BARRED CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary for the Department of the Treasury, made in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 26th instant, on the subject of claims barred by the statute of limitations; and the report was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 28, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a report prepared in obedience to the resolution of the Senate, of the twenty-sixth instant. I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN

To the honorable the President of the Senate:

The Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the resolution of the Senate, of the 26th instant, respectfully reports—

MAY, 1810.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

That it appears, by the letter from the Register of the Treasury, herewith transmitted, that the statement of all the claims adjusted and allowed, by virtue of the act, entitled "An act providing for the settlement of the claims of persons under particular circumstances, barred by the limitations heretofore established," cannot be completed before the day contemplated for the adjournment of Congress, but will be prepared so as to be laid before the Senate at the commencement of their next session.

That the statement (A) herewith transmitted, exhibits the amount of the balances standing on the books of the Treasury against the United States, which are barred by the statutes of limitation, and arranged under the following heads, viz :

Loan Office certificates - - -	$90,811 36
Indents for interest on the public debt - - -	64,590 98
Final settlement certificates - - -	23,873 24
Commissioners' certificates - - -	4,304 83
Army commissioners' do. - - -	46,468 97
Credits given in lieu of army commissioners' certificates cancelled - - -	28,674 30
Credits for pay of the army, for which no certificates were ever issued - - -	17,132 11
Invalid pensions - - -	16,635 46
Amounting together to - - -	292,491 25

That so far as relates to the said balances, which result altogether from accounts actually settled at the Treasury, the statute of limitation can be repealed without subjecting the Government to imposition; but that considering the length of time which has elapsed since the claims have been barred, and the little value on that account affixed to them, the repeal of the statute, unless properly guarded in that respect, may not generally benefit the rightful claimants.

And that with the exception of those balances, it is not believed that it would be safe to repeal the statute of limitation in relation to any other general description of claims; although there may be special cases in which, notwithstanding the lapse of time, the proper proofs and checks may still exist, so as to prevent any imposition on the public.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

A quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number, being present, Mr. GOODWYN and Mr. ROOT were appointed a committee on the part of the House, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, stating that, by certain acts of Congress, the number of members composing the Legislature of that Territory was so deranged as to render it necessary to make a new apportionment of members of the said Legislative Council and House of Representatives, which has been done; and praying the sanction of Congress to the apportionment aforesaid.—Referred to Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, Mr. WITHERSPOON, and Mr. JENNINGS, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. TAYLOR presented a petition of Thomas Galphin, of the State of South Carolina, only surviving partner of the late firm of Galphin, Holmes, and Co., traders with the Creek Indians, and executor of the will of his father, praying that an act may be passed to compel certain persons, resident in the Creek nation of Indians, to pay the amount respectively owing by them to the estate of the father of the petitioner and to the firm aforesaid.—Referred to Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. DANA, Mr. SAMMONS, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. CHAMBERLIN of Vermont, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives :

SIR: An occurrence having recently taken place between a member of the House of Representatives and myself, produced by circumstances not at all connected with his official duties or opinions, which from the time and place may be considered disrespectful to the House of Representatives, I take the liberty of tendering through you my most respectful declarations, that I am the last who would willfully manifest a deficiency of that reverence which is due to the Representatives of my country, or that sacred regard which is also due to their privileges.

To yourself, sir, personally, I tender the assurances of my very great respect. I. A. COLES.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The President's Message having been read,

Mr. SMILIE said that the common mode of proceeding, when in Committee of the Whole on the President's Message, was to refer the several subjects embraced in it to different committees. The Message was not yet printed and laid on the table. He had seen inconveniences arising from too hasty a reference of these subjects on former occasions; he remembered last winter, unfortunately, the subject of our foreign relations had been divided and committed to two separate committees, which had interfered with each other. Perhaps, if the House proceeded too hastily on this occasion, similar inconveniences might again occur. In order to give further time for consideration, he moved that the Committee now rise.

This motion was agreed to without debate and without a division.

FRIDAY, December 1.

Two other members, to wit: from Virginia, EDWIN GRAY; and from North Carolina, MESHACK FRANKLIN; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress on their part; after several ballotings a majority of the votes were found in favor of JESSE LEE, who was therefore declared duly elected.

On motion of Mr. SMILIE, a committee was appointed to prepare and report standing rules and orders for the government of the House. The committee consists of Messrs. MACON, SMILIE, RHEA of Tennessee, SOUTHWARD, and SHAW.

Mr. W. ALSTON offered the following resolution, which being varied on the suggestion of Mr. POINDEXTER, so as to refer the subject to the Committee of Public Lands, was agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of confirming the right of the city of New Orleans to the Common of said city, including the ground occupied by the fortifications of the same, and also of vesting in the said city or in the Territory of Orleans the public and vacant lots of ground within the city aforesaid, on such conditions as may tend to the improvement and health of the city.

Mr. MORROW presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, stating that, in consequence of the restrictions under which the commerce of the United States at present labors, they are unable to complete their payments for lands purchased from the United States; and praying such revision and amendment of the laws providing for the sale of the public lands as is therein expressed. Also, expressing their "unequivocal and entire approbation of the administration of the General Government."—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A motion was made by Mr. MONTGOMERY, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the farther consideration of the Message from the President of the United States, and the accompanying documents: and the question being taken thereupon, it was determined in the negative.

NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. MACON said he wished early to call the attention of the House to two motions, the object of which he deemed to be very important. The first of them had been formerly submitted to the House by a gentleman from Georgia (Mr. EARLY,) but never acted on, and afterwards by a gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS;) the other had been presented by Mr. MACON himself at the last session, but at so late a period that it had not been acted on. It appeared to Mr. MACON that these motions, combined with one submitted at different times by a gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) would form something like a system. The object of the first motion he was about to submit, was to prohibit any foreign vessel from coming from any port or place to which the vessels of the United States could not go. Gentlemen would at once observe that there were many places whence vessels came to this country, to which we cannot go, and would perceive the extent of the motion. The other motion related to sea-letter vessels only. Mr. MACON said he wished to put them out of the nation, and to have no vessels belonging to the United States which were not perfectly American. He would have our vessels wholly American, or they should not at all partake of the character of American vessels.

After declaring that he considered his motions as calculated for permanent regulations, Mr. MACON submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the entry of any vessel into the United States from any port or place to which a vessel of the United States is not admitted by permanent regulation of the Government owning such port or place by treaty.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the registering anew of vessels built in the United States, which are owned in whole by citizens of the United States, any disability incurred by such vessel to the contrary notwithstanding; and also into the expediency of forbidding by law sea-letters or any custom house documents being granted to vessels not registered or licensed according to law, or not owned by citizens of the United States, within a limited time after the passing of such a law.

Mr. NEWTON having seconded these motions, Mr. MACON moved to refer them to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. DANA observed that these resolutions had in view merely an investigation by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures into the subject of them. On such a question it was but necessary to ask whether the subject be of itself interesting, and whether or not the proposition bears on the face of it so much of probability and propriety that there could be no objection to it on the score of its being utterly inadmissible. Unless, therefore, the propositions were utterly inadmissible, if they related to a subject interesting to the nation in time of peace as well as of war, if they had a connexion with one great branch of national policy, there could be no objection to have them investigated by a committee. Without expressing any opinion on the first proposition, which embraced a variety of important considerations, Mr. D. said that the motions were recommended to the House by their being founded on permanent principles, to which the nation may adhere in every alternative; and in addition to the attention due to them because they were of a permanent character and not merely temporary expedients, they might contribute to some of those measures of temporary policy deemed proper, and without a possibility of thwarting, might perhaps aid any project the Government might adopt. As to the second resolution, that he considered important in another point of view, as tending to encourage American manufactures. If there be any manufacture which requires great precision of science and experimental skill, any one which embraces more of the profound and elevated principles of science, and requires more dexterity in practical execution than any other, it is the constructing of ships. With these ideas, which Mr. DANA said were not applicable to the merits of the proposition, but to the question of reference, he should vote for referring them. He was extremely glad the motions had been brought forward, and particularly that they had been introduced by a gentleman so well qualified to sustain them, by his character and talents.

The motion for referring Mr. MACON'S propositions was carried.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. DANA said it would be recollected that at the last session he had proposed a resolution for the benefit of the seamen of the United States, which had been referred to a select committee, and a bill to that effect had been reported. But as the time to which Congress had thought proper to limit its session did not admit of a full discussion he had thought proper to press its consideration. It appeared to him that the proposition had some connexion with the subject of the motions of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON,) and also with the subject, recommended by the President, of guarding against abuses of the American flag by collusive prostitutions of it. If a vessel of the United States was to be considered as a "floating colony," he did not wish it to be a colony of foreigners.

Mr. DANA submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That for the benefit of seamen of the United States it is proper to make provision that registered ships or vessels, after a time to be limited by law, shall not continue to enjoy the benefits or privileges appertaining to ships or vessels of the United States, unless a certain proportion of the mariners on board the same shall be citizens of the United States.

This motion was also referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were instructed to report by bill or bills or otherwise on all three propositions.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion, by Mr. EPPES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EPPES offered eight resolutions, which being agreed to by the committee were reported to the House, and agreed to, as follows:

1. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as respects the relations of the United States with foreign nations, be referred to a select committee.

[The following gentlemen compose this committee: Messrs. MACON, FINDLEY, J. G. JACKSON, MOSELY, TAYLOR, WM. CHAMBERLIN, FISK, MCKEE and GANNETT.]

2. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to penalties involuntarily incurred by the infraction of the law prohibiting commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

3. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to abuses of the flag of the United States, by collusive prostitutions thereof, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

4. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the naval establishment of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

[The following gentlemen compose this committee: Messrs. BASSETT, QUINCY, JOHN BROWN, SAWYER, MILNOR, CRIST, and J. C. CHAMBERLAIN.]

5. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Military Establishment of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

6. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the organization of the militia of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

[The following gentlemen compose this committee: Messrs. TALLMADGE, CLAY, BUTLER, REA of Pennsylvania, WEAKLEY, HALE, TURNER.]

7. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the finances of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

8. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

[This committee is composed of the following gentlemen: Messrs. CLOPTON, JOHN PORTER, EMOTT, McKIM, GARDNER, McBRYDE, and WITHERSPOON.]

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Mr. POINDEXTER offered the following resolution:

Resolved That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the citizens of the county of Madison, in the Mississippi Territory, a Representative in the Assembly of that Territory.

Mr. TROUP moved to amend the motion by adding the following, in substance, which he afterwards consented to make the subject of a separate motion, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House of Representatives any information he may have touching any settlement contrary to law on the public lands of the United States, in the county of Madison, in the Mississippi Territory; by whom, to what extent, and what measures have been taken for their removal.

Both these resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER took occasion to observe, that the citizens of Madison county were not Yazoo settlers, as the gentleman from Georgia seemed to suppose, but persons who had become purchasers of public land, some of which had been sold at twenty and thirty dollars the acre, and a considerable sum of the purchase money of which had lately been paid into the Treasury.

MONDAY, December 4,

Several other members to wit: from Maryland, ALEXANDER MCKIM, from South Carolina, THOMAS KENAN, from South Carolina, ROBERT WITHERSPOON; from Kentucky, HENRY CRIST; and from Georgia, WILLIAM W. BIBB; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of Josiah H. Webb, praying such annual allowance as may be deemed adequate for his support, in consequence of a wound received from an unknown hand, while employed as a post rider in conveying the United States' mail between Athens and New Orleans, which has rendered him incapable of labor.—Referred to Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. G. SMITH, Mr. SWOOPS, and Mr. HUBBARD, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. REZA, of Tennessee, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, presented a bill to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

A motion was made by Mr. NICHOLAS, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision be made by law for a general national establishment of banks throughout the United States, and that the profits arising from the same, together with such surplusses of revenue as may accrue, be appropriated for the "general welfare," in the construction of public roads and canals, and the establishment of seminaries for education throughout the United States.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. FISK,

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for taking the third census of the inhabitants of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. FISK, Mr. PITKIN, Mr. BIBB, Mr. JONES, and Mr. WHITMAN, do prepare and bring in the same.

An engrossed bill to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITEHILL presented the petition of sundry citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the importation of foreign spirits distilled from grain may be prohibited, and that a higher duty be laid on the importation of spirits distilled from other substances.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. EPPES presented the memorial of Thomas Randolph, stating that JONATHAN JENNINGS, the sitting Delegate from the Indiana Territory, was not legally elected, and praying that his seat may be vacated, and a new election ordered.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

COMMITTEE OF MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SAWYER asked leave to lay upon the table the following resolution, of a nature similar to one which he had proposed at the last session, which, from the shortness of the session, he presumed, rather than from any unfriendly disposition, never had been acted on:

Resolved, That a standing committee be appointed, to be called the Committee of Manufactures, whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all such petitions, matters, and things, touching manufactures, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question and be referred to them by the House, and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon.

Mr. S. said it was certainly too much to expect any one committee to do justice to two such important subjects, becoming daily more so, as those of commerce and manufactures. He wished to have employed on the subject of manufactures the undivided energies of the best talents of the House; he hoped that all the rays of patriotism and genius in the House would be directed to this subject as to a focal point at which they should all converge. How could one committee properly attend to the mass of business before the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures?

The subjects confided to them could not be acted on, and yet important matters were continually dropping into this gulf of oblivion. This committee, however, did all that could be expected of them; he did not believe that any member of it was hostile to manufactures; he could answer for the chairman, (Mr. NEWTON,) whom he knew to be friendly to manufactures, both from precept and example. It was because it was impossible for the committee to attend to all the business before it, that he offered the resolution.

Mr. S.'s motion lies on the table one day, of course, according to the rules of the House.

VIOLETIONS OF NEUTRAL RIGHTS.

Mr. TROUP begged leave to submit to the consideration of the House several resolutions, which had for their object the vindication of the commercial rights of the United States against the belligerent nations of Europe. He submitted them at this time with less reluctance, because the introduction of them was in no wise inconsistent with the most friendly negotiation which might be pending with foreign Governments. It is high time, said Mr. T., in my opinion, that these commercial rights were either vindicated or abandoned. The remnant of commerce, which the joint operation of the belligerent decrees has left to us, is scarcely worth carrying on. To designate what this little is, would be no difficult matter, but it would be superfluous; every one who hears me understands it.

But, it would be well to inquire, on what principle the belligerents pretend to justify these commercial restrictions? The avowed principle is retaliation, but is it the true principle? Unquestionably not. And why? Because it is equally asserted by both belligerents. Both cannot be retaliators; one must be the aggressor, the other the retaliator. If this principle, then, be equally urged by both, who is to judge between them? If the alleged principle of retaliation be not the true one, what is? As respects France, the true principle of her decrees is to be sought in the policy of embarrassing England by excluding from the Continent British merchandise; and as to Great Britain, the principle of her Orders in Council may be found in the consideration of her interest and her power. She avowedly contends that it is her interest to engross the commerce of the world; that she has the power to engross it, and, therefore, she will engross it.

But, what are the principles more specifically asserted by Great Britain? First, the right of blockade by proclamation; second, the right to turn your vessels into her ports to pay duty and take out a license. This right of blockading by proclamation is not a right growing out of a state of war; it is no belligerent right; it is a pretension, as applicable to a state of peace as to a state of war, and if we submit to it in a state of war, we must submit to it in a state of peace. The only principle of blockade which we recognise is that which gives to belligerents a right to turn from ports so closely invested as to make the entry of them dangerous; and, after due warning, vessels bound to them. But the right, asserted by Great Britain to blockade by a piece of parchment or paper, issued from her Council Chamber, a port or ports, a kingdom or kingdoms, a continent or continents, is a right no more relative to a state of war than to a state of peace; and, if we submit to the pretension in a state of war, we must equally submit to it in a state of peace. It is founded on the most arbitrary tyranny, it goes to the annihilation of your commerce. As to the other right, of forcing our vessels into her ports, to pay duty and take out license, this is equally applicable to a state of peace as to a state of war. We acknowledge the right of Great Britain, or any other nation, to shut her ports against us, provided there be no treaty stipulation to the contrary. But the right of Great Britain or of France to shut the ports of any other nation against us is a right no more appertaining to a belligerent than to a neutral. If we submit to it in war, we must equally submit in peace; and this right, like the other, is founded in the most arbitrary tyranny. What right has Britain to tyrannize on the ocean, and prescribe limits to our trade? She will not permit to us a trade which she cannot herself enjoy; she prohibits to us a trade which our Government permits, because it is her interest to monopolize it. It is equally our interest to monopolize, and, therefore, if you please, sir, we will prohibit the trade which her Government permits, and which it is our interest to monopolize.

If Great Britain can rightly prohibit our trade, because it is her interest to prohibit it, have we not the right to prohibit her trade for the same reason? If she, with right and justice, can stop and seize, and confiscate our vessels because they attempt a trade which she forbids, and only because she forbids it, cannot our Government do the same in relation to her trade? If she can turn our vessels into her ports to pay duty and take out license, what prohibits us from doing the same as to her vessels? England is a nation, so are we. England is independent, so are we. What prohibits us from doing to England what England does to us? Unquestionably nothing. To say that we have no right to do to England what England does to us, is to acknowledge our own inferiority; it is to acknowledge that she may demand without limitation, and that we are under obligation to submit without limitation.

I am aware that it may be objected to the resolutions that the adoption of them would lead to hostility: but the same objection is equally applicable to any resolution which would go to the vindication of our commercial rights. They ought not to lead to hostility; they are merely retaliatory. They follow the spirit of the British Orders in Council and French decrees, and therefore cannot be complained of by either Power. There is a great and profitable commerce, and rapidly increasing, passing not indeed before our doors, but near enough to make the capture of vessels engaged in it convenient to us, which the resolutions have chiefly in view. I allude to the Brazil and Spanish Main trade.

Foreign Licenses.

H. OF R.

Is it not matter of surprise that a commerce so profitable, so extensive, and so convenient, should have been permitted to a Government which permits no commerce to us but what her convenience and her interest suggest? Is it not strange that we should have suffered that Government to participate in a commerce which both our interest and our convenience stimulate us to engross? But, above all, is it not inexplicable that we should passively have suffered the monopoly of it by her, when we ourselves were willing and able to engross it? The House will perceive, on the face of the resolutions, that, as they regard France, they are equivalent to a war measure—neither by a war measure, nor by that which I have the honor to submit, can we come in contact with France; she has no commerce on the ocean. In relation to England it is short, infinitely short, of war; because by war her Continental Colonies would fall; her West India Islands would be distressed, and our privateers would cut up her commerce; but the resolutions propose merely to retort the evils of her own injustice, to do to her what, and no more than what, she has done to us. Reserving for another occasion any further remarks, I beg leave to read the resolutions to the House.

Mr. T. then read the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the President by law to instruct the commanders of the armed vessels of the United States to stop and bring into the ports of the same all ships or vessels with their cargoes, the property of the subjects of the King of Great Britain and of the Emperor of France, bound to ports other than those within the dominions or colonies of either.

Resolved, That it is expedient further to authorize by law the detention of all ships or vessels, with their cargoes, the property of the subjects of the King of Great Britain until the duties to be regulated and ascertained by law shall be first levied and collected upon the goods and merchandise whereof the said ships or vessels shall be laden, and until the said ships or vessels shall have received due license to depart.

Resolved, That it is expedient further to authorize by law the detention of all ships or vessels, with their cargoes, the property of the subjects of the Emperor of France, brought within the ports of the United States, there to abide the final decision or order of the Government in relation to the same.

Resolved, That an ad valorem duty of — be levied and collected on all the goods, wares, or merchandise, of British product or manufacture.

Resolved, That it is expedient further to authorize the President, on payment of the duties authorized to be levied and collected on the goods laden on board vessels the property of the subjects of the King of Great Britain, forthwith to grant a license to such vessels to depart and to proceed to the port of original destination without further hindrance or molestation.

The House having agreed to consider these resolutions—

On motion of Mr. TROUP, they were ordered to lie on the table, as he stated, to give every member the same time to consider them as he had himself taken.

TUESDAY, December 5.

Two other members, to wit: from Maryland, JOHN CAMPBELL; and from Georgia, DENNIS SMELT; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of the Navy, containing statements from that Department, referred to in his Message of the 29th ultimo.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Ordered, That the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two statements of the importations in American and foreign vessels, commencing the first of October, 1806, and ending the thirtieth of September, 1807, be referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. POINDEXTER reported a bill supplemental to the act "extending the right of suffrage in Indiana Territory and for other purposes," which was twice read, and referred.

[This bill proposes to give to the Governor of the Territory of Indiana, for the time being, power to apportion the Representatives of the Territory, in order to form a Legislature, of which the Territory is now deprived by the peculiar operation of the law for dividing it.]

FOREIGN LICENSES.

Mr. McKIM, after some remarks going to show that no subject more imperiously demanded the attention of the Legislature than the practice pursued by some Americans, of trading under foreign licenses, submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie for consideration.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law vessels owned by citizens of the United States from trading under the licenses or permissions of any foreign Prince or State, to any port or place not under the dominion of such foreign Prince or State, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

WEDNESDAY, December 6.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. McKIM, and the same being modified, was, upon the question put thereon, agreed to by the House, to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, vessels owned by citizens of the United States from trading under the license or permission of any foreign Prince or State, to any port or place not under the dominion of such foreign Prince or State; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FINDLEY presented a petition of Joseph Joshua Dyster, praying that an act may be passed to authorize the Secretary of State immediately to grant him the patent right to a new principle for erecting iron bridges, which patent right cannot as yet be vested in the petitioner, because, as he states, he is not a citizen of the United States.—Referred to Messrs. FINDLEY, LEWIS, KNICKERBACKER, FRANKLIN, and BLAISDELL, with instruction to examine and report their opinion thereon to the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the committee of the Baptist church at Salem Meeting House, in the Mississippi Territory, praying that the pre-emption right to a small piece of land upon which they have erected their said meeting-house, may be secured to the said church—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that they had chosen the Rev. O. B. BROWN their Chaplain.

Mr. LOVE presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Potomac Navigation Company, praying to be allowed to raise a sum of money by way of lottery for the use of the said company; which was referred to the Committee of the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the consideration of the Message and documents yesterday received from the President of the United States, and they were referred to the Committee on the Naval Establishment.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, yesterday reported, supplemental to the act extending the right of suffrage in the Territory of Indiana and for other purposes. The bill passed through the committee, and was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MORROW offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for issuing and locating United States military land warrants, and also the propriety of extending the time for completing the locations of land warrants in the Virginia military tract, and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. NELSON said he had, at a former session, had the honor to submit a motion which had for its object the relief of the infirm and disabled soldiers of the United States. He now again submitted it, deeming it unnecessary to enlarge upon the subject, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late Revolutionary Army, and of the present Army of the United States; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to, and the following gentlemen appointed a committee accordingly: Messrs. NELSON, HUFTY, TALLMADGE, CLAY, and DESEA.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of a number of the inhabitants of the district east of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, praying for a division of the Territory, which he moved to refer to a select committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER objected to the reference, and stated that, in addition to other forcible considerations, the Legislature of the Territory, since the petition was presented to Congress at the last session, had unanimously passed a resolution, which he read, "that they view with the most marked disapprobation the object and views of the said petitioners, and that the Speaker forward a copy of this resolution to the Secretary of State of the United States, and another to our delegate in Congress, requesting him to use his best exertions to prevent the prayer of the petitioners being granted." Mr. P. said that, at the last session, the petition was ordered to lie on the table; he wished to give it the same direction now. By a reference to the articles of cession and agreement between the United States and Georgia, it was expressly provided that the Territory was to form one State. These articles could not be altered without the consent of the three contracting parties, the United States, Georgia, and the Mississippi Territory. If it were lawful for Congress to divide it in one point, they might divide it ad infinitum, and forever prevent any part of it from being admitted to the rank of a State in the Union. The United States had stipulated with Georgia that the Territory should be indivisible, and should become a State so soon as it had attained a population of 60,000 souls. If Congress were to grant the prayer of these persons, feeble as they are shown to be by an unanimous vote of the Legislature of the Territory, including their own Representatives, they would do what the Constitution forbids; they would form a small county, containing five or six thousand souls, into a separate Territorial government, at an enormous expense, and in contravention of an express stipulation with the State of Georgia. It was true that all petitions should take the ordinary course of reference to a committee; but when a petition was presented praying for the violation of the Constitution, or of an express contract, it ought not to be referred.

Mr. MILLER said he had not the pleasure of an acquaintance with the petitioners, and therefore could not say what character they bore, or how their petition might be affected by it; but in the petition itself, he saw nothing to prevent its taking the usual course of all petitions. If it were true (and he did not dispute the fact) that no division of the Territory could take place without the consent of Georgia and of the Mississippi Territory, he could see no objection to the present application, because an application for an alteration of the compact, to which the consent of three parties is necessary, must originate with one of them. If they were to apply first to the State of Georgia for a division of the Territory, they would refuse to meddle with it, because the consent of three parties was necessary; if they applied to the Mississippi Territory, they would receive the same answer; and for this reason the question would never be got at. He did not believe that the existence of such articles as those mentioned by the gentleman from Mississippi Territory was a conclusive argument against re-fering the petition, because if the three parties should consent, the Territory might be divided, notwithstanding their existence.

Mr. GORNOY said he knew nothing of the merits of the petition; but, from its contents, the arguments it offered appeared strongly in favor of a reference of it. The petitioners state that they are debarred from the comforts of civil society; that they have not even a regular judiciary. These petitioners, he said, had no Representative on the floor but the gentleman from the Territory, (Mr. POINDEXTER,) who wished to refuse a reference of their petition. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him peculiarly proper that the petitioners should have their prayer considered by the proper organ of the House. It would be much more satisfactory to them to have their petition referred than to see it treated with contempt.

Mr. MACON hoped, without declaring whether or not he would vote for a division of the Territory, that the petition would be referred. These petitioners had been, for several sessions, urging the consideration of this subject by the House. Was it in the nature of men to be satisfied, when petition after petition, sent by them, was laid on the table? The House did not indeed reject the petitions, but it would not consider them. Last session, a similar petition, presented through the Speaker of the House, had been ordered to lie on the table. What would be the consequence of giving the same course to this petition? The petitioners would come again. Mr. M. thought the petition had better be referred. A reference of the petition was a question very different from that of a division of the Territory. The people say that they are oppressed. Let us inquire into it. It may turn out that they are merely dissatisfied, and wish for a change; or it may prove to be as they state. The right of petition is merely nominal, if petitions are to be laid on the table and never considered.

Mr. SMILIE was of the same opinion with Mr. MACON. The law might be as stated by the gentleman from the Mississippi Territory, but every one could not be supposed to be as well acquainted with it as that gentleman was, and time ought to be allowed for a thorough examination into it.

Mr. POINDEXTER said it was not from any desire to stifle the consideration of the subject, but in conformity with the former proceedings of the House in this case, that he wished the petition to lie on the table. He was certain that the House had sanctioned the doctrine, where a petition was presented for an object manifestly derogatory to the Constitution and to existing contracts, of refusing to refer it, even although upon subjects then immediately before the House. Would it not be much more proper to refuse to refer a petition praying for a manifest violation of the Constitution than to refer it? That granting the prayer of the petition would violate a solemn compact, he said he could show by a reference to the articles of cession and agreement. If so, why take into consideration that on which Congress could not act? They might as well refer a petition from a State for a recession from the Union, or for an exemption from the penal laws of the United States. If the petition should be referred, he should be content; he had done his duty in opposing its reference; he was confident that no committee of the House could be selected that would make a report in favor of the prayer of the petitioners, especially when they saw such a resolution passed by the Legislature of the Territory at the express instance of their own Representatives.

Mr. UPHAM expressed himself in favor of referring the petition, as he conceived he did not sufficiently understand the subject to vote at once to reject the prayer of the petition.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said he had been sorry to hear any observations going to place the petitioners in a contemptuous point of view. If it were in the power of the House to relieve the petitioners, relief ought to be extended to them. He, therefore, wished the petition referred, and hoped the committee would report at large on the subject.

The motion for reference was agreed to; and the following gentlemen appointed a committee accordingly: Messrs. MILLER, BIBB, QUINCY, BROCKENRIDGE, LYLE, NICHOLSON, and CAMPBELL.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. WHITMAN presented the petition of a number of the inhabitants of Portland, Maine, praying for the establishment of an uniform system of bankruptcy; which he moved to refer to a select committee.

Mr. NEWTON moved to refer it to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. PITKIN wished the petition rather to lie on the table than go to a Committee of the Whole. He was himself totally opposed to the object of the petition. Nothing would ensue from its reference to a Committee of the Whole, as such a committee could originate no proposition on the subject; reference of subjects to such committees being merely intended to afford an opportunity for a more free discussion of their principles.

Mr. SMILIE said we had already had one bankrupt law, and had got rid of it. He believed every honest man abhorred the system. He was clearly and decidedly against touching the subject at all.

Mr. NEWTON agreed with the gentlemen from Connecticut and Pennsylvania, that we have already had enough of bankrupt laws, and unequivocal experience of their bad effects too. He wished the petition to go to a Committee of the Whole, because when it once got there, there could be no hopes of its resurrection. The reference to that committee would be pronouncing its funeral oration, and dismissing it honorably.

Mr. PITKIN observed that he had always understood that a reference of a motion to a Committee of the Whole was for the purpose of discussion, and not for the purpose of getting rid of it. He wished it to lie on the table. If any motion were made on the subject of a system of bankruptcy. this petition could be referred to the same committee to whom it should be referred.

Mr. WHITMAN said he was not satisfied that the subject ought not to be referred to a select committee. The petitioners respectfully prayed a consideration of the subject, and it was a respect due to them to refer their petition. Mr. W. said that the object of a reference to a select committee was, to collect information on the subject, to be submitted to the House. He was of opinion that if such information was before the House on this occasion, the minds of members would be very differently affected on the question. At present the different States had different bankrupt laws; the citizens of one State did not know what were the insolvent laws of another State, and thus, unavoidably, much difficulty arose. For this difficulty a remedy might possibly be found on a mature consideration of the subject.

Mr. WILSON said, that if the petition prayed for a particular benefit to the petitioners, it might be proper to refer it for inquiry; but when they prayed for a general law, to which almost all appeared opposed, he could not see the propriety of referring it. For his part, his mind was made up against it; and if every gentleman was in the same situation, he could not see why it should be committed.

Mr. UPHAM spoke in disapprobation of a general bankrupt system, but in favor of a reference of the petition.

On the question of referring the petition to a Committee of the Whole, there were but 18 ayes. On the question of referring it to a select committee there were but 23 ayes. So the question was lost.

The petition lies on the table, of course.

DANISH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. WHITMAN offered, for the consideration of the House, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such information as he may have received and may deem proper to be communicated respecting seizures, captures, and condemnations, of the ships and merchandise of the citizens of the United States, under the authority of the Government of Denmark and its dependencies.

Mr. NEWTON hoped that the terms of the resolution, if it were to be passed, would be extended so far as to embrace also "Great Britain and France," and made a motion for that purpose.

Mr. WHITMAN said that his object was to obtain information on this subject; that Congress might be enabled as speedily as possible to adopt some mode of liberating our vessels, now detained from the difficulties of the situation in which they are placed. He had understood that a great number of our citizens were in a situation which required immediate relief. It had been suggested to him, that if proper measures were taken with regard to the property detained in Norway, it might be recovered; and that, if such measures were not taken, it might be wholly lost, or in a great measure destroyed. With this view of obtaining information, he had offered the resolution, and hoped that it would pass in its present form.

Mr. NEWTON thought it important that an extensive view of this subject should be taken, and that all the information attainable should be procured. Although Denmark had done us injury, the two nations which he had mentioned had done us infinitely more. If the House took any view of the subject, he wished them to have the iniquities of all nations before them.

Mr. PIRKIN said he had no objection to the addition of the words moved by the gentleman from Virginia, but he thought the House ought not to send so general a resolution to the President with respect to the two last Powers, because their vexation of our commerce having commenced from fifteen to twenty years back, it might give the President some trouble to lay before the House all the information accumulated in that time. He, therefore, thought some limitation ought to be fixed as to the time which the motion should embrace.

Mr. NEWTON presumed that, of course, the President would go no further back than to the last communications made by the Executive on the subject.

The amendment moved by Mr. NEWTON to add "Great Britain and France," was adopted—51 to 45.

Mr. TROUP said he could not conceive the object of the original resolution. He hoped it had no allusion to indemnity for spoliations. After merchants had compelled the repeal of a salutary measure, and sent their vessels to sea in the face of the most manifest danger, it would be extraordinary indeed if they were to call upon Congress for indemnity.

Mr. MACON was of opinion, if the information was called for, that some limitation of time ought to be expressed in the resolution, though for himself he did not want the information as to Great Britain and France. Your tables have, from time to time, been loaded with the nefarious proceedings of those two Governments. As to the idea of the gentleman from Georgia, whether such a consideration is to grow out of the subject or not, I consider a question totally different from the present. The object of the present motion, as I understand it, is to get information officially of the captures by Denmark of our vessels; and I am decidedly in favor of it. Nor have I any objection to hear more of the doings of Great Britain and France, though I think every man in the nation has seen enough of them.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the resolution was further amended by adding to the end of it the words "not heretofore communicated to Congress."

And, after being thus amended, Mr. WHITMAN's motion passed without opposition; and Messrs. WHITMAN and KENAN were appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States with the said resolution.

And, on motion, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

H. OF R.

THURSDAY, December 7.

Another member, to wit: from New York, URI TRACY, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom were referred the petitions of Charlotte Hazen, of John Fulton, and of Thomas Ayres, Benjamin Reynolds, William Fulton, and Robert Sharp, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the act, entitled "An act for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," approved on the seventh of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, ought to be revived and continued in force for a limited time: Provided, That no claimant under said act shall be entitled to receive a grant for any such lands until he produces satisfactory evidence that he is a resident within the United States.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee on the Public Lands do prepare and bring in the same.

An engrossed bill supplemental to an act, entitled "An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes;" was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment; and the same being read at the Clerk's table, was agreed to.

Mr. POYDRAS presented a representation of the Mayor, Aldermen, and citizens, of the city of New Orleans, containing a statement of facts and an exposition of the title of the United States to the parcel of ground called the Batture, in front of the suburb St. Mary, and adjoining to the said city of New Orleans.

Mr. POYDRAS also presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of New Orleans, praying that the title to the Batture aforesaid may be retained in the United States, and that it may remain open and unbuilt upon forever, and be used as a common, for the convenience and benefit of the public in general.

Ordered, That the said representation and petition be severally referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending jurisdiction to the Superior Courts of the several Territories of the United States, in which a District Court has not been established, for the trial of treason and other offences against the laws of the United States, committed within the limits of said Territories, and to empower said Courts to pronounce such judgments, or sentence, on conviction of the offender or offenders, as the law directs; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. BIBB, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, Mr. RICHARDS, and Mr. STURGES, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. SEYBERT observed, that on the fifth day of December, 1791, the original report of the Secretary of the Treasury, (General Alexander Hamilton,) on the subject of manufactures, was ordered to lie on the table. He said it was a document which contained much important matter, and did honor to its author. He conceived it might be made the basis on which an important superstructure might be raised. He therefore moved that it should be printed for the use of the members of the House.—Agreed to.

CHALLENGES, DUELS, &c.

Mr. BACON said he held in his hands three propositions which he deemed it his duty to submit to the House. They were not for the regulation of the great concerns with foreign nations, but for the necessary object of regulating themselves. It would be seen that these resolutions had not grown out of any personal considerations, nor out of any particular case, but out of the serious evils to which the House had been exposed by the want of such regulations from the commencement of the Government. In 1796, the evil had risen to such a height that the House had unequivocally expressed its opinion on it.* Mr. B. said he felt it his duty to express his sense on the subject by laying the resolutions on the table, and more particularly as he understood that the subject was now agitated in the committee appointed to draught rules and orders for the government of the House. He would merely remark that the resolutions might not be correct in form, or they might be altogether erroneous in principle. He was not anxious as to the particular form; but he was decidedly in favor of the general object, and wished to take the sense of the House upon it. For himself he was well prepared to act on them; but for the convenience of others he wished them to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the committee appointed to report on the rules and orders for the government of the House, do report a rule declaring, "That if any member, in the course of debate, shall make use of opprobrious or vilifying language with respect to any member, or call into question the integrity of his motives, or those of either branch of the Government in relation to the discharge of his official duties, except on a motion for impeachment, or for other interposition of the constitutional powers of this House—or apply to either indecorous or reproachful expressions—it shall be deemed a breach of the orders of the House."

That said committee be instructed further to report a rule declaring, "That if any member, during the session of Congress, whether of the House or not, shall give or send to any other member during his actual attendance at the seat of Government, a challenge to fight a duel, or if the member so challenged shall accept the same, it shall be deemed a breach of the privileges of the House, as well on the part of such members as on that of any other person whether a member or not, who shall be aiding, abetting, or assisting in giving or sending such challenge, or in carrying the same into effect, and every such member shall be held liable to be expelled from the House therefor."

That said committee be further instructed to report a rule declaring, "That if any person, during the session of Congress, whether a member of the House or not, shall commit personal violence or assault upon any member during his actual attendance at the seat of Government, it shall be deemed a breach of the privileges of the House, as well on the part of the person so assaulting, as on that of any other person who shall be aiding, abetting, or assisting therein, and such person, if a member, shall be held liable to be punished therefor, at the discretion of the House."

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MACON observed, that the committee appointed to draught rules and regulations for the government of the House would sit on Saturday.

Mr. BACON then said he should call for the consideration of his motion to-morrow.

ABOLITION OF DRAWBACKS, &c.

Mr. VAN HORN said, that on Friday last a gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) had moved several resolutions, and in the course of his observations had mentioned a wish, if he had been correctly understood, to adopt something like a navigation act for the United States. Mr. V. H. said he accorded cheerfully in that idea. It was time that their attention was turned to the powers which the Constitution had given to Congress, and that they no longer suffered the time and patience of the nation to be exhausted in treating about treaty-making; for, as to making a treaty by which commerce could be regulated whilst the war continued, he had no expectation of it. He thought something must be done by Congress which should go to aid the commercial as well as agricultural interest of the country. When he spoke of the commercial interest, he meant that connected with the agricultural interest, and not that which grew out of the war in Europe, and which our merchants would wholly lose in time of peace. He had five resolutions to present, of which he would briefly state the substance. The first, he said, went to give to the shipping of the United States the exclusive exportation of articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States. The second, proposed to confine American shipping to the exportation of articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States. The third, by laying a discriminating duty, would give to American traders an advantage over foreign merchants in supplying us with such foreign articles as should be necessary for our consumption. The fifth went to repeal or modify the laws respecting drawbacks. That these laws were very deficient every one must believe who reflected that the same drawback was allowed on all foreign articles exported, of whatever description, whether such as were manufactured or grown in the United States or otherwise. Without further remarks he offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the exportation from ports or places, under the jurisdiction of the United States, of any article, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, except in ships or vessels owned and wholly navigated by citizens of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the exportation from ports or places, under the jurisdiction of the United States, in ships or vessels belonging to the United States, of any article which is not of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying an additional discriminating duty in favor of ships owned and wholly navigated by citizens of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting American ships and vessels from carrying articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of any foreign country from any foreign port or place to another foreign port or place.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying or repealing the laws allowing drawback.

Mr. SMILIE wished these resolutions to lie on the table and be printed. He suggested to the gentleman the propriety of committing them to the Committee of Foreign Relations, instead of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. If it was the opinion of the former committee that the nation is not now to take a hostile attitude, he had no doubt that the very subject embraced by these resolutions would be the object of its consideration.

Mr. VAN HORN said he had no choice as to what committee they should go to; indeed, he would almost prefer any other committee than the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures; and yet he had a high opinion of the gentlemen composing the committee; but, as they came generally from commercial towns, they might not be prepossessed in favor of the propositions, because it was usual and natural for gentlemen concerned in mercantile transactions to believe that almost the whole world depended on them.

Mr. NEWTON suggested the propriety of an early disposition of the resolutions, that whatever committee they were referred to might have them immediately under consideration.

The resolutions were ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, December 8.

Two other members, to wit: from Maryland, PHILIP B. KEY, and from Virginia, DANIEL SHUFPEY, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report of the state of the finances of the United States, prepared in obedience to "An act to establish the Treasury Department;" which were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HELMS presented a petition of Harry Caldwell, of the town of Jersey, State of New Jersey, and Amasa Jackson, of the city of New York, merchants, trading under the firm of Harry Caldwell and Company, stating, that, during the last Summer, their brig, called the Joseph Bickerton, brought into the port of New Orleans three French families with their negro slaves, who had been forcibly expelled from the island of Cuba, which has subjected the said brig to condemnation for a violation of an act which prohibits the importation of slaves into the United States and their Territories; and praying such relief in the premises as shall appear just and proper.—Referred to Mr. HELMS, Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. SMELT, Mr. KENAN, and Mr. RICHARD JACKSON, with instruction to examine and report their opinion thereon to the House.

On motion of Mr. LOVE, the petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, presented on the 26th May, 1809, was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances attending the occurrence alluded to in the letter of Mr. I. A. Coles to the Speaker of this House; that the said committee be instructed to report a statement of the facts, with their opinion thereon, to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. GOODWYN, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. SMILIE, Mr. PITKIN, Mr. TAGGART, and Mr. MATTHEWS, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That the letter from I. A. Coles to the Speaker, laid before the House on the 30th ultimo, be referred to the committee last mentioned.

A motion was made by Mr. SAWYER, that the House do proceed to the consideration of a resolution proposed by him on the 4th instant, for the appointment of a standing Committee on Manufactures; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

MONDAY, December 11.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, WILLIAM STEDMAN and EDWARD ST. LOE LIVERMORE; from New York, BARENT GARDENIER; and from Pennsylvania, JOHN ROSS; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from WILSON C. NICHOLAS, resigning his seat as one of the members of the House, for the State of Virginia. The letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

11th Con. 2d Sess.—23

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill to revive an act, entitled "An act for the relief of the refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. BACON,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring whether any, and what, alterations or amendments are necessary to be made in the act, entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose; and that said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. BACON, Mr. KENAN, Mr. GOLD, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, and Mr. SEYBERT, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the relief contained in the provisions of the act, entitled "An act for the remission of certain penalties and forfeitures, and for other purposes," passed the 28th June, 1809, to cases where the introduction into the United States of slaves forcibly expelled from the island of Cuba, with the French inhabitants thereof, has been from places other than the island of Cuba;" and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

A motion was made by Mr. MILLER, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act passed at the second session of the tenth Congress, entitled "An act to prevent settlements being made on the lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law," ought to be repealed.

The said resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution, in the form of a concurrent resolution, respecting our foreign relations; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The resolution was read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

CHALLENGES, DUELS, &c.

On motion of Mr. BACON, the House proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by him on the 7th instant, in relation to indecorous language in debate, and to the practice of duelling; when the second and third of the said resolutions were modified by the mover to read as follows:

Resolved, That said committee be instructed further to report a rule, declaring "that if, during the session of Congress, any member of the House shall give or send, to any other member during his actual attendance at the seat of Government, a challenge to fight a duel, or if the member so challenged shall accept the same, it shall be deemed a breach of the privileges of the House, as well on the part of such members as on that of any other member who shall be aiding, abetting, or assisting, in giving or sending such challenge, or in carrying the same into effect; and every such member shall be held liable to be expelled from the House therefor."

Resolved, That said committee be further instructed to report a rule, declaring "that if, during the session of Congress, any member of the House shall commit personal violence upon, or assault, any other member during his actual attendance at the seat of Government, it shall be deemed a breach of the privileges of the House, as well on the part of the member so assaulting as on that of any other member who shall be aiding, abetting, or assisting therein; and such member shall be held liable to be punished therefor, at the discretion of the House."

The resolutions, as modified, were then referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

BATTURE AT NEW ORLEANS.

A motion was made by Mr. SHEFFEY, that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to authorize the President of the United States to cause the several persons who were removed from the batture, in front of the suburb St. Mary, in the city of New Orleans, on the 25th January, 1808, to be restored to the possession thereof; to be held with the same right with which they respectively held the same, prior to such removal; anything to the contrary notwithstanding.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the President of the United States, if he shall be of opinion that the United States have such a claim to the batture, in front of the suburb of St. Mary, in the city of New Orleans, as will justify the expense of prosecuting the same, with the assent of the persons removed therefrom, on the 25th January, 1808, to name three persons, who shall have full power to hear, and finally determine, all right, title, claim, and demand, whatsoever, as well of the United States as the persons so removed, both in law and equity; and their decision, or a majority of them, shall be binding, as well on the United States as the said parties."

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the President of the United States, if he shall deem it most proper, to compromise the conflicting claims of the United States and the persons removed from the batture of the suburb of St. Mary, in the city of New Orleans, or cause the same to be tried in a court of the United States, in such manner, and at such place, as will secure an impartial trial.

The said resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MR. JACKSON'S CIRCULAR.

Mr. QUINCY observed that he perceived that in the letter from Mr. Smith to Mr. Pinkney accompanying the Message from the President of the United States of the 29th November, 1809, an allusion was made to an important paper headed "Circular," which had not been communicated to Congress. He perceived, also, that by the resolution just received from the Senate, a specific declaration was required as to the contents of that very paper. It appeared to him extremely proper that the House should have that paper on its files, and within the reach of its members, before a declaration was made respecting it. Under this impression he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House a copy of a paper purporting to be a circular letter from Mr. Jackson to the British Consuls in the United States, referred to in the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney, accompanying the Message of the 29th November.

Mr. DANA observed that there was another document which it might be of some importance to have on the file of the House, and which it might be also necessary to consult—that was, the despatch from Mr. Canning, which it appeared was sent by Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State. He moved to add that paper to the resolution.

Mr. QUINCY accepted the amendment as a part of his resolution.

Mr. W. ALSTON objected to the first part of the motion. He said the House must see the impropriety of calling on the Executive for a document of which it could not have an official copy; for, no doubt, the copy sent to Mr. Pinkney was cut out of a newspaper, and such a one only could be sent to the House. He had no objection to calling for that asked for by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) although the material parts of it were often quoted in the documents before Congress.

Mr. QUINCY said it was not his intention to call for what was not in the Secretary of State's office. The paper which he wanted was a copy of that paper transmitted across the Atlantic by the Secretary of State, as appeared by his letter to Mr. Pinkney. The gentleman might have seen Mr. Jackson's circular letter; he, Mr. Q., had not seen it; he had not been fortunate enough to obtain a copy of it. It must be in the office of the Secretary of State, for it was utterly impossible for it to have been sent to our Minister in London, without also retaining a copy in the office of the Secretary of State.

Mr. SMILIE said he would not oppose a call for any information that should be deemed proper; but he did not know upon what ground the House would call upon the President for this paper, which had not been addressed to the President, but to the British Consuls in the United States. It could not be officially in the possession of the Secretary of State, who, he presumed, had seen it in the papers, as every one else had. Mr. S. said he accidentally held in his hand a New Hampshire paper containing it, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts was desirous of perusing it, it was at his service.

Mr. EPPES asked for a division of the question. He said he was willing to call for any paper which was, or might be presumed to be in possession of the Department of State; but it could not be presumed that the circular of Mr. Jackson was in that office in any other form than that referred to in Mr. Smith's letter, viz: in a printed form. Certain it was that it could not be in the Department of State, because it was dated subsequently to the intimation that no further communication would be received from that source by the Secretary of State. The only reason, he presumed, why the other paper alluded to had not been communicated to Congress, was, that it was a printed paper, purporting to be a despatch from Mr. Canning. He had no further objection to the call for either of these papers, other than it was neither decorous or proper to call upon the President for that which could not be officially in his possession.

Mr. GARDNER observed that, in addition to other forcible considerations, it would be treating the Executive rudely, when he had called their attention to a particular paper, to go to any other source to procure it; besides that, in the latter case, a spurious copy might be imposed upon the House. If the President referred to a certain document as justifying his conduct, by procuring that document the House would have the whole ground before it. What would be the situation of the House, if, pursuing the ideas of some gentlemen, every member was to bring forward a document which he believed to be the legitimate one, and all these copies should differ? Who was to decide which was the correct one? If the House were to act at all on this subject, it was not only respectful and just to the President, but extremely civil, to inquire of him on what ground he has acted. As a true American, and staunch republican, Mr. G. was desirous to give the President every opportunity of doing himself justice.

Mr. QUINCY said that a copy of this circular having been forwarded to our Minister in England, a copy must remain on the files of the Secretary of State's office; and, therefore, he asked for it merely that the House might have on this occasion precisely that information which the Secretary of State had communicated to Mr. Pinkney.

Mr. POTTER cited as a reason why Mr. QUINCY's motion should be agreed to, that between the copy of Mr. Champagny's letter to our Minister in France as it appeared in the public prints, and as since communicated to Congress, there was a material variation. If in that case there was a variance between different copies, it was equally probable that there should be a variance in the different copies of Mr. Jackson's circular.

The question was taken on the first part of the resolution, viz: on that part moved by Mr. QUINCY, and finally carried—yeas 53, nays 52.

The question was then taken on Mr. DANA's amendment, viz: on that part calling for a copy of the paper purporting to be a despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, and carried without opposition.

Mr. WHITMAN offered an amendment understood to be intended to embrace in the papers to be called for, the note from Mr. Erskine to Mr. Smith containing the "three conditions" which are admitted in Mr. Smith's letter of October 19, to have been submitted to him by Mr. Erskine.

On the suggestion of Mr. QUINCY, this motion was declared to be out of order, as it was now too late to receive an amendment to the resolution, both clauses of it having been affirmed by the House.

The question was then put on the whole resolution, as amended, and the yeas and nays being demanded on its passage,

Mr. RHEA said he should vote against the resolution, as by passing it the House could add nothing to its stock of information, nor receive any official document; in both cases it could receive only a printed paper.

Mr. SMITH said he had no objection to one part of the resolution—that which called for a copy of the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine—but connected with the other paper, he could not agree to it, for it would be the most extraordinary call he had ever witnessed since he had held a seat in Congress. What! said he, shall we call upon the Executive to send to us a paper which is not, never was, and could not be officially in its possession? It is known to every member of the House that the Secretary of State cannot have in his possession any other copy of this paper than such as is in the hands of every member in the House and of every man out of doors. I should think, sir, when we consider the nature of the paper alluded to, that there is nothing in it which would create any prejudice in its favor in the mind of any American in heart, if brought into this House. What is this paper? It is an appeal to the people of the United States. I for one shall not be guilty of the absurdity of calling for a paper which I know is not in the possession of the President any more than it is in mine. For the latter part of the motion, if distinct from the first, I would gladly vote.

Mr. WHEATON said that he was in favor of both branches of the resolution, taken together. There seemed to be a difficulty with some gentlemen with respect to the first branch of it, and it seemed to be contended that the paper there alluded to, being published in newspapers only, ought not to be noticed. In reply to this, it might be observed that the Secretary of State had thought proper to notice it in his correspondence with our Minister in London, and it was, therefore, before the House. The House was not called upon to act upon a paper which might be variously published in various prints, but on a paper such as the Secretary of State had thought proper to transmit to our Minister, in London. Mr. W. said he therefore wanted not to know what had appeared in the newspapers, but what had been forwarded to our Minister in London. To obtain this, an application to the President was the proper mode, and he could not see why there should be any objection to its being exhibited.

Mr. TROUP said he had voted in favor of the latter part of this resolution, and against the first; and he must now be compelled to vote against both combined. He deemed the object of the resolution to be improper, because on the face of it it appeared that the paper asked for was an official letter. If procuring a copy of it from the Secretary of State would establish its authen-tiety, there could be no objection to the call. But the communicating or withholding would not stamp authenticity on it, because it was a document of which the Department of State could not have an official copy.

Mr. MACON said he did not attach so much consequence to this motion as either its advocates or opponents appeared to do. The object was to get a paper which had been published in all the newspapers of the United States—Mr. Jackson's Circular, which it was clear could not be sent to the House in an official form, because it was not addressed to any department, but to the British Consuls. The other paper asked for was a document with the substance of which every one was acquainted. Without inquiring what was the object of the call, if any gentlemen wanted a copy of any paper in the Department of State, he would never object to gratify them. It had been said that the House should not call for it, because it was addressed to the British Consuls; but, Mr. M. said, it was known to have been written by Mr. Jackson, because if it had not it would have been long ago denied. It was called an appeal to the people; so was Genet's—but Mr. M. said, he had never cared anything about these appeals—he should not care if Mr. Jackson should make another, because he had no apprehension of any effect such things could have in this country. It could not be positively ascertained whether or not the letter in question was written by Mr. Jackson, but by calling on the printers; and he had no idea of meddling with them—he only claimed the privilege of believing what he pleased of their publications. Mr. M. was in favor of the resolution, because other gentlemen wished the papers for their information.

Mr. QUINCY said that the importance of this resolution lay in this; that the House was called upon (by the resolution from the Senate) to decide on the contents of a paper the existence of which was first made known to them by communications from the Executive. When called upon in this way, was it not a duty the House owed to itself to ask for the papers on which it was to express an opinion? The House would not do justice to itself if it did not ask for them after the intimation they had received that they were in possession of the Secretary of State.

Mr. UPHAM thought it necessary to have the very paper that was communicated by our Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney. He recollected very well that on his journey to this city, he saw in two papers in New York this very circular represented in two different ways.

Mr. GARDENIER remarked that he took it for granted, that the more carefully the House proceeded, the more fully it possessed itself of all the documents on the subject on which they were about to legislate, the more impressive upon their own country and upon the world, to whom in part the resolution appeared intended to be addressed, would their decision be. The determination to be made should appear not to result from passion, but from a deliberation and coolness worthy the representatives of a great nation. He professed sincerely that upon the subject of the resolution from the Senate he had formed no opinion, neither should he vote for the present motion, because he inclined to one side or other on the former. He wished to possess himself of all the facts on the subject. It appeared that a copy of this circular had been forwarded to our Minister in London, in order to guide him in his conduct, Mr. G. presumed. We, said Mr. G., are called upon to act here on the subject; our Minister at London is directed to act there. If he has a right, to enable him to discharge his duty, to have a copy of this paper communicated to him, shall we not also have the same privilege? The question, he said, was not whether the document was officially on record in the Secretary of State's office, but whether the House should be called upon to act on a document which was not before it. With the same propriety might a jury be refused the hearing evidence on a case on which they were called to decide, as the House could be refused a copy of this paper. It was said that it was only a newspaper publication. Newspaper publication or not, originally, Mr. G. said, that the President had made it a public document by communicating it officially to our Minister in London. He was satisfied that the President could have no objection to communicate it; for he well remembered that his predecessor had sent to the House, about the time of laying the famous embargo, a paragraph from an English newspaper containing something like a surmise that certain Orders in Council would be issued. If, as it had been said, the present President would follow in the footsteps of his predecessors, he could not have the least objection to comply with the request of the House to send a newspaper document, when his predecessor had sent one without any request at all.

Mr. SMILIE said that if the call was made, the House could get no more than what every one had seen; and he called upon any gentleman to say that he had not seen the circular in the public prints, and also whether he believed that the House could get from the Executive any other information than that which every member had or might have in his possession. He confessed for his own part that he thought it would scarcely be treating the Executive with that delicacy due from one department of the Government to another, to call upon him for a paper not officially in his possession, in order to see whether or not he had transmitted a faithful copy to our Minister in London. It seemed to insinuate a doubt of the propriety of his conduct.—[Mr. GARDENIER said that no such thing was meant.] Mr. SMILIE said that he did not believe gentlemen did mean it; but it was a reflection that naturally flowed from the circumstances. He did not know, if they could trust the Executive, why they should call for a paper already in every one's hands. He recollected a former case, and this was not the first appeal that had ever been made to the people. When Genet was the French Minister here, Mr. S. said, he had taken a step more direct than in the present case, and yet Congress had never called on General Washington for a copy of his appeal; for it had, as in the present case, been published in all the papers, and no one had doubted its authenticity. If the House was not to act on the case till they got the authenticated copy of the document in question, they never would act, for assuredly they would not get it; but if no one entertained a doubt on the subject, he thought they might act with propriety.

Mr. DANA said, that by the message from the Senate the House was called upon to express an opinion on a certain paper, to decide what was its meaning, and to concur with the Senate in affixing to it terms of reprobation. And was the House of Representatives to pronounce on this subject without having the paper before them? Could they, in point of legislative decorum and propriety, undertake to judge without seeing the paper in form? Would gentlemen refer them to newspapers for documents on which to act? He certainly never expected to hear it advanced on this floor that members of the House were to keep a file of every newspaper containing a document. If this was necessary, he had certainly been deficient in his duty; for he had not kept a paper containing a copy of the circular said to have been written by Mr. Jackson. Whatever construction had been given by the President or Secretary of State to a particular document, with all deference to their honor and virtue, Mr. D. said, he could not consent to surrender his own right of construction, of examination, and of judgment, nor to prostrate his understanding, however feeble, at the foot of the Executive or any department of the Government. Really, if newspaper publications were to be considered as authentic and sufficient for the use of members of this House, why had the House ordered five thousand copies of the documents to be printed for its use, when all the documents appeared in the newspapers before they had been printed for the use of the House? In point of propriety and respect to the Senate, Mr. D. said he might be at liberty to say that it was fair to presume that that body had the paper before them; he could not permit himself to imagine that they would have acted without it before them; and he hoped that the representatives of the people would also show a sufficient respect for themselves to have it before them when it was the subject of their deliberation.

Mr. RHEA, by several arguments, enforced the idea that the Government could have no other source of information on this subject than he or any other individual had. The statement made by a gentleman from Massachusetts, that variant copies of this document had appeared, was the very reason that he would vote against the resolution; because the Executive could not be responsible for the correctness of the copy which it had in its possession. Mr. Smith's letter to Mr. Pinkney did not state the enclosure of a copy of the letter, but of a paper purporting to be a copy of a letter written by Mr. Jackson. The gentleman from Massachusetts had said that he had not seen the letter. Mr. R. said he had no objection to have copies of it printed for the use of the House, from a copy to be taken from a newspaper; but he would not call upon the President for it, for by so doing they would remove the responsibility for its correctness from the newspaper publications to the Executive authority.

Mr. MILNOR was of opinion that, being called upon to pronounce a solemn opinion on a certain proceeding, they should have all the papers relating to it before them. He asked whether, when the House was called upon to pronounce an opinion and make a decision which might lead to a war, they should not have the same information before them that the President had before him? Mr. M. said he felt every disposition to support the Executive in all proper measures in the execution of his duty; he was ready to meet the question proposed whenever the House had before them the documents on which he had acted. Until they had them, it was impossible that they could make a just decision.

Mr. NEWTON said he should decidedly vote for the resolution before the House. The vote which he should give did not proceed from any disrespect to the President; the simple reason which would induce him to vote for it was, a desire that when the House came to a discussion of the resolution from the Senate, they should proceed to the merits of it; that no incidental question should be discussed; that no gentleman should have an opportunity of saying that he could not vote for it because the House had refused to call for documents.

Mr. BISS said that if the mover of the resolution had any other object in view than was expressed on the face of it, it was perfectly immaterial to him and must be so to the House. He should vote for the resolution not because the papers would have any influence on his conduct, but because they were deemed of importance by others whose duty it was as well as his own to endeavor to relieve their country from its embarrassments. It appeared to him that any member had a right to ask of the Executive any public document which he deemed necessary for the government of his conduct in Legislative matters. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) having declared such to be his situation in regard to the present paper, Mr. B. said he ought to have it.

Mr. W. ALSTON said that gentlemen spoke of their being called upon to vote on the resolution from the Senate without this paper. If that resolution was not pleasing to them, it was open to amendment. If the friends of the resolution failed to justify it from the want of the paper in question, its opponents could make use of that argument against it. The letter of Mr. Jackson was known to be nearly verbatim with the note delivered by Mr. Smith to Mr. Oakley; and no additional information could be derived from the call, although embarrassment might be created.

Mr. UPHAM said it was for the very purpose of seeing whether the circular coincided with the note just alluded to, that he wished to see it. Why then refuse to call for it?

H. OF R.

Mr. EPPES said, lest it should be thought, from what had been said by others, that in voting against the resolution he should be desirous of acting without information, he should make a few remarks. This was not an ordinary case, in which application ought to be made to a department of the Government for information—for what department, could say, whether the piece to which the British Minister's name was subscribed was a genuine paper or not? You know (said Mr. EPPES) to a certainty that the letters have not gone to the Secretary of State by an official channel, but that he possesses the same information as you do, and no other. In every case of this kind, are you not compelled to act on newspaper information? If in any instance a Legislative body attempts to examine the conduct of a Minister appealing from the Executive to the people, on what must it decide? Is it to be expected that his address will be forwarded to the President? No sir; it is from the Executive the appeal is made, and it will be found in newspapers, pamphlets, or some other form, circulating among the people. On the present occasion, as to the authenticity of the paper, I for one, without expressing an opinion on the merits of it, have no hesitation in saying that I believe it to be a genuine paper, written by the Minister of Great Britain for the purpose of appealing from the constituted authority to the people of this country. If you apply now to the Secretary of State as proposed, what can he do? He has become possessed of information in the same way with yourself; and, in transmitting it to our Minister, he does not call it a copy of the letter, but a paper purporting to be a copy of a letter, &c. Now, if this paper had come in any official form to the Secretary of State, it would be proper for Congress to call for it. But of what importance is it to obtain information cut out of a public newspaper? This motion does not affect the inquiry on the resolution from the Senate, which is, whether, from the circumstance of the letter appearing in print, and not being denied by the British Minister, from a view of all the circumstances, Congress shall think it a proper subject on which to legislate? If they believe that on a paper thus dispersed they cannot act without ascertaining its authenticity, let them summon the printer and take other steps to ascertain it. The appeal is from the Government, and to them. I should last of all look for a copy of it. The letter from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, coming enclosed from our Minister at London, I have no objection to call for; but because I have no objection to take that part of the resolution, I cannot swallow the nauseous drug which it is compounded.

The question was then decided by yeas and nays, in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 46, as follows:

Mr. QUINCY and Mr. DANA, were appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

TUESDAY, December 12.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, EBENEZER SEAVER, appeared, and took his seat.

An engrossed bill extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes,'" with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment; and the same being twice read, was agreed to by the House.

Mr. JENNINGS presented three petitions of sundry inhabitants of the Indiana Territory, respectively praying that the right of suffrage may be extended to every free white male inhabitant in said Territory, who shall have attained to the age of twenty-one years, and shall have paid a county or Territorial tax, or shall have performed militia duty; and that the people may be enabled to choose their own officers, both civil and military.—Referred.

COMMITTEE OF MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SAWYER called for the consideration of the motion submitted by him for appointing a separate Committee of Manufactures.

The House agreed to consider the resolution, ayes 68.

Mr. SEYBERT supported the motion on the ground of the propriety of paying a more particular attention to the subject of manufactures, which had lately become of great importance.

Mr. NEWTON opposed the motion as unnecessary, because the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures was competent to the performance of all the business assigned it, and had always manifested a disposition to foster the manufactures of the United States.

The question on the resolution was decided in the negative, 24 members only rising in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, December 13.

Mr. LOVE presented a memorial of the Board of Trustees of the Public Schools of the city of Washington, praying the patronage of Congress in the institution of a college in Washington.— Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

A report was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing, in pursuance of a standing resolution of the House, a statement of the drawbacks payable on articles exported from the United States in the years 1806, 1807, and 1808, compared with the amount of duties collected on the same respectively. From this statement the following abstract is made :

	Duties Received.	Drawbacks Payable.
Years 1806,	26,197,658	9,146,875
1807,	26,709,833	10,067,191
1808,	11,168,617	249,895

Ordered, That the report lie on the table.

A bill from the Senate for extending to Joseph Joshua Dyster certain privileges, (permitting him to obtain a patent for the invention of cast iron bridges, he not yet being a citizen;) and a bill in addition to an act regulating the laying out and making a road from Cumberland in the State of Maryland to the State of Ohio, were each read the first and second time, and the first referred to a Committee of the Whole, and the latter to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. MORROW, NELSON, LEWIS, ROSS, and GARDENIER.

Mr. QUINCY, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Monday last, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President had expressed his disposition to comply with the request of the House as far as practicable.

RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. GOLD rose for the purpose of moving a resolution to call upon the Executive for information, affecting, as he conceived, the resolution from the Senate respecting Mr. Jackson. To show the object of his motion, Mr. G. quoted from the letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney, of the 23d of November last, the following passage: "Another point in the despatch and not in the arrangement, is, that the British navy might capture our trade to ports prohibited by the United States. This condition, too, appears to have had its origin in a mistake of your meaning in a conversation with Mr. Canning, as noted by yourself." On referring to the communications made, and the correspondence presented to the House from the American Minister, he did not find the despatch there referred to. He said he found also in Mr. Erskine's letter to Mr. Smith, of the 14th of August, that reference was made to the same subject, and the same point was stated by Mr. Canning to have been assented to by Mr. Pinkney. The subject might not otherwise be of the most important nature, but, inasmuch as the resolution from the Senate seemed to point to the last resort of nations, war, it seemed to him important that the House should proceed circumspectly in the whole business; and it would certainly be seen by the House that it was proper to have the fullest information on the subject. Impressed himself with this idea, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House such information contained in any despatch from the American Minister in London, relative to the instruction of Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d day of January, 1809, and relative to any communications and conversations between the American Minister and Mr. Canning antecedent or subsequent thereto on the same subject, as may not, in the opinion of the President, be improper to be communicated.

Mr. BACON thought that the information asked for had no sort of connexion with the resolution from the Senate, which related merely to the conduct of Mr. Jackson, and which was of course to be decided by the proceedings of the Minister himself. In the consideration of this resolution, then, it would be immaterial to inquire what had given rise to the mistake of Mr. Canning. If the object of the resolution were to justify or accuse Mr. Canning, this information might be necessary. Suppose it should be ascertained that the proposition of Mr. Canning grew out of his own mistake, or originated with him, it was impossible to see what bearing it had upon the proposition from the Senate, which went to make a pledge to the nation to support the Executive in any result which might be consequent on the course it had pursued. Though he was willing at all times to call for all necessary papers, he could not see the propriety of passing this resolution, which only called upon the Executive for such papers as he should think proper to communicate, and which he no doubt had already done without waiting for a request by the House.

Mr. GOLD said that the House could not, as the gentleman supposed, have all the information on this subject already before it; for an express reference had been shown to a despatch from Mr. Pinkney, which was not to be found among the papers communicated. The House had called for

Mr. Canning's despatch to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d of January, and would they not have all its concomitants? Was it not of some importance to have all the papers which gave rise to it? Was it not proper, at this momentous crisis, that what our Minister in London had thought proper to communicate, this House should also have? The great question of peace or war was not to be decided on feeble grounds. When the time came that war should become a question, every inch of ground would be strictly scrutinized. It was important, on this occasion, to see whether that condition in Mr. Canning's despatch, which carried such hostile features on its face, might not be softened by the discovery that it originated, in some degree, in the agent of this country in England. A mistake arising, under these circumstances, would much soften the features of hostility. If the matter had been deemed by our Minister of sufficient importance to be communicated to the Executive, was it not important, also, that Congress should have it? As the House had called for the despatch of Mr. Canning, including that condition, was it not important that they should also have everything relating to it?

Mr. GARDENIER observed that, although the paper called for might not be necessary to the decision of the resolution from the Senate, it by no means followed that it was not necessary at all. The House were called upon to do more than merely to pass the resolution. If the honor and dignity of the nation had been sacrificed, as was stated, if the ground taken by the Executive was correct, he trusted they would do more than pass a resolution; he trusted that they would abandon this paper system, by which the nation had sunk in the estimation of foreign Powers. But, before they took that ground, he trusted, likewise, that they would look before them at every step; that they would be careful in all things that their quarrel was just. He said it was not to be concealed, and no American could conceal it from himself, that the third condition contained in the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine was such a one as the United States could not accede to. They could never call in the aid of any foreign nation to support those laws, because that would be to confess the impotence of the country to enforce its own acts. But, Mr. G. said, there were two parties to this question. That part of the world, not yet under the control of Napoleon, was to decide whether the United States or their adversary be right. To satisfy them, and all men who love justice, he said that it was necessary that this Government should make out the case in its own favor, and show that the British Government was in the wrong. The British Government had proposed that their navy should be expressly permitted to assist in executing a law to be passed by the Legislature of the United States. They had said, also, that, in making this proposition, they had acted not from their own impulse, but were warranted in suggesting it from its having been first proposed by our Minister in London. If this be correct, said Mr. G., our Government can have nothing to complain of. If our Minister in London has told the British Government that we were prepared to accede to such an arrangement, then, assuredly, there is nothing reprehensible in the British Government's being willing to take as much as we were willing to surrender. On our part, therefore, it is important that the declaration of Mr. Canning should be repelled; that the proposition did come from the British Government originally, and not from our Minister; because, in the latter case, we should have no cause of complaint on that ground. Let me not be understood to say that I would place confidence in the declaration of Mr. Canning, and disbelieve our own Government; but I merely wish to see the evidence which will clear the subject from all doubt. It is agreed by both parties, as appears from Mr. Smith's letter to Mr. Pinkney, that there had been a conversation on the subject, but it is alleged that the meaning of our Minister has been misapprehended. I wish to know what Mr. Pinkney did say, and how Mr. Canning came so widely to misunderstand him; I am desirous that it should appear that the third proposition did not derive its origin from our Government or from any agent of it abroad. It would appear extremely singular that a document which contains the means of putting down the statement of an adverse Government should be in our possession, and that gentlemen should be unwilling to let it come forth. Let me tell the gentleman from Massachusetts, who, I believe, sir, is quite as much attached to the Administration of the Government as I am, that he does injustice by withholding from them the opportunity of justifying themselves. No doubt Mr. Pinkney has satisfactorily explained the matter to the Executive; and no doubt the same explanation would be satisfactory to us as to his share in the transaction. But, Mr. G. said, standing here as the advocate of the honor and dignity of the United States, he wished nothing to be withheld. The President would thank the House, as he ought to do, for calling for information on this one point, if it were made out clearly on the side of the Government. If not made out in consequence of withholding information, gentlemen would see in what situation they would be placed. It was well known that, in this country, there were a great many skeptical captious people called Federalists—and what would they say if the information asked was refused? Why, that the Administration dare not communicate it; that this must be a lame part of the story, and therefore was not published; they would say that the Administration had given to the world so much as was favorable to themselves, and that what was otherwise had been withheld. If such should prove to be the fact, it would not be very honorable to the Executive. But, Mr. G. said, he had a confidence in the Executive, as he had said at the late session of Congress, and he would not surrender it until he was compelled to do so, and therefore he wished for the best evidence in his favor.

The President of the United States, in his Message to Congress, had in strong terms imputed to the British Government a breach of good faith; its Minister, too, had been rejected on account of his alleged insolence. This, Mr. G. said, was the rolling of clouds which preceded a storm, and which was not to pass over without producing some concussion. If this nation was to go to war the people must first be satisfied that the cause was just. With a divided people it was in vain to think of going to war. He pledged himself to the House that that description of gentlemen called the minority would proceed to the examination of this subject with that pure spirit of patriotism, which, in alarming times, became peculiarly necessary; that no party disposition would be shown to embarrass the Government, provided everything, when examined, should appear to be fair and open.

DECEMBER, 1809.

H. OF R.

Mr. G. concluded by hoping that, as it was important in this case to prove that Mr. Canning had erred, the House, too, should know what the Executive knew. They had as strong a right to know. The Executive received all information on our foreign relations, not that he alone was peculiarly entitled to it, but because it was most convenient that he should be the organ of communication with our Ministers abroad.

Mr. ERPES said, he should not have risen on the present occasion but that it appeared to him that the course taken by the gentleman from New York was calculated to give to this resolution a very different aspect from that which it bore on the face of it, and was calculated to carry to the American people and nation an impression that the grounds of difference now existing between the United States and Great Britain depended—on what? On, perhaps, the least important point of collision which existed, viz: a tender of the British navy to enforce the laws of the United States, thereby insinuating that they themselves were unable to enforce them—an insinuation made repeatedly on this floor; and which, when compared with the circumstances disclosed by the documents laid before Congress, was but as a drop in the ocean to the immense field of British enormities, duplicity, and deceit. Look, said he, at the letter of the Secretary of State, in which are stated the grounds on which matters now rest. A new Minister comes here, after the arrangement entered into and executed on our part is disavowed, and offers no explanation as to the motives of it. As to the affair of the Chesapeake, what have we there? The Minister is charged with no proposition but such as has been previously rejected, with none but such as the British Government knew would be rejected with scorn in this country. When Mr. Rose was sent here to atone for the outrage on the Chesapeake; the first step taken by him was to require the annulling a proclamation issued to prevent the recurrence of similar events; and what is the proposition of Mr. Jackson in relation to it, after the proclamation has been virtually repealed? Why, he must have a formal acknowledgment of its repeal. It is a decisive proof that there is no sincere desire in the British Government for a settlement of that point, because they propose terms dishonorable, terms which have been before rejected. There is another point of difference which should have entered into the view of the gentleman from New York. No proposition whatever has been made with respect to the Orders in Council, and it is declared that the principle of them they will never cease to maintain. Another point insisted on, previous to any friendly arrangement, is the express renunciation of the colonial trade not permitted in time of peace. I have said thus much to remind the gentleman that it is not because Britain has tendered her aid to execute our laws merely that we have cause of complaint against her, but because she has manifested a total want of good faith in refusing to fulfil an arrangement formally concluded, and by making propositions which she must know would be rejected, because they could not be honorably accepted. As to the resolution before the House, Mr. E. said, he cared very little about it. He believed if the gentleman would take the trouble of looking over the documents of the last session, he would find the paper desired. But, that no gentleman might have it in his power to say that he had not all the information before him that he could require, he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. KEY said that, whenever the Representatives of the nation were called upon to act, upon any momentous occasion, as the present certainly was, it was all-important to them and to the people at large, to possess all the information to be had compatible with propriety. It was manifest that the Executive was possessed of information which might be beneficial, and, therefore, ought to be laid before Congress. He said he alluded particularly to the correspondence of Mr. Pinkney with the Executive on this subject. He said he had seen nowhere an account of what were the views taken by that gentleman of the instructions, to Mr. Erskine. Mr. Pinkney, Mr. K. said, was a man of high character, of great talents, and of unquestionable zeal for his country's good; and it was impossible that he should have lost a moment in presenting to our Government the views of the Government of the nation to which he is our Minister. Mr. Canning had said that he had communicated to Mr. Pinkney Mr. Erskine's instructions in extenso. So important a fact would certainly not have been omitted to be communicated by our Minister. Mr. K. said, he wished to see whether Mr. Canning had correctly stated what had taken place, and in what manner Mr. Pinkney had conveyed the information to our Government. He had confidence enough in the Executive to submit to his discretion to lay before the House such part of this communication as he should think proper. But, satisfied as he was that important documents must be in possession of the Executive, he wished, when called upon to act on a great question, which would involve the dearest interests of the country, to be possessed of all the information possessed by the Executive on the subject. He therefore said he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. REA, of Tennessee, said he should vote against the resolution, because it called for information irrelevant to any question before the House, and because on a subject the consideration of which appeared to him to have been precluded by the arrangement entered into in April last. He said, he found by the documents laid before them, that strenuous efforts had been made by Mr. Jackson to call up the discussion of it afresh, on the principle that the arrangement concluded by Mr. Erskine was unauthorized, and entered into by our Government with the knowledge of its being so. Mr. R. said he was against giving any color whatever to that opinion. He never was opposed to calling for necessary information; but the reason he had assigned was sufficient, if there were no other, to induce him to vote against the motion. Mr. Erskine having denied ever having given his Government any reason to suppose, from any conversation he had held with members of the Executive, that they would agree to the third proposition, it seemed to be thought necessary to throw the burden of it on Mr. Pinkney. The very nature of the proposition itself ought to induce gentlemen to reject every motion to inquire into it. He would spurn the idea of inquiring what Mr. Pinkney had thought of it, because it went to a point in itself wholly inadmissible; as much so, as if the British Government had proposed to Congress to prepare projects of laws for them. It had been stated by Mr. Jackson that the arrangement was disavowed because the instructions contained in the note of the 23d of January were not complied with, which instruction included this third proposition. And, of course, this third proposition must be assented to before any negotiation could be brought to a conclusion. But, Mr. R. said, in his opinion, all this was foreign to the resolution from the Senate, which merely respected the conduct of Mr. Jackson to this Government, and whether this Government had done right in the manner in which it had treated him. He further remarked that it was evidently not Mr. Pinkney but Mr. Canning who had mistaken the meaning of their mutual conversations, because Mr. P. could not have had any doubts on the subject of such a proposal. And, what had this House to do with Mr. Canning's mistakes? They were not going to erect an inquisition into the correctness or incorrectness of his ideas, and therefore needed no information on the subject of them.

On the 27th of May, Mr. R. said, our Minister had been made acquainted with Mr. Erskine's instructions; and the arrangement was made on the 19th April. So that it had been executed by the United States prior to the time at which the instructions of Mr. Erskine were communicated to Mr. Pinkney. If Mr. Canning was at that time devising means of disavowing the arrangement which he expected was entered into, what was that to the United States? That arrangement, he said, had been a plain matter of bargain, which, after having been executed with good faith by one party to it, was refused to be fulfilled by the other.

It had been said that the British Government had a right to get from our Minister whatever they could, and that therefore the third condition in Mr. Canning's despatch had been prescribed. Where was the evidence that Mr. Pinkney had ever proposed or assented to it? Mr. R.'s opinion of him was such, he said, that he could not permit himself to suppose that he would assent to such a proposition; and it was not treating him with justice to suppose so. Mr. R. said it was not for him to say whether or not war would result from the present state of things—he wished not for war—but this consideration had no connexion with the resolution; against which he should vote, for the reasons some of which he had assigned.

Mr. GOLD said that he had examined the documents communicated at the last session, and found no such despatch as that alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia; and if that gentleman, whom he always heard with pleasure, would recollect the state of things, at the last session, he would hardly believe that the Executive would have been justifiable in communicating any correspondence which might recall hostile sentiments. That cause for forbearance did not now exist. He wished information from the fountain head, from Mr. Pinkney himself, who had been a party in the conversation alluded to; and he could perceive no reason why gentlemen should oppose it. He thanked the gentleman from Virginia for not limiting the discussion to that narrow point to which it was attempted to be confined by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON.) Gentlemen would see that they had arrived at a point at which the whole correspondence on this odious, offensive despatch from Mr. Canning should be communicated.

Mr. QUINCY stated the motion before the House, in one point of view, to show its connexion with the resolution from the Senate. We are called upon, said he, to state that it was the intention of Mr. Jackson to excite dissensions among the people through false and fallacious disguises. In making up this argument, as I understand it has been argued, it is stated that one of these disguises was, that he had stated to the people of the United States that he had commenced an important negotiation, when, in fact, he was only authorized to propose certain conditions, the acceptance of one of which would be disgraceful to this country. It is almost impossible to enter into an examination of those disguises without taking up that condition and the circumstances under which it was proposed; for, unquestionably, it is a false disguise if a proposition be stated to have been originally proposed by our Minister in London, which he never even assented to. The House ought not, however, to refuse the production of any paper thought necessary by any member in making up his opinion on matters before the House.

Mr. BACON said that he now understood the specific ground on which the motion was introduced to be abandoned, and the paper called for was admitted not to be necessary to the consideration of the resolution from the Senate. The gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDNER) had supported it, on the ground that the paper might be necessary for the justification of the Administration. How? No imputation had been alleged against the British Government by the Executive for making this third proposition; it had been simply rejected, as all admitted, on correct grounds. So far from being made the ground of any imputation against that Government, it was expressly imputed to a mistake of Mr. Canning, not to a wilful misinterpretation, but a misapprehension of what had passed between him and Mr. Pinkney. The sole imputation of blame made on Mr. Canning, is not that he originally proposed it, because he might, in so doing, have acted under a mistake, but that it was urged by Mr. Canning after the refusal by this Government to admit it. Neither could Mr. B. see how the paper to be called for was necessary for the justification of Mr. Canning; for no charge had been brought against him on account of it. No supposition had ever been uttered, in or out of the House, that our Minister had ever been authorized to assent to such a proposition; and, if he had done so, the affair concerned only him. Mr. B. said he could not see how the Administration were concerned in it. Whether the nation was to go to war, or not, would not at all depend on that point. He saw no reason to call for the paper. It might be necessary, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDENIER) supposed, to stop the cavilings of captious federalists. The gentleman, said Mr. B., is better acquainted with gentlemen of that description than I am, and therefore, no doubt, has characterized them correctly. It is not for me to say whether he has mistaken the character of his friends. But, on that account, I see no reason to vote for the motion.

Mr. KEY said, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. REBA) had seemed to suppose, because Mr. Canning's letter of the 27th of May was subsequent to the arrangement, that the communication of the instructions to Mr. Pinkney could have no bearing on the questions to be discussed. Mr. K. said, that he did not understand this to have been the first communication of the instructions, for Mr. Canning writes to Mr. Pinkney on the 27th May: "Having had the honor to read to you in extenso the instructions," &c. Mr. K. said, it was because the time when he first read them was not stated, that he wished to see Mr. Pinkney's letter on the subject. That gentleman, if he correctly recollected the nature of the communications from him, usually detailed the periods of time and substance of conversations in a clear and luminous manner. Not to travel over ground occupied by other gentlemen, Mr. K. said, he justified the call on the ground that the time at which the instructions given to Mr. Erskine were first read to Mr. P. was uncertain.

Mr. GARDENIER said, he had just heard from a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) very much to his surprise, that the proposition of this third condition was a matter of very trifling importance. Perhaps, Mr. G. said, he was fated to differ with gentlemen on points which concerned the honor of the country. He thought it extremely important that it should be ascertained how this proposition came to be made by the British Government; if without any previous indication on the part of the United States of a disposition to submit to it. He should, if such were the case, call it little short of an insulting proposition, as the making it necessarily implied a belief of the want of power in this Government to carry into execution its own views—an imputation to which he could never submit. But, said Mr. G., the President of the United States, in his Message to Congress, has thought fit, possessing no doubt a view of the whole ground, (to which I do not pretend but shall strive to attain,) in the face of the world to charge the British Government with perfidy in refusing to ratify an agreement entered into by his Minister having competent power to make it—a charge which, if not repelled, will disgrace the British Government for ever—for, what worse imputation can you attach to a Government than the deliberate violation of a compact entered into? None. It is therefore important, after issuing a State paper of a higher tone than anything since the Revolution, to that union which it ought to be the duty of Government to establish among the people, if any serious consequences are to result, to show that we are in the right. The British Government alleges, as I understand, that its Minister here did not follow his instructions, but absolutely violated them, inasmuch as, among other things, he did not get the assent of the American Government to stipulations which were to leave the British Government at liberty to capture our vessels engaged in a certain trade. Now, inasmuch as he was instructed to make this a part of his arrangement, and failed to do so, therefore, say the British Government, we are not bound by it. On the part of this Government it appears to have been contended that a Minister Resident was possessed of sufficient powers to conclude such an arrangement. That question, Mr. G. said, he would not enter into now. But, if it were true that the proposal that British armed vessels should capture American vessels engaged in a trade prohibited by American laws, so repugnant to every idea of propriety, did in fact come, as Mr. Canning says, first from America; and if, after it was made a condition by the British Government, the Government of the United States refused to accede to it, after having so first proposed it, there was a want of good faith on the part of this Government. If that fact should be ascertained, the British Government would be justified in refusing to sanction the arrangement. Mr. G. wished to be understood not as saying that such was the case, but merely stating the question on both sides. On this account, however, he considered it extremely important to ascertain how this proposition first received existence. He wished to know what Mr. Pinkney did say, and how Mr. Canning came to misunderstand him, if, in fact, he had misunderstood him. And, for this purpose, he wanted such papers as might be embraced by the motion before the House.

The question was now taken on Mr. GOLD'S

Mr. GOLD and Mr. KEY were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President of the United States.

REPEALING DRAWBACKS, &c.

Mr. VAN HORN called for the consideration of the resolutions laid on the table by him a few days ago relative to repealing drawbacks, &c., with a view of having them referred to a committee.

After some conversation between Messrs. DANA, QUINCY, MACON, and VAN HORN, as to the proper committee to which they should be referred, Mr. VAN HORN agreed that they should go to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. RHEA objected to the reference of a part of these resolutions, on the ground of the total inexpediency of the propositions contained in them, and assigned his reasons for that opinion at some length. He said that the subject of them properly belonged to the treaty-making power, and the legislating on them at all would take a powerful instrument out of its hands. They went to surrender those rights for which the United States had long been striving; and, if passed into laws, when they should be again contended for, our Minister would be told, here is a law of your own Congress formally surrendering that for which you contend.

Mr. VAN HORN said in reply that it was well known to all that we never should, during the existence of a war in Europe, be able to obtain an equitable treaty from either of the belligerent Powers. As to the surrender spoken of, it was not a surrender at all, but a refusal to exercise certain privileges because injurious to us. If our merchants, instead of employing their vessels in the carrying trade, the source of almost all our difficulties, were compelled to employ them in the carriage of our domestic produce, it might be beneficial to the country. How happened it, he asked, that our merchants were growing rich and our planters poor?—For such was the fact. The system of commerce producing such consequences must be erroneous, and therefore he had proposed to inquire into the propriety of a change.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, rebutted the idea held out by Mr. VAN HORN that his resolutions would afford a remedy to the depressed state of the planters. Instead of enriching them, his resolutions, by doing away all foreign competition in the market for their produce, would make them still poorer.

A motion was made by Mr. RHEA to postpone the consideration of the subject until to-morrow.—Negated.

Mr. MACON observed that a reference of the resolutions by no means committed any gentleman to vote for them.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, then required a separate question to be taken on each resolution.

And the question being so taken, three of the resolutions were referred and two rejected.

Those referred relate to a prohibition of the exportation of domestic produce in any other vessels than those owned and wholly navigated by citizens of the United States; to laying an additional discriminating duty in favor of vessels of that description, and to modifying or repealing the laws allowing drawback.

Those rejected relate to prohibiting exportation from our ports of foreign goods in American vessels; and to prohibiting American vessels from carrying articles of foreign growth from one foreign port to another.

THURSDAY, December 14.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, made a report, in part, on such matters of business as were depending and undetermined upon at the close of last session of Congress; which was read, and laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of William and Elias Rector; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee appointed on the eighth instant, presented a bill for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late and of the present Army of the United States; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. McKim, after a few observations, in which he declared the object of his motion to be to countervail the restrictions imposed by foreign nations on our commerce, laid upon the table the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, the importation, in foreign ships or vessels, of all goods, wares, and merchandise, not of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the country to which the ship belongs, excepting in the ships of such countries as, by permanent regulation, permit our ships and vessels, as freely and beneficially as their own, to import into their ports and territories the produce and manufactures of foreign countries.

2. Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying an additional import duty on distilled spirits imported in foreign ships or vessels, from ports or countries in which American vessels are not permitted, by permanent regulation, to a fair participation in such trade; and that the committee have leave to report on these resolutions by bill, or otherwise.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to revive an act, entitled "An act for the relief of the refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, and for other purposes." An amendment was agreed to by the House and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

YAZOO LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. Bacon presented a memorial of the Directors of the New England Land Company, citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying that measures may be speedily adopted by Congress for the examination and final adjustment of their claims to a portion of the lands lying within the Mississippi Territory, and ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States, on the twenty-fourth of April, one thousand eight hundred and two.

The said petition was read: When, a motion was made by Mr. Bacon, to refer the same to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. Trour moved to reject the petition. He said that the virtue of the House had induced it to reject a petition of the same tenor heretofore, and under circumstances, too, which would have rendered an attention to it more excusable than at present—and why? Because the nation was at peace and had a full Treasury. And what, said he, is our situation at present? The country is on the eve of a war, and has an exhausted Treasury. And what is the amount of the claim made upon you? I know not what is expected of you at this time; but four years ago ten millions of dollars was the estimated amount of it. And are you prepared to grant to these men a donation (for, it can be considered in no other light) of even three millions of dollars? If you have three millions of surplus money in the Treasury, throw it into the ocean, give it to the beggar who besieges the door of the Capitol, to the old Revolutionary soldiers who daily ask for bread—or put it in your own pockets as a reward for your public services; but in the name of justice do not think of putting your hand into the Treasury to pay the hire and wages of corruption. As much as I hate in my heart this corruption, and as much as I have viewed with horror its triumph over the virtue of my country, I have heretofore been content to see this petition lie on the table. But now the case is altered; the time is proper, and I hope that the virtue and understanding of the House will induce it to agree to its immediate rejection.

Mr. Bacon said he was not prepared, nor was it his wish, to reply to the eloquent declamation and pointed denunciation pronounced by the gentleman from Georgia. He would only say that the petition was preferred by a respectable portion of citizens, and ought to be referred. It embraced the claim of not only a respectable but of a numerous portion of the people of the State which he represented, although he had not himself a constituent who was interested to the amount of a cent in the claim. It was a subject of as great magnitude as any ever presented to the House, and in his opinion extremely interesting to the internal policy and interests of this country. It was a claim sanctioned by high authority—by persons of the most respectable standing in the Government. Should a claim of this amount, which had more than once attracted the notice of the Legislature of Massachusetts, not be referred? In this House there were not less than forty or fifty members to whom the subject was new, and who ought to be made acquainted with it before they decided on it. Were they sufficiently versed in it to enable them to determine at once that this claim was so unjust that they would immediately shut the door on it? It appeared to him that the House could not be prepared to adopt the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, whose sensibilities were so highly excited.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to refer a petition had precedence of the motion to reject it, because it had been first made.

Mr. Dana observed that from what he had heard of the petition, it related to the same subject as a report made to Congress by certain Commissioners appointed to investigate it, viz: James Madison, Albert Gallatin, and Levi Lincoln, the then Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General. These persons had so far respected the right of the claimants, and the interest of the United States as connected with it, as to recommend a compromise. If the gentleman from Georgia had spoken of things of his own knowledge, and not things which depended upon proof of which different opinions might be formed by different persons, Mr. D. said he should place implicit confidence in his opinion. But when doubts did exist in relation to the justice of the claim, when a respectable board of Commissioners had reported in its favor, were the House ready to say that this petition should be driven from them as infamous? Were they at liberty thus to refuse it a reference, or reject it upon the denunciation of the delegation of any State, however respectable the State or its delegation? Mr. D. said he did not feel disposed to do so, and had rather that the petition should take the usual course.

Mr. STANFORD said that the report of the Commissioners alluded to by the gentleman last up, had declared that in justice no claim could be set up by the petitioners; but it recommended a compromise on the ground of policy. He hoped the House would not agree to refer this petition, when they had peremptorily rejected a bill from the Senate, heretofore, going to carry into effect their prayer. He called for the yeas and nays on the question of reference.

