend to all the cases of reimbursement of any instalments or parts of the capital, or principal, of the public debt now existing, which may become payable according to law. And in every case in which a loan may be made accordingly, it shall be lawful for such loan to be made of the Bank of the United States, although the same may exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars.”

Mr. EPPES stated the object of the bill to be to accommodate the provision of a former law to the existing state of the public debt. On the 11th February, 1807, a change was made in the stock; and it had been made a question by the Bank of the United States whether the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund had the same power to borrow, in relation to the new stock created by the exchange, which the law gave them in relation to that which was thus exchanged.

Mr. DANA observed that this bill appeared to be a form to supply a deficiency actually existing or apprehended in the revenue of the United States. He was not certain that it was the best mode of borrowing money for the current service of the year, to borrow it under the name of a loan for the redemption of public debt. He also doubted whether the mode proposed was the most proper; for himself he said he should prefer that no loan should be made until public notice should be given of the time and place of making it, so that the Bank of the United States should not have any particular privilege; and that individuals disposed to loan money might have an opportunity of competing with the bank in the loan. For, such a contract for a loan of three or four millions, given to a particular individual or institution, in the existing state of commerce, might be very valuable, perhaps worth many thousands of dollars. The simple fact that the interest on stock of the United States was payable quarter yearly, gave it a preference to other stock, and other considerations enhanced its value; that the United States six per cent. stock generally sold in advance. He should therefore wish that public notice should be given by the Secretary of the Treasury of the loan when made, as had heretofore been done in similar cases.

Mr. EPPES replied, that the bill did not contemplate any new principle, but merely to accommodate the law to the change of stock. Circumstances might cause a deficiency in the revenue, which this provision would meet; but for the change in the denomination of the stock, it would have been met without the necessity of any new provision.

This debate was continued for two hours. Messrs. DANA, QUINCY, LIVERMORE, TALLMADGE, and RANDOLPH, contended that, should there be a possibility of the revenue falling short of the sum of eight millions annually pledged (after the payment of six hundred thousand dollars for the civil list) for the payment of the public debt, then such a law as this would be absolutely necessary for the support of public credit; but such a deficiency being almost out of the compass of probability, it was almost immaterial whether the bill passed or not. That a deficiency would exist in the revenue of the United States for the current expenses of the year, after paying the civil list and public debt, could not be doubted; but such a deficiency could not be supplied by borrowing for the payment of the public debt, without a misapplication of the public money. It was also said, that if money was wanting for the current expenses it must be had, but ought to be obtained by a special loan, public notice of which should be given. This bill could not be acted on but in a supposed case (which it was said would not occur) of a deficiency in the sum of eight millions six hundred thousand dollars, annually pledged for the payment of the civil list and public debt; and that it would not be lawful to apply the revenue thus pledged, to the payment of the current expenses, and thus leave a deficiency (to be supplied under this bill) in the sum required for the payment of the civil list and public debt.

It was replied, by Messrs. EPPES and MONTGOMERY, that, whether there would or would not be a deficiency in the public revenue depended on a contingency, viz. whether or not the sum to be paid out of the Treasury for drawbacks would exceed the estimate; and it was to provide against a deficiency which might be thus caused, that the bill was intended.

Mr. QUINCY observed, also, that it would not be fair to pay off the subscribers to the stock with money obtained by a new loan, whilst they were willing, nay even desirous to remain the creditors of the United States. It would in fact be favoring the Bank of the United States in preference to those who had accommodated the Government by lending money. He therefore moved the following proviso:

“ Provided also, That no such loans be made for the purpose of reimbursing any certificates issued under the act entitled, ‘An act supplementary to an act for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States,—the owners of which shall not wish to be reimbursed.’ ”

On this motion it was observed, by Messrs. EPPES and VARNUM, that this was a provision which precisely rendered the provisions of the bill nugatory; besides, it would be a violation by the United States of the faith they had pledged, not to reimburse the creditors, and surely it could be no hardship to them to have their money reimbursed when due.

Before a question was taken, the Committee rose and the House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, June 12.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Military Establishment, to whom was referred the bill sent from the Senate, entitled “An act to suspend, for a limited time, the recruiting service,” reported the same, without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on the Military Establishment, on the expediency of immediately disbanding the troops recruited under the act entitled “An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force.”

Mr. QUINCY presented petitions from sundry manufacturers of salt in the State of Massachusetts, respectively praying that duties may be imposed on salt imported from foreign places.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the committee appointed on the second instant, presented a bill making compensation to Major Zebulon M. Pike and his companions; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the same committee, also presented a detailed report in relation to the services of Major Pike and his companions, in their late exploring expeditions; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Attorney General of the United States on the petitions of Edward Livingston, and of sundry inhabitants of the city and Territory of Orleans, in relation to a parcel of ground adjoining the city of New Orleans, called the Batture, referred to him during the last session of Congress; which was read, and referred to Messrs. MACON, NICHOLAS, SMILIE, SEAYER, and THOMPSON.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill making appropriations for rebuilding two light-houses on Plumb Island, in the State of Massachusetts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee appointed on the first instant, presented a bill to revive and make permanent “An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses;” and in addition to the same; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, proposing an adjournment of the present session of Congress on the twentieth of the present month.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the discharge of John Heard from his imprisonment. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled “An act authorizing the appointment of an agent for the land office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk.”

A motion was made by Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON that the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to a Committee of the Whole, and the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative. The bill and amendments were then committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill from the Senate for extending the benefit of drawback to goods transported by land from the district of Newport to the port of Boston, was twice read and committed.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, reported a bill concerning the same.—[This bill authorizes the President of the United States, in case of a favorable turn in our foreign relations, to cause to be laid up in ordinary such of the public armed vessels of the United States as he may think proper.]—Twice read and committed.

Mr. CURTIS, from the same committee, on the resolution directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of selling any part of the public armed vessels, reported that it is not expedient, at this time, to sell any of the public armed vessels. Ordered to lie on the table.

JUNE, 1809.

Mississippi Territory—Adjournment—Contested Election.

H. of R.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER presented a petition enclosed to him from a number of inhabitants of the district east of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, praying for the division of the Territory.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved that the petition lie on the table. It would perhaps be disrespectful to the petitioners to reject it, although its contents would merit that course. There were three parties who must, by the ordinance for the government of the Territory, consent before the Territory of the Mississippi could be divided. One party was the Mississippi Territory, the other the State of Georgia, and the third the United States. Neither of these parties had consented. There was, therefore, an absolute interdiction to all legislation on the subject; and the House could, with as much propriety, refer a petition from a State to be exempt from general taxation, or to recede from the Union, as to refer this petition.

Mr. BURWELL said he felt himself bound to oppose the motion for its lying on the table. If the request was wholly improper, the report of a committee to that effect would settle the question at once.

Mr. BIBB was in favor of the motion; though, had a motion been made to reject it, he should have voted against it.

Mr. MACON was in favor of a reference of the petition. No harm could arise from an inquiry into it.

Mr. TROUP admitted the correctness of the remarks of the delegate from the Territory, but wished the petition to be referred to a committee for the purpose of an inquiry as well into the amount of population in that country as into its quality; whether it was lawful or unlawful.—There were certain facts connected with this subject, perhaps not generally known to the House. In the course of last year, he had understood that a great many persons, amounting to perhaps three or four thousand, had crossed the Tennessee river, and fixed themselves on its banks, not only contrary to law, but the impression was that they had set out in defiance of the law, and had even gone so far as to organize themselves into military associations for the purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER observed that there had been a settlement contrary to the existing law on Tennessee near about a year ago; but that they were ordered to be driven off by the military force, except they would take permission to reside as tenants at will. Some had done so, and some had been driven off.

Mr. TROUP said he knew that orders had been given to remove them; but of their removal and dispersion he had not heard. He said he had further understood that there were, in the county of Madison alone, two or three thousand intruders, and many of them settled on Indian lands, whose owners they excited to hostilities. There was another fact, of which the House might keep possession. Among these intruders was one of the name of Harrison, he believed, who claimed under what was called the Tennessee Yazoo claims, and who settled on the land with his retainers, and deliberately began to apportion it among them. Whether he had been dispossessed, Mr. T. said he did not know. It was absolutely necessary to ascertain the situation of that country, and therefore he should vote for the reference of the petition to a committee.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table—67 to 27.

ADJOURNMENT.

On motion of Mr. BIBB, the House took up the resolution from the Senate to adjourn on the 20th instant.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved that it lie on the table till Thursday. He thought it was unbecoming the dignity of this body to fix a day at which to adjourn, when it was impossible to say whether the business before the House could be maturely considered in that time. It was hurrying business at the hazard of its being insufficiently attended to.

Messrs. ALSTON and Cook were of the same opinion.

Mr. BIBB said he was not very anxious about it, but he did not before know that the dignity of a body was proportioned to the length of its sittings. He was of a very different opinion, believing that as much business might be as well done in a week as was often done in a month.

Mr. DANA was in favor of the resolution's lying on the table. He said he had supposed that quality was quite as material as quantity in legislation. It was an extraordinary thing that a Legislature should serve its members as sometimes men served their horses or slaves, giving them a certain portion of work to do within a given time, and then lashing them up to it. He had no idea of legislating upon compulsion.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table till Thursday next—ayes 87.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

*On motion of Mr. FINDLEY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Elections on the petition of Charles Turner, jr., contesting the right of WILLIAM BAYLIES to his seat.

On this report, the acceptance of which by the House would postpone the decision of the case till the next session, a debate arose which continued till 5 o'clock; in which Messrs. W. ALSTON, BACON BAYLIES, CLAY, DANA, FINDLEY, FISK, GANNETT, GHOLSON, GOLD, HOLLAND, LIVERMORE, MACON, MONTGOMERY, PICKMAN, QUINCY, RANDOLPH, RHEA, TAYLOR, VARNUM, WILSON, and WHEATON, took part.

It was contended by those in favor of postponement, that the depositions taken on the subject of this election, although the parties might have had reasonable notice, were not legal, having been taken under the authority of no existing law; that time had heretofore been allowed in similar cases on the request of the sitting members; that the constituted authority of Massachusetts having decided the first election not to be valid, and having ordered a second, it was doubtful whether Congress were not precluded from acting on the subject. It was also said by other gentlemen that it was a matter of courtesy to the sitting member, on his request in behalf of his constituents, to grant time for procuring testimony.

H. OF R.

Contested Election.

On the other hand, it was said that the depositions were taken under the same circumstances as those under which a member (Mr. CULPEPER) had during the last Congress been deprived of his seat; that time sufficient had been allowed previous to the meeting of Congress; that the returned member had not stated any specific facts which he believed he could prove if time were given; that the constituted authority of Massachusetts had no exclusive power of deciding on the returns of members, Congress being the sole judges of the returns of their own members, and having, in various instances, set aside elections declared valid by the State authorities, as in the case of Cowles Mead and John Culpeper. It was also observed, that some consideration was due to the gentleman contesting the seat of Mr. BAYLIES, who had already attended the whole of this session at considerable expense and inconvenience.

A motion was made that the Committee rise, with a view to recommit the report to the Committee of Elections. The Committee did rise about 5 o'clock, and were refused leave to sit again—65 to 55. A motion was made to recommit the report; which was opposed by Mr. PITKIN. A motion was made to adjourn, which was carried.

TUESDAY, JUNE 13.

Mr. SMILE presented a memorial of the hat manufacturers resident in the city of Philadelphia, praying that additional duties may be imposed upon hats imported from foreign countries. Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, from the committee on that part of the Message from the President of the United States which relates to our foreign relations, presented an amendatory bill to amend and continue in force the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. STANLEY, from the committee appointed on the petition of John Kerr, presented a bill for the relief of John Kerr; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was yesterday referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of an agent for the land office at Kaskaskia, and allowing compensation to the commissioners and clerk," reported the disagreement of the committee to the said amendments.

A motion was made by Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON that the report and amendments, together with the bill, be committed to a Committee of the Whole; and the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative. The question was then taken upon concurring with the committee in their disagreement to the said amendments, and resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITMAN presented a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in the town of Portland, District of Maine, to the same effect with the memorial of the hat manufacturers in the city of Philadelphia, presented this day.

Mr. GARDNER presented petitions from the manufacturers of salt in the towns of Orleans and Yarmouth, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that additional duties may be imposed on the importation of salt from foreign countries. The petitions were read, and severally referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

An engrossed bill, authorizing the discharge of John Heard from his imprisonment, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a memorial of a number of citizens of the United States, residing on Tombigbee river, stating that they are subject to an enormous duty of twelve per cent. on all exports and imports at the Mobile, to be paid to the Spanish Government, and praying relief.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LOVE reported a bill for the improvement of the navigation of the river Potomac.—[This bill contemplates giving power to raise money by lottery, &c., for the purpose mentioned.] The bill having been read once, was read a second time—50 to 48. It was then made the order for to-morrow week—53 to 42.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. FINDLEY gave his reasons in favor of recommitment.

Mr. PICKMAN stated at length the grounds on which the Council of Massachusetts had ordered a new election in the case, and supported the right of Mr. BAYLIES to his seat. Mr. CUTTS replied. Messrs. RHEA, BACON, and COOK, also advocated recommitment, and Mr. QUINCY replied to some observations made by these gentlemen.

The report was recommitted without a division.

Mr. BACON moved a resolution to instruct the Committee of Elections to inquire into and report such specific facts as in their opinion may afford good grounds for postponing the decision; and, if none should exist, to instruct them to inquire into the merits of the case.

Mr. POTTER moved to amend it by adding "and likewise to report to the House whether the depositions taken were authorized by any law of the United States."—Motion negatived—ayes 36.

Mr. BACON's motion was also negatived—ayes 28.

Miranda's Expedition.

H. OF R.

MIRANDA'S EXPEDITION.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the following resolution, reported by the committee appointed to consider the petition of thirty-six citizens concerned in Miranda's expedition, and now confined in the vaults of Carthagea, South America :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to adopt the most immediate and efficacious means in his power to obtain the liberation of the prisoners, if it shall appear to his satisfaction that they were involuntarily drawn into the unlawful enterprise in which they were engaged ; and that — dollars be appropriated for that purpose."

Mr. McKim observed, that he believed nothing further would be necessary for the attainment of this object than an application by the Government of the United States ; he then moved to fill the blank in the resolution with such a sum ($3,500) as would defray the expense of sending a vessel there and clothing the prisoners previous to their return.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, he believed there would be no better time than on this motion to express the disapprobation which he felt of the report ; for he was unwilling, in his representative capacity, to give one cent of the public money for bringing back into the bosom of the body politic these unfortunate but guilty men. He knew how invidious a task it was to appear to lean to the side of inhumanity ; he knew how very natural it was for the mind of man to relent, after the commission of a crime, and to see nothing in a culprit but his misfortunes, forgetting his guilt ; but there were occasions, and he took this to be one, where to lean apparently to the side of humanity is an act of as great injustice and cruelty to society as the Legislature can commit. What were the House about to do ? To make an appropriation of money for an extraordinary purpose of foreign intercourse. Was not the President of the United States already invested with power to negotiate with the Spanish Government on this, as well as with as any other Government on any subject ? Was the President of the United States presumed to have turned a deaf ear to the cries of our suffering countrymen in captivity in a foreign nation ? Mr. R. said, this was not like a question of redeeming our countrymen from slavery in Barbary or Tripoli ; but it was a question whether this Government would lend its countenance to that class of men who were concerned in the expeditions of Miranda and Aaron Burr. He for one said, that he would not consent to it ; and that those persons who, above the dull pursuits of civil life, had enlisted under these leaders, might take for him, however he might feel for their situation as men, the lot which they themselves had selected. He said, he considered them as voluntarily expatriated from this country, and among the articles of commerce and manufacture, which it might be contemplated to encourage by bounty and premiums, he confessed for one, that the importation of such citizens as these was not an article of traffic which would meet with any encouragement from him. So far from being afraid of any ill consequences resulting from the sparseness of our population, he was afraid that our population, (and experience has tested the fact) sparse as it was in number, in quality was redundant. We have been told, said Mr. R., and I believe it, that but the other day the Foreign Office in Great Britain cast its eyes on Colonel Burr, and that they either did commit him—I understand that he was committed and stood so for some time, and was only released on condition of quitting the country—that they either did commit or threaten to imprison that unfortunate man. I want to know, sir, if he had stood so committed, in what respect his case, in a political point of view, would have stood contradistinguished from that of these petitioners ? I can see no difference but such as, in my mind, would have operated to his advantage. There is an equality of guilt, but on his part a superiority of intellectual character which would have rendered him, if there is to be an accession to the State by bringing back to its bosom those who have voluntarily thrown themselves out of the protection of the country, a more valuable acquisition, or rather a less valuable loss, than these unfortunate men.

It appears to me, sir, that in passing this resolution we shall hold up a premium to vice ; for, if this proposition be agreed to, when some new Miranda or Burr comes forward with his project, he will tell his conspirators that they will have nothing more to do, should the matter turn out adversely, than to put up a face and tell Congress that they were involuntarily drawn into it. An extraordinary mode, to be sure, of volunteering to go against their will. These involuntary volunteers will be told they will have nothing to do but throw the whole weight of the blame on the original mover of the expedition, and Congress will tax their fellow-creatures—who, poor souls, had not enlarged and liberal minds, and were content with the dull pursuits of civil life—for redeeming them, clothing them, and bringing them back again to society. I wish the Committee to take the thing into consideration. As men and christians our conduct is to be governed by one rule ; as representatives of the people, other considerations are proper. There is, in the proposed interference, no justice ; there may be much mercy, but it is a mercy which carries cruelty, if not deliberate, the most pernicious of all possible species of cruelty, along with it. Suppose these men had been arrested and tried in this country, what would have been their lot ? It is difficult for me to say. I am no lawyer ; but I suppose, under the mild institutions in some of our States, they would have been condemned to hard labor for life. In what do they differ, to their advantage, from other felons ? In nothing. Who would step forward to rescue them from that punishment due to their crime if convicted by our own courts ? Nobody. Everybody would have said that they deserved it. Now, on the contrary, having escaped the hand of justice in this country, and fallen into the grasp of the strong hand of power in another country, we are not contented to let them reap what they have sown; we are not contented to leave them in the hands of justice. I believe that there exists a proper disposition in the Executive to interfere, where American citizens are wrongfully treated abroad. And, shall we come forward and open the public purse, and assume on ourselves the responsibility of that act which the President refuses to do, and thus share among us the imputation, such as it may be, which society chooses to cast upon us in consequence of it, instead of letting it fall singly and individually upon him, in case he chooses to incur it? No, sir. I have no disposition to pass this resolution to take the responsibility upon myself. In short, I should have been glad, if instead of telling us that these men are unfortunate and miserable, (for who are so unfortunate and miserable as the truly guilty?) that the members of that committee, or the respectable chairman himself, had come forward and shown the claim of these petitioners to the peculiar patronage of the country. So far from any disposition to bring them back, I would allow a drawback or bounty on the exportation of every man of similar principles.

Mr. EMOTT said, that as he had been a member of the committee whose report was now under consideration, he felt the propriety of making a few observations to show the expediency of adopting the resolution. In order to obtain the release of these miserable and deluded men, it was necessary that the Government should interfere, because the Spanish Government never would release them till such application was made. The only money necessary to be paid was not to the Spanish Government, but to defray the expense of bringing back the prisoners. It was not to buy their liberty, but to employ a person to go there to request it.

It had been said that the President had power to attempt the release of these persons without any resolution of the House. Mr. E. said he would not enter into that consideration. He knew, if the President had the power, that he had not chosen to exercise it; and if the House could find from the statement of the situation of these men that they ought to be relieved, they should not refrain from expressing their opinion, merely because the President had the power and would not exercise it.

It might be necessary, Mr. E. said, to call to the minds of the Committee the situation of these men. They were persons employed by Miranda, in his expedition, who, he undertook to say, did not know that they were going on any expedition contrary to the laws of the country. When taken, they had been tried by the Spaniards on a charge of piracy, and condemned to lie in a dungeon for a term of years. They prayed the Congress for its interposition in their behalf.

It had been said that these men knowingly engaged in this expedition. Mr. E. said he believed that they did not; but, admitting, for a moment, that this was the case; that they did know the pursuit on which they were entering, they should not, for that reason alone, be suffered to lie in prison. Let it be understood, said Mr.

E., that this expedition, whatever it was, was carried on, in the face of day, in the city of New York, and that equipments of the vessels and enlistments were made without interruption in, the face of day. And would these persons believe that they were going on an unlawful expedition? They might have enlisted from the best motives; and, supposing that they had enlisted, under the knowledge that they were going on an expedition, yet seeing that it was carried on in open day without interruption from the Government, he much doubted whether these poor men ought to be suffered to lie in prison.

But, putting motives aside, these men declare that they did not understand the nature of the service for which they were engaged; and this statement the committee who made the report had brought themselves to believe. Let it be recollected that these unfortunate individuals were lying in prison; and, although they had, by some means, forwarded a petition here, they could not attend in person to urge their claim to relief by proofs presented to the House. The persons who procured these men to go on this expedition certainly would not be very willing to come forward and give testimony; because, by so doing, they might criminate themselves and render themselves liable to the operation of the laws of their country. Considering that these persons were removed thousands of miles from us, that they were unfriended, and that the persons who alone could prove that their intent was innocent, would not come forward for fear of criminating themselves, he thought these men were entitled to commiseration, and he believed that it was in his power to show two or three circumstances which would convince the House that they had no knowledge of the nature of this expedition. The first circumstance was the extreme improbability that these men would have engaged in this expedition, if the nature of it had been explained. Had Mr. Smith or General Miranda gone to these men and said, "we are going on an expedition against the laws of the country, and, if taken, you will be punished under the laws of one country or the other," it is extremely improbable that they would have engaged. It is not likely that Miranda or Mr. Smith avowed their purposes, and told them that they were going on an expedition hostile in its nature, and against the laws of the country, because its object was to revolutionize a nation in amity with the United States. It is impossible that these men should have known the nature of the expedition, when it was not known to the Government here, however public. This circumstance, to me, is conclusive, to show that these young men did not know it. There might have been persons who did; if you please, Mr. OGDEN; who furnished the ship, or others, but it is impossible to believe, that these men, who were mere soldiers for carrying on the expedition, knew the nature of it. I am convinced that these persons, all privates—for the officers were executed—did not know why they did enlist, or that the corps was for the purposes to which it was actually designed.

Miranda's Expedition.

H. OF R.

I have said, and perhaps every person here knows, that the whole of the business was carried on in the face of day. Here were General Miranda and Mr. Smith coming to the seat of Government, and back to New York, procuring clothes, enlisting men. Can it be conceived that all this could have been carried on, if General Miranda had not meant to conceal it from the Government? But it is in my power to furnish something more than mere conjecture on this subject. The Committee will recollect that a greater part of this transaction took place at New York. There the men were to rendezvous, there the vessel was furnished, and to that State most of the young men who are now in South America did belong. In that State this matter was the subject of judicial investigation. Mr. Smith and Mr. Ogden were indicted. I will read a part of the evidence given on the trial, which will satisfy any one, at least it has satisfied me, that these men had no hand in it. Mr. Fink, who was produced as evidence on the part of the Government to convict Mr. Smith, was the person who was intrusted with enlistments.

[Mr. E. then read the following, and other extracts, from the report of the trials of the Messrs. Smith and Ogden :

Q. Do you know Colonel Smith?

A. Yes. He applied to me last Winter to enlist some men, or rather to engage some men for Government service. I told him I did not know of any men. But a few butchers were idle. I was to give the Colonel news next morning. Instead of six, as he told me yesterday, there was wanted twelve men, a sergeant, and a corporal. They asked a good price, it was fifteen dollars per month. There were fourteen at that time, and went on as far as twenty. I was authorized by him. He represented to me that they were for the service of the United States, but it was afterward found they were to go on board the Leander. He would not tell us where they were going to. He said he could not disclose the particular object. That he could have a great deal of money to explain it to a certain man, and, therefore, could not tell the sergeant or me. These men saw Colonel Smith. Several of them not at all. I saw him often; he said they were to go on a detachment. They boarded at my house. His son was to command the company, and had a commission to go. I have seen Smith several times at my house. He showed me a bundle of papers, which he said were his orders to get these men. Smith informed me that an expedition similar to this was to go from other States. He said his son was a captain. They went on board; the mate abused them, and they would not stay. There was fifteen dollars and a half a piece given to them. There were twenty of them. I received this money from Colonel Smith. He put it in parcels for each man, and delivered it to me for them. It was a month's pay. The men came to my house after they left the Leander. They would not go on board the vessel.

Q. by Hoffman. Was it intimated to them that they would stop at a place where they would have an opportunity to return, if they did not like the service?

A. I believe it was mentioned to them.

Q. by Colden. Was it not communicated to them that when the vessel arrived they would be at liberty to return, and a passage be provided for them, but that he could not tell what part they would be sent to?

A. Yes.

Peter Rose—sworn.

Q. Did you sail in the Leander on her last voyage?

A. Yes. I was employed by Captain Gardiner, who told me he wanted me to go to New Orleans—that we were to sail from here to Washington, and go from Washington by land.

Q. Have you been at New Orleans?

A. No.

Q. When did you discover the Leander had a different object in view?

A. As soon as I got on board; and I wanted to return, but they would not let me—they would not allow me even to send a letter ashore.]

On the same trial there was one of the persons who was actually enlisted who deposed that the same information which Peter Rose received was given to others. This man also was a private in the expedition, and swears that the person who employed him told him that he was to be employed in the service of the Government; that he was to be carried to Washington by water and thence to New Orleans. The men who now petition Congress are persons who are placed precisely in the same situation. We find, in the course of the trial, that the person employed to enlist the men, declares that the person employing him refused to tell him for what purpose they were to be enlisted, and, of course, he could not inform those whom he enlisted.

Mr. E. said he had already remarked the extreme difficulty under which these persons labored, that they were at a distance of several thousand miles from this country, incarcerated, and friendless. He had satisfied his mind that they had engaged in this business unknowingly and unwillingly—and, what was now asked of the Government? That they should expend large sums of money for the purpose of buying them out? No. All that the Spanish Government wanted, he undertook to say, was, that a request should be made by the Government of this country for those men, and all the money required for this service, was money enough to send an agent there and facilitate his return.

Nothing had been said by him, Mr. E. remarked, of the peculiar sufferings of these men; but there were representations enough, to show that they were chained naked in a dungeon, without clothing, and without wood. Some had died and others must die. He hoped, therefore, for the reasons which he had given, that the Committee would be satisfied that these men were not guilty of crime. If not guilty, he hoped there could be no doubt that they were a proper subject for the interference of the Government.

Mr. BAON observed that the conclusion which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had drawn, rested upon the idea that the men were guilty. If they were guilty, they certainly should not receive the benefit of the interposition of the Government of the United States. They had no claim on the United States when considered as criminals, or as men who had voluntarily engaged in this service. The report of the committee did not state this to be the case. I acknowledge, said Mr. B., that they are guilty in some respects, having innocently transgressed the laws. If they are guilty in the eye of justice, I contend they ought not to have relief. The report of the committee states, that, under a persuasion that the facts set forth by the petitioners were true, they were induced to submit this resolution. The committee had evidence, which they deemed competent, to prove that these men were not guilty men. In what respect, then, are they to be compared to Aaron Burr? No man will say that he did not proceed on his expedition with his eyes open, or that he could plead ignorance. The fact in relation to these men appears to be that they were inveigled; that their offence was involuntary, not as respected engaging in what they thought the service of the United States, but as to going abroad, for against their consent they were forced into the service. Therefore, with great truth, it might be said that they were scourged to the service. If this was the fact, as the committee appear to have believed, I ask, in what their case differs from that of men taken captives by the Algerines? Those men taken by the Algerines are engaged in lawful commerce; these poor men are engaged in an unlawful act, but not knowing it to be unlawful, and believing it to be correct, they are as innocent, in fact, as those who act innocently. The gentleman says, suppose they were to return to their country, would they not be punished? If the facts, as they state them are correct, as I believe them to be, I do not believe that they would be punished. The law does not punish a man because he does an act, but for the quo animo with which he does it.

H. OF R.

I will remark to the House that, on this subject, we have not the legal testimony. It is required scarcely in any case by the House, much less in a case situated so peculiarly as this is. These men are, of all others, in the worst situation for procuring relief. They are confined in a dungeon; they are poor men, of poor families, who cannot act in their behalf. I perceive that they have referred to persons to whom the House might refer, to substantiate their statement of facts. One of these prisoners is a young man from the district which I represent, who had friends able to assist him. They obtained such assistance as they could. Other persons whose evidence might have been of service could not be found. Mr. B. referred to depositions taken on this subject of persons who declared that they had enlisted unwarily, believing it to be for the service of the United States, for three years, at a certain compensation per month: that when informed that they were to go on board the Leander, they were opposed to it, but that their suspicions were lulled by the assertion that they were merely going round to New Orleans in this vessel, where they were to be stationed.

Mr. B. said he held in his hand a letter from one who was engaged in the expedition, but was so fortunate as to escape, which stated that not more than two persons concerned were acquainted with the nature of the expedition, but believed it to be sanctioned by the Government. The letter also stated the prisoners to be in the most wretched condition, lingering out a miserable existence, under the distress arising from the want of clothes, light, fuel, bedding, and means of intercourse with their friends. This statement, Mr. B. said, would be sufficient to draw the attention of the House to the men condemned to such an unparalleled fate. It would be very unfortunate, if, from any fear of an impression which might be produced by its interposition of the agency of the Government, in the original plan of the expedition, these men should be suffered to linger in hopeless captivity. Believing, as he did, that the committee had correctly reported, that these men were involuntarily participators in the expedition, he thought the hand of mercy should be extended to them.

MR. PEARSON.—On this occasion, Mr. Speaker, I feel a sensibility which it is not my nature to repel—a sensibility which, I trust, is manly, not merely the evaporation of ordinary feeling, or of mistaken humanity, but an impression, confirmed by the dictates of reason, of justice, of honor, and bottomed on the solid basis of nature's best gift—humanity.

We, as the Representatives of this nation, are appealed to for the relief of a few unfortunate fellow-beings—citizens of our country, whose imprudence, or, to say the worst, whose crimes have brought them to a situation, at the recollection of which the benevolent mind shrinks with horror—to the endurance of a punishment, in a foreign country, unknown to the humanity of our laws, and the mild spirit of our Government. Yes, sir, about thirty young men, citizens of your country, decoyed by the artifices and delusive hopes with which their ardent and youthful imaginations were flattered—led on by the example and patronage of men, by no means obscure, or at that time, disreputable, embarked in an expedition, the destination of which, I am induced to believe, was to them unknown—not only unknown, but, represented by their leaders, to be agreeably to the authority and laws of the United States. These young men having discovered, too late, the deception which had been practised upon them, after unsuccessful attempts at Hispaciola to escape, continued, involuntarily, in an expedition in which they were captured, sentenced, and punished as pirates—sentenced to the most torturing of all punishments—to rigorous imprisonment and slavery, and are now groaning under the weight of their chains in the dungeons of Carthage. We are supplicated to relieve those men, not by buying them, not by paying so much for each head, as has been required and complied with, in the case of captives taken by the savages of Algiers and Tripoli, but merely to express the wish of this country, to the Spanish nation, that those persons should be released, and that some pecuniary appropriation should be made, to effect this arrangement, and restore those unfortunate and unhappy men to their native country. Sir, from the report of the committee, who have investigated this subject, and from the statement made by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) I am induced to believe, notwithstanding the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) to the contrary, that those men are not guilty, at least, to the extent which some gentlemen seem to imagine.

H. or R.

It appears that the preparations for this expedition were by no means secret—they were made in the city of New York, in the face of day, and, if not known to everybody, at least to a great many. It appears, also, that the real object was not known to the persons who enlisted, some of whom are now the petitioners; that they were induced to believe the enterprise was not unlawful; they did not know the character, or even the name of their leader, until some time after they had embarked, and when it was not in their power to leave him, or even communicate to their friends. It will be recollected that statements have been made, which tend to produce a belief, that assurances were given to those unfortunate sufferers, that this expedition was not contrary to the authority and will of the Government of the United States. And here it may be observed, that impressions did exist, (and I confess the impression is not altogether eradicated from my mind,) that some of the principal officers of this Government did connive at, or at least were not entirely ignorant of the principal characters concerned, or the preparations which were making for this expedition. This impression arose, I presume, from a variety of circumstances, among which may be mentioned the apparent good understanding, if not intimacy, between General Miranda and some of the officers of Government; the respect shown Miranda by the President, at whose table, I am informed, he was a guest; from the open manner in which the expedition was fitted out; from the peculiar situation of affairs between this country and Spain, which left little doubt on the mind of many, that if war did not exist, there were strong grounds to believe that hostilities would soon commence. In addition to those, the circumstances which took place on the trial of Ogden and Smith, in the city of New York, had some tendency to strengthen the suggestion. In the course of that trial, it will be recollected, by every person who has attended to it, that one of the grounds of defence set up by the defendants was, that the expedition and enterprise was begun, prepared, and set on foot, with the knowledge and approbation of the President of the United States and the Secretary of State. The disclosure of this ground of defence is sworn to by one or both the defendants in an affidavit made to obtain a postponement of the trial, in consequence of the absence of the Secretary of State, and some other persons, who were subpoenaed to attend as witnesses in behalf of the defendants. It was also strengthened by the ultimate acquittal of those men. Other circumstances, which I have heard from gentlemen of respectability, could not fail of having some influence.

The conclusions, therefore, which I draw, are; that if any of the principal officers of Government had knowledge of the object and extent of this expedition, and those sufferers embarked from a conviction of this knowledge, and from a belief that they were not acting contrary to the authority or wishes of the Government, then they are not highly criminal, if criminal at all. If the officers of Government did not know the object and extent of this enterprise, but were deceived as to the preparations and object of this adventurous and artful commander, then, how much more likely is it that those young and ignorant men should become the dupes of his artifice and design?

But, sir, let us now turn for a moment to the darkest prospect in this scene; let us suppose all that can be imagined; let us admit that those men are really guilty; does it then follow that their crime is of so deep a dye it cannot be washed away—cannot be expiated but by a punishment unknown to our laws and the mild genius of our Government? This, surely, cannot well be. Those young men are to be considered as merely secondary objects in this transaction. They are not of that description, who, from the influence of wealth, connexions, or intrigue, it would be dangerous to restore to the bosom of their country. On the contrary, their sufferings have been such as to convince them of the folly of their doings, and their tales of woe would deter others from engaging in like adventures.

The object of criminal law is rather to prevent the commission, than punish those who have committed offences; and when that is likely to be obtained, even by mercy itself, policy and humanity step in and gently stay the hand of the executioner.

Sir, is it unknown—is it untrue, that offences of the highest nature have been committed against this Government? And, is it not equally true that pardons have been extended, not only to the secondary agents, but to the principal offenders? Yes, sir, persons convicted of high treason have been pardoned by the Chief Magistrate of the United States; nor do I believe that any ill consequences have arisen, any sentiments of public indignation excited by this extension of mercy.

Sir, if it be not proper to pardon in some cases, why give that power to your Chief Magistrate? Every State in the Union has vested such a power somewhere; and, in the State which I in part represent, that power is frequently and beneficially exercised. Indeed, it is seldom withheld for the first offence of a capital nature, unless in the case of murder or some very highly aggravated crime.

I contend that the claim of those miserable men for the interposition of their Government, is in the nature of a petition for pardon. But, it is said, money is required; an appropriation is to be made. It is true, the pitiful sum of $3,500 is required; not the tenth part of a cent per man throughout the United States. And, although I am disposed to hold a strict hand over the expenditures of the Government, and guard sacredly the pecuniary interests of my constituents, yet, I must not forget their honor and their generosity. I should do every man of them injustice if I did not take upon myself the responsibility of this just, this humane appropriation. Upon the whole, I am inclined to believe those men are not highly criminal; but, whether guilty or not guilty, they have suffered enough. The honor and humanity of the nation demands their liberation. They should not be suffered any longer to linger out a dreadful existence in the dark, chilly damp of a Spanish dungeon, writhing under tortures unknown to the mild precepts of our religion, and unsanctioned by our laws.

Mr. SMITH said that the Spanish Government were already all alive to the actions of this country, and, no doubt, jealous of any appearance of its participation in Miranda's, Burr's, or any other expedition against its territories; and no doubt their jealousy would be increased when they heard a declaration that there had been in this Government a disposition to injure that nation. And shall we now, said he, by an act of this kind, confirm those suspicions which are already entertained? And will you involve the nation, under these circumstances, by an application in behalf of these men? This is sufficient reason with me to vote against the resolution. It is better that these men, supposing them to be innocent, should bear with private hardship, than that the public should receive an injury.

Mr. PEARSON observed that he regretted to hear the misrepresentation given to his language and the injustice done his motives—nothing was further from his intention than to make any positive charge of criminality against the officers of the late Administration in relation to this transaction; he had only stated impressions, the grounds of which were long ago before the public. His principal object was to demonstrate the innocence of the men who now call for mercy, and to show that if the officers of Government, with all the lights before them, were deceived by this adventurer, how much more easily could the deception be practised on those ignorant individuals.

Mr. FISK said, he was glad to understand the explanation given by the gentleman from North Carolina to show that this case did not reflect upon the Government of the United States; because he said he should suppose it a reflection upon the understanding of any man, more especially of a member of this House, if he could, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, for a moment believe that the Government of the United States did participate in, know of, or in any way sanction the enterprise. I take this opportunity, said Mr. F., of expressing my approbation of the report, and of filling up the blank with any sum deemed competent to relieve these unfortunate sufferers from a situation more wretched than my power over the English language will suffice to describe. It is said that these men are guilty, and what is there to support this belief? Nothing but the declaration of the member (Mr. RANDOLPH) who asserts it. What constitutes guilt? The quo animo with which an act is performed. What evidence is there of guilt in this case, more than that these men were taken on the coast of the Spanish Main in an enterprise against that colony? Does it therefore follow, that they were guilty? If they were surprised into this situation against their wishes, against their power of resistance, they were not guilty. In giving my opinion on this subject, I will say, that it never fell to the lot of mortals to be more perfidiously betrayed, more cunningly dealt with, or more harshly treated than those who now petition their country—their country, I say, because they are entitled to relief from us, unless they have forfeited their right by this act.

Only one word will I say, of the acquittal of Smith and Ogden; the perusal of the evidence, arguments, and verdict of the jury in that case, has long ago convinced my mind not only of the propriety, but of the necessity of instituting an inquiry for the purpose of insuring an impartial trial by jury.

It may be, and has been asked, how it was possible that a ship of this description could be fitted up in the face of day in New York, without the knowledge of the Government or its officers. The evidence on the trial will answer this question. When it is recollected that the vessel was owned by Smith and Ogden, that it had been employed for some years in carrying on a forced trade with St. Domingo; that the vessel was armed, and that her complement was one hundred and twenty men; and, in addition, that one of our revenue officers was concerned, it is no longer a cause of surprise. But the revenue officer acted with great caution, as it became necessary to further his design or that of Miranda; for, had their intentions been known in the city of New York, they would have been defeated. Mr. Smith therefore engaged these men, not in this enterprise, but, as they honestly believed, in the service of their country. They understood that there were some to go to Washington, and guard the mail, others to go round to New Orleans, and for various purposes; but it was never intimated to one of them that they were to be employed in an hostile expedition against any nation whatever. It was no very difficult matter to cover such an equipment. Application was made to the insurance office to have insurance done, not for a certain place, but for a certain latitude. A considerable quantity of arms that were on board were got on board unknown to the Government or to the officers of the port, as they were not inserted in the manifest. It was unknown to the sufferers what was the destination of the army till the 19th of February, when they made the island of Jacquemel. To their utmost astonishment they then found themselves driven in a different direction from that which they expected. They remonstrated, and attempted to escape, but in vain. They were compelled to go on board the Leander, under the authority of Miranda and Captain Lewis. Another circumstance of weight in their favor is, that, in the trial which was had at Caraccas, the evidence produced against them was not sufficient, in the opinion of the Spanish Government, to convict them of having knowingly taken a part in this business. The officers being accessory to it, were executed. But, inasmuch as it was necessary to hold up an example, not so much to foreigners, as to their own citizens, it was found necessary to punish and confine these petitioners. If it appears to this committee that these men are innocent, are we not willing to interpose for their relief? If I did for a moment believe, that they were guilty, or had any doubt that they were innocent, I would not advocate their cause. But, believing, as I do from a thorough acquaintance with the facts, that they were entirely innocent of any intention of carrying on a hostile expedition against any nation or against the laws of their country, that they were betrayed by the arts of men who ought to have suffered more than they yet have, I am willing to assent to this resolution.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said, he recollected that when the subject was under consideration before, he had an objection to the motion; that he saw an evident impropriety in squandering money on these persons, whilst the old soldiers of the Revolution were yet unprovided for and in distress. But, said Mr. J., if the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PEARSON) be correct, we ought to indemnify them. There are cases in precedent. Captain Little made a mistake in the character of a national vessel, and the Government remunerated the expense occasioned by the error. If the Government has by any connivance or act of theirs encouraged an armament within the United States, they ought not only to indemnify the sufferers but to make a full inquiry into the facts. I do not know the method of doing it, but I believe if there was any manner of bringing the gentleman to the bar to exhibit and substantiate his charge, it ought to be done. I would ask, if any new testimony is forthcoming in addition to that on which the House at the last session, made a solemn decision?

Mr. McKIM said, that he had not the honor of a seat in the last Congress, and consequently could not be expected to have any knowledge of what was then done.

Mr. MAON said, that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. G. JACKSON) could not be serious in his observations, as to what had fallen from the gentleman from North Carolina. If indeed, the gentleman would state a thing upon his own responsibility, in a form in which the House could act upon it, it ought to be noticed. He believed, however, that the gentleman would not undertake to make such a statement; he must have too much respect for himself to do it. Mr. B. said, he believed that if the proposition for the relief of these poor fellows was lost, it would be by means of the gentleman's speech in their favor, and he was extremely sorry for it.

Mr. MAON expressed his disapprobation of the manner in which Mr. JACKSON had noticed Mr. PEARSON'S remarks. He regretted much that his colleague had used such words; and he was sorry that such comments had been made upon them. He had heard such things before; he heard them last session, and those who took part in them were as tired of the business as those who were compelled to hear them. It is well known, said Mr. M., that I am not in the habit of making invidious remarks; but I will observe, that my colleague (Mr. PEARSON) has not long taken his seat in the House, and, being a young member, that a little forbearance on his part would be very proper.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said, he had not reprehended the gentleman's remarks. He meant to say that if they were correct, (and the House ought to inquire into their correctness,) he should come to a very different conclusion on this proposition from what he otherwise should.

Mr. MAON said it had not been the practice of the House to call to the bar of the House any member for what he should say in debate. If I (said Mr. M.) believed that the President had connived at an act which I do not hesitate to avow that I believe he did not, I should feel myself justified in stating it. I for my part never will give one cent of money out of the pockets of those whom I represent, for the relief of those who would enlist with Miranda or any other foreigner. Gentlemen may talk about the innocence of these men. I do not believe that they were innocent. They knew what they were about; the papers of the day were filled with accounts of the great fortunes which they were to make, the hope of which no doubt induced great part of them to go on the enterprise. In proportion to the freedom of men, and of course to their power of intriguing, ought we to guard against such men as these. I feel no compassion for them, no more than I would for a man about to be hung for a crime which merited the punishment of death. I might feel compassion for such a man when seeing him going to the place of execution; but I would never put my hand to a petition for the pardon of a man who had committed murder. Their own word is taken for their innocence. Take his own word for it, and no man was ever guilty. Remember, sir, how many conspiracies you have already had in this country. They began ten years ago to disturb the country; and yet these offenders are to be called peaceable and inoffensive men! The history of all free Governments exhibits the same thing. I have no feeling for them, I repeat. I do not want them back. I wish that they and all other citizens of this country, rich or poor, who would follow the Mirandas, or any other adventurers, were out of it. If all these men, except Captain Lewis and Miranda, were innocent, they have very little of that American feeling which characterizes our citizens and seamen in general, or they would have knocked their employers overboard when they could get to a place where they could do it securely. If their failing to do so is no proof of their guilt, they have been convicted of the crime, and that is certainly some proof. It is true they were treated not quite so bad or a little worse than those who were hung—for I am at a loss to say which fate I should have chosen.

Sir, there appears to be more interest excited on this question than ever was for the fate of any of the many American seamen whipped to death on board British ships of war. Why all this sensibility for this sort of people? I do not want them, sir. They were employed to go—where? With Miranda, they did not know where. I do not believe that any man in the nation could be stupid enough to believe all the stories that are said to have been told them; that they were to be put on board a ship to go to Washington, to guard the mail to New Orleans; as though men could be put on board a ship with a large armed force for that purpose. Those who have more faith than I may give credit to the tale.

Miranda's Expedition.

We have had a great deal of law on this subject, sir, as we often have; and I would not care that I had a little of it, for I think it helps out a bad cause. It is said that the law only punishes the intention. I say we have nothing to do with these men or the degree of their crime. They are at Carthage, and there let them stay.

We are asked to appropriate $3,500, for the purpose of sending for them. Is it possible that $3,500 will be sufficient to send a negotiator to negotiate with the Junta, with Ferdinand, or with Joseph? If it is, we shall send a Minister at less expense than we have ever done before. But put down fifty cents in the appropriation bill, and it will be as adequate as any sum you can name. Begin the work, and you must finish it; that is the short and long of it. It is not the money, though a very good thing in a Government, that I object to. I want all American citizens to know that if they engage in any nefarious transactions, by which their fellow-citizens may be involved in war, the nation will not extend its hand to relieve them from any difficulty they may get into. Let them follow Burr, Miranda, or any one else, and share their fate. The responsibility is as great if you take a cent from the Treasury as if you take a million. I am a thorough-going Committee of Claims man; I will not pay a cent but on principle.

In the neighborhood in which I live we scarcely know law; but, as I understand, a man will be hung for stealing a horse. And notwithstanding all the fine-spun theories on the gradation of punishments, I believe that there are more rogues elsewhere than with us, where we now and then hang a man. I always have contended that the power of pardon is one which in the nature of it will be abused. I had rather always give men a chance, and let them run away.

We are told, too, that these men were opposed to going on board. If so, how did they get on board? Could they not have applied for a writ of habeas corpus? Were there no lawyers, justices of peace, or judges in the city of New York—or were they so totally ignorant of the laws of their country that they did not apply for it? The committee have told us that they are under a persuasion that the allegations of these men were true. This however seems to be wholly a matter of faith, for they have given the House no documents on which they grounded their belief. Sir, I have no faith. I believe if they did not want to go on board they would have got a writ of habeas corpus or some other relief.

This project of the invasion of South America is about twenty years old; something like in England, what was a popular theme among the common people, getting rich in the war by Spanish prizes. And whenever we go to South America, we shall get rich just in the same way. How was it possible that in such a city as New York, where people frequently meet and converse one with another, people should be so totally ignorant of their rights as to suffer themselves to be put on board a vessel without their consent by General Miranda, who had not been here more than six months? I do not doubt the sincerity of the faith of other gentlemen; but I must have my own. The same story does not appear to have been held out to any three of them; but these men are all together, and have an opportunity to compare notes; and it seems that they agree that General Miranda, who was at the head of the gang, assumed the name of Martin. If these men were so averse to the Spanish expedition, why had they not common sense? They would then have told the Spanish Government that they were trepanned and had in vain attempted to make their escape, being compelled to serve in Miranda's expedition. They might then all, or many of them, have escaped punishment.

I had thought that the British Government had owned Miranda—and I believe the late Administration never were charged, whatever else was alleged against them, with acting in concert with the British Government; and I thought that the exposure of this transaction on the trial of Sir Home Popham had completely cleared the American Government from any suspicion of an agency in it.

It has been said that these men are Americans, and entitled to the protection of the nation. I do not doubt that they are Americans by birth; but they have not American feelings. I think less of such men than I do of the foreigner naturalized here, and who yet feels for the country of his birth. This Government was too free for them, and they wished to attach themselves to the fortunes of a foreign despot. They did so; and I am unwilling to give one cent of the public money to relieve them from the situation in which they have placed themselves.

On a motion that the Committee rise, there were for it fifty-two, against it fifty-one. The Chairman tied the vote.

The Committee refused to fill the blank, 49 to 38. The resolution was then agreed to, 43 to 41.

The Committee having risen and reported, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, June 14.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to relinquish and remit the claim of the United States to any moneys arising from the condemnation of the ship Clara, late the property of Andrew Foster and Jacob P. Giraud; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. NEWTON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew Foster and Jacob P. Giraud, also reported a detailed statement of the facts relating to the case of the petitioners; which was read, and referred to the same Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. MORROW, the Committee on the Public Lands were discharged from the further consideration of the report of the Governor and Judges of the Territory of Michigan, referred to them on the sixth instant.

MARITIME JURISDICTION.

Mr. DANA observed on the importance of distinctly ascertaining the maritime jurisdictional line of the United States. He said that the present distance from shore, within which immunity from belligerent search was allowed, was a maritime league. He believed that, as respected the interest of the United States, it was at the option of Government, without any stipulation by treaty, to take a wider range. As respected the distance of a marine league from the shore, of immunity from capture, it might be claimed in any case by the Government of this country, and by all neutral Powers; but for the purposes of Government itself, without being pledged to any other Power, he contended that Government had another claim which it might assume whenever it considered it expedient. Immunity from belligerent seizures might be claimed for a maritime league in every supposable case by a neutral Power. Beyond the distance of a maritime league, in favor of commerce or public revenue, it was at our option to extend the jurisdiction of the United States over all anchorage grounds contiguous, and over all the waters within the headlands along the shore. Viewing it as an optional privilege which the Government of the United States might exercise, he thought it would be clearly for their benefit so to do. He said it would doubtless be recollected, that we had often heard much of the violent death of Pierce, and similar aggressions, but we had heard of no attempt to prevent such in future. His object would be to prevent a recurrence of such collisions. In order to bring this subject before the House in such a manner as could not possibly affect any negotiation now carrying on, he moved as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of adopting any legislative provision respecting the extent of the maritime precincts of the United States, and the safeguard of navigation within the same, and whether, in addition to the existing provision against captures within a maritime league from any part of the shores, it would be proper, by law, to authorize the President of the United States, for the benefit of the commercial interests or revenue thereof, after causing reasonable notification to be given, when he may deem it expedient, to prohibit foreign armed vessels from seizing or molesting any coasting vessel or merchant vessels bound to or from the United States, whenever the same may be in any of the roadsteads of the United States, or in any other waters within sight of land, and within lines extending from one cape or headland to another, along the coasts of the United States; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The House agreed to consider the motion—51 to 20; and passed it without debate—59 to 21.

Messrs. DANA, ROOT, WHITMAN, COBB, and McKEE, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

MIRANDA'S EXPEDITION.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, the House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to adopt the most immediate and efficacious means in his power to obtain the liberation of the prisoners, if it shall appear to his satisfaction that they were involuntarily drawn into the unlawful enterprise in which they were engaged, and that — dollars be appropriated to that purpose.

Mr. UPHAM moved to strike out the words in italics.—Motion lost—ayes 35.

Mr. ROSS said he had revolved this subject in his mind with a view to deciding his vote on it. At first it had appeared to him somewhat doubtful whether it would be proper to take any measures to rescue our unfortunate fellow-citizens. The first objection to this measure which presented itself to me, said Mr. R., was, that it might probably produce an effect calculated to bring others into similar situations, and operate as an encouragement to such expeditions. The next objection which occurred to me was, that it might be proper, on an occasion of this kind, that an example should be exhibited to the citizens of America to show that, whenever they attempted to commit the peace of their country, they would be abandoned to their fate. Further reflection, however, satisfied my mind that neither of those objections is sufficient to induce us to reject the resolution now under consideration.

As to the first objection, that it might hold out an encouragement to others to set out on similar expeditions, I think the severity with which those unfortunate persons have been punished, the sufferings they have undergone, the death of part of their companions, have been such a warning to our fellow-citizens, that nothing is required but that those sufferings should be made known to the country to hold up a warning to future adventurers. How could this fatal precedent operate with equal force as by procuring a return of those unfortunate men to tell the mournful tale to their friends, to tell the difference between the wise and mild administration of the laws of the United States and the liberty of the citizens under it, and the administration of those of the despotic government under which they were punished. A lesson would be taught such as could be taught perhaps in no other way, and which would produce a salutary effect on the minds of our citizens, receiving wisdom from the mouths of those who had obtained it by fatal experience. In that point of view I feel disposed to listen to their prayer.

Another objection to this proposition was, that it was necessary on this occasion that an example should be made, and that this Government should show to the world that they disapprove of proceedings of this kind, and therefore they ought to be abandoned to their fate. Have not examples been made? Have not ten of those men atoned for their offence by their lives, their heads being stuck on pikes and carried through the country? Great indeed must be that thirst for example, haughty and proud that unrelenting spirit, which can be appeased by no atonement of this kind. To me it would appear that atonement was made by the execution of ten individuals; and that by the punishment inflicted on the survivors, atonement has been made sufficient to satisfy the least humane member of society. I therefore suppose that the example is already made, and the men are sufficiently abandoned to the fate which they brought upon themselves.

Before I sit down, sir, I will endeavor to take notice of some of the observations made in the course of yesterday, when this subject was under discussion. I am well aware that men conscious of their own virtue and integrity have less sensibility than those who feel their own failings, towards the misfortunes of others. And while I admire the firmness of the nerve that is steeled to all the feelings which actuate the human heart, I cannot for myself avoid those sensations which are so intimately bound round our hearts by nature's hands. If, therefore, in my vote I shall err in the opinion of cool reason, unadulterated by the finer feelings of the heart, I shall find consolation for the error in the satisfaction of my own breast. I know that in Governments it is right to be actuated by principles of policy and a sound exercise of reason. But a question has arisen whether it be sound policy to adopt the resolution. None of the gentlemen who have spoken have satisfied my mind that it is objectionable on that ground. It seems from the observations of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) whom I congratulate on his feelings, that he views the ebullitions of youth and the follies of inexperience with indifference. He will not hold out the hand to the child which has been led into difficulty. I congratulate the man who possesses those kind of feelings. It would with propriety in my opinion be said that the gentleman might wish he was acquainted with law, supposing it calculated to support a bad cause. The cause in which he was speaking required such support, and therefore his desire is not an unnatural one. What were the objections which were made? Were they of a singular kind or were they bot-tomed on sound principles of policy? To what part of the able argument of the gentleman can you turn your attention and say, that therefore it was impolitic to proceed on the resolution on your table? I endeavored to attend to everything said by the gentleman, and perceived nothing in what he said which had the least tendency to show that it was an impolitic measure. Was it pretended that it could place the Government in an improper situation? It has been said that it is taking money out of the pocket of the Government to relieve villains. This is assuming a point;

I would call misfortunes by a milder name. I would say it was to relieve men led by the follies of youth, and misled by men some of whom were of high repute in the country. When you place the question in this point of view, it appears to me that it wears a very different aspect. I would not with the gentleman say that I would take away the power of pardon, that I would not leave a power of clemency because it might be abused. This would do away all law, because all laws to protect innocence are liable to abuse. It would go to the root of legislation itself.

I would not object to the principles of the resolution, because there were mingled in it some of the principles of mercy. I know that stern virtue may plume itself on sitting aloof from the frailties of human nature: but I also know that every man who has had occasion to associate with his fellow-creatures has had frequent opportunities of knowing the necessity of making great allowances to each other. When Col. Smith, a man high in the estimation of his country, and appointed to high and respectable office, launched into the scheme, and others who are not generally known, when these persons engaged in a plan to entrap men into their schemes, shall it be said that men so entrapped had acted like villains? Will gentlemen say if these innocent men have been led away by the machinations of wicked men, that we should abandon them to their fate? I hope in this country there is too much feeling for the frailties of human nature generally, ever to sanction such a doctrine. Were this case stated to the people of the United States, and an appeal made to their feelings, I venture to pronounce that three-fourths of all our fellow-citizens would be in favor of our making exertions for the release of these men. They were not in the secret of the expedition. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) who spoke in a very clear manner, showed that they were blindfolded, carried into the scheme without knowing its object. It may be said that it was their duty and business to know it. Sir, no prudential motives influence young men in general. Do you expect from them conduct different from their nature? Young men are always aspiring, enterprising. They were, under the influence of Col. Smith, Mr. Ogden, Captain Lewis, and Mr. Fink; led into a measure from which they were induced to expect much benefit, inasmuch as they were to be well dressed, fed, and to have no fighting to do. They did not inquire how it was to be accomplished, because they saw Mr. Ogden employing an independent fortune on this plan. If he would launch his fortune in the enterprise, was it to be supposed that young men would inquire deeply into the matter? Neither till they had been on board of the Leander six days, did one-third of them see Miranda. He never appeared to any of these persons at all till they were placed on ship-board. They were carried to Jacquemel, and then saw too late, they were destined to a purpose which they had not understood.

Gentlemen say that the pretences on which these men were engaged were too ridiculous for

JUNE, 1809.

H. OF R.

belief. Was there not reason to believe that there was danger in our southwest country? And if so, was it extraordinary that a guard should be wanted for the mail? Others were led to believe that they were to do other acts; but till they arrived at Jacquemel they had no idea what was their destination; and after they arrived there they were not told the design of the expedition, that it was to revolutionize the provinces, or what was the nature of the expedition. Here however when they attempted to rescue themselves from their situation, they were closely guarded, and kept under strict discipline. A part of them attempted to make their escape, but after passing ten miles were overtaken and sent back to their ship. Here then is evidence beyond doubt that these young men never entered into this enterprise with any view to attack the Spanish territory. Perhaps, according to the opinion of some gentlemen, a man may be guilty without knowing of his crime; but, according to my ideas, a man must be conscious that he is about to commit some evil act, to stamp criminality on his proceedings. Thus the leaders who conducted this enterprise were guilty, and it is a misfortune to the country that they were not brought to punishment. We see these subordinate persons abandoned by the men who deluded them; we see them lingering in dungeons without clothing, and perishing for want of the common sustenance of life. Can any American, any man possessing feelings common to the human heart, say that he can view them without sensations of pity? The American captains who have been there, advanced them money out of their own pockets; they could not see their distress without shedding tears. And shall this House steel itself against those sensations? Shall it say in cold laconic terms "let the villains suffer." My language should be—

"Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the faults I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me."

I call upon the fathers of the people, who now alone can help them, to step forward. For what good will you suffer them to expire in these dungeons? Why let them remain there to be insulted and oppressed by a domineering people? I hope we shall not do it. Shall it be said that the paltry sum of three thousand five hundred dollars shall be an obstacle to the relief of those men? I hope, sir, that we shall not act on the cool maxims of policy laid down by the gentleman who oppose it. The adoption of it will return these persons to the bosoms of their friends and families to tell the dreadful tale to their countrymen, to warn them of the danger of entering into expeditions against the public peace, and teach them the difference between the mild laws of the United States and the despotic laws of other countries. It will teach them a lesson calculated to produce much good, in my opinion, and to do no harm.

Mr. TAYLOR said if he could view this subject in the light in which it had been viewed by most of its advocates, and particularly by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. PEARSON,) he should think it was the duty of this Government to make exertion for the release of these people; but even then he should inquire whether any exertion in their favor would not rather do them an injury than a service; for it would be recollected that every gentleman who had spoken seemed to consider the mercy which was asked to depend upon and to be bestowed by the United States. Were I a Spaniard, and attended the debate in this House, I should think that gentlemen in favor of the resolution contemplated an infraction of the rights of the nation before whose courts, and by whose laws these men were condemned.—These fine appeals to mercy and humanity would apply well before the Power possessing the right to bestow mercy, but are not applicable to the feelings proper to be exercised on this occasion by this House. I say that it is one of the attributes of Government to punish those who have infringed or broken the laws of the country. These people have been condemned by a Spanish tribunal; it is by that Government alone that mercy is to be shown; and an exertion by this House in attempting to bestow mercy upon these people is an infringement of that right. I challenge gentlemen to show me an instance in the annals of diplomacy of a like nature with this proposition. I recollect one instance, but I have heard no gentleman propose to go so far. Oliver Cromwell, when a member of the British Commonwealth was imprisoned by the inquisition, ordered his admirals to draw up before the harbor and demand his release. This is the only case I have met with in the course of my reading, of an attempt by one nation to relieve criminals condemned by another nation under its own laws. If this view be a just one, it certainly becomes a matter of great delicacy. If this Government had never been by the most secret whisper implicated (unjustly as I firmly believe) in this transaction, still it would have been a subject of the greatest delicacy for the Government of the United States to interfere. What will the Government of Spain, Junta, King, or Governors of Spanish provinces to whom you apply, say to you on this subject? Why they will say—"We have long suspected, we have heard from your own quarter, that you were implicated in this expedition; you now give us proof; you have come forward in an unprecedented manner and interfered in a case with which you have no business, a case which is fully embraced by the sovereignty which we ourselves exercise over our own courts." Will it not at once be inferred that these assertions throughout the United States had been true, and that this Government was implicated or concerned, or, to use the words of yesterday, that this Government had connived at such an expedition? You will but render the sufferings of these people more rigorous. It is not to be conceived, although the gentleman from Massachusetts and others have acquitted the Government of participation, that the Spanish Government will do so also. Why, even in our cool and calm situation, you see that suspicion of the connivance of the Administration is not yet quite done away—and do you suppose, sir, that the Spaniards, against whom repeated expeditions have been made, at a distance from those sources whence conviction might flash upon their minds, will form the same opinion of the subject that we do? Fear forms a bias on their mind; and we form a conviction on the side on which we feel interested.

Gentlemen, in order to induce us to grant pardon to these men, which we have no power to do, have told us that they are innocent; because, forsooth, they themselves have said so. I recollect, sir, once in a conversation with a most eminent barrister in the State in which I live, who had often performed the duty of counsellor and advocate in our State, he informed me that in a practice of thirty years, in the course of which he had been concerned in the cases of many culprits, on many, nay, on all occasions he put this plain question to his client: "I am your counsel; it is necessary for me, in order to make the best possible defence of your cause, to make the best statement in your favor, to know whether you are guilty or not." He declared that he had never yet met with a man who acknowledged that he was guilty. I believe that this disposition to appear innocent is inherent in human nature. It is natural for these men to say that they are not guilty; they said so to the court before whom they were tried. Why were they not liberated? why was not that mercy which is so pathetically called for bestowed on them by that tribunal before whom the case was examined? If they are the immaculate and almost sainted victims which they are described to be, why did not the court which heard the testimony on both sides of the question bestow that clemency asked of us? I should presume, that when all the circumstances came out before the court, they were not favorable to the petitioners; and it is a respect due from this Government to the acts of that Government that such a construction should be put upon this matter. If we are to distrust the acts of the Spaniard, because, as we are told, he is vindictive and cruel, he might justly say that we have not done to others as we would be done by.

We should place the President of the United States in a very unpleasant situation indeed by requiring him to demand these men, if we would not also be willing to go to war for them. As our navy is now afloat I would propose as an amendment to the project, if gentlemen are serious in their determination to rescue these men, that our fleet shall sail before Carthage and compel the Spanish Governor or Junta to give them up. This is the only mode of interfering with a matter of this kind, which is sanctioned by precedent, as I have before stated.

It would seem, sir, as if the passing scenes of this world were entirely forgotten. The British Government has been suspected of having connived at this expedition as well as the Government of the United States; They have received Miranda into their bosom; and on the examination on the trial of Sir Home Popham it did appear that he had received orders to sail for a particular port of that Continent to create a diversion of an attack expected to be made in another part of it. But what have the British Government done on the subject? Have they not considered it a delicate one? Have they not in their conduct given us the most sound and wholesome advice on the subject? Although I believe these men were employed to answer a purpose all important to her, yet she has not extended towards these sufferers in her own cause that clemency which is asked at our hands. These men who were suffering in her employ, demonstrably acting in furtherance of her interest, have not met with the clemency of the Government; and the case is more strong when it is recollected that since the capture of these men, although previously at war with Spain, Great Britain was not only at peace but in alliance with that nation. With all these favorable circumstances, when but a hint from the British Ministry in favor of these people might have released them, yet being so delicate a subject that it has not been touched by them, shall we, who have been crusading and exerting every nerve for the release of our seamen, and with all our efforts have been unsuccessful, shall we start on a fresh crusade for these men, when the efforts of the Government in the other cause, in so noble, so just, and so humane a cause, have as yet proved unavailing? Shall we engage in a contest for these people, who are acknowledged justly to be in the power and under the sentence of the courts of another nation, whilst the honest American tar, guiltless of harm, is writhing under the lash of every boatswain on board a man of war? If you will go on and reform the whole world, begin with one grievance first; to use a homely phrase, do not put too many irons in the fire.

Sir, if the Spanish nation has any feeling for its sovereignty, it would spurn your request. Only suppose that nation to possess the same feelings which actuate every breast in this House; which actuate the American people. Suppose the claim of Mr. Burr to citizenship in Britain, on the ground of once a subject always a subject, had been recognised by the British Government. Suppose that he was suffering in chains in some of your prisons, and because they had heard that Mr. Burr might have been innocent, the British Government had asked his release, would not the people of America have spurned the request as an indignity to the nation? And may we not suppose that these proud Spaniards, as they are called, may have feelings of a like nature? I believe, sir, that the course proposed would only add rigor to their sufferings, weight to their chains.

But it seems that these men are to be called back to the country to tell the tale of their sufferings and horrors. Now, sir, I suspect from the feelings which the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ross) himself has shown, that other feelings would be excited; that if they return they would bring back with them resentment against those who punished them; they would return with information of the state of the country; your interference would convince them that, no matter how nefarious a plan might be, this nation would again stretch out its arm to protect them, and like the petty incursions which the Danes in former days made on the British coast, whatever hard blows are received will only be the motives for a larger band to follow. If the people of the United States would not believe Moses and the Prophets, if they would not already prefer the dull pursuits of civil life to these nefarious piratical expeditions, they would not believe it though these men with their chains came back and told it; though one should rise from the dead and tell it.

On this subject there is but little interest excited in the nation. What have you on the table? What is it that has caused so much debate? The single say-so of these men, themselves implicated in their own testimony. We have no petition from the city of New York, or even from the State, nor from the neighborhood whence the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) comes. The sympathy is all in this House, and whence proceeds it? I charge no man with illaudable motives, but certainly the most noble and godlike motives might be attributed to gentlemen in one quarter of the House from their advocating the proposition, according to the hint given by the gentleman from North Carolina that the Government ought to interfere now, as it was supposed to have connived at it, and no wonder that it excited sensations in another quarter of the House. I thank gentlemen for the intimation which they have given us; it is the same as I would give on any occasion on which I had the feelings which I know that gentleman honestly has on this occasion. I say, sir, that this Government has nothing to do with it; that to pass the resolution would be interfering with the sovereignty of another nation, and in a manner which would only expose our Executive to an insulting reply. The Spanish Governor may justly reply as Brutus to Cassius, "You wrong yourself to write in such a cause."

Mr. LIVERMORE asked if the committee which made this report had not before it evidence that certain British subjects concerned in Miranda's expedition had been liberated on the application of some officers of that nation? If they had, it would be a fair answer to the eloquent speech of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he did not think that the information asked for by the gentleman was at all material to this case. It was a matter of no consequence at all, as respected the statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina on (he had no doubt) very good grounds. What, said Mr. R., has been the situation of Great Britain in relation to Spain? Great Britain, at the time the expedition was undertaken, was an enemy of Spain—was at actual war with Spain—and therefore in a subject of Great Britain it might have been highly meritorious to annoy Spain, either at home or in her colonies to the utmost extent in his power, without any direct authority from his Government. Subsequently to that time, however, Great Britain has become the ally of Spain in consequence of the revolution; and at that time Great Britain obtained from persons exercising the authority of government in Spain the release of these prisoners, which it is perfectly natural Spain should then have granted. But suppose, instead of that change having taken place in the relations between Great Britain and Spain, Bonaparte had quietly succeeded in putting King Joseph on the throne of Spain and the Indies, and application had then been made; or suppose that the application had been deferred until now, and the power of the House of Bonaparte was as complete over the colonies in South America as we have every reason to believe it is over the European possessions of the mother country, would the British subjects in that case have been released? It is an unfortunate circumstance that no question can be agitated in this House and tried upon its own merits; that everything which is, has been, or may be, is to be lugged in on the question before us, to the total exclusion of the merits of the case, and in this way, instead of a session of three and six months for doing the business of the nation, if every question is to be tried in the manner in which it appears to me this has been, we may sit to all eternity and never get through it.

I lay no claim to greater precision than other men; but really I cannot perceive what kind of relation, what kind of connexion exists between most of what I have heard on this subject, and the true merits of the case. Gentlemen get up and abuse the Spanish Government and people, and what then? Why, it appears all this is preliminary to our making an humble request of this Government and people that they shall grant us a particular boon. To be sure, sir, all this time we do plaster ourselves unmercifully—we lay it on with a trowel—and gentlemen seem to think that if we sufficiently plaster ourselves, our President, and people, and be-devil every other Government and people, it is sufficient to illuminate every question. And this is the style in which we speak to Governments perfectly independent of us!—A very wise mean, to be sure, of inducing them to grant the pardon of these people as a favor to us. Sir, it would be a strange spectacle, to be sure, when this Minister that is to be, this sort of anomalous messenger whom you are going to send, I know not exactly to whom; whether to the Junta, or persons exercising the power of government in the provinces, or to the Government in Europe; when this Minister goes to Carthage or elsewhere, if he should carry to the Viceroy along with his credentials a file of papers containing the debates on this question. Why, sir, like Sir Francis Wronghead, we appear all to have turned round. My honorable friend, the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. TAYLOR,) spoke of the crimes of these men. Gentlemen on the other side, who wish them to be pardoned, tell you of nothing but of their innocence, and the injustice of those who condemned them and now have them under punishment. Two more such advocates as have appeared in favor of this proposition would damn the best cause ever brought before any House or any court in Christendom. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) who spoke yesterday, certainly very pertinently, and very handsomely, tells the House that in this case no other money than that of the United States will be received; that, with a sort of Castilian fastidiousness, those persons acting for the Government of Spain will not touch any money which shall not be offered in the quality of public money. I believe no such thing; and moreover I wish it to be distinctly understood that the question of money is not the question with me; and that to suppose it necessary for the Government of the United States to interfere for the purpose of raising so pitiful a sum as $3,500 for the relief of these unfortunate men, whose situation I most seriously deplore, is a libel upon the charity of this country. I believe, notwithstanding the public impression on this subject against the petitioners, that the money could be raised in half an hour in any town in the United States. I believe it might be raised in that time in the city of Washington. It is not a question of the amount of money wanted; it is, whether the Government of the United States shall lend its countenance to persons situated as these unfortunate people are? Sir, had we at that time been at war with Spain, as Great Britain, something might be said in favor of these persons. But we were not at war with Spain, and these men knew it; and I believe they knew at least as well as I know, that when a man is recruited for public service, as they say they thought to be their case, he is immediately taken before a justice of the peace and sworn. This part of the ceremony, however, is not stated to have taken place. To be sure, sir, the gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) said, I believe, everything that could be said in favor of those unfortunate people, and really almost convinced me that we ought to make this interference; but unfortunately for him and for his cause, other advocates rose up in its favor and placed the subject in a situation not only as respects the majority of this House, but as respects that Government with whom intercession is to be made, which will completely foreclose any attempt at relieving the sufferers. It is not possible that the majority of this House, or that the Spanish Government, can be affected in any other manner than with disgust and indignation at such stuff. The gentleman from New York told us that these were ardent young men, who were anxious to go to Caraccas for the purpose, I think, of correcting the despotism which existed in that country; or otherwise, political Quixottes. This, I take it, will operate little in their favor with the Spanish Government, however it may in ours. I confess I feel very little sympathy for those who, overlooking their own country, and the abuses in their own Government, go in search of political adversaries abroad—go tilting against political despots for the relief, I suppose, of distressed damsels compelled to live under them.

Sir, I could not have been induced to say anything more on this question, for I stand in a very invidious position, not at all congenial to my feelings, being compelled to rely on my judgment for support against my feelings. Nothing could have induced me to rise but the very unprecedented manner in which the oldest member, and certainly not the least respectable in this House, has been treated, and the manner in which some assertions (if you will) of mine have been met. It has been stated by a gentleman in his place, that the only proof of the guilt of these persons consists in my declaration to this effect; the naked assertion of one, too, who knows nothing of their innocence or guilt. Let us bring this naked assertion to the standard of common sense and common honesty. Were the ringleaders in this expedition condemned, and did they suffer death on my assertion—an assertion long posterior to the fact? Were the unhappy men now condemned to imprisonment and hard labor convicted on my assertion, on my assertion too, of yesterday? Or, is it so extremely unpardonable for any one to infer the guilt of the accomplices in any transaction, no matter what, wherein the ringleaders have been acknowledged universally to be guilty, have been brought to trial, and have suffered the punishment of their crime? Does not the onus in this instance, although it be in the negative, lie on the condemned? What, sir; they go on an expedition against South America under General Miranda, and, with others, are taken, the ringleaders executed as pirates, as hostes humani generis, as they really were, and these men are to be averred to be innocent men, the only proof of whose guilt consists in the declaration of an individual who has considered them as guilty men, but who feels not the less for them because they have been guilty? In this style is this question to be discussed and decided? One gentleman asserts that the men are perfectly innocent, that the only proof of their guilt rests on the declaration of an individual; and another asserts that they are guilty only under the unjust and arbitrary principles of the Spanish Government, when we have it in proof—the strongest proof that the nature of the case will admit—that, if they are not guilty men, something not much less than a miracle must have been worked in their favor. From the description of their situation given by the gentleman from Massachusetts, on whom, and on the gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) the management of this business appeared to devolve, I think it extremely probable that the resolution, improper as it is, would have passed. The description was forcible which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BAON) gave from his own knowledge of the situation of a man brought up at the same school with himself, and for whom it was natural for him to feel as he does; and I honor the member for so feeling and acting, for, mutatis mutandis, I think it highly probable I should do so too. These men are enlisted by, no matter whom; to go, they do not know where; to do, they do not know what. After getting to sea, they are compelled to go to Caraccas with the commanding officer, whether they will or not. Never before was such a tale invented. It will not bear the touch. The gentleman from New York (Mr. FISK) says that the very insurance offices would not underwrite, because no place was named. And then, we are told that these people were carried to a newly discovered country—a land of promise. I should not wonder, sir, that the insurance officers would not underwrite a voyage to the island of Jacquemel, or that the vessels should never have arrived at their place of destination; for the latitude of that island, with geographers, is at least as uncertain as was the destination of Miranda.

All that I have heard on this subject, except from the gentleman from Massachusetts, or the gentleman from New York on my right, (Mr. EMOTT,) reminds me of speeches which it has been my misfortune to listen to, delivered to ignorant juries, in mitigation of damages. My friend from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) laments that he, too, has not a little law, because he believes that it very often serves to help out a bad argument. Sir, it is one of the indiscretions of which my friend from North Carolina is not destitute, to wish for a little learning, more especially a little learning of the law. I had thought that the history of Jonathan Wild the Great had left an awful memento to posterity that although "a little learning was a dangerous thing," a little law learning is almost equal to a hanging patent. No, sir: God forbid that the natural sense, sterling worth, and real knowledge of my friend from North Carolina, should be baldersdashed by a little, county-court, law learning. It would be impossible for me to estimate him as I do if such were his lot—if he were fated to dress up a flimsy argument on any side of any question on which a man happens to have received a retaining fee. I do not know how it may be with other men, but I do most devoutly pray—not like Oliver Cromwell, to be delivered from Sir Harry Vane—but, that my country may be delivered from leading politicians in the persons of second rate lawyers. They have been tried in other countries, and it has been found that first-rate lawyers would not answer for politicians. If they will not, in the name of common sense, what are second, third, fourth, and fifth rates to make? I do not know, as I have said already, how it may be with other men, but, whenever I hear men of a certain description get up to speak in a public assembly, I am almost reminded of an observation made of a learned and witty man, who, when he rose to speak on a subject, said "Well now;" and was then supposed to be considering what he should say. And I, sir, never see a man of a certain description rising to speak on a great national question, but it appears to me that he is balancing for want of the make-weight of a fee.

Mr. FISK.—I rise, principally, sir, for the purpose of noticing a criticism made on a remark which fell from me in debate yesterday, relating to the attempt made by the petitioners while on the voyage from New York to South America to escape from the power of Miranda. I stated, that while at the island—at Jacquemel—they made this attempt, but were frustrated in their endeavors and compelled to go on board; as this port had been mentioned by other members of the committee, and was referred to in the report then under consideration, little doubt would remain as to the place intended, or the object for which I noticed it; and I then observed the distinguished gentleman from Virginia noting down the remark, with a significant smile, apparently much pleased. I presumed he understood me to have said "the island of Jacquemel." And I did not feel disposed to lessen the gratification that gentleman might feel from his having so understood me. I was willing to afford that gentleman all the pleasure and all the honor he could desire, together with all the consideration he might acquire with this House, and with this nation, from having, by his superior knowledge, in his place in this House, discovered and corrected an imaginary or real geographical mistake, of such immense moment and infinite concern to the people ("God bless them!") of this country.

If in the course of debate any member in mentioning a place incidentally connected with the question, to be decided and noticed by others, referred to in the report before the committee, should call a part of the island of St. Domingo the Island, I should think the blunder was made inadvertently or ignorantly. If inadvertently, that it was unworthy of the notice of any critic, however profound. If ignorantly, that it was beneath the animadversion of any honorable member of this honorable august body; unless I may be permitted to except the exception, the distinguished member from Virginia on my right, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) But whether Jacquemel is an island, a port, or a continent, was as immaterial to the inquiry then before the committee, as this criticism is foreign to the merits of the question now under consideration, or the remarks about the "building or rebuilding of the north wing of the Capitol, together with our chairs, tables, and bulkhead windows," were from a question touching the sale of the gunboats, or the reduction of the Army.

Mr. KNICKERBACKER said as he intended to vote for the proposition, he deemed it proper to assign his reasons for so doing. A principal reason was that these men had engaged in Miranda's expedition, not knowing it to be of a hostile character; and this fact, he said, sufficiently appeared from the testimony which had been quoted from the trial of Ogden and Smith. The fitting out of the armament, too, had been carried on in the most public manner, an officer of the Government being concerned in it. Miranda, the man from whom the whole emanated, was not known as being concerned to the unfortunate persons now suffering slavery in Carthage. The man who had enlisted these men (Fink) had promptly answered when questioned, that he himself was not informed of the nature of it, though he had asked for information of the real object of the expedition. The tale which had been told them appeared to be such a one as was calculated to seduce young men into the scheme. They had been told that it was an expedition under the authority of the Government, and had been engaged also under different pretences. In this point of view, not knowing that they were about to violate the laws of the United States when they embarked, Mr. K. said they could not be considered as highly criminal.

But gentlemen have said that these men ought never to have embarked in a concern of this nature without knowing its extent. Mr. K. said it was not common for young men to inquire minutely into the nature of anything from which they expected to receive a benefit. It always would be found when men were enlisted in the service of the United States, and the time of marching came, that they would be unwilling to go, and a reluctance to the service was on such occasions displayed, which had not been felt before the time of separation. Their reluctance to go on this expedition, therefore, when it was about to proceed, did not, Mr. K. said, argue that they possessed a knowledge of the design of it. It appeared to him rather that those men had been mistaken in the nature of the expedition, which, from its being conducted in so public a manner, they could not suppose to be hostile to the laws of the United States. Mr. K. said it was not his business here to approve or disapprove of whatever concern the Government might have been supposed to have in it. He should not, therefore, examine it; he hoped that the Government had no concern in it; but the open manner in which it was conducted might be a ground why those young men had no reason to believe that it was not an expedition authorized by the Government of the country. It had been stated to them, indeed, probably with a view to deceive them, that the Government was concerned. Miranda himself had not been seen by them. The first knowledge they had of him was some time after they had got to sea, when Miranda appeared under the assumed name of Martin. They were carried to Jacquemel, and, whilst there, exercised and trained in a military manner. Some of them discovered a wish to leave the vessel; they had begun to suspect that some improper design was on foot. They attempted to make their escape; but the only result of their effort was closer confinement. I say that these men have erred, but the question is, quo animo? Did they knowingly and willingly err? It appeared not. Mr. K. quoted the evidence given on the trial of Messrs. Smith and Ogden to show that the men who enlisted had no knowledge of where the expedition was bound to; because even the person who employed them knew it not; and also to show that these men might well suppose that the Government was concerned in it, having been told so by Colonel Smith. Mr. K. said he wished not to be understood himself as implicating the Government of the United States; he hoped they were innocent.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. TAYLOR) had said that the House should not show partiality to these men; that they were not worthy of the attention of Government; that they ought to have their claims rejected, because, if there were no other motive, it might set a precedent which might be dangerous in future; and that, if the House did interpose, it would wound the feelings of the Spaniards, and prefer the relief of those men to that of our impressed seamen in British vessels. Mr. K. said he lamented that our seamen were in distress and mercilessly dealt by; but because they are suffering, is that any reason why the House should not interpose in behalf of those who now petitioned them? It was no reason because others suffered, that a deaf ear should be turned to the prayer of any sufferers, or that those should not be relieved who were now immediately the subjects of consideration.

Mr. K. said he did not know but he had already trespassed sufficiently on the time of the House; but he was not in the habit of apologizing for such trespasses. He said he had assigned the reasons which he had thought it his duty to do as a representative of the district whence he came. He thought this an important question. Let us not, said he, treat the committee on this petition with that neglect which some gentlemen wish to do. They have reported a resolution; they state that under the persuasion that the facts stated by the petitioners are substantially true, they are in favor of assisting the men. And, sir, under a full view of all the circumstances, I am induced to say that these men merit the interposition of the House, and have already endured sufficiently for the crime which they committed; and I trust they will find that mercy which we, in similar cases, would hope to be shown to us.

Mr. HOLLAND said if this case were to be judged by the expressions of gentlemen in the House, it might be supposed that the offence of these men was one of the most aggravated crimes that could have been committed; that there was no crime of so high a nature, no offence of so deep a die. But what was their crime, and of what were they guilty? What was their destination? To know the crime it was necessary to know the object of it—and what was it? It was nothing more or less than going to some of the provinces of Spain in South America, in order to revolutionize them. This then was the object and this the crime—a design to revolutionize the provinces. Has the revolutionary spirit always been considered a crime of the deepest malignity? Certainly it has not. To those who believe that monarchy and despotism are favorable to human happiness it might appear a crime; to others, it seems to me, that it should not. We have heard of persons coming from Europe, long before we were independent or had so declared ourselves, for the express purpose of engaging in an act of this kind, to revolutionize the country and better the situation of these then provinces. At that period I well remember it was not considered a crime of deep die. Pulaski, Kosciusko, and I believe Lafayette and others came forward,

Miranda's Expedition.

H. OF R.

It was true that we had commenced the work, but they of their own free will and without the order of their Government, came and joined us here.

At the time Miranda's expedition was set on foot we were not very amicable with Spain, and this might influence persons taking a superficial view of the subject to suppose that it was no such great crime. If they had succeeded in their attempt, and liberated the provinces (and I hope they soon will become free provinces) they would have been considered the benefactors of mankind; they would have received the thanks of all the friends of humanity; but, poor fellows! they were defeated. In going with a design to revolutionize the Caraccas, they might have gone with patriotic motives. As to the crime itself, it is not of that deep die which ought to damn them for ever. It is not a moral crime, but may be considered a political crime. The United States being at peace with Spain, perhaps it was impolitic and improper for them to go forward on such an expedition. We have been told that all the officers concerned have, been executed, and that the persons remaining are only common soldiers. Supposing that these persons went with their eyes open on the expedition, the question would be, have they not suffered enough? Has not the cup of vengeance been drained to the bottom? They have suffered enough, sir, and if by an act of mine I could relieve them, I would. This is the view of the subject which I take, supposing them to be as criminal as gentlemen say. But, if they be not guilty, they certainly have a much stronger claim, not to the mercy, but to the justice of the House. If they did not know that they were to be carried to the Spanish provinces, they are innocent. To my mind nothing is more easy to conceive than that it was politic for the officers to keep them in ignorance, and I must view them as innocent men. Nor shall any apprehension of committing the late or present Administration prevent me from doing that which I believe to be right. Whether the Administration connived at the expedition, is not now the question. It is impossible to consult my own feelings, and not to say that these persons ought to be released. One innocent person in captivity would induce me to vote $3,500 for his release. What is that paltry sum in comparison with the relief of an innocent man? Nothing. How much less then ought we to hesitate when upwards of thirty persons are involved?

But it is said that the request for the relief of these men will be an indignity to the Spanish Government. I cannot conceive it. It proceeds on the ground that they were innocent in the outset; and under these circumstances we apply for their release. Will the ruling authority, be it what it may, be dissatisfied with this application? They are not detained there from political views—no such thing. The whole were tried as pirates, and condemned. No particular act was proved against them; they were viewed as pirates and as belonging to no nation; and of course remain under a sentence of confinement. But if they were claimed as deluded citizens of any nation, would it be an indignity to Spain for that nation who claims them to ask for their release? The Government of Spain will see that we come forward in the cause of humanity, and will feel themselves honored by an opportunity of favoring it.

I agree with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) in one respect. I, too, have been entertained with a variety of arguments which have no relation to the case. I have listened to gentlemen making long arguments without appearing to know what was before the House. I have heard it, and may myself be guilty of doing the same. My argument is this: that, even if guilty, their sufferings have expiated their offence; and that, if innocent, we are doubly bound to relieve them. What honorable gentlemen in the House will say that, amongst the whole thirty-six, there was not one who enlisted without knowing what was the object of the expedition? If we have a doubt of their knowledge, the doubt would amount to an acquittal, and would authorize our application for their release.

Sir, had I been a young man, and had nothing else to engage in, I should myself have been happy to join a number of brave fellows in emancipating an enslaved country—and the provinces of South America are in a miserable situation, and there is no danger of worsening them by any change. But, supposing this not to be correct, the suffering situation of these men calls upon the justice and humanity of the House for relief. It is true that, last year, I was not in favor of these men. From a suggestion that they were not American citizens, I voted against the proposition for their release; but I am here informed by gentlemen personally acquainted with some of them, that they were raised near their doors, and are well-meaning men. And, for fear of a paltry sum of money, of giving confirmation to ridiculous suspicions of our Government having connived at the expedition, or of offending any foreign Government, shall we withhold this relief? I hope not, sir.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he had no idea of bringing down upon the country the vengeance of the Spanish Government by the proposed application, or of attaching such importance to it. The simple case, said he, is this. We are informed that a number of our countrymen, children of the same family, are now suffering the most horrid punishment that the human frame is capable of enduring. I conceive it possible that, on this occasion, my feelings would carry me too far; as no judge could sit and pass sentence on his own son. I profess to be a man who has a feeling for his fellow-men, especially for his fellow-citizens, and not to have those qualms which would induce me to look very nicely into such a question as this, when a decision might relieve my fellow-citizens. The proposition is simply to request the President of the United States, if he be satisfied that these men were involuntarily drawn into the expedition, that he will apply the most efficient means in his power to effect their liberation. I merely wish to send an agent to attempt to procure the release of these men. There is a fact which ought to have weight on the decision of this question, viz: that, after these men were condemned to this imprisonment, a British vessel arriving near there, hearing that some were British subjects, made application for their release, and those that were such were liberated. And the American citizens would be liberated if applied for. I do not much imagine that they would support a despotic Government here, or that their sufferings would excite other people to revenge their cause. I do not imagine that any further benefit can arise from the further confinement of these poor fellows. They have been there three years; and must, even if we agree to liberate them, remain a considerable time longer. A part of them will have to remain five years longer, unless relieved, and some perhaps longer still. It is too much, sir, to be so punctilious on this question, to descant so much on taking this money from the pockets of our constituents. I can easily conceive that money must go from the Government, because the application is to be made by the Government. I should have thought, this being the cause of humanity, that nothing real and substantial could have been objected to it; nothing which could have drawn out the discussion for an hour.