Mr. TROUP said he was aware how improper it was on the question of reference to enter into a consideration of the merits of the claim. But one word he must be permitted to say as to the respectable characters who had recommended an adjustment. How, in what way, had they recommended it? In the same breath in which they had stated that it would be advisable to compromise the claim, they had said that the Yazoo claimants had not a shadow of title, but had advised Congress to get rid of them as a formidable faction. In the same report in which the Commissioners had advised Congress to pay them and send them off, they had also declared that four-fifths of the Legislature whose act was the foundation of this claim, were bribed and corrupted.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that the petitioners prayed for a compromise of their claim, not for money, but for a portion of the land to which they declare themselves to be entitled. He could, therefore, see no propriety in the petition being referred to the Committee of Claims; it should rather be referred to the Committee of Public Lands. If referred to that committee they would examine in what situation the claim was placed by the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and Georgia. According to these articles, after one year from the ratification of them no act could be passed by Congress to cede any part or portion of the land to any individuals or companies whatever; and if such cession should be made, by the same articles the land so ceded would revert to the State of Georgia. If the House then were to cede land to the petitioners as prayed, it would immediately become the property of the State of Georgia; the cession would confer no title, because it would be in contravention of the very agreement on which they had proceeded to legislate. He submitted to the House the propriety of referring a subject on which the House could not act without impairing a solemn compact. It would be impossible, without nullifying the articles of agreement, to give them any portion of the land thus ceded by Georgia. Either the articles of cession must be repealed, or the prayer of the memorialists must be rejected. He was not inclined to say much about the corruption practised in obtaining the act of Georgia of 1795 for a cession of forty millions of acres, but he was generally indisposed to do anything in favor of the petitioners, because he believed the grant had originated in fraud, and the fraud had adhered to it through all its various ramifications.

Mr. BACON remarked that it was true that the articles of cession provided that after the term of one year no cession of any part of the land should be made by the United States. In 1803, however, within a year after that time, an act had been passed regulating grants of land south of the State of Tennessee, in which so much of five millions of acres as may be necessary to satisfy claims against the land is reserved for that purpose. This section of the law obviously had in view the claims of the petitioners. He presumed the gentleman from Mississippi Territory had not adverted to it. With respect to the mode of reference, Mr. B. said it was true that the petitioners asserted a claim to land, but they expressed a desire for a compromise in any way. It was not for land that they specifically asked, but for such compensation as Congress should think fit to give them. He should be glad to see to what conclusion any committee, sitting coolly down in their chamber to investigate it, would come on this subject. Instead of fervid eloquence and glowing declamation, he should like to see a cool and deliberate investigation of the claim.

Mr. LIVERMORE said it was true, as had been observed, that this was a large claim, but its magnitude did not render it the less just. If the facts stated in the petition could be substantiated, he appealed to every gentleman who had ever entertained an idea of justice whether the petitioners were not entitled to redress. If they could not be proved, the effect of it would be very different; and, therefore, to ascertain the correctness of the statement, an inquiry ought to be made. As to the assertion that fraud attached to the claim through all its ramifications, Mr. L. said that he was acquainted with some of the petitioners, and knew that there were no men on the face of the globe who would more despise the idea of fraud than those petitioners—the gentleman himself could not be less disposed to sanction it than they would. These persons had purchased the land, for which they had paid their money, and been ruined by it—men who had been rich were now beggared by it. It would be denying justice to refuse a reference of the petition. If gentlemen believed facts to be against the petitioners, could they not trust themselves to an examination of them? The first question would be, are they entitled to claim anything? If so, would the House do them justice or not? It was the greatest injustice to stop a claim, alleged to be just, at the very threshold of the House.

Mr. TROUP asked, if, as had been stated, he had treated this subject in a declamatory style, in what mode could it be treated? He put it to the gentleman's liberality—he put it to the House and to the world—if it was not more becoming to resist with vehemence the introduction of corruption, than to support it with his deliberate understanding? What, sir, said Mr. T., would you say to a murderer who should rush into this Hall with his knife yet reeking with the blood of a fellow man? Would you stop to reason with him on the turpitude of the act? I have no objection to reason upon it, if the House think proper to send it to a committee; and if they do, if I do not prove it, as called by the gentleman from Mississippi, one tissue of corruption in all its ramifications, I hope the House will never again give me credence. I will prove not only that the Legislature who made the grant were corrupted, but that these people who pretend ignorance were parties to it—participes criminis—and ought to be treated as the original actors in it. Mr. T. then made some observations with a view to show that a question of rejection ought to take the place of a question of reference, because if the House refused to refer it to one committee, it would be moved to refer it to another, and there would be no end of the business.

Mr. SHEFFEY wished to know if the motion for reference could not be divided, so as to take a question first generally on its reference, and afterwards decide to what committee it should go?

The SPEAKER conceived not.

Mr. PITKIN remarked that he never knew a petition to be rejected on its first reading. A motion might be made tantamount to a rejection, but the rejection of a petition, unless its language was indecorous, was unprecedented. The right of petition was one secured to the people of the United States by the Constitution; and so long as petitions were couched in decorous language, he contended that it was not in the power of the House to reject them. The Parliamentary practice he understood to be to examine, in doubtful cases, whether the language of a petition was decorous, and even to appoint a committee for that purpose. If found to be consistent with decorum, a motion could not be made to reject a petition on its presentation. He thought it incorrect at this time to go into the merits of the petition, which he wished to take the usual course of reference to a committee, whose report would prepare the subject for discussion.

Mr. ROSS said, being totally unacquainted with the subject but through the medium of newspapers, from what had been said on both sides on the present occasion, he thought it important that the petition should be referred. If it were true, as alleged by those opposed to the reference, that gross and palpable fraud had been committed in relation to the claim set up by the petitioners, he asked whether it was not all important to the interests of the United States that it should now be decided on, when there were so many living witnesses of the fact? Was it not important that a report should now be made, spreading to the public view the gross and palpable fraud which attached to this whole transaction? If, on the contrary, the transaction had been fair and bona fide, and the persons implicated had been injured, it was but fair, and right, and reasonable that justice should be dealt to them. For himself he was not disposed to stifle a petition in the first outset, by rejecting it, when the terms of it were decorous to the House. He could know nothing further on this subject than had been suggested by different members of the House. It could not be expected that gentlemen who were new members of the House could consent to refuse to give to this petition the usual course.

Mr. BISS said he should not have said anything on this question, because he cared very little whether the petition was referred or not, for he was very sensible that there was a large majority of the House against complying with the prayer contained in it, but for the remark of the gentleman last up, who seemed not well to have understood the history of this business. It had been before Congress almost every session for five or six years, and one session a bill had been received from the Senate in favor of the claimants; the subject was then investigated maturely, and, after a full discussion, the bill had been rejected on its first reading.

Mr. MACON said that a few years ago it had been attempted to establish the practice of refusing to refer all petitions once decided against except new testimony had been produced relative to them. This appeared to be reasonable; for if the House were called upon to decide on petitions year after year on the same testimony, there would be no end of them. He quoted the journals to show that this had been the case in some instances. Mr. M. said if all the time of the House that had been occupied on this subject were put together, it would make one of the longest sessions that had ever taken place under the Government. It is a standing dish. The petitioners will not believe you when you say no to them. I believe I am the last man in the House who would throw the smallest shade of doubt on the right of petition. But, sir, after petition and petition, after you have said no and no and no again, is there to be no end to it? I do not understand the argument used on this question, that the petitioners are respectable and numerous. Every man petitioning here has the same right to have his petition attended to; no matter what be his standing in life, if right be on his side, it ought to be done to him. If the President were to come here with a petition, he would have no more claim to attention than if he was a beggar at our door. Their rights are perfectly equal. Sir, if there be merit in the claim, there is no occasion to tell us of the merits of the petitioners; if there be not, their merit will not avail it. I did not attend to the reading of this petition, sir, but I should not be astonished if it had told you that the Senate had once passed a bill on the subject. I have been long enough in this body to see the possibility of getting any claim through the National Legislature by a step at a time; for at last every attention heretofore given to it passes as a good argument in its favor. I believe, with the gentleman from Georgia, that there is scarcely a man in the nation who does not know that the transaction originated in fraud. I recollect a gentleman from Vermont told us here that the fraud was as well known in Vermont as in Georgia. Why, sir, the newspapers rung with it. Upon the very spot where the scene took place, what was done? Almost every man in the Legislature who was concerned in it was hurled from his seat, and what was called the rescinding Legislature followed. That cannot be good which originated in fraud, in sin, in iniquity—in the most flagrant political iniquity ever known. Nothing we can do can make it righteous. Gentlemen may talk as they please of declamation, but the most eloquent speech I ever heard in my life was on this subject from a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) which then put an end to all opposition on the subject. I could almost wish to postpone this question to hear the gentleman again speak on it—I believe it was the most eloquent speech ever made within the walls of this House. Mr. M. said the testimony on this subject had been printed over and over again. He recollected it had been stated that, on examination of the Clerk's library, the whole of the testimony on this subject had been torn out of the volume of printed documents of the year in which it had been laid before the House. Sir, to keep this petition out of these walls, I would be willing to vote to give the State of Georgia a sum equal to what we have given for the land, to take it back. We made a bad bargain with her; I thought so then, and I think so still.

At one time, sir, we are told that these people can sue for this land and recover it. Let them do so. I for one will make no compromise with them. Can any man believe they would be willing to take the fragments which are not yet taken up of five millions of acres, if they had a legal and just claim to the whole? It does not tell. If I believed that I had a just claim to the whole Indiana Territory, and that I could recover it, do you believe, sir, that I would take the fragments of five millions of acres of which the best has been picked out? No, sir; I would have all or none. This claim has never come up at any time at which the merits of it have not been discussed. If no vote had ever been taken on it, I would vote to-day to refer it. There ought to be a time to begin and a time to end, and this bill has had both; and, sir, it is a little remarkable that at the time a motion was made to reject it some years ago, we were discussing the state of our foreign relations. Such is now our situation, and up comes this claim again. If it had never been referred, I would now vote for it; but it has already been once decided, and I would not refer it again. It is due as well to the petitioners as to ourselves to settle this question, to refuse to pay attention to their petition.

Mr. DANA said he felt the impropriety of going into the discussion of the merits of the claim on a motion to refer it; but he rose simply to state to the House what was contained in the report of the Commissioners on the subject already alluded to. [Mr. D. read a part of the report.] In doing this he did not enter into the merits of the claim, but was merely desirous to show that there were persons high in public confidence who really had thought it so worthy of consideration that they had recommended a compromise; and it would not be easily admitted that this was so notorious a fraud on the part of the applicants that they should be branded with infamy, and yet that these gentlemen should have been willing to make a compromise with this iniquity. He did not feel himself at liberty to suppose that any public officer would propose a compromise of a claim so utterly improper that this House ought not even to listen to it.

Mr. PERKIN observed on Mr. MACON's idea of refusing to refer petitions once acted on by the House, that he did not apprehend that the petition before the House was one with which this course ought to be taken. It would be unnecessary to say that a report had once been made in favor of it, and although not assented to by the House, there had very often been nearly an equal division on the subject. Instances would be found on the Journals where petitions had been decided against, and yet which had been repeatedly referred. He hoped the usual mode of proceeding would be adopted in relation to this petition. He did not believe, whatever fraud might have attached to the original purchasers, that it could attach to those who purchased subsequently. The gentleman from Georgia had said that he could prove the contrary. Let the question then be examined, and if the gentleman had any proof let it be produced. Mr. P. said that for his part he had never seen any such testimony. He had been acquainted in substance with the transaction at the time the Georgia land was sold, and he had never heard that the petitioners were connected with the fraud. If so, let it be proved before a committee, and let the fact be reported to the House. It was certainly a question of great moment as it respected the United States, and ought to be examined.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought that the honorable gentleman from Georgia had furnished a strong argument in favor of a reference of the petition. If he had understood him correctly, the gentleman had undertaken to say that he could prove that these petitioners were participes criminis in this fraud practised concerning the State of Georgia. If that were the case, and the gentleman was prepared to make good the assertion, it was surely a reason why the petitioners should have a fair hearing. He said that a charge of serious import had been exhibited to the world, that a number of gentlemen petitioners, asking for justice, had been so guilty of fraudulent practices that their petition should not even be referred. He submitted it to the House, whether it would not be cruel to let this go without inquiry. The committee to whom it should be referred would report facts; for, Mr. L. said, he had great doubt, to say no more of it, whether there were good grounds for this assertion; he said this from a knowledge of the characters who petitioned. He did not contend, as seemed to be supposed by a gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) that one man had a better right to have his petition heard than another, because all citizens had equal rights. The respectability of character of the petitioners had not been mentioned as a reason why their prayer should prevail, but to rebut the assertion that they were profligate characters, guilty of such fraudulent transactions as to justify Congress in refusing them a hearing. He should wish them only to be treated as other petitioners, to hear everything for or against their claim. It was no argument, he said, against their claim, that we were on the eve of a war; he hoped that calamity was far from us; and if it were not, it could be no argument against a just claim. He hoped it would be connected with no political question, but stand on its own merits. What argument either was it against their claim to five millions, or to a less number of acres of land, that they were entitled to a much greater portion? They must take what they could get, when it was not in their power to get the whole to which they were entitled. Upon the whole, he could not conceive why an investigation should be denied.

Mr. UPHAM said a few words, not distinctly heard by the reporter, in favor of a reference. He urged as a reason why it merited that attention, that it had heretofore received the sanction of Commissioners appointed to inquire into it, of one branch of the National Legislature, and of a committee of the House.

Mr. GARDENIER moved to adjourn.—Negatived. Ayes 18.

Mr. STANFORD quoted a Message of GEORGE WASHINGTON to Congress, soon after the passage of the acts of the Legislature of Georgia making this grant, in which he communicated these acts to Congress, and recommended them to their attention. If alarm had been excited in the mind of WASHINGTON by the passage of these acts, so far as to induce him to communicate them to Congress within fifteen or twenty days after their passage, it was conclusive evidence that the suspicious nature of their transaction could not have been unknown to the petitioners at the time they purchased the claim.

The question of reference was now taken, and decided—yeas 60, nays 56, as follows:

FRIDAY, December 15.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD,
Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of passing a law to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. CLAY, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. KEY, and Mr. STURGES, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY,
Ordered, That the letter and report of the Commissioners under the act for the relief of the refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia, presented on the thirteenth of February, one thousand eight hundred and five, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

An engrossed bill to revive an act, entitled "An act for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented a petition of Levin Jones, of the City of Baltimore, owner and master of the schooner Wolf, stating that, in October last, at Charleston, South Carolina, he took on board the said schooner several French families and their slaves, who had fled from the island of Cuba, for the purpose of carrying them to Norfolk, and that upon his arrival at that place, his vessel was seized for a violation of the act prohibiting the importation of slaves, which required a manifest to be made at Charleston of the said slaves, of the existence of which act, the petitioner states, he was ignorant, and praying that his said vessel may be released, and that he may be exonerated from all penalties incurred by the violation of the law aforesaid.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

YAZOO CLAIM.

Mr. TROUP moved a resolution for printing, for the use of the members of the House, in consequence of what took place yesterday, the usual number of copies of the act of Georgia, passed in 1796, commonly called the rescinding act; of the constitution of Georgia of 1789; of the constitution of the same State of 1798; of the report of the commissioners appointed in pursuance of an act for the amicable settlement of limits within the State of Georgia, &c., made on the 29th of November, 1804; and of the articles of settlement and agreement between the United States and Georgia, of April, 1802. He said he had included in the motion the constitution of Georgia of 1789, because it would show that the Legislature of 1795 had no right to make the grant; and the Constitution of 1798, because in it the convention had, in the most solemn manner, ratified the rescinding act.

Mr. T. made some observations as to his motives for making this motion, in too low a tone of voice to be distinctly understood by the reporter.

Mr. BACON said he was not opposed to this motion, but in favor of it; but there were, probably, some other papers which it might be proper to connect with these. He asked the favor of the gentleman to let it lie on the table, until he could ascertain what papers to add to them.

Mr. TROUP consenting, the motion was ordered to lie on the table.

BATTURE AT NEW ORLEANS.

On motion of Mr. SHEFFEY, the House took up for consideration the resolutions on the subject of the batture, laid on the table by him a few days ago.

Mr. S. laid on the table several certificates and other papers relating to this subject.

Mr. W. ALSTON moved to refer the resolutions of the Committee of Public Lands, to whom had already been referred a memorial of the Corporation of New Orleans on the same subject, and a resolution for vesting in them the right of the United States to the batture.

This resolution was negatived—52 to 49.

The resolutions of Mr. SHEFFEY were then ordered to lie on the table, on motion of Mr. NELSON, with a view to make way for the following motion:

Mr. NELSON moved to discharge the Committee of Public Lands from the further consideration of the papers on this subject referred to them, with an intention to refer them, together with Mr. SHEFFEY's resolutions, to a Committee of the Whole House.

This motion finally prevailed, 57 to 51; but, from the lateness of the hour, (4 o'clock,) no question was taken on the reference to a Committee of the Whole.

On these several questions, a diffuse debate of more than three hours arose; in which Messrs. ALSTON, SMILIE, POYDRAS, MACON, EPPES, and GHOLSON, advocated a reference to a select committee, for the purpose of preparing a report of the facts on the case, and reporting their opinion thereon; and Messrs. SHEFFEY, NELSON, ROSS, GARDENIER, and KEY, supported the proposition to send the papers to a Committee of the Whole in the first instance, and thus to bring them more immediately before the House.

[The arguments in favor of a reference to the Committee of Public Lands, or to a select committee, were generally, that it was improper, on the ground of the equal rights of all petitioners, to give to the claim of Edward Livingston a direction different from that given to other claims for land now held by the United States; that petitions of persons appealing from the decision of the Commissioners appointed by the United States to try titles to land, had always taken that course; that, yesterday, the petition of the Yazoo claimants, involving a claim of at least equal magnitude with that now under consideration, had been referred to a select committee to inquire into it, and no other reference had ever been asked of it; that the claimant could have nothing to fear from the report of a select committee, as, on that report, there would be ample scope for discussion; that the circumstance that almost every one who spoke on the subject differed as to facts from the gentleman who preceded him, was evidence of the propriety of having a report of facts made which could be depended on; that, although the House were not asked by the petitioner to try his title, but merely to designate a proper tribunal to do it, yet they were asked, in the meanwhile, to reinstate him in possession of the land from which he had been ousted, and that they could not consistently do this until they were convinced by facts that the petitioner had a color of title, and was not an unwarranted intruder on the public land.

On the other hand, it was contended, in favor of a reference to a Committee of the Whole, that this was not a case which could be identified with ordinary claims for public lands, which were generally referred to a committee of that name, for it was a case in which it had become a question whether the lands claimed were public lands or not; that the propriety of passing Mr. SHEFFEY's resolutions depended materially on the construction of a statute and on a Constitutional question, on which topics it was not peculiarly the province of the Committee of Public Lands to decide; that this was not a case in which the House were asked to decide on a claim, but to appoint a tribunal for the purpose of deciding it, and it was therefore unnecessary for them to have a report of a committee minutely stating facts and investigating the legality of the title; that it was sufficient to induce the House to establish some tribunal to try the title, to know that the petitioner had once been in possession of the property claimed, and therefore had a color of title; and that the propriety of reinstating him in possession of the land could nowhere with more propriety be first discussed than in Committee of the Whole, which course, also, would afford a prospect of coming to an earlier decision on the subject of the bature.

In addition to these observations, gentlemen on both sides entered somewhat into a discussion of the relative merits of the titles of the United States and of Edward Livingston, and an examination of the questions of law and fact involved in it.]

In the course of the debate, Mr. KEY said as he could see no possible benefit from referring this subject to a select committee, he should, therefore, oppose the present motion. We do not want, said he, a committee to instruct us in what is proper to be done, nor do we need their assistance in the investigation of facts. All the facts that exist in the case have been collected, stated, and laid before us in a large octavo volume, by the late President, together with the opinions of eminent lawyers and civilians. We have statements by one party, and pamphlets by the other, and the great fear is, lest we become confused by the mass of matter and number of documents.

The case is simply this: that the petitioner, Mr. Livingston, became interested in certain property in the neighborhood of New Orleans, well known by the name of "the bature." The city of New Orleans claimed it, a suit was instituted, and the title determined by the highest tribunal in favor of Mr. Livingston, and subsequent to this judicial decision he was turned out of possession by the Executive of the United States as an intruder and trespasser on public property. I have no intention to censure the motives of the late President in adopting so hasty and harsh a measure, and I am inclined to believe, without intention of wrong, he was advised to this measure under the construction of a statute of the United States which all must admit does not nor never was intended to apply to possession obtained under the decision of United States courts.

That Mr. Livingston has been turned out by Executive authority we all know; we also know, Mr. Speaker, that redress cannot be had against the United States, who have done the injury. There is a shield of inviolability thrown around them which prevents redress for the most oppressive injuries. In two words, sir, the United States are non-suable.

Applications for relief can only be made to this body, and in the administering of it an important question arises, viz: Shall we investigate the subject and decide it ourselves, or shall we, in the language of the report, appoint a tribunal to decide it, and restore Mr. Livingston, in the meantime, to his possession? I am for the latter course. I am for appointing a tribunal to examine and decide this difficult and interesting point, for I am decidedly of opinion that this body is not capable of forming and coming to a correct decision upon so abstruse and intricate a question.

Mr. Speaker, a body composed of more than one hundred members is, in its nature and construction, little adapted to decide law points, and rights of property. If the collected wisdom of the House was much greater than we even flatter ourselves it possesses, it would not be equal to the decision of the case. I am, therefore, against the House passing any opinion on the merits of the case. I am against referring the subject back to a committee.

One simple point presents itself to the House. It is this: Will the House authorize this resolution to appoint a tribunal to hear and decide the case, or grant an appeal (which does not now exist) to the Superior Court? The petitioner will be satisfied with this. Justice and honor demand it; and let us not feel power and forget right. In a republican government, the protection and safety of each individual constitutes the mass of public happiness; and, as such a Government exists in the affections of the people, those virtues should be exercised and cherished which tend most to produce these affections. And I ask, Mr. Speaker, what principle is more sacred than justice? What more imperious and obligatory? Let us not, then, be judges in our cause. Let us not oppose an individual because we have the power to do it; and, above all things, Mr. Speaker, let us use no delay. In effect, sir, delay of justice is a denial of it. The individual is sacrificed while the Government deliberates. Let us never forget, sir, that justice, to be well administered, must be speedily administered. I am therefore against the delay of referring this subject to a committee. I am against being judges in our own cause; but I am decidedly for authorizing the tribunal to examine in whom the right to the bature exists—whether in Mr. Livingston, to whom the court has adjudged it, or in the United States, who, in the face of that judgment, have taken possession of it.

There is an application from New Orleans to the United States to have that property ceded to them. I hope this will have no influence in this House. The city of New Orleans has claimed the bature as their own property, but the court having decided against them, in favor of Mr. Livingston, they now say it belongs to the United States, and pray a gift of it. If the property is half as valuable as it is represented, I am for keeping it, if it belongs to us. I am not for purchasing their good will by giving them this property, even if it is ours. But, if it is not ours, it would be criminal to give it. Charity is of divine command, but the charity recommended by Scripture is giving what is our own. If charity consisted in giving away other people's property, few of us would want that grace. Before, then, we can grant the request of New Orleans, we must ascertain whether the bature belongs to us or not. I cannot consent to give Mr. Livingston's property to propitiate them, if it be his, nor to give it if it be ours, until the right is settled and the value ascertained. I hope, Mr. Speaker, we will proceed to act in this case without further delay.

MR. JACKSON'S CIRCULAR.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

According to the request of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of the 11th instant.

H. OF R.

DECEMBER, 1809.

I now lay before them a printed "copy of a paper purporting to be a circular letter from Mr. Jackson to the British Consuls in the United States," as received in a gazette at the Department of State; and also a printed paper, received in a letter from our Minister in London, purporting to be a copy of a despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d of January last.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 12, 1809.

[The first paper enclosed was the "Independent American," of November 21, containing a copy of the "Circular." The second was a piece cut out of a London newspaper.]

The circular is as follows:

WASHINGTON, November 13, 1809.

(Circular.)

SIR: I have to inform you, with much regret, that the facts which it has been my duty to state in my official correspondence with Mr. Smith, have been deemed by the President of the United States to afford a sufficient motive for breaking off an important negotiation, and for putting an end to all communication whatever with me as the Minister charged with that negotiation, so interesting to both nations, and on one most material point of which an answer has not even been returned to an official and written overture. One of the facts alluded to has been admitted by the Secretary of State himself, in his letter to me of the 10th October, viz: that the three conditions forming the substance of Mr. Erskine's original instructions were submitted to him by that gentleman; the other, viz: that that instruction is the only one in which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it related, is known to me by the instructions which I have myself received. In stating these facts, and in adhering to them, as my duty imperiously enjoined me to do, in order to repel the frequent charges of ill faith which have been made against His Majesty's Government, I could not imagine that offence would be taken at it by the American Government, as most certainly none could be intended on my part; and this view of the subject has been made known to Mr. Smith. But, as I am informed by him, that no further communication will be received from me, I conceive that I have no alternative left, which is consistent with the King's dignity, but to withdraw altogether from this city, and to wait elsewhere the arrival of His Majesty's commands upon the unlooked-for turn which has thus been given to his affairs in this country. I mean in the interval to make New York the place of my residence, where you will henceforward please to direct your communications to me, as I shall be accompanied by every member of His Majesty's mission.

I am, &amp;c.

F. J. JACKSON.

On motion of Mr. QUINCY, these papers were ordered to be printed—for the motion 59, against it 40.

MONDAY, December 18.

Another member, to wit: from New York, HERMAN KNICKERBOCKER, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary, transmitting his report, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the first instant, requesting information touching any settlement, contrary to law, on the public lands in Madison county, Mississippi Territory; which were read, and referred to the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the citizens of Madison county, aforesaid, to elect a member to the General Assembly of said Territory.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee appointed on the fourth instant, on the petition of Josiah H. Webb, presented a bill for the relief of Josiah H. Webb; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. POTTER,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the benefit of drawback of duties upon exportation on all goods, wares, and merchandise, subject thereto, that may be transported by land from the district of Newport, in Rhode Island, to Boston, in Massachusetts, and from said Boston, to said Newport.

On motion of Mr. HAVEN,

Ordered, That the letter and report of the commissioners under the act for the relief of the refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, made on the twenty-first of April, one thousand eight hundred and six, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FISK, from the committee appointed, on the fourth instant, for the purpose, presented a bill providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. LOVE,

Ordered, That the petition of the Common Council of Alexandria, presented, on the 21st of November, 1808, be referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. LOVE,

Ordered, That the petition of sundry inhabitants of the District of Columbia, presented on the 16th of March, 1808, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend certain privileges therein mentioned to Joseph Joshua Dyster," reported the said bill with amendments; which were, with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by Mr. SHEFFY, on the eleventh instant, in relation to the conflicting claims to the hature in the city of New Orleans: Whereupon, the said resolutions, together with the representation of the Mayor, Aldermen, and citizens, and the petition of sundry inhabitants of the said city of New Orleans, presented on the seventh instant, were referred to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. MCKIM's propositions, to instruct the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the propriety of passing countervailing commercial regulations, were taken up and agreed to.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Yazoo Land Claim.

H. OF R.

INTRUDERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. POINDEXTER observed that a resolution had been laid on the table, some time ago, by a gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. MILLER,) proposing the repeal of the law authorizing the President of the United States to expel intruders from the public lands. Mr. P. said, that he was averse to the repeal of the law, but thought some parts of it arbitrary and unconstitutional, and therefore wished it modified. Without designating the parts to which he objected, he said the following resolution would show his object in rising at present:

Resolved, That the Committee of Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the act, entitled "An act to prohibit settlements being made on the public lands until authorized by law," and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

YAZOO CLAIM.

Mr. TROUP called for the consideration of the motion made by him on Friday last for printing, for the use of the House, certain papers relative to the Yazoo claim.

Mr. BACON moved to amend it, so as to include the following papers: the act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the 7th day of January, 1795, granting to sundry companies and individuals certain lands therein described; the Message of the President of the United States communicated to this House on the 17th day of February, 1795; an act of Congress, passed the 7th day of April, 1798, for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory; and an act supplemental to the last-mentioned act, passed the 10th day of May, 1800; and the report of the Committee of Claims on the memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts and others, purchasers under the Georgia and Mississippi Company, made to this House on the 18th day of January, 1805.

Mr. TROUP had no objection to include in his motion all the papers mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts but the first. The House could not get at the act there alluded to, because the virtue of the people of Georgia had induced them solemnly to consign it to the flames, and nothing of it remained but its ashes, from which it could not, Phoenix-like, revive. It had been committed to the flames, because it was an unconstitutional act of an unconstitutional Legislature; a Legislature unconstitutional, because corrupted; an act unconstitutional, because resulting from, and originating in, fraud. He asked the House whether they would sanction the corrupt act of the Legislature of Georgia, when, in the most solemn manner, the people of Georgia had consigned it to oblivion? Unless for the purpose of insult to the State of Georgia, the House would not, in any manner, sanction such an act. It would be, in effect, to legislate for the State of Georgia, which this House had no right to do.

Mr. BACON said, that the fraud of the transaction had been alleged against the petition referred last week, as a reason why it should not be considered. It was impossible to get at a correct understanding of the circumstances attending the grant, unless the House had the act in its possession. How would it be made to appear that the Legislature had acted corruptly, except its act, and the names of the members concurring in it, were produced? He knew not how the gentleman would prove the corruption which he had pledged himself to prove without that act. And Mr. B. said he was desirous of affording every convenience to the gentleman in the task he had undertaken. As to the act having been burnt, he said he was much mistaken or he had seen copies of it in the printed documents in the Clerk's library. The House, by ordering it to be printed, would not express any opinion on the validity of the act.

Mr. TROUP observed that as much of the act of 1795 as was necessary for the purpose alluded to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, was recorded in the act of 1796, and so much he had no objection to have printed, as it was a matter of record. As to the names of the corrupt members, they were also on record.

Mr. BACON replied that, as much of the act of 1795 as was necessary for the purpose of the rescinding Legislature had been published in the act of 1796, it was not to be supposed, without imputing to that Legislature any improper motive, that any more of it would have been published in the act. But he was desirous of seeing the whole of the act.

Mr. BIBB remarked, to show that this act was not on record, that a year or two after the passage of the rescinding act, certain gentlemen had been appointed to publish a digest of the laws of the State of Georgia. They happened to be in favor of the Yazoo claim, and insisted upon inserting in the work the act of 1795. The people of Georgia would not permit it, and the book in which this act was inserted was declared by the Legislature not to be a digest of the laws of Georgia.

Mr. LIVERMORE made some further observations of the same tenor as those of Mr. BACON, and Mr. TROUP replied.

When the question was taken on including the paper objected to by Mr. TROUP, it was negatived—53 to 46.

And Mr. TROUP accepting the other papers as a part of his motion, the whole was agreed to—57 to 22.

Mr. POINDEXTER offered the following resolution, as connected with this subject:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to lay before this House an abstract of all British patents, warrants, or orders of survey, filed in his office, agreeably to the several acts of Congress regulating the grants of land and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee.

Mr. P. said, that a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) had, the other day, contended that the reservation of five millions of acres in one of the above acts had in view the claim of the Yazoo purchasers. This construction had been denied on this floor as well as in the Legislature of Georgia. But, Mr. P. said, his present object was to see whether the claims already made on this land, did not exceed five millions of acres. If so, the residue left for the Yazoo claimants would amount to just nothing; and this House would be wholly precluded from acting on the subject of their petition.

The motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. LOVE presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Washington, praying for an act of incorporation.—Referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, 61 to 48, on the resolution from the Senate, expressive of the approbation of the conduct of the Executive in refusing to hold any further communication with Mr. Jackson.

Mr. RHEA moved that the Committee rise and report their agreement to the resolution.

Mr. GOLD said, if he was in order, he would move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. He would merely observe that the resolution proposed a few days previous by him and laid before the President, calling for certain papers, had not yet been complied with. As gentlemen had agreed to that resolution, he would thank them to explain their reasons for thus urging the consideration of the resolution, before the papers had been obtained. He thought it a most extraordinary course, and would be obliged to the gentlemen for an explanation of their motives.

Mr. GARDENIER said, that on a question of such great importance as the present, and from which such serious and perhaps ruinous consequences to the United States might result, as he had the honor of stating on a previous occasion, the House could not proceed with too much deliberation. It ought to have all the information which it could possibly obtain upon every great question which might come before it. Such was the opinion which he had expressed when the two resolutions, of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY,) had been proposed to the House. On this question the Committee should not proceed without all the documents before them. The House would surely consult its own dignity, and not, after having called for information in relation to the question, part of which had been received, proceed to its discussion before even the part received had been printed, and before part of it had been communicated at all. The House could not conceive it proper to proceed to the discussion of the resolution, without giving time to obtain that information which it had itself, by consenting to call for it, deemed necessary and useful. He did not think it necessary to urge any arguments in addition to those which had before convinced the House of the propriety of obtaining the information; because, perhaps, none could be added, and because if a contrary spirit to that which had then prevailed now existed, and a disposition was entertained to force the question, all reasons would be vain. If the House was so determined, it must proceed to the discussion of the resolutions from the Senate, without the documents before them, and without that information which it had before declared necessary to the inquiry. He could not think this a proper course; and therefore, for the honor of the House and the interest of the country, he hoped the motion of his colleague (Mr. GOLD) would prevail.

Mr. RHEA said, he should forbear to make any observations upon the merits of the resolution before the Committee. He wished to ask the Chairman if the motion that the Committee should rise and report progress would supersede the motion for rising and reporting the agreement to the resolutions. He hoped, however, that the House would not be obliged to listen to a lengthy discussion upon the resolutions from the Senate. I will put the question to gentlemen, said Mr. R., what are we doing here? What have we done? I do not speak in relation to the petty business of individuals, but to the wounds of the country, inflicted by the foreign Powers. What have we done in order to heal their wounds? Let gentlemen put their hands upon their breasts and answer the question. I will not consent to investigate the claims of private citizens, until the great questions concerning the interests of the country are first discussed; I will then be willing to take them up. He said the nation expected decision on the question. And would the House, would the Representatives of the people, forbear to do what was imperiously required of them? He hoped they would not wait for the papers required. They could have no bearing upon the resolution; which only required the House to express an opinion in relation to the conduct of the Executive and of Mr. Jackson. He would again ask, "what are we doing here?" He would be willing to investigate questions of minor importance when they had got through with that great question. The resolution was said to be of little importance. He thought otherwise. He believed it to be a question of great moment. But he hoped there would be a silent vote upon it. He thought it a time when decision should take place of discussion; and therefore hoped the Committee would rise and report the resolution. He asked the decision of the Chair, whether, after a motion to rise and report the resolution had been made, a motion to rise and report progress could be in order?

The CHAIRMAN decided that the latter motion superseded the same.

Mr. DANA.—The inquiry of the gentleman last up (Mr. RHEA) is a very pertinent one. What do we here? If it is determined that gentlemen shall act and vote upon important subjects without information, well may the question be asked, what do we here? And is it so necessary that we must proceed instantly to the discussion of this subject? Is it in a moment to liberate the country from the difficulties by which it is surrounded? After so many ineffectual struggles by the Government to free the nation from the dangers which have been yearly increasing, is it so that this resolution possesses the magic power of instantly freeing us from all our difficulties; reinstating us in our rights; and rendering us respected by foreign nations? The gentleman calls upon us to act, and not to deliberate; to decide, and not to discuss. Is it for this purpose that we are placed here? No, sir. It is the peculiar province of the Legislature always to act with calmness and deliberation; not to hurry forward with precipitancy and passion. Does the gentleman from Tennessee believe that we are placed here with the mere zeal of soldiers? I had always thought we were more to resemble the character of officers. Or are we upon important occasions to act first, and get our information afterwards? Are we first to lay down our conclusions, and then deduce the premises? He could see no necessity of acting with this precipitancy; and he hoped the House would proceed with proper calmness and deliberation, that the subject would not be pressed until gentlemen had all the necessary information before them, and that the Committee would agree to rise and report progress.

Mr. W. ALSTON had voted for the resolution of the gentleman from New York, under the supposition that those who had supported it, would not, if the President should return no answer before the House wished to take up the resolution from the Senate, attempt to delay its consideration on that account. He found this was not the case; and he should not consent to delay the consideration of the resolution, to wait for papers which the President in the answer reported by the gentleman who had moved the information, had not even promised to send. He should not consent to wait, on account of conversation which perhaps never took place; and for papers which very probably had no existence. At all events, they could have no bearing upon the question, and let them contain what they might, they could not alter his opinion in relation to the question before the Committee. He had not voted for them on that ground. If this information were obtained, it might be expected, as was the case when the House agreed to the call proposed by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) that other papers would be demanded. It was always an easy matter for gentlemen who did not wish to meet a question, to find means for delaying it in a call for information.

Mr. GOLD observed, that the gentleman last up did not appear to recollect the import of the information requested by the resolution he had submitted to the House. The information called for embraced communications respecting conversations known to have taken place between Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Canning, in regard to a most important subject, and one which had been a principal cause of the difficulties and complaints of the United States for a long time past—no less a subject than the Orders in Council. This information it was important to obtain. He did not come here to act without debate. He did not come prejudiced upon a question, and prepared to vote without information. It was said that they had not come there to deliberate, but to decide. That delay would be improper, and that it was necessary to act with promptitude. This had been said as if the State was in imminent danger, and as if the enemy were at the Capitol. Such language might have suited the officers who were sometimes appointed in Greece to inspire men to mount the ramparts when the foe was at the gates; but it did not become the Legislators of the Union, called upon calmly to deliberate on the nation's rights. Such precipitancy would ill become the dignified representatives of a free people. He expressed himself in these terms, because he had understood gentlemen as committing themselves, when they voted for the information embraced by his resolution, not to take up the resolution from the Senate until the communication from the President should be received. He had believed them, as admitting by their vote, that the information was necessary to the consideration of the subject now before the Committee. He could not conceive what had induced the sudden change. He had understood the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. ALSTON) as making some kind of critical remark on the answer which the President had given to the committee who presented the resolution. The answer was a usual and satisfactory one. It was such as was customary with the President when information of an important nature was requested, and which required deliberation. There were resolutions embracing calls of a specific nature, to which specific answers were equally returned, but the resolution alluded to was worded in such a manner as must induce the President to deliberate, inasmuch as the information requested was of an important nature, and as it left the selection of such parts of the documents as might be proper, to the Executive. He hoped that gentlemen would not press the question on the resolution until that information was communicated, and that the committee would rise and report progress.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, in answer to the gentleman from North Carolina, who had seemed to suppose that the conversation called for by the resolution from the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GOLD,) might never have taken place, he would read a part of the letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney dated November 23d: "This condition, too, appears to have originated in a mistake of your meaning in a conversation of Mr. Canning, as noted by yourself, and in an inference thence deduced as to the disposition of this Government." The conversation must certainly have taken place; and as Mr. Smith declares the third proposition to have originated in a mistake, it was important to know what that mistake was. If a mistake actually had arisen, it was important that the House should know it, and that the nation should know it. What injury could arise from delaying the question a few days? It was not of so pressing a nature that it should be thus hurried through the House. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. RHEA) seemed to suppose that this resolution would put an end to all the difficulties in which the country was involved. If this were the fact, there would not be a man in the nation who would not sincerely wish it success. He wished to have an opportunity of seeing the resolution from the Senate fully discussed. He would not say what his opinion was upon its merits; but he wished, if he had any doubts on the propriety of its passage, to state those doubts, and express his sentiments. It was not candid for gentlemen to say that they did not want the information to make up their opinions. It was undertaking to judge for those who might want the information; and was not a fair course of proceeding, unless gentlemen in the minority were in the same condition with those who had lost their reason. A decision upon this question without discussion would be nothing but decision. And without information, it would be equal to deciding in the dark. This course could be of no utility unless gentlemen meant to pass the resolution by a coup de main; unless it was their intention to carry their point by surprise. He hoped the resolution would be discussed; and that the discussion would be carried on with calmness and without passion. Passion might do extremely well in the field of battle; but reason was the only proper guide in a deliberative assembly.

Mr. PITKIN seconded the motion that the Committee rise and report progress, with a view to give an opportunity for obtaining the information requested by the House, previous to the discussion of the question now before the Committee. It was supposed by some gentlemen that the information would have some bearing upon the joint resolution. In this respect there might be different sentiments. But gentlemen owed it to the courtesy which ought always to prevail, not to decide until the information expected was obtained. And although they might not think that information, as other gentlemen did, relevant to the subject under consideration, yet they owed it to the same kind of courtesy, not to prejudge the bearing of the paper until it should be submitted. He would agree that this principle might be carried too far; and that it would not be proper to refuse acting upon a resolution at all, until the information desired had been submitted. But in the present instance no Message had been received from the President in answer to the resolution. That the resolution was one of great importance all would agree. That it would amount, if passed, to a conditional declaration of war, he believed would not be denied—at least it appeared to him in that light. When, therefore, a resolution was under consideration, of so great importance as to contain a pledge of a conditional declaration of war, he hoped its consideration would not be precipitated. He trusted that it would be fully debated; that courtesy would prevail, and a little delay take place; and that the final question would not be unnecessarily pressed upon the House.

Mr. BACON made a few remarks tending to show that he might without any inconsistency, having voted for the information requested, oppose the rising of the Committee to report progress, because he did not believe the information demanded could have any bearing upon the question before the Committee. He thought gentlemen would be puzzled to introduce any part of the information called for, into the discussion of the concurrent resolution. But he could very well apprehend how they would contrive to introduce arguments into the debate in relation to the denial of this information. He could already see a disposition among gentlemen to proceed in this way. He might perhaps differ with some of his friends upon this point, as he did in regard to the calls for information; but he was not for throwing an advantage possessed by the friends of the resolution into the hands of its opposers. He disliked to be met in this manner. He was against giving them an opportunity, in the consideration of the main question, of introducing this collateral one. Besides, it would save no time, for as long a period would be occupied in discussing this extraneous point, as would be consumed in a delay for the information. Upon the whole, therefore, he would, to avoid being met under the disadvantages alluded to, vote for the Committee's rising and reporting progress.

Mr. WHEATON did not know precisely what bearing the information called for would have upon the question; but it was granted that the resolution from the Senate involved questions, the decision of which might be of very great consequence to the interests and happiness of the people of this country. It was not therefore to be presumed that this resolution was to be suddenly debated, or to be debated without all the information which could be obtained in relation to a case considered by all as so very important. Some gentlemen wished for the information which had been lately called for. The House had previously indulged them; and had consented to have all the light thrown upon the subject of the resolution which might be thought necessary. It had agreed to get such information from the President as he might think proper to communicate. The resolution called upon the House to justify the Administration in resenting the disrespectful conduct of Mr. Jackson towards it. While it was engaged in so doing it should take care not to act in the same way. If the House, after having requested information from the President in relation to a particular resolution, should proceed to act upon that resolution without waiting for his communication, it would be evidently disrespectful to him. It would neither show respect for the President, nor for themselves, if the House proceeded to act without the information from him. He did not presume it would be proper to delay a question forever because that information could not be obtained; but, after having asked, it would be improper not to wait a sufficient time to receive it. He was of opinion that the President did mean to supply the information which was called for, and be therefore thought it would be most proper to delay the resolution until it was obtained.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

Mr. RHEA again urged some of the reasons which induced him to oppose the delaying of the question, and the rising of the Committee to report progress; in which he could see no utility or advantage.

Mr. NEWTON was always desirous of getting a direct vote upon the merits of the resolution from the Senate. He had therefore voted for the information requested; because he did not wish that the discussion of it should be directed by any collateral points whatever. The information, indeed, might bear upon the great question of our foreign relations; but was not connected with the present case. As he was, however, desirous of getting at the main question on this resolution, he would agree to the rising of the Committee. The gentleman from Connecticut had said that the House should not proceed on the discussion of this great question with too much celerity. Upon examination he found that the subject had been brought before the Senate on the fifth of December, 1809! In order, as he before stated, that they might get at the discussion of the main question, without the interference of any extraneous circumstances, he should vote for the Committee's rising and obtaining leave to sit again.

Mr. GARDENIER again rose to address the Chair, when a Message was announced from the President of the United States, containing the information alluded to in the foregoing debate. The Chairman of the Committee informed Mr. G. that he was entitled to the floor. Mr. G. said he would not detain the Committee, in order that it might the sooner rise to read the Message from the President, which he believed was the best reason which could be urged upon the subject.

The Message is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Agreeably to the request expressed in the resolution of the thirteenth instant, I lay before the House extracts from the correspondence of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at London.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 16, 1809.

After the Message and documents were read, they were ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMILE observed, that the objection to discussion was now removed, and moved that the House again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole. Motion negatived, 57 to 40, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 19.

Mr. MACON, from the committee appointed on the first instant, made a report of such rules and orders as are proper to be observed in this House; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom is committed the resolutions submitted by Mr. BACON, on the seventh instant, in relation to indecorous language in debate, and to the practice of duelling.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill, to deprive, in certain cases, vessels of their American character, and to prevent, under certain disabilities, any citizen of the United States taking a license from any foreign Power to navigate the ocean, or trade with any other foreign or independent Power; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. LOVE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, praying that an act may be passed incorporating a company for the purpose of making, as far as the line of the District of Columbia, a road leading in the most direct route from the Capitol to Fredericktown, in Maryland, and a road passing over the Washington bridge, in the proper direction to Staunton, in Virginia.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of William and Elias Rector. The bill was reported with an amendment, which was agreed to by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee of Public Lands, presented a bill concerning claims to lands in the Mississippi Territory, granted by the British Government of West Florida; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, five thousand copies of the Message from the President of the United States, received yesterday, were ordered to be printed for the use of the members.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. MACON, from the committee on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our foreign relations, reported a bill respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France; and for other purposes.

[The 1st section prohibits all public vessels belonging to Great Britain or France from entering the harbors of the United States, subject to certain specified exceptions.

The 2nd section prescribes the punishment of those who shall aid the infraction of this provision.

The 3d section prohibits all vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen of either, from entering the harbors of the United States.

The 4th section prohibits the importation into the United States of goods from Great Britain or Ireland, and France, and their colonies; or of goods from any foreign port which are the growth, produce, or manufacture, of Great Britain or France; unless in vessels owned wholly by citizens of the United States.

The above provisions to take immediate effect.

The 5th section prohibits, after the fifteenth of April next, the importation of goods from Great Britain and France, and their colonies, unless imported directly therefrom.

The 6th, 7th and 8th sections, affix penalties to the infraction of these provisions.

The 9th section authorizes the President, in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, to declare the same by proclamation, after which the prohibitions of this act on the commerce of the nation so doing shall cease.

The 11th section repeals the act to amend and continue in force certain parts of the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States, and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

The 12th section limits this act to the end of the next session of Congress.]

The bill was read a second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for Friday next.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

On motion of Mr. REEA, of Tennessee, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the joint resolution from the Senate, approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to hold further communication with Mr. Jackson, the British Minister.

Mr. REEA, of Tennessee, expressed a hope that now no objection would be made to the passage of the resolution. The only objection yet made, as far as he had understood, was a doubt expressed by some gentlemen as to who was the first who suggested the project of enforcing the laws of the United States by the navy of Great Britain. An insidious attempt had been made to palm it on the Administration of this Government, which had failed to be proved. It had next been attempted to fix the stigma on Mr. Pinkney. This also had been disproved; and when they came to the bottom of the business, by the Message yesterday received from the President, it had been found that the whole affair had arisen from the suggestion of that renowned and famous politician, Mr. Canning, and to have proceeded from the same source as all our difficulties for years past.

Mr. R. was decidedly in favor of the resolution. Let me ask you, sir, said he, who have an interest in the adoption of this resolution? Every individual in the United States, I reply. The President of the United States, in his official capacity, is a Representative of all the citizens of the United States. Every citizen, then, is interested in his acts, and in supporting them when there is occasion. It is the duty of every nation, like individuals, to adopt those things necessary to its own happiness and interest. Will any one deny that the adoption of this resolution will have a happy effect on our union as a people, and respectability as a nation? Mr. Jackson did not make his offensive remarks in his individual character, but as a representative of the King of Great Britain. So far as we know, the conduct of Mr. Jackson may be traced to the source whence he derives his authority; and, although Mr. Jackson were to be punished for his conduct by the British Government, as Admiral Berkeley was, by being recalled, yet, no doubt we should, in the same manner, hear of his being appointed to another mission. That, however, is the care of his own Government—self-preservation is our duty. I am confident that no attempt will be made to justify Mr. Jackson in his conduct, or to palliate it. It could only be palliated on the principle of invincible error or invincible ignorance, which will not be pleaded in excuse for him. His offence had the full appearance of predetermination, because he persevered in it, though warned to desist, declaring that he was only asserting matter of fact. Now, when the whole evidence on this case is examined, his facts appear to be bottomed on his own suggestions, from beginning to end. I impute everything that he has done to the source of his power; and thus a question arises between this Government and that of Britain. In such a case, I shall justify my own Government, because I believe it to be in the right. And I think the Administration has made a noble stand in behalf of the offended dignity of the nation; and I hope the resolution before us, approving of that conduct, will meet the unanimous consent of the Committee.

Mr. POTTER said, as he was called upon to vote on this resolution, he felt it his duty to give his reasons for so doing. He deemed it of some importance to examine the origin of this business, and to take a view of it, through its different stages to its final conclusion. It appears, said he, that after the United States had laid the embargo, the Executive instructed our Minister in London to inform the British nation that it was not meant in hostility to them, but as a mere innocent municipal regulation of our own. Whatever they may have thought of it, at that time, they soon found that its features were materially changed, and that it was stripped of all its innocence, and held up in this country as a coercive measure; and such an one as, if continued and rigorously enforced, would soon bring that haughty, imperious nation, to a sense of its duty, and that she would be compelled, from motives of self-preservation, to do us justice. Notwithstanding they may have suffered some little inconvenience at first, their sullen Ministry scorned to complain. After hearing nothing from them, and suffering very much ourselves, our Minister in London, I believe, was instructed to barter away this innocent regulation of ours for their great system of national policy, their Orders in Council. This attempt failed, and all we got for this offer, were the insolent sarcasms of Mr. Canning, which were too much for any American to bear. Our Administration, thus, finding that our commerce was ruined, and of course our revenue at an end—our expenses increasing, and our Treasury exhausting; and having already seen the fate of a former Administration, which resorted to loans and direct taxes to support this Government, and, like prudent mariners, wishing to avoid the rock upon which a former Administration had split—was anxious to find out some plan to extricate this country from the very serious difficulties it was then laboring under; and their good sense led them all to the same remedy, and about the same time; for we find all the Heads of Departments (although not altogether, yet separately, and about the same time) in conversation with the British Minister on the same subject, and holding nearly the same language—and what was the result of all this? It appears that Mr. Erskine communicated what he honestly understood to be the meaning and intentions of our Administration to Mr. Canning, who then transmitted to him the despatch of the 23d of January, containing those three propositions which he had supposed would be acceptable here, and would form the basis of a treaty. This, sir, is the manner in which this difficulty originated; and it would have been well for the parties in this conversation, as well as for this country, if this conversation had been reduced to writing; for it appears, that when Mr. Erskine received this despatch, he did not discover anything in it more than he expected, from the information he had given to Mr. Canning; but, when he offered it for Mr. Smith's consideration, he found, for the first time, that he had misunderstood our Government, and that those terms were not only inadmissible, but insolent. Now, sir, it is clear that the despatch of the 23d January did not authorize Mr. Erskine to make the settlement which he agreed to; nor does it appear that he was asked by Mr. Smith if he had any other instructions different from those, nor did Mr. Erskine at that time pretend that he had any. The inference to be drawn is conclusive, that he had not; because, if he had previous instructions that would have authorized the settlement that he made, they certainly would have authorized him to have made the settlement first contemplated in those conversations, which was of importance to his nation, without waiting for the despatch of January. As he did not do it, it is clear, in my mind, that he had no power before—that the despatch gave him none—and it does not appear that he had any afterwards.

Now, sir, what was it the duty of our Government under all circumstances to have done? The parties are now in the same situation as to powers as before this despatch arrived, although Mr. Smith informs Mr. Jackson that he understood that Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions to regulate his conduct, and that upon one of them, which never had been communicated to himself or the public, rested the jurisdiction of the terms finally agreed upon. This I gather from the following sentence in a letter from Mr. Jackson to Mr. Smith:

"You have informed me that you understood that Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions by which to regulate his conduct; and that upon one of them, which had not been communicated either to you or to the public, was to be rested the jurisdiction of the terms finally agreed upon between you and him."

Pray, sir, how did Mr. Smith understand this? He says it was not communicated to him nor the public. How came he by this information? Was it not the duty of Mr. Smith to have demanded of Mr. Erskine those powers before this settlement was made and finally agreed upon? because it was the opinion of all parties, that, before the despatch, he had no authority, and that gave him none, and it has never been pretended that he had any subsequent instructions. As this agreement was on our part honestly and immediately to be carried into execution, it was his indispensable duty to have seen the powers of the British Minister. It might have been otherwise if it was not to be carried into execution until ratified by both nations.

Now, sir, if it is proper to compare small things with great—and I do not know but common sense is the same in all kinds of business—suppose a gentleman should come to me to sell me your real estate, and we should converse about the terms, and when it was found that we probably could agree upon the price, he was then to observe that he would apply to you for a power to make the deed, and our bargain is suspended for him to produce it, and that, when it is produced, the terms are altered, and it contains no power to convey; what would be the conduct of a prudent man about to pay his money down? He would wait until another power was obtained from you authorizing the conveyance, or for a deed executed by yourself, placing no reliance on his responsibility. Would he go upon the existence of a power which, in the first instance, never had been even pretended, the existence of which had never been communicated to him or the public? No, sir, he would demand the sight of this invisible, wonder-working, miraculous power. Now, sir, in what do these two cases differ? I presume, at the time of their conversations, the first thing to be attended to was to see which could outdo the other in politeness, in professions of personal respect, and then in professions of a sincere desire of their respective nations to do each other justice, and to terminate in an amicable and friendly manner all former differences which led to the conversation, which was the origin of this business; and when both parties were together, nothing was wanting but a power in Mr. Erskine, which, when it came, was found incompetent. If, therefore, he had no power in the first instance, the despatch gave him none, and we hear of none until after the disavowal; and then he talks of the spirit of his several letters of instructions.

Let us now, sir, examine the documents for the insult alluded to in the resolution before us. It really seems to me that our Government had heard so much of the insolence of this Mr. Jackson, that they expected to be insulted, and anticipated it, and dismissed him to prevent its occurring in reality. I cannot for myself see any insult that is offered to our Government. It appears that Mr. Jackson was urged for the reasons of the disavowal; that he stated it was entered into without competent powers, and in violation of particular instructions. He was urged again, and made the same answer. The question would admit of no other, unless he had acknowledged that it was entered into with full powers in Mr.

Erskine so to do, and that the British Government had dishonorably refused to ratify it. Mr. POTTER quoted the following as the offensive passages in Mr. Jackson's letters:

"I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing you that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were, at the time, in substance, made known to you; no stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred than by a reference to the terms of your agreement."

"I have shown that that agreement was not concluded in virtue of a full power, and that the instructions given on the occasion were violated."

"When I informed you that the agreement concluded here in April last had been framed in deviation from the instructions given for the occasion, my explanation was intended to apply to both parts of that agreement; that nothing required by the most scrupulous accuracy may be wanting, I now add, that the deviation consisted in not recording in the official document signed here the abrogation of the President's proclamation of the 2d of July, 1807, as well as the two reserves specified in the paper of memoranda enclosed in my official letter to you of the 27th ultimo. There is another motive for the disavowal of this part of the arrangement, considered to be so strong and so self-evident upon the very face of the transaction, that I am not commanded to do more than indicate it in the manner I have already done. By this forbearance His Majesty conceives that he is giving an additional pledge of his sincere disposition to maintain a good understanding with the United States."

"I must beg your very particular attention to the circumstance that His Majesty's ratification has been withheld, not because the agreement was concluded without a full power, but because it was altogether irreconcilable to the instructions on which it was professedly founded."

"Indubitably his agreement would nevertheless have been ratified had not the instructions, which in this case took the place of a full power, been violated."

In all these passages, Mr. POTTER said he could see no insult.

For my own part, said he. I do not believe the English want to settle with us at this time, although they may have wished it formerly, because all our restrictions on our commerce operate in her favor. Our embargo taught her a lesson that she never ought to have known; though I believe it was laid on from the best of motives. It taught her the imbecility of our own Government to carry it rigidly into execution; and it taught her the value of her possessions in America, and that she could do without us, and that our sufferings by the measure were greater than hers. The non-intercourse operates exclusively in her favor, because we carry our produce half way for her to neutral ports to glut the market, and sell it to her merchants for half price. The growers of the produce have to pay two freights instead of one. And, again, British goods are smuggled into this country by speculators belonging to no nation, and restrained by no laws. The Government receives nothing for duties, and the people get goods for no less money. Even our own vessels take out a coasting license, and go direct to Great Britain, notwithstanding the prohibition of the non-intercourse law.

We have been insulted and plundered for fifteen years past by the belligerent nations; and, to be sure, sir, we have borne it with Christian patience, upon the principle, I presume, that it is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong. When we have been smote on one cheek, we have turned the other. When they have taken our cloak we have been ready to give up our coat, and to ask what they would please to have next. We have declared many years since, if my memory serves me, that we were the most wise and enlightened nation in the world, and at another time we have seriously declared that we would not submit. Notwithstanding all this, when we have been insulted by one nation we protest, when by another we remonstrate, and when a national ship is attacked in our own waters, in sight of the smoke of our chimneys, we issue a proclamation; and, last of all, when many gentlemen think that we have been grossly insulted by a foreign Minister, that stain is to be wiped away by the force of a joint resolution. If an individual finds fault with one nation's abusing us, his remark is immediately met by observing, that other nations have abused us as much. If we apply to France to do us justice, she says we must resist the Orders in Council of Great Britain, and help her to restore the freedom of the seas. American commerce will then have acquired all its liberty, and will be sure of finding favor in the ports of France. If we apply to Great Britain for justice, we are told that we must resist the Berlin decree. We have been expecting justice from those nations because we were just ourselves; but national justice and honor are now out of the question with those nations, and avarice, ambition, and power, are substituted in their room. It is not enough for us to fold up our arms and consider, because we are just and honest, that we are the peculiar favorites of Heaven, and are to be entirely exempt from the calamities that are now overwhelming the civilized world. We must prepare for the worst. I would make a firm and temperate declaration of our neutral rights, and I would demand of France and England a recognition of them. In the meantime I would permit the merchants to arm in defence of those rights, acting only in the defensive, instructing them in such manner as that no act of theirs should commit the peace of the country. This, sir, would replenish your Treasury, and prevent the necessity of resorting to loans and direct taxes. The merchants have already become very rich by the commerce of the country, and they know best how to manage their own affairs. If they should lose a few vessels carrying to market the surplus produce of this country, it would be no loss to the country. What the merchant lost the farmer would gain; the property would all be in the country.

As to this resolution, I am against it on general principles. I never did vote for a resolve of approbation, or for an address under any Administration, nor ever will. If we can have resolutions to approve, we can have them to disapprove; and it ought to be a sufficient consolation to the President, and I presume it is, to believe that he squares his conduct by the Constitution, and that it meets the approbation of his own conscience. But this, I presume, is to be held up to convince foreign nations that we are not divided, and that we will stand by our Government. At the last session, this business of approving was considered anti-republican, and the minority could not then be permitted to approve the President's conduct. It was then of no importance to be unanimous; but now it seems as though everything that was near and dear to us depended on the passage of this joint resolution. I have known one President ruined by addresses and votes of approbation; it was then held up that the minority was opposed to the Administration, and that we were abroad considered a divided people; and the President was addressed from States, corporations, and societies, from all parts of the United States, approving everything he had done, and pledging their lives and fortunes to support him in anything he might do. Instead of his taking this as a mere compliment, that cost nothing, he took it all in earnest; but as soon as his Constitutional period of re-election came round, the people soon convinced him of his error, and dismissed him from office, which gave him such offense that he has declared war against himself, his own conduct, and Administration, and has even extended his resentment beyond the grave, and charged almost all the unpopular acts of his Administration upon one of the greatest men the world ever knew, and who is not in existence to answer for himself; when there was not one of those acts, during his Administration, but what, if he had refused his signature and approbation, could have been negatived, as there was not a Constitutional majority to carry any one of them without his approbation. Perhaps the same thing is now to be urged as was then—a division among the people, and the necessity of uniting. There is no division among the people now; there was none then; the division is between the ins and outs. The ins want to keep in, and the outs want to get in, and the division is not so much among the people as it is among those who want the people's money; and they now understand this thing very well, and have found that the question never has been, in reality, how much of their money should be spent, but who should have it; not how the Government should be administered, but who should administer it; and not how many offices should be created, but who should fill them. That there are parties in the United States cannot be denied, and that it is for the interest of the people that it should be so is equally true; and I could wish, let whatever party may have the ascendancy in the United States, that they may have but a small majority, which will make them more attentive to business, and more circumspect in their conduct, knowing that a few changes may place them in a minority; but I consider it otherwise whenever a party come into power with an overwhelming majority.

This resolution has for its object not only the approbating of the President's conduct, but the reprobating that of a foreign Minister, and convicting him of a gross, premeditated insult. Mr. Jackson only persists in asserting what he knew himself, and that was, that Mr. Erskine had no other instructions than those of the 23d of January, and that the settlement made was not only without authority, but in violation of those instructions; he does not say that our Government knew or did not know he had no other, but merely states what he knew himself. For my own part I consider his dismissal as a hasty, imprudent measure, although I could have seen no great good to be derived by his staying, as the terms held out in the despatch to Mr. Erskine could never have been submitted to; but as his stay in this country could have done us no possible injury, and his dismissal, and in the manner it has taken place, and the way we are now following it up, may have a tendency to precipitate us into a war unprepared, which I consider one of the greatest evils that can afflict any nation, I think it would have been well to have extended our patience and forbearance in this respect a little farther.

• Mr. DANA.—A solemn legislative decision is proposed by the resolution now before us from the Senate.

As it regards a public Minister, accredited from one of the great belligerent Powers of Europe, our relations with that Power may be considered as within the fair range of discussion.

This country has claimed the privilege of a neutral Power—one of whose eminent duties is, a conduct strictly and truly impartial between the respective parties engaged in war. Of course the purport of this resolution may be compared with the tenor of our conduct respecting the great rival belligerent, and our relations with this Power may be properly taken into consideration. The question, therefore, is open to a discussion of our affairs with Great Britain and France.

The resolution proposes to declare a determination to employ the full force of the nation in a certain event. To execute this declaration may require various means, and means highly interesting to our country. When, therefore, we are considering the propriety of making a declaration so serious, we may inquire respecting our naval and military means of enforcing it. We may inquire, what augmentation of our naval and military force would be necessary; what is contemplated, and what are our pecuniary resources for meeting the extraordinary expenditure which may be requisite.

The resolution has reference to a public Minister of the highest order ever sent from this country. We have in our statutes provided for sending abroad no Minister of a higher grade than that of Minister Plenipotentiary or Envoy Extraordinary. As it respects the intercourse with the foreign world, and the rules established by the maxims of public law, and the general usages of civilized nations, this is not a question which concerns only the United States, and which we can determine by our separate vote. It is a question to which the whole civilized world is party, because implicating principles which it has sanctioned; and in our proceedings upon it we should not act in a manner which would make us blush if the whole civilized world were present to witness our deliberations.

These general considerations are connected with the resolution, in addition to another interesting inquiry, whether the terms of the resolution are warranted, in point of fact, by the transactions which have taken place, as they appear in evidence before us.

The subjects which I have mentioned are so intricate and so various and so vast, that a complete discussion of them is what I do not here adventure to undertake, but to a part of them I propose to direct some observations.

Before I particularly examine the resolution, I request permission to state certain positions, in which I agree, so that gentlemen may know where we agree and where we differ; because, in this case, as in others, I would diminish the grounds of controversy.

Without going back to the full extent of our wrongs from Great Britain and France, I recur to decrees affecting neutral commerce which have been issued by the Dictator of Continental Europe, and to orders issued by the British King in Council: Omitting a particular discussion of them, I wish to be distinctly understood as avowing that I do not approve either the one or the other; and, from the most deliberate judgment which I have been able to form, on such examination as I have given them, I express my disapprobation of both. I consider them both as neither consistent with the rights of the United States, nor warranted by the principles of public law. And I utterly disclaim the whole doctrine of belligerent blockade, without a blockading force. The principles on which these opinions are founded, I will not detain the House by stating at the present time.

Further, I agree that the conditions stated in the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d January, 1809, (especially the two last of them,) are such as ought not to be admitted explicitly or by implication on the part of this Government. I admit not only that we ought not to stipulate that the British navy might take our vessels, but that we should not, even by implication, cede the principle itself. Of course, therefore, I do not admit, when any vessel of the British, under their Orders in Council, should have taken one of our vessels, violating a law of the United States, that it would not be perfectly competent for the United States to take cognizance of the question whether she had violated our laws or not; for it would be a question solely between our Government and its citizens. To have a law of the United States to be executed by the British navy, under the cognizance of their Admiralty, would be to relinquish an attribute of our sovereignty, and to abandon the precious duty of executing judgment in mercy.

I further agree that the privilege of a foreign Minister here accredited does not extend to charging the Government of my country with the detestable turpitude of intentional falsification in a matter of fact; and, on this subject, I do not inquire whether the charge be well or ill founded. It is not admissible within the principles of diplomatic intercourse. If the Government submit to it in terms, intercourse, on the principles of equality, must cease.

I agree, further, that the immunity of a foreign Minister here accredited does not extend to entering a public appeal against the Executive administration. Whether the appeal be well or ill founded, in point of fact, it is not for the foreign Minister to put the Administration of this country upon its arraignment at the public bar; it is not for him, through the medium of the press, to profess peace towards the people, and proclaim war against the palace.

I agree further, that the President of the United States has the Constitutional competence to receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers, and that, in the power to receive is included the power to refuse for reasonable cause, and that he is constitutionally the judge of this reasonable cause. Whenever, therefore, a foreign Minister has committed an offence for which he ought to be refused liberty to communicate with the Administration, the President may refuse it. If an offence more gross has been committed, for which the Minister ought to be required to depart from the United States, the President may order his departure. If the Minister has committed an atrocious crime for which he ought to suffer corporal punishment, the President may order him to be sent home, that he may be punished by his own Government; and the gentlemen of the sword are the proper officers to be employed for this purpose. As the Minister has a rank of high public trust, let him be treated with public decency; but, in a case of atrocious criminality, let the proceeding have the character of decision, that he may be duly punished. Such I admit to be the power of the President of the United States, without any statute whatever existing on the subject.

Having made these admissions, I may hope gentlemen will acknowledge that I am not solicitous to extend the points of difference between us.

The inquiry arises, whether the language of this resolution is warranted by facts, as they appear before us? On this point I am willing, at this time, to waive dispute; not that I admit the resolution to be warranted in point of fact, for the documents laid before us, together with the Messages of the President of the United States, afford matter for much, very much observation interesting to the country. But on that subject I will not now occupy the time of the House; for, in the view which I take of the resolution, I propose to consider it on the basis of what is contained in the letter of the 23d of November from Mr. Smith, the Secretary of State, to Mr. Pinkney, our Minister in London, and the Message of the President, communicated to Congress at the opening of this session. I am not, at present, about to dispute whether an adjustment of differences was probable; I may even admit that. After the irritating and disgusting circumstances attending the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Jackson, it was not probable that they would have come to any definite adjustment; and I am willing to admit that Mr. Jackson may have waited for proposals to be made to him, as proposals were made to France—without this Power having first made proposals to us—if I do not misunderstand the President's Message.

Taking up this resolution and the letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney, I ask, in the first place, what is the import of the resolution? Is it merely approbating the conduct of the President of the United States, and a manifestation of respect and decorum towards him? For myself, if it be merely the language of approbation of the conduct of the President of the United States, I am not making objection to it on the ground that we ought not to pass a vote of approbation. I am afflicted with no scruples of that sort. If gentlemen who opposed a resolution of approbation at the last session, choose now to support this resolution on the principle which they then opposed, it is not for me to object to it for such cause. If they are disposed to consider their former arguments as so many collections of straw, it is not for me to deny to the gentlemen the privilege of overturning and destroying such works of their own hands. Nay, further, if this resolution is to be considered as having the nature of a joint address to the President of the United States, I make no objection on that account. Some gentlemen may heretofore have seemed to be afflicted at the manner of addressing the President of the United States as being too adulatory. I am not troubled with their past scruples on the subject of addresses, and, considering this as a joint address to the President, should make no such objection.

If the principle of approbation be considered as involving an equal right to censure, I make no objection to the resolution on that account. But of this subject I would be cautious, because I might censure wrongly. The President might have reasons for his conduct which I did not know. I would be cautious also, because if I should censure where censure ought not to be pronounced, I might do injury by concurring in a procedure tending to diminish the confidence of the nation in the Chief Magistrate.

But this is not a resolution merely approbating the conduct of the President of the United States. It is not called for by anything which has been done. It is not conformable to the true spirit of what has taken place. It is rather reproachful to the President than honoring him with praise. It is a denunciation of a foreign Minister here accredited; it is expressed in language which your Chief Magistrate would not adopt in his Message to Congress, and which he did not authorize in addressing our Minister abroad. Sir, public Ministers and other public men may be exposed to wrongs of two kinds, personal violence, and violence done to their reputation. The case is rare indeed in which a public Minister, a Secretary of State, or Head of any other Department commits an offence, legally exposing him to corporeal punishment. But on a question of decorum should we permit ourselves to outrage it? When reprehending a violation of decorum, shall we ourselves violate it? Sir, I request you to look at the letter written by the Secretary of State, under the direction of the President, to our Minister in London. I will not say that the Secretary of State, in his letter to Mr. Pinkney, meant to affirm that those printers in this country who publish matters affecting the reputation of a public Minister, might be prosecuted at common law here, and be subjected to fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court; and yet, if that be not his meaning, where is the law to which a foreign Minister could have recourse? But his language at least shows, that he considers a wrong done to the reputation of a public Minister as an injury for which he may reasonably complain, as he may for a wrong done to his person; and that however freely our citizens may speak or publish their sentiments, it is not proper in our public acts to speak wantonly against any person coming here in a public character from a foreign Government. When a public Minister has been admitted to come here in the faith of an honorable reception, shall the National Legislature undertake to blast his character? Gentlemen will feel it as becoming them to be cautious of inflicting this wound on the reputation of a stranger, having a public trust of high distinction and thus honorably received by our Administration, especially when they are not warranted by the course adopted on the part of the Administration.

Let us then, sir, compare the language of this resolution with the language adopted by the President of the United States. The resolution charges "Francis J. Jackson Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty near the United States," with having used, in official correspondence, a language highly indecorous and insolent; and then, going on in form of elaborate climax, language still more insolent and affronting; next, outrageous and premeditated insults; then, a still more direct and aggravated insult and affront to the American people and their Government, an insidious attempt to excite resentments and distrusts; and lastly, appealing through false or fallacious disguises. Let us now observe in what manner the President has thought proper to speak by the Secretary of State, with respect to what is called the appeal in the letter, headed "Circular," and purporting to be a letter from Mr. Jackson to the British Consuls in the United States. After stating it in the letter to Mr. Pinkney, the Secretary of State remarks "it can only be regarded as a virtual address to the American people of a representation previously addressed to their Govern'ment; a procedure which cannot fail to be seen ' in its true light by his Sovereign." So much on that subject. With respect to the other, there is this general phraseology: "The observations to ' which so much extent has been given in this letter,

' with those contained in the correspondence with
' Mr. Jackson, will make you fully acquainted ' with the conduct and the character he has de' veloped; with the necessity of the step taken in ' refusing further communications with him, and ' with the grounds on which the President in' structs you to request that he may be imme' diately recalled. You are particularly instruct' ed at the same time, in making those commu' nications, to do it in a manner that will leave no ' doubt of the undiminished desire of the United ' States to unite in all the means, the best calcu' lated to establish the relations of the two coun' tries on the solid foundation of justice, of friend' ship, and of mutual interest." Considering this instruction as marking the disposition of the Executive, does the resolution before us correspond with that disposition as expressed in the letter to our Minister at London, or in the President's Message to Congress at the opening of the present session?

Much has been said (not however on this floor) of some case or cases in which a similar course is supposed to have been deemed necessary; and a case has been mentioned of a Minister from the Court of Vienna in the reign of George the First.
But, as it has not been urged in this debate, I content myself at this time with observing, that the case of the Imperial Minister (De Palm) was essentially distinguished from the present, and that as far as I recollect it I find nothing to warrant the resolution before us.

I have some objection, however, to the present resolution, because it seems, although I do not here charge it as a fact, to have been too much copied from a precedent to be found in a resolution of a British House of Commons respecting an affair materially different; and in some part there seems to have been copied a language better adapted to auxiliaries in pugilism than to the legislators of a great and enlightened Republic, a language which the British Parliament did not address to their King. A resolution was moved in the House of Commons for an address; and on that motion there was objection as to manner of expression, although the resolution was ultimately carried without a contradictory vote.
But in the joint Address of the Houses of Parliament to the King, the phraseology was varied, and they did not address him in the style of boxing familiarity.

Thus far, sir, I have considered the resolution before us as not warranted by the official language of the President of the United States and the Secretary of State. In addition to what has already been observed with this view, it is to be noted, that the President, in his Message to Congress, has not even mentioned Mr. Jackson's circular letter to the British Consuls. This letter, indeed, and its being put into circulation, are noticed, but not with laborious hardness of phrase, in the letter of the 23d of November, from Secretary Smith to Mr. Pinkney. But the President of the United States did not regard the subject as worthy to be named by him when giving to Congress information of the state of the Union and recommending the measures necessary and expedient.

The President's Message and the Secretary's letter appear expressive of a disposition to use language which should not in its manner be offensive to the British Government itself, and to suspend proceedings of an hostile character until an answer may be received from that Government.
This resolution appears to be formed on directly opposite principles. What, sir, can Congress, can any men think it necessary to say that they will support the President in refusing to receive a communication from a foreign Minister, or, that they will support him with the whole force of the nation in so refusing? You do not expect the Minister to force a communication on the President.
This is too absurd, and cannot be the real meaning of the resolution. The only manly idea intended to be conveyed to the resolution in this respect, would be, that the Congress mean to support the President in a conflict with the British Government eventually. Why, sir, is such language at the present time proposed for adoption, as if it were either necessary or expedient? The British Government perhaps may not be perfectly satisfied with the conduct of this Administration towards the Minister from Great Britain to the United States, and yet it might be thought proper to recall him; because unacceptable to the President of the United States, because the President has requested his recall, and because under existing circumstances the further continuance of such a Minister in this country might not be useful to the Government that sent him. Do you wish to place the affair in such a state as to render it peculiarly difficult for the British Government to recall him, except in prelude to war?

Do you approve the procedure of the President in causing application to be made by the Secretary of State in a style of guarded decorum, instructing the American Minister at London to request the recall of the British Minister who has been here received, and will you send a menace to accompany the request? In this view what is the proposed resolution, if it be anything?
What is meant by a solemn pledge to the world for calling into action the whole force of a nation, eventually, against a foreign Power? If language has certainty of meaning, it is a provisional defiance of war, solemnly made known to the world—a national challenge to battle. Have you weighed fully all that is implied in this defiance of war? Are you prepared to sustain it fully by all your means? Or, can you say that you do not intend this? Is it possible that the representatives of the people of the United States can solemnly announce to the world a pledge to call into action the whole force of the nation, and yet that it can be all idle words? That in fact they intend to do no such thing as they promise? Are we indeed prepared to pronounce ourselves fallen thus low?

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Considering gentlemen as serious in announcing this pledge to the world, and giving this national defiance to war, I ask what is to be the result of the conflict if we are not prepared for it, and how far are we prepared? This inquiry suggests an attention to the resolution under two different aspects, as we know the relations of Executive departments to be affected or varied according to views of peace or war. On questions of great national controversy, the Department of State has in charge to attend to those gratifying themes, the rights, the honor, and dignity of the nation and Government. And these themes may be presented the more for public attention as the state of affairs becomes hostile, until their most imposing influence over the public passions is realized amidst the operations of declared war. In a state of peace, the Department of the Treasury may attract regard from redundancy of revenue and extinction of debt, and projects of improvement. But the frown of war reverses the scene. On this Department is now devolved the task of devising ways and means for supplying extraordinary expenditure or waste. The ungrateful subjects of attention are the exhaustion of the Treasury—loans—taxation—the option of difficulties in procuring money—the choice between different modes of imposing pecuniary burdens on the people. If this resolution be pursued according to its import, additional charges on the people must be required. To give eclat to the Department of State, can you be willing to embarrass the Department of the Treasury?

There is another reason why we should be cautious. Can it be expedient for the public to make experiments tending to waste the national character? More than two years have elapsed since an interdictory proclamation was fulminated from the palace against the British navy. A squadron concerned in committing the offence mentioned in the proclamation, was suffered to remain for several months within the waters of the United States, in open defiance of the Executive interdict and the exclusive right of territorial jurisdiction. There that squadron was suffered to remain, although the power given to the President by statute, I believe, extended to employing his military and naval forces of the United States and the militia, at the President's discretion, to compel respect to his proclamation. The offending squadron was suffered to remain there, notwithstanding the number which the Government had of those highly recommended aquatico-terrene vehicles denominated gunboats. The indignity then was greater than is to be found in the subject of this resolution. Yet the Government did not then assert the paramount right of territorial sovereignty with effect. With such experience, what honor, what utility, is to be expected from passing his resolution now? What is to be expected but irritation without benefit, embarrassment without retri- cation? When they attend to your measures, will foreign Powers believe that such a resolution proves your title to respect?

A further reason against the resolution is founded on the conduct of the President of the United States; it is the consideration, that he has not ordered the British Minister (Mr. Jackson) to depart from this country. Until that order is given, no such resolution as the present ought to be passed. The extraordinary spectacle is now exhibited of a Minister accredited from a foreign Government, who is denied the eminent, direct privilege of the diplomatic character, the privilege of communicating with the Government to which he is sent, and yet is to enjoy immunities which are auxiliary to the exercise of diplomatic functions. The case is novel in the proceedings of this country. It is so extraordinary that the official publication of the refusal to receive communications from him might have been considered as a disavowal by the Administration of his diplomatic character, and consequently as a deprivation of his characteristic immunities, had not a certificate of special safe-guard to the contrary been given by the Administration. The case is clearly different from that of the Spanish Minister, who, I believe, was admitted to have written communication with the Administration, but was admonished by authority of the President not to appear in the City of Washington, who refused, however, to obey the admonition, but was suffered to come and remain, according to his avowed determination, within this extensive city, as he might find convenient or for the interest of the King his master.

These are some of the reasons for which, although it were supposed correct in statement of facts, I am not prepared to vote in favor of the resolution on the table.

It is a consideration of a different nature, that the phraseology of the resolution tends to draw aside the attention by placing it on a basis which is objectionable as being incorrect, not as in point of fact, but of principle. This, sir, leads me to consider the litigated subject of the powers of Mr. Erskine to negotiate and conclude the provisional arrangement of the last April. On this subject, I leave at once the greater part of the discussion between the Secretary of State and Mr. Jackson, as not distinctly exhibiting the specific character of the question. I consider a public Minister not authorized in virtue of a general letter of credence to stipulate any one thing to be done on the part of his Government. If I understand the course of argument on the part of the Secretary of State, it seems to assume as a basis, that a public Minister here accredited is entitled to stipulate for his Government in virtue of his letter of credence without further authority, or at least that the Government here should regard the Minister, in virtue of his letter of credence, as authorized to conclude such stipulations so as to be obligatory on the Government giving the letter of credence. This I do not admit to be correct either in principle or usage.

Permit me, sir, to call upon gentlemen to recur to the time when the public law of Christendom in relation to diplomatic intercourse may be considered as assuming regularity of character. I request gentlemen to recur with me to the epoch of the Treaty of Westphalia. The great work of the learned Grotius, on war and peace, first reduced to general system the body of public law in Europe. He was one of the great masters in science who have appeared formed to rise above contemporary competitors in their respective spheres, and acknowledged beyond dispute to be greater than those preceding or succeeding them. As such he was first made known with distinguishing honor by Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, one of the greatest men and heroes of his age or of the world. The work of Grotius was published in the year 1625; and the Treaty of Westphalia was concluded in the year 1648, consisting of a treaty concluded at Munster and another at Osnaburg, within the Circle of Westphalia, and both signed on the same day, being the result of a Congress composed of Ambassadors, Plenipotentiaries, Ministers, Delegates, Commissioners, Deputies, indeed almost, if not completely, every grade or description of governmental representation known in the whole Christian world. The conclusion of the treaty put an end to conferences which had long holden Europe in suspense, and terminated the famous Thirty Years War. Never before or since, I presume, were so many diplomatic characters assembled for negotiation or mediation, and such and so various interests to be arranged at one time by treaty. The great interests of the Catholic and Reformed religions in Europe, the Emperor, the Electors, Princes, and States of the Germanic body, France, Sweden, the States General, with the respective allies, all were concerned. Prussia was not then erected into a kingdom, and Russia had not taken rank under the Great Peter among the civilized Powers of Europe. From the nature of the affairs and the great number of public men from different portions of Europe, the famous Congress in Westphalia, after the publication of Grotius had attained high distinction, served to make known and establish extensively the principles constituting the public rules of intercourse among the Governments of the Christian world.

We are now called upon to pronounce respecting a question depending on those rules of intercourse as recognised and illustrated by national usage. What is the principle that protects and sustains in full immunity the Ministers of the United States in Britain, in France, in Prussia, or in any part of the civilized world? It is the respect due to those rules, a respect which the various Governments of whatever form have concurred in manifesting and enforcing. Nor can we claim to hold a course in diplomacy incompatible with such national usage, unless we strike ourselves out of the general pale of Christendom.

This question, therefore, is to be considered not merely as an abstract discussion; but we have now to inquire what is a letter of credence according to the public law and diplomatic usage of Europe? Is it an authority in stipulating anything to be done on the part of the Government sending the Minister? If it be, I request to know the proof: according to my apprehension, it is not; and I desire gentlemen to enlighten me on this point, if I err. If this opinion be erroneous

I should hope it might be made evident with respect to myself, that I may not continue in error. From whatever source there can be derived any aid to ascertain the true principle, if gentlemen honored by especial confidence respecting affairs of State, if any of the law officers or even members of the Cabinet, would be pleased to contribute to the stock of legislative information, I solicit the correction of any error, if indeed I err, on this topic.

With these sentiments, I do not propound for discussion any question respecting the negative knowledge of the Administration. I do not inquire whether the Executive Administration of the United States had a knowledge that Mr. Erskine had not competent powers, or had a knowledge that he was not instructed to accede to the provisional arrangement between him and the Administration in April. The question is, did the Administration know that Mr. Erskine had the necessary authority? The question is not, what was the ignorance, but what was the knowledge of the Administration? Was Mr. Erskine known to have any power for making that arrangement?

Permit me now, sir, to state what I understand to be a letter of credence. It is a letter of State, addressed to the Government to which a Minister is sent, and it is expressive of the character and grade of diplomacy with which he is invested; if the Minister be received, he must be received according to the letter of credence, and not otherwise. This is so much the established course, that where a Minister remaining at any Government is promoted to a higher grade of diplomacy, he presents letters of recall as to the lower grade and of credence as to the higher grade in which he is to be received. The authority which a Minister has in virtue of a letter of credence is not to make promises for his Government. He may declare facts; he may present complaints and remonstrances; he may exhibit his powers of argument; he may discuss topics of great interest, but he cannot stipulate for anything to be done as obligatory on his Government. For this purpose, the Minister must have a distinct authority. This I understand to be the general usage, not, however, without exception. The exception has been made with respect to a Nuncio or Legate from the Pope, whose letter of credence was so framed as to include the necessary authority to negotiate or conclude arrangements. This authority was added to the necessary clauses of a letter of credence, and the essentials of two diplomatic documents were comprehended in one. But the mere letter of credence gives no such authority. In support of these positions, I would refer gentlemen to writers on public law whom I presume they will admit to be correct on this topic—Martens, Vattel, Wicquefort; writers of authority certainly as to the known diplomatic usage in Europe. Others perhaps might have been named if I had found opportunity in this place to consult all the writers worthy of attention.

It may now be proper to state what I consider to be the full power, which expression is almost technically appropriate in diplomatic language. It is a document not addressed to the Government to which a Minister is sent. It is in the nature of an open letter addressed to mankind in general, and committing to the Minister bearing it the necessary authority to negotiate and eventually conclude terms of agreement respecting the subject or subjects therein mentioned. It is a public commission expressing the powers to be exercised, a document of ample form, a letter patent, a public act authenticated under the seal of Government. And this the Minister exhibits in manifestation of his being fully empowered to negotiate and stipulate on the part of his Government. The full powers are especially proper in the more solemn agreements, and in cases of formal treaty between independent nations.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Where some temporary stipulation is contemplated, or some particular affair not deemed of primary importance is to be arranged by agreement, if there be a Minister already residing with the foreign Government, there is not always the same formality with respect to the distinct authority given to the Minister. In such case, a patent of full power is not made out in ample form; but the proper officer of State dispatches a letter of instruction giving the distinct authority necessary for the proposed negotiation. Yet, whether the Minister undertakes to negotiate in virtue of a technical full power, or in virtue of a letter of instruction, it is proper to exhibit his distinct authority before signing any arrangement or stipulation, intended to be mutually obligatory on the respective Governments. He may fairly and with perfect propriety be called upon to exhibit such authority in cases where the terms are to be expressly reserved for the ratification of his own Government. But if the terms of engagement are to be deemed obligatory and acted upon accordingly as soon as signed by the negotiators, and no ratification is reserved, it is more peculiarly proper for the negotiating Minister to exhibit the official evidence of his authority to enter into stipulations. If he does not exhibit the evidence, it becomes the incumbent duty of the other negotiating party to call for it before the conclusion of any such terms of engagement, or to refuse to conclude the terms until the evidence is exhibited officially and the authority ascertained to be sufficient. In this case, if the distinct authority be not offered or called for and found adequate, there is a mistake and of course a failure in duty on the part of the Administration in concluding the engagement; unless indeed the transaction may have been understood at the time as not warranted by regular authority, but expected to be confirmed as an acceptable project. I express myself in these terms, wishing to be strictly decorous in manner and believing the general principle correct. When an Administration enters into engagements or stipulations with a foreign Minister, to be immediately executed without any reservation, it is incumbent on the Administration to require the official exhibition of the distinct authority of the Minister for making the stipulations; and if the terms be concluded by signature and delivered before the authority has been exhibited and ascertained to be adequate, there is a mistake and of course a failure on the part of the Administration.

When, therefore, gentlemen speak of Mr. Erskine's having competent powers to make the provisional arrangement in April, they may be desired to produce the regular evidence of the fact. If the negotiation was conducted according to the course of diplomatic usage and strict propriety, there is the regular evidence of his being authorized to make the arrangement, and it can be produced. If he had a patent of full power, a copy authenticated by the Minister, or a Secretary acting under him, would doubtless be considered proper evidence to be deposited with the archives in manifestation of the authority of the British Government to conclude the arrangement. If his authority was contained in any letter or letters of instruction, the authentic copy of such authority would, with the like propriety, be deposited in the Department of State.

The language of a part of the correspondence respecting Mr. Erskine's authority seems to be grounded on mistake. The Administration is spoken of as not knowing the restriction of his authority. This language might have been accurate if he had exhibited a full power giving him authority to negotiate and conclude stipulations: because, in the case of a full power embracing the whole subject of negotiation, the Minister might be restricted in the exercise of his power by orders from his Government instructing him how to proceed and on what he might conclude. And when he has restrictive instructions for his own direction and a full power to be exhibited to the Government with which the negotiation is had, if he departs from the instructions, his own Government, notwithstanding the formal plenitude of his power, is considered as not bound to ratify his acts, especially if he has departed from his instructions on a subject of importance to the honor or rights which he was instructed to maintain. But, in the case before us, where can we find sufficient reason for speaking of the restriction of authority as being unknown if the authority was known? There does not appear to have been any restriction, except what was inherent in the nature of the authority. The same despatch, the letter of instruction, gave the authority and defined its extent. In the nature of the thing, the Minister could not have more authority than was given to him; and he neither was nor could be authorized to act beyond the extent of his authority. How then, in this case, is it possible to separate the authority from what is called the restriction? If, therefore, the negotiation has been concluded according to the principles of public law, the evidence of the authority, such as it existed and appeared in fact, neither more nor less, can be produced. Unless there be some evidence of a distinct authority ostensibly competent to the arrangement, where is the propriety of insisting on explanations as if there had been apparent authority? Explanation is obviously due where the Minister has exhibited a competent full power, on the faith of which an arrangement has been concluded, if his Government disavows the arrangement because of departure from instructions on points important to the Government. The violation of instructions, and the importance of the matters respecting which they have been violated, constitute the basis of the proper explanation, to which may be added proper compensation for the failure, with due attention to the time and manner of making the explanation.

The case of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine has sometimes been compared to that of the treaty signed at London on the 31st of December, 1806, by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney. But the cases are materially different. That negotiation was conducted with observable propriety and decorum by the negotiators of each party. Perhaps no case is to be found in which the respective Ministers insisted with more firmness and perseverance on the claims, interests, and pretensions of their own Governments, and yet preserved towards each other so much decorum and honorable attention in their official and personal communications. Although Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney had full powers for the negotiation, they had instructions separate from those general powers, and by these instructions they were restricted according to the specified terms. In acceding to the articles as they believed expedient under the existing circumstances, they gave notice to the British Plenipotentiaries, that they proceeded to the signature of the treaty on their own responsibility, and that the letter of their instructions did not warrant the arrangement in the manner in which it was made; although they believed the essential objects of their instructions to be attained in substance for practical benefit to the United States, and accordingly they trusted that the terms would be approved by our Government.

The British Government had not just cause to complain and insist on formal explanations merely because the treaty was disavowed in this country, although the full powers of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, on the part of the United States, were exhibited and appeared competent; for the restriction contained in the instructions had been fairly communicated to the British Plenipotentiaries. Accordingly, the British Secretary of State, afterwards in his official note, stating the King's acquiescence in the President's refusal to ratify the treaty, did not complain on that account, but he adverted to the failure of conforming to instructions as a matter between the American Government and its Commissioners.

On the subject of that treaty, however, there is another inquiry which concerns ourselves, and on which the British Government can have no right to say anything; for it is not their concern, but ours exclusively. The inquiry is, whether the treaty was not of so much importance, concluded after so much discussion, and by such persons, and under such circumstances, that it should have been submitted to the Senate, who might have advised its ratification unconditionally or on condition of such modification as, after full deliberation, might be judged best for the United States? Whether the affairs of the country have not since been changing from bad to worse, instead of securing more beneficial terms, or any terms whatever?

With a view to the general subject of letters of credence, and the distinct authority of public Ministers, I will now refer to examples in the history of our own Government, without detaining you by citations from the works of foreign writers on public law.

The first authority to which I now refer, is the authority of President Madison as President of the United States. I propose to show, that prior to the present session of Congress he believed it proper that a public Minister Plenipotentiary having letters of credence should also have a distinct authority to enable him to stipulate in behalf of his Government. With this view I refer to the Message from the President of the United States at the commencement of the last session of Congress. In that Message, there is a clause relative to the purport of certain instructions for our Ministers at London and Paris, and then immediately follow the expressions which I will now read:

"Soon after these instructions were dispatched, it was found that the British Government, anticipating, from early proceedings of Congress at their last session, the state of our laws, which has been the effect of placing the two belligerent Powers on a footing of equal restrictions, and relying on the conciliatory disposition of the United States, had transmitted to their Legation here, provisional instructions, not only to offer satisfaction for the attack on the frigate Chesapeake, and to make known the determination of His Britannic Majesty to send an Envoy Extraordinary with powers to conclude a treaty on all the points between the two countries; but, moreover, to signify his willingness, in the meantime, to withdraw his Orders in Council, in the persuasion that the intercourse with Great Britain would be renewed on the part of the United States.

"These steps of the British Government led to the correspondence and the proclamation now laid before you; by virtue of which, the commerce between the two countries will be renewable after the tenth day of June next."

The language here is direct as to the fact stated. The fact is mentioned as being unquestionably ascertained, as being discovered and known to the Administration, although perhaps not to the great body of the community, as being known after examination. A mode of expression such as is observable in the Message would be of strong import in cases where persons are bound by oath or affirmation to declare the truth of fact according to evidence. On reviewing the statement communicated to Congress by the President, we extract this sentiment distinctly—it was found that the British Government had transmitted to their Legation here, provisional instructions to signify the willingness of His Britannic Majesty to withdraw his Orders in Council, in the persuasion that the intercourse with Great Britain would be renewed on the part of the United States; and the steps of the British Government led to the correspondence and proclamation laid before Congress. Why should the expressions have been so direct and explicit as to the provisional instructions and their import, if no distinct authority was necessary to give validity to the provisional arrangement? In the proclamation, the Hon. David M. Erskine, His Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, is stated to have made the specified declaration by the order and in the name of his Sovereign. If the letter of credence were believed sufficient to enable the Minister to stipulate for his Government, would the statement have been made so distinctly mentioning the transmitted instructions, the steps of the British Government, the declaration of the Minister by the order of his Sovereign? The President in the full belief of the statement would of course believe the arrangement to have been validly concluded. But, from that Message of the President, may we not justly deduce the inference—a letter of credence does not enable a Minister to make stipulations obligatory on the Government from which he is accredited?

In retracing the history of our Government, the next authority refers us to the Administration of President Jefferson. It is the case of an extraordinary mission comprehending a Minister having the character of Plenipotentiary in ordinary. Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney were appointed Commissioners Extraordinary and Plenipotentiaries for negotiating arrangements with the British Government; and as such they had letters of credence from the United States. Yet they also had full powers in a commission authorizing them to treat severally as well as jointly. This, according to my apprehension, sufficiently appears from a volume of State papers communicated by President Jefferson to the tenth Congress, particularly a letter from Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney. It is dated from the Department of State, the 17th of May, 1806. Permit me, sir, to read the first part of the letter. "Gentlemen: I herewith enclose a commission and letters of credence, authorizing you to treat with the British Government concerning the maritime wrongs which have been committed and the regulation of commerce and navigation between the parties. Your authority is made several as well as joint, as a provision for any contingency depriving either of the cooperation of the other."

We will now recur to the Administration of President Adams, who was so well known as a diplomatic functionary in Europe. Among the State papers which he communicated to Congress, we may find instructive documentary information relative to diplomatic credence and authority. Among those papers is the letter of credence for the Envoys Extraordinary to France according to full form of diplomacy. These are the terms: Credence for Messrs. Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry, Envoys to France.

JOHN ADAMS, President of the United States of America, to the Executive Directory of the French Republic:

Citizens Directors: Desirous of terminating all differences between the United States of America and the French Republic, and of restoring that harmony and good understanding, and that commercial and friendly intercourse, which, from the commencement of their political connexion until lately, have so happily subsisted, I have nominated, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, appointed Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, distinguished citizens of these States, jointly and severally, Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the French Republic, for the purpose of accomplishing the great objects above-mentioned: Wherefore I pray you, Citizens Directors, to give full credence to what they and each of them shall say to you in these respects, in behalf of the United States, and also when they shall assure you of the sincerity of our wishes for the welfare of the French Republic.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the United States of America, at Philadelphia, the thirteenth day of July, in the year 1797, and of the independence of these States the twenty-second.

JOHN ADAMS.

By the President of the United States:

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Secretary of State.

Here gentlemen may observe, that the letter of credence expressly states the objects of the mission extraordinary, and desires full credence to be given to the Envoys in those respects. Says the letter of credence, "I pray you, Citizens Directors, to give full credence to what they and each of them shall say to you in these respects, in behalf of the United States." But did the President then in office suppose the letter of credence even in such a case to give the proper authority for negotiating an arrangement of matters in difference between the two countries? He understood the subject far otherwise; for he believed it proper to authorize the Envoys distinctly, by giving them full powers. If gentlemen will now attend, they may know the terms of this public commission.

JOHN ADAMS, President of the United States of America to all whom these presents shall concern—Greeting:

Know ye: That, for the purpose of terminating all differences, between the United States of America and the French Republic, and of restoring and confirming perfect harmony and good understanding, and re-establishing a commercial and friendly intercourse between them, and reposing especial trust and confidence in the integrity, prudence, and ability of Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, citizens of the said United States, I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed the said Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, jointly and severally, Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States to the French Republic, hereby giving and granting to them, and any and each of them, full power and authority, and also a general and special command, for and in the name of the United States, to meet and confer with the Ministers, Commissioners, or Deputies of the French Republic, being furnished with the like full powers, whether separately or jointly, and with them to treat, consult and negotiate, of and concerning all claims, and all matters and causes of difference, subsisting between the United States and the French Republic, for the purpose of satisfying and terminating the same in a just and equitable manner, and also of and concerning the general commerce between the United States and France, and all other, the dominions of the French Republic, and to conclude and sign a treaty or treaties, convention or conventions, touching the premises; transmitting the same to the President of the United States of America for his final ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, if such advice and consent shall be given.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Philadelphia, the twenty-second day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and of the independence of the United States of America the twenty-first.

JOHN ADAMS.

By the President of the United States:

T. PICKERING, Secretary of State.

The history of the Government presents further authority. Let us remount to the Administration of the first President of the United States, the man first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen! Mr. Hammond was residing at Philadelphia in character of Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain. On the 29th of November, in the year 1791, a letter was addressed to him by the Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, who had returned from Europe, where he is well known to have been a Minister from the United States. After adverting to the inexecution of the 7th article of the definitive treaty of peace, and mentioning the sentiment entertained of the friendly movement then "lately made by the Court of London in sending a Minister," the letter contains these expressions:

"Permit me then, sir, to ask, whether you are instructed to give us explanations of the intentions of your Court as to the execution of the article above quoted?"

"With respect to the commerce of the two countries, we have supposed, that we saw, in several instances, regulations on the part of your Government, which, if reciprocally adopted, would materially injure the interests of both nations.

"On this subject, too, I must beg the favor of you to say, whether you are authorized to conclude or negotiate arrangements with us which may fix the commerce between the two countries on principles of reciprocal advantage?"

The correspondence gives us interesting information applicable to the present subject. Under the Administration of the first President of the United States, the inquiry was made by the Secretary of State officially—whether the accredited British Minister Plenipotentiary was authorized to conclude arrangements respecting commerce, or to negotiate such arrangements? Whether he was instructed to explain the intentions of the British Government as to the execution of an article of the definitive treaty of peace?

It does not seem to have been imagined at that time, that the inquiry could be thought to vary in any respect whatever from the honorable principles of diplomatic intercourse. The answer is to be found in the letter to the Secretary of State from the British Minister Plenipotentiary, bearing date at Philadelphia, the 30th of November, 1791, the next day after the official inquiry was made. Permit me now, sir, to state such parts of this letter as appear the most applicable to the case before us.

"With respect to the non-execution of the 7th article of the definitive treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, which you have recalled to my attention, it is scarcely necessary for me to remark to you, sir, that the King, my master, was induced to suspend the execution of that article on his part, in consequence of the non-compliance on the part of the United States with the engagements contained in the 4th, 5th, and 6th articles of the same treaty. These two objects are therefore so materially connected with each other as not to admit of separation, either in the mode of discussing them, or any subsequent arrangements which may result from that discussion."

"In stating to you, sir, this indispensable consideration, I must at the same time assure you, that, in the confidence of experiencing a similar disposition in the Government of the United States, it is His Majesty's desire to remove every ground and occasion of misunderstanding which may arise between the two countries: and in conformity to that disposition in His Majesty I can add that I am instructed to enter into the discussion of all such measures as may be deemed the most practicable and reasonable for giving effect to those stipulations of the definitive treaty, the execution of which has hitherto been delayed as well by the Government of this country as by that of Great Britain."

"In answer to your question on the subject of the commerce of Great Britain and the United States, I can also inform you, sir, that the King is sincerely disposed to promote and facilitate the commercial intercourse between the two countries, and that I am authorized to communicate to this Government His Majesty's readiness to enter into a negotiation for establishing that intercourse upon principles of reciprocal benefit."

"And I trust I may be permitted to add, that it would be the highest object of my ambition to be the humble instrument of contributing, in any manner, to fix upon a permanent basis the future system of harmony and good understanding between the two countries."

Such is the language of the British Minister Plenipotentiary, Mr. Hammond. He does not seem to have suspected any semblance of indecorum in the official inquiry; for he returned an official answer, such as I have just mentioned, on the subjects of the correspondence, and in the same letter mentioned his sense of obliging expressions of personal regard. The next letter which appears in the published correspondence now before me, is also from Mr. Hammond. The letter is so short, and, in point of principle, it has so near relation to the present subject, that the whole will now be stated as it appears in the printed collection.

Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, to Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State.

SIR: As I am extremely solicitous to avoid any misapprehension of my letter of the 30th ultimo, I have now the honor of stating to you, in explanation of that part of it to which you have adverted in yours of yesterday, that although, as I formerly mentioned in my first conversations with you after my arrival in this country, I am not as yet empowered to conclude any definitive arrangement with respect to the commercial intercourse between the two countries, I still meant it to be understood, that I am fully authorized to enter into a negotiation for that purpose, and into the discussion of such principles as may appear best calculated to promote that object on a basis of reciprocal advantage.

I am further authorized to receive any propositions which this Government may be pleased to make to me upon this subject.

I have the honor to be, with every sentiment of respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,
GEO. HAMMOND.

PHILADELPHIA, December 6, 1791.

In this letter, the distinction is marked between concluding an arrangement and entering into negotiation for that purpose. According to his own statement, although fully authorized to enter into negotiation, the Minister was not empowered to conclude an arrangement respecting the commercial intercourse between the two countries. As to the idea of concluding any definitive commercial arrangement, therefore, there could be no further question under the existing circumstances. The Minister Plenipotentiary had not the competent powers; and nothing ought to be done. And, of course, under the Administration of the first President of the United States, nothing was done. But the British Minister Plenipotentiary undoubtedly believed himself fully authorized to enter into a negotiation; such was his statement, as distinctly made in an official letter to the Secretary of State. What was the consequence? The Secretary of State addressed a letter the next week to the British Minister Plenipotentiary. The letter was short, but very intelligible. Gentlemen are requested to attend to the whole.

Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, to Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain.

SIR: I have laid before the President of the United States the letters of November 30th, and December 6th, with which you honored me; and in consequence thereof, and particularly of that part of your letter of December 6th, where you say that you are fully authorized to enter into a negotiation for the purpose of arranging the commercial intercourse between the two countries, I have the honor to inform you that I am ready to receive a communication of your full powers for that purpose, at any time you shall think proper, and to proceed immediately to their object.

I have, &c. TH. JEFFERSON.

PHILADELPHIA, December 13, 1791.

Such was the principle, and such the style, of diplomatic propriety under the Administration of President WASHINGTON. The British Minister Plenipotentiary returned an answer the following day. I will read every part of it as I find it, that gentlemen may judge on a fair view of the whole.

Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, to Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State.

SIR: In answer to your letter of yesterday, I can only repeat what I have before stated in my first conversations with you after my arrival, and, subsequently, in my letter of the 6th of this month, viz: that I have no special commission empowering me to conclude any definitive arrangement upon the subject of the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the United States. But that I conceive myself fully competent to enter into a negotiation with this Government for that purpose, in the discussion of the principles which may serve as the basis, and constitute the stipulations of any such definitive arrangement.

This opinion of my competency is founded upon my instructions, inasmuch as they are to regulate my personal conduct, and upon the conviction that the letter of credence from His Majesty investing me with a general plenipotentiary character, which I had the honor of presenting to the President of the United States, and his consequent recognition of me in that character, are authorities decidedly adequate to the commencement of a preliminary negotiation.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of great respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,
GEO. HAMMOND.

PHILADELPHIA, December 14, 1791.

The course of correspondence had now shown that the British Minister Plenipotentiary believed himself fully authorized to act as negotiator, because he had presented his letter of credence to the President of the United States, and been received accordingly; and because, too, he had instructions to regulate his personal conduct, but which he did not think proper to communicate, and which he does not appear to have been at liberty to communicate to the American Government.

If the letter of credence could be regarded as authorizing the negotiation, it had already been presented to the President of the United States. That this did not constitute the competent authority, therefore, must have been decided by the President, beyond controversy, at the date of the letter which invited the British Minister Plenipotentiary to communicate his full powers.

It is now to be recollected that, in his letter of the 30th of November, the Minister had mentioned his being instructed to enter into discussions with respect to articles of a definitive treaty which had been concluded, but not fully executed. According to his own decision, he wanted competent authority to conclude a definitive commercial arrangement between the two countries; and, according to the decision of the first President of the United States, undoubtedly he wanted the competent authority to negotiate such arrangement. Any opinions expressed by the Minister in his letters of the 6th and 14th of December could not be supposed to reverse a decision deliberately formed by President WASHINGTON; and a controversial correspondence relative to such opinions might be worse than useless. Of course, it would accord with expedience, as well as diplomatic decorum, to abstain from remarking on those letters in future correspondence. But to discuss the respective claims and complaints might contribute to a distinct knowledge of the affairs, and undoubtedly the Minister might enter into such discussions. No discussion, however multiplied, could constitute a stipulation for anything to be done on the part of the Government of either country. Accordingly, it is worthy of observation, that the letter of the 14th of December, from the British Minister Plenipotentiary, is not mentioned in the letter of the next day from the Secretary of State, who acknowledges the Minister's letter of the 30th of November, without seeming to recollect anything of the intervening correspondence. I will now state the introductory part of this letter from the Secretary of State.

Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, to Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain.

SIR: I am to acknowledge the honor of your letter of November 30th, and to express the satisfaction with which we learn that you are instructed to discuss with us the measures which reason and practicability may dictate, for giving effect to the stipulations of our treaty yet remaining to be executed. I can assure you, on the part of the United States, of every disposition to lessen difficulties by passing over whatever is of smaller concern, and insisting on those matters only which either justice to individuals or public policy render indispensable; and, in order to simplify our discussions by defining precisely their objects, I have the honor to propose that we shall begin by specifying, on each side, the particular acts which each considers to have been done by the other in contravention of the treaty. I shall set the example.

PHILADELPHIA, December 16, 1791.

Such authorities we have before us in the political history of our own country.

On considering the resolution from the Senate, the subject does not appear to be placed on the proper basis. I am against the resolution.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, the Committee now rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, December 20.

Mr. JOHNSON from the Committee of Claims reported unfavorable to the petition of Edward Turner and Thomas Brickell. The reports were severally agreed to.

Mr. LOVE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

An engrossed bill for the relief of William and Elias Rector was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOVE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to amend the charter of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers within the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to hold further communication with Francis J. Jackson.

Mr. McKEE.—I rise to submit a few remarks on the subject of the resolution now under consideration, in violation of a rule which I had prescribed to myself; which was, to take no part in the public discussions of any general question which might come before this House during the present session—a rule to which I might have adhered, had it not been alleged that those who were opposed to a resolution of last session, approbating the President for the prompt manner in which he met the overture made to this Government by Mr Erskine, would act inconsistently by supporting the resolution now on your table.

At the opening of the last session of Congress, the President of the United States communicated to us an arrangement entered into between this Government and Mr. Erskine, the representative of the British Government in America, important in itself, and more so when considered as opening the way to a more extended accommodation. The terms of this arrangement were carried fully into effect by the United States, with the expectation that the terms of the agreement thus concluded would have been carried into operation by the British Government. But, sir, it is now found that this arrangement has been disavowed, the Minister by whom it was made recalled, and Mr. Jackson sent to replace him.

This new Minister, in the explanations which he found it necessary to make to this Government of the causes producing the disavowal on the part of Great Britain, thought proper to use and repeat a language highly indecorous and offensive; and out of those circumstances the present question has arisen.

We find, sir, that this new Minister, in the threshold of his correspondence with Mr. Smith, insinuates that the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, was entered into with bad faith on the part of this Government; for we find the following statement in pages 30 and 31 of the printed documents:

"You state, sir, very truly, that an arrangement had been made between you and Mr. Erskine, and that His Majesty had thought proper to disavow that arrangement.

"I have here, in the outset, to regret the loss of the advantage of verbal intercourse with you, as I should have availed myself of it to inquire whether, by your statement, it were your intention to complain of the disavowal itself, or of a total want of explanation of it, or of the circumstances of that explanation not having been made through me. I observe that in the records of this mission there is no trace of a complaint, on the part of the United States, of His Majesty having disavowed the act of his Minister. You have not, in the conferences we have hitherto held, distinctly announced any such complaint, and I have seen with pleasure, in this forbearance on your part, an instance of that candor, which I doubt not will prevail in all our communications, inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done under such circumstances, as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed."

Mr. Jackson here congratulates himself on the candor and forbearance of Mr. Smith in his failure or refusal to make any complaint whatever of the disavowal of the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, alleging as a reason for the absence of every trace of complaint on the part of the United States, that the arrangement was made under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have followed. The consequences here alluded to, are a disavowal of the act of Mr. Erskine.

Now, sir, if our Executive negotiated an arrangement with Mr. Erskine or any other Minister, under such circumstances as could only lead to a disavowal of the act, by the Government with whose Minister the arrangement was made, and a knowledge of these circumstances rendered it an act of forbearance and candor to make no complaint whatever of the disavowal—it must necessarily follow, that the arrangement thus made was improperly entered into by this Government; inasmuch as a reliance on this arrangement by our citizens had overspread the ocean with American commerce, which was wafted by every gale to distant regions, all subject to the avarice of British cruisers, and this fact was known to those who administered our Government at the time this delusive arrangement was made. This, sir, appears to me to be the fair inference resulting from this sentence, when divested of its diplomatic flummery and reduced to plain English.

Mr. Jackson seems to find a motive for this insinuation from a communication made by Mr. Erskine to the British Government, which he states that he had submitted to the consideration of Mr. Smith, the three conditions mentioned in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January, and inasmuch as the arrangement of April is variant from these three conditions, and substituted (as he states) in lieu of them, he hence infers the undoubted right of His Majesty to disavow the arrangement, and solemnly declares that this was the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with this country.

Mr. Smith replies to Mr. Jackson as follows:

"If there be no trace of complaint against the disavowal in the archives of the mission, it is because this Government could not have entered the complaint before the reasons for the disavowal had been explained, and especially as the explanations were justly and confidently expected through the new functionary. And as to the supposed reserve on my part on this subject, in our several conferences, I did imagine, that my repeated intimations to you of the necessity of satisfactory explanations, as to the disavowal, were sufficient indications of the dissatisfaction of this Government with respect to the disavowal itself."

Mr. Smith, in this reply, seems to manifest a surprise that it should be declared that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d January, was the only one by which that Minister was to regulate his conduct, and this surprise seems the more natural, when, by a reference to the correspondence which took place in April last between Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine, at the time the arrangement was concluded, we find Mr. Erskine submitting, conformably to instructions, certain propositions for the consideration of the American Government. This official declaration that Mr. Erskine had received the instructions of his Government justified this Government to proceed with the negotiation, unless, as it is alleged by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) it became the indispensable duty of this Government to see and examine Mr. Erskine's powers before any arrangement was concluded with him, inasmuch as a ratification of the arrangement of April last, was not reserved—and several ancient authorities are produced in support of this opinion.

Whatever may be the rule of procedure where one Government, by its representative, makes important concessions to another, or where the terms of the agreement are unreasonable or unequal in themselves, I cannot pretend to answer; but where the terms of the agreement are reasonable and equitable in themselves, it has not been the practice of more modern times to demand a sight of the instructions possessed by the Minister making or proposing to make the arrangement. By a reference to the correspondence which took place between Mr. Pinkney, our Minister at London, and Mr. Canning, in which Mr. Pinkney submits certain propositions to the British Government for their consideration, we do not find that Mr. Pinkney was called on to show his instructions, or interrogated respecting them. His official statement, that he was instructed to make the overture, was then deemed sufficient; and although Mr. Canning did not think proper to accede to the terms proposed by Mr. Pinkney, yet no want of power or authority is alleged as a reason for the refusal on his part.

There seems to be a manifest impropriety in the notion of demanding a sight of instructions in ordinary cases, inasmuch as the act of the Minister, in violation of his instructions, would be obligatory on his Government, according to the usages of nations, where a ratification was reserved, in all cases where the terms of the agreement were reasonable and equitable in themselves. Now, sir, what was acquired by this Government, in the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, unreasonable or unequal? Was anything more obtained than a recognition of our natural and indefeasible right freely to navigate the ocean according to the rules of public law—a right belonging equally to all foreign and independent nations? If, by the arrangement of April last, a ratification had been reserved, the British Government would in good faith have been bound to have ratified the agreement, as no good reason could be assigned for failing to do so.

And, sir, this failure to see and examine Mr. Erskine's instructions is not alleged by Mr. Jackson as a cause or reason why this Government had not a right to complain of the disavowal. From this I infer that the official statement contained in Mr. Erskine's correspondence, that he had instructions, and that he was authorized to make the arrangement, was all that was necessary to be known by this Government before the arrangement was entered into, and that the Secretary of State was necessarily led to believe that Mr. Erskine had other letters of instruction than those contained in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January last.

Sir, let us now examine Mr. Jackson's reply to Mr. Smith's statement, in which Mr. Smith declares this Government had not a knowledge that the instruction contained in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January was the only dispatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it relates, and declares, if this fact had been known at the time the arrangement was made, that it would not have been made.

Mr. Jackson, in his reply to Mr. Smith, declares that Mr. Smith was acquainted with the instruction which was given to Mr. Erskine, and that he had no other instruction than that contained in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January. Is it possible to conceive a contradiction more positive than that contained in this reply? If a gentleman in his place states any matter of fact to exist, and he is told in reply that the fact stated is untrue, and that his statement was made with a perfect and intimate knowledge of its falsehood, all the world would at once agree he was insulted. And the present case does not differ from the case I put, except that it is obscured with diplomatic verbiage.

But, sir, Mr. Smith in his letter of the 18th of November expresses his dissatisfaction at the liberty taken by Mr. Jackson, and declares such insinuations inadmissible. And what is Mr. Jackson's reply to Mr. Smith? Why, sir, we find in page seventy-one of the printed documents, the following:

"You will find that in my correspondence with you, I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation, where I was unable to substantiate a fact. To facts, such as I have become acquainted with them, I have scrupulously adhered, and in so doing I must continue, whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is called in question, to vindicate its honor and dignity, in the manner that appears to me best calculated for that purpose."

What were the insinuations which Mr. Jackson had made? Why, first, that the arrangement negotiated with Mr. Erskine was done under such circumstances as could only lead to a disavowal, and it would have been an act destitute of candor on the part of this Government to make any complaint of that disavowal; and, secondly, that Mr. Smith was perfectly acquainted with Mr. Erskine's instructions, and knew he had but the one instruction contained in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January. Notwithstanding Mr. Smith positively denies any such knowledge, and complains of such insinuations as inadmissible, yet Mr. Jackson would least of all make an insinuation where he could not substantiate a fact; and to facts, such as he had become acquainted with them, he had scrupulously adhered, and in so doing would continue!

This, sir, is a justification of all the charges fulminated against this Government by Mr. Jackson, and a notice given that he would continue to charge them with bad faith in the formation of the arrangement, and of possessing a knowledge of Mr. Erskine's instructions; which had been positively denied.

What course was left for the Administration to pursue? Why, sir, either to hang down their ears like the sluggish ass, and bear with patience Mr. Jackson's flippant sarcasms, or cut him off in the manner they have done, and put an end to farther opportunities of abusing this Government. The course taken was surely the only proper one; and the question now before us is, whether we will support our Government in the measure thus taken, whatever consequences may grow out of it? I am prepared to say that we will.

It has been stated by the gentleman from Rhode Island, that he did not see where this insult was given. Why, sir, it does appear to my mind as clear and as evident as the light of day is to my sense of sight, from an examination of the documents, that an insult was given to this Government beyond bearing; and I should also think that no man could examine those documents with a determination to give the facts stated their proper weight, who would not make the same discovery. But, sir, according to the old adage, none so blind as him who will not see.

I come now to that part of the subject which principally induced me to rise, which is to show (if I can) that there exists no inconsistency in my opinion on the resolution proposed at the last session by a gentleman from Virginia not now in his place, and the support which I mean to give the present resolution. Indeed, sir, I might retort on the gentleman from Connecticut, inasmuch as he was in favor of the resolution of last session and is now opposed to this. If the two resolutions are substantially similar, he must be inconsistent as well as myself, and it would prove only that we had changed sides. But, sir, I take this change as presenting an irrefutable proof that the two cases are dissimilar, and the intelligence of that gentleman has discovered this fact. The resolution of the last session was merely approbatory of the conduct of the President for the performance of an act which appears to me to have been merely a ministerial one. Congress had vested the President with a power to remove by a proclamation the interdiction of our trade with Great Britain and France, or either of them, on the happening of a particular contingency. The contingency happened, in the opinion of the President, and he discharged his duty. But, sir, the resolution on your table is a pledge on the part of Congress to the President, to the nation, and to the world, that we will support him in the measure which he has taken, whatever consequences may grow out of it.

The gentleman from Connecticut has considered this resolution in the nature of a defiance of war, and that preparations are necessary to meet the event. I do not consider the resolution in this light; neither do I consider it a measure giving any just cause of war to England. But, if it should be made a cause of war, I conceive no previous preparations are necessary. Whenever war is made on this nation, the spirit of patriotism which has been lying dormant for years will be aroused; it will be communicated from one end of this country to the other with the rapidity of the electric fluid; it will convert in an instant the merchants, farmers, mechanics, and yeomanry of your country into citizen soldiers. The immense and almost inexhaustible resources of this country will be rendered active, and like Leonidas and his Grecians, they will defend every inch of ground, and, if without success, that spot of this country where the last hope of liberty deserts them will be their tomb. In what, sir, does the strength of this nation consist? Not in numerous and in large and well appointed fleets; but in the affections of the people to the Government. If the people are with you, your plans can be executed with effect. If they are against you, you are weak and can do nothing with effect. I am therefore in favor of the resolution.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Mr. WHEATON.—Mr. Chairman: Honored with a seat in this House, and called upon to give my vote in the decision of a question important to the nation, it becomes my duty, and a duty which ought not to be resisted by inclination, to submit for consideration some remarks respecting the subject upon which we are to decide; and I indulge the hope that on this, as on every other occasion, our discussions may proceed with coolness and in a manner becoming the Legislature of a free and discerning people, who know what is due to themselves and the rest of mankind.

The resolutions before us, sanctioned by the honorable Senate, now solicit the attention of the Representatives of the American people, and strongly invite them to give their assent to several propositions, deduced from a correspondence lately held between the Secretary of State and the British Minister, Mr. Jackson, relative to the points in dispute between that country and this; and, on their own behalf and that of their constituents, to signify their entire approbation of the determination of the Executive Government resulting therefrom, which put an end to that correspondence.

Notwithstanding the opinions of several honorable gentlemen, manifested on a former occasion in this House, to whom much respect is due, and whose opinions will always have great weight with me when forming my own; yet I cannot but still hold it as a correct principle, that in a Government like ours, springing from and supported by the will of the people, they have a right, and that it is even their duty, on great occasions, to signify their approbation or disapprobation of the conduct pursued, or the measures adopted by those in power. For, as on the one hand it may be the means of correcting an erroneous procedure, so, on the other, it may give life and vigor to a wise and honest policy.

If indeed praise is asked for as an alms, it should always be denied; but when it is well earned and really due, it would not only be illiberal, but unjust, to withhold it. Whether the one or the other be the case in the present instance, we may hazard our own opinions, but the great question will still remain to be decided before the grand tribunal of the public. For, whether we allow of an appeal to the people in this case or not, the people will sustain the appeal, and will finally judge and determine as they shall think proper.

I presume the honorable Senate, who sent us these resolutions, requesting our concurrence in them, did not, and I presume the advocates for the adoption of them in this House, do not wish for expressions of approbation from any one, where they are not sincerely felt. Expressions of approbation may indeed sometimes be compelled, but real approbation cannot; it must be freely given. It cannot be extorted, but by the discovery of the wisdom or propriety of the conduct or measure proposed to be approved.

Although my praise or dispraise, approbation or disapprobation, either as a private citizen or as an individual member of this House, may be considered as of little importance to those who stand in the first ranks in conducting the great concerns of the nation; yet if I could see what has been my anxious wish to see, and what others imagine they do see, that our Executive Government had pursued the wisest and most prudent course relative to the subject embraced by these resolutions, it would be highly gratifying to my pride to be able to furnish a few materials for a monument to their praise. In doing this I should feel as much pleasure and satisfaction as did the poor Egyptian, when gathering together a few splinters of a broken boat as a funeral pile for the great Pompey.

It is but natural that I should be prejudiced in favor of my own country, the country that gave me birth, and in which I have ever since lived, and of the Government I have had some small share in forming; and feel the force of the obligation I am under, by all just and proper means in my power, to promote the interests and happiness of the one, and to give aid and support to the other. I cannot however, under these impressions, and with these objects in view, either feel the necessity, or make myself willing to break through those eternal and immutable obligations, I am under to my God and my fellow men, always to maintain justice and truth. It is my wish to examine with fairness and candor every subject which it shall become my duty to consider, and that my tongue may always be found the true index of my heart.

I know it is a maxim in some Governments, that the supreme power of the State can do no wrong. I believe, however, that this maxim has not received the sanction of experience in any Government. It has sometimes been questioned even in that Government to which these resolutions point; and the resolutions themselves are made to decide against it. I should hardly then have expected, that in this early period of our free Republic, such a maxim would be received and become current here. May we not yet, sir, humbly and modestly inquire, even though such inquiry should lead to doubt, whether our Executive Government (as this Government is but a creature of our power,) have done right or wrong in the late hasty step they have taken, especially as we are now called upon, and in pretty strong terms too, to approve of it. If we are yet freemen, and retain any of our discriminating faculties, shall we not examine for ourselves before we venture to express our approbation? If we do not, shall we not be in danger of exhibiting to the world the picture of convivial, though tasteless company, over some sparkling adulteration, commending their champaign? For myself, sir, I have examined, and, though with modesty and deference for the opinion of others, I am compelled as an honest man to say that what is proposed in these resolutions does not meet my approbation. In giving my reasons I will state some facts, but carefully avoid drawing conclusions; leaving that to be done by those to whom they may apply.

The belligerents of Europe, anxious to excel in doing each other harm, have both done much harm to us.

The French, it is said, have committed some trespasses on our commercial rights, and, notwithstanding all our gentle entreaties, show little disposition to compensate for the past or desist from future injuries, until having acquired as much power by sea as they have already by land, they shall have been able to send their floating colonies abroad; and then, if we may judge of the probable effects of the one, from what we have seen or heard of the other, we may easily anticipate what kind of redress will be offered us. If we do not like the fate of Copenhagen, we may have that of Switzerland or Spain. Those harps on which we are now playing, we may be obliged to hang upon the willows, bemoan the loss of a stolen President, and, in a different tone, to hail the arrival of a victorious master from the family of the Bonapartes.

The French Minister is still with us, and for aught I have heard, in full communion; and our accustomed communications with, and civilities towards that nation are not interrupted.

For the British Government, sir, I feel no partiality; with British subjects I have no connexion; for the British nation no affection, but such as I ought to feel for all mankind.

From that nation we have endured many wrongs, and made as many complaints. But all the means which the wisdom of our Government has hitherto devised, or her power executed, for redress, have proved ineffectual to the attainment of that desirable object. A different expedient seems now to be contemplated. All communication with that Government through their Minister in this country is now suspended, and the way seems fast preparing for commencing open and avowed hostilities with that nation. How far the nature and magnitude of the wrongs we have suffered, or the prospect of redress, by having recourse to war, can justify the measure, deserves well to be considered by those who are to make the declaration.

I have no hesitancy in saying, that, according to the common notions of mankind upon such subjects, (I am not much fond of war myself in any case,) the conduct of the British towards the people of this country has in some instances, if not many, been such as to justify forcible resistance; provided, from a due consideration of their situation and our own, we could have a rational prospect, by such resistance, of inducing or compelling them to redress our wrongs and restore our rights. Yet I am not prepared to say that anything has been done or said by the British Minister to Mr. Secretary Smith, so gross and insulting, so far as can be discovered in their late correspondence, as to justify the hasty, and, as I think, injudicious step taken by our Government; much less to induce me solemnly to pledge myself and the people whom I have the honor to represent, to engage in so disastrous a measure as that of war, as recommended in these resolutions if necessary to repel it, however war in the views of any might be justified on other grounds. What, sir, shall we, shall a whole nation go to war, shall thousands of lives be lost, and millions of hard earned property be wasted, because one man imagines, in which imagination he may be, as I think in this case he must be mistaken, that another has made some representations or insinuations that might seem to affect his honor or character? Are you willing, sir, that our sons should thus fall unpitied victims at ambition's shrine? I hope not, sir.

I cannot admit that such an insult was offered by Mr. Jackson as has been imagined, nor could I agree that such should be the consequence if it had been a fact.

After turning over every page and carefully reviewing the whole of the correspondence between Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson, I have really failed to find what others think they so plainly see.

Mr. Smith, in his letter to Mr. Jackson, of the 9th of October, calls on that Minister for a prompt and explicit explanation of the grounds of refusal on the part of his Government to abide by the arrangement lately made with his predecessor Mr. Erskine. Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 11th of the same month, replies that, in his examination of the records of Mr. Erskine's mission, he found no traces of complaint, and that he did not hear any express annunciations of it in the several conferences he had had with Mr. Smith, on the part of the United States, of His Majesty's having disavowed the act of his Minister in the case alluded to; and then candidly supposes that this want of complaint by them might be owing to a consciousness that it would be unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that had followed. What were these circumstances, as stated by Mr. Jackson? They were these: That Mr. Erskine had not only not conformed with, but had acted in direct contradiction to his instructions in the arrangement he had made; that these instructions were contained in Mr. Canning's despatch to him of the 23d of January, and that that despatch contained the only instructions Mr. Erskine had received relating to that subject, and that those instructions had been made known in substance, though not in extenso, to the American Government. Now, can the most jealous eye discover any thing in these assertions of Mr. Jackson that could be offensive to the most squeamish stomach?—unless it be in the last, and that Mr. Smith confesses to be true; and yet some how or other seems strangely to imagine that they contain some inadmissible insinuations, and premonishes him against a repetition. In answer to this, Mr. Jackson says that he had been careful to avoid drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises he had advanced, and not to utter an insinuation where he was unable to substantiate a fact. Mr. Smith had asserted that our Government had no knowledge that what was made known of the despatch of the 23d of January was the only authority Mr. Erskine had to make the arrangement in question, and yet, by intimating an opinion that his general authority as Minister Plenipotentiary was sufficient, seems to admit that he might not have had any other special authority for the purpose. Here it would not be strange if the busy meddling mind of man should suggest an inquiry, how it should come to pass that authorities or instructions that were unexhibited and unknown, should be substituted as the basis of an important arrangement, in the place of those that were exhibited, discussed, and rejected. If none had been exhibited and found to be inadmissible, it would not appear so strange if the general authority had been relied on. Mr. Jackson, however, no where asserts, that I can find, that our Government knew, at the time of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, that he had no other instructions or authorities to make it than such as were exhibited, but simply that he knew such to have been the fact, and a fact to which he felt himself bound scrupulously to adhere, in order to vindicate the honor and dignity of his Government whenever its good faith might be called in question upon that point.

In all this I can see nothing but severe civility. And yet this is made the occasion for suddenly breaking off of a correspondence that might have led, however dubious the prospect in the beginning of it, to an amicable adjustment of all the points in dispute between the two countries, and we are now called upon to prepare ourselves for war to avenge the imaginary affront. Not to get redress for the wrongs we have suffered, nor to regain our commercial rights; for I do not perceive that any of these subjects are embraced by the resolutions. To be sure, sir, while I feel that I am an American, I would not agree to submit to the conditions contained in the despatch to Mr. Erskine of the 23d of January, and which were said to have been proposed by our Government; but Mr. Jackson intimates, at least, that the object of the British Government might be attained by the substitution of some others less exceptionable. At any rate, if we cannot, at present, have the offer of terms, that can be considered by us as admissible, on which to form the basis of a treaty with the British Government; if we cannot at present make any treaty at all with them, we ought not to be hasty in going to war.

It is a plain dictate of reason, and to be found among the precepts of revelation, that any nation even under the greatest pressure, before they go to war, should count the cost. We should estimate the losses to which war with the British may expose us, as well as the amount of our probable gain, as also the means in our power of gaining anything at all. That sentiment contained in the President's Message to Congress at the opening of this session perfectly accords with my own, that, in the midst of the wrongs and vexations experienced from external causes, there is much room for congratulation on the prosperity and happiness flowing from our situation at home; and it may be added that since, by the indulgence of our own Government, our citizens have been permitted to return to that commerce to which they have been accustomed, and with which they are so much delighted, their enterprises have been rewarded by pretty ample returns of gain from abroad.

As an evidence of this, we need only look into our great seaports, and view the hurry and zeal with which our merchants are preparing and sending their vessels to sea, fearing new restrictions and embarrassments from our own Government, more than any orders or decrees originating in foreign countries. So that amidst all our difficulties, our desires do not more exceed our enjoyments, than these exceed those of every other people in the world. To the loss of many, if not all these advantages and blessings a war would expose us. And where would be our gain? The worst passions of the human heart would be called into action, and we should have an increase of nothing but poverty and vice. But it may be worth inquiry, what are our means of going to war? The philosophers of our age and nation have taught us to expect that the happy time would soon come when the unprofitable contest of trying which could do the other the most harm would yield to the superior force of reason. Hence the policy of our Government has not been to make any considerable preparations for war. Our experienced warriors, though eminent, are few; the rest remain to be trained to the art, and perhaps to be born. The timber for rearing up an important navy is yet in our forests and perhaps in the acorn. And I wish we might never have occasion to call for the former or procure the latter. Shall we then, in this situation, go to war with a nation who, for centuries, have made war their trade? Shall we undertake to capture the ships of a nation who have it in their power efficiently to blockade all our ports from Georgia to Maine, and in the course of a few months to sweep from the ocean every vessel we may venture from our harbors?

But if we were to go to war with Britain, and could promise ourselves success in humbling the pride of that haughty nation, should we not, in hastening her downfall, accelerate the period when we should become the humble vassals of the great master of the world. And then the wrongs we should have to endure would no longer go under the mild name of trespasses. We should apply a harsher term, if allowed to give them any name at all.

It may be inquired, what then shall we do? Shall we become slaves to Britain, for fear of the shackles of imperial France? Shall we voluntarily submit to the unreasonable demands of the one, under an apprehension of the severer tyranny of the other? The answer must be, no. We will never agree to be wretched. We will give no quit-claim to anything to which we are entitled, but not madly refuse to enjoy any because we cannot at present enjoy all. Because we cannot now, with safety, traverse the ocean everywhere at pleasure, shall we abandon it entirely, and burn all our vessels for fear of losing them? This would be like the folly of the man, who having had some trespasses committed on his plantation, should magnanimously resolve to fly to the mountains and give up the whole. I would not, in madness, make a voluntary surrender of my corn-field, merely because my orchard had been robbed. Let us make the most of every advantage still in our power. If it be the policy of foreign Governments to lay unjust restrictions on our commerce abroad, let it be the policy of ours to see that it is not shackled with too much regulation at home; leaving our citizens to the quick-sighted guidance of private interest, and they will soon find the path to wealth. The wealth of individuals will become the wealth of the community, to which they belong. In this way we shall grow rich, as a nation. Riches will enable us to be richer still, and being richer still, we shall have the power, and having the power, shall not want the disposition to assert our rights; so shall we become a great and flourishing nation, and so may we continue until Old Time, like Samson in his wrath, shall pluck the pillars that support the world.

It is because I think, and think honestly, that the adoption of these resolutions would have a tendency to bring on a cloudy, if not stormy day, and deprive us of these delightful prospects, that I cannot give them the sanction of my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON.—When I consider it my indispensable duty to address you, I shall apologize neither for the manner, nor the time; and, however feeble my powers, to speak the sentiments of those whose confidence and whose affections have placed me here is a source of happiness which I cannot describe. To be silent on this occasion would do great injustice to the love of national honor and the patriotism of the district I represent, and in fact of the State in which I live. The gentlemen in opposition to the resolution have given an extent to this discussion which has involved our foreign relations with all the world.

I may be permitted, therefore, without being considered prolix, to embrace in my remarks the disavowed arrangement and the events subsequent; nor shall I be considered as wandering from the subject to review the situation of this country at the time of the disavowed arrangement, and to mention the great events which pressed heavily upon the eve of this period. What was this situation and these pressing and impending events previous to the arrangement? Our embarrassments had never been so great since the Revolution, nor our injuries so numerous, so serious, so aggravated; the political horizon was overshadowed with clouds and darkness—no commercial arrangement existed between Great Britain and the United States; we were bound together by no conventional ties—by no treaty obligation. The commercial part of Jay's Treaty, which conceded so much to England, and which has so justly incurred the execration of the friends of our independence, had expired. We were afloat upon the ocean upon the broad basis of the laws of nations, under which for a few years we were growing in wealth and happiness in a manner that excited the jealousy of Great Britain. She had failed to gain the same advantages by another treaty, and she refused to enter into a reciprocal and liberal one. Failing in this attempt, the laws of nations were disregarded—changed by municipal regulations, and executed by the British cannon—power and necessity became her code of maritime laws, and our commerce and our innocent and independent citizens fell a sacrifice to this system of iniquity.

The subject of impressment, the first in the list of injuries; the colonial trade direct and circuitous; the subject of blockade, by which the civilized world has been closed to our commerce by proclamations on paper; the list of contraband; the search of merchant vessels; depredations in our waters; the attack on the Chesapeake, where a number of our citizens were murdered and some still held in captivity; the British proclamation, holding out farther pretensions upon the subject of impressment than have ever been exercised with all of their nefarious practices; the Orders in Council levying a tribute, a tax, a contribution upon your soil and your property. These were the subjects of dispute, the points of controversy. Atonement for the injuries refused and negotiation on other points had failed. The most sanguine among us gave up all hopes of better times. The crisis was awful, which presented to the American people the alternatives of war, embargo, or disgrace. Our situation was rendered more perilous by the internal divisions at home and the opposition which Constitutional laws met with in many parts of the United States. In this hour of peril and danger, the disavowed arrangement was announced to the people of the United States by our Chief Executive Magistrate—an arrangement which made atonement in part for the murder of our countrymen on board the Chesapeake, offered a prospect of restoring the men now in captivity and exile—which rescinded the Orders in Council as they respected the United States—with a promise of sending a special Minister vested with full powers to conclude a Treaty of Peace. I cannot describe the feelings of the American people at this welcome news, when the agreeable surprise permitted reflection—the prospect of peace made their joy immoderate. A political jubilee was proclaimed. It was fondly hoped that a pledge had been given or a disposition manifested to obviate the insults and wrongs of twenty years in a just and amicable arrangement. The effects of this disavowed arrangement were universal, not confined to one party, nor to one class of citizens. The few who doubted the faith of Great Britain were denounced—no party or politician dared at that time to say, and it could not be said, that Great Britain had surrendered any right, that she had abandoned any principle of equity or the laws of nations; nor that Great Britain had more than atoned for the injuries in which reparation was rendered, nor that Mr. Erskine had been overreached, or that he had compromised the honor of his Government. Not even British emissaries nor the papers supposed to be devoted to the British interest dared to assert any of these positions. There was a difference of opinion with respect to the arrangement in this: that one party contended or thought that it contained the maximum of what we had a right to ask. The other party contended or thought, that it was the minimum of justice, that we had a right to demand more. But all concurred in accepting the arrangement with great joy. This arrangement furnished subject-matter for a very new and interesting discussion, as unexpected as the arrangement. What was this contest which was waged so very warmly? Why, sir, it was who should claim the credit of the arrangement. This was the dispute—forces were marshalled—the newspapers were engaged, and the orators of this House came forth in all their strength. I was also anxious to share a little of the credit, and therefore I put in my little mite with the rest. It was said by some of the opponents to the measures of the Administration and the Government that their opposition had produced the arrangement with Great Britain; and they therefore claimed the credit of the happy change. I could not subscribe to this doctrine, because I could not perceive its reasonableness, and it would have taken from those with whom I acted all the credit for which they contended. It was by others ascribed to the good disposition of Great Britain towards the United States which had ever existed, who said that Great Britain had been prevented from a display of that good disposition to do us justice on account of the partiality of Mr. Jefferson to France and his hostility to England. It was with sorrow, however, sir, that I heard that great and good man called a French partisan, a man who could not be injured by such unfounded charges, and whose name will be inscribed in the temple of renown in indelible letters; not only for his great abilities, but his great goodness. To bring other proof of the good disposition of Great Britain, Mr. Monroe's Treaty and Mr. Rose's mission were called up. It was a great consolation to me, however, that it was admitted by the same persons that Mr. Madison, in whom I have the greatest confidence, was impartial towards the two great belligerents, and therefore entitled to thanks and approbation. Another party, called the Republicans, ascribed the arrangement with Mr. Erskine to the wise and patriotic measures of the Government, and to the events in Europe, which were at that time disastrous to English hopes. I was of this number.

But while we were contemplating this golden age, this era in our history—at a time when the farmer had prepared his grain for market, and promised his impatient creditor speedy payment; when the mechanic expected an additional reward for his labor; when the flag of the honest trader floated in the winds of every region, and the seamen exulted with joy at the return of better times, and the wife and children of a fond husband and affectionate parent cherished a hope of meeting again the dearest object of their affection, detained by British imprisonment—at this eventful moment it was that the disavowal of that arrangement was announced to blast our hopes, and to put down our pretensions to credit. Laying out of the question past events, we are furnished by this disavowal with subject-matter for another long talk equally as important if not as amusing as the one I have mentioned; old grievances are done away or merged in those of later date.

What is this new subject of discussion—the origin and cause of this disavowal? This involves several questions, viz: whether the disavowal originated in British perfidy or in the mistake or misconduct of D. M. Erskine, Esq., the British Minister—and also an examination of the unwarrantable charge of Mr. Jackson, the dismissed British Minister, by which he endeavored to shift the odium of the disavowal from the King of England to the Executive of the United States.

I shall not enter into a tedious and disgusting detail, but confine myself to the spirit of the correspondence—nor shall I enter into a construction of Mr. Jackson's verbiage and phraseology, but of its obvious and natural import. The disavowal could not have originated in the misconduct of Mr. Erskine, because no gentleman will impute to him an unworthy motive; his high character, his uniform loyalty to his master the King, forbids such an idea. In addition to this, I would call to my aid the doctrine of human nature, and ask what motive could exist in Mr. Erskine to deceive his own Government or the United States? A motive for such conduct does not exist. But on the other hand every honorable consideration, as well as every other rational motive, must have impressed upon his mind the necessity of complying with His Majesty's wishes. His standing as a man of integrity and intelligence, his continuance as Minister in this country, all depended upon a faithful execution of the trust confided to his charge. He must have known that a violation of instructions would only have injured his own country and the United States, in producing a disavowal. The disavowal, therefore, must have originated in the innocent misconception of Mr. Erskine, or in the Punic faith of England.

Upon this subject, I shall think for myself.

Leaving out those events which would go to cast odium on the British Cabinet, let me remind the Committee that Mr. Erskine is a man of understanding, a man of integrity, and he still asserts that he acted agreeably to His Majesty's wishes and to the spirit of the instructions given him. I must refer to the declarations of Mr. Erskine in the printed document:

"Under these circumstances, therefore, finding that I could not obtain the recognitions specified in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d January, which formed but one part of his instructions to me, in the formal manner required, I considered that it would be in vain to lay before the Government of the United States the despatch in question, which I was at liberty to have done in extenso had I thought proper: But as I had such strong grounds for believing that the object of His Majesty's Government could be attained, though in a different manner, and the spirit, at least, of my several letters of instructions be fully complied with, I felt a thorough conviction upon my mind that I should be acting in conformity with His Majesty's wishes, and, accordingly, concluded the late provisional agreement on His Majesty's behalf with the Government of the United States."

He states, with candor and sincerity, that when he entered into the arrangements he felt a thorough conviction upon his mind, that he was acting in conformity to his master's wishes, and up to the spirit of his several letters of instructions, if not the letter of them. He also states that he greatly laments that an act of his should produce any embarrassment between the two countries. In a different letter he states that he had no intention to deceive the United States, and regrets the consequences which have resulted from the rejection of the arrangement. I will now speak of the conduct of the Executive, as to the charge brought against him, by Mr. Jackson. I will not condescend to vindicate the Executive. He stands, thank God! above suspicion. His talents, his veracity, his love of country, are above suspicion—I will not speak of motives as applying to him, or I would ask what motive the Executive could have to enter into an arrangement which he knew would be rejected, and produce the mischief which has resulted? 1st. Mr. Erskine declares he did not lay before the Executive or the Secretary of State his instructions. 2nd. On our part the engagement now disavowed was promptly executed by the Executive. All this was known to Mr. Jackson, and every circumstance enumerated should be recollected to interpret the intention of the British Government to insult us through their agent, Mr. Jackson.

From this retrospective summary, let any unprejudiced mind determine whether the disavowal originated in British perfidy or the mistake of Mr. Erskine. To enable us to judge still more correctly, let us attend to the mission of Mr. Jackson, and I am sorry here to state, that I understood the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. Dana,) either by his express words, or from the unavoidable conclusion drawn from his premises, to charge the Chief Executive Magistrate with the consequences of the disavowal on the part of Great Britain, of an equitable arrangement entered into with great solemnity, and which gave no more than our undoubted right, nor as much. I did not hear him cast any censure on the conduct of Mr. Jackson, nor upon the conduct of the British Government in disavowing the act of its Minister. He also admitted that the President had a right Constitutionally to receive foreign Ministers, and might reject them upon reasonable ground. He also stated that the immunity of a public Minister did not allow him to charge our Executive with a falsehood, or to appeal to the people from the Government. These principles being admitted, I listened attentively to hear where the blame was to be placed, on whose shoulders—and to my astonishment, the blame was packed upon the President of the United States, in failing to comply with an incumbent duty, viz: in not demanding the authority of Mr. Erskine to make the arrangement. And many authorities were quoted to prove the failure of duty on the part of the Executive. The gentleman has failed in his attempt, admitting every authority quoted. When a foreign Minister enters into any engagement with any other Government, and the stipulations are to be carried into immediate effect, there the Government has a right to demand the power, or, if you will, the authority of such foreign Minister to conclude an arrangement on the subjects embraced by the compact.

But there is a difference between the power of a public Minister, and his special instructions under the power. It never has been denied that Mr. Erskine had power to make an arrangement on the subjects embraced by the disavowed stipulations. This is acknowledged by Mr. Jackson in the correspondence, by Mr. Canning in his letters, and by all those who support Mr. Jackson and condemn our Executive Government. The President, therefore, demanded and received proper evidence of the power of Mr. Erskine to make arrangements embracing the Orders in Council and the affair of the Chesapeake. Having done this, the President discharged his duty.

Secondly.—Then how does the member from Connecticut make and prove his charge that the President failed in a great and an incumbent duty? The gentleman has ingeniously blended the power or the authority of a public Minister with his special instructions. I would ask that learned member, whether the annals of diplomacy, or the laws of nations, or his Treaty of Westphalia, can furnish an instance where a Government had the right or ever did demand a sight of the special instructions of a foreign Minister? It never has been done of right; it cannot be done. It would be violating the most sacred right of a foreign Minister. If, therefore, special instructions are ever exhibited, it is from courtesy, and from the free will of the Minister instructed. This doctrine is proved by the case under consideration. If we had a right to demand the special instructions of Mr. Erskine, why did Mr. Canning authorize Mr. Erskine to show one despatch to our Government? This is a case in point. The principle is absurd and unreasonable, and cannot bear examination.—When I have so often, therefore, witnessed the moderation of that gentleman, and been so often instructed with his remarks upon the laws of nations, &c., I confess I was pained to the heart to hear a charge of a failure in the President to discharge his duty to this nation, made out by blending the powers of a Minister with his special instructions. I regretted this still more, when I recollected that the same member declared that he would be more unwilling to censure than to approve the conduct of the President. It might have been useful if, at that time, the learned member had recollected his observations as to the worth of character, made when speaking of the British Minister, and when we were cautioned against its transduction. A failure of duty, therefore, in the President, to demand the instructions of Mr. Erskine at the time of the arrangement, has led to the disavowal and its consequences, by the fair deductions from the gentleman's premises, if not from his express declarations. I would ask, if the President had demanded the special instructions of Mr. Erskine, and they had been produced for inspection, what would have been the consequence? If the President had concurred with the construction of Mr. Erskine, and a disavowal had taken place, as it has already, the hue and cry would have rung throughout the United States. If the President had differed from Mr. Erskine, and had refused the amicable arrangement, denunciations in the voice of thunder would have been proclaimed to the world.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

But, the real dispute is, where it ought to be, with Mr. Erskine and his master the King. The charge which Mr. Jackson has made against the Government or the Executive is this: that the President did enter into an arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the British Minister, settling the affair of the Chesapeake and revoking the Orders in Council as they related to the United States, knowing at the time that Mr. Erskine violated his most positive instructions, and that the King would not be bound by the arrangement. The member from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) states that Mr. Madison failed in the performance of an incumbent duty in not demanding the authority of Mr. Erskine, thereby including in that expression his special instructions at the time of the arrangement; and that, therefore, Great Britain was not to blame in disavowing an unauthorized act!

I am sick of this subject, and return to the mission of Mr. Jackson. He is received as the Minister resident and successor of Mr. Erskine. His conduct soon induced the President to require of him written communications to prevent his equivocations. He was vested with no extraordinary power—he had no propositions to make upon the subject of a commercial intercourse, including the Orders in Council; but he was authorized to receive for consideration propositions from us. We, the injured party, must make overtures, and he would listen to them and get the final answer from his master in the mean time!

He stated to our Government in addition that the Orders in Council would not be revoked, but upon three conditions. I almost blush to state those conditions, which were, to purchase rights that belonged to us as a neutral nation.

1. The United States must abandon their restrictive system, non-intercourse, &c., against Great Britain—admit the British navy to our ports and harbors—and continue this system against the commerce of France, her allies and dependencies.

2. That the United States must abandon the colonial trade during the war, direct and circuitous.

3. The British navy must be called in to execute the laws of Congress against our own citizens, viz: the non-intercourse against France, and to capture our merchant vessels going to France, with a declared intention that this measure would be necessary to secure the bona fide intention of the United States.

And where did these conditions originate? Whose mind, so sickly and feverish at the prosperity of the United States as to propose them, particularly the last, which asks a formal surrender of one of the attributes of sovereignty? It was first attempted to fix the origin of these propositions on conversations which Mr. Erskine had with Messrs. Madison, Gallatin, and Smith, then heads of departments. This was denied by Mr. Erskine in positive terms, in answer to the inquiries of this Government. He denies that any such concessions or conditions were made or mentioned. It then is attempted to fix the blame of calling in the British navy to execute our laws, upon Mr. Pinkney. To prove it, we call for papers, and how does it appear? That Canning made the proposition to Pinkney, who never sanctioned in any manner such a degrading proposal. The truth is, that these propositions originated and were hatched in the brain of Canning. No other mind, I hope and trust in God, would have been so corrupt and audacious. Lo! we make a great struggle to fix every blame on our Administration, and when that cannot be done, no censure is attached to the foreign Government! Our Administration has been so unfortunate as never to be in the right with some politicians, and some foreign Governments never to be in the wrong. We are thus told that we are not able to execute our laws, and that British cruisers in all their licentiousness must be permitted to capture our own merchantmen; and I suppose the next condition would be, that we should get the British Parliament to make the laws for us, and then the British navy might better execute them—and that we should send our soldiers to the Continent to fight her battles. Omnipotent Orders in Council!

Thus the door to negotiation was closed; unless indeed some should suppose that these conditions should be complied with on our part. These conditions being urged a second time, after they had been rejected with indignation by the Executive, was good cause to have dismissed the British emissary, without waiting for personal insult.

Conduct of the British Minister.

DECEMBER, 1809.

His offer in the case of the Chesapeake was also disgraceful and unacceptable. Keeping in view what has been said, I come to the slanderous charge made by Jackson, the British Minister, against the President of the United States. The British Minister is called on repeatedly to give explanations and reasons for the disavowal of the arrangement with his predecessor. After much equivocation, he commences his task. Not satisfied with charging the disavowal to the mistake of Mr. Erskine in the violation of his instructions, he expressly charges the President with a complete knowledge that Mr. Erskine at the time violated his instructions, and that the President knew it would not be binding on the King his master. He says that no distinct complaint had been made of the disavowal. That he attributes to the candor of the President, to that forbearance arising from a belief that such complaint would be unreasonable. Pages 32, 33, of the printed documents, contain the substance of this charge. This charge was met by the Secretary of State with a positive denial, and with a declaration that the arrangement would not have been made, if Mr. Erskine had informed the President that the three conditions before stated, were the only terms upon which the compact was to be made.

Notwithstanding this denial and declaration, the charge is again repeated. The Secretary of State, feeling a just indignation at the dishonorable insinuation or charge, states it expressly, in such a way that it cannot be misunderstood, and declares to Mr. Jackson that such language was inadmissible. In reply to this admonition, the charge is still persisted in. The Executive had no alternative left, but either to have admitted the truth of the charge, to have taken the insult, or to dismiss the agent.

If it were not known to the world what step had been taken, it would be unnecessary to proclaim it, when the character of the Executive and those associated with him in the Administration is known. Thus, sir, without going into a tedious detail, I have only given the substance, from which you may get the spirit of the correspondence.

I do not think, like some members, that this is a national challenge, a defiance of war—a provocation to hostility. No, sir, it is a solemn declaration, that this nation has been abused and insulted, and that we will maintain the honor and the rights of the people, although it should cast a shade of disgrace over the fame of a foreign Minister. The dismissal of Jackson is the exercise of a sovereign right, recognised by the laws of nations and the law of experience among civilized nations; and Great Britain has no cause of complaint on that account. And should it be made a pretext for aggression, I proclaim it here, I proclaim it to the people whom I represent, and to the American people, that I approve and applaud the conduct of the President in the dismissal of Jackson, the British Minister; that in so doing he has maintained the honor, vindicated the rights, and spurned the insults offered to an independent and patriotic people. He acted with decision, not with rashness—with a just resentment, not with passion. We may continue to pursue a wavering course until our liberties are destroyed by inviting foreign aggression. Our forbearance has already drawn down upon us the contempt of other Powers, and to this policy we may attribute many of the wrongs we have suffered. You are treated with contumely on the ocean, your citizens are impressed and held in perpetual bondage. Your commerce is destroyed, your flag was torn down and scattered to the winds of heaven in foreign ports, on the 4th of July, the day of our independence; and now, at our own door, at the seat of the Federal Government, a foreign Minister looks your President in the face, and charges him with falsehood—and we are told to submit to it. I am desirous to see this nation grow—nothing can stop its growth. But when I hear members talk about the growth of this nation, and declare that we cannot or ought not to resent the ten thousand wrongs we have suffered, it has often reminded me of a swine confined in his pen—give it corn enough to eat and the animal will grow fat, although you kick and cuff it for your amusement. It is a vulgar comparison, but suitable to such arguments. Let us recollect, that, like the animal, we may grow in fatness; but that fatness may soon be the spoil of others by slaughter.

I was surprised to hear the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. POTTER) make a war speech against France and Great Britain. If that gentleman is sincere, will he vote for strong measures of retaliation against both? If so, I will join him. He speaks of those wrongs having been committed continually for fifteen years. Did he vote or would he have voted for letters of marque and reprisal by sea and land against both nations last winter? If so, we should have voted together. But this ill comport with declarations of men in high office at that time, that we had no cause of war with England, and that we should unfurl the republican banners against France. If we cannot contend with other nations upon the ocean, let us be independent upon our own soil; for, our temporizing policy has already given popularity to the British Ministry, and I will venture to assert that no war that could at this time be waged against us would be more calamitous than the pressure we have felt for several years from the rival Powers of Europe. And when we recollect the disastrous consequences of the Revolution to Great Britain, it is presumable no Ministry could carry on a war against us six months, if we were to war it also.

The same member (Mr. POTTER) mentioned that one President (meaning Mr. Adams) had been ruined by resolutions of approbation, and that the leaders expected vacancies for their applause. As that member is better acquainted with those times, and the sentiments of those of whom he speaks, I shall not contradict him; and, as I am a friend to the present Chief Magistrate, I shall recollect his advice, which I hope has originated from a fear that resolutions of approbation would ruin the present President. For my part, sir, I should have been as well satisfied to have expressed these sentiments on any other resolution which would have involved our foreign relations. I should have been as well pleased to have expressed these sentiments on a resolution to send Mr. Jackson home and recall Mr. Pinkney.

It has been said that it would require means perhaps to effect the object of this resolution, and that we shall have to talk of loans, &c. It will not require means unless Great Britain should make it a pretext for further injuries. If that should be the case, and if we must surrender our freedom, or vote means to maintain it, although we might be naked, hungry, and moneyless, I would not hesitate to choose, between slavery and death. And, if it were necessary on such an occasion, and I had talents, I would invoke the States as sisters, united by long suffering, cemented with blood—I would revive the memory of former friendship by invoking the spirit of Seventy-Six, pointing to the glorious achievements of our ancestors—and produce the effects of union by a recital of our wrongs.

Mr. ENOTR said he rose with some reluctance to address the Committee, as the lateness of the hour and the discussion which had taken place led him to believe that gentlemen would not willingly attend to the detail which he had to wade through, but, as he found no person ready to take the floor, he would occupy the time of the Committee in submitting to them his view of the subject.

Sir, said he, the resolution on your table calls upon us to give our assent to two propositions: First, that Mr. Jackson has, in his correspondence with Mr. Smith, insulted the Government, by intimating that the Executive had a knowledge that the arrangement entered into with Mr. Erskine was without authority on his part; and, secondly, that, in refusing to receive any further communications from the English Minister, in consequence of this insult, the Executive has manifested a just regard to the character and interests of the American people. Now, I can agree to neither of these propositions, inasmuch as I have not been able to discover the insult, and as I do not believe that the interest of the people has been consulted in the measure.

In making this declaration, I know I subject myself (not here I hope) to the imputation of being a British apologist and partisan, and of taking part against the Government of my country. But, if the President has his duty to perform, I also, as a Representative, have mine; and although I might have remained silent if his friends had not called up this subject, yet, when I am thus pressed for an opinion, it is my duty to give it fairly, and I will do it. It is not, I trust, necessary, in order to evince my respect for the Government, to approbate every Executive measure, or to join with the Administration in its plans and views. Our present Chief Magistrate will doubtless recollect the time when he did not deem a love of country, and a due regard to its Government, incompatible with a marked disapprobation of Executive measures, and an earnest opposition to the views of the persons in power. In all this there is nothing to blame, when the opposition proceeds from good motives. I am not in the habit, sir, of making professions, but I will on this occasion say, that I have not a drop of blood running in my veins that is not purely American, and that I have not a wish but for the happiness, the prosperity, and the honor of my country, and the preservation of its Government.

As to the insult, it is said by Mr. Smith, in his letter of the 8th of November, to consist in the use of language on the part of Mr. Jackson, "implying a knowledge in this Government that the instructions of his predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him." Had such language been used by the British Minister, in the commencement of the correspondence, it does not appear to me to follow that it would have been an insult, for it can be no offence for our Government to enter into a provisional arrangement with a resident Minister who has not full power. Nay, had Mr. Erskine shown his instructions of the 23d of January in extenso, declaring them to be the only instructions received by him from his Government, and had the terms held out by them been negatived by our Executive, as they certainly ought, it would have been competent for the Minister to receive and negotiate on other propositions more just in themselves, and to send the result to his Government for its acceptance. Indeed, this is the view which Mr. Smith himself appears to have taken of the subject. In his letters of the first and eighth of November, he intimates that Mr. Jackson's first letter contained the implications, as he speaks of the repetition of a language conveying the idea that our Executive had a knowledge that the arrangement with Mr. Erskine was without authority, and in both letters the offence is placed in the repetition after the declaration that there was no such knowledge. The same course is adopted by the resolutions, as they omit all mention of Mr. Jackson's first letter, and find the insult in expressions in the letters of the 23d of October and the 4th of November. It is not, therefore, strictly necessary to examine the first letter, but as it has in the debate of this day been much dwelt on by gentlemen who are in favor of the resolution, I shall claim your attention while I, in a brief manner, analyze the entire correspondence.

Before I commence this analysis, permit me, sir, (said Mr. E.,) to observe, that Mr. Jackson is not stated to have made any direct charge, but to have contented himself with insinuations; or, in other words, the insult complained of is a constructive one. Now, as a rule of construction, I understand that when an intent is to be made out, the whole paper is to be taken into consideration. A particular paragraph or phrase, from its generality or its looseness, may convey an impression which was not in the writer's mind. This is peculiarly the case with a correspondence, where there is less caution used than in papers of more permanent use. |

How unfair it is to play upon words in a correspondence, may be seen by adverting to Mr. Smith's letters, which are certainly drawn with ability, and we are to presume with great care. I take a single paragraph in the letter of the 19th of October, as it relates more immediately to the present discussion:

"The declaration that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d of January, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it relates, is now for the first time made to this Government. And I need hardly add that if that despatch had been communicated at the time of the arrangement, or if it had been known that the propositions contained in it, and which were at first presented by Mr. Erskine, were the only ones on which he was authorized to make an arrangement, the arrangement would not have been made."

Now, the knowledge of the thing might have been gained in a variety of ways without a declaration. Thus, our Secretary might have had a view of the instructions of Mr. Erskine; there might have been an understanding between them on the subject, or Mr. Smith might have the knowledge of circumstances (without an open avowal by the Minister) which would necessarily have led to the same conclusion. Again, as the Secretary is not the Government, but a mere agent, who, until directed by the President, could not move in the business, the declaration might have been made to Mr. Smith individually before the negotiation, or he might have had full knowledge of the fact, and yet this letter would be true in its terms.

The Secretary declares that if the despatch had been communicated at the time, or if it had been known that Mr. Erskine had no other authority, the arrangement would not have been entered into. Now does he mean to say that the mere communication of the despatch, although accompanied by further instructions and better terms, would have broken up the treaty? and yet this is in the terms of the sentence. Was it necessary that the communication, to have its effect, must have been made at the very time of the arrangement? What, if made before, would this have varied the result? Again, suppose that in point of fact our Government did not absolutely know, but had the strongest possible reason to believe and think, and did in truth believe and think, when the arrangement was made with Mr. Erskine, that he was not authorized, would this form an excuse on their part?

In these criticisms, violence I admit is done to the intent of the writer, and they are made only to show the unfairness of seizing on a word to make out the intent against the intent as collectable from the whole paper. And yet, sir, the British Senate may be told that our Secretary is a man of wit, a maker of puns, a vender of conundrums, and a master of equivocal, and that therefore the intent lies in the terms, and is there to be sought. If they do so reason, however highly I may think of their ingenuity, I shall think little of their logic.

One word more before I take up the communications. I wish not to be understood as standing here the apologist of Mr. Jackson, for the manner in which he conducted this part of the correspondence; nay, I am ready to admit that there is in some of his letters a harshness of expression and a want of courtesy which is not justifiable. But on this I am not called to judge. The Executive has placed the dismissal on a different ground; and by the resolutions we are to pronounce whether the ground taken by him is defensible.

The correspondence on your table was commenced by this Government with a letter from Mr. Smith to Mr. Jackson, in which the Secretary, after stating the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the disavowal of that arrangement by His Britannic Majesty, and the expectation of this Government that an explanation of the grounds of refusal would have been given by Mr. Jackson, goes on to state that the President understood that the British Minister had no instructions from his Government authorizing him to make any explanation as to the reasons of the disavowal, and calls upon Mr. Jackson to correct this statement if he had been misunderstood.

The letter of Mr. Jackson of the 11th of October, in answer to this call, states that he is not altogether certain whether Mr. Smith meant to complain of the disavowal itself, of a total want of explanation of it, or that the explanation had not been made through him, and, under the influence of this doubt, the letter is continued with a reference to each of these particulars. Speaking of the disavowal, Mr. Jackson remarks, that he had found no trace of complaint on the part of his Government in the records of his predecessor, and that Mr. Smith had not in their conferences distinctly announced any such complaint. He adds, "that he had seen with pleasure in this forbearance on the part of Mr. Smith, an instance of that candor which he did not doubt would prevail in all their communications, inasmuch as Mr. Smith could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done under such circumstances, as could only lead to the consequences that had actually followed."

It is to this part of the letter that we have been referred for the insult, and very properly, for if it is not to be found here, we shall in vain seek for it elsewhere. It has been urged that when Mr. Jackson declares that the arrangement was made under such circumstances as could only lead to a disavowal, he is to be understood as charging the Executive not only with a knowledge of the instructions of Mr. Erskine, but with dishonorable conduct in procuring with such knowledge his assent to an act which his instructions did not authorize. Now, sir, is this the charitable or fair construction of this sentence? Are there not other circumstances which would equally warrant the disavowal? If the fact is so, that Mr. Erskine not only acted without authority, but against his instructions, who can reasonably question the right in his Government to refuse to recognise his agreement? To solve this point we need not refer ourselves to writers on the laws of nations. The every day doctrine of the rights and duties of principal and agent is sufficient for our purpose. Why then will the Executive insist upon an insinuation which he considers so odious, when the sentence will bear another and a better construction? A construction, too, which will be found necessary to give force to the conclusion, as it is not the circumstance that the instructions were known, but that they were disregarded by the Minister, on which the right to disavow is founded. I like not the feverish apprehension which can so readily discover insult in disguised and veiled insinuations.

Conduct of the British Minister.

I am sensible that another part of the sentence has been enlisted in the cause of the insinuation. Mr. Jackson states, that, in the forbearance of complaint on the part of Mr. Smith, he had witnessed that candor which he did not doubt would prevail in their correspondence, as Mr. Smith could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal. It is material here, in the first place, to ascertain the time to which Mr. Jackson alludes when he refers to Mr. Smith's thoughts. Is the period at which the arrangement was made intended? Not so, surely, because then there was no disavowal of which to complain. The sentence in this point at least is sufficiently clear. Mr. Jackson very distinctly says, that during their conferences Mr. Smith could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal. You will bear it in mind that the conferences were had a short time before the writing of the letter, as Mr. Jackson in it declares, that but a very few days had elapsed since his introduction to the President. Now what were the materials for thinking which Mr. Smith had at the period of the conferences?

From the papers on your table, said Mr. E., you will find that our Minister at London, on the 28th of May, gave our Secretary an account of a conference with Mr. Canning, in which the English Secretary declared that Mr. Erskine had acted not only without authority, but in direct opposition to his instructions, and read the despatch of the 23d of January, the substance of which is contained in Mr. Pinkney's letter. By Mr. Pinkney's letter of the 9th June, it appears that the instructions of Mr. Erskine had been laid before the House of Commons, and a copy of them were then enclosed to our Secretary. In the letter of the 23d June, Mr. Pinkney gives to our Secretary the reasons which Mr. Canning had stated to him for the disavowal. Mr. Smith, in his letter to Mr. Erskine of the 9th August, declares that he had just received from Mr. Pinkney the printed copy of the despatch of Mr. Canning of the 23d of January, and it appears from the letter of Mr. Jackson which I am now testing, that this despatch had been a subject of conversation between him and Mr. Smith.

We have now in review some things which might in the conception of the British Minister have found materials for thinking for our Secretary. He knew the pretensions of the British Government that its Minister had violated his instructions. He had seen the despatch in its whole extent, and might have compared it with the arrangement. Mr. Jackson thought there was a substantial difference between the instructions and arrangement; and perhaps he had a right therefore to conclude that Mr. Smith did not complain, because, after what had come to his knowledge, he found that the act was done under such circumstances as justified the disavowal—nay, sir, he must at this very time have had in mind the latter part of the letter of Mr. Smith to Mr. Erskine which I have just alluded to, in which, after the conditions in the despatch of the 23d of January are mentioned, our Secretary says—"I forbear to express to you, sir, the surprise that is felt at the extraordinary pretensions set forth in this letter of instructions, and especially at the expectation that this Government would as a preliminary recognise conditions, two of which are so manifestly irreconcilable to the dignity and interest of the United States." The Secretary had thus officially volunteered his opinion respecting the difference between the instruction of the 23d January and the arrangement, to the English Legation itself.

If, however, there is yet room for a jaundiced or a jealous mind to suspect an insinuation in the sentence before us, it must be obviated by what immediately follows in the same letter—

"It was not known when I left England, whether Mr. Erskine had, according to the liberty allowed him, communicated to you in extenso his original instructions. It now appears that he did not. But, in reverting to his official correspondence, and particularly to a despatch addressed on the 20th of April to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I find that he had submitted to your consideration the three conditions specified in those instructions, as the groundwork of an arrangement, which, according to information received from this country, it was thought in England might be made, with a prospect of great mutual advantage. Mr. Erskine then reports, verbatim et seriatim, your observations upon each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions; but the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions were, in fact, very explicitly communicated to you; and by you of course laid before the President for his consideration.

"I need hardly add, that the difference between these conditions and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th April, is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation; nor need I draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint, on the part of the American Government, viz: that, under such circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister. I must here allude to a supposition, which you have more than once mentioned to me, and by which, if it had any the slightest foundation, this right might perhaps in some degree have been affected. You have informed me that you understood that Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions, by which to regulate his conduct; and that upon one of them, which had not been communicated either to you or to the public, was to be rested the justification of the terms finally agreed upon between you and him. It is my duty, sir, solemnly to declare to you, and, through you, to the President, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, which you have made the basis of an official correspondence with the latter Minister, and which was read by the former to the American Minister in London, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with this country on the matter to which it relates."

Here we find that Mr. Jackson expressly places the disavowal on the difference in the conditions contained in the instruction and the terms of the arrangement, and again draws his conclusion that under such circumstances the King had a right to disavow the act of his Minister. When speaking of his instruction, he not only admits that Mr. Erskine had not communicated it in extenso, but deems it necessary in answer to a suggestion made by Mr. Smith in their conferences, that Mr. Erskine had more than one set of instructions, solemnly to assure our Secretary, and through him, the President, that such was not the case. This declaration is to me utterly irreconcilable with the notion of an insinuation that the Executive of this country knew, at the time of the arrangement, that the British agent was acting without authority. If Mr. Jackson had intended a charge of this kind, he certainly would not thus notice a mere conversation for the sole purpose of giving an official negative to it.

There is one part of the paragraph which I have just read to you which requires a moment's attention, as it has been the subject of some cavil; I allude to that part of the specification of the letter of Mr. Canning in which Mr. Jackson says that Secretary Smith had made it the basis of a correspondence with Mr. Erskine. This is sufficiently explained by reference to the letter from Mr. Smith to Mr. Erskine of the 19th of August. In that letter the despatch is indeed made the basis of a correspondence. It was not so anterior to the arrangement. One observation more, sir, in relation to this letter. It has been urged that in a fair and critical construction of the terms used by Mr. Jackson, it not only does not appear that Mr. Erskine had no authority to conclude the arrangement, but it is justly to be inferred that he had authority. This I confess is not my construction of the letter, but it is surely strange for those who make and profess to believe it, to urge at the same time that Mr. Jackson in the same letter has charged the Government with the knowledge of a matter which he admits to be untrue, that Mr. Erskine acted without authority.

I shall now, for the present, leave the first letter of Mr. Jackson, remarking, that in the part of it which we have had before us, I understand him as proceeding on the hypothesis that our Government asked from him an explanation of the disavowal, and that he attempts to answer such call by referring to the despatch of the 23d of January as containing the only authority of his predecessor, and alleging the disavowal was occasioned by what was regarded on the part of his Government, a departure from such authority. As to the insinuation attributed to Mr. Jackson, it is not my wish to extenuate, but I have not been able to discover it. If it is in the letter it is a mite too small for my vision.

The next letter in course is that of Mr. Smith of the 19th of October, in which Mr. Jackson is reminded that the President expected "a formal and satisfactory explanation" of the reasons of the disavowal, and he is told that the President "persists in that expectation and in the opinion that there has been given no explanation that is adequate either as to the matter or the mode." In a subsequent part of the letter, the Secretary goes on to say—"The stress you have laid on what you have been pleased to state as the substitution of the terms finally agreed on for the terms first proposed, has excited no small degree of surprise." And why did it excite so much surprise in Mr. Smith? Was it that he now, for the first time, had information of the offensive conditions, or that the alleged substitution was considered by him as an imputation on his honesty, or that of the Government? Let him give the answer: "Certain it is that your predecessor did present for my consideration the three conditions which now appear in the printed documents; that he was disposed to urge them more than the nature of two of them (both palpably inadmissible, and one more than merely inadmissible) could permit, and that finding his first proposals unsuccessful, the most reasonable terms comprised in the arrangement respecting the Orders in Council were adopted." No, sir, the conditions were not merely shown by Mr. Erskine, but they were pressed by him, and very properly rejected by the Secretary, and other terms finally adopted. And whether you call the proposal a substitution, or by some other name, it was the natural course to be taken.

Mr. Smith then proceeds to say:

"And what, sir, is there in this to countenance the conclusion you have drawn in favor of the right of His Britannic Majesty to disavow the proceeding? Is anything more common in public negotiations than to begin with a higher demand, and, that failing, to descend to a lower? To have, if not two sets of instructions, two or more than two grades of propositions in the same set of instructions; to begin with what is the most desirable, and to end with what is found admissible, in case the more desirable should not be attainable? This must be obvious to every understanding, and it is confirmed by universal experience.

"What were the real and entire instructions given to your predecessor, is a question essentially between him and his Government. That he had, or at least, that he believed he had sufficient authority to conclude the arrangement, his formal assurances, during our discussions, were such as to leave no room for doubt. His subsequent letter of the 15th June, renewing his assurance to me 'That the terms of the agreement so happily concluded by the recent negotiation, will be strictly fulfilled on the part of His Majesty,' is an evident indication of what his persuasion then was as to his instructions. And with a view to show what his impressions have been even since the disavowal, I must take the liberty of referring you to the annexed extracts (See C.) from his official letters of the 31st July, and of the 11th August.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

"The declaration 'that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d January, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it relates,' is now for the first time made to this Government. And I need hardly add, that if that despatch had been communicated at the time of the arrangement, or if it had been known that the propositions contained in it, and which were at first presented by Mr. Erskine, were the only ones on which he was authorized to make an arrangement, the arrangement would not have been made."

I must beg you, sir, here to recollect that when Mr. Smith wrote this letter, he had seen the instructions of the 23d of January, which, though they may be deemed offensive, are precise and clear, and that Mr. Jackson had not only solemnly pledged himself that Mr. Erskine had no other instructions, but had placed the right of disavowal on this very circumstance. Now, in what I have just read to you, I perceive a direct charge of falsehood given by Mr. Smith to Mr. Jackson, inasmuch as the Secretary not only intimates that Mr. Erskine had several sets of instructions, or different grades of propositions in the same instruction, but attempts to make out the charge by Mr. Erskine's assurances and correspondence. In doing this, Mr. Smith insinuates that the British Government has been guilty of perfidy towards this country, in refusing to carry into effect the arrangement, and stamps falsehood on the face of the official acts of that Government. For you will recollect, that, by the letter of Mr. Pinkney of the 28th of May, it appears that Mr. Canning declared to him that Mr. Erskine had acted "not only without authority, but in direct opposition to the most precise instructions," and the Order of Council, of the 24th of May, declares that the agreement "is not such as was authorized by His Majesty's instructions."

I am not about to question the propriety of this measure. It is perhaps right, and it might have been necessary, if the Executive had this impression, to avow it; but it does appear to me that if Mr. Smith deemed this course of correspondence proper and justifiable on his part, he should not have been so ready to take fire at an insinuation not more gross. Let me say too that not perceiving the necessity or utility in the then existing state of things of the remarks, I do most sincerely regret they were made. Their tendency is certainly not to bring to a happy termination our disputes with Great Britain.

We will now, sir, pass to the reply of Mr. Jackson of the 23d of October. In answer to the renewed call for an explanation of the disavowal, he says: "His Majesty was pleased to disavow 'the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation 'of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether 'without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. 'These instructions I now understand by your 'letter, as well as from the obvious deduction 'which I took the liberty of making in mine of 'the 11th instant, were at the time in substance 'made known to you; no stronger illustration 'therefore can be given of the deviation from them 'which occurred than by reference to the terms 'of your agreement."

Here again it is said, this evil spirit of insinuation has imbodied itself, and it has been discovered lurking in the latter sentence in which Mr. Jackson states that the instructions of Mr. Erskine, which with a reference to his former letter, and what follows in this, is declared by the British Minister to rest in the despatch of the 23d of January, were known in substance by Mr. Smith at the time of the arrangement, as he understood not only from the admission of Mr. Smith, but from the deduction in the letter of the 11th of October. Now what is the deduction? By adverting to the letter it will be discovered to rest on the "official correspondence" of Mr. Erskine to his Government. And what are the facts? Mr. Smith in his letter of the 19th of October very fairly admits that the "three conditions" were presented and pressed by Mr. Erskine. But does Mr. Jackson allege in this or any other letter, that when Mr. Erskine gave in the "three conditions" he intimated that he was not authorized to treat on other terms, or that our Government so knew? I can perceive nothing of this. Indeed it would have been much more fair for the Executive to have drawn a contrary admission from this sentence. For, if the "three conditions" were distinctly known, and the British Minister would consent, as he did consent, to adopt terms which did not comport with them, the fair inference is that he must have led our Government to believe that his instructions had "two or more grades of propositions." Why then did the Executive persist in the notion that the mere recital of things known to be true bore with it an insinuation of another fact which is not true?

Permit me now, sir, to read that part of Mr. Jackson's letter which is in answer to the insinuation of double instructions:

"Nothing can be more notorious than the frequency with which, in the course of a complicated negotiation, Ministers are furnished with a graduation of conditions, on which they may be successively authorized to conclude. So common is the case which you put hypothetically, that, in acceding to the justice of your statement, I feel myself impelled to make only one observation upon it, which is, that it does not strike me as bearing upon the consideration of the unauthorized agreement concluded here, inasmuch as in point of fact Mr. Erskine had no such graduated instruction. You are already acquainted with that which was given, and I have had the honor of informing you, that it was the only one by which the conditions on which he was to conclude were prescribed. So far from the terms, which he was actually induced to accept, having been contemplated in that instruction, he himself states that they were substituted by you in lieu of those originally proposed."

Here Mr. Jackson meets the insinuation, not by talking of the respect due to his Government, but by an open and unequivocal denial. "Mr. Erskine had no such graduated instruction." You, sir, he says to Mr. Smith, have never seen the despatch of the 23d January, and although you might have been induced to think that Mr. Erskine had farther powers, I have informed you, and again repeat, that this is not so. Does not this renewed asseveration afford a strong ground for the belief that Mr. Jackson never had in mind the insinuation with which he is charged? One word, sir, as to what is stated about the substitution. In this, as well as in the former letter, it appears to me that the remark that Mr. Erskine had stated that the terms finally agreed on were substituted in lieu of those originally proposed, is made for the very obvious purpose of showing that in Mr. Erskine's own conception the agreement did not comport with the "three conditions."

H. OF R.

In the course of the correspondence the next letter is that of Mr. Smith of the 1st of November, from which I will read a few passages. In answer to the explanation he says—"although the delay and the apparent reluctance in specifying the grounds of the disavowal of the arrangement with respect to the Orders in Council do not correspond with the course of proceeding deemed most becoming the occasion, yet as the explanation has at length been thus made, it only remains as to that part of the disavowed arrangement to regret that such considerations should have been allowed to outweigh the solid objections to the disavowal."

While the disavowal was a matter of discussion, it might be proper to canvass the reasons on which it was attempted to be justified. But after the explanation had been given and recognised by our Government, it was not strictly necessary to intimate, as is here done, that the British Minister had behaved unbecomingly in delaying that explanation, or in evincing a reluctance to give it at all. Besides, sir, as the first letter of Mr. Smith is dated the 9th of October, and the letter of Mr. Jackson is of the 23d of the same month, there was really no great delay, and as to any reluctance, I find in Mr. Jackson's first letter of the 11th of October the same cause assigned for the disavowal as in that of the 23d, with perhaps less force.

The letter of Mr. Smith closes thus:

"I abstain, sir, from making any particular animadversions on several irrelevant and improper allusions, in your letter, not at all comporting with the professed disposition to adjust in an amicable manner the difference unhappily existing between the two countries. But it would be improper to conclude the few observations to which I purposely limit myself, without advertent to your repetition of a language implying a knowledge on the part of this Government that the instructions of your predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him. After the explicit and peremptory asseveration that this Government had no such knowledge, and that with such a knowledge no such arrangement would have been entered into, the view which you have again presented of the subject, makes it my duty to apprise you, that such insinuations are inadmissible in the intercourse of a foreign Minister with a Government that understands what it owes to itself."

Shall I say, sir, that in this part of the letter the Secretary shows such a want of temper, the expressions used by him are so harsh, that as an American, I have to regret that he ever suffered the paper to pass the threshold of his office? I admire firmness, and when the occasion demands it our public functionaries ought to use the language of complaint and expostulation, nay, even that of crimination, but then it ought to be done in terms which are decorous. To tell a Minister in terms that he has made "several irrelevant and improper allusions in his letter," without specifying wherein, is not using the language even of dignified resentment. And while a negotiation is pending, the adoption of such language must irritate, and, however intended, can have the effect only of bringing it to a disastrous close.

I am now come to Mr. Jackson's last letter, and you will here permit me to repeat, that I feel no inclination to justify the manner in which the correspondence was conducted on his part. The close of this letter in particular is so uncourteous, that but for the letter of Mr. Smith, to which it is in answer, I should call it rude. The charges however made against the British Minister, of conduct unbecoming and improper, in the plainest terms, and without coloring or qualification, invited a reply out of the ordinary course of diplomatic civility.

Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 4th of November, thus expresses himself:

"I am concerned, sir, to be obliged a second time to appeal to those principles of public law, under the sanction and protection of which I was sent to this country. Where there is not freedom of communication in the form substituted for the more usual one of verbal discussion, there can be little useful intercourse between Ministers; and one at least, of the epithets which you have thought proper to apply to my last letter, is such as necessarily abridges that freedom. That anything therein contained may be irrelevant to the subject, it is of course competent in you to endeavor to show, and as far as you succeed in so doing, in so far will my argument lose of its validity—but as to the propriety of my allusions, you must allow me to acknowledge only the decision of my own Sovereign, whose commands I obey, and to whom alone I can consider myself responsible. Beyond this it suffices that I do not deviate from the respect due to the Government to which I am accredited.

"You will find that in my correspondence with you I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was unable to substantiate a fact. To facts, such as I have become acquainted with them, I have scrupulously adhered, and in so doing I must continue, whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is called in question, to vindicate its honor and dignity in the manner that appears to me best calculated for that purpose."

Now, what are the insinuations which Mr. Jackson "had uttered," and the facts he had stated? I find it no where said that he had uttered the insinuation complained of; the charge on the contrary is, that he used a language which, by implication, is said to convey the idea so offensive to our Government. And what, sir, is this language? I have already given it to you in detail, and will only here remark, generally, that I see nothing in it but an adherence to two facts: that the despatch of the 23d of January was the only authority which Mr. Erskine had to conclude an arrangement, and that the "three conditions," forming the substance of that despatch, were known to our Government. Permit me to remark, that if the insinuation is not contained in the former letters, it certainly is not in this.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

But it is said that inasmuch as Mr. Smith had charged Mr. Jackson with the insinuation, and as Mr. Jackson makes no denial, but declares that he should not think of uttering an insinuation where he was not able to substantiate a fact, it is an admission of the charge. If we strip the sentence of its severity and rudeness we will perceive that Mr. Jackson, never having uttered the insinuation in terms, must have understood that Mr. Smith perceived it in the statement of the two facts, and as he knew this statement to be correct, he meant to adhere to it, notwithstanding Mr. Smith might draw an inference which did not inevitably flow from it. At best this sentence is equivocal, and our Executive might have understood Mr. Jackson as saying, I did not think of making the insinuation of which you complain, because I am not able to substantiate the fact.

Will any gentleman still say that Mr. Jackson ought explicitly to have renounced his error, to have acknowledged that he did mean the insinuation, and that it was without foundation? If he does so say, he must have forgot the course and temper of this correspondence. Certainly there was nothing in Mr. Smith's last letter which could possibly lead to conciliation or concession. When equals meet, we must expect that harshness will meet harshness, and when one party will permit himself to be uncivil, he must expect incivility, not courtesy or concession, from the other.

I have now done with the correspondence as it relates to the insult. And, sir, lest I may be misunderstood, I will now state that it is not my intention to intimate that our Government knew that Mr. Erskine made the arrangement without authority. My aim has been to show that Mr. Jackson did not use "a language implying a knowledge in this Government, that the instructions of his predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him." To myself the considerations I have urged are satisfactory.

I will now proceed, sir, (said Mr. E.,) to consider whether the Executive, in refusing to receive any farther communications from the British Minister, has manifested a just regard to the interest of the American people. I have already remarked, that in my opinion the true interest of the country was not consulted in, or promoted by, this measure; it remains then for me to explain the grounds of that opinion.

It would be superfluous in me at this time to attempt to prove that the interest of this country is best promoted by a state of peace and of free intercourse with Great Britain. The mutual wants of the two nations might be brought to prove this, but the general joy of the country, so audibly expressed at the time it was thought our restrictive system as to that nation was about to be abandoned, is sufficient for my purpose, as it shows as well the general wish as the general sense of the community on this subject. If, then, it is the interest and the wish of the nation to be at peace with Great Britain, it ought to be a primary point in the policy of our Administration to form a treaty with that country on just principles. Matters of etiquette and personal considerations ought to give way to this greater object. I cannot, therefore, think that the interest of the country was promoted by a refusal, in the course of a few days, to communicate with the man who came (ostensibly at least) to form a treaty with us.

It has been remarked, however, that Mr. Jackson had no power to treat, and that, therefore, any farther communication with him could answer no desirable purpose. I will not ask your attention to all that passed between Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson on this point, but will merely present to you the call which Mr. Smith made for the authority and the answer which Mr. Jackson gave.