Mr. RHEA next spoke at length on this subject. It had been said that these men were induced to go from the expectation of acquiring great wealth. It had been also said that they had been employed under the pretence that they were to guard the mail to New Orleans. Was it in that employment that they expected to acquire such great wealth? The inconsistency of these stories, Mr. R. said, was too palpable. Gentlemen had said they believed them innocent. But a tribunal of competent authority had found them guilty of one of the greatest of crimes, piracy, and as pirates they had been taken and condemned. This House was not the tribunal to judge of the propriety of their punishment.

The gentleman, (Mr. HOLLAND,) who made a talk behind me, said Mr. R., has used a curious argument. He says that these men were employed in a design to revolutionize South America. But, says the gentleman, it is no crime to revolutionize the Government of the Spanish provinces, because it is despotic. This is the most extraordinary argument I ever heard; and it is strange that no gentleman has before discovered it. This must have been the grand discovery which induced the gentleman himself to change his mind. According to his doctrine, it is a glorious thing to revolutionize any Government. Sir, what have the people of this Government to do with the despotic Government of South America, or with any other Government? Upon cool deliberation, the gentleman must renounce the idea, as unworthy to be held out by any gentleman on this floor. I grant that the question is, have these persons committed any wrong? The gentleman says that they have violated no moral right; that it is merely a political sin. Mr. R. here compared the idea of a distinction between a moral and a political sin. Away with all appeals to the passions in this case, said he, for they only obscure the true view of the subject. If these men had been taken fighting for their own country, or on board armed or unarmed vessels of the United States, or taken by force from their own country, the President would have claimed them, as it would have been his duty to have done. But that not being the case, the United States had no right to interfere with them.

When gentlemen talked about sensibility, humanity, and all these things, let them recollect that the people of the United States are interested in this subject. What would have been the event if these people had prospered in their undertaking, if Great Britain, in whose cause they were employed, had been able to have induced them to make war upon the United States in consequence of this attempt to invade the dominions of a Power in peace with the United States? Would not this have involved this nation in war? Let our sensibility be excited, said Mr. R., when we contemplate that these nefarious desigus were thwarted. Let us rejoice, and not undo what we have done by giving a vote to relieve these men, who actually chose to be no longer citizens of the United States, not showing their disposition in words but in deeds. I am unwilling now to admit their claim to citizenship. It is the principle, not the money, which I regard.

Mr. COOK said he differed on every point with the gentleman last up. The idea that the application would involve the country in war was altogether erroneous; for, in fact, it was a private expedition which, at any time, would have been, and indeed had been, wholly disavowed by the Government of the United States. If guilty of intention to commit the crime, these men would have been punished as the ringleaders were. There being no proof of their guilt, they were imprisoned, because it would not do to release them after their being landed there as a hostile force. In this state of things, Mr. C. said we certainly should interpose.

Mr. PEARSON.—This discussion, I hope, is drawing to a close, but I cannot consent to dismiss it, without submitting a few observations, which I conceive due to myself, due to my friends, and not inconsistent with the obligations I am under to this assembly. When I took my seat in this House, I thought it a fortunate, a propitious moment—a new political era had arrived—a time had come which, if met with proper dispositions, and well improved, ancient feuds might be done away, and that harmony, that good will, and that unanimity, once more restored, which is so essential to the welfare and prosperity of this Republic, and which, for some time past, had nearly been driven from this land. With such sentiments and dispositions, to which I still hope to adhere, was my regret to hear a venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) not only make an unfavorable interpretation of my language, but also do injustice to my motives. I had hoped, and do still indulge the belief, that a majority of this House were perfectly satisfied with my language and motives, but I felt no reluctance, on the contrary, I was cheerful in making such an explanation as I did deem fair to myself, and satisfactory to every member of this House. Then, sir, what was my surprise, what my sensibility and astonishment, to find certain gentlemen, and particularly a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JACKSON,) who I do not now see in his seat, but who, I hope and believe, is in my hearing; if he is not, I will be ready to repeat every syllable I utter; what, I say, was my disappointment, to find that gentleman not satisfied even with my explanation; not disposed to interpret my expressions liberally and ingenuously; but agitated, quickened, and roused, as if some demon, some evil spirit had rushed through these walls, and threatened us with destruction. This gentleman immediately moved the Committee to rise, alleging that information had been given by a gentleman from North Carolina, which demanded consideration, as implicating the conduct of some of the late officers of Government, and which might be proper to be disclosed by calling the gentleman from North Carolina to the bar of this House as a witness, and for this object he expressed a wish that time would be given for consideration until to-morrow. Although I did not conceive the language and proposition of the gentleman as directly insulting, yet, from the time and manner of those remarks, together with the circumstance of my having been only a few days a member of this House, I could not forbear to apprehend that more was intended than expressed; and, taking all the circumstances together, were well calculated to produce unpleasant sensations, if not a wound to my feelings.

Miranda's Expedition.

I had imagined that gentlemen of ordinary understanding would have seen that the circumstances stated by me, respecting the conduct of some of the officers of the late Administration, were not given as facts within my own knowledge, to which I might be called to depose, and that the conclusion I drew of their probable knowledge of Miranda's views, was not an assertion of their participation in his plans, but an inference deducible from facts and circumstances before the public. If the discriminating powers of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) did not admit his comprehending this distinction, it is his misfortune, not my fault. Permit me now to say, to my country I shall always obey a call of duty; where its interests require, I hope to be found. And the gentleman, whom I perceive is now before me, may know that, not only the call of my country shall be obeyed, but also any private call which it may be honorable to meet.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he had indeed observed that he conceived it proper that the groundless and slanderous charge should be made openly, and not covertly avowed; but, when he had recollected a moment, he had conceived it not worthy of notice. And I cannot conceive (said Mr. JACKSON) how gentlemen, when they say that they feel themselves offended, should lay themselves open again. I hold myself responsible anywhere for anything which I have said.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that there were two important points which he had intended to have touched upon when up before, but which had nevertheless escaped his recollection. He had no sooner returned to his seat than they had occurred to him. The first was a Constitutional question—how far it was competent to the House to direct the Executive as to the object of any particular negotiation? Or, in other words, how this House can direct the Executive to open a negotiation on any one subject whatever? We have heard in this House, said Mr. R., objections, the most fastidious, to an expression of our opinion as to the conduct of the Executive on that which has already taken place. How much more strongly will these objections apply to the power of this House to direct the attention of the Executive to that which has not taken place? I wish it to be understood that I consider the House as the great Constitutional adviser of the Executive, and that I feel no conscientious scruples on this head. On the contrary, if I thought proper, I would at once move that the Executive be requested to open a negotiation, and pledge the House to make good the expenses; but I know that there are members in this House who hold this to be one of the most detestable heresies; who conceive that the Executive is wholly independent of us, and that, although he may recommend measure to us, we have no right to interfere with him in the most remote degree. I wish, therefore, to impress on the minds of gentlemen who have heretofore felt these scruples, the magnitude of the Constitutional question involved in the report of the committee as to our right to pass the resolution. And there is a sort of subsidiary point involved which it may be as well to take into consideration; and that is, whether the matters in dispute between us and France are so few, and of a nature so trivial, that the adjustment of those matters may be safely burdened with, not a demand, but an asking, on our part, of a very great matter of special favor of that Government? For I perceive that we cannot send this agent without acknowledging the independence of the colonies of South America, and then involving ourselves in a war with France, or addressing ourselves, in the first instance, to the Government of France. And I wish to ask of the House whether our situation is perfectly smooth, whether we tread on velvet with that nation? And whether this matter should be thrown into the scale of difference?

There is another point on which I meant to be explicit and full. It has been assumed as a principle that, provided the Government of the United States (understanding by this expression the Executive Government) did sanction the expedition of Miranda, this House is bound in duty or honor to interpose in behalf of these people. That is a position which I do most peremptorily deny. If the Executive Government of the United States (I argue only hypothetically) did countenance the expedition, it acted contrary to law and to its duty; and there is no obligation, on the part of this House, to support the Executive Government, whenever it departs from the obligations of law. For what is that but to say that, if the Executive Government choose to make war against any nation, we are immediately bound to vote lives and fortunes to carry it on; that, in fact, there is nothing which the Executive, without our knowledge or consent may sanction, that this House may not be called upon to confirm. This is a doctrine to which I can never subscribe.

As I am up, sir, permit me to discharge a very small part of the obligation which I owe to the gentleman on my left, (Mr. FISK,) at the same time premising that I see, with concern, the spirit which has manifested itself on the right of the House. Without imputation or blame on any gentleman in the House, I am sorry that it should have been manifested. Surely, I am under no small obligation to the gentleman on my left, (Mr. FISK,) and I beg leave to discharge a small part of it. The bare recital of the marks of attention which I have received from that gentleman, I am afraid would call a blush into his cheek. I owe it him as a member of the minority, for having, when he first set foot on this floor, deigned to answer (in what manner it does not become me to say) speeches which I made years ago—it is a debt of gratitude I owe him for having come into this House to do that which, I presume, the talents of this House were, in the gentleman's opinion at least, incompetent to execute. Does the gentleman expect, sir, that I mean to quibble with him about a phrase? Shall I object to the poor come-off which the gentleman claims for having said, "when these people were at Jacquemel"—a species of phraseology which I venture to say was never heard before this day. Should we say "at the Island?" Speaking of Blannerhasset's Island, or any little spot like it, we might use that language; but, "at the island of Jacquemel," is a species of phraseology which I never heard of before this day.

Again, sir—After having so pointedly pitted himself as the leader of the majority of this House (and I congratulate it on the accession of talent it has received against a single individual who certainly has no ambition of breaking a lance with a gentleman of such superior prowess) did I owe him nothing for the especial notice and countenance which he chose to bestow upon me? I might have attempted to repay it in an awkward way—I did attempt to set the gentleman right in his—I will not call it French, for it would have disgraced any black letter Norman—and to correct him in geography caps my error. Let me entreat hereafter that the gentleman will select an adversary more worthy of his powers, one from whose defeat and chastisement he might derive more honor; he might find such a one even in his own delegation—the gauntlet has been fairly thrown, but I have not perceived that it has been accepted. Poor minority men! their fate indeed is hard; they are not only compelled to bear the weight of their own errors (for who is exempt from error?) and all the errors of their opponents and of those who administer the Government, and the frailties of gentlemen of a different political description who sometimes act with them, and their own too, the misfortunes of their country and the defeats in Europe, and all the disasters in this our country and in the whole world—but they are selected as the objects of the especial enmity of the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISK.) That it is the calamity which fills up the measure of their woes; that it is for which nothing can possibly make amends. Nos poma natamus—what a dust we make! What a dust the gentleman has kicked up—and how we apples do swim! Did the minority elect Mr. Jefferson? I can tell the gentleman—yes, sir, they did; it was a minority when the measures were taken to produce the election; and the characters who had a hand in it have many of them composed a minority since. I have no claims in that way—but I will at least ask the gentleman from New York to bare his bosom and show his political scars; to tell the victories he might have won, the battles he might have conquered—and I will show at least as high a claim as that gentleman. In both elections of Mr. Jefferson the minority had their weight, although at the last election that weight could not be felt.

I hope, sir, that the gentleman from New York and myself have now settled our accounts; if not it remains for him to keep it open to the end of the chapter, on his part. Like my friend from North Carolina, I too have a sort of alacrity in getting into a minority, as great as ever honest Jack Falstaff had in sinking—and, to tell the truth, I am so wrong-headed as to take a pride in it, that I never have been and hope in God I never shall be found to join a set of men, in their triumph, of whose adversity I was afraid to partake. If I desert the camp, it shall not be when we are at short allowance and overmatched by a victorious enemy; it shall not be for motives of gain, to partake of the profit of the strongest side, and then to be the first trumpeter on that side. In short, sir, to come at the point more directly, the most rancorous men now in public life as politicians of the majority, are the men who were of the other party when Mr. Jefferson was first elected, whose election has been lugged into debate, I know not why or wherefore. And sorry am I to say, that the stronger party, defalcated and purged of its dross and lees—for straws show how the wind blows; certain materials always go with the current—I am sorry to say that that party sometimes gives us cause to blush, I do not say on what account. Adversity is a fine thing; it toughens men; and in 1798-9, there were as many honest men in the Republican party, although it was a minority, as there are now.

But, enough of all this. I hope, sir, that the proneness to get into a minority, of which my friend (Mr. MACON) complains, will not deter him from the course which he has so long and so honorably pursued—I mean the keeping his eyes singly fixed on the public good. Rely upon it, Mr. Speaker, the people of this country have begun to open their eyes. Great as their influence is, newspapers have lost much of their weight. The people begin to judge of propositions, not so much from the popularity of the man from whom they come as from their intrinsic value; that it is not their interest to be played off by one faction against another faction, when, in fact, let whatsoever faction will be in power, it is the people who must always rule. It is they from whom the wealth and emolument and office is drawn. They begin to see through this trick—

Miranda's Expedition.

The SPEAKER observed that he must confess he could not see how the gentleman from Virginia could apply his observations.

Mr. RANDOLPH sat down.

Mr. FISK proceeded to speak—

Mr. RANDOLPH wished to know if his sitting down to give an opportunity to the Speaker to make his decision on the point of order had precluded him from proceeding?

The SPEAKER said he had decided that it was improper to speak of factions in this country. He hoped the gentleman's good sense would enable him to distinguish between what was consistent with order and what was not.

Mr. RANDOLPH said the Speaker had thrown him into a great dilemma. He had a problem to work, which might puzzle Euclid himself; that was, in replying to the remarks of other gentlemen, to ascertain how far his remarks in this House were in order.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman would observe that he had not been called to order when replying to what other gentlemen had said; for he was speaking of factions, a subject not before introduced into debate.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had heard of nothing but factions for two or three days past. He was sorry so much had been said; and it was because factions had been brought almost in hostile array against each other, that he had found it unnecessary to say anything. A gentleman the other day, to be sure, gloried in being a party man. This, said Mr. R., may have led to this sort of discussion; it certainly was not begun by me, and nothing could have induced me to partake in it but the extraordinary manner in which it was introduced. I wish to discuss this question on its merits; and should have been happy heretofore to have witnessed the interference of the Chair. I do not see how it is possible to get along, unless we stick to the question itself, in which case there is no occasion for any reply at all. Now it is necessary sometimes to rebut that which gentlemen advance as having great weight on the minds of others. I hope this is not a party question. Certainly, if it is, I shall vote in such a way as to promote the interests of my country; that is my object, but it incidentally happens that I shall at the same time sustain the reputation (as far as it is involved in Miranda's affair) of the late administration of our Government. In short, sir, I feel myself so circumstanced as to thinking whether what I am about to advance will, in the Speaker's opinion, fall under the imputation of disorder, and am trying to make a distinction between it and what has been advanced by other gentlemen. I recollect a case in Philadelphia, in which the present Chief Justice of the United States was one party, and a gentleman from Virginia another. The Chief Justice made a speech, which the gentleman from Virginia attempted, very unsatisfactorily to the House, to answer. The gentleman from Virginia was pronounced out of order. He took his seat, and then this question arose: If it was out of order in my colleague to discuss it, was it not a fortiori, or rather, a priori was it not out of order for the Chief Justice to introduce them? And the gentleman had permission to proceed. The House has had too much of what a (not very accurate) gentleman called mulcaginous matter; and, with a former member of this House, I shall be glad to see matters restored to a state of statu quo; that we should set out again, as we began yesterday; that this question might be considered and decided on its intrinsic merits; that hardness of heart and all uncharitableness should not be imputed to my worthy friend before me; that we should take up this thing and settle it on these points: 1st. Supposing these men to be innocent, and to bring proofs of it, does not the fact of their having petitioned serve in some degree to mitigate the representations we have heard of the severity of their situation? After discussing the proposition on the supposition that they are innocent, let us argue it on the supposition that they are guilty, which unquestionably must be assumed as a fact until the contrary is demonstrated. These men are the agents, the accomplices of the guilty. To be sure, they may tell us, like the geese in the fable, that they are not swans; but what does that avail, when they have been found trespassing on the cornfields of the farmer? Their being involved in the scheme by swans who could fly away and escape punishment, does not alter the question of their accountability. Then, sir, there is the Constitutional question on which I have no scruple myself; then there is the expediency of the thing, and the example which it holds forth to society. If we discuss it upon those grounds; if I could be brought to believe that these men are innocent, or that, if guilty, which I believe them to be, no public detriment of a serious nature would result from our interference, even I would vote for the resolution, for my feelings are with their sufferings, I wish them released, but I would annex a condition, viz: that they should never return to the United States. I would be glad that they were released; I have no sentiment of hatred or uncharitableness towards them. And whatever may be said or thought of my friend from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON), I believe he would go as far to relieve human misery in any shape as any member of this House. In relation to the resolution, if the President is not inclined, I presume that neither the passage of the resolution, or of a bill in pursuance of it, would compel him to apply for the liberation of these persons.

Mr. MACON said he should not again have risen had not his name been brought into debate. What he had said yesterday, he would repeat to-day, notwithstanding the congratulations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross.) I, said Mr. M., in this House, never said a word to injure any man's feelings; this is not the place to do it. I repeat that I have no more charity or feeling for men who undertake to do acts by which the nation shall be placed in a state of war, than for the wretch who would murder his mother. I dare say always what I think on this question and any other; and I will say it. I said yesterday, and I say it again to-day, that I was opposed to giving any man under the sun, the power of pardon. The power of pardon is copying after a Government which has no analogy to ours; and the opinion which I have expressed against it, is not one which I have taken up in haste, but one which I have long entertained. I appeal to any man who has ever attended to the exercise of this power of pardon, if it be not abused nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand. The Government of our country ought to be more cautious of the exercise of this power than of any other. Let a free man of a free country be convicted of a crime for which he ought to lose his life, and he becomes an enemy to his country if he be pardoned. No one will receive the outcast, and he is ready to follow any Catiline who appears. These opinions may be singular, but I know they are honest. If they do not follow a Catiline, what becomes of them? They get into your army or navy. I want them not there; they will always be industrious to make proselytes to their nefarious practices.

In the course of this discussion, much reliance has been placed on the man who was one of the party, and turned a sort of State's evidence. Of all witnesses in the world I would trust them the least. According to the old proverb, "honesty among rogues."

Sir, you may try to laugh at "Roman virtue," till you get it out of countenance; but it is that stern virtue on which every Republic depends. All Republics that ever did or will exist, must depend on that stern or Roman virtue. To take a thing half right or half wrong is not according to my creed. I was always rather foolhardy—neck or nothing; and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) need not fear that I shall depart from it as long as I have common sense. I had rather be in the majority than in the minority, but I will never go there for the sake of being in one.

As to the money involved in this business, I do not bring it up as an objection. It is the advocates who bring it up. But my colleague (Mr. HOLLAND) has made a new discovery, not only that these men are innocent, but that they are deserving men, because they went crusading in the cause of liberty. Sir, let us take care of home first. When we can do more than support our own liberty, we may go a crusading. We are in a situation, the gentleman seems to think, to go into a general battle, to revolutionize South America; and, after that, to take British India, I suppose. It is something strange that we, who are opposed to the resolution, are called upon to prove them guilty. They went on an unlawful expedition, and are taken in the fact. I have no charity for evil-doers. I have heard nothing said of their repentance, though a good deal of their sufferings.

Some how or other the election of Mr. Jefferson has got into debate. The people in the State which I represent, know what part I took in that. I never was mealy-mouthed in it; and gentlemen who were then here, to whom I am opposed in politics, but with whom I have no enmity, will say if I did not contribute my mite to produce it. But I know that a great many people who were thought very slack then are making a great deal of noise. I like toleration in politics as well as in religion; and I can say, and I believe truly, for the honor of the State in which I live, that office is not there the object of the people. No man was ever turned out of office there for his politics alone. From what I have seen of this Government, and I hope I shall be permitted to state it, let a party only come in by a squeeze, and they will soon have a monstrous majority. But, notwithstanding the late President and his Council were divided in opinion on some points, though many (not Federalists) were willing for him to go out, he held his popularity throughout.

Sir, I do not like these indirect wipes, by "congratulating" me on my feelings. Let gentlemen come boldly out.

Mr. ROSS said he certainly should be the last man to cast any insinuations against the gentleman who had just sat down; and if he had not expressed himself in such a way as to be understood, he would observe that he meant no ridicule, no irony. He had stated that some gentlemen possessed sterner virtues than others, and were, therefore, more insensible to the feelings of humanity.

Mr. MACON continued.—My affections are not scattered over the world; they are tied to the land which gave me birth. One time I have been called a Frenchman, another time an Englishman but I knew this mad would not stick to me. What do we want with these men here? Is any gentleman willing that they should associate even with their servants? No, sir; much less will they let them come among them. If they were but poor and honest, every man in America would admit them as freely as if they were the richest men. Their object was to put us in a state of war with Spain, I believe. They have gone into Spain, and there they may stay, for an example. I neither want any nation to interfere with us, nor to interfere with them. All I want is, hands off. What do you want with men with whom nobody will associate? Do you want an Ishmaelite in the midst of Israel? But some gentlemen's feelings are so tender that they cannot bear to know that these men are in prison. In some of these States, and Pennsylvania for one, they keep culprits imprisoned at hard labor, and call it a mild punishment. And I will take the opportunity of stating that I am not so friendly to penitentiaries since Virginia has had one, which has brought the experiment nearer to me. I believe that people will steal there when they would not steal with us; for, although the power of pardon is exercised sometimes, we now and then hang a man. You may moralize until you demolish law. My system of democracy is that law, when made, shall not be broken. Make your Executive above law, and this will no longer be a Republican Government, but will assimilate to a monarchy, where a King is the key of all power. We have derived much good from the English constitution, and some evil. There the King is the source of the evil, and here I should like to see the President rather less powerful than more so. I should like to see him like some of our Governors. Look at the States in which the Governors have great patronage; they are always in a ferment. Look at the States where the Governor is almost a nominal officer; they are all peace and quietness. So little do we care about it in the State in which I live, that though we have a Federal majority, we have never had a Federal Governor. But the same indifference does not prevail in our Congressional elections. Some men may think it a disgrace to the State, but I do not—for I would be the last man ever to utter a sentiment against her. We are to get these men back; all our finer feelings are interested. We shall, perhaps, make schoolmasters of them, to teach our children the art and necessity of political crusades. I repeat, that I do not want one of them again in this nation. I judge them solely by their actions. Like the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Rhea,) I do not want them to be called my fellow-citizens. Great Britain may take them and put them on board her navy, as she did her own from the same place. It is in vain to appeal to the finer feelings of the heart, and to humanity, when talking about these people. The House must and will judge the case according to its merits.

Mr. TAYLOR said he had asked for precedent in this case, and gentlemen had given him none. He held in his hand a precedent in point, which arose from the feelings which this nation and its Representatives very properly felt toward M. de Lafayette, who was pining away in a dungeon, in whose case there could not be a doubt as to his innocence or guilt, for he was taken in open war. Yet, when the subject had been brought before the Legislature of the nation, in the good old times of WASHINGTON, (and an example from that day derived sanction from the auspices under which it was made,) they refused to interfere. A motion was made, and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

[Mr. T. here quoted from the Journals of Congress, a motion which was made, and negatived, to request the Executive to use its endeavors to obtain the release of M. de Lafayette, then in imprisonment.]

If the sympathies of this nation could not then be roused high enough toward this distinguished citizen, (for he had been adopted a citizen of the United States,) to interfere for his relief, Mr. T. asked whether the House ought to do it now for condemned felons?

Mr. McKIM remarked that this precedent could not have force. Citizenship had been conferred on the Marquis de Lafayette, as a gift for his services, without his renouncing his allegiance to the French Republic, in whose service he then was.

Mr. FISK said that the difficulty which had been raised as to the proper authority through which the release of these men should be requested, did not furnish sufficient reason for negativing the resolution. He did not consider this motion as infringing the powers of the Executive, or that a special mission would be necessary to carry it into effect. He believed that an expression of a wish for their release would procure it. I ask, said Mr. F., what would be the language of the people of this country, who feel a wish that the prisoners should be released, and of the prisoners themselves, when they find that their prayer was rejected on such scruples as these? They might pursue the dialogue of which the gentleman from South Carolina quoted a part, and say:

"Should I have answered Caius Cassius so?
When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous,
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, Gods, with all your thunderbolts,
Dash him to pieces."

They will think this a hard case that we should deny them this paltry sum. They might not think it a conclusive answer to this application, that there was some doubt as to the propriety of interfering, some doubt whether it might not offend the Spanish Government.

I rise merely to call the attention of the House to a fact in relation to a Mr. Powell. [Mr. F. stated the manner of his release from imprisonment.] I do not rise, said he, never have risen, nor ever will I rise in my place as a Representative of the people, to settle accounts with any gentleman or any member, because I never have knowingly (nor will I ever allow myself to do it) made use of language calculated to injure the feeling of any member on this floor, either individually or en masse. But, if any gentleman on this floor shall, alluding to me as a Representative or a lawyer, say that I balance till I receive a fee, or use an expression of similar import, that I shall consider as a personal allusion, and shall feel myself bound so to deem it. Personal remarks answer no good purposes, and are often productive of the most serious consequences. I regret that they are ever made within these walls. While newspapers are, as has been stated, growing into disrepute from their scurrility, it is a more lamentable fact that the deliberations of this body are going into disrepute; and it is these personalities, on this floor, that cause it; and they will, if persisted in, operate the dissolution of this Government; for, once let the people cherish a contempt for you, and they will soon begin to hate you. If the Government ever be destroyed, the work must be commenced in this House. I beg of gentlemen to suppress their personal allusions, as I will. If I err, it is unintentionally; I never rise but when my weak judgment dictates to me that I can say something pertinent to the subject. Having said thus much, and expressing my deter-

THURSDAY, June 15.

Mr. LOVE presented a petition of John Brent, late Collector of the Customs at Nanjemoy, and John Randall, now Collector of the Customs at Annapolis, State of Maryland, stating, that, in the year one thousand eight hundred and six, they seized and took possession of two vessels, one in each of their said ports, for a violation of the acts of Congress suspending commercial intercourse with the Island of Saint Domingo, which said vessels were libelled, and condemned as forfeited, and judgments obtained in the district and circuit courts for the district of Maryland, which judgments were reversed, upon the appeal of the adverse parties, by the Supreme Court of the United States, on the ground of the said acts being no longer in force, and praying that the necessary inquiry may be made in the premises, and such relief afforded them as may seem just and proper.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in the counties of Essex, Middlesex, and Somerset, in the State of New Jersey, to the same effect with a memorial of the manufacturers of hats in Fredericktown, State of Maryland, presented the twenty-fifth ultimo.

Mr. RICHARD JACKSON presented a memorial to the like effect, from the Providence Hat Manufacturing Company.

Mr. BACON presented a petition of sundry woolen manufacturers in Berkshire county, State of Massachusetts, praying that such measures may be adopted by Congress, as will afford protection and encouragement to the manufactories in which they have engaged.

The said petitions and memorials were read, and severally referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

FINANCES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making further provision for the support of public credit and the redemption of the public debt.

Mr. QUINCY moved to strike out the whole of the bill except the enacting clause.

On this motion a debate occupied the House till near seven o'clock, in which Messrs. QUINCY, RANDOLPH, DANA, MACON, GOLDSBOROUGH, LYON, and TALLMADGE, supported the motion, and Messrs. EPPES, MONTGOMERY, W. ALSTON, ROSS, J. G. JACKSON, and HOLLAND, opposed it.

The question being taken on Mr. QUINCY's motion, was negatived, 66 to 47.

Mr. DANA moved to amend the bill, by inserting in the bill in substance as follows :

"Provided that no loan shall be made under this act, unless the revenue, after reserving $600,000 for the payment of the civil list, shall fall short of eight millions of dollars annually, as already by law pledged to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund."

After some observations from Messrs. RANDOLPH and DANA, a motion was made for the Committee to rise, and carried.

On the question whether the committee have leave to sit again, it was suggested by some gentlemen that it would answer no good purpose, as there was no question now pending but the motion by Mr. DANA, which could be renewed in the House, if the committee were discharged.

Before the question was decided, a motion was made to adjourn and carried.

FRIDAY, June 16.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Washington county, in the District of Columbia, and of Prince George's county, in the State of Maryland, praying that an act may pass declaring a road leading from the lower Eastern Branch bridge, in the District of Columbia, to the line of the said District, a public high-war, on such terms as Congress may think proper.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. MACON,

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the twelfth instant, the report of the Attorney General of the United States on the petition of Edward Livingston and the petitions of sundry inhabitants of the city and Territory of Orleans, in relation to the conflicting claims to the batture adjoining to the city of Orleans, be discharged from the farther consideration of the said report.

Mr. MACON said, that he was directed by the committee to whom was referred the report of the Attorney General on the subject of the batture, to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of it. The committee were of opinion, before they proceeded to the examination of this report and documents, that they should have another report on the subject, viz: an examination of the Attorney General of the claim of the United States to the batture; and if the committee should be discharged he was directed to make a motion to that effect. If the House was to adjourn before the first of July, it would be impossible for it to go through with the examination of the documents. The committee had heard the petitioner in defence of his claim, and in reply to the delegate from the Territory, (Mr. POYDRAS,) who had informed the committee that there were many more documents to examine before they made their report, some of which were not translated from the French language. One of the documents he had understood contained three hundred pages, of which but a part was translated. The examination of these documents it would be perceived would occupy much time; and it was supposed by the committee that the opinion of the Attorney General on the title of the United States was necessary.

The Committee were accordingly discharged, 52 to 63; and Mr. M. offered the following resolution, which, at the request of the petitioner, he wished to lie on the table, for one day:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States of the 27th of March, 1808, as relates to the batture in the suburbs of St. Mary's, adjoining New Orleans, and the documents which accompanied it, together with the petition of the citizens of New Orleans on the same subject, and the documents which accompanied the same, be referred to the Attorney General of the United States, and he be instructed to receive and collect such other testimony as may be necessary to ascertain the title of the United States to the before mentioned batture, and that he be directed to report to this House, at the next session of Congress, his opinion as to the validity of the claim of the United States to the said batture.

HANNAH FOSTER.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Hannah Foster, made the following report:

That the petitioner states that her husband, William Crator Foster, in the year 1776, enlisted as a private soldier in the second New Jersey regiment, commanded by Colonel William Maxwell; that he marched with his company to Quebec; that, in his retreat from Quebec, he was taken sick at Crown Point with the smallpox, and died. She, therefore, claims the pay of her husband while in the service of the United States. It is proven by an affidavit accompanying the petition that the said W. C. Foster entered the service of the United States, and that he died at Crown Point, while a common soldier. Your committee must state that, upon a consideration of the merits of this case, they cannot report favorably to the prayer of the petitioner; that the troops who marched into Canada were generally enlisted for one year, and had no promise of land from the Government of the United States, and that the wages for officers and soldiers were deposited in the hands of regimental paymasters, and by them paid into the hands of the captains for their companies at short intervals. It does not appear, by any evidence in this case, that the husband of the petitioner did not receive, as was usual, his wages while in actual service. Your committee, waiving the consideration of the statute of limitation upon the merits of this case, would not only require proof of the services of W. C. Foster, but at least strong presumptive testimony that the wages had never been paid, and the reasons which operated to make this case an exception to the general rule, which has not been done.

Your committee have already reported that this claim, if it still remained unpaid, was barred by the statute of limitation, and in that report the committee would be best supported by a review of the regulations which have heretofore governed the Congress of the former and present Government. As early as February 20, 1782, by a resolve of the old Congress, commissioners were appointed in each State with ample powers to liquidate the claims against the United States arising from the struggle for independence. And as early as February 27, 1782, commissioners were appointed to settle the army accounts in the five great departments, viz: the quartermaster's department, the commissary's department, the clothier's department, the hospital department, and the marine department, with full power and authority to liquidate and finally settle the accounts of these departments, respectively. Having thus made liberal provision to adjust the claims against the United States, by carrying a competent tribunal to each man's door, the Congress under the confederation, from various and good considerations, to guard against fraud, imposition, and speculation, resolved, in November 2, 1785, that claims for personal services in the military department should be barred, if not exhibited for liquidation before the commissioners of army accounts, on or before the 1st day of August ensuing the said resolve, viz: August 1786; that governed by the same and still stronger considerations as time elapsed, in July 23, 1787, all other claims against the United States were barred in the following words:

Resolved, That all persons having unliquidated claims against the United States, pertaining to the late commissary's, quartermaster's, hospital, clothier's, or marine department, shall deliver particular abstracts of such claims to the proper commissioner appointed to settle the accounts of those departments, within eight months from the date hereof, (July 23, 1787); and all persons having other unliquidated claims against the United States shall deliver a particular abstract thereof, to the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, within one year from the date thereof; and all accounts not exhibited as aforesaid, shall be precluded from settlement or allowance.

H. of R.

Finances.

That notwithstanding the many reasons which existed to adhere to the statute of limitation, the Congress of the United States, under the present Constitution, on the 27th of March, 1792, suspended the limitation law, as it respected the claims upon the United States for personal services. Your committee might pursue this subject with respect to other descriptions of claims, and the regulations upon them, but will forbear at present. Your committee would not be understood as saying that no particular cases of hardship do not exist which would call for relief, but they would state that if the statute of limitation ought not to exist as to any classes of claims, the law should be suspended for a limited time, and claims admitted upon the same principles, under the same regulations and instructions which governed the different commissions and the Treasury Department when the statute did not bar these classes of claims. That, in all cases where claims exist of the same kind, auditors should be appointed, or the Treasury, or some other department, under certain regulations, should be authorized to adjust those claims, as any individual claimant would then have the same opportunity of substantiating his claim: and that particular laws ought only to be made for exceptions to the class of claims which could be settled by a general provision.

This remark arises not only from the practice of all Governments founded upon intelligence and freedom, but from the impossibility of extending relief to all cases which require it through this committee, who can examine very few cases, in comparison to the number of the same kind before them, which inability to do equal justice to all makes the regulation more unjust than if those claims were forever barred, by which all the mischiefs to the Government at least, of which the claimants are members, would be prevented. These reflections have arisen from the decision of the House upon a recommendation of this petition and the former report to this committee. If, therefore, the statute of limitation is improper, as to claims for personal services in the Revolution, or for supplies, or any other class of claims, it should be suspended for a limited time, as giving the only proper relief. Therefore,

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

FINANCES.

The question pending at the time of adjournment yesterday, that the committee have leave to sit again on the bill supplementary to the act for the support of public credit, &c., was carried, 53 to 36; and on motion of Mr. EPPES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject.

Mr. DANA's amendment, offered yesterday, for restricting the operation of the bill to the extent of a deficiency in the sum of eight millions, pledged for the payment of the public debt, was negatived, after debate—ayes 32.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill Mr. RANDOLPH, after quoting the law establishing the office of Secretary of the Treasury, to show that it authorized the motion he was about to make, moved,

“That during the discussion of the bill, entitled ‘An act supplementary to an act for the support of public credit, and the redemption of the whole of the public debt,’ the Secretary of the Treasury be required to give information to the House touching the same, in person.”

The House agreed to consider the motion, by yeas and nays—61 to 59, as follows:

NAYS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., William Anderson, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Adam Boyd, John Brown, Robert Brown, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, James Cochran, Orchard Cook, James Cox, William Crawford, Henry Crist, Richard Cutts, Joseph Deaba, John W. Eppes, William Findley, Jonathan Fisk, Barzillai Gannett, Gideon Gardner, Thomas Gholson, jun., Peterson Goodwyn, Daniel Heister, William Helms, James Holland, Benjamin Howard, Jacob Huff, John G. Jackson, Robert Jenkins, Richard M. Johnson, Thomas Kenan, William Kennedy, John Love, Aaron Lyle, Alexander McKim, Pleasant M. Miller, William Milnor, Nicholas R. Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Wilson C. Nicholas, John Porter, John Rhea of Tennessee, Matthias Richards, Erastus Root, John Ross, Ebenezer Sage, Lemuel Sawyer, Benjamin Say, Ebenezer Seaver, Samuel Shaw, John Smilie, George Smith, Henry Southard, John Taylor, Uri Tracy, Robert Whitehill, and Richard Winn.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. FINLEY and SMITH, on the ground that it had been long settled by practice that the correspondence with the Heads of Departments should be in writing, as a more responsible mode. If farther information was wished, it could be obtained in writing. If the Secretary of the Treasury were to come to this House to take part in its deliberations, and was to be answered in anything he might say by the members of the House, it would be better at once to make him a member of the House, as in monarchical Governments. When the law constituting the Treasury Department had been passed, the Secretary of the Treasury had been every thing in finance, there being then no Committee of Ways and Means. It appeared at that time to be the wish of the party who supported him that he should so continue; and after a long struggle, when the Republicans had carried the question for having a Committee of Ways and Means, they thought it a great point gained. The right of the Secretary to appear in person here was inconsistent with the views of the Republicans. It never had been approved of by the Republican party, and it was hoped the vote on this question would show that it was not yet.

The resolution was supported by Messrs. DANA and RANDOLPH; by the former on the ground that the House ought to know more on this subject than was officially known, and that they should have the same information which appeared to be possessed by particular members on the subject of the operations of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and of the Treasury Department. In reply to Messrs. FINDLEY and SMILIE, it was said by Mr. RANDOLPH, that the Constitution had denied the power to make the Heads of Departments members of the House, but not the power now proposed to be exercised. Many questions had been stirred during the debate—and from whom could the House with greater propriety derive information as to the present and past state of the funds of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and as to what were deemed to be their resources, than from the Secretary of the Treasury? And in what manner could this information be more conveniently received than by oral testimony? It was not proposed to enlarge or decrease his sphere of action. Indeed, if he had a seat on the floor, the House would derive no slight benefit from his intelligence. The creation of the Committee of Ways and Means, did not affect this question. There was no occasion to look back to the feuds and party bickerings of former times to decide one of the plainest questions in the world. Was it of no moment to have the opinion on a doubtful case of the man who was to decide it, who was to carry the law into execution when passed? As to the mode of receiving his opinion, the Secretary could give more information orally in one hour than by writing in five. The Secretary was certainly not a man who need be ashamed to show his face on the floor; it was an honor to him to be called on, and appearing here in person would be even to him a saving of time and labor.

Mr. RANDOLPH'S motion was negatived—yeas 41, nays 83, as follows:

YEA—William Baylies, Daniel Blaindell, James Breckenridge, John Campbell, William Chamberlain, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Matthew Clay, Howell Cobb, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, jun., William Ely, James Emott, Charles Goldsborough, Thomas R. Gold, William Hale, Jonathan H. The House having agreed to take up the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the table,

Mr. DANA moved that the bill lie on the table, to give him an opportunity to move that the Secretary of the Treasury be required to lay before the House, certain information.

The motion was negatived—68 to 39.

Mr. DANA moved to amend the bill, by inserting a provision restricting its operation to a case in which the products of duties on imports and tonnage, &c., "shall be insufficient to discharge the sum of eight millions annually, pledged for the payment of the public debt."

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to adjourn—ayes 47, noes 54.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved that the bill lie on the table—ayes 42, noes 54.

Mr. PITKIN commenced a speech against the bill; but having sat down to permit explanation by Mr. J. G. JACKSON—

A motion was made by Mr. J. G. JACKSON to adjourn, (with Mr. PITKIN'S consent,) and carried—near five o'clock.

SATURDAY, JUNE 17.

Mr. POTTER presented a petition of Thomas Lindsey, of Bristol, in the State of Rhode Island, stating that, in the month of May last, his sloop, called the Philadelphia, brought into the port of Charleston, State of South Carolina, a number of French families, together with their negro slaves, from the Island of Cuba, to prevent their being murdered by the Spanish populace of that Island, in consequence of which the said sloop has been libelled and condemned for a violation of an act of Congress which prohibits the importation of slaves into any part of the United States, and that it is probable the cargo of the said sloop, upon the same ground, may also be condemned; and praying such relief in the premises, as to the wisdom of Congress shall appear just and proper.

John Murray.

JUNE, 1809.

Mr. SHEFFEY laid upon the table the following resolution, premising that he did not mean to call it up this day, but at a future day, when he conceived that he should be able to prove to the satisfaction of the House that this was the proper mode of disposing of the subject :

" Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Commissioners to try and determine the dispute between the United States and the person who was ousted from the possession of a certain portion of land called the Batture, at New Orleans, on the 25th of January, 1808."

On motion of Mr. LOVE,

Ordered, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be discharged from the farther consideration of the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Alexandria, referred to them on the sixth instant, and that the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with his opinion thereupon, to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled, "An act to change the post route from Annapolis to Rockhall, by Baltimore to Rockhall; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

JOHN MURRAY.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the thirty-first ultimo, the petition of John Murray, made a report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows :

That the petitioner prays the payment of three loan-office certificates of the following description, viz: No. 13,975, for $200, dated March 29, 1779, payable with interest, March 29, 1782, to Dr. Henry Murray, or bearer, signed Francis Hopkinson, treasurer of loans, and countersigned Thomas Harwood; No. 13,976, for $200, of the same tenor and character as the above certificate; No. 6,400, for $600, also of the same tenor as the above certificate.

Your committee having examined the merits of this case, state, that the claim appears to be just, and nothing prevents relief but the acts of limitation. It will appear, from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, that these loan-office certificates are genuine, that they did issue, and that they are outstanding and unpaid, as appears by the records of the Treasury Department. And the belief that they are genuine, and the identical certificates issued, as appears upon record, is strengthened by their being now presented in the name of the heirs of the original owner. The petition states, that, in June last, upon the date of the said petition, upon repairing an old desk which belonged to his deceased father, Henry Murray, these loan-office certificates were found in a secret drawer, which fact is proven by an affidavit which accompanies the petition; that Dr. Henry Murray died in 1785, and the existence of these certificates was unknown until the above discovery, which deprived the representatives of the said Henry Murray of the benefit of those laws which provided for the redemption or payment of such certificates. Your committee have no doubt, therefore, upon the merits of this claim, that the certificates are genuine, and that they remain unpaid; and that the circumstances of the temporary loss of the said certificates, by which the representatives of said Dr. Murray were deprived of the benefit of the laws which provided for the redemption of these claims was not in the control of either the representatives, or said claimant, or in the Government of the United States, and neither can be blamed in this transaction. But, notwithstanding this statement and opinion in favor of the merits of this claim, it is expressly barred by the statutes of limitation, and from that circumstance alone the committee feel themselves bound to report against the prayer of said petitioner, in conformity to their reports in other cases, until, by a solemn decision of this House, the statutes of limitation are disregarded in the payment of such claims. Your committee have thought this a fortunate case to discover the will of this House upon the statutes of limitation when just claims are barred. But your committee are unwilling to offer to this House a resolution before they present in a concise view the laws and the conduct of the United States upon the subject of these claims, which will better enable the House to judge upon the course to be pursued with less embarrassment. Leaving out of view the many various and liberal provisions upon the subject of claims, it will be sufficient to state, that on the 21st of April, 1794, an act passed limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates, including loan-office certificates, to the 1st of June, 1795. That, on the 3d of March, 1795, an act passed making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt, the fourteenth section of which declares that all certificates, commonly called loan-office certificates, final settlements, and indents of interest, which, at the time of passing this act shall be outstanding, shall, on or before the 1st day of January, in the year 1797, be presented at the office of the Auditor of the Treasury of the United States, for the purpose of being exchanged for other certificates of equivalent value and tenor, or at the option of the holders thereof, respectively, to be registered at the said office and returned; and every of the said certificates which shall not be presented at the said office within the said time shall be forever after barred or precluded from settlement or allowance. From this provision one year and ten months were allowed to present and settle these claims. That, on the 12th day of June, 1798, a bill passed respecting loan-office and final settlement certificates, &c., suspending the provision already recited, which barred this description of claims one year from the passage of the act; from which term the statute has barred these claims, and still remains in force. Therefore,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 16, 1809.

SIR: In answer to your letter of this day, I have the honor to state, that there is not, to my knowledge, any other objection to the payment of the three loan-office certificates in the name of Dr. Henry Murray but what arises from the acts of limitation. Such certificates were issued, and, as appears by our records, are still outstanding, having never been paid. Those now presented appear to be the identical certificates thus issued; and what removes every doubt is, their being now presented in the name of the heirs of the original owner.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. R. M. JOHNSON, Chairman.

A motion was made by Mr. DANA, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House such information as may be in the Treasury Department, touching the exercise or construction of the duties, powers, or authorities, mentioned or contained in the tenth and nineteenth sections of the act of the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, entitled "An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt," as the same may appear from any minutes or proceedings of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and also copies of any correspondence with the Directors of the Bank of the United States, respecting the making of any loan or loans for reimbursing or paying the whole or any part of the stock created by virtue of the act of the eleventh of February, one thousand eight hundred and seven, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States.'"

A motion was made by Mr. ROSS, that the said resolution do lie on the table; and the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 51, nays 56, as follows:

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The question on the motion of Mr. DANA, to amend the said bill, by inserting, after the words, "according to law," the words, "whenever the product of the duties on imports and tonnage, with other moneys appropriated to the Sinking Fund, after reserving the yearly sum of six hundred thousand dollars, as by law provided, towards the support of Government, shall be insufficient to satisfy and discharge the sum of eight millions of dollars annually, as appropriated and vested by law in the Commissioners of said fund," which was depending and undetermined at the time of adjournment, being again stated:

Mr. PITKIN advocated the amendment at length, and opposed the bill.

Mr. QUINCY spoke at length against the bill.

Mr. SHEFFEY replied.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the bill and amendment be indefinitely postponed, and spoke at length in support of the motion, and against the bill. When he concluded, the motion for postponement was negatived by yeas and nays—75 to 52, as follows:

Batture at New Orleans.

H. OF R.

MONDAY, JUNE 19.

Mr. PETER B. PORTER, from the committee appointed on the memorial of Joseph Wilkinson, jr., presented a bill authorizing the discharge of Joseph Wilkinson, junior, from his imprisonment; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. Mr. PORTER, from the same committee, also presented a detailed report; which was read, and referred to the same Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. GOLD, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for ascertaining and settling the controverted boundary of the public land at West Point, in the State of New York; with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.—Mr. GOLD, Mr. GOOD-WYN, Mr. VAN DYKE, Mr. SHAW, and Mr. CRAWFORD were appointed the committee.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to change the post route from Annapolis to Rock-hall, by Baltimore to Rockhall, was read twice, and ordered to be read the third time this day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend and continue in force an act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,'" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to whom was committed the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

THE BATTURE AT NEW ORLEANS.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. MACON, on the sixteenth instant, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States of the seventh of March, one thousand eight hundred and eight, as relates to the batture in the suburbs of St. Mary's, adjoining New Orleans, and the documents accompanying it, together with the petitions of Edward Livingston, and the petition of the citizens of New Orleans on the same subject, and the documents which accompanied the same, be referred to the Attorney General of the United States, and that he be instructed to receive and collect such other testimony as may be necessary to ascertain the title of the United States to the before-mentioned batture, and that he be directed to report to this House, at the next session of Congress, his opinion as to the validity of the claim of the United States to the said batture."

Mr. BURWELL thought that this was not the proper course to pursue; but that the course recommended at the last session was the proper one, viz: to give the petitioners the right of appeal from the decision of the Orleans court to the Supreme Court, or to give the United States the same right, should the decision be against them. He could see no advantage in the procrastination now proposed, nor any injury to the United States or the city of New Orleans, in the course which he advocated. He doubted, although the letter of the law of 1807 might cover this case, whether it was ever intended that that law should operate as this had done. My intention, said he, in voting for it, was that it should apply exclusively to the Western lands, commonly called the Yazoo lands, and such other lands as were occupied by hundreds who might be formidable from their numbers. To undertake jurisdiction on questions of property is taking upon ourselves the functions of another department, of the Judiciary. The case involves important points of law—and let me ask, whether gentlemen in this House are so well read in law as to be able to decide such an important point as this? It does appear to me that on all questions of private property arising in the United States, where the question of right is not to be brought before this House, we ought to consult the convenience of the parties by promoting dispatch. On the question whether this property belong to the United States or to the petitioners I am completely ignorant. Nor would I have it inferred that I believe the petitioner to have a right to the property; I take it that the claim of the United States must be good, or the inhabitants of Orleans would not be so zealous in support of it. Mr. B. dwelt further on the difficulty of deciding in this House on complicated claims to property, if it were right in any case so to do.

Mr. POYDRAS asked for the reading of a letter which he had received from the Governor of Orleans Territory, which was accordingly read. The letter states, that if it were possible that the committee to whom Mr. Livingston's claim was referred could now visit New Orleans, they would be convinced that the batture, now covered with water, was in fact the bed of the river, and, therefore, could not be private property. Mr. P. stated the history of this piece of alluvion at some length, and the circumstances under which it had always been deemed public property.

Mr. SHEFFEY said that, before passing this resolution, gentlemen ought to ascertain what the Attorney General could do in this case. He could not compel the attendance of witnesses, or collect testimony of circumstances which occurred a hundred years ago; and unless he could do this, it was impossible he could examine the title, for testimony as to facts was essential to enable him to form a correct opinion. What influence could the opinion of the Attorney General have? Was the right of the citizen to fall prostrate before such an ex parte opinion or statement as that might be? If it was not to have influence, why thus evade a decision on the prayer of the petitioner? If it was to have any influence, it must be a pernicious one, because founded on ex parte testimony. Would the House go into the merits of the case on this opinion, when obtained, without affording an opportunity to the party interested to prove that the law was not correctly expounded nor the facts correctly stated? Surely not. If they did not, if they heard opinions on both sides, they converted this House into a judicial tribunal. Was this body calculated for that branch of Government? No; this, Mr. S. said, is a Government of departments, each of which ought to be kept separate. What, sir! is this a question of right between the United States and an individual, and we are about to take it into our own hands, to wrest it from the Constitutional authority, and decide it ourselves? I hope we shall not; and, therefore, I am against this proposition. What does the Attorney General state in his report? Aware of the impropriety of his deciding, he tells you—what? That the usual course, where the rights of the United States have been involved, has been to appoint commissioners to hear and decide. Here the Attorney General tells you it is not proper for him to decide. And I should never wish to see the case in which the Attorney General's opinion is to give authority for dispossessing an individual of his property; for if it can be done in one case it may be in every case. Any individual may be driven from his property by military force, and then his title be decided by an ill-shapen, one-sided statement and opinion of the Attorney General. Against such a decision I do protest. Is it because you have power on your side, sir, that you will not submit to a judicial decision of this question? If there be a controversy about a right, there ought to be a judicial decision.

I, sir, have been unable to see how an individual having property, of which he was put in possession in 1804 or 5 by a judicial decision, could be dispossessed of it by the act of 1807, the operation of which was limited to acts done hereafter, that is, after the passing of that act in 1807. That law too speaks of "lands ceded to the United States." Was the batture ceded to the United States? I say not, because it was private property before the United States possessed the sovereignty of the country. By the treaty of 1803 with the Government of the United States, the rights and property of the inhabitants of Louisiana was secured to them. What then is the inference, from this state of the case? That the United States got possession illegally, in defiance of judicial authority. I am sorry to see that the judicial authority has been set at defiance, and the Presidential mandate carried into effect at the point of the bayonet, right or wrong. This was the case. Those who were put in possession were ousted by military force. Let me not be understood as throwing odium on the Executive; far from it. I believe the Executive acted conscientiously, but upon an ex parte statement. The President was never told that the case had been judicially investigated. Those facts were taken for granted, on the other hand, which did not exist, and those which formed the foundation of the true merits of the case, were withheld.

Mr. S. went into an examination at some length of the legal points and facts involved in this question. Was the House, when it had received the Attorney General's report, to establish itself into a judicial tribunal, send for witnesses, or take an ex parte statement as respected the United States or the individual? Gentlemen would then ultimately be convinced, if they were not now, that a body like this was incompetent to do justice to a contested claim for property.

When the opinion of the Attorney General should come before the House, if it were the same as already given in favor of the title of the United States, would Congress, because the United States had obtained a tortuous and illegal possession, deny an opportunity of investigation before a tribunal of justice? A shadow of justice might be held out, but it would be a shadow indeed. The party petitioning had already had a decision in his favor. And, after the parties had been fully heard, after the judges had pronounced their decision in favor of the petitioner, would the House pretend to say that he had not a color of right?

Mr. S. concluded his observations by expressing a hope that the reference to the Attorney General would be rejected; that a speedy mode of decision would be adopted; that the right of the claimant should be fully investigated; that it should be ascertained whether his claim was founded in justice or was a spurious one, and the case decided accordingly.

Mr. POYDRAS spoke at some length in reply to Mr. SHEFFEY, and in defence of the title of the United States. The batture had many years ago been considered as public property, and no one who examined the circumstances of the case could for a moment doubt it. He said that it had never been claimed as private property until after it came into the possession of the United States. He hoped the rights of the public and of the people of New Orleans would not be trampled upon to grant the petitioner his prayer.

Mr. MACON said that he was himself in favor of giving the right of the United States to the property to the people or corporation of New Orleans, and letting them and the individual contest it. There was nothing new, however, in the reference of a subject to the Head of a Department, whose opinion would have no more weight than reason, and so far only ought it to have weight. Mr. M. said he had no more desire to interfere with the judiciary than either of the gentlemen who had spoken. If provision was made for trying this case, must it not be extended to all others? In order to do justice, it must be done to all. Had not a special court been refused in relation to a property of much greater value than this? Before Congress made a special court for a certain case, they ought to look at the consequences. It was departing from the general system of the nation to appoint a court for a special case. Perhaps there was something in this case which differed from other cases: but he doubted whether it would warrant the appointment of a special court. Mr. M. said he saw no other way of treating this subject but by letting it go before the courts already organized. If the right was in the petitioner, be the consequence what it might, the city of New Orleans had no right to take it away from him.

Mr. ROSS said that the delegate from the Territory seemed to fear that the question of right would be decided now. The decision of this resolution either one way or the other would require delay. The House must first decide whether they would act on the case or not. If not, it was to no purpose to have the testimony collected. Was it the best way of collecting testimony, to refer a subject to the Attorney General, who has no power to issue compulsory process? He was not of opinion that this House could exercise judicial authority; if it did, he would not have evidence collected in the mode proposed. If the right of the petitioner had been invaded, the invasion of that right was the invasion of the right of every citizen of the United States. He did not mean to express any opinion as to the right in this case, for he had not formed any. It was impossible for the House to decide fairly between the United States and Mr. Livingston, when the evidence was collected by an officer of the United States. Whenever commissioners were to be appointed, they ought to be appointed by agreement, or with the consent of both parties to the litigation. Errors often occurred, even in taking depositions, by the omission or misconception of a word, and the same might much more readily occur in this case.

What good could result from all this delay, if it was not intended to decide on this case ultimately? Let commissioners be appointed, said Mr. R., to hear and decide this point. The general position that we ought not to establish special tribunals for particular cases is correct; but, like other general rules, is not without an exception. If a difference arises between two States, do they not appoint commissioners to decide on the right? This course was pursued in the contest between the States of Pennsylvania and Connecticut, in regard to the right to the soil of a tract of country. And why was it so decided? Because the case was one qui genefts, totally distinct from all cases coming regularly before a regular judicial tribunal. Is this such a case? From everything which I have heard of this case, it is such a one. This House is not the proper tribunal to decide it; but, if it do decide it, the Attorney General is not the proper commissioner to take depositions.

Mr. TROUP observed that this case was probably one which would fall under the old maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi or reipublice. It appeared to him that there was a Constitutional difficulty in this case, which did not appear to have suggested itself to the mind of any gentleman. First, has the United States a claim, either real or disputed, to this territory? Whether disputed or otherwise, provided the claim be asserted on its part, the question is, has the Congress of the United States a power to decide the validity of that claim? And if it has, is it proper so to decide it? What is the subject-matter in dispute? Public property; and what species? Landed. Then the question results, has Congress a right, in order to determine its title, to refer it to any tribunal whatever? I contend not; the right to public property was originally in the people of this country; they could never be divested of their great public right to the landed property of the nation, but by their express consent. They did give that right to the Congress of the United States, in declaring that it should have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations concerning public territory. Would it have had that power, if this right had not been expressly delegated? I know that, under the old Articles of Confederation, Congress did undertake to legislate as to property; but it was always questionable whether they had a right to do so—and this was not the only point on which Congress did exercise powers which were brought into question. The right to determine claims to public property is not only guaranteed exclusively to Congress by the Constitution, but the practice has been invariably pursuant to it: it was so in 1807. The Government not only asserted its right in the first instance, but asserted its power to enforce the right at the point of the bayonet. If the public have always been in possession of a certain property, the man who enters on it without their consent is a trespasser on that property. Upon this view of the subject, there is a Constitutional difficulty on which the House should decide, before it entertains a motion for delegating a power to decide this question to any tribunal or commission whatever.

Mr. BOYD said, admitting all the gentleman had said to be true, his observations did not apply to this case. He had spoken of the right to public property. The question now was, whether this was public property or not; if it were certainly public property, on which ground the gentleman rested his argument, there could be no question on the subject. It was asked only before they decided between the individual and the United States on the right to land, not confessedly public property, but claimed as such, that fair investigation should be had. Mr. B. disclaimed the power of deciding judicially upon the subject; it was a right which he had never thought of this House claiming. A delay of justice was a denial of it. The individual petitioning had been in possession of the property; it had been taken from him by force, and he now asked a trial of his title before a competent court—and this opportunity, Mr. B. said, he ought to have as speedily as possible.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he should vote against that report. He said it was no part of his intention to deliver any opinion on the merits of the claim, although he had devoted not a little of his time to the study of that question, for two reasons: first, that it would be a prejudicated opinion, inasmuch as that was not the question which the House were called upon to decide, even if it were competent to decide it. I am extremely sorry, said he, that the law of 1807 has been brought into view of this House by my friends from North Carolina and Georgia, and for this reason; that that law has no bearing at all on the present question. Its object was wholly different from that to which it has been misapplied. What, sir, was the object of that law? To defend against a conspiracy, I may properly term it—against the lawless violence of confederated associations, a vast property. How has it been applied? Not to a great public property, but to a speck of land, to which, as I understand it, a single individual, or at most three or four, put in a claim. Such an application as that of the law in question was never intended by the Legislature; and, if applied to such a property as the batture, and to the case of a single individual, may be applied to the property of every man in society. What is the doctrine of my friend from Georgia? That the public are always supposed to be in possession of the national domain. True, sir, and it is also true that those who enter upon it and endeavor to appropriate it to themselves, are trespassers, and, as such, may be resisted by force. But that is not the case in the present question—very far from it—for the public never had been in possession of the property in question.

Without attempting to enter into the merits of the real title to the land in question, let us take it on the ground of the right of the citizen. A citizen comes before this House, and complains that he is dispossessed of his common right by arbitrary power. If, after a cause has been heard by a court, and a citizen put in possession of a property, by a decree of that court, he is dispossessed of it by military violence, where, if not before this House, is he to prefer his claim for redress? There is no court before which he can go, because the court which is the last resort in this case has already unavailingly given its decision. There is no court of appeal, no superior tribunal, and if there were, and a decree of the Supreme Court obtained in his favor on the appeal, what is any decree to avail against armed men—against muskets and bayonets? But, this is not the only reason why I am sorry that the act of 1807 has been brought in to apply to this case. It is because, if this House can be once prevailed upon to consider this case as analogous to the Yazoo case, many most injurious consequences must follow therefrom. The first is, that that odious and supremely infamous claim will be put upon a ground which it is by no means entitled to occupy; and I entreat my friend from Georgia, and those whose minds are unalterably made up on the Yazoo question, not to give their enemies such a prize as they must have on us, if we agree to confound the Yazoo claim with that before the House. There is no sort of analogy between them. On the other hand, sir, supposing the right to be in the United States, I beg gentlemen not to create so forcible an interest against the rights of the United States as will infallibly be embodied against it if we confound the two. I have no idea of giving the Yazoo men such a handle. Again, let us suppose, if we can suppose it, that the right is in the petitioner; may it not, supposing a great majority of the House to be against the Yazoo claim—we do not know how they are disposed—may it not create an unjust bias against the petitioner? So that, in whatever aspect we view it, it is not only impolitic, but, what is worse, extremely unjust to attempt to identify the two cases. And, sir, it is a matter of curious speculation, that, while the act of 1807 has been brought into operation in the case of a solitary individual and a little speck of property to which it was not intended to apply, even supposing the case in question to have arisen subsequently to the passage of that act; that, although it has been misapplied in this case, it has not been applied to the case to which it was intended to apply, and for which it was enacted; for, if I understood my friend from Georgia a few days ago, some hundreds or thousands of intruders have set themselves down on the public lands, and the public force has never been employed against them. On the contrary, the artillery of Government has been brought into play against a single individual. It was, indeed, said that these intruders had agreed to remain as tenants at will; but, let them remain till they are sufficiently strong, and they will give you another chapter in the history of Wyoming; for, after they are sufficiently strong to hold territory, although the arm of Government has been applied successfully to oust a single individual put in possession by a decree of a court, you will find it nerveless to expel these men.

With regard to the doctrine nullum tempus occurrit reipublica, it is a dangerous doctrine, if carried to the extent to which I apprehend my friend from Georgia would carry it. I venture to say that the abuse of that doctrine in the celebrated case of Sir John Lowther and the Duke of Portland, which created one general sentiment of indignation in the British nation—an attempt under that maxim to deprive a subject, hostile to the Court, of property of which he had been long in possession, for the purpose of transferring it to a minion of the Court—that case, with all its aggravated enormities, does not come up to the case before the House; and I speak without reference to the question whether the petitioner has a right or not to the property in this case. The question of right is not before the House, and that question, decide which way you will, can have no sort of weight in the vote which the House ought to give. The question is this: Having been long in possession of a piece of land, the title deeds destroyed, records burnt, and possession the only title you have to show, an attempt is made to dispossess you of the property; a decree of court confirms your right; if the individual, under these circumstances, can be turned out of possession by main force and strength, and that, too, military force, there is an end in the right to property of every man in the country. Sir, I have been astonished, and grieved, and mortified, to see so little sensation created in this nation by the procedure in question. It strikes at the root of everything dear to freemen. There is an end of their rights. This doctrine has been applied, in the first instance, in the Territory of Orleans; but, where is the security that it will not be applied to-morrow in the Territory of Columbia, and the next day in every State in the Union? And, sir, I shall consider the acquisition of the Territory of Louisiana, otherwise so valuable, as a pernicious gift, if it be the means of the introduction of this doctrine. Suppose this case—for I believe there is not a part of the Union where there is a greater confusion of title than in this City of Washington—suppose it to have occurred here. Suppose it to be a matter of doubt whether property belongs to one individual or another, or to the Government. Suppose the question to have been settled by due course of law, and a legal decision to have been had thereupon; and then, suppose the President of the United States had taken this law, which my friend from North Carolina very properly calls the Yazoo law, to apply to the turning out the person put in peaceable possession of the property, and keeping him out. I do not know, for my part, any duties which the marine corps have to perform at the barracks to prevent them from being employed for that purpose. Suppose property of mine, or any man in this House, be in dispute; there is not a man of us who may not be turned out of possession; and how? Upon the doctrine, as I understand my friend, that the Government is always supposed to be in possession of property, and nullum tempus occurrit. So that, land in possession of your ancestors since their emigration, may be taken from you because the Government is always supposed to be in possession. A more flagrant abuse of power never was, never can be, committed; and the only ground on which it can be attempted to be sanctioned is, that it is a small spot of land, and the property of an individual; the very ground on which it becomes every individual to contest it. If the law had been applied to a country covered by vast hordes of Indians, the case would have been different; it would have been no individual claim. But, when we apply it to every little farm, to every cottage, if the people are not very different from what I believe them to be, they must unite una voce in reprobation of the outrage. I venture to say, if you go into any State, and attempt to dispossess any farmer or planter of his twenty-five acres in this way, they would rise in opposition to it. Sir, the old tea and stamp tax was nothing to it. It is a principle which comes home to the bosom and fireside of every man in the country; a principle which if we sanction, there is not an individual in the United States who may not to-morrow be turned out of his right and set adrift, and that, after a finding in his favor by a righteous jury.

Batture at New Orleans.

H. OF R.

What, then, is this case? An individual comes before us, and says, that after having been put in possession of a piece of land, (I speak not of the validity of his title; it is not concerned in this question,) he was dispossessed by military force of this property. These two facts I do not understand any member of this House to deny. And what does he claim? He claims of you, as the guardians of the rights of every man in society, justice. And where do you send him? To the Attorney General. I will suppose that in the Lowther and Portland case, the Duke of Portland had been referred to the Attorney General.

Would the English nation have endured it? No, sir. Much less would they have endured, military as the nation is becoming by the introduction of large standing armies, that he should have been dispossessed of his property by an armed military force, at the fiat of the Crown. The question is, what should be done? Sir, what should not be done is perfectly clear. It ought not to be done that the petitioner should be sent to the Attorney General, who has already given an opinion on his claim, though that is very immaterial, which opinion, it seems we cannot find. If I understand anything of this Government, however, it ought to be on record, and this return of non est inventus ought not to have been received. All that we have to do, it appears to me, is to make a provision, in the nature of a declaratory law, not amending the act of 1807, but, declaring what the law is; and we ought to quiet the rights, and the mind too, of every man in society, by declaring that, by the act of 1807, it was not intended to authorize the President of the United States to interpose the bayonet between the courts of justice and the individual. This power never has been given, never was intended to be given. The individual has a right to a remedy, somewhere, against those who thus ousted him. If I were to set myself down on this heath by which we are surrounded, and take possession of a spot of earth to which I have no more title than Robinson Crusoe, it is not in the power of the President to remove me, more especially after a court has given an opinion in my favor. I must be dispossessed by due course of law, and not of gunpowder and steel. I see a batture forming before my door in Georgetown. It may become a question to whom that batture belongs, for the territory has been ceded by the States of Virginia and Maryland in the same manner as Louisiana was by France. That question may be brought into court. Suppose it decided that the owner of the island is entitled to the batture, and he is put in possession, I ask whether it would be competent to the Executive, under the ubiquity of the right of the United States to the soil, and the maxim of nullum tempus occurrit, to remove the party thus put in possession; to take away the property and give it to a favorite, no matter whether the Corporation of Georgetown, or an individual? It could not.

As to the sensation which this question has appeared to excite, I consider it one of the most important questions which ever arose under this Constitution, and a question, too, the merits of which are not to be, by any possibility, affected by the question whether the claimant has a legal right to the property or not. I did expect, sir, when the act of 1807 passed, that it would have been applied to very different purposes. I did not expect that in 1809 there would have been two thousand persons on that property, permitted to hold it peaceably, when force was put in the power of the President to remove them; and, that the law would have been put in force only in relation to a small spot of land, the property of an individual not only unable to resist military authority, but even to resist the Marshal. There was no cause for such interference. My colleague (Mr. SHERREY) has, indeed, explained the motives which may have influenced the decision. I believe that the President may be misled by evil counsellors. It is not investing a man with great Executive power, or placing him in a great department of the Government, that divests him of the frailty of man. Whatever may be brought in palliation of this outrage, it nevertheless strikes at the root of the rights of every man in society. The motive of the action belongs to the other House to consider, when a case is brought before them in which the question of the guilt or innocence of the party is involved.

I have said more than I intended, but I could not have said less. I could not reconcile it to myself as a freeman, determined to defend as long as I can my fireside and household gods against military power, to consent that the same right of my fellow-citizens shall be violated with impunity if I can help them.

Mr. LYON said that he was also of opinion that the President had been wrong in what he had done; but the law had compelled him to do it. Mr. L. referred to the law to show that the terms of it were imperative. The gentleman from Virginia, said Mr. L., takes it for granted that the petitioner was in possession of the property in question previous to the passage of the law; but I believe it was subsequent. I spoke of that law when it passed as I speak of it now; I told gentlemen that the law could take in other cases than those which they intended it to operate on; I told them that they were acting in direct opposition to the Constitution. I want to know what difference there is between this case and that of a man who owned land in any other Territory? The rigorous law has been but rigorously executed in relation to this case. I would repeal the law and appoint commissioners to take cognizance of the case. Repeal your unconstitutional law, and undo what has been done under it. You may smother the law, as they lately did the Olmstead business in Pennsylvania, but it will be understood to the original cause of it. I am glad to see that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has come to the end of his tether; he has persuaded the House to pass an unconstitutional law, and now compares it with the tea and stamp tax.—[The SPEAKER said it was doubtful whether it was within the rules of order for any member to say that a gentleman had persuaded the House to pass an unconstitutional law.] Mr. L. said, he believed he was always apt to speak the truth too bluntly. He would give his advice to undo the law, to accommodate what had been done, and bring the business to an end. This clause of the law would be found to fit a thousand other cases as well as it had done this; it was unconstitutional and improper; and the House never would do right until they wholly repealed the law.

Mr. GOLD said that this was one of the most important subjects that had ever been brought before the House. He did not mean to enter into the merits of the case. The gentleman from Virginia had very clearly expressed all those sentiments which every man must feel on hearing the history of this case; and as regarded the ground taken, of nullum tempus occurrit, the gentleman had repelled it very properly—and indeed in that country whence the maxim had been derived, whenever it was attempted to be put in force against ancient possessions, it had been executed with great difficulty. It is in the very teeth of Magna Charta, which says that a freeman shall not be dispossessed of his freehold without a better right is ascertained. There are a variety of forms by which the right is guarded. If I, said Mr. G., understood the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) he considers it a sacrifice of the rights of the United States to permit a decision on its property to pass into the hands of third persons. Even in England the prerogative is not carried so far. The Crown has frequently consented that the right of Government should pass into the hands of third persons, viz: of commissioners, for the purpose of investigation.

I will not trouble the House with lengthy remarks on this subject. I can hardly advert to it without feeling all that has been much more eloquently expressed by the gentleman from Virginia than it is in my power to express it. Let gentlemen look around and see if they can find a precedent for this transaction. And when we consider it, every man's feelings must be operated upon too strongly to permit him to argue. The course suggested by the gentleman from Virginia must prevail, or we no longer live under a Government of laws, and those principles on which it is founded are destroyed. The man ousted must be put in possession, must be restored to the possession of the property which the hand of violence has wrested from him; and I hope that a proposition to this effect in a proper shape will be presented.

Mr. ALSTON said, God forbid that he should be concerned in the smallest degree whatever in wresting from an individual property to which he was justly entitled. It had been stated by the gentleman from Virginia that the act of 1807 was not intended to apply to this case. From an examination of that law, said Mr. A., I verily believe that if ever there was a case on which that law could operate, this was such a case. Do you find anything in this law saying that it is to guard against associations? It speaks a language too plain to be misunderstood. The act says "if any person or persons" shall do so and so. This surely applies to individuals as well as to associations. Away then with the nice distinctions between this case and that of intruders on the lands of the United States. I shall not attempt to investigate the title of the claimant or of the United States in the present case. Why will gentlemen attempt to make a distinction between this case and that of any other individual who has intruded on the lands of the United States? If the United States had a claim to land, was it not the duty of the President, under the law of 1807, when an individual took possession of it, to remove him from it? Surely it was. Was the claim of this petitioner laid before the commissioners appointed to take cognizance of claims to land in Louisiana? I believe not. Let, then, the proper authority make a decision on it. The court of Orleans was not the proper court. The right of the United States was not defended before the court of Orleans; and the decision before that court, therefore, ought to have no influence in leading the minds of gentlemen to a decision on this subject. The public have a claim; they are now in possession; and I will never consent to establish any tribunal for this, different from that which decides in similar cases.

Batture at New Orleans.

H. OF R.

Mr. GHOLSON said he thought it would better become the character of this assembly to discuss every subject with calmness and deliberation, and on its own merits, than to endeavor to influence the decision by an appeal to the passions. It was important that such a course should be pursued, whether with reference to a great political principle or to the interest of the individual whose rights were said to have been wantonly prostrated at the Executive will. I (said Mr. G.) have been early taught, and the doctrine has grown with my years, that the right of property is not one of the least consideration in a free Constitution. It is of a nature so sacredly inviolable that, when clearly ascertained, I would never encroach upon it by any means but through the regular constituted authority. It would have been under this impression that, had I been a member of the Legislature when the law of 1807 was introduced into the statute book, I should have been opposed to it. But receiving all the sanctions of a law, and as such containing a rule of conduct in certain specified cases, what was the Executive to do? Was he to set at defiance the law of the land? A doctrine like this can never be contended for. It seems however, that to satisfy gentlemen the President should have refused to carry this law into execution, which I acknowledge does usurp judicial authority.—[Mr. RANDOLPH said that his ground was that the President had not executed the law. If a law were ever so unconstitutional, the President having signed it, it would become his duty to carry it into effect. But he denied that he had carried it into effect.] Upon that point, continued Mr. G., my colleague and I are at issue. I rise not to discuss the merits of the claim, which I have no disposition to do. I rise to defend the late President of the United States, to endeavor, to the extent of my feeble powers, to place this question in a proper point of view. If the President of the United States has gone beyond the letter of the law, which itself tends to encroach on the rights of the citizen, I would be the last person to justify him in thus trespassing on the dearest rights of a freeman. But it is very easy to show that he has not exceeded the express provisions of the law in question.

The act of 1807 contains two clauses having a bearing on the subject; the first ascertaining the character of the persons to be ousted, and the second providing the means of ousting them. The President is authorized to exercise this power, either where property was previously in possession, in which case he is to give notice, or where it was subsequently entered on, in which case he is not required to give notice. It is easy to show that this is one of the cases contemplated by that act. It is well known that the feudal law did exist in Louisiana previous to its acquisition by the United States, and that by that law alluvion does accrue to the Crown. Now if the feudal law did exist, and by that law alluvion did accrue to the Crown of France, does it not follow that the same right did accrue to the United States by the deed of cession from France, who owned the territory? If the claimant was in possession when this act passed, it became the duty of the President of the United States to give him three months notice previous to his removal; if not, no such notice was necessary. On this point I need only refer to the fact that it was not so early as the passage of the act, indeed not till the 23d of May, that the claimants came into possession. They were quieted in possession, so far as the rights of the United States were not concerned, on the 23d of May, 1807.

The decision of the corporation court of New Orleans is relied on as giving a title to the petitioner. That that decision did at all affect, in the remotest possible degree, the right of the United States, is a position which no man acquainted with the principles of law will contend for. The decision cannot affect the right of the United States, because it was not contested or defended before that court.

It is said that the feudal law does not exist in France. From time immemorial it has existed all over Europe. That it exists at this time in this country there can be no doubt. The right to lands is allodial, but is inherent in the Government. Is it denied that the Government can take property from an individual, making him compensation therefor? If the right to land be indefeasible, could the Government run a road through it? It certainly could not. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not attempt to say where the real right to the property in question does reside. But I do say, that, according to the treaty of cession, it did become the Government of the United States to exercise the power which the President under the law of 1807 did make use of.

If there has been any violation of right, it was in the passage of the law under which the President acted. It was such a one as, under present persuasion, I could not have voted for, even to remove a Yazoo purchaser. I would even give to such an one his right to a fair trial. I would not have agreed to pass it, for a reason given a day or two ago, that the right to trial by jury is inalienable; it is a right which descends to us with our other birth-rights; it is one without which liberty is but a name. It was an unfortunate circumstance that such a law did pass. But if the Legislature thought proper to enact such a law, let them not, in the name of the great God, throw the blame on their instrument, on the President, who was innocent of fault, and bound to carry the statute into effect. There is undoubted proof that the President only acted in pursuance of the statute. The retroactive part of the statute is the most horrible feature in it.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—Does the gentleman mean to advance this position, that there is in the Government of the United States (not of the State of Virginia, for instance) a right to take any property which it pleases on giving compensation to the owners?

Mr. GHOLSON continued.—I mean to advance no such position. This is an external Government, and all matters relating to internal concerns fall within the province of the State Governments, whose power in this respect will not be doubted. Although the Federal Government cannot exercise this power in the States, I by no means admit that they cannot exercise it in the Territories, over which they have a right to legislate. It is a right of such a nature as should be exercised with great delicacy and caution. Yet, though it is necessary that privileges should never be invaded but with a hallowed hand, it is sometimes necessary to give up a little for the general good.

But it is said that this is an extreme case, that this small spot was selected as the object of Executive vengeance. I am informed that in almost every instance of intrusion on the public lands, settlement was made by individual claimants. I would rather give up fifty times the value of land of the United States than to encroach against law on that of any individual. It was not the execution of the law which encroached on the rights of the citizen, but the law itself. I would ask, how can it be contended to the contrary? Who was in possession of the land when the law passed? It had been used as public property, and had every requisite to that character; and as such, when any one took possession of it, the President would not have done his duty under the act of 1807, had he not caused them to be removed.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he merely wished to say a few words in answer to his colleague, because he was afraid that he had put the question upon a footing which in justice to the petitioner it ought not to be placed upon. I would ask him (said Mr. R.) whether he thinks the right of the United States so untenable, their title so frail, or the prejudice against the title of the petitioner so weak, as to render it necessary to fortify the side which he has taken on this question by making it a question, as it already has been made, between the late President of the United States and the petitioner? Ought the feelings of the House to be touched in this manner? Ought that chord be made to vibrate? It is true that my colleague may say that the law of 1807 was first set on foot by myself. On me, then, let the blame rest, and not on the claim of the petitioner, who has already enough to contend with. On me let the whole weight fall. It does seem, from the uniform practice in this House, that when a man gets up to canvass any act performed by the Executive, under law or no law, he must preface whatsoever he says, if he means to be listened to with respect, by a disclaimer of any sort of intention to censure the Executive. No matter how great the enormity in question; it is absolutely necessary, it would appear, in order to prevail upon the House to lend a favorable ear to your argument, to disclaim all design of inculpating the Executive. Do we live in a land of liberty, or do we not? I know that in England the throne is interdicted by the constitution from all attack, that the King can do no wrong; and yet, sir, when a wrong is committed there, they are not (to use a strong but expressive epithet) very mealy-mouthed, but arraign His Majesty's Ministers with all the freedom with which counsel in a court will arraign the credibility of a witness. I want to have some means within my power whereby I can thoroughly canvass the conduct of the Executive branch of the Government. Suppose a member to rise in his place, and instead of throwing a blame on the President, were to throw it on some poor head of a department; would he not be told that it was unmanly and unfair; that, under the Constitution, having no King who can do no wrong, it is not fair to lay blame on a secondary officer, but upon him who is responsible for the act? And there I have placed it. Could I think of blaming the Governor of Orleans Territory? I might as well blame the private who, in obedience to his orders, dispossessed the party put in possession. If we would also canvass the conduct of our Ministers, and the President is our Minister, we must drop this way of saving, as I believe they do in Catholic countries, the infallibility of the Pope, of saying "God bless the President! he is always just right, and can never do wrong!" But here, sir, is an enormous wrong—on whose shoulders shall we pack it? In my representative capacity, I shall consider it my duty, fall on whose shoulders it may, to state it. I know that it is an invidious task to charge any man with blame, and that rising to eulogise him is a much more agreeable one. But it seems that I am the cause of all this. The bill in question, it is well known, came from the Senate. It is equally well known to you, sir, if not, be it now known, that I never saw it before it made its entry into these walls. But with what show or color of justice can I be deemed the father of this bill? If it be meant that I was the cause of its being passed, because I was the humble instrument of arresting that claim until time and a majority of the House could be found to pass that bill, I am obliged to the gentleman for reminding me of what I believe the proudest triumph of my life. It was a glorious triumph—an unprecedented one—for that claim came here, not only with the undivided sanction of the heads of department, but with the sanction of the best talents of the nation, and of integrity equal to any within these walls. I hope it is not the last time that an honest majority in this House shall triumph over Executive influence.

But it seems that a great deal of warmth has been displayed on this subject; that we ought to discuss the matter with great coolness. I should like to know of my colleague, if he were turned out of his house under the obligation of this same law, in a bleak and dreary winter's night, whether he would think a little of this warmth amiss. Whatever may be the opinion or belief entertained in States exempt from that accursed evil, I believe it is notoriously true that there is not a slave (who has no property of his own) that would not display greater warmth if his little house had been violated by his master in the way in which the property of the petitioner has been. When we are directing the bayonet, pointing the instrument, there is no occasion to be warm; but when it comes to our own throats—and it is coming—I do not mean it is the intention, but, if this principle be sanctioned, it must come, and I trust in God that, under any circumstances, even under the north pole, I shall never display less warmth on any such occasion than I have done on this.

Batture at New Orleans.

My colleague undertakes to say what the law was in the Louisiana Territory prior to its cession, and in so doing opens the merits of the claim, which he said he did not intend to touch. Whether the feudal law is or is not, was or was not in existence there, cannot affect the question, inasmuch as the very grant of the property was an allodial grant, taken out of the operation of the feudal law of France by the express limitation of the grant itself. It is not true, as I understand it, that the feudal law is the law in all monarchical countries. [Mr. GHOLSON said that since the reign of Charles II there had not been that part of the feudal system in existence which required every man to do service, &c. But he had said and did maintain that there is now remaining in every part of Europe a portion of the feudal system. He certainly had only meant that the feudal system yet existed quo ad hoc.] Mr. R. continued.—It has been much the fashion for a long time in Europe, and particularly since Dr. Robinson published his celebrated history of Charles V, to account for everything by the feudal system. I do not understand, however, that it exists in Spain, but that property is granted as allodial.

Again, sir, I understand my colleague to advance the doctrine that the Federal Government possessed the right of taking any private property in the territories which it pleased for public use, paying the owner the value thereof—paying damages. I ask my colleague to show the grant by which the General Government holds the power, for it will be recollected that the power of this Government is more straitened than any citizen is in his property. It must show a grant of all the power it exercises. If the Government possess this power, I want to know how it got it.

In his zeal to defend the Executive, and throw the whole weight of the blame on the shoulders of those who passed the law, my colleague forgot that the President is as much committed in relation to that law as any man who voted for it. The law must apply to individuals, but it had reference to great tracts of territory. Where was the necessity for this law to dispossess individual settlers, when a single constable was fully competent to that task? The power was granted in such a manner that it might be exercised on an individual, but it was given with reference to such cases as those now occurring in the Mississippi Territory, where so many get together as to form an interest stronger than the civil process, and capable of resisting it. Can my colleague say, if his title be litigated, and he be put in possession by a decree of the court, that he does take possession "without being thereto duly authorized by law?" Surely not.

We are told that the point in dispute is, has this land been ceded? But have not all the lands in the United States been ceded, except such as the grants to which were absolutely perfected at the Declaration of Independence? Was not the whole of Kentucky and Tennessee, and by far the greater part of Virginia and Pennsylvania, ceded by the Treaty of 1783? And to whom? To the individual States? No, sir; to the United States in their confederate corporate capacity. The King of Great Britain did not know, neither did France, when she made the treaty, any State in its individual capacity, but the whole Government of the United States as United States.

I do say and repeat, that this act has not been carried into effect, and the gentleman himself cannot say, that it has been carried into effect. Neither can he say, that the President was authorized to execute it in regard to this mud bank, without inculping him for failing to execute it in case of the intruders in Madison county. When we speak of this particular case of the batture, we are told that this law, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, must be executed. If it was only a duty of the President to execute it in one case, he has been guilty of a dereliction of duty in not executing it in the other case.

I know that there are gentlemen far more adequate than I am to do justice to the merits of this case as connected with law. But, I declare, that according to the construction given to this law, there is no individual in the United States who may not be brought under the operation of that law, which it is well known was not passed with that intention, for it is to be gathered from the face of it that military power was not intended to be exercised unless the civil power was insufficient, and I defy any man under a fair construction to place it in any other point of view. Suppose the Secretary of War takes possession of your farm—you say it was never ceded to the United States; but will that declaration put you in possession against an armed force? Your property is taken from you under color of law; military despotism is established under color of law. There is nothing in imagination which can exceed this. Telling a man making a complaint to go to the Attorney General is something like telling a slave making complaint of ill-usage to go to the overseer, the man who has already made up an opinion against the complainant.

With respect to maxims in law, in which, no doubt, my colleague is much better versed than I am, it is unquestionably true, as respects the doctrine of escheats, that the feudal system prevails in some of the States; but it never had been applied to the extent contended for by my colleague in any State in the Union, and certainly not in the State which we represent.

I am afraid, sir, that I have done a mischief where I meant to have done a good. If my object had been to favor the views of the petitioner, I certainly should not have taken the course which I have pursued. Whether the petitioner succeed in his object or not, is a secondary affair, compared with the great Constitutional privilege which has been violated in his person. I repeat it again and again. Let any man come forward and complain that his property never was ceded—you are told that the rights of the United States are not to be contested by the courts below, and in the mean time, leave the rights of the citizen to contend against a file of grenadiers with fixed bayonets;—and this we must do, it seems, for fear that incidentally some blame should fall on the President of the United States. Sir, we had better establish a principle in our Government, that the President can do no wrong, but hold his Ministers responsible for all he does, than hold our rights by this tenure. There will be then some sort of society. I dislike this business, when we find fault with subordinate officers, of being told that they are not responsible; and when we find fault with the President, being told that he is not responsible. Sir, I know as well as you or any other member can know, that he is a King in masquerade. I feel it; I know it. I speak not of the late President of the United States or of the incumbent. Every question which is brought up touching the liberty of the citizen serves but to confirm me in the opinion that this Government has an awful squinting towards monarchy!

Mr. GHOLSON said, that so far from clothing any President with an inviolability of character and assigning to him an incapacity to do wrong, he would go as far as his colleague or any other man in support of private and personal right, and to secure the inviolability of private property. Sir, said Mr. G., did any expression escape me to the disparagement of the right of the claimant? I only said, that under color of a title derived from the previous laws of the country, the President had considered it his duty to take possession of this land. I pledge myself even to go further. I would give the claimant possession, if he would give security to abide the result of a fair trial of the title. I conceive the law under which he was dispossessed to have been a most execrable one; I was desirous too that the blame should be placed on the right horse, and never said my colleague was the cause of it. But I believe, in an honest zeal against Yazoo perjury, he and his then colleague did subscribe their assent to a law which they would not otherwise have consented to pass. The law cannot be vindicated. It does invade judicial powers; because it invaded the principle, which we inherit, that possession is a prima facie evidence, of the right to property, and that the citizen cannot be deprived of it but under the law of the land, and by the intervention of an impartial jury of his countrymen.