Mr. Smith, in his letter of the 1st of November, says:

"For the first time it is now disclosed that the subjects arranged with this Government by your predecessor are held not to be within the authority of a Minister Plenipotentiary, and that, not having had a full power distinct from that authority, his transactions on those subjects might of right be disavowed by his Government." This disclosure, so contrary to every antecedent supposition and just inference, gives a new aspect to this business. If the authority of your predecessor did not embrace the subjects in question, so as to bind his Government, it necessarily follows, that the only credentials yet presented by you being the same with those presented by him, give you no authority to bind it, and that the exhibition of a 'full power' for that purpose, such as you doubtless are furnished with, has become an indispensable preliminary to further negotiation; or, to speak more strictly, was required in the first instance by the view of the matter now disclosed by you. Negotiation without this preliminary would not only be a departure from the principle of equality, which is the essential basis of it, but would moreover be a disregard of the precautions and of the self-respect enjoined on the attention of the United States by the circumstances which have hitherto taken place.

"I need scarcely add, that in the full power alluded to, as a preliminary to negotiation, is not intended to be included either the whole extent or any part of your instructions for the exercise of it. These, of course, as you have justly remarked, remain subject to your own discretion."

To this call Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 4th of November, answers—

"It will not I dare say have escaped your recollection that I informed you, at a very early period of our communications, that, in addition to the usual credential letter, His Majesty has been pleased to invest me with a full power, under the great seal of his Kingdom, for the express purpose of concluding a treaty or convention. I well remember your testifying your satisfaction at the circumstance, and I have only to add that I am ready, whenever it suits your convenience, to exchange my full power against that with which you shall be provided, for the progress of negotiation."

It is not necessary for me, after the very able and satisfactory explanation which has been given by my friend from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) of what is intended by "a full power" in diplomacy, to show the authority it creates. Suffice it to say, that if Mr. Jackson had such authorization he might have concluded a treaty, and that he had I am satisfied. He not only declared that, in addition to his letter of credence, he had a full power under the great seal of England, but offered to produce it. Would such offer have been made if the thing had no existence? If the Executive entertained a suspicion of this kind why did he not take Mr. Jackson at his word? Instead of doing this, the answer of Mr. Smith is a dismissal of the negotiation with the negotiator.

But if Mr. Jackson was empowered to treat, it is suggested that it was on terms derogatory to the honor and inconsistent with the interest of the country, inasmuch as his instructions bound him to insist on the "three conditions" as the basis of his negotiation. One of these conditions you will recollect is the absolute relinquishment of the colonial trade as well indirect as direct, and another is the authorization of the British navy to enforce our non-intercourse system.

Now, on these terms, I never would conclude a treaty with Great Britain. Nay, I can hardly forgive our Secretary for his official assurance to Mr. Erskine, as I find it in the letter of that gentleman to Mr. Smith of the 9th of August—"The third condition you certainly very distinctly informed me could not be recognised by the President, but you added, what had great weight in my mind, that you did not see why any great importance should be attached to such a recognition, because it would be impossible that a citizen of the United States could prefer a complaint to his Government on account of the capture of his vessel while engaged in a trade absolutely interdicted by the laws of his country."

This was certainly granting the right by implication. But, is it true that Mr. Jackson was bound to insist on the three conditions? Let the correspondence answer the question. I know that Mr. Smith, to the end, insisted that he was; but, in my judgment, it is another of his mistakes.

Mr. Smith, in his first letter of the 9th October, states, among other things, that the President had learned, with surprise and regret, that Mr. Jackson had avowed, that, "At all events, it is not the disposition or the intention of the British Government to revoke their Orders in Council, as it respects the United States, but upon a formal stipulation on the part of the United States to accede to the following terms and conditions, viz:

"1. That the act of Congress, commonly called the non-intercourse law, be continued against France, so long as she shall continue her decrees;
"2. That the navy of Great Britain be authorized to aid in enforcing the provisions of the said act of Congress;

"3. That the United States shall explicitly renounce, during the present war, the right of carrying on any trade whatever, direct or indirect, with any colony of any enemy of Great Britain, from which they were excluded during peace; and that this renunciation must extend, not only to the trade between the colony and the mother country, but to the trade between the colony and the United States;" and requests Mr. Jackson to correct this statement, if he had been misapprehended.

Mr. Jackson, in his answer of the 11th October, says:

"On the subject of His Majesty's Orders in Council, I have had the honor of informing you that His Majesty, having caused to be made to the Government of the United States certain proposals founded upon principles—some of which were understood to originate in American authorities, and others to be acquiesced in by them—and having afterwards ascertained, in a manner mentioned in a former part of his letter, that the sentiments of the American Government were so different from what they were at first understood to be, I was not instructed to renew to you those proposals, nor to press upon your acceptance an arrangement which had been so recently declined, especially as the arrangement itself is become less important, and the terms of it less applicable to the state of things now existing."

In this sentence, as I read it, there is a sufficient negative to the statement of our Secretary. The proposals, with the three conditions, were made, originally, Mr. Jackson says, because they were supposed acceptable to our Government; but as this was discovered to be founded in mistake, he was instructed not to renew them. Does this look like an adherence to the "three conditions," as the basis of a treaty? But, Mr. Jackson is still more explicit: he was not only instructed not to renew those proposals, but he was even directed not to press upon this Government the acceptance of an arrangement which it had declined. And yet, sir, in contradiction to this statement, it is insisted, that, though Mr. Jackson was not instructed to renew the proposal, or press its acceptance, yet he was bound not to form a treaty which did not embrace the three conditions. Is this a fair deduction? But, in the latter part of the same letter, as if fearful that he might still be misapprehended, Mr. Jackson goes on to say:

"Such, sir, are the grounds on which it has appeared to His Majesty to be unnecessary to command me to propose to the Government of the United States any formal agreement, to be substituted for that which His Majesty has been under the necessity of disavowing; but I am directed to receive and discuss with you my proposal which you may be authorized to make to me on this head.

"As no disposition has hitherto been shown on your part to make any such proposal, it has been impossible for me to state by anticipation (nor was I instructed so to do) what might be the answer that I should eventually think it my duty to return to you; consequently I could not have made, with that view, the statement contained in the fourth section of your letter, and the three subdivisions of it. Such a statement would have been obviously inconsistent with the former part of my overture, which you may correctly record in the third section, viz: that I was not instructed to make to you any proposal whatever upon this subject. I must necessarily reserve, until I hear from you, what proposals it may be deemed proper to make on behalf of the United States; to state in how far they do or do not accord with the instructions which it has pleased His Majesty to give me for the guidance of this negotiation.

DECEMBER, 1869.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

"I will only add, sir, in conclusion of this letter, that His Majesty is very sincerely desirous of maintaining a perfect and cordial understanding with the United States, and of bringing to a complete and satisfactory adjustment all the points of difference that have arisen between the two Governments; and that, agreeing as I do with you, most heartily, as to the interest which both nations have in fostering a mutual and solid friendship and cordiality, no zeal or exertions shall be wanting on my part to carry into effect His Majesty's commands for this most salutary purpose."

Now, sir, how is this received by our Government? Are they satisfied with this correction of their statement, and do they proceed to specify their terms? Let Mr. Smith answer. In his letter of the 19th October, he speaks thus:

"On the subject of the Orders in Council, the President perceives, with sentiments of deep regret, that your instructions contemplate, neither an explanation of the refusal of your Government to fulfil the arrangement of that branch of the existing differences, nor the substitution of any other plan of adjustment, nor any authority to conclude any other arrangement on that subject; but merely to receive and discuss proposals that might be made to you on the part of the United States; and these, it appears, must include a stipulation on the part of the United States to relinquish the trade with enemies' colonies, even in branches not hitherto interrupted by British orders for capture, and also a sanction to the enforcing of an act of Congress by the British navy.

"Were the way properly opened for formal propositions from this Government, a known determination on the part of His Britannic Majesty to adhere to such extraordinary pretensions, would preclude the hope of success in such advances, whether regard be had to the conditions themselves, or to the disposition they indicate, in return for the conciliatory temper which has been evinced by the United States."

It is not charitable to think the Secretary could entertain a wish that Mr. Jackson should have authority to discuss on the terms of a treaty without a power to conclude it; and that such discussion must be made a mere play of words, by the introduction of "the three conditions." And, yet, why this renewed statement against the obvious meaning of the terms of Mr. Jackson's last letter? But I will not further consume your time, by reflections which must suggest themselves to every mind.

Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 23d October, repeats that he was not authorized to renew proposals already declared unacceptable.

"Beyond this point (says he) my instructions are prospective; they look to substituting for notions of good understanding, erroneously entertained, practical stipulations on which a real reconciliation of all differences may be substantially founded. And they authorize me not to renew proposals which have already been declared here to be unacceptable, but to receive and discuss any proposal made on the part of the United States, and eventually to conclude a convention between the two countries. It is not of course intended to call upon me to state, as a preliminary to negotiation, what is the whole extent of those instructions; they must, as I have before said, remain subject to my own discretion until I am enabled to apply them to the overtures which I may have the honor of receiving from you."

Here, again, we find Mr. Jackson repeating that he did not attempt to renew proposals which had been declared unacceptable. But it has been remarked, that he speaks not of making other proposals, but of receiving propositions from our Government; and that the usual course of negotiation required him to take the first step. I will not stop to ascertain this point; but you will recollect, that, by the disavowal, the arrangement was considered by the British Government as at an end; and, according to Mr. Jackson's statement, he did not come to form another arrangement, adjusting our differences partially, but to conclude a convention, whereby there might be a real reconciliation of all differences between the two countries. Now, as the "three conditions" had been deemed inadmissible by the President, it does not appear to me to have been very exceptionable in Mr. Jackson to say, that, not wishing to propose to us what might be deemed improper, he desires the propositions to come from us originally.

Let us now attend to the reply of Mr. Smith of the 1st November. After speaking of the disavowal, and the reasons assigned for it, he adds, that he has to "regret that such considerations should have been allowed to outweigh the solid objections to the disavowal; it being understood, at the same time, that His Britannic Majesty perseveres in requiring, as indispensable conditions, on the part of the United States, an entire relinquishment of the right to trade with enemies' colonies, and also a permission to the British navy to aid in executing a law of Congress—pretensions which cannot but render abortive all proposals whatever upon this subject, whether made by the United States or by His Britannic Majesty."

I will close this examination of the correspondence by presenting you with a part of Mr. Jackson's last letter of the 4th of November:

"You say that 'it is understood that His Britannic Majesty perseveres in requiring as indispensable conditions on the part of the United States, an entire relinquishment of the right to trade with the enemies' colonies, and, also, a permission to the British navy to aid in executing a law of Congress.'"

"The same statement is contained in your letter of the 9th instant, and represented as the substance of what had fallen from me in our previous conferences. In my answer to the letter I took the liberty of showing that such a supposition was erroneous, and I have looked in vain to my letter of the 23d, to find in it any suggestion of a similar tenor. I believe, therefore, that by reference to my two letters you will find that the statement now again brought forward, is contained in neither of them; that it made no part of my previous conversations with you, and that I have in no way given room to suppose I ever made any such statement at all."

"That before the Orders in Council can be revoked, their object must be obtained in some other way, is unquestionably true; but you may be assured, sir, that there is no wish whatever entertained in England that the British navy should be employed in executing a law of Congress. If the proposal that was made upon that subject, and made, as you now know, because it was believed to be acceptable here, had been adopted, and had become a matter of compact between the two countries, and thereby a part, not of the law of Congress, but of the public law, binding upon both parties, and which both would have had a common interest in seeing duly executed; in that case the agency of the British navy would not have had the invidious aspect which is now attempted to be given to it. At present there is no engagement between the two countries, no laws of Congress which bear a reference to any such engagement, and, consequently, it cannot be wished to take any share whatever in the execution of those laws."

"In regard to the colonial trade, I need only to observe that all, or nearly all the enemies' colonies are blockaded by British squadrons; it cannot, therefore, be so much an object of solicitude as you imagine to obtain the relinquishment of the trade of any country to those colonies. On the contrary, you will find it stated in my letter of the 11th ultimo, to be a 'matter of indifference whether the Order in Council on this subject be continued, or an arrangement by mutual consent substituted in its room.'"

In this letter Mr. Jackson is full and precise. He declares that he has been misapprehended by Mr. Smith, as well in the conferences as in his letters, and states in terms, "that there is no wish 'whatever entertained in England that the British navy should be employed in executing a law of Congress.'" Thus, then, this offensive condition is most explicitly given up. As to the colonial trade, he observes that its relinquishment by us is not a matter of much solicitude to Great Britain at this day, but yet, that his Government is willing to form an arrangement relative to it. Does he mean by this to be understood as requiring us to make perpetual, by treaty, what is now temporary; to recognise as right, in all its extent, the British rule of 1756? I do not so understand him. You will recollect the arrangement on this subject in Mr. Monroe's treaty. By that the English Government consented to recognise our right to the indirect trade on our relinquishing the direct trade. And certainly, what was conceded to us at a period when the colonial trade was of greater importance than it now is, would not, at this time, be refused in an arrangement.

Is it not, then, to be regretted that at the moment when our Executive had ascertained Mr. Jackson had power to make a treaty, and that his instructions were not limited by the "three conditions," the negotiation should be broken off, under pretence of an insinuation, which, to say no more of it, is doubtful? Did not the interest of the people point to a different course of proceeding?

One part of this letter, I think, has not been fairly understood. I mean the declaration "that before the Orders in Council can be revoked, their object must be obtained in some other way." The object of those orders, we have been informed, is to retaliate on France the effects of her own system, by refusing to her those advantages of commerce which she had forbidden to England. Now, without inquiring who was the original aggressor in this warfare on neutrals, or in any manner attempting to justify the Orders in Council, let me ask, what has been the understanding of our Government on this subject? When the arrangement was made with Mr. Erskine, was it not understood that the non-intercourse law was to take the place of the Orders in Council, and did we not in some degree, by the law of the last session, give effect to this system as against France?

But it has been objected that the British Government is not disposed to treat with us on equal terms. That, however the Minister may have expressed himself, yet it is to be collected from the letter of Mr. Canning, of the 23d of January, containing the three conditions, that they will not form a convention with this country, which does not contain the offensive propositions. Until the publication of Mr. Pinkney's letters, I am willing to confess to you that I had great doubts as to the sincerity of the British Ministry. The propositions stated as coming from our Government through Mr. Erskine, are so extraordinary that I could scarcely believe such information had actually been communicated; but I can no longer doubt, after reading the letter of the 28th of May.

Mr. Pinkney, in that letter, you will recollect, sir, states his interview with Mr. Canning, when the latter declared that Mr. Erskine had violated his instructions, founded on his own letters, in which were set forth the particulars of several conversations that had passed between him and the heads of department here. Among other things, Mr. Canning represented that, from these conversations, it appeared "that, on the subject of the Orders in Council, we would have no objection, in case they were revoked, as regarded the United States, to repeal the embargo and non-intercourse laws as to Great Britain, and to continue them as to France and Holland, and such other countries as should have in force maritime edicts similar to those of France, so long as those edicts remained; that we would allow it to be understood that the British cruisers might capture American vessels attempting to violate the embargo and non-intercourse laws so modified; that we would even agree to abandon, during the present war, all trade with enemies' colonies from which we were excluded in peace."

Mr. Pinkney, after giving the substance of the conversations, as mentioned to him by Mr. Canning, adds:

"Mr. Canning proceeded to inform me, that in consequence of these representations, some parts of which he said I had myself confirmed in two conversations in January, he had framed and transmitted to Mr. Erskine two sets of instructions, dated the 23d of that month, but not forwarded till sometime afterwards, the first of which related to the business of the Chesapeake, and the second to the Orders in Council, and the proposed commercial arrangements. These instructions, together with the passages in Mr. Erskine's letter, written, I believe, in December last, which contained the above-mentioned representations, and some other details which I ought not to repeat, Mr. Canning read to me."

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

After the strong testimony, by our own Minister, that the letter of Mr. Erskine was not only read to him, but that it contained the representations embodied in the instructions of the 23d of January, I can no longer doubt that such representations were really made. This circumstance, too, goes strongly to repel the idea of additional instructions, as Mr. Canning had reason to believe not only that the conditions would be accepted here, but that he was closing with our offer. The letter of the 23d of January, thus explained, is no proof that the British Government is not willing to meet us on fair and honorable terms.

Again, sir, the time for treating was peculiarly favorable to us. We have been led to believe that the disposition of Great Britain is very much regulated by her situation. That, in the moment of success she is haughty, unbending, and severe, and that when overtaken by adverse events, she is gentle and conciliating. Nay, we have heard that the different modifications of the Orders in Council, from more to less severe, is owing to the defeats of the English or their allies, and that we may read the instructions of their Minister here in the passing history of their war with France. Now, the success of Napoleon at Wagram had decided the fate of Continental Europe. The defeat of the Austrians was supposed to place the political existence of their monarch in the hands of the conqueror, and in all probability the subjugation of Spain must follow. Had our Executive waited a few days, he would have found that, by the Treaty of Vienna, the Emperor of Austria had engaged to break off all intercourse with Great Britain, and acceded to the prohibitory system of France. This state of things in Continental Europe certainly made the friendship and good will of this country an object of interest and solicitude with England, and I must believe that, under these circumstances, the interest of the people of this country required an attempt at least to negotiate.

Another reason why I do not think the interest of the people was consulted, is, that the act, under the circumstances in which it now appears, with imputations on the British Government, will necessarily occasion irritation, and render an adjustment of our differences, if not impracticable, at least more difficult. And in this point of view, the adoption of the resolution on your table is more than impolitic. It is throwing the gauntlet to Great Britain, and who that knows the haughty spirit of that nation, who that has perused its history, will answer for it that it will not be taken up? I shudder, sir, while I reflect, that, before we pass on this resolution, the correspondence and dismissal may produce the fatal mandate which will sweep our commerce from the ocean and lay our trading cities in ruins.

Are we prepared for this war? I cannot subscribe to the doctrine of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) that we are to meet war, not prepare for it, and that it is in time to fit ourselves for the contest when we are attacked. To persons who inhabit the wilds of our Western country, this doctrine may be correct, as the enemy, before it can reach them, must pass over their neighbors, and thus afford them time to prepare for the conflict. But those who live on the seaboard must, if this system is adopted, be sacrificed. We are without money, without an army, and without a navy. Our fortifications are unfinished and unmanned, and is this a state in which to invite hostility from a nation who has the means and the power at command to injure us? I know, sir, we have great resources, that we can draw forth men and money; but if we must have war, let us begin by preparing for it before we provoke it.

Again, sir, I do not consider the dismissal of the English Minister as comporting with the interest of the people, because it appears to me, taken in connexion with other matters, to be part of a system of hostility towards Great Britain, which is to end in war. On this subject I wish to be understood as not intending to question the views of those who advocate a British war; nay, I know the motives of some of them to be pure. I only question the policy of such a measure. To me it appears pregnant with incalculable evils to this country.

Perhaps my situation renders me unnecessarily sensible on this point, as I represent a State which must immediately and greatly suffer in such a war. It is not to be concealed that the State of New York is in some degree a pledge to Great Britain for the conduct of this country. Our seaboard is yet unprotected, and a British fleet may, at any time, destroy our capital, (our pride and boast,) and convert its vast population into hordes of wandering beggars. On the North we have a frontier of several hundred miles, sparsely settled by industrious husbandmen, who, with their families, will not only be exposed to incursions from Canada, but will be an easy prey to the remorseless savages whose residence approach our borders, and who are perhaps now whetting their knives and their axes.

Permit me, sir, to mention a few of the circumstances which have brought alarm to my mind. The manner in which this mission and Minister were held up to the public by the papers which are in favor of the Administration, is one circumstance. I am not about to charge this on the Administration, for I hope and trust it did not proceed from them. I witnessed it with disgust, as disgraceful to my country, but I witnessed it also with alarm, inasmuch as we are apt to consider the leading prints as so many indices to the feelings and views of our public men. Again, the manner in which the negotiation was conducted by our Government induced me to believe that the object of the Administration is not a treaty with Great Britain. The adherence to what I cannot but view as mistakes, the charges which are exhibited, the warmth of temper discoverable, and the harshness of expression adopted in the correspondence, lead to this conclusion.

H. of R.

Conduct of the British Minister.

DECEMBER, 1800.

Again: the speedy termination of the negotiation on a point not connected with the merits, and the publications in the State paper so near the meeting of Congress, assuming a form almost official, and having a tendency to inflame the public mind against the British Minister and his Government; the introduction of these resolutions, extraordinary in their terms, and without a parallel in the history of this country; the bill in the Senate, by the same hand, providing for the forcible removal of a public Minister who may have been, or shall hereafter be, guilty of a breach of privilege, which (in appearance, at least,) is directed against this very Minister; the various resolutions introduced into this House by the friends of the Administration, hostile in their character and views; all these are circumstances that lead me to believe that the aim and intention of the Administration is a war with Great Britain.

I have much more to say on this subject, but as I am sensible that I have already taken up too much of your time, I will close with repeating, that I cannot give my assent to the resolutions on your table.

THURSDAY, December 21.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee appointed, on the seventh instant, presented a bill extending jurisdiction, in certain cases, to the Territorial Courts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of John N. Stout; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. MORROW, from the committee to whom was referred, on the thirteenth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," reported the agreement of the committee to the said bill, without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee appointed on the fifteenth instant, presented a bill to revive and make permanent "An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses," and in addition to the same; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

A communication was received from the Secretary of War, stating the situation and state of the different fortifications in the United States.

Objection was made to the reading of this paper on the ground that it would afford official information to the enemies of the United States, if they had any, of their weakest points.

A question was taken on the reading of it and carried in the affirmative.

After it was read, a motion was made by Mr. TROUP to print it. The motion was supported by himself and Mr. UPHAM, and opposed by Messrs. TALLMADGE and LIVERMORE; and negatived, yeas 32.

The report was referred to the Committee on Fortifications.

On motion of Mr. LOVE,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be directed to inquire into the expediency of amending the "Act for the establishment of a turnpike company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia."

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a report from the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, of the progress made on them during the last season, and of other explanations relative thereto.—The Message and report were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message was received from the Senate which informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to have the application of the money appropriated by "the act making a farther appropriation for the support of a Library;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the resolution from the Senate.

Mr. EMOTT concluded his speech against it, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. GHOLSON said, that notwithstanding much had already been said on the subject before the Committee, he hoped he should be pardoned for occupying a small portion of their attention. The resolution before us seems to embrace several objects pre-eminently entitled to the dispassionate consideration of Congress; objects altogether unconnected with those factions and political dissensions which have unhappily too long prevailed among brethren of the same common family, and which may one day prove fatal to political liberty. The first question which presents itself in the investigation of this subject, involves on the one hand the veracity and dignity of the American Government, and, on the other, the character and reputation of a British Envoy, and, in some degree, of the British Ministry.

In my remarks on this subject, I consider it regular to commence with the origin of the mission from Great Britain to the United States, out of which has arisen the present unpropitious posture of the affairs between the two countries. What, sir, were the circumstances under which that mission was despatched here? In the month of May last, it was known to the British Ministry that a commercial arrangement had been made by their Envoy resident here, (Mr. Erskine,) with the American Government, but under the allegation that it was made contrary to instructions, it was no sooner known than it, and the Minister making it, were disavowed. Mr. Jackson was then appointed to substitute Mr. Erskine, the disavowed agent, and at the time he (Mr. Jackson) was sent to this country, it was well known by the British Ministry that the Government of the United States stood solemnly pledged to the American people to maintain, and that they had inviolably and steadily adhered, to certain points and principles in our differences with England, a surrender of, or departure from which, would be a sacrifice of the honor and best interests of this nation.

Yes, sir, when they well knew that, in the affair of the Chesapeake, our Executive would not, and the voice of almost the whole nation had pronounced that he ought not to make the first advance to a reconciliation, Mr. Jackson was charged, not only to require the first advance from us, to wit: that in the document which should contain the adjustment of that affair, the revocation of the President's proclamation of 1807, interdicting the British armed ships from our own waters, should be recited as an indispensable preliminary; but to require from us also the violation of the principles of our naturalization laws, by insisting on the surrender of foreigners who had become naturalized. As to the Orders in Council, we know not what specific propositions he was charged with in relation to them. As far as we are able to deduce anything from facts before us, it must be understood that the British Government had determined to accept of no conditions for the repeal of the Orders in Council, except such as had been previously declared on the part of the American Government to be inadmissible. Notwithstanding what has been said by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) I think it is easily to be demonstrated that the British Government did not intend to make any arrangement different from that contemplated by the celebrated instructions of the twenty-third of January, transmitted to Mr. Erskine. If the British Government, so recently as May last, disavowed an arrangement, and recalled its Minister, under an allegation that he violated his instructions, was it to be supposed that they would, in two or three months, so far change their policy as to authorize an arrangement on the same principles that they had just rejected? Certainly not, sir. It is evident that such an accommodation could not have been designed, because Mr. Canning says that such measures must be adopted as should secure the objects of the Orders in Council. That they did not by this mean the mere continuance of the non-intercourse law as to France, is manifest; for Mr. Canning says to Mr. Pinkney, that a repeal, as to Great Britain, would be a repeal as to the whole world, unless the British Navy were to be permitted to enforce the law interdicting intercourse with France by the seizure of such vessels as should be found violating it.

Again: if it was the intention of the British Government to recede from the grounds taken, to wit: the requisition of a continuance of the non-intercourse law as to France, a surrender of the colonial trade, and allowing the British Navy to enforce a law of the United States, would not the Minister sent here to perfect the arrangement have been instructed to take a different ground from that previously insisted on? It seems to me perfectly clear that he would. From this obvious view of the subject, I hope I shall not be charged with trespassing on that decorum so earnestly recommended by gentlemen on the other side of the House, if I say that Mr. Jackson was sent here both to offer terms and contend for principles insulting to this nation: and I demand of gentlemen whether this conduct can be considered in any other light than as a premeditated insult? They were apprized of the ultimatum of this Government as to the Orders in Council and the affair of the Chesapeake. The terms offered had been declared over and over again by our Government to be such as it could never sanction.

These, sir, were the circumstances under which the mission commenced. What were those that characterized its progress and termination? I think it very easy to show that the conduct of the Minister himself, after he arrived, partook strictly of the same character as the conduct of the Ministry who sent him. I think I have shown that the disposition manifested by the Ministry in sending him here was insulting to this country. Let us next inquire into the character disclosed, and the conduct displayed by that Minister after his arrival. And, in this inquiry, without wading through all the documents, which gentlemen can as well understand by perusing them in their chambers as by hearing them read here, I will merely advert to the offensive expressions used by Mr. Jackson, and to the manner in which those expressions were met by the Secretary of State. By doing this, it will be very discernable, not only that the facts stated in the resolution are sustained by the correspondence, but that the resolution does not go so far as facts would warrant. In Mr. Jackson's letter of the 11th of October, he says, that the arrangement with Mr. Erskine was made under such circumstances as could only lead to a disavowal. If the circumstances were such as could only lead to a disavowal, they must have been dishonorable, and Mr. Jackson, by intimating that our Government had a knowledge of these circumstances, charges it with being particeps criminis. Can anything be more palpable than this? He expresses this idea in still stronger terms when he intimates that Mr. Smith had a principal agency in the misconduct on this occasion. It certainly was not in Mr. Smith's power to substitute conditions for those which he declined accepting, but it must have been done by Mr. Erskine. But, notwithstanding this, he charges Mr. Smith, not only with conniving at a conduct improper in itself, because it could only lead to rejection of the arrangement growing out of it, but insinuates that he was the principal actor in the scene. In Mr. Smith's letter in answer to Mr. Jackson, the animadversions are too clear in their object to be mistaken. Mr. J. is informed of the displeasure of the American Government at such insinuations; and, in the very first letter which was written by the Secretary of State, he disclaims pointedly having had any knowledge whatever of the deficiency of Mr. Erskine's instructions at the time of making the arrangement. And what says Mr. Jackson in reply? He says again, that Mr. Erskine's instructions were known to Mr. Smith. Sir, I acknowledge very candidly, that on a superficial perusal of the correspondence, the charge of falsehood, from the art and adroitness with which it is wrapt up, does not appear so palpable as when it is more closely examined. Yet, sir, notwithstanding all knowledge of the instructions had been denied by Mr. Smith, Mr. Jackson reiterates the assertion that they were known. Do gentlemen say that there is no insult in this? That there is nothing wrong in the assertion of a knowledge on the part of the Secretary of State which he had before formally and solemnly disclaimed. In Mr. Smith's letter to Mr. Jackson, of the first of November, he intimates to Mr. Jackson that a language implying such a knowledge on the part of the American Government, was altogether inadmissible. What is Mr. Jackson's reply in his letter of the 4th of November, which is the last communication that a proper self-respect on the part of the American Government would permit it to receive from him? After again insinuating that our Government had a knowledge of Mr. Erskine's instructions, he says: "That anything therein (in his former letter) contained may be irrelevant to the subject, it is of course competent to you to endeavor to show; and as far as you succeed in so doing, so far will my argument lose of its validity; but, as to the propriety of my allusions, you must allow me to acknowledge only the decision of my own Sovereign, whose commands I obey, and to whom alone I can consider myself responsible." In speaking of the propriety of his allusions, he acknowledges that he had made them, and does not deny that they are of the character ascribed to them. This insolent letter is concluded by expressions too plain for any misconception whatever. He says: "I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions which did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and least of all, should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was unable to substantiate a fact." He here, in fact, recognises the insinuation imputed to him, and says he would not have made it if he could not have substantiated it. Collecting all his insinuations, on the one hand, and the refutation of them, on the other, I draw the conclusion that Mr. Jackson not only insulted the Government, but charged it with one of the foulest crimes—with direct falsehood.

If the circumstances under which he was sent, and his conduct after he arrived here, were such as I have described, I ask if the occasion does not require that the American Government should take a firm and dignified stand? That we should repel insults and respect ourselves? Shall the authority to whom only is entrusted the most solemn act of government which can be performed, the act of deciding on the last appeal of nations, stand by and see the Executive insulted by an emissary, such as Mr. Jackson was? I hope not, sir.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Dana) seems to have endeavored to throw the whole blame of the transaction on our own Government, because, he says, the arrangement ought not to have been entered into, Mr. Erskine not having exhibited for that purpose, what is termed in public law, a full power, and the gentleman has referred to a variety of authorities to support his doctrine. I would, in my turn, refer that gentleman to the declaration of Mr. Jackson himself to show that Mr. Erskine had what was considered as equivalent to a full power. Says Mr. Jackson, "Never did I imagine, or anywhere attempt to rest the right of disavowal upon that circumstance, (the want of a full power.) His agreement (Mr. Erskine's) would nevertheless have been ratified, had not the instructions, which, in this case, took the place of a full power, been violated." Here is a direct recognition that Mr. Erskine had what was tantamount to a full power; and, indeed, the Government of Great Britain never objected to the arrangement on the ground, that that gentleman had not power to negotiate. It never has been denied, and the disavowal has always been rested on an alleged departure from instructions, which, in fact, admits the power to treat.

As to the observations of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Emory,) though it is far from my purpose, and indeed very unnecessary, to endeavor to follow him through them, I think it proper to take notice of one remark made by that gentleman. He perceives in the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Jackson, what I am utterly unable to perceive, a disposition on the part of our Government, on which he finds the charge of hostility against Great Britain, and a disinclination to treat with her. I can see no such disposition; on the contrary, I have witnessed on the part of the American Government only the greatest forbearance; and I believe it has always been their earnest wish to conclude a treaty with Great Britain on fair and reciprocal terms.

Sir, I consider the present no time for the causeless crimination of our own Government, and much less is it a time to countenance any other. We should discard domestic differences and party spirit, which, at a juncture like this, may be disastrous to our country. If we differ among ourselves, in the name of God let us unite against foreign aggression and foreign insult. It is admitted by gentlemen on the other side, that both Great Britain and France have done us wrong. If so, why not unite against the one as well as against the other? A conduct like this must produce the happiest consequences. If anything like union is discovered against insult and injury, I believe in God that it would not be long ere we met on reciprocal terms of amity. Sir, for my country, I only desire the rule of right; that we must obtain. If it is thought I wish any disaster to befall the British nation, I am misunderstood. I am willing that Great Britain should be great, happy, and prosperous. I should view her downfall as an inauspicious event; consequences might result from it which I will not undertake to estimate; but I hope that the expectation never will be encouraged from this Hall, that Great Britain can or will receive any terms from us other than such as are fair, honorable, and reciprocal.

The terms which have been offered to us are not of that kind. I submit it to gentlemen's own decision. We have long experienced injustice, and if we are only capable of being firm to our purpose, and adhering to the principles of neutrality which have hitherto guided the councils of our country, and especially the enlightened policy of the Executive department, we shall no doubt obtain justice.

In every view, therefore, it appears to me that the resolution from the Senate not only is supported by the correspondence laid before us, but is rendered peculiarly important by the occasion. The appeal made by Mr. Jackson from the Executive, from the organ with which alone a foreign Minister can have communication, to the people, to a tribunal with which he cannot communicate, adds great force to the arguments in favor of a firm stand on our part. I hope it will be made, and that it never will be abandoned till we receive that justice which has been but too long delayed.

Mr. Ross observed, that it appeared to him that the gentlemen who had preceded him had taken a wider range in debate than the resolution seemed to call for. In all cases of this kind, said he, it would be proper to ascertain our objects; to know the objects of those in favor of the resolution, and of those who are against it. Two gentlemen, in opposition to the resolution, have very candidly declared what are their objects. One of them (Mr. PORTER) has said that he thinks all political questions are not questions of policy, but contests for power between the ins and outs; not questions how the Government shall be administered, but who shall administer it; not what offices shall be created, but who shall fill them. The other of them, (Mr. EMOTT,) says, that he distinguishes between the Government, and the Administration of it. These gentlemen, and the British Minister, no doubt, had different objects; the object of these gentlemen is to degrade the Administration; Mr. Jackson's object was not only to degrade the Administration, but the Government also. I am sorry, I confess, and feel all the passions, of grief, fear, and anger, that such divisions should afflict our councils at this time. I grieve to see such divisions; I fear lest a knowledge of them should have an injurious effect on our foreign relations; and I feel anger and indignation to hear it declared at this critical moment that it is fair and right to pursue measures tending to degrade the Administration of our Government. I do not, and I wish it to be understood that I do not, undertake to quote the precise language of gentlemen, but shall endeavor to state what were their conclusions, and the tenor of their arguments.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WHEATON) was not quite so explicit in his object as the other gentlemen were, but assured us that it was natural that all his partiality should be in favor of his own Government. I would ask then, sir, why does he act so unnaturally? If his position be correct, it is reasonable to suppose that, in this critical period of our affairs, he would act naturally; and, acting as he does now, is a proof to my mind of the truth of the principle asserted by philosophers, that men have no natural partialities at all. If he had stated what were his political partialities, he might have been better understood.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DAN) has said that it is not sufficient, in deciding a question of this kind, that that decision should be satisfactory to this House and to the American people, but that it is necessary, on a great and important question of the nature of that under consideration, that it should be decided so as to meet the approbation of the whole world; and he asks with an emphasis, is there to be found in the annals of diplomacy a procedure of the nature of that now contemplated? Permit me, sir, to answer this inquiry by asking another question: Can he find in the annals of diplomacy a conduct so completely outraging all decency and decorum as the conduct which is now the subject of our animadversion? For, if a case never before occurred, it is not to be presumed that there is any record of such a case in existence. And, indeed, the presumption, that in diplomatic correspondence, Ministers usually conduct themselves with decorum, is sufficient to induce me to believe that a case similar to this never has before occurred.

Having thus paid my respects to the four gentlemen who preceded me in the opposition, any further observations made by me in reply to them will result from the necessity of clearing my path from the impediments which they may have thrown in my way.

I, for one, am an Administration man, if that Administration act correctly, whether it shall, in a time of great difficulty and doubt, insure a prospect of peace with Great Britain, or whether it may find it necessary in asserting the rights and independence of the Government to involve the nation in war. I think the importance of the one course is as great as the other, and I will, under such circumstances, equally support them when they are likely to make war as to make peace, however other gentlemen may differ from me on this head.

Before I proceed to state, sir, what I conceive necessary to be understood, in order to come to a correct judgment on these resolutions, permit me to premise that there is more than a presumption that Mr. Erskine had a power to enter into the arrangement which he made. 1st. Because he himself declared he had such power. 2dly. Because he acted in conformity to that declaration; and 3dly. Because Mr. Jackson does not deny he had such power. Mr. Jackson does not pretend to say that Mr. Erskine had not other despatches and other instructions than those of the 23d of January, and that, in them, there were not other conditions of a different grade and character from those contained in that despatch. Hence, I think it is fairly to be concluded, that Mr. Erskine had the power to enter into the agreement. It has, however, been said by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANAS,) that this is not so much a question of what our Government was ignorant of, as of what they knew, or what they ought to have known; and he has entered into a long examination of the mode of commissioning diplomatic characters, whether by letters of credence or by full powers, and has drawn a distinction between the two. In the first place, I apprehend it is in no wise material, to enable the House to decide on the resolution, whether the President did or did not know the nature of Mr. Erskine's powers. But it is necessary to rescue him from the imputation which those are disposed to cast on him who are desirous to pull down the Administration. What was the amount of the gentleman's showing on this occasion? That in all cases, in order to complete a treaty, it is necessary there should be a commission or full power. But has he shown that it is necessary in order to make a preliminary arrangement similar to that entered into? I apprehend he has not. On referring to the letter quoted by him from Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, to Mr. Hammond, we find the former calling upon the latter to exhibit his powers to enter into a negotiation; but Mr. Jefferson afterwards recedes from that demand, and receives the word of Mr. Hammond that he is possessed of power to negotiate as sufficient evidence of his being clothed with the proper power without the exhibition thereof. But the ratification was not withheld, as has been justly said, because there was an absence of a full power on this occasion. Mr. Jackson himself states that this was not the ground on which the ratification was withheld. It must first be proved that it was obligatory on the Executive to call for Mr. Erskine's full power, and it must then be proved that he did not, before his observations can be brought to bear on the question. Where is the proof that the Executive did not call for those powers? It is not pretended that Mr. Erskine had not a power to make an arrangement, but that it was not concluded in pursuance of his instructions. Therefore, if he had produced ten thousand powers, unless his instructions had authorized him to do what he did, the British Ministry would have rejected the terms stipulated for them, as they have done. But why is it necessary to know, on this occasion, whether the President did call for these powers or not? The inquiry composes no part of the resolution; it is neither expressly mentioned nor glanced at; and why this inquiry is raised, I confess I am utterly at a loss to know, unless it was to prove that the President of the United States had a knowledge of the instructions, and that they restricted Mr. Erskine's powers. The gentleman has not ventured to infer that the President of the United States had this knowledge, but the course of his argument goes to show that, in his opinion, he did possess this knowledge. He lays down the position, that it was the duty of the President to have seen those powers, and, I presume, supposes that the conclusion will be drawn that the President performed his duty; and, of course, taking it for granted that there were no other instructions than those of the 23d of January, that the President must have seen those instructions, and consequently have known that Mr. Erskine had not power to conclude the arrangement. All his argument went to raise a structure to induce a belief in this House, and in the public at large, that this knowledge must have been in possession of the President. The gentleman, at the same time, professes the utmost regard and respect for Mr. Madison. This, I confess, is following the direction of the poet, who says:

"Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer;
"And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer."

But let us inquire if the President had any knowledge that Mr. Erskine had no full power; for if I show, beyond all doubt, that the President did not know it, all this insidious fabric, which is designed to produce so many delusions, will vanish at once. I think it is to be presumed that the President had no knowledge that Mr. Erskine had not full powers, because he entered into the arrangement. What object could he have in view which should induce him to conclude an arrangement, except with full confidence of its being carried into effect? Not to get rid of the embargo—that had long before been interred by its fathers with a truly Christian spirit. Not to get rid of the non-intercourse—because the moment the arrangement was disavowed, the President breathed life and spirit into that act, and gave it renewed existence. It was not from any hostile disposition to England, because he could have no reason to wish for a war. And because, if he had desired a war with that country, he had no occasion to seek a pretext therefor, inasmuch as long antecedent, and up to the very time of making the arrangement, the causes for war against Great Britain were great and numerous, as has been agreed by all parties. If not to get rid of the embargo, nor of the non-intercourse, nor for war, what object could he have, with such knowledge as has been imputed to him, not expressly, but by inference, in making the arrangement of April? Will gentlemen be good enough to condescend so far as to assign some object that the Executive could have had in view from such conduct? For it is not to be presumed that men, in or out of office, act without motive and without object. Therefore, hearing no reason assigned why the President should act thus preposterously, as it is attempted to be insinuated he did, by those in opposition, it would be reasonable to conclude that he had no such knowledge. But, in opposition to this insinuation, also, you have the solemn declaration of the President of the United States through the Secretary of State. Humiliating in the extreme must it be to hear this solemn asseveration questioned, even in a side-way, in order to support the insolence of a British Minister! Was it not enough that the country has been enabled to endure, in order to secure the great object of remaining in peace, insult after insult, outrage after outrage, and even that the Government should be insulted by foreign diplomatic characters, without doubts and suspicions being insinuated by members of this House? Pray, sir, let me ask this House, or the whole of the United States, what the President of the United States has ever done in any official character, among the many which he has filled with honor to himself and reputation to his country, that the correctness of his declarations, made through his Minister of State, should be disputed? But I might suffer the humiliation of going still further into this subject. We have the word of the recalled Minister, if that be considered more conclusive by gentlemen than that of the President of the United States, that he did not communicate his instructions to Mr. Smith. We have, 1st. The presumption that the Executive had no knowledge of Mr. Erskine's instructions, because he could have no object in view in concluding an arrangement with that knowledge; 2d. We have his declaration to that effect through the Secretary of State; 3dly. We have the declaration of the Minister, whose act was disavowed, to the same effect. What have we to destroy this proof? The deceptive, poisonous insinuations of Mr. Jackson. Mr. Erskine repeatedly declared that he had ample powers. On the news being received during the last session of the issuing of the order of the 26th April, he declared that he had no doubt his arrangement would be carried into effect. He, to the last moment, declared that he acted in the spirit, if not in the letter, of his several letters of instructions. How, therefore, was it possible for the President to receive information from Mr. Erskine that he was not invested with competent power, when Mr. Erskine himself declared and believed he was, and acted accordingly.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

From these considerations I apprehend it most clearly appears that the President of the United States had not a knowledge, neither was it his duty to have had a knowledge that Mr. Erskine did not possess powers to make the arrangement which he did.

It has not been made to appear what were the particular conditions on which Mr. Erskine was to act with respect to the Chesapeake; all that we know on the subject we know from Mr. Jackson; and I must confess that after the evasive and insidious manner in which he conducted in his correspondence in this country, I am disposed for one to give but little credit to him. Pope says somewhere, "the proper study of mankind is man." I know no use of this study, unless the character of men are to have an influence on the opinion which we form of their actions. Mr. Canning's character appears to me to have been such a one as might be expected to produce such a Minister as Mr. Jackson has proved himself. He who would undermine his friend and colleague, as Mr. Canning did Lord Castlereagh, could not be expected to do better by Mr. Erskine, or to act fairly and honorably with us; and therefore Mr. Jackson, whose abilities, whose insolence, and whose perfidy, had already been proved to be equal to any political project, however dishonorable, was commissioned by Mr. Canning to succeed Mr. Erskine. This observation with respect to the character of Mr. Jackson, I hope will be recollected by the House during the remainder of my observations.

I now come to what I conceive to be the second point, and the great and important point necessary to be decided on this occasion. If the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) was really in earnest when he declared to this House that, if the Government of this country had been charged with falsehood and insulted, it was such an indignity as ought to receive the reprobation of every American, I might entertain a hope that he would yet be induced to vote for this resolution. For I think it as clearly demonstrable as anything that could be suggested, not only that Mr. Jackson did make use of those expressions attributed to him, but that he did it with intent to insult the Government.

What are the inquiries which naturally arise under this resolution? 1. Did Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 23d of October, make use of expressions "conveying the idea that the Executive Government of the United States had a knowledge that the arrangement lately entered into by Mr. Erskine, his predecessor, on behalf of his Government, with the Government of the United States, was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine for that purpose?" If that question be answered in the affirmative, the next question will be, was such an insinuation "highly indecorous and insolent?" These are the two inquiries contained in the first part of the resolution. 3dly. Did he repeat the same intimation in his letter dated the 4th of November, 1809, after he was apprized by the Secretary of State that the Executive Government had no such knowledge, and that if it had possessed such knowledge, such arrangement would not have been entered into on the part of the United States, and after also being officially apprized that such intimation was inadmissible? And if he did, was not such intimation still more insolent and affronting than the first intimation thereof? If I shall be able to show that the first question must be answered in the affirmative, the first, being the only disputed point, will therefore alone require investigation. It is admitted that Mr. Smith did, by his letter of the 19th of October, 1809, inform Mr. Jackson that our Government had no knowledge that Mr. Erskine was not invested with competent authority to make the disavowed arrangement, until they received it from Mr. Jackson, and that if they had been possessed of such knowledge, the arrangement would not have been made. And it is not disputed, nor can it be disputed, that Mr. Smith did, by his letter of the first of November, 1809, inform Mr. Jackson that a language implying a knowledge on the part of our Government that the instructions of Mr. Erskine did not authorize the arrangement made by him, after an explicit avowal that our Government had no such knowledge, was inadmissible. With these admissions, let us examine the letters of Mr. Jackson, and see if he has not been guilty of the charges contained in the resolution.

In his letter of the 11th October, Mr. Jackson says to the Secretary, "you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of an act done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that actually followed." Under what circumstances? Let me ask this House what circumstances could have induced Mr. Smith to have thought that the agreement then entered into would have been disavowed? Let me ask them to rack their inventions to discover any other circumstances than fraud, intrigue, or a knowledge that Mr. Erskine had no power. Can they discover any other reason why Mr. Jackson should make use of this expression? If they cannot, has Mr. Jackson discovered such incapacity as not to be supposed capable of conveying the ideas he intended? Here, then, I think is the groundwork of this resolution, and it is laid in the very first letter of Mr. Jackson. True, sir, that is not the one recited in the resolution; but it is necessary to examine the tenor of the conduct of the gentleman who is alleged to have made the insinuation; and, by attending to the tenor of the paragraph, it will be collected that it was the intention of Mr. Jackson to charge Mr. Smith with a knowledge, at the time of the arrangement, of Mr. Erskine's having exceeded his instructions. In the second paragraph from this sentence, is also an insinuation that our Government might have derived a knowledge of Mr. Erskine's want of powers from Mr. Pinkney, our Minister in London; and I cannot, after reading it with the greatest attention, discover any other view with which that clause was introduced into the letter.

Having thus looked into the first letter, and having, as I conceive, discovered reasonable grounds to say that Mr. Jackson, in the very outset of this correspondence, discovered a disposition to insult our Government by charging them with making an arrangement which they knew must be disavowed, which carried with it the inference that it was done in a dishonorable manner, and, if such be the inference, there is no member who will not say that it was an insult to the country. Let us now see what he says in his letter of the 23d of October; in that Mr. Jackson says: "These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were, at the time, in substance made known to you. No stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them that occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement." How did he come to the knowledge that these instructions were, in substance, made known to Mr. Smith? From what part of this correspondence can any gentleman collect that

Mr. Jackson had a right to draw the conclusion which he did? It is true that Mr. Smith acknowledged that the three conditions had been communicated to him, but no where is there proof that the instructions were made known to him. Mr. Jackson speaks in one place of conditions; but where he speaks of the knowledge of Mr. Smith, he says that the instructions were, in substance, made known to him. Was it not a substantial part of the despatch of the 23d January, that Mr. Erskine was to receive a concession of those three conditions therein mentioned, before he proceeded to make an arrangement at all? If the substance of that instruction had been communicated to Mr. Smith, he must have known of this material part. I ask what other reasonable and fair conclusion can be drawn from the expressions of Mr. Jackson just read? And does not Mr. Jackson, when he refers to the obvious deduction he made in his letter of the 11th, repeat the offensive passage quoted from that letter by me? In the very next paragraph of his letter of 23d, he says: "You are already acquainted with that (instruction) which was given, and I have had the honor of informing you that it was the only one by which the conditions on which he was to conclude were prescribed." Here it may be observed that Mr. Jackson's language is not so precise that the conclusion may not be drawn that there were other instructions; and therefore, I presume, Mr. Smith is rescued from the imputation attempted to be cast upon him by the gentleman from New York; for I understood his argument to be, that Mr. Jackson might have been guilty of petulance and impropriety, but that Mr. Smith was equally so in suggesting that there was more than one despatch, after Mr. Jackson had asserted to the contrary. Mr. Jackson does not give Mr. Smith that information. He only gives him the information that that was the only despatch which contained the conditions. There is certainly a difference between saying that that was the only despatch, and saying that it was the only despatch which prescribed the conditions. So that Mr. Smith, when he suggests that there was more than one despatch, does not, by any means, contradict what had been said by Mr. Jackson.

That this charge was intended to be made by Mr. Jackson, is put beyond all possibility of doubt by his letter of the 4th of November. Mr. Smith puts a construction on the words contained in Mr. Jackson's letter of the 23d. He calls upon Mr. Jackson for an explanation, and tells him that the Government of the United States understood his allusions to mean so and so; he throws the door wide open for him to explain himself to the Government of the United States. Will gentlemen say that this conduct of Mr. Smith was not that liberal course which should be pursued? What more could any gentlemen do, if he had understood another gentleman's language and terms in a way calculated to give offence, than to call upon that gentleman for an explanation. If the person called upon did explain and say, "sir, you have mistaken my meaning," the subject would be dropped, and friendship and correspondence be renewed. Was this course pursued by Mr. Jackson? No, sir. Mr. Jackson does not say that his meaning was misunderstood, or in any manner whatever deny that the construction put on his language was the true one. I ask gentlemen what stronger proof can there be of Mr. Jackson's having made use of the words with the intent attributed to him? If he did make use of them with that meaning and intent, I ask if, after an explanation has been liberally, and with a forbearance seldom manifested, asked of him and refused, whether a member of this House can doubt the intention of that Minister? Nay, I presume Mr. Jackson himself will not be very thankful to gentlemen for frittering away what he has said, so as to make it appear to have a different meaning from that which he intended. Because, when called on for that purpose, he declined giving any such explanations or constructions to the offensive passages in his letters, as are now attempted to be given by his friends.

The next inquiry under the resolution is, did he reiterate his gross insinuations? He did; and no gentleman can look to the last clause of that letter without saying that Mr. Jackson does reiterate every statement and insinuation he had undertaken to make; he not only forbore to give an explanation, but reiterated his offensive language.

Here, then, sir, I apprehend we have proof of all the facts necessary to the support of this resolution. We have seen the Executive part of our Government insulted by a foreign Minister; and it remains to be seen that that insult was not intended for the man but for the Secretary of State; because I understood, from some expressions which have fallen from gentlemen, that they have a reluctance to involve their country in war for a mere insult to a man. I really feel myself humbled at being compelled to go into this inquiry; but I believe I shall show that Mr. Jackson was not satisfied with insulting the Secretary of State, and through him the Government of the United States, but has given the nation in the course of his correspondence one of the greatest insults that could be given to a people. In his letter of the 23d, he more than insinuates that all honorable and manly resistance is banished from America, thus charging the American people with not having courage, spirit, or honesty enough to resist the French decrees.

"Without minutely calculating what may be the degree of pressure felt at Paris, by the difference in the price of goods, whether landed at Havre or at Hamburg, I will, in my turn, appeal to your judgment, sir, whether it be not a strong and solid reason, worthy to guide the councils of a great and powerful monarch, to set bounds to that spirit of encroachment and universal dominion which would bend all things to its own standard? Is it nothing in the present state of the world, when the agents of France authoritatively announce to their victims 'that Europe is submitting and surrendering,' that the world should know, that there is a nation which by that Divine goodness so strongly appealed to in the paper to which I allude, is enabled to falsify the assertion? Is it not important at such a moment, that Europe and America should be convinced, that, from whatever countries honorable and manly resistance to such a spirit may have been banished, it will still be found in the Sovereign of the British nation and in the hearts of his subjects?"

What is this but to insinuate that this spirit has been banished from America; that a spirit of resistance is neither to be found in the American Government nor in the hearts of its citizens to the oppressive and domineering power of France? It proves to me beyond all possibility of doubt, that Mr. Jackson came to this country with prejudices and prepossessions with regard to the spirit of the Government, which he found (and I rejoice that he did) were incorrect. He seemed to suppose that we had banished every honorable and manly spirit, and that the British Government might call upon us to bow to whatever idol she might set up; for, sir, calling upon us to agree to the conditions presented was in effect calling upon us to agree that Great Britain should regulate the commerce of the world.

The gentleman from Rhode Island, in an impressive and eloquent manner, spoke of the injuries of the country, and expressed his dissatisfaction at the resolution, inasmuch as it would place the interests of the country at the hazard of a war. I do not know, when a foreign Government has by some means or other imbibed a notion that all honorable and manly spirit is banished from another Government, that she shall be involved in a war with that Government by showing that all honorable and manly spirit is not banished from among us. Therefore, I do not see that the adoption of this resolution would have a tendency to involve us in war. If the gentleman be really sincere in his desire of seeing our rights asserted in a manly manner, I ask him why he should be afraid to assert our rights in the manner proposed by this resolution? Let me ask why we should be afraid of being involved in a war? Our rights have been invaded, our neutral trade destroyed by that domineering Power; and although those gentlemen who are in opposition to this resolution have been generally in favor of protecting these rights, and gentlemen in favor of it have reluctantly protected them, it is strange that the latter should be in favor of strong measures, and that fear should come from the side where it does. Are the opposition more intent on degrading the Administration than in protecting commerce. Shall we lose any rights by war? Will we be deprived of any comforts by it? It is true that it is said that our Treasury is not in a situation to go to war. Will gentlemen calculate the expense of maintaining our rights or revenging our wrongs? I presume as Americans they will not.

It has been said by a gentleman from New York that he is opposed to this resolution, because he conceives that the President did not consult the interest of the United States by breaking off the negotiation. I am perfectly at a loss, sir, to know what the gentleman would have wished him to have done. If it be true that insults have been offered to our Government—and I should suppose that every gentleman looking with a sole eye to discover the meaning of the terms used, would agree with me on this point—I ask what could the Government do? There was no hope that any terms could be agreed upon with Mr. Jackson to which the American Government could subscribe. It has been said that Mr. Jackson was empowered to conclude a convention; but, sir, he only says that he was empowered to receive and discuss such propositions as should be made to him; and in another paragraph he says that the British Government can never cease to maintain the principles of the Orders in Council. When this House has almost unanimously declared that the United States can never submit to the Orders in Council, and the British Government has declared that it never would yield them, I ask what hope could remain of a beneficial effect to be derived from further negotiation, putting out of view the circumstance which imperiously put an end to it?

The gentleman from New York seems to think that the powers of Mr. Jackson are put beyond doubt, because, in his letter of the 23d of October, he says most explicitly that he is authorized to discuss and eventually to conclude a convention. What was the event on the occurrence of which he was to conclude a treaty? On the American Government's subscribing to its own degradation; on its surrendering all those neutral rights, the contending for which placed us in our present situation. Why do gentlemen talk about the danger of involving the nation in a war by the adoption of these resolutions? Are they afraid of being involved in a war in defence of the nation's rights, if these terms and these conditions be prescribed as the ultimatum of the British Government? Subscribe to her conditions, give up your neutral rights, do everything she wishes, and she will be your best friend; she will give you her manufactures and take your money. And if we have no hope of receiving better terms, why should we pocket insult after insult, to effect no real object?

Sir, said Mr. R., I can see nothing to induce the House to refuse to adopt this resolution on the ground that adopting it will produce a war with England—I think it is most devoutly to be wished for in preference to the terms which have been offered to us. The American people must and will rouse from their slumbers; they must defend their rights and support their Government; and not only that, they must and will discriminate between their friends and their enemies. The crisis is fast approaching to this event, and it requires no penetration to see that ere long such a course will have to be adopted. Is it not important that this resolution should be adopted on this momentous occasion? Will it have no effect at a time when strength ought to be given to the Administration? Will it not nerve the arm and give confidence to the heart of the Executive to guide the vessel of State? It appears to me its adoption will produce very beneficial effects, by showing to the world that undiminished confidence is placed in the Administration of our Government.

I have thus endeavored to show, as far as my feeble abilities would enable me, that we are not only justified in adopting this resolution, as respects the truth of the facts it states, but by expediency and propriety also. I have perhaps trespassed on the attention of the Committee for too great a portion of their time, but I hope to be excused by the importance of the subject.

On motion of Mr. UPHAM, the Committee rose and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, December 22.

Mr. POYDRAS presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of Point Coupée, in the Territory of Orleans, praying, for reasons therein set forth, to be confirmed in their title to a certain piece of land lying on the Mississippi river, near said Point Coupée, or that such other measures may be adopted to secure the title to the petitioners as shall appear reasonable and proper.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LOVE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to incorporate the Trustees of Washington College; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. HELMS, from the committee appointed on the eighth instant, presented a bill for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Ordered That the message received yesterday, communicating a report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, be referred to Mr. LEWIS, Mr. STANFORD, Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. ROOT, and Mr. J. BROWN, to consider and report thereon to the House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign Ministers within the United States," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution from the Senate, for the appointment of a joint committee to have the application of the money appropriated by the "act making a further appropriation for the support of a Library;" and the same being twice read, was agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That Mr. DANA, Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. SEYBERT, be appointed of the said committee, on the part of this House.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Randolph, praying that the seat of JONATHAN JENNINGS, the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Indiana, be vacated, made a detailed report in favor of the petition, and recommending to the House the adoption of a resolution that the election, having been illegal, is therefore void, and that the seat of JONATHAN JENNINGS ought to be vacated. The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

H. OF R.

The report is as follows:—

The committee report: That they have maturely examined the documents committed to them by the House, and also the allegations of the petitioner and of the sitting Delegate. The documents are,

1st. The official certificate of the Governor of the Territory of Indiana, testifying that Jonathan Jennings was, on the 22d day of May, 1809, duly elected a Delegate to Congress for that Territory.

2d. A memorial of Thomas Randolph, praying that the seat of Jonathan Jennings may be vacated, for the following reasons, to wit: That though it does appear, by the official return, that Jonathan Jennings had a majority of thirty-nine votes, there ought, in the opinion of the petitioner, to be deducted from the votes counted by the sitting member ninety-one votes taken in the seventh district of Dearborn, the returned copy of which was not certified by the poll-keepers, as the law directs; and also that two districts in the said county of Dearborn were prevented from voting, through the omission or mistake of the sheriff, who did not appoint deputies to be judges of the election, or whose appointment was not attended to as it ought to have been; in which districts the petitioner is of opinion that he could have had the majority of votes.

The petitioner further states that it is not his intention on these grounds to claim a seat in this House, when in fact he had not a majority of votes, but that it is his wish that the voice of the people should be legally and truly heard; and, in support of the prayer of his petition, he refers to the memorial of the Legislature of the Territory, transmitted to the House, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

3d. A document purporting to be a petition of the Legislative Council and members elected to serve in the House of Representatives, and not objected to by the parties, states that, from a deliberate view of the act of Congress dividing the Northwestern Territory, the ordinance for the government of the Indiana Territory, regulating elections, and the law of Congress extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of the Territory, they find that considerable doubt existed in the minds of the minority with respect to the constitutionality of the meeting of the General Assembly of the Territory. And they further state that, in the year 1805, there was a Legislature organized under the law dividing the Territory northwest of the Ohio river: that, in the year 1808, the Governor dissolved the said Legislature: that, on the 3d day of February, 1809, the law of Congress dividing the Indiana Territory was enacted: that, on the 4th day of April, 1809, the Governor issued his proclamation for the election of an additional number of members of the Legislature, sufficient to supply the place of those struck off by the division of the Territory, corresponding with the law of 1805, on the authority of which the General Assembly was first organized, viz: eight Representatives. But the law passed the 27th of February, 1809, extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of Indiana, declares how the Legislature shall be organized, after the passage of the said law, that is, that the General Assembly shall apportion the members to the House of Representatives to consist of not less than nine, nor more than twelve members. That the law was evidently predicated on the principle that a Legislature was in existence at the time of its passage, or that a Legislature might be convened under the authority of the Governor's proclamation; but the fact was different, for the old Legislature was doubly dissolved, first by the Governor, as above stated, and again by the division of the Territory, which struck off three members of the House of Representatives and two of the Legislative Council. Thus there was no Legislature in being to make the apportionment, agreeably to the act of Congress.

The petition, after further explanations, goes on to state, that after the General Assembly was convened, the minority of the Representatives not conceiving themselves authorized to go on in legislative business, the Legislature agreed to postpone doing any business except apportioning an additional member to make the number nine, agreeably to the law of Congress extending the right of suffrage to the Territory.

The above petition is accompanied with a document purporting to be a resolution of the General Assembly requesting the Governor to dissolve the Assembly, and to proceed as speedily as may be to organize another under the provisions of the act of Congress.

4th. In support of the irregularities in the election, stated by the petitioner, he produced to the committee a certificate signed by the clerk of the court of Dearborn county, testifying that there were two districts in said county in which the citizens were prevented from voting, through the omission or unintentional mistake of the sheriff. He also produced a return of the election held in the seventh district of Dearborn county, in which the signatures of the poll-keepers, required by the law of that Territory, are wanting; but it is certified by the judges of the election to be a true test of the votes taken under their inspection on the 22d day of May, 1809, and certified by the Secretary of the Territory to be a true copy.

The petitioner also produced a certified notice, given to Jonathan Jennings, of his intention to contest his election, and that for that purpose he would apply on the first Tuesday of September next at the court-house in the town of Vincennes, where the sitting member might attend; and further adds, that there are other grounds upon which he shall contest his election, and says that of this due notice shall be given; but these other grounds have not been stated to the committee, nor any further notice to the sitting member produced.

In reply to these objections, the sitting Delegate complains that he had neither notice nor opportunity to have the alleged irregularities examined. He admits that two districts in Dearborn county were prevented from voting, as stated by the petitioner; but says he could prove, if he had an opportunity, that there did not more than fifteen attend at the places of election who had a right to vote, who, if they had all voted for the petitioner, which he does not admit, would not have altered the state of the poll. He further alleges that, if opportunity had been allowed, he could have proved that the poll-keepers at the election held in the seventh district of Dearborn county did their duty according to law, though their signatures do not appear along with those of the judges in the copy before the committee. He further says that he is informed that, if he had an opportunity, he could prove that the election in Knox county, where the petitioner had all the votes, was not conducted according to law. This fact the petitioner admits, and the sitting member claims an opportunity to examine the facts alleged in opposition to his right to a seat in the House.

The petitioner does not ask the election to be declared void on account of the want of legal authority vested in the Governor. He, before the committee, argued in support of the Governor's authority to order the election by proclamation, and rests his plea solely on the irregularities he has specified.

The sitting Delegate also advanced the legal authority of the Governor to organize the Legislature, and to direct the election of a Delegate, in argument before the committee, and in a written paper reported along with the documents.

Besides the opinion of the General Assembly, in their petition, expressing a doubt of the authority by which they were convened, the Governor himself, in what is submitted to the committee as the Governor's speech at the opening of the General Assembly, convened by his own authority, expresses a doubt of his authority, but goes on to support it by a liberal construction of the law of Congress for extending the right of suffrage to the Territory.

The committee, after deliberate examination of the laws relative to the Indiana Territory, consider it to be their duty to investigate the authority under which the election of a Delegate to represent that Territory was held, previous to an examination of the irregularities suggested, because, if the election was held without authority of law, it was void, without regard to irregularities; and, on this investigation, they discovered that the Governor had, on the 26th October, 1808, dissolved the Legislature, but that at that period his power to organize it again remained unimpaired. They also found that by the act of Congress, erecting the Illinois Territory into a separate Territory, five members of the Representatives, with the districts which they had represented, were taken away from the Indiana Legislature, and two of the Legislative Council; by which act, the Legislature of the Indiana Territory was not only dissolved, but abolished, and no power vested in the Governor to revive it, because the power vested in the Governor with relation to the Northwestern Territory could not be applied to the Governor of the Indiana Territory. The saving clause, viz: that nothing in the act dividing the Indiana Territory shall be construed in any manner to affect the Government now in force in the Indiana Territory, cannot, by any reasonable construction, be applied further than to protect the Executive and Judiciary of that Territory, because there was no Legislature in existence at the time at which the Territory was divided; and because the act of Congress, passed the 27th February, 1809, extending the right of suffrage to the citizens, directed a General Assembly, that contained a regular number of members, to be elected at the same time and places as the Delegate to Congress, directed by that law to be chosen by the freeholders.

The last-mentioned act expressly provides that the apportionment on which such election shall be held shall be made by the Legislature, and that that Legislature shall consist of not more than twelve, nor less than nine members. And if no such Legislature or General Assembly existed in the Territory, the act of Congress gives no authority to the Governor, or any other person, to act with Legislative authority.

That there was a defect in the act of Congress granting the extension of the right of suffrage, is admitted. It did not provide for the organization of the General Assembly which it prescribed, and no reasonable construction could supply that defect: it required a supplementary act of Congress, which act has actually passed this session, and has been approved the instant.

If the Governor of the Indiana Territory, instead of exercising the legislative authority of Congress on what he supposed a liberal construction of the law, had represented the case to Congress at the last session, the defect would have been supplied, and the Territory now legally represented in Congress. It cannot be admitted that the Governor of a Territory may by his own authority supply a want or defect of a law of Congress, on his own opinion of a liberal construction, expediency, or necessity. To sanction such an assumption of power, by a vote of this House, would set a dangerous precedent. On this view of the subject, the committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the election held for the Delegate to Congress for the Indiana Territory, on the 22d of May, 1809, being without authority of law, is void, and consequently the seat of Jonathan Jennings, as a Delegate for that Territory, hereby declared to be vacant.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution from the Senate, approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to receive any further communications from Francis J. Jackson.

Mr. GOLD.—It is with much regret, sir, that I am constrained, at this time, to meet a question involving a consideration of the merits or demerits, and the consequent approbation or disapprobation of the Administration of the Government of my country. It cannot, sir, but be seen, that the resolutions before the Committee do convert this House into a Council of Censors. Let it be remembered, that those with whom I may act on this occasion have had no part in bringing this question before the House. It only remains, sir, for us to meet the question thus put upon us, in that spirit of independence becoming the Representatives of a free people, and with that solemn consideration due to the momentous subject of peace or war, now presented to the American people.

And here, sir, at the very threshold, let me not be misunderstood. I rise not, sir, the apologist of the enemies of my country. I rise not, sir, the advocate of Mr. Jackson, or of his commercial propositions, as far as they were disclosed; I disclaim them as utterly inadmissible; they ought not, they cannot prevail. None of these subjects, sir, shall find in me an advocate; nor shall the decrees or Orders in Council of the great European belligerents. On the subject of blockade, I hold, sir, the indispensable necessity of an actual investment, so as to create manifest danger to the neutral in attempting to enter, in conformity with the rule established in the treaty between Great Britain and Russia. Nor, sir, will I be found to justify insult offered by any foreign Minister to the Government of my country; only show me the evidence of such insult and you have my concurrence in support and vindication of the Administration. Here, sir, lies the question between us; does the correspondence of the British Minister contain an insult to Government? Are you willing to involve this country, whose boast has been her pacific policy, in war, on the grounds disclosed in that correspondence? Mr. Jackson is charged with having imputed to the Administration a knowledge of the defect of Mr. Erskine's powers; of knowing that he was not authorized to enter into the arrangement of the 19th of April last.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

In recurring, sir, to the stand taken by the British Minister and the American Secretary, respectively, to the opposite propositions advanced by them in their correspondence on this subject, we find Mr. Jackson asserting and maintaining, that the despatch from the British Secretary, Canning, to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d day of January last, containing the three conditions, was made known to Mr. Smith before the arrangement was entered into.

Does the American Secretary deny this position? No, sir; he does most unequivocally, in pages 45 and 87, admit that the conditions in that despatch were presented to him. Here, then, sir, so far, there is no contradiction, no possible ground on which to engraft the charge of insult. On the part of the American Secretary, without controverting this allegation of Mr. Jackson, a new and very different proposition is set up, to wit: that the fact of Mr. Erskine not being authorized to enter into that arrangement was not known to the Administration or Government.

Does the British Minister contradict this; does he answer it at all? No, sir; it is not to be found in the correspondence. But, sir, a resort is had by the advocates of the resolutions to constructive imputation, to the doctrine of presumptions; a doctrine at all times dangerous when applied in support of a criminal charge, and to be received with great caution. Bounds must be set to this range of presumption, for it is a rule as old as the common law of our country, and as just as it is ancient, that odious, uncharitable, unfavorable intentions are not to be presumed. You are not to search with a nice, a jealous eye, to see if words may not possibly be understood in bad part. If this rule is received in administering justice between individual and individual, with double force does it apply to nations; to the great issues of peace and war; to questions involving the destinies of millions; and most emphatically to the American nation, boasting a pacific policy, and professing to hold in abhorrence the mad systems of the European world, which involve nations in war to gratify wounded pride, or satisfy the punctilios of honor. If we are now to abandon the rule here laid down, and pursue the course marked out by the resolutions on your table; if such grounds of suspected insult are to become causes of war, you must consent to bid adieu to your pacific policy; your eagle must cease to grasp the olive branch; and we must move down the broad way of nations, filling up our future history with a succession of wars, and scenes of human suffering. Must we forget, sir, that forbearance and moderation, in avenging insults, is the lesson of wisdom? Must we deprive ourselves of that consolation and support so necessary, when war with all its calamities shall overwhelm, of reflecting that our quarrel is just in all its parts, and that no fault of omission or commission lies at our own door? Must we put upon so doubtful an issue the justice of our cause in the opinion of foreign nations? Permit me now, sir, to advert to the documents before the Committee, and see if there be any terms found in the correspondence of the British Minister which fairly import that our Administration knew Mr. Erskine to be unauthorized to enter into the arrangement in question. The following paragraph, in a letter of the 11th of October, (page 31 of documents,) is adduced for this purpose, and to make out the charge of insult to the Administration:

"You have not, in the conferences we have hitherto held, distinctly announced any such complaint, (of the disavowal of the arrangement,) and I have seen, with pleasure, in this forbearance, on your part, an instance of that candor, which, I doubt not, will prevail in all our communications, inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act, done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed."

It becomes important, sir, here to ascertain what circumstances are referred to in this passage; and here the Minister has not, in my conception, left us without a certain guide, but has, in the paragraph immediately following, so explained himself as to repel all possible doubt of his meaning. He states that the conditions in the despatch of the 23d of January, were, according to Mr. Erskine's report to his Government, made known to the American Secretary, and, after showing that the arrangement of Mr. Erskine does not correspond with those conditions, he, with a reference to those premises, uses the precise terms complained of, "such circumstances," and from them deduces the right of disavowal. As certainly as the relative "such," upon elementary rules, refers to its antecedent, does the Minister here explain his meaning, in using the terms "such circumstances," to be, that the right of disavowal flowed necessarily from a defect of power in Mr. Erskine to enter into the arrangement. The construction cannot be sustained, for a moment, that the terms "such circumstances," as here applied, mean one thing in one place, and another thing in another. But, sir, why will you make the Minister place the right of disavowal on one ground and his Sovereign on another? Did not the British Government solemnly, in the face of Europe, disavow Mr. Erskine's arrangement upon the single ground of its being unauthorized, without regard to the fact of the defect of powers being known to our Government? and why will you force the construction which would make the British Minister superadd a further ground of disavowal in imputing to our Administration a knowledge of such defect, which was not assumed in the original act of disavowal in London? So far, sir, from there being here any foundation for presuming that the Minister intended to add other and unnecessary ground for the disavowal to that assigned by his Sovereign, that the inference is irresistible that he intended to place it on the same ground, on the same circumstances, and no other. The principle of the disavowal adopted, in the first instance, by the British Government must be considered as a polar star, to guide us in expounding all the subsequent acts of the Minister on the same subject. I will only add, sir, on this branch of the insult, that the terms complained of, "such circumstances," can never be presumed to refer to any dishonorable circumstance, if there be any innocent circumstance or fact, growing out of the subject, which the terms may embrace. Need I add, that the defective powers of Mr. Erskine present themselves, at first view, as falling within the above terms of reference, and that they necessarily lead to, and, in themselves alone, disconnected from every other circumstance whatever, justify the disavowal upon the established principles of public laws? If any one can yet doubt, let him turn to this Minister's letter to Mr. Smith, of the 23d of October, (page 57 of the documents,) where you will find Mr. Jackson, on a formal call of Mr. Smith, states the precise ground of the disavowal adopted by his Government; of which a knowledge of our Government of want of authority in Mr. Erskine forms no part. Is it fair, is it just, to extend general expressions on a subject beyond the particular and formal explanation given in the same correspondence on the same subject?

I come now, sir, to what it has been deemed proper to set up, in the body of the resolution before the Committee, as a monument of British insult to the American nation. This is to be found in the above letter of the 23d of October. Every sentence, every line of this ill-fated letter, I have carefully analyzed and weighed, and I have searched in vain for evidence of the charge brought against the British Minister. In the previous debate, one gentleman refers to one part and another to another part for the insult. If the supposed offensive paragraph had been introduced into the resolution, it would have saved much embarrassment to the friends of the measure, and given much satisfaction to opponents. If there be insult in this letter, it lies too deep for me to fathom. The only passage, which, to a mind the most jealous of its honor, could be deemed susceptible of a doubtful construction, is the following: "So far from the terms, which he (Mr. Erskine) was actually induced to accept, having been contemplated in that instruction (of the 23d January,) he himself states that they were substituted by you in lieu of those originally proposed." It is possible, sir, to suspect, that it was intended to charge Mr. Smith with using improper means to induce Mr. Erskine to substitute the propositions contained in the arrangement for those in the instructions; but so long as fair and honorable means of inducement were open to the American Secretary, so long, sir, it was his bounden duty to urge those means in every shape and with all that address and ingenuity for which the diplomatic theatre has been at all times so much distinguished. Surely, sir, it is a forlorn pretence that no means could be here imputed but such as were unworthy and dishonorable. Let gentlemen advert to the same correspondence, and they will find that Mr. Jackson himself, after referring to the same conditions and instruction of the 23d of January, invites the American Secretary to make proposals, to offer a substitute. Can it be more criminal to offer substitutes in April than in October, to endeavor to induce Mr. Erskine to receive them, than Mr. Jackson? And here, sir, let me repeat, that, unless there were no means which Mr. Smith could use to induce Mr. Erskine to substitute the conditions agreed on, except such as were improper, it is impossible, upon settled rule of construction, to sustain for a moment this imputed insult. It is to be understood that such means of inducement as were fit and proper only, are, under the general expressions in question, intended. But, if there could be any doubt, on the face of this letter, you will find, by turning to another letter of the 11th of October, (page 31 of documents,) that Mr. Jackson could not, on this point, intend insult, as he there admits that it may have been concluded between Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine; that the conditions substituted and agreed on were an equivalent for the original conditions of the 23d of January.

This admission applied to all the subsequent correspondence on the same point; and if the conditions substituted were equivalent, the very foundation of the imputation is subverted and done away.

The last letter, of the 4th of November, alone remains to be considered. Some fatal error appears to have attached itself to the resolution throughout. The term "repetition" is applied to this letter, than which nothing can be more incorrect. Whatever that part of it may be to which this term is applied, it is not a repetition, its true character is a justification of the preceding letters; and I am warranted in saying that the paragraph in question is couched in terms as little offensive as its object would well permit. But I do not hesitate to say that, if the preceding correspondence was offensive, this as a justification could not be innocent; and yet, sir, there is a fitness and propriety in so solemn a paper as the resolution before the Committee, in giving to the subject its true character and denomination.

On the subject, sir, of the circular of the British Minister, issued upon his dismissal, which the resolution embraces among the causes of war, I have but little to offer the Committee. That paper is, in my opinion, justly subject to animadversion. A foreign Minister is to communicate through the Government to which he is sent only. But, sir, as this note is not in the usual inflammatory language of an address to the people, but brief and temperate, it is swelled, by the resolution under discussion, into a consequence and character greatly above its intrinsic merits. I see nothing in the paper that should arouse America to arms.

Permit me now, sir, to call the attention of the Committee to some prominent points in the correspondence on the part of the American Secretary; that, seeing both sides of the question, with the relative merits and demerits of the correspondence, we may be enabled to pronounce a righteous judgment. After the British Government had solemnly disavowed the arrangement entered into here on the 19th of April, as unauthorized, as contrary to instructions, we find the American Secretary, in his correspondence, agitating, at some length, the question of public and private instructions; suggestions and suppositions are introduced of different sets of instruction, issued by his Sovereign to Mr. Erskine. The same suggestions have found their way into this debate. Let gentlemen pause and consider how high a charge, how reproachful an imputation, is here brought against a foreign Government. Great Britain is represented as giving Mr. Erskine one set of instructions, to show, in extenso, on which the arrangement entered into is to be disavowed; and another set to put in his pocket, for his protection against his Government, which would, if produced, warrant the arrangement. Between individual and individual such a practice would be pronounced downright swindling. It is a transaction in its nature so fraudulent and base, that I would not believe it of any crowned head in Europe. Could the breast of the British Minister be insensible to such an imputation? And is there not, sir, in justice, some allowance to be made to a correspondence under such circumstances? Whatever gentlemen seem disposed to believe of Mr. Canning and Mr. Jackson, they profess some charity for Mr. Erskine, whose moral character has been respected by the Administration during the whole period of his residence in this country; we find them appealing to him as a witness for them against Mr. Canning. Do gentlemen mean to charge Mr. Erskine with being the humble tool, the disgraceful instrument, in the hands of Mr. Canning, to carry into effect this flagitious conspiracy, this infamous fraud upon America? Do they mean to charge him with receiving a public instruction for our inspection, and a private one for suppression, for the purpose of deceiving, cheating, and defrauding the American people? Will they suppose him capable, in the situation he stands, of consigning his fair reputation to infamy forever, by continuing to suppress instructions, merely to vindicate the political character of Secretary Canning? In this light, and no other, do gentlemen, by their suppositions of different sets of instructions on the same subject, place Mr. Erskine. But, sir, the evidence before the Committee, aside from the intrinsic improbability of the supposition, forbids us to indulge the suspicion; we ought not to shut our eyes against that evidence and deceive ourselves. We cannot avoid seeing and believing that the different sets of instructions, mentioned by Mr. Erskine, are not upon the same subject, the Orders in Council, but upon different subjects, to wit: the orders, and the attack on the Chesapeake. To this point the despatches of the American Minister, in London, particularly the letter of the 20th of May last, to the Secretary of State, communicated by the President in his Message of the 18th instant, is conclusive.

In the course of this correspondence, sir, we are presented with a reiterated demand of the American Secretary upon the British Minister, for the reasons of the disavowal; a disavowal founded on the simple ground of want of authority in the agent to do the act disavowed; a ground, sir, which rendered the act intrinsically void from the beginning.

In such case, sir, are not the reasons of the disavowal, the precise reasons of the instruction to Mr. Erskine, connected with the deviation from that instruction? Were not the Orders in Council the avowed basis of that instruction, and were they not known to all Europe, and not only known but severely felt in their unjust operation upon neutral nations? Has not this same subject occupied our deliberations, diffused itself through all our foreign relations and correspondence, and filled up almost every page of our history for years? And yet, sir, we are so ignorant on the subject as to require to be instructed anew. Nor was this, sir, a departure from instructions in an immaterial point, but the departure went to the principle and basis of a great system of national policy, resorted to for retaliation upon a belligerent, but operating most injuriously upon America. The necessity of powers, distinct from letters of credence, to enable the Minister to enter into a contract binding on his Sovereign, has been placed, in my conception, upon unanswerable grounds by the honorable member from Connecticut. Indeed, sir, on this point, authorities of public law thicken on every side; I will trouble the Committee with but a few references. To show that the American Ambassador in London considered it necessary that additional powers should be granted to Mr. Erskine to enter into the arrangement, and that he himself suggested this necessity to Secretary Canning, I refer the Committee to Mr. Pinkney's despatch to his Government contained in the last Message of the President (page 5th) in which he says: "I suggested (to Mr. Canning) that it would be well, in case a special mission did not meet their approbation, that the necessary powers should be sent to Mr. Erskine." This was on the 22d day of January, and in pursuance of Mr. Pinkney's recommendation, instructions were issued to Mr. Erskine on the next day. Did not Mr. Pinkney understand the relations between the two countries, and the extent of Mr. Erskine's former powers as well as any gentleman of the Committee? I may add, that he did not deem it foreign to his duty to see, at the outset, that Mr. Erskine was furnished with the necessary powers.

Vattel, in his treatise on public law (book 2d, chapter 12) says, in treating of Ministers Plenipotentiary, "that to this office we may apply all the rules of natural law, which respect things done by commission. The rights of the proxy are determined by the instructions that are given him; he must not deviate from them, but every promise which he makes, and within the extent of his powers, is binding on the constituent." Here, sir, is a plain rule, founded in wisdom and common to the ordinary transactions in life; it applies to merchant and factor, principal and attorney or agent, as well as to a Sovereign and his Minister.

Grotius (third book, chapter 22d) observes, "it ' must be considered on what foot the agent was appointed, for if ordered to treat on conditions, he ought to follow them, in default of which his act may be disowned."

In second Rutherford (section 19) the rule is laid down: "Treaties bind the State and Sovereign only when the Ministers have been duly authorized to make them, and have done nothing contrary to their instructions."

That letters of credence are matters of form, and are not considered as giving power to enter into any binding stipulation, I would refer to the same book, (page 362, section 4.)

It will occur to the honorable member from Kentucky, (who first addressed the Committee,) on reflection, that the case he alluded to, of a discussion between Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Canning for exchanging the embargo against the Orders in Council, falls precisely within the rule laid down by the gentleman from Connecticut, as illustrated by reference to the correspondence between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Hammond.

I observe, sir, with some surprise, that the effects of the arrangement and disavowal are described by the strong term "irreparable" to the United States; whereas, in my humble opinion, the balance of advantage is greatly, as between the two countries, on the side of America. It is true that Great Britain suffered, but, is it less true that America was half ruined by the baleful embargo and its concomitants? Imagine, sir, the situation of the Administration on the 19th day of April last; advancing to a precipice in full view; non-intercourse, buckled on with difficulty, for a few months—its days were counted and its sands numbered; the ensuing May session was the term of its duration. What a humiliating prospect, after all the promises given this country, that it should bring the great belligerents of Europe to our feet, and all our losses sustained under its operation? Was not every motive presented to Government to seek, by all honorable means, to remove non-intercourse by treaty rather than leave it to perish by the hands of its authors? Is it possible not to see that, in entering into the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the interest of all, both governors and governed, were consulted?

The happy effects are seen throughout the community. The bankrupt list has greatly diminished, and the relation of debtor and creditor is much improved. We see no longer the coin of our country flowing in copious streams to Montreal to purchase bills for remittance to Europe; our produce, which was rotting in the hands of the farmer, is exported in place of a remittance of coin. I insist, sir, we have the best of the bargain; and I do most willingly join with the honorable member from Pennsylvania in a requiem to the departed spirit of the embargo; I will go further, sir, and pray that the tutelary genius of my country may watch the door, lest that fell spirit should, by some magical incantations, be again raised to infest the land. I congratulate the United States on the manifestation of a disposition, in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to suffer the remnant of this ruinous system to pass gradually into oblivion; whereas, if it was so precious a boon, as one would be led to suppose, from the above correspondence, we might have expected the whole system of commercial restriction to be reinstated in all its force.

I have a few observations to bestow on the agency of British ships, mentioned in the correspondence, and I have done. The condition on this subject, in the despatch of Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d of January, has been deemed insulting, and as presenting a strong feature of hostility to this country. If the public agents of our own Government have been, in any manner, accessory to this proceeding, this supposed feature of insult and hostility will be greatly mitigated, if not destroyed.

While I find nothing in the correspondence of those agents to warrant the insertion of a stipulation in a treaty, that American merchantmen, captured by British ships, in violating a non-intercourse with France should be good prize, I do find that which to Great Britain, is little, if any, short of an equivalent, to wit: that the captured would be without complaint and remediless. The agency of British ships is not to be admitted by precedent stipulation, but to flow as a consequence and, in a manner, to produce to Great Britain all the benefit, and to America all the loss of an express stipulation.

In a conversation between Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Canning, on the 22d day of January last, as detailed in a despatch of the former to his Government, communicated by the President on the 18th instant, (page 5th of the Message,) Mr. Canning presented this precise proposition in favor of the agency of British ships as above, to Mr. Pinkney for his approbation. Does the American Minister, sir, take fire at the proposition as highly offensive? No, sir, I find no objection there made; leaving an inference of implied assent to be made.

In another despatch from Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State, of the 6th of June last, and communicated in the same Message, Mr. Pinkney, referring to a previous conversation, with Mr. Canning, expresses himself as follows:

"It will, I am sure, occur to you, as the fact is, that the little which I may have thrown out upon that occasion, did not look to the admission of Mr. Canning's object into any stipulation between the two countries, and that I viewed it only as a consequence that might and would, if France persisted in her unjust decrees, grow out of arrangements similar to those offered by us in August last."

Our Minister complains that Mr. Canning misapprehended him. The above extract discloses the length and breadth of that misapprehension; Mr. Canning did not assent to the agency of British ships as a precedent, but only as a consequence. It is impossible, sir, not to see that Mr. Canning has been led into an error in some degree by the agents of our own Government.

In the communications between the Secretary of State and Mr. Erskine enough is found to show that Mr. Pinkney had not mistaken the views of our Government. Mr. Erskine, when appealed to, as a proper source of evidence for the Secretary, replies as follows: (page 20th of the documents:)

"The third condition, you certainly very distinctly informed me, could not be recognised by the President, but, you added, what had great weight in my mind, that you did not see why any great importance should be attached to such a recognition, because it would be impossible that a citizen of the United States could prefer a complaint to his Government on account of the capture of his vessel while engaged in a trade absolutely interdicted by the laws of his country."

While, sir, I have found myself constrained, in the foregoing observations, to consider the correspondence of the American Secretary as tinged with asperity and irritating to the British Minister, I can readily suppose that personal collision and strong impressions of injustice to this country might get the better of great personal urbanity and courtesy of manners.

I have, sir, with freedom, but with due regard, I trust, to the decorum of debate, submitted the reasons for which I cannot consent to attempt the dangerous course marked out by the resolution before the Committee; a course which, without any possible benefit, may put in jeopardy the peace of the country, may bring upon us the greatest calamity that can befall the nation.

Mr. MAÇON said it appeared to him, the first point for consideration in the resolution ought to be, is it expedient? but it seemed to him that those who had taken part in the debate had looked at everything but the resolution; and he should probably follow the example. What good effect will the resolution have if adopted? Will it produce unanimity at home, or respectability abroad? Will it add strength to the nation? Will it fill the Treasury with money, or will it convince the civilized world that it is their interest to act justly toward us? No, sir, it will not produce one of these. I am opposed to the resolution, not for the reasons which have been offered against it, not for any which can be drawn from the documents before us, but because I am opposed to addressing the President of the United States on any subject whatever. We have nothing to do with him in our legislative character, except in the passing of laws, calling on him for information, or to impeach. On the day of the Presidential election, we, in common with our fellow-citizens, are to pass on his conduct, and resolutions of this sort will have no weight on that day. It is on this ground solely that I am opposed to adopting any resolution whatever in relation to the Executive conduct. If the National Legislature can pass resolutions to approve the conduct of the President, may they not also pass resolutions to censure; and what would be the situation of the country, if we were now discussing a motion to request the President to recall Mr. Jackson, and again endeavor to negotiate with him?

No doubt can be entertained but that, at this and the last session, the policy of passing approbatory resolutions will have been as well investigated as ever any question was in Congress, because, as well as I recollect, when, at the last session, it was proposed by a resolution to approve the conduct of the President, for making the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, those who support the present resolution opposed that, and those who supported that oppose this; so that all the talents of the House seem to have been employed on each side of the question at the two sessions. In fact, it appears to me, that gentlemen have completely changed sides. I mean not by this to cast any imputation or reflection on any one. I consider the right of changing opinions a sacred one, and that which every man ought to do, when convinced that his opinions are erroneous or wrong; and it is one of the few rights of which the most tyrannical Government cannot deprive us. Convince me that I am wrong in opposing the present resolutions, and I, too, will change sides.

The dismissal of a foreign Minister is no new case in the country. Genet was dismissed, Yrujo was dismissed, and no bad consequence followed, and why should any be anticipated because Jackson has been dismissed? I will not trouble the Committee with reading any part of the documents, they must be tired of hearing parts of them already, and every member has surely read them with attention, beside the nation has them, and will decide on them, without our assistance; to me it appears, on a fair examination of his letters, that he was properly dismissed; but, to the resolution—it will not be denied that either House might pass an approbatory resolution without asking the concurrence of the other. Then, what would be the situation of the Government or the country, if one branch of the Legislature was of a different party from the Executive, and the branch agreeing with the Executive should pass an approbatory resolution; might we not from our knowledge of the intolerant spirit of party expect the other branch to pass one to censure? But, suppose both branches opposed to the Executive, and they pass joint resolutions against him, what then becomes of the Executive? Strong as it is, with all its patronage, it must fall. No Executive could maintain itself in this situation. This state of things would agitate every part of the nation and shake the Union itself; and this Government is so organized, that it is not impossible but all this may happen. This House is elected for two years, the Senate for six, and the President for four. If ever it should happen, I fear you would not only have no President, but no Federal Government. This would be a very different case from that which took place when Congress repealed a law, because it was opposed by a part of the nation; that opposition was used as an argument to shake the firmness of the National Legislature, and it succeeded. I have, since I had a seat in the House, heard a great deal about foreign influence; I never believed much in it, but if events, like those I have mentioned, should ever take place, then you may look for foreign influence.

tive to the disavowal by the British Government. If the ground he assumes be true, his argument is unanswerable. If I mistake him, I wish he would correct me, because I have no desire to do it; I understood him to say that Mr. Erskine had no full power to do what he did, and that the Administration ought or must have known it. I believe, sir, it is as difficult to decide what an accredited Minister may do, under his letter of credence, and what would require a new or full power, as it is to distinguish the lines which separate the shades of color. All the gentleman's arguments went to show that a full power was necessary to form a treaty. This, I mean not to deny; but, he assumed as a fact that the arrangement made in April last was a treaty. I deny that it was a treaty; if it was a treaty, how does it happen that, at the last session of Congress, neither the gentleman himself nor any one else in this House said a word about its being laid before the Senate? Every one knows that a treaty cannot be made, under the Constitution, without the consent of that body. I am not diplomatist enough to say to what class of public agreements the disavowed arrangement properly belongs; Mr. Erskine called it an arrangement, and Mr. Jackson an agreement; and I challenge any man to say it was a treaty, and ought to have been laid before the Senate by the President. If a full power was necessary to the conclusion of the arrangement, where was the sagacity of the gentleman from Connecticut last Spring, when he was so desirous of voting thanks to the President, for having made this very arrangement? In this House, it is well known that I was as much opposed to the motion, last Spring, as I am now to this, and intended to have delivered my sentiments upon it, but was prevented by the House not deciding on it. Why did not the gentleman then come forward, and tell us that this boasted arrangement was all nothing? For in the whole correspondence, which was then laid before us, there is not a word about full powers; in fact the British Government, in the disavowal, has not made this objection; nor has it called the arrangement a treaty; both Governments, and every man in both countries, understood it to be not a treaty, but only an agreement, by which the United States engaged to withdraw the operation of a certain law as to Great Britain, provided Great Britain would withdraw her Orders in Council; both engaged to do certain things, and the United States fairly performed their part. If the President was to blame, the blame does not begin with him, it begins with Congress, because Congress passed the law which authorized him to do as he did. He was authorized to suspend the operation of the non-intercourse act, provided France or Great Britain should do certain things. If the arrangement be a treaty, then Congress passed a law to authorize the President to make a treaty; and if Congress can constitutionally pass a law to authorize the President to make a treaty, my lips are sealed on this point—to use a modern phrase, they are hermetically so forever. But Congress did no such thing; the arrangement was made under the law, and not under the Constitutional power to make treaties. If the President was to blame, or was not authorized to do what he did, the last session was the proper time to have objected; but, instead of objections of any kind, no man in or out of Congress discovered that the British Minister, Erskine, had not full power. In truth, if this objection be good, we ought not then to have said "well done" to the Executive; not only we, but every man in the nation said to him "well done." If the British Government had not disavowed the arrangement and the President and Mr. Jackson differed, we never should, in my opinion, have heard a word about this want of full power in Erskine, it would not have been thought of.

I confess, sir, I have been most egregiously disappointed, since the debate on the resolutions commenced. I did not believe before, that there was a man in the nation who thought the Administration hostile to an amicable adjustment of all our disputes with Great Britain, or who could read Mr. Jackson's first letter without feeling the insult offered in that. In that letter he intended either to insult the Administration, to laugh at it, or, if you please, to humbug it. His appeal is nothing compared to his first letter. Instead of appealing to the people, suppose the President had refused the arrangement offered by Mr. Erskine, and he had, in an appeal to the people, stated the offer and the refusal? Should we have had motions to approve the conduct of the President? No, not one; all would have declared that the Administration was hostile to negotiation with England; every one would have been as much displeased with the refusal, as they were pleased with the arrangement; and so pleased were all parties, that all seemed to claim the President; it seemed to be almost a dispute in the House to which of the two great parties he belonged; and if he had not concluded the arrangement, both parties would probably have disclaimed him, one saying they never expected any good from him, and the other that they always entertained doubts of him. If the Administration were unwilling, as has been said, to settle our disputes with England, why make the agreement with Mr. Erskine, especially if they knew, as the gentleman from Connecticut has told us they did, that he had no full power? If this assertion of the gentleman proves anything, it proves an over anxiety in the Administration to settle our disputes with Great Britain; and, if they have erred, they have erred from this over anxiety.

This debate, I fear, will have a most unfortunate effect on the nation; it has, more than once, put me in mind of two men who should be present when the house of a third was burning, who, instead of assisting him to save his property, were endeavoring to call his attention from the fire, to some unimportant circumstance—such as, look, yonder is a Jack-o'-lantern, or a star shooting;—they were willing to amuse the man with trifles, but not to aid him in putting the fire out. So, with us; anything will do to debate on, that will take off the attention of the nation from the great question which it ought to consider. One says, Smith is wrong and Jackson is right; another that Jackson is wrong and Smith is right. Is this calling the attention of the nation to this petty quarrel, for so I call it, in comparison with other evils inflicted on us? Is it equal to the attack on the Chesapeake? Is it equal to the impressment of our seamen? Is it equal to the French decrees and British Orders in Council, which violate all our neutral rights? Or, is it equal to France, paying no sort of regard to her treaty with us? It is pointing the eyes of the nation to Jackson alone. How comes it to pass that the insolence of this Minister makes so much noise in this House, when that of D'Yrujo made none, and that of Genet very little? To me this is inconceivable.

A gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. POTTER,) who made a very elegant speech, said that the whole dispute between the two great parties was that of the ins and the outs, a contest who should have the loaves and fishes. If it really be so, I have been very unfortunate, having been here a long time, and have not got either loaf or fish. I do not doubt but the gentleman believes it, as he stated, nor can I doubt what he says concerning his own party; he knows them better than I do; and I, therefore, must believe him as to them. But, sir, the men who were in the opposition in the year 1798, did not want places, and they afterward proved it by their acts. As soon as they got into power, they put down four or five hundred snug places, by repealing the laws under which they existed; if those in power now possess the same principles with the opposition of the year 1798, they do not want places.

The gentleman almost warmed me up to the war pitch, when he talked about the insults we had received, and the wrongs we had suffered, for the last fifteen years; if he had laid a declaration of war on the table, I am not sure but I should, from the impulse of the moment, have seconded the motion; indeed, I began to think he had such a motion in view. As for myself, I feel no hesitation in saying, that I had rather wait longer, and even depend on chance, than to declare war at this time.

To my mind, the cause of the disavowal is as clear as the noon-day sun. The embargo, which the gentleman from New York (Mr. GOLD) has brought into the debate, produced the arrangement, and the repealing of it the disavowal. At the last session, I had notes, with which I thought I could then defend the embargo, and made several attempts to do it, but, somehow or other, was always prevented. I was then willing to have undertaken it against talents a hundred to one my superior. Gentlemen may laugh, but it is certainly true that, by repealing the embargo, they gave their party a severe blow, and did the country great injury. The repeal, too, was not made until the House had declared that, to repeal the embargo and not go to war, would be submission; notwithstanding all this, on the question to authorize the President forthwith to issue letters of marque and reprisal, only seventeen voted in the affirmative. The British Government sent Mr. Oakley here with instructions, under the firm belief, as I conceive, that the embargo was in force, and had Mr. Erskine, after receiving the instructions, instead of obeying them, as he did, informed his Government of the great change which had taken place here, he would not, I believe, have been disgraced, but ennobled. The instructions were sent, under the belief that the embargo was in force. When they arrived, the embargo was given up, and the non-intercourse act was substituted in its place, and not war. The embargo and non-intercourse united, would have been, like Samson and his hair, invincible; but the non-intercourse alone, is not worth the hair after being cut from the head of Samson. It has had the effect expected—it has operated upon ourselves, and nobody else, and scarcely on ourselves—for no one, I believe, regards it. I have seen letters from England, written, as I was told, by respectable men, which stated that the people of England could not have stood the embargo three months longer, and that they were determined to stand it as long as possible; because, if they yielded to it, we obtained a victory in a way that would always put them in our power. The nation was prepared to continue the embargo agreeably to the votes of this House. We had made the stand, and ought to have adhered to it. We then solemnly pledged ourselves to the nation, but we did not mind that; we unpledged ourselves with great ease, and I am unwilling now to make any pledge to the Executive whatever.

In my digressive way, I will go back to the resolution. I dislike it on account of the language; to say the least of it, it is too rough. One State paper excepted, and all the rest issued by the Government, have added to the American character. The man, whoever he may be, that dislikes Mr. Jefferson most, as a statesman, cannot but feel pride when he reads his correspondence with Genet and Hammond; his language, always polite and correct, constantly putting them down by refuting their arguments. I may be mistaken, but I really consider the resolution a sort of public manifesto. If I was to vote for a thing of the kind, I should wish it to be strong, but not rough or rude. It is not often that I undertake to give advice, but I cannot forbear recommending to the House, if they mean to pass the resolution, to commit it to a select committee, to put it in a different, and, I will add, a better dress; though I should not be able to do this myself, I am sure it could be done. It appears to have been copied nearly from a precedent in the Journals of the English House of Commons, and of no late date. If such language was then fashionable in England, I hope it is not now here. I know it may be said, that I often, in debate, speak roughly of the belligerents and their agents, but then I speak to my brethren, and not to them. I wish never to see a State paper under any Administration that may not add new lustre to the American name, and that the world may say the style of the men of 1776 is not banished from the United States.

It is a little remarkable, that this question about full powers has never been started before, either in this country or England. When Mr. Pinkney was instructed to make an offer of the repeal of the embargo, provided the British Government would withdraw their Orders in Council, he was not asked for his instructions or full power; his authority was not doubted. If between us and the English there should be a departure from the strict rules of diplomatic etiquette, may it not reasonably be imputed to this circumstance, that we speak the same language, and of course there may be more ease and less form generally in our diplomatic intercourse, than among nations not speaking the same language?

Whether Mr. Erskine had competent powers or not, is a question between him and his Government, with which we have nothing to do. He told the Executive he had authority to make the arrangement, and the Executive was bound to believe him. I put this question to the gentlemen: Suppose the Executive had not believed him, or that the Executive had told him his instructions were not sufficient to make the arrangement, and had declined all negotiation for either cause, what would have been said? Surely this: that here was a fair offer to adjust a part of our disputes, and the accredited Minister was not believed; or that it was refused on a matter of form—a mere point of etiquette.

What is it that makes it necessary for the House to pass the resolution? The dismissal of Jackson cannot be the reason, although it appears to me from his letters that he did not come here with any friendly intentions. The style of his letters sufficiently shows this. It will not be said for this we ought to pass the resolution. It seems to me in asking for passports to protect him from the insults of the people, he has continued his insult. Genet and D'Yrujo were dismissed—they asked for no passports. I beg of the members to compare his letters with the letters of any other Minister, and they will be satisfied I have not mistaken their meaning, especially the first, with any first letter written by any Minister in the world. But his letters, indecent as they are, ought not to induce the House to adopt the resolution.

It has been said, that the Administration were unwilling to settle our disputes with Great Britain. In my conscience, sir, I firmly believe, and I judge only from their transactions, that they are not only willing but anxious to settle our disputes with all the world. If we had an ambitious military man in the Presidential house, it might be thought that he would not be willing to have our disputes settled, but rather to increase them; that he might thereby get armies and navies to follow the steps of Cæsar, of Cromwell, or of Bonaparte. Examine the Message of the President of the 29th ult. to Congress, in which he informs us that Jackson had been dismissed, and you will not find a single expression in it, that looks as if he was not sincerely desirous to settle our differences with all the world; if there be such an expression I will thank gentlemen to point it out. After mentioning the disavowal, and the breaking off of the negotiation, does he not plainly tell you, that he is still for another attempt to settle by negotiation? Every part of the Message breathes a spirit friendly to the peaceable settlement of all our disputes; according to my understanding it speaks of nothing but peace; not a word to be found in it advising a warlike attitude; no advice to increase the army or navy. It is strange, indeed, after reading such a message, it should be thought that there was a hostility in the Administration to an amicable settlement with Great Britain.

Sir, I am well aware, that upon this question I may appear to some in an awkward situation, because I dislike the resolution, and am not dissatisfied with the conduct of the Executive towards Mr. Jackson. Be it as it may, so long as I have a seat in this House, I never will give a vote which my judgment does not approve. There is no view of this resolution that pleases me; if it be meant as a new-fashioned answer to the Message of the President, I object to it; because I am unwilling to answer it any way. In 1801, when the change in the Administration took place, all were so tired of answers that no one made a motion to answer the Message. If it be meant for a declaration of war, I object to it, because it does not mention our greatest causes of complaint; it seems to leave them out, merely to bring Mr. Madison and Mr. Jackson into view. If war be meant, let gentlemen come out boldly and say so; give us a project for it in plain terms that all can understand. I have believed (and I hope in God I am mistaken, for no man is more desirous of peace than I am) from the time of the attack on the Chesapeake, that before our differences are settled with England we should be compelled to go to war with her; for one I would put it off as long as possible. It will be remembered that the embargo was supported as the only means to keep us out of war, and as a sure means to bring Great Britain to fair terms; and I still believe, as much as I do that we shall all die, if it had been continued three months longer, we should have settled every dispute with the English Government.

The conversations of Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Canning communicated by the President to the House at their request, have been brought into the debate. Unfortunately for the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GOLD,) who mentioned the embargo, he read a part of them. I am willing to rest the policy of that measure on that communication, and on Mr. Canning's conversation about it. Every time he talks with Mr. Pinkney, the embargo is mentioned; in fact it seems to be the first and the last word with him. Though I may not be willing to acknowledge him as good authority on the laws of nations, no one can doubt that he is not good authority that the embargo pinched England very sorely. If there be a man clear of party feeling, let him read the conversations between Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Canning, and if he does not decide that the embargo was a bitter pill to Mr. Canning, I am greatly mistaken. That we suffered a little under the embargo was never denied; but, adopt what measure you will, that will have half the effect on England that that had, and we shall suffer twice as much under it as we did under that—in truth, our little sufferings under it were over, and it had begun to operate in Great Britain, when it was repealed. A little perseverance would have brought the British Ministry to terms.

The gentlemen who differ with me, not as to the vote on the resolution, but to the conduct of the Executive, have all declared that they would not submit to the British Orders in Council, nor would they treat on the terms proposed by the British Government; not one of them, except the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. POTTER,) talked like fighting, and not one of them told us what he was willing to do. They will not submit to the Orders in Council, nor treat on the terms proposed. When the abominable transit duty was attempted to be put on us, the same declarations were made, and I believed them. I never have believed that an American would be base enough to pay that duty. There is no great change from that plan now. Almost all the countries with which we carried on commercial intercourse, and by which we were enabled to pay Great Britain for her manufactures, are now blockaded. It is true, you may trade to England, Bonaparte's decrees to the contrary notwithstanding; but you cannot go anywhere else without the consent of Great Britain.

All have said they would not submit, as well those who opposed the embargo from the first, as those who repealed it. I have heard so much said about not submitting, that I am really anxious that the gentlemen should come boldly out and tell us what they will do; if they will not do this, they ought to quit talking about the embargo. When the ship is in danger every hand ought to be at the pump, and it is no inquiry how she got into danger, but to get her out of danger. Suppose your house set on fire, will you ask for help to discover who did it? Or will you endeavor to put it out as soon as possible, and then inquire who did it? That the nation has many difficulties to struggle with cannot be denied; and no one will agree that he had any hand in producing a single one of them. Is it enough for us not to have aided in producing them? To me it seems not. It is the easiest thing in nature to say what you will not do, but it is quite different to say what you will do.

Before I sit down, I must ask the gentlemen for the proof, that the Executive is unwilling to settle our disputes with Great Britain by friendly negotiation. The assertion has astonished me. His Message of the 29th November, is to my mind complete proof to the contrary; his not treating with Jackson is no proof, because the gentlemen themselves would not have treated with him on the terms proposed; his sending him away is no proof, because he has declared himself ready to treat with any other agent that the British Government may appoint. Jackson I believe came, like Rose, to settle no dispute whatever, and if no one would consent to treat with him on the ground proposed by Mr. Canning, what use could there be in his staying here? I cannot conceive any at all. For one, I sincerely wish that no foreign Minister were ever to put his foot on our shore, unless sent for some special and particular purpose, and to return immediately after he had completed his business, and so with our Ministers. I had rather give one $50,000 for a trip of this kind than $9,000 a year to reside at a foreign Court. If Mr. Jackson was authorized to do any thing, it was to reiterate proposals which had been rejected, and which, he must have known before he left England, would be again rejected. However it seems, instead of making proposals to satisfy us for the wrongs and injuries done to us, he politely waited for the Administration to make proposals to him. The case of the Executive and Jackson has been compared to common life—an unfortunate comparison. I am sure no case in private life can be found, where the injured party was told: Give your terms, after you have done this, I am willing to talk to you about them. The United States are the injured party, and Great Britain ought in justice to make the propositions for accommodation. However, I would not myself stand on this, so that we could any how have our differences fairly settled. Carry this individual comparison to a single case, that one man should without provocation give another a blow in the face—ought the man who received the blow to ask pardon? if he did, every man in the world would think him a very great fool, or something worse. The British have attacked your unprepared frigate, killed and impressed your seamen, when there was no war between you, and they have issued against you the most abominable proclamation that ever disgraced a civilized Government; and now they tell you, for all these injuries and wrongs, we are ready to hear all you have to say, but will not promise to do anything. The letters of Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson are before the nation, and the nation will pass judgment upon them, and that judgment will be, in my opinion, that the Administration has been moderate enough. Many will, no doubt, wonder that Mr. Jackson's first letter was passed over in silence. It surely is the most insulting—the other only repeats the insult of the first; it would seem as if the Administration had not read the first. There is no danger that Great Britain will take the dismissal of Jackson in dudgeon. She well knows that neither the present nor the past Administration has the smallest inclination to go to war with her—if they had, they have had a hundred times the cause to do it that another Administration had for the quasi war with France, and which war I believe was first regularly declared by the Federal Government. I ask gentlemen to say whether this is not so?

When speaking of the embargo, a little while past, I forgot to notice that the embargo prices had been complained of. They were one third better than those of the quasi war, and the quasi war was not given up on account of the low price of our produce. The embargo began to pinch Europe so hard, and the prices of our produce had got so high, that more than $30,000 was made on some of the first cargoes of tobacco, which went out after it was repealed. The Committee will, I hope, pardon me for so often touching on the embargo. I believe I am the only man on the floor, who has always been willing to defend it and stick to it, through good and through evil report; and so far am I now from giving up, that I am willing again to try it, provided the House would adhere to it, until we had a fair experiment of its effects. If the late Administration were desirous of war, why try the embargo? If the present are desirous of it, how does it happen the Message has not a word about war in it? The real truth is, that Great Britain does not want to treat with us. If she did, she might at any time, by doing justice, settle every dispute between us. What motive can an honest and upright Chief Magistrate have in this free country to wish for war, (and God forbid that we should have one of any other character)—his fame must be linked to his Administration; if the country be prosperous and happy, his fame will be great and lasting. What at this moment would give the President the greatest fame? and he, like all other men must value it. Need I look back to the arrangement made last Spring to discover, when all parties, from the most red hot Democrat to the maddest Federalist, were crying out to him—well done! Settling all our disputes with the European belligerents, would give him a fame, that would last as long as freedom should be respected.

Sir, the people in the Southern States have often been charged with a wish to go war with England. The charge has always been unfounded. That they have felt great resentment at the vile treatment we have received from both France and England, is undoubtedly true. How any man could think they wanted war, only for the sake of war, is unaccountable to me. They are an agricultural people, and, if you please, a slave-holding people; agriculture and domestic manufactures are their pursuits, and they want no protecting duties to encourage or aid them to make their homespun. If these people really want war only for the sake of war, they must be either mad or fools. Every man in the House knows that they are not in a situation to catch by privateering the fat London ships or the rich India ships. But, if they actually wanted war, how happens it, that in the year 1805, when the table was overloaded with petitions from the people of the large towns in the Middle and the Eastern States, declaring that they could not live under the British Orders in Council then in force, and which were not half equal to what we have since felt, that they withstood a torrent which would have drove the nation into a war with this very England? How an opinion so entirely without foundation should have gained credit is indeed wonderful. The face of the country, the population, and the pursuits of the people, ought to have convinced every man that the opinion was erroneous. If we wanted war and the President wanted it with Great Britain, it is strange that no attempt was ever made to get it.

Permit me, before I sit down, once more most seriously to recommend it to the House, to recommit the resolution to a select committee; though I could not myself improve the language, I am sure it could be done—it might be made quite as strong as it is without anything rough in it. I consider the character of the nation in some measure implicated by the style of the resolution; at least let it be such as one gentleman would use to another; it is too much like that of Mr. Jackson's letters, a style which if used in some countries from one man to another, might produce a little pinking. I have no more to say, and return the Committee my thanks for their attention.

The Committee rose at half past three, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again; and the House adjourned till Tuesday next.

TUESDAY, December 26.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, BENJAMIN PICKMAN, jr.; and from Virginia, WILLIAM A. BURWELL; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of Knox county, State of Kentucky, presented a bill for the relief of William White, and others; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. SMITH, from the committee appointed on the fourteenth instant, on the petition of William Linnard, presented a bill to increase the compensation of the military agent for the Middle Department; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a memorial of the convention of the representatives of the people residing east of Pearl river, on the waters of the Tombigbee, Alabama, Chickasawbay, and Mobile rivers, in the Mississippi Territory, praying that the act of Congress appointing an additional Judge in the said Territory, for the Washington district, may be repealed, and that a division of the said Territory may be made, under such regulations as may appear expedient and proper.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the sixth instant, on the petition of sundry inhabitants east of Pearl river, in the Territory aforesaid.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, presented a bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the Secretary of the Department of War: which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

EZRA THURBER.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee, of Claims, made a report on the petition of Ezra Thurber; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

The report is as follows:

That it is stated by the petitioner, that the collector of the district of Champlain applied to him for the use of his house, situate in the village of Champlain, New York, for the purpose of stationing there a guard to put the embargo laws in force; that, on the 7th of April, 1809, the house was consumed by fire by the carelessness of the sailors in the revenue service, who then occupied it, by order of the said collector; and evidence is taken to prove the facts; and he claims the value of the house so consumed.

Without adverting to the testimony in this case, the committee are of opinion that, in principle, the United States cannot be liable for the acts of sailors in this instance; and it is unnecessary to advert to a principle which would exempt the United States from damages occasioned by citizens or sailors, unless such damage originated in the performance of the duty imposed upon such persons by the authority of the United States. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the joint resolution from the Senate approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to receive any further communication from Francis James Jackson.

Mr. FISK.—As the course this debate has taken embraces a view of the relations between this country and England, and from that circumstance derives much of its importance, I shall not be deemed out of order in entering into an examination of the conduct of the British Government towards this country for some years past.

I shall not commence this examination by declaring that I have neither British partialities or French prejudices, or that I have no other object in view but the welfare of my country; such assurances equally apply to every topic of discussion within these walls, and seem to imply a doubt of the speaker's motives. From a view of the system pursued by England towards this country for the last ten or fifteen years, it must clearly appear that her object is to embarrass, cripple, and destroy our commerce. She has been progressing in this system, until she has nearly effected the object of her wishes. She commenced by interrupting our colonial trade, interpolating new principles into the laws of nations. Our merchants, alarmed at this outrage upon their rights, this destruction of their property, remonstrated against it, and petitioned the Government to interpose for their relief. Our Minister complains to the British Government, he is answered only by new and extended aggressions. Not satisfied with interrupting this branch of our trade, they blockade, not only our foreign markets, but our own ports are infested with their frigates. Our eyes are made to witness their depredations in our own waters. I need hardly mention the conduct of the Cambrian, or notice the multiplied captures made on our coast for violating these nominal blockades. These things seem to be no longer remembered. In their day they occasioned some uneasiness. Again, we complained of the violation of our rights, and our injuries have been redressed by the attack upon one of our national ships, the Orders in Council, and the continued impressment of our seamen. Averse to war, we have remonstrated, and endeavored to negotiate, until there remains no hope of an adjustment by negotiation.

But Mr. Monroe's Treaty has been several times mentioned in this debate, and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) said that it was a great question whether that treaty ought not to have been submitted to the Senate for their consideration and ratification. Independent of the conditional ratification of that instrument on the part of the British Government, it was too exceptionable ever to be received and acknowledged as a national compact by the American people. By that treaty, we were required to abandon the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, to guarantee to the British the right of navigating the Mississippi. We were to have no other, but a direct trade to the East Indies. And, as it respects the West India trade, why, inasmuch as the parties could not agree respecting it, provision was to be made for settling that at a future period, and in the mean time, each party should enjoy their rights to it! And as to the spoliations and depredations made upon our property, about which our merchants had so loudly complained, that question was settled by a sweeping clause, declaring that, for all unjust captures "hereafter" to be made, we should be indemnified. These are articles which I believe no gentleman on this floor would be willing to subscribe. Yet, we are told this treaty ought to have been seriously considered, and some there are who have even contended that we ought to have accepted and ratified it. I cannot believe that this is the opinion of any American, who has attentively perused it. But, if there are any who believe that the British Government were willing to treat with us, a perusal of this treaty will convince them that it was only upon terms which required the almost unqualified surrender of our commerce into their hands. These degrading terms could require no hesitation to determine the proper course to be pursued. And that was, immediately to return it, or a prompt avowal that it would not be ratified by our Government. Great Britain, upon this, determines to make you feel both her resentment and her power. A wanton attack is made upon one of our public ships in our own waters, by the same orders, no doubt, which directed the bombardment of Constantinople and Copenhagen. An act so outrageous, that it occasioned a universal burst of indignation and resentment from the American people, in a tone that prevented even the British Ministry from openly avowing it, or attempting to justify it. As this attack was, by that Government, declared to be unauthorized, we had a right to expect honorable reparation. We were assured, that a Minister would be sent here for the express purpose. At length, Mr. Rose arrives. What does he offer? honorable reparation? No. Instead of tendering satisfaction for this injury, he recriminates the American Government for the exercise of an indisputable right—a mere municipal act, the issuing of the proclamation interdicting our hospitality to those who had so wantonly abused it. This must be revoked, or no terms of reparation could be offered. And when our Government propose to make the revocation contemporaneous with the act of reparation, this is refused. What else should we have done? fought? No; the country would have rung with the clamorous charge of French influence if war had been advised. But peace, so long as it could be honorably maintained, was the wish of our Government. Negotiation is again attempted, and the next intelligence we get from England is the Orders in Council, aimed at the destruction of our remaining commerce. Here, then, we are again presented with “a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evincing a design” to annihilate our trade, or reduce it to her control. The wisdom of our councils foresaw the premeditated blow, and prepared, not only to avert it, but to make it, in some degree, recoil upon the aggressor. An embargo, a measure that has been, more than any other measure of our Government, reviled and resisted, was advised and adopted. But, had it been observed with that spirit of patriotism with which it was advised, we should have seen, this day, all our disputes with the British Government adjusted. And gentlemen seem to overlook the history of the times, when they tell us that this law affected no one but ourselves. Were not the West Indies reduced almost to famine? The price of American produce was treble to what was ever before known there. The scarcity of American produce, not only made an impression upon the merchants, but it affected the Government; a proclamation was issued, inviting your citizens to violate their own laws, to set their Government at defiance to relieve British distress, occasioned by a measure which, we are told, operated only upon the American people. Some few were found so destitute of virtue and patriotism, as to attempt to profit by the invitation. When they arrived at Jamaica, they not only found the people suffering for provisions, but the Government in want of revenues. These unprincipled violators of their own laws are subjected to a new tariff of duty. But of this act of perfidy I do not complain, although honor might have been expected, even among these common violators of our laws; I would not have found fault, if every vessel and cargo which violated the embargo on the faith of that proclamation, had been seized and condemned as good and lawful prize. But the effect of the embargo was neither confined to America or limited to the West Indies, it reached England. A clamor was raised against the Ministry, for pursuing a system that compelled our Government to resort to a measure which affected Great Britain so seriously. I need neither refer to the popular tumults in England, or the speeches and proceedings in Parliament, to show that British interest was materially affected by the embargo. It was with a view to be relieved from the operation of this act, that “Mr. Canning, on the 18th of January last, took Mr. Pinkney aside,” and informed him that an arrangement might, he believed, be made for adjusting the differences between England and America. Despatches were then immediately prepared for Mr. Erskine, and upon which he lost no time in proposing and making the arrangement which took place between him and our Government in April. This arrangement was not less gratifying to England, than agreeable to all parties here. It was understood in England, before Mr. Oakley's departure, that an arrangement would soon be made with this country, and the event appeared to be as anxiously desired there, as it was promptly proposed, and universally approved, here. When Mr. Oakley, the bearer of the despatches, arrived in New York, it was announced that all our differences with England were in train of settlement, or about to be adjusted. And here, I may ask, what could authorize the conjecture of this adjustment, if the despatch of the 23d of January was the only instruction upon which the British Minister was to act? Our Government had never agreed to, nor could it be supposed that it would, consent to submit to the conditions contained in that despatch. But what was the arrangement? It contained no very valuable concessions on the part of the British. They agree to make us reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake, to revoke their Orders in Council as they respect our trade, and to send a Minister to form a treaty, upon all the points in dispute between the two countries. We have, by this arrangement, no treaty, nor even a promise of one, only that a Minister shall be sent with full powers, &c., which is different from a treaty. And what were the points in relation between the two countries to be settled? Nothing so very difficult, if there was a disposition to treat; nothing but what two honest men really disposed to adjust, might settle in two hours. The British Government ought to have felt itself bound by a sense of honor, as well as by the principles of justice, to have made us a prompt and satisfactory reparation for the attack upon the Chesapeake. Their Orders in Council are a palpable violation of the laws of nations, and an infringement upon our neutral rights, and ought never to have issued; yet, by the terms of the arrangement, we are required to give an equivalent. We must purchase the justice she renders us. The proclamation and non-importation act must cease to operate, and the embargo or non-intercourse act must, as it relates to her, be relaxed, and enforced against France. To this, we are all agreed. By this agreement, our Government give a new pledge of the sincerity of its desire for “amity and commerce” with the British nation. No one here, I believe, entertained a suspicion that this arrangement would be wholly disavowed by the British, for we had no great bargain to boast. But the first news we receive from that country is information of the disavowal. A stipulation, performed with good faith on our part, justified the expectation, that some reasons for the disavowal would be assigned by that Government. And in vain do we look into the correspondence of the British Minister with our Government for the motives or reason of the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement. We find the whole tenor of that Minister's letter a tissue of prevarication and insolence.

Sir, an attentive examination of the documents accompanying the Message of the President, to which I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee, will, I think, clearly show the duplicity of Mr. Canning, and the studied reiterated insults of Mr. Jackson to our Government. It will show that the mission of Mr. Jackson was instituted, not for the purpose of conciliating, but with an intention to insult and irritate the Government of this country. We have no occasion to single out particular paragraphs of the British Minister's letters, as evidence of his effrontery and insolence, you may take the whole, the whole will furnish the best proof of his intentions. And, through this examination, let it be remembered that America is the injured party, Great Britain the aggressor, and Mr. Jackson the representative of his Government.

And I would not, sir, attempt to go into this investigation to prove what, to me, is so obvious, did not gentlemen contend that they cannot discover anything insolent or affronting in these letters, and that, therefore, they must vote against the resolution.

That part of the documents to which I will first request the attention of the Committee, is the second, third, and fourth paragraphs, of a letter from Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney, dated 27th of May last, in these words:

"Having had the honor to read to you in extenso the instructions with which Mr. Erskine was furnished, it is not necessary for me to enter into any explanation of those points in which Mr. Erskine has acted, not only not in conformity, but in direct contradiction to them."

"I forbear equally from troubling you, sir, with any comments on the manner in which Mr. Erskine's communications have been received by the American Government, or upon the terms and spirit of Mr. Smith's share of the correspondence."

"Such observations will be communicated more properly through the Minister whom His Majesty has directed to proceed to America; not on any special mission, which Mr. Erskine was not authorized to promise, except upon conditions, not one of which he has obtained, but as the successor of Mr. Erskine, whom His Majesty has not lost a moment in recalling."

Here we see the spirit with which this mission is instituted, and the object for which it is designed. Affecting a tone of complaint, at the "manner" in which Mr. Erskine's communication had been received by the American Government, and at the "spirit" of Mr. Smith's share of the correspondence, Mr. Canning insinuates the displeasure of His Majesty, and that Mr. Jackson will communicate it. For he then tells Mr. Pinkney, that "such observations" will be communicated more properly through Mr. Jackson; that is, not respecting any reasons for the disavowal, but upon the points wherein Mr. Erskine had acted—in contradiction to his instructions? No, but to the instructions which Mr. Canning had read to Mr. Pinkney in extenso, and with which Mr. Erskine was furnished, and upon the other two points, the manner our Government received the communications, and upon the terms and spirit of Mr. Smith's share of the correspondence. This, then, is the object for which Mr. Jackson is to be sent here—to chastise our Government for their rude manners and independent spirit. And we are not permitted to conjecture, that, after he shall have accomplished the primary object of his mission, he will condescend to treat with us. For Mr. Canning, in the next sentence, assures us, that this Minister is not to be sent "on a special mission, but as the successor of Mr. Erskine." Mr. Erskine, as resident Minister, had not full powers to treat, &c. Mr. Jackson, as his successor, has then no power to treat with us.

Sir, if we turn to the extracts from Mr. Pinkney's letter to Mr. Smith, dated 28th May, 1809, we find that Mr. Canning tells Mr. Pinkney that Mr. Erskine's instructions were founded on his own letters, stating the conversations he had held with Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin, and Mr. Smith, in which they had agreed to the conditions contained in the despatch. And here we detect Mr. Canning in a misstatement. Mr. Erskine did never communicate such information in his letters. He never suggested that our Government would agree to the three conditions. Nothing that passed in the conversations alluded to, would authorize him to make such a suggestion. Mr. Erskine, in a letter to the Secretary of State, dated 31st July, 1809, speaking of the disavowal, says, "that any vindication of his conduct (what ever he might have to offer) would be of no importance, further than it might tend to show that 'no intention existed on his part to practise any 'deception towards the Government of the United States.'" He could, doubtless, show copies of the letters in which he had detailed the conversations, about which Mr. Canning speaks, and that he (Mr. Erskine) had stated these correctly. If so, we shall see that these conversations neither authorize Mr. Canning to say or suppose that our Government would submit to the three conditions in the despatch. And it justifies the inference, that other instructions were furnished to Mr. Erskine. This inference being correct, accounts for Mr. Erskine's declaration, that he "conceived he had conformed to His Majesty's wishes; and to the spirit, at least, of his instructions upon that subject." But, could he have thought he conformed to those instructions contained in the despatch of the 23d of January? Certainly not; he must refer to other instructions.

Now, sir, let us see what is stated, or, rather, what is not stated, in the conversations spoken of by Mr. Canning. The Secretary of State, in a letter addressed to Mr. Erskine, bearing date the 9th of August, 1809, after stating the three points contained in the despatch of the 23d of January, requests Mr. Erskine "to give such explanations, as his candor would at once suggest, in relation to these imputed conversations." Mr. Erskine, in his answer, dated the 14th of August, relates the conversations which he had communicated to Mr. Canning; in which there is nothing to justify the assertion of the British Minister, that it was understood in England, from these conversations, that the conditions mentioned in the despatch would be acceptable to this country. Mr. Madison is represented to have stated, "that every opinion which he entertained respecting the best interests of his country, led him to wish that a good understanding should take place between Great Britain and the United States, and that he thought that the obvious advantages which would thereby result to both countries were a sufficient pledge of the sincerity of his sentiments." Mr. Erskine, after stating the time when this conversation took place, adds: "But I never considered that Mr. Madison meant, that the Government of the United States would pledge themselves beyond the proposition respecting the embargo as above stated," and as proposed to the British Government, in August, 1808, "because that was the extent of the power of the President by the Constitution of the United States." It was not to be expected that the British Minister would require what the President had no power to give, a pledge for the course Congress would pursue in relation to the two countries. But provision was made by law for suspending the non-intercourse law as related to England, upon the revocation of her Orders in Council, so far as they affected our neutral rights. About this first point there could be no difficulty; and as to the second point, Mr. Erskine gives the following explanation:

"In the course of a private interview I had with Mr. Gallatin, the Secretary of the Treasury, he intimated that the non-intercourse law, which was then likely to be passed by the Congress, might be considered as removing two very important grounds of difference with Great Britain, viz: the non-importation act, as applicable to her alone; and also the President's proclamation, whereby the ships of Great Britain were excluded from the ports of the United States, while those of France were permitted to enter; but that, by the non-intercourse law, both Powers were placed on the same footing. He did not pretend to say that this measure had been taken from any motives of concession to Great Britain; but as, in fact, those consequences followed, he conceived they might be considered as removing the two great obstacles to a conciliation.

"He adverted also to the probability of an adjustment of another important point in dispute between the two countries, as he knew that it was intended, by the United States, to abandon the attempt to carry on a trade with the colonies of belligerents in time of war, which was not allowed in time of peace, and to trust to the being permitted, by the French, to carry on such trade in peace, so as to entitle them to a continuance of it in time of war."

Is there, sir, anything in this explanation that justifies the belief, that we were "willing to renounce, during the present war, the pretension of carrying on, in time of war, all trade with the enemies' colonies, from which we were excluded during peace?" So far from it, that an intimation is given of an expectation that the French would permit us to carry on such trade in peace, which would entitle us to continue it in time of war. But, in order that no doubt should remain upon this point, Mr. Erskine feels no hesitation in declaring that he supposed Mr. Gallatin alluded to the trade from the colonies of belligerents, direct to their mother country, or to the ports of other belligerents, because the right to such trade had been the point in dispute. The right to carry on a trade from the colonies of belligerents to the United States had never been called in question. Yet, by the second condition of the despatch, we are to renounce all trade in time of war, and we are told that this has been proposed, because our Government were willing to assent to it. The fact we see is directly the reverse. These conditions were required to be recognised by us as preliminaries to an arrangement, and, for the same reason as before urged, that we consented to do so. But Mr. Erskine, in this same letter, says:

"That he never received any assurances from the American Government, that they would pledge themselves to adopt the conditions specified in Mr. Canning's instructions, as preliminaries, nor did he ever hold out such an expectation to His Majesty's Government."

He would not dare to make this assertion, if it be unfounded, because the British Government, having his communications, would not fail to contradict it, if incorrectly stated. We have seen, then, that, as to the two first conditions, our Government had never consented to recognise the second in any manner, nor either, as preliminaries; and that, Mr. Erskine had so stated it to the British Government.

Now, let us hear what he says about the third condition:

"As to the third condition referred to by you, specified in Mr. Canning's instructions, I have only to remark, that I never held any conversation with the members of the Government of the United States relative to it, until my late negotiation, or had ever mentioned the subject to His Majesty's Government; it having, for the first time, been presented to my consideration, in Mr. Canning's despatch to me of the 23d of January, in which that idea is suggested, and is stated to have been assented to by Mr. Pinkney."

Sir, the history of this third condition may be worthy of some further consideration, for the purpose of showing the "spirit" of the British Ministry. Mr. Canning, the author of this condition, first proposes it to Mr. Pinkney in London, on the 22d day of January last, and Mr. Pinkney, so far from assenting to it, tells him, as we find by his letter of the 23d of June, that it would never be admitted into a stipulation; yet, Mr. Canning tells Mr. Erskine that Mr. Pinkney had assented to it; "and he flattered himself that there would be no difficulty in obtaining a distinct and official recognition of these conditions from the American Government?" But let us see what Mr. Canning says to Mr. Pinkney upon this point, after the disavowal. In the extract of Mr. Pinkney's letter, dated the 23d of June, Mr. Pinkney observes:

"Upon the third condition, I said a very few words

DECEMBER, 1800.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

I restated what I had thrown out upon the matter of it, in an informal conversation in January, and expressed my regret that it should have been misapprehended."

"Mr. Canning immediately said that he was himself of opinion, that the idea upon which that condition turns, could not well find its way into a stipulation; that he had, nevertheless, believed it proper to propose the condition to the United States; that he should have been satisfied with the rejection of it."

On seeing the despatch published, as it was by a call of Parliament in May, Mr. Pinkney could not but feel surprised to find it contained such an entire misrepresentation of his opinions and conversations; he therefore takes occasion to express his regret that he should have been misapprehended.

Mr. Canning does not pretend that he had misunderstood him, or that Mr. Pinkney had ever assented to this condition, but confirms Mr. Pinkney's statement, by saying that he was himself aware that this condition could not be admitted into a stipulation, and he was willing it should be rejected. Yet, sir, the despatch requires a distinct and official recognition of this condition. And there we are told, that the arrangement was disavowed, because made without this official recognition. But Mr. Pinkney was not less surprised at the statement of his opinion, than were the President and Secretaries at the entire misstatement of their conversations with Mr. Erskine. On seeing the despatch, no time is lost in calling upon Mr. Erskine for an explanation. He readily and very candidly gives it, and declares that he never had communicated to the British Government such conversations as were stated by Mr. G. Canning in the despatch. The Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury state the substance of the conversations they had held with Mr. Erskine on the subject, and this statement corresponds with that which Mr. Erskine tells us he made to his Government. We then discover a misstatement on the part of Mr. Canning, as respects the second condition. For it appears that the conversations related to the direct trade, from the colonies of a belligerent to the mother country, and for this obvious reason, that this was the point in dispute, a very different thing from "all trade," which is mentioned in the second condition. But let us recur once more to the extract from Mr. Pinkney's letter of the 23d of June, and hear what Mr. Canning says upon this point. Mr. Pinkney, after reciting the very conclusive arguments which he had urged, to show that this condition was of no importance to Great Britain, adds, as follows:

"Mr. Canning admitted that the second condition had no necessary connexion with the Orders in Council; and he intimated that they would have been content to leave the subject of it to future discussion and arrangement. He added, that this condition was inserted in Mr. Erskine's instructions, because it had appeared from his own report of conversations with official persons at Washington, that there would be no difficulty in agreeing to it."

tion, is equally fallacious and unfounded, as that he offers for inserting the third. Both of which conditions, he admits, are of no importance to Great Britain; the third, he was willing should be rejected; the subject of the second, they would have been content to leave to future discussion and arrangement. Why, then, is an official recognition of these conditions required, and the not obtaining it made a pretence for the disavowal? The answer is obvious; we had yielded our restrictive system, and Great Britain found her interest in disavowing the arrangement, and she is left without the semblance of reason or argument to palliate the perfidious act. No explanation is attempted to be given to our Minister in London. A show of displeasure is manifested at the conduct of Mr. Erskine, by his immediate recall, and a mere pretence of negotiating with us is kept up, by the appointment of a successor. But, when the name of this successor was known here, there was but little ground of hope that the object of his mission was to negotiate with us. But, notwithstanding our Government had, after the disavowal, and prior to the arrival of Mr. Jackson, seen the gross attempt of Mr. Canning, to render the prominent members of our Administration the authors of the inadmissible and odious conditions contained in the despatch to Mr. Erskine, and after the rude intimations to Mr. Pinkney, that this new Minister came not on a special mission; such was the forbearance of our Government, and such their desire for an honorable adjustment of our differences with that nation, that no time was lost in receiving and accrediting Mr. Jackson as the successor of Mr. Erskine.

Having given an honorable reception to this Minister, our Government had a right to expect that he would assign or attempt to assign some plausible, at least, if not solid and satisfactory reasons, for His Majesty's disavowal of the arrangement entered into with Mr. Erskine, and that he would propose a substitute. Justice and honor required that Government to do this with frankness and promptitude. That this should be done, was not only expected, but made a point with our Government, and I trust and believe that it will be made a point, and insisted on by the people of this country. We are the injured party, and Great Britain the acknowledged aggressor, admitting we are entitled to reparation for the injuries she has done us, making an agreement to satisfy us, which we observe, and fulfil with good faith on our part, and which she refuses to perform. Shall we not demand some explanation of her conduct, and some substitute for the agreement she has violated? No one will say this is unreasonable. Our attention is turned to Mr. Jackson, as the organ of his Government, who is to communicate to us this explanation, and to offer this substitute. But how egregiously are we disappointed! Instead of explanations, we meet with recrimination; instead of argument, abuse; instead of satisfaction for past injuries, we are jeeringly told that he has no proposals to make. Finding such was the temper, and such the language, of this new negotiator, the Secretary of State, with great propriety, apprizes him that his communications must be in the written form.

And now, sir, from this written form, which is, I am confident, without a precedent or parallel in the history of diplomacy, it is not very difficult, however disagreeable it may be, to discover that the sole object and intent of Mr. Jackson, was to insult the American Government. A brief examination of the correspondence will warrant this assertion. What is the first language we find in his first letter? Petulant and recriminating. Protesting against the proceedings of our Government, as unprecedented, in requiring his communications to be in writing; affecting to view "it as a violation, in his person, of the most essential rights of a public Minister." He approaches the subject of the disavowal, by insinuating that our Government, from a knowledge of the circumstances under which the arrangement was concluded, could have expected no other result, than a refusal, on the part of his Government, to ratify it. His language to the Secretary of State is, "you could not but have thought 'it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act, done under such circumstances, as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed.'" What circumstances? He has not mentioned them. Such as were known to our Government—our Government knowing the basis upon which the arrangement was made, had no reason to expect it would be ratified, and therefore are to be made parties to the disavowal, which excludes all pretence of complaint. And, in the same letter, page 32, he enters into a train of reasoning to prove that his position was correct. He labors to establish the fact so material to his purpose, that our Government knew the instructions under which Mr. Erskine acted. For he says:

"Mr. Erskine then reports, verbatim et seriatim, your observations upon each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you, that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions; but the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions were, in fact, very explicitly communicated to you, and by you, of course, laid before the President for his consideration."

Here we see Mr. Jackson assuming premises, for the purpose of establishing a conclusion that he determines to make. A substitute is one, acting for another, and, without attempting to show that other conditions were substituted, he proceeds to show what the act of substitution would prove; but he ought first to show this act, before he draws his conclusions. But he contents himself with this peculiar mode of reasoning, and declares—

"That he need hardly add, that the difference between these conditions and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th of April, is sufficiently obvious, to require no elucidation; nor need I (he adds) draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that, under such circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister."

Are we to take this, which is neither reason nor argument, but a perversion of both, as a satisfactory explanation of the disavowal? No, sir, Mr. Jackson seems unwilling to leave it here. He is not satisfied with his own conclusions, but he proceeds to add, in page 33:

"It is my duty, sir, solemnly to declare to you, and through you, to the President, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, which you have made the basis of an official correspondence with the latter Minister, and which was read by the former to the American Minister in London, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with this country, on the matter to which it relates."

Here Mr. Jackson adroitly substitutes for the three conditions, the "despatch," which contained the instructions and conditions, and tells the Secretary of State, and, "through him, the President," that "you," intending the President and Secretary of State, have made that despatch the basis of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine. It is his duty, he says, to make this declaration. If it was his duty, it could only be so, because he was so instructed. And, it will be remembered, that Mr. Canning informed Mr. Pinkney, that the successor of Mr. Erskine would be charged with "observations" to our Government, upon this point. Here, then, we have the observations he is instructed to make. In the next paragraph of this letter, he proceeds to say to the Secretary of State:

"If sir, it be your intention to state that no explanation whatever has been given to the American Government, of the reasons which induced His Majesty to disavow the act of my predecessor, I must, in that case, observe that, in the instructions conveying to him His Majesty's intentions, those reasons were very fully and forcibly stated; and if he has not transmitted them to you, I can only attribute it to the peculiar delicacy and embarrassment of his situation, and he might the more reasonably be led to that reliance on it, as a full and ample communication was also made upon the subject, by His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to Mr. Pinkney."

Let us, for a moment, look at the preparation to which the British Ministers resort. Upon the disavowal being made, Mr. Pinkney is informed, by Mr. Canning, that an explanation will be given by the successor of Mr. Erskine. This successor tells our Government, that Mr. Erskine was instructed to explain; and if he has not, it was because a "full and ample" communication was made upon the subject by His Majesty's Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to Mr. Pinkney. In London we are referred to Washington, and here we are directed to London, for the explanation or reasons of this disavowal.

Mr. Jackson, in page 34, continues:

"As to the expectation entertained here, that the explanation of His Majesty's share in this transaction should be made through me, I might content myself with simply observing, that I was not provided with instructions to that effect, because it was known that the explanation in question had already been given."

And in page 35, the same letter adds:

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

"I say this, in regard to the original notification of His Majesty's determination, and of the motives of it, which, being already made, it could not be supposed, in London, that a repetition of them would be expected from me; and, of course, no such case has been foreseen in my instructions."

Is not this an attempt to shuffle the question out of sight? First, we are told, that, as we knew Mr. Erskine's instructions did not authorize the arrangement, no explanation of the disavowal would be given; then, it is said, this explanation has been already given, and a repetition could not be expected. But, let us pursue Mr. Jackson upon this point, until he quits it, and see if we can discover anything but a disposition to persevere in insolence towards our Government. The Secretary of State, in his letter of the 19th of October, addressed to Mr. Jackson, informs him, that the President expected a formal and satisfactory explanation of the reasons for the refusal of His Britannic Majesty to carry the arrangement, made with Mr. Erskine, into effect; and that he persisted in that expectation, and, in the opinion, that there had been given no explanation, which could be deemed adequate, either as to the matter or the mode. Mr. Smith assures him, in this letter, page 47, that the declaration, "that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d of January, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it relates," was then, for the first time, made to this Government. And "that, if that despatch had been communicated at the time of the arrangement, or if it had been known that the propositions contained in it, and which were at first presented by Mr. Erskine, were the only ones on which he was authorized to make an arrangement, the arrangement would not have been made." This declaration explicitly negatives the fact, which Mr. Jackson had attempted to affirm by inference, that the "instructions" under which Mr. Erskine made the arrangement, were known to our Government. The Secretary of State then proceeds to say, page fifty-four:

"I conclude, sir, with pressing on your candid attention, that the least which the President could have looked for, in consequence of the disavowal of a transaction, such as was concluded by your predecessor, and carried faithfully into effect by this Government, was an explanation from yours of the disavowal, not through the Minister disavowed, but through his successor; an explanation, founded on reasons strong and solid in themselves, and presented neither verbally nor vaguely, but in a form comporting with the occasion, and with the respect due to the character and the good faith of the disappointed party."

Now, let us see, sir, how Mr. Jackson answers this. In his letter, of the 23d of October, addressed to the Secretary of State, he first observes, page 58, that he shall, "without loss of time, transmit Mr. Smith's letter to his Court, where the various and important considerations which it embraces, will receive the attention due to them." Passing over this paragraph, with one remark, that it is a declaration incompatible with the idea, that he who makes it has full power to treat, I will proceed to what Mr. Jackson adds, upon the point of explanation:

"It could not enter into my view, to withhold from you an explanation, merely because it had been already given, but because, having been so given, I could not imagine, until informed by you, that a repetition of it would be required at my hands. I am quite certain that His Majesty's Government, having complied with what was considered to be the substantial duty imposed upon it on this occasion would, had this been foreseen, have added to the proofs of conciliatory good faith already manifested, the farther complacency to the wishes of the United States of adopting the form of communication most agreeable to them, and of giving, through me, the explanation in question. I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing you, that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were, at the time, in substance, made known to you; no stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement."

Mr. Jackson here more explicitly declares what he had before, in a circumlocutory manner, insinuated; not barely that Mr. Erskine had violated his instructions, which was a question between himself and his Government, and not a sufficient reason for the disavowal, but that these instructions were known at the time of the arrangement by our Government. If Mr. Jackson did not violate the rules of diplomatic decorum, when he first made this insinuation, he is without excuse for his diplomatic rudeness, in presenting it in the more serious form of assertion, after he was informed by our Government that Mr. Erskine's instructions were not known here. But we have not yet reached the end of the correspondence upon this point. In the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Jackson, dated 1st November, page 66, he remarks—

"I abstain, sir, from making any particular animadversions on several irrelevant and improper allusions in your letter, not at all comporting with the professed disposition to adjust, in an amicable manner, the differences unhappily subsisting between the two countries. But it would be improper to conclude the few observations to which I purposely limit myself, without advert- ing to your repetition of a language implying knowledge, on the part of this Government, that the instructions of your predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him. After the explicit and peremptory assertion that this Government had no such knowledge, and that, with such knowledge, no such arrangement would have been entered into, the view which you have again presented of the subject, makes it my duty to apprise you that such insinuations are inadmissible in the intercourse of a foreign Minister with a Government that understands what it owes to itself."

A language, mild, dignified, and forbearing, evincing a sincerity for negotiation, and a patient perseverance, not to be exhausted even by sneers and sarcasms, unless they conveyed the direct and detestable charge of falsehood. Is this met with a corresponding conciliatory disposition, on the part of the British negotiator? No, sir. And I regret that the answer is so obvious and conclusive in the negative. In the conclusion of his letter, addressed to the Secretary of State, dated 4th November, page 72, we find him obstinately persevering in his offensive insinuations and unfounded assertions. His own language is the best evidence of his fixed determination to treat our Government with insolence. It is as follows:

"You will find that, in my correspondence with you, I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow, from the premises advanced by me, and, least of all, should I think of uttering an insinuation, where I was unable to substantiate a fact. To facts, such as I have become acquainted with them, I have scrupulously adhered; and, in so doing, I must continue, whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is called in question, to vindicate its honor and dignity in the manner that appears to me best calculated for that purpose."

He avows, that the conclusions he had drawn were correct, that his insinuations could be substantiated by facts, and that he should adhere to the assertions he had made. This is his meaning, for, in the preceding paragraph, he says: "But, as to the propriety of my allusions, you must allow me to acknowledge only the decision of my own Sovereign, whose commands I obey, and to whom alone I consider myself responsible." What language, sir, could be more insolent and affronting than this? It contains, not only an insinuation, but a reiteration, of the detestable charge, that our Government were guilty of a falsehood. If the Executive had continued the correspondence after this, it would have degraded itself and the country.

There, then, remained no other course to be pursued more proper than the one taken by the Executive, to refuse to receive any further communications from the Minister, and inform his Government of his offensive conduct. This course I approve. This part of the resolution has my approbation.

If, sir, there would remain any doubt, after examining those parts of the correspondence which I have already noticed, that Mr. Jackson has insulted our Government, and that he designed so to do, I would ask the attention of the Committee to what he says respecting the Orders in Council, the affair of the Chesapeake, and the object of his mission to this Government. These are subjects of importance, of great moment, and interest to the country, subjects to which the attention of the nation is at present directed. I may, therefore, sir, be excused, in turning again to the correspondence, to hear what this new Minister has to say in relation to them.

In the letter of Mr. Jackson of the 11th of October, page 38, of the printed documents, we find a paragraph, touching the Orders in Council, which cannot, I think, be mistaken. It is in the following words:

"The effect of this new order is to relieve the system under which the former orders were issued, from that which has always been represented in this country as the most objectionable and offensive part of it, the option given to neutrals to trade with the enemies of Great Britain through British ports on payment of a transit duty. This was originally devised and intended as a mitigation of what is certainly more correct but more rigid in principle, the total and unqualified interdiction of all trade with the enemy. If, however, this mitigation was felt as an aggravation, and, as has been sometimes warmly asserted, as an insult, that cause of complaint is now entirely removed. By the Order in Council of the 26th of April, 1809, all trade with France and Holland, and the ports of Italy, comprehended under the denomination of the Kingdom of Italy, is simply prohibited altogether. No option is afforded, and consequently no transit duty is required to be paid. In another respect, the Order in Council of the 26th of April must be admitted to be more restrictive than those of November, 1807."

Sir, let me now ask, if in this paragraph of studied, labored invective, it is possible for any one who understands the English language to perceive anything but insult? What, sir, after this country had suffered so much by these orders, and complained so loudly against them, because they excluded a portion of our trade, and shackled the remainder with a transit duty, are we to be told, that we are relieved by "simply prohibiting the trade altogether?" Not only told this, but required to receive the declaration as the unexceptionable language of friendly negotiation! No, sir, this is too much. The Executive would have been justified, I have no doubt, by the people, if it had peremptorily refused to receive any further communications than this first letter from Mr. Jackson. That it did not so refuse, is only to be attributed to the sincere and strong desire of the Government, to have an amicable adjustment of our differences with England.

By adverting to the preceding part of this letter, in which Mr. Jackson mentions the affair of the Chesapeake, we find he is not instructed to make reparation for that outrage, but upon terms that would be humiliating and disgraceful to this country. Our Government is required formally to revoke the proclamation, which has long since been done away, to stipulate, in fact, to purchase the proffered reparation. The seamen to be restored must not be either natural born subjects of His Majesty, or deserters from His Majesty's service.

Well, sir, as they were claimed, and forcibly taken as natural born subjects or deserters, of course, by the terms of this stipulation, none would be restored. We are required, after this length of time has passed, now to receive that sort of reparation which goes directly to justify the attack.

When we look for the object of Mr. Jackson's mission, we find throughout all his letters, I need not refer to any in particular, that he has no substitute to propose for the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, fulfilled by our Government and violated by his; that he has no proposals to make us, which might lead to a treaty; he is only authorized to receive and discuss proposals. We must be thus placed in the attitude of the offending nation. Is this to be endured? Sir, after the many injuries we have suffered, are we to acknowledge ourselves in the wrong, subscribe to a falsehood, by offering proposals of redress to the offender? Such disgrace is without precedent in the annals of diplomacy. And nothing but the spirit of insolence would have induced the British Minister to make such intimations to the American Government. How would the British Government have met such treatment from our Minister? Suppose we had murdered a few of His Majesty's subjects, seized and confined four or five thousand more, obstructed the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, plundered their property to the amount of fifty or sixty millions of dollars, of which His Majesty complained; entered into an arrangement for making reparation, which he observed with good faith, but which we had perfidiously violated; and after all this, sent a Minister to tell that nation that he had no proposals to make, that his instructions were "prospective," and to charge their Ministry with falsehood? The Minister who should thus trifle with that Government, would be instantly dismissed, if not ordered to leave the country.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Why disavow the arrangement so far as it relates to the affair of the Chesapeake? It is not denied but Mr. Erskine acted in pursuance of his authority upon this point. And when we are told that he violated his instructions, that reason does not apply to this part of the case, if it were admissible. The cause of the disavowal is to be found only in the monopolizing system of that Government. That system, which Mr. Jackson tells us, was "deliberately adopted and acted upon, in just and necessary retaliation of the unprecedented modes of hostility resorted to by the enemy." A system, justified only by the pretence, that it is, "to set bounds to that spirit of encroachment and universal dominion which would bend all things to its own standard." But, sir, we are not to be told at this day, that the object of the present war on the part of Great Britain, is resistance to the spirit of encroachment. It is a contest for commercial profits. Suppose we were to declare war against the Dey of Algiers because his subjects would not exchange their present form of Government for one like ours. Could we expect to be justified in the eyes of the world, in appealing to the necessity of this war as an excuse for violating the rights of other nations? No, sir, the pretence would be insolent, especially when offered to the injured. Yet we are required to take this as a satisfactory reason for British blockades, Orders in Council, and depredations upon our property!

Sir, if further evidence would be necessary to prove the insolence of this Minister to our Government, it is to be found in his letters delivered by Mr. Oakley to the Secretary of State, dated the 13th of November. In the first of these notes, Mr. Oakley is desired to state to the Secretary of State "that Mr. Jackson had been grossly insulted by the inhabitants of Hampton, in the abusive language held by some of them to several officers bearing the King's uniform," that special passports were indispensable to his safety, "that this was the more necessary, because the language of our newspapers had a tendency to excite the people to commit violence upon his person." Not satisfied with the insolence he had offered to the Executive, he extends it to the people. Such is the barbarous state of American manners, that he shall be destroyed by the hand of violence, unless the Government extends to him their special protection! The object of the next note is to reiterate the offensive charge "for which he had been dismissed." "He had seen with much regret that facts which it had been his duty to state, had been deemed a sufficient motive for 'breaking off an important negotiation.'" The term "facts" is selected, and several times repeated in this note, for the purpose of repeating the insult to the Government. The plain English of this note is, if you are offended at what Mr. Jackson has said, he now repeats the assertions in the strongest terms the language affords! And yet, sir, do we hear gentlemen declare, that they cannot perceive any insult in all this! And they call upon us to prove the charge contained in the resolution.

Sir, if more evidence be necessary, it is to be found in the letter headed "Circular," which, under false and fallacious disguises, is an appeal to the people, and supports the assertion contained in the resolution. And this is a part of that Minister's conduct, upon which the Executive has expressed no opinion, and upon which I think this House bound by the duty we owe to ourselves and our country, to express an opinion. An appeal by a foreign Minister, from the decision of the Executive, to the people, merits the severest reprehension. If this be not an appeal to the people, what is it? Is it the usual course of diplomacy for Ministers to inform Consuls of the particulars relating to their attempts at negotiation, and authorize the publication of such information? No, sir. It is unprecedented. This publication could not be with this view, because the statement it contains is both "false and fallacious." It is false, in asserting that the negotiation was broken off, because he had stated facts. It is fallacious, in holding out the idea, that our Government were offended at his stating, first, "that the three conditions forming the substance of Mr. Erskine's original instructions were submitted to the Secretary of State." Secondly, that Mr. Jackson knew, that that instruction was the only one in which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine. Our Government did not dismiss him for stating these facts; but for repeating, after he was apprized that the declaration was inadmissible, that our Government knew that the despatch of the 23d of January contained the only instruction to Mr. Erskine under which he made the arrangement. A very different thing from the declaration, that Mr. Jackson knew it contained the only instructions. Yet, he says, he could not imagine that offence would be taken at his stating these facts, and adhering to them, as none could be intended. Attempting, under this false and fallacious statement, to make an impression upon the American people, that our Government were offended and had broken off an important negotiation without cause. An act of atrocity, for which, I think, he should be ordered out of the country.

Sir, I have now waded through the correspondence of this "important negotiation," in which we have seen everything but a disposition to treat with our Government upon any of the points in relation between the two countries. The whole of Mr. J.'s conduct, from his first letter to the end of his circular appeal to the people, is irritating and insolent. Are we, then, silently to submit to be thus trifled with, and treated with contempt? The British plunder your property, blockade your markets, hover in your waters, attack your national ships, murder a part of the men and capture others; impress your fellow-citizens, disavow their solemn engagements, and send a Minister to insult your Government, and then appeal to the people to justify him, and Congress pass all this over in silence! Sir, I trust the spirit of the nation is not yet so low. If it is, well may we exclaim, "How are the mighty fallen!" The genius of liberty has fled from the country, and the spirit of patriotism forsaken the nation.

No, sir, our pacific policy has at length brought us to the "ne plus ultra," to the utmost point of forbearance. We have, while negotiating with that nation, been plundered of more property than would maintain a war, that should avenge our wrongs. Our attention, by repeated aggressions, is drawn from former injuries, and in contemplating the present we seem to have forgotten the past. But, sir, will you forget the sufferings of your captured seamen? Your seamen, whose constancy, whose valor, and whose enterprise, are themes of just and patriotic exultation to every American, and afford a subject of admiration to the world, call upon you for relief and protection. They are not only captured and imprisoned, but have been murdered, their blood has tinged your waves, while they have been engaged in the service of their country, and reposing their confidence in the protection of their Government. These wrongs are neither redressed, nor avenged. We are amused from year to year with new Ministers, and new documents, but reparation is neither made or promised. Sir, we have had enough of this, enough of these documents almost to make a shroud for our national sovereignty. If we are to get nothing better, let these be converted into cartridges, to assert our rights and avenge the injuries we have suffered. And I confess, sir, that the prospect before us seems to promise no alternative, but degrading submission or manly resistance. We have made an attempt to resist by a restrictive system, which failed in its object, for want of union and energy. We have seen that measure opposed by legislative resolves, tending to invite insurrection and legalize rebellion; by processions and the tolling of bells, for the loss of liberty, under the pretence of supporting the Constitution. But rebellion and treason are always undertaken with patriotic pretences.

"Did not great Julius bleed for justice' sake!

What villain touched his body that did stab,
And not for justice?"

While upon this subject, let me refer gentlemen to the doctrines they preached ten years ago. I will turn to the Journals of the first session of the sixth Congress, and read an extract from an answer presented by this House to the President's speech. It is as follows: "That any portion of the people of America should permit themselves, amidst such numerous blessings, to be seduced by the arts and misrepresentations of designing men into an open resistance of a law of the United States, cannot be heard without deep and serious regret; under a Constitution where the public burdens can only be imposed by the people themselves, for their own benefit, and to promote their own objects, a hope might well have been indulged, that the general interest would have been too well understood, and the general welfare too highly prized, to have produced in any of our citizens a disposition to hazard so much felicity by the criminal effort of a part to oppose with lawless violence the will of the whole." This, sir, is sound doctrine; it should have been enforced in 1808, upon those who advocated it in 1799?

Our divisions among ourselves, and our opposition to our own laws, are magnified to our rivals and our enemies. It was triumphantly said in England, that America was in a state of insurrection, resisting the operation of their own laws. There was too much truth in the assertion. You suffered the harmless rattle-box of opposition to assume the power of thunder, to cause your Government to tremble, and to break up your great system of national measures. The storm is passed. It should have been braved. You ought to have made the experiment, and to have demonstrated to the world that your Government has energy sufficient to make its laws respected. Nineteen-twentieths of the people would have supported you. But such was the apparent condition of the ship of State, swinging from her moorings, that neighboring vessels hauled off to gaze at her distress.

Hence the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement. His instructions were calculated for the meridian of the embargo. But, before the intelligence of his arrangement reached his Government, they were informed that we had receded from the patriotic stand, which had induced them to approach us with offers for negotiation. These considerations admonish us of the necessity of union and energy among ourselves; and I had hoped they would have produced an unanimous vote upon the resolution before us. But gentlemen have apprized us of their opposition. And, sir, I will beg the indulgence of the Committee, while I briefly examine some of the arguments gentlemen have offered to justify the vote they intend to give against this resolution.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PORTER) has told us that he was not friendly to approbatory resolutions, and has referred the Committee to the disposition this House made of a resolution approving the President's conduct last Spring. That resolution was very different from this. That contemplated the expression of the approbation of this House, at the President's discharging with frankness and promptitude, a duty pointed out to him, by an express law. To votes of that sort, I shall always be opposed. But the resolution now before us is designed to express the opinion of Congress upon the conduct of a foreign Minister in this country both as it relates to the Government and the people whom we represent. If we believe that he has insulted the nation, shall we pass his conduct over in silence, especially when the history of it is communicated to this House by the Executive with his Message? No, sir; I think the welfare of the nation requires, that Congress should express an opinion upon this subject. But, sir, I did not expect to hear objections to this mode of proceeding come from that side of the House. This course was not opposed by the gentlemen in the opposition, when they were in the majority. I beg leave to call their attention to the Journals of the second session of the 5th Congress, and to an extract from an address of the House to the President, in these words: "Our abhorrence cannot be too strongly expressed of the intrigues of foreign agents to alienate the affections of the Indians, and to rouse them to acts of hostility against the United States. No means in our power should be omitted of providing for the suppression of such cruel practices, and for the adequate punishment of their atrocious authors." This authority answers that part of the gentleman's objection. He tells us that addresses have ruined one President. Sir, I differ from the gentleman upon this point; one President was, it is true, abandoned by his party, but it was because he preferred negotiation to war, then the favorite measure of his political friends, of the gentlemen who then declared, that to treat was disgraceful to this nation, but who now seem to prefer submission to war. Then they were willing to meet the calamities of war, now they tell us a war would ruin the country. But the gentleman has told us, that the opposition in this country is only a question between "the outs and ins." Sir, "there needs no ghost come from the grave to tell us that," especially after what fell from a gentleman on that side of the House in debate last Spring. But, however this may be the object with some zealous partisans, it is not the question with the people, their wish is to have the Government well administered. And, sir, let us for a moment change the scene. Suppose the outs had been in for several years past, what would have been their administration? If the gentleman's declaration be correct, and I am not disposed to question the truth of it, they must have pursued the same measures, which have been adopted; for their only objection is, that they were not the authors of those measures.

And I understand the arguments of the gentlemen in the opposition now go to approbate the course the Government has pursued for some years past. They would not go to war, at least since 1801. It is a calamity, of which they cannot think, but with horror. They would not submit, they declare, and as they would not have been able, by treating, to have made the belligerents respect the laws of nations and the rights of neutrals, they would have adopted as the only remaining policy, that which the Administration has pursued. That opposition should be made to the administration of our Government ought not to surprise us more than it should to hear of a ship encountering adverse winds in navigating the ocean; but there are certainly times and measures which ought to command union and energy. And we are told by the gentlemen that war will unite us. But, sir, are we to wait to see the enemy landing upon our shores, unfurling their banners, hear them beat to arms, and proclaim to the disaffected invitations to join in the attack, before we will unite in rallying round the standard of our own Government? I had hoped, and I will still hope, that we are not yet so lost to a sense of what concerns the honor and safety of our common country.

But, sir, we are told by a gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) who opposes this resolution, that although he might vote for a resolution to approbate the conduct of the Executive, he would be cautious of censuring, because it might be productive of injury to the country. Will not opposition to this resolution in effect censure the Executive, and approve the conduct of the British Minister? I am unable to view it in any other light. That gentleman is also opposed to the resolution, because it affects the reputation of the British Minister? Sir, while gentlemen are so tender of his reputation, will they forget the character of the Executive of their own Government? Mr. Jackson ought to have remembered that he came not only with a character, but to a character, and to a character not to be trifled with and disgraced by him or his nation.

But this resolution amounts to a declaration, that we intend to sustain our Government against the British, says that gentleman. Is it for this he opposes it? If this were the sole object of the resolution, no considerations of expediency should induce me to oppose it. I trust there is no hesitation among the American people upon this point. They are ready to sustain their Government against the British. They have done it once with success. And if it shall become necessary, they would exhaust the last cent of their treasure, and the last drop of their blood, before they would submit to British insolence and outrage. And although the gentleman reminds us of the exhausted state of the Treasury, that is neither sufficient cause for submission or of alarm. The genius of our Government does not confine our resources to the Treasury Department, they are to be found with the people, and will be ready when required.

But, sir, the principal argument of the gentleman from Connecticut, upon which he grounds his opposition to this resolution, if I understand him, is, that to have authorized the arrangement made by Mr. Erskine, a general letter of credence was not sufficient, a full power was requisite, that our Government ought to have required a copy or sight of this full power, and not having done so, they had mistaken their duty, which justified the disavowal of the arrangement. Sir, this argument goes very wide of the question before us, which is, whether the insinuations and charges against our Government are insolent; not on what ground that Government made the disavowal. But the argument of the gentleman places this upon a different basis from what Mr. Jackson or Mr. Canning have attempted to put it. In recurring to the letter of Mr. Jackson, addressed to the Secretary of State, 4th of November, page 71, Mr. Jackson says: "Never did I imagine, or anywhere attempt, to rest the right of disavowal upon that circumstance. Indubitably his agreement would nevertheless have been ratified, had not the instructions, which in this case took the place of a full power, been violated." Mr. Jackson here gives a conclusive answer, I think, to the gentleman's argument.

But that gentleman has told us, he opposes the resolution, because he considers it a war measure. If every act of Congress, which has been denominated a war measure, by gentlemen on that side of the House, was in fact such, we should have been at war long since. They attempted to give this character to the non-impotation act, the non-intercourse, and the purchase of Louisiana. It is a sort of standing name, with which they christen almost every measure they oppose. It has become so common, that it is neither novel or alarming. But if war shall result from the expression of our opinion upon this question, let us prepare to face the foe. Although I cannot so consider it, I confess I can see but little prospect of treating with Great Britain but with the sword. But shall this House be deterred from adopting these resolutions, because it may displease Great Britain? No, sir, I trust that we are not yet prepared to yield to the influence of this consideration. If British resentment is to be apprehended, the path of our duty is plainly marked before us. Provide arms and ammunition for the militia, complete your unfinished fortifications, erect such others as may be deemed necessary, equip and call into service that portion of your Navy now in ordinary, and thus give that direction to the energies of the nation which the times may require. And when we are told to count the cost of war, let us remember the price of our independence and the worth of liberty.

Sir, I will not detain the Committee by attempting to answer all the objections gentlemen have urged against these resolutions. I may, however, be permitted to say, in answer to an honorable colleague of mine, who for two days favored the Committee with his remarks, (Mr. EMORY,) that I think he has exactly misconceived the intentions of both Governments, and is twice mistaken: First, in believing that the British Government were willing to treat with us; and secondly, in supposing that our Government have not been anxious to settle by negotiation all the points in difference between the two nations. If gentlemen fall into this two-fold error, it may, in some degree, account for their not being able, as they declare, to perceive anything like insult in the letters of Mr. Jackson. When the Executive of my country solemnly affirms a fact, I will not permit myself to wander in the field of conjecture, in search of an apology for a foreign Minister, who has insolently contradicted it.

Another honorable colleague of mine, (Mr. GOLD,) condemning the modern mode of blockading by proclamation, only declaring his opposition to the Orders in Council, and assuring us that he would not have submitted to the conditions required by the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, expresses his surprise that the British should be charged with disavowing the arrangement, for the purpose of continuing their depredations upon our property. This, he says, would be downright swindling, of which that Government would not be guilty. Sir, when gentlemen undertake to exercise their charity for the conduct of the British towards us, let not the outrages they have committed be forgotten. The definition of the term swindling, informs us that her Orders in Council, and her blockading decrees, have given to swindling the sanction of a "system of great national policy." To retaliate on the enemy is a false pretence for their captures of neutral property.

Both of my colleagues have urged as a consideration against the passage of this resolution, that it is to lead to an immediate war, an event for which the State of New York is not prepared. I am not insensible of the situation of the State of New York. I know that in the event of war, that State has much to risk; but I also know, that her spirit is too independent and patriotic ever to truckle to the insolence of any foreign Power. But why will gentlemen contemplate war as the inevitable result from the passage of this resolution? Let them look at the correspondence, the resolution, the state of our country, the situation of England, and her hostile acts toward us, and then tell us if war be the result, who will have been the aggressor, and what the causes. No one will pretend that in the whole of the correspondence before us, there is to be found the appearance even of a disposition on the part of the British Government to treat with this country. Are we then to submit to all the injuries we have sustained without the hope of redress; nor dare to express the opinion we entertain upon the insolence and outrage we experience? If so, the American spirit has abandoned our country. But, sir, if the British Government shall not immediately recall the Minister, whose conduct has occasioned the discussion, I venture to say, there will be manifested throughout this nation a spirit of indignation and resentment, which it becomes us, as the representatives of the people, and the guardians of their rights, neither to stifle or impair by our debates and divisions in this House. And I regret, sir, to have witnessed so much debate and opposition upon this occasion; I had hoped the question would have been taken without delay or division. I was unwilling to add to the time, or debate, this question had occupied, and I certainly would not, if I could have seen, as I wished, a prospect of deciding it without further debate.

It is not a party, but a great national question, in which all are equally interested. The consequences of division may be disastrous to our country. Unless we can unite on subjects of great national concern, our liberties are destined to speedy ruin. Can we so frequently and feelingly lament the fate of other nations, whose divisions and distractions have proved their destruction, and not take warning ourselves?

As well might you go "stand upon the beach and bid the main flood to 'bate his usual height," as to entertain the hope of negotiating with the temper which has been manifested by the British Government towards this country for years past. Our cause is just, our means are independent; let our union be perfect, and we shall then give a proper direction to the energies of the nation, command respect, and not add another to the list of ruined republics.

WEDNESDAY, December 27.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a petition of Peter Landais, praying to be allowed and paid his share of prize money in three vessels captured by him, in the Revolutionary war, while commander of the United States' frigate Alliance.—Referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered that the petitioner have leave to lay copies of his said petition on the tables of the members.

Mr. BURWELL presented a petition of the delegates of the people of several settlements East of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, praying for a division of the said Territory.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the sixth instant, on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the district East of Pearl river, in the Territory aforesaid.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill authorizing the discharge of William Hawkins from his imprisonment; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion, by Mr. POINDEXTER,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of allowing an additional Judge to the Mississippi Territory, to reside in the county of Madison, and to have the same powers with those granted by law to the Judge of Washington county, in said Territory.

Ordered, That Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SEAVER, Mr. BURWELL, Mr. HEISTER, and Mr. SMELT, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. MORROW presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, praying that the provisions of the "Act to extend the time of payment for the Public Lands of the United States," and that certain rights of pre-emption may be extended to them.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BURWELL presented a memorial of William Lambert, of the State of Virginia, accompanied with a number of astronomical calculations, relating to the establishment of a first meridian of the United States, at the permanent seat of the General Government, and praying that such proceedings may be had therein as to Congress shall appear wise and expedient.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

A motion was made by Mr. NICHOLSON, that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making permanent provision by law for constructing public canals and roads, and for the general establishment of seminaries for education, throughout the United States; and that they have leave to report thereon to this House.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the best means of providing, by law, permanent funds for the accomplishment of these objects, and that they, in like manner, have leave to report thereon to this House.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the surveying and making certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to hold further communication with Francis J. Jackson.

Mr. MILNOR said, he would have been well satisfied if this question had not been brought before the House; not because he was disposed in any way to question the right of the Executive to dismiss a foreign Minister for insolence or misbehaviour; not because he believed that resolutions approbatory of the conduct of the President were improper; but because he had unhappily seen that this resolution had been productive of a division of sentiment, and would not pass through the House by an unanimous vote.

On questions of general policy, said Mr. M., where particular projects are brought forward for the consideration of the House, it is the right and duty of every member to investigate for himself, to judge of the propriety or impropriety of the measure proposed, and to give his vote accordingly. Every member is at full liberty to decide for himself. Nor am I about to question the right of members to decide for themselves on this question. But I consider the present materially different in its nature from questions of general policy; and however gentlemen may feel, although they may have some doubts as to the policy of the conduct of the Government, yet whenever a dispute arises between the Administration and a foreign Government, unless the conduct of our Executive be so clearly adverse to the interests of our country that it cannot be sanctioned, the dignity of our country and the dictates of sound policy require that it should receive our undivided support. True, sir, I heard a gentleman (Mr. GARDENIER) say the other day, that he was waiting to receive evidence upon this question; that he had not made up his mind and did not mean to do so till he heard both sides of the question. Probably the gentleman may be correct in his notions; but I cannot boast, upon a question of this nature, that I am so cool, so dispassionate, so completely clear of all prejudice, as to feel myself a perfect blank, as it were, open to any impressions to be made on it by the evidence which may appear. In all questions on which the Administration and constituted authorities of the nation are in opposition to foreign insolence, I acknowledge that my impressions are in favor of my Government; and it will require very strong evidence indeed to induce me to give a vote against them. In the case before me, I am free to say that, after giving it the fullest consideration of which I am capable, my judgment coincides with my feelings in saying that the Executive Government has acted correctly. Other gentlemen, whose patriotism I cannot permit myself to doubt, have declared that, on examining the correspondence, they have not been able to discover the insult offered to the Government.

I confess, sir, as I have never felt any difficulty in ascertaining in what part of the correspondence the insult lay, and as the procedure appears perfectly clear to me, I have felt somewhat astonished that other gentlemen have viewed it in a different light. But this is only another proof that on subjects of importance there will always be difference of opinion between those honestly desirous of deciding correctly. Although the documents on this subject have been repeatedly referred to, and quotations copiously made, I shall find it necessary again to call the attention of the Committee to them, but shall make the quotations as short as possible, not desiring to tire the patience of the Committee.

Mr. Jackson, in his first letter, says: "You have not, in the conferences we have hitherto held, distinctly announced any such complaint (of the disavowal;) and I have seen with pleasure, in this forbearance on your part, an instance of that candor, which I doubt not will prevail in all our communications, inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences which have actually followed." One of the gentlemen from New York who have spoken (Mr. GOLD) stopped here, after reading this passage, to inquire what were the circumstances to which the British Envoy here alluded, which he said were detailed in the succeeding paragraph, which is as follows:

Mr. Erskine had, according to the liberty allowed him, communicated to you in extenso his original instructions. It now appears that he did not. But, in reverting to his official correspondence, and particularly to the despatch addressed on the 20th of April, to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I find that he there states, that he had submitted to your consideration the three conditions specified in those instructions, as the groundwork of an arrangement which, according to information received from this country, it was thought in England might be made, with a prospect of great mutual advantage. Mr. Erskine then reports verbatim et seriatim your observations upon each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you, that these letters were an equivalent for the original conditions, but the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions were, in fact, very explicitly communicated to you, and by you of course laid before the President for his consideration. I need hardly add, that the difference between these conditions and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th April, is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation; nor need I draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that, under such circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister."

The gentleman from New York took considerable pains to show us that the meaning of the words "such circumstances" was applicable to the expressions contained in this paragraph. I agree with the gentleman that such is the case; but I know not how, by some kind of argument which I was unable exactly to comprehend, the gentleman slipped round what I deem the offensive part of the paragraph, and concluded that Mr. Jackson had only meant to state that the conditions contained in the instructions were proposed to Mr. Smith: After having said that it could not be thought unreasonable to disavow an arrangement concluded under such circumstances, Mr. Jackson says: "It may have been concluded between you that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions; but the very act of substitution evidently shows those original conditions were in fact very explicitly communicated to you, and by you of course laid before the President for his consideration." What does he mean by the very act of substitution? Is not this one of the "circumstances" to which he alludes? "Nor need I draw the conclusion," he adds "which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that under such circumstances His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister." To me there can be nothing more plain and explicit than the insinuation contained in this paragraph, that the Administration of this Government were fully acquainted with the powers of Mr. Erskine. His language, in common terms, is this: It may have been concluded between you two to substitute the arrangement made for that authorized by the instructions; and inasmuch as you made a bargain which you knew our agent was not authorized to make, and in which you overreached us, it must be unreasonable in you to complain of the disavowal of it. This is the plain meaning of his language—and yet gentlemen are unable to see the insult!

In his next letter Mr. Jackson repeats the insinuation—he says: “I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing you, that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman’s instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were at the time, in substance, made known to you; no stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement.” Here, sir, Mr. Jackson, fearful lest the Secretary of State should not have noticed his insinuation in the letter of the 11th, is determined immediately to call his attention to it, to repeat the insinuation in such a way that Mr. Smith should not again misunderstand him. “These instructions I now understand, by your letter, as well as by the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were at the time in substance made known to you. No stronger illustration, therefore,” says he, “can be given of the deviation from them (Mr. Erskine’s instructions) which occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement.” That is to say, addressing Mr. Smith: “You have knowingly induced Mr. Erskine to deviate from his instructions, of which you were fully apprized. This obvious deduction I took the liberty of making in mine of the eleventh instant, and now repeat; and it is not necessary to give you any other reason for the disavowal of the arrangement than the strong illustration of comparing it with the instructions in relation to it.” It is impossible to apply to this extract any other meaning than this. He says in effect to Mr. Smith “you knew very well the event of Mr. Erskine’s instructions, and therefore I need only refer you to the deviation from them as a reason for the disavowal.”

Mr. Jackson having repeated the insult in such terms, Mr. Smith found it necessary to notice it; and he called Mr. Jackson’s attention to it in his letter of November 1, as follows:

“I abstain, sir, from making any particular animadversions on several irrelevant and improper allusions in your letter, not at all comporting with the professed disposition to adjust in an amicable manner the differences unhappily subsisting between the two countries. But it would be improper to conclude the few observations to which I purposely limit myself, without advertising to your repetition of a language implying a knowledge on the part of this Government that the instructions of your predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him. After the explicit and peremptory asseveration that this Government had no such knowledge, and that with such a knowledge, no such arrangement would have been entered into, the view which you have again presented of the subject, makes it my duty to apprise you, that such insinuations are inadmissible in the intercourse of a foreign Minister with a Government that understands what it owes to itself.”

Now, sir, we will suppose, for argument’s sake, that Mr. Jackson had really not intended to offer an insult to the Administration in his letters of the 11th or 23d of October. If such were the fact, what ought to have been the conduct of Mr. Jackson on receiving this intimation? He is told “we have understood your language to convey an insinuation that the arrangement was entered into with a knowledge on our part that Mr. Erskine’s powers were incompetent, which we conceive grossly insulting to us as the Administration of the country.” Should not Mr. Jackson, if he not did really mean the insinuation with which the Administration charged him; was it not his incumbent duty, to have gone into an explanation—to have said to the Secretary of State “you have misunderstood my meaning: I did not mean any such charge, but to state a plain and simple fact, that Mr. Erskine’s instructions did not authorize the arrangement entered into by him.” If, sir, Mr. Jackson had come forward in a manly and open manner, as he ought to have done, with an avowal of this kind, there would have been no collisions with the Administration on this subject. It was evidently the wish of the Administration that Mr. Jackson should exculpate himself, and the express insinuation is pointed out at which offence was taken, that he might have an opportunity to explain it away. What was his conduct? Did he attempt an explanation? Did he attempt any kind of apology? On the contrary, he repeated it in a manner, in my opinion, still more violent than in the first instance. In his letter of the 4th of November, he says: “You will find that in my correspondence with you, I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was not able to substantiate a fact. To facts such as I have become acquainted with them I have scrupulously adhered, and in so doing I must continue, whenever the good faith of His Majesty’s Government is called in question, to vindicate its honor and dignity in the manner that appears to me best calculated for the purpose.”

Alluding to a caution Mr. Smith had given him, understanding clearly, as he must have done, that our Government conceived themselves to be insulted by insinuations, having it fully and fairly laid open to his view, instead of disavowing it, he says: “least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was not able to substantiate a fact.” Sir, Mr. Jackson not only repeated the insult, but avowed his determination to persevere in it, declaring that he must continue in so doing. What could our Government do under such circumstances, but declare that they would hold no further communication with him? Was there a possibility that our Administration, without degrading themselves in the eyes of their constituents, and in the opinion of the world, could continue a correspondence with a man who acted in this way? If they had, sir, I from my heart should have despised them for it.

But, sir, the resolution has been objected to on the ground that it is about to precipitate us into a war, that there is something warlike in its aspect. If there be, I confess I am at a loss to comprehend it. A dispute has arisen between a foreign Minister and the Administration of this Government. The latter, from a respect for itself and for the dignity of the nation, thought it necessary to dismiss the Minister. The nation from whom the Minister came may possibly consider this as a justification of war; but the light in which they may view it will depend essentially upon the course of policy which they mean to pursue. If they are disposed to go to war with us, they would not want pretexts, if this had never occurred. If, on the contrary, they conceive that their true policy consists in peace and amity with us, they will condemn the conduct of the Minister, call him home, and return in his place a man more likely to conciliate our friendship.

If a war, however, is to grow out of this proceeding, it will be founded on an act of the Administration, and not upon any act about to be done by us. The act has already taken place, for which, if for any, war will be made; the Minister has already been dismissed. The offence, if it is one, has already been committed; and I cannot see in what possible way the passage of this resolution can operate to produce a war, if the act of dismissing the Minister be not deemed cause of war. Instead of inducing war, it appears to me that the passage of this resolution, particularly if carried by an unanimous vote, would have tended to preserve this nation in peace. It never could be a cause of war to Great Britain to see the constituted and delegated authorities of the country in union with each other. If war is to grow out of it, it will arise from another source, from our own divisions; from seeing that a considerable portion of the people are opposed to the Administration, and ready to condemn them, almost without trial, in a question of difference between themselves and a foreign Minister.

The resolution has been objected to by most gentlemen who have spoken against it, and particularly by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) on the ground that there was still a probability of accommodation of our differences, and that this resolution is calculated to widen the breach between the two countries. Was there a probability of an accommodation taking place between Mr. Jackson and the Administration? Can any inference drawn from one circumstance induce a belief for an instant that there was a probability that an arrangement of mutual accommodation would have taken place between the two countries? An arrangement had been made between our Government and the then British Minister, Mr. Erskine, on such terms as would have been mutually advantageous. The British thought proper to disavow the arrangement and substitute another Minister. This, surely, did not indicate a desire to accommodate. In making this selection of a Minister, whatever was their view, they were very unhappy in their choice. They chose a man once objected to, if I am rightly informed, by our Minister in London (Mr. King,) as unacceptable to the American people. They chose a man conspicuous in a transaction which was one of the basest in the annals of the world; a man sent to Denmark to negotiate with a fleet and army at his heels, and who immediately, on failure of compliance with his demands, set his fleet and army upon the nation which had preserved a uniform neutrality, resisted an alliance with either belligerent, and given the British Government no plea for the attack. I do not charge this upon Mr. Jackson as his fault, or say that he is accountable to the world for the transactions which followed the negotiation at Copenhagen; but, as the Minister who was the precursor of that horrid transaction, prejudices had arisen against him which incapacitated him from negotiating to advantage with a neutral nation. It is said, too, how correctly I will not pretend to say, that there were a large number of Ministers unemployed at the Court of Great Britain, and yet that the British Ministry had thought proper to select Mr. Jackson and send him here—for what reason I do not know. I mention the circumstance to show that they were unhappy in their choice, if they were amicably disposed to this country.

The circumstances attending the nomination of Mr. Jackson strongly induce me to believe that the British Government did not calculate on his making an amicable arrangement. They disavowed an arrangement already concluded, recalled the Minister who had made it, and sent Mr. Jackson here, without instructions to make any new propositions. After trying our patience by disavowing the arrangement already carried into effect on our part, and refusing to fulfil any part of it, was it to be expected that they would negotiate with us on fair and honorable terms? I think not. But, nevertheless, when Mr. Jackson came into this country, the American nation (pleased with the declaration of Mr. Canning, that although the arrangement was disavowed, a Minister would be sent out to negotiate, and that he had no doubt the differences between the two countries would be soon settled) endeavored to flatter themselves into a belief that something amicable might grow out of his mission. They were soon undeceived.

In the very first letter of Mr. Jackson to Mr. Smith, after the latter had informed him that it was deemed proper to pursue the written form in their correspondence, he writes thus:

"I have had the honor of receiving your official letter of the ninth instant, towards the close of which you inform me that it had been thought expedient to put an end to all verbal communication between yourself and me, in discussing the important objects of my mission. Considering that a very few days have elapsed since I delivered to the President a confidential letter from the King, my master, and that nothing has been even alleged to have occurred, to deprive me of the facility of access, and of the credit to which, according to immemorial usage, I am by that letter entitled, I believe there does not exist in the annals of diplomacy a precedent for such a determination between two Ministers, who have met for the avowed purpose of terminating amicably the existing differences between their respective countries: but, after mature reflection, I am induced to acquiesce in it by recollection of the time that must necessarily elapse before I can receive His Majesty's commands upon so unexpected an occurrence, and of the detriment that would ensue to the public service, if my ministerial functions were, in the interval, to be altogether suspended. I shall, therefore, content myself with entering my protest against a proceeding which I can consider in no other light than as a violation, in my person, of the most essential rights of a public Minister, when adopted, as in the present case, without any alleged misconduct on his part. As a matter of opinion, I cannot, I own, assent to the preference which you give to written over verbal intercourse, for the purpose of mutual explanation and accommodation. I have thought it due to the public character with which I have the honor to be invested, and to the confidence which His Majesty has most graciously been pleased to repose in me, to state to you unreservedly my sentiments on this point. I shall now proceed to the other parts of your letter, and apply to them the best consideration that can arise from a zeal proportioned to the increase of difficulty thus thrown in the way of the restoration of a thorough good understanding between our respective countries."

If Mr. Jackson was really the Minister of peace, and was sent in the spirit of conciliation, was this the kind of language to be addressed to the Government with which he was treating? Was the assertion that the deprivation of oral correspondence had no precedent in the annals of diplomacy, and the protest against the violation of his rights, the language of amity? Was there anything improper in confining their communications to the written form? Was it not a mode of procedure common in every nation? Did not Mr. Canning oblige Mr. Pinkney to confine his communications to the written form—and did our Minister protest against it as a breach of his privilege? No, sir; he knew it was a right which the Government possessed, and he complied with its injunctions. I take this letter to be altogether an insolent one. I conceive that in the very first paragraph the British Minister absolutely insulted the Government; although it was not on that part of his letter that the Government thought proper to notice him. The whole correspondence is in my opinion one tissue of insolence on his part.

Gentlemen have attempted to show that, although Mr. Jackson's language was not as polite as it ought to be, yet the language of Mr. Smith was equally indecorous. They cannot point to the parts of Mr. Smith's letter which are indecorous. They have indeed pointed to Mr. Smith's contradiction of Mr. Jackson on the point of Mr. E. having more than one set of instructions. If it had been on the part of Mr. Smith merely a matter of opinion that Mr. Erskine had other instructions than those published, and Mr. Jackson had contradicted him, Mr. Smith would have been wrong in asserting or insinuating that Mr. Erskine had other instructions. But Mr. Erskine, in his letter to Mr. Smith, explicitly declares that he had other instructions. He alludes to his "several letters of instruction." Mr. Smith had therefore undoubted evidence that there were other instructions, and he was justified in saying so. It was not an impeachment of the veracity of Mr. Jackson, because Mr. Jackson speaks of information derived from Mr. Canning. His evidence on the subject, therefore, was circuitous. Mr. Smith's was direct from Mr. Erskine, who declares that he had other instructions: and I question whether the gentleman who made the remark on Mr. Smith's language can have in reality any doubts but that Mr. Erskine was correct on this point.