Mr. HOLLAND rejoiced that this case had come before the House. It was a subject of peculiar satisfaction to him, that gentlemen would now see what was the consequence of being put under military law. I well recollect, said Mr. H., that, when the law was passed to prevent Yazoo men from having the right of citizens, it was then stated by some, in opposition to it, that it was improper to put any class of citizens under military law; that, to remove them from possession of the land, when they had titles in their hands, and claimed a trial, by the laws of the country, was contrary to the Constitution. The opponents to the law stated a number of cases, in which it might bear hard on others than the Yazoo claimants. So extreme, however, was the zeal of gentlemen, that they determined to put them all under the Yazoo law, not only the Yazoo claimants but all other. Now, it seems that the ground on which they stood is taken from them; now it is demonstrable that a "little law knowledge" is requisite for legislators. No doubt gentlemen who supported the passage of that law did not intend to entrap any but Yazoo men. It seems it has taken in a worthy citizen. I then thought, and still think, there are Yazoo claimants honest men as well as others. The reason why I voted against that law was, that it was a violation of the rights of the citizen; for it is always against the rights of the citizen to put him under military law. It is now complained that the particular persons on whom it was intended that the law should operate, have escaped it, but that if they had been put under military law, it would have been a gratification to gentlemen. I rejoice that it has now operated on a man who is able to come forward and show that he has been oppressed by that law, and who is able to show that the operation of the law was oppressive. The Executive is not to blame, except for not extending the operation of the law as far as it was intended. The gentleman might have seen also, had he chosen, why the law has not been put into operation in relation to others; they have been compelled, in order to retain their situation, to say that they hold under no claim.

It is true, sir, that the bill, passed in 1807, came from the Senate; yet, I recollect that, so ardent were gentlemen in favor of it, that the appropriation could not be carried into effect, and the Committee of Ways and Means would not bring in a bill until something of this kind was admitted, in the shape of a law, with a particular view to keep the Yazoo claimants from having the right to a trial by jury. When we legislate upon these principles, sir, we shall always get into embarrassments.

Mr. FISK opposed the reference of the subject to the Attorney General, and advocated the rights of the petitioner. He had no idea of taking a way property from the petitioner, and then giving it to the corporation of New Orleans. It was giving him a law suit, at least. He would place the property in status quo, and give the corporation any claim which the United States might have had to the land, and let them and the individual contest it together.

After some further observations from Mr. MACON and Mr. W. ALSTON in favor of the report of the committee, and of Mr. BIBB against it, the resolution for a reference of the subject to the Attorney General was negatived—ayes 27.

TUESDAY, JUNE 20.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, jointly, with a committee to be appointed on the part of the Senate, to have the direction of the money appropriated to purchase books for the use of Congress, pursuant to the "Act making a further appropriation for the support of a Library," passed on the 21st of February, 1806.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. DANA, and Mr. SAY, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution, on the part of this House.

Mr. BIBB moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to vest in the Corporation of New Orleans whatever right, title, or claim, the United States possess to the batture, situate in front of the suburb of St. Mary's, and adjoining the city of New Orleans.

The resolution was read, and permitted to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation to finish and furnish the Senate Chamber, and for other purposes;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill to alter the road from Baltimore to Annapolis by Rockhall, was read the third time, and supported by Mr. MONTGOMERY and opposed by Messrs. STANFORD, GOLDSBOROUGH and LIVERMORE, and postponed indefinitely, ayes 65.

SEA-LETTER VESSELS.

Mr. MACON observed that there was known to the laws of the United States, a species of vessels called sea-letter vessels, foreign built, but belonging to this country. They appeared to be a mongrel species of vessel, of which he wished to get rid. Those who wished to encourage American shipbuilding would be in favor of the following motion, for it would go to encourage it:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the registering anew of vessels built in the United States, which are owned in whole by citizens of the United States, any disability incurred by such vessel to the contrary notwithstanding, and also into the expediency of forbidding by law sea-letters or any custom house documents being granted to vessels not registered or licensed according to law, or not owned by citizens of the United States within a limited time after the passing of such a law.

The House agreed to consider the motion, ayes 72.

On the suggestion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, the motion was ordered to lie on the table for one day.

BARRED CLAIM.

Mr. JOHNSON made a report on the claim of General Arthur St Clair, for moneys due to him by the United States, stating that the claim is barred by the statute of limitations, and therefore recommending that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

A motion was made by Mr. EPPES to recommend the report, because it rejected the claim merely because within the operation of the statute of limitations, without inquiring into its merits; and because the principle had already been settled in the case of the report on the petition of Hannah Foster, made a few days ago, which was recommitted on the same ground, and a report required on the merits of the case.

After debate, the report was ordered to lie on the table.

BRIGADIER GENERAL'S PAY.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observed, that by the act passed in 1802, fixing the Military Peace Establishment, among other things, the pay of the Brigadier General was fixed at $225, which was to be his full and entire compensation; and also allowed "to the commanding officer of each separate post, such additional number of rations as the President of the United States shall from time to time direct, having respect to the special circumstances of each post." Under this section of the act, an opinion had been given by the Attorney General, in pursuance of an application to him, that the Brigadier General, besides his fixed allowance, was entitled to extra allowances. A committee had been appointed at the last session, who had reported facts on this subject, on which report no order had been taken, except that, at a late hour on the last night of the session, a motion was made by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) declaratory of the fact, that that allowance was illegal and improper. The ground taken in opposition to it was, that this House could not speak, except through legislative acts, and that it was only in the form of a law that an exposition could be made. It had been declared by gentlemen on almost every side of the House, that they inclined to the belief that the Attorney General's opinion was not in conformity to law. But since that decision had been made by the Attorney General, until it should be reversed by law, Mr. J. said it would continue to be a rule of conduct. He had felt a disposition, ever since the meeting of Congress, to have their attention drawn to this subject; and he had waited in expectation that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. R.) would have brought forward some such proposition; but he had waited in vain. It was consistent with his sense of propriety that something should be done to correct the proceeding in future. By the act of 1808, two additional Brigadier Generals had been authorized, whose allowance was but $104 per month, besides their rations, for which, admitting the highest value, the whole compensation could not amount to as much as $225 dollars per month, the pay of the first Brigadier General. He wished that the allowance of the one should be expressly limited to its standard by law, and that of the other two brought up to it. He, therefore, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill declaring that the compensation to the Brigadiers General of the Army of the United States, fixed by the act of Congress, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," shall be no more than $225 dollars per month, including all rations and every other species of emoluments heretofore claimed or allowed, except the usual allowance of stationery.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he was very glad to hear it acknowledged that the opinion of the Attorney General upon the act of 1802 was an incorrect and illegal opinion; but he was afraid that this was not the mode to correct an illegal and incorrect act, whether of the Attorney General or of any other officer of the Government of the United States. The Committee of Ways and Means to be instructed to bring in a bill declaring how a law should be construed! That to him was a novelty. The Committee of Ways and Means might bring in a bill declaratory and amendatory of the law; but the introduction of a bill declaring how a law shall be construed, he took to be a novelty, and moreover incommensurate with the extent of the evil. If, in the present case, a manifest departure from the law had taken place with impunity, he wished to know how this proposed law for construing law was to be enforced? Recollect that it has been agreed on all hands (we are told so, at least,) that the conduct of the officers in question has been incorrect and illegal. Now, if it has been incorrect or illegal, that the proper remedy is not a declaratory act, is a self-evident proposition, because there will be no more sanction for securing the observance of the new law than of the old. With respect to the case occurring at the last session, and the motion made by me in relation to it, I think the House will do me the justice to say, that I certainly have pointed their attention to it even during the present session; and it will be recollected that the whole of that business is now, by a resolution of this House, in possession of a committee appointed to investigate the application of public moneys to the purposes for which such moneys have been appropriated; and, unquestionably, it will be the duty of the committee to take cognizance of it. That point was agitated this morning in committee, and it was determined to take notice of that irregular and illegal expenditure of public money, as of any other, and report thereupon. The law itself, Mr. R. said, was perfectly clear, and could not require any amendment, much less an act declaring how it should be construed. To prove this he quoted the law. If a subsequent act had established other brigadier generalships, (if he might use the expression,) and had given them less monthly pay by more than an hundred dollars than to the Brigadiers under the former act, allowing them, however, rations and forage, it placed them also without the limitation of the law in relation to extra allowance of rations and forage. They were placed, by the very nature of their compensation, on the same footing, rank excepted, as the colonels, majors, &c., under the old law, which, please observe, declared that the Brigadier General should receive a certain gross sum of money in lieu of any other emolument whatever, stationery requisite for the use of his department excepted. To all officers other than the Brigadier appointed under the act of 1802, that regulation of this section applied, which enabled the President of the United States to give to the commanding officer of each separate post "such additional number of rations as he shall from time to time direct, having respect to the special circumstances of each post." The Brigadier Generals lately appointed, having a monthly pay inferior to the Brigadier appointed under the former act, and having, as he had not, allowance for forage and rations, this section of the law, which had been improperly extended to the first Brigadier, Mr. R. said did fairly attach to the Brigadiers subsequently appointed, because they, instead of having a gross sum per month in full, had $104 in part, and rations and forage also, which the act in 1802 positively denied to the Brigadier first appointed. So that if the Committee of Ways and Means, or any committee, were to bring in a bill declaring how that act should be construed, they would bring in a bill declaring, that because the act of 1802 had been illegally and incorrectly expounded as to the original Brigadier, it should not be legally expounded in relation to the new Brigadiers, but that they should be excluded from the positive benefit of a law made for their express case. Mr. R. said he should, therefore, vote against this resolution—and he thought he might, without arrogance, say that he had demonstrated to the House the inapplicability of the resolution to the case in question, and its inefficiency as to any abuses which now existed, or might hereafter occur, in this department.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observed that he had not considered it necessary to be as explicit in a resolution as in a bill. He had not said, as ascribed to him, that the conduct of the officer making the allowance was illegal. It was perfectly legal; for, if gentlemen would turn to the act establishing the office of Attorney General, they would find that he was bound to take an oath of office, and, upon the application of any officer of Government, to give his opinion as a rule for their guide. That opinion had been given in the present instance, and in pursuance of it, the allowance had been made. Have I, said Mr. J., said, that the conduct of the Attorney General was illegal and incorrect? I said that the opinion was deemed to be illegal and incorrect. But we are asked by the gentleman, why legislate on the subject? You cannot have forgotten, sir, that the member from Virginia, when he offered the resolution at the last session, spoke of the high regard he had for the officer who had given the incorrect construction of the law. He then said that the having given an erroneous opinion was no disparagement to his talents, for that Homer himself sometimes nodded; that it was merely an error of the judgment, in which the heart was not inculpated. But when laws have been constructed differently from the intention of those who passed them, it is not at all unusual to pass laws giving an explanation of such laws. What would be the effect, the gentleman asks, if this officer were again to violate his duty? There has been no violation of duty; it was a mere error of opinion. But if there was a law expressly declaring that the emoluments of the Brigadier General should not exceed two hundred and twenty-five dollars, the officer could not plead a misconstruction of the law. I ask the gentleman, whether he can possibly wish that this erroneous opinion shall be practised on in future, for the purpose of exclaiming against the officer who is bound to act on the opinion given, so long as it is unreversed? When the Legislature is informed that the officers of the Government expound a law differently from its intention, they usually pass a law explanatory of it—and this is a correct mode of proceeding. In every point of view, I can see no good ground for opposing the resolution, and I had hoped that it would pass unanimously. With the exception of the gentleman who declared that he would oppose it, I hope so still.

Mr. LIVERMORE observed, that if the case in question had been a doubtful point, or one which admitted of a doubt, it might be proper to legislate on it; but he could not conceive that a doubt existed. He did not believe it possible that a law could be made stronger in the English language, and where was the security if a law was passed confirming it, that that law too would not be violated? He did not mean to insinuate that he considered the officers of the Treasury to be corrupt; but he conceived that they had not proceeded with that correctness which ought to characterize officers in that situation. There could have been no necessity for a legal opinion in a case in which there could have been no doubt. The opinion itself was a strange one, whether considered as coming from a professional character, or from a man of common intelligence. On reading the law, he was astonished that the Brigadier General could have been supposed to be entitled to a farthing more than two hundred and twenty-five dollars per month in full. He quoted the law, observing that there was an exception of no other allowance than stationery. According to an old rule of law, that an exception renders a clause stronger, that exception would clinch the meaning. Mr. L. said, it would be impossible to introduce a law more explicit than this. If the Attorney General was to say black was white, were the other officers of Government implicitly to believe it? If he were to say that "two hundred and twenty-five dollars" meant two hundred and twenty-five pounds, would they believe it? Surely not. It was equally impossible that the Brigadier General should have been entitled to rations, forage, or other emolument, when the law said expressly that he should not have them. There ought to be some mode of deciding the case without passing a law to prevent the officers from doing wrong in future. If, notwithstanding the precedent given, they should continue to make allowance to the officers in question of rations, forage, &c., in his opinion they would be liable to punishment. There was no necessity for legislation on the subject.

Mr. EPPES said that the fact was, that the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and the Comptroller of the Treasury, had all given a construction of the law different from that for which the gentleman from Massachusetts contended; and, although he was far from wishing to disparage either the legal or any other talent of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he should be very much inclined to conceive that either the Secretary of War or the Attorney General was as capable of giving a legal opinion as that gentleman. A law had been passed declaring that the compensation of the Brigadier General should consist of a certain sum. He had no doubt that it was the intention of the Legislature that it should consist of that sum. Such, Mr. E. said, as an individual, he had always believed to be the construction. In the same law was a passage declaring the commanders of separate posts should receive such additional rations as the President shall think proper to grant, having respect to the special circumstances of each post. Under that clause, the law had, as he conceived, been incorrectly construed. As a difference of opinion existed as to the construction of the law, the question was, what course should be pursued? If gentlemen believed that either the Secretary of War, the Comptroller of the Treasury, or the Attorney General, had corruptly acted in the construction they had given, for any such conduct they were liable to a punishment, agreeably to law. But, as he imagined that there was no gentleman in the House who believed, that in giving this opinion they had been actuated by corrupt motives, he could see no mode more regular than to declare by law that the compensation should consist of that sum, and that only. It appeared to him that there could be no objection, in a case of this kind, to give a construction of the law; because it would not at all interfere with the course which gentlemen might hereafter wish to pursue, either with the officer concerned, or in placing it before the public, in any manner.

Mr. NELSON said, if he understood rightly the object of the resolution—that it contemplated the introduction of a bill explanatory of a law of the land—he was opposed to it; because he believed, that, if any gentleman chose to take the trouble to read the present law, he would be with him of opinion that no power of language could make any new law more plain than the old one. The reason why a fixed allowance had been made to the Commander-in-Chief, was, that he would be always exposed to certain expenses to which other officers were not liable; and it was therefore proper that he should have a fixed and adequate compensation. Mr. N. said, he had no doubt that the opinions of all the three officers, concurring in construction, were incorrect; and he presumed that they had fallen into the error in this way: that the law, in another part of it, said, that every officer commanding at a separate post should be entitled to an additional number of rations. Why? For the same reason that the expenses of the Commander-in-Chief must be greater than other officers; because they have to entertain the officers and visitors at each post. Was it ever heard of before, that a Commander-in-Chief should be sent to command a separate post? How separate; from whom separate; from the main Army? No; because he must be with the main body. If there was an army of an hundred thousand men, and it should be so dispersed that there should only remain with the Commander-in-Chief five hundred men, that body was the main Army, and could not be a separate command. How our officers have fallen into this error, I cannot tell. That the Attorney General, who knows not much of military subjects—that the worthy Comptroller, (who, I am proud to say, would do honor to any country as a man of integrity)—should have erred on this point, is not so surprising; but that my old friend, the Secretary of War, could have fallen into such an error as to suppose that the Commander-in-Chief could be placed at a separate post, is a little extraordinary. How would it be separate? Wherever he is, is the main Army—from thence orders originate. Why we should pass this explanatory law, is, to me, very strange; for, if the former law is not distinct enough, we may go on and pass laws ad infinitum, without making them intelligible.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, that no man would more readily than himself adopt a resolution of this sort, if he could deem it at all necessary to obtain the object which the gentleman from Virginia very candidly had explained to the House that he had in view. When he had seen the construction which had been given to the law sanctioned by one of the highest law characters of the United States, he had been almost led to doubt the evidence of his own senses. You, sir, said Mr. T., well remember the circumstances under which that law was passed. For myself, though I should most heartily wish to guard and put checks in such a way that the officers of Government could not misconstrue the law, yet I say that I can hardly conceive words in the English language which could be more full and complete than those of the law fixing the Military Peace Establishment. It does not appear to me that the opinions of all the officers of the Departments were the same as that of the Attorney General; for, as far as I remember, there was a strong ground of objection to this extraordinary claim, amounting almost to rejection; and that the opinion was called for, more to help out the claim, than as the groundwork of proceeding. I utterly reject the idea that the Attorney General is the sole person competent to construe a law. Here is a law, one of the most plain and conclusive, declaring that the Brigadier General shall not receive one farthing more than a fixed compensation; and yet, the officers of the Treasury have allowed the most extraordinary claim, on the authority of the opinion of the Attorney General! Could we enact a law in more explicit language? We could not. The resolution, however good its object, (and I would accord most sincerely in carrying that object into effect,) would certainly be useless. To pass an explanatory law, would be trifling with the Legislature and with the Government. I am averse to sanctioning the construction given, which would be the effect of passing an explanatory bill. In my present opinion of the resolution, therefore, I am averse to its passage.

Mr. HOLLAND said, he certainly could not conceive that the passage of the resolution, or declaring the meaning of the law, would sanction the decision of the War Department in relation to it.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON asked his friend's leave to interrupt him, and withdrew the resolution, which he said he had proposed under a belief that there would be no objection to it.

FINANCE.

The engrossed bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the support of public credit and for the redemption of the public debt," was read the third time.

Messrs. PICKMAN, LIVERMORE, and RANDOLPH, opposed the bill.

Mr. LYON.—Mr. Speaker: The bill on your table meets my most hearty disapprobation; for reasons which I will take the liberty, in the most concise manner, to suggest. It is not, sir, altogether because I perceived, on the first glance, that the bill was an attempt to raise money, by loan, for the public service, in a disguised form, thereby to shelter the advocates of the unfortunate, disgraced embargo from the odium of so soon becoming borrowers—a situation their favorite measure has brought them into—after all the boast of an overflowing Treasury, and a superfluous revenue, for the disposal of which a committee of this House was at last December selected. Although, sir, such attempts at deceiving the people, and keeping from their view the true state of the nation, are ever at war with the true principle of Republicanism—if the bill contained nothing more than the mere subterfuge, the deception I speak of, my desire to let everything which relates to that disastrous measure pass into oblivion; my wishes to heal, if possible, what is by some called a breach in the Republican party, created by the gentlemen who now advocate this bill making the embargo a party measure, would have prevailed with me to let the bill pass with my bare negative vote. But, sir, I see a vital stab aimed by that bill at the Sinking Fund; a fund constituted principally from a portion of the national revenue appropriated, and most sacredly pledged by the truly Republican Congress of 1802; pledged, not only to the creditors of the nation, but pledged to the American people as their redemption from a debt which threatened their posterity. This republican act of the organ of the Republican party, just then arrived at the zenith of their power, consummated with the most patriotic views, was received by the nation with extreme applause. At the time, I was not a member of Congress, but I can never forget the satisfaction with which the news was received by myself, and all those with whom I was conversant. I remember, also, reading that the Federalists threw some obstacles in the way of its passage; they prophesied the fate which now awaits that Sinking Fund; they asserted that, regardless of its sanctity, it would, ere long, be broken in upon, under one pretence or other, to defray the current expenses which ought to be provided for in some other manner. This opposition to a measure so salutary in its nature and design, irrevocably pledging a share of the national income to the discharge of the national debt, was among the ruins of the old Federalists, which has swept them out of this House. Little did I think, when reading the debates on this subject in 1802, that a majority of this House in 1809, and that majority calling themselves Republicans, would be found fulfilling the predictions which I then considered as the effusion of spleen and envy. No, sir, I could not then believe that the same men, or their successors in name, flushed with power and proud of the strength of their party, would sacrilegiously destroy so fair a monument of the virtue, the wisdom, and the patriotism of the Republican Congress of 1802. It is contended that the bill does not go the length that I insist it does. Why was the bill couched in jargon—in language so nearly unintelligible, that the most learned gentlemen in this House cannot understand it alike? Was it for any good purpose? It is not likely to be the case; as every amendment offered to this House to make the bill more intelligible, has been rejected by great majorities. It seems we cannot get a letter of this bill altered; we are refused the explanations which we require from the Secretary of the Treasury, who must have drawn the bill or furnished materials. However ignorant I am, I can see the bill goes to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold from the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund the money sacredly promised to be placed in their strong box; and it allows that money to be paid out of the ordinary expenditures of the Government. It goes also to the empowering of the Commissioners to make up the deficiency by borrowing. It is asked, what harm will all this do? I answer, it will destroy the nature of the Sinking Fund; it will make a breach on its inviolability, and nothing can remain but the name. One breach on the purity of the virgin fund, and it loses all its reputation—it becomes common! Its virtue, like virtue of another kind, consists in its chastity and inviolate character!—a single act of prostitution will destroy the fair fame, and even the very nature, of this fair daughter of Republican virtue.

The gentleman on my left, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) lawyer-like, very ingeniously argues that, if you had given a note for a sum of money, and a mortgage of a certain property for the security of its due payment, and you do eventually and honorably pay that money, although you borrow the money from another to pay that debt, the mortgagee has no right to complain. All this may be very well; but there is no similarity between that and the case before us. I will take the liberty to state a case: A man borrows money of another, and beside giving his note, he mortgages the rents of certain lands; in security for the payment, he fixes a strong-box in a safe place, into which the agents to whose management the lands are assigned are directed, through an aperture which will admit of no money going out, to drop the rents to a certain amount. The key is placed by contract between the debtor and his heirs, who are extremely anxious to see their patrimony cleared from this debt, in the hands of certain trustees, who are, at stated times, to open the box and pay the interest, and a portion of the principal. This course is pursued for some time to the mutual satisfaction of both the creditors and the heirs; when the mortgagor takes it into his head to get another key made and goes to the sacred box for money to satisfy his ordinary disbursements. Or, suppose he finds means to draw the money which was to be dropped into the box out of the hands of the agents, and then calls out to the trustees, "my credit is good—borrow, if you can, on that credit, to make up the deficiency I have occasioned." In such a case, would the mortgagor be justifiable? I say no. Every one would say the creditor was robbed of the benefit of the mortgage, that the pledge was injured, was destroyed. The creditor would have cause of alarm. The heirs would say, their hope of freeing their patrimony from this debt was jeopardized; that the check against squandering for any and every purpose, that which was pledged for the best of purposes, and for that exclusively, was destroyed. I take this, sir, to be the parallel of the case before us; my mind can conceive no difference between the two cases.

Notwithstanding all the opposition I can give to this bill, I believe it will go down, and that by about the old embargo majority. And what are gentlemen to gain by this victory? A loss, a very serious loss. They will lose the fair fame of being the supporters of that goodly fabric, the Sinking Fund; while they gain the name of polluters and destroyers. And for what? the poor temporary popularity of getting through this session without the name of directly authorizing a loan; although, in fact, they will have done it, and that in a way most deserving reprobation. But, sir, the veil that is thrown over this borrowing is too flimsy, not to be seen through by a great share of their partisans at home. The rejection of the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) which went to fix the commencement of Commissioners to borrow, at the period when the money appropriated and pledged to the Sinking Fund should be inadequate to the demand upon them, exposes the character of the bill to every man of common discernment, who pays attention to the subject.

I voted for the expense which will bring the nation into debt—all the defensive measures. I am opposed to reducing the Army at present. And, although I did not vote for the embargo, which has cut off the means of paying the expenses, I am willing to meet the present exigency by authorizing the President to borrow a sum in the usual way. I believe, if we had no extra session, the Government would have got along very well without borrowing until Congress meet again. I believe they may now get on until Fall; yet, on the first intimation of its being necessary, I am ready to give my aid to a loan in the usual way, consistent with good faith—this ought to suffice.

Gentlemen boast of the national credit. I know the present credit in abundance—know its sources—one of them is the good faith which the Federal Government has hitherto preserved; and I beg of gentlemen to continue to preserve it. This bill puts me in mind of the man who, after telling one untruth, takes the liberty to tell another to cover or justify the first, and so goes on, until, by sinking deeper in filth, he gets himself enveloped in difficulties, and surrounded with disgrace.

I wish gentlemen on my left would open their eyes, and, looking across the House they sit in, would see who sits in the seats before them. Those seats were emptied of their tenants by the sedition laws, the alien bill, the land tax, and eight per cent. loans; they are now filled, by Republican blunders, with a new set of Federalists, who are not loaded with the sins of the old. They will not only be careful to avoid the rocks and shoals which their predecessors split and foundered upon, but they will watch and take advantage of any new blunder or misstep Republicans may make. They are more numerous, and have greater opportunities sometimes to present to the people, in the colors they choose, your conduct and your motives. The measures that have been pursued for two years past by the majority, have had a tendency to lessen that unbounded confidence the people placed in those called the heads of the Republican party. Gentlemen ought to calculate that their doings will be canvassed with more scrutiny than ever. As a Republican, and a friend to that cause, let me entreat you to pause before you put another weapon into the hands of your adversaries; a weapon with which they will not fail to annoy you.

This bill is, I know, considered by many who hear me, as a mere trifle, of little moment—mere matter-of-form—tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. But let me assure them that, in point of principle, it is extremely important. It involves a question of national faith, dear to intelligent Republicans; it will probably be found in the end to be more important than is expected. I will, sir, do my duty, however little I may hope from its performance.

For my endeavors to save the Republican party from the dangers into which they have plunged themselves and the nation, I have been stigmatized. When I assured gentlemen, near two years ago, that their conduct would federalize the Eastern States, I was disbelieved and disregarded; and attempts have been made to represent me as an enemy to republicanism. But my predictions are fulfilled. There is the proof, (pointing to the Federal side of the House.) I will only add, sir, that the enlightened American people will not long be governed by an empty name. There must be wisdom and virtue joined with the name of Republican, to keep up its currency.

The bill was then passed by yeas and nays, 74 to 51, as follows:

Resolved, That the title be, "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt.'"

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, to amend the non-intercourse act, but after remaining a short time in session, the Committee rose and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have concurred in the resolution sent from the House, for the appointment of a joint committee to have the application of the money appropriated by the "Act making a further appropriation for the support of a Library;" and have appointed Mr. THURSTON, Mr. GILES, and Mr. GREGG, a committee on their part.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was recommitted, on the thirtieth instant, their report on the petition of Charles Turner, junior, and petitions from sundry inhabitants of the District of Plymouth, in the State of Massachusetts, contesting the election of WILLIAM BAYLIES, returned to serve as one of the members of this House for the said State, made an amendatory report thereon.

The report repeats the former report in regard to the facts of the case, and adds the following:

That Charles Turner, of Scituate, had for a long time been known throughout the said district by the several descriptions of Colonel Charles Turner, Charles Turner, Esq., and Charles Turner, Junior, Esq.; that there was not in said district any other Charles Turner entitled to the addition of esquire; and that for many years there had not been any Charles Turner in said district older than Charles Turner, of Scituate, although he had continued to add junior to his signature since the removal of his father into the District of Maine, several years ago.

In support of these facts stated by the petitioner, Charles Turner, Junior, who claims a seat in this House, produced a law of Massachusetts, passed June 27, 1794, and another law passed March 10, 1802, prescribing the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives to Congress; in both of which laws it is enacted and required that the persons voted for should be inhabitants of the district, and no instance of any practice to the contrary of these laws has been produced to the committee. He also produced one of the precepts issued by Lieutenant Governor Lincoln for calling the meeting in Plymouth district, on the 19th day of January last, in which precept the Lieutenant Governor had inserted the law. Also, an attested copy of the schedule of the votes returned by the selectmen of the several towns in Plymouth district, in November last, by which it appears that the statement made by the petitioners as to the number of the votes, and in what manner they were returned, is correct; and, in support of the preceding statements and allegations, he produced depositions of Augustus Clapp, who testifies that he has kept the post office in Scituate for the last six years, and that he had examined more than seventy letters received at that office, which, as appeared by the post mark, came from various towns in and out of Plymouth district, having all the various directions of Colonel Charles Turner, Jr. Esq., Colonel Charles Turner, Esq., Charles Turner, Charles Turner, Jr. Esq., Charles Turner, Esq., and Mr. Charles Turner; that he had sent or delivered them to Colonel Turner, of Scituate, not doubting that they were intended for him; that he had examined three letters from the Honorable Ephraim Spooner, one of the Council, directed to Charles Turner, Jr. Esq., and Charles Turner, Esq.

[The report here embodies a great mass of testimony, tending to show that the petitioner was familiarly known and addressed in his district by the name and addition of Charles Turner, Junior, and also without such an addition; and that the vote given, both with and without it, were equally intended for him.]

The testimony is certified to have been taken before Nathan Willis, Esq., who appears by the certificate of the Governor, and of the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to be a justice of the peace, and an associate justice of the court of sessions within and for the county of Plymouth in said State. It also appears that the said Willis, at the request of the said Turner, issued citations, dated 25th of March last, to William Baylies, Esq., the sitting member, requiring him to be present (if he saw cause) by himself or his agent duly authorized, when and where the testimony of the witnesses was to be taken respecting the election which the claiming candidate proposed to contest; in which citations the names of the persons to be examined, and the times and places where the examination was to take place, were inserted, allowing a competent length of time to be prepared.

The committee admitted the testimony above recited to have been correctly taken, notwithstanding the sitting member declined being present himself, or by his agent, he having been duly notified.

The aforesaid depositions are accompanied with official certificates of the decisions of the Senate of Massachusetts, in two cases, supposed by the claiming candidate to be similar to his case, and made under similar Constitutional provisions.

The sitting member had also before the committee a certified return of the election held on the first Monday of November last, agreeing with the certificate accompanying the petitions, and likewise a certificate or schedule of the votes returned on the 19th day of January last, in which schedule it appears that the sitting member had 2,168, (being a majority of the whole number,) and the claiming candidate had 1,812 votes. He also exhibited the credentials of William Baylies, having been appointed and sworn into office as a justice of the peace for the county of Plymouth, and of his having been admitted an attorney by the Supreme Judicial Court, in neither of which is "junior." These are accompanied with a certified statement of the votes given in the second middle district of Massachusetts, in the year 1794, which he suggests to be similar to the case now before the committee.

The committee gave deliberate attention to the allegations and arguments of both parties, and received from the sitting member in writing his reasons for requesting the decision to be postponed till the next session of Congress. They received from the claiming candidate his observations on the reasons offered by the sitting member. And the sitting member also protested against the committee going into the investigation of the evidence adduced by the petitioner. Having diligently attended to the allegations and arguments of both parties, and carefully examined the testimony produced, on mature deliberation, the committee submit the following resolutions to the decision of the House:

"Resolved, That the election held in Plymouth district in November last was legal and proper.

"Resolved, That William Baylies is not entitled to a seat in this House.

"Resolved, That Charles Turner, Junior, is entitled to a seat in this House."

The report was committed to the Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to a revision of our commercial laws, for the purpose of protecting and fostering the manufactures of the United States, and the several memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of hats and salt, made a report thereon; which was read as follows:

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the revision of our commercial laws, for the purpose of protecting and fostering the manufactures of the United States, and also the petitions and memorials of sundry manufacturers of hats, of cotton goods, of hemp into linen, of shot, of woollen cloths, and of salt, respectfully submit the following report:

The committee are fully impressed with a conviction of the importance, difficulty, and delicacy, of the subject submitted. It is a mine which even the industry and laborious researches of philosophers cannot exhaust. The committee are apprized, that on this subject men of great science and experience have supported, and do still support, diversity of opinions. With such impressions, they cannot approach it without circumspection. On a review of the reports made on the policy of fostering and protecting our manufactures, the committee find that the plan therein recommended and pursued has received the support of Congress; and likewise the countenance of the nation, if silence on, and long acquiescence in that plan, can authorize them to infer it. In giving to our manufactures the support necessary to withstand foreign competition, skill, and capital, the committee have on all occasions endeavored to avoid the danger of fastening on the community oppressive monopolies. For a manifestation of the solicitude which they have at all times felt, and the caution which has always presided over their deliberations on this interesting subject, they beg leave to refer to the following reports, which they solicit may be taken as parts of the present:

Report on the memorial and petitions of sundry manufacturers of gunpowder, &c.; 10th February, 1802. 1st vol. of Reports page 217.

Report on the petition of sundry manufacturers of paper, &c.; 18th February, 1802, Ibid. page 219.

Report on the petition of sundry manufacturers of paper, &c.; 8th March 1802, page 226.

Report on the petition and memorials of sundry calico printers and dyers, &c.; 25th January, 1804, page 394.

Report on the petition of the president and directors of the New York Dutchess County Slate Companies 15th of November, 1804, p. 491.

Report, on the memorial and petition of the Philadelphia Typographical Society; 22d January, 1806, page 263.

Report on the petitions and memorials of Paul and Joseph W. Revere, and sundry coppersmiths; 21st January, 1808, 2d vol. page 121.

The like spirit which dictated those reports maintains, without any diminution, its influence over the committee, and represses every disposition to depart from restraints, the observance of which becomes indispensable, if the public good be the sole object in view.

The shortness of the present session, and the want of materials, preclude the committee from giving this subject a full investigation. Though the committee have to regret that they are prevented from going into a minute discussion of the advantage that would result from a judicious encouragement of manufactures, yet they cannot refrain from expressing an opinion that additional duties at this time may be laid with advantage on the importation of certain articles. It must be obvious to every person, on the slightest attention, that the citizens of the United States possess sufficient ingenuity and skill to make up all the articles of wearing apparel and millinery that may be wanting for use. It is no less clear that shot, over and above our own consumption, can be supplied, and that other manufactures in which lead is the article of chief value, have progressed so rapidly as to deserve the fostering care of Government. The importation of cotton manufactures from the Cape of Good Hope interferes not only with our own cotton manufactures, but also comes into competition with fabrics imported from Europe, made of the cotton of the United States. Manufactories are in operation for supplying, and preparations are in great forwardness for increasing the supply of coarse cotton manufactures. If some encouragement be given to establishments of this description, the probability is, that a quantity of these manufactures, equal to the demand, may be supplied. Bedticking, of a quality superior to that which is imported, can be had in abundance.

JUNE, 1809.

The use of salt as a necessary of life cannot be dispensed with. To keep in the market a quantity commensurate to the consumption of the nation is certainly an object of moment. In times of peace importations of this article are abundant, and the price low; but should the United States at any time be forced into war by a concurrence of inauspicious events—and they have no power to prevent it—the scarcity consequent on such a state of things would greatly increase the price of this article, and the pressure would of course be sensibly and severely felt by that portion of the community least capable of bearing it. The scarcity and high price of salt during the American war, produced no little distress. The apprehension lately entertained, that a deficiency in the necessary supply of this article would be the consequence of an interdiction of commerce with the belligerent nations of Europe and their dependencies, gave rise to some objections, not easily removed, against the adoption of that measure. To prevent effectually a want of salt, on the occurrence of any event, is certainly an object deserving the serious attention of Congress. Assurances are made with confidence that a supply of this article can be furnished by our own manufactories, equal to the demand, if encouragement be given by a moderate duty on imported salt. A nation erects a solid basis for the support and maintenance of its independence and prosperity, whose policy is to draw from its native sources all articles of the first necessity. As the encouragement sought can be given, it is respectfully submitted to the consideration of the House, whether the manufacture of salt is not, in a national point of view, an object of primary importance, and highly deserving its patronage.

The committee, with great deference, submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That additional duties ought to be laid on the following articles imported into the United States, viz:

On ready made clothing and millinery, two and one-half per cent. ad valorem.

On cotton manufactures from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, on bedticking and on corduroys, and fustians, two and one-half per centum ad valorem—and on shot and other manufactures in which lead is the article of chief value, one-half cent per pound.

Resolved, That a duty of eight cents per bushel on imported salt, would give encouragement to the manufacture of that article in the United States.

A motion was made to refer the report to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHEFFEY wished to move to postpone it indefinitely; but the motion for commitment being first made, the question on it was first put.

The motion for commitment was opposed by Messrs. SHEFFEY, VAN HORN, ROSS, and MACON, on the ground that it was useless in name to pay attention to a subject which in fact could not be considered at this late period of the present session; that a call having been made on the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to manufactures, it would be improper to act partially on the subject till it could be put in a proper train to be acted on generally; that it was a question which admitted of much doubt and probably would excite much debate, how far it was proper to force any part of the capital of the country from its natural channel into an artificial one; that the tax proposed to be laid on salt, was objectionable and obnoxious to the constituents of most gentlemen in the House; being so, it could not be expected that it would now be decided on.

The motion was supported by Messrs. NEWTON, MCKIM, SOUTHARD, DANA, BOYD, and PICKMAN, on the ground that it was the ordinary course of legislation to refer reports to a Committee of the Whole, except they were so objectionable on the first blush as to be wholly unworthy of consideration; and that, whatever objections gentlemen might have to any particular part of the report, they were not committed to vote for it by referring it; that, even were the report not to be acted on during the session, the House might refuse to take it up when called for, and a reference of the subject would be more respectful as well to the numerous petitioners for legislative aid in manufactures, as to the committee that made the report.

Mr. STANFORD called for a division of the question, so as to take it on a reference of the resolutions separately, being in favor of referring the first and against the last.

Mr. RANDOLPH renewed the motion indefinitely to postpone the report.

The SPEAKER decided it to be out of order, the motion for commitment, first made, having preference.

Mr. RANDOLPH appealed from the decision of the Speaker, which was confirmed by the House, 63 to 31.

After further debate between Messrs. GOLDSBOROUGH, SOUTHARD, RHEA, SMILIE, and HOLLAND, the motion for commitment of the first resolution was carried by yeas and nays, 77 to 41, and made the order of the day for the first Monday in August next, 57 to 52. The yeas and nays are as follows:

The question was then stated from the Chair, that the second member of the said report, consisting of so much of the same as is contained within the second resolution before recited, be committed to the same Committee of the whole House.

A question of order was raised by Mr. RANDOLPH, whether it was in order to put the said question?

Mr. SPEAKER decided that, in his opinion, it was in order.

From which decision of the Chair an appeal was made to the House by Mr. RANDOLPH, and the said appeal being seconded, the question was stated, "Is the decision of the Chair correct?" When, a motion was made by Mr. PITKIN to reconsider the vote last taken: Whereupon, Mr. RANDOLPH withdrew his question of order and appeal.

The question was then taken upon reconsidering the said last vote, and determined in the negative.

Mr. RANDOLPH then renewed his question of order, and his appeal from the decision of the Chair. And, on the question, "Is the said decision of the Chair correct?" it was resolved in the affirmative.

The question to commit the said second member, consisting of the second of the said recited resolutions, to the Committee of the whole House, was then taken, and determined in the negative—yeas 32, nays 85, as follows:

NON-INTERCOURSE.

On motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole—yeas 80—on the bill from the Senate to revive and amend the non-intercourse act, &c.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observed that doubts existed with some gentlemen whether the third section of the act about to be re-enacted by this act did not virtually prohibit the admission of armed vessels. As this was not the intention of the committee who reported it, and he was desirous to make it so explicit that there could be no doubt on that head, he moved an amendment to the proviso, with a view to render the intention more clear.

Mr. GOLD said, that the bill reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, now under consideration, proposed the restoration of the rights of hospitality to France in the admission of her armed vessels into our harbors. The provision of last session, interdicting the entrance into the waters and harbors of the United States to that nation (said he) is left to expire with the present session. This course, sir, I cannot reconcile with justice and consistency. For that cause, sir, did you by a deliberate act of last session exclude French armed ships from your harbors? Does not the same reason continue down to this hour unabated? Has the Emperor of that nation checked his career of injustice against us? Has he ceased to violate and trample under foot everything that is sacred in treaties? Permit me, sir, to call on the advocates of the bill to reconcile the admission of French armed vessels at this session with the measure of exclusion at the last? It was, sir, at the last session resolved by the advocates of the present measure, that the course then adopted, in interdicting our waters to the vessels of the belligerents, was resistance to foreign injustice; and hence to withhold such interdiction was submission. The measure was pressed upon the country in all the fervid strains of eloquence.

Without admitting the definitions of resistance and submission then adopted, or the application of the terms, I put it home to the great leaders at that eventful period, upon the principle of consistency. I ask what has France done that we should now change our attitude of resistance; for what shall we now submit and kiss the rod? I pray gentlemen not to withhold their reasons, but kindly to impart them to the House. Would you, sir, avoid all imputations of partiality, of not carrying an even hand between the belligerents, give to the country the reasons of your conduct; mark your lines plain, that they may not be mistaken. The principle of exclusion of last session was applied to both France and Great Britain; equality was introduced. Hence, sir, it will be seen, that the insulated case of the Chesapeake was not the ground of that provision. If any one should doubt on this point, I invite a recurrence to the resolution expressive of the sense of the House of last session, as preparatory to the law, where he will find a broad application of the principle of exclusion to "all the belligerents having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce of the United States, as a neutral nation."—(Journal of the House of Representatives, page 46.)

While on this subject, permit me, sir, to notice the position laid down in this House, that "the attack upon the Chesapeake was, intrinsically, 'cause of war.'"

If there be any gentleman of the Committee who continues to entertain that opinion, I will refer him to the usages of nations on the subject. The rule will be found in both Puffendorf and Rutherford, that "an individual member of a nation cannot by his act commit or render his nation liable without the assent to, or adoption of, such act by his nation." Here, as soon as the act of Admiral Berkeley was known in England, it was explicitly disavowed. Will it be pretended that the case was proper for a surrender of the individual? The Executive of the United States has not so thought; no demand has been made.

It was not the crime of England, but her misfortune, to have had an individual commit her peace and jeopardize her welfare by an unauthorized act. What has happened to Great Britain may befall America; and we shall never submit to the position, that the nation is committed by the act of a member which it disavows.

After such disavowal and promise of reparation, there could remain no danger of the repetition of the injury; no measure of precaution against the repetition could be necessary, and the continuance of the exclusion of British armed ships, by proclamation, was, sir, in my apprehension, unwarranted by the usages of nations. On the disavowal and promise of reparation, the relations of amity between the two countries ought to have been restored, and so continued until an experiment at negotiation for redress could be made; upon the issue of which, ulterior measures might be adopted.

What losses, what sacrifices this ill-fated continuance of the late President's proclamation has brought on this country is beyond my power to measure.

The exclusion of British and admission of French armed ships in our harbors at the same time, was justly odious; and whether so intended or not, could not fail to interpose an insuperable barrier to all negotiation.

But this odious distinction being done away by the non-intercourse act, so termed, a satisfactory atonement was offered for the attack on the Chesapeake, and negotiation upon other points of difference promised.

The Executive, reposing himself on these assurances, has restored the relations of amity, between the two countries. Here, sir, the course was fair for opening our ports to British vessels; and the line of conduct towards France is equally plain; every principle of justice and honor combine in requiring at our hands a perseverance in the course adopted at last session, in withholding the rights of hospitality from a nation which has, for years, not only violated those rights in relation to this country, but showed an utter disregard to all the various duties imposed on friendly nations.

The task of retracing and comparing the relative conduct of foreign nations towards this country is truly unpleasant, but the proposition before the Committee imposed this duty upon me, and while I have briefly adverted to the catalogue of our sufferings from France, I disclaim all foreign predilections, and, be my country's enemy whoever it may be, am an American.

In what situation will the bill under consideration place America in relation to France? A non-intercourse of trade and an intercourse of hospitality at the same time—an anomaly in the usages of nations. Surely this age is fruitful in experiments, and the new world is henceforth destined to give lessons of political conduct to the old.

Mr. LOYE said that the few observations which he intended to offer should be confined to a reply to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GOLD,) who had just sat down; and could he believe, as that gentleman did, that the proposed amendment did imply submission to the edicts of France, he certainly should be equally opposed to it. The amendment, he said, was merely calculated to give effect to that part of the bill which provided for the removal of the interdiction of the armed vessels of France and England from our waters; a provision, which, while it was exercised alike towards both belligerents, neither could complain of, nor could either view it as a condescension, so long as the other enjoyed the privilege to a similar extent. The removal of the interdiction as to both nations left both in the same relative situation towards each other as the continuance of it would. All Great Britain had required was to be placed in a state of equality with France as it respected her armed vessels. The act of the last Congress which effected this purpose (said Mr. L.) is by that Power made the ground of an overture, which has been accepted by our Government as honorable and satisfactory.

Had the terms of that overture required that British armed vessels should receive admission into our waters, in exclusion of those of France, as some have mistakenly supposed, the question would have assumed a different aspect, but that was not the case, nor would the law of the last session have warranted such admission.

But the gentleman has said, that the outrages of France are of a more inexcusable nature than those of England; that with England we have no treaty, and with France we have one which has been infringed. I had presumed that, at this time, no man could be found in the National Legislature of this country, who would attempt to palliate or excuse the conduct of either of the belligerents towards us. Indeed, so little regard was in every respect paid to treaties by those nations, that nothing can be said of the good or bad faith of either of them. It is certainly no difficult matter to enumerate various infractions by both nations. Great Britain has infringed the first of the permanent articles of the Treaty of 1794, by the attack on the Chesapeake, for that article, I believe, stipulates that there shall be an inviolable peace between the two nations. It is said, indeed, that ample reparation was tendered, according to the principles of the law of nations, by the disavowal of the outrage, which the gentleman has said was afterwards no longer a question of public injury, but then became merely personal to the individual committing the outrage, and for this the law of nations had been referred to. The reference to that law, sir, is correct; and if the gentleman had been equally correct in his premises, there would have been no disagreement between us. Had Great Britain, when she made the disavowal of the act, have promptly surrendered the culprit to the justice of our laws, and to punishment for the violation of them within our limits, she would have done what the law of nations enjoins, and our Government must have been satisfied. There is no subject of political interest which, I believe, has ever been more misrepresented than that relative to the affair of the Chesapeake. It was but a few days ago, a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) if I understood him right, declared on this floor, that the same overtures which had now been accepted were made to Mr. Monroe in London, but he was not permitted to accede to them. Sir, I should be glad to be informed in what part of the correspondence, public or private, of an official or epistolary kind only, this fact is exhibited. Compare the reparation agreed to be made, with anything which has before been offered us, and the assertion stands completely refuted.

The affair is now adjusted, I believe, sir, to the satisfaction of all parties, and of every man in the nation; and although it might be doubted whether a President of the United States has, of himself, without the concurrence of the other branch of the treaty-making power, the right to accept of reparation for an act of hostility of so flagrant a nature as that we have been speaking of, yet I shall at all time be ready to approbate the terms on which the adjustment has been made.

It is said by the gentleman from New York, that all our differences are in a train of accommodation with England, and the recent overtures ought to place her on superior ground to France. Her recent overtures have placed her on superior ground, by opening commercial intercourse with her, and continuing the inhibition as to France. That is all she did or could require of us. To do more would, in my opinion, be a voluntary act of hostility towards France; and one which, if we are disposed to hold the scale of justice with an equal hand towards both nations, we ought to avoid. What has France done since the passage of the non-intercourse law, which would make such a distinction proper, or would make this exclusion of her armed vessels, and the admission of her enemy's, the appropriate remedy? When the measure of exclusion, as it respected England alone, was resorted to, it was a remedy which was appropriate to the injury. She had attacked our vessels in our own waters, and a series of outrages were consummated by the capture of the Chesapeake.

But the policy of the interdiction of the last Congress, stands on different principles. The repeated injuries our commerce has sustained from both nations require that both should be put on the same ground. It was done, and although the position they both stand in will be changed by this bill, yet they will alike remain on a ground of equality. So far, sir, as respects any other subject than those negotiated on at this place lately, policy would certainly dictate that we should at this time, maintain the most guarded position. I do not mean here to express a doubt of the sincerity of the British Ministry in the overture they have made for the revocation of their orders of November, 1807. I believe at least that the overture was made with pure good faith on the part of her Minister resident in the United States. But, sir, I confess there is something in the orders of April, 1809, which produce an involuntary distrust, that the negotiation made here is not to be fulfilled in its spirit and meaning. The new orders are said to be produced by the altered state of Europe. What is this alteration, and when was it made? If at all, it has been since the overture authorized by the late mission to this country, and if that be the principle on which this new order rests, we may indeed be told, that the negotiation made here affords us no security for the abrogation of the principle of the orders of November, 1807. I confess I find none in the assurance that the new orders are not connected with the negotiation made here. The Minister has probably used the words of his instructions, and for my part I had rather it had been said that the new orders were connected with, and their continuance dependent on the negotiation pending here. An assurance of this sort, would to my mind have been more satisfactory. But sir, I have unwillingly said anything in reply to the gentleman on this topic; it is a delicate one, and certainly the less we shall say at present about it, the better. To me it would have been much more agreeable to have said nothing on it, and if possible to have refrained from acting at this moment; it would to my apprehension have been more fortunate to us, had the meeting of this Congress have been fixed to such a period as would have enabled us to act on the real instead of the conjectural state of our relations with France and England; and indeed I conceive the less we do, until we know our actual state, the better. The provisions of the present bill, I only prefer to those of a contrary description contained in a bill reported some time ago, by the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Intercourse, because these may possibly produce some advantage in the sale of our products; not much, and there is certainly little choice in the measures. The only very important feature in either, being the equal justice which is held out to both the belligerents. Thus far they each pursue the policy our Government has never ceased to adhere to, and therefore I am willing, if compelled at this moment to act at all, to give the present proposition my support.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he would not admonish the House that he would not dilate on the subject; for if he did he feared he should contradict his assertion. He would say a few words why he thought the amendment ought not to be adopted, though he confessed he did not feel very anxious about it one way or the other. He did not feel himself responsible for the question. It is, however, said he, a matter of considerable delicacy in all its bearings. There is a negotiation going on between this country and Great Britain. It was supposed, at a certain period not long past, that we were on the eve of a war with Great Britain, and indeed with France also. As this business is now considered as being with the Executive, and in a great measure confided to him, I certainly would not do anything to interfere with what may be the transactions between the two Governments, or interrupt the harmony now existing. I will briefly state a history of this business as it strikes my mind. I will not however go into all the confused contradictory assertions, speeches, and decisions, made within these walls during the last session, but simply take up this famous non-intercourse law as to what it was intended to effect. It was said, by the Committee of Foreign Relations, that we had suffered great injuries from both nations. No doubt this was correct. An abstract proposition was then offered, Can we submit to the orders and decrees? No, was the answer. What then? Gentlemen called upon us for a substitute for the embargo. We said that there was none necessary in our opinion but to repeal it. It appeared to be thought necessary, however, that something should be done; and, after great confusion, this non-intercourse bill was brought forward, to be sure in a strange kind of a way, not by those gentlemen who were ultimately the majority on its passage, but by those who wanted letters of marque and reprisal, which the House would not grant. This bill was not agreed on, which speaks for itself. It was thought to be a hostile measure, and intended as such by the declaration made at the time. But it was contemplated that probably one of those nations might recede from its unlawful ground; and in consequence of this belief, a new section was enacted authorizing the President of the United States in case Great Britain or France should so revoke or modify their edicts as to render the commerce of the United States sufficiently safe, to declare the same by proclamation. That hostile deed was then to be done away, according to the understanding of every man. The thing was done by Great Britain. Was it intended to be done away as to both, because one revoked its edicts? No gentleman with any kind of consistency advance that this was the understanding of it. [Mr. EPPES asked of Mr. L. whether he had understood him to say that the President was authorized to do away the other provisions of the non-intercourse law, as well as to renew the commercial intercourse.] I believed so, said Mr. LIVERMORE, and I believe such was the opinion of a majority, if not of three-fourths of the nation; for I never heard, till I came here, a different construction of this act. If it be possible to conceive that interdicting ships is a measure of hostility, which certainly I understood to be intended, it must have been the understanding of the British Minister that the whole of the hostile measures should be done away in relation to Great Britain; and for us to say, although trade is to be renewed, yet that these hostile measures are to be continued, seems to me to be absurd. But I wish gentlemen to consider whether there are not two parties to this state of things, Great Britain and the United States. Gentlemen may satisfy their own consciences that they have kept within the letter of the law, but I think they cannot satisfy the country of it. This exclusion of armed ships, as I before said, was viewed as a hostile measure to meet the hostile measures of both belligerents, and to cease when either of those nations ceased their hostility. Now I understand that it has ceased as to Great Britain. In the first place, though different ideas are entertained of the promises of a foreign Minister, and though, when a Minister makes a promise it is only satisfactory when you have security for its performance, it is very different from a case in which a public Minister and functionary makes a promise absolute which does not depend on any contingencies of ratification; it is satisfactory and has been so viewed by the President of the United States. The Orders in Council being withdrawn, hostility ceases, and the two countries are considered as much in amity as though there had been no hostility between them. Has Great Britain made this contract on stipulation offered? What is it natural to suppose that she would expect on our part? Certainly a continuation of hostility towards that other country, till that other country does what she did by rescinding her decrees. For, as the existence of those very decrees of France was injurious to Great Britain, and was the cause of the Orders in Council, which was considered as the cause of difference, what have they a right to expect from us? Why, that precisely the same conduct as we adopted towards both nations should continue as to the other. If therefore it was a part of the agreement that hostility should cease in relation to Great Britain, according to every rule of construction and as to common honesty, the hostility towards the other nation ought to be continued.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr LOVE) appears to be very anxious lest we should put something in this bill to offend sister France; and this disposition is the cause of all our difficulties. The gentleman asks what France has ever done? [Mr. LOVE said the gentleman stated his observations incorrectly.] At the last session, said Mr. LIVERMORE, it was acknowledged—though to be sure it was thought a mighty thing to acknowledge, that France could not be hostile to us; that the two nations were as much alike in their conduct as one egg is like another. There was an admission that they were equally hostile. Is any gentleman now going to contend that there has been no hostile act done by France towards this country? If the Orders in Council were hostile, was not the act also hostile which caused the issuing of them in retaliation of it? It was so considered. I say that the decree of Berlin itself considered seriously was a hostile act, and we have no right to conceive it in a contrary view; and we now feel its effects, and have had a declaration from France, too, that she knew no distinction between us and any other nation, our treaty with her to the contrary notwithstanding. Further, that the decrees of Milan provided that every vessel even spoken to by a British cruiser was "denationalized" and should be condemned. Now I say that these are sufficient acts of hostility to justify the interdiction and inhibition of intercourse mentioned in the act. I do not know that I am competent to judge in what light Great Britain will view the subject. I do not know that the nation will be disposed to break off the negotiation entered into; but I say that I would not alter the stipulation which induced them to revoke the Orders in Council, or I might justify them in recalling their promise.

But gentlemen say, that although the Orders in Council were revoked, they have been renewed in another form. I do not know that they have been renewed. As far as we know we see everything satisfactory, and nothing to interrupt the course of the business. We have no right to say a word about the agreement entered into here, in relation to the modification in the Orders in Council, for the alteration of them and the agreement to revoke here were nearly on the same day, and there cannot therefore be any right to suppose that one is in accordance with the other.

Now, sir, is it possible that Congress will interfere and do anything which shall serve to embarrass the negotiation? It is taking upon themselves so great a responsibility that they would hardly answer it to their constituents. It is true that the President has not recommended anything specific which he has thought proper to be done. I could wish that he had, for I believe it would have been proper. Sir, the admission of French ships will be productive of a very serious evil. They will lodge in our ports, learn what vessels are going out, and go and take them. But this is not the chief reason with me for interdicting

French armed vessels. As far as my vote would go, I would not interrupt anything going on in the way of negotiation. If it were ascertained that the President acquiesced in this measure, I do not know that I should object to it, but nothing of the kind is signified to the House. But is it proper for me to be led by other gentlemen? I am certainly not anxious to get into a situation similar to that in which we were six or eight months ago. I do not want to see the negotiation interrupted. If we alter the stipulations of the non-intercourse act, there will be a plausible pretext for breaking off the negotiation, if they wish to do it. If we should again get into a situation similar to that, it would be a great consolation to know that we had done nothing to authorize it.

Now as to the particular reason why this amendment should be adopted, to put it beyond all doubt that vessels shall be admitted, I certainly shall not agree to it. I hope there is a majority of the House that will not agree to the alteration. As to what further we should do on the subject, I will not at this time say.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he meant to take very little part indeed in this debate, because he conceived that he labored under a very great difficulty in understanding the bill which had come from the other House, as to any practical good which could result from it. He said he saw, indeed, a great many sections of the non-intercourse act of last session retained, and a great many abolished; but when he considered the whole circumstances of the case, this bill appeared to him to be a very flimsy covering to the national nakedness. It would perhaps, said he, be arrogating too much to myself to undertake to pronounce what results would follow from the bill, should it be agreed to in its present shape. I do believe that would be a question which the best legal abilities of this country, and our courts, if it shall be brought before them, will have no small degree of difficulty in deciding. But if I understand the proposition now under consideration, it is made for the purpose of avoiding any absurdity of construction of this bill, and to declare with greater precision that the armed ships of Great Britain and France shall absolutely be admitted into our waters. This is a proposition to which I do not feel at present disposed to agree—and wherefore, sir? Why, because, if I understand anything of the nature of the measures of resistance taken during the last session of Congress to the unlawful edicts and decrees of France and Great Britain, this exclusion of the armed ships of those two nations constituted a part of that resistance. For my part, I never had much opinion (nor have I any better now) of attacking seventy-four gun ships with paper; but really I cannot consent to declare that these ships shall be admitted peremptorily within our waters, when I consider what must be the inevitable consequence of such an admission—for I hope the House will understand me. I speak not in the disjunctive but in the adjunctive in relation to this proposition. It is, by the decrees of France, the right (if right can be conferred by an arbitrary pretension) and duty too of the armed ships of that country, both public and private, to capture every American vessel which shall have been spoken to or visited by any British armed ships. From this ground France has in no degree receded—and yet shall we declare that her ships of war shall come into the Chesapeake, the Hudson, or into Boston harbor, as if we were afraid that their opportunities of executing their illegal decrees would not be sufficient, unless we gave them the rights of hospitality here? Whenever one of those armed ships either comes in or goes out, unquestionably she will be in the habit of taking every American vessel which has been spoken by a British ship of war. Under these circumstances I do confess that I am not ready to say to these people "You shall come in." I had rather have the thing in status quo. I had rather, if they do come in, that they should come in in quality of intruders; that these captors of our property under their illegal decrees should not receive any kind of sanction whatever from the admission of their capturing vessels within our waters. At the same time I hope I may not be so much misunderstood as to be thought capable of supposing that our pen, ink, and paper, will keep the Patriot or any other ship of France from coming in or going out—I am fully impressed with the mortifying conviction that it will not—but at the same time I am unwilling to give them an express right and title to come; and I wait with deference and with patience too for gentlemen to show what are the relaxations on the part of France, what the concessions and modifications of her illegal decrees, in resistance to which this ground was assumed at the last session of Congress, which will countenance us in declaring by law that her armed ships shall come within the waters of the United States.

It really is a curious situation in which you are got through the instrumentality of this bill to interdict commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies. It seems to me that the only possible object of the present session of Congress, if it once be admitted that we are not assembled here to transact the ordinary legislative business, is, that this non-intercourse law may die as soon as we adjourn, because it was to continue till the end of the next session of Congress. Therefore, there was to be and is a session of Congress, in order that we may cease and determine. Perhaps I shall be asked, on the other hand, for a project; and may also be asked, if we do adjourn, and the act to prohibit intercourse dies by its own limitation, what will exist in resistance to one or the other of those two countries on our part? I might say, suppose the bill to continue, what does exist of the nature of resistance? What ever did exist like resistance?

By the 11th section of the non-intercourse law the President was authorized to suspend the law in relation to that Power which should revoke or modify its edicts. Great Britain having done this, we are placed in that situation in relation to her. It is now proposed, if I understand anything of the bill, to change that situation—how? To change it by expressly admitting the armed ships of Great Britain and France (I speak in the conjunction) into our ports and harbors. So that whilst the President of the United States has, in consequence of certain communications between him and the British Government, very wisely and patriotically changed the relations between this country and Great Britain, we are, therefore, without any communications between the President of the United States and France, for the purpose, if I understand the argument, of keeping the balance accurately adjusted between these two Powers, to admit them both into our waters. Now, sir, suppose, on the contrary, that the first overture towards concession and relaxation of their decrees, had come from the French Emperor, and that consequently the President of the United States had, as it would have been his duty to do, suspended the act on which we are now legislating in relation to France. What would have been thought of a proposition that, because the President had such assurances as were completely satisfactory to induce him to suspend the non-intercourse law in relation to France, therefore, we must make some concession to Great Britain, who had shown no disposition to relax in her decrees and orders, for the purpose of keeping the balance of impartiality between two nations, one of whom had and the other had not, in a degree at least, come into our measures? If such a proposition had been made, it appears to me that it would have been scouted. I do not see the whole drift of this bill, but I want to know if the United States ought, without any manifestation of a friendly disposition on the part of France, to make any relaxation of that which they have chosen to call resistance to France, and more especially, if at the very moment they do on paper most rigorously interdict all commercial intercourse with France and exclude her merchant ships, they should by a positive legislative act such as the amendment now under consideration admit her ships of war. If we admit her ships of war, a fortiori I think we ought to admit her merchant vessels.

I have not much expectation of participating more in the final passage of this bill than I did in the act to which this is a supplement. I hope all the good will be received from it which is expected; but, with that amendment, I shall be compelled, however reluctantly, to vote against the bill. And that shows the propriety, in my opinion, not only the propriety but the political necessity, which exists for this House to remain in session until we can receive, and we must be in daily expectation of it, some manifestation of the disposition of the French Government towards us. I do think it would be an act of political dereliction in us, situated as we are in regard to France—and I have as little disposition to go to war with France as any man; I shall show the same disposition towards France now as I did in 1799—I think it would be highly improper in us to change our disposition in relation to France by admitting French ships of war, when, in one week after we adjourn, news may arrive of the Emperor and King taking our proceedings in very high dudgeon, and that he has declared war or issued letters of marque and reprisal against us. It seems that we are to pass this bill in our anxiety to do something, the same old prurient itching to do something which has prompted us to former measures, and in our anxiety too to get away from this place or to surrender this Hall for the celebration of the next fourth of July; for it seems by the papers that volens volens we are to be turned out, and not only that, but that the use of the room is to be vested in strangers. In my opinion this room is national property, consecrated to legislative business, and it is not competent for any person whatsoever at any time to take possession of it or put it to any use without the sanction of an order of this House. That by the way. I shall listen with great attention to any one who will induce me to believe in the propriety of this amendment. If we forget all that we have said, I hope in God we shall not forget all we have voted and resolved. I wish any gentleman to show me not merely the expediency but the right, without abandoning all sort of claim to legislative consistency, which we have to adopt the measure now presented. If we do, we shall have launched an anathema on the 10th Congress to which even I would be sorry to give my assent. I see them denounced publicly, but I am unwilling to give my aid and sanction, and I hope that the gentleman who composed it will be equally unwilling to give their sanction to the denunciation.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said it would be recollected that when this subject had been under discussion some weeks since, in the course of the wide range which had been taken and which had been so much censured, he had stated that he was of opinion that it best comported with the honor of this nation to exclude all armed vessels from our waters, subject to such regulations as should be fixed by treaty. But it seemed that gentlemen thought at this time, when a negotiation with Great Britain was upon the tapis, and the intention of any act of this kind would be liable to misinterpretation, it would be assuming a hostile attitude towards that country, and that, therefore, it was proper to admit armed vessels. In that wide range of debate, said he, I observed that the unatoned injuries of Great Britain had equalled if not exceeded those of France, and I, therefore, asked why should we make a distinction in the admission of her armed vessels. There is a doubt in my mind of the construction of the law, though some of my friends think it is perfectly plain. I would ask the gentlemen from New York and Massachusetts (Messrs. GOLD and LIVERMORE) if they had to choose whether they would admit or exclude both, if they would not rather admit them? But it has been said that the 11th section of the non-intercourse law did authorize the admission of armed vessels of either belligerent complying with the terms of the law. If this be the true and sound construction, why not express it, when we know very well that a different construction has been put on it? But it is not sound. The law says that commercial intercourse with the nation revoking its edicts "may be renewed." What may be renewed? The trade of the United States; and it was a liberal construction of this section to include in the arrangement the admission of vessels carrying on this trade. The law simply provided that the relations between the two nations should be placed in status quo, which would not include the admission of her armed vessels.

But the gentleman from Virginia says that this amendment proposes a peremptory admission of the armed vessels of the belligerents. He certainly has not examined it with his accustomed penetration or he would not have hazarded the assertion. It is not an authoritative admission. It merely says that the law shall not be construed to prohibit their admission. It does not say explicitly that they shall be admitted, but removes the interdiction; and if they come here with hostile intentions, or during a state of war, they are still liable to any measure of the Government, for the power of excluding vessels from our waters still remains with the President, and may be applied to the vessels of any nation violating our peace or sovereignty. I am unwilling now to excite a disagreeable and unprofitable discussion on our foreign relations, at this time so delicately situated, and, therefore, shall not go over the ground which gentlemen have taken on this occasion, but will leave them peaceably to occupy it.

ALLUVION ON MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. MILLER observed that it had been stated to the House, in the course of the debate, a day or two ago, that the Attorney General had given an opinion that the title to the bature at New Orleans was in the United States. If that were true, it must be equally true (without deciding the correctness of the opinion) that the United States must be entitled to other parts of bature or alluvion on that river. He was against a partial investigation of a general right. He therefore wished to know if there was not other property in the same situation, and therefore moved the following resolution, which, at his own suggestion, was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to take measures to ascertain the title of the United States to all the alluvions, islands, accretions, and banks, on the river Mississippi, designating particularly the title to those opposite the city of New Orleans, and the several suburbs laid out and adjoining the same.

NEXT MEETING OF CONGRESS.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress. After various unsuccessful attempts made by Messrs. BASSETT, MACON, FISK, GHOLSON, J. G. JACKSON, and STANFORD, to obtain a later day than that mentioned in the bill, (the fourth Monday of November next,) the bill, as received from the Senate, was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read a third time, and passed. The House refused five times to alter the day proposed, by an average majority of about thirty.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF CONGRESS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress.

A motion was made by Mr. RANDOLPH, to amend the bill by inserting a provision for an appropriation of $4,000 annually, in addition to the present annual appropriation of $1,000, for the increase of the Library of Congress. This motion was carried in Committee; and, after eight or ten unsuccessful motions to adjourn, and great opposition made to it, it was carried by yeas and nays—53 to 32, as follows:

YEAS—Ezekiel Bacon, Daniel Blaisdell, John C. Chamberlain, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Orchard Cook, Richard Cutts, Sam'l W. Dana, John Davenport, jr., William Ely, James Emott, John

W. Eppes, William Findley, Jonathan Fisk, Thomas Gholson, jr., Charles Goldsborough, Thomas R. Gold, William Hale, Nathaniel A. Haven, Benjamin Howard, Jonathan H. Hubbard, John G. Jackson, Richard Jackson, Richard M. Johnson, Herman Knickerbacker, Edward St. Loe Livermore, Robert Le Roy Livingston, John Love, Matthew Lyon, William Milnor, Jonathan O. Mosely, Thomas Newton, Joseph Pearson, Benjamin Pickman, jr., Timothy Pitkin, jr., Peter B. Porter, Josiah Quincy, John Randolph, John Ross, Samuel Smith, Richard Stanford, John Stanley, William Stedman, Lewis B. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Uri Tracy, Jabez Upham, Nicholas Van Dyke, Archibald Van Horn, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Ezekiel Whitman, and James Wilson.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning the Naval Establishment.

[The bill provides, "That the President of the United States, in the event of a favorable change in our foreign relations, be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be discharged from actual service, and laid up in ordinary, such of the frigates and public armed vessels, as, in his judgment, a due regard to the public security and interest will permit; and that so much of the first section of an act, entitled 'An act to authorize the employment of an additional naval force,' passed at the last session of Congress, as requires the public armed vessels to be stationed on the seacoast of the United States and Territories thereof, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."]

Mr. PITKIN moved to amend the bill by inserting, after the word authorized, the following: "to cause to be sold all the gunboats belonging to the United States, except such as he may judge requisite for the public service; and, also."

Mr. PITKIN observed, that if the time was not yet come for discharging the gunboats from the Navy Establishment, the time must come. The House now had before them a statement of the Secretary of the Navy, from which it appeared that one gun on board a gunboat required to fight it nearly six times as many men, and almost six times as much money as a gun on board a frigate. This was precisely the state of the question; and it appeared that even the comparative estimate of original cost was in favor of large vessels; that nineteen gunboats, each carrying two guns, would cost more than a frigate of fifty-six guns. The difference between the expense of fighting a fifty-six-gun frigate and fifty-six boats, each carrying one gun, was half a million in favor of the former. The only argument, then, in favor of gunboats was, that the gunboats might answer a better purpose than frigates. Mr. P. said they might or not. In some cases frigates must be of much greater service than gunboats. It was not only on account of the expense of these gunboats in service that he objected to them, but on account of the expense of keeping them in ordinary. And it appeared to him that Congress ought not to continue this expense, unless some very great benefit was to be derived from it. For the purpose of showing the state in which these boats probably would be at the end of the year, Mr. P. said he would beg leave to call the attention of the Committee to a letter of the Secretary of the Navy in answer to the queries of a committee of the Senate on the subject; and, for this purpose, he quoted the report (ante p. 27.) It appeared by this report, that it would require a large annual expenditure to keep these boats in ordinary. He said he did believe, and always had said it, that, in case the country should ever be invaded, and gunboats were wanted to aid and assist our forts and frigates, they could be taken up in the course of a month in sufficient numbers. All bay and water craft could be immediately turned into gunboats. There could be no necessity, therefore, to keep these boats against invasion, and they could be of no use in any other case, for it was agreed on all hands that they could not go to sea. In point of economy, therefore, was it not best that they should be sold; and, if ever we should be invaded, if ever a hostile force should come upon our coast, that river craft should be taken up on the spur of the occasion and converted into gunboats? It could not be doubted. Mr. P. said, he therefore hoped, notwithstanding gentlemen had heretofore voted for gunboats under the belief that, in case of invasion they might be of some service, yet as the probable good was far counterbalanced by the certain evil that they would vote to sell them. He did hope that the time was now come, when from fact, (not theory,) from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, it appeared that we have given too much for our whistle, gentlemen would be convinced it was high time to part with the gunboats.

Mr. BURWELL said it was a very easy matter to understand this contest between frigates and gunboats. The gentleman from Connecticut had always been opposed to the latter, because if the United States expended a part of their money in gunboats they would not expend as much on frigates. For one, if the United States were to have a navy of any kind, Mr. B. said he was decidedly in favor of the gunboat system, for this plain reason, that the gunboat system was one which it was in the power of this nation to carry into effect, and the navy system was not. When the object was within the power of the Government, was it not more consistent with sound discretion to aim at that, than at one which was beyond its reach? The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) told us that nobody ever dreamed of our fitting out frigates to resist or coerce the British Government, but to oppose the French, because their marine is small. Now, sir, if it is decided that, whatever may be the conduct of the British Government, we may not meet them on the ocean, where is the necessity of accumulating a species of force which cannot cope with similar force of other nations? I have always been of the same opinion on this subject as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and therefore have always been against frigates. And here I will observe, that except it is by commercial restriction, I give up all idea of contending with the mistress of the ocean.

With respect to the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, I believe there is nothing more obvious than that it is erroneous. He goes upon the ground that we shall always keep on board the boats so many men as are necessary to fight them; and that is the reason why the expense appears so exorbitant, and why, in the estimate of the Secretary, gunboats appear to be so much more expensive than they really are. Let me ask if the appropriations for gunboats have been deficient in any comparison with the frigates? As well as I recollect, the appropriation for one year has never exceeded $800,000.

There is another circumstance in relation to these vessels which cannot, at this time, be remedied, and which, it is unfortunate, was not attended to when they were built. The gunboats are too large. As a species of armed vessels never to go to sea on a cruise, they have not been constructed in such a manner as best to answer the purpose they have in view. I have conversed with the officers of the Navy on the subject, and they stated to me that the gunboats of Europe are small, and put in motion by means of oars, sometimes perhaps using a single sail. A gunboat of that kind might be built for $2,000, and answer every purpose to which the largest boat now in service is competent. Let me ask the gentleman from Connecticut whether—if, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, your Navy is intended exclusively to fight France, and fit for no other purpose—consistency would not require that we should, at least, suspend for a moment the sale of these vessels? However unpopular this species of vessel may be, let me ask whether, if sold, they would bring the price which the timber of which they are constructed cost the United States? Is it necessary to mark with reprobation this system, which has received the approbation of all Europe? Why throw away all the capital already expended on it? The gentleman says, that they are of no service, inactive, and that if we want them for service we should soon be able to purchase bay-craft for the purpose. Let us keep them by us till they rot. If they are found to be unfit for the service of the country, build no more of them. If you sell them now, they must be sold much beneath their cost or value.

Besides, sir, I am one of those who have frequently voted for gunboats, not because they were the rage at all, but because I believed them adequate to the object in view. And, let me tell the gentleman, however useless he may deem them in the Northern ports, they will be of service on the Southern shore, where the water is not so rough. The gentleman tells us these boats never can be of service unless we are invaded. If that argument be good against them, let me ask him why has he pressed upon us the increased expenditure for fortifications? Why is he averse to dismissing the frigates, and presses a continuance of our present attitude? Because, I presume, he fears something of this kind. I should presume that his reasoning in favor of an increased expenditure for fortifications would apply as well to gunboats. I am willing to acknowledge that the expenditure is now greater than a time of perfect safety would authorize; and if we wait till that time arrives, I shall have no objection to reduce the expenditure. If a reform now takes place, however, it is upon the ground that some change has taken place to justify it; and I hope we shall give the President a like authority in relation to the frigates as to gunboats. I am decidedly in favor of beginning with them. What do you want with frigates? We are told they cannot oppose England; and do you want them to oppose the mere brutum fulmen, which the French force on the seas has been so often called? Whilst we are calling the public attention to the enormity of our expenditures, and inviting a reduction of them, let it begin with a species of defence (the frigates) not less expensive and much more useless than any other. If the motion now before us prevail, I shall certainly move to insert a clause for selling all the frigates as a matter of course.

Mr. LIVERMORE supported Mr. PITKIN'S motion. God forbid, said he, that I should be the means of depriving our Southern brethren of the means of defence! The motion only goes to sell such of the gunboats as may not be deemed expedient for the public service. I have no objection that our Southern brethren should retain so many as are necessary for their defence, but I disclaim owing our defence to such means. I am perfectly willing that Virginia and North Carolina, or the Western States of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio, should have them. I go upon the ground that all the gentlemen from those States entertain the same opinion as the gentleman last up, viz., that they are good means of defence. The idea of selling the unnecessary gunboats I believe to be correct, as they decay in a little time, and the expense of building them is very great. They require repairs when in service, and much more when laid up and exposed to the sun and weather. As to the use of gunboats, I do not know but they are beneficial in Southern waters; but in rough waters they are useless. I do not expect, even were there a certainty of war, that any benefit could be derived from these gunboats. France cannot come here to invade us, and if we make any resistance to her it must be at sea by means of our Navy. It does not follow, however gentlemen may apprehend benefits to result from the increase of our Naval Establishment, that such an increase would be made in consequence of the sale of the gunboats. I believe that this motion for selling gunboats proceeded solely from a desire to get rid of the expense of keeping them.

It has been said that some European nations employ these gunboats. It is true; but no nation except Spain has many. They are useful only in a dead calm, when a large ship becalmed might be annoyed by them. Although used in the South of Europe to annoy the Barbary Powers, it is only there that I have ever heard of their being of service. And, reasoning by analogy, I believe there is no part of the world where they could be of advantage but New Orleans.

The gentleman from Virginia says that the opposition to gunboats arises from a party which is in favor of a Naval Establishment of a different kind. I do conceive that the United States cannot be protected without a certain naval force; I do not conceive that these gunboats are the best kind; but I do not expect that any other species will be given us in exchange for them. Gentlemen who have thought gunboats a beneficial species of defence, of course do not concur in the idea of selling them; but there are those who conceive that this is a part of the theoretical system which ought to be done away; and I am willing to give them up as far as they can be got rid of.

Mr. DANA said that the abandonment of error and acquisition of wisdom was one of the first fruits of experience. When experience should have taught a person his error, to persevere in it lest he should be thought deficient in wisdom, could be no proof of solidity of intellect or attention to the public good. I recollect, said Mr. D., that I for one voted for a large number of gunboats—not that I was very much attached to these things called gunboats—not that I believed them to constitute a good mode of defence, but as a subordinate aid in the general system. But at the time I voted for it I was not so much aware of their defects as I am now. No species of land or naval force can be of use without activity and skill; and as to this species, if anything can be hostile to activity which produces stupidity, supineness, and neglect, it is gunboats. As to naval skill, if there be anything which can teach a man to unknow his knowledge, if I may use the expression, it is being placed on board a gunboat. As to young men who might be worthy of commissions in the Navy, if anything can render them unworthy of them, it is the remaining on board gunboats in port. I consider the system of gunboats, laid up in ordinary, as a system of hostility to maritime activity or naval skill. Make a seaman on board a gunboat! Teach a young gentleman to be fit for command, teach him a habit of subordination, and commanding others with propriety on board a gunboat! It is impossible, sir. I appeal to gentlemen who know anything of it, whether it is not deemed much to the credit of a young gentleman if he be not ruined by being placed on board a gunboat. I do not speak of persons employed in active occupations; but, I ask, where should he find himself at home, see his friends, and be received by them; where he should study, where make his observation keep his log-book, and things of this sort, on board a gunboat?

The question before us is this: whether gunboats should be laid up in ordinary? The first section of the bill proposes to give to the President of the United States eventual authority for laying up the frigates and gunboats in ordinary; and my colleague proposes, that when the frigates shall be laid up in ordinary the gunboats shall be sold. The question is, whether the gunboats shall be laid up in ordinary? I was one, who, about the commencement of the gunboat fever, when a proposition was under consideration for building a number of gunboats, proposed an amendment authorizing the procuring a quantity of timber, suitable for building gunboats, to such an extent as might be deemed requisite. If this had been done, much would have been saved. What is the principle on which you would lay up a frigate in ordinary for a certain time? It is because this article is so large, so expensive, and requires so much skill, time, and care, to make it fit for service, that it cannot be got ready under a long space of time; some years even may be required for it. You must have timber of unusual sizes and shapes, the best masts, cordage, &c. These materials will take much time to prepare. Fortifications were a species of permanent defence, not built to meet any particular emergency, but to resist assault whenever made. So frigates are vast floating fortifications; and when not wanted may be laid up so as to be ready for service in a very short time. But as to gunboats—how long will it take to make a gunboat throughout? A month or six weeks. In that time they may be turned out by the hundred. Is there any great difficulty in their construction? Do you want the best timber, or are your forests to be searched for masts for them? No, sir. Then why keep them in ordinary at an expense of four hundred and thirty dollars a year, when not wanted for actual service? There can be no use in it. The idea of laying up gunboats in ordinary is utterly incompatible with the principle on which gunboats are built at all. The alarm of war is done away, which has existed for eighteen months past, and there is no use for them. They will go to decay; you will acquire no naval skill from them; they are odious to seamen and disadvantageous to the public. When you lay up your large ships, sir, you may sell the gunboats, because they are not worth the care of keeping.

Mr. CURTIS said he had hoped that this subject would have been permitted to sleep. The committee who reported this bill were opposed to selling the gunboats. When this bill was taken up I had no idea that the question would be agitated; but, since it has been brought forward, I will make a few observations upon it.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN) has told you, that to keep a fifty-six-gun frigate in service for a year, will require $120,000, and to keep fifty-six gunboats for the same time, will require $670,000. I differ with him materially. The cost may be greater, but not so disproportionate. If the gentleman had pointed out a single instance in which it had been proved that gunboats were not useful, I should have listened to him with attention. But neither he nor his colleague, (Mr. DANA,) who has pushed them out to sea on service for which they were not intended, said anything of that kind. From my knowledge of naval tactics, I can say that, in some situations, I had rather have five gunboats than a frigate. The great advantage of gunboats is, that they will carry heavier metal.—Whenever an enemy attempts to come into your waters, they will always take into calculation their chances of success or defeat. The tide may turn; they may be becalmed, in which case five gunboats, carrying two and thirty-pounders, will be of much more service than a frigate. Perhaps, when an enemy's fleet actually enters our waters, and arrives at the place of its destination, the wind may blow so strong, and the tide run so swift, that they cannot get a spring upon their cables to enable them to fire a broadside. The gunboats, lying in the shoal or calm waters, can lie at greater distance, and yet from their weight of metal keep the frigates within range of their own guns; they are low, and can take aim with greater certainty than a frigate; and from the smallness of their bulk, even if within range of the frigate's guns, are scarcely tangible. I have seen a debate in the British Parliament, in which the British Ministry were censured for not protecting the commerce in the Mediterranean. It was said, in reply to the charge, that the whole British Navy could not protect it against gunboats.

It will be recollected, sir, that when the boats are laid up in ordinary, the expense will not be great. The Secretary of the Navy has given an opinion of the expense; but I must be permitted to say that I know a little of the subject myself. I believe the expense will not be so great as it is stated. Suppose these gunboats were to be sold, and that, from any change in our foreign relations, they should be wanted this Fall. In the first place, we shall have been at the expense of purchasing gunboats at $10,000, and have sold them at $500 each, and shall have to appropriate so much money again for building them; and, in the next place, it may not be possible to procure them before it is too late for any service.

Gentlemen attempt to deride them. This, sir, is a mode of decrying them which is resorted to from a defect of argument against them. It is said that sailors are dissatisfied with the gunboats. A sailor will, in every station, be dissatisfied, whether on board gunboats or frigates, and this is no argument against them. As to their rotting, I know a little about that too. The difference in their preservation between their being in actual service and in port, is very slight. And in respect to the utility of gunboats, I presume gentlemen will not put their knowledge in competition with that of the officers of the Navy, and others who have given their opinions in favor of it. If gentlemen would not carry them out to sea, but consider them as a defence proper for bays and rivers, in that line they must be eminently useful. Officers, in service, no doubt like frigates better than gunboats, because every man had rather command a frigate than a gunboat. The gentleman from Connecticut tells you that the officers have no place to write or take an observation. In reply to that, I would observe, that the officers have but little writing to do, and that the proper place to take an observation, is the deck, and not the cabin.

My colleague (Mr. LIVERMORE) says, that the Southern gentlemen are fond of this species of defence. I am, too; I think it one of the best. Gunboats are always ready, and men can be found on the spur of the occasion to man them. Frigates, however useful when in service, take some time to prepare them, and must be manned with good seamen. For these reasons I am opposed to the motion, and hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. PIRKIN said that, in making his motion, it had not been his object to provoke a long discussion, but from a conviction that the gunboat system was one which could not be persevered in, that experience must satisfy gentlemen on this floor, and had already satisfied the nation of the inefficacy of them, he had thought it his duty to bring the subject before the House. If it be really supposed that this species of arming would be an advantage to the nation, in proportion to its expense, I should be one of the last men to wish to put it down; for although it is true that the appropriations for the Army and Naval Establishments must be great, yet, if it be necessary that the whole of these establishments should be kept up, I am willing that they should. The House will judge whether it be necessary or not, and in their decision I shall cheerfully acquiesce. But I did believe, in the event of a settlement of our differences with the other belligerent, it would be better that this species of armament, instead of being laid up in ordinary, should be sold. Believing this, and the late report of the Secretary of the Navy placing the subject of the gunboats in a stronger light than they ever yet have been placed, and which must be satisfactory to the House and to the nation, I thought it proper to bring the subject before them.

We are told by the gentleman last up of the efficacy of gunboats. Five gunboats equal to one frigate! It is difficult for me to reason on this subject; it is impossible to subscribe to the doctrine. I did not attempt to deride the gunboats. I stated that I had always been opposed to them; that I did not conceive them a species of profitable defence. I believe that the nation has pronounced upon them the sentence that their expense is much greater than the benefit derived from them.

The gentleman calls upon us to show where they are not useful. I ask him to show where they are useful. The burden of proof lies on gentlemen who support them. With respect to the Northern section of the Union, it is the opinion of all classes of the people, and especially of naval gentlemen, that they will not be of service.

That they may be of some service in the Mississippi, I am not disposed to deny; and I am desirous to give the President power to retain so many as may be necessary for that purpose. Wherever there is a bold shore they can be of but little service. Let the President of the United States sell so many as are not necessary for the Mississippi, or rivers to the South; for, if the public service requires them, it is to be presumed that he will retain them, as the law prescribes.

But gentlemen say, will you not keep the gunboats in service on the same principle as you keep the frigates in service, granting that they can be only as useful in case of invasion as the latter? As for myself, sir, if I vote to keep the frigates in service, I do it not for fear that we shall be invaded, because I believe that there is no danger of invasion; but to protect commerce along our coast, and preserve peace within our waters. Can gunboats do that? That they cannot is agreed on all hands. I do believe that if we had had a single frigate stationed in the harbor of New York, the case of Pierce would not have happened. If they had been stationed on our coast, the aggressions upon our commerce would not have taken place in the manner in which they have. It is not, therefore, to protect the country against invasion that I shall vote to continue the frigates in service, leaving it discretionary with the President to lay them up in certain events. Have we given up our idea of protecting commerce in the Mediterranean or in foreign seas? If so, why have we ever attempted it? Why have we expended several millions upon it? The same reasoning does not apply to both species of defence, in my opinion.

I do not know what these gunboats will bring in market, if sold; they might be used for some purposes; but they must be sold at a loss. The difference between what they would bring, and what others would cost when wanting, would not be so much as, if laid up in ordinary for four, five, or six years, they would cost the United States. I do not believe, sir, that we shall build more gunboats hereafter; but if they were necessary, they might be built in a very short time. However the House shall decide, I shall be perfectly satisfied. I do believe that the time will arrive—whether it has now come I cannot say—when the gunboats will be sold; and that whatever naval force we have must be composed of more sterling stuff than gunboats.

Mr. COOK said, that although he had never been a friend to gunboats, he considered the present an improper time to sell them. And as he was not willing to give the President a discretion over the gunboats which he had not over the frigates, he said that he should vote against the motion.

Mr. DANA said he calculated with perfect certainty on the vote of the gentleman last up, for the same authority did exist in relation to frigates as was proposed to be given in relation to the gunboats. The real question was not, Mr. D. said, as to the efficacy of gunboats in time of actual war, or the opinion of any of our naval commanders, particularly of that eminent commander, Commodore Preble, in relation to them. But let gentlemen say, whether any commander ever spoke of laying up the gunboats in ordinary in the same manner as you would ships of the line and frigates? The talents of a boatswain or boatswain's mate were not necessary to enable a man to judge of this subject, any more than the skill and experience of a recruiting sergeant were necessary in marshaling an army or planning a campaign. Mr. D. said he wished not to be guided by the opinions of those members of the House who were so fortunate as to know more about merchantmen, or armed vessels, than some others. As to the defence of our rivers, he asked whether floating batteries were not better, and if a floating battery could not take much steadier aim than gunboats? They might be useful in some cases; they certainly were useful off Tripoli. They were useful, because they were the means of bringing men of valor and skill in conflict with the enemy; and valor and skill prevailed. Whenever it was proper to lay up the frigates, it must be proper to sell the gunboats. This was what he contended for, let gunboats be as useful as gentlemen pleased, applaud them as much as they would. As to seamen, they are much like other men, if you give them two qualities for which they are distinguished, bravery and generosity; but for the rest, they like good living and accommodation, and have as much aversion to odious service as any other men. I do not believe that the seamen are willing to go on board of gunboats, except to fight the enemy. For that purpose they are willing to go on board of them; but as to remaining there in ordinary service, they do not like them any better than other men, nor are they willing to be enlisted to serve on board of them. To be sure, sir, I have no practical knowledge on this subject, because I have not been employed to recruit for the Navy; neither, I presume, has the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CUTTS,) but I derive my information from sources equally as authentic as if I were.

Mr. HOLLAND said he thought that the question of the utility of gunboats had been long ago settled in their favor. I recollect when the question for building them was before the House, the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) gave us a history of the mode in which they are built, and the uses for which they were proper; and concluded by voting for them. Why is all this change now? Gentlemen say that experience has now shown their inutility. What experience have we had? None. We then knew, and now know, that they are expensive. That was then, however, no object with gentlemen. Have we had an assault within our waters since the establishment of the gunboat system? No, sir. We have had no experience of their inutility, then, because it must have been derived from an experiment of them. Is it proper that we should now deprive ourselves of that species of defence which has been supposed to be the only proper system? On what ground of relaxation ought we now to act? None that I know of. The principle against which we have contended with foreign nations is still maintained; the principle of blockade, by proclamation, is still practised on. Would it not be a disgrace to the Councils of the nation to dispose of these vessels for a tenth of their cost before the period which called for their employment has expired? As we now have them, why shall we, to save the paltry sum of $60,000 a year, dispose of the most efficient mode of defence? If we are to do anything on this subject, we ought to sell the frigates and keep the gunboats. The frigates are no protection to our harbors, and nobody dreams of their being useful for the protection of commerce.

We are told that they are liable to rapid decay. Why are they so? They will not decay before the frigates. They are made of the same materials, and one will not decay faster than another merely because it is smaller. A plank in one will not rot before a plank in the other. The same objection, therefore, would lie against all naval force.

Gentlemen say that the gunboats have cost too much. Have not frigates cost too much? Upwards of ten millions of dollars have been spent on the frigates, and it would require a very nice calculation to tell what good they have done. Instead of keeping you in peace, they will increase the objects for war. If we had twenty or thirty frigates, we should soon be in war. If the United States had not had the Chesapeake, the nation would not have been disgraced. We shall find ourselves insulted in proportion as we increase the number of our frigates. What has been the use of all the money expended on the Navy since the last session? Their expense is, always has been, and always will be, greater than their utility. It is futile and improper to attempt to defend our commerce on the ocean with them; for when we attempt a thing to which we are incompetent, we only show the weakness of our councils and the nakedness of our country. I, therefore, think the gunboats should be retained in service, and the frigates sold.

Mr. LYON was against making any change in the situation of the country at all. Was it not to save the time of the House, he would call for the reading of a lengthy report in favor of the gunboats. As to their being disliked by officers and seamen, he observed that there had been no want of applications for offices on board of them. He could see no reason for selling the gunboats.

Mr. RHEA also opposed the motion.

The motion was negatived in Committee, and being renewed in the House, was decided by yeas and nays, as follows—the yeas being in favor of selling the gunboats:

Previous to the question being taken on the amendment, Mr. MACON moved to amend it, so as to include the frigates not necessary for actual service.—motion negatived, without a division.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to amend the bill, by inserting, after the word ordinary, the words or to be sold. The motion was declared not to be in order, being the same, in substance, as that which the House had just decided. The bill was then ordered to a third reading to-morrow, without opposition.

FRIDAY, June 23.

A bill from the Senate authorizing the Comptroller of the Treasury to give credit to certain collectors of the customs for sums paid by them to the owners of fishing vessels, &c., and a bill for the remission of certain forfeitures and penalties, and for other purposes, (inflicted on the sufferers from Havana who have unwittingly violated the law prohibiting the importation of slaves,) were twice read and committed.

A communication was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the 17th instant, enclosing copies of proceedings of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Bank of the United States in relation to a loan under the act supplementary to the act for the further support of public credit and the redemption of the public debt.

The engrossed bill concerning the Naval Establishment was read the third time.

Mr. MACON said he would take occasion at this time to notice the difference between the several statements received at different times from the Navy Department. He compared the reports made on the 10th of December, 1867, and on the 6th of June inst.; the latter report stating the expenses of the gunboats at nearly double of the estimate in the former. He presumed that when the one was made, there was a zeal for gunboats, and when the other was made there was a fever for frigates and fast-sailing vessels instead of them. It was stated, also, that it required forty-five men to manage a gunboat with one or two guns. He could not conceive how it would require the same number of men for a boat with one gun as a boat with two. These things he mentioned, being an anti-Navy man, to show the inconsistency which always attended statements from that Department.

The bill was passed without opposition.

The engrossed bill making an appropriation to defray the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, was read the third time.

Mr. ROOR moved to recommit the bill, with a view of striking out the appropriation for the Library of Congress.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. FISK, GOLD, QUINCY, and LIVERMORE, and supported by Messrs. SMILIE, RHEA, and HOLLAND, and negatived—55 to 52. The bill was then passed—60 to 37.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate to amend and continue in force the non-intercourse act.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON modified his motion, so as to comprise the admission into our waters of public ships of any nation whatever.

Mr. ROSS said he would, before this question was taken, submit to the Committee some of the views which had occupied his mind since this question was under consideration the other day. The importance of the subject ought to demand the attention of every member of the Committee to consider himself as sitting in the Great Council of the Nation, to conclude the great work which had been begun; he meant the restoration of commerce to its former vigorous state. I have not, said he, upon an examination of this bill, upon taking a view of the arguments offered either on one side or the other, been able to draw a conclusion favorable to the amendment which is proposed. The question propounded to the Committee by the amendment explanatory to the design of the bill, is, whether it be sound policy with respect to our relations with Great Britain and France, to permit the armed vessels of those nations to enter into our ports.

I have heard it said that the bill contemplates nothing but justice to France and England, in placing them in precisely similar situations. I have not been able to perceive that such would be the effect of the bill with the amendment proposed. At present France has no commerce; no vessel of France will, I apprehend, sail from any port of France to any port of the United States at this time, except an armed vessel; so that our ports will be completely open to all the vessels of France, while, on the other hand, they are only opened to England in consideration of the revocation of her Orders in Council, and of a promise to negotiate a commercial treaty. Therefore, I apprehend that, in its effects, it will operate unjustly. But, it will be recollected that the non-intercourse law was passed at a time when it was said that the outrageous conduct of those two nations justly called for the indignation of this Government. Since that time, England has made proposals and preliminary stipulations, and entered into such assurances as warranted the President in exercising the authority vested in him by the law to which this is a supplement. Has France done this? If there was just cause to enact a law to interdict the armed vessels of France, let us inquire whether there be now any just cause to relinquish it? It may be said that she has declared that, if we make England respect our flag, she will relax her decrees. What does this amount to, but this? that she sets herself up as the judge, whether we assert our independence or not. She says: "I will undertake to decide whether you conduct yourselves in such a way as shows to our Sovereign that you make the English respect your flag." This, I apprehend, is the only ground upon which gentlemen can proceed with any degree of consistency. With respect to their conduct, last year, when they enacted this law prohibiting intercourse, I have nothing to say. But is this declaration, contained in the Milan decree, of such a nature, so specific in its terms; is the mode by which you have arrived at a knowledge of the disposition of France, so satisfactory as to authorize this Government to relax from that firm ground which they had taken? I apprehend not. It is objectionable to my mind, sir, inasmuch as it holds out the idea to the world and to ourselves, that France is to be the judge when we make England respect our flag. It is objectionable, also, because it does not designate the manner in which the French Government would relax its decrees or restore the commerce of the United States to its former situation.

But, sir, I am not satisfied with merely excluding the armed vessels of France, but I am opposed to repealing the clause interdicting the vessels of Great Britain from our waters. What have we more than promises, which I hope hereafter to see fulfilled with good faith? As the repeal of the interdiction was not made a necessary part of the agreement for the renewal of intercourse, I see no cause to rescind it. It may be said that the interdiction, as it respected the armed vessels of Great Britain, was made in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake; and that, as atonement has been made for the attack on the Chesapeake, therefore the act consequent thereon should be rescinded by our Government. Let us have patience, and see how this case stands. Have we got atonement from Great Britain? Has it been actually given to us? Have we any knowledge that she has actually given that kind of redress which we have agreed to accept as satisfactory? If she has, we have no knowledge of it; and we can only act from what we know. All we have is a promise, that it shall be done. What, then, would be the prudent policy to be pursued? Would it be to recede from the ground which it was deemed prudent to adopt, in consequence of the acts of Great Britain, before the promise of reparation is performed? It would appear to me that the reverse would be the proper course. I would continue the interdiction until the President shall have received the atonement, and be satisfied that these vessels might be admitted with safety. To the President of the United States is intrusted the power of making treaties. I have the fullest confidence that the President of the United States has no bias in favor of France, and no improper prejudices against England; that his sole object is to effect a restoration of harmony between the two countries. Having this opinion, I would leave everything with him to conduct on this occasion, and do no more than enable him, in the different stages of negotiation, to rescind what shall interfere with it, as he shall think right; and, therefore, I would authorize him to admit the armed vessels of either nation, as he was before authorized to renew intercourse. This would leave the state of things as we found it, without having altered in any manner the laws in relation to the two belligerent nations, as they stood at the end of the last session. Would not this be sound policy? If we were to admit the armed vessels of France, we might furnish Great Britain with reasons for flying from her promises, and breaking stipulations. Is there any immediate necessity that we should admit the armed vessels of both nations? The President alone, who is immediately concerned and interested, who knows all the different turns and changes of the negotiations, can best tell at what time it will be proper to do this act. Is there any necessity that the Legislature should do it while sitting? Would it not be better to trust it into the hands of him who is to conduct the negotiation, that he may wield it as a shield during the negotiation? Certainly. I therefore submit it to the Committee whether it be proper to admit the armed vessels of France in our present situation? Whether it would not be abandoning that impartial conduct which was manifested to the world in the act to which this is a supplement? Being impartial, why should you give up your impartial conduct? England has come to some terms; France to none. We have nothing from which we can say that France has not at this moment a declaration of war in force against us. We should make a ridiculous appearance, if we should repeal the interdiction before the rising of the Legislature; and, before we arrive at home, should hear of a declaration of war from France.

H. OF R.

Therefore, I can see no reason for relinquishing that ground, assumed last Winter, with regard to France, nor in regard to England, further than the President shall think proper. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment, and am of opinion that the first and second sections of the act to which this is a supplement should be re-enacted, that a clause should be added to this bill, authorizing the President by his proclamation, whenever the state of affairs would justify it, to permit the armed vessels of the belligerents to enter our waters.

If I had any favorable feelings or disposition to England rather than to France, I should be disposed to adopt the amendment, because the vessels of the former are so much superior, that if the vessels of the latter should attempt to enter our waters, they will fall a sacrifice; and, therefore, though in terms the law would appear to be favorable to France, it would be giving an advantage to Great Britain so far forth as it will give her an opportunity to destroy the French vessels attempting to enter our waters.

I have given the Committee my views of the subject. I have thought of it with considerable attention, and cannot bring my mind to bear so as to think it proper to adopt the amendment proposed, or to recede from the interdiction already in existence, without committing my character for impartiality or consistency and good policy.

Mr. GOLD moved to strike out the words "any nation whatsoever," and insert "Great Britain," so as to admit the armed vessels of Great Britain only into our waters. If this were assented to, he should be willing to continue the exclusion as to France, giving the President a power to suspend it, when in his opinion it may be expedient.

While up, he would make some remarks in reply to observations in support of the amendment. It has been asked said he, with some emphasis, what has France done to exclude her from our waters? I comprehend, sir, the bearing of the question, and am to understand that France has not trespassed in our waters, as was the case of England in the attack upon the Chesapeake. But does, sir, the honorable member suppose that the forfeiture of the rights of hospitality can be incurred only by an injury within the sea-line, the maritime leagues? The admission of armed vessels within our harbors appertains to the principle of hospitality, and the causes which will justify an exclusion are many and various; they are not confined to this or that part of the theatre of national intercourse. Suppose a nation, while under the obligation of a treaty of amity, denies you rights of hospitality in her own harbors? Suppose she makes prize of an unfortunate shipwrecked vessel on her coast, (a measure becoming barbarians only,) and, arresting your merchantmen in her ports upon the faith of treaty, makes prisoners of your seamen, and drives them, like beasts, into the interior, and there incarcerates them; and suppose she fills up the measure of her injustice by burning your vessels upon the high seas—will you receive such a nation with open arms, and welcome her to all the rights of hospitality? France is the nation that has thus offended, and America is about to receive her to her embrace, and greet her with all the amities of the nation.

But, in justification, it is said that the object of our Government has been to restore and preserve equality with the great belligerents. For this the non-intercourse was made common to both nations, and the provision ceasing, as to the public vessels of England, ought to be discontinued as to France. Strange equality! Singular impartiality!

I do greatly fear, sir, that, notwithstanding these professions of impartiality, our public councils will be exposed to well-founded imputations of not holding the balance even between those nations. While, sir, I have been constrained to say that France, pursuing an unyielding course of injustice toward this country, is not entitled to the same treatment as Great Britain, I stand free, if I know my own heart, from all impressions of favor or prejudice in relation to the belligerents. It is enough for me that a foreign nation does my country injustice, "trois rutulusse" is, to me, indifferent.

Mr. WHITMAN quoted the journal of the proceedings of the last session in relation to an amendment for issuing letters of marque and reprisal against both belligerents, offered by Mr. J. G. JACKSON. He said he also found, by the yeas and nays, that the gentleman from Virginia was then in favor of excluding the armed vessels of France. He wished to know what had induced the gentleman now to change that opinion?

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said that the situation in which he was placed was extremely unpleasant, because, in the course of his remarks the other day, he had stated his opinion that it would be more consistent with the honor, interest, and duties of this nation to exclude all armed ships, except such as should be admitted in particular numbers, by treaty. But it was supposed by some that such a measure might have a hostile aspect towards Great Britain, with whom a negotiation is pending, which it is hoped to bring to a happy conclusion. And having avowed these sentiments as my own, I am now called upon to combat the arguments of gentlemen expressing the same sentiments. I am reduced to the unpleasant dilemma either of maintaining an amendment which I do not like, or of withdrawing it, and thereby exposing myself to the imputation of inconsistency, and of unnecessarily wasting the time of the House on this point. But, unpleasant as it is, I am willing to meet it; and I am willing, if the bill as it came from the Senate have that operation, to exclude the armed vessels of both nations, that those who oppose the amendment may take upon themselves the responsibility of producing such a situation. If the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WHITMAN) had adverted to the language of the amendment, and to the explanations of it which I gave when I first addressed you, sir, he would have found that the course proposed by this bill is perfectly consistent with the course pursued last session. I recollect hearing it observed, in the course of debate, that we were desirous to involve the nation in war at all events, and that we were only restrained by the little parties who aided the Federal party, as it is called, in voting us down. In reply to that, I state that it was not proposed to go to war with either belligerent until after demand made and a refusal to respect our rights had been communicated to this Government; that at that time, and not until then, the President should issue letters of marque and reprisal; and I stated, moreover, that we had no information from France enabling us to determine what course would be taken consequent on the acts of last session; that it was inconsistent with good faith, at the time we sent a messenger bearing the olive branch to France, to commit an act of hostility, which it is admitted on all hands the exclusion of the armed vessels of one nation and admission of those of the other is. It has been contended by the friends of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and admitted by mine, that it was a hostile act to exclude the armed vessels of one nation and admit those of the other. It is not my fault that gentlemen cannot discriminate between admitting all armed vessels now, and excluding them at the last session. It will be recollected that France and Great Britain have been contending which nation is retaliating the unjust acts of the other; each has contended that the other commenced the work; and we had assurances from France, in the decree of Milan, that as soon as Great Britain respected the rights of neutrals, France would imitate the example. More particularly I contended against the discrimination between French and English vessels, when we have sent a messenger to France and received no answer. What should we say of a man who sent to another to request him to do him justice for an injury, and whilst the messenger was there and the other in security, should strike a blow and do him an injury in return? We should at least say that it was inconsistent with the conduct which one man ought to pursue to another; and a fortiori the argument applies to nations, particularly a nation like this, which does not make power the criterion of right—a character dear to us at home and respectable abroad. Sir, I am now willing to pass the sections which I proposed last Winter; to declare, that, after demand made and refusal of France to withdraw her decrees, the President of the United States should be authorized to issue letters of marque and reprisal; and the same in regard to Great Britain. But as my amendment has proved the source of fruitless debate, and there is a doubt whether or not it be necessary, I withdraw it from consideration.

Mr. SHEFFEY moved to amend the bill by adding at the end of the proviso in the first section the following:

"And provided also, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any public vessel from entering the waters and harbors of the United States, belonging to any nation with whom commercial intercourse shall have been permitted."

Mr. S. proceeded to submit to the consideration of the Committee a few ideas on the subject. He believed that the bill, as it now stood, was intended to admit the vessels of war of all nations. Probably from inattention in the passage of the bill, the generality of the terms employed in the third section at least led to a doubt, whether the interdiction did not extend to public as well as private armed vessels. The question appeared to him to be, whether it was proper to place the public vessels of Great Britain and France upon the same footing? Mr. S. said he would very briefly attempt to show that it was not. Why, he asked, depart from that policy which last year had been considered a proper policy? Why abandon a system without anything interposing which shall render it necessary? At that time this House adopted a measure to exclude from the waters of the United States all public vessels belonging to either nation; and then interdicted all commercial intercourse, until either nation should completely satisfy the President of the United States that they were about to abandon their injurious regulations. Great Britain has made assurances which, however to be relied on, have been considered as sufficient by the President of the United States, the proper authority. As to that nation the terms of the non-intercourse act have been complied with. What are you going to do in relation to the other? That which no nation ever has done. I challenge any one to place his hands on history, and show me a case in which any country has interdicted commercial intercourse with another nation, and at the same time afforded the rights of hospitality to the public vessels of that nation. Gentlemen cannot find such a thing in the history of nations. The course of all governments has been first to deny the rights of hospitality. The exclusion of the public ships of a nation is merely a denial of the rights of hospitality, which a slight offence might authorize. To interdict commercial intercourse has been considered an act of hostility. Has it ever before been considered proper to permit the rights of hospitality, and at the same time interdict commercial intercourse? I believe not, sir. In 1798, commercial intercourse was interdicted between this country and France; but before that was done, the public vessels of France were excluded from the waters of the United States. How, then, is this plan, so opposite to the principles of propriety, and so totally hostile to all former professions, to be justified? Stability in adhering to a system commenced, is not one of the least of virtues which a public man ought to possess. He ought to deliberate slowly, but when he comes to a decision he ought not immediately to depart from it. What is intended by measures in relation to foreign nations? To produce an effect upon them. But before they can operate, it is proposed to repeal them; and the consequence of such a conduct must be to procure contempt for them hereafter. What can be thought of a nation which cannot adhere to a measure for a year together? Nothing; and especially when it cannot be shown that a departure from the principles of the last session can be of any advantage to the nation. There is to be sure some interest in having vessels of foreign nations in our waters, because it creates a certain consumption; but this is no reason to operate in a national measure. Neither reason nor interest demands the adoption of the measure. Then why adopt it, when its only effect must be merely to show your inconsistency? On that ground I shall be opposed to placing France and England on an equality.

JUNE, 1809.

Non-Intercourse.

H. OF R.

But it is said that impartiality in our conduct towards foreign nations is proper. I most cordially subscribe to the doctrine. I wish we could always be influenced in our conduct by this consideration. Our country has been injured by both belligerents; I will not inquire by whom most lawlessly. I believe that we have felt more the injuries of Great Britain, but it is only because the tyrant of Europe has not the power to execute his wishes. The two nations were placed on an equality at the last session, because both nations adhered to their injustice, notwithstanding repeated efforts to obtain redress. The case is now different, very different indeed; and I need only observe in proof of it, that gentlemen have agreed on all hands that the proclamation of the President was a correct measure. On what ground was it issued? That we had assurances from Great Britain which authorized a departure from the principle established at the last session.

With respect to England, then, you are placed in precisely the same situation as you were in before you adopted this measure, as relates to her public vessels and to commercial intercourse. It would be proper, I contend, to place her precisely on the ground on which we offered to place her before that time. It was offered in the negotiation between the Secretary of State and Mr. Rose, that whenever assurances should be made of an intention to make satisfactory reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake, British public vessels should be admitted. If now we were to admit or exclude the public vessels of both belligerents, she might say, and with some propriety, that you had changed your ground; and, under these circumstances, the least favorable change in the aspect of affairs on the continent of Europe would perhaps induce England to recede from her overtures. With respect to her, then, it is perfectly right that her vessels should be admitted.

But now with respect to France. Has she done anything? No. And are you not as much authorized to depart from your whole commercial interdiction in relation to her as from a part of it? This country is much interested in the commerce of the continent of Europe, over which the Emperor of France has strong control. There would have been stronger reasons in favor of renewing commercial intercourse than in favor of the proposed alteration. I ask gentlemen, on what principle has Great Britain made overtures to you? On the principle, surely, that you are to leave the relations between France and this country precisely as they were. You had taken measures which affected both nations alike; you had manifested complete impartiality; and Great Britain enters into a negotiation with you, and tells you, in so many words, that the equality on which both belligerents are placed is the reason why she has departed from her course. The moment she has told you this, you are about giving her evidence of partiality. This is a new way of effecting an adjustment between the two countries. I ask gentlemen, on that principle, will they repeal all that part of the non-intercourse law which interdicts commercial intercourse with France? Certainly not. If that argument applies to the commercial non-intercourse, will it not apply to all the provisions of the non-intercourse law? It surely will.

But, if I understand the arguments, we are to rely on the Milan decree for the intentions of France. I have heard it repeated again and again that there is no reliance to be placed on the declarations of Great Britain; it has even been hinted that you are premature in your reliance on the late conciliation. The Orders in Council were issued in consequence of the French decrees; and Great Britain declared that whenever things were placed in such a situation that they could not affect her, she would rescind her orders. Well, sir, our Government took such a station; and they were rescinded. The declaration of Britain was fulfilled. But I have no faith in the declarations of the Emperor of France. The history of his life, of Germany, of Holland, Italy, Switzerland, and Spain, falsify any assertions he may make. I am not disposed to bottom this change on the Milan decree. I wish to see acts, overtures, which shall place us precisely in the same situation in relation to her as we have been placed in relation to Great Britain.

It will be observed that the amendment which I propose will have this effect. It will admit the public vessels of Great Britain, and as soon as assurances are received by the Government of the United States from the Government of France, similar to those from Great Britain, then with commercial intercourse the permission to enter our waters will be renewed.

It was understood, sir, that if satisfactory overtures of reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake had been made by Mr. Rose, the proclamation interdicting British public vessels from entering our waters would have been rescinded. At the time the late overtures were made by England, I presume it was understood that the situation of the two countries should not be changed by permanently excluding British armed vessels from our waters. For another reason the measure would be improper. This country perhaps ought not to set the example of denying the right of hospitality. We have therefore been involved in war with the Barbary Powers, and may again when a friendly port is of infinite advantage. And this consideration aside, is it proper, when we have such cause of complaint against France, when she has made no overtures towards a restoration of intercourse, that she should be placed on this ground? No, sir; when she acts differently from what she has done, and meets us as England has, I shall be ready and willing to meet her in the same spirit, but not till then.

Mr. EPPES said, that he felt great reluctance in bringing into discussion at the present time the foreign relations of the United States. With Great Britain we have every reason to expect an amicable adjustment of our differences, on honorable terms to the United States. With France we have a negotiation depending, which will probably terminate in a withdrawal of the decrees which violate our rights, as every reason heretofore urged for their continuance will be removed by an adjustment with Great Britain. I feel anxious, said Mr. E., to secure to the nation the full and complete benefit arising from the favorable change in our prospects. I have no wish at the present moment to pass in review the wrongs inflicted on us by either of the belligerent nations. Peace with both on honorable terms, must be the wish of every honest man, and I rejoice that on the present occasion no attempt has been made to rouse into action feelings calculated to prevent our examining with temper the course, which ought, in the present situation of our country, to be pursued. At the last session of Congress a general system of non-intercourse was adopted with both the belligerents. This measure consisted of two separate and distinct provisions. 1st, The exclusion of public armed vessels. 2dly, The suspension of commercial intercourse. This law expires at the end of the present session of Congress. No control was given to the Executive over the interdiction of armed vessels. Under the eleventh section of the act, the Executive was authorized to restore commercial intercourse with either of the belligerents on a withdrawal of their decrees and orders. This power has been exercised. A promise of the British Government to withdraw its decrees and orders on the tenth of June, has been accepted by the Executive as an actual withdrawal, and the commerce suspended restored. The liberal construction given by the Executive to this section of the law meets my entire approbation. Whilst I considered the independence of this country assailed by Great Britain, I expressed my indignation with the warmth of an American. With the causes which produced that feeling, the feeling will cease, and no man more sincerely rejoices at the prospect of an honorable adjustment than myself. Notwithstanding the recent orders and the declarations made on the floor of Parliament, I believe that the British Government will comply with its engagements. I cannot, for a moment, suppose that any nation can stain its character by an act of so much perfidy, as publicly to offer through its accredited agent the withdrawal of decrees and orders destructive to our rights for the purpose of substituting others. No power was given to the Executive to take off the interdiction from the public armed vessels of Great Britain or France. The interdiction expires at the end of the present session of Congress. Shall we renew it in relation to Great Britain? Or shall we pursue the liberal course adopted by the Executive as to the withdrawal of the decrees or orders?

This interdiction grew partly out of the injuries in our ports and waters, but principally out of the outrage on the Chesapeake. After Capt. Bradley, in 1804, insulted the port officers of New York, and claimed jurisdiction to the length of his buoys, a law passed authorizing the Executive to prohibit by proclamation the entrance into the waters within our jurisdiction of public armed vessels. In 1805, on the murder of Pierce, the power was exercised, and the squadron commanded by Whitby interdicted; and after the outrage on the Chesapeake, the interdiction was extended to all the public armed vessels of Great Britain. The British Government has now promised honorable reparation for this last outrage. It has gone further, and promised to send here a Minister for the purpose of adjusting the differences between the two countries. Believing this promise will be complied with, I am willing to adopt the same liberal construction which was given by the Executive to the promise to withdraw the decrees and orders. I am willing to accept the promise as a pledge for reparation, and to suffer the interdiction of the armed vessels of Great Britain to expire at the end of this session of Congress. It is an act of liberality, and not a strict right extended to that nation. The admission of armed vessels, except in cases of distress, is a matter of favor, and not of right. As a measure of precaution and safety, I believe it would be our interest to exclude them, even after reparation shall be made, and an adjustment of all differences takes place. As this interdiction of the armed vessels of Great Britain, however, was adopted as a measure of retaliation for injuries, it will manifest a spirit of liberality to accept the promise of retaliation and suffer it to expire. If reparation shall be made, no inconvenience or injury will attach to the nation before the next meeting of Congress, when general regulations on this subject may be adopted, extending to the public armed vessels of all nations. If reparation shall not be made, we shall, by our conduct, have afforded irresistible evidence that every branch of the American Government has manifested a disposition to meet in a spirit of liberality and conciliation, the reparation proffered by the British Government.

While thus disposed to meet in a spirit of liberality the offer of Great Britain, let us not take any course calculated to prevent a favorable termination of our differences with France. To continue the attitude taken by the Executive towards this nation appears to be the plain and obvious course. While a negotiation is pending, no measure ought to be adopted calculated to impede its progress. What is the footing on which our affairs are placed with France, under the non-intercourse law, and the power exercised by the Executive under the 11th section of that act? The restoration of commercial intercourse with the one nation, founded on the withdrawal of its decrees and orders, imposes on us an implied obligation to continue the commercial interdiction as to the other. No such implied obligation is imposed as to the interdiction of public armed vessels. No power was given to the Executive on the subject. No pledge, therefore, could have been given as to the interdiction of the armed vessels of the one or other belligerent. This interdiction depends on a part of the non-intercourse act over which the Executive had no control. In the 4th page of the President's Message, he states "The discontinuance of the orders as they respect the United States, having been thus arranged, a communication of the event has been forwarded in one of our public vessels to our Minister in France; with instructions to avail himself of the important addition thereby made to the considerations which press upon the justice of the French Government a revocation of its decrees, or such a modification of them as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States." We may presume that the non-intercourse law under which the Executive acted was communicated to our Minister at Paris, and by the Minister to the French Government. To this alone the French Government must look for the footing on which our relations are placed. How do they stand under this law? The President's proclamation restores commerce with Great Britain on the tenth June. The interdiction of French commerce is continued, subject to the controlling power of the President on the event of a withdrawal of the French decrees, and the interdiction of the public armed vessels of Great Britain and France expires at the end of the present session of Congress.

From this communication the French Government had a right to expect—1st. That commercial intercourse was restored between the United States and Great Britain on the tenth of June—2nd. That commerce with France continued to depend on the withdrawal of her decrees—3rd. That the interdiction of the public armed vessels of both nations would cease at the end of the present session of Congress. It could not be presumed by the French Government that after the withdrawal of the decrees and orders of Great Britain, a tender of reparation for the outrage on the Chesapeake, and for a general adjustment of differences, that Congress, in this posture of affairs of the two countries, would re-enact the exclusion of British vessels pending the negotiation; nor could it be presumed that, after the communication from our Government, before the French Government had returned an answer, a discrimination in favor of British armed vessels would be made and those of France excluded. No, sir, until we know what will be the answer of the French Government, let us make no discrimination as to the public armed vessels of those two Powers. We are not pledged to make a discrimination. Let us suffer the law to expire as to the public armed vessels of both, and continue in force only that part which was placed under the Executive control. We know that by the Government of Great Britain the exclusion of her armed vessels while her adversaries were admitted, was considered as an act of hostility. Will not France take the same ground in the event of a discrimination? Are we prepared, in the present situation of this country, before the answer of the French Government is received, to take an attitude of hostility? The admission of the armed vessels of one belligerent, and the exclusion of those of the other, can only be justified as an act of hostility. It was an act of hostility against Great Britain, and so considered by that Government. It will be an act of hostility towards France, and so considered, I have no doubt, by that Government. To resort to it at the present moment would be an act of injustice towards France.—The means of Great Britain for obtaining information as to the proceedings of our Government are abundant. The British Ministry have had an opportunity of availing themselves of this information, and have of course preceded their adversaries in withdrawing their decrees. France, excluded from the ocean, and possessing no information except such as is transmitted by our public vessels, does not stand in this respect on equal ground with her adversary. Shall we not await the answer of the French Government, and for the present, at least, maintain the ground taken by the Executive? I shall not dwell on the circumstances which produced the interdiction of the French armed vessels; it was produced, however, by the burning our vessels on the high seas. It is true that for this no reparation has been made; it is equally true that, independent of the outrage on the Chesapeake, insults and injuries within our ports and waters have been offered by Great Britain, more serious in their effects on the national sovereignty, than the burning of our vessels on the high seas. If the British armed vessels are admitted while these remain unredressed, while even the affair of the Chesapeake is unatoned for, why shall we, pending our negotiation with France, revive a measure we are not bound to continue—a measure acknowledged by all to be justified only as an act of hostility? No obligation is imposed on the nation thus to sacrifice its interest. Let us extend to Great Britain that species of liberality which is calculated to place no bar in the way of an honest compliance with her engagements. Let us not, under mistaken views of what is consistent, lose sight of our interest. I do not wish to afford ground to either of these Powers for future palliations of their conduct, if either the one Government shall fail to comply with the faith which has been pledged, or the other Government shall refuse to withdraw decrees and orders infringing our rights. If, on the promise of reparation, we suffer this interdiction on the public armed vessels of Great Britain to expire, and reparation shall not be made, the act will appear without a veil to cover its deformity. The British Ministry will not have it in their power to say "we promised to withdraw our orders, to make reparation for the Chesapeake, to send a Minister to negotiate on all the points of difference, and you have revived against us a measure which had expired—a measure which was adopted in a spirit of hostility while our orders were in force, and atonement for the other injuries refused." Nor do I, on the other hand, wish to manifest towards France such a spirit of hostility as to revive against her, while negotiation is depending, a measure which if adopted as to one belligerent is an act of hostility. I am neither partial to Great Britain or France. I wish to remove every obstacle to negotiation with both, and afford them irresistible evidence that peace on honorable terms is the wish of every real American. The non-intercourse system expires by its own limitation at the end of the present session of Congress. Its revival in part does not proceed from a disposition to commence a new system of measures at the present time, but grows out of the power which was exercised by the Executive under the 11th section of the act. Believing that the bill before the House continues our foreign relations on the footing on which they were placed by the Executive, I shall vote against the amendment. Every motive of policy and interest prevents a discrimination between the public armed vessels of the two nations at the present moment. A short period only can intervene before we know in what manner the British Government will comply with the faith plighted by its Minister here. The first arrivals must bring us information as to the disposition of France. Let us not at the present moment adopt any course which may excite on the part of either of those nations, feelings calculated to operate on the depending negotiations. By the combined influence of injustice on the part of foreign nations, and a powerful party united by no common principle but opposition to the measures of their Government, the independence of our country was jeopardized, the advantages obtained by the American Revolution put at hazard. The storm has passed by—the amicable adjustment of our differences with both these Powers may now be considered as probable. Let us put at defiance the denunciations of the partisans of Great Britain or France, and pursue the course calculated to insure to our country the blessings of peace.

Mr. TAYLOR said that he, too, as well as the gentleman who had just sat down, was very averse to changing our ground in relation to the belligerents; and, having a view to the existence of this law, to the particular clause which does prohibit the armed ships of Great Britain from entering the waters of the United States, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, if adopted, will be changing that ground, and to the disadvantage of that nation. In what situation do we find ourselves? Commercial intercourse has recommenced with Great Britain by the President's proclamation, but the British armed vessels are yet prohibited from entering our waters. And, notwithstanding the doubts of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GOLD,) I never had any doubt that the President had not the power to rescind that part of the law.

I am for remaining in statu quo. I think it would be dishonorable in this Government to take a step in advance of the position in which we have placed the Executive, and in which we now stand by the arrangement with the British Government. It would not be fulfilling the promises which we have, in our legislative acts, undertaken to perform. On the other hand, it would be equally embarrassing and unpleasant that we should recede. It would be like placing a General on our frontier, during a war, with an hundred thousand militia; making a truce; and, at the expiration of that time, leaving him to fight his battles alone. I am averse to it. An expression fell from a gentleman from Virginia, that the arrangement with Great Britain, as it now stands, was not complained of by her. The gentleman from New York was desirous of knowing whence the gentleman derived his information. As no complaint has come to this House, or to the Executive, on this subject—because if it had he would have stated it—as to the operation of the first and second clauses, it is a fair presumption, without having any other data on which to form our opinions than merely the circumstance of our not having it reported to us that this was a subject of difficulty, that it is quite satisfactory. Why we should volunteer to smooth the way, I cannot discover. I consider the British Government as perfectly satisfied with the situation which was produced by the acceptance of the offer to revoke the Orders in Council. I would rather say that there are circumstances which would justify the continuance of the first section of the non-intercourse law with relation to the armed ships of Great Britain. I would mention, for instance, the affair of the Impetueux; and, as the subject of our seamen marched inland and incarcerated in France has been brought up by the gentleman from New York, I would mention the six thousand American seamen, not only incarcerated, but, more than that, compelled to fight the battles of a country not their own. I do not mention this by way of balancing accounts. I am satisfied with things as they are, and willing they should remain so. But, in fact, I do think, that this throwing up our caps, this rejoicing for our great success, is beginning to rejoice before we have gained a victory. There is a topic which, by the gentleman from New York, in his very liberal mode of discussing a subject, might have been introduced here. I feel pain at introducing it; but it is a duty which I must perform. I ask whether this country is in a more friendly situation in relation to Great Britain than was the Government of Denmark at two particular times? At both of those times, the sine qua non was carried to her at the mouth of the cannon. Or, are our relations with that Government more friendly than were the relations between Great Britain and the Porte? The same sort of negotiant materials were used, and the same sort of diplomacy was attempted to be played upon that Government. What would be the sensation of this Government, of the gentleman himself, if this sort of punishment for supposed breach of faith were carried into the harbor of New York?

Sir, promises to negotiate are not promises to settle every subject of difference. Mr. Rose was sent here for a particular purpose. Promises were made that he should come for that purpose. He came and he went away; nothing was done by him. The fact is, that, in our excessive desire to smooth the way to negotiation, we may be smoothing the way to the destruction of this nation. For I should not expect energy from the President of the United States on minor points of differences, where a refusal to concur in a proposed article might occasion the destruction of the principal city of the United States, whose consequence and importance we have so often heard of. It is unpleasant to mention these circumstances on the discussion of this subject; but it really does appear to me, whether this negotiation is to end favorably or not, that it would be policy to adopt, as an irrevocable law of the land, a provision for the exclusion of all armed vessels. The true moral line of conduct which one nation is bound to observe to another with respect to the use of its ports and harbors, is precisely the same as respects the use of its terra firma; and the sending or admitting a navy into your waters, unless by compact, is no less a violation of neutral right, or a concession on the part of the Government yielding it, than it would be to send or admit armies on your soil. And although we may not at this time be able, from the disturbed situation of the world, to carry the principle as far as I wish, I hope to see the day when not an armed vessel shall come into our waters, except she come in hors des combats, unable to injure any of our citizens.

I have thrown out these observations to show that neither of the propositions meets my idea. But after the proposition now before the Committee shall have been disposed of, I shall move that the 1st and 2d clauses of the non-intercourse act shall also be revived and continued. That course, I think, by excluding both belligerent armed vessels, would be maintaining our ground, and not changing that which our Government has taken in relation to England, nor will it be conceding an iota of our ground in relation to France.

Mr. DANA said that on this subject a general question had been frequently brought into debate. A position was advanced that to admit armed ships into our ports was the same in point of public law, and on the general principles of neutrality, as to admit an army within our territory. However that question may be in regard to public law, said Mr. D., there are reasons why the Government of the United States should pause, should pause long, before it adopts the principle of exclusion of all public armed ships. What, sir! A nation founded in a spirit of enterprise, which has extended its commerce to every quarter of the world, which has risen to a state of prosperity which makes it the second nation in the world as to its commercial marine, which owes its importance to the hospitality of the world—this nation is at once to shut the door of hospitality against all nations!

The proposition, I understand, is, that it would be proper to exclude all foreign armed ships. Let it be recollected that our ships employed in the most enterprising commerce are armed, and have a force nearly equal to the force of public armed vessels. Do we never expect that cruisers will harass our commerce? And do we mean to abandon it, or that our vessels shall be suffered to perish for want of a port? When our commerce has been invaded in the Mediterranean, our public ships have been received with a hospitality too deeply felt by our Navy and by our Government to permit the adoption of such a principle as that hinted at.

Independently of this, if we ask the question generally of those who are acquainted with the point of fact in relation to public law, and who are versed in the writers on the subject, whether there is not a strongly marked distinction between an army and navy, they will answer you in the affirmative, and will tell you that an army of one nation cannot enter the territory of a friendly Power, without being restricted as to its course, and the limits under which it moves. But, as respects public ships of war, it never was deemed any violation of territory for them to come into port without ceremony, although general usage excludes armies, unless previous permission be obtained. And the name of the thing authorizes this distinction. This, I believe, the gentleman will find to be the correct doctrine which is stated by some of the latest writers on public law, more particularly by those on maritime law. I shall acknowledge the right of every Power, for its own security, to decide that it will not admit the armed vessels of any Power in such numbers as to endanger its peace, or to regulate them when they come into port. But the principle assumed is not the same as announced by writers on public law and explained by the usage of the world. There is a difference between maritime and territorial force. I am not, however, for bringing the subject into discussion at the present moment; I do not conceive that it has a bearing on the question.

As respects the amendment moved by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) I acknowledge that to me it does seem peculiarly contradictory in itself to say that the armed instruments of a Government which wrongs us shall be received with open arms, and that the unoffending and inoffensive merchant vessels shall be excluded from our waters. I do not ask whether on this subject there is any contention with the British Government, or whether the arrangements entered into bind us to one thing or the other. For myself I very much dislike the idea of being obliged to resist one belligerent Power because another has ceased to wrong us. The broad principle on which we act should be different. It should be, that our rights we will maintain; and not that we will maintain them in consequence of the desire of any foreign Power.

I am not pleased, sir, with any part of this system of non-intercourse. I think it peculiarly inconsistent to say that there are certain outrages continued, which are such as to induce us to stop all intercourse, and at the same moment to say that the merchant vessel which is the object of belligerent outrage shall be tamely surrendered up to spoil and destruction by armed vessels. For the course proposed I conceive to be this: When a palpable wrong is attempted to be inflicted on you, you permit the instruments of the outrage to partake of your hospitality. These vessels should certainly be the first objects of our displeasure. I therefore think it highly proper, when you exclude the commerce of a nation, also to exclude its armed ships. The armed ships of one of the belligerents seizes your merchant vessels, plunders them, and imprisons your seamen, and then comes into your waters. A respect to the peace and dignity of our own country ought to carry us so far as not to admit within our waters any vessel guilty of such an attack. It was one of the strongest arguments urged in favor of the prohibitory proclamation of the late President, that the excitement in the nation was so great that, as a measure of prudence, to preserve the peace of the nation, it was necessary for a time to exclude the whole British navy. The very fact of a nation's committing such outrages as to authorize all exclusion of intercourse, I consider a sufficient reason to refuse to it the rights of hospitality. I consider it much more compatible with the principle assumed at the last session of Congress that the proposed amendment should take place. I do not know that the admission of French vessels rests upon any arrangement made at the last session. What was the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations? What the import of all the votes passed by this House? The interdiction of commerce was put down as the consequence of the interdiction of armed vessels. Now it appears to me, that continuing the consequence and putting down the premises would be rather absurd. The report pledged us to the nation and to each other as to the integrity of our own character; it was a pledge on which the world were to rely as to the course which we would pursue when our rights are violated. Though, sir, as respects a nation which declares that it will not submit, if it will not resist without a declaration in words, I very much question whether it will be bound by promises. By this bill, therefore, I contend that the principle of last session, however correct, is very decidedly contradicted, except some such amendment as that which is proposed be adopted.

Mr. RHEA (of Tennessee) observed, that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) by withdrawing the amendment by him offered, had given particular pleasure; there, then, was reason to have hoped, that the bill under consideration might have passed on without alteration or amendment. This hope is destroyed—another amendment is proposed—it involves two points for consideration: first, whether it be necessary to make an explanatory declaration, that the public ships and vessels of Great Britain and France, are not interdicted from the waters, harbors, and hospitality of the United States by the third section of the non-intercourse law? And whether it be right to discriminate, or, in other words, to admit the public vessels of one of these Powers, to wit, Great Britain, and to keep interdicted the public vessels of the other Power? If the diction or expression of the first section of the non-intercourse law is attended to, and also that of the third section of that law, it will appear that the object of the first section is to interdict all armed ships and vessels belonging to Great Britain, or to except France, as therein excepted, from the waters, harbors, and hospitality of the United States. For that purpose the first section declares, "That from and after the passage of this act, the entrance of the harbors and waters of the United States and of the territories thereof, be, and the same is hereby interdicted to all public ships and vessels, belonging to Great Britain or France, excepting vessels only which may be forced in by distress, or which are charged with despatches or business from the Government to which they belong, and also packets having no cargo nor merchandise on board;" and that the object of the third section is to interdict the entrance of the harbors and waters of the United States and territories thereof, to ships and vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either: and for that purpose the third section declares, "That, from and after the twentieth day of May next, the entrance of the harbors and waters of the United States and the territories thereof, be, and the same is hereby interdicted to all ships or vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either; vessels hired, chartered, or employed by the Government of either country, for the sole purpose of carrying letters or despatches, and also vessels forced in by distress or by the dangers of the sea, only excepted." In the first section of the law, the words, "public ships and vessels belonging to Great Britain or France" are used. In the third section the words "ships or vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either," are used. It is observable, also, that the first section requires the interdiction, thereby provided for, to operate from and after the passage of the act, and the third section requires the interdiction thereby provided for to operate from after the twentieth day of May next, that is, next after the passage of the act. The act was approved and became a law on the first day of March, in the year 1809—and, therefore, it may be concluded, that the interdiction provided for by the first section of the law operated on the second day of March next after the passage of the act, that is about eighty days previous to the day on which the interdiction provided for in the third section of the law was required to operate. The different periods determined by the law for the operation of the several interdictions, respectively provided for by the first and third sections, clearly prove (even if there was no other reason) that the interdiction provided for by the first section was designed to operate (as the expression of the section clearly evinces) on the public; that is, the national armed ships and vessels belonging to Great Britain or France: and that the interdiction provided for by the third section, was designed to operate on the unarmed private merchant ships and vessels belonging in whole or in part to citizens or subject of Great Britain or France, and sailing under the flag of either Great Britain or France. The term "public ships and vessels belonging to Great Britain or France," used in the first section, and the term "ships or vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France," are not synonymous—they cannot be construed to mean and intend the same description of ships and vessels, for this reason, (if there was no other,) that the law provides and limits distinct periods for commencement of the operation of the interdictions respectively provided for by the first and third sections: if then language is to be permitted to be the clothing or vehicle of distinct ideas, the first section of the law must be construed to operate against ships and vessels of one description or character—and the third section must be construed to operate against ships and vessels of another description or character.

Public ships or vessels are those which properly are denominated national, or belonging to the sovereign. A public ship is national property, national territory, a part (if the expression will be permitted) of the national domain. A public ship is an armed floating fortress of the sovereign, completely equipped, fortified, manned, and directed to maintain and guard the rights of the sovereign owner. A public ship or vessel (in propriety of nautical expression,) carries and displays the proud ensign of sovereignty; it is said to carry the flag or ensign of sovereignty, and is not said to sail under the flag or ensign of sovereignty; the reason is, the public ship goes forth, in the majesty of its owner, to guard and protect the weak, unarmed, defenceless merchant ships and vessels sailing under the flag of the sovereign of the nation, of which its owner is a citizen or subject. The merchant ship or vessel is said to sail under a flag, pointing thereby to the nation of which its owner is a citizen or subject, and manifesting that it sails under the protection of that nation. If, then, the distinction, that a public ship or vessel carries the ensign or flag of sovereignty, and that a private or merchant ship or vessel sails under the flag of sovereignty, be correct, (and there is every reason to believe it is,) it goes incontestably to prove that the diction or expression of the first section of the non-intercourse law is proper, and clearly defining an interdiction against armed ships and vessels; in other words, the public ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, exclusively;—and that the diction or expression of the third section of the non-intercourse law is proper, and clearly defining an interdiction against private unarmed merchant ships and vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either country exclusively. From these considerations it may be concluded that there is no reason to adopt the proposed amendment on the ground of its being an explanatory declaration.

It may not be necessary to add to what has already been said respecting the other principle contained in the proposed amendment. On behalf of that discrimination in favor of Great Britain, it has been urged, that the usages of nations, on the broad ground of morality, is to assist, consistently with their own interest, every nation. It would have been more satisfactory, if the gentleman had fully explained what he designed to be understood by the observation—morality of nations! and you apply the observation to the old nations of Europe—what is it? If more particularly it is applied to that nation who first began and continued its unjust oppressions against the United States from the odious stamp act to the present time—what is the conclusion? The inquiry would lead to a recapitulation of all the injuries, outrages, oppressions, miseries, and wars, inflicted by Great Britain on the United States. Many fine things have been said of morality; but how much sœver it is to be deplored, it is a stubborn truth, that the morality of the old Governments of Europe consisted more in theory than practice. To what principle of morality is the past or present conduct of any of the same nations towards the United States to be ascribed? Let the gentleman tell; he appears to know all about it. But it seems that a nation is to act on the broad ground of morality in assisting every other nation, only so far as is consistent with its own interest. With its own interest! unhappy adjunct, unfortunate addition. By this definition of national morality, benevolence, disinterested friendship, and every cardinal, social, manly, noble virtue, is excluded from the morality of nations—consistent with its own interest. Great Britain then, whose apologist, Mr. R. observed, he would not say the gentleman had tried to be, extends the hand of friendship to the United States, but it is only so far as may be consistent with her own interest. So, then, a wonderful discovery is made—of what? Why of that only, which every gentleman in the House knows—only this, that Great Britain acts exclusively for her own interest; and this is the broad, boasted ground of morality on which Great Britain always has acted, and will, if able, continue to act on towards the United States. And is this the strong, cogent, all convincing, all concluding reason in virtue whereof the propriety of discriminating in favor of Great Britain is urged? A considerable quantity of time has been consumed in endeavoring carefully, sedulously, and closely to elucidate hypothetically the morality of the old nations of Europe. Away with such visionary theory; come to plain matters of fact; tell and state things and facts as they are, and argue from them as existing; that species of reasoning, which is bottomed on ifs and suppositions, will never do much honor to the political reasoner.

But it may be asked, does the definition alluded to mean and intend that, on the broad ground of morality, it would be proper that the United States do assist Great Britain, and join in the war against France? And for that reason, to admit the public ships of Great Britain, and to exclude the public ships of France? Will that mode of proceeding be consistent with the interest of the United States? If it be so, it has yet to be proved, and it is not assumed that any gentleman of this Committee thinks so. If it be otherwise, let the declaration be made, and then it will be known how to answer it.

Great Britain is bound in justice and honor to carry into complete effect the express and implied conditions in the late negotiation had at the City of Washington. It is urged that that Power will recede from the late Orders in Council declaring a great part of the Continent of Europe in a state of rigorous blockade. It is earnestly hoped that Great Britain will recede. So far as respected France and the dependencies of France, Great Britain certainly ought to have confided in the honor, justice, and magnanimity of the United States, in this, that the United States would have continued the non-intercourse system as defined in the law, in full force, effect, and operation against France, until France will have rescinded her decrees violating the rights of the United States. Great Britain has not so confided in the United States, but has assumed to herself, in this case, to act on the alluded to "broad ground of morality, consistent with her own interest." If Great Britain had acted on the true principle of morality, she would have waited until the result of Mr. Oakley's mission was known, and not have issued those blockade orders. The same late blockading orders do virtually take away the necessity of continuing the non-intercourse law against France, for this plain reason—the non-intercourse law interdicts all commercial intercourse with France. The late Orders in Council go to prevent all commercial intercourse between the United States and France. The blockading orders of Great Britain and the non-intercourse law of the United States act, as they relate to France and her dependencies, on the same subject. Both are not requisite, therefore; the late blockading orders of Great Britain have superseded and virtually taken away the force of the law of the United States interdicting commercial intercourse with France and its dependencies. It will not be denied, that Great Britain was well informed of the principles of the non-intercourse law, previous to the issuing of the same late blockading orders. It is desirable then that attention be given to these facts, and to get clear of them, rather than be descanting on hypothetical visions, which being compared with matters of fact, are like the sounds of a tinkling cymbal.

But it is urged on behalf of the amendment "that the act of an individual cannot, if disavowed, bind a nation;" and "that a nation is not bound to surrender the individual who committed the disavowed act unless he be demanded." On what principle of moral justice are these assertions made? They are, too, of the left-handed, crooked, vicious principles of that deceptive, wicked policy, which has never failed to destroy a nation. A nation may disavow the hostile act, but it is bound in justice to punish the individual who, in violation of the orders and laws of his own Government and in violation of the laws of public reason, perpetrated the hostile act; or to surrender him to the injured nation, although no demand of him be made. Let, then, all such unjust, deceptive, illusive assertions be omitted in reasoning and argument. Let Great Britain have the labor of justifying her own conduct: The sovereign people of the United States require the honest execution of the abilities of their representatives on their own side of the question, not only as the question relates to Great Britain, but to France also. It is incumbent on every nation to take care for itself. The nations of the old world are taking care for themselves, and it is presumed the United States will proceed in the adoption of measures which will eventually secure their peace, happiness, and prosperity.

Mr. COOK spoke in favor of the motion.

On motion of Mr. VARNUM, the Committee rose—53 to 38; reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again—57 to 51; those opposed to sitting again being in favor of continuing the discussion in the House, with a view to obtain a greater attention to it than was paid in Committee, many members being absent during the debate.

SATURDAY, June 24.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN, the Clerk was directed to procure a Clock for the use of the House of Representatives, and to cause it to be placed in some convenient part of the Representatives' Chamber.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for defraying the expense of stationery, printing, and all other contingent expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives, during the present session of Congress, and an additional appropriation for the purchase of books, maps, and charts, for the Library of Congress," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. Also, a bill, entitled "An act freeing from postage all letters and packets from Thomas Jefferson;" to which they also desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON stated that he had been requested by a committee of the House to make a motion that the House should come to the following resolution, to which he hoped there would be no objection:

Resolved, That, if Congress shall not be in session on the fourth of July, the citizens of the District of Columbia shall be permitted to occupy the Representatives' Chamber, for the purpose of attending the delivery of any discourse prepared for the celebration of that day.

The House agreed to consider the resolution—55 to 17.

Messrs. LEWIS, QUINCY, and LYON, opposed the resolution, on the ground that this Hall should be set apart sacred for legislative purposes; that the furniture might be injured by indiscriminate admission of persons; and that it would be improper in this House in any way to give encouragement to any party celebrations of that or any other day.

Messrs. JOHNSON, BURWELL, COOK, and SMITH, supported the motion. They observed that no building reared by mortal hands was too sacred for the celebration of that day; that there was no intention to foster party spirit; and that sufficient reliance might be placed on the good order of the citizens that they would not injure the furniture of the House.

Mr. VAN HORN rising to oppose it, Mr. JOHN-SON withdrew it, to avoid occupying the time of the House with it.

Mr. COOK renewed the motion; but the House refused to consider it.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House refused to go into Committee on the non-intercourse bill; and

On motion of Mr. FINDLEY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the contested election of WILLIAM BAYLIES—ayes 56.

Before the report was read, Mr. DANA moved that the Committee rise, under a belief that time had not been allowed for the consideration of the report; he wished not to be driven in so great a hurry to the decision of so important a question, which it was impossible to decide without mature consideration.

Mr. BURWELL observed that it was for the purpose of consideration alone that the House went into Committee; that it could not be expected the Committee could rise immediately after they agreed to go into Committee; and that if a disposition was manifested to drive the House from the consideration of the subject, it might produce a counter-determination to persevere in it.

Mr. DANA, observing that he had no desire but for a fair consideration, withdrew his motion.

The report was then read, concluding with a recommendation of the following resolutions:

“Resolved, That the election held in Plymouth district, in November last, was legal and proper.

“Resolved, That William Baylies is not entitled to his seat.

“Resolved, That Charles Turner, junior, is entitled to a seat in this House.”

Mr. FINDLEY moved that the petitioner, Chas. Turner, may be admitted to a seat in the House during the discussion. Agreed to without debate and without opposition.

A motion was made by Mr. TAYLOR, that the Committee rise, and report progress. His object was to move a resolution for a postponement of the further consideration of the subject until next session.

This motion was supported by Messrs. TAYLOR, TROUP, PITKIN, SHEFFEY, LIVERMORE, BAYLIES, WHITMAN, ROSS, and LYON, and opposed by Messrs. RHEA, J. G. JACKSON, BOYD, HOLLAND, TURNER, (the petitioner,) VARNUM, and LOVE.

The arguments which appeared to be most relied on by the mover of the postponement, and those who spoke on the same side of the question, were, that the depositions and testimony taken in this case, although it was admitted that reasonable notice was given to the sitting member, who did not attend, were taken under the authority of no existing law, and were not such as would govern a court of justice; that the sitting member not having attended at the time of taking the depositions, from the belief that they were illegal, the testimony was wholly ex parte, and however decisive it was admitted by some gentleman to be, was not such as, in candor or justice, the House would decide on without permitting the sitting member to bring testimony to rebut it.

To this, it was replied that, for several years, there had been no law prescribing the mode of taking testimony in cases of contested elections, in the course of which time several contested elections had been decided by the House on testimony taken under no law, but under the guidance of common reason; that, during the first session of the last Congress, the seat of Mr. Culpeper was vacated on testimony undoubtedly taken in this manner, and under no express law; and that the House having heretofore, in various cases, decided in this way, it was not to be expected that they would, in this instance, desert the principles on which they had acted.

Other arguments, however, founded on facts stated by the sitting member, and the petitioner, were introduced into the debate, by gentlemen speaking on both sides of the question, to support their respective opinions.

The question, on the Committee's rising, was taken about five o'clock, and carried—58 to 33.

The Committee were refused leave to sit again—ayes 33.

MONDAY, June 26.

BATTURE AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. SHEFFEY, after a speech of some length in the course of which he examined the title to this much contested piece of alluvion, moved the following resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President of the United States be requested to cause the several persons who were removed from the batture of the suburb of St. Mary, in the city of New Orleans on the 25th day of January, 1808, to be restored to the possession thereof; to be held with the same rights with which they respectively held the same immediately prior to such removal, any subsequent act or thing to the contrary notwithstanding.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That if the President shall be of opinion that the United States have such a legal claim to the batture opposite the suburb of St. Mary, in the city of New Orleans, as will justify the expense of prosecuting the same, he be authorized, with the consent of the parties removed therefrom on the 25th day of January, 1808, to name three referees, who shall have full power to hear and finally to determine all right, title, claim, and demand whatsoever, as well of the United States as of the parties removed, both in law and equity, and their award or that of a majority of them shall be binding as well on the United States as the said parties.

Resolved, That if the President of the United States shall deem it most expedient, he may compromise the conflicting claims of the United States and the persons removed from the batture of the suburb of St. Mary, in the city of New Orleans, and cause the same to be tried in a court of the United States, in such manner and at such place as will secure an impartial trial.

The House agreed to consider the first resolution, ayes 67.

A motion was made to refer it to a Committee of the Whole; which after debate, in which Messrs. LOVE, POYDRAS, SMILIE, DANA, TROUP, and BIBB, participated, was agreed to, 60 to 21; and it was made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The House agreed to consider the other resolutions, 48 to 41; which were referred to the same Committee.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

On motion of Mr. SMILIE, the House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, to revive and amend certain parts of the act interdicting commercial intercourse; the unfinished business of yesterday (the report of the committee on the contested election of William Baylies) having been ordered to lie on the table, 58 to 46.

The Committee of the Whole were, on motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON, discharged from the further consideration of the non-intercourse bill, ayes 70.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he found that there was in the bill no provision authorizing the departure of vessels charged with public despatches for France, and therefore moved such an amendment.—Agreed to without opposition.

Mr. SHEFFEY observed that when the bill had been before the committee he had the honor to move an amendment which he now renewed as follows: "And provided also, that nothing therein contained shall be construed to prevent any public vessel from entering the waters and harbors of the United States, belonging to any nation with whom commercial intercourse shall be permitted."

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved to amend the amendment by adding to the end of it the following: "Whenever a full and satisfactory adjustment of our differences shall have been made with such nation."

Mr. DANA said the amendment moved to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) went to give a construction to the bill which would operate as a complete exclusion of the vessels of both Powers until a satisfactory adjustment of all existing differences shall have taken place. What, said Mr. D., is the situation in which we are now placed? On what principle is it that British ships were first excluded and on which their exclusion was confirmed by the non-intercourse law? They were originally excluded by the proclamation of the President of the United States in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake. The President of the United States now in office has declared his acceptance of the proffered terms of satisfaction for that outrage. And, after that, is it proposed that we shall continue the measure of hostility when the cause alone which led to it is completely done away? I should suppose that in the very act of adjustment, which took place between the British Minister and the American Secretary, it is implied that we should do nothing further on this subject. The President of the United States has accepted the satisfaction offered; he has declared those terms, when performed, to be satisfactory. And are gentlemen considering the restoration of the seamen taken from the Chesapeake as a reason why we should continue the interdict? If we examine this subject fairly, the great principle of reparation was a disavowal of the claim to search our armed vessels, and a homage to our rights. That matter must be deemed to be settled, if the President of the United States had authority to settle it. If the President had not power to settle it, this furnishes strong evidence that the vote of approbation of his conduct was a proper proposition.

As to the interdiction by the non-intercourse act, I apprehend that was founded on the violation of our neutral rights by the belligerent Powers, the President of the United States being authorized to renew trade whenever the edicts violating our lawful commerce should be revoked. Whether or not the President has done right in accepting the assurance instead of the fact, gentlemen have considered it unnecessary for them to express any opinion upon it. If there be no edict affecting our lawful commerce in force by one belligerent, the interdict is at end in point of fact in relation to that one. The question of the affair of the Chesapeake is settled, if the President had power to settle it; and as to the other cause of interdiction, the President has declared that the British orders will have been revoked on the 10th of June. Has the President acted correctly or not? If he has acted correctly in taking the assurance for the fact, the very principle of the non-intercourse is at an end as respects one of the belligerents, and there can be no ground for the exclusion of British armed vessels.

Mr. TAYLOR said he thought the gentleman from Connecticut used the word hostility in relation to this measure of including British armed vessels from the United States. Now, I believe, sir, said Mr. T., that if we go to the opinions entertained, not by the President of the United States, but entertained and expressed in the very foundation of the arrangement which was made, it will be found that the very hostility intended to be produced by the President's proclamation ceased at the moment when we passed the non-intercourse act in which we excluded the vessels of both the belligerents. The hostility was in the admission of the armed vessels of one, and excluding those of the other. It ceased by the non-intercourse law, and so satisfactory was this law of the last session, that it was the very foundation on which the overture was made which ended so much to the satisfaction of this nation. So that, in fact, when we perpetuate the order of things produced by that act, we do not perpetuate the state of things produced by the interdictory proclamation of the late President. It was matter of satisfaction to the British Government, as expressed by their Minister here, that the quality of hostility in the exclusion of her vessels was taken away by the non-intercourse law. Have we promised, in the negotiation which has taken place, that we will commit an act of hostility against France for the boon which we have received from the hand of Great Britain? No, sir; and yet, if we take the definition of Mr. Canning, as to excluding the vessels of one belligerent and receiving those of the other, according to the mode proposed by the amendment, without the sentence moved to be admitted to it, it will in fact be agreeing to go to war with France. According to the opinion of Britain, promulgated not only to this Government but to the world, according to the demonstration made by the British Government, you will undertake a measure of active hostility against France; for what? For any great boon that this Government has received from the hands of Great Britain? No, sir. If all the promises were fulfilled to their full extent, we should then receive but justice at her hands. It was acknowledged, too, in the discussion which took place, that any nation, particularly a neutral nation, has a right to exclude the armed vessels of both belligerents; but that, on the contrary, the state now proposed to be produced, the exclusion of one and admission of the other, is an act of hostility to the party excluded. As I would not be compelled by the utmost ill usage by either belligerent to take part with the other against that one, neither will I take a consent or refusal from one or the other to do us justice as a motive for alliance, or a war which shall compromise our neutrality. I now speak of both, for both have used us as ill as was in their power. As kicks and cuffs have not compelled us to take part with them, neither shall caresses or fawning, for we will mete out an equal measure of justice to both. I consider the state of things produced by the non-intercourse as totally distinct from that produced by the proclamation of our late illustrious President.

But it is a little extraordinary that we are called upon to volunteer in this business, in what, according to the doctrine of the British diplomats, is war against France, without any requisition made by the British Minister here, or any hint given that this step is necessary or proper. I have seen none such, and therefore conclude that there has been none. And, in point of candor, if the treaty-making power does suppose that it will be of advantage that this step should be taken, it would be right that we should hear from him. As we have not heard from the President on this subject, it is a fair conclusion that he does not suppose it will be of advantage, but of disadvantage to him.

Another thing, sir. The British Minister's not applying in form might thus be construed. We know that he (Mr. Erskine) is an honorable gentleman, one who will act with the utmost candor towards this Government. Now as some nations are in the habit of using Grotius, Puffendorf, and all the other writers on public law as engines of diplomacy, in fact, of using vellum, parchment, paper, and books, for the purpose of producing friendly arrangements with those Governments with whom they come in contact, so other nations will use a different mode. And if the British Minister recollects the course of conduct pursued by one great nation in their manner of managing diplomacy, it would be very candid in him not to ask you to produce such a state of things as his Government might take advantage of. I believe, if he knew that such was the mode in which the pending negotiation was to be carried into effect, that he would not ask it. I am sure he would not.

I think it is the best way to continue things precisely in the state in which they were when the arrangement was made; and that more cannot be asked, either as respects the justice due to Great Britain or fair play to the officer managing the negotiation.

Mr. FISK.—It was my intention not to have troubled the House with any remarks on the bill now under consideration. I could readily have reconciled it to my feelings to have given a silent vote in favor of the bill, had not so many and various objections been made against it. But as it seems to be objectionable, and susceptible of so many amendments, in the opinion of so many gentlemen, the House will indulge me, while I offer the reasons which will govern my vote.

This bill, for which we were convened, has, during the time we have been here, received as yet but a small portion of our attention; and it is so important that upon its passage, and the principles it shall embrace, may depend the destinies of our country. It deserves our immediate and most serious attention. I hope it may be coolly and dispassionately examined, and treated according to its real importance. Its principles have been carefully and scrupulously investigated by the committee who reported it, or a bill similar in its provisions, of which committee I had the honor to be a member.

The language is plain; public ships are not interdicted. There is but one question to be decided in disposing of this bill, and that is respecting public ships; for I believe all will agree to renew the non-intercourse act as respects France. The question is, what regulation shall we make respecting public ships, and one of three courses is to be pursued? Shall we exclude both, admit both, or discriminate?

There are many who would be willing to exclude the armed ships of every foreign Power from our harbors and waters. And considering what we have suffered by admitting them, it may be well questioned whether it would not be the best policy of this nation to interdict them by a permanent law; yet many gentlemen object to this, as being inexpedient at this period. It is said, and it is the principal argument urged against it, that it might embarrass our impending negotiations with Great Britain to interdict her public ships by this act. As I feel as much disposed for an amicable adjustment of our differences with that nation as any member of this House, and would be as unwilling to embarrass the negotiation, I would not insist on this interdiction.

It is also said that England has made reparation, or agreed to make reparation, for the aggression which caused the interdiction of her public ships, and that as the cause no longer exists the interdiction should cease. Be it so; and may we never have fresh cause to renew it!

But, say gentlemen, we must not now recede from the ground we have taken with respect to France, we must discriminate. Let us for a moment view the ground we have taken—not only as relates to France, but England also.

We are not at war with either of the belligerents. Our Ministers at their respective Courts are endeavoring to negotiate, and by negotiation to obtain redress for the injuries of which we complain, and whatever precautionary measures we might adopt would not be deemed a violation of our neutral character, so long as those measures were equally applicable to both the belligerents. We could not be deemed to have taken part with either to the prejudice of the other, while no other was benefited by our measures. While British public ships were interdicted, and our embargo existed, an offer was made to both the belligerents to resume our trade—the same equal terms were tendered to both. The nation refusing is left without a cause of complaint against us, for resuming our trade with the nation accepting the offer.

Before either nation does accept, America changes her position. The embargo is abandoned, and a general interdiction of the public ships of England and France, and a non-intercourse with these nations and their dependencies is substituted. By this non-intercourse act, the particular interdiction is merged in a general regulation. This was to exist until the end of the next session of Congress only. This was virtually saying, that the proclamation interdicting British public vessels from our waters for a particular aggression shall be revoked; and a general municipal regulation, over which the President shall have no control, shall be substituted in its stead. It was then, in order to preserve our neutral character, necessary that this rule should embrace both the belligerents. It may be said, and has indeed been frequently said, that the reason of extending this restriction to France, was her having burnt our vessels and imprisoned our seamen. But never, at least in the history of diplomacy, have cause and effect been more distant and unconnected. France, on the high seas, burns our vessels, and in her own territories imprisons our seamen. We, at the distance of three thousand miles, interdict our ports and waters to her public ships, which do not or dare not come within five hundred leagues of the line of our interdicted territory, and this is to retaliate for the aggression. Can this interdiction be defended on this ground? It cannot. There must have existed some other reason. It was to preserve our relations with the belligerents in that state that should be consistent with our professions of neutrality.

Had the interdiction been confined to British vessels by this law, what would Great Britain have said to this discrimination? In vain might we have told her that we meant to preserve our neutral character, and not to take a part with her enemies in the war against her. Our acts would have been directly opposed to our professions. With this discriminating, permanent, municipal law, could we expect Great Britain to treat with us as a neutral? If we did, we should be disappointed. If, then, it be inexpedient to make this discrimination against Great Britain, how is it less so, when directed against France? We are to admit British and exclude the French. And, are we to endeavor to negotiate, as neutrals, with France, upon this ground, with any reasonable prospect of success? It is desirable that the commercial intercourse between this country and France should be restored. Peace and free trade is the interest and the object of America. While we throw wide open the door of negotiation to England, why should we shut it against France? While we facilitate negotiations with the British, why should we embarrass and prevent the same with the French? I wish to leave the Executive and treaty-making powers of our Government free and unshackled, to enter on negotiation with both these Governments, under every advantage of success which we can give. On what ground can this discrimination be defended? You adopt this measure. Our Minister at Paris is requested to explain it. Is there any advocate for this discrimination in this House, who can conceive the grounds upon which our Minister or our Government are to justify this measure with our relations of neutrality? It cannot be defended. I am not for yielding to either nation, but, let our conduct be consistent, impartial, and defensible. If then, we are to be involved in a war with either, the resources of the country and the hearts of our citizens will support the Government, and we need not be afraid of the world. But those men, or that Administration that will, upon a mere useless, punctilious point of etiquette, commit the peace and happiness of this country to the ravages of war, will meet the indignation, and feel the vengeance of the intelligent citizens of the country. This temerity would meet its merited punishment. The people of America can see, and will judge for themselves; they can readily discern the difference between shadow and substance; they are neither to be deceived or trifled with, especially on subjects of such immense moment to their liberties and happiness.

Let me ask gentlemen what possible benefit is to result to this country from this discriminating resolution? Is it to keep the scene of naval action at a distance from our territories? During the late war, no naval engagement has taken place between these Powers, in our waters, unless it was the combat between the Ambuscade and Boston, in 1794, off New York. None is to be apprehended. As well might we apprehend that the Continental Powers would make Louisiana the theatre of action. It cannot be required to secure us from a danger so remote as renders it a subject of neither fear nor probability. Is it to prevent trespasses and aggressions? Let those who have seen the public ships of France on our coast during the late revolutions, say whether danger is really to be apprehended from this quarter, especially when we reflect on the state of her naval force. For what purpose is it, then, to be adopted? No good can, but much evil may, result from it. Will any one say that our relations with England require it? None acquainted with the views that Government has of the subject can say so. America complains of the restrictions of her trade by the orders and decrees of the belligerents. France and England retaliate upon each other this system of restriction, and both call on America to resist; but, how? By interdicting our waters to their public ships? No, truly; to restrain this unwarrantable system of warfare by those means which we command, and which may operate upon the interests of the aggressor. What are these? Interdicting their public vessels from our waters? No; how would this affect France? She has no occasion for our hospitality. It never could be considered an object with her that we should deny to her the use of that which was neither asked for nor wanted by her. This measure could never be deemed, either by England or France, a measure of resistance to their blockading decrees. It would, and must be absurd and ridiculous, if contended for in this point of view. How has resistance been wished? By restrictions on our trade. In this way, and in this only, can we affect the interest of the aggressor. A non-intercourse is the only effectual means in the power of America to resist these unjustifiable orders, unless we take an active part in the war, which is neither required nor to be expected, at least, by either of the belligerents.

Our trade is the engine by which we are to resist these orders. But, we shall recede without cause from the ground we have taken, it is urged. Why have we receded from resisting British orders? We have a promise. Have we not the same from France? The Milan Decree was founded on the orders of the 11th of November. When these are repealed, the basis of this decree is gone. Is nothing due to this declaration of the French Government? Shall we not wait a moment, to see what course will be now pursued by the French Government after the relaxation by the British? What is the benefit, which, in every possible case, is to result to us from this discriminating restriction? None. Much evil may. It may break up our negotiations with France, and in all probability will; for, it can neither be explained or justified by any national expediency or diplomatic ingenuity.

Perhaps a negotiation is now in train with the French Government, and a messenger may be on his way, with despatches, to this country.

The French Minister here, finds us discriminating between the British and his own Government, and to the expense, if you please, of the latter. Would he feel himself authorized to proceed, without further and additional instructions? Surely not.

If gentlemen wish for peace upon honorable terms; if they will not, for a punctilio, sacrifice our neutral character, I hope they will unite in favor of this bill.

The advocates of this bill may be charged with being under French influence; but, my own views and feelings justify me against this imputation. My God, who knows my heart, knows that instead of cherishing I deplore, and, as sincerely as any one, deprecate foreign predilections.

The Senate, the treaty-making power, have passed this unanimously, and after much deliberation. This consideration has great weight with me; for, the subject of this bill is under the control of the treaty-making power. A subject of this nature and moment, would never have passed the other branch of the Legislature without deep and mature reflection. Having thus passed, and unanimously, can we expect they will agree to the proposed amendment, which changes the very nature and principles of the bill; and, if they should agree to it, that the President, who, I repeat, cannot justify it in his diplomatic instructions, would sanction the law?

If this bill should not pass the three branches, and we thus abandon the ground we have taken, can we expect our negotiations with England will progress to a favorable termination? We are, as a nation, pledged to continue the non-intercourse with that nation which continues her orders; but not so with the interdiction of public vessels. One is a municipal regulation, the other a public law?

To the amendment, I am decidedly opposed. I hope we may pass the bill as it came from the Senate. I am prepared to vote for it, and I have taken the liberty of stating some of the reasons which have operated on my mind. I have gone into them more at length than I intended. The House will consider the principles of the bill very important, and in this consideration may, perhaps, find an apology for the time I have claimed their indulgence.

Mr. BURWELL said he deemed it in some degree his duty to make some remarks on the bill before the House. He intended to vote against both the amendments proposed to the bill. I think (said Mr. B.) that if my colleague who moved the first amendment (Mr. SHERRY,) had taken that view of this subject which might have been presented to his mind, he would not have found such error in the course proposed to be pursued. He seems to have taken another ground, when by the clearest demonstration it might have been shown that the system proposed is one of impartiality to the belligerent Powers of Europe. It will be recollected by gentlemen of this House, that at the time the exclusion of French armed ships took place, it was upon the express ground that the British Government objected to come to an accommodation with us, because we excluded her vessels and nominally admitted those of her enemy. On that ground I venture to say that the exclusion took place; because, at the time that it took place, it was considered a measure absolutely favoring Great Britain, yet not injuring France by a nominal prohibition of the entrance of her vessels. It was stated that there was not perhaps in the course of a year a single French public armed vessel in the harbors of the United States. Have we any French frigates now in our seas? None. Is there any probability that there will be any? No, sir; for France having now lost her West India islands, if her vessels are freely admitted, it is probable that there would not, in the course of five years, be a single French vessel within our waters. As the exclusion would be perfectly nominal, I would not adopt anything to prevent a settlement of our differences with France. I am not now sanguine in my belief that we shall settle our differences with her; for every one acquainted with that Government knows, I fear, that it is not to be diverted from its object by any arrangement we may make. But I would do away every possible justification that could be urged by France for not meeting our overtures for peace. This conduct would produce at home more union among our citizens; and, when our rights are attacked without a pretence for their infraction, there can be but one sentiment in the nation. I have always determined to admit British vessels as far as my vote would go; and should the House determine to exclude French vessels I should still vote for the admission of English vessels, because their former exclusion has been so artfully managed by the British Government, and the doctrine has been so admitted by the presses in this country, as to give rise to the most unjustifiable conduct ever pursued by one nation towards another. As to the idea advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. TAYLOR,) that, if we do admit them to take possession of our waters, they will take advantage of the privilege to our injury in negotiation, it has no force with me, for this plain reason; that, although the exclusion of them from our waters was not carried into execution by physical force, yet they did not enter our waters, which they might have done, in defiance of the proclamation. And why did they not? Because, I presume, they had no desire to rouse the indignation of this nation by an open violation of the laws of the land.

If, sir, you wish to gain the advantage of union at home, take away every pretext for the violation of your rights. Let me ask if it be not better to admit them? By so doing you give up a principle which does not benefit you, and receive an accession of physical strength by union at home. I do not say that every one will be satisfied, because I have no doubt England has agents in the country, but so few in number as to be unworthy of notice. If Great Britain, on the other hand, attacks us when we have taken away every possible ground of collision and violates her promise, the people in every part of the country will be satisfied that her deliberate object is to destroy our commerce. We should have no more of those party divisions which have distracted us for some months past.

It cannot be said that we are bound by any part of the negotiation to admit English vessels. I have seen nothing of the kind, if it exist; and I call upon gentlemen to point it out. Why do it, then? It may be considered a concession; and certainly manifests that disposition which we feel to settle all the points of difference in agitation betwixt us. And here I beg leave to say that, according to the most explicit declarations of the British Minister, you would not give the smallest umbrage by pursuing that course. On this subject Mr. B. quoted a speech of Mr. Stevens in the British Parliament. If we were to be governed by reference to expressions which existed in that country of our partiality to France, it did appear to him that this speech was entitled to weight, because it justified the course proposed by the bill, and stated a position which the British Government admitted was all that could be required from a neutral State. From this speech it appeared that placing the two belligerents on an equal footing was all that was required. Did not this bill completely come up to their wishes? Did it not interdict all trade with France—under the most severe and heavy penalties? Mr. B. said he did not wish it to be understood that he would shape his conduct by the wishes of the British Ministry; but, as it had been said that the bill was somewhat hostile to that country, he had quoted the speech of a ministerial member to show that no such inference could be drawn. The same person, in his speech, also states, said Mr. B., that the reason why our offer in August last was not accepted, was, that, if it had been accepted, such was the situation of the law, that a commerce might always be carried on with the enemy; that, through the ports in Europe, her enemy might be as efficiently supplied as if the embargo did not exist in relation to him. But, sir, what is now the state of things? If it is possible to operate on France by commercial restrictions, let me ask if this bill will not accomplish that object? Let me ask if an American vessel under it can go to any port of France? It not only cuts off direct intercourse, but prohibits the importation of the products of France; and any attempt to carry on a circuitous commerce must be ineffectual, inasmuch as the produce will be liable to seizure when it comes into the ports of the United States.

If, according to the ideas of the British Government itself, this state of things be a sufficient resistance to France, let me ask of gentlemen how they can infer a partiality to France? What more can you do? If you exclude the armed vessels of France, though it may display a disposition to injure her, I defy any gentleman to show that it can, in the smallest degree, coerce or affect her. Let me call the attention of gentlemen to the present situation of Europe. If accounts lately received are to be credited, we may calculate on the universal control of the French Emperor over the ports of Europe. Is it to our advantage to be excluded from the trade of the Continent? Is it not known that all the surplus product of the agriculture of this country finds its vent on the continent of Europe? Is it not known that, of the whole of our tobacco, seven out of eight parts are consumed on the Continent? That of our cotton, at least one-half finds its market there? Does not flour find a great proportion of its consumption on the Continent? This cannot be denied. Then, let me ask of gentlemen, whether it be so much to our advantage to exclude this trade; and, if not, why we should take a step which can do France no injury, but which may, and probably would, be made a pretext for cutting off so valuable a part of our trade? With respect to partiality to France, let me call upon the gentleman from Virginia, or any other, to show if, from the conduct of the United States, any such thing can be inferred. Look at our relative situation. Have we opened our ports to her traders? Have we renewed commercial intercourse with her? Let me ask, which have we placed in the best situation, France or England? Every gentleman must answer—England. Whilst she gets all our commerce, her enemy is wholly excluded from any participation in it.

There is another point of view in which this subject may be considered. So far as French commerce is excluded, I contend that it cannot be cause of war, because you have a right to restrict your commerce in any manner you please. If France will not trade with you on liberal terms, you have a right to say that you will not trade with her at all; and this would not be cause for war, or an act for which she could, in justice, attack you. What was the non-importation act as to England? Not an act of war, not an act which she has any right to resent; it was a mere municipal regulation. Apply the same principle to France. If she will not permit intercourse on terms of liberality and reciprocity, you have a right to prohibit intercourse partially or generally. In so doing, no man would have the hardihood to say that you had commenced the controversy with France. But one sentiment on the subject will pervade the country, and that will be resistance. It strikes me, sir, that, if the House were disposed, instantly, to go to war with France, they should take the course pointed out by the amendment. I acknowledge that the conduct of that nation does justify war; that is to say, that many a war has been commenced since the foundation of the world, with less provocation and for less cause. But it ought to be observed that we are a peaceful nation; war is not congenial to our habits. The point of view in which I consider the subject, is, that if you exclude French armed vessels now, they must consider you as having commenced a war with them. If you are for war, and think this the proper time to commence it, make this discrimination. Let me ask gentlemen whether the partial exclusion of British public vessels, in the first instance, and their total exclusion, in the second instance, were not produced by ostrages within our waters? Certainly. And is not the probability of the repetition of them now as strong as ever? Unquestionably it is; and so far the admission of British armed vessels may be considered a concession. On this subject of partiality to France, I will observe, that I believe that a great part of the hostility of the British Government to this country has been produced by this charge made here, in the first instance, and repeated there; and that gentlemen anxious to prevent a war with Britain, have done more to accelerate it by this charge, than by any course of conduct which they could have adopted. Is it not within the recollection of every gentleman who has attended to the politics of this country for eight years past, that this cry has been as strong throughout, as it has been during any period of the existence of the embargo? From 1796, down to the present day, a part of the people of this country have been charged with French partiality; and when the change of Government took place, which stationed us at the head of it, the papers teemed with the assertion that we were partial to France. For myself, I believe that a great part of the hostility of the British Government towards us has grown out of the unfortunate state of parties in this country. When the charge of partiality to France is considered, it must strike every one as the most absurd and unfounded that could be urged. Let gentlemen look at their neighbors, friends, and connexions, whom they have thus accused, who have so much at stake in the country, and how can they reconcile it to themselves to conceive that they have any attachment to any foreign country? A particular species of papers of this country alone circulate in England. From these the Ministry derived their information; and any person reading them, must suppose that a great portion of the citizens of this country are devotedly attached to France, caring nothing for their own country. It is not, therefore, surprising that this jealousy has existed in Great Britain.

During all our differences with the British Government, it has always been in the power of that Government to renew commercial intercourse with us, without a sacrifice of a single right. I have thought that we were rather disposed to yield rights of importance for the sake of accommodation. You have given up various claims, and yet, when we were struggling for the abandonment of the Orders in Council, and nothing else, she had the art to make a great portion of the people of this country believe that we were struggling to destroy her very existence. She has now given up more than we have asked, and yet, not surrendered one iota of her just rights, but merely abstained from the prosecution of a principle, which, if carried into effect, would have reduced us to the most despicable state of colonization. My object, heretofore, has been to prevent the existence of any point of etiquette to a settlement. It was said, however, that a mere point of etiquette prevented a settlement with England. Sir, whenever we are compelled to go to war, let us do it on grounds on which it is impossible for Americans to hesitate. I do contend that we ought to try if it is not possible, by faithfully discharging the duties which we owe to ourselves, and maintaining a correct position, to keep peace with France and with England also.

I do hope, from what I have said, that no one will suppose that I should be governed in my conduct by the policy of England or France: I wish to be governed exclusively by our own policy. If England does us an injury, let us resist it. If France does us an injury, let us resist her. While considering the subject in this point of view, I am not much in hopes of producing the result which we hope for, because I am afraid that the policy of France is already decided on.

Another idea has suggested itself to my mind, which I think merits consideration. Let it be recollected, that, on the 15th of March, a great many of our vessels went to the continent of Europe; and, I am informed by gentlemen whose authority is to be relied on, that the shipments of colonial produce have been enormous. Where can it have gone? Not to Great Britain, because there it is as plentiful as here. It must, then, have gone to the Continent. Suppose fifty vessels have gone to Amsterdam; the insurance against sea risk is five per cent.; in consideration of the risk in port, there is an additional insurance of seven per cent. Now, sir, would you not do extreme injustice to the merchants and insurance offices by taking a step which would infallibly insure the condemnation of all your property? I ask whether it would not be injuring them materially? because these vessels left your ports under a state of things very different from that which it is proposed to create; and, by changing it, you will infallibly cause the loss of all this property. At this time, it is probable that the shipments are greater, even, than they were on the 15th March. The merchants, finding the colonial produce useless here, (for, unless they can find a foreign market for it, it is of comparatively little value,) ship it off to Europe, rather than risk the total loss of it by keeping it.

As I before said, I have always been in favor of admitting British vessels; for I would have peace with that nation, if possible. I never have hesitated on that subject, because I wish to take away every possible pretext for quarrel. If she is disposed to do us justice, I am not disposed to prevent it. If all our wealth and strength were confined within the walls of any particular town, the admission of armed vessels might be a matter of serious doubt. Let it be recollected that we have an immense extent of coast and innumerable seaports which she might attack; and I never would prevent an adjustment by a measure which can be of no real efficacy, and which may do a vast deal of harm. I would reason in the same manner with respect to France. I would make peace with her, if we can; but I would not quarrel with England to please her, any more than I would quarrel with France to please England. If the proposed step be taken, however, all the property which has left this country for the ports on the Continent, since the 15th of March last, is as certainly confiscated as it has touched those ports.

Mr. LIVERMORE wished gentlemen to confine themselves to the point in debate. For what purpose were old transactions now brought up? For what purpose did gentlemen say that Britain was misled? I might say the same of France, said Mr. L. But I could not probably convince the gentleman, or he me. The real question is on the last amendment proposed, which appears to have for its object to get rid of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFY.) The meaning of the amendment I take to be, that there has not been a satisfactory adjustment of our differences with Great Britain; whether it be considered in that or any other point of view I cannot admit it. I contend that, as the two countries stand in relation to each other, we are at peace; and whether an envoy is or is not sent out here does not lead to any event by the law of nations. Still we should be at peace. Now, as I said the other day, I am not anxious whether the bill which came from the Senate be adopted or not; it is a measure which the majority may take on their own shoulders. A gentleman from South Carolina has inferred that it is the opinion of the Executive of the United States, that this act is correct. If I knew this to be the fact, it would completely alter my opinion on the subject, for if peace be preserved, I care not in what way—but I am not for doing away what we have already done, for fear it should offend sister France.

A great deal has been said about its being our interest to keep peace with France. I feel that as much as any one; and if peace can be preserved, we certainly ought to do it. But I would not do a wrong act because I wish for peace.

Declarations made on the floor of Parliament have been introduced here as authority. I must observe, whilst gentlemen lug these in, they would be very angry at the other side of the House for doing it. And to what did the quotation amount? To this: that as long as the decrees of France exist we ought to resist them. It is admitted that an indiscriminate admission or exclusion is not a breach of neutrality. But, considering the whole circumstances of the non-intercourse act, can the United States, consistently with good faith and with the true line which they ought to pursue, or with the interests of Great Britain, or what she has a right to expect, impair one part of the obligation more than another? I conceive that the resistance to decrees and orders in the first instance was the interdiction of public ships; and, secondly, the interdiction of commerce. And although the terms of the agreement do not point out expressly that the interdiction shall cease, yet I contend that, as to good faith, it was intended it should cease with the renewal of intercourse.

As to the negotiations carrying on with France, I wish to know whether or not it is not as injurious to France to interdict her private ships as to interdict her public armed vessels? If so, the interdiction of her armed vessels will not add to her complaints. An argument is urged that France knew what we had done at the time the messenger went out in the Mentor, and that the interdiction of her armed vessels now, before the return of the messenger, would essentially change the relation in which we stand to each other. This argument would apply just as much to the whole non-intercourse bill, as to this feature of it ; and, if correct, would supersede this wholly ; for, if we have no right to enact over again against France, provisions which do not extend to Great Britain, we must let the non-intercourse act die by its own limitation. What I contend for, is simply this : that this act, which was resistance to the arbitrary decrees of both nations, when one has ceased its orders, should still be left in operation against the other.