Sir, in my view, in the whole of the correspondence, Mr. Smith has acted in a correct, manly, and dignified manner. He has sustained the credit of the Administration, and of his country, in the correspondence, in a manner which, in my opinion, has done him great honor.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) entered into a long and learned dissertation on a subject which had no connexion with the question before the House; but I listened to him with pleasure, because he displayed great talent, ingenuity, and research, in the history he gave us of the grounds of treaties and of the manner in which they are concluded. The information which he gave us amounts to this; that, in the conclusion of a treaty, a Minister must be possessed of a full power, or of instructions to take the place of a full power. I could not exactly ascertain what was the precise object of the gentleman in the course in which he took. It appeared to me, however, that the only object he had in view was to show that in the arrangement made, the Administration had, by a neglect of duty, laid themselves open to a charge of misconduct on their part, and had thus given to the British Government a fair opportunity to disavow the arrangement, without a right on our part to complain. If that were his object, I confess that I do not conceive his arguments to have been conclusive. I acknowledge that in order to form a treaty, the Ministers concluding it must have either a full power or special instructions to conclude particular points; and if they have those powers, or they violate their instructions, that the treaty is not binding on the nation whose agents they are. Having made this concession, I will offer a few observations to show what I believe to have been the nature of the arrangement made. To my mind there is nothing of the treaty-kind in it. Was there any mutual stipulation, any contract mutually signed by both parties? Nothing of that kind. Mr. Erskine comes forward and says to Mr. Smith:

"WASHINGTON, April 19, 1809.

"SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that I have received His Majesty's commands, to represent to the Government of the United States, that His Majesty is animated by the most sincere desire for an adjustment of the differences, which have unhappily so long prevailed between the two countries, the recapitulation of which might have a tendency to impede, if not prevent an amicable understanding. It having been represented to His Majesty's Government, that the Congress of the United States, in their proceedings at the opening of the last session, had evinced an intention of passing certain laws, which would place the relations of Great Britain with the United States upon an equal footing, in all respects, with the other belligerent Powers, I have accordingly received His Majesty's commands, in the event of such laws taking place, to offer, on the part of His Majesty, an honorable reparation for the aggression committed by a British naval officer, in the attack on the United States' frigate Chesapeake," &c.

I believe that the papers we have before us on the subject only show us that an offer was made by Mr. Erskine in relation to the Chesapeake, in the name of his Government, and accepted by ours. There was no mutual stipulation by which the parties were bound to do a certain thing. The offer was spontaneously made by the British Government and spontaneously accepted on our part. On their part it is true a stipulation was to be executed, but none on ours, except a mere acknowledgment of satisfaction.

As respected the Orders in Council, also, Mr. Erskine stated that His Majesty having seen a disposition in this country to place the two belligerents in a state of equality in our commercial relations with them, had instructed him, in the event of such laws passing as would effect that object, to say that the Orders in Council would be withdrawn as respects the United States on a certain day. What part had the Administration in this transaction? The proclamation issued by the President was a mere Executive act. The non-intercourse law passed at the session preceding, authorized the President, in the event of the revocation of the Orders in Council, or the modification thereof, so that they should not affect the lawful commerce of the United States, not to withdraw the embargo and non-intercourse acts, for that had been conditionally provided for by the Legislature; but, to declare the existence of the event on which the revocation of the law as to Great Britain and her dependencies was to take place. It was no stipulation made by our Administration; for they had no power to make such a stipulation. True, sir, Mr. Canning tells Mr. Erskine, in his instruction, to obtain a stipulation that we were to continue the non-intercourse law as to France; but Mr. Canning was sufficiently acquainted with the organization of this Government to know that the Administration could do no such thing, the regulation of it depending wholly upon Congress. It, therefore, is not only a fact that the President had no power to enter into a stipulation, but that the British Ministry must have known it. It then appears that on the part of Administration there was no stipulation or agreement, but an acceptance of the proposition made by the British Government. The latter thought proper to make propositions on the existing circumstances, which were accepted. No convention or preliminary agreement was signed by the parties. This having been the situation of the case, I can see nothing of the treaty-kind, nor anything which required the British Minister to produce his full power or his particular instructions on the subject, or which made it necessary for the President to require them.

We will suppose, sir, for the sake of argument, the Administration had, when Mr. Erskine came forward with his propositions, expressed a doubt of his honor or veracity, and required of him to produce his instructions or authority, previous to their acceptance on our part—what, in such case, would and ought to have been Mr. Erskine's conduct? If he had done what a respect for himself and the dignity of his country required, he would have ceased correspondence with our Government, he would have said that the American Government was unwilling to come to an accommodation, because, when he had offered terms, they had questioned his authority and doubted his being the confidential agent of the British nation. And what would have been the consequence of such a proceeding on the minds of the people? Gentlemen who now come forward in opposition to this resolution would have said that the American Administration was not amicably disposed to Great Britain; that when an opportunity had offered for accommodation, the American Government, instead of accepting the offer, had treated with insolence and outrage the British Minister; and it would have been another circumstance to add to the many already exhibited to prove that the Administration were in favor of war with Great Britain. I challenge any gentlemen in opposition to say whether such would not have been the course pursued. There cannot be a doubt of it.

If then there was, in the arrangement which was concluded between our Administration and the British Minister, nothing like the mutual stipulation of a treaty, I would ask how the arguments of the gentleman from Connecticut apply? Or how he could make out his argument that the Administration had indeed made a mistake? The gentleman frequently repeated that if indeed the Administration had concluded the agreement without seeing Mr. Erskine's instructions, they had committed a mistake, avoiding, as he said, giving it a harsher name, thereby implying that he conceived it merited a harsher designation. From what I have said I must conclude that the Administration were not in this case bound to scrutinize the instructions of Mr. Erskine.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) told us that previous to the perusal of the documents last communicated by the President he had indeed doubted whether Mr. Canning had in reality received such communications from Mr. Erskine as to induce him to believe that the three propositions would be accepted by the Government; but that upon the perusal of the documents his mind had become completely convinced that, whatever might have been the nature of the communications between the Minister and the gen-gentlemen to whom he alludes, there was no doubt Mr. Erskine had given Mr. Canning to understand that he had received from those gentlemen communications the same in substance as those mentioned in the despatch of the 23d of January. Sir, if the evidence the gentleman could derive from those documents was confined to the single expression that such and such parts of Mr. Erskine's correspondence were read to him, (Mr. Pinkney,) he might rationally draw some inference of that kind. But I would ask whether a loose expression, merely stating that Mr. Canning had read to him letters containing such things, is to be taken as positive evidence in contradiction to the express declaration of Mr. Erskine, in repeated instances. Mr. Pinkney says, "These instructions (of 23d January) together with the passages in Mr. Erskine's letter, written, I believe, in December last, which contained the above-mentioned representation and some other details, which I ought not to repeat, Mr. Canning read to me." This is the distinct sentence which has communicated to the gentleman from New York the positive fact of Mr. Erskine's having made such communications to his Government. But, sir, in the last correspondence between Mr. Erskine and the Secretary of State, the former expressly states what he understood Mr. Smith and the other gentlemen to have said, and what he communicated; and in this I do not find anything authorizing the inference that the American Government would accede to those three propositions. After stating to Mr. Smith what he deemed to be the substance of the conversations, which had taken place between himself, Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin, and Mr. Smith, he says: "Such was the substance, sir, of the unofficial conversations which I had held with Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin, and yourself, which I did not consider or represent to His Majesty's Government as intended with any other view than to endeavor to bring about the repeal of the Orders in Council, by showing that many of the obstacles which had stood in the way of an amicable adjustment of the differences between the two countries were already removed, and that a fair prospect existed of settling what remained; since the United States exhibited a determination to resist the unjust aggressions upon her neutral rights, which was all that Great Britain had ever required; but I certainly never received any assurances from the American Government that they would pledge themselves to adopt the conditions specified in Mr. Canning's instructions as preliminaries; nor did I ever hold out such an expectation to His Majesty's Government." Now, sir, if the gentleman from New York, after reading this slight expression of Mr. Pinkney, stating that certain extracts of a letter from Mr. Erskine were read to him, and also reading this paragraph, in which the latter gentleman expressly asserts that he never did authorize the expectation apparently entertained by Mr. Canning, can yet think that he did really authorize such an expectation, his opinion must be very different from mine. On the one hand I see an equivocal expression conveying no positive idea on the subject; on the other hand I see a positive declaration of Mr. Erskine, in most explicit terms, that he never made any such communication as that suggested.

Some of the gentlemen in question, one particularly (Mr. GOLD) have alluded to the Orders in Council in the language of Mr. Jackson, and styled them a great object of national policy. Are they indeed a great object of national policy? I cannot view them in that light. If they be so considered, let us inquire what is the object to be effected by them? The British Government has repeatedly said that the object is to retaliate on the enemy, to strike at the enemy through neutrals, because he cannot be got at in any other way. The British Government has endeavored to convince this country that such was the sole object of them, and that so long as the French decrees are in force, so long will the Orders in Council be adhered to. What is really the practice under the Orders in Council? They are said to be solely intended to injure the enemy, by depriving her of those supplies which she had been accustomed to receive from neutral commerce. And yet, sir, at the very moment that Great Britain is making these assertions and inducing us to believe that her hostility is wholly employed against her enemy, at the very moment that she refuses to permit any neutral flag to enter the ports of her enemy, under the pretext that it might cover articles necessary to her subsistence—at that very moment she permits her own vessels to go there, and supply that enemy with those articles which would otherwise be supplied by neutrals. She is herself supplying her enemy with the very articles with which she refuses to permit neutrals to supply her, under the plea that her sole object is to deprive her enemy of those articles. I believe, sir, that if the Orders in Council are indeed a part of a great system of national policy, it is, to permit no other vessels than her own to enjoy any rights on the ocean; that she has seen with the eye of jealousy our increasing ability to rival her in commerce, and has invented the pretext of injuring her enemy to destroy us. This is what I understand by her "great system of national policy."

I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WHEATON,) that Mr. Jackson had shown a disposition to conciliate, and that it was extremely unfortunate that the Administration had thought proper to dismiss the Minister when there was an opening for producing an amicable arrangement. Where, sir, is the evidence of any such disposition on the part of Mr. Jackson, or of Great Britain? Is it to be found in the disavowal of the arrangement? I should suppose not. We have seen that it was not in the appointment of Mr. Jackson. Is it to be found in the correspondence of Mr. Jackson himself? Did he not declare explicitly that his principal business here was to say that he had no proposals whatever to make? Was it to be presumed, after such a disavowal as had taken place, that the United States were indeed to make a proposition to the British Minister? That they were to make the first advances to conciliation? I should really have supposed the first advances to conciliation ought to be made by the party committing the offence. I should suppose indeed that no complete restoration of amity could take place without a settlement of the affair of the Chesapeake as a preparatory step. This did not take place, nor was there any probability of it. True it is that Mr. Jackson did come forward and make propositions as to the reparation of the outrage; but were these propositions such as could be acceptable to the Government and country? To my mind, instead of wearing the aspect of conciliation, it was an additional insult offered to the Government. What were the propositions? That His Majesty would restore the seamen taken from the Chesapeake and provide for the families of the slain, provided that exceptions should be made from the restoration and remuneration of such of them as were natives of Great Britain or deserters from her service. It was well known that the men of whom the British were in search when they committed the outrage on the Chesapeake were deserters from the British navy; but it is as well known that they were American citizens. But, sir, was it to be expected, that the American Government, for the flimsy offer of a restoration of three or four men and the support of the families of as many more, were to recognise the principle that the British Government had a right to claim every man born in the country, or every man who had ever been impressed and had deserted from them, even if they were native Americans? If our Administration had been ready to do this they must have been lost to every sense of national character or dignity.

Another evidence, deduced from the correspondence of Mr. Jackson, that he was not the minister of peace, and that there was no probability of effecting a reconciliation through his agency, was the direct avowal that indeed the Orders in Council never would be withdrawn, unless substituted in some other manner. The Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, have been uniformly viewed in this country as one of the greatest outrages on our neutral and national rights. This House has almost unanimously resolved that it would never submit to the British Orders in Council; and yet this minister of peace, this man of conciliation, comes forward and tells us that the Orders in Council never will be withdrawn. Sir, at the time that Mr. Canning disavowed the arrangement it would seem that the celebrated three conditions contained the sine qua non of the British Government; that, without a previous acceptance of our agreement to them, there could be no probability of friendly relations being renewed between the two countries. This appears too at the time when he was expressing sentiments of friendship and an anxious desire to accommodate all differences between the two countries. Yet, notwithstanding the positive declaration of Mr. Canning that those three propositions must be acceded to on the part of the American Government, previous to any stipulations on his part, he acknowledges to Mr. Pinkney in conversation that he did not see that the surrender of trade with enemies' colonies (one of those indispensable conditions) had any connexion with the Orders in Council, and that it would be made more properly the subject of an article in a treaty.

"Upon the third condition (says Mr. Pinkney) 'I said a very few words. I restated what I had thrown out upon the matter of it in an informal conversation in January, and expressed my regret that it should have been misapprehended. Mr. Canning immediately said that he was himself of opinion that the idea upon which that condition turns could not well find its way into a stipulation; that he had nevertheless deemed it proper to propose the condition to the United States; that he should have been satisfied with the rejection of it; and that the consequence would have been that they should have intercepted the commerce to which it referred, if any such commerce should be attempted.'" Thus, sir, after disavowing an arrangement, because not including in it three conditions, Mr. Canning, in conversation with Mr. Pinkney, confesses that two of them were not properly connected with the subject, and would more properly have found their way into a treaty. This change of disposition, after declaring that the conditions were imperative, and disavowing a solemn agreement because it did not include them, is really extraordinary. What are we to understand by it? We know very well from past experience that Mr. Canning has displayed great facility in stating things in conversation and stating them wholly differently in writing, and in understanding conversations differently from what they were meant, and acting upon his own comprehension of them. It appears to me that the disavowing the arrangement, and immediately after, in conversation with Mr. Pinkney, acknowledging that the three conditions could not be acceded to on our part, is evidence that the cause of the disavowal was other than that advanced. It was a convenient ground to allege that the instructions were not complied with, but there was some secret, hidden ground, arising from an indisposition to come to an accommodation with us. In every point of view, seeking where I will, I have been unable to find that evidence which is to convince my mind that the British Ministry or Mr. Jackson were disposed to conciliate. Let gentlemen produce evidence if they have any, and let it be sifted and put to the test.

There is one view of this subject which I think ought to have great weight with gentlemen in inducing them to vote for the resolution. Let them consider the effect which a negative of it would have on our foreign relations and on our domestic concerns. Such a vote would degrade the Administration in the eyes of foreign nations and of our own citizens. It would say in effect to the former, you have either wilfully or ignorantly erred, you must retrace your steps, you must make a humble apology to the British Minister for the treatment you have given him, soliciting him to resume his station and his insolence. You must recall your letter of instruction to Mr.

DECEMBER, 1809.

H. OF R.

Pinkney, which directed him to solicit the recall of Mr. Jackson, and direct him to make a humble apology to the British Government for the insult offered to it in the person of its Minister, with a promise to behave better in future. Under such circumstances, sir, where would be our national dignity or national character? Where indeed would be our independence? They would all be fled with the vision of the morning. Could our Administration proceed one step further in negotiating upon the subject of our foreign relations? Certainly not, unless indeed they were ready to submit to every insult which foreign insolence might heap upon them, and to acquiesce in every proposition from foreign nations, however derogatory to our national honor and independence. I am well aware, sir, that many gentlemen upon whom these considerations would otherwise have great weight, satisfy themselves with the reflection that the resolution will be agreed to and these effects averted. But, sir, every gentleman ought to consider that his vote against the resolution is of course a negative of it for himself, and that he does, as far as in him lies, produce the result so much to be deprecated.

I have thus, sir, offered reasons to the Committee for the vote I shall give. I am sensible I have trespassed on their time: but I have thought it necessary that on a question of this magnitude the public at large as well as the committee should understand the real grounds on which members act, and therefore I have presented the ground on which I shall support my vote for the resolution.

The question on the Committee's rising and reporting their agreement to the resolution, was now taken and carried—54 to 35, fifty-two members being absent.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he did not rise now to attempt to go into an examination of the merits or demerits of the question; but to make a motion which, if carried, would put an end to the discussion. He said he made this motion under the idea that the question ought never to have been brought before the House; and that the passage of it would be an unconstitutional act, and might be destructive to civil liberty. The Constitution, (said he) which I think we shall all agree ought to continue as long as time exists, has pointed out the different powers of the different Departments of the Government; by it the powers of the Executive and of the Legislature are each defined. It never was intended that they should run into each other, or that the Legislature should exercise the Executive powers.

We are now called upon to express an opinion on an Executive act of the Government, upon an act of the President of the United States in relation to a foreign nation, the superintendence of our relations with whom are by the Constitution confined solely to himself. I conceive that if the President has done right, the approbation of his own conscience will be a sufficient reward. If he has done wrong, sir, nothing which we can say or do will alter the case. Whether he is competent to execute the duties of his office or not, is a question not for this House to consider. The people have chosen him, and to them is he amenable. It is true, sir, that the House might be called on in a Constitutional way to examine the transaction from beginning to end, and express their opinion on it; and therefore more particularly ought they not to meddle with it in the way proposed. It is possible that the President, for his conduct in this transaction, may be impeached before the Senate. Suppose that body should be called upon to try such a question—what have they done in this case? Why, they have committed themselves on the question.] The SPEAKER observed that it was not within the rules of order to refer to the acts of the Senate.] Mr. L. continued. I conceive, sir, that it is impossible to get along in this debate if we cannot refer to transactions in the Senate; because it is a transaction of the other House on which we are called upon to deliberate. I was going on to consider the great impropriety and unconstitutionality of this method of deliberation. We are called upon to express our approbation of the doings of the Executive, which very subject may be drawn in question before us. It is possible, and results from the very nature of the case, that we may be called upon to express our opinion on the propriety of impeaching him before the Senate. I was going on to consider this case as one which may be important to this country, which may stand on record as a precedent as long as records exist.

This question may be considered in different points of view. Let us suppose that this was a resolution of censure. Would not the Executive have a right to say, when a vote of censure is passed in this way, that you prejudice the case? With what propriety could you, after passing such a resolution, discuss a question of impeaching him before the Senate. This shows the glaring impropriety of the proceeding in the one case as well as in the other. Justice should be impartially administered. Can it be said that there is any impartiality about a man who prejudices the case on which he is to decide? I ask gentlemen to consider the question in this light, and I think it is infinitely the most important view which has been taken of it. It is wholly improper for the House to interfere in it, as was correctly observed by a gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON,) though in my apprehension there is no danger of the Government being destroyed by collisions between the two branches or either branch of the Legislature and the Executive. It is true that such a course might impede the public business; but the people hold the corrective, and would judge and place the matter right at last.

But it is a consideration worthy of notice—and I do not know how gentlemen will receive my observations, but—as a representative of the people, I must express my opinion, that whenever the Executive can by his popularity or the great patronage he holds become so powerful as with a secret hand to seize upon the minds of a majority of the Legislature, the Constitution is in jeopardy; for acts will be carried through both Houses for which there will be no responsibility. I fear not that any individual will lay hold of power and wrest our liberties by force. No, sir,—and in my opinion the little finger nail of Henry the VIII contained more despotism than the whole house of the Stuarts, from their origin to the extinction of the race. For the unfortunate Charles, who boldly attempted to seize upon the liberties of his subjects, met destruction in the attempt, while Henry employed his servile Parliament to effect the most cruel tyranny and oppression with certainty of success. I would guard against gradual approaches to despotism—and I ask whether this very case may not hereafter be produced as a precedent for such proceedings? If it should so happen that there be an Executive who wishes to carry through any arbitrary measure, he may get some confidential friend to move a vote of approbation, and get it passed possibly without discussion. Will not this be the plain operation of the precedent? I appeal to gentlemen's candor for an answer. Let them consider, taking all for granted which has been said of the injuries done us in this case, it is but dust in the balance to the injuries which may result to the Constitution from such a precedent as this. It is against the spirit of the Constitution, and therefore as unconstitutional as if it were against the letter of it. I know not, sir, how I may be apprehended; for what is said here as the result of mature consideration is often misapprehended as the result of party spirit. There is, I acknowledge from daily experience, too much of this displayed in the House. But, if I can judge for myself, and am capable of considering any question on its merits, I conceive that this is a most unconstitutional thing in its origin, and brought forward in an unconstitutional manner here.

Gentlemen, no doubt, will say, what was your opinion at the last session, when you were desirous of approbating the conduct of the President? That question did not come to a decision. It is true, I consider the subject in a different light now from what I did then, and the cases are essentially dissimilar. And if they were alike, should I, because once wrong, persist in error? That resolution was not a joint resolution, an act of the Government, but an expression of the opinion of this House, and was introduced not by any gentleman considered as in the confidence of the Administration, but from a different quarter.

This question must be considered on its own merits. Conceiving it not to be a Constitutional, proper, regular mode of proceeding, to shorten its discussion, if possible, by dismissing it from the House, I move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. RHEA called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. EPPES said, that as the motion to postpone indefinitely the resolution before the House involved the merits of the question, he would avail himself of the opportunity to present to the House and to the public his view of a transaction which so deeply affected the honor, the interest, and independence of the nation. If, said he, there is any question on which the two great parties of our country ought to unite on ground truly American, it is the one which we are now called upon to decide. In maintaining the respect due to the Executive branch of our own Government, in discountenancing rudeness or insolence on the part of a foreign agent, men of all political parties have a common interest. Whatever difference of opinion may exist either as to general or local policy, we surely cannot, on a question involving the support of a foreign agent against the Executive Government of our own country, arrange ourselves under the banners of party. Hitherto, in all questions between the Administration of this country and that of Great Britain, gentlemen have told us, you need not expect justice until you repeal laws considered in Great Britain as manifesting hostility on the part of the United States. The partial non-importation act was said to be a measure of hostility; this is done away. The proclamation, issued after the most flagrant violation of our territory and rights, was considered a hostile measure; this is done away. The embargo was considered as a hostile measure; this is done away also. Great Britain and France must be placed on an equal footing; this has also been done. The former Administration, against which gentlemen had been habituated to indulge feelings of distrust and suspicion, has gone out. The first act of the new Administration, but for the bad faith of the British Ministry, would have consigned to oblivion every measure which the opponents of the former Administration have heretofore considered a bar to the adjustment of our differences with Great Britain. Will gentlemen now tell us why Great Britain will not do us justice? Will they tell the people the grounds on which the disavowal of the late arrangement with Mr. Erskine is made, and justify the British Ministry? They dare not. Will they sacrifice on the altar of public good, party feelings, and present to foreign nations that united front which alone gives force to a free Government? The vigor of a free Government depends on union. To the patriotic and voluntary exertions of our citizens, we must look for that energy which a tyrant forces from reluctant slaves. What prospect of redress for our injuries can we have, if on an occasion like the present, marked by such strong features of injustice on the part of the British Government, and of atrocious insolence on the part of its Minister, the Representatives of the people shall present to the world the extraordinary spectacle of discord, division, and dissension? It seems, sir, that the fair castle of union and confidence, which men of all parties united in rearing at the last session, has vanished. It seems that the present Administration is not to be judged by its own acts; but is destined to receive as a sort of inheritance all those bitter and acrimonious feelings which years of party conflict had ripened into inveterate hostility against the former. Gentlemen have just discovered that the promptitude and frankness with which the Executive of the United States met the overtures of Mr. Erskine, is all an error. A gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA,) who at the last session of Congress told us that on this occasion the President of the United States had acted like a man of business;

that no diplomatic difficulties had been thrown in the way; that the tender was met fairly, openly and honorably, has employed himself during the recess, in reading Grotius, Puffendorf, Vattel, Wicquefort, Martens, and other writers on national law, and now tells us gravely this thing is all an error. In May last I thought with the gentleman from Connecticut. I see nothing in the correspondence laid before us which can justify a change of opinion. I cannot, like the Satyr in the fable, blow hot, blow cold, with the same breath. I cannot now call black, what I at that time thought white. I cannot consent to attach myself to the pendulum of Mr. Canning, whether its vibrations tend to promote the interest or ruin of my country. Sir, do gentlemen forget that the conduct of the Executive on this occasion was approved by men of all parties in this country? Do they forget that it was eulogized and approved by themselves? Do they expect to explain to the people this sudden vibration by references to Puffendorf and Grotius? Will they tell the people the real grounds on which the disavowal of the late arrangement with Mr. Erskine is made, and array themselves in opposition to the Administration for having entered into it? They dare not. Will they say to the people, that, as to the affair of the Chesapeake, the British Government will not us make reparation, because the repeal of the President's proclamation is not recorded in the instrument? The people will tell them the proclamation is repealed. Will the gentleman then tell the people, that although Captain Bradley violated your territory; that although Pierce was murdered within sight of the harbor of New York; although the attack on the Chesapeake took place before the proclamation issued, still it is made an affair of honor by the British Government? Is it not enough that it is repealed, you must acknowledge you were wrong in having issued it? Will gentlemen, in addition to this, tell the people, that before reparation for the Chesapeake is made, we must disfranchise our naturalized citizens, and acknowledge the right of His Britannic Majesty to claim them? Will they tell the people that before the Orders in Council are withdrawn we must give security for the continuance of our non-intercourse system against France? The people will reply, that, by the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, that has been already done. Will the gentlemen then say to the people, in the language of Mr. Canning: this law may be repealed; Great Britain must have two other conditions complied with; you must relinquish all right to trade with enemies' colonies: but this is not sufficient; your own Government is too imbecile to execute your laws against France; the British fleet must be allowed to aid you, so as to secure the good faith of the United States. Will any gentleman deny that these are the reasons assigned by the British Ministry for disavowing the late arrangement? Mr. Canning says, Mr. Erskine was authorized to make the arrangement on these conditions only, and these have not been obtained. I call upon gentlemen to deny the statement I have made.

They cannot. To our disgrace it is on record, and the record before us.

The course pursued by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) in discussing the resolution before the House, renders it necessary to bring into view the whole of the late arrangement and disavowal. The gentleman has told us—

1. That the whole correspondence is founded on an error on the part of our own Executive, viz: that Mr. Erskine could make stipulations binding on his Government in virtue of his general letter of credence.

2. That in all cases where stipulations are to be made by a Minister binding on his Government, there must be a full power, or, as the gentleman terms it, a patent power.

3. That it was the duty of the Executive of the United States to have demanded of Mr. Erskine, as a preliminary to negotiation, the production of the authority under which he acted, whether it was contained in a full power or instructions.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) who on this occasion has certainly displayed both learning and industry, seems to have viewed the arrangement entered into with Mr. Erskine as a formal treaty, and has applied to it principles not at all applicable to what it really was, viz: a preliminary arrangement to be succeeded by a treaty. All the authorities cited by the gentleman are applicable only to treaties embracing regulations of a permanent character. The gentleman has correctly cited various cases under the authority of the United States. 1. President Jefferson to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, letters of credence and full power—President Adams's Envoys to France, letters of credence and full power; and lastly, the case of Mr. Hammond, under General Washington's Administration, who had presented letters of credence, and was nevertheless called upon to produce a separate power.

In all these cases the Ministers were to form a treaty. The last case, between Mr. Hammond and Mr. Jefferson, embraced not only a treaty of commerce, but the adjustment of difficulties produced by a failure on both sides to execute certain articles of a treaty concluded under the old Confederation. It never has been doubted, but that a separate power independent of the letter of credence is necessary for the formation of a treaty embracing regulations of a permanent character. The full power, or patent power, on which the gentleman from Connecticut has said so much, was originally designed to bind Princes to ratify the acts of their agents. It was much in use in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and part of the eighteenth centuries, when Princes were prone to perjury, and being considered, according to Wicquefort, as a power of attorney, absolutely bound the Sovereign. Indeed, the same author relates instances where treaties were published before ratification, and says, that the ratification is not of the essence of a treaty. It is not however doubted but that, according to the present usage of nations, whether a treaty is concluded in virtue of a full power or not, Sovereigns claim the right, to use the language of Vattel—"not to lay any stress upon their treaties until they have signed upon and ratified them"—vide Vattel, b. 2, c. 12, sec. 156. By the same writer the distinction is laid down, between a treaty embracing permanent regulations and what are termed conventions on public affairs—vide book 2, chap. 12, sect. 207. The reference which the gentleman has made to the Message of President Madison, in support of his doctrine of full power, is rather an unfortunate one. Here Mr. E. read the following extract :

"In consequence of the provisions of the act interdicting commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, our Ministers at London and Paris were, without delay, instructed to let it be understood by the French and British Governments, that the authority vested in the Executive to renew commercial intercourse with their respective nations, would be exercised in the case specified by that act.

"Soon after these instructions were dispatched, it was found that the British Government, anticipating, from early proceedings of Congress, at their last session, the state of our laws, which has had the effect of placing the two belligerent Powers on a footing of equal restrictions, and relying on the conciliatory disposition of the United States, had transmitted to their Legation here, provisional instructions, not only to offer satisfaction for the attack on the frigate Chesapeake, and to make known the determination of His Britannic Majesty, to send an Envoy Extraordinary with powers to conclude a treaty on all the points between the two countries; but, moreover, to signify his willingness, in the meantime, to withdraw his Orders in Council, in the persuasion that the intercourse with Great Britain would be renewed on the part of the United States."

Here, then, the form in which this arrangement was made is stated officially to the gentleman from Connecticut. The arrangement has none of the characteristic features of a treaty. It has never until the present time been considered as a treaty. It was stated by the President as it really was, as a mere preliminary arrangement contemplating only a temporary withdrawal of certain measures until the general relations of the two countries could be fixed by a formal treaty. On this part of the subject, to wit—"that the arrangement with Mr. Erskine cannot be considered as a formal treaty"—the observations of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MAÇON,) are infinitely superior to anything which I can say, because they are conclusive.

Having made these preliminary remarks, I will now proceed to examine—

1. How far the Executive of the United States was authorized to receive the declaration of the accredited Minister of Great Britain as to the extent of his powers, or was bound to require an exhibition of his instructions as a preliminary to the arrangement.

2. How far the arrangement entered into was obligatory on the British Government.

3. Whether there has been such a departure from instructions as to warrant a disavowal of the arrangement, without a breach of good faith on the part of the British Ministry.

In examining the first point, the first question which presents itself is, under what authority did Mr. Erskine act ?

1. Under a general letter of credence.

2. Under instructions.

What is a general letter of credence? It is a paper addressed by the Executive Magistrate of one country to the Executive Magistrate of another country. It contains the name and quality of the Minister who bears it, and it is always presented in person—after mentioning the name and quality of the Minister, it proceeds to state: "We therefore, desire that you will give a favorable reception to our said Minister Plenipotentiary, and that you will give entire credence to whatever he may represent to you in our name."

A letter of credence being under the signature of the head of the Government and seal of the nation, and of course patent to the Government receiving it, is equivalent to a commission in any other form whatever.

The only difference between a full power (unless limited to a special object) and a general letter of credence, consists in this—

The full power gives a right to make stipulations on all subjects.

The letter of credence on such subjects as come properly within the range of the general powers of the Minister resident.

The full power is signed by the Head of the Government, and, being under the seal of the nation, is of course patent.

The letter of credence is also under the signature of the Head of the Government and seal of the nation, and of course patent.

A Minister acting under a full power and instructions presents to the Government only the full power.

A Minister acting under a letter of credence and instructions presents only his letter of credence to the Government.

The instructions in both cases belong exclusively to the Minister, and cannot be demanded. They contain, to use the language of Vattel, the master's secret. The only question therefore seems to be, whether the subjects arranged by Mr. Erskine, viz. the Chesapeake and Orders in Council come fairly within the range of the powers of a Resident Plenipotentiary.

The powers of a Resident Minister Plenipotentiary are no where precisely defined—and consequently there is no precise demarkation between the cases falling within his powers and those requiring a special Plenipotentiary commission. Usage, reason, and common sense, must trace the distinction. In general, occurrences of a transitory character are settled by the resident functionary. Transactions and arrangements operating like treaties of peace, commerce, alliance, &c., either on account of their permanent character or peculiar magnitude, are the work of Plenipotentiaries specially commissioned.

Mr. Rose, for the adjustment of the affair of the Chesapeake, brought only a letter of credence under the hand and seal of his Sovereign. The despatch of Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine of the 23d of January is not a full power in the legal sense of the terms, being neither signed or sealed like a full power, or addressed to the proper authority. Had Mr. Erskine therefore shown the instructions, the authority of them would have rested not on their intrinsic character, but on the letter of credence which required faith to be put in his word. It is admitted that Mr. Erskine had authority to adjust the affair of the Chesapeake, and objected only that he violated his instructions. Yet it is certain he had no extra commission—nor is it pretended that in that case he had any instructions, even, which he was authorized to communicate. His authority, therefore, was in his letter of credence. The proposals of our Minister, Mr. Pinkney, in London, on the subject of the embargo and Orders in Council, although they contemplated a repeal of both, were not objected to for want of power, yet he had no commission except his letter of credence. The instructions of Mr. Erskine contemplated a repeal of the prohibitory acts on both sides, although it is not pretended that he had any other commission but his general letter of credence. English history furnishes a precedent in point, which shows that a full power is not necessary to arrangements preliminary to a treaty. The case in question is the declaration and counter-declaration exchanged at Madrid, the 24th of July, 1790, between the Spanish Minister, Count Florida Blanca, and the British Ambassador, Alleyne Fitzherbert. In that case there was no full power, the phrase used is, "being thereto duly authorized." This declaration and counter-declaration were signed in virtue of a general letter of credence, by Mr. Fitzherbert, who was Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain to the Catholic King; but when, in consequence of this preliminary arrangement, a treaty was entered into on the 28th of October of the same year, the phrase is altered, as, after reciting Count Florida Blanca's and Mr. Fitzherbert's appointments to conclude the treaty, it says, "who after having communicated to each other their respective full powers."—Vide An. Reg. 1790, p. 300. On this and the other point, the calling for the exhibition of instructions as a preliminary to negotiation, I beg leave to read the following authorities:

"The Ambassador, after he has presented his letters of credence, (says Wicquefort, folio ed., p. 109,) and had them approved, ought to enjoy the effect thereof purely and simply, and has no further occasion to fortify or authorize his negotiation by producing other instruments."

"Instructions (says Wicquefort) are a secret instrument which the Ambassador is not obliged to communicate to the Court where he negotiates. Nay, I dare affirm that he ought not to produce it, without a necessity and express order. In the year 1560, Queen Elizabeth sent into Scotland Robert Bowes, with orders to make pressing instances to have the Duke of Lenox removed from the King's person, who was at that time very young. Those of the Council of Scotland said, that it was so severe and unjust a thing, that not being able to believe the Queen had given him any such orders they desired to see them. Bowes said he would not show them. The Scotch were dissatisfied therewith. But the Queen was so displeased with their procedure, that she recalled her Ambassador, and refused to give audience to him they sent to justify their transaction."

"In the year 1643, (says the same author,) Walter Strickland, Minister from the Parliament of London, presented a memorial to the States General, wherein he spoke of the Prince of Orange with little respect. He was urged to show his orders, but it was a kind of violence that could not well be justified. They that did it, either did not reflect on what they did, or else they were very willing to offend his master. We have seen within some years a Minister, who, having been sent by a powerful State to one of the first Princes of Germany, begun his negotiation by laying his instructions on the table. But all that can be said of it is, that it was the action of a fool, in the utmost extent of the signification of the epithet. It is an unheard-of thing that a Minister has been compelled to show his orders, and they who force him to do it offer violence to the law of nations."

"The Minister who is to carry on a negotiation (says Martens, book 7, chap. 3, sec. 5) is furnished with instructions. These instructions, as well as those that it may be necessary to dispatch to him in the course of his embassy, being intended for himself alone, are not usually produced to the Court where he is sent, unless his own Court orders him to do it, or unless he, from urgent motives, thinks himself justifiable in producing certain passages of them. Sometimes he has two sets of instructions, the one public, and the other secret."

"Instructions (says M. de Callieres in his 'Maniere de Negocier,' page 87, c. 12,) are a writing which contain the commands of the Prince or of the State that gives them to its negotiator, to which he may have recourse for the purpose of refreshing his memory, and by which he is to regulate his conduct. There are sometimes two sets of instructions, one made to be shown, the other secret—which contains the true and ultimate intention of the Prince or State that gives them."

The same author, page 88, declares:

"The instructions of a public Minister cannot be demanded without a violation of the law of nations. He ought never to communicate them without the express commands of his Sovereign—nothing is necessary to give full faith to his declaration, but the letter of credence which he has presented, or the full power which he may have communicated."

From these authorities it appears that the Executive had no right to demand of Mr. Erskine his instructions. Mr. Erskine did not exhibit them—on the contrary, he declares, that he considered it would be in vain to lay before the Government of the United States the despatch of the 23d of January, which he was at liberty to have done in extenso if he had thought proper.—Vide Correspondence, page 20.

I will now proceed to examine how far the arrangement entered into was obligatory on the British Government. In order to form a correct opinion on this subject it will be necessary to pass in review the circumstances which took place prior to the late arrangement. The measures adopted at the commencement of the second session of the eleventh Congress placed Great Britain and France on an equal footing—every pretext for a continuance of the decrees and orders was removed, and the provision contained in the eleventh section of the non-intercourse act was introduced for the express purpose of enabling the President to meet the advances of either Great Britain or France, for the restoration of intercourse. After a due lapse of time the arrival of a national ship is announced, bringing not an ordinary messenger but a Secretary of Legation charged with important despatches. Mr. Erskine, the British Minister, immediately addresses to the Secretary of State a note tendering reparation for the affair of the Chesapeake and expressing the sincere disposition of His Majesty for an adjustment of all the differences between the two countries.

I will read an extract from the first note—

“It having been represented to His Majesty’s Government, that the Congress of the United States, in their proceedings at the opening of the first session, had evinced an intention of passing certain laws, which would place the relations of Great Britain with the United States upon an equal footing, in all respects, with the other belligerent Powers; I have accordingly received His Majesty’s commands, in the event of such laws taking place, to offer, on the part of His Majesty, an honorable reparation for the aggression committed by a British naval officer, in the attack on the United States’ frigate Chesapeake.”

The reparation for the outrage on the Chesapeake is accepted, and the British Minister immediately addresses to the Secretary of State a second note, from which the following is an extract :

“The favorable change in the relations of His Majesty with the United States, which has been produced by the act (usually termed the non-intercourse act) passed in the last session of Congress, was also anticipated by His Majesty, and has encouraged a further hope, that a reconsideration of the existing differences might lead to their satisfactory adjustment.

“On these grounds and expectations, I am instructed to communicate to the American Government, His Majesty’s determination of sending to the United States an Envoy Extraordinary, invested with full powers to conclude a treaty on all the points of the relations between the two countries.

“In the meantime, with a view to contribute to the attainment of so desirable an object, His Majesty would be willing to withdraw his Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, so far as respects the United States, in the persuasion that the President would issue a proclamation for the renewal of the intercourse with Great Britain, and that whatever difference of opinion should arise in the interpretation of the terms of such an agreement, will be removed in the proposed negotiation.”

This also is met with that unsuspecting confidence which the circumstances under which it was tendered was calculated to produce—the proposal of the British Minister is accepted, and he immediately addresses to the Secretary of State the following note :

“In consequence of the acceptance, by the President, as stated in your letter dated the 18th instant, of the proposals made by me on the part of His Majesty, in my letter of the same day, for the renewal of the intercourse between the respective countries, I am authorized to declare that His Majesty’s Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, will have been withdrawn as respects the United States, on the 10th day of June next.”

This pledge, sir, thus solemnly made in the face of the whole world, is accepted by the Executive; he could not have declined it without supposing the British Minister an unprincipled swindler. On what principle could the Executive of the United States have declined a tender thus made? The accredited Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain declares, “I am authorized to declare that His Majesty’s Orders in Council will have been withdrawn on the 10th day of June next.” Could the President of the United States have doubted the veracity or honor of the Minister? They had never been questioned. Could he suppose that Mr. Erskine would artfully sacrifice himself to such a project, against the views of his Government? For this there could be no possible temptation. Could the Executive suppose that Mr. Erskine had mistaken the views of his Government? Such a supposition could not be entertained, because his despatches were brought by a diplomatic auxiliary, immediately from his Government, not doubted to be possessed of all its views, and well understood to be privy to all the steps taken by Mr. Erskine. Were the terms offered at such a crisis of a nature to render the offer suspicious? So far from it that the language of those who now reprobate the want of caution was, that they were always attainable. If under such circumstances the opportunity had been met by the scruples and subtleties now advanced, let candor decide whether the authors could not and would not have appeared in much greater force against the Administration. Let gentlemen say, whether men of all parties would not have united in execrating the conduct of the Executive, if instead of meeting the overtures of Mr. Erskine, to use their own language, with “promptitude and frankness,” he had told him to send back to Great Britain for a patent power as a prop for his veracity.

To make a contract binding, five things are necessary—

1. That the parties have power to consent.
2. That they have consented.
3. That they have consented freely.
4. That the consent is mutual.
5. That the execution is possible.

Vide Marten, b. 2, ch. 1 sec. 3.

The arrangement is not disavowed for want of power on the part of Mr. Erskine, but for a departure from instructions. It is admitted by Mr. Jackson that Mr. Erskine had power. In page 69 of the correspondence, Mr. Jackson declares—“I must beg your very particular attention to the circumstance that His Majesty’s ratification has been withheld, not because the agreement was concluded without a full power, but because it was altogether irreconcilable to the instructions on which it was professedly founded. The question of the full power was introduced by yourself, to give weight, by a quotation from a highly respected author, to your complaint of the disavowal; in answer to which I observed, that the quotation did not apply, as Mr. Erskine had no full power. Never did I imagine, or anywhere attempt, to rest the right of a disavowal upon that circumstance." According to Mr. Jackson, then,

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. O. R.

1. Mr. Erskine had power to consent.
2. He did consent.
3. He consented freely, for the proposition came from him.
4. The consent was mutual, for it is in a written form and signed by both.
5. The execution was not only possible, but just and easy.

The five essentials of a contract were complied with; the contract, so far as it respected the United States, executed with good faith; no future ratification was or could be reserved; the affair of the Chesapeake was to be concluded here; the stipulations as to the Orders in Council were to be carried into immediate effect. To use the language of Mr. Canning, the Orders in Council and the embargo were to be contemporaneously withdrawn, and Mr. Erskine was authorized to fix the time—no notice of a departure from instructions was given at the time of making the arrangement.

To disavow with honor the act of its accredited agent, it is incumbent on a Government not only to show a palpable and manifest departure from instructions on material and important points, but also to produce such strong and solid reasons, as manifestly outweigh not only the general obligation, to abide by what has been done, but also the disappointments and injury accruing to the other party. This principle applies to cases where mutual ratification is reserved. The case before us is of a higher character—the refusal of the British Ministry is not simply to ratify what had been ratified by the other party, but to carry into effect on their part an arrangement which had been carried into full effect with good faith on the part of the United States.

I will now proceed to examine,

3. Whether there has been such a departure from instructions as to warrant a disavowal of the arrangement without a breach of good faith on the part of the British Ministry?

The arrangement entered into with Mr. Erskine consisted of three parts—

1. Reparation for the affair of the Chesapeake.
2. A withdrawal of the Orders in Council.
3. A promise to send over a Minister with full powers to conclude a treaty on all the subjects of difference between the United States and Great Britain.

Let us pass in review the several parts of the arrangement, and see how far on each there has been such a departure from instructions, as to warrant the course pursued by the British Ministry.

1. The reparation for the outrage on the Chesapeake—

The instructions of Mr. Erskine on this subject are not known to us; Mr. Jackson has not pointed to any despatch in which they were contained. There is strong ground indeed for believing that as to the Chesapeake, there has been no departure from instructions; the instructions on this subject, and indeed on the Orders in Council, are said to have been founded on a representation made by Mr. Erskine to the British Minister, Mr.

Canning. There is a perfect agreement between what Mr. Canning stated to Mr. Pinkney as the reparation which Mr. Erskine said would be acceptable to the American Government, and the reparation actually tendered. In page 7, of the last Message containing extracts from Mr. Pinkney's letters, Mr. Pinkney says:

"In the interview which took place (on May 23) Mr. Canning said, that the British Minister had acted in his late negotiation and engagements with you, not only without authority, but in direct opposition to the most precise instructions; that the instructions actually given to him had been founded on his own letters received here in January, in which were set forth the particulars of several conversations that had passed between him and Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin, and yourself, but especially the two last; that it appeared from these conversations that, in the opinion of the persons with whom they were held, the Government of the United States would be willing that Great Britain should consider the measures then contemplated by Congress, relative to non-intercourse, and the indiscriminate exclusion of belligerent vessels from our waters, as presenting an opening for the renewal of amicable discussions with this country; that it would be disposed, in the case of the Chesapeake, to receive as sufficient reparation, in addition to the prompt disavowal and recall of Admiral Berkeley, the restoration of the seamen forcibly taken out of that vessel."

In the next page of the same letter, Mr. Pinkney says, Mr. Canning proceeded to inform me, that, in consequence of these representations on the part of Mr. Erskine, two sets of instructions had been forwarded; the one relating to the Chesapeake, the other to the Orders in Council. What was the representation of Mr. Erskine as to the Chesapeake:

"That the American Government would be disposed to receive as sufficient reparation, in addition to the prompt disavowal and recall of Admiral Berkeley, the restoration of the seamen forcibly taken out of that vessel."

What was the reparation tendered by Mr. Erskine? Precisely what is here stated, with the addition only of a provision for the families of the unfortunate sufferers, if acceptable to the American Government. No mention is made of any condition in the representation of Mr. Erskine, on which the instruction was founded—nor is it probable that any conditions were contained in the instruction itself. But, sir, let us take the disavowal as stated by Mr. Jackson. In page 63 of the correspondence will be found the memorandum tendered to the Secretary of State in the following words:

"The President's proclamation of July, 1807, prohibiting to British ships of war the entrance into the harbors of the United States, having been annulled, His Majesty is willing to restore the seamen taken out of the Chesapeake, on reserving to himself a right to claim, in a regular way, by application to the American Government, the discharge of such of them, if any, as shall be proved to be either natural born subjects of His Majesty, or deserters from His Majesty's service.

"His Majesty is willing to make a provision for the families of such men as were slain on board the Chesapeake, in consequence of the unauthorized attack upon that frigate, provided that such bounty shall not be extended to the family of any man who shall have been either a natural born subject of His Majesty, or a deserter from His Majesty's service."

And, in page 98, Mr. Jackson says, on the subject of the Chesapeake:

"When I informed you that the agreement concluded here in April last had been framed in deviation from the instructions given for the occasion, my explanation was intended to apply to both parts of that agreement. That nothing, required by the most scrupulous accuracy, may be wanting, I now add, that the deviation consisted in not recording, in the official document signed here, the abrogation of the President's proclamation of the 2d July, 1807, as well as the two reserves specified in the paper of memoranda enclosed in my official letter to you of the 27th ult."

It appears, then, that the tender of reparation for the Chesapeake is disavowed:

1. Because the repeal of the proclamation of the President was not recorded in the instrument by which the reparation was made.

2. Because it did not contain a stipulation admitting the right, on the part of Great Britain, to claim a discharge from our service of deserters generally, and particularly of her natural born subjects, without excepting such as had been naturalized in due form by the United States.

The first condition was entirely useless, because the proclamation was repealed.

The second condition has no connexion with the subject. Stipulations on the subject of deserters, or on any other subject, ought to have been reserved for arrangement by treaty. They could not honorably be tendered to the American Government as the price of reparation for an injury. The nation or individual tendering reparation for an injury cannot give better proof of treachery of the basest kind, than to clog it with disgraceful conditions, which insure its rejection. Who, sir, are the natural born subjects of Great Britain? All persons born within the dominions of Great Britain, whether naturalized by the laws of other countries or not. We are refused reparation for an atrocious injury, because we will not purchase it by a surrender of the rights of our naturalized citizens. The disavowal of the reparation for the Chesapeake manifests not only bad faith on the part of the British Ministry, but proves irresistibly to my mind, that if such a condition was contained in Mr. Erskine's instructions, it was not intended he should make us reparation. The veil attempted to be thrown over this transaction, viz: a departure from instructions, is too thin to conceal the base perfidy by which it is characterized.

I now, sir, proceed to examine the second part of the arrangement, viz: the Orders in Council.

The stipulation for a withdrawal of the Orders in Council has also been disavowed, on account of a departure from instructions. The departure consists in Mr. Erskine's not obtaining a recognition of three conditions contained in the despatch of the 23d of January, which, Mr. Jackson says, was the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with this country on the matter to which it relates. In page 69 of the correspondence, Mr. Jackson says: "In his despatch of the 23d of January, Mr. Secretary Canning distinctly says to Mr. Erskine: 'Upon receiving through you on the part of the American Government a distinct and official recognition of the three above-mentioned conditions, His Majesty will lose no time in sending to America a Minister fully empowered to consign them to a formal and regular treaty. This Minister would, of course, have been provided with a full power; but Mr. Erskine was to be guided by his instructions, and had the agreement concluded here, been conformable to them, it would, without doubt, have been ratified by His Majesty.'"

Let us, then, turn to the conditions contained in the despatch of the 23d of January, to which Mr. Jackson refers, vide page 13th, Correspondence. These conditions are:

1st. "That the American Government is prepared, in the event of His Majesty's consenting to withdraw the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, to withdraw, contemporaneously on its part, the interdiction of its harbors to ships of war, and all non-intercourse and non-importation acts, so far as respect Great Britain, leaving them in force with respect to France, and the Powers which adopt or act under her decrees.

2d. "That America is willing to renounce, during the present war, the pretension of carrying on in time of war all trade with the enemy's colonies, from which she was excluded during peace.

3d. "Great Britain, for the purpose of securing the operation of the embargo, and the bona fide intention of America to prevent her citizens from trading with France, and the Powers adopting and acting under the French decrees, is to be considered as being at liberty to capture all such American vessels as may be found attempting to trade with the ports of any of these Powers; without which security for the observance of the embargo, the raising it nominally, with respect to Great Britain alone, would, in fact, raise it with respect to all the world."

By the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the first of these conditions was substantially obtained. The second, Mr. Canning admits, has no connexion with the subject; and the third, he says, could not with propriety constitute any part of a formal stipulation. In page 13th of the last Message of the President, containing extracts from Mr. Pinkney, Mr. Pinkney says:

"Upon the second of the conditions mentioned in Mr. Erskine's instructions, I made several remarks, I stated that it had no necessary connexion with the principal subject; that it had lost its importance to Great Britain by the reduction of almost all the colonies of her enemies; that Batavia was understood not to be affected by it; that it could not apply to Guadeloupe, (the only other unconquered colony,) since it was admitted that we were not excluded from a trade with Guadeloupe in peace; that I did not know what the Government of the United States would, upon sufficient inducements, consent to do upon this point, but that it could scarcely be expected to give the implied sanction which this condition called upon it to give to the rule of the war of 1756, without any equivalent or reciprocal stipulation whatsoever. Mr. Canning admitted that the second condition had no necessary connexion with the Orders in Council, and he intimated that they would have been contented to leave the subject of it to future discussion and arrangement. He added, that this condition was inserted in Mr. Erskine's instructions, because it had appeared from his own report of conversations with official persons at Washington, that there would be no difficulty in agreeing to it.

"Upon the third condition I said a very few words. I restated what I had thrown out upon the matter of it in an informal conversation in January, and expressed my regret that it should have been misapprehended. Mr. Canning immediately said that he was himself of opinion that the idea upon which that condition turns could not well find its way into a stipulation; that he had, nevertheless, believed it proper to propose the condition to the United States; that he should have been satisfied with the rejection of it; and that the consequence would have been that they should have intercepted the commerce to which it referred, if any such commerce should be attempted."

From this, then, it appears that, by the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, a full equivalent for the first condition was obtained; and that the British Minister acknowledges that the second condition might have been left for future discussion and arrangement, and that he would have been contented with the rejection of the third. Even, therefore, supposing this despatch of the 23d of January to have been the only instruction Mr. Erskine had on this subject, it does not appear that there is any solid ground for disavowing this part of the arrangement. If, however, we are to credit the solemn declaration of Mr. Erskine, he had several letters of instruction. In page 20 and 21 of the correspondence, Mr. Erskine says:

"Under these circumstances, therefore, finding that I could not obtain the recognitions specified in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d January, (which formed but one part of his instructions to me,) in the formal manner required, I considered that it would be in vain to lay before the Government of the United States the despatch in question, which I was at liberty to have done in extenso had I thought proper. But, as I had such strong grounds for believing that the object of His Majesty's Government could be attained, though in a different manner, and the spirit, at least, of my several letters of instructions be fully complied with, I felt a thorough conviction upon my mind, that I should be acting in conformity with His Majesty's wishes, and, accordingly, concluded the late provisional agreement on His Majesty's behalf with the Government of the United States."

I will now, sir, proceed to the third part of the arrangement, viz: the promise to send over a Minister with full powers to conclude a treaty on all the subjects of difference between the two countries. This also is disavowed. Instead of a Minister of peace, Mr. Canning officially notifies Mr. Pinkney, our Minister in London, of his intention of sending over a Minister for the purpose of giving our Secretary of State a kirking. In page 7th, of the correspondence, Mr. Canning in a letter to Mr. Pinkney, says:

"I forbear equally from troubling you, sir, with any comment on the manner in which Mr. Erskine's communications have been received by the American Government, or upon the terms and spirit of Mr. Smith's share of the correspondence.

"Such observations will be communicated more properly through the Minister whom His Majesty has directed to proceed to America; not on any special mission, (which Mr. Erskine was not authorized to promise, except upon conditions, not one of which he has obtained,) but as the successor of Mr. Erskine, whom His Majesty has not lost a moment in recalling."

Here, sir, the object of Mr. Jackson's mission is explained; he is sent, says Mr. Canning, not on any special mission, but as the successor of Mr. Erskine. The terms and spirit of Mr. Smith's share of the correspondence with Mr. Erskine are expressly noted, and an intimation given in form, that they will be the subject of animadversion. Mr. Jackson appears to have arrived in this country with dispositions precisely in unison with the intimation thus thrown out by Mr. Canning. His misrepresentation of the affair at Hampton, fixed on him now by the oath of respectable persons, manifests but too strongly the state of his feelings on his first arrival in this country. His first letter, before any correspondence had taken place calculated to excite unpleasant feelings, is proof positive that his feelings were not acquired here, but brought with him. I will read an extract—it will be found in pages 29 and 30 of the correspondence; and the style and manner excite the more surprise because it is the first official note addressed to the Secretary of State:

"Considering that a very few days have elapsed since I delivered to the President a credential letter from the King my master, and that nothing has been even alleged to have occurred to deprive me of the credit to which, according to immemorial usage, I am by that letter entitled, I believe there does not exist in the annals of diplomacy a precedent for such a determination between two Ministers who have met for the avowed purpose of terminating amicably the existing differences between their respective countries: but, after mature reflection, I am induced to acquiesce in it by the recollection of the time that must necessarily elapse before I can receive His Majesty's commands upon so unexpected an occurrence, and of the detriment that would ensue to the public service if my Ministerial functions were, in the interval, to be altogether suspended. I shall, therefore, content myself with entering my protest against a proceeding which I can consider in no other light than as a violation, in my person, of the most essential rights of a public Minister, when adopted, as in the present case, without any alleged misconduct on his part."

The style and manner of many parts of the same letter but too strongly mark the temper and views of Mr. Jackson. The formal tender of terms for the adjustment of the affair of the Chesapeake, which he knew could not honorably be accepted, and which he knew would be rejected, manifests a spirit of hostility too obvious to be denied. The renewal in an informal manner of the disgraceful proposals on the subject of the Orders in Council affords additional proof of the hostile views with which he was sent. These informal propositions are stated in the first letter of Mr. Smith. Mr. Jackson, in answer to this letter, says, that the propositions were not made "with that view," viz: with a view to their being considered as formal propositions on the part of the British Ministry; finally, he denies that they were made at all. In a part of the correspondence, he declares "he has a power to discuss and eventually to conclude," and afterwards, that he has "a full power." Taking his own declarations and Mr. Canning's notification to Mr. Pinkney already cited, and he can only be considered as an ordinary Minister, a mere successor of Mr. Erskine, and charged with no special commission except a lashing for Mr. Smith.

H. OF R.

Conduct of the British Minister.

With this view, sir, of the grounds on which the late arrangement has been disavowed, I cannot but feel that a course has been pursued by the British Ministry not warranted by good faith. Such a transaction in private life would be called swindling. It would stamp with dishonor the character of any individual who could fly from engagements fairly entered into and attempt to cover his bad faith by so flimsy a veil.

The reason assigned by the British Ministry for disavowing this arrangement cannot be the real ones. The real reasons have been ably stated by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MILNOR,) and I rejoice on the present occasion to see his talents devoted to his country, and not employed in softening the injustice of a foreign nation or the atrocious insolence of its Minister. The object to be accomplished by Mr. Canning is too plain—plighted faith is violated that British smugglers may fatten, while the rights of neutrals are destroyed.

I will now, sir, proceed to offer a few remarks on the parts of the correspondence which bear more particularly on the resolution before the House. My object will be to present in succession the parts of the correspondence, in which I consider the British Minister, Mr. Jackson, has attributed to the Executive Government of the United States, to use the language of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) the intentional falsification of a fact. I do not wish to put between the parts of the correspondence a single remark:

Mr. Jackson to Mr. Smith—pp. 31, 32.

"You have not in the conferences we have hitherto held distinctly announced any such complaint, and I have seen with pleasure in this forbearance on your part an instance of that candor which I doubt not will prevail in all our communications, inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of a disavowal of an act done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed.

"It was not known when I left England whether Mr. Erskine had, according to the liberty allowed him, communicated to you in extenso his original instructions. It now appears that he did not. But, in reverting to his official correspondence, and particularly to a despatch addressed on the 20th of April to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I find that he there states that he had submitted to your consideration the three conditions specified in these instructions as the ground-work of an arrangement which, according to information received from this country, it was thought in England might be made with a prospect of great mutual advantage. Mr. Erskine then reports verbatim et scribitim your observations upon each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions, but the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions were, in fact, very explicitly communicated to you, and by you of course laid before the President for his consideration. I need hardly add, that the difference between these conditions, and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th of April, is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation; nor need I draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint, on the part of the American Government, viz: that under such circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister. I must here allude to a supposition which you have more than once mentioned to me, and by which, if it had any the slightest foundation, this right might perhaps have been in some degree affected. You have informed me that you understood that Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions by which to regulate his conduct; and that upon one of them, which had not been communicated either to you or the public, was to be rested the justification of the terms finally agreed upon between you and him. It is my duty, sir, solemnly to declare to you, and through you to the President, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, which you have made the basis of an official correspondence with the latter Minister, and which was read by the former to the American Minister in London, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with this country on the matter to which it relates."

"I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing you that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were at the time, in substance, made known to you. No stronger illustration therefore can be given of the deviation from them which occurred than by a reference to the terms of your agreement.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

"Nothing can be more notorious than the frequency with which, in the course of a complicated negotiation, Ministers are furnished with a gradation of conditions on which they may be successively authorized to conclude. So common is the case which you put hypothetically, that in acceding to the justice of your statement, I feel myself impelled to make only one observation upon it, which is, that it does not strike me as bearing upon the consideration of the unauthorized agreement concluded here, inasmuch as in point of fact Mr. Erskine had no such graduated instruction. You are already acquainted with that which was given, and I have had the honor of informing you that it was the only one by which the conditions on which he was to conclude were prescribed. So far from the terms, which he was actually induced to accept, having been contemplated in that instruction, he himself states that they were substituted by you in lieu of those originally proposed."

"But it would be improper to conclude the few observations to which I purposely limit myself, without adverting to your repetition of a language implying a knowledge on the part of this Government, that the instructions of your predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him. After the explicit and unremotely avowed avowal that this Government had no such knowledge, and that with such a knowledge no such arrangement would have been entered into, the view which you have again presented of the subject takes it my duty to apprise you that such insinuations are inadmissible in the intercourse of a foreign Minister with a Government that understands what it owes to itself."

Mr. Jackson to Mr. Smith—pp. 70, 71.

"You will find that in my correspondence with you have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was unable to substantiate a fact. No facts, such as I have become acquainted with them, have scrupulously adhered, and in so doing I must continue, whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is called in question, to vindicate its honor and dignity, in the manner that appears to me best calculated for that purpose."

In the first part of the correspondence cited, Mr. Jackson makes three separate and distinct charges. 1. That the arrangement was made under such circumstances as could only lead to a disavowal. 2. That the instructions of Mr. Erskine were communicated to Mr. Smith, and by him to the resident. 3. That the instructions which Mr. Erskine had on the subject to which they related.

In the second passage of the correspondence which I have cited, Mr. Smith, passing over the offensive insinuation as to the circumstances under which the arrangement was made, declares, that it is now for the first time communicated to him that the instruction alluded to by Mr. Jackson was the only one Mr. Erskine had, and that with such a knowledge no arrangement would have been made.

In the third passage of the correspondence cited, Mr. Jackson, after a construction had been placed on his insinuations, repeats and adheres to them.

In the fourth passage, Mr. Smith declares to him that, after the explicit declaration made on his part, the insinuations of Mr. Jackson are inadmissible.

In the fifth passage, without any regard to the declarations of Mr. Smith, without noticing the formal intimation given that his insinuations are inadmissible, Mr. Jackson declares, "I have made no insinuation where I cannot substantiate a fact. To facts I shall adhere."

Take the case, sir, as between two individuals in private life: A says to B, you have concluded with my agent an arrangement he was not authorized to make; his powers were shown to you, and with a complete knowledge that his powers were totally inadequate, you have nevertheless concluded a bargain.

B very courteously replies, that it is now for the first time made known to him that the agent of A had no power to make the agreement entered into. That with such a knowledge he should not have concluded a bargain with him.

A, in return, declares, that the powers of his agent were fully made known to B, and that B knew, at the time of making the contract, that the agent had no power.

B, in return, says, that after the explicit declaration made by me, that I had no knowledge of the want of power on the part of your agent, the insinuation contained in your letter is inadmissible.

A, in return, declares, I have made no insinuation which I am unable to substantiate by facts. To facts I shall adhere.

I appeal, sir, to any gentleman who regards his character, whether such a transaction between individuals could terminate in anything but hostility. From the time of Shakspeare, it has been settled that gentlemen cannot, in their intercourse with each other, go further than retort courteous, or reply valiant. It appears that Mr. Jackson, on the present occasion, has overleaped the reply valiant and proceeded to the lie direct. If it had been a case between individuals there would have been nothing left but to run or fight.

I will now, sir, examine some of the reasons urged against the adoption of the resolution. The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) says, that before he can give the pledge contained in the resolution, of calling into action the whole resources of the nation, he must inquire what those resources are. The resources of the United States are the same with those of every other country where the people are not ground down by oppressive taxes. The ordinary revenue of no country where freedom exists can be equal to the extraordinary expenses produced by war. Public credit is the fund on which all free countries must draw. Our credit as a nation stands high; an honest compliance with our engagements insures to us the floating capital of our own country, which is ample; it is as easy for the Government of the United States to command forty millions of dollars as five. But, says the gentleman, it is a defiance of war; are you prepared to sustain it? Did you not suffer the offending squadron, after the outrage on the Chesapeake, to remain in your waters without an attempt to dislodge them? I remember well, sir, the circumstances which arrested the proceedings of Congress after the attack on the Chesapeake. The gentleman was himself, at that time, an old and respectable member, possessed of talents to support whatever proposition he might offer. Why did he not spur up the lazy drones, who, at that time, conducted the affairs of the nation? Embarked in the same vessel, if he has slumbered at his post while national honor was wrecked, he must bear his portion of the blame. It really appears to me, however, (without meaning anything disrespectful to the gentleman,) that for those who were silent at the time of the attack on the Chesapeake, to come forward now and say, "why was not the offending squadron driven out?" is too much in the style of the renowned Captain described by Smollet, who, after suffering himself and the passengers in a stage coach to be robbed, cried out as soon as the robber was out of sight, that he would have his "heart's blood." But, sir, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) feels some scruples about fixing a stigma on the character of Mr. Jackson, a man invested with the highest order of powers. He expresses for him that sort of feeling, which, if applied to a young man flushed with hope, and just entering into life with a fair unblemished character, would do great credit to his heart. Who, sir, is Mr. Jackson? No young stripling, with a character to form; he is already a conspicuous character; his fame, to use an expression of Pindar, has ascended to the skies in curling smoke; he will be as well known in history as Arnold, or any other conspicuous character. In Denmark, he professed peace to the Government, and made war on the people; here, he has changed his system, to use the language of the gentleman from Connecticut, he has made war on the palace, and professed peace to the people. While he grasped with inviolable friendship the hand of the Crown Prince, the lawless banditti he headed sacked their city, and bore off in triumph the Danish fleet. While this transaction shall remain on the records of history the character of Mr. Jackson will find a conspicuous place in the annals of fame. But why, sir, shall we feel delicacy for the character of a man, who, in his intercourse with us, has violated every principle of decorum and decency? The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) objects to the wording of the resolution. The terms are hard, such as the President would not use. I do not know whether the gentleman said such as no Christian ought to use, but certainly such as ought not to be used by any branch of the Government. The energy with which the gentleman expressed his feelings on this part of the subject brought forcibly to my mind the story related by Sterne, of Francis the First, who said to his Minister, he would give to a neighboring Republic the honor of standing god-mother for his next child. The Minister remonstrated; Francis is obstinate: a courier announces that the Republic accepts the honor, but claims, as god-mother, the right of naming the child. Well, says Francis, she will call it Louis, or Henry, or some Christian name. No, says the Minister, she insists on its being called Shadrach-Meshack-Abednego. Francis, in wrath, declares it is not a Christian name; it is not such a name as any Christian ought to use; it is a name no Government ought to pronounce. The name deterred Francis from accepting the honor he had solicited. Perhaps, on the present occasion, the hard names in the resolution may be the only objection of the gentleman from Connecticut. He has declared that the privilege of an Ambassador does not authorize him to attribute to a Government the intentional falsification of a fact; that it does not authorize him to profess peace to the people and make war on the palace. But the gentleman, notwithstanding these strong declarations, will not even trust himself to look at the resolution. He seems, sir, to be under that sort of embarrassment which a girl of sentiment and feeling experiences when very desperately in love, and her wishes opposed by her friends; she likes the lover, but she cannot disoblige her friends; she will not even trust her eyes to dwell on him; whether his tale is true or not she fears to learn; without examination, turns from him; complains of his language, or manners, and throws him off precisely as the gentleman from Connecticut does the resolution, without knowing whether it is true or false.

H. OF R.

Conduct of the British Minister.

A gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) has exercised much ingenuity in attempting to show that Mr. Jackson has not been insolent. I have no doubt that if I was to place an apple on my desk, the gentleman could deliver a very ingenious speech to show that it was really not an apple. Suppose, in his attempt, he should establish, that, instead of being a fine Newtown pip-pin, it was only a sour crab? This is really what the gentleman has done by his construction of the correspondence, so far as respects the conduct of Mr. Jackson; for, after all his ingenuity, he concludes with saying, Mr. Jackson has been rude, very rude indeed. I am willing to join issue on this point, and would for one have had no objection to striking out insolent, and inserting very rude, if that would have secured the gentleman's vote.

The gentleman's argument on the second part of the resolution is founded principally on the circumstance of the conditions in the despatch of the 23d of January, having originated in a representation by Mr. Erskine of certain conversations with members of our own Government. If these conditions originated, as the gentleman supposes, in the idea that they would be acceptable to the American Government, why are they persisted in after the error was made known by the representation of Mr. Erskine to his own Government? Why are they urged as a ground of disavowal? If the propositions did not originate with the British Government, they have been completely adopted by Mr. Canning. But, sir, if the gentleman from New York considers the conditions in the despatch of the 23d of January so offensive, that the Executive of the United States ought at once to have dismissed Mr. Jackson on their being tendered, what does he think of the disavowal of the arrangement, rested avowedly on the failure of Mr. Erskine to obtain a recognition of these conditions? The gentleman has not favored us with his opinions on this subject or on the appeal; he cannot, I am certain, reconcile to himself the justification of either.

I regret, sir, that another gentleman from New York, (Mr. GOLD,) who, in his ordinary deportment and manner displays so much moderation and mildness, should have seized on an occasion like the present to express so much bitter feeling against the administration of his own Government. I wish not to misrepresent anything the gentleman has said, and, if I do, shall feel happy in being put right. The gentleman tells us that Mr. Jackson could not have intended to make the charge, that the American Government knew Mr. Erskine had no power to make the arrangement entered into, because that ground is not taken by the British Government. The British Minister, he says, would have been guilty of a high misdemeanor if he had gone further than was allowed by his own Government. This idea of a high misdemeanor has, I fear, operated too strongly on the gentleman's mind. Instead of viewing the transaction as it really presents itself, he appears to have argued it precisely as if Mr. Jackson was arraigned for an indictable offence, and that it was his duty to exercise all his ingenuity in stating circumstances calculated to palliate or soften his conduct. The gentleman says, that Mr. Smith first agitated the question of different sets of instructions, and that this was calculated to wound and irritate Mr. Jackson, because it can only be considered as a charge of perfidy against the British Government, after the ground taken before all Europe, of disavowing the arrangement, because Mr. Erskine violated his instructions. If, sir, the gentleman is so much alive to an imputation on the British Government; why does he not feel for the honor of his own country? How do we stand before all Europe, with the arrangement disavowed, because Mr. Erskine did not obtain a recognition of the disgraceful conditions in the despatch of the 23d of January? In speaking of the appeal to the people by Mr. Jackson, the gentleman applies to it the mild term incorrect. He says, too, there are many palliating circumstances—the terms are not at all inflammatory—as little offensive as could have been used. While, in viewing the conduct of the British Minister, the gentleman appears to possess all the mildness of my uncle Toby, he judges with a heart of iron the conduct and motives of his own Government. On the 19th of April last, says the gentleman, the Administration was reduced to the brink of ruin. The non-intercourse, buckled on in haste, was about to expire; all its measures had failed; never were there stronger temptations for an Administration to get rid, by honorable means, of a system which had produced only ruin to ourselves. What, sir, is the amount of this charge? Precisely the one made by the British Ministry and its unprincipled Envoy—collusion between the American Government and Mr. Erskine—concluding an arrangement, knowing he was not authorized to make it. I have seen it some where stated that in arbitrary countries there is nothing excites so much dread among the people as professions of mildness, moderation, and clemency. It always precedes acts of injustice and cruelty. Nor shall I ever again hear a politician declare, as the gentleman has done, that moderation and justice is a lesson of wisdom, without having forcibly recalled to my mind this odious custom in arbitrary countries. While, sir, the gentleman is thus harsh in attributing improper motives to the administration of his own Government, he can discover nothing insulting in the correspondence of Mr. Jackson; if there is any insult, says the gentleman, it is too deep for my understanding. Opinions on affairs of honor depend on our organization. I was once acquainted with a respectable man in Virginia, a practitioner of law, and a Senator, too, who, on receiving a blow with a cane, turned round to the person who gave it and asked, are you in earnest? Yes, says the person, perfectly. Very well, replied the Senator, I am glad of it, for really I should not like such jests. The notions of this gentleman as to what constituted an insult were singular—as singular, I think, as those at present expressed by the gentleman from New York. The gentleman is for placing a sentinel, lest some fell spirit should cause the embargo again to rise. If, sir, a sentinel is to be placed, let it be at the election poll. Let the Goddess of Liberty there take her stand, and warn the voters as they advance of the dangers of division and disunion. Let her unfold to the people what has destroyed all free Governments. What destroyed the first confederated republic under the Amphycyonic Council? What destroyed the Achaean league which succeeded it? What has destroyed all the minor Governments of modern Europe? Division produced by foreign influence. The gentleman says, our citizens have enjoyed, and are now enjoying, the blessings derived from being freed from the shackles of embargo, non-intercourse, and all our restrictive system. When, sir, in ancient times, a daughter of one of the Roman Kings drove in triumph over the mangled body of her own father, she rose to power and to wealth. It was by a violation of every moral principle. So, sir, those who have violated the laws of their country may have reaped the profits of their iniquity by committing a crime of the first grade in a free country, arraying themselves in opposition to the will of the community. But why, sir, does the gentleman rake up the ashes of the embargo and non-intercourse? They were used as a shield of his own party. They would serve on the present occasion as a convenient rug for the gentleman himself to creep under. When called on to explain his speech or his vote, it would have been only necessary to pronounce the short word embargo. It is much easier for any gentleman to pronounce this word than explain to the people the reasons why, after all our restrictive system has ceased, our difficulties with Great

When Mr. EPPES had concluded, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 28.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan, was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Jared Shattuck; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Knox, in the Indiana Territory, praying that an act may be passed to authorize the Land Commissioners for the District of Vincennes, to receive, examine, and decide, on their titles to their several tracts of land, which has not heretofore been done, for the reasons therein mentioned.—Referred.

Ordered, That Mr. MACON and Mr. DANA be added to the committee appointed, on the eleventh instant, for the purpose of inquiring what amendments are necessary in the "Act to promote the progress of useful arts."

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the resolution from the Senate approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to receive any further communications from Francis J. Jackson.

The motion for indefinite postponement being still under consideration.—

Mr. STANFORD said, so many were the objectionable features of the present resolution before the House, he should vote for its indefinite postponement, and with permission of the House he would give his reasons for his vote. In the first place, he thought the language and style of the resolution highly objectionable, and calculated to render that which was already bad enough still worse; that it was, in the second place, a strange innovation upon all former practice and usage under our present Government; and lastly, that it was clearly unconstitutional. Thus much he should endeavor to show, and trusted he would be able to do it to the satisfaction of the House.

Mr. S. then premised that he had disapproved the introduction of the resolution of approbation at the last session; that, he considered unnecessary; but the present he considered not only unnecessary, but even pernicious. That was a pacific one; this belligerent in all its aspects. He had suggested a mode to one or two gentlemen, of getting rid of that one, if they had thought proper, and in which case he would have contributed his vote to have got clear of it. But, had the question been put in a direct form, he should have differed from his colleague, (Mr. MACON,) inasmuch as he should have voted for it.

He could not have done honestly otherwise, as he had most cordially approved the arrangement made by our Government with Mr. Erskine. Further, that as respected the rejection of Mr. Jackson, he thought entirely with his colleague, that he might well have been dismissed on the receipt of his first letter. He tells us for what he had been sent and commanded to do. In the case of the Chesapeake, to make "declarations" and to receive counter "declarations" simultaneously. In other words, for the arrogance, insults, and murders, we had borne and suffered, he came to stipulate atonement, if we would stipulate a sort of counter atonement at the same time. Stipulation for stipulation, at any rate. It had "not appeared to His Majesty necessary to command him to propose to our Government any formal agreement" to take place of the rejected one. For the matter, said Mr. S., of Mr. Jackson's instructions, much rather than for the manner of his negotiation, might the communication have been cut off with him. Both matter and manner were, to be sure, objectionable, but the former, in his estimation, formed much the most solid ground of dismissal. It was but too obvious the mission of Mr. Jackson would end as the former one had done. That he did not come to propitiate us was but too manifest.

While the resolution before us, sir, affects to support the Executive Government against insult, and language "highly indecorous," it descends into a style of expression, itself more culpable and degrading; unworthy, indeed, of the country and the dignity of its Government. It was a flattering truth to know that in the style of diplomatic correspondence the American side of the question suffered not in comparison with that of any other. In the late, as well as for former instances, the advantage has been calculated, as he presumed, to inspire every American bosom with just sentiments of pride. Had it, therefore, been recommitted, as his colleague (Mr. MACON) had advised, he had no doubt it could have been amended, and rendered more worthy of consideration as a State paper, than it is likely to be in its present dress and form.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, if the measure be intended to have any effect, it must be a bad one. It looks toward war. Already are our difficulties with Great Britain critical enough, but if gentlemen wish war, the thing is altogether appropriate to its end; well calculated not to support, but to thwart the pacific views and intentions of the Executive. We may, in this way, foreclose the door of amicable negotiation which the Executive by his first Message showed us he had kept open. If rudeness of expression had been resorted to on the part of the British Minister, in his correspondence with our Government, had it not been repelled on their part? Had they not amply redressed the insult of the individual? It might well afford some consolation to ourselves and the country, if other wrongs and insults had been even as well repaired as this. Besides the murder of Pierce, the more horrid murders on board the Chesapeake, the continuation of impressments for years, we have had instances, more than one, it is said, of other Ministers conspiring with your conspirators, menacing you with war, and putting your Government at defiance, here in the ten miles square, and the sensibility of Congress had never before been awakened to a resolution of this kind in defence of the Executive. The truth is, sir, it never needed it, nor does it now. We have, in very deed, Mr. Speaker, refined upon the more substantial insults we have suffered, till we have literally reduced it to a war of words. It is the expressions of the individual we are combating, and pledging the whole force of the country to protect the President against the consequences of, and not the more palpable injuries received. Would to Heaven, sir, such a resolution had not been brought forward! It is unworthy of us—unworthy of the political professions we heretofore made, even those made at our late session.

That a resolution of approbation, Mr. Speaker, is against all example for the last eight years; that it is an innovation upon all usage and practice, reference need only be had to the speeches of gentlemen during the last session. They afford the most ample proof. They were then unwilling to pour out the oil of adulation upon the Executive head. It was deemed unnecessary, anti-republican, to do so. He hoped gentlemen understood him. He was using their own language upon that occasion, and not his own. He borrowed it for its excellence and fitness upon the present occasion. Such language conveyed his sentiments then, and still did; and, for his part, he could not comprehend how it could be correct then, and now the reverse of correct. Some gentlemen on the floor perfectly remembered that when Mr. Jefferson came into the Presidency, eight years ago, he changed the mode of personal address into that of written message. "In doing this," said he, in his first Message, "I have had a principal regard to the convenience of the Legislature, to the economy of their time, to their relief from the embarrassment of immediate answers on subjects not yet fully before them, and to the benefits thence resulting to the public affairs." All acquiesced in this new course, and from that time till the late instance mentioned, no time had been wasted in pouring back the oil of adulation or approbation, in any form, on the Executive head. The only instance which could be cited during the last eight years, was found incidentally incorporated in a resolution relating to the navigation of the Mississippi. The words were, "and relying with perfect confidence on the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive." This, then, was the only drop of this oil which the last Administration produced, and has been called up at this first ordinary session of a new Administration to form an example to follow; or rather, might we not say, to resume the exploded practice of former times, and thus echo back messages in this new form of joint resolution. But what was the style in which gentlemen spoke at our last summer session, when the subject of approbation was then before us? The language of one was, "if it were the object to bring before the House a discussion upon the Message of the President, and to return an answer to his Excellency's most gracious Message, he should certainly be opposed to it. If there had ever been a particular part of the former Administration which had met the approbation of the Republicans generally of this country, it was the discontinuance of the practice." Another had told us that he was "opposed to a deviation from what he conceived to be the duty, and becoming the dignity of the House." He thought the House had nobler duties to perform than passing abstract resolutions, out of which no legislative act is contemplated, merely for the purpose of pouring the oil of adulation upon the head of the Chief Magistrate." And, again, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY,) whose opinions are always so much relied upon and respected in this House, and he, Mr. S., trusted by few more sincerely than himself, had, upon that occasion, with singular happiness and force, spoken thus: "Law," said the gentleman, "is the only language of a Legislature. It is the only language that can command obedience and respect. Any equal number of citizens met in a tavern, and there passing a resolution of approbation, would have equal force with such a resolution passed in this House, and would be more in character. They are acting without authority from the Constitution or the rules of the House." It would be for that gentleman to tell us, to tell the House, and he would beg the gentleman's pardon for the particular request—but he must request that he would take the occasion to let us all know how his doctrine then is now to be got over. For his own part, he could not comprehend how right and wrong could change their respective sides in so short a time.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. FISK) had, also, at the late session of Congress, made a long, and by no means unhandsome display of his talents in a speech against "approbating the Executive," and a like lengthy display at the present session in favor of "approbating." The gentleman then thought a resolution of this kind "extraordinary." "He was against giving his vote of approbation as a Representative in this body, however meritorious might be the action which he had performed. He had not done an act of supererogation. He had only done his duty." Again, "he never wished to see that House converted into a temple for offering up adulation to the Executive Magistrate," and, finally, concluded with saying he "should vote for the indefinite postponement of the resolution. The House were setting a dangerous precedent, highly pernicious to the nation. They were going out of the line of their duty pointed out by the Constitution. If the motion to postpone did not succeed, he should not vote at all." The gentleman had, indeed, referred us back to the unexemplary times of 1798, and 1799, when we know the echoing approbation system was the fashion, not with a view, perhaps, in so many words, to recommend them for our present model, but to show the gentlemen on the other side of the House they had once thought differently, and had in the course of ten years, played the "political roundabout," and yet, by the same showing, the gentleman had himself shown that he had played the "political roundabout" in six short months. The "wheel and the dust" flew in one direction at the last session, and at the present it flies in the opposite direction, with equal velocity and more "dust;" and the gentleman, all the while, keeps pleasantly on the top—that part of the wheel which they say in Virginia runs the fastest, and he believed they were right, for so it does here, and there too.

His colleague, (Mr. MACON,) in referring to former times, had expressed some doubt whether the majority were the same party now they were then. He felt no doubt himself they were the same; but there was no room to doubt, from the present question itself, they had undergone some strange modification since former times. The doctrines then must be well remembered by him, yourself, Mr. Speaker, and a few others on this floor. The advocates of this sort of adulation must go back beyond the times of the late and last Administration, if they would introduce the fashion again. At the opening of the fifth Congress, in the answer of this House to the speech of the President, these words are used: "We cannot omit to testify our approbation of the measure, and to pledge ourselves that no considerations of private inconvenience shall prevent, on our part, a faithful discharge of the duties to which we are called." And again, this sentence: "Whilst we view with great satisfaction, the wisdom, dignity, and moderation, which have marked the measures of the Supreme Executive of our country in its attempt to remove, by candid explanations, the complaints and jealousies of France, we feel the full force of that indignity which has been offered our country in the rejection of its Minister." This language was too much in the style of adulation for us then to brook, and our names, sir, stand recorded together against it. Let gentlemen compare for themselves.

It is the peculiar misfortune, sir, of this system, if again to be revived, that the right of approbation fully implies the right of disapprobation and censure; and during the same Administration of which we are speaking, this right of disapproving and censuring was also attempted to be exercised. The resolution was introduced at the first session of the sixth Congress, by a gentleman then from the city of New York, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) in the case of Jonathan Robbins. The same gentleman is occasionally present here at this time, and seems yet to be a stickler for judicial decision, and still thinks the Executive, against an individual, matchless odds. The part of the resolution alluded to, runs thus: "that the decision of those questions by the President of the United States against the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in a case where those courts had already assumed and exercised jurisdiction, and his advice and request to the judge of the district court, that the person thus charged should be delivered up, provided, only, such evidence of his criminality should be produced as would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, is a dangerous interference of the Executive with judicial decisions." Hence, then, sir, it might be easily seen from a practice of this sort, that a whole session might be wasted without doing any part of the public business. The thing would be endless.

In the fourth Congress, on the subject of a call for papers in relation to the British Treaty, an unhappy difference arose between this House and the Executive. General WASHINGTON was the President. His reply to the House was, "that a just regard to the Constitution, and to the duty of his office, forbid a compliance with their request." The House again, by resolution, asserted their right, disclaiming, however, at the same time, any agency in making treaties. Notwithstanding the violence and passion of the moment, this House did not then think they had any right to meddle with the making of treaties; but now, it would seem the present House were disposed to join the Senate in this sort of interference in the negotiations of the Executive to form a treaty.

In all the cases alluded to, sir, it should be distinctly kept in view, that each House had acted for itself in voting their approbation and homage to Executive speeches and proclamations. He had reference to the proclamation of neutrality by General WASHINGTON. This was the first time Congress ever legislated approbation before.

But, Mr. S. said, not to protract the observations he had intended to make to an unnecessary length, he would come to his last position, which he deemed unanswerably conclusive. But, if he had misconceived the real force of that argument, or any other, it was competent for any gentleman to show it. The different gentlemen of the House had discovered much learning and research upon the occasion in hunting up authorities; but what had books on the laws of nations to do with the present resolution before us? What Wicquefort, Grotius, Martens, Puffendorff, and Vattel, had to do with it, he was entirely at a loss to perceive. A case against a case gentlemen had pretty clearly made out from these differing and different writers. Admit the arguments on either side, and still the propriety or impropriety of passing the present resolution was not to be affected or involved. He held in his hand the Constitution of the United States. He would make that his text book, and would beg leave to call the attention of the House to a single paragraph which it contained. It was the third of the seventh section, and first article, and reads thus:

"Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and, before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Mr. S. then observed he trusted the House would recollect that Congress were about to act, upon the present occasion, in their joint, solemn, legislative capacity; that the resolution was a joint one, and being so, it was one "to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be, and was, necessary," and indispensable. Hence, then, of necessity, it must be presented to the President for his approbation, before it could take effect, or, being disapproved by him, would have to take the course prescribed in the case of bills. Thus we see the unprecedented novelty, not to say absurdity of the thing. Both Houses, the Congress, the Legislature of the United States, pass a resolution approving the President. The President has to receive it, and approve our approbation; in other words, to approve himself—for as to disapprobation, that must be presumed to be out of the question; that could not be imagined. It would place the President in an unpleasant predicament, a thing no way necessary to be done, and, for one, he would not contribute to do it. And besides, when a paper like the present shall have been legislated through the several branches of the Government, shall have passed through all its forms in the great Councils of the Nation, it must be considered a State paper of no ordinary cast; and, in all probability, would become the subject of diplomatic correspondence abroad. At least, it was likely our Minister in London would have to be informed something about the occasion, the style, the form, and motives, of such a resolution on the part of our Government. He had seen almost every State paper required some such explanation, and we had no reason to believe such necessary explanation would be withheld.

Among the enumerated and specific powers given to Congress were to be seen the power to lay and collect taxes, borrow money, regulate commerce, establish rules of naturalization, coin money, and the like; all looking to some fair and proper object of general legislation; thence, some exercise of the Executive function, and some ultimate, probable, public good. But nothing of all this attaches to the present measure. It is, in its true character, nothing but words—an abstract, inoperative thing; a dead letter the moment it passed. Powers not delegated were retained, reserved to the people, and no such power as that we were about to exercise could be made appear to belong to Congress as a Legislature. It was the peculiar right of the people to approve or disapprove their functionaries, but not of the Congress, in any other way than the Constitution pointed out. If any gentleman on the floor could lay his hand upon his heart, and read this paragraph of the Constitution, and then say that we could, or ought to pass upon such a resolution, (for, let it be remembered, we are legislating—acting in our joint capacity,) it was more than he could allow himself to say, or to believe, under his oath to support it. If, indeed, we are now to form a new precedent, to be resorted to upon all future occasions, to give in to this new species of legislation, the field is an extended one, and we shall but distract ourselves, and commit an endless waste of time to no good purpose. Nothing good, and much evil may grow out of it.

Should the resolution, said Mr. S., be finally adopted, he would be permitted to say it was the first of the kind Congress ever had passed before, and he would defy the research of any gentleman in the House, however accurate, to find a single example of the kind since the Government commenced. The proceedings of both Houses were on record, and spread on the Journals of each, and if there was the shadow of a precedent for the measure he hoped it would be found. He humbly entreated of gentlemen to point it out. Mr. S. concluded with saying so exceptionable was the resolution to him in point of style, in point of form, and in point of Constitutionality, he sincerely wished its postponement; and if that would not do, and it must finally pass, it would have to do it without his vote.

Mr. QUINCY.—It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to offer any common-place apology for the few observations I shall submit to the House on the subject now under consideration. Such is the character, and such the consequences of these resolutions, that no man, who had at heart the honor and happiness of this country, ought to continue silent, so long as any topic of illustration is unexhausted, or any important point of view unoccupied.

It is proposed, sir, that this solemn assembly, the representative of the American people, the depository of their power, and in a Constitutional light, the image of their wisdom, should descend from the dignity of its legislative duties, to the task of uttering against an individual the mingled language of indignation and reproach. Not satisfied with seeing that individual prohibited the exercise of his official character, we are invited to pursue him with the joint terrors of legislative wrath, couched in terms selected to convey opprobrium and infix a stigma. "Indecorum," "insolence," "affront," "more insolence," "more affront," "direct, premeditated insult and affront," "disguises, fallacious and false;" these are the stains we are called upon to cast; these the wounds we are about to inflict. It is scarcely possible to comprise, within the same compass, more of the spirit of whatever is bitter in invective, and humiliating in aspersion. This heaped up measure of legislative contumely is prepared; for whom? For a private, unassisted, insulated, unallied individual? No, sir. For the accredited Minister of a great and powerful Sovereign, whose character he in this country represents, whose confidence he shares; of a Sovereign who is not bound, and perhaps will not be disposed to uphold him, in misconduct; but who is bound, by the highest moral obligations, and by the most impressive political considerations, to vindicate his wrongs, whether they affect his person or reputation, and to take care that whatever treatment he shall receive shall not exceed the measure of justice, and above all, that it does not amount to national indignity.

Important as is this view of these resolutions, it is not their most serious aspect. This bull of anathemas, scarcely less than Papal, is to be fulminated, in the name of the American people, from the high tower of their authority, under the pretence of asserting their rights and vindicating their wrongs. What will that people say, if, after the passions and excitements of this day shall have subsided, they shall find—and find I fear they will—that this resolution is false, in fact; that a falsehood is the basis of these aspersions upon the character of a public Minister? What will be their just indignation, when they find national embarrassments multiplied, perhaps their peace gone, their character disgraced, for no better reason than that you, their representatives, following headlong a temporary current, insist on making assertions, as they may then, and I believe will, realize to be not authorized by truth, under circumstances, and in terms, not warranted by wisdom?

Let us not be deceived. It is no slight responsibility which this House is about to assume. This is not one of those holiday resolutions, which frets and fumes its hour upon the stage and is forgotten forever. Very different is its character and consequences. It attempts to stamp dishonor and falsehood upon the forehead of a foreign Minister. If the allegation itself be false, it will turn to plague the accuser. In its train will follow severe retribution, perhaps in war; certainly in additional embarrassments, and most certainly, in worse than all, the loss of that sentiment of self-esteem, which to nations, as well as individuals, is "the pearl of great price;" which power cannot purchase, nor gold measure.

In this point of view, all the other questions which have been agitated in the course of this debate dwindle into utter insignificance. The attack or defence of Administration, the detection of fault, or even the exposure of crime are of no importance when brought into competition with the duty of rescuing this House and nation from the guilt of asserting what is false, and making that falsehood the basis of outrage and virulence. I avoid, therefore, all questions of censure or reproach on either the British Minister or the American Secretary of State. I confine myself to an examination of this resolution, particularly of the first branch of it. This is the foundation of all that follows. I shall submit it to a rigid analysis, not for the purpose of discovering how others have performed their duties, but of learning how we shall perform ours. The obligation to truth is the highest of moral and social duties.