Non-Intercourse.

H. OF R.

Another argument has been used against discrimination, viz : that France has no public armed ships. If this is the case, gentlemen need not be alarmed ; for, if they cannot come here, we need not be afraid of their resentment, because we will not admit them. But we know that her cruisers can steal out of their ports, go into foreign seas, and destroy our trade in spite of the ships of Great Britain. If an American vessel has British property on board, or has been spoken by a British cruiser, a French public armed vessel is bound to make prize of her. This being the case, let us for a moment consider the subject as respects ourselves. Our feelings ought to be for ourselves and our country. Here is a nation having public ships, having a right to come into your ports. Does it comport with our honor and dignity to admit into our ports and harbors the very vessels destroying our commerce ? Not to go into an inquiry what has been the fact heretofore, but what may be now—if you pass a law that a French frigate may come into your waters and partake of your hospitalities, where is the obligation that it may not take advantage of the opportunity to make its prey more sure by watching it in port and then going out and entrapping it ? If, from the intoxication of the man who rules the destinies of the nations of Europe, he does not feel disposed to treat with us on terms of reciprocity, that circumstance should have no effect on our measures. But the question on that point is no doubt already settled ; time sufficient has been allowed for the vessel to go and receive an answer to the instruction sent to our Minister. I certainly would so far respect myself as to fulfill what I conceive to be good faith toward both, without respect to the wish or dictation of either.

As to the amount of produce sent to the Continent, it cannot be great. Some few may have adventured there on desperate voyages ; but that there is much property in jeopardy, I cannot believe, for France is known to be, in respect to mercantile property, the lion's den, easy of access, but impossible to return. Those, therefore, who have risked their property must have been extremely rash.

If the French Government would do us justice, I should be glad ; if not, we must abide by the consequences. We must not do improper things because they will not do us justice. It is proper that we should assert what we conceive to be our rights. I believe, however, that the question of peace with France will not turn on this bill. I believe the point to be already settled. If it be not, and the exclusion of French armed vessels would be an impediment to it, the same objection would be valid against the whole bill.

Mr. HOLLAND asked the indulgence of the House whilst he stated a few reasons why he should vote for the amendment under consideration. It had been asked whether it was consistent with the honor of this nation to admit French ships within our waters. Mr. H. said, he would answer, that, as things now stood, he did not consider it consistent with our honor and dignity so to do ; and the reason why, was, that that Government had done sundry injurious acts towards this nation for which it had not made reparation, nor even intimated an intention of doing so. He therefore answered that it was inconsistent to admit the vessels of France within our waters. It was in consequence of injuries which they had done, according to my conception, that I voted for their exclusion. I was not influenced to vote for the prohibition of the ships of France from coming into our waters by any desire to produce an equality in our relations with the belligerents. It was no impression of that kind that influenced my vote ; and yet I voted that French ships of war should not come into our waters. It was not the opinions of editors of newspapers, or the clamors of individuals, that influenced my vote, and I hope they never will. I think that every gentleman, on taking his seat in this House, should consider himself beyond suspicion. The only question for the consideration of the members of this House, when a measure is presented to them, is the expediency of it ; and on that ground alone, I voted for the exclusion of French ships or of British ships. I was chiefly influenced to vote for the exclusion of British armed ships by the variety of acts committed in our waters, and the great disposition which she had shown to commit the most wanton acts of treachery. I can say for myself that my conduct was only partially influenced by the acts of British officers within our waters ; I had in view a variety of other acts committed against the rights of the people of this country. Supposing the affair of the Chesapeake to have been authorized, I never wish to see the British ships of war within our waters, till they recede from the right of impressment. I wished the British Government to know that it was the determination of the major part of the citizens of the United States to resist her till she surrendered that right. I think it was a sacrifice of the dignity of the United States to receive British vessels so long as they committed those acts. It was therefore that I voted to exclude them.

It is said, by the gentleman last up, that we are at peace with Great Britain. Does it follow, from that, that they are entitled to all the rights of hospitality that one nation could possibly show to another ? Certainly not. We ought yet to hold up some indication that we are not perfectly reconciled to them. When they abandon the outrageous principles which govern that nation with respect to neutrals ; when they abandon the practice of impressment ; when they make restitution for spoliations of our trade ; we will hold the hand of fellowship to them. It is not enough for me to hear the British Minister say that an Envoy Extraordinary is to come out and settle all differences. I have heard something like this long ago. I heard that a Minister was to be sent out to make reparation for the affair of the Chesapeake. We have experience on this subject. Have we forgot that everything which accompanied that mission was evidence that the British Government was not sincere, and that it did not intend to accommodate? When I see an abandonment by Great Britain of the principles destructive to neutrality, I can consent to admit that nation to the rights of hospitality.

If we pass this bill as it now is, the British Government will see the inconsistency of it, and certainly it will not raise our reputation to a more exalted pitch than before. The true course, in my opinion, will be, to follow up our measures, and not to retrograde. Even had France conducted herself properly towards this country, the exclusion of her armed vessels was an act which every one will admit our right to do; but, as we have great ground of complaint against that nation, still stronger right have we to do it. To admit the armed ships of France within our waters, is, at best, but a nominal favor. It is impossible that the injury can be forgotten till reparation is made. When the injuries done to us are repaired, then, and not till then, would I open the waters of the United States in respect to France.

Why did we vote a prohibition of our waters to British ships? Because of injuries received. Have they been repaired? No, sir; to my mind they have said nothing conclusive or satisfactory as to abandoning any ground they had taken. What would be the feelings of any American, if a fleet of British vessels were to come up the Potomac, immediately after the passage of this act, with the commander who perpetrated the outrage on the Chesapeake at their head? They may do so by the bill, as it has come from the Senate, unlimited in number and force. The British would not ask the privilege, and yet we gratuitously offer it to them! Is the privilege worth anything to the British nation? Let us hold it up as a matter that requires certain privileges in return; for we are compelled to buy all the privileges we get from that nation. I wish, therefore, if this be an advantage, not to take it out of the hands of the Executive; for, we know that appeals to the magnanimity and justice of that nation will have no effect. If it be not an advantage, there can be no complaint for a refusal of it.

With respect to the ships of France, I cannot but notice the strange appearance we shall hold out to the world if this bill pass. The interdiction of commerce with a nation, and admission of her public armed ships! The public ships are the representatives of the sovereignty of a nation—of the Government against which we have cause of offence. But the merchants, who are the innocent subjects, we will not admit. We declare war against the subjects, whilst we take the Emperor and Government into our bosom! This, to me, is inexplicable. To save our honor, and preserve our consistency, we ought not to admit

French ships of war, so long as trade with France is interdicted. I think, therefore, both as respects the one or the other, we ought to maintain the same ground as heretofore. From France, we have heard nothing. Instead of relaxing measures in relation to her, therefore, we ought to strengthen them. These ideas, however incorrect they may be thought, will influence my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON observed, that, to say anything on this subject, after the time which had been already consumed, and the speeches which had been made, was contrary to a rule which he had laid down for his own conduct. But his excuse would be found in the introduction into the House of a proposition, which, it was said, proposed to place us on a neutral ground. Nothing, said Mr. J., is dearer to me, than neutrality as to our foreign relations; but, the bill submitted to the House by the committee of which I had the honor to constitute one, and which is the same with that now before us, so far from being in hostility to Great Britain, and partiality to France, I contend, is a concession to Great Britain, at the same time that I admit that it is not hostility to France. The admission of the belligerent vessels into our waters, so far from being hostility to Great Britain, is concession. I bottom the remark upon the fact, that, at this moment, as many and as heavy causes of complaint exist unsettled between this Government and Great Britain, as between this Government and that of France. If, then, the same causes exist to exclude from our waters the vessels of both, I ask whether the admission of both will not be an actual benefit and concession to Great Britain, and a nominal benefit to France? And, still, it is to go forth to the nation that we are about to commit an act which will sink the nation, from the elevated situation in which it is now placed by our former measures! I hope that we shall continue to convince the world that the United States of America are incapable of other than neutral conduct. Is it a fact, that greater injuries exist from France than from Great Britain? What injuries have been received from France? Have they been committed within our waters? Has our hospitality been violated and our officers insulted in our very ports by the vessels of France? or is her hostility merely commercial? It is of the latter description. Is it not admitted that we may lawfully exclude or admit the vessels of both belligerents? If you admit the vessels of one nation with whom you have cause of difference, and exclude those of another nation with whom you have only the same cause of difference, I ask whether you do not commit the dignity of the nation, and jeopardize its peace?

I will put this question to gentlemen: what has Britain done which would require a discrimination as to her public vessels? She has rescinded her Orders in Council. And what have we done in return? Have we done nothing? Has Great Britain held out the hand of friendship, and have we refused to meet her? Has she withdrawn her Orders in Council, and have we insisted on a continuance of our commercial restrictions? I have understood that she has done nothing but rescinded her Orders in Council, and we have renewed intercourse with her therefor. I am more astonished at the proposal to discriminate, when we see that, at this moment, orders are in existence blockading countries to which your merchants have, long ago, taken out clearances, in violation of stipulations which Britain had proposed to us. When she has violated our rights, I am more astonished that gentlemen should wish to go beyond this letter of the law. And, let the consequence be what it may, it would result to the benefit of this nation that we should not be influenced by idle fears of imaginary dangers. My better judgment tells me we should exclude the armed vessels of both nations; but the general sentiment appears to be against it. It is asked of us, why admit the vessels of France, whilst injuries which she has done us are unatoned for? And, I ask, sir, why, then, admit the vessels of England standing in the same relation to us? I only make these remarks as going to show that we ought to be strictly neutral. If, sir, you wish to take part in the broils of Europe embody your men, and send them over to the disposal of England at once, and let her send them to Spain or Austria. But, if you would remain neutral, either admit or exclude the armed vessels, as you would armies, of both belligerents.

Non-Intercourse.

H. OF R.

I had thought, sir, not only from the acts of our Government, but from conversing with gentlemen, that we hailed the present as an auspicious moment, as a political jubilee; I had thought that we had been on the verge of war with the two most powerful nations of the earth, but that our situation was changed, and that, at the same moment we now offer the only asylum to the victims of European wars. And are you now about again to jeopardize the peace of this nation, without any cause whatever?

The exclusion of French and British armed vessels at the last session, may be taken on this ground. It was a defensive war, not only for the injuries we had received, but in expectation of actual hostility. Has it occurred? No, sir. Would you have excluded British vessels since 1793, for taking the vessels engaged in your lawful trade, and for impressing your seamen? You did not do it; and it was not for that alone that you did it at the last session, but for other causes, which have nearly or quite disappeared.

I have done, sir. I shall not vote for any proposition which makes a difference between France and Great Britain; not that I am afraid of the conscripts of Napoleon or the navy of George III. But I cannot consent to adopt a course which will again obscure with clouds our political horizon.

Mr. SMILIE said, that if he now took up five minutes of the time of the House, he could not excuse it to himself; and he should not have risen, but to explain the reasons for the course which he should take. As to the amendment, to that he could never agree. The question which the Legislature often had to decide, was not what was best, but what is practicable. Now, he thought it a happy circumstance that parties in the other House had united on this subject. However we may differ as to local affairs, said he, I think it good policy, if it can be done without a sacrifice of principle, to meet in concert on measures of external relations. What may be the effect, if you introduce either of these two principles into this bill? We know that, if this bill does not go to the Senate till to-morrow, if amended, a single member of the Senate can, according to their rules, prevent the bill from passing altogether. My opinion is, that it is our duty to pass the bill in its present form. If any material alteration be made in the bill, I believe it will not pass. If it does not, all that has taken place between this country and Great Britain is at an end. And I hope that this reason will induce gentlemen to permit the question to be taken.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he had intended, before the day had so far progressed, to have explained to the House the motives by which he was actuated in relation to the bill. He said he would still take the liberty of stating to the few members present, (the House being very thin,) why he offered the amendment to the amendment. It will be recollected, said Mr. J., that, the other day, I stated that a construction had been given to the law contemplated to be re-enacted by the bill on the table, which, notwithstanding the renewal of intercourse, excluded armed vessels from our waters; and, for the purpose of doing away completely that construction, I moved an amendment which, gentlemen conceiving it unnecessary, I withdrew. If gentlemen are correct in the opinion which they advanced, and which induced me to withdraw that motion, they cannot, consistently, vote for the amendment of my colleague providing an exception to a provision which the bill does not contain. Where is the necessity of a proviso if the law does not bear such a construction? Is the Executive to infer from the proviso that something exists in the law which the friends of the proviso declare does not exist? The amendment proposed by my colleague provides for the admission of the armed vessels of those nations with whom commercial intercourse shall have been (not has been) permitted. Are you, by this phraseology, about to devolve upon the President a discretionary power, holding the scale of national honor in one hand and the injury and atonement in the other, to decide which nation shall be thus favored, when it is conceded on all hands that the admission of the armed vessels of one nation and the exclusion of those of the other, is an act ipso facto of hostility?

Gentlemen have observed that there ought to be an exclusion of French and admission of English armed ships, and that any other course would be an acquiescence in the views of "sister France," and hostility to England. This language, sir, does not help the cause which the gentleman advocates. What must be the effect of such insinuations? They must excite feelings, which, I am happy to say, have not been displayed on this floor during the session. Might it not be retorted, as a natural consequence, that gentlemen who wish to admit British and exclude French ships, and thus serve the interest of England, are desirous of subserving the views of mother Britain? The attachment to sister France on the one hand is about as great as the attachment to mother Britain on the other. I believe it has been emphatically declared to the nation that we would not go to war for existing differences. If, however, gentlemen, since the last session, have so materially altered their ideas of the policy proper in relation to one belligerent, let us go to war openly; I am not for using the stiletto, or for stabbing in the dark.

H. of R.

Non-Intercourse.

JUNE, 1809.

The interdiction of British armed vessels from entering our ports was not on account of the affair of the Chesapeake only. It is unnecessary now to repeat the cause which led to it. If gentlemen will turn to the letter of Mr. Madison to Mr. Rose, they will find the causes detailed. Since that time other injuries have been committed; and it has been justly observed that the burning the Impetueux was an insult to the sovereignty of this nation scarcely less than the affair of the Chesapeake. If we permit hostility from one belligerent to another within our territory, we become party to the war, as we do, by admitting the enemy even to pass through our territory to attack another nation. It is in vain to say that a nation preserves a neutral attitude, when it permits one of the belligerents repeatedly to violate its sovereignty. If there be as much injury unatoned on the part of Britain as on the part of France, then a discrimination will be a departure from the ground which we took last session, that both should be excluded. And the President had no power over that part of the law. Inasmuch as we know that Great Britain has the command of the ocean, and that a French ship of war cannot, without a miracle, escape across the Atlantic, we, in fact, by the operation of the bill as it came from the Senate, admit English and exclude French ships.

We throw open our ports and admit the thousand ships of Britain, without opening our eyes to the consequences which have heretofore resulted from so doing. And shall we now refuse admission to the vessels of France? It is indeed difficult to say what led to their exclusion; for it has been with truth observed that the non-intercourse bill had not an advocate in the House. It was something like throwing all our discordant opinions into one crucible, and after fusion, extracting what was expected to be gold, but which all called dross. When gentlemen speak of their zeal to maintain the ground taken last winter, I beg of them to recollect their own speeches, from which it will be found that the bill was so obnoxious to them that they would not even extend its operation to the next Winter and that it was with difficulty that it was extended to the end of the present session.

I hope, sir, that present appearances across the water are not the sure tokens of the course which the British Government intends to pursue towards us. When, however, they assume so awful an aspect, we had better remain a little longer in our present situation. It was unequivocally known to the British Government that the overture which she made would be accepted, because last summer we offered more advantageous terms to her, which she refused to accept. They know the state of things in this country, however, or the letter of Mr. Canning would not have found its way into the prints of Boston before it found its way to us here. Here is a tariff of duties to take effect on the twelfth of May, by which cotton is taxed $7 50 per hundred weight, pitch $5 50 per twelve barrels, and many other articles enormously taxed. These duties were laid at a time when they must have known, if my position be correct, and I defy gentlemen to show how it is not, that their overture was accepted. They were laid at a time when our products were known to be going to that country, having no other market, because they had re-blockaded the Continent after nominally rescinding their orders, and thus prevented our vessels from going to the Continent. It was a kidnapping duty, and must produce the ruin and bankruptcy of many thousands of those who embarked their property on the ocean within two weeks after the suspension of the embargo. Great Britain has cut off our market from every quarter of the globe but herself, and imposed those duties on our exports to her ports. This is sufficient to induce the American Congress to hesitate. The bill under consideration presents a perfect equality in regard to vessels of war, and discrimination as to everything else; and in so doing goes far enough.

Gentlemen ask, has there not been a satisfactory adjustment of our differences with Great Britain? I deny it. What is the expression of the British Envoy on which gentlemen rely, and on which they are about to sit down quietly under the vine and fig tree? "In the mean time, with a view to contribute to the attainment of so desirable an object, His Majesty would be willing to withdraw his orders," &c. In the mean time, still persisting in the principle of taxing our exports, a right denied even to us by the Constitution. It is to be hung up in terrores, to be let loose upon us hereafter, if we shall not do everything which is required of us. There is a marked cautious style of language in this letter, which shows that Great Britain in fact has promised nothing. She does not say that she will repeal or revoke her orders, but that in the mean time she will withdraw them; and, ah, in the mean time she has withdrawn them, and substituted other orders or proclamations equally obnoxious. This is reason sufficient for not going beyond the letter of the agreement; which however I will consent to do, by admitting instead of excluding British armed vessels.

When Mr. J. G. JACKSON concluded, Mr. SHERFEX, in order to obtain a direct question on his own amendment, adopted Mr. JACKSON's rider to it, as a part of his own motion, and called for a division of the question, taking it first on his own amendment as first moved.

Some doubt arising whether it was correct thus to act, according to the rules of the House, Mr. MACON produced a precedent in which he had himself done the same in the case of a motion for the repeal of the second section of the sedition act, nine or ten years ago.

The question was then taken on Mr. SHEFFEY'S amendment—yeas 35, nays 77, as follows:

This motion having been negatived, Mr. JACKSON'S amendment to it fell of course.

Mr. GOLD observed that he did not consider the last question as decisively trying the point which had been debated; and for that reason moved to insert, after the clause continuing in force certain sections of the non-intercourse act, these words: "and also so much of the first and second section of the same act as provides for the exclusion of public ships or vessels of France from the waters of the United States."

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved to amend the amendment by inserting between the words "vessels of" and "France," the words "Great Britain and."

Mr. GOLD requested of Mr. JACKSON to withdraw his motion for amendment, that the question might be taken in a direct mode.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON withdrew his motion for amendment, observing that he had but moved it to show how the game played by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) might operate, if any person was disposed to embarrass the proceedings of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR observed that Mr. GOLD'S proposition presented the same question as that which had just been decided, and suggested to him the propriety of withdrawing it, to save time.

Mr. GOLD, observing that he did not wish to embarrass or unnecessarily to consume the time of the House, withdrew his motion.

Mr. TAYLOR said that, as the House had decided that they would not discriminate between the admission of British and French public vessels, he wished to try the question on the exclusion of both. He made a motion having in view that object; which was decided as follows, without debate:

Fifteen for it, one hundred against it—being a majority of eighty-five against the exclusion, at this time, of the public vessels of both belligerents.

Mr. MONTGOMERY observed that the decision of the courts of the United States had been that, after a law had expired, they had dismissed all suits pending for the recovery of penalties incurred under the act. He conceived that this bill should have a saving clause, that penalties and forfeitures incurred under it, should be recoverable and distributable after the act itself had expired. He therefore moved an amendment to that effect.

Non-Intercourse.

JUNE, 1809.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON concurred in opinion with Mr. MONTGOMERY.

The amendment was agreed to, without opposition.

Mr. LIVERMORE said that he had an amendment to propose to the bill, which, he conceived, would essentially benefit the people of the United States, and could injure no one, not altering any principle of the present bill. It would be found, by referring to the bill, that they were about to enact that it should not be lawful to import into the United States or Territories thereof, any goods, wares, or merchandise, from any port or place situate in France or its dependencies, or any goods of the growth or manufacture of its colonies or dependencies. The island of St. Domingo, said Mr. L., was considered as a colony or dependency of France. Now, could any gentleman point out what benefit could arise to the United States from not importing any of the products of that island into this country? It certainly could not benefit France, who had no commercial connexion with the island, and would benefit the United States by returning coffee, sugar, &c., for our surplus produce. He expatiated upon the benefits of such a trade, and concluded by moving the following amendment to the bill:

"And, for the purposes of this act, no country or place shall be considered a colony or dependency of Great Britain or France, which is not in the immediate possession of Great Britain or France."

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped that this question would be decided in such manner as would enable the people of the United States to distinguish the part which their respective Representatives bore in its decision. It was not his purpose to trouble the House at length upon it, but merely to ask, if it could be possible that the House of Representatives of the United States, a people, one-sixth of whose gross population were in a state of domestic slavery, could incidentally undertake to acknowledge the independence of the island of St. Domingo on the mother country? Mr. R. said he was not about to consider this question at all in relation to its foreign aspect or bearing, but merely as to its effect at home. With the motives which might have operated on the Government of the United States to prohibit intercourse with St. Domingo, he had nothing to do; neither had he any right to suppose but that they were the most laudable. As a Southern man, as a slaveholder, Mr. R. said, he did congratulate his country and himself, at the time the law passed, that all intercourse between that nest of banditti and the country to which he belonged, was cut off. He said he knew that much might be said on the subject of this amendment, as it regarded foreign policy, as it regarded accommodation with France. Even in that aspect of things, gentlemen who had expressed their willingness not to interdict French armed vessels from our ports would hardly be induced to place in the way of accommodation such a bar as this might be. With its foreign bearings, however, Mr. R. said, he had nothing to do. He viewed it solely as it related to domestic policy. He said there was an immense section of this Union, all the country south of Pennsylvania and south of the Ohio, the best and dearest interests of which, the very existence of which might be implicated to a certain extent in that amendment. And, could it be supposed that the Representatives of the people of that country would listen to such a proposition? He hoped not. He hoped the motion would meet a decisive and unanimous rejection. But a few days ago, they had heard of an insurrection of the slaves in Jamaica. What must be the effect of a direct trade betwixt the town of Charleston and the ports of the island of St. Domingo? To say the truth, he had been astonished that, long before the traffic to that island was stopped by our Government, a sense of self-preservation had not united the interests—for it was a mixed interest not to be mistaken; it existed in nature, it existed in things, and could not be gotten over—he had been astonished, he said, that a sense of their own rights, interest, and safety, had not united every man in the Southern country in bringing forward such a proposition. He would not consent, for one, to put one dollar, one cent, into the Treasury by legalizing a trade there. He would oppose it every way. What had lately occurred in the island of Cuba? Contrary to law, our vessels had been compelled to take on board persons expelled from that island, masters and slaves, males and females. What was now the state of things in St. Domingo? Why, that a civil war raged between the chieftains of those barbarians. The first American flotilla which put into Port Francois, or any other port in the island, might be compelled to take on board the brigands, whom the dominant party might put on board, to enable themselves to enjoy, as they might suppose, the peaceful possession of the island. The importation of such persons not only might, but inevitably must, work in the Southern country a dreadful evil. He hoped he had said enough, and more than enough, to insure the rejection of the motion.

Mr. SMILIE said that the aspect in which the gentleman from Virginia had viewed the motion, was certainly correct. Independent of that view the gentleman from Massachusetts should have taken a previous step before he brought forward his motion; and that was, to declare the island of St. Domingo independent. If we were ready for that, the motion might be adopted. If the gentleman was ripe for war with France, this motion would answer his purpose; for, certainly, if we were to take such a step, we should pave the way for war. France, or any other nation, would not submit to an imposition of this kind.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he had made this motion, because he believed that a free construction of the act would operate beneficially. Really, if he had thought it would operate in the way in which the gentleman from Virginia supposed, he should be the last man to bring forward a motion to interrupt the harmony of the Southern States. He had not supposed that the adoption of the motion would have the slightest effect of that kind. He did not conceive either that there was any ground for such a supposition, which went upon the idea that, because we traffic with them, the people of that country must be exported into this; for the exportation of their produce certainly did not include their principles. The same law that now exists would then exist to prevent the importation of slaves. Did it follow, because an act has been passed by this Government to cut off the trade with St. Domingo, that there was no communication between the two countries? The reverse was known to be the fact. He said that there is a trade, to a great amount, carried on between the United States and St. Domingo, perhaps as much from North Carolina as any other State, and which was not now carried on in a regular way, but in foreign bottoms. The "banditti" who are to bring with them those principles which would serve to destroy the Southern States, might be imported in that way. I conceive that there is no weight in the objection, or I would give up the motion. It was but to legalize a trade which will be carried on in an illegal way, which now is and will be carried on by foreigners, between this country and that, that I offered it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seemed to suppose that we must pass a non-intercourse act with St. Domingo or go to war with France. If we consider ourselves under any obligations to France, we should then certainly observe strict non-intercourse with that island. But, under present circumstances, I conceive that argument to have no weight.

Mr. MACON said he did not rise to debate the question at length; he would not add anything to the force of what had been said by the gentleman from Virginia, and might detract from it. That there were people in North Carolina, as everywhere, who would sell principle for a little sugar or coffee, might be true; but, for one of the Representatives of that State, he disclaimed them. Sir, said Mr. M., you are staking the safety of this nation—for what? For the profits of a little trade in coffee and sugar with barbarians, with people who, at this time, have no settled form of government. If there be such people as carry on the illegal trade, in the State in which I live, they do not live in the part which I represent, but on the seaboard. As it relates to that State, nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine would be opposed to the trade, for one that is in favor of it. When we talk about its influence on our relations with France, or in producing a war with her, the question dwindles into nothing. It is nothing to a civil war, and that of the worst kind. Compare the war carried on in St. Domingo with all the horrors of that carried on in Europe, and the latter sinks to nothing in the comparison. I had rather be at war with both belligerents than have this trade.

Mr. DANA said, he thought it was desirable that the Legislature should pronounce the political import of the term "dependency," rather than that it should be left to judicial decision; but he was not certain that the amendment proposed to define it in the best manner. He believed the general idea of the mover to be correct, that there should be a definition; for he understood that a question had now arisen, which might be referred to the courts, and he thought it peculiarly unfortunate that the judicial authorities should be called upon to decide. For himself, he said, he was not at all satisfied that the construction of the Secretary of the Treasury was a correct one; he was by no means certain that Holland was not a political dependency of France. For himself, he was not by any means solicitous to enter into the question of the superiority of black or white men. I am not, said he, such a democrat as to say that all men, whatever be their colors, should be liberated and placed on an equality. I consider myself, on all questions of this sort, as a republican under the Federal Constitution—that is, a friend to elective liberty. But, whatever be my theory, I am controlled by the Constitution of the United States, which does not permit me to indulge in theories on this subject. Whatever shall tend to disturb the state of things in the Southern country, a state of things which, by implication, I consider as guaranteed by the Constitution, I shall consider as not conforming to that Constitution, which, as a federalist, I am bound to respect. As the introduction of this amendment into the bill might affect the question of the independence of Hayti, or interfere with the relations between St. Domingo or France, I should be unwilling to adopt it; and yet I think it proper that some definition shall take place, of the word "dependency." Under the view which I have taken of the amendment, however, I cannot vote for it.

The question was then taken on Mr. LIVERMORE'S amendment by yeas and nays, and negatived—yeas 1, nays 97, as follows:

Absent on this vote, forty-three members, viz :

Messrs. Breckenridge, J. C. Chamberlain, Champion, Chittenden, Clopton, Crist, Davenport, Denning, Ely, Gardnier, Gray, Hale, Hubbard, Richard Jackson, Jenkens, Kenan, Key, Love, Lyon, Matthews, McBride, McKee, Miller, Mosely, Nelson, Newbold, Nicholson, Pearson, Pitkin, Potter, Ross, Say, Seaver, Smelt, Stedman, Stephenson, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wheaton, and Whitman.

Of whom those in italic are absent from the city, on leave, except Mr. DENNING, who has not taken his seat.

Mr. GOLD suggested an amendment to the bill in the part providing for the recovery and distribution of such fines as "have been" incurred under the sections of the non-intercourse act revived and amended. He moved to amend it by making it read "may be," instead of "have been." At present, he conceived the bill to contain, in this respect, an ex post facto provision, inasmuch as it directed the recovery of fines and penalties, the suits on which must abate on the expiration of the law under which they were commenced.

Mr. SHEFFEY objected to the amendment. He said that laws, when made, ought to be observed, and that the usual mode of coercing obedience to our revenue laws was by fines and penalties on the violators; and, although the law under which a penalty is incurred, expires before the recovery of the penalty, yet still the offender is liable to the punishment of his offence; that the suits for penalties should not expire with a law inflicting them.

Mr. GOLD contended that it was impossible to recover penalties incurred under one law by another law, or to recover them after the law under which they were incurred had expired, unless their subsequent recovery was provided for under the law which inflicted them. The penalty must stand or fall with the act under which it was incurred. This was an ex post facto provision; for it was a principle, that a judgment could not be obtained for a penalty after the act expired under which it had accrued.

Mr. GOLD's amendment was negatived, six or seven gentlemen only rising in the affirmative on it.

Mr. MILNOR suggested an amendment to that part of the law remitting from forfeiture all vessels which have come into the United States between the 20th of May and the 10th of June. He wished to add after the word "vessels" the words "and their cargoes."

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he had no objection to the amendment, though he believed the whole section might be dispensed with, inasmuch as he understood that the Secretary of the Treasury, under the power given him by former laws, had already remitted all the penalties.

Mr. W. ALSTON objected to the amendment, inasmuch as it would take away the discretion now reposed in the Secretary of the Treasury; and although there might be in the cargo goods forfeited for violation of the ordinary revenue laws, yet the injunction would be peremptory on him to remit the whole cargo.

Mr. MILNOR's motion was negatived.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading to-morrow, without a division.

TUESDAY, June 27.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to the 'Act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio,'" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A bill from the Senate, for freeing from postage all letters from Thomas Jefferson, was twice read. [The act of last session only freed from postage letters to Thomas Jefferson.]

Mr. MAOON opposed the bill, on the ground that the privilege of receiving letters free was sufficient, having himself an objection to the whole privilege, on principle; and Messrs. DANA, J. G. JACKSON, LIVERMORE, TAYLOR, and MONTGOMERY, supported the bill, because that it was proper to give to Thomas Jefferson the same privilege which had been heretofore granted to George Washington and John Adams. The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

EXPENDITURE OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expenditures of public money, &c., made the following report :

"Report, in part, of the committee appointed to inquire and report whether moneys drawn from the Treasury since the 4th of March, 1861, had been faithfully applied to the object for which they were appropriated, and whether the same have been regularly accounted for :

"Your committee beg leave to lay before your honorable House such information as they have obtained from the several departments touching the application of public moneys, which, from the pressure of time and business, they have not found leisure thoroughly to investigate, but which they deemed would prove acceptable to the House of Representatives. It will be perceived that the respective communications from the War and Navy Departments are of an unsatisfactory nature, differing in character from those required by the committee. A representation to this effect has been made to the heads of these departments respectively, and they have been notified that the information sought by the committee is essential to the prosecution of the inquiry with which the committee have been charged by the House of Representatives. Expectation is held out that it will be prepared by, or during the course of the next session.

The documents accompanying the report having been partly read, a motion was made that they lie on the table, and carried—46 to 40; and the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The bill to revive and amend certain parts of the act "interdicting commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," was read the third time.

Mr. PICKMAN hoped that he should be excused for making a few observations at this stage of the bill, not having before partaken of the debate. He said he felt a strong objection to the bill, because it admitted French vessels into our ports and harbors. Gentlemen had asked why a discrimination should be made. He answered, that the reasons for this conduct were to his mind very plain. He had considered the outrage on the Chesapeake as a gross violation of our rights and of the law of nations, and he believed no one had felt more indignation at it than he did. But that was now atoned for. I consider (said Mr. P.) that the Orders in Council are repealed; that Great Britain has stipulated to send an envoy with instructions to negotiate for a settlement of all differences. I consider these things as done, because I consider the faith of the British nation as solemnly pledged to do them; for, if it had not been, the United States would not have been justified in taking the attitude which we have taken.

It has been said, that since the arrangement here has taken place, Great Britain has modified her Orders in Council in a most exceptionable manner. I admit that this modification was posterior in point of date to the arrangement here; that is to say, that the proclamation of the President of the United States was issued on the 19th, and that the orders were modified on the 29th of April; yet, in strict propriety, the new orders may be said to have issued before the arrangement, because it was before it was known. Viewing the subject in this light, I do not believe that the modification of the Orders in Council did proceed from the arrangement here; and I now declare that if such modification as has been made is to be considered as rescinding the orders, according to the stipulation made with Mr. Erskine, I should consider it a mere mockery. I do, however, consider it in a very different light, and have no doubt that the Government of Great Britain will adopt such modification of their orders as they have stipulated to do. These are my ideas, and on this ground I did and do still believe that we ought to have made a discrimination, because I consider one nation to have complied with the conditions of the non-intercourse act, whilst the other has not varied its position.

It will be recollected by the House that when the question was yesterday propounded, whether we should exclude the vessels of both belligerents, I voted in favor of it; and I confess that I prefer the exclusion to the admission of both. I know that the admission is more favorable than the exclusion; but, when I consider that the honor of the nation has been endangered by them, I will not prostitute it to either. I do consider it contrary to the honor of my country to admit the armed vessels of either belligerent, when sailing under orders or decrees justifying them in capturing every American vessel sailing on the ocean. And the observation appears to me to be of great weight, that there is a great inconsistency and impropriety in refusing admission to their merchants, and admitting the entrance of armed vessels. Considering the peculiar state of our relations with France, I think it proper that we should know how France will receive the intelligence of our accommodation with England before we change our situation in relation to her.

I have other objections to the bill, the principal of which is the introduction of the word "dependency," or retaining it in the bill which it is intended to re-enact. Gentlemen are not sensible of the very great embarrassments which the most intelligent merchants have had to undergo to avoid the violation of our laws. A vessel sails to a port which at the time of her sailing is not a dependency of France. When she arrives, the French Emperor has possession; and the port then being a dependency, the vessel incurs the penalty of the law. It is true that, under such circumstances, the Secretary of the Treasury will remit the penalty. But why subject a vessel to this violation of your laws, when it is inconsistent with good policy? It is utterly impossible to carry into effect a regulation prohibiting trade with France. It is known that our vessels going to Barbadoes have brought and will bring back French goods. They do not know whether the articles they carry are of French growth or not, yet, at the same time, there can be no doubt that a considerable portion of those articles are of French production; and, if so, the property is liable to condemnation. I am not in favor of passing a law which presents such strong temptations to a violation of it. I have a high opinion of our merchants. It is owing to their honor and punctuality that your revenue has been so great as it is; but if once you encourage the practice of smuggling, or introduce such strong temptations to it, your revenue will cease to come into the Treasury with such certainty as it has.

I shall not trouble the House with any further observations, though I have other insuperable objections to the bill. I should be happy to agree with the majority in favor of the bill; but, viewing it as I do, viewing the admission of French ships into our waters as inconsistent with the course laid down for our conduct by the non-intercourse law, viewing it as inconsistent with the honor and dignity of the nation to admit any armed vessels into our waters whilst the country to which they belong has orders and decrees in force against us, I must vote against the bill.

Mr. MAOON said he was against admitting the armed vessels of either belligerent into our waters. He would place our foreign relations precisely in the state in which the President had left them, saying neither yea or nay on the subject of their armed vessels, leaving it where it had been left by both the parties to the late arrangement. He should have been glad that the same disposition had been manifested towards us by France as by Great Britain; but because there had not he would do nothing towards her to prevent it.

H. OF R.

Non-Intercourse.

JUNE, 1806.

Some gentlemen had conceived that an indiscriminate admission would be more advantageous to France than to Great Britain. Mr. M. said he did not agree with gentlemen in this; for Great Britain had Canada and her West India islands, to which she was in the habit of sending out vessels; whilst France, having no possessions on the American coast, had no occasion for our hospitality.

Mr. M. said he sincerely hoped that we should now act, as we had heretofore done, so as to give to neither of the belligerents cause to charge us with partiality. He was decidedly of opinion that we ought to leave both nations in the same state as they were left by the President's proclamation. He had no doubt that Great Britain would send a Minister to negotiate. But what was left, as to her, for the surrender or repeal of which she had any anxiety? Nothing. As to France, she would have no shipping at sea, so long as the war lasted in Europe, unless an event took place which he hoped would not. You give France a right to enter your waters, said he, and take away any inducement she might have had to rescind her decrees. I believe the passage of the bill will extend the difficulties of the nation. I know it is not a very pleasant thing to be opposed to the evident sentiment of a majority of the House; but it is the bounden duty of those who think as I do to vote, as I shall, against the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR said it appeared to be desired on all hands that nothing should be done by the House to embarrass the negotiation; and he presumed that the majority, in the different stages of this bill, had been actuated by that wish. He, said Mr. T., I could see the present measure in the light in which its friends appear to view it, I certainly should be in favor of it. But, when it is recollected that your legislative acts have been held out to your fellow-citizens and to foreign nations, promising a perseverance in our restrictive measures against such nation as shall continue to oppress our commerce by her unlawful edicts, I consider our faith as pledged to the nation, that, according to the recession of one belligerent, or perseverance of the other, we were to shape our course.

The gentleman from Virginia aimed a side blow at those who, in the discussion of this subject, had spoken of the ground which we have taken. On the effects supposed to be produced by the non-intercourse, I had a right to say we. The sense of the House was taken distinctly as to a repeal of the embargo, on the first report of the Committee of Foreign Relations. It was then that the principle was decided, and it was that act which was taken hold of across the Atlantic, and made the ground of the instructions which came out by Mr. Oakley to the British Envoy here, and on which the arrangement did take place. Now, though the gentleman seems unwilling that any part of the House should say we, I vindicate the claim which I have to use it. In fact, I would claim for the mover of the original proposition to this House for the interdiction of armed vessels, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Macon), the merit of the late negotiation, if it attach any where. But I am not willing to carry on the co-partnership. I will not now say we. I, who voted for the motion going to give power to the President of the United States to issue letters of marque and reprisal against that nation which persevered in its edicts after the other had withdrawn them, am not willing, on the passage of this bill, to say we, as by it you admit instead of continuing the exclusion against, armed vessels, where, instead of a recession, injuries have rather been added. When gentlemen are asked why they have admitted French vessels, in our present situation in relation to France, after the temper displayed and the votes given at the last session on the subject, their's must be a feeling in which I would not participate, and therefore I will not say "we."

Mr. DANA observed that, by the Journals of the Senate, it appeared that this bill had been unanimously passed by that body. This unanimous vote of the Senate might be regarded as a consideration to operate very strongly on the minds of members of the House, as respected the propriety of adopting the present bill; it certainly must have weight in favor of a measure, when it was found that men differing widely in political opinions joined in voting for it. I, said Mr. D., have myself very strongly felt the force of this consideration. But you know, sir, that the rules of proceeding and order established in this House do not admit of our urging in debate the conduct of the Senate of the United States as a motive for deciding the opinion of this House. Why is it out of order? Because the excellence of our Constitution is, that the Legislature shall consist of two Houses, each of which shall act on its own ideas of propriety. If it is not proper to mention the conduct of the Senate in debate, it is not proper to suffer it to overthrow our opinions. In this view I feel myself bound, with all due deference to the Senate, to examine this subject for myself. I cannot but feel the weight of that vote; but I cannot forget that the bill respecting the writ of habeas corpus was once passed in that House, and rejected unanimously in this, without being permitted to be read a second time.

On examining this bill, sir, I do not find that its various provisions appear to constitute one whole, to conform with any system of policy, or to be consistent with the principles of any man in this country. It is certainly not the course which I would have chosen; it is not consistent with the course marked out at the last session of Congress. I was certainly not in favor of the embargo; I disapproved of that system; and when I saw the non-intercourse system, I considered that as retaining the embargo principle, but not with so much precision. I consider this bill to be receding from a weak position. If the embargo was a decisive measure, it ought to have been taken more completely at the outset than it was. But it failed. The non-intercourse was abandoning one part and retaining another of the system. This bill was abandoning a part of the non-intercourse system and retaining a part. When I look at it, I see nothing in it at which any portion of American citizens can rejoice or be proud of; nothing of a firm, dignified, matured, sound, consistent policy, to be maintained on general principles against all the world. Am I then required to vote for a measure of this kind? If, with my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) I could suppose that voting for a system which I did not like would destroy it, I should vote for it. For, if I understand him, he dislikes the whole, and therefore will vote for this part of it. The whole would die at the end of this session; but to show his anxiety for its death he must keep it alive till the next session of Congress. I was very much pleased with a great part of his remarks; I approved his premises, but his conclusions appeared to be directly the reverse of the proper result. But as he is a gentleman of strong powers of mind, he may well be able to draw a conclusion which I cannot.

Gentlemen have alluded to the declarations of the Emperor of France in relation to his decrees. When Bonaparte talks of the freedom of the seas, does he mean the same idea which we attach to these words when we use them? When he talks of the principles of maritime law, does he mean the same as we? On the subject of maritime law, has he not stated things which before were unheard of? Certainly, sir. On the contrary, I have always understood the claims of the United States as a neutral nation to be, not to assert new pretensions, but to assert such claims as they may think reasonable with respect to principle, and such as have been formerly admitted in practice.

With respect to the bill before you, there has been one argument used, and an imposing one certainly, provided that it appeared completely founded in fact. It is said this bill is considered as comporting with the views of the Executive Government of the country; and that the Executive has acted so well in conducting the preliminary arrangement for removing certain obstacles to negotiation, that on the whole we ought to assist his Administration. On this subject, sir, I have to observe that we are utterly without official evidence on this point. We have no evidence whatever, of an official nature, that this bill comports with the Executive views. If we have, it is to me unknown. We have not, during the present session, had any report in detail from the Committee of Foreign Relations. If that committee had made a report, stating facts and reasoning as the basis of the bill, I might consider that committee as having consulted the Executive of the country, and as having adopted its disposition as the basis of its proceedings. But, as we have no such thing, are we to suppose that there are certain gentlemen in the House who are organs of communication of the Executive wishes? Have we any other evidence of the disposition of the Executive in relation to this bill than that certain gentlemen are in favor of it? If, on this subject, the opinion of the Executive should properly decide our judgment, ought we not to have had some official exposition of the views of the Government? As we have no such information, we are to examine whether this bill comports with the arrangement made with Great Britain. But, as to that, I beg leave to be deemed as not considering myself pledged by that arrangement merely. As to myself, as an American, I am by no means gratified that we should contend with one nation because another does us justice. A stipulation of that kind I should consider as degrading to my country.

In my remarks therefore, I disclaim owing anything for any boon which Great Britain may have given us, because I do not consider it as a boon that they have ceased to injure us. But in the face of the world such declarations have been formally made by the Congress of the United States. The fact is known to ourselves, to our countrymen, to such portions of the foreign world as may take an interest in our concerns. And in comparing this bill with those declarations, will it be possible to conceive that we are consistent? When you had differences with both the belligerents, what was your language? You talked as though you would throw the gauntlet to the globe, as though you would stretch out your arm and smite the world. When an adjustment is made with one of those Powers, what is your language? Really, sir, the difficulty under which the Government formerly labored was said to be this: that if we went to war with both nations.—[Mr. D. quoted a part of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations of last session on this subject.] I consider this part of the report, said he, as proceeding upon assumptions which are erroneous, and founded upon grounds untenable and inaccurate. But as to this report, which appeared to receive the approbation of a majority of the members of the House, it seems to be clear from it, that were it not that you were so equally wronged by both belligerents, and that both persisted, you certainly would have engaged in war with one; but that, as a treble war was rather a difficult plan, it was best to continue the restrictive system.

What is the declaration made to the British Minister at this place, by our Secretary of State, on this subject? Is it pretended to enter into any stipulations with Great Britain as to our conduct? No, sir, it is that our measures are adopted on the principle that the Government would assert the rights of our country against any Power on the globe, without any reference to pledges. On this point I would call the attention of the House to a sentence which is the most extraordinary surely that ever was put together. And, unless it be a dash of the pen, like that of the brush of the painter who painted at one dash a perfect horse, it must have been the elaborate labor of twenty-four hours; in either case not detracting from the skill of the author of it. The sentence is as follows: "As it appears at the same time, that, in making this offer, His Britannic Majesty derives a motive from the equality, now existing, in the relations of the United States, with the two belligerent Powers, the President owes it to the occasion, and to himself, to let it be understood, that this equality is a result, incident to a state 'of things, growing out of distinct considerations.' If any mortal, from the depth of his knowledge, can specifically tell what this means, he may pass for an oracle. It proceeds upon this idea: that in making our arrangements at the last session we did not mean, as respects saying that whatever nation insulted us we would resent it, to please Great Britain alone, but equally to please any other nation whatever. If the saying this was an annunciation by our Government to the British Government, that in making this arrangement we are not making any stipulation in respect to France, but you and the world may know that whoever invades our rights shall meet with resistance, adequate to the crisis, if the Government can find means to accomplish it. If the paragraph be thus considered, we may respect the declaration itself, and admire the skill with which it is so worded as to convey nothing offensive in the expression. In this view, I am willing to admit it, because it conduces to the reputation of the Government and of the Secretary of State, who in this business appears to have conducted with the frankness of a man of talents, and the manner of a practical man of sense. I consider this bill as not corresponding with the resolutions of last session, as not corresponding with the general sentiment in regard to the non-intercourse law when it passed; nor with the general sentiment fairly to be collected from the correspondence of our officers with the British Minister.

If then this bill be not consistent with the declarations of gentlemen and of the Government itself, I must ask of myself whether it be consistent with my own opinion? And there, I cannot hesitate. For myself, I do not approve this system of commercial restriction. The non-importation act was the commencement of a system, feeble as it affected other nations, powerful to distress ourselves. In this system there is a radical error, by adopting a policy which acknowledged our allegiance prior to the Declaration of Independence, when we were merely infants, and when refraining from intercourse was an expression of the dissatisfaction of a child; when remonstrances at the foot of the throne were presented, very properly accompanied with professions of allegiance and humble supplications of mercy. And therefore I say, that to adopt these regulations is to adopt measures of infantine weakness, and implies premature old age; that if this be our system of resistance to foreign insult or injury, second childhood has come upon us at once. And, sir, when I hear gentlemen quote the measures of Congress prior to the Declaration of Independence in 1776, I am convinced that, would they but read through the page of history of that day, they would have scouted such authority for these measures; for they were universally attended with supplications before the throne of Majesty. And if we mean that the Ministers of the United States shall only throw themselves at the foot of the thrones of the French Emperor and British King, it may be proper to adopt these measures. Otherwise, they are unworthy of a great and independent nation.

If it be asked, what other system would be proper, I acknowledge it to be a question of difficulty. But, for myself, I think I would say that I would prefer an armed neutrality; not such a one as distinguished the confederacy in the Baltic, not one to assert new pretensions; but one temperate in its claims, specific in its object. And I could really wish that in the present state of the world we should turn our attention to a system of policy which shall be founded on general principles, and at least say what are the rights which as neutrals we claim, and what the pretensions to which as neutrals we will submit; and if our legislation were of that character, we never should be embarrassed as we are. We pass a law that if edicts of the belligerents be revoked or modified, trade shall be renewed. Now the edicts then in existence might be revoked, and others substituted, and the law would be complied with. The whole system has been constituted too much in reference to particular cases.

Independently of these general views, I have another objection to the bill: that the persons who are in favor of this bill cannot, I presume, tell its meaning. Let me not be understood as meaning that they cannot tell what they believe it means; but the question is, whether a majority of them can agree as to its particular meaning. The bill proposes to continue in force the third section of the non-intercourse act. What will be the effect of it? It will go to exclude from the waters of the United States vessels owned in whole or in part by the citizens of either belligerent nation. I was highly delighted the other day on this subject to hear a distinction taken (by Mr. RHEA) between vessels sailing under the flag of the United States, and vessels carrying it. I was pleased with it, because it had all the charm of novelty about it. A merchant vessel was said to sail under, and a public vessel to carry the flag of the United States; and this was stated as a distinction generally known. Whatever maritime writer has laid it down, cannot be much known—indeed I should think it rather difficult for a vessel to sail under a flag which it did not carry. A vessel which carries a flag must sail under it at some time or other. I should doubt whether the gentleman's position be correct; because flag is a figurative term. For, in speaking of maritime law and the usages of nations, no gentleman will say when we mention a flag that we mean the piece of bunting carried at the masthead. It is the public manifestation of the national character of the vessel that we mean; and this word is a mere figure of speech for all such manifestations. I must therefore consider that public ships sail under the flag of a nation; and that really if it was proposed to the commander of a vessel to press one of his seamen, he would point to the flag over their heads and, say that was their protection. The waters of the United States are interdicted to any vessel sailing under the flag of Great Britain and France, or owned in whole or in part by any subject or citizen of either. The words are so broad as to comprehend all vessels, whether public or private.

But I have one further objection to this bill, viz: that by it you do permit trade with French trading vessels, thus. There is no prohibition to the furnishing supplies to French vessels. The French vessels, going to sea, go armed and under the authority of their Government; and coming into the ports of this country may be supplied with anything they wish without an infraction of the letter of the law. Let any public armed vessel come into the waters of the United States, and they may purchase whatever they please. There is no law to prohibit it, nor any authority placed in the Government of the United States to prevent them from purchasing. The state of the case now is, that your vessels shall not be cleared out to carry anything to France, but your boats and everything that sails may be employed to carry provisions to French armed ships in your harbors, and they may be completely loaded. If this be the intention of gentlemen, I have nothing further to say; if it be not their intention, they will have in this case, as they have had in others, a very great experience of the disadvantages of undertaking to chop up law.

From these general views of the subject, sir, I am opposed to the passage of the law.

Messrs. PITKIN and QUINCY stated their reasons for voting against the bill.

And on the question, "Shall the bill pass?" it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 15, as follows:

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then took up for consideration the report of the committee on the contested election of WILLIAM BAYLIES—60 to 35.

After debate, a motion was made to postpone it indefinitely. The debate on this subject was continued to a very late hour, many motions of adjournment having been made without success. About 9 o'clock the question was taken on indefinite postponement of the report, and negatived—yeas 45, nays 65, as follows:

A motion was then made by Mr. LIVERMORE that the House do now adjourn, and the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 39, nays 63.

The question was then stated from the Chair, that the House do agree to the first resolution contained in the report, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the election held in Plymouth district, in November last, was legal and proper."

A motion was made by Mr. LIVERMORE to amend the resolution, by adding after the words "legal and proper," the words "but not conclusive."

The SPEAKER decided that the motion was not in order, it being a substitute for the resolution under consideration, and that agreeably to the standing rules and orders of the House, no new proposition shall be admitted, under color of amendment, as a substitute for the motion or proposition under debate.

From which decision of the Chair, an appeal was made to the House; and on the question, "Is the decision of the Chair correct?" it was resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was made by Mr. BIBB, that the first resolution do lie on the table; and the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken that the House do agree to the first resolution, as originally proposed by the Committee of Elections; and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 58, nays 13, the SPEAKER declaring himself with the yeas.

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jr., Wm. Anderson, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Adam Boyd, John Brown, Robert Brown, William A. The question was stated from the Chair, that the House do agree to the second resolution contained in the report, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That William Bayles is not entitled to a seat in this House."

And the same being taken, there appeared—yeas 56, nays 12.

It having appeared by the foregoing vote that a quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number of members, was not present, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, June 28.

Mr. MORROW presented a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, directed to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, enclosing a letter from the Register of the Land Office for the Eastern District of Orleans Territory; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the first instant, presented a bill providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; which was received, and permitted to lie on the table.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observing that no one was more anxious to adjourn at the time fixed than himself, but that he was certain that the House could not discuss and decide all the business before them, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the House on the subject, moved that the Speakers of the two Houses be authorized to adjourn them on Friday next instead of this day.

This motion was out of order, other motions for the orders of the day having preference, and was therefore not received.

The House concurred in a verbal amendment of the Senate to the bill to amend the "Act for the support of public credit and the redemption of the public debt."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MACON in the Chair, on the bill to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved to strike out the clause, authorizing the President of the United States to renew it if the public service, in his opinion, shall require it.—Carried 48 to 29.

The Committee rose and reported the bill as amended; which was ordered to a third reading, and was subsequently read and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, the bill from the Senate authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to give credit to the collectors of the customs for certain allowances made by them to the owners of fishing vessels, passed through a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BASSETT in the Chair, and was ordered to a third reading; and was then read a third time and passed without opposition.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. STAFFORD said: I have for several days had a resolution to offer to this House, which, from the press of other business, I have not had the opportunity to do. The subject is one so apparently necessary to be taken up, I am persuaded the House will not hesitate to adopt it. I allude to the subject of the Post Office Establishment. In the fifth Congress, it was found necessary to review that Establishment, and remedy many evils which were found to exist in that Department. If then it was found necessary to review the subject generally, and make it one entire system, it is certainly now much more necessary to do the same thing, seeing ten or eleven years have since elapsed, much territory is added to our country, and a great extension of the Establishment taken place. Satisfied I am, said Mr. S., some defects, radical in their nature, exist in the present system; and that it is so, must be obvious to every gentleman of the House. Session after session, for several years, without being able to pass any Post Office law, gentlemen in their places have offered at every session, for some years past, resolutions on this subject, in order to accommodate their constituents. Our constituents themselves have petitioned, and all in vain. We are told the revenue from the Post Office Establishment will not bear any farther increase of roads; nay, that many already established, ought to go down, and thus, the bill receive the go-by; and for this reason, properly enough, no doubt. But, Mr. S. said, he believed a system could be devised, which would so promote economy in that Department, not now practicable as it appeared to him, as that we might add every necessary road, in whatever part of the country it might be desired; and that we can, upon a proper revision of the subject, do much towards bettering the system, as it now appears to go on. I offer the resolution in the words in which it was before offered, and hope it will be adopted.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and is hereby directed to prepare and report to the House of Representatives, at the next session of Congress, such a system as will enable the House to comprise into one, the several laws which have been made, and are now in force respecting the post offices and post roads within the United States, adding thereto any other roads on which he thinks it expedient to carry a mail; with such additional notes and amendments as, in his opinion, will tend to obviate any difficulties in the transportation of the mail and newspapers.

The House agreed to consider the motion, yeas 50, nays 26—and it was then carried without opposition.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the contested election of WILLIAM BAYLIES. When the House last night, or rather this morning, adjourned for want of a quorum, the following resolution was under consideration:

Resolved, That William Baylies is not entitled to a seat in this House."

Mr. PICKMAN and Mr. LIVERMORE opposed the resolution, and Mr. MACON supported it; when it was carried—yeas 60, nays 40, as follows:

And CHARLES TURNER, jun., a Representative from Massachusetts, appeared, and took his seat.

EMIGRANTS FROM CUBA.

On motion of Mr. MARION, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the remission of certain fines and penalties.

[This bill provides for the remission of penalties incurred by the captains and owners of vessels which have been compelled to take on board emigrants from Cuba, with their slaves, the landing of the latter in the United States having, under present laws, forfeited the vessels and cargoes and fined the persons concerned.]

Mr. MARION observed that he had, a day or two ago, presented petitions from persons bringing in slaves, amongst which were some documents, one of which was the opinion of the district court of South Carolina, by which it appeared that, if the bill passed in the present shape, no relief would be afforded by it; for, it had not appeared on the trial that the slaves were forcibly expelled from the island, though the owners were. He therefore moved an amendment to include slaves owned by persons who were expelled the island.—Motion agreed to without opposition.

Mr. M. then moved to add a proviso: "And provided, also, that such slaves shall have been brought in at the same time as their owners, respectively."—Agreed to.

Mr. ROSS observed that a former act on the subject of the importation of slaves, said that it should not be lawful to bring into the United States any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with intention to sell the same or hold them as slaves. The present case appeared to him to be one in direct violation of that law. Under the act of 1807, it had become the duty of the court to examine whether it was the intention of the parties to infringe or violate the laws. After a fair examination by a court, under a desire to relieve those interested, and a failure of every attempt to show that they were compelled to take on board these slaves, was the House about to sit in judgment and reverse the decision? Mr. R. said that provision was also made in the bill as to slaves that may hereafter arrive in the United States, giving a power to the President of the United States, at his discretion, to set aside the law. What reason could there be for enacting this law, if the principles of the law of 1807 were correct? If it was intended, by a side blow, to repeal that law, he had rather see it done at once; and not, whilst in appearance we had such a law, to give the President a dispensing power over it. It was said that the persons concerned in bringing them in were distressed. How distressed? Only because they could not prove they were compelled to bring them into the country. Mr. R. said he did not wish to irritate the feelings of gentlemen from any portion of the Union, but he was sorry to see a bill introduced to unsettle what he conceived to be a valuable provision, enacted some sessions ago.

Mr. NEWTON said he felt as much repugnance as the gentleman from Pennsylvania to touch that law; but, if the gentleman would consider that this was a case of a peculiar nature, attended with singular circumstances, he would withdraw his objection. And he verily believed, that had the Legislature foreseen what had taken place, they would certainly have inserted a provision to meet the case which had occurred. Let it be recollected, said he, that the unfortunate Frenchmen driven on our coast, were sometime ago driven from St. Domingo, and were obliged to take shelter at Cuba. Since the commencement of the war in Spain, Cuba has almost witnessed the same scenes as St. Domingo. These people were forced to leave the island in distress, and take what portion of property they could collect. They could not go to France, because no vessels of that country were permitted to touch at the island of Cuba, neither could they go to the French islands in the West Indies. There was no country open to them but America. The American captains, then, were forced to take the French on board, and with them, a few body servants; and, under the former law, these vessels are seized, and liable to forfeiture, our merchants to suffer the loss of vessel and cargo, and the poor emigrants to lose all their little property. Let it be recollected that the law of 1807 does not interfere with the State rights on the subject. This bill only goes so far as to remit all fines and penalties incurred by the captains of vessels, and release the property which would otherwise be condemned, and relieve the perfectly innocent merchants who would otherwise suffer. Let us say to these unfortunates, as Dido to Æneas, when he was exiled from Troy: "I have suffered misfortune myself, and therefore know how to extend the hand of relief to others."

Mr. MARION said that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROSS) thought that he had a wish or intention to increase the number of slaves, he was much mistaken. The laws of South Carolina prohibited the bringing these slaves, or any other, into the State; yet they had been brought there, and the persons bringing them there must give security that they would have them carried out of the State. Now, by the non-intercourse law, the State was prevented from sending them away; they would, of course, remain here till the law permitted them to be sent off, for they could go nowhere but to France and her dependencies, France being at war with all the rest of the world. Mr. M. said that there were several captains now in jail under sentence of court for having brought those people into the country; he submitted to the House whether, under the circumstances of the case, the captains had not good reason to suppose that they would not be subject to the penalty of the law. The law prohibiting the importation of slaves was of a highly penal nature, and different from all other laws of that nature, having no clause in it giving a power of remission of penalties; and this bill was guarded in such a manner that no evil could arise.

Mr. MACON said it was certainly true that the Southern country wanted no more slaves. The sole object of the bill was to get them away. However desirous the people might be to hold that property, there could be no fear of their wanting them from the West Indies.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said it was peculiarly necessary to pass this bill to get rid of the immense number of slaves brought into New Orleans; for every one must know that they were not wanted there. They were too numerous to continue there, and this bill was intended to make provision for their exportation.

Mr. NEWTON produced a letter from the Collector of New Orleans on this subject.

Mr. TAYLOR said it never could have been the intention or spirit of the law of 1807 to increase our population in free blacks. It was not to set free the people of this description that the law had been passed, but to prevent them from being brought here at all. For even in Pennsylvania he had no doubt the gentleman would be content to have no further population of this sort. Mr.

H. OF R.

T. said he knew that in the Southern States there was an extreme aversion to receiving an additional free black population. The intent of this bill, so far from being in hostility to the law quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was in furtherance of it. It was to remove them out of the country.

Mr. Ross said that it was strange that the House should have a bill before it contemplating the removal of a certain description of persons out of the country, when nothing of the kind appeared on the face of it. If that was its intention, there should be a condition that the persons bringing in these slaves should carry them out again.

Mr. NEWTON observed that unless this law passed, the inevitable consequence must be that the negroes must remain here. He did not want them; they brought principles, which it was known would not promote our interest or happiness.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

Mr. NEWTON moved a new section for the relief of Foster and Girard, of New York, whose ship had been forfeited under the law prohibiting the importation of slaves.—Agreed to.

And the bill was ordered to a third reading, and subsequently passed without opposition.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill (from the Senate) in addition to the act, entitled "An act for laying out and making a turnpike road from Cumberland, Maryland, to the State of Ohio."

The bill proposed to appropriate $60,000 towards that object.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observed that it would be impossible to complete the turnpike road originally, and now contemplated by the act to which this is a supplement, under an expense of a million of dollars, which would never accrue probably from the funds set aside for this object. He therefore moved the following section as an amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That the President be authorized to apply the moneys to the improvement of the road as may be most expedient, without contemplating a turnpike road."

This motion was opposed by Messrs. LYON, SMILIE, and EPPES, and supported by Messrs. J. G. JACKSON and ROSS.

In favor of the motion it was contended that the money applicable to this object would never be competent to the making a turnpike road, which must cost from six to ten thousand dollars per mile; that turnpikes made for less were no better than common country roads, and would not bear a heavy team; that the sum proposed by the bill would not suffice for turnpiking more than eight or ten miles, whilst it would open a passable road of the common description the whole distance; that the turnpike roads which were made at a less expense than five thousand dollars a mile were good for nothing, and broken up by each successive Winter; that the House would pledge themselves by the passage of the present bill to complete the turnpike, whatever might be the expense; that it was to be hoped they would not act like the celebrated projector who undertook to build a bridge across a river, and, his funds failing, built it only half way across, and when asked how the passengers were to get over the remainder of the distance, replied that they might swim it.

To this it was replied by the opponents of the amendment that Congress were already pledged by their law, to the State of Ohio, to make a turnpike road; that it would be improper in this incidental way to repeal a solemn law; that sixty thousand dollars would complete a turnpike across the mountains, and the people of Ohio were ready and willing to complete the remainder by companies or otherwise; that turnpike had been made in Pennsylvania or New York for one thousand dollars a mile, and could certainly be made as cheap in this direction, where materials were cheaper and in plenty; that Congress were bound to make a turnpike road, and such a one as should be passable in Winter as well as Summer, which would not be the case if the amendment was adopted.

The amendment was negatived in Committee without a division.

The Committee rose, and Mr. JACKSON renewed his motion. Before a decision could be had, the bill was ordered to lie on the table to receive a motion for adjournment until six o'clock.

IMPARTIAL JURY.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the first instant, presented a bill to secure an impartial jury in all cases, civil and criminal, maintained in the courts of the United States; which was received, and permitted to lie on the table. The bill is as follows:

A bill to secure an impartial jury in all cases, civil and criminal, maintained in the courts of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the judges of the superior, circuit, or district courts of each of the States respectively shall, during the sitting of the courts holden by such judges, designate, out of the persons qualified to serve as jurors within such State, and residing within the jurisdiction of the court so holden as aforesaid, a number not exceeding —, to serve as jurors for the courts of the United States for the district within which such State courts shall be holden; the said designation to be made at convenient times, at least twice within each year, and the names of the parties so designated to be returned to the clerk's office of the court of the United States at least — days previous to the commencement of any term of the circuit court, or of any regular term of the district court. And it shall be the duty of the marshals of the respective districts to summon the persons so designated as aforesaid to attend as jurors on the circuit and district courts of the United States next to be holden after the return aforesaid. And if the number of persons so designated and returned and summoned and appearing shall exceed —, it shall be the duty of the marshal to cause the number to be reduced by lot under the direction and in the presence of the court to a number not exceeding —, out of which the juries for the court then holden, and to be holden within the next six months ensuing shall be selected by the marshal, subject to such right of challenge and exception as now does or may hereafter exist by law.

ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the twenty-seventh ultimo, presented a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States;" which was received, and permitted to lie on the table. The bill is as follows:

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, the following punishment and none other shall be inflicted by sentence of courts martial for any offence arising under the act, entitled an act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, to wit: Confinement to hard labor, with or without a suspension of pay; solitary confinement, with or without a suspension of pay, and a suspension of subsistence in part; banishment with disgrace; and death.

The following letter accompanied the bill reported on the subject of the articles of war:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 8, 1809.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry respecting a commutation of the punishment provided by the 87th section of the rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, the following opinion, founded on the practice of other armies, and on the practice of our own Army and country, is respectfully submitted for the consideration of the committee:

"Confinement to labor, with or without a suspension of pay; solitary confinement, with or without a suspension of pay, and a suspension of subsistence in part; banishment with disgrace; and death, may by law be established as the four general punishments for crimes."

At the same time it will be necessary to empower the courts to inflict corporal punishments not exceeding — strokes or lashes, (and this number ought to exceed the present provision of the statute,) in cases where either of the two first mentioned punishments have proved ineffectual, or on characters so depraved, in the judgment of the court, as to merit this mark of degradation, or under circumstances where confinement is incompatible with the situation of the troops.

I am, very respectfully, &c., W. EUSTIS.

Several motions were made for printing the report on public expenditure, by Messrs. MONTGOMERY, RANDOLPH, and MACON, before it was in order. The motion was at length made and carried, and the House adjourned to six o'clock.

Evening Session.

The bill from the Senate making an appropriation for completing and finishing the permanent Senate Chamber, passed through a Committee of the Whole, without opposition, and was read a third and passed.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON called for the consideration of the bill respecting the Ohio road.—Motion negatived, ayes 32.

NEW ORLEANS BATTURE.

Mr. SAWYER moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Mr. SHEFFEY'S resolutions relative to the batture. [They propose the restoration of the property to the persons removed from it.]

Mr. J. MONTGOMERY moved to postpone the consideration of the subject indefinitely. The motion was negatived, ayes 25.

The House then agreed to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, 51 to 27, on Mr. SHEFFEY'S resolutions.

Mr. VARNUM hoped that the Committee would immediately rise and report progress. It appeared to him impossible that the House could carry into effect a principle of this kind, in which some of the dearest interests of the country were involved, without great deliberation. He was clearly of opinion, as it must be evident to every one, that it was impossible for the House to act on them with that deliberation they required, at this period of the session, when it was scarcely possible to keep a quorum in the House.

Mr. LEWIS thought that there could be no interest more dear than the right of the citizen. He could not conceive that the time of the House could be better employed than in the discussion of an important claim for a redress of grievances of a citizen of the United States. There was time enough between this time and 12 o'clock to discuss this and every other subject necessary to be acted on.

Mr. SMITH said that if the House undertook to decide this question in this way, it would be a piece of extravagance greater than he had ever witnessed in a deliberative body.

Mr. ROSS said that the objection to going into a discussion at this late hour did not apply to this subject, because a discussion had already been had. It is true, said he, that the present question is presented in a very different shape; but, as far as I have before understood, it was the sense of the House that a reference to the Attorney General was improper. Let gentlemen recollect that they have contended that it was improper to postpone the consideration of a petition first presented at this session, whilst this had been pending many sessions. The right of the citizen too is involved in this case; and all appear to agree in the opinion that the law of 1807 was not intended to affect persons situated as the petitioner was. This House, then, is in justice called upon to place the petitioner in a situation from which the law never intended to remove him. To refuse to do it would be to treat a citizen contrary to the rules of equity.

Mr. GHOLSON was astonished, the subject having been fully discussed, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should have occupied so much time on it. He hoped that the question would be decided immediately.

Mr. TAYLOR said that it was not in evidence before the House that the claim in question had been registered. The application to have it registered after the legal time had expired was almost proof of a defect in the title, and upon this ground discussion might be extended to an infinite length. Mr. T. maintained that this petitioner had no further claim to the property in dispute, than a thousand others who, from ignorance, had not had their claims registered in due time. This however was a topic on which he would not dwell. He would only incidentally observe that the petitioner was not the first person who had been dispossessed even of that kind of possession which a duck has of the Potomac when it alights on the river, and which, when the tide falls, is left on the beach. Mr. T. said that there had been citizens of Tennessee expelled by the whole settlement from the lands on which they had pitched their tents, whilst their crops were growing. The case was therefore not new, and no peculiar hardship distinguished it.

JUNE, 1809.

Adjournment.

But there was another topic which had not been introduced, viz: that the court of New Orleans had palpably exceeded the powers granted to them as judges of the Territory. The ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory, passed before the United States obtained possession of Louisiana, had been extended to the Territory of Orleans. All the power delegated to the court of New Orleans was a common law jurisdiction. I venture to say, observed he, that in the proceedings of the court in relation to this contested property, it has taken upon itself chancery or civil law jurisdiction. They have transgressed the powers given them. All the claim to this bank, which is half the year the bed of the river, derived from the decision of that court, falls to the ground, when it is found that the court has mistaken its jurisdiction and transcended its powers. The delegate from Orleans had attempted to be understood; and, if understood, his observations would have had their effect. He, said Mr. T., has told you that this piece of land under water, this piece of batture, has not yet arrived to that state of alluvion, which would authorize its being made a ground of claim as territory. It is not only under water, but is the common highway of the Ohio and Kentucky boats. But the land is sometimes uncovered, and so sometimes is the bottom of the bay of Charleston. And, according to the doctrine set up now, if some unfortunate shipwrecked mariner should lay his hand on it in that situation, his descendants might lay claim to it as their property. Who would think the claim plausible? No one; and yet it would be nearly as feasible as the claimant's appears to be.

I can say that there are thousands who have lost the right to show their titles in a court because they have not registered them within the time prescribed by law—and such is the situation of this petitioner, if he had a title. If you will take this case into consideration, erect a tribunal for the consideration of the many similar cases. In a particular part of the House I can find unanimity on this subject. The same part declared the embargo laws unconstitutional. A. B. might have had property in port, and by having his vessels prevented from sailing might have encountered an immense loss. And if this cry of unconstitutionality were to have weight, we must take up every hard case, and establish a special tribunal to reimburse to individuals the immense sums which they imagine they have lost. I do not say that they are unconstitutional, but that part of the House unanimous on this subject are also unanimous in this opinion. Should I then select this case when there are others equally strong and perhaps more meritorious?—

At this moment a message was received from the Senate and Mr. TAYLOR took his seat, and the Committee rose to give the House an opportunity to consider the message.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they were ready to adjourn, and had appointed Messrs. POPE and BRENT a committee on their part to wait on the President, and inform him that they are ready to adjourn. The House concurred in appointing a committee, and Messrs. ROOT and CRAWFORD were named for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the subject of the batture, with a view to take it up in the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH then called for the consideration of Mr. SHEFFRY's resolutions.

On the first count, there were, for it 29, against it, 33.—No quorum.

On the second count, for it, 34, against it, 35.—No quorum.

On the third count, 37 to 37—a tie, and another count called.

On the fourth count, for it 37, against it, 33.—No quorum.

A call of the names was then ordered, (eight o'clock,) and the names being called, it appeared that the following gentlemen were present:

Messrs. Anderson, Bacon, Blaisdell, Boyd, J. Brown, R. Brown, Burwell, Butler, Calhoun, J. C. Chamberlain, Crist, Cutts, Dana, Dawson, Desha, Ely, Emott, Eppes, Findley, Fiak, Gannett, Gardner, Gholson, Gold, Hale, Haven, Heister, Helms, Holland, Howard, Hubbard, Hufty, J. G. Jackson, R. Jackson, Johnson, Kennedy, Knickerbacker, Lewis, Livermore, Livingston, Lyon, Lyle, Marion, McBride, McKee, McKim, Milnor, Montgomery, N. R. Moore, Morrow, Newton, Nicholson, Pearson, Randolph, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Richards, Roane, Root, Ross, Sage, Sawyer, Smilie, G. Smith, Sturges, Swoope, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Tracy, Turner, Van Dyke, Van Horn, Van Rensselaer, Weakley, Whitman, and Wilson—75.

And another count being made on the above question, the votes were 34 to 34.—No quorum.

Mr. ROOT reported that the committee had waited on the President according to order, who was pleased to say that he had no further communications to make.

About nine o'clock, all the bills having been enrolled and signed, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried; and the SPEAKER, after wishing the members of the House a pleasant journey home, and a happy meeting with their friends, adjourned the House to the fourth Monday in November next.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE ELEVENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1809.

MONDAY, November 27, 1809.

Conformably to the act passed at the last session, entitled, "An act to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress," the second session of the eleventh Congress commenced this day; and the Senate assembled, in their Chamber, at the City of Washington.

PRESENT:

NICHOLAS GILMAN, from New Hampshire.
TIMOTHY PICKERING, from Massachusetts.
CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, from Connecticut.
STEPHEN R. BRADLEY and JONATHAN ROBINSON, from Vermont.
JOHN LAMBERT, from New Jersey.
ANDREW GREGG and MICHAEL LEIB, from Pennsylvania.
WILLIAM B. GILES, from Virginia.
JAMES TURNER, from North Carolina.
THOMAS SUMTER and JOHN GAILLARD, from South Carolina.
BUCKNER THRUSTON and JOHN POPE, from Kentucky.
RETURN JONATHAN MEIGS and STANLEY GRISWOLD, from Ohio.
The number of Senators present not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, the Senate adjourned to 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, November 28.

The Senate assembled—present as yesterday; and OBEDIAH GERMAN, from the State of New York; JAMES HILLHOUSE, from the State of Connecticut; ELISHA MATHEWSON, from the State of Rhode Island; and NAHUM PARKER, from the State of New Hampshire, severally attended.

ANDREW GREGG, President pro tempore, resumed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, stating the difficulties that have prevented the entire completion of the permanent Senate Chamber; which letter was read.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to attend to business.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILMAN and GAILLARD be a committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a committee, on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with three such newspapers printed in any of the States as he may choose, provided that the same be furnished at the usual rate for the annual charge of such papers: and, provided also, that, if any Senator shall choose to take any newspapers other than daily papers, he shall be supplied with as many such papers as shall not exceed the price of three daily papers.

Resolved, That James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper to the Senate; and that the sum of twenty-eight dollars be allowed him weekly for that purpose, to commence with, and remain during the session, and for twenty days after.

Mr. GILMAN reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, agreeably to order, and that the President of the United States informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, November 29.

JAMES LLOYD, from the State of Massachusetts, attended.

The letter from the Surveyer of the Public Buildings, communicated yesterday, was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, LLOYD, and LEIB, were appointed the committee.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

At the period of our last meeting, I had the satisfaction of communicating an adjustment with one of the principal belligerent nations, highly important in itself, and still more so, as presaging a more extended accommodation. It is with deep concern, I am now to inform you, that the favorable prospect has been overclouded by a refusal of the British Government to abide by the act of its Minister Plenipotentiary, and by its ensuing policy towards the United States, as seen through the communications of the Minister sent to replace him.

Whatever pleas may be urged for a disavowal of engagements formed by diplomatic functionaries, in cases where, by the terms of the engagements, a mutual ratification is reserved; or where notice at the time may have been given of a departure from instructions; or, in extraordinary cases, essentially violating the principles of equity; a disavowal could not have been apprehended in a case where no such notice or violation existed; where no such ratification was reserved; and, more especially, where, as is now in proof, an engagement, to be executed, without any such ratification, was contemplated by the instructions given, and where it had, with good faith, been carried into immediate execution on the part of the United States.

These considerations not having restrained the British Government from disavowing the arrangement, by virtue of which its Orders in Council were to be revoked, and the event authorizing the renewal of commercial intercourse having thus not taken place, it necessarily became a question of equal urgency and importance, whether the act prohibiting that intercourse was not to be considered as remaining in legal force. This question being, after due deliberation, determined in the affirmative, a proclamation to that effect was issued. It could not but happen, however, that a return to this state of things, from that which had followed an execution of the arrangement by the United States, would involve difficulties. With a view to diminish these as much as possible, the instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, now laid before you, were transmitted to the collectors of the several ports. If, in permitting British vessels to depart without giving bonds not to proceed to their own ports, it should appear that the tenor of legal authority has not been strictly pursued, it is to be ascribed to the anxious desire which was felt, that no individuals should be injured by so unforeseen an occurrence: and I rely on the regard of Congress for the equitable interests of our own citizens, to adopt whatever further provisions may be found requisite for a general remission of penalties involuntarily incurred.

The recall of the disavowed Minister having been followed by the appointment of a successor, hopes were indulged that the new mission would contribute to alleviate the disappointment which had been produced, and to remove the causes which had so long embarrassed the good understanding of the two nations. It could not be doubted that it would at least be charged with conciliatory explanations of the step which had been taken, and with proposals to be substituted for the rejected arrangement. Reasonable and universal as this expectation was, it also has not been fulfilled. From the first official disclosures of the new Minister, it was found that he had received no authority to enter into explanations relative to either branch of the arrangement disavowed, nor any authority to substitute proposals, as to that branch which concerned the British Orders in Council. And, finally, that his proposals with respect to the other branch, the attack on the frigate Chesapeake, were founded on a presumption, repeatedly declared to be inadmissible by the United States, that the first step towards adjustment was due from them; the proposals, at the same time, omitting even a reference to the officer answerable for the murderous aggression, and asserting a claim not less contrary to the British laws and British practice, than to the principles and obligations of the United States.

The correspondence between the Department of State and this Minister will show how unnecessarily the features presented in its commencement have been varied in its progress. It will show, also, that, forgetting the respect due to all Governments, he did not refrain from imputations on this, which required that no further communications should be received from him. The necessity of this step will be made known to His Britannic Majesty, through the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in London. And it would indicate a want of the confidence due to a Government which so well understands and exacts what becomes foreign Ministers near it, not to infer that the misconduct of its own Representative will be viewed in the same light in which it has been regarded here. The British Government will learn, at the same time, that a ready attention will be given to communications, through any channel which may be substituted. It will be happy, if the change in this respect should be accompanied by a favorable revision of the unfriendly policy which has been so long pursued towards the United States.

With France, the other belligerent, whose trespasses on our commercial rights have long been the subject of our just remonstrances, the posture of our relations does not correspond with the measures taken on the part of the United States to effect a favorable change. The result of the several communications made to her Government, in pursuance of the authorities vested by Congress in the Executive, is contained in the correspondence of our Minister at Paris, now laid before you.

By some of the other belligerents, although professing just and amicable dispositions, injuries materially affecting our commerce have not been duly controlled or repressed. In these cases, the interpositions deemed proper, on our part, have not been omitted. But, it well deserves the consideration of the Legislature, how far both the safety and the honor of the American flag may be consulted, by adequate provisions against that collusive prostitution of it by individuals, unworthy of the American name, which has so much favored the real or pretended suspicions, under which the honest commerce of their fellow-citizens has suffered.

In relation to the Powers on the coast of Barbary, nothing has occurred which is not of a nature rather to inspire confidence than distrust, as to the continuance of the existing amity. With our Indian neighbors, the just and benevolent system, continued towards them, has also preserved peace, and is more and more advancing habits favorable to their civilization and happiness.

From a statement which will be made by the Secretary of War, it will be seen that the fortifications on our maritime frontier, are, in many of the ports, completed, affording the defence which was contemplated; and that a further time will be required to render complete the works in the harbor of New York, and in some other places. By the enlargement of the works, and the employment of a greater number of hands at the public armories, the supply of small arms, of an improving quality, appears to be annually increasing, at a rate that, without those made on private contract, may be expected to go far towards providing for the public exigency.

The act of Congress providing for the equipment of our vessels of war having been fully carried into execution, I refer to the statement of the Secretary of the Navy for the information which may be proper on that subject. To that statement is added a view of the transfers of appropriations, authorized by the act of the session preceding the last, and of the grounds on which the transfers were made.

Whatever may be the course of your deliberations on the subject of our Military Establishments, I should fail in my duty in not recommending to your serious attention the importance of giving to our militia, the great bulwark of our security and resource of our power, an organization the best adapted to eventual situations, for which the United States ought to be prepared.

The sums which had been previously accumulated in the Treasury, together with the receipts during the year ending on the 30th of September last, and amounting to more than nine millions of dollars, have enabled us to fulfil all our engagements, and to defray the current expenses of Government, without recurring to any loan. But the insecurity of our commerce, and the consequent diminution of the public revenue, will probably produce a deficiency in the receipts of the ensuing year, for which, and for other details, I refer to the statements which will be transmitted from the Treasury.

In the state which has been presented of our affairs with the great parties to a disastrous and protracted war, carried on in a mode equally injurious and unjust to the United States as a neutral nation, the wisdom of the National Legislature will be again summoned to the important decision on the alternatives before them. That these will be met in a spirit worthy of the councils of a nation conscious both of its rectitude and of its rights, and careful as well of its honor as of its peace, I have an entire confidence. And that the result will be stamped by a unanimity becoming the occasion, and be supported by every portion of our citizens, with a patriotism enlightened and invigorated by experience, ought as little to be doubted.

In the midst of the wrongs and vexations experienced from external causes, there is much room for congratulation on the prosperity and happiness flowing from our situation at home. The blessing of health has never been more universal. The fruits of the seasons, though in particular articles and districts short of their usual redundancy, are more than sufficient for our wants and our comforts. The face of our country everywhere presents the evidence of laudable enterprise, of extensive capital, and of durable improvement. In a cultivation of the materials, and the extension of useful manufactures, more especially in the general application to household fabrics, we behold a rapid diminution of our dependence on foreign supplies. Nor is it unworthy of reflection, that this revolution in our pursuits and habits is in no slight degree a consequence of those impolitic and arbitrary edicts, by which the contending nations, in endeavoring, each of them, to obstruct our trade with the other, have so far abridged our means of procuring the productions and manufactures, of which our own are now taking the place.

Recollecting, always, that, for every advantage which may contribute to distinguish our lot from that to which others are doomed by the unhappy spirit of the times, we are indebted to that Divine Providence whose goodness has been so remarkably extended to this rising nation, it becomes us to cherish a devout gratitude, and to implore, from the same Omnipotent Source, a blessing on the consultations and measures about to be undertaken for the welfare of our beloved country.

JAMES MADISON.

NOVEMBER 29, 1809.

The Message and documents therein referred to were read, and five hundred copies of the Message, and also five hundred copies of the Message together with five hundred copies of the documents, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. GOODRICH,

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing their respect to the memory of the Honorable SAMUEL WHITE, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for one month, by the usual mode of wearing a crape round the left arm.

THURSDAY, November 30.

PHILIP REED, from the State of Maryland, attended.

JOHN CONDIT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, in the place of Aaron Kitchel, resigned, produced his credentials, which were read; and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

On motion of Mr. MERRIS,

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The following motion was submitted, by Mr. GILES, for consideration:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as respects the relations existing between the United States and Great Britain and France, with the accompanying documents, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine the same and report thereon to the Senate; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, bills, or otherwise.

Mr. GILES introduced the foregoing resolution with observing, in substance, that in presenting the resolution to the consideration of the Senate, he did not mean at this time to suggest any specific course of proceeding, as proper to be observed upon the very delicate and interesting topics embraced by it; nor to pledge himself upon presenting any specific proposition, for the final adoption of the Senate; but he was induced to introduce the subject at this early period of the session, because he was deeply impressed with the importance of the disclosures made in the Message, and the accompanying documents; as they respect the interests, the character, and even the independence of the United States. He conceived that considerations so vitally interesting to the nation certainly demanded the most prompt attention, and most serious animadversion of Congress. He had presented the resolution in this generalized form, to give the Committee the freest range in devising and reporting measures, suited to the difficulty and delicacy of the crisis.

FRIDAY, December 1.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. GILES; and

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as respects the relations existing between the United States and Great Britain and France, with the accompanying documents, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine the same, and report thereon to the Senate; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, bills, or otherwise; and,

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, POPE, BRADLEY, GOODRICH, LEIB, SUMTER, and GILMAN, be the committee.

The following motion was submitted by Mr. LEIB:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to an efficient organization of the militia of the United States be referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed agreeable to the 22d rule for conducting business in the Senate; and,

Ordered, That Messrs. GILMAN, GRISWOLD, and MATHEWSON, be the committee.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 4.

RICHARD BRENT, from the State of Virginia, and WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, from the State of Georgia, severally attended.

SAMUEL SMITH, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Maryland from the 15th of November, 1809, to the 4th of March, 1810, produced his credentials, which were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate of the 30th of November, for the appointment of Chaplains, and have appointed the Rev. JESSE LEE Chaplain on their part.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. POPE offered the following resolution, pre-facing it by observing that in several courts of the United States business had been interrupted and delayed in consequence of the age and infirmities of judges presiding in them. At the last session of Congress an attempt had been made to permit the retirement of Judges from the bench with a moderate compensation; but it appeared that there could be no other remedy for the evil but an amendment to the Constitution. He had therefore been induced to make the motion, which was loudly called for by the existing state of things.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following section be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified and confirmed by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid and binding, as a part of the Constitution of the United States, in lieu of the first section of the third article thereof.

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour, or until they shall have respectively attained the age of sixty-five years. But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the President shall remove any of them, on the address of — of each House of Congress: Provided, however, That the cause or causes for which such removal may be required shall be stated in such address and on the Journal of each House. They shall at stated times receive for their services an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law."

TUESDAY, December 5.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now transmit a report of the Secretary of the Navy, containing statements from that Department, referred to in my Message of the 29th ultimo.

JAMES MADISON.

The Message and report were read and ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 1st instant by Mr. LEIB; and

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to an efficient organization of the militia of the United States be referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, LEIB, BRADLEY, SUMTER, and GERMAN, be the committee.

The Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain, on their part, in pursuance of the resolution of the two Houses, and the whole number of votes collected was twenty-two, of which the Reverend Mr. BROWN had twelve, and was accordingly elected.

THE BRITISH MINISTER.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed on the first instant, reported in part the following resolution; which was read the first time, and passed to the second reading:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the expressions contained in the official letter of Francis James Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty near the United States, dated the 23d day of October, 1809, and addressed to Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, conveying the idea, that the Executive Government of the United States had knowledge that the arrangement lately made by Mr. Erskine, his predecessor, on behalf of his Government, with the Government of the United States, was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine for that purpose, were highly indecorous and insolent; that the repetition of the same intimation in his official letter dated the 4th of November, 1809, after he was apprized, by the asseveration of the Secretary of State, that the Executive Government had no such knowledge, and that if it had possessed such knowledge such arrangement would not have been entered into on the part of the United States, and after also being officially apprized that such intimation was inadmissible; was still more insolent and affronting; and that, in refusing to receive any further communications from him in consequence of these outrageous and premeditated insults, the Executive Government has manifested a just regard to its own dignity and honor, as well as to the character and interest of the American people.

That the letter signed Francis James Jackson, headed "Circular," dated the 13th of November, 1809, and published and circulated through the country, is a still more direct and aggravated insult and affront to the American people and their Government, as it is evidently an insidious attempt to excite their resentments and distrusts against their own Government, by appealing to them, through false or fallacious disguises, against some of its acts; and to excite resentments and divisions amongst the people themselves, which can only be dishonorable to their own characters and ruinous to their own interests; and the Congress of the United States do hereby solemnly pledge themselves to the American people and to the world to stand by and support the Executive Government in its refusal to receive any further communications from the said Francis James Jackson, and to call into action the whole force of the nation if it should become necessary in consequence of the conduct of the Executive Government in this respect to repel such insults and to assert and maintain the rights, the honor, and the interests of the United States.