It is remarkable, Mr. Speaker, that of all the gentlemen who have spoken, no one has taken the precise terms of the resolution as the basis of his argument, and followed that course of investigation which those terms naturally prescribe. Yet the obvious and only safe course, in a case of such high responsibility, is first to form a distinct idea of the assertion we are about to make, and then carefully to examine how that assertion is supported, if supported at all, by the evidence.

With this view I recur to the resolution, in the form in which it is proposed for our adoption, and make it the basis of my inquiries.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the expressions contained in the official letter of Francis J. Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty near the United States, dated the 23d day of October, 1809, and addressed to Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, conveying the idea that the Executive Government of the United States had a knowledge that the arrangement lately made by Mr. Erskine, his predecessor, in behalf of his Government with the Government of the United States, was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine, for that purpose, were highly indecorous and insolent."

This part of the resolution, it will not be denied, is the foundation of the whole. For if no such "idea was conveyed" in the letter of the 23d of October, then there could be no "repetition" of that idea, in the letter of the 4th of November; and if in the former part of his correspondence Mr. Jackson had made no such "insinuation," then the assertion in this letter that he had made none, was perfectly harmless and justifiable. This part, therefore, includes the pith of the resolution. If we analyse it, we shall find that it contains two distinct assertions. First, that the expressions alluded to convey a certain idea. Second, that this idea, so conveyed, is indecorous and insolent. Here again we are enabled to limit the field of our investigation. For, if no such idea, as is asserted, was conveyed, then the inquiry, whether such idea is indecorous and insolent, is wholly superseded. The true and only question, therefore, is, whether the expressions alluded to, do convey the asserted idea. I place the subject in this abstract form before the House to the end that, if possible, we may exclude all those prejudices and partialities which so naturally and imperceptibly bias the judgment. In the light in which it now stands, it must be apparent to every one who will reflect, that the question has, so far as it respects the principles on which our decision ought to proceed, no more to do with the relations between Great Britain and the United States, than it has with those between the United States and China, and has no more connexion with Mr. Francis J. Jackson and Mr. Robert Smith, than with the late Charles of Sweden, and the old Duke of Sudermania. It is a simple philological disquisition, which is to be decided by known rules of construction. The only investigation is, touching the power or capacity of certain terms to convey an alleged idea. However illy suited a question like this may be for the discussion of an assembly, like the present, yet if we would be just to ourselves and the people, we must submit to an examination of it, in that form in which alone certainty can be attained. It is only by stripping the subject of all adventitious circumstances, that we can arrive at that perfect view of its nature which can satisfy minds scrupulous of truth, and anxious concerning duty. It is only by such a rigorous scrutiny that we shall be able to form that judgment which will stand the test of time, and do honor to us and our country, when the passions of the day are passed away and forgotten.

Conduct of the British Minister.

The natural course of inquiry now is, into the idea which is asserted to be conveyed, and the expressions which are said to convey it. Concerning the first there is no difficulty. The idea asserted to be conveyed is, "that the arrangement made between Mr. Erskine and Mr. Smith was entered into by the American Government, with a knowledge that the powers of Mr. Erskine were incompetent for that purpose." It would save a world of trouble if the expressions in which this idea is said to be conveyed were equally easy of ascertainment. But on this point, those gentlemen who maintain this insult are far from being agreed. Some being of opinion that it is to be found in one place, some in another, and others again assert that it is to be found in the whole correspondence taken together. Never was an argument of this nature before so strangely conducted. Gentlemen seem wholly to lay out of sight that this resolution pledges this House to the assertion of a particular fact, and expresses no general sentiment concerning the conduct of Jackson, or the conduct of his Government. Yet, as if the whole subject of British relations was under discussion, they have deemed themselves at liberty to course through these documents, collect everything which seems to them indecorous, insolent, or unsuitable in Mr. Jackson's language, and add to the heap thus made the whole list of injuries received from Great Britain—impressments, affair of the Chesapeake, murder of Pierce—and all this, for what purpose? Why, truly, to justify this House in making a solemn asseveration of a particular fact! As if any injury in the world could be even an apology for the deliberate utterance of a falsehood. Let the conduct of Mr. Jackson, or of Great Britain, be as atrocious as it will, if the fact which we assert do not exist, we and this nation are disgraced. It is evident, then, that irksome as such a task is, it is necessary that we should submit to a precise inquiry into the truth of that to which we are about to pledge our reputation and that of this people.

In our investigation, let us follow the natural course that is pointed out in the resolution. This alleges that the obnoxious expressions are contained in the letter of the 23d of October, and to this limits our assertion. In this letter, therefore, either directly, or by way of reference to some other, this obnoxious idea or insinuation must be found. For if it be not in this, even if it should be contained in other parts of the correspondence, which is not, however, pretended, still our assertion would be false. Concerning this letter of the 23d. of October, I confidently assert, without fear of contradiction, that the obnoxious idea, if contained in that letter, is conveyed in the paragraph I am now about to quote. No man has pretended to cite any part of this letter, as evidence of the asserted insult, except the ensuing, and although there is not a perfect coincidence in opinion as to the particular part in which it resides, yet all agree that it lurks somewhere in this paragraph, if it have any dwelling place in this letter.

"I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing you that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were, at the time, in substance, made known to you; no stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement. Nothing can be more notorious than the frequency with which, in the course of complicated negotiation, Ministers are furnished with a gradation of conditions on which they may be successively authorized to conclude. So common is the case which you put hypothetically, that in acceding to the justice of your statement, I feel myself compelled to make only one observation upon it, which is, that it does not strike me as bearing upon the consideration of the unauthorized agreement concluded here, inasmuch as in point of fact Mr. Erskine had no such graduated instruction. You are already acquainted with that which was given, and I have had the honor of informing you that it was the only one by which the conditions on which he was to conclude were prescribed. So far from the terms which he was actually induced to accept, having been contemplated in that instruction, he himself states that they were substituted by you in lieu of those originally proposed."

I have quoted the whole paragraph because, in that obscure and general mode of argument in which gentlemen have indulged, it has been read as that entire portion in which the insult is conveyed. It is difficult to conceive how some parts of this paragraph can be thought to convey any insult. However, in prosecution of my plan, I shall first exclude all those parts in which the obnoxious idea cannot be pretended to exist, and then limit my investigation to that part in which it must exist, if, in the letter of the 23d of October, it be conveyed at all.

With respect to the first sentence in this paragraph, I say confidently that the insult is not contained there. It is simply a declaration of the causes of the disavowal, so far from including the obnoxious idea of a knowledge in our Government of the incompetency of Erskine's powers, that in a manner it excludes that idea, by enumerating violation of instructions, and want of authority as the only causes of the disavowal. In the first sentence, then, the insult is not. I pass by the second, as it will be the subject of a distinct examination hereafter. The third and fourth sentences it will not even be pretended convey this obnoxious idea. They simply acknowledge the frequency of graduated instructions, and assert the fact that Mr. Erskine's were not of that character. In this there is no insult. As little can it be pretended to exist in the fifth sentence. It merely asserts that Mr. Smith "already," that is, at or before the time Mr. Jackson was then writing, is acquainted with the instructions, (a fact not denied, and not suggested to be an insult,) and that the fact of these instructions being the only ones, Mr. Smith knows from the information of Mr. Jackson—an assertion, which so far from intimating the obnoxious idea of a knowledge in Mr. Smith at the time of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, that it conveys a contrary idea, by declaring that he was indebted for it to his (Mr. Jackson's) information. Here, then, the insult is not. With respect to the last sentence in this paragraph, the only assertions it contains, are the fact that the terms accepted were not contained in the instructions, and the evidence of this fact, derived from the statement of Erskine that those acceded to were substituted by Mr. Smith in lieu of those originally proposed. In all this, the knowledge of Mr. Smith of the incompetency of Mr. Erskine's powers is not so much as intimated. Indeed no one has pretended directly to assert that they have found it in the parts of this paragraph, from which I have thus excluded the obnoxious idea. Yet, as the whole has been cited, and made the basis of desultory declamation, I thought it not time lost to clear out of the way all irrelevant matter, and to leave for distinct examination the only sentence of this paragraph in which the insult lurks, if it has any existence in this letter. This point we have now attained. And as little inclined as gentlemen may be to precise investigation, they must yield to it. I say, therefore, confidently, and without fear of contradiction, that if the assertion contained in this resolution be capable of justification by any part of the letter of the 23d of October, it is by the following, the only remaining sentence of the cited paragraph which I have not yet examined: These instructions I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were, at the time, in substance made known to you; no stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement." The latter part of this sentence being merely a conclusion from the preceding part, and having no relation to the knowledge of our Government at the time of the arrangement, will be laid out of consideration as being obviously wholly without the possibility of any agency in conveying the obnoxious idea. There remains only the preceding part of this sentence for the residence of the insult. Here, if anywhere, it must exist. Accordingly this is usually shown as the spot where the ghost of insinuation first appeared before the eyes of our astonished Administration. Here we shall again find it; unless, indeed, it were in fact a mere delusion of the fancy, formed of "such stuff as dreams are made." Let us examine by way of analysis.

The sentence to which the advocates of this insulting insinuation are now reduced contains, first, a fact asserted; second, the sources from which a knowledge of that fact is derived. The fact asserted is, that the "instructions were, at the time, in substance made known to you." The sources stated are Mr. Smith's "letter of the 19th of October, and the obvious deductions in his (Mr. Jackson's) letter of the 11th." The question is, whether in either of these branches, or in both taken together, directly, or in the way of reference, the following idea is by any fair construction conveyed, viz: "That at the time of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the Government of the United States had a knowledge of the incompetency of Erskine's powers."

Previous to proceeding further, I wish to make a single observation, by way of illustrating the nature and strength of the argument I shall offer. To induce this House to adopt a resolution so pregnant with consequences to the hopes and character of this people, it cannot be sufficient merely to show that the insinuation, on which their assertion is predicated, may be conveyed, it will require certainty that not only this idea is, but also that no other possibly can be. Surely if it be possible to show, or even make it probable, that another and an innocent idea may be conveyed, this House will never consent to make an assertion of such high responsibility on such dubious ground. For the purpose of defeating this resolution, it would therefore be amply sufficient for me to show that an idea, other than the obnoxious one, may be conveyed. But I do not limit myself to this task, I undertake to show not only that another idea than the obnoxious one may be conveyed, but that another is, and that the idea asserted in this resolution is not, and by any fair construction of language cannot possibly be, conveyed by these expressions.

The question recurs, in the fact asserted, in this sentence, Is the knowledge of our Government of the incompetency of Erskine's powers intimated? So far from conveying such an idea, that it intimates nothing concerning the knowledge of our Government in relation to the general state of Mr. Erskine's powers. The simple assertion is, "you knew the substance of those instructions," because you admit you knew the conditions, and I tell you these were the substance. So far from this assertion conveying the idea of a knowledge in our Government of the general state of Mr. Erskine's power, that if Mr. Jackson had here expressly asserted that those instructions were shown in extenso to our Government, although this, after the denial of Mr. Smith, might have been insult, yet it would not have conveyed the obnoxious idea, nor authorized this resolution, unless he had also asserted, or it was a fact, that those instructions included an exclusion of all other powers. Because the assertion of the knowledge of a particular power, which does not include such an exclusion, can never convey the idea of the general incompetency of the agent. In order to make my argument distinct, I will state it more generally. If a particular power contain an exclusion of all other powers, except those expressed in it, then, an assertion that this particular power was known may convey the idea of a knowledge of the general incompetency of the agent. But if such partiacular power does not in fact contain an exclusion of all other powers, then to assert that this particular power was known, can never convey the idea of a knowledge of such general incompetency. In this case it is not even suggested that the instructions in question did include any such exclusion of other powers. An assertion, therefore, that they were known, can never convey the idea of a general knowledge of the incompetency of the agent, unless a part can be made to include the whole, and an assertion that one thing is known can be made to convey the idea that everything is known. If, then, an assertion of a knowledge in our Government of the instructions in extenso, would not have conveyed the idea of a general knowledge of Mr. Erskine's powers; by much stronger reason a simple assertion, that not only the substance of those instructions was known cannot convey that idea. I say, therefore, that so far as respects the fact here asserted, not only another idea than the obnoxious one, may be conveyed, but that another idea is, and that the idea this resolution asserts, cannot by any possibility be conveyed. So that if this idea is to be found anywhere in this letter of the 23d of October, it must be in consequence of the reference to the two letters of the 19th and the 11th, which Mr. Jackson says were the sources by means of which he understood the facts he asserts. Into these letters, therefore, we must look after the insulting idea, for we have now shown that it is not in the letter of the 23d of October, unless it be by virtue of this reference.

With respect to Mr. Smith's letter of the 19th, the assertion "I understand by your letter, (that of the 19th.) that the substance of those instructions was known to you," has been represented as insolent. So far from being insolent, it is not so much as a contradiction. Mr. Smith says, "I knew the three conditions." "That is what I say," replies Mr. Jackson, "you know the substance, because I tell you that those three conditions were the substance." Here is no contradiction. The only fact open to dispute is, whether the three conditions were the substance. Mr. Jackson indeed asserts, but Mr. Smith does not deny this fact. He only admits that he knew the three conditions; neither admitting nor controverting the fact asserted by Mr. Jackson that they were the substance. But, taking it for granted that this assertion was insolent, general insolence is no justification to this House for asserting a particular fact. It is enough, however, for the present argument to observe, that the obnoxious idea, which is the basis of the resolution, cannot be conveyed by means of this reference to the letter of the 19th, not only from the argument just now adduced, and showing that even the assertion that these instructions were known in extenso would not have conveyed that idea, but also from this further consideration, that no gentleman has pretended that it was in consequence of this reference to that letter that this obnoxious idea was conveyed.

The advocates of this insult and of this resolution are, therefore, driven back to the letter of the 11th. If it be not found here, it can be found nowhere, at least to justify this resolution. With respect to this letter of the 11th, we are subjected to the same difficulty to which we were reduced in relation to the letter of the 23d. Many passages have been read for the purpose of general comment, to which, in pursuance of my plan, I shall make no allusion. I confine myself only to those passages which have been cited to prove the particular idea asserted in this resolution. None of these I shall omit. With anything else under this resolution we have nothing to do, unless we are willing, by suffering extraneous influence to operate, to mislead our own judgments, and to deceive our fellow-citizens.

The following paragraph in the letter of the 11th of October, is the first, and the one principally relied upon, to prove the existence of that obnoxious insinuation which is the basis of the resolution. "I observe, that in the records of this mission there is no trace of complaint on the part of the United States of His Majesty having disavowed the act of his Minister. You have not in the conferences we have hitherto held, distinctly announced any such complaint, and I have seen with pleasure, in this forbearance on your part, an instance of that candor which I doubt not will prevail in all our communications, inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed." Here is the insult, the advocates of this resolution assert, in a sort of embryo state. Let us look at it through the spectacles of the friends of the Administration, without any disposition to distort or to change any of its proportions. The features of this insult, say these gentlemen, consist in this: first, in referring to the thoughts of Mr. Smith; second, in intimating that his thoughts must have been such as to satisfy him that it was unreasonable to complain of an act done under such circumstances. In this the insult consists. In other words, in this the obnoxious idea is conveyed; because it implies a knowledge in Mr. Smith, that it was done under circumstances which could only lead to a disavowal. Now, say they, the circumstance which could only lead to a disavowal, is a knowledge in Mr. Smith at the time of the arrangement of the incompetency of Mr. Erskine's powers. Thus, say they, the knowledge of that incompetency is implied, and the idea asserted in this resolution, conveyed. This is a fair and full statement of their argument. I reply—I do agree that these expressions do imply a knowledge in Mr. Smith, that it was done under circumstances which could only lead to a disavowal. But it does not imply that this knowledge existed in Mr. Smith at the time of the arrangement made; but, on the contrary, does imply and can imply only a knowledge in Mr. Smith at the time of the disavowal known. The former is the only implication which can possibly be obnoxious, the latter is most innocent, because at the time of the disavowal known, the circumstances which led to that disavowal were communicated. An intimation of this knowledge in Mr. Smith could not but be, therefore, perfectly inoffensive. That these expressions cannot imply a knowledge in Mr. Smith at the time of the arrangement made, and can only imply a knowledge in him at the time of disavowal known, I argue from this fact, that the only time intimated is the time when Mr. Smith "could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal." Now Mr. Smith could not have begun to think of complaining of the disavowal, until the disavowal was known to him; and with that knowledge came also the knowledge of the circumstances which led to it. Nothing, therefore, can be more plain than that the time here implied is the time after the disavowal was known, and not the time of the arrangement made. The fair construction of these expressions is, "you must have thought it, Mr. Smith, unreasonable to complain after you knew of the disavowal, for that knowledge apprized you that the act was done under circumstances which could only lead to a disavowal." I say, therefore, that the idea asserted in this resolution (a knowledge in Mr. Smith at the time of the arrangement) is not conveyed in this paragraph; another idea is conveyed, viz: a knowledge at the time of disavowal known. I say further, that the idea of knowledge and incompetency of Mr. Erskine's powers, in Mr. Smith, at the time of the arrangement, cannot by any possibility be conveyed, unless the assertion of a knowledge, existing at a time subsequent, can be made to express such knowledge, limited to a time antecedent. The only knowledge implied is subsequent to disavowal, and so by no possibility can be wrested to express the state of knowledge at a time antecedent to disavowal.

The ensuing paragraph I cite at large, because it has been quoted by some of the advocates of this resolution as containing the obnoxious idea, although it requires only a single perusal to satisfy any mind that it is impossible that the far greatest part of it can contain anything offensive. It is the only paragraph remaining unexamined which has been thus quoted, and will require a very short elucidation. "It was not known when I left England, whether Mr. Erskine had, according to the liberty allowed him, communicated to you, in extenso, his original instructions. It now appears that he did not. But, in reverting to his official correspondence, and particularly to a despatch addressed on the 20th of April to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I find that he there states that he had submitted to your consideration the three conditions specified in those instructions, as the groundwork of an arrangement, which, according to information received from this country, it was thought in England might be made with a prospect of great mutual advantage. Mr. Erskine then reports, verbatim et seriatim, your observations upon each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in ' lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions, but the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions, and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th of April, is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation; nor need I draw the conclusion which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that under such circumstances His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister."

On this passage it is only necessary to remark, that so far as it respects the assertion that Mr. Erskine had submitted to Mr. Smith the three conditions specified in those instructions, the fact is admitted by Mr. Smith; that so far as it respects Mr. Jackson's assertion that Mr. Erskine reports, in his official correspondence, the reasons which induced Mr. Smith to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them, that it is not denied by Mr. Smith. For, in his letter of the 19th, Mr. Smith, referring to this subject, expresses himself very cautiously, that Mr. Erskine "on finding his first proposals unsuccessful, the more reasonable terms comprised in the arrangement respecting the Orders in Council were adopted;" without denying, as he would, if it had been false, and he thought it material, that he had offered "reasons to Mr. Erskine which had induced Mr. Smith to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them." But whether true or false, the assertion that Mr. Smith had offered such reasons to Mr. Erskine can never, by any fair construction, be made to convey the idea that Mr. Smith knew that Mr. Erskine's powers were limited to the three conditions, or, in other words, that Erskine's powers were incompetent. Upon the next sentence, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) lays great stress, asserting that "it conveys the idea that Mr. Smith had overreached Mr. Erskine." Concerning this sentence my first assertion is, that whatever else it may convey, it can never convey the idea asserted in this resolution. For certainly, to say of two classes of conditions under consideration, that Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine concluded together, that the one was equivalent to the other, can only imply a comparison and a knowledge of those classes, and by no possibility can imply the state of Mr. Smith's knowledge in relation to Mr. Erskine's right to conclude concerning either of them. So that for all the purposes of supporting this resolution it is utterly useless, whatever other demerit it may have. The strenuousness of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) on this point, shows the crude ideas which even he, usually so acute and correct, entertains concerning his duties on this occasion. His great aim was to show that Mr. Jackson here intimates the idea that Mr. Smith had overreached Mr. Erskine. Well, suppose he had said this directly in so many words? Would that justify this House in voting that Mr. Jackson had conveyed the idea asserted in this resolution? It is the universal fallacy—prove anything rude or indecent, and it is a sufficient justification to this House for asserting a particular, independent fact. Is it possible for any mode of conduct to be more unjustifiable, or thoughtless; more calculated to bring shame upon ourselves, and disgrace upon the nation?

The next and last sentence in this paragraph is merely a declaration of the obvious difference between the conditions in the instructions, and those contained in the arrangement, accompanied by a reference, by way of recapitulation to the circumstances alluded to, in the paragraph which has been before considered. As it has been shown that this paragraph did not contain the obnoxious idea, it needs no argument to show it is not contained in this sentence. Indeed, I have not heard it pretended that this is the place of the insult.

I have thus far proceeded by way of a strict analysis of every part of the correspondence, in which the insulting idea, asserted in this resolution, has been said to be conveyed. I have omitted no part, which has been cited in support of this first resolution, and think I have shown that it exists nowhere in the letter of the 23d of October, either in direct assertion, or by way of reference. And it is concerning what is contained in that letter alone, that the resolution under consideration makes assertion. The House will observe that, according to all rules of fair reasoning, it would have been sufficient for me to have limited myself to show the fallacy of the arguments of the advocates of this insult. It being always incumbent on those who assert the existence of anything to prove it. I have not, however, thought my duty on so important an occasion fulfilled, unless I undertook to prove what the lawyers call "a negative," and to show, with as much strength of reasoning as I had, the non-existence of the idea asserted in this resolution; with what success, I cheerfully leave to the decision of such thoughtful men in the nation who will take the trouble to understand the argument. There is, however, a corroborative view of this subject, which ought not to be omitted.

The insulting idea said to be conveyed is, that Mr. Smith had a knowledge, at the time of the arrangement of the incompetency of Erskine's powers, and this because such a knowledge was one of the essential circumstances which could only lead to a disavowal. Now it does happen, that neither Mr. Erskine nor his Government enumerate this knowledge of our Government as one of those essential circumstances. On the contrary, they constantly omit it, when formally enumerating those circumstances. Mr. Canning places the disavowal, solely, on the footing of Mr. Erskine's having "acted not only not in conformity, but in direct contradiction to his instructions." Mr. Jackson, also, in his letter of the 23d, when formally enumerating the causes of the disavowal, says expressly, that the disavowal was "because the agreement was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it." Now is it not most extraordinary that after such formal statements, not including the knowledge of our Government among the essential circumstances, that it is on this knowledge the British Government intend to rely for the justification of their disavowal? I simply ask this question, if the British did intend thus to rely on the previous knowledge of our Government, why do they always omit it in their formal enumerations? And if they do not intend thus to rely, in what possible way could it serve that Government thus darkly to insinuate it? But, as if it were intended to leave this House wholly without excuse in passing this resolution, Mr. Jackson expressly asserts, in this very letter of the 23d of October, that the information of that fact was derived from him, the knowledge of which, this resolution asserts, he intended to intimate was known at the time of the arrangement with Erskine. For he specifically says: "I have had the honor of informing you that it (Mr. Erskine's instruction) was the only one by which the conditions on which he was to conclude were prescribed." Now, if Mr. Jackson had remotely intended to intimate that Mr. Smith had a previous knowledge of that fact, would he have asserted that he was indebted to him (Mr. Jackson) for the information? Conclusive as this argument is, there is yet another in reserve, which is a clencher. And that is, that this very knowledge which we propose solemnly to affirm, Mr. Jackson intimated our Government possessed at the time of the arrangement, it is, from the nature of things, impossible they should have possessed. The idea asserted to be intended to be conveyed is, a knowledge in our Government that the arrangement was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine. Now the fact that Mr. Erskine's powers were incompetent, it was impossible for our Government to know, except from the confession of Mr. Erskine. But Mr. Erskine before, at the time, and ever since, has uniformly asserted the reverse. So that, besides all the other absurdities growing out of this resolution, there is this additional, that it accuses Mr. Jackson of the senseless stupidity of insinuating as a fact, a knowledge in our Government, which from the undeniable state of things it is not possible they should have possessed. Mr. Speaker, can any argument be more conclusive? 1. The idea is not conveyed by the form of the expression. 2. Mr. Jackson, though expressly enumerating the only causes which led to a disavowal, does not suggest this. 3. Mr. Jackson expressly asserts that the knowledge that these were the only instructions derived from him, of course it could not have been known previous to the arrangement. 4. Had he been absurd enough to attempt to convey such an idea, the very nature of things shows that it could not exist. I confess I am ignorant by what reasoning the non-existence of an insinuation can be demonstrated, if it be not by this concurrence of arguments.

Before I conclude this part of the subject, it will be necessary to make a single observation or two, on the following passage in Mr. Jackson's letter of the 4th of November, for although our assertion has relation in the part of the resolution under consideration, only to the letter of the 23d of October, yet this subsequent passage has been adduced as a sort of accessory after the fact. "You will find that, in my correspondence with you, I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation, where I was unable to substantiate a fact. To facts, as I have become acquainted with them, I have scrupulously adhered." This, the subsequent part of the resolution under debate denominates "the repetition of the same intimation." But if the argument I have offered be correct, there was no such "intimation" in the preceding letters, and of course no repetition of it here. For if he had, as I think I have proved, in his former letters uttered no such insinuation as is asserted, then all the allegations in this paragraph are wholly harmless and decorous, neither disrespectful nor improper. "But this," says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MILNOR) "is conclusive to my mind that Mr. Jackson did intend to insult, for if he had not would he have refrained from giving an explanation when it was asked?" That gentleman will recollect that the assertion of this House is as to the idea which Mr. Jackson has conveyed in the letter of the 23d, not as to the idea which he intended to convey. Suppose he intended it, and has not done it, our assertion is still false. But will that gentleman seriously conclude, contrary to so obvious a course of argument, that he has asserted, or even intended to assert, this particular idea, merely because he does not choose to explain it? Are there not a thousand reasons which might have induced Mr. Jackson not to explain, consistent with being perfectly innocent of the intention, originally to convey it? Perhaps he thought that he had already been explicit enough. Perhaps he thought the explanation was asked in terms which did not entitle Mr. Smith to receive it. Perhaps he did not choose to give this satisfaction. Well, that now is "very ungentlemanly," says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MILNOR.) I agree, if he pleases, so it was. But does that justify this resolution? Because he is not a gentleman, shall we assert a falsehood?

I briefly recapitulate the leading points of my argument. When Mr. Jackson asserts "that the substance of the instructions was known to our Government," the expression cannot convey the obnoxious idea, because it is not pretended that, in those instructions, the existence of other powers was excluded. When he says, "you must have thought it unreasonable to complain of disavowal," the time of knowledge implied is confined by the structure of the sentence to the time of a disavowal known, and cannot be limited backwards to the time of arrangement made. It is also absurd to suppose that Mr. Jackson would intimate by implication the knowledge of our Government of Erskine's incompetency of powers at the time of arrangement, as an essential circumstance on which the King's right of disavowal was founded, and yet omit that circumstance, in a formal enumeration; and lastly, it is still more absurd to suppose that he would undertake to insinuate a knowledge, which, from the nature of things, could not possibly exist.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, submitted to a strict and minute scrutiny all the parts of this correspondence which have been adduced by any one in support of the fact asserted in this resolution. This course, however irksome, I thought it my duty to adopt, to the end that no exertion of mine might be wanting to prevent this House from passing a resolution, which, in my apprehension, is pregnant with national disgrace, and other innumerable evils.

But let us suppose for one moment that the fact asserted in this resolution is true; that the insult has been offered; and that the proof is not obscure and doubtful, but certain and clear. I ask, is it wise, is it politic, is it manly for a National Legislature to utter on any occasion, particularly against an individual, invectives so full of contumely and bitterness? Shall we gain anything by it? Have such expressions a tendency to strengthen our cause, or add weight and respectability to those who advocate it? In private life do men increase respect, or multiply their friends, by using the language of intemperate abuse? Sudden anger may be an excuse for an individual. Inability to avenge an insult may afford an apology to him for resorting to these women's weapons. But what can excuse a nation for humiliating itself to the use of such vindictive aspersions? Can we plead sudden rage? We on whose wrath thirty suns have gone down? Is this nation prepared to resort for apologies to its weakness, and to confess that, being unable to do anything else, it will strive to envenom its adversary with the tongue? But our honor is assailed. Is this a medicament for its wounds? If not, why engage in such retaliatory insults? Which is best, to leave the British Monarch at liberty to decide upon the conduct of his Minister, without any deduction or sympathy on account of our virulence, or to necessitate him, in measuring out justice, to put your intemperance in the scale against his imprudence? Railing for railing is a fair offset all over the world. And I ask gentlemen to consider, whether it be not an equivalent for a constructive insinuation?

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the hand of the Chief Magistrate of this nation is in this thing. In every aspect, this resolution is at war with that wise and temperate ground on which he has placed this insult, in the letter to Mr. Pinkney:

"You are particularly instructed, in making those communications, to do it in a manner that will leave no doubt of the undiminished desire of the United States to unite in all the means, the best calculated to establish the relations of the two countries on the solid foundation of justice, of friendship, and of mutual interests."

Is there a man in this House who can lay his hand on his heart and say that, by adopting this resolution, we are about "to unite in all the means 'the best calculated to establish the relations of 'the two countries on the solid foundations of 'justice, friendship, and mutual interest?" I hesitate not to say, that there is no man who can make such an asseveration.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

But, if it would be wise and politic to refrain from uttering this opprobrious resolution, in case the insult was gross, palpable, and undeniable, how much more wise and politic, if this insult be only dubious, and has, at best, but a glimmering existence? But, suppose the assertion contained in this resolution be, as it appears to many minds, and certainly to mine—false; I ask what worse disgrace, what lower depth of infamy can there be, for a nation, than deliberately to assert a falsehood, and to make the falsehood the groundwork of a graduated scale of atrocious aspersions upon the character of a public Minister?

When I say that the assertion contained in this resolution is false, I beg gentlemen distinctly to understand me. I speak only as respects the effects of evidence upon my mind. I pretend not to make my perceptions the standard of those of any other. I know the nature of the human mind, and how imperceptibly, even to ourselves, passion and preconception will throw, as it were, a mist before the intellectual eye, and bend or scatter the rays of evidence before they strike on its vision. On a question of this kind, as I would not trust the casual impressions of others, so I have been equally unwilling to trust my own. I have, therefore, submitted the grounds of my opinion to a rigid analysis. The process and the result of my reasonings I have laid before this House. If that which, to me, appears a palpable falsehood, to others appears a truth, I condemn not them. I can only lament such a diversity on a point, which, in its consequences, may be so important to the peace and character of the country.

Bur this resolution was devised for the purpose of promoting unanimity. Is there a man in this House who believes it? Did you ever hear, Mr. Speaker, that language of reproach and insult was the signal for conciliation? Did you ever know contending parties made to harmonize in terms of insult, of reproach, and contumely? No, sir. I deprecate this resolution on this very account, that it is much more like the torch of the furies, than like the token of friendship. Accordingly, it has had the effect of enkindling party passions in the House, which had begun, in some degree, to be allayed. It could not possibly be otherwise. A question is raised concerning a constructive insult. Of all topics of dispute, those relative to the meaning of terms, are most likely to beget diversity and obstinacy in opinion. But this is not all. On a question merely relative to the construction of particular expressions, all the great and critical relations of the nation have been discussed. Is it possible to conceive that such a question as this, on which the debate has been thus conducted, could be productive of anything else than discord and contention?

For my own part, I have purposely avoided all reference to any of the great questions which agitate the nation. I should deem myself humiliated to discuss them, under a resolution of this kind, which, in truth, decides nothing, but our opinion of the meaning of Mr. Jackson's language, and our sense of its nature; and has, strictly speaking, nothing to do with any of the national questions which have been drawn into debate.

I declare, therefore, distinctly, that I oppose and vote against this resolution from no one consideration relative to Great Britain or the United States; from none of friendship or animosity to any one man, or any set of men. But simply and solely for this one reason, that, in my conception, the assertion, contained in this resolution, is a falsehood.

But it is said that this resolution must be taken as a "test of patriotism." To this I have but one answer. If patriotism ask me to assert a falsehood, I have no hesitation in telling patriotism—"I am not prepared to make that sacrifice." The duty we owe to our country, is, indeed, among the most solemn and impressive of all obligations. Yet, high as it may be, it is, nevertheless, subordinate to that which we owe to that Being, with whose name and character truth is identified. In this respect, I deem myself acting upon this resolution under a higher responsibility than either to this House or to this people.

Mr. GARDENIER said that he had the honor to represent a portion of this country, that was peculiarly and he might add exclusively interested in an intercourse with the British dominions. It is in the dominions of Great Britain, sir, said he, and in those alone, that they find a market for the products of their honest toil. It is, therefore, that they will not be persuaded to abandon that intercourse, the cause of all their prosperity, the cutting off of which must reduce them to indigence and distress, unless in a case of the most imperious necessity. Gentlemen may talk in this House, and others may talk out of it, as they please, the passions of men may be worked up to any extent that human ingenuity can urge them; but when they have said and done all, the prosperity of the farmers, "of God's chosen people," in the Northern and Eastern States, depends upon this intercourse; without it they must be poor, and revert to that state of indigence in which our glorious Revolution left them. They will not abandon it on light ground; and, therefore, sir, I, as their representative, will not abandon it or see it abandoned but for the most cogent reasons. It is this same people which has been made most deeply to feel the effects of that experimental embargo system which evaporated last Spring. Yes, sir, we have suffered by it—I was about to say we alone—but I will add, all the other inhabitants of the United States, who tilled the earth for the purpose of getting eatables out of it, because it is this species of our produce of which the British dominions stand in need. We shall suffer by it to the end of time, because the experiment made at our expense has taught those who were the consumers of what we raise, the means of doing without it. Yes, sir, we have suffered particularly by this system, and must suffer by every system growing out of the same principle. I beg gentlemen from the South to reflect that their cotton, tobacco, and rice, find a market principally on the Continent, and very much in France; they are not interested in the market in which we are, they have not suffered as we have, because at any rate they could not go to France. France would not let them come, and England would not let them go, and they themselves declared they ought not to go.

The measure which is now proposed for the adoption of this assembly is a visitation which is worse than all the plagues through which we have gone. It is still worse than war itself, nearly the most dreadful calamity that can befall this nation. It is the worst measure that could have entered a head the most fertile in pernicious experiments; and this I shall endeavor to demonstrate. But let me first inquire whether it is the object of this resolution to lead us into a war? Gentlemen say, no; war is not intended to be produced by it. Then, sir, to what end and for purpose is the pledge, contained in the resolution, to be given? We are to pledge ourselves to bring out the whole force of the nation in support of the determination of the Executive; and yet that state of things which can alone call for bringing out this force is not to happen! We are to have no war, say gentlemen, and that in the same breath, in which they say they will bring out the whole force of the United States. Why then, sir, if it is to be so, if we are indeed to have no war, if it be not looked upon as probable, the whole sinks down to that empty paper gasconade to which I think it high time to put an end. But if it be a prelude to war, as the resolution indicates, and as on the face of it it appears to me to be intended, then let us pause a moment before we plunge our country into the calamities attendant on that state of things! It is easy to get into a war, but it is not so easy to get out of it! And here again, the country which I in part represent is to bear the brunt. If war should come, our defenceless seaports, in which is deposited the portable wealth of the nation, will be the first object of attack, of plunder, and of destruction; and if we are to have war, we must calculate that our enemy will endeavor to make that war as distressing as she can. The subjugation of our country she will never be mad enough to think of attempting. If she could not manage the infant in its cradle, she will hardly attempt to subdue the full-grown giant in his strength. It must be a war of plunder, devastation, and ruin, wherever it reaches. In the inland country, where no force can penetrate, they will only have to bear the burden of excessive taxation to defray the expenses of the war. We are subject not to that alone, but to the loss of those very means which would enable us to bear this taxation. What, in the event of war, would prevent the British from sailing up the Hudson, and from plundering and laying waste the whole of the fertile country on its banks, and the towns which rejoice to be planted on its shores? Nothing. Yes, sir, you may talk of war; but when that state of things comes, you will have cause to say it required strong considerations indeed to justify you in producing it.

But, sir, this is not all. Remember that when we have war, we must have armies; when we have armies we must have a General; and remember that at the close of the Revolution, a period when there was more purity, more sincere patriotism than can possibly ever be found again—even then you found that there were men who dared to attempt to keep embodied the army which had procured your liberty—and under what pretence? The want of pay. Are you sure that pretence would not again exist? Are you sure that none equally powerful may exist? Are you sure, if an attempt should be made after another war to excite the military to become the rulers of the country, that we should find another WASHINGTON to put down the traitorous parricidal attempt? I know not who may be the General then; but from the present I have little to hope. The school of Burr is not the school of patriot Generals. This Republic, notwithstanding all doubts to the contrary, can, in my opinion, exist to the end of time, unless it be put down by foreign invasion or by a military force collected within its own limits. It is hence that I dread a war; because a war must produce armies; and I am not satisfied that when there are armies we shall be safe, because they may be commanded by Republican Generals. The Republic of Rome was destroyed by a popular General. The leader of the Republic put down the Republic in England, and the great Napoleon had sworn eternal enmity to all Kings!

But I have said that the adoption of this resolution would be worse and more to be dreaded than even a state of war. To war there may be an end. You may conquer, you may compromise, and you may be obliged to yield. Neither of these is as pernicious as what this resolution promises. You are called upon to pass sentence in the face of the world, upon the reputation of a Minister of a great and powerful nation. This is the object of the resolution. I believe my honorable friend from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) who spoke the other day, was not afraid, as was supposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPEL), that his heart would be overcome by the irresistible charms of this resolution. I believe his paying little attention to its particular features was not owing to that. If it was, sir, his heart has become more susceptible than we have any evidence of its having been heretofore. I confess that I see in the resolution none of those charms that have so forcibly impressed themselves on the affections of the gentleman from Virginia. There is a coarseness of feature and a ruffian dialect, and altogether the style of a bully about it. Things not calculated to fascinate, whatever other impression they may make. It contains a condemnation of the conduct of a foreign Minister, an affair, in the first place, with which we have no Constitutional right to interfere, which belongs exclusively to the Executive, and upon which the Executive has not thought proper to intimate that it would be expedient for us to act, in order to aid him; but which we are to take up of our own mere volition, to no useful purpose, but perhaps so as to induce the most disastrous consequences. I shall not on this occasion examine whether the language of Mr. Jackson was insolent, affronting, and so forth; nor whether the dismissal of him by the Executive was proper; because as this subject does not constitutionally belong to the Legislature, I would avoid as long as I could any remarks on it. It is to another point alone that I shall apply my observations. Allowing for the sake of argument—1st, that Mr. Jackson was insolent; 2d, that the President did right in dismissing him—I still contend this resolution ought not to pass; and to bring my ideas more particularly to a point, it is, therefore, that I am desirous that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts now under consideration should prevail.

I have forborne to make any remarks on this subject in Committee of the Whole, because I did not wish to excite feelings which can but lead to imprudencies, and because I was well satisfied that the resolutions would be reported by the Committee of the Whole. And upon the whole, sir, I cannot say I am much displeas'd that the committee did agree to report them; but in reporting them I think they have done all that their own arguments call upon the friends of the Executive to do; and that when we give them legislative form and sanction, no one useful purpose can be answered by it, but much pernicious consequence may be produced. It is said, inasmuch as Mr. Jackson was insolent, inasmuch as Mr. Madison did right in dismissing him, that the President ought to have a knowledge of the sense of the members of the Legislature on these two points, so that he may be certain that the course which he shall pursue to vindicate the national honor, will meet with a proper support in the Legislature. Well, sir—is not the President now convinced of the sentiments of the majority in both Houses? Is he not now satisfied that they think he was right in the manner in which he considered Jackson's conduct, and that he was right in dismissing him? If there were any use (which I do not agree that there is) in the President's knowing what is the opinion of both Houses of Congress on his conduct, he knows it already from what has already taken place. Giving this resolution the sanction of Legislative form cannot, therefore, be for the purpose of making the President feel that he is supported; for, if that be really the purpose, it is answered already. The Administration say Jackson was guilty of a gross insinuation, and they have dismissed him. We come out, and not only echo this sentiment, though in grosser language, but say that we will draw out the whole force of the nation against any one who says differently. I will suppose, for the sake of argument, that the British Government will entertain the same opinion of Mr. Jackson's conduct that ours has expressed; that they will think his dismissal to have been proper, or, that finding him unacceptable, they would be willing to send another Minister. What will they say when you appeal to them not by argument but by menace—when you are not content with laying before them the conduct of their Minister, and requesting them, by recalling him, to pass the same censure on him which you yourselves are supposed to have done? What will they say, when instead of appealing to the justice or politeness of the British King in the first place, the Legislature tell him, if you do not agree to recall your Minister, here is the whole force of the nation to back our demand. What is this but a threat? They may say, "we should have been willing to yield to your argument, or at any rate to your request; but to your menace we cannot." Sir, you are about to deprive them of the power of yielding to you. I will put a case. Your servant, Mr. Speaker, has injured me; I represent his conduct to you, and say that if you do not punish him I am determined to have satisfaction of you. Your reply would be, that you could not listen to me, lest it should be supposed that you yielded through fear and not from a sense of justice. You would answer, had you appealed to my justice, I had yielded; you have appealed to my fears, and you have appealed in vain. If the object of this resolution be utterly to prevent the possibility of Great Britain and this country agreeing on this matter, no step could be devised in nature more certain of producing this result. Do you know beforehand that Great Britain will stand by her Minister? Is an apprehension entertained of that? Is it then doubtful whether the Minister has done wrong? Or if not, is the Government of Great Britain so profligate that you suppose she will support her Minister when he has done wrong? Grant it. But is this an argument by which you expect to obtain her acquiescence? It is out of the question. By adopting these resolutions, you will have violated the reputation of an Ambassador, no less sacred than his person. To punish him, either in person or reputation, is the prerogative of his Sovereign alone. How then can negotiation hereafter of any kind, or under any circumstances, be renewed between the two Governments? Here is thrown in the way a barrier which must be removed before ever the two nations can speak together again. For, let it be remembered that a Minister going from his own country into the country of strangers has nothing to protect him but his Government, and it is as much the duty of his Government to protect his reputation as his person. If it be true that reputation is more valuable than life, then indeed is his Government more emphatically bound to protect him from assaults upon his reputation than from assaults upon his person. You have violated, says Great Britain, the reputation of my Ambassador; I cannot be safe in sending another to you till you have made a due atonement. Now, if it should so happen that the British Government, not having the same tenderness and delicacy for our dignity which our own citizens may have, but feeling this tenderness and delicacy for (so they will express it) their insulted Minister, should not see this business in the same light in which it strikes us, are they not as much bound to protect the reputation of their Minister, violated by this open and gross denunciation, as if the assault were made upon his person! If they should think him innocent, and as such, that they are bound to support him, what fruits will this resolution produce? In the name of God, sir, are not gentlemen content with the difficulties and embarrassments which already exist? Is there not enough, in the name of Heaven, to keep us apart for years, but is this new and insuperable obstacle to even negotiation to be superadded? Hereafter, when the two nations desire to speak together, this matter must first be disposed of—and how? Are they to submit to this outrage on their Minister? Or are we to make atonement? Neither is to be expected. Why then would you throw this difficulty in the way, which, it strikes me, can never be gotten over? For the purpose of producing what good, I entreat you, sir? To show the world that you are of the same opinion with the Executive in considering the language of Mr. Jackson insolent? Or to show that you will stand by the Executive on the ground which he has taken? Who doubts it? Who doubts the devotion of Congress to the President? To what end then, to what useful end, is the giving legislative form and final sanction to these propositions? For, let it be understood, it is to this I now object specifically. There has not been and cannot be urged an argument which can show that any practical good can result from clothing these propositions in a legislative garb.

In making these remarks to the House, I have carefully studied to avoid making a single remark which would wound the sensibility of gentlemen; because, although it is not my nature to be always so studiously sparing, yet upon this occasion my mind recoils with so much terror and horror from these unprecedented, pernicious resolutions, that I would sacrifice all minor considerations, all the gratification of party feelings, for the purpose of placing before gentlemen a view of the situation in which they are about to place this nation in relation to Great Britain. A situation in which two nations cannot negotiate. A situation unprecedented—unheard-of! We must have war as the only remedy for the passage of this resolution. A war may bury in the same grave with a multitude of our citizens this question about the violation of the ambassadorial character of Mr. Jackson. We may be able then to get clear of it; it may be forgotten, or a remedy be found for it, in the distressing calamities which will succeed, and if this resolution is indeed to pass, I do not know but I should myself be willing to have war in order to bring the two nations to that condition in which they can again speak to each other of their affairs. Sir, I wish to do right; I am impressed with as much grief for the unhappy condition of our country as any gentleman can profess; I would give a helping hand as cheerfully as any to extract the country from the terrible perplexities with Great Britain in which it is involved, and the more so as my immediate constituents are the victims of them. If this measure is to do good, if any beneficial consequences can result from giving a final sanction to the resolutions, let gentlemen point them out, and I will be as ready to vote against the motion for indefinite postponement as they can be. But even the attempt has not been, and will not and cannot be made. You have already audibly expressed your opinion in Committee of the Whole; the Executive knows it. But, having done this, do not take way all possible chance of the two nations being able to treat hereafter, if hereafter such circumstances should arise as would make the conclusion of a treaty practicable but for this obstacle, which may render even the commencement of a negotiation impracticable—for I am willing to allow that I do not at this time see how a treaty can be attempted. While the present temper exists on the part of the British Government and of our Administration, I do not see that a treaty can be made. Let gentlemen go to war if they will; but let them not bring about that state of things which will prevent the possibility of preserving peace and mutual intercourse by throwing in the way an unnecessary difficulty which cannot possibly produce any good. In this view I shall vote for the present motion; and would to Heaven I had a tongue of fire that might pierce the hearts of gentlemen who hear me with this single question—"What good will this measure produce?" I beg them to consider it most seriously; and in the fair spirit of argument I challenge them to answer me—How are the two nations ever to speak to each other again? To what good purpose is this resolution to lead? If to no good on the one hand; and to so much pernicious result on the other, can they answer it to their country, if they refuse to stop where they are?

Mr. PITKIN said, that he felt a reluctance in addressing the House, at so late an hour; but, viewing, as he did, the resolution proposed, as an improper innovation on the legislative proceedings of Congress; not only so, but as involving a question, which, in all probability, would materially affect the peace, the happiness, and future prosperity of this country, he could not resist the impulse of duty, in endeavoring to arrest its progress by an indefinite postponement.

In the range I may take, said he, in the discussion, it is possible I may also touch upon some of the topics which have been mentioned by those gentlemen who have preceded me, on different sides of the House.

In doing this, I trust, I shall not transgress any of those rules which ought to be observed in all deliberative bodies; I trust I shall deliver my sentiments with firmness, but with a due regard to legislative decorum.

In this late stage of the debate, I hope I shall be pardoned if I should repeat some of the observations which have been made by others; it shall be my endeavor, sir, to avoid this as much as possible.

I have stated that, in my view, this is an innovation in the legislative proceedings of Congress highly improper.

As has been said, by several gentlemen, no precedent can be found in the history of our Government for a procedure like the present. A joint resolution, having for its object either to approve or disapprove the conduct of the President of the United States, in relation to foreign nations, or their Ministers, has never yet been adopted by Congress. And yet, sir, have not occasions occurred, under this Government, in which, if such a procedure had been considered proper, it would have been done? Have no difficulties heretofore arisen between the Executive and the agents of foreign nations?

Need I recall the recollection of gentlemen to the celebrated cases of Genet and Yrujo? I should certainly consume the time of the House unnecessarily in making a particular statement of the facts in these cases. It is well known that Genet not only undertook to exercise acts of sovereignty in this country, but even to dictate to the President of the United States what course he ought to pursue in the discharge of his duty. He went further, sir; not being able to shake the firmness of the President, he published what has been emphatically called his "Appeal to the People." What was the course which the then President thought proper to pursue? He informed Congress of the facts by a special Message, on the 5th December, 1793, in which he says:

"It is with extreme concern I have to inform you, that the proceedings of the person whom they (the French Government) have unfortunately appointed their Minister Plenipotentiary here, have breathed nothing of the friendly spirit of the nation which sent him; their tendency, on the contrary, has been to involve us in war abroad, and discord and anarchy at home."

Accompanying this Message was a letter written by the then Secretary of State, to our Minister at Paris, respecting the recall of the offending Minister, in which he says:

"The Government thus insulted and set at defiance by Mr. Genet, committed in its duties and engagements to others, determined still to see in these proceedings, but the character of the individual." Also, "Mr. Genet not content with using our force, whether we will or not, in the military line, against nations with whom we are at peace, undertakes, also, to direct the civil government," &c.

Did Congress, at that time, think proper to pass joint resolutions, approbating the conduct of the President, and reprobating that of the foreign Minister? They did not. And yet, sir, history scarcely furnishes an instance in which a Government was more grossly insulted than ours then was, by the French Minister. The case of Yrujo is of a still later date. Was not the Government then insulted? This Minister came to the seat of Government, and was ordered by the President to depart. He said that he would not go; that he obeyed no orders, no commands, but those of the King, his master. In both these cases there was no question but that the Executive and the Government had been insulted; and yet Congress, in neither of them, thought it necessary to pledge themselves by a joint resolution, or in any other way, to call out the whole force of the nation to repel such insults.

But, sir, if it is necessary to pass a resolution of this kind, do not let it be couched in language which ill becomes the dignity of Congress and of this nation. If we have really been insulted by a foreign nation, or its Minister, let us tell them so, in a tone firm and proud, but dignified. Let us convince them that we feel for the honor of our country; but let us do it in a language which will show that we are conscious of its worth. This resolution is not for ourselves, but for a foreign nation; and let us not, when acting as legislators, forget that we are gentlemen.

But, sir, the resolution in another point of view has a bearing upon the future prospects of this country, of vast moment. I can consider it in no other light than as a conditional declaration of war against Great Britain. The words of it are: "And the Congress of the United States do hereby solemnly pledge themselves to the American people and to the world, to stand by and support the Executive Government in its refusal to receive any further communications from the said Francis J. Jackson, and to call into action the whole force of the nation, if it should be necessary, in consequence of the conduct of the Executive Government, in this respect, to repel such insults," &c. For what purpose, let me ask, is the force of the nation to be called out? Can it be to repel the insult of Mr. Jackson merely? This, sir, would be too ridiculous. If anything is intended by it, it must be either to declare to the British Government that, in case they sanction the conduct of their Minister, war is inevitable; or, in case Great Britain, in consequence of our proceedings relative to Mr. Jackson, should make war upon us, that the force of the nation is to be called out to defend ourselves. I trust no gentleman will avow that the latter is intended. I do hope that we are not yet so degraded in our own estimation, or in the estimation of the world, as to render it necessary to make a formal declaration that, in case any nation makes war upon us, we will resist.

What, sir, let me ask, is to be our situation, if the British Government should not view the conduct of their Minister in the same point of light as we do? Suppose the British Ministry should say that Mr. Jackson, instead of insulting our Government, has, for the purpose of repelling a charge of a breach of faith on their part, for disavowing the late arrangement, used a language calculated only to support the honor and dignity of his own? Having passed the resolution now on your table, what, let me ask, is to be done? The insult has now become that of the British Government. And, having declared that you will call into action the whole force of the nation to repel such insults, will you not do it? In that event you have no alternative but to go forward or retreat. You must, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) has said, either run or fight. Does it not, therefore, become us seriously to inquire, whether it is necessary to place ourselves and the nation in that situation? I know, sir, that some of the advocates of this measure do not consider it as wearing this hostile aspect. But, sir, I did not so understand a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES.) I understood him to say that we were already in a situation that, according to the laws of honor, we must either run or fight. That the "lie direct" had been given to our Government by Mr. Jackson, and that no other alternative remained. This he undertook to prove by referring to the authority of Shakspeare, who had given a minute account of affairs of honor of this kind among the ancient knights; that, in the correspondence, Mr. Jackson had gone beyond "the retort courteous and the reply valiant," to the "lie direct;" and that, according to the laws of chivalry and the authority of Shakspeare, one party must either run or fight.

Mr. EPPES observed that, in his remarks on that point, he had alluded to the discussion between the Secretary of State and Mr. Jackson, and stated that, after what had passed between the two, nothing was left but either to run or fight. He had expressed no opinion as to the course proper to be taken after the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. PITKIN continued.—I think, sir, I could not misunderstand the gentleman. If his observations had any bearing upon the subject before the House, they went to prove that those notions of honor, to which he alluded, were applicable to nations as well as to individuals; especially as the gentleman has said, that a nation that would not support its honor, even at the expense of forty millions of dollars, did not deserve the name; and that he could not look into the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to determine whether we should defend him or not. But, sir, if this affair is between Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson, as individuals merely, what have we to do with it? I had thought that the gentleman had considered our national honor to have been wounded, through the Executive, by Mr. Jackson, the British Minister, sent here, as I understood him to say, for the express purpose of insulting us; and that, as a nation, we were in the same situation in relation to Great Britain, as individuals are to each other, between whom had passed not only "the retort courteous, and the reply valiant," but the lie direct; and that nations, like individuals, in that situation, must either run or fight. Yes, sir, according to the ideas of the gentleman, we must have (to use the language of chivalry—and the days of chivalry seem to be fast returning upon us,) a grand national tilting match about an affair of honor; not one in which a few brave knights may break their lances, but one in which every brave man in the nation must be engaged.

But, let me ask, sir, what is to be done with this resolution after it has passed both Houses?

Being a joint resolution it must be presented to the President for his approbation. I see a gentleman, (Mr. EPPES,) by shaking his head, seems to say, no, this is not necessary. Let me call upon that gentleman, and the House, to examine this question, and to examine particularly what the Constitution says in such cases. The words are:

"Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and the House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and, before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved, be passed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations, as in the case of bills."

Is not this, sir, a resolution in which the concurrence of the Senate and House is necessary? Has it not here, as well as there, gone through all the forms required in the case of bills? The Constitution is clear and explicit on the subject. I would ask gentlemen to point out a single instance when a joint resolution has not been presented to the President for his signature and approbation; although they have been complimentary to those officers and men who have distinguished themselves in the service of their country. I might here refer the House to the joint resolution approbating the conduct of the gallant Truxtun and his officers, sailors, and marines, on board the frigate Constellation, in 1798; to a similar resolution in honor of the conduct and intrepidity of Commodore Preble, and the officers, seamen, and marines, before Tripoli. These, sir, as well as others, were presented to the President and received his approbation. I will agree, sir, that, as to that part of the resolution which goes to approve of his conduct in relation to Mr. Jackson, we place the President in rather a delicate, and, indeed, awkward situation, when we request him to sign an act commending himself; not only so, sir, but as the resolution is at present worded, we place him in rather a laughable situation when we request him not merely to approve of his own good conduct, but to declare to the world that he will "stand by and support" himself in doing well. And if he does not sign the resolution, but returns it for our reconsideration, he will then virtually say that he will not "stand by" himself. In the latter case, we might, perhaps, give ourselves very little trouble about rephrasing it, as we might justly say, if the President will not "stand by" himself, he cannot expect that we shall stand by him.

But, sir, it is unnecessary as well as improper to place the President of the United States in this situation. If it is the wish of both Houses of Congress to compliment him on this occasion, to return him their thanks for his good conduct, let them do it, by a joint address, in the true Parliamentary style. This address, according to the established rules, is to be presented to him in the presence of both Houses, and will not require his signature or approbation.

But, sir, so far as this resolution is a pledge of the constituted authorities to call into action the whole force of the nation, ought it not to be presented to the President for his approbation? Can you actually call out the force of the nation, by any joint resolution you may pass, without submitting the subject to the consideration of the President? You cannot, sir. Neither can you give any Constitutional pledge to this effect, without taking the same course. In what situation, then, will this resolution place the President, in respect to the course he has thought proper to pursue, in relation to the British Government? Sir, you compel him at once to change the state of the relations between the two countries. And, let me ask, whether, in this way, you do not in fact violate the Constitution, which has intrusted the Executive alone with the power of conducting negotiations of every kind between this country and foreign nations? In respect to the conduct of Mr. Jackson, has not the President assumed a tone and language totally different from that of this resolution? Has he not, sir, pursued the course pointed out, in a similar case, by the immortal WASHINGTON, and which has been pursued by his successor? And yet we are now about to tell him that this is an improper course, that he ought to have assumed a higher tone; to have threatened the British Government "with calling into action the whole force of the nation" against them if they should sanction the conduct of their Minister.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

I need only advert to the Message of the President, and the letter of the Secretary of State, to our Minister at London, to prove that the language of the Executive and that of the resolution are at war with each other. The language of the Message is:

"And it would indicate a want of confidence due to a Government, which so well understands and exacts what becomes foreign Ministers near it, not to infer that the misconduct of its own representative will be viewed in the same light in which it has been regarded here. The British Government will learn, at the same time, that a ready attention will be given to communications through any channel which may be substituted."

The Secretary of State, also, says:

"You are particularly requested, at the same time, in making these communications, to do it in a manner that will leave no doubt of the undiminished desire of the United States to unite in all the means best calculated to establish the relations of the two countries on the solid foundation of justice, of friendship, and of mutual interest."

Such, sir, is the language of the President, and unless gentlemen are determined upon a war, even before they have heard "in what light the conduct of their representative is viewed by the British Government," unless they are determined to place the dearest interests of this country at hazard, unless they intend to close the door which the President has left open "against any further communications" from them; why will they be induced to vote for the present resolution?

Sir, I need no more resolution and proclamation wars. This nation is sick of them, and foreign nations view them with contempt. If one of the old-fashioned wars is intended, in any event, let gentlemen prepare the means for it; let them replenish their arsenals with arms and ammunition of every kind; let them raise armies, build navies, and negotiate loans.

But, sir, before we make any direct or conditional declaration of war against Great Britain, let us wait until we learn, through the Constitutional organ, in what light the conduct of Mr. Jackson is viewed by his Government; let us wait until we are informed by the President whether any other channel of communication between the two countries is substituted or not? It will then be time enough for us to take a decisive step. We may then be called upon as legislators to exercise the high power with which the Constitution has invested us, in relation to war. But, until we come to this point, to me, sir, it is clear that we ought not to interfere, as legislators, in the manner proposed by this resolution. And I cannot but express my fears that, in passing it, we shall not only compromise the best interests of this country, but establish a precedent which may hereafter be brought into action, with, perhaps, far other views and motives than those which now actuate the majority of this House.

But, sir, although no precedent can be found for this measure, in the history of our own Government, yet, it has been said to be conformable to the proceedings relative to De Palm in the Parliament of Great Britain. I beg leave to state that case to the House. In January, 1726-'7, the King, in his speech to Parliament, speaking, among other things, of a secret treaty which had then lately been made between Spain and Austria, said:

"I have received information from different parts, on which I can entirely depend, that the placing the Pretender upon the throne of this Kingdom is one of the articles of the secret engagement; and that if time shall evince that the giving up the trade of this nation to one Power, and Gibraltar and Port Mahon to another, is made the price of imposing upon this Kingdom a Popish Pretender, what an indignation must this raise in the breast of every Protestant Briton."

This speech gave great offence to both the Courts of Austria and Spain, and Monsieur de Palm, then Imperial Resident at the Court of London, had express orders from the Emperor, as appears by a letter to him, from Chancellor Zinzendorf, which I now hold in my hand, to present to the King a memorial, expressly denying the statements he had made from the throne. The memorial begins thus:

"Most Serene and Potent King: As soon as the speech, made by your Majesty to the Parliament of Great Britain now assembled, came to the knowledge of his Imperial and Catholic Majesty, my most gracious master, he was struck with the utmost astonishment, that your Majesty could suffer yourself to be prevailed upon to declare, from the royal throne, to that most renowned nation, in a manner hitherto unheard of, as certain and undoubted facts, several things, some of which are strained, in that speech, to a wrong sense; some are entirely distant from the intention of His Imperial and Catholic Majesty; and, lastly, (which affect much more sensibly than all the rest,) some things absolutely void of all foundation."

The memorial then proceeds to state, that the assertions contained in the speech relative "to the secret articles in favor of the Pretender, are entirely unsupported by truth." De Palm had, also, express orders to cause this memorial to be printed, and circulated through the Kingdom, and which was immediately done. This, then, was not the mere act of the Imperial Minister—it was the act of the Emperor himself, and as such was viewed by the British Parliament. Can gentlemen see no difference between that case and the present, in this respect? That was a direct charge of the most wilful falsehood, made by one nation against another, in the face of the world; the present, to make the most of it, a mere insinuation of the kind, made by a foreign Minister, against a Secretary of State, in their correspondence.

The British Parliament, in the case alluded to, indignant at the manifest insult and outrage offered to their King and to the nation, presented a joint address to him, giving him assurances that they would "defend and support him against all his open and secret enemies, both at home and abroad."

In stating this case it is impossible, sir, not to call to our recollection the history of those times, and the then political situation of Great Britain.

The house of Hanover, to the exclusion of the ancient and tyrannical house of Stuart, had then but lately, by the voice of the nation, succeeded to the Crown.

This alteration of the succession, it is well known, lighted up a flame, not only in England, but in Europe, which lasted more than half a century. The pretensions of the house of Stuart to the British throne, were abetted, not only by the Scotch and the Roman Catholics in England, but, either openly or secretly, by most, if not all, the Roman Catholic countries in Europe. But a few years before this, a rebellion in favor of the Pretender, aided by foreign influence, had broken out, in the heart of the kingdom, which had nearly shaken the house of Hanover from the throne.

Under these circumstances, and in this situation, the Parliament very justly viewed with indignation every attempt of foreign nations to reinstate upon the throne a family, which the nation, but a few years before, had expelled from it. It was this extraordinary occasion which produced the joint address from Parliament, which has been mentioned, and in which they engaged to support and defend the King, in opposition to a family under whose oppression and tyrannical acts, the nation, not long before, had so severely suffered. The Imperial Minister was immediately sent out of the kingdom, and the proceedings of the Emperor were considered as amounting to a declaration of war. Both parties, therefore, as the historians of those times inform us, prepared for war. They increased their armies and navies, and Great Britain immediately took into pay thirty thousand Danish, Swedish, and Hessian troops; Gibraltar itself was besieged by the Spaniards within one month from the time of this transaction.

Such, sir, was the case of De Palm, which I have heard so often mentioned, as precisely similar to that of Mr. Jackson. If I am unable to perceive that similarity so as to justify the measure now before us, I presume it may be owing to my want of that acuteness of perception which others seem to possess.

These are some of the reasons which will induce me to vote for the postponement of the resolution.

While a negotiation with a foreign Government is pending, I do not wish to be called upon to give a vote, either to applaud or condemn the conduct of the Executive in relation to it. I would do nothing, sir, which could embarrass the President in any negotiation, or in any intercourse between this country and foreign nations. And, although I might be of opinion that the course which the Executive had thought proper to pursue, was not, in all respects, the wisest and the best, yet, sir, I would be cautious of expressing that opinion on this floor, until the business was brought to a close. While, therefore, the door for an accommodation of our differences with Great Britain is left open by the Executive, I would take no step that might shut it.

But, if I must be compelled to give that opinion, if by pressing the resolution to a final decision, I am called upon to give a vote, I must give it as my best judgment shall dictate.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, detain you and the House long in entering into the details of the correspondence between Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson. This correspondence has been so largely commented upon, and with so much ability, by those who have preceded me in opposition to the resolution, as to render it unnecessary. The nature of the alleged offence, on the part of Mr. Jackson, is stated by the Secretary of State in his letter to Mr. Pinkney of November 23. Mr. Smith there states:

"It was never objected to him (Mr. Jackson) that he had stated it as a fact that the three propositions in question had been submitted to me by Mr. Erskine, nor that he stated it as made known to him by the instructions of Mr. Canning, that the instruction to Mr. Erskine, containing those three conditions, was the only one from which his authority was derived to conclude an arrangement on the matter to which it related. The objection was, that a knowledge of this restriction of the authority of Mr. Erskine was imputed to this Government, and the repetition of the imputation even after it had been peremptorily disclaimed."

From an attentive examination of the documents, I have been unable to find that Mr. Jackson has anywhere stated that "this restriction of the authority of Mr. Erskine" was known to our Government at the time of the arrangement. He states it, to be sure, as a fact, that the despatch of the 23d of January was the only one by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement. He also states what he considers Mr. Smith as admitting, that the instructions contained in it were, in substance, made known to our Government by Mr. Erskine. These premises being admitted, Mr. Smith was, in fact, acquainted, at the time of the arrangement, with the only instructions which Mr. Erskine had. For if, in truth, there were no other instructions or authority than those contained in that despatch, and Mr. Smith was made acquainted with the substance of those instructions, Mr. Jackson's assertion, that Mr. Smith had a knowledge of the only instructions or authority which Mr. Erskine had, even supposing it refers to the time when the arrangement was made, was a verity.

DECEMBER 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

But, sir, does it follow from this that Mr. Smith at that time knew that Mr. Erskine had no other instructions, or that his authority was restricted to the conditions contained in that despatch? It does not. Mr. Jackson has not said that Mr. Smith had such knowledge, neither do I perceive that it is necessarily implied from anything he has said. In his letter of October 23d, (in which are said to be the offensive expressions,) he says :

"I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing you that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand by the letter, as well as by the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th inst., were at that time, in substance, made known to you."

To what instructions does Mr. Jackson here refer? Evidently to those contained in the despatch of January 23d; for he had before declared, in the most solemn manner, that the despatch contained the only instructions and the only authority which Mr. Erskine had to conclude an arrangement on the subject to which it related. And when, in his last letter, he says that he had "avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced," &c., is it to be inferred that one of the conclusions was, that, at the time of the arrangement our Government had a knowledge of the restriction of the authority of Mr. Erskine? Certainly not; because such a conclusion does not necessarily follow from the premises advanced. If then, sir, by a fair construction of the language and expressions used by Mr. Jackson, this insult is not to be found, I can never consent to give my vote for the resolution.

In making these observations, I am not the advocate of Mr. Jackson, or of the British Government; nor have I condescended, nor will I ever condescend to be the flatterer of the present or of any other Executive of my own country. I cannot but regret that, in the correspondence between Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson, there appears to be a mutual distrust of each other's sincerity, and that the language of both is far from being conciliatory. But, sir, I can see nothing in it which will warrant me in calling out the whole force of the nation, or in giving a pledge to that effect. I cannot consent to put the dearest interests of this country at hazard, because a Secretary of State has supposed that he has been insulted, by implication, by a foreign Minister. If, sir, I could believe, what some gentlemen have stated as their belief, that Mr. Jackson has not only insulted our Government, but that he came here with no other view, and that he had orders from his Government to do it, I would be willing to say directly, that we must have war or satisfaction.

But, sir, the President himself does not view this insult, whatever it may be, as coming from the British Government; if he had so viewed it, he never could have told them that a "ready attention would be given to communications, through any channel that might be substituted."

There is, sir, another important inquiry, which has been presented for our consideration; an inquiry in which the people of this nation have the deepest interest. It has been asked, and will often be hereafter asked, How has this quarrel originated? How has it happened, that a dispute has arisen between Mr. Jackson and Mr. Smith? Whether the latter had or had not a knowledge of the restriction of the authority of Mr. Erskine in his late arrangement with this Government? Was it of no importance to the Secretary of State in making this arrangement, to know the extent of Mr. Erskine's authority? Was it a matter of indifference with him, whether Mr. Erskine had authority to bind his Government to rescind the Orders in Council, on the single condition of our suspending the non-intercourse law, as it respects Great Britain, or on other and further conditions? And, if it was important, had or had he not a right to require of Mr. Erskine the production of his authority, before he concluded the arrangement? The principles of public law or the law of nations have been clearly stated and proved by my colleague, (Mr. DANA.) These principles, I understand to be, that the Secretary of State had a right to require of Mr. Erskine the production of his power or authority, before he concluded any arrangement with him; and that, as by the arrangement, the conditions on our part were to be immediately carried into execution, it was peculiarly his duty so to do. If this, sir, had been done, this unfortunate dispute, a dispute which, it seems, is now threatening to involve this country in a war, would never have arisen.

Much has been said about the diplomatic papers with which Ministers are usually furnished, viz: Letters of credence, full powers, and instructions. It is of importance that we should distinctly ascertain the nature and object of these several papers and the different uses which are to be made of them.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) has more than intimated, that a Minister, by virtue of his simple letter of credence, has power to make a treaty, or to enter into stipulations which will be binding on his Government; and, to prove this, has quoted the words, which are usually inserted in all the diplomatic papers of this kind, requesting the Government to whom the Minister is sent, "to give full credit to all he shall say to them, on the part of his Government."

Simple letters of credence, sir, give no power to the Minister, who is the bearer of them, to enter into any stipulations which shall bind his Government. The general expressions which are used in diplomatic papers of this description, and to which allusion has been made, are words of form, and, by the general usage and custom of nations, have never been construed to refer to anything more than the ordinary business of a Minister or Envoy at a foreign Court. Permit me to illustrate this idea: Suppose, Mr. Erskine, who at the time was an accredited Minister near this Government, had, immediately after the attack on the Chesapeake, and before he had heard from his Government on the subject, undertaken, by virtue of the powers, contained in his simple letter of credence, to stipulate what reparation and satisfaction should be made to us, on the part of Great Britain, for this outrage upon our national sovereignty. Would such a stipulation have been, in any manner whatever, binding on his Government? It cannot be pretended. Suppose, also, that, immediately after laying the embargo, he had without any other authority, entered into an agreement or arrangement with the Executive, that, on the repeal of our embargo acts, the King should rescind his Orders in Council. Would the King of England have been under any obligation to comply with the terms of such an arrangement? Certainly not. But, sir, further to prove the correctness of this doctrine, let me refer gentlemen to another case, under our own Government, in addition to those which have been mentioned by my colleague. It is well known that great difficulties arose in the execution of the sixth article of Mr. Jay's Treaty. To remove these difficulties, a convention was entered into between Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. King, on the part of the two Governments, at London, in 1802. In the convention itself, Mr. King describes his power of authority in the following words:

"And the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, has named for their Plenipotentiary Rufus King, Esquire, Minister Plenipotentiary of the said United States to His Britannic Majesty, who have agreed to," &c.

And the Plenipotentiaries, at the conclusion of the convention, say, that they sign the same, "by virtue of their respective full powers." Now, sir, notwithstanding Mr. King, by virtue of his general letter of credence, was at that time a Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Great Britain, it was thought necessary to invest him with special Plenipotentiary powers, in order to enable him to settle the disputes which had arisen under a former treaty. This proceeding was undoubtedly considered as conformable to the usage and custom of nations in similar cases. To prove that it was so, as well as to prove that the Secretary of State had a right to require the production of Mr. Erskine's authority, I beg leave to refer the House to one or two writers on this subject; wishing them to keep in view the important disinction between the powers or authority of a Minister and his instructions, as separate from his authority. For although the powers or authority of a Minister may be called for, and must be produced, if required; yet, his instructions, as separate from his authority, can never be called for or required of him. One of the writers to whom I allude, viz: Wicquefort, and who has written expressly on the functions and duties of Ambassadors, has been cited by the gentleman from Virginia. He has described him as an old authority. I would observe, however, that his writings are much less ancient than those of Grotius, who has been justly styled the father of public law. Having been unable to find this work in English, I shall be compelled to give the House an imperfect translation of it from the French—gentlemen, however, will be able to correct me, if I should mistranslate:

"Power or authority (la pouvoir), says Wicquefort, is essentially necessary for an Ambassador, when he would make or conclude a treaty, or negotiate any particular and important affair, in the execution of which both parties are interested in having assurances." Liv. I. sec. 16.

After stating particular cases, he then proceeds to say:

"And I would add, that powers are not so necessary to the Ministers, who are the bearers of them, as they are to the Commissioners or Ambassadors who treat with them, and to whom it is important to be assured that, whatever they shall negotiate and treat upon with Plenipotentiaries, will be agreed to and ratified."

To prove this, he also refers to a particular case, which I shall ask permission to read:

"It is very certain (says he) that the power or authority is at least as necessary for him who treats with a Minister, as to the Minister himself, as appears from the following case: 'The invasion with which Philip the Hardy, King of France, threatened the kingdom of Arragon, in the year 1285, obliged King Peter the Great to send to Sancho the Brave, King of Castile, a gentleman by the name of Pierre de Bolea, to induce him to enter into his interests. This gentleman, who had no other power than a simple letter of credence, found himself very much embarrassed, seeing that the King of Castile was very little disposed to act for the interest of the King of Arragon. So that, fearing he would even declare for France, he told him, that if he would only remain neuter, the King of Arragon would give him the city of Calatayua after the war should be finished. Sancho remained neuter, and, seeing that Peter had made an advantageous treaty with France, he demands of him the city which Bolea had promised him. The King of Arragon said, that the gentleman whom he had sent to him had neither order nor power (ni ordre ni pouvoir) to promise him anything; but, not to fail in what he owed to a King, whose friendship had been so dear to him, he sent to him the gentleman himself, to dispose of him according to his will. Bolea confessed to the King of Castile that he had no order to offer him anything; but that the great affection he had for the King his master, had induced him to make the advances he did, for the purpose of averting those dangers which the junction of the forces of France and Castile would render inevitable. The King of Castile praised his zeal and sent him back to his master.'

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

The writer immediately adds :

"He (the King of Castile) ought to accuse himself for having too lightly trusted to the saying of a Minister, who, in the regulation of his employment, did not fear to mix a little artifice with his probity. The King of Castile ought to have had this promise made in writing, and, before accepting it, he ought also to have had given him an authentic copy of the power in virtue of which it was made."

This case proves, sir, that simple letters of credence give no authority to a Minister to enter into any special stipulations to bind his Government. And we also have the authority of this writer that the Government to whom any promise or engagement is made by a Minister who may have a letter of credence, has a right to require that not only the promise or engagement should be in writing, but, before accepting it, that an authentic copy of the power, in virtue of which it is made, should also be given to them.

The gentleman from Virginia, however, to prove the contrary, has cited the following passage from Wicquefort :

"The Ambassador, after he has presented his letters of credence, and had them approved, ought to enjoy the effect thereof purely and simply, and has no further occasion to fortify or authorize his negotiation by producing other instruments."

This quotation, sir, is but a part of a sentence, the whole of which must be taken together, in order to understand the meaning of the author. Wicquefort has just before been speaking of the conduct of the States General toward Walter Strickland, in demanding his instructions, and which he very justly condemns; he then adds :

"What I have just said respecting the treatment which Walter Strickland received at the Hague is founded on the law of nations; because an Ambassador, after he has presented his letters of credence, and had them approved, ought to enjoy the effect thereof purely and simply, and has no further occasion to fortify his character or authorize his negotiation, by producing other instruments, unless that he be either requested, or that he himself requests, to make a particular treaty, for which he must necessarily have a special power. It is this, of which I shall speak, after having said a word on the subject of letters of credence in the following section."

This, sir, is the whole of the sentence, and is the conclusion of a section on the subject of the instructions of a Minister; and, taken together, proves, beyond a doubt, that a letter of credence is insufficient to enable a Resident Minister or Plenipotentiary to make a particular treaty, but that a special power is necessary for the purpose. And, let it not be supposed that, by the word "treaty" here used, nothing more is intended than an agreement, which is technically so called, and which is of the highest character, and is the most solemn compact between nations. For, in the subsequent section, part of which I have before quoted, Wicquefort says, this power is necessary not only for the purpose of "concluding a treaty, but of negotiating any particular and important affair, (une affaire particuliere et importante), to be assured of the execution of which both parties have an interest."

The power or authority with which a Minister must be clothed, in order to enable him to enter into any stipulations which shall bind his Government may be, either what, in a strictly legal sense, is called a full power, and without any limitation, and which is under the great seal of the State; or, it is a more limited and restricted authority, and is not attended with such high evidence of authenticity. But, in either case, the power or authority must be produced if required. When this authority is given to a Resident Minister or Plenipotentiary, and is limited to a particular transaction, it may be, and sometimes is, coupled with his instructions; and more especially is this the case when the terms by which alone he is authorized to negotiate, are prescribed to him in the instrument giving the authority. This limited power is not, then, what, in the usual style of writers on public law, is called a full or patent power, under the great seal of the State; but is still such an authority, as, if required, must be produced. And, when this authority is not produced, if required, it is optional with the party thus requiring it, whether he proceeds in the negotiation or not. If he does proceed, trusting solely to the word of the Minister that he has authority (as was the case with the King of Castile before quoted) to make the stipulations which he proposes, he proceeds at his own risk, and can never complain, if the Government should disown an agreement entered into by its agent without authority, or, contrary to his authority. The British Ministry, aware that the Government of the United States had a right to call for the authority of Mr. Erskine, to bind the King to rescind the Orders in Council, gave him liberty to show the despatch of the 23d of January, in extenso; which despatch not only contained his authority, but also his instructions or the precise conditions to be performed on our part before the authority could be exercised.

That a Government is not bound to ratify an agreement made by its Minister, without authority, or contrary to his authority, is one of the plainest maxims of common law. This maxim was taken from the old Roman law, that the acts of an agent or proxy were not binding on his principal, unless done in pursuance of the power or authority given him by his principal. This, sir, is a maxim about which writers on public law have never differed. And I will venture to assert that, from the time of the memorable agreement entered into, without authority, between the Roman Consuls and the Samnites, and which was disavowed by the Roman people, down to the present moment, this principle has never been questioned.

It is intimated, however, sir, in the President's Message, and the same intimation has been made on this floor, that "a disavowal of engagements formed by diplomatic functionaries," cannot be made consistently with good faith, unless, "in cases where, by the terms of the engagements, a mutual ratification is reserved; or where notice at the time may have been given of a departure from instructions; or, in extraordinary 'cases, essentially violating the principles of equity." I must be permitted to say, that my opinions of the law of nations, on this subject, are totally different from the intimations here given. I have always understood the public law on this subject to be, that "agreements formed by diplomatic functionaries," might be disavowed in cases where they had departed from their secret instructions, although no notice of such departure was given at the time, and that, by the modern usage of nations, engagements, although formed by public Ministers in strict conformity with their powers and instructions, are not considered as obligatory on their respective Governments, until ratified by them, although "by the terms of the engagements, a mutual ratification is not reserved."

If the House will indulge me, sir, I will prove, by well established authorities, that my opinion is correct. Vattel, in his celebrated work on the law of nations, and which is a sort of text book on this subject, in book four, chapter six, concerning public Ministers, says: "By a well grounded custom any engagements, which the Minister should enter into, are at present of no force among sovereigns, unless ratified by his principal."

Martens lays down the same principles, and to these let me add the authority of a French writer, Monsieur Piquet; who, although not so much known as the former, Vattel himself has quoted, and has called a wise and virtuous politician—this author, (in a little treatise, entitled Discours sur l'art de Negoier) says "although the powers which authorize a Minister to treat appear to be unlimited,) yet they are always in fact limited by the instructions, which accompany them, and this limitation is of such rigor, that the Minister cannot be too scrupulous an observer of them. He ought in effect, in matters of so great importance, to avoid, as much as possible, taking anything upon himself, either as to the terms of his engagements, or as to their extent. The inconveniences of this are too evident to render it necessary to detail them. He who passes the limits which are prescribed to him, not only deceives his master, but does a great injury (rend un mauvais service) to the Prince with whom he treats, because it always depends on the master to ratify or not an engagement formed by a Minister, who acts contrary to his instruction."

These, sir, are the principles of national law on this subject. Acting in conformity with these principles, the late Administration refused to ratify a convention entered into between our Minister, Mr. King, and the British Government, relative to our Northeastern boundary; although this convention was formed in pursuance of powers and instructions given to Mr. King, by our Government. Upon the same principles the late President refused to ratify the treaty of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney; and on the same ground, no treaty or convention in this country is obligatory, or considered as the law of the land, until ratified by the President and Senate, and promulgated by proclamation.

It is said, however, sir, that these principles are only applicable to treaties strictly so called, on account of their great magnitude, and of their permanent character. To this I shall only oppose the opinion of Vattel, who (in book II. chapter 14) says: "All we have said of the validity of treaties, of their execution, of dissolving them, and of the obligations and rights that flow from them, are applicable to the various conventions which sovereigns may conclude with each other. Treaties, conventions, and agreements, are all public engagements, in regard to which there is but one and the same right, and the same rules." It seems, sir, that in the late arrangement the Secretary of State trusted to the word, nay, even to the belief of Mr. Erskine, that he had sufficient authority to conclude it. In his letter to Mr. Jackson of October 19th, page forty-six, of the printed documents, he says: "That he (Mr. Erskine) had, or at least that he believed he had sufficient authority to conclude the arrangement, his formal assurances, during our discussions, were such as to leave no room to doubt."

If, sir, instead of trusting to formal assurances of this kind, the Secretary of State had, agreeable to diplomatic usage, called for this authority, that he might himself judge of its sufficiency, we should not now be required to pass the resolution before us; we should not now be plunged into difficulties, from which nothing short of a miracle can extricate us with honor.

With these observations, I shall dismiss this part of the subject; claiming, however, the indulgence of the House, for a few moments longer, while I advert to some other parts of the papers and correspondence before us.

As to the terms and conditions, which were offered us in the despatch of Mr. Erskine of January 23d, on the part of the British Government, I have no hesitation in saying that they were such, especially the second and third, as ought not and could not have been agreed to on the part of our Government. And no justification or apology for the British Ministry in proposing them, can be made, but the one which they themselves have stated, a supposition or belief, that they came from members of our Government, and that, therefore, they would meet with the approbation of the present Administration. This supposition or belief, originated it seems in what Mr. Smith, in his letter of November 23d to Mr. Pinkney, calls a double mistake. Let us, sir, examine the subject. As to the second condition, which goes to renounce the colonial trade altogether, this had its origin in a conversation between Mr. Erskine and Mr. Gallatin, previous to the 3d of September, 1808. This conversation was reported to the British Ministry by Mr. Erskine, and is detailed in his letter of the 14th of August last, to Mr. Smith, in answer to one requiring explanations on the subject of the conditions contained in the despatch of January 28th. In this letter of the 14th of August, Mr. Erskine proceeds to give "an abstract of the communications" which he made to his Government "relative to unofficial conversations" which he held with Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin, and Mr. Smith, and which were alluded to by Mr. Canning.

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Speaking of the conversations with Mr. Gallatin, he says:

"He (Mr. G.) adverted also to the probability of an adjustment of another important point in dispute between the two countries, as he said he knew that it was intended by the United States to abandon the attempt to carry on a trade with the colonies of belligerents in time of war, which was not allowed in time of peace, and to trust to the being permitted by the French to carry on such trade in peace so as to entitle them to a continuance of it in time of war."

Here, sir, Mr. Erskine stated to his Government, not the mere opinion, but the knowledge, of one of the members of the Administration, that the United States intended to abandon the colonial trade altogether. It is true, that in the same letter to Mr. Smith, he adds: "as it may be very material to ascertain what 'trade with the colonies of belligerents' was, in my conception, meant, by Mr. Gallatin, as intended to be abandoned by the United States, I feel no hesitation in declaring that I suppose he alluded to the 'trade from the colonies of belligerents direct to their mother country, or to the ports of other belligerents' &c. It does not appear, however, that Mr. Erskine informed Mr. Canning, what his conceptions were, as to what Mr. Gallatin meant by the colonial trade; but, by the expressions which he uses, it appears very plainly that he did not, and that he was merely explaining his conceptions to Mr. Smith.

All doubt, however, must be removed on this point, by attending to Mr. Pinkney's letter to the Secretary of State, dated May 23th, 1809, where, speaking of the interview he had with Mr. Canning, he says that Mr. C. informed him that the instructions sent to Mr. Erskine were "founded on his own letters received in January last, in which were set forth the particulars of several conversations that had passed between him and Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin," &c. Mr. Canning then stated to him (Mr. Pinkney says) the substance of Mr. Erskine's letters relative to the concessions to be made by our Government, and among the rest, "that it would even agree to abandon, during the present war, all trade with enemies' colonies, from which we were excluded in peace." And Mr. Pinkney says, that Mr. Canning read to him passages in Mr. Erskine's letters in December last, which contained the above representation among others. And Mr. Pinkney also says, in his letter to the Secretary of State of June 23d, that "Mr. Canning (in a conversation with him) admitted that the second condition, viz: the colonial trade, had no necessary connexion with the Orders in Council; and he intimated that they would have been content to leave the subject of it to future discussion and arrangement." He added, that "this condition was inserted in Mr. Erskine's instructions, because it had appeared from his own report of conversations with official persons at Washington, that there would be no difficulty in agreeing to it."

As to the third condition, Mr. Canning states, in his despatch to Mr. Erskine, that this was suggested in consequence of "an opinion expressed to him by Mr. Pinkney, that there would be no indisposition on the part of his Government to the enforcement by the naval power of Great Britain of the regulations of America, with respect to France and the countries to which those regulations continue to apply, but that his Government was itself aware, that without such enforcement those regulations must be altogether nugatory." What, sir, does Mr. Pinkney himself say on this subject? In a "Brief account of an unofficial conversation between Mr. Canning and Mr. Pinkney, on the 18th and 22d of January, 1809," sent to this House by the President, Mr. Pinkney says:

"In the course of the conversation, Mr. Canning proposed several questions relative to our late proposal; the principal were the two following: 1st. In case they should wish either through me, or through Mr. Erskine, to meet us upon the basis of our late overture, in what way was the effectual operation of our embargo as to France, &c., after it should be taken off as to Great Britain, to be secured? It was evident, he said, that if we should do no more than refuse clearances for the ports of France, &c., or prohibit, under penalties, voyages to such ports, the effect which my letter of the 23d of August, and the published instructions proposed to have in view, would not be produced; for that vessels, although cleared for British ports, might, when once out, go to France instead of coming here, that this would in fact be so, (whatever the penalties which the American laws might denounce against offenders might be) could not, he imagined, be doubted; and he therefore presumed, that the Government of the United States would not, after it had declared a commerce with France, &c., illegal, and its citizens, who should engage in it, delinquents, and after having given to Great Britain, by compact, an interest in the strict observation of the prohibition, complain if the naval force of this country should assist in preventing such a commerce."

It may not be improper here to inquire, what was the late proposal and overture to which Mr. Canning alluded, and what effect did Mr. Pinkney's letter of the 23d of August, and the published instructions, propose to have in view. The proposal referred to was the offer made on the part of our Government, in 1808, to suspend the embargo as to Great Britain, on the revocation of the Orders in Council, and to continue it as to France; the effect which was to follow from this was then stated to Mr. Canning by Mr. Pinkney, in August, 1808, to be, that a revocation of those orders would, if not attended or followed by a revocation of the decrees of France, place us at issue with that Power, and result in a precise opposition by the United States, to such parts of her anti-commercial edicts as it became us to repel. Mr. Canning asked Mr. Pinkney how the effectual operation of the embargo, as to France, after it should be taken off as to Great Britain, was to be secured, in case they should meet us upon the basis of our late overture; and proceeds to state that he presumes the Government of the United States would not complain if their naval force should assist in preventing a commerce with France. What answer, sir, does Mr. Pinkney give to this question? It is unfortunate that the account of this "unofficial conversation" is so brief, that the answer of Mr. Pinkney is not given at all. After stating the second question, which went to making the repeal of the British orders and American embargo contemporaneous, Mr. Pinkney, without having made any answer to the two questions, goes on to say, "I took occasion, towards the close of the conversation, to mention the recent appointment of Admiral Berkeley to the Lisbon station," &c. That some conversation passed between Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Canning on the subject to which the questions related, there can be no doubt. This, indeed, is acknowledged in the subsequent letters of Mr. Pinkney. I cannot, sir, but regret that the President of the United States has thought it improper to communicate to us the answer which Mr. Pinkney gave to the first question proposed to him by Mr. Canning. That the whole conversation that passed between them on the 18th and 22d of January, or the substance of it, was communicated to the Secretary of State, no one can doubt; and I am willing to presume that the President has withheld it from motives of delicacy towards Mr. Pinkney, or from a sense of the impropriety of publishing to the world the free and unofficial conversations between public Ministers; and although I am sensible that, at times, and particularly pending a negotiation, a publication of these conversations may be improper; yet, sir, when a question of magnitude is brought before this House for decision, and such a question as we are, or may be, unable to decide correctly, without a full knowledge of what has passed between our Minister and a foreign Government relative to it, I must think that this information ought not to be withheld from us.

But, sir, let us endeavor to obtain this information as well as we can from the subsequent letters of Mr. Pinkney. On the 6th of June, 1809, Mr. Pinkney writes to the Secretary of State:

"Mr. Canning tells me that the conversations detailed in Mr. Erskine's letters did not, as I had supposed, suggest that the Government of the United States would allow it to be understood, that British cruisers might stop American vessels attempting to violate the embargo and non-intercourse, continuing as to France, &c., after they should be withdrawn as to Great Britain. They suggested that the United States would side with the Power revoking its edicts against the Power persevering. This, Mr. Canning says, he considered (although he did not so insist upon it, in the recapitulation contained in his instructions to Mr. Erskine) as comprehending what I thought he had represented the actual suggestion to be, and what he supposed I had said to him, in an informal conversation, at his house in Briton street, on the 22d of January, in an answer to one of his inquiries. It will, I am sure, occur to you, as the fact is, that the little I may have thrown out upon that occasion, did not look to the admission of Mr. Canning's object, into any stipulation between the two countries, and that I received it only as a consequence, that might and would, if France persisted in her unjust decrees, grow out of arrangements similar to those offered by us in August last."

In this letter, sir, Mr. Pinkney admits that, on the 22d of January, he said something to Mr. Canning, by way of answer to one of his inquiries, and it must have been to the first inquiry which Mr. Canning made. And what, sir, was this answer? Notwithstanding the obscurity with which it seems to be enveloped, it is manifest, that Mr. Pinkney did admit, that Mr. Canning's object might be obtained in some way. The negative terms which he uses clearly imply it:—"What little he may have thrown out (he says) did not look to the admission of Mr. Canning's object into a stipulation between the two countries." To what, then, let me ask, did it look? For it looked to the admission of it for some purpose. What was the object Mr. Canning had in view? To have security that our embargo and non-intercourse should be enforced as to France after it should be taken off as to Great Britain; and, for the purpose of obtaining that object, he intimates to Mr. Pinkney that their naval force might be employed without any complaint on our part. Mr. Pinkney seems to say, that the object might be obtained by means of the British naval force, but not in consequence of any stipulation; but, as he adds, "as a consequence that might and would, if France persisted in her unjust decrees, grow out of arrangements similar to those offered by us in August last." What that consequence would be, and what those arrangements were which he offered, I have before stated, viz: is to place us at issue with France. And, sir, it appears by Mr. Erskine's letter to Mr. Smith, of the 14th of August, page 16th of the correspondence, that Mr. Madison informed Mr. Erskine, "that the United States would at once side with that Power against the other which might continue its aggressions."