PRIVILEGES OF FOREIGN MINISTERS.

Mr. GILES, from the same committee, also reported the following bill, which was read and passed to a second reading:

A bill to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by Foreign Ministers within the United States.

Be it enacted &c., That if any foreign Ambassador, Minister, or other person, entitled to enjoy within the United States the privileges and immunities of a foreign Minister, shall have committed, or may hereafter commit, any such act as by the laws and usages of nation would justify the President of the United States in ordering such offending Ambassador, Minister, or other person as aforesaid, out of the District of Columbia, or out of the Territories of the United States; or in sending him home to his Sovereign, or to some place or territory within his Sovereign's jurisdiction; in every such case where the President of the United States shall deem it proper and expedient to exercise his Constitutional authority, in either of these respects he shall be, and is hereby authorized and empowered to cause a warrant to be issued and signed by the Secretary of State, directed to any civil officer of the United States authorized to serve process, or any military officer under the authority of the United States, commanding him to provide for and enforce the departure of such Ambassador, Minister, or other person offending as aforesaid, taking due precautions to avoid improper or unnecessary violence in executing such warrant. And all officers, civil and military, under the authority of the United States, are hereby required and enjoined to be obedient to such warrant. And in case any officer, civil or military, to whom such warrant shall be directed, shall fail, or unreasonably delay to execute the same, every officer so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be punished by fine and imprisonment before any court of the United States having cognizance of the offence: Provided, That the fine shall not exceed — dollars, nor the imprisonment be for a longer time than — years.

Mr. GILES gave notice that he should call for the consideration of this subject on Thursday next.

WEDNESDAY, December 6.

The resolution reported yesterday from the committee appointed on that part of the Message of the President of the United States which respects foreign relations, was read the second time.

The bill to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers in the United States was read the second time; and on motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be the order of the day for to-morrow.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage," was read the second time as in Committee of the Whole, and amended; and the President having reported the bill to the House accordingly, on the question, Shall this bill be read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. LEIB presented the petition of Joseph Joshua Dyster, a native of England, stating that he had discovered a new principle for the erection of iron bridges, and exhibiting a prospectus thereof, but arriving in America on the 5th day of May last, he had not resided in the country the term prescribed by law to entitle him to become a citizen of the United States, although it was his intention. He therefore prays an act of the Legislature may be passed to enable him immediately to obtain, at the office of the Secretary of State, any patent or patents to which he might be entitled were he an American citizen; and the petition and paper therein referred to were read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. LEIB, BRADLEY, and BRENT, be the committee.

The resolution submitted on the fourth instant, for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, was read, and passed to the second reading.

THURSDAY, December 7.

Mr. BRADLEY presented the petition of Charles Minife, stating that, in April, 1803, he contracted for and supplied the Navy Department with a quantity of spars, for which, by casualty, he has not been fully compensated, and praying relief, for reasons stated at large in his petition; which was read, together with the accompanying documents.—Referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, GOODRICH, and LEIB, were appointed the committee.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

Mr. LEIB gave notice that he should to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act, entitled "An act to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service."

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported on the 5th instant, from the committee appointed on that part of the Message of the President of the United States which respects the relations existing between the United States and Great Britain and France, as in Committee of the Whole; and on motion, by Mr. POPE, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers within the United States; and on motion, by Mr. POPE, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The resolution submitted on the 4th instant for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the second time; and on motion, by Mr. POPE, it was referred to a select committee, to consist of five members; and Messrs. POPE, GOODRICH, CRAWFORD, LLOYD, and BRENT, were appointed the committee, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. POPE gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes,' in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BRADLEY gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to incorporate religious societies in the District of Columbia.

FRIDAY, December 8.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," which, together with the accompanying documents, were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes,'" was read the second time, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. POPE, MEIGS, and CRAWFORD, were appointed the committee.

Mr. LEIB asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act, entitled "An act to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The resolution reported by Mr. GILES, approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to hold any further communication with Mr. Jackson, was taken up in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The resolution having been read,

Mr. GILES rose, and spoke as follows:

Mr. President: Before I proceed to perform the duties enjoined upon me as chairman of the committee who reported the resolution before you, permit me to express my regret that the consideration of a subject which justly excites so much sensibility should have been delayed, even only one day, on my account; and be assured, sir, that nothing less than an indisposition, sufficient to justify it, would have caused me to have been absent from my place yesterday. Perhaps, sir, I owe an apology to the Senate at this time for entering into this debate under a state of hoarseness, which must necessarily disqualify me, in some degree, from discharging my duty on the present occasion. But, sir, it is a subject of great consolation to me, to reflect that I am fortunately favored with associates on the committee, either of whom could perform the task I am now engaged in better than myself, and some of whom will certainly do me the favor of correcting any errors I may unintentionally commit, or supplying any omissions I may inadvertently make.

Although it appears to me that the propriety and urgency of the resolution now under consideration must be strongly addressed, both to the judgment and sensibility of every gentleman who has carefully attended to the distribution of powers under our Constitution, and who has also carefully attended to the correspondence which gave rise to the resolution, yet, in a case of so much delicacy, it would naturally be expected, and is a respect due to the Senate, from the chairman of the committee, to present to it at least some of the general motives which induced the committee to report the resolution at this time.

It is to be observed, Mr. President, that our Constitution is peculiar in the organization and distribution of its powers; and in no respect is it more peculiar than in the distribution of the particular powers embraced by the resolution. In all other Governments, known to us, the same department which possesses the power to receive and negotiate with foreign Ambassadors and other public Ministers, also possesses the power to make war. It has been thought wise in our Constitution to separate these powers. With a simplicity of language, and a solidity of wisdom almost peculiar to our Constitution, the President is invested with the power to receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; thus using the broadest terms in granting this power, without even an attempt at limitation or specification; evidently with a view that all the incidental or consequential powers might flow from this general expression to the department thus invested with this general power. It was easy to foresee (and no doubt the framers of our Constitution did foresee) that the multiplicity and diversity of cases which would arise in the course of various diplomatic manœuvres and negotiations, would set at defiance all attempts to limit or specify the powers of the department, in this respect, to which these powers were confided, and to be exercised on the part of the United States; and, therefore, every attempt of that kind was wisely avoided, leaving to the President to exercise his authority upon his own responsibility, to be regulated by the only established standard amongst nations, to wit: the laws and usages of nations. For, it never can be presumed, sir, that the wise sages who framed our excellent Constitution could for a moment have tolerated the idea that the Ministers of foreign nations residing near the Government of the United States, should possess greater privileges and immunities than the Ministers of our Government residing near foreign Courts. Of course, the same laws—to wit: the laws and usages of nations—were left reciprocally to govern in every reciprocal case.

But, sir, notwithstanding the President is invested with the power "to receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers," and, as I think, all other incidental or consequential powers applicable to the various agencies with such Ambassadors and other public Ministers, yet Congress is invested with the power, without limitation or qualification, "to declare war." Now, sir, it must be obvious to every understanding, that these several powers are so intimately connected, and may be so dependent upon each other, that the exercise of the power conceded to the President may consequentially involve the necessity of the exercise of the power conceded to Congress, as in the case now under consideration. The refusal of the Executive to receive any further communications from His Britannic Majesty's Minister, (Mr. Jackson,) may consequentially involve us in war with Great Britain; or, in other words, may serve as a pretext to Great Britain to make war upon us, if she should conceive it her interest to do so, which I think not very improbable. Hence arises, in my judgment, the propriety and urgency of expression of the Congressional opinion upon this Executive act, and a declaration of the Congressional will as to the course of conduct Congress will pursue under any consequences which may flow from, or possibly be attributed to, this Executive act.

I conceive, sir, that the expression of this opinion, and the pledge of a solemn declaration, by Congress, are due to the people, because the people have the greatest interest in the character of their Government; and in no part of its attributes have a deeper interest than in its efficacy to resist and repel injuries and insults from foreign Governments. The people, also, are the mediate or immediate electors of Congress, and as such have a right to expect and demand that Congress will execute all their duties, and will never shrink from their Constitutional responsibility in any case; and, last of all, in a case of so high and solemn a character as the one under consideration.

This course of conduct is essentially due to the Executive. The President ought to know whether, with the indispensable co-operation of Congress, he ought to proceed with dignified moderation and intelligence to assert and maintain the rights, the honor, and the interests, of the American people; or whether, for the want of that co-operation, he shall with shame and confusion of face be compelled to retrace his steps, and leave to Congress to abandon these high attributes of the nation, and, with their degradation, to record their country's ruin and disgrace. No, sir, it is not possible that an American Congress does exist, or can ever exist, that would not spurn from themselves every vestige of an idea that they could be brought, under any circumstances, to perform so degrading and dishonorable a task. It is imperiously demanded by the dignity and candor of Congress itself. What, sir, shall the exercise of one of the highest Constitutional functions of Congress be brought into question, and every individual in the nation engaged in expressing an opinion on it; and shall Congress alone stand aloof, for fear of incurring a responsibility imposed on them by the Constitution! Shall Congress stand by as idle spectators, and see a contest before the people, between the President and a foreign Minister, and feel no interest and take no share in such an unprecedented scene, especially when one of their highest Constitutional functions may be affected by it! No, sir. Congress must speak—Congress must act. Congress never can shrink from its Constitutional responsibility. It is due to the dignity—it is demanded from the candor—of Congress.

Above all, sir, it is important to the United States as a nation, that the Congressional will should be proclaimed upon this delicate and solemn occasion. It is of importance, it may be of the last importance, to the United States, that Great Britain should know, before she decides upon this subject, what is the Congressional will in relation to it. Whether she will be called upon to act against an united, harmonized Government and people—or whether she shall have for her prey, a divided people and a discordant Government.

SENATE.

Conduct of the British Minister.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Do you believe, Mr. President, that the conduct of Great Britain would be very different under these different conditions of the people and Government of the United States? Let me ask you this question, sir; would you not, sir, if you were Prime Minister of Great Britain, consulting her interests alone, pursue a very different course of conduct under this different state of things? Let every gentleman put the question to himself; and the answer of every one would be the same. Why then, sir, do we not unanimously take the ground here, which, if we were called upon to act in an opposite hostile character, would most certainly deter us from persevering in that hostile character against the United States? Sir, if there had been any doubt upon this subject, our late experience ought to have removed it; for, sir, I have no hesitation in saying, and with pain at heart I shall be compelled to show it in the course of this debate, that, in my judgment, our present embarrassments are too much to be ascribed to our former manifestations of indecision, to our unfortunate dissensions and divisions. Sir, whenever I approach this sorrowful and awful subject, my heart feels as if it were bleeding at every pore, when I am compelled to reflect, and to believe, that this our beloved and happy country may shortly become a bleeding victim, from wounds—if not inflicted by the hands of her own sons, at least by their unhappy divisions and dissensions. Yes, sir, with a full knowledge of what is past, and strong presages of what is to come, is it not deplorable to be compelled to think, that, in a very few months, perhaps in a still shorter time, American blood must be shed, to repel the hostile spirit of Great Britain, now rendered too manifest to every understanding; and worse than all, sir, to wash away the stains of our own unfortunate divisions and dissensions; and is it not wonderful, as it is deplorable, that the virtuous and patriotic American people, and sometimes called the most enlightened in the world, with the experience of the horrible consequences, through all ages, of the divisions of a people amongst themselves, should permit themselves from the same cause, to fall a prey to the same inevitable calamities?

Look, Mr. President, through all history, from the first dispute between Cain and Abel, down to the late disastrous dissensions between the Spanish branch of the Bourbon dynasty, and find if you can, sir, a single instance of a people who gained any advantage from dissensions among themselves, and especially, sir, when they carried them so far, as to join a foreign against their country's standard! I believe, sir, not one solitary instance of this kind stands recorded. Nor is it possible or practicable in any state of human affairs—because in all cases, the foreign interference in the internal concerns of its neighbors is always for its own and never for its neighbor's benefit. With these monitory lessons before our eyes, and a full conviction of their truth upon our hearts, is it not wonderful, that we should voluntarily give up ourselves victims to the same calamities? But, sir, gentlemen may ask, where is the remedy? How can we make a sacrifice of our own opinions? Sir, the case is a plain one. Let gentlemen exercise their opinions and persevere in their arguments at all times respecting our internal concerns, as well before as after the measures are adopted; let them, respecting our foreign relations, urge their arguments with a zeal proportioned to the magnitude of the subject; they will be pleasurable received, and respectfully considered; but after the Government has taken its attitude against a foreign nation, it would be going too far, to desert its standard, and to join that of the enemy. It is then time for opinion to pause and reflect, whether any consequence can be worse, or more disgraceful, than joining a foreign against its country's standard? Whether it would not be better, more patriotic, more virtuous, to support your country even in a supposed unwise course of policy, than to join a foreign standard, and use it to correct and change the course of policy thus disapproved?

Sir, in a contest between your own and a foreign nation, it never can be wrong to join the standard of your own country; nor right to join the standard of your enemy. Then, sir, here is a rallying point. It is a plain and obvious one. No understanding can mistake it. No heart can disapprove it. It is our own Government. Let that be the rallying point. There never can be a more propitious moment than the present for casting into oblivion all former irritations and dissensions: There can never be a plainer case presented to the human understanding. There never were more urgent considerations in favor of the course recommended. Whether we respect their repulsive effects upon British hostility, or their harmonizing effects among ourselves, they appear to me to be equally strong and persuasive. May I not then, sir, indulge the pleasing hope, that the resolution before you will be received as the signal of unanimity in Congress, and joyfully hailed in that character through the whole of this great and extended country? Sir, does it not manifest a strange perverseness in the human character, for us to observe that, when it is perfectly at our option, we should choose to distress and injure ourselves by irritations and resentments, rather than delight ourselves with union and harmony and mutual good offices? Especially, sir, when the latter choice would command the respect, if not excite the alarm of our enemy. For, sir, do you believe that if Great Britain saw the strong arm of this nation stretched out to oppose her unjust spirit of hostility, guided in all its operations by one undivided will, she would so readily encounter its powerful influence, as if she saw it paralyzed in all its efforts from the want of an unity of will and action? No, sir, we undervalue our energies and importance, if we were to suppose that her conduct would be the same in both of these situations; or that she is at all indifferent to the course of conduct now to be pursued by us. Let us then all unite, sir, in this proposition, and disappoint her mistaken calculations upon her influence in this country. I verily believe, that union is all that is wanting to appease her hostile spirit towards us. But perhaps, sir, every gentleman present will admit, and it appears to me that no human being can deny, that if the facts stated in the resolution be supported by the correspondence upon which it is founded, that then every gentleman would readily assent to the resolution. But, sir, it is possible, although it appears to be scarcely possible, that some gentlemen may doubt whether the facts stated in the resolution be supported by the correspondence or not. This I admit is a fair though delicate inquiry, and I will therefore immediately proceed to the examination of that question—and I beg the most critical attention of the Senate in the course of the investigation.

I will now proceed, Mr. President, to inquire whether the facts stated in the resolution are supported by the correspondence upon which it is founded? In performing this task, I propose to read the whole of the correspondence which I conceive bears any material relation to the subject of the resolution, and no other; although the whole may not be entitled to, nor receive any animadversions from me, yet, as my sole object is to get at the true exposition and meaning of the correspondence, if I should unfortunately omit, misconceive, or misinterpret any material part of it, I shall have the consolation to reflect, that, by presenting the whole, the means of my correction in either case will be presented to the Senate and the world, if the observations I propose now to make should ever find their way out of the walls of this Chamber. I shall also present this correspondence in its responsive order, which will be found to be indispensable to the due comprehension of some of its most essential parts.

Permit me, then, sir, to call your attention first to the letter of Mr. Jackson to Mr. Smith, dated the 11th October, 1809, page 32, 33, of the printed documents. For, sir, although this letter is not mentioned in the resolution, yet it furnishes the original offensive insinuations, and is referred to and reiterated in the letter of the 23d of October, which is noticed in the resolution, and therefore the offensive expressions of the letter of the 11th are entitled to, and shall receive, the most accurate and critical attention and analysis.

The expressions alluded to are the following:

“You have not, in the conferences we have hitherto held, distinctly announced any such complaint, and I have seen with pleasure, in this forbearance, on your part, an instance of that candor which, I doubt not, will prevail in all our communications, inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act, done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed.”

“It was not known when I left England, whether Mr. Erskine had, according to the liberty allowed him, communicated to you, in extenso, his original instructions. It now appears that he did not. But in reverting to his official correspondence, and particularly to a despatch addressed on the 20th of April to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I find that he there states, that he had submitted to your consideration the three conditions specified in those instructions as the ground-work of an arrangement, which, according to information received from this country, it was thought in England might be made, with a prospect of great mutual advantage. Mr. Erskine then reports, verbatim et seriatim, your observations upon each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you, that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions; but the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions were in fact very explicitly communicated to you, and by you, of course, laid before the President for his consideration. I need hardly add, that the difference between these conditions and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th of April, is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation; nor need I draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that, under such circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister. I must here allude to a supposition, which you more than once mentioned to me, and by which, if it had any, the slightest foundation, this right might perhaps have been in some degree affected. You have informed me that you understood that Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions by which to regulate his conduct; and that upon one of them, which had not been communicated either to you or to the public, was to be rested the justification of the terms finally agreed upon between you and him. It is my duty, sir, solemnly to declare to you, and through you, to the President, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, which you have made the basis of an official correspondence with the latter Minister, and which was read by the former to the American Minister in London, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with this country on the matter to which it relates.”

Permit me, sir, to call your attention to the first paragraph of this quotation, in the following words. Addressing himself to Mr. Smith, Mr. Jackson says:

“You have not, in the conferences we have hitherto held, distinctly announced any such complaint, and I have seen with pleasure, in this forbearance, on your part, an instance of that candor, which, I doubt not, will prevail in all our communications, inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed.”

First, let me ask, Mr. President, what were the consequences that actually followed this act? The obvious answer is, the disavowal of it. Who is it that must have thought it unreasonable to complain of this disavowal? The answer is, Mr. Smith, Secretary of State. What are here suggested as the materials for his thinking, or upon which his thoughts must have been exercised? The answer is, the circumstances under which the act was done.

Mr. Smith, then, must have had a knowledge of these circumstances, upon which he exercised his thoughts; because it is impossible to exercise thoughts, or perform the act of thinking upon circumstances, without the knowledge of those circumstances. What must have been the character of such circumstances as could only lead to the disavowal of the act done under them? Could it have been fair? Could it have been honorable? Certainly not; because an act done under circumstances, the character of which was fair and honorable, might merit a better destiny than an unqualified disavowal; but this act was done under such circumstances, within the knowledge of Mr. Smith, as could only lead to a disavowal of it. The character of such circumstances must then have been dishonorable and scandalous, or certainly some better fate than a disavowal of the act done under them might have attended it; but in this case, Mr. Jackson says, no better fate could attend the act; the circumstances were such as could only lead to a disavowal. Now, sir, after thus stripping this extraordinary sentence of all its disguises, and translating it into plain English, to what does it amount? Why, sir, certainly and unquestionably to this:—You, Mr. Smith, Secretary of State of the United States, have entered into an arrangement with my predecessor, Mr. Erskine, under such scandalous and dishonorable circumstances as could only lead to a disavowal of it; and you yourself were so well apprized of them, and so conscious of their inevitable operation, as even to think it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal. I defy gentlemen to give to this offensive paragraph any other fair and correct interpretation; and if this be the fair and correct one, can you conceive, sir, of an insult more outrageous and premeditated? And will you not be surprised, sir, to be told, that the insult does not stop here; that, as offensive as it already appears, it does not stop here; that it is still further aggravated? Yes, sir, Mr. Jackson, not content with making this extraordinary and insolent communication in its ordinary form, underscores the words "could only," containing the point or gist of the insult, thus aggravating the act, either by the distrust thus manifested of Mr. Smith's mental perceptions, or by letting Mr. Smith know, that the insult was known to, and intentionally given by Mr. Jackson; for the underscoring could not have had any other object in view. In this impudent act of underscoring, Mr. Jackson reminds me, sir, of a set of miserable, conceited pretenders to wit, who, having great confidence in the acuteness of their own mental perceptions, and very little in that of their hearers, will kindly and compassionately explain the point of wit to their hearers, before they approach it in the recital of the story, to prepare and qualify the hearers' minds to join in the laugh intended to be produced by it. Yes, sir, this underscoring was as much as saying to Mr. Smith,

I am afraid that I have so nicely wrapped this insult in the veil of mysteries and disguises, that it may escape observation from the obtuseness of your mental perception, but am determined it shall not. I have underscored it for you; you shall look at it; you shall know that I, Mr. Jackson, understand and mean it. I have wrapped it up in mystery and disguise to be sure, but I will rend the veil, I will make an eyelet hole for you, that you shall look through, and behold the insult in all its front of grossness and impudence.

But, sir, if Mr. Jackson had then known, as well as he now does, the dignified character, the high sensibility, and the correct intelligence of the Secretary of State, he would have found it more honorable to himself to have spared his insult altogether, or at least might have spared himself the trouble of underscoring. Sir, I conceive this insult so gross and outrageous that I am surprised how the Executive Government could reconcile it to itself to proceed another step in the communications with Mr. Jackson. Certainly, sir, proceeding beyond this point manifests on the part of the Executive great moderation, great forbearance, and a condescension scarcely excusable; and, sir, I am perfectly sure, that nothing could have induced it to consider such gross intimations argumentatively, but the ardent and sincere desire which has invariably actuated the present, as well as the last, Administration to preserve peace and cultivate harmony, and a good understanding with Great Britain. And, sir, we shall see, in the course of this investigation, how it has been required for this, as well as for all former acts of moderation, forbearance, and condescension.

Let me now, sir, select out of the quotation another extraordinary expression, for a few animadversions, in the following words: "But the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions were in fact very explicitly communicated to you, and by you, of course, laid before the President for his consideration."

It is somewhat curious to observe what stress Mr. Jackson placed through the whole of his correspondence, upon what he is here pleased to term "the very act of substitution," and demonstrates to every impartial mind how slender are the pretexts with which Mr. Jackson is furnished, to apologize for, or rather to equivocate about the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement. Let me, therefore, inquire, in what this horrible act of substitution, as Mr. Jackson would make it appear, consists? Why, sir, simply in this: That the three inadmissible conditions mentioned in one of the despatches to Mr. Erskine, were verbally communicated to Mr. Smith, and insisted upon by Mr. Erskine, and that Mr. Smith, in rejecting those conditions verbally, and with great propriety and frankness, told Mr. Erskine what conditions he might obtain. Mr. Erskine, upon a review of all his letters of instructions, finding it impossible to obtain his, the three conditions first proposed, conceived himself fully empowered to propose those which possibly might have been intimated to him by Mr. Smith in conversation; and the arrangement was accordingly and promptly made between these two gentlemen on the part of their respective Governments. And now let me ask you, sir, what is there dishonorable, unfair, or even unusual in this proceeding, which is the whole amount of Mr. Jackson's "very act of substitution." Sir, it is very easy to see, that Mr. Jackson keeps his ingenuity constantly upon the stretch respecting this very act of substitution, evidently with a view of producing an impression by the insinuation, that the Executive Government of the United States had more than its share in that arrangement, and, in fact, was concerned in a dishonorable and scandalous combination with his predecessor, Mr. Erskine, for the purpose of producing the arrangement. Which insinuation, if true, must represent Mr. Erskine as a fool, a knave, or a traitor, or all three, and our Executive Government still further lost to every honorable sentiment, and utterly destitute of even the most ordinary understanding. An insinuation so insidious and affronting, cannot fail to excite the indignation and contempt of every patriotic heart in America. But, fortunately for the Executive Government, Mr. Erskine's previous explanation of this point to our Government strips the transaction of every shadow of a shade of a doubt, of which Mr. Jackson perhaps was not apprized at the time he was employed in devising the gross insinuation. Yes, sir, this was one miserable effort of Mr. Jackson to reproach our Executive Government for an act, for which it merited, and universally received the sincere applause and grateful thanks of the American people. It restored the Executive, as it ought to have done, to universal confidence, and utterly rooted out every doubt of its sincerity in its diplomatic intercourse with Great Britain, under which some of our misled and mistaken citizens, for a while, unfortunately labored. For the moment, terms were proposed on the part of Great Britain, which could, with honor or propriety, be accepted by the United States: they were frankly and promptly accepted by the Executive, regardless of all consequences from any other quarter. Sir, there is another part of this quotation which requires a few animadversions.

I allude, sir, to the first solemn declaration made to this Government by Mr. Jackson, respecting the despatch, in which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine. It is in the following words:

"It is my duty, sir, solemnly to declare to you, and through you, to the President, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, which you have made the basis of an official correspondence with the latter Minister, and which was read by the former to the American Minister in London, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with this country on the matter to which it relates."

The equivoque of this sentence consists in using the word "despatch" instead of the word "conditions." What does Mr. Jackson here solemnly declare to Mr. Smith? Why, sir, that the "despatch" from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, &c., is the only "despatch" by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine, &c., not that these were the only conditions that were prescribed. This, I have no doubt, is true. It is astonishing to me that such extraordinary conditions should have ever found their way into one despatch, or any despatch. I hope, for the honor of Mr. Canning, that he did not repeat them in any other despatch. But, sir, does Mr. Jackson here solemnly declare that Mr. Erskine had received no other despatch in relation to this subject, in which some other conditions were prescribed, or some discretion to Mr. Erskine, authorizing him to explain or modify those conditions, or, if he thought proper, to substitute others in their stead? No, sir, there is no solemn declaration to this effect. Is it not, then, very probable, that this was the case? As the despatch in question is not, I believe, the only despatch brought to Mr. Erskine by Mr. Oakley, and as Mr. Oakley was sent for the express purpose of bringing despatches to Mr. Erskine, and as one of these despatches did not contain the conditions prescribed in the preceding despatch, is it not natural to conclude that this despatch did prescribe some other conditions, or give some discretion respecting those previously prescribed, or make some new explanation or modification of them? As the last despatch did not contain the same conditions with the first, is it not natural to conclude that it did contain something else; and might not that something else be a full power to Mr. Erskine, which, either in its letter or spirit, would justify the arrangement finally concluded under it? This is so natural in itself, and is rendered so probable by Mr. Erskine's letter to Mr. Smith, dated the 14th August, 1809, that I think it fair to infer that such was the real course of facts. For you will observe, sir, that Mr. Jackson, in this first solemn declaration nowhere says that Mr. Erskine had no discretion given him in relation to this subject in any other despatch; but simply that the despatch in question is the only one in which the conditions are prescribed, &c. He may, notwithstanding this declaration, have had full powers, or discretionary powers, as he probably had, given him in some other despatch. In support of this conclusion, sir, let me beg your attention to Mr. Erskine's letter, containing the expressions to which I allude, and which will be found in pages 21 and 22 of the printed documents, in the following words:

"Under these circumstances, therefore, finding that I could not obtain the recognitions specified in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d January, (which formed but one part of his instructions to me) in the formal manner required, I considered that it would be in vain to lay before the Government of the United States the despatch in question, which I was at liberty to have done in extenso had I thought proper. But, as I had such strong grounds for believing that the object of His Majesty's Government could be attained, though in a different manner, and the spirit, at least, of my several letters of instructions be fully complied with, I felt a thorough conviction upon my mind, that I should be acting in conformity with His Majesty's wishes, and, accordingly, concluded the late provisional agreement on His Majesty's behalf with the Government of the United States.

"The disavowal by His Majesty is a painful proof to me that I had formed an erroneous judgment of His Majesty's views and the intentions of my instructions; and I have most severely to lament that an act of mine (though unintentionally) should produce any embarrassment in the relations between the two countries."

It is to be observed from this quotation, in the first place, sir, that Mr. Erskine explicitly disavows ever having shown the Executive Government the despatch containing the inadmissible conditions; and thus entirely exculpates it from the odious imputation attempted to be thrown on it by Mr. Jackson, and for this respectful forbearance to our Government, he is certainly entitled to the applause of his own. In the next place, Mr. Erskine explicitly states that the despatch in question contained but one part of his instructions, and that he thought that, from the spirit at least of his several letters of instructions, he was fully authorized to make the arrangement he had done. And I think there is very little doubt but he had—that Mr. Erskine still thinks so, there can be no doubt—for he nowhere says he is now convinced that his powers were incompetent—he only says, that the disavowal by His Majesty is a painful proof to him, that he had formed an erroneous judgment of His Majesty's views and the intentions of his instructions. Whether, or not, he had formed an erroneous view of His Majesty's views, or the intention of his instructions, I imagine, will depend very much upon the point of time to which the judgment he had formed is referable. If it be referred to the time of Mr. Oakley's mission, I am inclined to think he had neither formed an erroneous judgment of His Majesty's views, nor the intentions of his instructions; but, if he refers to the time of the disavowal, then I think it pretty certain, he had formed an erroneous judgment of both—for I have no doubt but His Majesty's views at least had completely changed between these two periods of time, and the real cause of this change, and of the disavowal itself, is to be looked for in the occurrences which took place, both in Europe and in the United States, during that interval. No, sir, the want of powers on the part of Mr. Erskine is not the true cause of the disavowal. I will now venture to conjecture the true cause, and, if it be the right one, the case will be a plain one, and all equivocations in the explanations rendered unnecessary. To do this, sir, I must call your attention to the state of events in Europe and in the United States, at these different periods of time. Mr. Oakley's mission was immediately after the British Government was apprized of the precipitate retreat of Sir John Moore's army from Spain, and the fortunate escape of the remains of it from Corunna. The affairs of Spain, which had before excited such high expectations in the British Cabinet, were given up as hopeless, &c. Contemporaneously with a knowledge of these events, the British Government was also informed of the rageous aggressions, contemplated by Congress; which she then believed would certainly be carried into effect, &c. Such was the state of things at the time of sending the despatches by Mr. Oakley. At the time of the disavowal, a new coalition had been formed, Austria had boldly entered into the war against France, and the Spaniards had been animated into further efforts at resistance, which excited new hopes of success, &c.

In this country, too, sir—it pains my heart to be compelled to recite the circumstances—our contemplated measures of resistance had been relaxed, and the whole country exhibited such scenes of divisions and disaffections as paralyzed in some degree the movements of the Government. I wish, sir, I could throw a shade of oblivion over these unfortunate scenes, or recollect them only as they furnish the strongest argument. Indeed, sir, they point with an infallible index to the course it now becomes us to pursue. Yes, sir, it is to these changes in the state of things, you are to look for the real causes of the disavowal, and not to the want of competent instructions on the part of Mr. Erskine; and it would have been more dignified on the part of the British Government to have told us so at once. She would then have said to us, the state of things is changed; at the time of giving the instructions, I was depressed from a combination of untoward events; I am now flushed with new hopes of elevation and of triumph. Besides, you have convinced me that you are untrue to yourselves—that you will shrink from the assertion and support of your own rights—if you will not, I am not bound to respect them, &c. I was then down, I am now up, and therefore I cannot grant you, in a spirit of triumph, what I solemnly promised in a spirit of despondency—I now find this the most favorable moment for establishing my favorite doctrine of the despotism of the ocean; and I cannot, and will not deprive myself of the advantage merely to avoid the imputation of bad faith. Yes, sir, this would have been a much more correct and dignified course on the part of Great Britain than the miserable effort made by Mr. Canning in devising an ingenious mental retort, for converting the bad faith of his own Government, in the disavowal of the arrangement, into a reproach upon ours, for the circumstances under which that arrangement was pretended to have been made. It is true, sir, that in the one case there would have been an admission of mala fides, which is basely attempted to be avoided by a miserable subterfuge in the other; but, then the British Cabinet would have had the consolation of having told the truth, taken the responsibility upon themselves and set us at defiance; and we should have been left to our own remedy, with a perfect understanding of the case. She would, also, have had the plea of necessity, the old-fashioned plea of tyrants, and, indeed, of everybody else, who has no better; but this is not Mr. Canning's mode of doing business; he chooses to act by tricks and contrivances; and, in the case of the disavowal, by a mental retort, flowing solely from his own visionary mental conceits, without a fact or pretext for its support.

Mr. President, I am told that Mr. Canning is a professed punster. But, sir, I would not condescend to make the observation here, had he not, after heaping upon us, during the whole of his administration, every injury and insult in his power, at the close of it placed us in a ludicrous situation by imposing on us an obligation, in a grave and serious concern to the nation, of expounding his equivoques, and unriddling his riddles. I really feel some condescension in being compelled, in my place, to hunt out for his and Mr. Jackson's meaning, through a transition of sentences, a collocation of words, and a shifting of verbiage. And indulge me, sir, with remarking, that I conceive the situation of a nation never can be more disastrous, calamitous, and lamentable, than when its great and serious affairs are placed in the hands of a parcel of punsters. For, sir, men of minds of that description are too much employed in the pleasing amusement of looking out for coruscations of wit and sentiment, to have any leisure for the more dull and unpleasurable business of observing and marking the great occurrences in human affairs, and of devising means of giving them a direction favorable to their own views, or to their country's interests. No, sir, this is too dull and plodding a pursuit for men of such light, fitting, brilliant imaginations, and if ever they unfortunately undertake it, they soon find the woful misapplication of talents. If, sir, any illustration were wanting of the correctness of these observations, it could nowhere be found better than in an attentive review of the historical events which occurred during the late British administration—the administration of the energetic, the brilliant, the sarcastic, the facetious, the joking Mr. Canning. He has carried his joking propensities far indeed. It may be truly said, he jeers at scars indeed—at scars of the blackest disgrace and ruin inflicted upon his bleeding country—upon a great nation, which probably would have received, and certainly merited, a better fate, if it had fortunately placed its destinies in better hands. Sir, it appears to me, that all the military enterprises during his whole administration, from the abominable attack on Copenhagen, down to the last expedition against the islands of Zealand, were nothing more than belligerent puns and conundrums. It has been constantly announced that some grand, secret expedition was on hand, and each succeeding one grander than the preceding, until the last expedition to Walchereen, which was the grandest of all; and, when the secret really came out, it appeared either that the object was abominable or contemptible, and the means of executing even the contemptible object, upon experiment, were generally found incompetent. Yes, sir, probably these enterprises have cost the British nation the lives of fifty thousand brave officers and soldiers, and I will not undertake to count the millions of dollars. Sir, the same little-minded course of policy has also been uniformly manifested during the same time against the United States; and in no respect more than in the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement—in avoiding to avow the real motives for it—and in the uncandid attempt to convert the bad faith of the British Government into a reproach upon our own; and this was to be done by an ingenious mental device, prettily conceived by Mr. Canning, and adroitly executed by Mr. Jackson, who, if not equal to Mr. Canning in the mysterious art of punning, I think can be very little way behind his prototype in the art of equivoques. Sir, the disavowal, in my judgment, was not for the want of competent powers. Too great a share of the real cause of the disavowal, unfortunately, is attributable to ourselves, and now is the moment to relieve ourselves from the imputation.

Let me now, sir, call your attention to the letter of Mr. Smith to Mr. Jackson, in reply to these highly offensive insinuations, dated 19th of October, 1809, pages 46 and 47, of the printed documents:

“The stress you have laid on what you have been pleased to state as the substitution of the terms finally agreed on, for the terms first proposed, has excited no small degree of surprise. Certain it is, that your predecessor did present for my consideration the three conditions, which now appear in the printed document—that he was disposed to urge them more than the nature of two of them (both palpably inadmissible, and one more than merely inadmissible) could permit, and that on finding his first proposals unsuccessful, the more reasonable terms comprised in the arrangement respecting the Orders in Council were adopted. And what, sir, is there in this to countenance the conclusion you have drawn in favor of the right of His Britannic Majesty to disavow the proceeding? Is anything more common in public negotiations than to begin with a higher demand, and, that failing, to descend to a lower? To have, if not two sets of instructions, two, or more than two, grades of propositions in the same set of instructions; to begin with what is the most desirable, and to end with what is found to be admissible, in case the more desirable should not be attainable. This must be obvious to every understanding, and it is confirmed by universal experience.

“What were the real and entire instructions given to your predecessor is a question essentially between him and his Government. That he had, or, at least, that he believed he had sufficient authority to conclude the arrangement, his formal assurances during our discussions were such as to leave no room for doubt. His subsequent letter of the 15th of June, renewing his assurances to me ‘that the terms of the agreement, so happily concluded by the recent negotiation, will be strictly fulfilled on the part of His Majesty,’ is an evident indication of what his persuasion then was as to his instructions. And with a view to show what his impressions have been even since his disavowal, I must take the liberty of referring you to the annexed extracts (see C) from his official letters of the 31st of July and of the 14th of August.

“The declaration ‘that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine of the 23d of January, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it relates,’ is new for the first time made to this Government; and I need hardly add that if that despatch had been communicated at the time of the arrangement, or if it had been known that the propositions contained in it, and which were at first presented by Mr. Erskine, were the only ones on which he was authorized to make an arrangement, the arrangement would not have been made."

The language of this quotation is at once so perspicuous, candid, and intelligent, that it requires no explanation or illustration from me. I will, therefore, pass on to Mr. Jackson's reply, dated 23d October, 1809, pages 59, 60, in the following words:

"I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing you, that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the eleventh instant, were at the time in substance made known to you; no stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement.

"Nothing can be more notorious than the frequency with which, in the course of a complicated negotiation, Ministers are furnished with a gradation of condition, on which they may be successively authorized to conclude. So common is the case which you put hypothetically, that, in acceding to the justice of your statement, I feel myself impelled to make only one observation upon it, which is, that it does not strike me as bearing upon the consideration of the unauthorized agreement concluded here, inasmuch as, in point of fact, Mr. Erskine had no such graduated instruction. You are already acquainted with that which was given, and I have had the honor of informing you that it was the only one by which the conditions on which he was to conclude were prescribed. So far from the terms, which he was actually induced to accept, having been contemplated in that instruction, he himself states that they were substituted by you in lieu of those originally proposed."

The first observation which occurs, in reading this extract, is, that Mr. Jackson here attempts to get at his object by what, I suppose, he considers an ingenious conceit, shifting his verbiage—the words, "conditions prescribed in the despatch" are here dropped; and the word "instructions" substituted. Thus endeavoring to show, that Mr. Erskine's instructions themselves, were in fact known to Mr. Smith, at the time of the arrangement. And how, sir, do you suppose he attempts to get at this fact? Why, sir, he tells you, from Mr. Smith's letter, just read; which is so far from justifying that conclusion, that it positively denies it; and even goes further, it furnishes, and refers to extracts of two letters from Mr. Erskine to Mr. Smith, the one dated the 31st July, the other the 14th August, 1809—it refers also to one of the 15th, all of which go explicitly to show that the instructions in question were not known to Mr. Smith, and that Mr. Erskine at every period of time thought his instructions competent to the arrangement. Sir, these papers ought to have relieved Mr. Jackson's mind from every vestige of a doubt, respecting this fact, if it were possible that he could even before have thought so unworthily, as well of Mr. Erskine, as of our Government; but very far from yielding to the influence of all this evidence, in the very face of it, with the most extraordinary effrontery, he contradicts the whole, and renews his offensive insinuation with all the aggravation of this impudent contradiction. But, sir, this is not all, he here reiterates this insinuation by referring to what he calls the "obvious deduction" he took the liberty of making in his letter of the 11th of October, which I have before animadverted on to the Senate; this reiteration demonstrates the propriety of my animadversions on that letter; the whole of which are equally applicable to the letter of the 23d of October, now under consideration, and noticed in the resolution before you; with this additional aggravating circumstance, that at the time of writing this last letter, Mr. Jackson knew that he wrote the first under false or mistaken impressions. Nor, sir, can it escape observation that he here again renewed his insinuations, deduced from his ridiculous and contemptible interpretation of what he calls the act of substitution.

Let me now, sir, proceed to Mr. Smith's letter to Mr. Jackson, of 1st of November, replying to these reiterated and aggravated insults. It will be found in pages 66, 67, of the printed documents, in the following words:

"But it would be improper to conclude the few observations, to which I purposely limit myself, without adverting to your repetition of a language implying a knowledge on the part of this Government that the instructions of your predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him. After the explicit and peremptory asseveration that this Government had no such knowledge, and that with such a knowledge no such arrangement would have been entered into, the view which you have again presented of the subject, makes it my duty to apprise you, that such insinuations are inadmissible in the intercourse of a foreign Minister with a Government that understands what it owes to itself."

This language is also too perspicuous and correct in itself, to require any explanation from me. But I cannot help remarking, sir, that surely every American patriot must feel a smile of confidence and complacency towards his own Government, when he beholds the openness, the frankness, the candor, and the intelligence with which it gets at the truth, compared with the miserable and contemptible conceits and subterfuges with which the British Minister attempts to disguise and obscure it.

After this admonition, made with dignified decision and moderation, let me turn your attention to Mr. Jackson's reply. It will be found in his letter to Mr. Smith of the 4th of November, page 72, of the printed documents, in the following words:

"You will find that in my correspondence with you, I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and last of all should I think of uttering an insinuation, where I was unable to substantiate a fact. To facts, such as I have become acquainted with them, I have scrupulously adhered, and in so doing I must continue, whenever the good faith of his Majesty's Government is called in question, to vindicate its honor and dignity, in the manner that appears to me best calculated for that purpose."

It cannot have escaped your observation, sir, that the Executive Government, with a moderation and forbearance almost peculiar to itself, would not impose upon Mr. Jackson the pain either of explanation or retraction. Notwithstanding his reiterated affronts, it made no demand of either. It appeared only to desire to throw out of the way these offensive insinuations. And how, sir, has it been required for this moderation and forbearance? Why, sir, instead of dropping a subject in which Mr. Jackson was so clearly in the wrong, he again renews it with still farther aggravations. He tells Mr. Smith that he had carefully avoided, in all his preceding correspondence, drawing conclusions, that did not necessarily follow from premises advanced by him; or uttering an insinuation, where he was unable to substantiate a fact. That he had scrupulously adhered to such facts as he had become acquainted with, and that he should continue to do so, whenever the good faith of his Majesty's Government was called in question, to vindicate its honor and dignity, in the manner he thought best calculated for that purpose.

Now, sir, permit me to ask you, if the Executive Government had gone on to receive any further communications from Mr. Jackson after these declarations, in what situation would the American Secretary of State have been placed? when Mr. Jackson, in substance, here tells him, with a superciliousness bordering on mental infatuation, I have insulted you, I here repeat the insult, and now give you notice that I will continue to repeat it, whenever I may think proper, during the whole course of our future negotiations. For, sir, at the time of writing this letter, you will be pleased to remark, that there remained no doubt of the true meaning of the offensive insinuations; because Mr. Smith had put an interpretation upon them in his letter of the 1st of November, which was plain and explicit, and which could not be misunderstood. Mr. Smith then tells Mr. Jackson, that his, Mr. Jackson's language, implied a knowledge on the part of the American Government, that the instructions of his predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him. That after the explicit and peremptory assertion that this Government had no such knowledge, and that with such knowledge, no such arrangement would have been entered into, &c. such insinuations are inadmissible, &c. This interpretation of the meaning of Mr. Jackson's insinuations is not denied, and therefore admitted by Mr. Jackson; and with that admission he goes on superciliously to repeat them, and to declare that he will continue to do so in all future discussions, whenever he pleases.

Is there one single gentleman in the United States, with an American heart in his bosom, who could wish to see his Government and his country placed in so degrading a situation? And what prospect of benefit could there be to the United States, in proceeding with a negotiation conducted with such a spirit of hostility and superciliousness on the part of the British negotiator? Is there a gentleman whose highest sensibilities are not excited by this insolent conduct of the British Minister? and whose judgment is not convinced of the propriety of the conduct of his own Government? And, sir, after all these outrageous and premeditated insults, what is the measure proposed by the Executive in relation to this contumacious Minister? Why, sir, the mildest in the whole vocabulary of expedients. Simply to refuse to receive any further communications from him, and to request his recall by his own Government; and in the mean time, to receive communications through any other channel. Thus merely shielding itself from further insults, and manifesting a solicitude for friendly intercourse with Great Britain, which must shield it from every imputation of insincerity in its professions of friendly views in relation to that Government. Yes, sir, negotiation is still open, although in my judgment without the smallest probability of success or advantage. Upon the whole review of this part of the subject then, sir, is there a gentleman, who is not prepared to say, that in refusing to receive any further communications from Mr. Jackson, the Executive Government has manifested a just regard to its own dignity and honor, as well as to the character and interests of the American people? and can there be a gentleman of this Senate who is not prepared to pledge himself to stand by and support the Executive Government in this respect to the last extremity? Permit me now, sir, to call your attention to a still more aggravated conduct on the part of Mr. Jackson. I allude to his letter headed "Circular," dated 13th of November, and published and circulated through the country. In all its essential parts it seems to be the same with the note of the same date delivered to Mr. Smith by Mr. Oakley at the request of Mr. Jackson, in the following words—and will be found in the printed documents pages 74, 75—

"That Mr. Jackson has seen with much regret, that facts, which it has been his duty to state in his official correspondence, have been deemed by the American Government to afford a sufficient motive for breaking off an important negotiation, and for putting an end to all communication whatever with the Minister charged by his Sovereign with that negotiation, so interesting to both nations, and on one point of which an answer has not even been returned to an official and written overture.

"One of the facts alluded to has been admitted by the Secretary of State himself, in his letter of the 19th October, viz: that the three conditions forming the substance of Mr. Erskine's original instructions were submitted to him by that gentleman. The other, viz: that that instruction is the only one in which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it related, is known to Mr. Jackson by the instructions which he has himself received.

"In stating these facts and in adhering to them, as his duty imperiously enjoined him to do, Mr. Jackson could not imagine that offence would be taken at it by the American Government, as most certainly none could be intended on his part."

It is to be observed, sir, that the letter headed "Circular," and this note officially presented by Mr. Oakley, at the request of Jackson, are of the same date, and essentially in the same words; and what must have been the surprise of the Executive Government, to find that within a very few days after an official note had been presented to it, at the request of the British Minister, complaining of some of its acts, that the same note should be published and circulated through the country, as an appeal to the people against the conduct of their Executive Government in relation to these acts! Nor can it escape observation, sir, that this circular letter contained the first official announcement of the nature of the negotiations between this Government and Mr. Jackson. This sir, was such a premeditated and inexcusable affront to the whole American people, as well as to their Government, that nothing could have restrained me at this time from submitting a resolution to the Senate, requiring the President to send Mr. Jackson immediately out of the country, but the consideration, that this contumacious and insolent conduct has been presented to the British Government, as one of the grounds upon which his immediate recall is requested, and I am unwilling to interfere with this milder course, which the Executive has thought proper to adopt. Yes, sir, I wish it now to be explicitly understood, that I think Mr. Jackson ought instantly to be sent out of the country. That it is due to the dignity and the honor of the people and the Government; and even that measure would afford a poor atonement for his insolent affronts to both:

I wish it also understood, sir, that I consider the insult to consist in the appeal itself, in the publication and circulation of the paper, without any reference to the question of the truth or falsehood of the facts stated as the grounds of the appeal; but, sir, as an aggravation in the case, the facts stated are manifestly false or fallacious, and in some respects, I believe both false and fallacious. As an incontestible evidence of this, sir, I beg your attention to the first paragraph of this impudent appeal, which has been already read, in the following words:

"That Mr. Jackson has seen with regret, that facts which it has been his duty to state in his official correspondence, have been deemed by the American Government to afford a sufficient motive for breaking off an important negotiation, and for putting an end to all communication whatever with the Minister charged by his Sovereign with that negotiation so interesting to both nations, and on one point of which an answer has not even been returned to an official and written overture."

What, sir, is the evident design of Mr. Jackson in thus presenting this complaint to the people against their own Government? Why, sir, to impress them with a belief that he really was engaged in an important negotiation, highly interesting both to the United States and Great Britain, and that there was a fair prospect of bringing it to a happy conclusion; when the Executive of the United States causelessly and capriciously put an end to it, utterly regardless of the high interests of both nations. This surely, sir, if well founded, is a serious complaint, and let me ask every gentleman, and especially those, if there be any, who have habitually placed their faith in British orthodoxy, whether this was not the impression intended to have been made by Mr. Jackson? Sir, it is too obvious to be denied. Now, sir, let me look into the state and prospect of this negotiation, and see whether it was likely to eventuate in these intimated and anticipated advantages to either nation? Without animadverting upon the general spirit and temper of the whole of Mr. Jackson's communications, the nature and tendency of which cannot be mistaken by any gentleman, who has given them an impartial consideration, let me call your most particular attention to a principle of ultimatum, as I understand it, contained in pages 38, 39, of the printed documents. Speaking of the Orders in Council and the British principle of blockades, in page 38, Mr. Jackson uses these words:

"The effect of this new order is to relieve the system under which the former orders were issued, from that which has always been represented in this country as the most objectionable and offensive part of it, the option given to neutrals to trade with the enemies of Great Britain through British ports on payment of a transit duty. This was originally devised and intended as a mitigation of what is certainly more correct but more rigid in principle, the total and unqualified interdiction of all trade with the enemy."

And in speaking on the same subject, in the same page, and page 39, Mr. Jackson used these words:

"And that by the capture of Martinique, in addition to that of almost all the colonies of the enemies of Great Britain, together with the blockade of Guadeloupe, the extent to which the liberty of commerce with enemies' colonies applied, has been so far narrowed, that there is little of practical hardship in recurring to the rule which, however occasionally mitigated in its application, Great Britain can never cease in principle to maintain."

Now, sir, let me ask, if there is one single gentleman, in this Senate or in the United States, who would formally admit, by treaty, that Great Britain has a right to interdict the whole of our trade with her enemy? Or what prospect there could be of a happy termination of a negotiation, in which the principle is asserted by Great Britain, and a positive declaration made, that she never will cease to maintain it?

But again, sir, let us see in what manner this negotiation was to be conducted, and what were the powers of Mr. Jackson in relation to it. To do this, sir, with the most perfect fairness and impartiality, let me present the subject in Mr. Jackson's own words. His first announcement will be found in page 63, of the printed documents:

"Beyond this point of explanation which was supposed to have been attained, but which is now given by the present letter in the form understood to be most agreeable to the American Government, my instructions are prospective; they look to substituting for notions of good understanding, erroneously entertained, practical stipulations on which a real reconciliation of all differences may be substantially founded; and they authorize me not to renew proposals which have already been declared here to be unacceptable, but to receive and discuss any proposals made on the part of the United States, and eventually to conclude a convention between the two countries."

Now, sir, in what manner were these negotiations to commence? And to what point were they to extend? Why, Mr. Jackson tells us, that his prospective instructions do not authorize him to renew proposals which have already been declared to be unacceptable to the United States, but to receive and discuss any proposals made on the part of the United States, and eventually to conclude a convention, &c. Here, sir, Mr. Jackson has nothing on his part to propose, but sets himself up to be courted by new proposals on the part of the United States, and then he has power to receive and discuss any such proposal, and eventually to conclude a convention, &c.—underscoring the word eventually to give it a peculiar character and emphasis. Now, sir, I should like to know what events Mr. Jackson's instructions would call for, to take place between his positive power to receive and discuss, and his eventual power to conclude a convention, &c.—Why, sir, I suppose the proposals on the part of this Government must exactly fit his instructions without the Government's knowing what they were; and in case of such a lucky hit, these proposals might be transmitted to the British Government, and if there also approved, why, then, Mr. Jackson might eventually be invested with powers to conclude a convention, &c. So much by way of conjecture, as to Mr. Jackson's eventual powers. Now, sir, let me ask you, what does he tell us are his positive powers? A power merely to receive and discuss. Why, sir, every gentleman here present has that power; and, indeed, every lady too, sir, has the power to receive and discuss, and eventually to conclude a convention, &c. But, sir, the power merely to receive and discuss, is what is very properly called, and is, in fact, no power.

I am apprized that Mr. Jackson places this subject upon a ground somewhat different in his next letter; or, at least, it would appear so if that letter were taken by itself; but, in fact, I apprehend there is no material difference in the two statements. Let me, however, call your attention to his own words, which will be found in page 71, of the printed documents. In addressing Mr. Smith, Mr. Jackson says:

"I am surprised at the transition by which it appears to you that this part of the subject is connected with the authority empowering me to negotiate with you. It will not, I dare say, have escaped your recollection that I informed you, at a very early period of our communications, that, in addition to the usual credential letter, His Majesty had been pleased to invest me with a full power, under the great seal of his Kingdom, for the express purpose of concluding a treaty or convention."

Here, sir, Mr. Jackson, in a peculiarity of style and manner, says, that His Majesty has been pleased to invest him with a full power, and for the express purpose of concluding a treaty, &c. But here Mr. Jackson omits the mode of conducting the negotiation, and the conditions upon which he would be authorized to conclude, &c. But, sir, he had been very explicit upon those points before; and this sentence, therefore, must be taken in connexion with his previous explicit declarations in this respect, or Mr. Jackson would be reduced to the dilemma of a direct contradiction; therefore, sir, this new declaration is nothing more than an equivocation upon the former, and makes no material variation in the first announcement of his powers, and the mode pointed out for conducting the negotiations under them; especially, sir, as he took the precaution to underscore the word eventually, and therefore cautioned Mr. Smith to regard it as the most important and significant word in the sentence. Let me here inquire, sir, whether there is a single gentleman in the United States who now believes that a negotiation commenced and conducted under such auspices could be highly interesting to the United States or to Great Britain? Or, that it promised the smallest advantage to either? Still less could any gentleman conclude that it was causelessly or capriciously broken off by the Executive of the United States. And if impressions to this effect were intended to have been made on the American people, as is most obvious, then I am warranted in concluding that if this part of the appeal is not both false and fallacious, it is, at least, false or fallacious, and thus justifies to the full extent the expressions in the resolution.

I beg now, sir, to turn your attention to another part of this insidious appeal, in the following words:

"One of the facts alluded to has been admitted by the Secretary of State himself, in his letter of the 19th of October, viz., that the three conditions, forming the substance of Mr. Erskine's original instruction, were submitted to him by that gentleman. The other, viz., that that instruction is the only one in which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it related, is known to Mr. Jackson by the instructions which he has himself received."

I now assert that the facts here stated are not true. If Mr. Jackson had never made any other statement than the preceding, I do not know that any offence would have been taken at it by the Executive Government. The offensive insinuations of Mr. Jackson are fully explained by Mr. Smith, in his letter of the 8th of November, in the following, which could not have been misunderstood by Mr. Jackson:

"In my letter of the 19th ultimo, I stated to you that the declaration in your letter of the 11th, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d of January, was the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it related was then for the first time made to this Government. And it was added, that if that despatch had been communicated at the time of the arrangement, or if it had been known that the propositions contained in it were the only ones on which he was authorized to make an arrangement, the arrangement would not have been made.

"In my letter of the 1st instant, adverting to the repetition in your letter of the 23d ultimo of a language implying a knowledge in this Government that the instructions of your predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him, an intimation was distinctly given to you that, after the explicit and peremptory asseveration that this Government had not any such knowledge, and that with such a knowledge, such an arrangement would not have been made, no such insinuation could be admitted by this Government.

"Finding that in your reply of the 4th instant, you have used language which cannot be understood but as reiterating and even aggravating the same gross insinuation, it only remains, in order to preclude opportunities which are thus abused, to inform you that no further communications will be received from you, and that the necessity of this determination will, without delay, be made known to your Government."

Now, sir, is it not most obvious that the grounds of complaint against Mr. Jackson, which caused the rupture in the negotiation, are very different from what he states them to have been in his insidious appeal to the people; and if so, sir, is not the appeal false or fallacious? or both?

Sir, another part of this insidious appeal, deserves some animadversions. It is in the following words—

"In stating these facts and adhering to them, as his duty imperiously enjoined him to do, Mr. Jackson could not imagine that offence would be taken at it by the American Government, as most certainly none could be intended on his part."

Sir, it is painful for me to be so often compelled to question the candor of any gentleman, particularly one clothed with the high functions of Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty; but permit me to ask you, sir, how it is possible for Mr. Jackson not to conceive that offence would be taken at his offensive insinuations after Mr. Smith's letter of the 1st of November, telling him in strong and decisive terms that offence had been taken at them? or how can Mr. Jackson reconcile it to himself to say that in adhering to these gross insinuations, he did not intend to give offence? Let me ask you, sir, what else he did, or could intend? For my part, I can see nothing else that he could either rationally intend or expect. Here then, sir, is another false or fallacious disguise thrown out before the people of the United States, as will always be the case in every appeal to them, calculated, or evidently intended, to excite their resentments and distrusts against their own Government.

Now, sir, upon the most critical review of this exposition, is there a single gentleman present, who is not prepared to say, that the facts stated in the resolution are fully justified by the correspondence? And if they be, sir, what inducement can possibly prevent unanimity on the present occasion? Surely those, who wish peace with Great Britain, will find unanimity upon this occasion the most likely to deter from war; and surely, sir, every gentleman must feel and see that the declarations contained in the resolution are imperiously due to the dignity and honor of our own Government, as well as to our respect for the people and ourselves. Sir, what would be the effect of passing by unnoticed these gross and insidious insults to both the people and Government? Why, sir, foreign Ministers would begin to conceive, that an appeal to the people was amongst the most sacred of their privileges and immunities. The frequency of them already is almost sufficient to establish and sanctify the rule. The cases of Genet, Yrujo, the publication of Mr. Canning's letter in one of the Boston newspapers, &c., never received sufficient animadversions from Congress; and if this most aggravated case of all should pass over unnoticed, I should not be surprised to see Mr. Jackson during the present Winter set himself up as a British President in New York, contesting the point of jurisdiction before the people, with the American President at Washington; whilst Congress, regardless of their own Constitutional powers, &c., should stand by and behold the extraordinary scene in a state of perfect neutrality. Sir, is it possible, that Congress can so far forget their duties to the people and their respect for themselves? Independently of the obvious propriety of this proceeding in itself, have we, sir, no examples of the course of conduct recommended by the resolution? Let me remind you, sir, of the case of Count De Palm in the British Parliament. In that case, sir, the Count De Palm presented a memorial to the British King by the express order of his Government, complaining of the misrepresentation of facts made in the King's speech to Parliament, which complaint British historians admit was well founded. After presenting the memorial, he caused it to be published and circulated through the country, etc. What, sir, was the conduct of the British Parliament and nation upon that occasion? Sir, the Parliament unanimously entered into resolutions expressing the highest indignation at the insolent procedure; and presented an address to His Majesty requesting him to order the Count De Palm out of the country immediately. Sir, I will not trouble the Senate with reading the proceedings of the House of Commons upon this memorable occasion; because I presented them to the Senate last Winter in the case of the publication of Mr. Canning's letter in the Boston paper, and I, therefore, presume they are now fresh in the recollection of every gentleman. And what, sir, was the conduct of the opposition in the British House of Commons, when their King and country were insulted by a foreign Minister? Did they hold back, did they attempt to paralyze the proceedings of their Government in resenting this conduct and retrieving its wounded honor and dignity? No, sir, they were Englishmen and felt the indignity to themselves! They were patriots, and could not see their Government and nation insulted with indifference! They stepped forward, sir, and were the first to move the resolution and address. The proceeding was unanimous; and what benefit did the British nation receive from this unanimous and prompt proceeding? Why, sir, from the year 1726 to the present time, the insult has not, I believe, been repeated, and probably never will again.

Sir, how honorable, how patriotic, was this course of conduct to the British opposition! How honorable and laudable would be its imitation here! Especially, sir, when union is all that is wanting to make us happy and victorious. Why then, sir, should we not have union, when it is so easy and efficacious a remedy for all our difficulties? Sir, the nation expects it; the nation has a right to demand it. May I not then hope, sir, that the hitherto dominant spirit of party will now yield to an occasion, so obvious, so urgent, so honorable! Sir, I cannot express to you the pleasure I should feel at my heart, if I could see all irritations banished, and harmony and mutual good will universally pervading all political scenes and all social intercourse. That the present occasion may be improved to this desirable end, is the most fervent prayer of one, who, in the present delicate, interesting crisis of the nation, feels a devotion for his country beyond everything else on this side of Heaven!

After Mr. GILES concluded, the question was taken on the passage of the resolution to a third reading. There were twenty-four members present, besides the President pro tem.; of whom twenty voted in favor of it. It was ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

PRIVILEGES OF FOREIGN MINISTERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers within the United States; which was read the second time.

The question having been put on its passage to a third reading—

Mr. HILLHOUSE said he could have no objection to the passage of such a bill if he were satisfied of the necessity of it. It was not a novel subject, for it had been agitated three or four years ago in the case of the Spanish Minister, and there was a very unanimous opinion in the Senate in favor of such a provision, if it were necessary to carry the object into effect. But the Senate had been informed that the Executive did not think it necessary. Mr. H. said that he himself had been of the same opinion; he could scarcely suppose that the Government would have remained so long without a competent provision to enable the Executive to send away foreign Ministers conducting themselves improperly. He believed for his part that the Government had already competent authority to send them away; and as to the means, undoubtedly the proper means were within the direction of the President of the United States, who had the control of the military and naval force. A civil officer could only imprison a person, and had no power over him but in his own district; therefore, any authority given by the bill to civil officers would be incompetent to the purpose. A marshal could not remove a foreign Minister out of the country; for the moment he stepped beyond his jurisdiction his power ceased. Such a service peculiarly belonged to the military and naval force, of which the President had already the entire direction. He therefore thought that the passage of this bill, instead of adding to the weight and character of the President, would be declaring that he is not possessed of the power which the Constitution has given him. He knew not why this bill should be now introduced. If it was in relation to the subject under consideration this morning, he presumed that the President would now as heretofore conceive that he had the power, and wanted no legislative assistance. Mr. H. said he certainly must vote against the bill, unless some necessity were shown for passing it. On the former occasion alluded to (the conduct of d'Yrujo) every one was convinced that the Executive had been insulted, and there was but one sentiment, that if the President had not the power of sending away a foreign Minister, he should be invested with it. And yet a bill for giving him that power had been rejected almost unanimously, upon the ground that no legislative provision was necessary; and if he was not much mistaken, information was given to the Senate through those who were in the confidence of the Executive, that he did not want an investiture of the power by Congress; conceiving that he possessed it from a higher source, the Constitution of the United States, which authorized him to receive foreign Ministers, in which power was included everything necessary to carry it into execution. Could it have been expected by the framers of the Constitution, that, in case of collision with a foreign Minister, the President was to wait for the passage of a law by Congress before he could act? This subject had never escaped the attention of Congress; but the President had always been conceived to possess ample power for the purpose contemplated by the bill. If such a provision however were necessary, a law for the purpose ought to have been passed long ago. Under present impressions, Mr. H. said, he should consider this bill as an attempt to express the opinion of Congress that the President did not possess a power which he believed to be vested in him by the Constitution; and therefore he must vote against it.

Mr. GILES said that he did not feel himself at this time qualified to go into any observations on the bill. It certainly was not his wish to press through the Senate a bill without its being well considered, particularly when it involved a Constitutional question. He did not know that the President might not have been supposed to possess the power proposed to be given to him by the bill; but he knew very well that the President never had ventured to exercise it. Not wishing to press the bill, he had no objection that it should lie on the table, if any gentleman should think proper to make a motion for that purpose.

Mr. POPE said he had been forcibly struck with the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut, not that he deemed the bill unnecessary, even although the President might already have such a power; for, as so much jealousy existed in this country of Executive power, perhaps Congress should nevertheless express its opinion on this point. He was of opinion also that that part of the bill which related to civil officers should be stricken out. The natural agent of the Executive authority was the naval or military power. To give further time for the consideration of the bill he moved to postpone it till Monday next.

The motion for postponement was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned till Monday next.

MONDAY, December 11.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the resolution relating to the official correspondence between the Secretary of State and Francis J. Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, correctly engrossed; and the resolution was read the third time.

On the question, Shall this resolution pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Condit, Crawford, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Gregg, Griswold, Lambert, Leib, Matthewson, Meigs, Parker, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, and Pickering.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 6th instant, the petition of Joseph Joshua Dyster, reported a bill to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. POPE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes,'" reported the bill without amendment; and on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the bill was amended.

Ordered, That it pass to the third reading as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers within the United States; and no amendment having been offered, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. BRENT presented the petition from the committee of the board of trustees of the institution for the education of youth in the City of Washington, praying an act of incorporation for the establishment of a college therein; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. BRENT, GOODRICH, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. POPE, agreeably to notice, presented a bill in addition to an act regulating the laying out and making a turnpike road from Cumberland in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio. [The bill contemplates an additional appropriation of $50,000 for this object.] The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

RECRUITING SERVICE.

The bill to repeal an act, entitled "An act to suspend for a limited time the recruiting service," was read a second time.

Mr. LEIB observed that it was the usual course of business to refer a bill introduced by a member to a select committee on its second reading. Not wishing to travel out of the usual routine of business, he made that motion in relation to this bill.

Mr. GILES observed that if he could ascertain the object of a commitment, he should have no objection to it; but that this was a bill not susceptible of modification, containing but one principle, and the sooner it was acted on the better. He was therefore opposed to commitment.

Mr. LEIB said he had only made the motion in deference to the usual practice of the Senate. He was also of opinion that the sooner it was acted on the better; and, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, he withdrew the motion for reference.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, December 12.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to the directions of the act, entitled "An act regulating the currency of foreign coins in the United States," passed April 10th, 1866; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster was read the second time. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, was read the second time. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes,'" was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The bill to repeal the act, entitled "An act to suspend, for a limited time, the recruiting service," was read the third time, and the further consideration thereof postponed until the 1st day of August next.

The bill to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers, within the United States, was resumed, and the further consideration of the bill postponed until to-morrow.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 13.

The bill, entitled "An act extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants," was read the second time, and passed to the third reading.

Mr. POPE presented the petition of the inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory east of Pearl river, stating that their remote situation renders it difficult, if not impracticable for them to participate in the benefits of the Territorial government; and praying a division of the said Territory, for reasons stated at large in the petition; which was read.

Mr. MEIGS gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to authorize the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated in the treaty of Brownstown, in the Michigan Territory.

The bill in addition to the "Act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers, within the United States, was read the third time, and it was agreed further to postpone the consideration thereof until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 14.

The bill, entitled "An act extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants," was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the bill to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers within the United States.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Ordered, That the bill be recommitted to the original committee, further to consider and report thereon.

Mr. MEIGS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated in the treaty of Brownstown, in the Michigan Territory; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. LEIB submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a copy of the correspondence between him and the Governor of Pennsylvania, in the case of Gideon Olmstead.

Mr. BRADLEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to incorporate religious societies in the District of Columbia; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

FRIDAY, December 15.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday on the subject; and

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a copy of the correspondence between him and the Governor of Pennsylvania, in the case of Gideon Olmstead.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to incorporate religious societies in the District of Columbia; and on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be the order of the day for the first Monday in January next.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, gave notice that on Monday he should ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Joseph Summerl, Simon Philipson, William Hamon, Archibald McCall, and Isaac Clason.

The bill to authorize the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated by the treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. MEIGS, BRADLEY, and POPE, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BRADLEY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, requested to lay before the Senate a statement of the payments which have been made by the respective States, of the direct tax; designating, as far as may be, what sums have been paid into the Treasury; what sums are unaccounted for by the supervisors; what sums are in the hands of collectors; and the persons in whose hands such moneys are; and what sums are still due from any of the respective States.

MONDAY, December 18.

JOHN SMITH, from the State of New York, attended.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The act authorizing a detachment of one hundred thousand men from the militia, will expire on the 30th of March next. Its early revival is recommended, in order that timely steps may be taken for arrangements such as the act contemplated.

Without interfering with the modifications rendered necessary by the defects or inefficacy of the laws, restrictive of commerce and navigation, or with the policy of disallowing to foreign armed vessels the use of our waters, it falls within my duty to recommend, also, that, in addition to the precautionary measure authorized by that act, and to the regular troops, for completing the legal establishment of which enlistments are renewed, every necessary provision may be made for a volunteer force of twenty thousand men, to be enlisted for a short period, and held in a state of organization and readiness for actual service at the shortest warning.

I submit to the consideration of Congress, moreover, the expediency of such a classification and organization of the militia, as will best insure prompt and successive aids from that source, adequate to emergencies which may call for them.

It will rest with them, also, to determine how far further provision may be expedient for putting into actual service, if necessary, any part of the naval armament not now employed.

At a period presenting features in the conduct of foreign Powers towards the United States, which impose on them the necessity of precautionary measures involving expense, it is a happy consideration that such is the solid state of the public credit, that reliance may be justly placed on any legal provision that may be made for resorting to it in a convenient form and to an adequate amount.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 3, 1810.

The Message was read, and referred to Messrs. GILES, POPE, BRADLEY, GOODRICH, LEIB, SUMTER, and GILMAN, the committee to whom was referred, on the 1st December last, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as respects the relations existing between the United States and Great Britain and France, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

PUBLIC ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. POPE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the improvement of the United States by public roads and canals; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The bill is as follows:

A Bill for the improvement of the United States, by public roads and canals.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, in all cases in which any company or companies shall have been heretofore incorporated, or shall in future be incorporated, under the authority of any State, or the concurring authorities of any two or more States within which the canals and roads hereinafter enumerated and described shall lie, or through which they shall pass, for the cutting, constructing, and making such canals and roads, and of the capital stock, of which at least one-half shall have been subscribed, either by individuals, bodies politic and corporate, or by States, the President of the United States, on the application of such company or companies, shall be authorized, and is hereby authorized, to subscribe unto the capital stock of such company or companies, but in the manner and under the restrictions in this act contained, to the amount which may be deficient in the subscriptions to the said stock, not exceeding the one-half of the whole capital stock of such company or companies, to wit:

1. To the capital stock of any company or companies which may be incorporated by the States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, for the purpose of cutting a canal from the harbor of Boston to the navigable waters of Newport Bay, in the State of Rhode Island.

2. To the capital stock of any company which may be incorporated by the State of New Jersey, for the purpose of cutting a canal from the navigable waters of Raritan to the navigable waters of the Delaware.

3. To the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

4. To the capital stock of the Dismal Swamp Canal Companies of Virginia and North Carolina, or of any other company or companies incorporated for the purpose of cutting a canal from the navigable waters of James river to Albemarle Sound, sufficiently deep for sloop navigation.

5. To the capital stock of any company or companies incorporated by the State of New York, for the purpose of cutting a canal from the Hudson or its waters, to the waters of Lake Ontario, or of Lake Erie.

6. To the capital stock of any company incorporated by the State of New York, for the purpose of cutting a canal for vessels drawing ten feet water, to pass the Falls of Niagara.

7. To the capital stock of any company incorporated by the State of New York, for the purpose of cutting a canal from the river Hudson to the waters of Lake Champlain.

8. To the capital stock of any company incorporated by the States of Ohio or Pennsylvania, for the purpose of cutting a canal from the waters of the Ohio to those of Lake Erie.

9. To the capital stock of any company incorporated by the State of Kentucky, for the purpose of cutting a canal to pass the Falls of Ohio.

10. To the capital stock of any company or companies which shall be incorporated by the States of Virginia or North Carolina, for the purpose of cutting a canal from the waters of the Roanoke, above the Great Falls, to the waters of the Appomattox.

11. To the capital stock of any company or companies which shall be incorporated for the purpose of cutting a canal from the waters of the Tennessee river to the waters of the Tombigbee.

12. To the capital stock of any company or companies which may be incorporated by any of the States for the purpose of making turnpike roads from the highest navigable waters of the Atlantic to the nearest navigable waters of the Western States.

13. And to the capital stock of any company or companies which may be incorporated by any one or more States, for the purpose of making a turnpike road or roads, in the most proper direction, for carrying the general mail from and through the District of Maine, in the State of Massachusetts, to and through the State of Georgia.

14. And to the capital stock or stocks of any company or companies which may be formed by any one or more States, for the purpose of cutting such canals, opening and clearing such rivers, or making such turnpike roads, as may hereafter be approved of by Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever application by any of the companies, in this act enumerated, which are now incorporated, or may hereafter be incorporated, for the purpose of cutting, constructing, and making the said canals, or roads, shall be made as aforesaid, an authentic map and description of such canal or road, explaining the manner in which the same is proposed to be carried into effect, shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, together with a correct list and account of all the subscriptions and payments which shall have been made to the capital stock of such company or companies, and also a copy of the law under which the company or companies shall have been incorporated and empowered to act; and, also, if the said company have already commenced their operation, have a clear and detailed statement of all the expenses they shall have incurred, of all the moneys due to them by stockholders and others, and of the debts due by them, and also a complete schedule of all the lands, effects, and rights, belonging to said company or companies; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President that all the provisions of this act have been and are fully satisfied, and complied with, and that competent provision has been made for cutting or making the said canals or roads, and efficient provision for the payment of the shares subscribed therefor, and for the recovery of any arrears thereon, so as that the portion actually payable by the United States, shall never exceed one-half of the capital stock actually paid or payable for such work; and that the canal or road for effecting which such company or companies have been incorporated, is one of those enumerated and described in this act; and that, in his opinion, there is no sufficient objection to the line or lines, on which the said companies propose to carry the said canals or roads, then the said subscription on the part of the United States shall be made in the form and manner in this act authorized. But, if any objection as aforesaid, occur to the line or lines, on which the said companies propose to carry their canals or roads, then it shall be lawful for the President to withhold the subscription on behalf of the United States, until the line of said canals or roads shall be located in such manner as to him may appear proper.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Register of the Treasury shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, issue certificates for the amount of the instalments of that part of the capital stock of the company or companies aforesaid, subscribed on the part of the United States, as the said instalments shall, from time to time, become payable under the several laws of incorporation of such companies; which said certificates shall bear interest, at the rate of six per cent. a year, from the time and times respectively at which the instalments above mentioned shall become payable as aforesaid, and shall be assignable and transferable as other certificates of the United States stock; but the principal of said certificates shall be redeemable at the will of the United States, and payable out of the proceeds of the tract of land hereinafter designated; and the proceeds of the sales of the public land contained in the said tract, shall, from time to time, be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, to the payment of the principal of such subscription, by either purchasing or redeeming the certificates issued as aforesaid, as may be most convenient.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in order to make good and secure the payment of the interest on the certificates issued as by this act provided, so much of the money arising from the sale of the public lands of the United States, as may be necessary, shall be, and is hereby, appropriated, the said interest to be paid in the same manner as the interest of the public debt of the United States, and at such place or places as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the President to cause the shares which shall belong to the United States, of the capital stock of any of the companies to which subscription may be made on the part of the United States as aforesaid, to be sold, provided the same shall not be sold under par, and the moneys arising from such sales and also from dividends of the profits on the stock of any of the said companies belonging to the United States, may be applied to the payment, redemption, or purchase of the interest, or principal, of any certificates issued by the United States under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, in order to make provision for the purchase or redemption of the certificates issued under this act, the proceeds of all the public land of the United States, contained in a tract, bounded on the east by the western boundary of the Connecticut reserve; on the south by the forty-first degree of north latitude; on the west by that meridian which forms the western boundary of the State of Ohio, continued northwardly to the Lake Michigan; and northwardly and eastwardly by the Lakes Michigan, Huron, St. Clair, and Erie, and the straits by which they are connected, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, with respect to the companies which may be already incorporated for any of the purposes above recited, the shares constituting the subscription which may be made on the part of the United States, as by this act provided, shall be vested in the United States, and it shall and may be lawful for the President to appoint a proxy to vote at any stated or other meeting of the stockholders on behalf of the United States. But that no subscription

SENATE.

Volunteer Corps.

JANUARY, 1810.

Mr. BRADLEY gave notice that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a bill to augment the compensation to the circuit judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MEIGS presented the resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, instructing their representation in Congress to use their endeavors to procure an extension of the time of payments for public lands in certain cases; which was read: Whereupon, Mr. M. submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending by law the times of payment for public lands in certain cases.

FRIDAY, January 12.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, in place of Edward Tiffin, resigned; and CHRISTOPHER G. CHAMPLIN, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, in the place of Francis Malbone, deceased; severally produced their credentials, which were read. And the oath prescribed by law having been administered to them, they took their seats in the Senate.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported that they had examined, and found correctly engrossed, the bill authorizing the fitting out, officering, and manning, the frigates belonging to the United States; and the bill was read the third time. And, on motion by Mr. GILES, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, on the subject of public lands; and,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending by law the times of payment for public lands in certain cases.

Ordered, That Messrs. MEIGS, FRANKLIN, and GREGG, be the committee.

Ordered, That the resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, yesterday communicated to the Senate, be referred to the same committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia. And, on motion by Mr. ANDERSON, it was agreed further to postpone the consideration thereof to Tuesday next.

Mr. BRADLEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to augment the compensation to the judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion of Mr. GILMAN,

Ordered, That Mr. CAMPBELL be on the committee, agreeably to the twenty-second rule for conducting business in the Senate, in place of Mr. GRISWOLD.

Mr. MEIGS, from the committee to whom was recommended the petition of Daniel Boone, together with the bill for his relief, made report; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

MONDAY, January 15.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill authorizing the fitting out, officering, and manning, the frigates belonging to the United States. And, on motion by Mr. GILES, the bill was re-committed to the original committee, further to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Daniel Boone. And, on motion by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed to Tuesday next.

TUESDAY, January 16.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, of the 3d instant, reported, in part, a bill to engage a corps of volunteers, for a short period, in the service of the United States; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia; and, after progress, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 17.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of War, in compliance with the fifth section of the "Act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks, and to authorize the laying out certain public roads, and for other purposes;" and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia. And, on motion by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill was re-committed to a select committee, to consider and report thereon. Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, BRENT, GOODRICH, BRADLEY, and GAILLARD, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the fitting out, officering, and manning, the frigates belonging to the United States, together with the amendment yesterday reported thereon. And the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

VOLUNTEER CORPS.

The bill to engage a corps of volunteers, for a short period, in the service of the United States, was read the second time; and the further consideration thereof was made the order of the day for Monday next.

[By this bill, the President of the United States is authorized to engage in the service of the United States, for one year, the following military force, to be engaged as volunteer companies:

From Vermont 20 companies, New Hampshire 20,

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Massachusetts 40, Rhode Island 10, Connecticut 20, New York 40, New Jersey 20, Pennsylvania 40, Delaware 10, Maryland 30, Virginia 50, North Carolina 20, South Carolina 30, Georgia 20, Tennessee 20, Kentucky 30, and from Ohio 10 companies; each to consist of one captain, one lieutenant, one ensign, four sergeants, four corporals, two musicians, and not less than forty nor more than sixty privates. One inspector to be appointed for each State, from the officers of the Army now in service, whose duty it shall be to repair to the State for which he is appointed, and receive the written engagement of the companies, &c. The corps of volunteers to be liable, during the period for which they are engaged, to be ordered into actual service by the President of the United States, and, whilst in service, to be entitled to the same pay, rations, forage, and emolument, of every kind, (bounty and clothing excepted,) with the regular troops of the United States. When these volunteer corps shall be engaged, mustered, and accepted by the President, they shall be entitled to the following bounties: To each commissioned officer, one month's pay; to each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, of such companies who are dressed in complete uniform, and armed and equipped fit for service in the field, twenty-five dollars; to each private, &c., in complete uniform, and not armed, fifteen dollars, and one musket and bayonet, and one cartridge-box. The corps to be formed into regiments, consisting of ten companies each, from the same State—one colonel or lieutenant colonel, and two majors, to each regiment, to be selected by the President of the United States. If a sufficient number to fill the quota from each State shall not engage by the — day of —, the President is to accept so many supernumerary companies from the State nearest to it as may be necessary to supply the deficiency; but, when more companies shall engage than the quota required, those whose written engagements were first received shall be accepted in preference. The office of inspector of volunteers to be discontinued from and after the — day of —, and the officers appointed shall return home; or sooner, if the President shall think proper. A sum of — dollars is proposed to be appropriated to carry the plan into effect.]

THURSDAY, January 18.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported that they had examined and found correctly engrossed the bill authorizing the fitting out, officering, and manning, the frigates belonging to the United States; and the bill was read the third time, and the blanks having been filled, as follows:

- 1st. With the word "four."
- 2d. With the word "four."
- 3d. With the word "fourteen."
- 4th. With the words "two years."
- 5th. With the words "six hundred thousand dollars."

On motion, by Mr. CRAWFORD, it was agreed that the question on the final passage of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The bill to augment the compensation to the judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia was read the second time; and, on motion by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be the order of the day for Tuesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Daniel Boone; and, on motion by Mr. BRADLEY, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. REED submitted the following resolution for an amendment of the Constitution; which was read for consideration:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following section be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid and binding as a part of the Constitution of the United States:

"If any citizen of the United States shall accept of any title of nobility from any King, Prince, or foreign State, such citizen shall thenceforth be incapable of holding any office of honor or profit under the United States."

Mr. POPE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 8th instant, the bill for the improvement of the United States by public roads and canals, reported the bill amended; and the bill was read accordingly.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson, Jeremiah Reynolds, and Levin Jones;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John N. Stout;" and a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another;" in which several bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

FRIDAY, January 19.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson, Jeremiah Reynolds, and Levin Jones," was read the second time; and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon, and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, POPE, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented the petition of Levin Jones, of the city of Baltimore, stating that he is owner and master of the schooner Wolf, which vessel was seized some time in October last at Norfolk, in Virginia, for having brought certain French slaves to that place without previously complying with the requisites enjoined by law, and praying relief; and the petition was read, and referred to the committee last mentioned.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John N. Stout," was read the second time; and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. POPE, GOODRICH, and FRANKLIN, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another," was read the second time; and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon. Messrs. GILES, REED, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the bill authorizing the fitting out, officering, and manning, the frigates belonging to the United States; and the consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next; and

Ordered, That the letters from the committee to the Secretary of the Navy on this subject, together with his replies thereto, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the motion submitted yesterday for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and, on motion by Mr. REED, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be the order of the day for Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing a subscription on behalf of the United States to the capital stock of the Chesapeake, and Delaware, and Ohio Canal Companies, as amended; and, on motion by Mr. LLOYD, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed to the first Monday in February next.

MONDAY, January 22.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage a corps of volunteers for a short period in the service of the United States; and, after progress, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I now transmit to Congress an account of the contingent expenses of the Government for the year 1809.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 22, 1810.

The Message and account were read, and then ordered to lie for consideration.

The following Message was also received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, complying with their resolution of the 27th of December, on the subject of disbursements in the intercourse with the Barbary Powers.

JANUARY 22, 1810.

JAMES MADISON.

The Message and report were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the petition of the clerks in the Treasury Department, stating that the provision made by law for clerk-hire in that department is less in proportion than that made for other accounting officers, praying an investigation into their duties, and to be placed in situations equally eligible with those of the gentlemen belonging to the other departments; and the petition was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. ANDERSON, GREGG, and BRENT, were appointed the committee.

TUESDAY, January 23.

NAVAL ARMAMENT.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill authorizing the fitting out, officering, and manning, the frigates belonging to the United States.

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, to postpone the consideration of the bill to Monday next, the Senate was divided, 13 in the affirmative and 13 in the negative, and the President determined the question in the negative.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, to postpone the consideration of the bill to the second Monday in February next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 18, as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gregg, Lambert, Meigs, Robinson, Sumter, Turner and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brent, Champlin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Leib, Lloyd, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, and Tait.

On the question, Shall this bill pass?

Mr. GILES observed that, from the papers presented by the committee to the Senate, and the explanations already given of them, he had hoped that the expediency of the measure proposed by the bill, would have been so obvious to every gentleman of the Senate, as to have relieved him from the necessity of making any further exposition in its favor. He said he felt himself perfectly exempt from the fashionable rage of debate, which he feared was extended so far as to tend, at least, to impede the necessary operations of the Government, if not to paralyze all its energies; and he regretted now to be placed under an obligation of extending or participating in its influence. But, as gentlemen had called on him for further expositions of the inducements of the committee for reporting the bill, he would attempt to state them as briefly as possible; and he begged to be excused for confining himself to general observations, without descending to very minute details.

Mr. G. said the bill under consideration grew out of the President's Message of the 3d instant. In that Message, the President recommends a system of preparatory measures to meet any exigencies that may await this country; of which system, the measure proposed by the bill forms one essential part. The President commences, by reminding Congress that the law authorizing a detachment of one hundred thousand men from the militia, will expire on the 30th of March next, and recommends its continuance for a longer period. A bill to that effect would long since have been reported by the committee, but a committee of the House of Representatives had anticipated them in the report, and it was thought unnecessary to bring the same subject before the Senate at the same time. The President then recommends a military force of twenty thousand men, to be raised and placed in a state of readiness, to be called into service at the shortest warning. Some difference of opinion existed as to the per-icular description of force intended by the Message; but a majority of the committee thought that the call of the President would best be answered by the bill reported by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. BRADLEY,) and which was yesterday under consideration. The President then proceeds in the following words:

"It will rest with them, (Congress,) also, to determine how far further provision may be expedient, for putting into actual service, if necessary, any part of the naval armament not now employed.

"At a period presenting features in the conduct of foreign Powers towards the United States, which impose on them the necessity of precautionary measures involving expense, it is a happy consideration that such is the solid state of the public credit, that reliance can be justly placed on any legal provision that may be made for resorting to it, in a convenient form, and to an adequate amount."

From this recommendation, as well as from the papers and other information obtained from the Navy Department in relation to this subject, the measure was addressed to the committee by two obvious and powerful considerations.

The one, to preserve the frigates proposed to be repaired from entire destruction.

The other, to employ them as instruments of protection and defence in the event of war, &c.

With respect to the first object, it is to be remarked, the Secretary of the Navy informs you—and this information, he believed, founded upon an actual examination of the vessels—that they required material repairs, that they would probably be damaged thirty per cent. by delaying the repairs for one year, and shortly thereafter, be totally unworthy of repair. That the present cost of repairs would be about equal to one-half of the original cost of new vessels; and that, when repaired, they would be better vessels than could be built of green timber. That the repairs of the whole of them could be completed by next Fall, if the work was all to be done at this place. Whereas, to fell timber for new frigates, and to complete them out of timber now to be procured, would require two or three years, &c.

Under these circumstances, the committee were left to the alternative, either of giving up these frigates to entire waste and destruction, or to substitute new ones in their stead, under all the disadvantages of increased expense, delay in time, and the inconvenience of building them of unseasoned timber, &c.; or to provide for repairing the frigates now in being, as contemplated in the bill. They preferred the last alternative; and, surely, it is recommended by every consideration of economy in expense, economy in time, and the superior quality of the vessels when completed, &c.

Mr. G. said, he knew there were gentlemen who thought that it would be better policy to let these frigates go to destruction altogether; and that the money expended upon their repair was money thrown away, or worse, as involving consequential expenses, &c.; and that imputations had been thrown out against those who now favored naval establishments even to a very limited extent, and who formerly opposed them. He had reason to believe, also, that these imputations, however unmerited, had not been altogether without their effect.

He would, therefore, endeavor to put this subject in its true point of view, by bestowing a few observations on it.