When our Government has, therefore, informed Great Britain, that in case the revocation of the Orders in Council was not followed by the revocation of the decrees of France, we should be placed at issue and in collision with France, and that we would side with (which must mean to take part with, if it means anything) that Power against the other, which might continue its aggressions; was it not very natural that Mr. Canning should make the inquiry, which he did? But, sir, here let me ask gentlemen in what light was this third condition viewed by our Government at the time of the arrangement? Hear what Mr. Erskine says on this subject in his letter of explanation to Mr. Smith: "The third condition (he says, page 20) you certainly very distinctly informed me, could not be recognised by the President; but you added, what had great weight in my mind, that you did not see why any great importance should be attached to such a recognition, because it would be impossible that a citizen of the United States could prefer a complaint to his Government, on account of the capture of his vessel while engaged in a trade absolutely interdicted by the laws of his country." From this statement of Mr. Erskine, it appears, that although this condition could not be recognised by the President, yet that no great importance could be attached to such a recognition—and why, sir? Because our citizens could not complain if captured by the naval force of Great Britain while violating the laws of their country. And, Mr. Erskine says, that this had great weight in his mind. Why, sir, should this remark of our Secretary of State have weight with him unless he was satisfied, that although this condition was not recognised “in the formal manner required” by his instructions, yet that his Government would in reality have the full benefit of it in this side-way manner; and that, with this understanding with our Government, he had, in making the arrangement, complied at least with the spirit of his instructions? I find it difficult, sir, to reconcile these remarks of the Secretary of State, made at the time of the arrangement, with those I find made by him on the same subject, in his correspondence with Mr. Jackson. In his letter of October 19th, 1809, he says: “The other demand could still less have been apprehended. Besides, the inevitable and incalculable abuses incident to such a license to foreign cruisers, the stipulation would touch one of those vital principles of sovereignty which no nation ought to have been expected to impair—for where would be the difference in principle between authorizing a foreign Government to execute, and authorizing it to make laws for us? Nor ought it to be supposed that the sanctions and precautions of a law of the United States, in the cases of the prohibited trade in question, would prove inefficacious for its purposes.” I do not hesitate to declare that I would never consent that the naval force of Great Britain should enforce our laws; I would not consent that it should be done either directly or indirectly, by way of stipulation, or in any other way: and I cannot but regret that the Secretary of State should, at the time of the arrangement, have attached so little importance to a condition or proposition of this kind. I do believe that our citizens could not only complain when thus captured by a foreign naval force, but that they ought to complain, and ought also to obtain redress from their Government. As to the views which our Government had of the first and second conditions, at the time of the arrangement, Mr. Erskine says, page 19: “I consider it, however, to be my duty to declare, that during my negotiation with you, which led to the conclusion of the provisional agreement, I found no reason to believe that any difficulties would occur in the accomplishment of the two former conditions, as far as it was in the power of the President of the United States, to accede to the first, and consistently with the explanation which I have before given of the second point.” I have made these observations relative to the three conditions contained in Mr. Erskine’s instructions, for the purpose of showing that they were proposed by the British Ministry, from a supposition that they would be agreed to by our Government; and that this supposition, to make the most of it, was founded on the mistaken conceptions of certain unofficial conversations that passed between the agents of the two Governments. It was my wish also to satisfy this House and the nation, not only of the impolicy, but of the folly of taking a course, in consequence of these mistakes, which might, and in all probability would, involve this country in a war.

I will add, sir, but a few words more. I would beg gentlemen, before they pass this resolution, to call to their recollection the present unparalleled state of the world. History furnishes no example to be compared with it. A new era has arisen. France commands by land, and England by sea. The whole Continent of Europe, hitherto composed of many independent kingdoms, powerful in arms, and justly celebrated for their improvement in all the arts of civilized and social life, is now bending beneath the iron yoke of a military despot.

England alone, in that quarter of the world, remains unsubdued by the mighty conqueror. For more than ten years a war has now been waged between that nation and France; a war which has never been equalled, either as to the objects which it had in view, or as to the manner in which it has been carried on. In this mighty conflict, principles of public law have been disregarded and trampled under foot, and we have been the victims of its fury. In this state of the world, in vain shall we expect to be able to resettle the law of nations upon its ancient basis; nay, it can hardly be supposed that we can make treaties with either on any permanent principles. Have we not a treaty with France which secures to us, as far as treaties can secure, the freedom of the seas? Does not this treaty provide, that in case France is at war, “we may sail, with our ships and merchandise, not only to enemies’ ports, but from enemies’ ports to neutral ports, and even from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever?” Notwithstanding this, our vessels are seized, not only for entering an enemy’s port, but are captured and burnt on the high seas for having done so. No regard, sir, is paid by France to her most solemn stipulations. And has not our Minister, Mr. Armstrong, long since told us and the French Government, that to appeal to the stipulations in this treaty, or to the law of nations for redress, “would literally be appealing to the dead?” France says, that Great Britain regards no law; that she forgets “all ideas of justice, and all humane sentiments; that she insults even reason itself.”—That France, therefore, is obliged to forget them herself. Great Britain, on the other hand, says, that France “has established an unprecedented system of warfare against her, aiming at the destruction of her commerce and resources,” and that she is compelled to adopt retaliatory measures for her own security. And in this unheard-of conflict, whose end none can tell, neutral rights have been disregarded. If, sir, by passing this resolution; if by the magic influence of words; nay, if by force itself we could hush the mighty tempest which is now desolating the fairest portion of Europe, and which, I fear, will too soon desolate our happy shores, I would be the last to be found in the ranks of opposition. But, sir, our efforts must be vain. From the moment we seriously enter into this contest against Great Britain, instead of securing our neutral rights, we seal the ruin of our country. The inevitable consequence must be an alliance with her enemy; and I cannot but view such an alliance with a sort of horror I am unable to describe. No ally of Bonaparte has ever fought, but to increase the power of this military despot, and to lose their own independence. And we cannot expect to share a different fate. It is possible, sir, that in this contest, what has been called the freedom of the seas may be obtained; but it will not be obtained for us; it will only be transferred to him who now commands the freedom of the land.

FRIDAY, December 29.

Another member, to wit: from North Carolina, JAMES HOLLAND, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the Levy Court of the county of Alexandria, and of the Common Council of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying a grant of money sufficient for the erection of a permanent jail in the said county, for the safe-keeping of prisoners.—Referred to the District Committee.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee appointed to inquire into the circumstances alluded to in the letter of I. A. Coles to the Speaker of the House, made the following report:

That, according to order, they have taken into consideration the subject referred to them; that in making the proposed inquiry they have taken the depositions of the honorable James Turner, a Senator of the United States, and of Mr. Samuel Sprigg, which depositions they beg leave to report to the House.

From these depositions it was established, to the satisfactory belief of your committee, that Mr. I. A. Coles, without any immediate previous altercation or provocation, did assault and strike a member of this House, within the walls of the north wing of the Capitol; that this act was done on Monday, the 27th ult., about one o'clock P. M., and after this House had adjourned over to the following day.

That, from the assertions of Mr. Coles, and from the actual admission of the member assaulted, your committee were satisfied that the provocation or supposed provocation which occasioned the attack did not arise from anything said or from any act done by the member of this House, in the fulfilment of his duties as a Representative in the Congress of the United States.

Your committee are of opinion that this latter circumstance may be received in extenuation, but cannot be admitted in justification of the act done by Mr. Coles; and, from all the circumstances of the case, they are of opinion that said assault and violence offered to the member was a breach of the privileges of this House.

Your committee further report, that they have considered the letter of Mr. Coles to the Speaker of this House, together with another letter from Mr. Coles addressed to the Chairman of your Committee, (which they also beg leave to report to the House,) that these two letters, in the opinion of your committee, do contain acknowledgments and apologies on the occasion, which ought to be admitted as satisfactory to the House. They therefore recommend the following resolution.

Resolved, That any further proceeding in the above case is unnecessary.

To the Hon. John Taylor, Chairman, &c.

SIR: Understanding that the declaration which I had the honor this morning to make before the Committee, will be more acceptable if put in the written form, I hasten to comply with what I believe to be their wish, in tendering through them, to the House of Representatives, the renewed assurance "that if I could have supposed that the circumstance alluded to in my letter to the Speaker, would have been construed into a breach of the privilege of the House, it would not have occurred at the time and in the place where it unfortunately happened."

With sentiments of great respect, I am, your obedient humble servant,

I. A. COLES.

Ordered to lie on the table.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER,

The House resumed the consideration of this subject; when Mr. PITKIN concluded his speech, as given in full in preceding pages. At four o'clock Mr. LIVERMORE commenced a speech, but gave way for a motion to adjourn which was carried, 53 to 51.

SATURDAY, December 30.

A motion was made by Mr. DAWSON, that the report made yesterday, on the occurrence between I. A. Coles and a member of this House, and the documents accompanying the same, be printed for the use of the members: and the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 25. The report and documents were referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the resolution from the Senate—the motion for indefinite postponement yet under consideration.

Mr. POINDESTER.—Mr. Speaker, it has not heretofore been my practice to address you on subjects relating to the general welfare of the nation. I have hitherto confined myself to the discharge of those duties which devolve on me as the sole Representative of a distant and important Territory. But, on the present occasion I deem it an indispensable duty, to the performance of which I am led by every impulse of feeling, to express to this honorable assembly, to my constituents, and to the world, my opinions concerning the resolution under consideration. Sir, the present ought not to be considered a party question. The sovereignty, the honor, and the best interests of America, have been assailed, and the Executive Magistrate most grossly insulted, by Francis James Jackson, the Minister Plenipotentiary from His Britannic Majesty to the United States; a Minister sent among us to excite the demon of discord and division; a legalized spy, prowling from Hampton to New York, and through every city, town, and village, to designate the victims of corruption, and to subvert, if possible, the allegiance of the citizens from their Government, and thereby promote the views of the King, his master. Under such circumstances there ought to be but one sentiment from Mississippi to Maine, and that sentiment should prompt us, without distinction of party, to rally around the constituted authorities of our common country, and, by a patriotic burst of indignation, to scout the foreigner. While, sir, the pendulum of reason vibrates between the innocence or guilt of those who administer the Government of my country, I shall never hesitate to support the Government against every species of foreign influence. Yes, sir, so long as there is a loop on which to hang a doubt, the vindication of the country to which I owe my existence, and to which I am bound by the strongest ties of affection, shall call forth the energies which it has pleased Heaven to bestow on me.

But, in the present instance, the course pursued by the Executive is manifestly founded in wisdom, moderation, and firmness, and merits the undivided support of the American people. Can I then, sir, forbear to express my astonishment that the Minister of Great Britain should find an advocate within these sacred walls? It is not wonderful that, in matters of internal policy, we should differ as to the means best calculated to promote the general good; these differences often lead to useful investigation, and produce the most salutary results. But I cannot reconcile my mind to the novel and afflicting controversy which has arisen out of the subject under consideration.

Before I proceed to discuss the points immediately embraced by the resolution on your table, permit me to notice the remarks which have been made by gentlemen opposed to the measure in relation to the character of Mr. Jackson. On this subject there appears to exist an uncommon portion of sensibility. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) has told us that we are about to fulminate legislative contumely against the accredited Minister of the Sovereign of a great and powerful nation, who is bound to see that whatever treatment he may receive is not disrespectful. And the gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDENIER) has added, that the adoption of this resolution will inflict a fatal wound on the character of Mr. Jackson. Sir, I beg gentlemen who feel thus tenderly for the reputation of this Minister, to tell us in what country he has acquired the celebrity of character? By what noble deeds has he signalized himself, and where is the record of them to be found? Was it prior to his memorable mission to Copenhagen, or subsequent to that disgraceful event, that he was clothed with the mantle of fame, of which we are about to disrobe him? If gentlemen refer to a period anterior to the destruction of that devoted city, I put it to their candor to say, if that act of perfidy, at the recollection of which the human mind recoils with horror and detestation, is not enough to stamp with infamy the vile instrument of treachery and assassination who performed it? Can gentlemen be really in earnest when they speak with reverence of the character of Mr. Jackson? I hope they will pardon my doubts as to the sincerity of their declarations. What, sir, was the conduct of Mr. King, our late Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in London, when it was proposed to send this same Mr. Jackson to the United States as the Minister of Great Britain on a former occasion? And let it be remembered that Mr. King is a Federalist; a distinguished member of that party who now manifest so much zeal in vindicating the character of Mr. Jackson. If I am correctly informed, and if not I call upon gentlemen to deny the fact, Mr. King felt it his incumbent duty to remonstrate against the appointment of Mr. Jackson as the resident Minister in the United States. Was this a wanton act on the part of Mr. King? Will it be alleged by any gentleman in opposition to this resolution, that Mr. King was actuated by any unworthy motive in that transaction? I presume to say that such insinuations will not receive the slightest support. To what cause, then, are we to look as the basis of this remonstrance? The turbulent and unprincipled character of Mr. Jackson must suggest itself to every mind as the foundation of the objection. The British Ministry, on every occasion which required extraordinary duplicity, have availed themselves of the services of this incendiary. These facts cannot be controverted, and yet gentlemen tremble lest the fame of this immaculate personage should fall a sacrifice to the ruthless violence of legislative contumely!

Mr. GARDENIER said he supposed the gentleman alluded to him as attempting to patch up a character for Mr. Jackson. That I expressly disclaim; and if the gentleman had understood my argument, his candor certainly would have prevented him from imputing to me that intention. I did not speak of the merits of Mr. Jackson, but took this point, that the British Government considered his character as good, and our denunciation of it, whether it is demonstrated to be bad or not, so long as they think he does not deserve it, is calculated to produce an obstacle to negotiation which cannot be overcome. I did not speak of his character.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he had understood the gentleman in the manner he had stated his argument; the House would determine whether he had understood him correctly or not. But, sir, while gentlemen are thus anxious to save the rotten fabric of Mr. Jackson's reputation from the destruction which awaits it, are they ignorant of the deleterious effects which the rejection of this resolution would have on the character of the President of the United States? A man whom eulogy cannot exalt, and who soars above the miserable shafts of calumny and detraction. In order to elucidate this point, I beg the indulgence of the House, to take a concise view of the measures which were in operation at the close of the last session of the tenth Congress. Commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, was wholly interdicted. Provision was made by law for raising a military force of six thousand men in addition to the Military Peace Establishment of the United States; for manning and equipping the whole naval force, including a large number of gunboats for actual service, and for holding in requisition one hundred thousand militia, to be ready to march at a moment's warning. These were the precautions which the crisis demanded. Well, sir, what were the events which occurred to produce a relaxation in these preparations for a state of actual hostility? About one month previous to the meeting of the extraordinary session of Congress, in May last, it was officially announced to the President by David M. Erskine, the British Minister Plenipotentiary in this country, that he had received His Majesty's instructions to offer suitable and honorable reparation for the aggression committed by a British naval officer, in the attack on the United States' frigate Chesapeake. The offer of satisfaction was accepted. This part of the arrangement was followed by propositions from Mr. Erskine for a renewal of commercial intercourse between the respective countries, which was likewise accepted; in consequence of which, Mr. Erskine explicitly states, in an official letter to Mr. Smith, the Secretary of State, that he is "authorized to declare that the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, will have been withdrawn on the tenth day of June next." The President of the United States proceeded immediately to execute, with good faith, the agreement on his part, by issuing a proclamation declaring the revocation of these Orders in Council, whereby commercial intercourse between this country and Great Britain, and her dependencies, was restored.

Permit me now, sir, to call the particular attention of gentlemen to the Message of the President, at the opening of the May session, from which I beg leave to make a few extracts: "A revision of the commercial laws, proper to adapt them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain, will doubtless engage the early attention of Congress."

Again: "Under the existing aspect of our affairs, I have thought it not inconsistent with a just precaution, to have the gunboats, with the exception of those at New Orleans, placed in a situation incurring no expense beyond that requisite for their preservation and convenience for future service; and to have the crews of those at New Orleans reduced to the number required for their navigation and safety. I have thought, also, that our citizens detached in quotas of militia, amounting to one hundred thousand, under the act of March, 1808, might not improperly be relieved from the state in which they were held for immediate service. A discharge of them has accordingly been directed. And it is further submitted to the judgment of Congress to decide how far the change in our external prospects, may authorize any modifications of the laws relating to the Army and Navy Establishments."

What are the plain and obvious conclusions to be drawn from the "promptitude and frankness with which the President met the overtures of Great Britain," and the full confidence which he here manifests in the good faith of that Government? The inference is irresistible, that he did not entertain the most distant suspicion that Mr. Erskine had either acted without authority, or that he had violated his instructions. But suppose the resolution under consideration should be rejected. In that event, the expressions contained in Mr. Jackson's letter of the 11th of October, which are repeated in several other communications, conveying the idea that the Executive Government of the United States had a knowledge that the arrangement made by Mr. Erskine in behalf of his Government was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine, will receive all the support which this House can give them. I demand of gentlemen who oppose the passage of the resolution, whether such a proceeding would not contain a charge of twofold perfidy against the President of the United States? It would speak a language not to be mistaken. In the first place, the arrangement was entered into by the President with a knowledge that it could lead to no other result than a disavowal, and with this knowledge he permits the ocean to be covered with the products of the American people, exposed to the robbery and plunder of British and French privateers. He directs the whole of the gunboats, with the exception of a few at New Orleans, to be placed in a situation incurring no expense, except that necessary for their preservation. The quota of one hundred thousand militia, ordered to be held in requisition for immediate service, is discharged. And the change in our external prospects is made the basis of a recommendation to reduce the Army and Navy Establishments, added to which the recruiting service was actually suspended in obedience to that recommendation. Yes, sir, in order to save Mr. Jackson from disgrace, and to fortify the honor of the British nation, the President must bear the foul imputation of having entered into a fraudulent contract with Mr. Erskine, and what is still more perfidious and extravagant, of having corruptly recommended to Congress the reduction of our means of national defence, on the ground of that arrangement, which, at the time it was made, he knew would result in a disavowal on the part of His Britannic Majesty. I cannot submit, in silence, to insinuations like these, against the Chief Executive Magistrate of the only free people on earth. No man whose mind is exempt from the despotism of prejudice, can for a moment countenance such glaring absurdities.

I shall now, sir, take a view of the ground on which the act of the British Minister Plenipotentiary in the United States is professedly disavowed. In the course of this discussion, it seems to have been admitted, that if Mr. Erskine did really violate his private instructions, the disavowal of the arrangement of April by the British Government was regular and not inconsistent with public law. From this opinion I beg leave to dissent. First, because the agreement was not contingent or executory. Secondly, because the engagements entered into came within the open commission and acknowledged powers of the Minister who concluded it. And, thirdly, because it was executed with good faith on the part of the United States. Besides the usual letter of credence with which the Minister of one sovereign Power is furnished to the sovereign power of the Government at which he is accredited, Mr. Erskine was clothed with special authority on this particular occasion. In the despatch of the 23d of January, Mr. Canning, after enumerating the three conditions which Mr. Erskine was instructed to propose to this Government, proceeds with his instructions in the following language: "As, however, it is possible that the delay which must intervene before the actual conclusion of a treaty may appear to the American Government to deprive this arrangement of part of its benefits, I am to authorize you, if the American Government should be desirous of acting upon the agreement before it is reduced into a regular form, either by the immediate repeal of the embargo and the other acts in question, or by engaging to repeal them on a particular day, to assure the American Government of His Majesty's readiness to meet such a disposition in the manner best calculated to give it immediate effect."

Thus, Mr. Erskine is made the sole judge of the extent and import of his instructions, and if he has been guilty of a departure from them, his Sovereign cannot take advantage of that circumstance so as to work an injury to the other contracting party. But, independent of this special power, I contend that the act of Mr. Erskine was strictly within his general letter of credence, and that the British Government was bound to perform the agreement on its part, unless it could be shown that fraud and collusion had been practised between Mr. Erskine and Mr. Smith, the American Secretary of State. This I think was manifestly the opinion of Mr. Canning, which I shall attempt to show from Mr. Jackson's correspondence in the course of my argument. Mr. Canning, without doubt, knew the law on this subject, and had charged the successor of Mr. Erskine to make out a good case, for the preservation of His Majesty's honor.

Permit me now, sir, to examine what are the established principles of public law, in relation to contracts entered into by proxy. I shall refer in the course of my remarks to the several writers on the law of nations, whose authority will not be questioned, and for greater convenience, I propose to give a quotation from each in succession. Puffendorf, page 309-10—Here the principle for which I have contended, is clearly supported:

"If any agent be sent with a double commission, one open, to show the person with whom he is to transact, the other secret, prescribing what steps he shall take, and how far he shall proceed; it may be made a question whether the agent shall oblige his principal if he exceed his private and secret orders, and yet to keep within his open commission where the affirmative side ought to be maintained. For, by my own instructions, I bind myself to the third person with whom the contract is made that I will ratify and make good what my agent shall conclude on. And by my secret orders I bind my agent not to recede from such positive terms, in which point if he transgress, he stands accountable to me, for so much as I lose by his mismanagement, but I am still tied to perform to the third person, what was thus granted in my name. For otherwise there could be no manner of safety in treating by commissioners, it being ever to be feared, lest their secret directions should differ from their open powers, neither could there be a more specious pretence made use of to overthrow all affairs transacted by mediation, and to deceive, and abuse men with vain treaties. But it must be observed, we suppose here, as in the former case, that the agent, when he thus transgresses the bounds of his private instructions, did it not out of a dishonest and treacherous design."

"Where we have given a man a power or commission to act for us as our proxy, though no restrictions or limitation of such commissions may appear, yet it frequently happens that we give some private instructions to such proxy, or agent, in what manner we would have him act, and how far he may go. Suppose him then to act contrary to these private instructions, and to go farther than we allowed him, we shall be obliged to stand to the promise which he makes for us, notwithstanding our consent seems to be wanting. For that act of our will whereby he was appointed our agent, which is the only act of our will that is or can be known by the party to whom the promise is made, is sufficient to make what such agent does for us, be considered as our own act; the private instructions which we gave him cannot affect any one to whom they are not known, and from whom we were determined to conceal them; they cannot therefore so affect the party to whom the promise is made as to prevent his claim upon us. The consent which appears to him, must in respect of him, be looked upon as our true and full consent. If it was otherwise, there would be such room for collusion, between the promiser and his agent, that it would be in their power at any time, to prevent any obligation from arising upon the promises thus made."

I trust, sir, no gentleman will hereafter attempt to justify the conduct of the British Government, either on the ground that Mr. Erskine violated his secret instructions, or that he was not possessed of a full power. The despatch of the 23d January authorizes him to conclude an agreement to take immediate effect, without any reservation to suspend its operation for the ratification of His Majesty. Mr. Canning well knew that the first information received in England of such an agreement, would bring with it the supplies so necessary to relieve the wants of his suffering country: it was therefore important that the British Minister here should stipulate for the fulfilment of the terms agreed on by His Majesty, and thereby prevent delay in the benefits which would result to that nation, from the enlargement of our commerce.

But, whether we consider that special authority or the general letter of credence, it is equally clear that the British Government was bound by the act of its Minister. The plea that Mr. Erskine had violated his private orders is unavailing, both in reference to the known and established principles of public law, and to the plain and obvious dictates of reason, and of common sense. I challenge any gentleman to show, in the annals of diplomacy, a solitary case in which the veracity of an accredited Minister at any Court has been questioned, when he officially makes known the instructions he has received from his Sovereign. If then Mr. Erskine had authority to bind his Government, it may be useful to examine the ground on which the contract he entered into with the President might be impugned. On this point, I refer gentlemen to Pothier on Obligations, page 21:

"It is only the fraud which has given rise to the contract that may give occasion for the rescision of it, viz: the fraud by which one of the parties has induced the other to contract, who would not have contracted without it. 2. It is requisite also, in order that I may claim the rescision of my engagement, that the fraud which has been made use of in order to induce me to contract should have been committed by the party with whom I have contracted, or at least that he should have participated in it. If it has been committed without his participating, and if I have not besides been enormously injured, my engagement is valid, and is not liable to rescision."

These are the principles upon which alone the arrangement of April could have been disavowed by the King of Great Britain, without a sacrifice of the honor of the British nation; and I think it very evident that Mr. Jackson has taken as the basis of his correspondence with Mr. Smith, not merely that Mr. Erskine violated his instructions, but that the Secretary of State had induced him to substitute terms which were known not to be within his powers, and consequently that the agreement originated in fraud and collusion. This, sir, is the broad position assumed by Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 11th of October. In that letter he states that it would have been unreasonable for this Government to complain of the disavowal of an act, done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed, and then proceeds to explain the circumstances to which he alludes:

"It was not known when I left England whether Mr. Erskine had, according to the liberty allowed him, communicated to you in extenso his original instructions—it now appears he did not. But in reverting to his official correspondence, and particularly to a despatch addressed on the 20th of April to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I find that he there states that he had submitted to your consideration the three conditions specified in those instructions, as the ground-work of an arrangement which, according to information received from this country, it was thought in England might be made with a prospect of mutual advantage. Mr. Erskine then reports, verbatim et seriatim, your observations upon each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you that these letters were an equivalent for the original conditions, but the very act of substitution, evidently shows that these original conditions were in fact very explicitly communicated to you, and by you of course laid before the President for his consideration. I need hardly add, that the difference between these conditions and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th of April is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation; nor need I draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that, under such circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister."

Here then we have the original ground taken by Mr. Jackson, to vindicate the honor of his Sovereign. I do not believe that this was the work of his own imagination. No, sir—it formed an object of no small magnitude in his mission to this country, to inculpate the Executive Government of the United States in this affair, and thereby to exculpate His Majesty from the disgrace incident to the violation of a solemn engagement. "The breach of a solemn promise," says a modern writer, on the law of nations, "is a violation of another person's right, and as evidently an act of injustice as it would be to rob a man of his property."

Mr. Canning, well knowing that the King, his master, had reserved no right "to disavow the act of his Minister," in the despatch of the 23d of January, and that, upon the most solid principles of public law, he could not refuse with good faith to execute his part of the agreement, except he supported the allegation of fraud between the contracting parties, charges the new Minister to rest the justification of the disavowal on that basis. And what, sir, are the reasons urged by Mr. Jackson to show the right of His Majesty to disavow the agreement of April? does he rely on the assertion, that Mr. Erskine made propositions to this Government not warranted by his instructions, and therefore not binding on his Sovereign? No, sir. Does he pretend that a full power was necessary to give validity to the contract? This is not pretended. But he says, explicitly, that Mr. Smith was made acquainted with the three conditions, contained in the despatch of the 23d of January, that he made observations on each of them, and offered reasons, why he thought others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may, says Mr. Jackson, have been concluded between you (Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine,) that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions. The evident meaning of these expressions is, that the arrangement of April was first conceived by Mr. Smith, that he proposed to substitute it in lieu of the original conditions, and that he collusively prevailed on Mr. Erskine to accept them as an equivalent for those conditions. To show that Mr. Jackson never lost sight of this charge against the American Secretary of State, I refer to a sentence in his letter of the 23d of October. "So far from the terms which he (Mr. Erskine) was actually induced to accept having been contemplated in his instructions, he himself states that they were substituted by you in lieu of those originally proposed." From this view of the subject, I must conclude, that not only Mr.

Jackson, but the British ministry themselves, were of opinion, that to refuse with honor to carry the arrangement of April into effect on their part, it was incumbent on them to show that the Executive of the United States had fraudulently induced Mr. Erskine to substitute that arrangement in lieu of the conditions "originally proposed." Mr. Jackson expressly admits, in his letter of the 4th of November, that he must continue to repeat this insulting charge, "whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is called in question;" and for what purpose? "To vindicate its honor and dignity, in the manner that appears to me best calculated for that purpose." This is indeed a most unfortunate admission for Mr. Jackson. The official correspondence of Mr. Erskine with the Secretary of State, repels the foul insinuation, and fixes a stain on the honor of the British nation, which the corroding hand of time cannot efface.

But the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PINKNEY) has told us that the agreement entered into by Mr. Erskine could not bind his Government, because that gentleman had no full power. A sentence from Mr. Jackson's letter of the 4th of November will answer that argument more conclusively than volumes of reasoning in all the syllogistic forms of ancient or modern logicians. "I must beg your very particular attention to the circumstance, that His Majesty's ratification has been withheld, not because the agreement was concluded without a full power, but because it was altogether irreconcilable to the instructions on which it was professedly founded." The gentleman from Connecticut admits that the President could not demand a view of Mr. Erskine's secret instructions, and Mr. Jackson assures us that the want of a full power formed no part of the motive which induced His Majesty to withhold his ratification. A more complete justification of the American Government could not be given than is contained in these conflicting arguments. I have shown that Mr. Canning, in the despatch of the 23d of January, had provided for an immediate execution of the agreement; the instructions of Mr. Erskine were known only to himself, and were submitted to be exercised entirely at his discretion, according to his own opinion of their spirit and intention. The ratification of His Majesty is not made a prerequisite to the fulfilment of the agreement on our part; it follows, therefore, according to the respectable authority which I have quoted, that the breach of a perfect promise made on the part of Great Britain, by a Minister whose powers are acknowledged to be full and sufficient for the purpose, is a violation of right, "and as evidently an act of injustice as it would be to rob a man of his property."

The cases referred to by the gentleman from Connecticut relate to treaties, conventions, and explanatory articles of treaties, where the consent of the co-ordinate department of the Government, to whom the treaty-making power is confided, must be obtained before either party is at liberty to proceed to their execution.

To illustrate the distinction which I shall take between the disavowed arrangement and a treaty, I refer to Ward's history of the Law of Nations, page 231. "By treaties, I do not mean merely those agreements which men fall upon in order to bring about a cessation from war. But all those deeds, whatever they were, by which some uncertainty was put out of doubt, some contingent difficulty smoothed away, and the natural rights of mankind not unfrequently treached upon in order the better to enjoy those that remained." The Minister of Great Britain, in the case under consideration, entered into no deed either formal or informal, but merely declares himself to be authorized to pledge His Majesty for the performance of an act purely Executive. The removal of the Orders in Council is altogether a Cabinet measure, which might be taken at any moment in the recess of Parliament. This Government, therefore, could not conceive itself at liberty to hesitate in placing full confidence in the official declarations of Mr. Erskine, that he was instructed to declare, "that the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, will have been withdrawn on the 10th day of June next." Let us look, sir, at the conduct of Mr. Canning in a case precisely apposite to this. The President of the United States was authorized, in the event of such peace or suspension of hostilities between the belligerent Powers of Europe, or of such changes in their measures affecting neutral commerce, as might render that of the United States sufficiently safe, in his judgment, to suspend in whole, or in part, the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto. Instructions were, accordingly, forwarded to our Minister at London to propose a suspension of the embargo, as an equivalent for the removal of the British Orders in Council, so far as they respected the United States. This proposition, it seems, was, in the first instance, communicated in conversation between Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Canning, upon which the latter has made the following remarks: "In the first of our conferences, I understood you to say little more on the authority of your Government, than that you were instructed to remonstrate against the Orders in Council of the 7th of January, and of the 11th of November, 1807, but to add, as from yourself, an expression of your conviction, that if those orders were repealed, the President of the United States would suspend the embargo, as to Great Britain. Upon the consequences of such a suspension of the embargo, while it would still continue to be enforced against France, you expatiated largely, still speaking, however, as I understood you, your own individual sentiments." Will gentlemen dispute the accuracy of the orthodox, sharp-sighted George Canning? I think, sir, unless some radical change has very recently taken place, there is nothing to be feared on that score. Mr. Pinkney, in these conversations, was induced to believe that his proposal would be well received, and Mr. Canning, in order to evade the obligation which he might have incurred relative to a removal of the Orders in Council, resorts to every pretext within the grasp of his fertile imagination to show that the proposition was not submitted in regular form, so as to make it binding on the President of the United States. Well, sir, does he demand of Mr. Pinkney the production of a full power? Is that made a sine qua non to all further negotiation? None of these things appear to have entered in the brain of Mr. Canning; notwithstanding, he seems peculiarly disposed to equivocate, and even to misrepresent the words of Mr. Pinkney. The only objection which he thought it plausible to urge was, that the overture was not made on the authority of the President, but that Mr. Pinkney expressed his own opinion, that, if the Orders in Council were removed, the President of the United States would suspend the embargo as to Great Britain.

The result of that correspondence shows, that the overture of Mr. Pinkney was rejected on principles of general policy, and not on either of the grounds of exception taken by gentlemen to the powers of Mr. Erskine. There is not the slightest shade of difference between the two cases. The removal of the embargo by the President, and of the Orders in Council by His Britannic Majesty, were reciprocal acts, each within the range of Executive authority, without requiring the interposition of any co-ordinate branch of either Government.

But, sir, it is impossible to mistake the duplicity of Mr. Canning in this transaction. We know too much of that jesuitical negotiator in America to be caught in the cobweb which he has thrown over the real motives which influenced His Majesty's Ministers in the disavowal of the act of Mr. Erskine. The delusive idea that he had violated his instructions, is the ostensible, not the real cause of the disavowal. I think that it has been satisfactorily shown, that the departure of a proxy from his secret orders does not impair a fair and bona fide contract which he enters into for his principal; and from the admissions of Mr. Canning himself, it will be readily inferred that such a departure is not, in fact, the consideration on which the arrangement of April was rejected. When Mr. Pinkney, our Minister in London, was informed that a new Minister was to be sent to America, Mr. Canning assigns as the reason, that Mr. Erskine had not acted in conformity to the despatch of the 23d of January, in obtaining the three conditions therein specified, and that these conditions must be obtained before any alteration could take place in the Cabinet measures of Great Britain, affecting the neutral commerce of the United States. He states explicitly, that Mr. Jackson is to proceed to America, "not on any special mission, which Mr. Erskine was not authorized to promise, except upon conditions—not one of which he has obtained."

On the 23d of June following, Mr. Canning, in a conversation with Mr. Pinkney respecting these very conditions, which he previously declared must be made the basis of the repeal of the Orders in Council, "admitted that the second condition had no necessary connexion with the Orders in Council, and intimated that they would have been content to leave the subject of it to future discussion and arrangement. And with respect to the third condition, he said, that he was himself of opinion, that the idea upon which that condition turns could not well find its way into a stipulation; that he had, nevertheless, believed it proper to propose the condition to the United States." If then, sir, the failure of Mr. Erskine to obtain the whole of these conditions was really the reason on which the act of that Minister was disavowed, why are the only objectionable conditions suddenly abandoned, and declared to be wholly unconnected with the Order in Council, and inadmissible in any stipulation for their repeal? Does not this abandonment carry with it the most irrefragable demonstration that the arrangement of April, relative to the removal of the Orders in Council, was not disavowed because these conditions were not acceded to by the American Government? At one moment we are told, that no special mission can be authorized to this country except upon conditions—not one of which Mr. Erskine has obtained; and afterwards it is confessed that the two conditions, which were alone offensive to this Government, had nothing at all to do with the subject. I waive the evidence which is contained in Mr. Erskine's explanatory correspondence, as to the several letters of instructions with which he was furnished, and I rest my argument on this point solely, on the admissions of Mr. Canning in his conversations of the 23d of June, 1809. Sir, I am one of those who believe that this agreement was brought about by the shock which Great Britain sustained under the operation of our embargo. Mr. Canning had to perform the arduous task of quieting the murmurs of a hungry people. The great manufacturing interest of the nation were discontented and clamorous against Ministers, because they were thrown out of employment, and deprived of their usual supply of the important articles of cotton and tobacco, which they had been accustomed to receive from America. Ireland was on the brink of ruin. The British army in Spain was defeated, and compelled to return to England, covered with wounds instead of laurels. Admonished by these disastrous circumstances, and urged by the hard hand of necessity, the relaxation of their maritime restrictions appeared to be indispensable to the salvation of the British nation. It was this state of things which prompted Mr. Canning to furnish the several letters of instruction to Mr. Erskine, on which he was authorized to declare that the Orders in Council would be removed on a particular day. But, sir, before the success of Mr. Erskine's proposition for a renewal of commercial intercourse was officially known at the foreign office, the markets of Great Britain and her dependencies were glutted with the products of America. Their wants were supplied, and from a state little short of starvation, they were restored to the enjoyment of that abundance which custom had taught them to look for from this fertile region. The Continental war was renewed with great vigor by the ill-fated Emperor, Francis. The affairs of Spain revived again the desponding hopes of the British Ministry. New expeditions were planned; and the gloom which recent calamities had spread over the national prospects was exchanged for the illusory dream of countless victories, whose terrors should reach even the imperial throne of Napoleon himself. Buoyed up by these delusive calculations, His Majesty was induced to disavow the agreement entered into by Mr. Erskine with the American Government. The suggestion that Mr. Erskine acted contrary to his several letters of instructions, is a mere pretext, which cannot bear the penetrating touch of open and candid investigation. We have learnt from experience that the only security we can have for the good faith of the British Government, is necessity. The embargo was a weapon which might have been wielded with great effect in producing that necessity, and in redressing the wrongs inflicted on this country by the belligerent Powers of Europe. "God's chosen people," the planters of the Southern States and Territories, have sustained the most severe losses from the operation of the embargo, and yet no people in the Union have evinced a more ardent determination to support that and every other measure of policy calculated to vindicate the national honor. But the fact is notorious, that there was not virtue enough in the Eastern portion of the Union to carry the law into effect. That expedient is now rendered imbecile by the fatal experiment which it has recently undergone. There is now no alternative but war or submission. But the adoption of the resolution is deprecated, on the ground of its hostile aspect. We are told by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER,) that it is an appeal to the King of England, on the subject of the misconduct of one of his servants, not by argument, but by menace; and that gentleman has asked, what would be the conduct of Southern gentlemen, if required to chastise a servant who had transgressed, when that request was accompanied with a threat of personal violence in case of refusal? I will answer the gentleman's hypothesis by a concise statement of facts. The people of the United States have been robbed of their property while pursuing a lawful commerce on the high seas. Our fellow-citizens have been impressed to the number of several thousands, and compelled to enter into the service of His Majesty, on board his ships of war, without the most distant prospect of relief. A national ship has been attacked in a time of profound peace by a British squadron, and her crew most shamefully murdered within our own jurisdictional limits; for which acknowledged outrage upon the national sovereignty no honorable atonement has been made. Our commerce is restricted by the enforcement of regulations inconsistent with the most sacred principles which bind together the nations of the earth; and to cap the climax, the Executive Government of this country is charged with perfidy and falsehood in its very domicile.

Now, sir, I ask Northern gentlemen to say how they will resent these injuries and insults which the nation has received from Great Britain? Will they crouch under the lash of this inexorable tyrant? or, will they, by a manly display of dignified firmness, support the rights, the honor, and independence of the United States? Sir, between individuals, when the party assailed calls on those around him for protection, and seeks to shelter himself from danger, the assailant becomes more brave, and rushes with impetuosity in pursuit of the object of his vengeance; but where each man shows an equal disposition to maintain his ground, a parley is not unfrequently the result. The gentleman is unwilling even to menace His Most Gracious Majesty, but wishes, in the mildness of Christian forbearance, to appeal to him by argument, and persuade him to do us justice; while we are to retreat as if affrighted by some fell spirit of destruction from the proposition before us, because, forsooth, it may so affect the delicate nerves of His Majesty that he can never "speak to us again." Sir, this is not the language which was held by our venerable fathers who so nobly achieved our independence, and it is not the language which will perpetuate that independence.

If, indeed, we could be so pusillanimous as to dread the consequences of a manly declaration of our rights, and our determination to support them, it might be questionable whether Great Britain would stoop so low as to speak to us. Under such humiliating circumstances we should deserve the contempt of the world. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) has denounced the resolution on your table as a tissue of falsehood. That gentleman has taken as the ground of his argument that the knowledge imputed to this Government of Mr. Erskine's instructions refers to the time of the disavowal, and to the time the agreement was entered into. I shall not ransack these documents for the purpose of sifting from Mr. Jackson's letters the most offensive expressions which they contain to show the great object of his mission was to rescue his own Government from disgrace by fixing a charge of fraud and collusion on the Executive of the United States, and that object is steadily pursued through the whole correspondence. But, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has given us a lumping argument, I shall call on Mr. Jackson for the only reply which it merits. And really, sir, I beg pardon of Mr. Jackson for having so often set him in collision with his friends. I hope it will produce no misunderstanding between them. Mr. Smith, in his letter of dismissal to Mr. Jackson, enumerates the causes why no further communications will be received from him; and that these may be fairly before the House, I beg leave to refer to the letter itself:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

November 8, 1809.

SIR: In my letter of the 19th ult., I stated to you that the declaration in your letter of the 11th, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine of the 23d of January, was the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclu-tion of an arrangement on the matter to which it related, was then for the first time made to this Government. And it was added, that if that despatch had been communicated at the time of the arrangement, or if it had been known that the propositions contained in it were the only ones on which he was authorized to make an arrangement, the arrangement would not have been made.

In my letter of the 1st inst., adverting to the repetition in your letter of the 23d ult., of a language implying a knowledge in this Government, that the instructions of your predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him, an intimation was distinctly given to you, that, after the explicit and peremptory asseveration that this Government had not any such knowledge, and that with such a knowledge such an arrangement would not have been made, no such insinuation could be admitted by this Government.

Finding that, in your reply of the 4th inst., you have used a language which cannot be understood but as reiterating, and even aggravating, the same gross insinuation, it only remains, in order to preclude opportunities which are thus abused, to inform you that no further communications will be received from you, and that the necessity of this determination will, without delay, be made known to your Government. In the mean time a ready attention will be given to any communications affecting the interests of the two nations, through any other channel that may be substituted.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

R. SMITH.

Well, sir, what does Mr. Jackson say, through Mr. Oakley, in reply to the enumeration of facts which is contained in Mr. Smith's letter? He says, "that Mr. Jackson has seen, with much regret, that facts, which it has been his duty to state in his official correspondence, have been deemed by the American Government to afford a sufficient motive for breaking off an important negotiation, and for putting an end to all communication whatever with the Minister charged by his Sovereign with that negotiation, so interfering to both nations, and on one point of which an answer has not even been returned to an official and written overture." Is not this a satisfactory answer to the labored speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts? Mr. Jackson does not pretend that he was misunderstood, or misstated by Mr. Smith. He merely regrets that the facts, which it had been his duty to state, were deemed a sufficient motive for breaking off an important negotiation. It is tacitly admitted that he had charged this Government with a knowledge that the despatch of the 23d of January was the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine on the subject to which it related. That, with this knowledge, the President had collusively induced Mr. Erskine to substitute the arrangement of April, "in lieu of the conditions originally proposed;" and, that, under these circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow that arrangement, but he regrets that these facts, which it had been his duty to state, should be deemed by the American Government to afford a sufficient motive for breaking off an important negotia-

Sir, I do not believe if Mr. Jackson was now at the bar of the House, that in his own defence, he would descend to retract these insulting charges. Nay, I go further; I do not believe he would feel himself authorized to retract them under any circumstances. To these facts, says Mr. Jackson, "I have scrupulously adhered, and in so doing I must continue, whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is called in question." How far the knowledge which this Government possessed, at the time the agreement was disavowed, is connected with a justification of the act, remains for the gentleman from Massachusetts to show. "It is only the fraud which has given rise to the contract that may give occasion for the rescision of it;" and, according to the premises assumed by the gentleman, it follows that if this Government knew the extent of Mr. Erskine's powers, at the time the disavowal of His Majesty was made known, ergo, the agreement was fraudulent and void, ab initio. I leave the gentleman to reconcile these absurdities. But it has been said, that the threat which the resolution contains will be an effectual barrier to further negotiation. Mr. Jackson has, indeed, alleged that his dismissal put an end to an important negotiation; but the most superficial view of this correspondence must satisfy every man that such is not the fact. Mr. Canning, as early as the 27th of May, informs us that Mr. Jackson is to proceed to America; "not on any special mission, which Mr. Erskine was not authorized to promise, except upon conditions—not one of which he has obtained;" and notwithstanding every gentleman has warmly protested against these conditions, they seem to have forgotten that Mr. Jackson has expressly made their adoption the ultimatum of his Government—the event on which he is authorized to conclude a treaty. And this, sir, is the important negotiation which has terminated with the mission of Mr. Jackson, and which gentlemen fear will not again resuscitate. We are required by this resolution to give a pledge to the American people, and to the world, to stand by and support the Executive Government in its refusal to receive any further communications from Francis J. Jackson." What answer shall we give to this proposition? Shall we say to the American people, to Great Britain, and to the world, that we will not stand by and support the Executive Government in that refusal? Let us consider the consequences of such a step in the present crisis.

The President of the United States has requested His Majesty to recall the offending Minister, from whom he refuses to receive further communications. That Minister has doubtless given to his transactions here a coloring favorable to the part he has acted, and his representations will bear in unison with the wishes of his Sovereign. And, sir, at the very moment when these despatches form the subject of consultation in the British Cabinet, a transcript from your journals announces the determination of the Representatives of the people not to support the conduct of the President in his refusal to receive further communications from Mr. Jackson. Is it to be expected that, under these circumstances, the request of the Executive would command the respectful attention which its importance to the welfare of the nation really demands? So far from attending to that request, the President would be told, "that he had insulted the Minister of a great and powerful nation, while in the legitimate discharge of his official functions; and that upon a solemn appeal to the most popular branch of the American Government, they had refused to stand by and support him in the attitude which he had assumed towards that Minister. If, then, you cannot find support within the walls of your own Capitol, it is unreasonable in you to expect His Majesty to listen to your request." Mr. Jackson might be recalled; but the breach between the two nations would receive a more portentous aspect by a demand from the British Government of ample atonement for the insult he had received in his ministerial character, notwithstanding the solemn declarations of the Executive to the contrary. And, sir, all the consequences which gentlemen seem to anticipate from the adoption of the resolution would unavoidably flow from its rejection. We should, in that case, say to the American people, and to the world, that we will not "call into action the whole force of the nation, should it become necessary, in consequence of the conduct of the Executive department in this particular," nor "repel future insults if they should be offered." And is there any honorable member on this floor who is prepared to say, that he will not call into action the whole force of the nation if it should become necessary? That he will not repel future insults if they should be offered? Sir, I should loathe my country if such degrading sentiments could receive the sanction of the National Legislature.

Whatever may be the fate of the resolution, it has my hearty approbation. It is the only support which the Constitution permits me to give it. But though my suffrage cannot be recorded, my hand and my voice shall be raised to defend the honor and independence of the nation so long as the vital spark shall continue to animate my bosom.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee.—Mr. Speaker, it is not deemed necessary in the observations I will make on the resolution under consideration to take into view any relations of the United States with Great Britain or France, because it does not clearly appear that any exist, except in this, that the United States are suffering loss and damage. If there be any relations with Great Britain, as they respect the United States, they are negative and suffering; as they respect Great Britain, positive and active. Be they what they may, they are not properly within the range of a discussion on this resolution, which merely respects the conduct of an Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty near the United States. How the relations, if there be any, between the United States and France are connected with the subject of this resolution, will require the greatest civilian, the most wise master of public law, to discover; the consideration of these subjects, except so far as mentioning only circumstances which have existed, will be omitted. Neither does it appear very necessary to recur, in examining this question, in the view I intend to take of it, to writers or authorities, as they are called, on public law or laws of nations, because, if any time heretofore, there was a public law acknowledged and practised by all civilized nations, that law is, in these times, become obsolete and disused; and the great nations of the old world have severally adopted particular systems of law respecting other nations, adapted to their own several existing circumstances, and bottomed on principles different from those which heretofore were denominated principles of public law. When, therefore, in the course of these observations, said Mr. R., I may use the words "public law," my intention is to express thereby an idea of some system named public law, not the law of nature, which, gradually becoming obsolete, has been very little, if any, in use since the commencement of the American Revolution—a system which, notwithstanding it is often appealed to, if ever it did exist, is now only to be found in books, and not in practice. Neither is it intended in this case to draw into notice any diplomatic proceedings many years heretofore transacted, by way of argument, in support of what I may say on the subject of this resolution; inasmuch as the truth and merits of it do rest and depend on the Message of the President of the United States, and the documents accompanying the same, and the other documents relative thereto, which have been received from him since the commencement of this session of Congress, together with some other documents relative to the arrangement of April last, made between the American Government and the honorable David Montague Erskine, late Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from His Britannic Majesty, near the United States.

This resolution is not an answer to a Message from the President of the United States; there are not in it any words of relation between it and a message evidencing an expression or intended direction of that nature; neither are there in it any words manifesting an intention to transmit it to him as an address; for these and other reasons, which, if necessary, might be mentioned, it does not appear that this joint resolution can, with any propriety, be named an answer or response to a Message from the President, or an address to him. It may, therefore, be reasonably expected, that any objection raised against it, on the opinion of its being an answer to a Message from the President, or an address to him, will not prevail.

This resolution is not a declaration of war; it is predicated on a specified conduct of an Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, near the Government of the United States, and on the denial of the Executive Government of the United States to receive any further communications from him in consequence of that conduct. And it may be observed that, how ancient soever among nations the custom or usage of sending or receiving Ambassadors, Plenipotentiaries, and public Ministers of that kind may be, the custom or usage, it is reasonable to believe, is bottomed only on the great principle of humanity, and does not impose a perfect obligation either to send such Minister, or to receive him, or to continue him after being received; therefore, not to send an Ambassador, Plenipotentiary, or public Minister—not to receive such Minister—to recall such Minister—or to refuse to receive any further communications from such Minister, is not a just cause of war; and it follows that the acting or not acting, in either of the cases, is not a declaration of war. True it is, that the resolution states, that "the Congress of the United States do solemnly pledge themselves to the American people, and to the world, to stand by and support the Executive Government in its refusal to receive any further communications from the said Francis James Jackson, and to call into action the whole force of the nation, if it should become necessary, in consequence of the conduct of the Executive Government in this respect, to repel such insult, and to assert and maintain the rights, the honor, and the interests of the United States;" but, it is to be observed, that that pledge goes only to the doing of certain things which may become necessary in consequence of the conduct of the Executive Government in respect to that thing which is alluded to. But if any gentleman is disposed to continue to this resolution the name of an answer to a Message from the President, or address to him, or to call it a declaration of war, he certainly may give it any name he pleases; and I hope, said Mr. R., that I may also have the liberty to give it a name that appears appropriate to it.

At the last session of Congress a resolution was proposed for consideration in this House, of the import following:

That resolution and the resolution now under consideration are not similar in cause, subject-matter, or effect. The cause assigned for that resolution was the frankness and promptitude of the President in meeting the overtures of Great Britain, which preceded the arrangement of April last, virtually implying that that Power had been, prior to that period, in the practice of making overtures of the same nature and extent to the Executive Government of the United States, but without effect, and, for that, virtually approbating the conduct of that Power; and that the Executive Government of the United States had not, prior to that period, been frank and prompt to meet such overtures of Great Britain, and that, therefore, it had not attended to the interest of the American people. That resolution in express terms approbated the conduct of the President, and was intended, if adopted, to have been presented to him as an act of this House (but of this House) only, it not being a joint resolution of both Houses of Congress; the effect of that resolution, notwithstanding it ought so to have been, was not conclusive on Great Britain; it also was presented to the House of Representatives at a time when doubts, in consequence of the orders of April 26, existed whether Great Britain would, in good faith, perform the arrangement of April, made by Mr. Erskine with the United States; and the event has indubitably proved the propriety of not adopting that resolution.

The resolution under consideration respects the conduct of an Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty towards the Executive Government of the United States, and the act of that Government in consequence thereof; the cause and subject-matter of this resolution, after what has been said by gentlemen in support of it, require but little further elucidation; the act of the Executive Government is, in this case, complete, conclusive, and cannot be contested. It cannot, therefore, with good faith be said, that the disapprobation of that resolution presented at the last session of Congress, and the approbation of the resolution under consideration, argues a change of opinion, or a change of principle.

Against the adoption of this resolution, it has been urged that there is no precedent in nature of a joint resolution of both Houses of Congress for it, nor any precedent for it to be found in the acts and proceedings of any nation. Admit that to be so, it will prove nothing. It will be difficult, indeed, to find in the acts and proceedings of any nation a precedent (if one was necessary) to sanction and authorize the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; but the United States judged themselves to be sufficiently adequate to adopt that Constitution, and it was adopted. I will not, therefore, said Mr. R., trouble this House or myself to inquire about a precedent to sanction this resolution; for, if this be a new or novel case, (as has been intimated,) I am willing to assist. And it is certain that the United States, in Congress assembled, have power sufficient to make a precedent in this new case, which in future may be relied on in all cases of a similar nature. The resolution states:

"That the expressions contained in the official letter of Francis J. Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty near the United States, dated the 23d day of October, 1809, and addressed to Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, conveying the idea that the Executive Government of the United States had a knowledge that the arrangement lately made by Mr. Erskine, his predecessor, in behalf of his Government, with the Government of the United States, was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine, for that purpose, were highly indecorous and insolent. That the repetition of the same intimation in his official letter dated the 4th of November, 1809, after he was apprized by the asseveration of the Secretary of State that the Executive Government had no such knowledge, and that if it had possessed such knowledge, such arrangement would not have been entered into on the part of the United States; and after also being officially apprized that such intimation was inadmissible, was still more insolent and affronting; and in refusing to receive any further communications from him, in consequence of these outrageous and premeditated insults, the Executive Government has manifested a just regard to its dignity and honor, as well as to the character and interest of the American people. That the letter signed 'Francis J. Jackson,' headed 'Circular,' dated the 13th November, 1809, and published through the country, is a still more direct and aggravated insult and affront to the American people and their Government, and it is evidently an insidious attempt to excite their resentment and distrust against their own Government, by appealing to them, through false or fallacious disguises, against some of their acts; and to excite resentments and divisions amongst the people themselves, which can only be dishonorable to their own characters and ruinous to their own interests. And the Congress of the United States do hereby solemnly pledge themselves to the American people, and to the world," &c.

Mr. Jackson, in his official letter of the 4th of November, 1809, to the Secretary of State of the United States, uses the following remarkable expression: "But, as to the propriety of my allusions, you must allow me to acknowledge only the decision of my own Sovereign, whose commands I obey, and to whom alone I can consider myself responsible."

Here, then, Mr. Jackson clearly intimates, that as to the propriety of his allusions, he obeys the command of his Sovereign, whose decision only, in respect to the propriety of his allusions he acknowledges; and to whom alone, in respect to the propriety of his allusions, he considered himself responsible. The propriety of this construction of that remarkable expression will not be doubted, inasmuch as every general one contains all the particulars. It follows, then, that the Sovereign of Mr. Jackson is a party in the allusion of Mr. J., and consequently that His Britannic Majesty's Government and the United States are parties to the case stated in the resolution. This case having originated from the conduct of a Minister Plenipotentiary from one sovereign Power to another, and as all civilized nations are interested in the conduct of their Plenipotentiaries and public Ministers, it may truly be said, that all the civilized nations of the world are interested in the case contained in the resolution under consideration. It is therefore necessary that this case, novel as is said in the United States of America, be made known to all the civilized nations in the world. This resolution is for that purpose, and that all the civilized nations in the world may know what the decision is; that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, do pronounce on it. This resolution, therefore, may properly be named a manifesto.

Immediately on reading this resolution, a question of the greatest importance presented itself—that is, is this resolution, or, in other words, are the matters therein stated and alluded to, true? For, if they be not true, it was not right to refuse to receive any further communications from Mr.

Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty. The character of the Executive Government of the United States is well known to be mild, amiable, peaceable, and just; it is presumed that the Government, possessing these qualities, would not have refused to receive any further communications from the same Minister Plenipotentiary without just cause. What is that cause? The resolution states "that the expressions contained in the letter of Francis J. Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty near the United States, dated the 23d day of October, 1809, and addressed to Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, conveying the idea that the Executive Government of the United States had a knowledge that the arrangement lately made by Mr. Erskine, his predecessor, in behalf of his Government, with the Government of the United States, was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine for that purpose, were highly indecorous and insolent. That the repetition of the same intimation, in his official letter dated the 4th of November, 1809, after he was apprized by the asseveration of the Secretary of State that the Executive Government had no such knowledge, and that if it had possessed such knowledge, such arrangement would not have been entered into on the part of the United States, and after also being officially apprized that such intimation was inadmissible, was still more insolent and affronting."

In order to manifest the truth of this statement, it will be necessary to examine and recite some parts of the official correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Jackson.

The Secretary of State, in his official letter of the 8th of November, 1809, to Mr. Jackson, after stating that in his letter of the 19th of October he had stated to Mr. Jackson that the declaration in Mr. Jackson's letter of the 11th, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine of the 23d January was the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it related, was then for the first time made known to this Government. And it was added that if that despatch had been communicated at the time of the arrangement, or if it had been known that the propositions contained in it were the only ones on which he was authorized to make an arrangement, the arrangement would not have been made. And that in his letter of the 1st of November, adverting to the repetition in Mr. Jackson's letter of the 23d of October, of a language implying a knowledge in this Government that the instructions of his predecessor did not authorize the arrangement, an intimation was distinctly given to Mr. Jackson that, after the explicit and peremptory asseveration that this Government had not any such knowledge, and that with such knowledge such an arrangement would not have been made, no such intimation could be admitted by this Government. The Secretary then proceeds to state: "Finding that in your reply of the 4th instant, you have used a lan-

' gauge which cannot be misunderstood, but as ' reiterating and even aggravating the same gross
' insinuation, it only remains, in order to preclude ' opportunities which are thus abused, to inform ' you that no further communications will be re' ceived from you, and that the necessity of this
' determination will, without delay, be made ' known to your Government."

Mr. Jackson, in his official letter of the 4th of November, 1809, to the Secretary of State, being the letter alluded to by Mr. Smith in his letter of the 8th of November, 1809, after other matters, states, "but as to the propriety of my allusions,
' you must allow me to acknowledge only the deci' sion of my own Sovereign, whose commands
' I obey, and to whom alone I consider myself re' sponsible; beyond this, it suffices that I do not ' deviate from the respect due to the Government
' to which I am accredited.

"You will find, in my correspondence with ' you, I have carefully avoided drawing conclu' sions that did not necessarily follow from the ' premises advanced by me, and least of all should
' I think of uttering an insinuation where I was ' unable to substantiate a fact. To facts, such as ' I have been acquainted with them, I have scrup-
' ulously adhered, and in so doing I must con' tinue, whenever the good faith of His Majesty's ' Government is called in question, to vindicate
' his honor and dignity in the manner that ap' pears to me best calculated for that purpose."

What are those premises and conclusions?
What is that insinuation which he should not think of uttering where he was unable to substantiate a fact? What are those facts, such as he had been acquainted with them, that he scrupulously adhered to, and must continue so to do, whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is drawn in question, which he (Mr.
Jackson) intimates, in order to manifest that His Majesty's Government did not violate good faith by the disavowal of the arrangement made by his predecessor, Mr. Erskine, with the Government of the United States?

The expressions in this part of Mr. Jackson's letter of the 4th of November, are dark and obscure, but are capable of illustration, and, when illustrated, will furnish evidence that Mr. Jackson did impute to the Government of the United States a knowledge that, at the time his predecessor, Mr. Erskine, made the arrangement of April with the Government of the United States,
Mr. Erskine was not authorized by his Government to make that arrangement.

Mr. Jackson states, in his official letter of the 11th of October, 1809, to Mr. Smith: "It is my duty, sir, solemnly to declare to you, and through ' you to the President, that the despatch from Mr.
' Canning to Mr. Erskine, which you have made ' the basis of an official correspondence with the ' latter Minister, and which was read by the former
' to the American Minister in London, is the only ' despatch by which the conditions were prescrib' ed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an ar' rangement with this country on the matter to ' which it relates."

To which the Secretary of State, in his letter of the 19th of October, 1809, to Mr. Jackson states the declaration, "that the despatch, from
' Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d Janu-
' ry, is the only despatch by which the conditions
' were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclu' sion of an arrangement on the matter to which
' it relates," "is now for the first time made to ' this Government, and I need hardly add, that if
' that despatch had been communicated at the ' time of the arrangement, or if it had been known ' that the propositions contained in it, and which ' were at first presented by Mr. Erskine, were the ' only ones on which he was authorized to make ' an arrangement, the arrangement would not ' have been made."

This asseveration of the Secretary of State—taking into view the character of the American Government, so well known for its undeviating adherence to candor, sincerity, and truth—ought to have satisfied and put forever at rest the mind of Mr. Jackson, relative to the points and insinuations against the correctness whereof this assereration was made. But, no, the mind of Mr. Jackson was not to be satisfied. A disposition to acknowledge truth, when presented to his view at that time, does not appear to be within the range of his excellent qualifications. Something other than truth must, if possible, by some means or other, be directly or indirectly drawn from the American Government. What matter is that which Mr. Jackson is so anxious about? Only this, that the American Government (contrary to the truth and real state of the case) might, by the diplomatic acts of the experienced Mr. Jackson, be drawn in to admit, directly or indirectly, that it was possessed of a knowledge, at the time the arrangement of April was made, between Mr. Erskine and the American Government, that Mr.
Erskine was not, on his part, authorized by his Government to make that arrangement. It may be well to inquire what are those allusions—what are those premises—what are those conclusions—what is that insinuation—and what is that fact—which this accomplished diplomatist mentions in his letter of the 4th November; on the enumeration of which he rests with so much apparent pleasure—to which he, indeed, without reason and justice did adhere.

Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 23d of October, 1809, after acknowledging the receipt of the letter of the Secretary of State, of the 19th of the same month, which contained the asseveration alluded to, and stating some matters, observes: "I have,
' therefore, no hesitation in informing you, that
' His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agree' ment concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, ' because it was concluded in violation of that ' gentleman's instructions, and altogether without ' authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These ' instructions, I now understand by your letter, as ' from the obvious deduction which I took the ' liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant,
' were, at the time, in substance, made known to
' you. No stronger illustration, therefore, can be ' given of the deviation from them, which occur-

DECEMBER, 1809.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

'red, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement.'

Let the letter of the Secretary of State, of the 19th October, 1809, be read and examined, with the most critical attention, and it will be found impossible to discover in that letter any expression which can in the least sanction the opinion insinuated by Mr. Jackson, viz: that the American Government, at the time that the arrangement was made with Mr. Erskine, possessed a knowledge that Mr. Erskine was not authorized by his Government to make that arrangement. In this paragraph, Mr. Jackson intimates that he understood, by that identical letter of the 19th of October, that the substance of the instructions of Mr. Erskine were submitted to the Secretary of State. Mr. Smith, in that letter, with great candor, observes: "Certain it is, that your predecessor did present for my consideration the three conditions which now appear in the printed document." A man in search of truth would not believe, and far less would he endeavor to impose a belief on others, that the whole instructions of Mr. Erskine were, at the time, in substance, made known to Mr. Smith. Mr. Erskine himself, in his letter dated August 14, 1809, expressly declares that he considered that it would be in vain to lay before the Government of the United States the despatch in question, (that is, the despatch of the 23d of January,) which he was at liberty to have done, in extenso, had he thought proper. If, then, Mr. Erskine did not think proper to lay that despatch in extenso before the American Government, a man in search of truth will not utter an insinuation that the American Government did at the time know the substance of it. The character of Mr. Erskine is well established for his adherence to truth—will not be impeached by an insinuation that he did contrary to what he himself declares he did do. If this be one of Mr. Jackson's facts, to which he will adhere in vindication of the good faith of His Majesty's Government, it would be well for him to adduce other evidence to support it, otherwise the good faith of His Majesty's Government will rest on as bad a foundation as this one of Mr. Jackson's facts.

But, Mr. Jackson, in the paragraph of his letter of the 23d of October, before alluded to, observes: "These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were at the time, in substance, made known to you." Here it may be inquired, what is that obvious deduction, which conveyed that convincing evidence to the very discerning intellect of Mr. Jackson?

In Mr. Jackson's official letter, of the 11th of October, he observes: "In the records of my mission there is no trace of a complaint, on the part of the United States, of His Majesty having disavowed the act of his Minister. You have not, in the conferences we have hitherto held, distinctly announced any such complaint; and I have seen with pleasure, in this forbearance on your part, an instance of that candor which I doubt not will prevail in all our communications,

'inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed.'

This paragraph of Mr. Jackson's letter contains some of his allusions, premises, conclusions, insinuations, and facts, to which in his letter of the 4th of November he alludes, and which he must scrupulously adhere to in vindication of the good faith of His Majesty's Government. In this paragraph he intimates that in the records of the British mission there was no trace of a complaint on the part of the United States of His Britannic Majesty having disavowed the act of his Minister; and because there was no such trace, there was no such complaint on the part of the United States. It is, however, a known fact, that that disavowal was complained of from East to West, from North to South, and from one extremity of the United States to the other. Mr. Jackson also insinuates that the Secretary of State, in the conferences held with him, did not distinctly announce any such complaint. Distinctly! The word distinctly, with Mr. Jackson, might have a meaning—it is, in diplomatic language, a very indefinite word. If the Secretary of State did not absolutely announce any such complaint, why did not Mr. Jackson in direct terms say so, without using the word distinctly? In this, it may be fairly inferred that the Secretary of State did announce a complaint of His Majesty having disavowed the act of his Minister; but it being only in a verbal conference, Mr. Jackson did not think proper, when he was obliged to clothe his ideas with visible signs on paper, to acknowledge that Mr. Smith had distinctly announced such complaint. Such an acknowledgment would not have suited Mr. Jackson's plan of insinuations, premises, conclusions, and facts, which he was determined to adhere to in vindication of the good faith of His Britannic Majesty's Government. This word distinctly may have afforded one reason to break off verbal communications with Mr. Jackson. Mr. J. having intimated that on the records of the mission there was no trace of complaint on behalf of the United States of His Britannic Majesty having disavowed the act of His Minister, and that Mr. Smith, in the conferences, had not "distinctly" announced any such complaint, assumes these insinuations for premises, and then proceeds, on his plan of insinuation, to infer that forbearing to complain was an instance of candor on the part of Mr. Smith; that that candor caused Mr. Smith to think it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of the act, and he did not complain of the disavowal of the act, because it was done under such circumstances as could only lead to the disavowal of the act. This is the substance of the reasoning of Mr. Jackson, bottomed on the insinuation that no complaint was made on the part of the United States of His Britannic Majesty having disavowed the act of his Minister. And these are some other of the allusions, premises and conclusions, insinuations and facts, which Mr. Jackson must continue to adhere to in vindication of the good faith of His Majesty's Government. With respect to the insinuations, that on the record of the mission there is no trace of complaint, and that Mr. Smith in the conferences had not "distinctly" announced any such complaint, Mr. Smith, in his official letter of the 19th of October, 1809, observes: "If there be no trace of complaint against the disavowal in the archives of the mission, it is because this Government could not have entertained such complaint before the reasons for the disavowal had been explained, and especially as the explanations were justly and confidently expected through the new functionary. And as to the supposed reserve on my part on this subject in our several conferences, I did imagine that my repeated intimations to you of the necessity of satisfactory explanations as to the disavowal, were sufficient indications of the dissatisfaction of this Government with respect to the disavowal itself." This plain, candid statement of the Secretary, at once sweeps away the foundation of the fanciful structure of insinuations, allusions, premises and conclusions, built by Mr. Jackson on his insinuation of no complaint.

Respecting the business of explanation, which Mr. Jackson was often requested by the Secretary to make, Mr. J., in his official letter of the 11th of October, 1809, observes: "As to the expectation entertained here, that the explanation of His Majesty's share in the transaction should be made through me, I might content myself with simply observing, that I was not provided with instructions to that effect, because it was known that the explanation in question was already given."

Mr. Canning, in his letter dated May 27, 1809, to Mr. Pinkney, observes: "Having had the honor to read to you in extenso the instructions with which Mr. Erskine was furnished, it is not necessary for me to enter into any explanation of those points in which Mr. Erskine has acted not only not in conformity, but in direct contradiction to them. Such observations will be communicated more properly through the Minister whom His Majesty has directed to proceed to America."

In this business of explanation, therefore, it appears, by Mr. Jackson's statement, that he was not provided with instructions to make explanations; and Mr. Canning states that such observations (that is, explanations) will be communicated more properly through the Minister whom His Majesty has directed to proceed to America, as the successor of Mr. Erskine. Mr. Jackson was that Minister. Between Mr. Canning and Mr. Jackson, therefore, the question of explanations remain. So much for Mr. Jackson's insinuation respecting no complaint.

Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 11th of October, 1809, to the Secretary of State, after admitting that Mr. Erskine had not communicated his instructions in extenso to the Government of the United States, observes: "But, in reverting to his official correspondence, and particularly to a despatch of the 20th April, addressed to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I find, that he there states that he had submitted to your consideration the three conditions specified in those instructions, as the groundwork of an arrangement, which, according to information received from this country, it was thought, in England, might be made with a prospect of great mutual advantage."

In respect to the insinuation, contained in the words "As the groundwork of an arrangement, which, according to the information received from this country, it was thought in England might be made with a prospect of great mutual advantage," it would have been better if Mr. Jackson had stated explicitly how that information was derived. He does not state it as from Mr. Erskine; and Mr. E., in his letter of the 14th August, 1809, to the Secretary of State, observes: "But I certainly never received any assurances from the American Government that they would pledge themselves to adopt the conditions specified in Mr. Canning's instructions as preliminaries, nor did I ever hold out such an expectation to His Majesty's Government." And Mr. Erskine, in that letter, further observes: "As to the third condition referred to by you, specified in Mr. Canning's instructions, I have only to remark, that I never held any conversation with the Government of the United States relative to it, until the late negotiation, nor had ever mentioned the subject to His Majesty's Government, it having for the first time been presented to my consideration in Mr. Canning's despatch to me of the 23d January, in which that idea is suggested, and is stated to have been assented to by Mr. Pinkney." Mr. P., in the account he gives of an unofficial conversation held between him and Mr. Canning on the 18th, and continued on the 22d of January, 1809, states, that in that conversation, Mr. Canning suggested to him that he (Mr. C.) presumed "that the Government of the United States would not, after it had itself declared a commerce with France &c. illegal, and its citizens who should be engaged in it delinquents; and after having given to Great Britain by compact an interest in the strict observation of the prohibition, complain, if the naval force of this country should assist in preventing such a commerce." And Mr. Pinkney, in his letter of the 23d of June, 1809, after observing he had an interview yesterday with Mr. Canning, states: "In conversing upon the third condition, I said a very few words. I restated what I had thrown out upon the matter of it in an informal conversation in January, and expressed my regret that it should have been misapprehended."

By the foregoing, it appears, that the third condition, in place of information having been received respecting it from America, originated with Mr. Canning himself. This pretended information, it is presumed, is one of Mr. Jackson's facts or circumstances. Information, proceeding from the American Government, intimating that America is willing to renounce, during the present war, the pretension of carrying on in time of war all trade with the enemy's colonies, from which she was excluded in time of peace, cannot be proved to have gone to England. Let all the documents be read—no proof on that point from them can be adduced. That which, in the despatch of the 23d January, is stated to be the first condition, is, except the last clause respecting France, the same in principle with that which is contained in the non-intercourse act, as it refers to renewing commerce and free intercourse with Great Britain. To that part of the first condition no exception appears to be made; but the clause respecting France never was intended to be admitted in the nature of a compact. In that case, Great Britain ought to have confided in the good faith of the United States; but it appears, by the addition of that clause, that Great Britain intended to provide against what, according to the policy of His Majesty's Government, was deemed the ill faith of the United States; and there can be no doubt of the dishonoring principle contained in that clause having originated from the same source with the others. By this view of the subject, the true origin of some other of Mr. Jackson's facts and circumstances may be discovered.

Mr. Jackson, progressing with his letter of the 11th October, to the Secretary of State, further observes: "Mr. Erskine then reports, verbatim et seriatim, your observations on each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you, that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions; but the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions were in fact very explicitly communicated to you, and by you of course laid before the President for his consideration. I need hardly add, that the difference between these conditions and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th April, is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation; nor need I draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that, under such circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister."

Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 23d of October, 1809, to the Secretary of State, after observing: "Nothing can be more notorious than the frequency with which, in the course of a complicated negotiation, Ministers are furnished with a gradation of instructions, on which they may be successively authorized to conclude"—states: "It does not strike me as bearing upon the consideration of the unauthorized agreement concluded here, inasmuch as, in point of fact, Mr. Erskine had no such graduated instructions. You are already acquainted with that which was given, and I have had the honor of informing you that it was the only one by which the conditions on which he was to conclude were prescribed. So far from the terms which he was actually induced to accept, having been contemplated in that instruction, he himself states that they were substituted by you in lieu of those originally proposed." The connexion between this part of Mr. Jackson's letter of the 23d, and the last part of his recited letter of the 11th of the same month, (October,) is remarkably striking. Mr. Erskine is stated to have reported that he had submitted to Mr. Smith the three conditions specified in the instructions, and the observations of Mr. Smith on each of them, with the reasons which induced Mr. S. to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. Mr. Jackson then infers that Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine may have concluded that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions, and afterwards asserts: "But the very act of substitution evidently shows that the original conditions were in fact very explicitly communicated to Mr. Smith, and by him of course laid before the President for his consideration;" and adds, that "The difference between these conditions, and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th of April, is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation."

It may here be proper again to notice, that Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 23d of October, after stating that Mr. Erskine had no graduated instructions, observes: "You are already acquainted with that which was given, and that it was the only one by which the conditions on which he was to conclude were prescribed. So far from the terms which he was actually induced to accept having been contemplated in that instruction, he himself states that they were substituted by you in lieu of those originally proposed." Here, then, at last, Mr. Jackson comes out plain. He does not himself state that Mr. Smith submitted the conditions, but Mr. Erskine is made to do that. Now if Mr. Erskine in any letter stated that Mr. Smith substituted the conditions, that must have been known to Mr. Jackson prior to the date of his letter of the 11th of October; and was taken into consideration, but not expressed, at the time of writing that letter. Mr. Jackson, then—taking all these his insinuations, arising from no complaint being (as he insinuates) made, and the statements respecting substitution, which Mr. Erskine is stated to make—works out an insinuation, not plainly expressed, that Mr. Smith must have seen all the instructions in extenso of Mr. Erskine; and that, having seen the instructions in extenso he (Mr. S.) must have known that Mr. E. was not, on his part, authorized to make the arrangement of April; and from this collection of insinuations, premises, conclusions, and facts, all arising from the creative fancy of Mr. Jackson, he observes: "Nor need I draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that, under such circumstances, His Majesty had an undoubted and incontrovertible right to disavow the act of his Minister."

From what has been said on this subject, and by Mr. Jackson's own statement of what he calls allusions, insinuations, premises, conclusions, and facts, it is evident what they were which he is pleased to call circumstances—"such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed;" that is, the disavowal of the arrangement. And these are the circumstances to which Mr. Jackson must adhere to vindicate the good faith of His Majesty's Government. It must however be deemed extraordinary, and indeed it is hardly possible to believe, that Mr. Erskine ever stated in any letter that Mr. Smith had substituted conditions in lieu of the original. To believe so, is to believe that Mr. Erskine, contrary to the duty and allegiance he owed his own Government, suffered himself to be imposed on. No man possessing even less than common sense can believe so. Taking into view, also, that Mr. Erskine expressly declares that he thought it would be in vain to lay his instructions in extenso before the American Government, it may be fairly (though not according to Mr. Jackson's diplomatic mode of reasoning) inferred that those things he called circumstances, were and are, if such intuities can be termed in existence, the mere creatures of the imagination of Mr. Jackson; and that the imputation by him alleged against the Executive Government of the United States is not true. But, sir, this will be more evidently apparent, when it is made appear, that in the arrangement of April, there is no substitution of conditions. In addition to what has already been observed respecting the detestable project of Mr. Jackson, the object of which was to fix on the Executive Government of the United States an imputation of a knowledge, that, at the time of making the arrangement of April, Mr. Erskine on his part was not by his Government authorized to make that arrangement, there is not only the asseveration of the Secretary of State, proving that the Executive Government did not possess that knowledge, but the President, in his Message of the 29th November, 1809, gives further information relative thereto—not in his private character as an individual, but as James Madison, President of the United States. The President observes: "The correspondence between the Department of State and this Minister will show how unessentially the features presented in its commencement have been varied in its progress. It will show also, that forgetting the respect due to all Governments, he did not refrain from imputations on this, which required that no further communications should be received from him." What imputation does the President allude to? That same imputation mentioned in the correspondence. Having noticed this statement of the President respecting Mr. Jackson's conduct, I was induced, said Mr. R., in the few observations which I made at first on the subject of this resolution, to intimate that certainly no gentleman in this House would attempt to justify Mr. Jackson, or even to palliate his conduct. But, sir, notwithstanding this asseveration of the Secretary of State—notwithstanding the declaration of the President—attempts are made not only to palliate, but to justify the conduct of this same Mr. Jackson! What shall be said to this? Will gentlemen give more credit to the dark, obscure statements of this foreign Minister than to the plain, open, candid statements of the Secretary of State, and the easy-to-be-understood declaration of the President? It appears they do; and it is strange—wondrous strange, indeed—how this can be!

It appears to me, said Mr. R., that the matter stated in the resolution are true, and that Mr. Jackson was justly, and for good cause, refused by the Executive Government to be any further communicated with. Truth, candor, and sincerity, are necessary requisites in transacting the affairs of human life, between man and man, in their individual concerns. Nations in their moral capacity being as individuals, the same requisites are necessary in conducting their affairs in settling their differences, and bringing them to an issue mutually beneficial. It is to be lamented that in these times, the business of a Minister Plenipotentiary appears to be to involve the differences in more difficulty—to delay and to procrastinate. In ancient times it was otherwise: truth, candor, and sincerity, presided in the councils of Ministers Plenipotentiary. I would not, said Mr. R., be supposed to include all public Ministers within the range of this observation: there are amongst them men who do honor to human nature, and who, by the practice of candor, sincerity, and truth, build up for themselves monuments more lasting than marble—more durable than brass. It has been asked, what supports our Ministers abroad? The answer is plain: truth, candor, and sincerity, supports them. The preservation of the peace, happiness, and prosperity, of nations, in a certain degree, depends on the conduct of public Ministers. It is therefore the more necessary that the conduct of public Ministers should be regulated by those rules of propriety, virtue, and morality, by which alone their conduct can be adorned.

Admitting the matters and things stated in the resolution to be true, (and it is expected that that is established beyond contradiction,) another question presents itself for consideration—that is, may a Minister Plenipotentiary, or any public Minister, with impunity, abuse and impute untruths to the Government to which he is accredited?

That the maxims of public law and the general usages of civilized nations would be marshalled in array against this resolution was not expected; neither was it expected that the United States of America, in Congress assembled, would be denied to be competent to the decision of the question; neither was it expected that it would be deemed necessary—although Mr. Jackson, at the time, was Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty—to summon all the civilized nations of the world to convene and form a tribunal to decide it. As to the maxims of public law—if there be any book containing a system of public law, as it is called, and that has been sanctioned, authorized, and practised on by general consent of all civilized nations—let it be produced and examined, whether it contains a maxim authorizing a Minister Plenipotentiary to abuse and impute to or insinuate untruths against the Government of the nation to which he is accredited, and that will justify or even palliate him in that conduct. If a book containing a system of public law so sanctioned cannot be found, (and it is presumable it never can or will, at least respecting time past,) then let the famed Grotius, and the celebrated writers on public law, as it is called, be produced and examined, whether they or any of them assert such a maxim, or one anywise near to it. The search will be useless. Virtue, morality, and piety, are the grand principles on which each of them has erected his superstructure. But, if there be any such maxim, when, where, and how was it practised on? To attempt to destroy and overwhelm this resolution with the weight of that which is called public law, does not appear to be treating it in the candid manner it ought to be. The attention of this House has also in this case been taken back to the celebrated Treaty of Westphalia—celebrated, indeed, and made almost sacred by the blood of the great and good Gustavus Adolphus, which flowed to establish it. And what did the great Convention of public Ministers of every grade from all the civilized nations of the Christian world, who formed the two treaties which were called the Treaty of Westphalia, do? Did that Convention of public Ministers establish a maxim of the kind alluded to? No, it did not. Virtue, morality, and piety—truth, candor, and sincerity—had influence in their deliberations. But, if it did, it certainly was a most unchristian maxim. But Christianity directs that we should not do that unto others which we would not have others do unto us.

But I had almost, not recollected, said Mr. R., to mention a treaty not noticed in the discussion of the resolution, namely, the Treaty of Pilnitz—it is more probable, that some kind of maxim going to sanction the conduct of Mr. Jackson towards the Executive of the United States may be found among the records of the treaty makers of that celebrated and very humane treaty, with more ease than in the records of those who formed the Treaty of Westphalia. There was another grand assemblage of treaty makers at Rastadt; but I forbear, said Mr. R. to pursue this point further, and conclude, that there is no maxim of the kind alluded to.

This question affects the United States materially, not as it respects Mr. Jackson in his individual character, but in his ambassadorial character, as Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty. If the United States in Congress assembled are not competent to render a judgment on the conduct of Mr. Jackson, because he is the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty, the better way in that case would be to petition His Britannic Majesty to depute judges to the United States to decide here on the conduct of Mr. Jackson, for if he can only arrive in England, it is probable his conduct will be disavowed, and after some time Mr. Jackson will be advanced to some higher grade of honor, as Admiral Berkeley was after the attack on the United States' ship Chesapeake and the murder of part of her crew.

The United States are competent to decide on this question, and if they will not act on it, I would seriously advise, said Mr. R., to recall all our public Ministers from abroad, and send all foreign Ministers from the United States, and to determine never hereafter to receive any public Minister of any grade from any foreign nation, and never hereafter to send any public Minister to any foreign nation, is the only mode to preclude the possibility of similar insults in future.

But it has been said, Mr. Jackson is the Minister Plenipotentiary of a powerful monarch—no less than His Britannic Majesty; well let it be so. Suppose Mr. Jackson was the Minister Plenipotentiary of some petty East Indian Rajah, whom His Britannic Majesty's Government permits to drag on a life chained in slavery, would the United States in that case be deemed competent? Mr. Jackson forgot the respect due to all nations; particularly that which was due from him to the sovereign people of the United States in the person of their President, and the Representatives of that sovereign people have power and are competent to decide on this question; and if any one will enter an appeal after the decision is made, let him do it.

This is, indeed, a serious and solemn question; all the civilized nations in the world are interested in it; not that all the civilized nations, (and if you please all the uncivilized nations in the world also) are drawn up a party on one side, and the United States on the other. The United States and Great Britain are parties in this question, and all the civilized nations in the world may be considered as spectators; taking no part in the dispute, but waiting with anxiety the termination of it. The question in dispute is, whether a public Minister may with impunity abuse, and impute untruths to the Government of the nation to which he is accredited? If he may, then as a principle, it must have been sanctioned by public law, and be obligatory on all civilized nations in the world; and, if so, then the resolution may be said to implicate principles which the whole civilized world has sanctioned; but who will say that that is a principle of public law, and that it has been sanctioned by all the civilized nations in the world? If a principle of that kind be intimated, let it be asserted boldly, and then it will be known what to say to it. If Mr. Jackson is in this case to be justified, he must be justified on principles of public law; if on principles of public law he cannot be justified, as it is contended he cannot, why are such strenuous efforts made to justify him?

The whole civilized world is a spectator in the discussion of this resolution; and all the civilized nations in the world are and will be anxiously desirous to know, whether the United States of America, after having hitherto, with impunity, suffered all the aggressions of Great Britain, and after having suffered Great Britain, with impunity, to impress thousands of their seamen, and retain them on board of their armed ships and vessels and compelling them to fight against nations with whom the United States are at peace; after having suffered Great Britain, with impunity, to murder their citizens, and after having suffered Great Britain with impunity to attack their sovereignty, in case of the Chesapeake frigate will, after all these outrages and hostile acts, tamely, meekly, and patiently, submit and bow down to the lowest degree of debased degradation, and suffer Francis J. Jackson, Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, with impunity, to abuse their Executive Government, and to impute to it with impunity the detestable charge of untruth.

Mr. Jackson, in his official letters to the Secretary of State, frequently states, that he is not authorized to make any proposals to the Executive Government of the United States which might be a groundwork of friendly settlement of differences; not even instructed to make any rational and satisfactory explanations of the reasons which induced his Sovereign, whose command he obeys, to disavow the arrangement of April. Mr. Jackson states that he is instructed only to receive and discuss any overtures which the Government of the United States may make to him, and eventually to conclude a treaty. In his official letter of the 23d of October, 1809, to the Secretary of State; he expressly states, that his instructions are prospective; and observes, "it is not of course intended to call upon me to state, as a preliminary to negotiation, what is the whole extent of those instructions; they must, as I before said, remain subject to my own discretion, until I am enabled to apply them to the overtures which I may have the honor of receiving from you."

It has been stated in the course of this debate that the United States is a neutral nation; that is true—the United States have uniformly desired to be and remain neutral, and not to be involved in the wars of Europe. The United States, as a neutral nation, had a right, at least, to expect justice from Great Britain, but have not obtained it. Great Britain despoiled the commerce of the United States to the amount of many millions of dollars, and has not made restitution; Great Britain impressed thousands of the seamen of the United States and hitherto has refused to set them at liberty. Several citizens of the United States have been murdered, and Great Britain has not punished the murderers; Great Britain has violated the sovereignty of the United States in the case of the Chesapeake frigate; an arrangement, which was made by the upright and virtuous David Montague Erskine, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, with the United States, has been disavowed. With complete and perfect knowledge of all these aggressions, murders, impressment of seamen, and violations of the sovereignty and neutral rights of the United States, His Britannic Majesty has sent Francis J. Jackson, Esq., his Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, with full powers to do—what? Nothing. For Mr. Jackson expressly, in his official letter to the Secretary of State, declares, that he is not instructed to make any proposals to the American Government; that his instructions are prospective, and only authorizing him to receive and discuss overtures which may be made to him by the Executive Government of the United States. Notwithstanding the British Government had a perfect knowledge of all these things, and notwithstanding it knew that the United States had with good faith carried into complete effect on their part the arrangement of April, made by Mr. Erskine, Great Britain disavows that arrangement, recalls the virtuous and honest Minister, Mr. Erskine, and sends Francis J. Jackson her Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, to do nothing. Mr. Jackson in his letter of the 11th of October, 1809, to the Secretary of State, declares, "that His Majesty is very sincerely desirous of maintaining a perfect and cordial understanding with the United States, and of bringing to a complete and satisfactory adjustment all the points of difference that have arisen between the two Governments." Is this true? And is His Britannic Majesty desirous—is he sincerely desirous? is he indeed very sincerely desirous of maintaining a perfect and cordial understanding with the United States, and of bringing to a complete and satisfactory adjustment all the points of difference that have arisen between the two Governments? If His Britannic Majesty is so disposed, and is very sincerely desirous of doing all these good things to the United States, what prevents him to set at liberty all the seamen of the United States whom he detains in slavery on board of his floating castles? What prevents him from ordering satisfaction to be made to the citizens of the United States for the many millions of dollars' worth of property, which has been taken from them by his armed ships under illegal and unjustifiable pretences? For what reason is it that he delays to order atonement to be made for the outrageous and murdering attack on the Chesapeake frigate? What were those strong and solid reasons which induced him to disavow the arrangement of April last, an arrangement which would, in all human probability, have operated as a groundwork for a complete and satisfactory adjustment of all points of difference that have arisen between him and the United States; and more especially as it had in good faith been carried into effect on the part of the United States? For what good reason did he recall Mr. Erskine, and send to the United States, as his Minister Plenipotentiary, Francis J. Jackson, with full powers, not to make proposals for accommodation to the United States but to receive and discuss such overtures as the United States by their Executive Government might make to him? And did His Britannic Majesty, being very seriously desirous to maintain a perfect and cordial understanding with the United States, expect that the United States, under existing circumstances, would make overtures to his Minister Plenipotentiary, Francis J. Jackson? Did not His Britannic Majesty fully and perfectly understand that the outrageous attack on the Chesapeake frigate (of the United States) stood an insuperable barrier in the way, and until atoned for, prevented and rigorously precluded all negotiation? What then, did His Britannic Majesty, possessed with the knowledge of all these things, send his Minister Plenipotentiary, Francis J. Jackson, with letters of credence and full powers to the United States to do? Nothing.

But His Britannic Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary, with his full powers, has not been altogether idle. He has done something—he has abused and insulted the Executive Government of the United States, and imputed untruths to it; and says he obeys the command of his Sovereign. And did Mr. Jackson believe that to abuse and impute untruths to the Executive Government of the United States was necessary to vindicate the good faith of His Britannic Majesty's Government? Did he believe he was under no obligation to proceed on principles of truth, candor, and sincerity, in his transactions with the Government of the United States? Did he believe or was he taught to believe that the United States had no truth, no honor, no dignity, no character, to maintain?

It is hardly possible to believe that Francis J. Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, so elegant, so polite, so accomplished, who had been by His Britannic Majesty so frequently honored with so many honorable appointments to several Powers of Europe; who appears to have a perfect knowledge of the elegance of expression that his native language is capable of, could have proceeded in the manner he did towards the Executive Government of the United States, if he had not been under the influence of some controlling power. What was the object, which by his conduct he appears to have borne in view, for the obtaining whereof he feared not to sacrifice that which he ought carefully to have reserved? It will be observed that the British Government had disavowed the arrangement made by Mr. Erskine with the United States, and by reason thereof, the good faith of His Britannic Majesty's Government might be or was drawn in question. To vindicate that faith it was necessary to make appear, by some means or other, that that arrangement was not made by Mr. Erskine in pursuance of his instructions, and that the Executive Government of the United States knew he was not authorized to make it. To obtain this end, it is observable that Mr. Jackson, in the course of his correspondence with the Secretary of State, has made strenuous efforts to bring again into view and to resume the objects of that arrangement in a way that would imply that the Executive Government of the United States was aware that the arrangement was not binding on the British Government, because made with a knowledge on the part of the Executive Government, that Mr. Erskine had no authority to make it. If Mr. Jackson had prevailed, the odium of the disavowal would have been thrown off from His Britannic Majesty's Government and fixed on the United States. Mr. Jackson then would have very honorably returned to his Sovereign, and would have deserved to have, by His Britannic Majesty's Government, been rewarded with a tate of gold; not such as that which a certain other personage was declared worthy of, but with one of pure gold, as large, as massy, as high, as solid and majestic as that one was which the mighty Nebuchadnezzar erected for his idol on the plains of Dura.

His Britannic Majesty's Government may have been persuaded to believe that there was not in the American Government, energy sufficient to resist the diplomatic powers and artful stratagems of the selected Mr. Jackson; but truth is great and powerful, and will always prevail. The Executive Government of the United States maintained the honor and dignity of this nation, and did resist, and indignantly precipitated Mr. Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, from its presence, down to a level better comporting with his deservings. In him the proverb is verified; he was anxiously and perseveringly engaged, and busily employed in digging a pit wherein he might bury the honor, fame, and good name of the United States; and into that pit, he himself, with the weight of a world upon him, is plunged; and, from the bottom thereof, he may, with what pleasure he can, behold, at an immense distance, the high and exalted eminence on which he did stand.

But it has, by way of excuse, been intimated, that Mr. Jackson was forced to explain; and for that he ought to be excused. Well, then, let one other of his explanations be attended to, and examined.

In the note, dated November 13th, 1809, sent by Mr. Jackson through Mr. Oakley, to the Secretary of State, there is a remarkable explanation.

In this note it is apparent that Mr. Jackson alleges that the American Government was offended, and refused to receive any further communications from him, because he stated and adhered thereto, "that the three conditions, forming the substance of Mr. Erskine's original instructions, were submitted to the Secretary of State by Mr. Erskine; and, secondly, because he stated and adhered thereto, that that instruction is the only one in which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it related, is known to him (Mr. Jackson) by the instruction which he has himself received." This is a strange explanation, indeed, and such a one as even Mr. Jackson himself would not have been presumed to have been capable to have made, if he had not made it. That the American Government was not offended, and did not refuse