In the first place, he would call to the recollection of gentlemen, for they appear to have forgotten or overlooked the circumstance, that the present Naval Establishment was fixed in the years 1800 and 1801, under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, with the approbation and consent of himself, and, he believed, of every other Republican then in Congress. That, at that time, the establishment was thought a proper and reasonable one; and that, after completing the frigates now proposed to be repaired, the establishment will then be less by three frigates, than was thought proper and reasonable by the Republicans at that time. He asked, what circumstances had taken place since 1800 and 1801, to justify a further extension of the Naval Establishment, or with what propriety can those who then consented to that establishment be accused of inconsistency of conduct, or change of political principles, for consenting to an establishment now, less by three frigates, than they then thought both reasonable and proper?

Since that time, the United States have been blessed with a vast increase of population, a vast increase of wealth, particularly mercantile wealth, and increase of revenue, &c. At the same time, with an unexampled diminution of public debt, and, withal, they have, in the meantime, had their rights, commercial rights particularly, assailed by both the great belligerents of Europe, without any prospects of relaxation from either. He asked whether they could find, in any of these circumstances, causes to justify, at the present moment, dismantling their Navy, or cutting off or unnerving the naval arm of their Government? He presumed the whole of them would naturally produce a contrary tendency. He said, these imputations had been thrown out by some gentlemen, for whom he had the highest respect, and, he believed, with the most candid, though mistaken, convictions on their minds; but their errors would be easily corrected by an attentive review of the events which preceded the causes which produced, and the events which followed the change of Administration in 1800. During the Federal Administration, the Federal party conceived the erroneous opinion, and acted under the mistaken impression, that the Constitution of the United States wanted energy; and to supply this want, they undertook to legislate energy into it. For this purpose, they devised expedients to justify it, and resorted to physical force, armies and navies, to supply this misconceived fatal defect in the Constitution, and to form the essential substitute for energy; which was, in their view, the great desideratum of the Government.

These measures required enormous expenses; taxes were imposed on the people to defray them; and when they were informed that these expenses were intended to procure energy, they did not believe that they were in want of any such energy. They found their rulers were acting under a mistaken vision; that they had departed from the necessary practical objects of the Government, and gone in quest of visionary theories, which existed only in their own deluded imaginations, which could be of no practical use to the people, and which cost them vast sums of money, &c. They therefore took the Government out of Federal hands, and put it into the hands of their opponents—the Republican party. The visionary theory of energy was, therefore, the fatal error of the Federal party; and that error deprived it of the power of the nation. The Government being thus placed in the hands of the Republicans, whilst heated with the zeal of opposition to the Federal doctrines, and flushed with their recent triumph, it was natural for them, with the best intentions, to run into the opposite extreme; to go too far in the relaxations of the powers of the Government, and to indulge themselves in the delightful visions of extending the range of individual liberty. They were, therefore, in danger of relaxing the powers of the Government so far as to deprive it of the means of its own preservation and execution for domestic objects, and impair or destroy its efficacy in resisting foreign aggressions. The theory, therefore, of the Republicans, as opposed to that of the Federalists, was the relaxation of governmental restraints, or the extension of individual liberty. It was natural that, in the vibration of the political pendulum, it should go from one extreme to another; and that this has been too much the case with the Republican Administration, he regretted to say, he feared, would be demonstrated by a very superficial review of the events of the last two or three years. He said it had been his fortune to oppose both of these extremes; that he thought the true policy of the United States would be found in the medium between these two extremes; that he had steadfastly placed his footing on that ground; and that he should not be driven from it, until he was convinced he had assumed an unwise position. He said he was equally averse from incurring expense, or devising expedients, merely to procure ideal energy for the Government; and from an undue relaxation of its powers, stimulated by a visionary philanthropy, in a vain pursuit of the extension of individual liberty beyond the susceptibility of human nature; or, in other words, irreconcilable with the imperfections of the human character. He always had been, and still was, willing, to call into action the whole Constitutional powers of the Government, for the purpose of effecting all its practicable, legitimate, and expedient objects, whether of a foreign or domestic character. And he believed the Government had powers sufficient for all its objects, if wisely and efficiently applied. He said, if any example were wanted to illustrate the truth and correctness of these observations, it would be found in the case under consideration: In the objections to a Naval Establishment at this time, less by three frigates than was deemed reasonable in 1800 and 1801; and in the intimated inconsistency in the conduct of those who then approved that establishment, and who now approve of one of less extent. Perhaps the truth is, that gentlemen have gone so far in the pleasing and laudable effort to improve the happiness of man, by extending the scope of individual liberty, that they suppose those who stand still are receding from them in an opposite direction, while they are not sensible of their own motions. He said, under the view of this part of the subject, he would vote for the bill; and if circumstances should, in his judgment, hereafter render it expedient, he would vote for a still further extension of naval equipments. He said there was no danger, in his judgment, in having a navy in this country beyond a very limited extent; because the agricultural and mechanical interests were greatly superior to the commercial; and they would always afford a complete security against a too great extension of a navy.

Mr. G. said the second consideration which induced the committee to report the bill, was to employ the frigates as instruments of protection and defence, and even of annoyance, in the event of war. Gentlemen have asked whether the whole of the frigates are competent to resist the British fleet, or even a small squadron of it? To which it is answered, no, they are not. But it by no means follows, that because they are incompetent to achieve that splendid exploit, that, therefore, they cannot be of any use at all. He conceived they might be materially useful in defending a town in case of a naval attack. They would form an essential part of a combined force for that object. Fortifications on land have been erected at an immense expense, gunboats have been provided for the defence of the seaport towns, &c., and frigates are in many respects essential to their combined operation. They are, besides, important in furnishing officers and men for the gunboats, &c.; and it has always been understood that their operations must be incomplete without the operations of vessels of war. He therefore considered it incorrect to single out this particular part of the naval force, and to ask what it can achieve singly and alone. It would be more just and proper to consider it as part of a combined system of force. In that point of view, he believed it would not be inefficient. He believed they might also be occasionally employed in harassing the commerce of an enemy with considerable effect, particularly if Great Britain should be that enemy.

Mr. G. said he should avail himself of that occasion to be explicit in stating his views of the question of peace or war. He was induced to do this because his views upon that question had been misunderstood, or at least misrepresented to the public, and pretended to be derived from conversations and other sources of information easily to be misconceived, and more easily to be misrepresented, and for which he did not feel himself at all responsible. He had always been in the habit of frankly exposing his views without reserve, in his place on that floor, upon all subjects, when required by the duties of his station; he should now do so, and for their correctness in that place he acknowledged himself to be responsible to the public.

He said, with respect to peace or war, it should be observed, that in a dispute between nations, war was at the option of either party—peace was not; peace required the consent of both. Whilst, therefore, war may be in our power, peace may be beyond our control. Great Britain may make war upon us, and it is our most imperious duty to be prepared to meet it. He said, as to the probability of that event, he had no certain data to guide his judgment; but if it be even uncertain, preparations ought to be made to meet it with effect and advantage. He was, therefore, in favor of every preparation, both by land and by sea, to meet war; but he considered the question of making preparations to meet war a very different thing from a question to declare or to make war; so much so, that resorting to the one has always been considered as the best expedient to avoid the other alternative; whilst, therefore, he was against declaring for making war under present circumstances, and at this time, he was in favor of preparations to meet it, which might hereafter render a resort to it unnecessary. But he would at the same time say, explicitly, that if Great Britain would continue her course of hostility against us, he would, at a convenient and proper time, be decidedly in favor of war, rather than submit to her lawless pretensions and aggressions. He believed that rather than submit, the United States ought, must, and will go to war for the preservation and maintenance of their rights, &c. He drew this conclusion with confidence and certainty from the character of the dispute between the two countries. What is the real character of that dispute, particularly as it respects commercial rights? Independently of aggressions vitally affecting the character and interests of the United States, continued without atonement or relaxation, and which are too well known to require repetition here, the real character of the dispute respecting commercial rights, when stripped of all its disguises and embellishments, consists in this: whether the United States or Great Britain shall regulate the commerce of the United States? Or, rather, whether the United States shall regulate their own commerce consistently with the law of nations? Or, shall Great Britain regulate it in contravention of the law of nations? The right to regulate commerce is, perhaps, the most important right confided to Congress under the Constitution; and that Congress might possess that power was certainly the primary inducement to the formation of the Constitution.

It is known that the inefficiency of the commercial regulations of the several States, and the extremely inconvenient influence of the conflicting systems of the different States upon each other, first suggested the necessity of a General Government, for the purpose of regulating commerce by one uniform and efficient system; of course the power to regulate commerce may be considered as the foundation of the Constitution itself. The people of the United States have delegated a Congress charged with the sacred trust of protecting and exercising this great Constitutional power. How, then, can that Congress abandon it to the exercise of a foreign Power, without an almost treasonable infidelity to the people, by whom they are delegated? Great Britain not only claims, but actually exercises the power of regulating, and even of restraining and prohibiting your commerce at pleasure; and so far has she carried the exercise of this power as to substitute her own illicit commerce in the place of your lawful, but prohibited commerce! Yes, in utter contempt of your rights and authority, and in utter disregard of her own character, she is now in the daily habit of granting licenses to her own subjects to commit treason against the common law of the land, by authorizing them to carry on an illicit commerce with her enemy, in substitution of your lawful commerce. He believed it impossible for the United States to submit long to this unexampled state of things; and, therefore, that they ought, must, and will, ere long, go to war to assert and maintain their violated rights, their injured interests, &c., if no other expedient will answer the object.

Mr. G. said that this view of the subject was addressed with peculiar force to the commercial parts of the United States; and this state of things, if persevered in by Great Britain, must and will awaken them, in spite of all their prejudices, to a sense of their own danger and interest; and whenever that shall be the case, they must and will unite in measures of protection and redress.

Mr. G. said it was astonishing to him how gentlemen representing the commercial parts of the United States could ever, for a moment, suppose that himself, or the people in the scene of country from which he came, could desire to enter into an unnecessary war with Great Britain. That part of the country, above all others, found an interest in an intercourse with Great Britain, particularly at the present moment; the articles it furnished were, at this time, particularly suited to the British market. They were principally tobacco, flour, and wheat. The whole of which were now in brisk demand for the British market, particularly the best James river tobacco, which was so peculiarly suited to the market, as now to command from seven to nine dollars per cwt.; whereas Maryland tobacco, which was consumed in the prohibited markets of the Continent, was in little demand, and comparatively low in price. Indeed, from these causes, there has been a peculiar activity in the commercial scene in that part of the country for some months past; and gentlemen, who supposed him disposed to plunge into an unnecessary war with Great Britain, could not give him credit for even the most superficial consideration of his own interest, or the interest of that part of the country. But, notwithstanding these considerations, he was not willing himself, nor were the people of that part of the country willing to submit to the abandonment of a single attribute of national sovereignty; still less were they disposed to abandon the great Constitutional right in question.

SENATE.

Naval Armament.

JANUARY, 1810.

Mr. G. said he thought war justifiable only in case of self-defence. That, as he had often done before on that floor, he now solemnly protested against war merely for the acquisition of territory, or any other object of aggrandizement or ambition. But what is a war of self-defence? When any attribute of national sovereignty whatever is attacked by a foreign Power, it then becomes a case of self-defence to the party attacked. In the case between the United States and Great Britain, not only is a national attribute assailed, but the highest national attribute sanctioned by the Constitution of the United States—the corner stone of the Constitution itself. This, then, is strictly a case of self-defence, aggravated with all the circumstances of a continued claim, and contemptuous insult. But, although he deemed a war purely defensive alone justifiable; yet he thought it perfectly correct to carry on such a war when undertaken offensively; and that it was perfectly justifiable to seize on territory, and appropriate it as a just retribution for the evils of war unjustly inflicted by the culpable assailant, or to resort to any other means of offensive annoyance whatever, &c. Under every view of this subject, therefore, he thought the measure contemplated by the bill recommended as one part of a system of preparations for war.

Mr. G. said he would now bestow some observations on the objection of expense. This point afforded an argument always powerful, and for some years past irresistible. It is said $800,000, the contemplated expense for equipping all the frigates, is enormous. He said it was so; and no gentleman regretted the necessity of incurring this and other similar expenses more than himself. But the correct and proper question is not—is this sum not erroneous? It is: how can it be avoided, and save the rights and interests of the nation? The real object of this expense is to save the United States against the rapacity and mad ambition of the rulers of other nations; and hence arises its indispensable necessity. It no doubt will appear wonderful to a speculative, philosophic mind, to contemplate the enormous expenses incurred by nations for the purpose of self-protection against the rapacity and ambition of the rulers of other nations. In this respect, however, the United States have been at all times peculiarly fortunate, compared with any other nation with which they have any intimate relations. Take Great Britain, for instance, and calculate the enormous expenses she incurs to protect herself from the ambition of her own and the rulers of other nations, and compare them with those incurred by the United States for the same object, and the latter would be to the former as a drop in the ocean. This would be the result in some degree in a comparison with any other nation. But the question is, whether it is not better to incur this expense, than to yield to the fatal influence of this unbounded rapacity and ambition? Independently of exchanging the attributes of freedom and independence for the degradation of slavery, would not this submission cost you more in money upon the most economical calculation? Could you purchase off its gripping influence for $800,000? Would not your proud conqueror take all you had, and think he had left you too much, as long as you had a comfort remaining? The same speculative reflections may be applied to the enormous sums expended in the most perfect political associations for the protection of society against the violence and depravity of individuals. To count up all the costs expended, to protect the virtuous and the good against the violence and depravity of the vicious and the bad, would doubtless be a subject of wonder to a philosophic mind. Take the United States for example, and imagine all the costs of all the courts of criminal jurisdiction, the grand and petit juries, witnesses, &c., and add to them the costs of the dungeons, the jails, the bolts, the bars, the chains, &c., and the amount would be enormous; and if you should choose to indulge yourself in the speculation still further, count the costs of all the locks and keys in the United States, which would be useless if there were no such thing as human vice and depravity, and the mind would be left in a state of astonishment at the enormous result, at the immense sums necessarily expended for the protection of society against the baneful and destructive influence of human vices. But did ever any man doubt of the propriety of this expenditure? Did he ever pause and ask himself, whether these sums were not enormous? No; he knew they were great in themselves, but nothing compared with the object to be obtained by them; nothing compared with the preservation of society from the destructive influence of human violence and depravity. And is this result to be wondered at, when you reflect for a moment on the horrible effects of giving them the triumph, and yielding submission to their influence? The same observations will apply with greater force to the society of nations; the same injurious consequences would result from submission by one nation to the demands of the rapacious and ambitious rulers of another nation; he was therefore willing to resist and repel them when directed by any nation against the rights and interests of the United States, and for that purpose was willing to incur the proposed expense, or any other within the ability of the Government, rather than to yield submission to the destructive influence of these ambitious and rapacious demands.

Mr. G. said he could not help reminding gentlemen here of the unfortunate consequences of the successful influence of this argument of economy at no distant period. He feared that from the want of a timely expenditure of money, to enforce a great and wise measure of the Government, we were now reduced to our present embarrassed situation; and to be relieved from it might probably cost us much more money than was then necessary for the object; and in addition to this economical waste of treasure might also be a waste of blood.

Mr. G. then begged to present another aspect of the proposed measure to the view of the Senate. He said that the aggressions of the belligereats upon our rights and interests were so universally known and felt throughout the United States, that the people were almost universally looking up to Congress for some measures of preparation for meeting any crisis which may befall us. The present measure goes to put into a state of readiness for service all the naval force of the United States. It is therefore believed, that, in this respect, the measure would satisfy the just expectations of the people, and when combined with other preparatory measures contemplated for the land service, would afford such protection and security as would justify the confidence of the people in Congress. He said that the measure of the first importance, in his judgment, for this object, was a provision for procuring every species of munitions of war, to be deposited in convenient places of security near the various parts of the United States, most liable to sudden attacks from an enemy. This measure would probably shortly be brought forward by the committee on the President's Message. And if, in addition to this 20,000 men, either volunteers or regulars could be placed at the disposal of the President, with a power to call out 100,000 men from the militia, he thought the system would answer all existing exigencies, would place the nation in a respectable attitude, would do justice to the character of Congress, and insure the general confidence of the people.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, before he entered on the discussion of the bill, he felt it his duty to declare, that in the observations he had made upon the motion for postponement, he had not the most distant intention of intimating that the gentleman from Virginia wished to involve the nation in a war, that he did not conscientiously believe to be necessary for the preservation of the honor or interest of the country.

Mr. C. said that he had, by his own reflections, been led to conjecture that this additional naval force was intended to protect our commerce in time of peace, or to prepare the nation for a declaration of war, which we intend to issue, or expect to be issued against us, by one or both of the great belligerent nations. The observations of the gentleman from Virginia had satisfied him that his conjectures are well founded. These are the objects of this bill. But when a measure involving a considerable expense is under consideration, it is necessary and proper to inquire whether the means to be employed are adequate to the attainment of the object. The inadequacy of the naval force of the United States to the protection of its commerce, is so glaring as to strike the most superficial observer at the first blush. If every frigate, sloop, and bomb ketch, was a first rate ship-of-the-line, it would even then be wholly incompetent to that object. If the United States were to invest $100,000,000 in vessels of war, and expend one fourth of that sum annually by employing it for the protection of our commerce, it would still be unprotected, or the nation involved in war. As this additional naval force is inadequate to the protection of our commerce, and has never been employed for that purpose, it is but reasonable to suppose that it is intended to prepare the nation for a declaration of war, which we intend to issue against France or Great Britain. In the examination of this question we can only reason from analogy. From our past conduct, we may judge with some degree of correctness, what we shall do under similar circumstances. What was the situation of the United States in March last? The British Orders in Council of the 11th November, 1807, were then unmodified, and in full operation; every port in Europe which was shut against British vessels, was declared to be in a state of blockade; all vessels attempting to enter them were subject to capture and condemnation; the right to trade to those ports could not be exercised, until the neutral vessel had touched at a British port, and paid a transit duty, which, in some cases exceeded the original value of the cargo. Our commercial intercourse with France was not more auspicious. Our vessels and cargoes had been placed in a state of sequestration, with an intimation, that their final disposition would depend upon the course which this nation should adopt towards Great Britain. To relieve the nation from the pressure of these accumulated wrongs, the embargo was imposed—it was voluntarily submitted to for fourteen months, and was then abandoned in a panic. When this measure was repealed, did we declare war? Did we issue letters of marque and reprisal; or did the other House strike from the non-intercourse act, a provision which authorized the President to issue them upon a specified contingency? Sir, if this nation ever intended to declare war for any cause short of the invasion of its territory, or the bombardment of its cities, last March was the time which ought to have been seized for its commencement. We had cause, and more than cause for war, if war would have procured redress. Our ships were then in our own ports—our seamen were at home—the property of the nation had been gathered in from the four winds of heaven, and we were prepared to strike, where the enemy was vulnerable. We did not, however, declare war. Mr. C. said he was not convinced but that it is fortunate for the nation that we did not, although he thought and felt differently upon the repeal of the embargo. He was opposed to its repeal, but for war, when it was repealed. What, sir, is our situation now, when compared with March, 1809? The embargo, although vilified and abandoned here, proved efficacious. The arrangement of the 19th of April last was the offspring of the embargo. The abandonment of the embargo produced the disavowal of that arrangement. The order of the 26th of April, 1809, is still in force, and although it falls very short of the arrangement made at this place, yet it abandons the two most important and obnoxious principles of the orders of the 11th November, 1807. The transit duty is given up, and the blockade of commercial Europe is restrained to Holland, France, and the Kingdom of Italy. By this modification our trade to all the rest of the world is unmolested by British

Orders in Council. If the comparison between our present situation and that of March last, be fairly drawn, there can be no difficulty in deciding, that as we did not then declare war, we shall not do it now. But it will be said that, to all the injuries which Great Britain has committed against us, she has added the grossest insult. Mr. C. said that no man was more sensibly affected by the conduct of the British Minister towards this Government than he was. He felt compassion for those who could not, and contempt for those who would not, discover the insult.

But, sir, are we to merge the aggravated and accumulated wrongs of the nation, in the quarrel between the negotiators of the two countries? If we are to have war, will any rational man be willing to rest it on the insult offered by Jackson to the Government, instead of the long list of atrocious injuries, which we have suffered from the injustice and rapacity of Great Britain? Certainly not. But, waiving all the arguments against our declaring war, which may be drawn from our past conduct, Mr. C. said, he would ask this honorable body, whether the present situation of the world does not solemnly admonish this nation to stand aloof from the dreadful convulsions with which Europe for years past has been agitated to its centre? Yes, sir, the character of the war, and the principle upon which it is conducted, admonish us in the most solemn manner to remain quiet until its stormy billows shall subside into a calm. In the wars which were began and carried on anterior to the French Revolution, the conquest of a town or province was generally the object and end of hostilities. Now, a battle decides the fate of a Kingdom; and the mightiest empires are overthrown in a single campaign. The change in nautical warfare has not been less than that upon land. Formerly, the capture or destruction of a small part of the adverse squadron, was esteemed a glorious victory. Te Deum was sung in their churches, or the Tower guns were fired. Now, if any part of the hostile fleet escapes, the victorious officer is punished. This contest, so sanguinary in its progress, and destructive in its consequences, must ere long be brought to an end. Let it then be the wisdom of this nation to remain at peace, as long as peace is within its option.

Having shown from our past conduct, that we do not mean to declare war, and also that sound policy forbids us to do it, it is necessary to inquire into the probability of its being declared against us. Will France declare war against the United States? In what relation do we stand to France? She captures and condemns all our vessels which have been visited by a British vessel, or are bound to a British port. Is this all? Does not France, under some pretext or other, sequester the most of our vessels which have the temerity to enter French ports? How would war affect this relation? It would put an end to sequestration, and would greatly diminish the number of captures, because our vessels in that case would arm in their defence. It is not the interest of France to declare war against us—she will, therefore, avoid it. But, admitting that France should declare war—this additional naval force would be unnecessary, as long as England continues the war and preserves her naval superiority. If this should be lost, it is not upon a fleet of tenfold the efficient force of our whole Naval Establishment, that we must rely for defence against the Gallic legions of Napoleon. No, sir, we must rely upon our own internal strength, upon our union and patriotism, which will answer every demand that can be made upon it by the most trying emergency—the dreams of the timid, and the predictions of madmen, to the contrary notwithstanding.

But it is possible that Great Britain will declare war against us. Let us examine this subject. Has Great Britain any interest which can be subserved by war with the United States? Is the commerce of this country beneficial to her? She enjoys all of it which she wishes. She gets by purchase or capture all which she wants from us. For the first she pays a moderate price, and for the last she pays nothing. But what is of equal importance to her, we purchase her manufactures. In the full enjoyment of all the benefits of our commerce, she restrains her adversary from all participation with her in those benefits. But admitting there is danger of war with England, of what service will these few additional frigates be against the 1,000 ships of war which that nation can put in commission? The honorable chairman of the committee says, they will answer the twofold purpose of defending our ports and harbors, and of annoying the commerce of the enemy. To this it may be answered, that if they are kept in our ports for their defence, they cannot annoy the trade of the enemy. If they are sent out to prey upon the commerce of the enemy, but few, if any of them, will ever return to defend our ports.

The President's Message of the 3d instant has been introduced by the chairman of the committee in support of this bill. Feeble must be the aid which this measure can derive from that source. This Message, in point of obscurity, comes nearer my ideas of a Delphic oracle than any State paper which has come under my inspection. It is so cautiously expressed that every man puts what construction upon it he pleases. Is he for war? The Message breathes nothing but destruction and bloodshed. Is he for peace? The Message is mere milk-and-water, and wholly pacific. Is he for the bill before you? The Message calls for its passage. Is he a friend to a large standing army? Why then the Message means 20,000 regular troops. Is he friendly to the militia? The Message does not call for regular troops—it means militia. Thus, sir, this Message means anything or nothing, at the will of the commentator. If this Message is oracular in its meaning, it was no less miraculous in its promulgation. The newspapers to the east of this, stated that such a message would be delivered, and stated its contents nearly one week before it reached the two Houses of Congress. To account for this phenomenon, is neither within my power or province.

The gentleman from Virginia has reiterated the old maxim, "that to be prepared for war is the best method of preserving peace," and has declared that he should vote for this bill upon that principle. This maxim has the authority of great names. It may be true to a particular extent. If these preparations are of such a nature as to make the nation invulnerable, it is true. But, sir, when the preparations amount to the equipment of five frigates, and the nation against whom these preparations are made can launch a thousand vessels of war against us, who can seriously urge this maxim as a justification of the measure? It is in vain for us to contend upon the ocean with a nation who expends annually, more than $300,000,000; a sum six times greater than the whole amount of our exports. The charge of inconsistency against those who oppose the passage of this bill, has been but feebly supported. By way of enforcing this charge, we are told that when this Government was in the hands of Federal gentlemen they fancied it was too weak, and attempted to legislate energy into it, by creating a navy and increasing the standing army. The people could not be made to feel or perceive this want of energy, and turned them out of power. The Republicans, says the gentleman, who succeeded them, like the pendulum of a clock, very naturally vibrated to the other extreme, and have nearly succeeded in legislating energy out of the Government. That he was opposed to both extremes. Sir, it is not for me to decide whether the gentleman from Virginia has alone been consistent, while the rest of his friends have vibrated from one extreme to the other. The gentleman is certainly incorrect, when he says, the Naval Establishment was reduced and fixed upon its present footing by a Republican Administration. The Navy, which was created by a Federal Administration, was by that Administration reduced to what they called a Peace Establishment. In this situation it was found by the late Administration; who, so far from running into the extreme, stopped short in the salutary work of reform. It will be recollected that at the downfall of the Federal Administration, the most gloomy predictions were uttered by the advocates of a sinking cause—everything sacred—everything venerable—everything in fact which links and binds society together, was, according to Federal declaration, to be trodden under foot, and torn asunder by their successors, whom they branded with the odious epithet of Jacobins. Unfortunately for the cause of reformation, at this precise time, the hopes of the philanthropist and patriot were blasted in France. The blind fury of their unprincipled demagogues, their jacobinical leaders, and the specious pretext of reform, had trampled upon every institution in that country, which was held dear by the people, and the last ray of hope, that rational liberty would be established in that nation, had perished forever. Under these circumstances the new Administration, cautiously guarding against the charge of innovation, stopped short of their duty. They ought to have amputated this fungus of the body politic, and restored it to a sound and healthy state. This was not done, and the nation has consequently spent about $12,000,000 upon it. But we are informed that the Navy in 1800-1, was larger than it now is, although our revenue was then inferior to what it is now. If we refuse now to put in commission and service all the vessels which were not sold in 1800-1, we stand convicted of inconsistency. But, sir, is the revenue greater now than at that period, or has the whole of the public vessels then retained, ever been put in service, from that year until the present time? Let the records of the nation decide. At that time the Secretary of the Navy, according to my information, consented to manage the Naval Establishment with $900,000, and upon that consent the internal taxes were repealed. If we are at liberty to contrast the expenses of the Navy of any two years by way of establishing the charge of inconsistency, let us take the present and last year. Did we call into service the whole of the Navy last year? Is the necessity for this measure stronger now than at that time? No man will venture the assertion. The expenditure of the Navy was last year $2,379,267 and if this bill passes, it will rise this year to $3,500,000. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) has no apprehension of war, and yet votes for the bill upon principles of economy—but he is only for repairing the vessels, and not for employing them, while the gentleman from Virginia intends to repair and employ them. One gentleman says, the sum appropriated includes not only repairs, but rigging, &c., and the other says, that the sum is more than sufficient. The report of the Secretary of the Navy proves that this sum is for repairs only—and another report shows that $150,000 were last year transferred from the article of provisions, to the article of repairs. If the same thing does not happen in the present case, it ought to excite surprise.

We were told the other day, by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) that he hoped this bill would receive a unanimous vote. The same gentleman objects to the expense of the bill for the organizing twenty thousand volunteer militia. This expense will not exceed $500,000, while the frigates, the object of his affection, will cost more than double that sum. To use his own expression in relation to the volunteers, a high-sounding measure might receive my vote, if it was not an expensive one; but $1,200,000 or $1,500,000 is too large a sum to throw away in vaporing, in the present exhausted state of the Treasury. The gentleman from Connecticut and his friends are acting consistently in supporting this bill. They are supporting a system which owes its birth to them. They believed, and no doubt honestly, that a Government which relied for support only on the utility of its measures, would be weak and inefficient. They endeavored to strengthen it by creating a system of patronage, and for that purpose the Navy was built, and for that purpose, and that alone, is it calculated. But the time when this Navy was built, and the purposes for which it was ostensibly destined, enabled them to reason more plausibly in its favor than we can for the additional expense called for by this bill. They intended to employ it against France, where it would be efficient to a particular extent. We intend to employ ours, if it is to be employed at all, against Great Britain, where it will be inefficient, and worse than inefficient.

SENATE.

Proceedings.

JANUARY, 1810.

But, sir, our naval force is not to be employed at all, if the two positions attempted to be established in my previous observations, be correct. If we do not intend to declare war, nor expect it to be declared against us, what apology have we for incurring this enormous expense? What apology have we to embark in war expenses, when we intend, and expect to be at peace? Gentlemen who think with me, who believe that we shall not have war, and that, so far as depends upon our own actions, we ought not to have it, will do well to reflect that when our fleets are equipped, and armies raised, we must employ them—we must go to war to justify ourselves to the nation for the exorbitant expenses which have been incurred by these means.

Mr. C. said that the observations he had made as to the expense of this equipment, rested upon the supposition that we are not to have war. In this supposition the gentleman from Virginia acquiesces, at least to a particular extent. If the nation should unfortunately be involved in war, it ought to be prosecuted with vigor, as well offensively as defensively. The energies and resources of the nation ought to be put in a state of requisition; but, until this event should happen, he was opposed to measures which exhausted the Treasury without adding to the real and substantial defence of the nation.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Brent, Champlin, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Leib, Lloyd, Meigs, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Lambert, and Turner.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act authorizing the fitting out, officering, and manning the frigates belonging to the United States."

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to augment the compensation to the judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia; and, after debate, on motion, by Mr. POPE, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the first Monday in December next.

The Senate resumed the motion submitted on the 18th instant, for an amendment to the Constitution; and on motion, by Mr. LEIB, it was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. REED, LEIB, and CRAWFORD, were appointed the committee.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter signed James Sykes, Speaker of the Senate of the State of Delaware, enclosing a certificate of the appointment of OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, a Senator of the United States, in the place of Samuel White, deceased; and the certificate was read, and ordered to lie on file.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the moneys expended during the year 1809, for the discharge of miscellaneous claims not otherwise provided for, and paid at the Treasury; also, a statement of all the contracts made during the same year, by, or under the direction of, the Secretary of the Treasury; together with a copy of the contract made, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, by the collector for the port of Boston and Charlestown, for building a custom-house in that port; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage a corps of volunteers for a short period in the service of the United States; and, on motion by Mr. LEIB, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 26.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson, Jeremiah Reynolds and Levin Jones," reported it without amendment; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and amended; and the President having reported it to the House accordingly, the bill was ordered to the third reading as amended.

Mr. MEIGS, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill granting the right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

MONDAY, JANUARY 29.

OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, in the place of Samuel White, deceased, attended, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him, and he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson, Jeremiah Reynolds and Levin Jones," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands, in certain cases, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage a corps of volunteers, for a short period, in the service of the United States: and, on motion by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be further postponed.

Mr. CAMPBELL presented the petition of a number of the inhabitants of the State of Ohio, signed John Short and others, praying an alteration of the law regulating the sales of public lands, for reasons stated in the petition; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to regulate and fix the compensations of clerks, and to authorize the laying out certain public roads, and for other purposes;" which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. BAYARD gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans.

Mr. REED, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 24th instant, the resolution for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, reported the same with amendments; which were read for consideration. The resolution as amended is as follows:

"If any citizen of the United States shall accept of any title of nobility, or of any other title of distinction, from any Emperor, King, Prince, Potentate, or foreign State, or shall hold the same by descent, or shall intermarry with any descendant of any Emperor, King, or Prince, or with any person of the blood royal, such citizen shall thenceforth be incapable of exercising or enjoying any of the rights and immunities of a free citizen of the United States or of the individual States; and shall also be incapable of holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, under them, or either of them."

TUESDAY, January 30.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another," reported the bill without amendment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, entitled "An act to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster," with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. The House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes;" a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of William Hawkins from his imprisonment;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jared Shattuck;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the appointment of an additional judge, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of Madison county, in the Mississippi Territory;" in which several bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage a corps of volunteers, for a short period, in the service of the United States; and, after debate, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. PICKERING submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate the information which will exhibit those features in the conduct of foreign Powers towards the United States, referred to in his Message of the 3d instant, which impose on them the necessity of the precautionary measures recommended in that Message, of providing, by law, for detaching one hundred thousand of the militia, and for raising a force of twenty thousand volunteers.

WEDNESDAY, January 31.

Mr. BAYARD asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, CRAWFORD, GILES, FRANKLIN, and HILLHOUSE, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jared Shattuck," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GREGG, BRADLEY, and FRANKLIN, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of William Hawkins from his imprisonment," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GREGG, BRADLEY, and MATHEWSON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. POPE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John N. Stout," reported the bill without amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act for the appointment of an additional judge, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of Madison county, in the Mississippi Territory," was read the second time; and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CRAWFORD, WHITESIDE, and LEIB, were appointed the committee.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster," and concurred therein.

Mr. GERMAN submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That provision be made by law for protecting and defending, by convoy, the ships and vessels belonging to citizens of the United States loaded with articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, or Territories thereof, not contraband of war, bound to any foreign port or place to which the ships and vessels of the United States are not excluded by municipal regulations, and not being actually blockaded by an armed force.

Resolved, That the citizens of the United States, who shall put their ships or vessels under protection of convoy of an armed vessel or vessels, as aforesaid, shall be permitted to arm in their defence.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage a corps of volunteers for a short period, in the service of the United States; and, on motion by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed to postpone the bill, for the purpose of considering the motion made yesterday on the subject; and the motion was amended as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate any information he possesses, rendering it necessary or prudent on the part of the United States to augment its military force.

And, on the question to agree to the motion as amended, it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Pickering, and Reed.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Turner, and Whiteside.

And the consideration of the bill last mentioned was resumed, as in Committee of the Whole; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 1.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Governor of the State of Kentucky, enclosing a certificate of the appointment of HENRY CLAY a Senator of the United States, in place of Buckner Thruston, resigned. And the certificate was read, and ordered to lie on file.

The bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BAYARD, CRAWFORD, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage a corps of volunteers, for a short period, in the service of the United States; and, after progress, adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 2.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Postmaster General, prepared in obedience to the provisions of the act passed 21st April, 1806, entitled "An act to regulate and fix the compensations of clerks, and to authorize the laying out certain public roads, and for other purposes:" which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the petition of a number of citizens of Washington county, in the District of Columbia, signed Walter Jones and others, praying that provision may be made for the establishment of a penitentiary system, for reasons stated at large in the petition. He also presented the representation of the grand jury of said county, together with the representation of the justices of the circuit court on the same subject, which were read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. ANDERSON, MATHEWSON, and CRAWFORD, were appointed the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the petition of Thos. Beall, of Georgetown, and others; also, the petition of William Marbury and others, inhabitants of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, praying that the sixth section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," which exempts the City of Washington from taxation by the levy court of Washington county, be repealed, for reasons mentioned in the petitions, or that such laws may pass as may redress the grievances complained of; and the petitions were read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. ANDERSON, CONDRIT, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage, for a short period, a corps of volunteers in the service of the United States; and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another;" and, after debate, adjourned.

MONDAY, February 5.

HENRY CLAY, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, in the place of Buckner Thruston, attended, and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating that the measures which have been authorized by the Board subsequent to their last report of the 4th of February, 1809, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Board, dated the second day of the present month, and the statements therein referred to; which are therewith transmitted and prayed to be received as part of their report.

And the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another;" and it was ordered to the third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year one thousand eight hundred and ten;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which application shall be made for the purchase of land at the several land offices; and for the relief of Joab Garret," in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage, for a short period, a corps of volunteers in the service of the United States; and, on motion by Mr. GREGG, to strike out, from section third, line fourth, the words "immediately thereafter," for the purpose of inserting "upon entering into service," in lieu thereof—

Mr. BRADLEY called for a division of the question, and the question was taken on striking out; and passed in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Gaillard, German, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Giles, Lambert, Leib, Parker, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, and Whiteside.

On the question to insert the words "upon entering into service," it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Clay, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Mathewson, Parker, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Lambert, Leib, Pope, Robinson, and Whiteside.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, it was agreed that the consideration of the bill be further postponed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the 17th January, the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia, reported amendments; which were read for consideration.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John N. Stout."

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

TUESDAY, February 6.

On motion, by Mr. BAYARD,

Resolved, That the Attorney General be required to lay before the Senate, a statement of the number and nature of the cases depending before the Supreme Court, upon writ of error or appeal from the district court of Orleans; and, also, information as to the extent and nature of the jurisdiction actually exercised by the said district court.

The bill, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which application shall be made for the purchase of land at the several land offices, and for the relief of Joab Garret" was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GREGG, CAMPBELL, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1810," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, ANDERSON, CRAWFORD, FRANKLIN, and GOODRICH, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage, for a short period, a corps of volunteers in the service of the United States; and, on motion by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed to postpone the bill for the purpose of considering the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the Surveyer of the Public Buildings, of the 28th of November last; and, on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, the report having been amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That, from and after Saturday, the 10th instant, the Senate will hold their session in the new Senate Chamber, lately provided in the north wing of the Capitol.

Mr. LLOYD submitted the following motion.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to cause to be laid before the Senate the amount of duties which has accrued on merchandise imported into the United States from any port or place in the Mediterranean, since the 30th of June, 1804, and also the amount of duties which has accrued in consequence of the duty of two and a half per centum laid on all goods, wares, and merchandise, paying a duty ad valorem, imported into the United States; which said duty was laid for protecting the commerce and seamen of the United States, for carrying on warlike operations against any of the Barbary Powers which might commit hostilities against the United States, and for defraying the expenses incidental to an intercourse with the said Powers.

The consideration of the bill last mentioned was resumed, as in Committee of the Whole; and sundry amendments having been submitted by Mr. BRADLEY, on motion, it was agreed that the consideration of the bill, together with the amendments, be postponed until to-morrow.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another," was read the third time. On motion by Mr. GILES, the bill was recommitted to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, GILES, and REED, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John N. Stout," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases was resumed, and postponed.

The Senate resumed the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia; and the consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill to incorporate religious societies in the District of Columbia; and the consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

WEDNESDAY, February 7.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that the further consideration of the bill to engage a corps of volunteers, for a short period, in the service of the United States, be the order of the day for Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the report of the select committee on the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia; and, after progress, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

A message from the House informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the Secretary of the Department of War;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

THURSDAY, February 8.

The bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the Secretary of the Department of War," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GREGG, GILES, and BRENT, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia, together with the report of the select committee thereon; which was amended and agreed to; and the bill having been further amended, the President reported it to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases; and on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed the motion submitted on the 18th of January for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, together with the amendments reported thereon by the select committee; and, on motion by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be the order of the day for Tuesday next.

FRIDAY, February 9.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of William Hawkins from his imprisonment," reported it with an amendment; which was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to the third reading as amended.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported that they had examined and found correctly engrossed the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases; and the bill was read the third time; and the blank having been filled with "six hundred and forty," on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the consideration of the bill was further postponed.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from Robert Fulton, with sundry copies of his pamphlet, explanatory of the practice and effects of torpedoes; and the letter was read.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Attorney General, made in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 1st instant, the bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

MONDAY, February 12.

The bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BAYARD, BRADLEY, and LEIB, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing a subscription, on behalf of the United States, to the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware and Ohio Canal Companies; as amended; and, on motion by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases; and, on motion by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until Thursday next.

The Senate resumed the bill to incorporate religious societies in the District of Columbia; and, on motion by Mr. ANDERSON, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the first Monday in December next.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of William Hawkins from his imprisonment," was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the sixth instant respecting the duties on goods imported from the Mediterranean, which was amended and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to cause to be laid before the Senate the amount of duties which has accrued on merchandise imported into the United States from any port or place in the Mediterranean since the 30th of June, 1804; and, also, the amount of duties which has accrued in consequence of the duty of two and a half per cent. laid on all goods, wares, and merchandise, paying a duty ad valorem, imported into the United States; which said duty was laid by the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers;" and the several acts to revive and continue the same in force.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia was read the third time as amended; and, on motion by Mr. SMITH of Maryland, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to amend the bill, as follows: line 113, after the word "mentioned," insert "for and during the term of twenty years, after which it shall be lawful for Congress to regulate said tolls, provided the said tolls shall never be reduced so that the stockholders shall not receive ten per centum interest on their capital stock;" and some of the blanks having been filled, as follows:

The 1st with	"twenty-five cents."
2d	"twenty-five cents."
3d	"fifty-cents."
4th	"twelve and-a-half cents."
5th	"twenty cents."
6th	"six cents."

On motion, by Mr. LEIB, it was agreed to recommit the bill, for the purpose of providing a difference between the tolls on business and pleasure carriages; and Messrs. LEIB, SMITH of Maryland, and BRENT, were appointed the committee.

CORPS OF VOLUNTEERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to engage a corps of volunteers for a short period in the service of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD.—The bill before us proposes the payment of a sum exceeding eight hundred thousand dollars, to men engaged to serve as volunteers, even though no service should ever be rendered or required. The amendment which has been submitted is designed to save this money, unless these men should be called from their private employments into the public service. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just sat down, (Mr. LEIB,) has said that it is no impeachment of the patriotism of a volunteer to suppose he will not engage to serve when called upon, unless he is paid for the engagement twenty-five dollars, although he may never be called into service; and, to illustrate his position, he has attempted a parallel (by no means a happy one) between the case of a volunteer and a member of the National Legislature. We are paid, he says, not only for our daily attendance in this place, but for the expenses of the road from the time we leave our homes. Upon this footing place the volunteers, and the objection is removed. The moment they leave their homes they are in the public service, and from that moment they ought to be paid. When a man gives up his time to the public, he ceases to labor for himself, and has a fair claim to public remuneration. But will you empty the public Treasury, already nearly exhausted, in paying for services which may and probably never will be rendered? Let us reserve the money till the service is required; we can then have some assurance that it will not be thrown away.

I was, sir, not a little amused by the course pursued yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. POPE.) He began by complaining of the desultory manner in which the debate had been conducted, and yet he indulged himself in a very long and certainly an eloquent speech without feeling an obligation to say one word in relation to the important question before us. If, sir, I should be guilty of the same departure from the question in the remarks I have to submit, I shall feel myself justified and protected by the example he has been allowed to set.

The general merits of the bill having been brought into discussion, I am at liberty to inquire into the primary question, whether the condition of the country renders it expedient, at this time, to increase its military force? I consider it as a principle in a free Government, such as we live under, that the military force, committed to the hands of the Executive, should be restrained within narrow bounds, and ought not to be augmented but in a case of evident necessity. A large military force is at all times dangerous to the liberties of a country, and the expense with which it must be attended, is, with us, a strong additional objection in the present low state of our finances.

The question, then, which I propose is, whether a necessity exists to increase our Military Establishment? It already amounts to ten thousand men; they are enough for our garrisons; and, with the views which I have taken of the state of the country, we do not now, nor are we likely to want for men for any other purpose upon land.

The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. POPE,) yesterday, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. LEIB) to-day, have not only said, but pressed it upon us, that the President had recommended an augmentation of our military force; and the same gentleman from Pennsylvania has gone to the extent of saying that, as the President had recommended this augmentation, he would take it for granted that it was necessary. And are we, sir, come to this point, that we are to take for granted whatever the President recommends? If the President barely recommends an increase of the Army, of the Navy, or of taxes, are we to take it for granted that power cannot be abused, or the people burdened unnecessarily? Are we, then, no better than the ancient Parliament of Paris, sitting solely to register the edicts that are sent to us? Are we prepared to establish the principle of Presidential infallibility? I am disposed to treat the recommendation with all due respect and deference, but this respect and deference will carry me no further than to carefully inquire into the expediency of the measure recommended.

The President may be better informed than we are on the subject of our foreign affairs. I presume he is so; and upon that ground it was urged a few days ago, upon the resolution submitted for the purpose, that the President should be required to indicate the information which induced the necessity of augmenting our military force. The same gentlemen and their friends then told us that the President had sent us all the information he possessed on the subject. Nay, sir, it was treated as an imputation upon the integrity of the Executive conduct to suspect that any material information had been withheld from us. As gentlemen have refused to enlighten our minds with Presidential knowledge, and have left us in the darkness of our own ignorance, I shall, for my own part, still consider it as my duty, with the dim light I possess, to inquire into the subject, and to decide according to the best judgment I can form.

The question, whether it is expedient to augment our military force, would seem, in a great degree, to depend upon the question, Shall we have war or preserve peace? If there be no reason to apprehend war, we have a sufficient army for a Peace Establishment; but, even in the event of the only war that can be expected, it is extremely evident that the corps designed to be raised by the bill before us, is not suited to the service which the probable nature of the warfare would require. In my opinion, war is not to be apprehended, and our present army is, therefore, sufficient for our purpose, without incurring the expense of the measure now proposed to us. Who is to make the war, and upon what ground is it to be declared? I have never contended nor said that we have not cause for war against England and France. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAMPLIN) that there is cause enough to justify us, in the eyes both of God and man, to make war upon either of these nations. This sentiment I avowed in my place in the session of last year. It is not with a view to the interest of France, or England, that I am not disposed to make war; but if, under all we have suffered, we have an evident interest to remain at peace, what reason requires us, or what motive can induce us, to abandon that interest? The course of our conduct has long since decided that we are not going to war for that bauble "honor." "The days of chivalry are past." It is not a question of profit and loss; and it requires little calculation to see how the account would stand between war and peace in relation to Great Britain.

I have said that we have just cause of war against England and France, and though less is said of the wrongs which we have endured from France, in fact they have surpassed those suffered from England. Trust me, sir, that I mean not to justify or extenuate the outrages of England, but those of France, I affirm to have been more atrocious and insupportable. I need not go back to the Berlin and Milan decrees. They are merged in that of Bayonne. This decree is nothing short of a declaration of war, as it authorizes the indiscriminate capture of all American vessels found upon the ocean. In fact, to the extent of her means, France has carried on this war. Does she allow a vessel to escape, which she has the power to take? And, when there has been danger of her losing the prey, sooner than relinquish the prize to the American owner, she has put fire to it and destroyed it. Your captured seamen have been cast into irons, and treated more like felons than prisoners of war. What can exceed this state of things? Not an article of the treaty made under the Consular Government has been observed; and, instead of deigning to treat with you respecting the rights you claim, or the grievances you complain of, she imperiously prescribes the course you are to pursue, and, assuming the sovereignty of your nation, she has had the audacity to declare war for you against her enemy! Whatever she could do, France has done to injure, insult, and degrade this country. No doubt we should not have borne from her all which we have submitted to, had it not been for the acts of violence and injustice which we have experienced upon the part of Britain. She also has furnished us cause for war, and done enough to provoke it. She has given laws to the ocean promotive of her own interests and destructive of our rights. She has taken from us, by violence, the colonial trade, and, by the arbitrary extension of the principle of blockade, leaves us the commerce with Europe, held by the miserable tenure of her good will. Our seamen she forcibly takes from our own ships, and scourges them upon the guns of her men-of-war if they refuse to enter into her service. Her conduct upon these subjects, or any one of them, is cause enough of war, when the nation is disposed to go to war.

It has, sir, been a painful task to me to make a comparison between the wrongs and outrages which we have endured from the two great belligerents. But while a recent occurrence has inflamed the public mind against one, we ought not to lose sight of the hostile conduct of the other.

After all, the question which we have now to consider is, whether war is an event upon which we are to calculate? No one speaks or thinks of a war with France. She can do no more than she has done. One Congress after another have passed over, and it is now rather too late to resent what we have so long submitted to.

Is it likely, then, that we shall have war with Great Britain? Who is to commence the war? Not the United States; our faith is pledged to further the negotiation before we have recourse to hostility. Our Government has informed the British Government that they are still willing to treat, if Britain will send to us a Minister of better manners. In the face of these peaceful assurances, can you make war? Would our republican virtue avail itself of the example, if to be found in the perfidy of Monarchs, of violating our pledged faith! We have aspired to a better and fairer character; and if the Powers of Europe have disregarded the obligation of moral right, I trust we shall not furnish them with the means of retorting the reproach upon us. Good faith would not allow us at present to commence war; and give me leave to say that you have the proof upon your table, in the bill sent from the other House. that they have determined not to go to war. The bill before us supposes war, and therefore requires an augmentation of our military force. The bill they have sent us supposes peace, both with Britain and France, and proceeds to regulate our commercial relations with those countries. It is idle for us to think of war when the House of Representatives, who have a stronger hold on public confidence, as well as of the purse strings, have averted their eyes from the prospect. I deem it settled that nothing exists for which at this time this Government will declare war against Great Britain.

The recent affront given by the British Minister to our Secretary of State, or to our Government, if you please, will surely not drive us into a war, after patiently submitting to the capture and condemnation of our vessels carrying colonial produce; to the interdiction of our commerce from the ports of the Continent under the arbitrary and feigned blockades; to the impressment of our seamen on board of our own vessels; and to the cruel and bloody aggression in the case of the Chesapeake. After all these things, and twice as many more on the part of France have not driven us to madness and to war, the nation will certainly not agree to shed its blood for a small affair of honor between two public functionaries.

Of this celebrated affair, which is already spread over the face of volumes, it does not belong to my subject, or to my purpose, to say one word further than to inquire whether it is likely to prove a cause of immediate war. On our part that point is settled. We have discarded the Minister, and thus revenged the insult offered to the Government. It is thus we have retorted the insult on Mr. Jackson, and the account is closed between him and the Secretary of State; and we have assured the British Government that, the affair being personal, we shall be ready to treat with any other Minister she will send us.

The only question remaining upon this head is, will Britain commence the war? I answer, surely not. She has no motive. She has done, and continues to do, as she pleases on the ocean. She has nothing to complain of. She felt herself injured at one time by the neutral flag covering enemies' merchandise; but her decrees and her conquests have relieved her from all uneasiness upon that subject. England does not and cannot feel herself an injured party, and having an interest to remain at peace with us, it is against every probability that she will commence the war as long as she is satisfied that no such intention is harbored upon our part. She will not be pleased with the late rejection of her Minister; but still she cannot make it a cause of war, because it is personal and not national. Our Government considers that Mr. Jackson has offered them an insult, and though the British Government may view the subject in a different point of light, they will surely have liberality enough to allow us to be the judges of our own feelings. We have assured them that the dismissal of Mr. Jackson was not designed to shut the door of negotiation; and although it is possible that they may despair of being able to send us a Minister to our taste, (for, send who they may, they will still send us an Englishman,) yet they will certainly be willing, if we are content, to let things remain in their present condition. Upon the whole, sir, I conclude that there is no probability of an immediate war, and therefore that an augmentation of our military force is not necessary.

We have, however, been reproached by the gentleman who reported this bill for having voted for an increase of the Navy, while we are opposed to any augmentation of the Army. I did vote for the four additional frigates, and I should have been willing to vote for four ships-of-the-line. The United States require, for the protection of their territory, a standing army of a certain amount. Our present Military Establishment exceeds ten thousand men. These are designed for the security of our persons and property upon land; and is not the person and property of the citizen entitled to protection upon the ocean?

God has decided that the people of this country should be a commercial people. You read that decree in the sea-coast of seventeen hundred miles which he has given you; in the numerous navigable waters which penetrate the interior of the country; in the various ports and harbors scattered along your shores; in your fisheries; in the redundant productions of your soil; and, more than all, in the enterprising and adventurous spirit of your people. It is no more a question whether the people of this country shall be allowed to plough the ocean, than it is whether they shall be permitted to plough the land. It is not in the power of this Government, nor would it be if it were as strong as the most despotic upon the earth, to subdue the commercial spirit, or to destroy the commercial habits of the country. Young as we are, our tonnage and commerce surpass those of every nation upon the globe but one, and if not wasted by the deprivations to which they were exposed by their defenceless situation, and the more ruinous restrictions to which this Government subjected them, it would require not many more years to have made them the greatest in the world. Is this immense wealth always to be exposed as a prey to the rapacity of freebooters? Why will you protect your citizens and their property upon land, and leave them defenceless upon the ocean? As your mercantile property increases, the prize becomes more tempting to the cupidity of foreign nations. In the course of things the ruins and aggressions which you have experienced will multiply, nor will they be restrained while we have no appearance of a naval force.

I have always been in favor of a Naval Establishment—not from the unworthy motives attributed by the gentleman from Georgia to a former Administration, in order to increase patronage, but from a profound conviction that the safety of the Union and the prosperity of the nation depended greatly upon its commerce, which never could be securely enjoyed without the protection of naval power. I offer, sir, abundant proof for the satisfaction of the liberal mind of that gentleman, that patronage was not formerly a motive in voting an increase of the Navy, when I give now the same vote, when surely I and my friends have nothing to hope, and for myself I thank God nothing to wish, from the patronage it may confer.

You must and will have a Navy; but it is not to be created in a day, nor is it to be expected, that in its infancy, it will be able to cope foot to foot with the full-grown vigor of the navy of England. But we are even now capable of maintaining a naval force formidable enough to threaten the British commerce, and to render this nation an object of more respect and consideration.

In another point of view, the protection of commerce has become more indispensable. The discovery is completely made, that it is from commerce that the revenue is to be drawn which is to support this Government. A direct tax, a stamp act, a carriage tax, and an excise, have been tried; and I believe, sir, after the lesson which experience has given on the subject, no set of men in power will ever repeat them again, for all they are likely to produce. The burden must be pretty light upon the people of this country, or the rider is in great danger. You may be allowed to sell your back lands for some time longer, but the permanent fund for the support of this Government is the imports.

If the people were willing to part with commerce, can the Government dispense with it? But, when it belongs equally to the interest of the people and of the Government to encourage and protect it, will you not spare a few of those dollars which it brings into your Treasury to defend and to protect it?

In relation to the increase of a permanent military force, a free people cannot cherish too great a jealousy. An army may wrest the power from the hands of the people, and deprive them of their liberty. It becomes us, therefore, to be extremely cautious how we augment it. But a navy of any magnitude can never threaten us with the same danger. Upon land, at this time, we have nothing—and probably, at any future time, we shall have but little—to fear from any foreign Power. It is upon the ocean we meet them; it is there our collisions arise; it is there we are most feeble, most vulnerable, and most exposed; it is there, by consequence, that our safety and prosperity must require an augmented force.

I have been endeavoring to show, Mr. President, from an examination of the posture of our affairs in relation to Britain and France, that there is no such probability of war with either of these nations as to require or to justify an expensive measure, designed for an increase of our military force. I now proceed to show, that in the event of war with either of these Powers, the force designed to be raised by this bill will be useless, and incapable of rendering the very service for which they are probably intended.

Let me first suppose a war with France—what are we to apprehend from this war? Not the invasion of our territory. She has troops in abundance, but how is she to transport them across the Atlantic? Would she ask permission of Great Britain? or could she do it without license? It is now for her a great achievement, when her transports or men-of-war, by fast sailing, or by hard fighting, can make a successful voyage from one of her own ports to another. While the present war continues, (and it is not likely to end very soon,) we have nothing to dread from a French invasion.

Then, suppose the war with England—is it probable that our territory will be invaded? The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. BRADLEY) has told us that the frontiers of his State would be exposed to the irruption of a British and savage force of not less than two thousand men. If, sir, there be anything to fear from this quarter, what becomes of the brilliant prospects which have been presented to us, within and without these Halls, of forcing Britain to terms by seizing her Northern possessions? And this Canada, which has been promised and pledged as a fund to compensate us for our expenses, and to indemnify us for our losses? And now we are called upon to provide thirty thousand men to defend us from invasion from that feeble province! But the fear of invasion from Canada does not exist. Canada is furnished with troops for defence, but none for invasion. More than thirty years ago, the invasion of an army of ten thousand men upon that quarter was fatal to the invaders. Britain has not forgotten the fate of Burgoyne, and she would consider, also, that where she heretofore met one gun, she would now find three presented; and that, instead of encountering men shackled with the scruples of former allegiance, she would have to fight sons of freedom, invigorated from their infancy with a sense of liberty and independence. The brave militia of Vermont would want nobody to help them in a struggle with Canada—they would agree to fight that province single-handed; and, take my word for it, the Crown of England would as freely stipulate for the neutrality of Canada in a war with the United States, as in the Continental wars she has done for that of Hanover. Would Britain attempt to invade us in any other quarter? It is evident that she has occasion for all her troops upon the Continent and at home, and we may consider it as certain that she would not hazard a body of troops, capable of making an impression upon this country, three thousand miles from her. In case of a British war, invasion is put out of the question. The purpose of the troops to be raised by this bill can, then, only be to invade and conquer the British possessions on our Continent, in the event of war. We have, therefore, to inquire whether they could be employed for that purpose?

Upon a former occasion the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) attributed to me an opinion upon the question which I had not then formed, because I had not then examined the question; but the attention which I have since been able to bestow upon it, has completely satisfied me that the militia cannot constitutionally be marched beyond the limits of our territory for the purpose of conquest. A different doctrine is repugnant to the nature and design of a militia, and the plain demonstrations of intention upon the face of the Constitution. The militia is the whole physical force of a country supposed to be capable of bearing arms. Such a force was never placed at the disposal of any government for the purpose of conquest. They are designed for the support of law and order, and to defend our liberties and rights against domestic usurpation or foreign invasion. They are not instruments of power, to gratify ambition by despoiling other people of their territory or self-government. They devote themselves alone to the sacred duty of defending their country and maintaining their Constitution and laws. Proclaim to the militia that it is in the power of the Government to carry them abroad, in order to make foreign conquests, and you annihilate the vital spirit of the body. They are no longer the defenders solely of their country; they are equally the instruments of wrong and oppression.

The Constitution, in relation to foreign nations, does not contemplate conquest, but defence only; and there is not, especially with regard to the militia, a single provision which warrants a pretence to employ them for the purpose of conquest. The only provision on the subject which has been referred to is in the eighth section of the first article, in which power is given to Congress "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

I have heard it frequently remarked by the gentleman from Virginia, that there was not a sentence, a word, or even a comma, in the Constitution, not replete with meaning and definite intention. I have always considered it as an instrument constructed with admirable ability. We will then consider whether the construction put upon the passage cited comports with the high character for precision which we agree in attributing to the Constitution.

The power relied upon by the gentleman, is that given to call out the militia to execute the laws. The obvious meaning of this provision refers to the general administration of the laws of the United States. Combinations may be formed to resist the execution of the law (as happened in relation to the excise law) which the feeble arm of civil authority may not be able to coerce. The Constitution, in such case, affords the aid of the militia; and, in the case to which I referred, they were made use of in support of the law. But the gentleman insists that Congress may make a law to take possession of a foreign country, and that the militia may then be called upon to execute the law.

Congress has no power but what is delegated to it; and if the important power to make conquests had been designed to be given, would it have been conferred by so precise an instrument as we agree the Constitution to be, under cover of a forced and obscured inference from a power evidently given for another purpose? On this important point the Constitution has studiously and definitely described the occasion upon which the militia may be employed—"to execute the laws, to suppress insurrections, and to repel invasions."

If it had been intended to employ them in the important and perilous work of conquest, would an express provision have been made for their use in the case of insurrections and invasions, to which, naturally, they would have been applied, and nothing said as to conquests, in its nature the most questionable service into which they could be called? This is not consistent with the character which we have agreed belongs to the Constitution. If, further, the point depended upon the question, whether Congress could make a law directing the Executive to conquer a foreign country, the militia could never be called upon to make foreign conquests, because Congress has no power to make such a law. Conquests are under the laws of nations, and not under municipal law. Legislative jurisdiction depends upon one of two grounds—viz: territory or allegiance. The operations of your laws are confined to the circuits of your own territories, unless operating upon the allegiance of your citizens. If the principle contended for be correct, you might still make it treason for the subjects of a foreign State to resist your invasion as to make it lawful for your President to take possession of their country. Nay, if such an act of Congress could be passed, it would, as the law of treason has been settled among us, be treason to resist it; and you would hang the patriot as a traitor who came forward to defend his country.

The gentleman from Virginia has put several cases, involving, as he supposes, inconvenience or absurdity upon our construction of the Constitution. He supposes the enemy upon your frontier threatening an invasion, and the ground more favorable for attack upon their side of the line than upon ours. He asks also, if, in an encounter, they are forced over the line, whether you may not pursue them? Upon these cases I have no difficulty in saying you may pass the line, if done for the purpose of repelling an invasion. The Constitution expressly delegates the power to employ a militia to repel an invasion. If, therefore, they are passed into a foreign territory, in a case in which it is necessary effectually to defeat an invasion, I should suppose they were constitutionally employed. It will depend, therefore, upon the quo animo they are carried out of their own territory. If, as the means to repel an invasion, the Constitution, having given the power to repel invasion, gives also the means of employing them effectually for that purpose; but for conquest, they are not allowed to be used. They are instruments too precious to be employed in the service of ambition.

The gentleman has told us that he considered the point settled when the militia were employed to take possession of Louisiana, when acquired by the cession of France. I mean not, sir, at this time, to say a word upon the question which has been heretofore agitated, whether the limits of our territory could be enlarged, either by purchase or conquest, consistently with the Constitution; but, admitting for the present that they might be in either way, there is certainly a great difference between employing the militia to defend a territory already acquired, and marching them into a foreign territory, for the purpose of acquiring it. In one case you use them to repel invasion from a territory belonging to you; and, in the other, to invade a territory which does not belong to you. I respect the "res judicata" as much as the gentleman, but I must be allowed to tell him that the case he cited is not in point.

If I am correct in either of my positions, that war at this time is not to be apprehended; or if, on the other hand, it should take place with England, the only use to be made of this corps is the invasion of Canada, it is evident that in neither event do we want a force of this description. If there be war, no augmentation of the military force is necessary. But you would not, surely, throw away eight hundred thousand dollars unnecessarily; and if the only war should happen which appears in the remotest degree probable, this force will not answer the purpose for which it is intended. Of what nature it is I mean presently to inquire; but it evidently carries with it a sufficiency of the militia character not to allow you, Constitutionally, to employ it for the purpose of conquest. I cannot, therefore, consent to sacrifice nearly a million of dollars upon a fruitless project.

Before we vote, Mr. President, for the bill before us, it belongs to us to ascertain the nature of the military corps which we are about to form. The Constitution recognises but two species of military force—one the militia and the other the army. The militia is the physical strength of the country capable to bear arms. They are not brought into service by enlistment, but by allegiance. They are not recruits, but soldiers made by law. They are detached from private life by law, commanded to take the field whenever the order, peace, or safety of the country require it. The obligation to serve is not from any personal agreement, but from the assent implied from the social compact. The ordinary nature and occasion of their employment detains them in the field but a short time, and returns them at the end of a short period to the bosoms of their families, and replaces them in the common character of citizens. Being the natural and efficient defence of the rights and liberties of the country, a prudent jealousy has vested in distinct authorities the power to appoint officers for these and for the Army. The former belongs to the States, the latter to the United States. The Army is composed of men enlisted under the authority of the United States, agreeing to serve as soldiers for a limited time, subject to military law, and officered by the Government of the United States. To which of these classes are we to assign the corps designed to be raised by the bill before us? The plan exhibits every feature of a regular army, except the mode of officering. The volunteers are enlisted by companies or sections, and yet individually, for the consent of each man is to be obtained, and he subscribes the engagement to serve. They are paid a bounty, and agree to serve for a limited time. In this instance the period limited is a year, but the same law may extend to five or ten years. If you call this corps no army, but a militia, you easily evade an important provision in the Constitution. The Constitution prohibits any appropriation of money being made for the use of the Army for more than two years. These two years send the Representatives to their constituents, and if a dangerous or unnecessary military force has been raised, the people relieve themselves from the peril of the burden by the employment of men whose views and designs better correspond with their own. But this volunteer force being militia, and no part of the Army, may be engaged for ten years, and may be supported by a permanent appropriation for that time. What security have you against a standing force of this nature more than in the case of a standing army? The only difference is, that the officers receive their commissions from the States; but, called into service, are they not fed, clothed, and paid by the United States, and subject only to the orders of the Executive? But, of what consequence would it be, after they had been embodied for a short period of time, had acquired an esprit du corps, were deriving their subsistence and pay from this Government, and were subject to its orders alone, from what quarters the officers originally derived their commissions? This corps is of spurious origin, and a mongrel breed. It is an unnatural mixture of army and militia. The men have every character of the soldiers of a standing army, and those that command them have but one mark of militia officers. Let us have an army or militia of full blood; we shall then be acquainted with their properties, and know what we have to rely on. But, the plan of this bill seems calculated to engender a military corps with all the bad qualities of a militia and of an army, without one good property of either.

I shall be indulged in one word as to the mode in which it is provided that the corps shall be officered. The militia, sir, with us, are territorially assigned to companies, regiments, and brigades. They who live in certain districts of country form a company, and so on, regiments and brigades. The officer of one regiment or brigade has no command out of his regiment or brigade. This bill forms the companies and regiments out of the different companies, regiments, and brigades. A body thus composed could not be commanded, under the laws of the State, by any officer by virtue of his State's commission. But, by this bill, the President is to assign to each officer his respective command. It is not, then, the commission that makes the officer or confers command, but the assignment of the President. The State power, under the commission, is dormant until the hand of the President shakes it from its slumbers. In fact, the necessity of State commissions only limits the compass of selection, but the officer is substantially appointed (and without the concurrence of this body) and commissioned by the President. The officer has no command until he is assigned. And how is this assignment to be made? Not by message, but the officer must have something to show for it. It must be a warrant, by some instrument of writing; and, call it by what name you will, in substance it is a commission. And this, let me tell you, will be a formidable and dangerous encroachment upon the power of the States.

Will you permit me now, sir, to ask why the militia are not to be relied on, and in what point they will be excelled by this corps of volunteers? The gentleman from Kentucky told us he was not for an increase of the regular troops, but was for raising a body of citizen soldiers. I am also against an augmentation of the regular force, and equally against an increase of military force to be composed of the mongrel breed of this bill. I think we might safely rely, for any emergency likely to arise, upon those who alone truly deserve and are justly characterized by the appellation of citizen soldiers—the militia, in their pure, unadulterated state. How are these volunteers improved by the money you pay them? They remain at home, are not imbodied, disciplined, nor trained; when required for service, for the first time, are they placed in their ranks, and a musket put into their hands. What better are they than the militia, who will turn out if danger threatens the country, without a bounty, as expeditiously as these volunteers?

We are to consider, further, the invidious nature of this system, and its inequality and injustice. It looks as if you could not rely upon the body of the militia, but must call the choice spirits to form a separate corps. Does this operation improve or flatter the militia? And, by selecting a part, do you not disorganize and disparage the remainder?

Again, sir, if service be required and the United States be assailed at any particular point, can you suppose that thirty thousand men, scattered over the face of our country, from Maine to Georgia, will dispense with the employment of the militia? The militia and volunteers are then called upon to turn out at the same time—the first gratuitously, the latter for the bounty which they have received. Will the body of the militia be satisfied that a part of them, without any better pretensions than the others, are paid for turning out, when they are obliged to perform the same duty for nothing?

Again, sir, will you not consult the state of your Treasury before you incur the fruitless expense of this bill? Let me direct your eyes to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for a view of the deplorable condition of your finances. We there find that the Treasury is empty; we see to the bottom of it, and the streams have failed which formerly replenished it. In this state of things, is it a matter of no moment to part with eight hundred thousand dollars—I may say to throw them away—for if the bill passes, they are gone, and the United States have no prospect of benefit in return? At present there is no probability that these volunteers will be wanted, and if called into service, if as good, they are not better soldiers than the militia, whom we have for our reliance without the waste of public money.

We are told for our comfort by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES.) that if, as he admits it is shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, our Treasury is empty, and that a loan of four millions of dollars will be necessary for the estimated expenses of the current year, yet that our credit is good, and of course we can borrow to the extent of our wants. This suggestion furnishes but a very gloomy prospect. Credit is not a visionary structure; it requires a solid foundation to rest on. If you have nothing but credit to support a war in its commencement, what will support your credit in the progress of a long, expensive, and ruinous contest? If, after a prosperous peace of five and twenty years, the ill-judged restrictions of your commerce for two years have exhausted your Treasury, what will be the state of your finances at the end of a wasteful war of three or five years, which immediately destroys the great source of your revenue? Loans are our ultimate resort, and what are we to forbode if driven, in the commencement of a war, to our last resource? But, sir, if necessity will justify our borrowing, are you excused in borrowing for projects evidently unnecessary and fruitless?

If we possessed at this moment the overflowing Treasury which a short time since puzzled the wits and invention of your members to dispose of its surplusses, I should feel less objection to the generous donations which the bill proposes; but, at a crisis when the wants of the Government are increasing and its resources are decaying, I conceive it to be a time illly selected to display our liberality or to indulge profusion.

When gentlemen will convince me that there is danger of invasion, I shall be as ready as any one on this floor to vote for an augmentation of our military force—not upon the principles of this bill, but upon such as would add to the strength of the Army, or improve the condition of the militia; and, even with the view I have of the state of our affairs, I will agree to such preparations for defence as will serve us in the event of war, and yet not be useless, or lost, if peace should be preserved. If the committee will take back this bill and propose the expenditure of eight hundred thousand dollars in the purchase of arms to be deposited in convenient arsenals for the use of the militia, I will agree to lay out not only eight hundred thousand dollars, but a million of dollars. According to the estimate contained in the bill, a million of dollars will furnish a hundred thousand stand of arms and accoutrements. This will arm the one hundred thousand militia who are to hold themselves in readiness for service when and wherever they may be called into the field. Adopt this measure, and if, happily, we escape a war, your money is not lost. The arms are a treasure deposited in your arsenals of more value than the dollars which are paid for them deposited in your Treasury. Such is the only preparation upon land, which, at this time, I would make for war. If hostilities happen, I do not dread invasion. But if, in such event, our enemy should be bold enough to invade our territory, I conceive the best and cheapest defence of the nation will be to supply our citizens with arms.

When Mr. BAYARD had concluded, the further consideration of the bill was made the order of the day for Monday next.—And on motion the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 13.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred, on the sixth instant, the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which application shall be made for the purchase of land at the several land offices, and for the relief of Joab Garret," reported the bill with amendments; which were considered and agreed to, and the bill was ordered to the third reading as amended.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes," reported it with an amendment.

The Senate resumed the motion made on the 18th of January for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, together with the amendments reported thereon by the select committee.

On motion, by Mr. CRAWFORD, the resolution was recommitted to a select committee, to consist of five members, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. REED, CRAWFORD, LEIB, GILES, and PICKERING, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was referred, on the first instant, the bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans, reported it with amendments; which were read.

On motion, by Mr. LEIB, it was agreed that the further consideration of the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes," together with the amendment reported thereon, be the order of the day for Monday next.

WEDNESDAY, February 14.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which application shall be made for the purchase of land at the several land offices, and for the relief of Joab Garret," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 20th of December, the bill, entitled "An act to revive an act, entitled 'An act for the relief of the refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, and for other purposes," reported the bill with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans; and, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 15.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the 6th instant, the bill, entitled, "An act authorizing the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another," reported the bill with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases; and, on motion by Mr. BRADLEY, the bill was recommitted to a select committee, to consist of five members, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, GREGG, MEIGS, FRANKLIN, and CAMPBELL, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the amendments reported by the select committee to the bill, entitled "An act to revive an act, entitled 'An act for the relief of the refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, and for other purposes,'" and, having agreed thereto, the President reported the bill to the House amended accordingly.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 6th instant, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year one thousand eight hundred and ten," reported the same with amendments; which were read.

Mr. HILLHOUSE submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate information of the manner in which the act, entitled "An act to amend and continue in force certain parts of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,'" has been executed; and how far exports to, and imports from, the ports of Great Britain, have been, or now are permitted; and, whether collectors of districts in the United States do not admit to an entry goods the growth and manufacture of Great Britain, and, if so, under what authority the same is done."

Mr. REED, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the 13th instant, the resolution for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, together with the amendments reported thereon by the select committee, reported the same further amended, to read as follows:

"No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of Congress, except of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any Emperor, King, Prince, or foreign State. And, if any citizen of the United States shall accept of any title of nobility, or of any other title of distinction, above or below that of nobility, from any Emperor, King, Prince, or foreign State, or shall hold the same by descent, such citizen shall thenceforth be incapable of exercising or enjoying any of the rights and immunities of a free citizen of the United States, or of the individual States; and shall, also, be incapable of holding any office of profit or trust under them, or either of them."

FRIDAY, February 16.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday, for information on the manner in which the non-intercourse law has been executed.

On motion, by Mr. GILES, to amend the motion, by striking out all that follows the word "information," and inserting, in lieu thereof, these words:

"Whether, in the execution of the act, entitled 'An act to amend and continue in force certain parts of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' exports to, and imports from Great Britain or France have been, or are now permitted; and, whether collectors of districts in the United States do not admit to an entry goods the growth and manufacture of Great Britain or France:'"

Mr. HILLHOUSE called for a division of the question, and it was taken on striking out; and passed in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Campbell, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Lambert, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Crawford, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsesy, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and Sumter.

On the question to adopt the amendment, amended as follows:

"Whether, in the execution of the act, entitled 'An act to amend and continue in force certain parts of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' exports to, and imports from, the ports of Great Britain or France have been, or are now permitted; and whether collectors of districts in the United States do not admit to an entry goods the growth and manufacture of Great Britain or France; and the instructions under which such collectors have acted:'"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 29, nay 1, as follows:

NAY—Mr. Reed.

So it was Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate information whether, in the execution of the act, entitled "An act to amend and continue in force certain parts of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,'" exports to, and imports from, the ports of Great Britain or France have been, or are now permitted; and whether collectors of districts in the United States do not admit to an entry goods the growth and manufacture of Great Britain or France; and the instructions under which such collectors have acted.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1810;" together with the amendments reported by the select committee; and, after progress, on motion by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed to Monday next.

MONDAY, February 19.

Mr. BRADLEY presented a petition from the committee in behalf of the Trustees of the Erie Literary Society, stating that the Legislature of the State of Ohio, in the year 1803, incorporated that society, with power to establish a college in the Connecticut Western Reserve; and that the Trustees have fixed upon the town of Burton, in the county of Granger, for the purpose; and praying a donation in land for the benefit of the institution; and the petition was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. BRADLEY, GREGG, and GOODRICH, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BRADLEY presented the petition of Amasa Soper, of Westminster, in the State of Vermont, late a Captain in the Revolutionary army of the United States, detailing his services and sufferings, and praying relief; and the petition was read.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of War, on the sale of public arms to individual States, as authorized by the act of the 2d of April, 1808, entitled "An act authorizing the sale of public arms;" which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. LEIB presented the petition of Joseph Joshua Dyster, stating that he had discovered a new and important mode of propelling vessels through the water by means of steam; and praying Congress to grant him the privilege of obtaining for that purpose a patent right, he not having been long enough a resident in the United States to entitle him thereto; and the petition was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. LEIB, GOODRICH, and MATHEWSON, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act to revive an act, entitled 'An act for the relief of the refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, and for other purposes,'" was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1810," together with the amendments reported by the select committee.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, to strike out the following words, section 1, lines 160, 161: "For repaying the Bank of the United States a sum advanced to the late collector of New Orleans, to enable him to pay drawbacks, one hundred thousand dollars;" it was determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

And the report of the select committee having been amended, was agreed to; and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended accordingly, on the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, complying with their resolution of the 12th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 17, 1810.

The Message and report were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. HILLHOUSE presented the petition of William Marbury and others, inhabitants of Georgetown and District of Columbia, praying a law authorizing a turnpike from the intersection of Fayette and High street, continued by Tennytown, to the place where the Fredericktown road now crosses the District line; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, February 20.

Mr. LEIB presented the memorial of a large number of the citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, on the subject of our foreign relations, and remonstrating against the passage of a bill pending in the Senate, respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes; and the memorial was read.

Mr. GERMAN presented the petition of a number of the citizens of the city of New York on the same subject; which was read.

Mr. MEIGS, from the committee appointed on the 8th of January, to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law a Land Department of the United States, reported a bill to add to the officers of the Treasury a Superintendent of the Public Lands of the United States; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand eight hundred and ten," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Mr. BRADLEY submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of employing the torpedo, or submarine explosions, in conjunction with the naval and military operations of the United States, for the better defence of their ports and harbors; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT communicated a petition of George H. Hannah and others, impressed American seamen, in the British service, praying the interposition of Government for their relief; and the petition was read, and referred to the Secretary of State, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Joseph Summerl, Simon Philipson, William Harmon, Archibald McCall, and Isaac Clason, reported it with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 18th of January, for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, together with the amendments reported by the select committee; and, after debate, on motion, by Mr. GILES, the motion was recommitted to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CRAWFORD, GILES, REED, PICKERING, and BAYARD, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee.

On motion, by Mr. GILES, to postpone the further consideration thereof until Monday next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Giles, Horsey, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, and Robinson.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

On motion, by Mr. CRAWFORD, it was agreed that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 21.

The bill to add to the officers of the Treasury a Superintendent of the Public Lands of the United States was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday on the subject; and

FEBRUARY, 1810.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of employing the torpedo, or sub-marine explosions, in conjunction with the naval and military operations of the United States, for the better defence of their ports and harbors; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. BRADLEY, CRAWFORD, GREGG, CONDIT, and LEIB, be the committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 31st of January, the bill, entitled "An act for the appointment of an additional judge, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of Madison county, in the Mississippi Territory, reported the bill with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes;" together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, to strike out the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, and 11th sections of the bill, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Horsey, Leib, Lloyd Mathewson, Parker, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, and Tait.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Lambert, Robinson, Smith of New York, Sumter, and Turner.

And sundry other amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended, by striking out the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 13th sections. On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, the further consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Sumner, Simon Philipson, William Hamon, Archibald McCall, and Isaac Clason," was postponed until to-morrow.

On motion, by Mr. BRENT, it was agreed that the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another," be further postponed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States;" a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and ten;" also, a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and ten;" in which several bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the 11th CON. 2d SESS.—19 bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1810," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, BRADLEY, and CRAWFORD, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1810," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GREGG, ANDERSON, and CLAY, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans, together with the report of the select committee thereon; and having amended the bill and report, on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

On motion, by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed that the bill authorizing a subscription on behalf of the United States to the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware and Ohio Canal Companies, be postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 22.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jared Shattuck," reported it without amendment; and, on motion by Mr. GREGG, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the second Monday in March next.

Mr. BRADLEY presented several petitions from a number of the inhabitants of the Territory of Louisiana, praying to be admitted to the privileges consequent upon a second grade of Territorial government; and the petitions were read.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of State, in obedience to the order of the Senate of the 20th instant; which was read for consideration.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of War, in compliance with the act of the 21st April, 1806, of three statements, comprehending contracts made by the Secretary of War, and those made by the Purveyor of Public Supplies; and the report was read.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee appointed on the 19th instant, on the petition of Joseph Joshua Dyster, reported a bill to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States." And, on motion by Mr. LEIB, it was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. LEIB, ANDERSON, CAMPBELL, FRANKLIN, and POPE, were appointed the committee.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Mr. CLAY.—Mr. President: At all times embarrassed when I have ventured to address you, it is with peculiar diffidence I rise on this occasion. The profound respect I have been taught to entertain for this body, my conscious inadequacy to discuss, as it deserves, the question before you, the magnitude of that question, and the recent seat I have taken in this House, are too well calculated to appal, and would impel me to silence if any other member would assume the task I propose attempting. But, sir, when the regular troops of this House, disciplined as they are in the great affairs of this nation, are inactive at their posts, it becomes the duty of its raw militia, however lately enlisted, to step forth in defence of the honor and independence of the country.

I voted yesterday against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, because, while that vote did not pledge me for the ultimate passage of the bill, it would have allowed me to give it my support if no better proposition was tendered. I do not like the bill as sent from the House of Representatives. It was a crazy vessel, shattered and leaky; but it afforded some shelter, bad as it was. It was opposition to the aggressive edicts of the belligerents. Taken from us without a substitute, we are left defenceless, naked, and exposed to all the rage and violence of the storm.

Sir, have we not been for years contending against the tyranny of the ocean? Has not Congress solemnly pledged itself to the world not to surrender our rights? And has not the nation at large, in all its capacities of meetings of the people, State, and General Government, resolved to maintain at all hazards our maritime independence? Your whole circle of commercial restrictions, including the non-importation, embargo, and non-intercourse acts, had in view an opposition to the offensive measures of the belligerents, so justly complained of by us. They presented resistance—the peaceful resistance of the law. When this is abandoned without effect, I am for resistance by the sword.

No man in the nation wants peace more than I; but I prefer the troubled ocean of war, demanded by the honor and independence of the country, with all its calamities and desolation, to the tranquil and putrescent pool of ignominious peace. If we can accommodate our differences with one of the belligerents only, I should prefer that one to be Britain; but if with neither, and we are forced into a selection of our enemy, then am I for war with Britain, because I believe her prior in aggression, and her injuries and insults to us were atrocious in character. I shall not attempt to exhibit an account between the belligerents of mercantile spoiliations inflicted and menaced. On that point we have just cause of war with both. Britain stands pre-eminent in her outrage on us, by her violation of the sacred personal rights of American freemen, in the arbitrary and lawless imprisonment of our seamen, the attack on the Chesapeake—the murder, sir. I will not dwell on the long catalogue of our wrongs and disgrace, which has been repeated until the sensibility of the nation is benumbed by the dishonorable detail.

But we are asked for the means of carrying on the war, and those who oppose it triumphantly appeal to the vacant vaults of the Treasury. With the unimpaired credit of the Government, invigorated by a faithful observance of public engagements, and a rapid extinction of the debt of the land, with the boundless territories in the West presenting a safe pledge for reimbursement of loans to any extent, is it not astonishing that despondency itself should disparage the resources of this country? You have, sir, I am credibly informed, in the city and vicinity of New Orleans alone, public property sufficient to extinguish the celebrated deficit in the Secretary's report. And are we to regard as nothing the patriotic offer so often made by the States, to spend their last cent, and risk their last drop of blood, in the preservation of our neutral privileges? Or, are we to be governed by the low, grovelling parsimony of the counting-room, and to cast up the actual pence in the drawer before we assert our inestimable rights?

It is said, however, that no object is attainable by war with Great Britain. In its fortunes, we are to estimate not only the benefit to be derived to ourselves, but the injury to be done the enemy. The conquest of Canada is in your power. I trust I shall not be deemed presumptuous when I state that I verily believe that the militia of Kentucky are alone competent to place Montreal and Upper Canada at your feet. Is it nothing to the British nation; is it nothing to the pride of her Monarch, to have the last of the immense North American possessions held by him in the commencement of his reign wrested from his dominion? Is it nothing to us to extinguish the torch that lights up savage warfare? Is it nothing to acquire the entire fur trade connected with that country, and to destroy the temptation and the opportunity of violating your revenue and other laws?

War with Great Britain will deprive her of those supplies of raw materials and provisions which she now obtains from this country. It is alleged that the non-intercourse law, constantly evaded, is incapable of execution. War will be a non-intercourse, admitting of but partial elusion. The pressure upon her, contemplated by your restrictive laws, will then be completely realized. She will not have the game, as she will if you press this bill without an efficient system, entirely in her own hands. The enterprise and valor of our maritime brethren will participate in the spoils of capture.

Another effect of war will be, the reproduction and cherishing of a commercial spirit amongst us.

FEBRUARY, 1810.

Non-Intercourse.

SENATE.

Is there no danger that we shall become enervated by the spirit of avarice, unfortunately so predominant? I do not wish to see that diffusive military character, which, pervading the whole nation, might possibly eventuate in the aggrandizement of some ambitious chief, by prostrating the liberties of the country. But a certain portion of military ardor (and that is what I desire) is essential to the protection of the country. The withered arm and wrinkled brow of the illustrious founders of our freedom are melancholy indications that they will shortly be removed from us. Their deeds of glory and renown will then be felt only through the cold medium of the historic page. We shall want the presence and living example of a new race of heroes to supply their places, and to animate us to preserve inviolate what they achieved. Am I counting too much on the valor of my countrymen, when I indulge the hope, that, if we are forced into war, the American hero now lives, who, upon the walls of Quebec, imitating his glorious example, will avenge the fall of the immortal Montgomery? But we shall, at least, gain the approbation of our own hearts. If we surrender without a struggle to maintain our rights, we forfeit the respect of the world, and (what is worse) of ourselves.

We are often reminded that the British navy constitutes the only barrier between us and universal dominion. When resistance to Britain is submission to France, I protest against the castigation of our colonial infancy being applied in the independent manhood of America. I am willing, sir, to dispense with the parental tenderness of the British navy. I cannot subscribe to British slavery upon the water, that we may escape French subjugation on land. I should feel myself humbled, as an American citizen, if we had to depend upon any foreign Power to uphold our independence; and I am persuaded that our own resources, properly directed, are fully adequate to our defence. I am therefore for resisting oppression, by whomsoever attempted against us, whether maritime or territorial.

Considering then that the bill as amended in this House, in furnishing no substitute for the law of non-intercourse, which it repeals, nor the propositions of the other House, intended to take its place, is a total dereliction of all opposition to the edicts of the belligerents, I cannot vote for it in its present form. I move a recommitment of the bill to supply this defect. What ought to be the substitute, I confess I have not satisfied myself—not expecting that it would fall to my lot to make you this motion. The committee, however, can deliberate upon the subject, and propose one. I would suggest two for consideration—either a total non-importation, which our laws can doubtless enforce, or to arm our merchantmen, and authorize convoys. A day may be fixed, allowing sufficient time for the last effort of the negotiation. That failing, our merchants then to be permitted to arm, and to receive all the protection by convoys which the public vessels can give. This latter measure may lead to war, but it is not war. Our neutral rights are violated by the belligerents.

Each places our commerce under restrictions, not warranted by the law of nations. We must then submit, or protect it. Whilst we confine ourselves within the pale of that law, neither has a right to complain. When so armed, and pursuing our lawful destination, let those who attempt to molest us take to themselves the consequences of their own violations. On our part, a war thus produced will be a war of defence.

But, Mr. President, if, after all our deliberation, it shall be deemed unwise to adopt either of these expedients, perhaps some other unexceptionable course may occur. I insist that you do not return the bill to the other branch of the Legislature in its present form. They have sent you a measure, I acknowledge, weak; it is, however, not submission. It professes to oppose (in form, at least) the injustice of foreign Governments. What are you about to do—to breathe vigor and energy into the bill? No, sir; you have eradicated all its vitality, and are about to transmit back again the lifeless skeleton. I entreat the Senate to recollect the high ground they occupy with the nation. I call upon the members of this House to maintain its character for vigor. I beseech them not to forfeit the esteem of the country. Will you set the base example to the other House of an ignominious surrender of our rights, after they have been reproached with imbecility, and you extolled for your energy! But, sir, if we could be so forgetful of ourselves, I trust we shall spare you the disgrace of signing with those hands, so instrumental in the Revolution, a bill abandoning some of the most precious rights which it then secured.

The motion of Mr. CLAY to recommit the bill, for the purpose of amendment, was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Condit, German, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Pope, Robinson, Sumter, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Champlin, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, and Turner.

On the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Brent, Campbell, Champlin, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Clay, Condit, German, Parker, Pope, and Robinson.

So it was resolved that this bill pass with amendments.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH of Maryland, it was agreed that the title of the bill be amended, to read as follows: "An act to interdict the public ships and vessels of France and Great Britain from the ports and harbors of the United States, and for other purposes."

FRIDAY, February 23.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1810," reported the bill without amendment. And on motion, by Mr. LEIB, to recommit the bill, for the purpose of amendment, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Meigs, Reed, Robinson, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Champlin, Clay, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Gregg, Horsey, Mathewson, Parker, Pickering, Smith of Maryland, and Smith of New York.

Ordered, That Messrs. GREGG, CRAWFORD, and LEIB, be the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States during the year 1810," reported the bill without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster; and, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, by Mr. CLAY,

Ordered, That the petition of Richard B. Lee, with the report of the Secretary of War, made on the 29th November, 1809, together with all the other papers accompanying the said petition, be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. CLAY, CRAWFORD, and BRENT, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. LEIB, that the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year 1810," be now read the third time, by unanimous consent, it was objected to, as against the rule.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill, entitled, "An act for the appointment of an additional judge, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of Madison county, in the Mississippi Territory," together with the amendments reported by a select committee; and, having agreed thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House as amended; and, on the question, Shall this bill be read a third time, as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another;" and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

On motion, by Mr. CRAWFORD, it was agreed that the bill relative to the district court of the United States, established in the Territory of Orleans, be printed, as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Joseph Sumner, Simon Philipson, William Hamon, Archibald McCall, and Isaac Clason, together with the amendments thereto reported by the select committee; and, on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, it was made the order of the day for Tuesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to add to the officers of the Treasury a Superintendent of the Public Lands of the United States; and the further consideration was postponed until Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing a subscription on behalf of the United States to the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware and Ohio Canal Companies; and the further consideration was postponed until Monday next.

The following Message, was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, complying with their resolution of the 16th instant. JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 22, 1810.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," reported it without amendment.

MONDAY, February 26.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the bill to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. G., from the committee, also reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the appointment of an additional judge, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of Madison county, in the Mississippi Territory," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1810," reported it with amendments, which were considered as in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to; and the President reported the bill to the House amended accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee appointed to consider on the propriety of employing the torpedo or sub-marine explosions for the defence of the ports and harbors of the United States, made a report, that the committee were unanimously of opinion, that a sum ought to be appropriated for the purpose of making experiments in relation thereto; and, in pursuance of this opinion, a bill was reported by the committee "making an appropriation for the purpose therein mentioned." The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1810," was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee.

On motion, by Mr. HILLHOUSE, to strike out the first section of the bill, for the purpose of inserting amendments, a division of the question was called for, and it was taken on striking out; and passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Campbell, Champlin, Condit, Crawford, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Robinson, and Smith of New York.

NAYS—Messrs. Brent, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

And, after debate, on motion by Mr. GILES, the bill was recommitted to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon. And Messrs. BRADLEY, GILES, and HILLHOUSE, were appointed the committee.

The following motion was submitted by Mr. LEIB:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of allowing additional rations to the commanders of separate posts, and to define what shall constitute a command to entitle an officer to additional rations; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CAMPBELL gave notice that he should, tomorrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to alter the time for holding the district court in the State of Ohio.

TUESDAY, February 27.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1810," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Mr. MEIGS presented the petition of the inhabitants of Marietta, praying a proportion of the proceeds of public lands within the State of Ohio may be appropriated to the improvement of the great post road leading from Western Port on the Potomac, to the Ohio, at Marietta; and the petition was read.

The bill making an appropriation for the purpose therein mentioned was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Joseph Summerl, Simon Philipson, William Hamon, Archibald McCall, and Isaac Clason, together with the report of the select committee thereon; and on the question to agree to the amendment, as follows:

After the word "place, in the thirty-sixth line, insert, "to Joseph Shoemaker, for one hundred and two hogsheads and four barrels of sugar, exported from Philadelphia for Bordeaux, on the eighth of August, one thousand eight hundred and five, on which he states, that the taking said oath and giving said bond were prevented by a belief that the captain had cleared out on the twelfth, and that he had until the twenty-second to take said oath and give said bond; and from the pressure of business at the custom-house on the seventeenth (on which day he appeared) having prevented the officers of the customs from being enabled to attend to his business; that believing he had until the twenty-second, notwithstanding he was within the intermediate time, he did return to the custom-house within the said time, the twenty-second of the month, for the purpose of taking the oath, and signing the bond required, when he was informed that the ship had cleared on the eighth, and that he was thereby precluded."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Campbell, Champlin, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, and Smith of New York.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Lambert, Leib, Parker, Robinson, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

And, after debate, on motion of Mr. LEIB, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for altering the time for holding the district court in the State of Ohio, and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, "That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of allowing additional rations to the commanders of separate posts, and to define what shall constitute a command to entitle an officer to additional rations, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise;" and, having agreed thereto, Messrs. LEIB, PICKERING, and SMITH of Maryland, were appointed the committee.

WEDNESDAY, February 28.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and the Honorable JOHN GAILLARD was appointed.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and acquaint him that the Senate have, in the absence of the Vice President, elected the Hon. JOHN GAILLARD President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

The bill for altering the time for holding the district court in the State of Ohio was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs.

SENATE.

Proceedings.

MARCH, 1810.

CAMPBELL, ANDERSON, and MATHEWSON, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the bill making an appropriation for the purpose therein mentioned, as in Committee of the Whole. On motion, by Mr. BAYARD, to postpone the further consideration thereof to the first Monday in December next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Campbell, Champlin, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and Smith of New York.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

On motion by Mr. ANDERSON, to recommit the bill to a select committee; and that the committee be instructed to ascertain at the Navy Department whether any, and what, experiments have been made of the torpedo; and whether it would be useful to make any, and what, experiments with the same; and, if any experiments ought to be made, what sum of money will be necessary to make the same?

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, called for a division of the question, and it was taken on the recommitment—yeas 15, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Campbell, Champlin, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, and Smith of New York.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Robinson, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

So the motion was lost.

THURSDAY, March 1.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the Secretary of the Department of War," reported it with amendments, which were read.

The PRESIDENT communicated the general account of the Treasurer of the United States from October 1st, 1808, to October 1st, 1809, as also the accounts of the War and Navy Departments for the same period; together with the reports of the accounting officers of the Treasury thereon; which were read.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th December, the petition of Charles Minifie, made a report on the subject; which was read.

He also asked and obtained leave to report a bill for the relief of Charles Minifie; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. GERMAN, it was agreed that the resolutions submitted on the 31st January, on the subject of convoys, be referred to the committee appointed on the 1st of December, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as respects the relations existing between the United States and Great Britain and France.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Joseph Summerl, Simon Philipson, William Hamon, Archibald McCall, and Isaac Clason, together with the report of the select committee thereon.

On motion, by Mr. LEIB, to postpone the further consideration thereof to the first Monday in December next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays, 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Robinson, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Campbell, Champlin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Meigs, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, and Smith of New York.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the bill was re-committed to a select committee, to consist of five members, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, SMITH of Maryland, LLOYD, LEIB, and GILES, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, a bill making an appropriation for the purpose therein mentioned.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Meigs, Pope, Robinson, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Campbell, Champlin, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Parker, Pickering, Reed, and Smith of New York.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," and, after debate, on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, March 2.

The bill for the relief of Charles Minifie was read the second time, and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," reported the bill with amendments.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to add to the officers of the Treasury a Superintendent of the Public Lands of the United States; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," and, after debate, on motion, by Mr. LLOYD, the bill was re-committed to a select committee, to consist of five members, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BAYARD, SMITH of Maryland, LLOYD, POPE, and CHAMPLIN, were appointed the committee.

SENATE.

The bill making an appropriation for the purpose therein mentioned was read the third time; and, on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the blank filled with "five thousand dollars." On the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Campbell, Champlin, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and Smith of New York.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, to amend the title, and that it be as follows:

"An act making an appropriation for the purpose of trying the practical use of the torpedo, or sub-marine explosion."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Campbell, Champlin, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Smith of New York, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Sumter, and Whiteside.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act making an appropriation for the purpose of trying the practical use of the torpedo, or sub-marine explosion."

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before you copies of the treaties concluded with the Delaware, Pottawatimie, Miami, Bel River, and Wea tribes of Indians, for the extinguishment of their title to the lands therein described; and I recommend to the consideration of Congress the making provision by law for carrying them into execution.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 28, 1810.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

MONDAY, March 5.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Governor of the State of Ohio, with a copy of a resolution of the General Assembly of that State, approving the measures of the General Government; which were read.

The PRESIDENT also communicated the report of the Postmaster General, made in obedience to the act of the 21st of April, 1808, concerning public contracts; together with his report on unproductive routes, pursuant to the 30th section of the act to establish the Post Office; and the reports were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing a subscription on behalf of the United States to the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware and Ohio Canal Companies; and on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," together with the report of the select committee thereon; and having agreed to the report of the committee, the President reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and the bill having been further amended, on the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill for the relief of Charles Minifie. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the Secretary of the Department of War," together with the report of the select committee thereon; and the report was agreed to; and the President reported the bill to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed the bill to add to the officers of the Treasury a Superintendent of the Public Lands of the United States; and on motion, by Mr. GREGG, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Thursday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes."

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. LEIB, to postpone the consideration thereof to this day week, it was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brent, Campbell, Champlin, German, Gregg, Leib, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lambert, Lloyd, Meigs, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, and Turner.

A motion was made, by Mr. ANDERSON, to adhere to the amendments: Whereupon, a motion was made, by Mr. POPE, to postpone the farther consideration thereof until to-morrow; and, on motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 6.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to exand the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the Secretary of the Department of War," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

On motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL, the bill was re-committed to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon. And Messrs. CAMPBELL, POPE, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BRADLEY submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, further provisions are necessary and expedient in relation to the intercourse between the United States and the Barbary Powers, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed the bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans, as amended; and on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MEIGS presented the petition of the citizens of the county of Athens, in the State of Ohio, praying a law to make and establish a permanent national road, leading from the seat of the Federal Government through Clarksburgh to Ohio, striking the State near the mouth of the Muskingum river; and the petition was read, and referred to a select committee, together with the petition of the inhabitants of Marietta, presented on the 27th of February, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. MEIGS, ANDERSON, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, also reported the bill for the relief of Charles Minifie correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE MILITIA.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to an effectual organization of the militia of the United States made report; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The report is as follows:

That, in considering the subject submitted to them, impediments of various and insuperable kinds present themselves to view. The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress only a qualified agency, on the subject of the militia, and authorizes them only "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." As, under this provision, no authority is delegated to Congress to regulate fines for non-attendance, nor to fix the days for training, the only efficient reasons seem to be wanting to give force and skill to this establishment. The law of 1792, already provides for organizing and disciplining the militia; and a subsequent act makes provision for arming them. All, therefore, within the power of Congress, seems to have been already done, unless it should be deemed expedient to make a new organization, by a classification, which shall constitute a select and a reserve militia.

The prejudices against such a mode of organization in many parts of the Union, and the difficulties to be surmounted, at a moment like the present, have deterred the committee from submitting such a project.

If the States are anxious for an effective militia, to them belong the power, and to them, too, belong the means of rendering the militia truly our bulwark in war, and our safeguard in peace; and, as the committee are willing to hope that the States will not be unmindful of the great duty of providing for the national safety, by a well ordered and effective militia, and as the committee are unwilling to derive any powers to Congress, not expressly given by the Constitution, nor necessarily incident to the powers delegated, they submit the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from further consideration of this subject.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The Senate resumed the resolution of the House of Representatives disagreeing to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes."

The question pending, when the Senate adjourned yesterday, was on adherence to their amendments to the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON observed that, when he had made the motion yesterday to adhere, he had done it under the impression that it was proper to bring the subject to a conclusion, and because he believed the interest of the country required that it should be finally acted on. He said he was still impressed with that idea; but, paying a deference to the opinion of his friends, desiring also to treat the House of Representatives with the respect due to that body, and because it was more conformable to the rules of proceeding generally observed, he withdrew the motion to adhere, and moved to insist on the amendments. He said he should, by parliamentary practice, have been fully justified in the motion to adhere before insisting. But it was proper that the two Houses of Congress should be courteous in their conduct to one another, and the state of affairs at present peculiarly required it; he therefore varied his motion. The question was then taken to insist, and carried without a division.

Mr. ANDERSON then moved to appoint a committee of conference, to confer on the subject with such committee as should be appointed by the House of Representatives.—Agreed to.

Messrs. ANDERSON, LEIB, and SMITH of Maryland, were accordingly appointed on the part of the Senate.

for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments; which were read.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, stated that he had received a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives in Congress, to use all proper means and exertions to procure the passing a law establishing weights and measures; which was read.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday, "That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any and what further provisions are necessary and expedient in relation to the intercourse between the United States and the Barbary Powers, with leave to report by bill or otherwise;" and, having agreed thereto, Ordered, That Messrs. BRADLEY, ANDERSON, and SMITH of Maryland, be the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes." They agree to the conference proposed on the subject, and have appointed managers on their part.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another, reported the bill with amendments; which were read.

Mr. BRADLEY gave notice that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a bill for the preservation of peace and maintenance of the authority of the United States, in the ports, harbors, and waters, under their jurisdiction.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill relative to the district court established in the Territory of Orleans, as amended; and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the committee to whom was referred the bill for altering the time for holding the district court in Ohio, reported it without amendment. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 8.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the bill for altering the time for holding the district court in Ohio correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time. And, on motion, by Mr. WHITESIDE, the bill was recommitted to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. WHITESIDE, CAMPBELL, and POPE, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BRADLEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the preservation of peace and maintenance of the authority of the United States in the ports, harbors, and waters, under their jurisdiction; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. LEIB submitted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be required to instruct our Minister at the Court of Great Britain to demand of the British Government an immediate compliance with the arrangement made by their Minister, Mr. Erskine, with this Government, comprising atonement for the attack upon the frigate Chesapeake, and a relinquishment of the Orders in Council; and that, on failure to execute that arrangement, our Minister be directed forthwith to return to the United States.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be required to instruct our Minister at the Court of Great Britain to demand of the British Government an immediate release of all American citizens impressed into the British service, and that, on failure or refusal to make such release, our Minister be directed forthwith to return to the United States.

Resolved, That, on the failure or refusal of the Government of Great Britain, after demand made by our Minister to carry into effect the arrangement made by Mr. Erskine, the British Minister, or, on the refusal or failure to release all American citizens impressed into the British service, the President of the United States be authorized to issue letters of marque and reprisal against the ships and vessels belonging to the Government and subjects of Great Britain."

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia, together with the report of the select committee thereon, and the report was agreed to; and the bill having been further amended, the President reported it to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," reported the bill with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill relative to the district court established in the Territory of Orleans; and the amendment reported by the select committee having been agreed to, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly. On the question to agree to so much of the report of the Committee of the Whole as goes to strike out the first section of the original bill, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Champlin, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Meigs, Parker, Reed, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Campbell, Clay, Goodrich, Gregg, Horsey, Pope, Smith of Maryland, and Whiteside.

And the other amendments, agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, having been adopted, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

SENATE.

Proceedings.

MARCH, 1810.

FRIDAY, March 9.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, also reported the bill relative to the district court of the United States established in the Territory of Orleans, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to reconsider the vote, and to amend the bill as follows: In the second line, after the word court, insert of the district of Orleans.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," reported the bill with amendments.

Mr. CHAMPLIN gave notice that, on Monday, he should ask leave to bring in a bill for extending the benefit of a drawback of the duties upon the exportation of all goods, wares, and merchandise, subject thereto, that may be transported by land from the district of Newport to the port of Boston, and from said Boston to said Newport.

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, that the Senate take into consideration the resolutions submitted yesterday, respecting instructions to our Minister at the Court of Great Britain; on motion by Mr. LEIB, it was agreed that they lie on the table,

Mr. CAMPBELL presented the petition of the inhabitants of Chillicothe, in the State of Ohio, praying a proportion of the net proceeds of the public lands in the State of Ohio may be appropriated for the improvement of a great post road leading directly from the Potomac to Marietta, on the Ohio, and thence through Athens and Chillicothe, in a western direction; which petition was read, and referred to the committee to whom the petition of the citizens of the county of Athens and State of Ohio, presented by Mr. MEIGS, on the 6th instant, was referred, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the report of the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to an effectual organization of the militia of the United States; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," together with the report of the select committee thereon, and the report was agreed to; and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the Senate accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time, as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another," together with the report of the select committee thereon; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday.

MONDAY, March 12.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 3d January last, the Message of the President of that date, reported, in part, a bill appropriating a sum of money for procuring munitions of war, and for other purposes; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILES, from the same committee, also reported, in part, a bill for the establishment of a Quartermaster's department; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILES also communicated sundry documents from the Secretary of War, on the subject of the before-mentioned bills; which were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, with the exception of the return of ordnance and military stores.

Mr. GILES presented the memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Orleans, stating the inconveniences resulting from their form of government, and praying the Territory may be admitted a member of the Union, for reasons stated at large in the memorial; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GILES, BRADLEY, CRAWFORD, GOODRICH, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for the establishment of a turnpike road in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia,'" also, a bill, entitled "An act to make public a road in Washington county, in the District of Columbia;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. The two bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," together with the report thereon of the committee to whom the bill was recommitted; and the report was agreed to, and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly. On motion by Mr. SMITH of Maryland, the bill was read the third time, by unanimous consent, as amended, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another," together with the report of the select committee thereon. And, on motion by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in December next.

The bill for the preservation of peace and maintenance of the authority of the United States, in the ports, harbors, and waters, under their jurisdiction, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon.

MARCH, 1810.

Withdrawal of Resolutions.

SENATE.

Messrs. BRADLEY, CRAWFORD, and GILES, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following motion :

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 13th of December, 1790, and also the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 2d of March, 1809, on the subject of a National Bank, be referred to a select committee; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BRENT gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to prevent the future migration of free negroes to the District of Columbia.

WITHDRAWAL OF RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. LEIB, on request, had leave to withdraw his resolutions submitted for consideration on the 8th instant.

Mr. LEIB remarked, that he had submitted the resolutions upon the table of the Senate under a conviction that the honor and interests of the nation required such a course of measures. He believed that it was time to have done with trifling, with a war of words, and with what had been termed gasconade; that the cup of expedients had been drained to the last dregs, and that a new mode of warfare became indispensable, to vindicate our honor and assert our rights. His impressions were, that a determined attitude alone could rescue us from the oppressor's wrong, awaken a sense of justice, or lead to that necessary alternative which an injured nation is sometimes obliged to resort to, to avoid greater calamity. He said, that he was no friend to war—that peace was the first wish of his heart—but that he could not consent to preserve it by a prostitution of the attributes of freemen. Insult, robbery, and murder, cried aloud for justice or for vengeance; and duty required of him the aid of his feeble efforts to rescue the nation from degradation. He remarked, that the resolutions were directed against one of the beligerents, only, and he would assign his reasons for the discrimination, and why he had selected Great Britain for their object. It had been admitted that we had a right to choose our enemy, and Great Britain was selected, because she was first in the career of maritime despotism, and had exercised it with unrelenting severity; because she stands alone in the impressment of our citizens, and dooms them to ignominious punishment, or compels them to fight her battles; because the national honor had been vitally wounded, in the attack upon our flag; and because she had heaped outrage upon aggression, and had imbrued her hands in the innocent blood of our citizens. Since the resolutions were offered, he further remarked, the aspect of things seemed to be somewhat varied, and a hope is entertained, from the advices received, that a change of attitude may be rendered unnecessary; and that, under present circumstances, such change is inexpedient, and may prove injurious. However sceptical he might be on this subject, he had no wish to embarrass the Administration in its negotiations; but, on the contrary, he wished to give full scope to any efforts for an amicable adjustment of our differences. He wished not to throw in a cloud to intercept that glimpse which was supposed to be breaking upon us. His enmities, he said, were national, and would cease with the cause of excitement. Under these impressions, and in deference to the judgment of political as well as personal friends, to whose opinions he was always ready to render a willing homage, he said that he would withdraw the resolutions, reserving to himself the right to renew them under other circumstances.

TUESDAY, March 13.

The bill, entitled "An act to make public a road in Washington county, in the District of Columbia," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. LLOYD, SMITH of Maryland, and TAIT, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for the establishment of a turnpike company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia,'" was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. On motion, by Mr. POPE, to amend the bill, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the establishment of a quartermaster's department; and, after debate, on motion, by Mr. GILES, it was agreed that the bill be recommitted to the original committee, further to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to some, and disagree to other, amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States."

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States;" and on motion, by Mr. POPE,

Resolved, That the Senate insist on their amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Ordered, That Messrs. POPE, ANDERSON, and GREGG, be the managers at the said conference on the part of the Senate.

THURSDAY, March 15.

The bill to alter and amend the act, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," was read the second time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States." They agree to the conference proposed on the subject, and have appointed managers on their part. They agree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels," with an amendment; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the improvement of the United States by public roads and canals.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, to strike out from section 1, line 9th, the words "one-half" and insert "two-thirds," it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Champlin, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Parker, Pickering, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, and Tait.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Brent, Clay, German, Giles, Horsey, Meigs, Pope, Turner, and Whiteside.

On motion, by Mr. GREGG, further to amend the bill, on motion of Mr. LEIB the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the managers at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes," reported that they could come to no agreement with the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

FRIDAY, March 16.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels." And, on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary for the Department of the Treasury, with a statement of the emoluments of the officers employed in the collection of the customs, for the year 1809; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill for altering the time for holding the district court in Ohio, was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the bill to alter and amend the act, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States;" and on motion, by Mr. LEIB, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be the order of the day for Monday next.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

MARCH, 1810.

SENATE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

A treaty having been entered into and duly ratified with the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, for the extinguishment of their title to certain lands within the Indiana Territory, involving conditions which require Legislative provision, I submit copies thereof to both branches, for consideration.

MARCH 15, 1810.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

MONDAY, March 19.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases, together with the report of the select committee thereon; and, after debate, on motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be the order of the day for to-morrow.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled an act regulating the Post Office Establishment; a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Amey Dardin, widow and representative of David Dardin, deceased;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Elizabeth Hamilton;" in which several bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and ordered to the second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a committee on their part, jointly with such committee as the Senate may appoint on their part, to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress during the present session, and when it may be expedient to close the same; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate, and the appointment of a committee on their part.

The resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILES presented the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Jones, daughters and legal representatives of Robert Hanson Harrison, deceased, late Aid-de-Camp and Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief of the Revolutionary army of the United States, praying to be allowed the commutation of their father's half-pay, or a donation of lands, for reasons stated at large in the petition; which was read.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the managers at the conference on their part, on the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes."

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, that the Senate adhere to their amendments to the said bill, a motion was made, by Mr. LEIB, to postpone the further consideration thereof until Monday next; which was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Campbell, Condit, Gaillard, Giles, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Parker, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Champlin, Clay, Crawford, Franklin, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, Pope, Smith of New York, Tait, and Turner.

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, to postpone the further consideration thereof until to-morrow, it was determined in the negative. And the question recurring on the original motion—

Mr. S. SMITH said: Mr. President, the question before the Senate is, to adhere to their amendments made to the bill "respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France."

It is with extreme reluctance that I rise on the present occasion. I feel, sensibly feel, the situation in which I place myself by opposing a measure countenanced by the vote in the other House, of almost all those with whom I have been accustomed to act, and by many in the Senate, for whose superior judgment and correct opinions I have ever had the highest respect. Finding, however, that I differed with those gentlemen, I took the bill to my lodgings, and considered it with a disposition to find in it something that should induce me to give up my own opinion to that expressed by the vote in the other House; but I looked in vain, and I found myself compelled to take the ground of opposition to the bill. In doing this, I must hope for the indulgence of those with whom I differ, and of the Senate, for detailing the reasons for the motion I made to amend the bill. To do this, it may not be unprofitable to take a review of the causes that led to the measures adopted by the United States, and the course taken by Congress to resist the injuries imposed upon us by Great Britain and France.

The insult offered to the honor of the nation in the affair of the Chesapeake, so far from being redressed, was heightened by a proclamation from the King of Great Britain, authorizing publicly, in the face of the world, the boarding of our merchant ships, and taking therefrom whosoever their officers should call a British subject; to palliate this outrage on our independence, it was recommended to the boarding officer to execute this indignity with politeness. About the same time the Government was informed of the case of the Horizon, condemned under the Berlin decree, and that the Emperor had determined that that decree should embrace Americans as well as other neutrals. This determination was directly contrary to the assurance given General Armstrong, by the French Minister of Marine, as well as to the practice under the decree. This was the first intimation given to our Government that the Berlin decree would operate on the interest of the United States.

The President (as was his duty) laid both of those subjects before Congress in a Message, and it was well known at the same time, (although not officially,) that the British Order of Council of November had been issued.

What was then our situation with those nations? France had declared every American vessel that was bound to or from Great Britain, or having on board goods, the produce or manufacture of Great Britain, to be lawful prize. Great Britain declared that every American vessel bound to any port of Europe, should first come into her ports, there land her cargo, pay a transit duty, and depart (if they pleased) to their original port of destination; and any vessel failing to do so, should be liable to condemnation; that any American vessel having a certificate of origin on board, should be considered good prize. Thus situated, we had a choice of war or embargo. To make war on France would have been idle; we could inflict no wound on her by war, except that of withholding our supplies from her West and East India colonies, and this would as effectually be done by an embargo. In a war with England, we could inflict severe wounds on her immense commerce, and she is always vulnerable on the side of Canada. A more pacific system was however adopted—the embargo. Had that measure been rigidly enforced, it could not have failed to have compelled a removal of the unjust conduct of those nations, most certainly of that of Great Britain. The Senate, aware that a measure of that kind could not be enforced without a physical force, sensible that the prospect of profit would induce many to prevent its intended operations by evasions, did immediately pass a bill authorizing the President to fit out and put to sea all the armed vessels of the United States, for the purpose of preventing evasions of the law, to employ our seamen who were thrown idle, and to be prepared for events should a war ensue. The bill slept in the other House, and, by an ill-timed economy, was ultimately rejected, by which a free scope was given to evaders of the law, and the system (which was a wise one) was in some degree frustrated; yet it had an effect highly salutary on Great Britain, it compelled her to modify the Orders of Council of November, and no longer were our ships compelled to go into her ports, and there pay tribute; no longer were our vessels subjected to condemnation for having a certificate of origin on board. The embargo was severely felt by Great Britain while in force, every article which they had been accustomed to receive from us, rose immediately in price, and I am confident that had it been continued and executed, full satisfaction would have been given by Britain for the various outrages which had been committed on our honor and independence. It was relinquished, and a non-intercourse was substituted as to both nations. This measure, although less strong, was such as would have been very severely felt by the British nation. It completely excluded the importation of her manufactures into the United States; it took from her a market for more than one-half of her manufactures; it turned idle a large number of workmen, and although it did not prevent her from getting our productions, yet she obtained them in such a way, that they cost her, in some instances, double their usual price. This new system was however checked in its course by the arrangement made with Great Britain through Mr. Erskine. Our ports were thrown open, and our vessels (then nearly all in our harbors) soon filled Great Britain with everything she wanted at low prices; flour fell instantly in England to nine and a half and ten dollars the barrel.

Great Britain, in lieu of the Orders of Council, excluded us from France and Holland, and their colonies, and from Italy, by a paper blockade; an iniquitous, illegal system, which she had adopted in 1793, and has either contracted or extended at her pleasure ever since. Our own law excluded us from France and Italy. This tended to give a direction to a great proportion of our trade to Great Britain, and thereby completely supplied her wants. On the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement, the non-intercourse was renewed, and a stop put to our exports to Great Britain; the consequence was, that flour rose immediately to fourteen and fifteen dollars in England; cotton, tobacco, and other articles, in a proportion still greater. I mention this to show, that whenever we stop our trade to Great Britain she feels it sensibly in the high prices she has to give for our exports, and thus to show the efficacy of the system that had been taken, if it had been duly executed. But in her exports Great Britain felt little, for our merchants had given their orders under the arrangement, and it would have been unjust to have prevented them from receiving the goods they had ordered; the non-importation part, which I conceive the most essential part of the non-intercourse, had in consequence been inoperative.

What, then, was our situation when Congress met? The French privateers were capturing our defenceless merchant ships, burning those of little value, and carrying into their ports for condemnation those which were valuable. Great Britain had, by a pretended blockade, excluded us from entering the ports of Holland, France, Italy, and their West and East India colonies. She had sent a Minister to succeed Mr. Erskine, who, so far from offering any explanations on the disavowal of the arrangement made with his predecessor, added insult to injury, and bearded us to our teeth; he gave us to understand that the terms proposed in the instructions to Mr. Erskine would be insisted on—terms that I am confident no citizen of the United States would accede to.

In this state of our foreign relations Congress met, the members brought with them the feelings of the people, who were all alive to the late indignity offered their Government, all expected that measures of energy would be pursued. This House felt and acted. Resolutions passed almost unanimously, expressive of their sense of the insult offered by the British Minister.

The Senate passed a bill ordering the whole of the vessels of war to be put in commission (which bill sleeps still in the other House,) and were progressing in preparations for the defence of the honor and safety of the nation, when the bill now under consideration was reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations. It operated instantly like an electric shock, it paralyzed every effort, and gentlemen were astonished when they were told, that this bill was the great measure that was to preserve our honor in the eyes of all the world; that it was the grand panacea which was to heal the wounds that had been inflicted on our rights by the belligerents. In fact, it was the only measure on which we were to rely for a redress of all our grievances.

Mr. President, I read this grand effort with attention. In vain did I look for something therein that would tend to obtain satisfaction for the insult on the Chesapeake; in vain for anything that would tend to prevent the future impressment of our seamen; in vain for anything that would induce or coerce the belligerents to repeal their unjust orders and decrees against our lawful commerce. One great feature, and one only, was to be discovered, to wit: the repeal of the non-intercourse law—covered by a thin veil, composed, as the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has said, of shreds and patches. Not so, Mr. President; if it had been patchwork alone, I should not have disturbed its arrangement. But I found in it, or believed I did, that which would be ruinous to the commerce of the United States, and therefore felt myself bound by the duty I owe to my constituents to remove the veil, and leave the measure open to public view; the Senate concurred with me in opinion, to wit: to strike out the injurious sections, to which opinion I shall vote to adhere.

I will, Mr. President, ask the Senate's indulgence, to show my view of the sections that have been stricken out of the bill. The important ones are the third, fourth, and fifth; the others are only calculated to carry those into execution. The third and fourth contain the same principles; they appear to be intended to have a twofold operation, the one to coerce the belligerents to do us justice, the other, to secure to our own ships the carriage of all the produce of the United States. The third section excludes from our ports all British and French merchant ships, and declares "that any ship sailing under the flag of either, which shall hereafter arrive in any of our harbors, shall, with their cargoes, be seized and condemned."

Is there no danger, Mr. President, to be apprehended from the Emperor, if the bill should pass with this provision? His character for decision is well known. Might we not fear that he would retort our own measure upon us, by causing all the property of our merchants now under sequestration (amounting to at least three millions of dollars) to be condemned; and by seizing all the American vessels and property in his ports, or that might arrive therein? I confess, sir, I should feel no surprise if he did. It appears to me, from his well known conduct, that he would scarcely hesitate to adopt such a measure, and what right would you have to complain, and for what object would such a risk be run? The section only prohibits the entry of French merchant ships into our ports—prohibits what? That which has no existence—for there is scarcely a French merchant ship that now floats the ocean. The section permits our own ships to carry to France. It throws open our trade to France, in the only way that it can be carried on, to wit, in our own vessels, and thus invites them to go to France, and there be subject to any consequences which the Emperor (in resenting the provision of that section) might choose to decree. It in no way inflicts a punishment on France for her aggressions on our honor and interest.

But what will England do should this law pass? Will the King and Council retaliate our measure? I confess, Mr. President, that I think they will. What right shall we have to complain, if a seizure is ordered in the ports of Great Britain of every American vessel found therein? I have been told that the magnanimity of Great Britain is full security against such conduct, and that the words of this bill would not justify her. I admit it, but I must be excused for not placing implicit reliance in her justice or her magnanimity. I fear that she would not tie herself down to the letter of our law in the retaliation she would inflict; but admitting that she did, this bill permits an open trade to her ports in our ships; an immense number of our vessels are ready to proceed to her ports the moment this bill shall pass into a law: and, sir, the law will get to England as soon as our ships, with their valuable cargoes; a day is sufficient for the King and Council to act; an order may, and I do not doubt would issue, perhaps, in the very words of the bill, "directing the seizure and condemnation of every American vessel and their cargoes that shall arrive in her ports." What would be the consequence? Ruin to your merchants, and destruction to the party which now governs this country. But, Mr. President, let us suppose that the King should not order the condemnation of our ships, yet he would have it in his power to wound us severely, by simply arresting all the American ships and cargoes in his ports, and holding them as a security for any of the ships of his subjects that we should condemn under our law; he would thus place in his power from three to four hundred thousand tons of shipping and their cargoes; such a step would bring down certain ruin on our merchants, and would be a most powerful machine in his hands to compel our Government to such measures as his Ministry might dictate. What Administration could stand the hue and cry that would be raised against them by the sufferers and their friends? All would understand that the wrong was on our side; all would be taught to know that our own law had only been retorted upon us, and all must agree that we had no right to complain. We should lose the high ground we now stand on, that of opposition to the unjust and oppressive measures of the belligerents, and be compelled to admit that we were the aggressors, thus departing from being defenders of right to become the wrong-doers. And for what, Mr. President? For the paltry consideration of preventing British shipping to an amount not exceeding eight thousand tons from entering our ports, and from becoming the carriers of our produce to that amount; for that is the only injury the bill proposes to inflict on the British Government for all her spoliations, insults, and injuries. The fourth section confines the importation of French and British goods to our own vessels. The third and fourth sections form one great whole, the object of which is to coerce Great Britain and France to do us justice. How?—by prohibiting all commerce with them? No, by preventing them from the carrying any of our produce, or bringing into our ports any of their manufactures in their ships. And this measure is to coerce Great Britain and France! What are its coercive powers? None, certainly; none upon France, for she has no merchant ships; of course it can have no coercive influence upon her. It certainly has no persuasive qualities. We throw out provocation without a motive, as it relates to France; already we have the whole carrying trade between the United States and France, and her colonies; this bill could not give us more. But, Mr. President, gentlemen who have voted for this bill may have thought that it will operate powerfully against Great Britain. Let us examine that point. If I recollect correctly, there did enter the ports of the United States on the average of the three years prior to the embargo, about eight thousand tons of British shipping. To exclude the participation in the carrying trade between Great Britain and the United States to that amount, is the great good that is to result to the United States from the third and fourth sections, to obtain which, we are to risk the retaliation of Great Britain. Should she take the words of our own law and prohibit our vessels from her ports, what we should suffer thereby is a question worthy of consideration. I have little doubt that three to four hundred thousand tons of ships of the United States annually enter the ports of Great Britain. We should then risk by this law the employment of four hundred thousand tons of shipping; to obtain what? The employment of eight thousand tons now occupied by British ships—what extreme folly! What madness! Would any man run such a risk on his private account?

It is, Mr. President, the old story of the goose with the golden eggs. In attempting to seize on a little, we risk the loss of a great whole. Having taken this view of the subject, I had believed that imperious duty compelled me to endeavor to avert such great evil. But I have been told, that if Great Britain should retaliate, that her retaliation would operate as a complete non-intercourse or embargo between the two countries, and in a way that would be effectual; and that as I had always approved those measures, this view of the subject must meet my approbation; that it would precisely create that which I have said was a powerful measure against Great Britain—to wit: an embargo. I never will agree, Mr. President, in this side way to carry into execution a great national measure. If we could not execute our law by our own means, I will not, by a subterfuge attempt to call in the aid of the nation against which the measure was directed. I will not lose the right side of the question, and put myself in the wrong. The people were impatient under the embargo, and you repealed it. Yes, sir, it was repealed at the very moment when Great Britain, smarting under its effects, was modifying her Orders of Council; and she would have done us complete justice but for the wavering indecisive conduct that she saw we were pursuing. Seeing that, and encouraged by the support her measures met in the United States, she modified her orders and substituted her blockading order of April, 1809. Should this bill pass and another embargo be created thereby between the two nations, how will the people then feel? When the embargo was laid to compel a redress of wrongs, it created uneasiness among many, but was highly approved by most of the people; but should our commerce be again shut up through this bill, the veil will be seen through; the covering is too thin, and all will see that our own act was the leading cause; that on the part of Great Britain it is fair retaliation, provoked by ourselves; that in justice to her subjects she could not do less. You will then appear the aggressor. You will have left the high ground of being the defender against acts of injustice, and place yourselves before your fellow-citizens as the wrong-doer. You will forfeit that character for impartial justice to which we have now a just claim, and I fear, Mr. President, that it would deprive the Administration of their well-earned popularity. But I believe that the measure would have a very different tendency; that it would throw the carrying of our produce to Great Britain and her possessions entirely in British hands, which I shall try to show to the Senate before I sit down. The fifth section is intended to operate in the expectation that Great Britain and France would retaliate. It prohibits the importation from those nations of their goods, except direct from the place where they are produced or manufactured, and it is intended to prevent Great Britain from introducing her produce or manufactures into the United States, by placing them at Amelia Island, at Nova Scotia, or Canada, or in any neutral country. Should Great Britain retaliate, (which is expected by this section of the bill,) how will the bill operate? In the following manner: the bill repeals the non-intercourse law; of course our ships are free to go with our produce wheresoever they please. But Great Britain, it is presumed, will prohibit their entrance into her ports generally; still she wants our exports. How will she get them? By throwing open Canada, Nova Scotia, Bermuda, and Amelia Island, to our trade, our coasters will carry to those ports our cotton, tobacco, flour, &c., and from thence they will be carried in British ships; thus will our ship owners be deprived of their present valuable employment for their ships. Equally injurious will it be to the agricultural interest, for at those places their produce will meet with a confined market, and the prices they will obtain will be in proportion to the difficulties of such a course of trade, and to the little competition in such markets.

SENATE.

Non-Intercourse.

MARCH, 1810.

The manufactures of Great Britain will be brought to those places, and the prices in the United States will be such, that no risk of seizure will prevent them from being purchased and smuggled into the United States, to the ruin of your finances, the great injury of the honest merchant, and the destruction of the morals of the people. And all this risk we are to run with the sole view of employing eight thousand tons of shipping more than we now employ; for, sir, there is not another motive held out in the bill; and to add ridicule to injury, we, in the tenth section, authorize the President to repeal this terrible measure, provided the belligerents shall withdraw their hostile orders and decrees. Why, sir, we should by this bill hold ourselves up to the two nations as objects to be laughed at. When our embargo and non-intercourse did not obtain for us justice, can any man believe for a moment that this measure can operate any effect favorable to our interest?

I am averse, Mr. President, to a commercial warfare with Great Britain; in such a war we shall always be the sufferer. The King and Council can, in one session of a single day, do an act which it would take Congress a month or two to meet. We have had some experience on the subject. Soon after the adoption of the Constitution, discriminating duties were laid, which operated rapidly to increase the shipping of the United States. It soon called the attention of Great Britain, and in the treaty made by Mr. Jay, they provided against its increase, and were authorized to countervail its effects; they did countervail, and secured to themselves (in times of peace) the carrying (for their consumption and commerce) of all the tobacco they required, and nearly all the other produce of the United States. As they increase their duties, their countervail of ten per cent. also increases; this increase has so operated on the article of cotton, that should peace take place in Europe, every pound of that important article wanted for Great Britain, would be carried in British ships. I am, therefore, of opinion, that we should, as soon as possible, agree with Great Britain to relinquish our discriminating duties on condition that she would repeal her countervailing duties. Let the ships of each enter the ports of the other on terms of perfect equality. I am not afraid of the competition; I feel confident that we can meet any nation on equal terms in the carrying of the produce of our own country; if we cannot, we do not deserve the preference. With this precedent in my view, I am not willing again to enter into a commercial warfare with Great Britain or France, for France has countervailed our discriminating duty on the article of tobacco, which will (when she again enters into trade) give to her ships the carrying of all that article wanted for her consumption, being near forty thousand hogsheds annually, and she will no doubt pursue the system as to cotton and other articles.

11th Con. 2d Sess.—20

I have been asked, shall Congress rise and do nothing? I answer, that it is better to do nothing than to do that which will only injure ourselves. But, sir, I wished to do something; I proposed, in select committee, to strike out those sections which would only do us injury, and then fill their place with sections (which I had draughted and presented for consideration) authorizing the arming of the merchant ships, not for defence alone, but with authority to capture and make prize of any vessel that might assail them while engaged in lawful commerce, and to employ the public ships of war in conveying the trade of the nation. I met with no support in this system; there were in committee four against my motion. Discouraged by so large a proportion voting against me, I neglected, or was deterred from making the same motion in Senate, and this error I regret, although I know not whether I should have been more successful in Senate than I had been in committee; but I should have been better pleased with my own conduct. I had, it is true, an expectation that, in a committee of conference between the two Houses, that something might be introduced that would please both branches of the Legislature; and I presumed that the convoy system would be substituted. I have been mistaken. The conferees met, and the committee of Senate submitted a section, "authorizing the President, under his instructions, made conformably to the laws of nations, to grant convoy to the merchant ships of the United States engaged in lawful commerce." That proposition spoke this language to the belligerents: The United States have taken every pacific means of obtaining justice from you without success. We will no longer deprive ourselves of commerce; we will open our trade, and we will defend it. We are ready to meet the consequences that may arise, and will stand prepared for war, if war shall ensue. This, Mr. President, appeared to your committee as a course that would be honorable to the nation. It was unanimously rejected by the committee on the part of the House, who, in turn, proposed that "British ships should be permitted to bring into the United States the produce and manufactures of that nation, but should not be permitted to carry from the United States any of the produce thereof," and the same as to France. This most extraordinary proposition was unanimously rejected by the conferees on the part of the Senate. Strip the proposition, and what language does it speak? That the British merchant may send into your ports his ships and fill your market with British goods, to the great injury of your infant manufactories; he may enter into competition with them and work their destruction. But he must not enter into competition with the merchants in the purchase of a return cargo, nor with the ship owners in the carrying of the produce of the country. No, sir, that was hallowed ground, and must not be trodden. The conferees of the two Houses could not agree, and the question now before the Senate is, to adhere to their amendments. For which I shall vote, although the bill will then not be such as I wish it had been. But, sir, it cannot in this stage be amended. I am aware that my vote will be disapproved by many of my friends. But, sir, I trust that time, and a further consideration of the subject, will convince them that my objections to the rejected sections have not been unfounded.

The question being then taken that the Senate adhere to their amendments, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 15, as follows:

TUESDAY, March 20.

The bill, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. FRANKLIN, ANDERSON, GOODRICH, GREGG, and MEIGS, were appointed the committee.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Elizabeth Hamilton," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CRAWFORD, BRADLEY, and FRANKLIN, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Amey Dardin, widow and representative of David Dardin, deceased," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, GILES, and HILLHOUSE, were appointed the committee.

The resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to consider and report the business necessary to be acted on during the present session, and when it may be expedient to close the same, was read the second time, and passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives on the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the issuing of sea-letters, except to certain vessels;" and agreed thereto, with amendments.

Mr. LLOYD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to make public a road in Washington county, in the District of Columbia," reported it with amendments, which were read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the improvement of the United States, by public roads and canals; and, after progress, a motion was made by Mr. BRADLEY, to postpone the further consideration thereof to the first Monday in December next; which was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Champlin, Condit, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lambert, Mathewson, Pickering, Robinson, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gregg, Horsey, Leib, Meigs, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, and Whiteside.

Mr. POPE, from the conferees on the part of the Senate, on the bill, entitled an act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," made report: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate recede from their second, sixth, and seventh amendments; that the Senate recede from the fourth amendment with an amendment, to wit: strike out "January," and insert "March."

WEDNESDAY, March 21.

The following Message was yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a return of the militia of the United States, as received by the Department of War, from the several States and Territories.

MARCH 20, 1810. JAMES MADISON.

Ordered, That the Message and documents lie for consideration.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Ordered, That the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Jones, daughters of Robert H. Harrison, Esq., deceased, be referred to the committee who have under consideration the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Elizabeth Hamilton;" to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BRENT presented the petition of Fontaine Maury of the city of New York, praying the benefit of drawback on three hundred and eighty bags of coffee, although the formalities of the laws (with no intention of fraud, however, but from the ignorance of the captain) have not been complied with, as is stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRENT, GAILLARD, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

Mr. B., also, presented the petition of George Andrews and others, inhabitants of the District of Columbia, praying Congress to empower them to form a company for making a turnpike road from the termination of Vermont avenue to a point where it shall intersect the boundary line of the District; and the petition was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRENT, CONDIT, and MATHEWSON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of Urban Guillet and his associates, known under the name of "The Society of La Trappe," now resident in the Illinois Territory, stating that their association has for its peculiar object the promotion of useful literature, husbandry, and mechanical arts, and praying confirmation of the title to certain parcels of land mentioned in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRENT, GILES, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

The resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to consider and report the business necessary to be acted on during the present session, and when it may be expedient to close the same, was read the third time, and agreed to; and Messrs. GREGG, CRAWFORD, CLAY, FRANKLIN, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing a detachment from the militia of the United States," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the improvement of the United States by public roads and canals; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, a motion was made by Mr. LEIB to strike out the first and second articles of the bill, authorizing the subscription of the United States to the stock of the Massachusetts and New Jersey companies, when formed; and Mr. ANDERSON called for a division of the question, and it was taken on striking out the first article, authorizing the subscription to the Massachusetts company, and determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Leib, Meigs, Sumter, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Champlin, Franklin, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lambert, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, and Whiteside.

On the question, to strike out the second article, authorizing the subscription to the New Jersey Company: it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23, as follows:

Mr. BAYARD gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company; also, a bill to amend the laws within the District of Columbia.

Mr. POPE submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That so much of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting roads and canals, as relates to the Ohio Canal, be referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

And on motion, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 22.

Mr. BAYARD asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill authorizing the sale and grant of a quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BAYARD asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the laws within the District of Columbia; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday "That so much of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting roads and canals, as relates to the Ohio Canal, be referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise;" and, having agreed thereto, Messrs. POPE, BAYARD, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing a detachment from the militia of the United States," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, SUMTER, and BAYARD, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate the whole of the correspondence between the United States and Jared Shattuck, or any agent acting for him, or in his behalf, in respect to Lieutenant Maley's detaining the ship Mercator, in the year 1800, and in relation to the judicial investigation that was afterwards suggested, and the stipulations that a final decree should not involve the question whether the United States are responsible.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases, together with the report of the select committee thereon; and, after debate, on motion, by Mr. CLAY, it was recommitted to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CLAY, BRADLEY, and LEIB, were appointed the select committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to make public a road in Washington county, in the District of Columbia," together with the report of the select committee thereon; and having agreed thereto, the President reported the bill to the House amended accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The following motion was submitted by Mr. WHITESIDE :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any further and what provision should be made for the relief of persons imprisoned on process issued from the courts of the United States in civil cases, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill for the establishment of a quartermaster's department, reported it with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to alter and amend the act, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States."

NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee appointed on the subject the thirteenth instant, reported a bill making provision for the establishment of a National Bank; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading. The bill is as follows :

A bill making provision for the establishment of a National Bank.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That a Bank of the United States shall be established, the capital stock whereof shall not exceed twenty millions of dollars, divided into fifty thousand shares, each share being four hundred dollars. And that subscriptions towards constituting the said stock shall, on the first Monday of October next, be opened at Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, for eight hundred and sixty-seven shares; at Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, for two thousand nine hundred and fifty shares; at —, in the State of Connecticut, for one thousand two hundred and fifteen shares; at Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, for three hundred and forty-seven shares; at —, in the State of Vermont, for six hundred and ninety-four shares; at —, in the State of New York, for two thousand nine hundred and fifty shares; at Trenton, in the State of New Jersey, for one thousand and forty-five shares; at Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, for three thousand one hundred and twenty-five shares; at Dover, in the State of Delaware, for three hundred and forty-seven shares; at Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, for one thousand five hundred and sixty-two shares; at Richmond, in the State of Virginia, for three thousand eight hundred and twenty shares; at Raleigh, in the State of North Carolina, for two thousand and eighty-two shares; at Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, for one thousand three hundred and eighty-eight shares; at Milledgeville, in the State of Georgia, for six hundred and ninety-four shares; at Lexington, in the State of Kentucky, for one thousand and forty-five shares; at Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, for five hundred and twenty-two shares; and at —, in the State of Ohio, for three hundred and forty-seven shares; under the superintendence in each State of such persons, not less than three, as shall be appointed for that purpose by the President of the United States, (who is hereby authorized to appoint the said persons accordingly,) which subscriptions shall continue open until the whole of the said stock shall have been subscribed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person, being a citizen of the United States, or of the Territories thereof, copartnership composed of such person or body politic, incorporated within the United States, to subscribe for so many shares as he, she, or they shall think fit, not exceeding one thousand, except as shall hereafter be provided in relation to the United States, and the States respectively; and that the sums respectively subscribed, except on behalf of the United States, and the respective States, shall be payable in gold or silver, and shall be payable in four equal instalments, at the distance of six calendar months from each other; the first whereof shall be paid at the time of subscription.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all those who shall become subscribers to the said bank, their successors and assigns, shall be, and are hereby, created and made a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of the President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of the United States, and shall so continue until the fourth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty; and by that name shall be, and are hereby, made able and capable in law to have, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain, to them and their successors, lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects, of what kind, nature, or quality soever, to an amount not exceeding in the whole thirty millions of dollars, including the amount of the capital stock aforesaid; and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien, or dispose of; to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in courts of record, or any other place whatsoever. And, also, to make, have, and use, a common seal, and the same to break, alter, and renew, at their pleasure; and, also, to ordain, establish, and put in execution such by-laws, ordinances, and regulations, as shall seem necessary and convenient for the government of the said corporation, not being contrary to law, or to the Constitution thereof, (for which purpose general meetings of the stockholders shall and may be called by the directors, and in the manner hereinafter specified,) and generally to do and execute all and singular acts, matters, and things, which to them it shall or may appertain to do; subject, nevertheless, to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations, and provisions, hereinafter prescribed and declared.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That for the well-ordering of the affairs of the said corporation, there shall be twenty-five directors; for twenty of whom there shall be an election on the first Monday in January in each year, by the stockholders or proprietors of the capital stock of the said corporation, and by plurality of votes actually given, and five of whom shall be appointed as hereinafter provided; and those who shall be duly chosen at any election, and appointed as provided, shall be capable of serving as directors, by virtue of such choice and appointment until the end or expiration of the Monday in January next ensuing the time of such election, and no longer. And the said directors, at their first meeting after each election, shall choose one of their numbers as president.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, at the expiration of twenty days after the opening of the said subscriptions, it shall be the duty of the persons having the superintendence of the same to transmit an account to the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount of subscriptions upon their books respectively, and of the moneys actually paid on account of such subscriptions, and as soon as it shall appear to him that the sum of four millions of dollars have been actually received on account of subscriptions to said stock, he shall cause due public notice thereof to be given, and he shall at the same time in like manner notify a time and place within the city of Philadelphia, at the distance of sixty days from the time of such notification, for proceeding to the election of twenty directors; and it shall be lawful for such election to be then and there made; and the persons who shall be then and there chosen, together with five directors to be appointed by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund for the time being, (who, or a majority of them, are hereby empowered to make such appointment at any due and convenient time,) shall be the first directors, and shall be capable of serving, by virtue of such choice and appointment, until the end or expiration of the Monday in January next ensuing the time of making the same, and shall forthwith thereafter commence the operations of the said bank at the said city of Philadelphia: Provided, That in case it should at any time happen that an election or appointment of directors should not be made, upon any day when, pursuant to this act, it ought to have been made, the said corporation shall not for that cause be deemed to be dissolved; but it shall be lawful on any other day to hold or make an election or appointment of directors in such manner as shall have been regulated by the laws and ordinances of the said corporation, not inconsistent with this act: And provided further, That in case of the death, resignation, absence from the United States, or the removal of a director by the stockholders of one of those chosen by them, or of the death, resignation, absence from the United States, or the removal of a director by a majority of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund of one of those appointed by them, his place may be filled up by a new choice or appointment (as the case may be) for the remainder of the year.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the directors for the time being shall have power to appoint such officers, clerks, and servants under them, as shall be necessary for executing the business of the said corporation, and to allow them such compensation for their services respectively as shall be reasonable; and shall be capable of exercising such other powers and authorities, for the well-governing and ordering of the affairs of the said corporation, as shall be described, fixed, and determined by the laws, regulations, and ordinances, of the same.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the following restrictions, limitations, and provisions, shall form and be fundamental articles of the constitution of the said corporation, viz:

1. The number of votes to which each stockholder shall be entitled, shall be according to the number of shares he shall hold, in the proportions following, that is to say: For one share, and not more than two, one vote; for every two shares above two, and not exceeding ten, one vote; for every four shares above ten, and not exceeding thirty, one vote; for every six shares above thirty, and not exceeding sixty, one vote; for every eight shares above sixty, and not exceeding one hundred, one vote; and for every ten shares above one hundred, one vote. But no person, copartnership or body politic, shall be entitled to a greater number than thirty votes, except in relation to the stock subscribed by the respective States, in which case the number of votes in the ratio aforesaid shall be limited to one hundred. And after the first election, no share or shares shall confer a right of suffrage, which shall not have been holden three calendar months previous to the day of election. Stockholders actually resident within the United States, and none other, may vote in elections by proxy.

2. Not more than three-fourths of the directors in office chosen by the stockholders, nor more than three-fifths of those appointed by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, the president excepted, shall be eligible or capable of appointment for the next succeeding year. But the director who shall be president at the time of an election, may always be re-elected or re-appointed as the case may be.

3. None but a stockholder, being the owner of five shares, and being a citizen of the United States, and resident therein, shall be capable of being chosen or appointed as a director.

4. No director shall be entitled to any emolument, unless the same shall have been allowed by the stockholders at a general meeting. The stockholders shall make such compensation to the president for his extraordinary attendance at the bank, as shall appear to them reasonable.

5. Not less than seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business, of whom the president shall always be one, except in case of sickness, or necessary absence; in which case his place may be supplied by any other director whom he, by writing under his name, shall nominate for the purpose.

6. A number of stockholders, not less than sixty, who, together, shall be proprietors of two hundred shares or upwards, shall have power at any time to call a general meeting of the stockholders, for the purposes relative to the institution, giving at least ten weeks notice in two public gazettes of the place where the bank is kept, and specifying in such notice the object or objects of such meeting.

7. Every cashier or treasurer, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall be required to give bond, with two or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the directors, in a sum not less than fifty thousand dollars, with condition for his good behaviour.

8. The lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which it shall be lawful for the said corporation to hold, shall be only such as shall be requisite for its immediate accommodation in relation to the convenient transaction of its business, and such as shall have been bona fide mortgaged to it by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings, or purchased at sales upon judgments which shall have been obtained for such debts.

9. The total amount of the debts, which the said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, shall not exceed the sum of twenty millions of dollars, over and above the moneys then actually deposited in the bank for safekeeping, unless the contracting of any greater debt shall have been previously authorized by a law of the United States: In case of excess, the directors, under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for the same, in their natural and private capacities, and an action of debt may in such case be brought against them, or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors or administrators, in any court of record of the United States, or either of them, by any creditor or creditors of the said corporation, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution; any condition, covenant, or agreement, to the contrary notwithstanding. But this shall not be construed to exempt the said corporation, or the lands, tenements, goods or chattels of the same, from being also liable for, and chargeable with, the said excess. Such of the said directors, who may have been absent when the said excess was contracted or created, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act, whereby the same was so contracted or created, may respectively exonerate themselves from being so liable, by forthwith giving notice of the fact, and of their absence or dissent, to the President of the United States, and to the stockholders at a general meeting, which they shall have power to call for that purpose.

10. The said corporation shall not be at liberty to purchase any public debt whatsoever, nor shall directly or indirectly deal or trade in anything, except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent and not redeemed in due time, or of goods which shall be the produce of its lands. Neither shall the said corporation take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum, for or upon loans or discounts.

11. No loan shall be made by the said corporation, for the use or on account of the Government of the United States, to an amount exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, or of any particular State to an amount exceeding fifty thousand dollars, or of any foreign Prince or State, unless previously authorized by a law of the United States.

12. The stock of the said corporation shall be assignable and transferable according to such rules as shall be instituted in that behalf, by the laws and ordinances of the same; except the stock subscribed by the several States, which shall not be assignable or transferable either in law or equity.

13. The bills obligatory and of credit, under the seal of the said corporation, which shall be made to any person or persons, shall be assignable by endorsement thereupon, under the hand or hands of such person or persons, and of his, her, or their assignee or assignees, and so as absolutely to transfer and vest the property thereof in each and every assignee or assignees successively, and to enable such assignee or assignees to bring and maintain an action thereupon, in his, her, or their own name or names. And bills or notes which may be issued by order of the corporation, signed by the president and countersigned by the principal cashier or treasurer thereof, promising the payment of money to any person or persons, his, her, or their order, or to bearer, though not under the seal of the said corporation, shall be binding and obligatory upon the same, in the like manner, and with the like force and effect, as upon any private person or persons, if issued by him or them, in his, her, or their private or natural capacity or capacities; and shall be assignable or negotiable, in like manner, as if they were so issued by such private person or persons: That is to say, those which shall be payable to any person or persons, his, her, or their order, shall be assignable by endorsement, in like manner, and with the like effect, as foreign bills of exchange now are; and those which are payable to bearer, shall be negotiable and assignable on delivery only.

14. Half-yearly dividends shall be made of so much of the profits of the bank, as shall appear to the directors advisable; and once in every three years, the directors shall lay before the stockholders, at a general meeting, for their information, an exact and particular statement of the debts, which shall have remained unpaid after the expiration of the original credit, for a period of treble the term of that credit; and of the surplus of profit, if any, after deducting losses and dividends. If there shall be a failure in the payment of any part of any sum, subscribed by any person, co-partnership or body politic, except in case of the States who shall be respectively entitled to a dividend proportioned to the payment actually made by them, the party failing shall lose the benefit of any dividend which may have accrued, prior to the time of making such payment, or which may accrue while there be a default in payment of any part of the subscription money which is payable.

15. It shall be lawful for the directors aforesaid to establish offices wheresoever they shall think fit within the United States, or the Territories thereof, for the purpose of discount and deposit only, and upon the same terms, and in the same manner, as shall be practised at the bank, and to commit the management of the said offices, and the making the said discounts, to such persons under such agreements, and subject to such regulations, as they shall deem proper, not being contrary to law or the constitution of the bank. And it shall be the duty of the said directors to establish such offices of discount and deposit in each of the States respectively, the Legislature whereof may require the same to be done. And the Legislatures of the States respectively shall have a right to require of the said directors the establishment of an office aforesaid within the State, at such place as the directors may fix, with a capital not exceeding for the States respectively, the sum hereafter limited, that is to say: For the State of New Hampshire, two hundred thousand dollars; for the State of Massachusetts, seven hundred thousand dollars; for the State of Connecticut, two hundred and ninety thousand dollars; for the State of Rhode Island, two hundred thousand dollars; for the State of Vermont, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; for the State of New York, seven hundred thousand dollars; for the State of New Jersey, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; for the State of Delaware, one hundred thousand dollars; for the State of Maryland, five hundred thousand dollars; for the State of Virginia, eight hundred thousand dollars; for the State of North Carolina, five hundred thousand dollars; for the State of South Carolina, four hundred thousand dollars; for the State of Georgia, two hundred thousand dollars; for the State of Kentucky, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; for the State of Tennessee, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and for the State of Ohio, two hundred thousand dollars.

16. The officer at the head of the Treasury Department of the United States shall be furnished, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the said corporation, and of the debts due the same; of the moneys deposited therein; of the notes in circulation, and of cash in hand; and shall have a right to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank, as shall relate to the said statements: Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if the said corporation, or any person or persons for or to the use of the same, shall deal or trade in buying or selling any goods, wares, or merchandise, or commodities whatsoever, contrary to the provisions of this act, all and every person and persons, by whom any order or direction for so dealing or trading shall have been given, and all and every person or persons who shall have been concerned as parties or agents therein, shall forfeit and lose treble the value of the goods, wares, merchandise, and commodities, in which such dealing and trade shall have been, one-half thereof to the use of the informer, and the other half thereof to the use of the United States, to be recovered with costs of suit.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That if the said corporation shall advance and lend any sum, for the use, or on account of, the Government of the United States, to an amount exceeding one hundred thousand dollars; or of any particular State to an amount exceeding fifty thousand dollars; or of any foreign Prince or State, (unless previously authorized thereto by a law of the United States,) all and every person and persons, by and with whose order, agreement, consent, approbation, or connivance, such unlawful advance or loan shall have been made, upon conviction thereof, shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, treble the value or amount of the sum or sums which shall have been so unlawfully advanced or lent; one-fifth thereof to the use of the informer, and the residue thereof to the use of the United States, to be disposed of by law and not otherwise.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the said corporation, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, in gold and silver coin, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, at any time or times, within two years from the time of the passing of this act, to cause a subscription to be made to the stock of the said corporation, as part of the aforesaid capital stock of twenty millions of dollars, on behalf of the United States, to an amount not exceeding four millions of dollars, to be paid out of the moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or which may be borrowed by virtue of this act; and it shall be lawful for the President to borrow from the said bank, for the purpose aforesaid, a sum or sums not exceeding in the whole four millions of dollars, which the said bank are hereby authorized to lend, reimbursable in ten years, by equal annual instalments, or at any time sooner, or in any greater proportion that the Government may think fit.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Legislatures of the States, at any time or times within three —, to cause a subscription to be made to the stock of the said corporation, as part of the aforesaid capital stock of twenty millions of dollars, on behalf of the States, to an amount not exceeding six millions of dollars, to be appropriated among the States respectively as follows, that is to say:

The State of New Hampshire, five hundred and twenty shares; the State of Massachusetts, seven hundred and seventy shares; the State of Connecticut, seven hundred and thirty shares; the State of Rhode Island, two hundred and ten shares; the State of Vermont, four hundred and sixteen shares; the State of New York, seventeen hundred and seventy shares; the State of New Jersey, six hundred and twenty-five shares; the State of Pennsylvania, eighteen hundred and seventy-five shares; the State of Delaware, two hundred and ten shares; the State of Maryland, nine hundred shares; the State of Virginia, two thousand shares; the State of North Carolina, twelve hundred and fifty shares; the State of South Carolina, eight hundred and thirty-three shares; the State of Georgia, four hundred and fifty-three shares; the State of Kentucky, six hundred and twenty-five shares; the State of Tennessee, four hundred and fifty-three shares; the State of Ohio, three hundred and sixty shares; which said subscription may, as the Legislatures of the States shall judge proper, be paid in any equal annual instalments within ten years; the first instalment to be paid at the time of subscribing, and the subsequent instalments at a distance of time not greater than one year from each other successively: Provided, That if any State shall decline or neglect subscribing within the period herein limited, or neglect to pay the whole amount of its subscriptions within ten years from the time of subscribing, in such case it shall be lawful for the United States to dispose of, or make any regulations they may judge proper in respect to any shares not subscribed, or any instalment remaining unpaid.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the bank herein provided for, shall take effect and be established on the fourth day of March next; and that no other bank shall be established by any future law of the United States, during the continuance of the corporation hereby created; for which the faith of the United States is hereby pledged.

MUNITIONS OF WAR.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill appropriating a sum of money for procuring munitions of war, and for other purposes.

[This bill provides: That for procuring cannon and small arms, with all necessary implements for using the same with effect, when required for actual service, and for procuring gunpowder, saltpetre, knapsacks, tents, camp kettles, and all other necessary implements and munitions of war, and also for providing proper and convenient arsenals, and other needful buildings for the reception and preservation of the same, there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated a sum of money not exceeding — dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

That the aforesaid sum of money, or so much thereof as in the judgment of the President of the United States shall be deemed necessary for the objects aforesaid, shall be applied by the Secretary at War, under the directions of the President of the United States, to the purchasing and procuring the articles aforesaid, in such proportions and at such times, and the same when purchased or procured shall be deposited in such places as the President of the United States shall direct, having regard in making such deposits to places of security, convenient to such parts of the United States as he shall deem most liable to predatory attacks from an enemy.

That, for supplying clothing for the Army of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven, there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated a sum of money not exceeding — dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the object, as well as all other moneys hereafter appropriated, shall be applied to procuring the necessary clothing for the Army of the United States, under the directions of the Secretary at War, by publishing proposals and making contracts for supplying the aforesaid clothing, or any part thereof, in the same manner as proposals are now published and contracts are now made for supplying provisions for the Army of the United States, giving the preference, in all cases of such proposals, to fabrics of the domestic manufactures of the United States, where the same can be done without material detriment to the service thereof.]

Mr. POPE moved to amend the bill by adding the following as a new section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That for supplying clothing for the Marine Corps and for furnishing and equipping the Navy of the United States, for the year 1811, there shall be, and is hereby, appropriated, a sum of money not exceeding — dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same or so much thereof as may be necessary for the object, as well as all other moneys hereafter appropriated, shall be applied to procuring the necessary clothing for the Marine Corps and furnishing and equipping the Navy of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, by publishing proposals, and making contracts for supplying the aforesaid clothing or any part thereof, in the same manner as proposals are now published, and contracts are now made for supplying provisions for the Army of the United States, giving preference in all cases of such proposals to fabrics and articles of the manufacture and growth of the United States, where the same can be done, without material detriment to the service thereof.

Mr. LLOYD also having offered an amendment, the further consideration of the bill was, on motion of Mr. GILES, postponed till to-morrow.

FRIDAY, March 23.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to make public a road in Washington county, in the District of Columbia," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The bill to amend the laws within the District of Columbia was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BAYARD, BRENT, and POPE, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any further and what provision should be made for the relief of persons imprisoned on process issued from the courts of the United States in civil cases, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and, having agreed thereto, Messrs. WHITESIDE, LEIB, and BAYARD, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of John Kerr from his imprisonment," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to alter and amend the act, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States."

[The first section provides: "That no allowance of additional rations shall be made to any officer above the rank of a colonel, nor to the commandant of the Marine Corps, nor in any case shall allowance of additional rations exceed the number of rations, to which the officer receiving such allowance is entitled by law for his daily subsistence."]

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, to strike out, from lines fourth and fifth, the following words: "nor to the commandant of the Marine Corps," it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Champlin, Clay, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Horsey, Mathewson, Meigs, Pickering, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, and Sumter.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Tait, Turner, and Whiteside.

And the President reported the bill to the House amended accordingly. On the question, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BAYARD, POPE, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill appropriating a sum of money for procuring munitions of war, and for other purposes; and, after the consideration of sundry propositions to amend the bill, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the bill to add to the officers of the Treasury a Superintendent of the Public Lands of the United States. And, on motion by Mr. MEIGS, the further consideration thereof was postponed indefinitely.

MONDAY, March 26.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, reported it without amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of John Kerr from his imprisonment," was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the establishment of a Quartermaster's department, together with the amendments reported by the select committee; and, having agreed thereto, and further amended the bill, the President reported it to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Ohio Canal Company—Munitions of War.

SENATE.

The bill making provision for the establishment of a National Bank, was read the second time.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the bill to alter and amend the act, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

A Message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the purpose of trying the practical use of the torpedo, or submarine explosion," with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. The House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Phineas Varney from his imprisonment;" also, a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases, reported it with amendments; which were read.

OHIO CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. POPE, from the committee to whom was referred on the 22d instant so much of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on roads and canals, as relates to the Ohio Canal, reported the following bill, which was read the first and second time:

A bill authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States, to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall be, and is hereby, authorized to subscribe unto the capital of the Ohio Canal Company, incorporated by the State of Kentucky, upon the application of the said company, in the manner and under the restrictions in this act contained, to the amount which may be deficient in the subscription to the said stock, not exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, payable in three equal annual instalments, to be payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever application, by said company, shall be made, as aforesaid, an authentic map and description of the said canal, explaining the manner in which the same is proposed to be carried into effect, shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, together with a correct list of all the subscriptions and payments which shall have been made to the capital stock of the said company, and also a copy of the law under which the company shall have been incorporated and empowered to act; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President, that proper and competent arrangements have been made for cutting or making the said canal, and that, in his opinion, there is no sufficient objection to the line or lines on which the said company propose to carry the said canal, then the said subscription, on the part of the United States, shall be made as before directed by the President, who shall, at the time of subscribing, direct when the first instalment of the aforesaid sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid. But if any objection occur to the line or lines, on which the company propose to carry their canal, then it shall be lawful for the President to withhold the subscription on behalf of the United States, until the line or lines of said canal shall be located in such manner as to him may appear proper.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the shares constituting the subscription which may be made on the part of the United States, as by this act provided, shall be vested in the United States, and it shall be lawful for the President to appoint a proxy to vote, at any stated or other meeting of the stockholders, on behalf of the United States, and in all respects to represent the interest of the United States, under the direction of the President.

MUNITIONS OF WAR.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill appropriating a sum of money for procuring munitions of war. The section, as first offered by Mr. POPE, having been objected to by some on the ground that the expressions relative to the Navy were too general and comprehensive, Mr. P. withdrew it and offered the following as a substitute:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That for supplying clothing for the Marine Corps and for furnishing the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven, with sail-duck, cordage, and hemp, and other articles of the fabric of hemp and flax requisite for its use, there be and is hereby appropriated a sum of money not exceeding — dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the object, as well as all other moneys which shall be hereafter appropriated, shall be applied to procuring the necessary clothing for the Marine Corps, and furnishing the Navy of the United States as aforesaid, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, by publishing proposals and making contracts for supplying the aforesaid clothing and naval supplies aforesaid, or any part thereof, in the same manner as proposals are now published and contracts are now made, for supplying provisions for the Army of the United States, giving preference, in all cases of such proposals, to fabrics and articles of the manufacture and growth of the United States, where the same can be done without material detriment to the service thereof.

A motion was made, by Mr. LLOYD, to strike out from the amendment the following words:

"And for furnishing the Navy of the United States with sail-duck, cordage, and hemp, and other articles of the fabric of hemp, and flax, requisite for its use:"

Mr. CLAY.—The local interest, Mr. President, of the quarter of the country which I have the honor to represent, will apologize for the trouble I may give you on this occasion. My colleague has proposed an amendment to the bill before you, instructing the Secretary of the Navy, in providing supplies of cordage, sail-cloth, hemp, &c., to give a preference to those of American growth and manufacture. This part of the amendment is moved by the gentleman from Massachusetts,

(Mr. LLOYD) to be stricken out. And in the course of the discussion which has arisen, remarks have been made on the general policy of promoting manufactures. The propriety of this policy is perhaps not very intimately connected with the subject before us, but is nevertheless within the legitimate and admissible scope of debate. Under this impression I offer my sentiments.

In inculcating the advantages of domestic manufactures, it never entered the head, I presume, of any one to change the habits of the nation from an agricultural to a manufacturing society. No one I am persuaded ever thought of converting the ploughshare and the sickle into the spindle and shuttle. And yet this is the delusive view too often taken of the subject. The opponents of the manufacturing system transport themselves to the establishments of Manchester and Birmingham, and perceiving the indigence, vice, and wretchedness prevailing there, by pushing it to an extreme, argue that its introduction into this country will be attended by the same mischievous consequences. But what is the fact? That England is the manufacturer of a great part of the world, and even there the numbers thus employed bear an inconsiderable proportion to the whole mass of population. If we were to become the manufacturers of other nations, effects of the same kind might result. But if we limit our efforts by our own wants, the evils apprehended would be found to be chimerical. The invention and improvement of machinery, for which the present age is so remarkable, dispensing in a great degree with manual labor; and the employment of those persons, who, if we are engaged in the pursuits of agriculture alone, would be either unproductive, or exposed to indolence and immorality, will enable us to supply our wants without withdrawing our attention from agriculture; that first and greatest source of our wealth and happiness. A judicious American farmer, in the household way, manufactures whatever is requisite for his family. He squanders but little in the gewgaws of Europe. He presents in epitome what the nation ought to do. Their manufactories ought to bear the same proportion, and effect the same object in relation to the whole community that the part of his household employed in domestic manufacturing does to the whole family. It is certainly desirable that the exports of the country should continue to be the surplus production of tillage, and not become those of manufacturing establishments. But it is important to diminish our imports—to furnish ourselves with clothing made by our own industry—and to cease to be dependent for the very coat we wear upon a foreign and perhaps inimical country. The nation that imports its clothing from abroad is but little less dependent than if it imported its bread.

The fallacious course of reasoning urged against manufactures, the distress and servitude produced by those of England, would equally indicate the propriety of abandoning agriculture itself. Cast your eyes upon the miserable peasantry of Poland.

Revert back to the days of feudal vassalage, and you may thence draw copious arguments of the kind now under consideration against the pursuits of the husbandman! What would become of commerce, the favorite theme of some gentlemen, if assailed with this sort of weapon? The fraud, perjury, cupidity, and corruption, with which it is unhappily too often attended, would at once produce its overthrow. In short, sir, take the black side of the picture and every human occupation will be found pregnant with fatal objections.

The opposition to manufacturing institutions recalls to my recollection the case of a gentleman of whom I have heard. He had been in the habit of supplying his table from a neighboring cook and confectioner's shop, and proposed to his wife a reform in this particular. She revolted at the idea. The sight of a scullion was dreadful, and her delicate nerves could not bear the clattering of kitchen furniture. But the gentleman persisted in his design; his table was thenceforth better and cheaper supplied, and his neighbor the confectioner lost one of his best customers. In like manner Dame Commerce will oppose domestic manufactures. She is a flirting, dippant, noisy jade, and if we are governed by her fantasies, we shall never put off the muslins of India and the cloths of Europe. But I trust that the yeomanry of the country, the true and genuine landlord of this tenement, called the United States, disregarding her freaks, will persevere in reform until the whole national family is furnished by itself with the clothing necessary for its own use.

It is a subject no less of curiosity than of interest to trace the prejudices in favor of foreign fabrics. In our colonial condition we were in a complete state of manufactural and commercial, as well as political dependence on the parent country. For many years after the war, such was the partiality for her productions, that a gentleman's head could not withstand the influence of solar heat, unless covered with a London hat—his feet could not bear the pebbles or frost of this country, unless protected by London shoes—and the comfort or adornment of his person was consulted when his coat was cut out by the shears of a tailor "just from London." At length, however the wonderful discovery has been made that it is not absolutely beyond the reach of American skill and ingenuity to provide these articles, combining with equal elegance greater durability. And I entertain no doubt that in a short time the no less important fact will be developed, that the domestic manufactories of the United States, fostered by Government, and aided by household exertions, are fully competent to supply us with at least every necessary article of clothing. I therefore, sir, for one, (to use the fashionable cant of the day,) am in favor of encouraging them, not to the extent to which they are carried in England, but to such extent as will redeem us entirely from all dependence on foreign countries. There is a pleasure—a pride (if I may be allowed the expression, and I pity those who cannot feel the sentiment) in being clad in the productions of our own families. Others may prefer the cloths of Leeds and of London, but give me those of Humphreysville.

Aid may be given to native institutions in the form of bounties and of protecting duties. But against bounties it is urged that you tax the whole for the benefit of a part, only, of the community; and in opposition to duties it is alleged that you make the interests of one part, the consumer, bend to that of another part, the manufacturer. The sufficiency of the answer is not always admitted, that the sacrifice is merely temporary, being ultimately compensated by the greater abundance and superiority of the article produced by the stimulus. But, of all practicable forms of encouragement, it might have been expected that the one under consideration would escape opposition, if everything proposed in Congress were not doomed to experience it. What is it? The bill contains two provisions—one prospective, anticipating the appropriation for clothing for the Army, and the amendment proposes extending it to naval supplies also, for the year 1811—and the other, directing a preference to be given to home manufactures and productions whenever it can be done without material detriment to the public service. The object of the first is to authorize contracts to be made beforehand with manufacturers, and by making advances to them, under proper security, to enable them to supply the articles wanted in sufficient quantity. When it is recollected that they are frequently men of limited capitals, it will be acknowledged that this kind of assistance, bestowed with prudence, will be productive of the best results. It is, in fact, only pursuing a principle long acted upon, of advancing to contractors with Government, on account of the magnitude of their engagements. The appropriation contemplated to be made for the year 1811, may be restricted to such a sum as, whether we have peace or war, we must necessarily expend. The discretion is proposed to be vested in officers of high confidence, who will be responsible for its abuse, and who are enjoined to see that the public service receives no material detriment. It is stated that hemp is now very high, and that contracts made under existing circumstances will be injurious to Government. But the amendment creates no obligation upon the Secretary of the Navy to go into market at this precise moment. In fact, by enlarging his sphere of action, it admits of his taking advantage of a favorable fluctuation, and getting a supply below the accustomed price, if such a fall should occur prior to the usual annual appropriation.

I consider the amendment under consideration of the first importance in point of principle. It is evident, that whatever doubt may be entertained as to the general policy of the manufacturing system, none can exist as to the propriety of our being able to furnish ourselves with articles of the first necessity, in time of war. Our maritime operations ought not in such a state to depend upon the casualties of foreign supply. It is not necessary that they should. With very little encouragement from Government, I believe we shall soon not want a pound of Russia hemp. The increase of the article in Kentucky has been rapidly great. Ten years ago there were but two rope manufactories in the State. Now there are about twenty, and between ten and fifteen of cotton bagging; and the erection of new ones keeps pace with the annual augmentation of the quantity of hemp. Indeed the Western country alone is adequate to the supply not only of whatever of this article is requisite for our own consumption, but is capable of affording a surplus for foreign markets. The amendment proposed possesses the double recommendation of encouraging at the same time the manufacture and growth of hemp. For, increasing the demand for the wrought article, you increase the demand also for the raw material, and consequently present new incentives to the cultivator.

The three great subjects that claim the attention of the National Legislature are the interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures. We have had before us a proposition to afford a manly protection to the rights of commerce, and how has it been treated? Rejected! You have been solicited to promote agriculture, by increasing the facilities of internal communication through the means of canals and roads, and what has been done? Postponed! We are now called upon to give a trifling support to our domestic manufactories, and shall we close the circle of Congressional inefficiency by adding this also to the catalogue?

When Mr. CLAY had concluded, the question was taken on striking out the clause, and it was determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Crawford, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Campbell, Champlin, Clay, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Horsey, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, and Whiteside.

And the original motion, of Mr. POPE, for amendment having been agreed to, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 27.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the purpose of trying the practical use of the torpedo or submarine explosion." And on motion by Mr. LEIB,

Resolved, That they concur therein.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties," was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Phineas Varney from his imprisonment," was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the bill for the establishment of a Quartermaster's department correctly engrossed; and the bill was resumed. And on motion, by Mr. LEIB, it was recommitted to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon, and Messrs. PICKERING, LEIB, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Tristram Hussey;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases, together with the amendments reported by the select committee; and having agreed thereto, and further amended the bill, on motion, by Mr. GERMAN, to strike out all the bill except the enacting clause and the third section, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Campbell, Champlin, Clay, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Horsey, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tait, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Condit, Crawford, and Turner.

On motion, by Mr. MEIGS, the bill was recommitted to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. MEIGS, GREGG, and GILES, were appointed the committee.

Mr. CHAMPLIN stated that the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island had requested their Senators and Representatives in Congress, to oppose an alteration of the Constitution of the United States, respecting the removal from office by the President of the United States, of any of the judges of the courts thereof, which was proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Vermont.

WEDNESDAY, March 28.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill to amend an act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed that the bill making provision for the establishment of a National Bank be the order of the day for Wednesday next.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties," was read the second time, and passed to the third reading.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Phineas Varney from his imprisonment," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, GOODRICH, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Tristram Hussey," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GERMAN, BRADLEY, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. TURNER, the bill entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of John Kerr from his imprisonment," was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. TURNER, TAIT, and CRAWFORD, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed the bill authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill appropriating a sum of money for procuring munitions of war, and for other purposes, and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 23d February, the petition of Richard B. Lee, made report; which was read for consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MEIGS, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill granting a right of pre-emption to purchasers of public lands in certain cases, reported amendments thereto; which were read.

Mr. CLAY gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers."

Mr. LLOYD presented the memorial of the proprietors of the Middlesex canal, in Massachusetts, stating that, at a very great expense, they have constructed a canal twenty-seven miles in length, and which, in its progress, over seven rivers and by twenty locks, descends one hundred and four feet, into the harbor of Boston; and when finished will be of great public utility; but that the finances of the proprietors are inadequate to the completion of their object, ultimately, the inland navigation from the Merrimack, by intervening rivers and lakes, to the western waters. They therefore pray they may be included in the bill for the improvement of the United States by canals and roads; and the memorial was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. LLOYD, BRADLEY, and GILMAN, were appointed the committee.

MARCH, 1810.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the amendments reported by the select committee to the bill to amend the laws within the District of Columbia; and, having agreed thereto, the President reported the bill to the House amended accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. BRENT, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Urban Guillet and his associates, known under the name of the "Society of La Trappe," made report; which was read for consideration.

The engrossed bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the proprietors of the Middlesex canal, in the State of Massachusetts, was read the third time.

On motion by Mr. LLOYD, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to amend the bill, and to strike out, after the word "thencewith," at the end of the fourth section, as follows: "and extending the same to Connecticut river, by such waters or canals as may be fixed by the Board of Directors," and to insert the following words: "pursuant to the act or acts of incorporation that have been or may be obtained by said company."

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended, and that the title thereof be "An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the proprietors of the Middlesex canal, in the State of Massachusetts."

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland.

Resolved, That the Secretary for the Department of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, whether any, and what, dividends have been made by the Bank of the United States, other than those publicly declared of eight per cent. per annum; and whether any surplus, and what amount, remained to the credit of the bank after payment of the last dividend had been made; and, also, the profit or loss that has resulted to the bank from its offices of discount and deposit; specifying the profit or the loss on each office separately, and the amount of capital supplied to each.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with the resolution of the twenty-second instant.

JAMES MADISON.

MARCH 30, 1810.

The Message and report were read.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, it was

Resolved, That the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jared Shattuck," together with the above Message and report, be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That Messrs. BRADLEY, GREGG, and BAYARD, be the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Tristram Hussey," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GERMAN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to appropriate a certain tract of land for opening and improving the water communication between the tide waters of the Hudson river and Lakes Ontario and Erie; and the bill was read and passed to a second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives

APRIL, 1810.

Bank of the United States.

SENATE.

informed the Senate that the House adhere to their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes." The House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to examine into the title to the bature in front of the suburb St. Mary;" in which bill they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. GILES, the further consideration of the bill appropriating a sum of money for procuring munitions of war, and for other purposes, was postponed until Thursday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment," together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 3.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the bill to amend the laws within the District of Columbia correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to appropriate a certain tract of land for opening and improving the water communication between the tide waters of the Hudson river and Lakes Ontario and Erie, was read the second time.

The bill fixing the compensation of Ministers and of Consuls residing on the coast of Barbary, and for other purposes, was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act to examine into the title of the bature in front of the suburb St. Mary," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. WHITESIDE, CRAWFORD, GREGG, BRADLEY, and HILLHOUSE, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment," together with the amendments proposed thereto; and on the amendment submitted by Mr. BAYARD, as follows:

To strike out, from the word "office," in the second line of tenth section, to the word "and," in sixth line, and insert the following clause:

"Which shall remain open for the receipt and delivery of letters, papers, and packages, each day of the week, from the hour of — in the morning, to the hour of — in the evening; during which time, and also, each other time as the Postmaster General shall direct, one or more persons shall attend for the purpose of performing the duties thereof."

Mr. BRADLEY called for a division of the question; and it was taken on striking out; and determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 15, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Franklin, Gregg, Meigs, and Sumter.

And sundry other amendments having been agreed to, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 4.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 2d instant:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 3, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a report, prepared in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of yesterday.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

To the honorable the President of the Senate:

The Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the resolution of the Senate, of the 2d instant, respectfully reports—

That the statement annexed to the report made to the Senate on the 2d day of March, 1809, contained all the dividends made by the Bank of the United States, from its establishment to the date of the report, as stated to the Treasury by the bank.

That the annexed table, (A,) being a transcript of the abovementioned statement, with the addition of the dividends made on the 1st day of July, 1809, and on the 1st day of January last, embraces not only the semi-annual dividends of 4 per cent., but also all the extra dividends which are within the knowledge of this Department, and which, it is believed, have ever been made by the bank; making, in the whole, an average of 8 13-36 per cent. a year.

That there remained to the credit of the bank, after payment of the dividend made on the 1st day of January last, a surplus of $409,410, consisting of two items, viz: $125,000, designated by the name of "General Bank Estate," intended as an offset against decay and presumed loss, in case of sale of the real estate of the bank—that estate having been paid for from the capital stock, and not from the profits of the bank; and $284,410, designated by the name of "Contingent Fund," intended in the first place to cover losses arising from bad debts, not yet actually lost; and the residue of which, if any, will be applicable to another extra dividend.

That the nominal profit resulting to the bank, from each of its offices of discount and deposits, could not be ascertained without an investigation of all the weekly returns made to this Department; and that there are no returns from which the actual loss sustained by each office can be known.

But, that the statement (B) shows the permanent capital given to each office of discount and deposits; the balance due in account current by the offices of the bank, (exclusive and in addition to the said permanent capital,) on the 27th day of March last; the amount of the notes actually discounted and due to the bank by the last returns, specifying the amount discounted at Philadelphia, and at each office respectively; and an estimate of the gross amount of the annual expenses and losses of the bank, including its several offices, by which it appears that the annual expenses, being about $125,000 a year, the ascertained losses must in the whole have amounted to about $35,000 a year.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

was agreed that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

REVENUE BONDS.

The PRESIDENT communicated a statement from the Secretary for the Department of the Treasury of the outstanding revenue bonds, made in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant. The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 16; 1810.

SIR: I have the honor, in obedience to the resolution of the Senate, of the 13th instant, to transmit a statement of the outstanding revenue bonds, amounting, on the first day of January last, to $9,600,000. But in that are included all the bad debts which have accrued on revenue bonds, from the commencement of this Government to that day. These, together with the debentures issued prior to the first day of January last, and remaining unpaid on that day, are estimated at one million of dollars at least, and must be deducted from that nominal amount. The expenses of collection may be estimated at about $400,000.

The balance remaining in the Treasury on the first day of January last, amounted to $3,817,976 54.

It may not be improper to add, that the estimates of the probable receipts of this year, as stated in the annual report made at the commencement of the present session of Congress, will not, so far as is now known, differ materially from the actual receipts, unless the exportations of foreign produce should exceed what had been presumed. The total amount of debentures, payable in the year 1810, had been there estimated at two millions of dollars, and those paid before the first of April, amounted already to $1,360,000.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The letter was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, April 18.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to examine into the title of the bature in front of the suburb St. Mary." They have passed a bill, entitled "An act to allow the benefit of drawback on merchandise transported by land conveyance from Newport to Boston, and from Boston to Newport, in like manner as if the same were transported coastwise; in which bill they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GERMAN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Isaac Clason; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," was read the second time.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to establish post roads," reported it with amendments.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to examine into the title to the bature in front of the suburb St. Mary."

On motion, by Mr. WHITESIDE, that the further consideration thereof be postponed to the first Monday in December next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 17, as follows:
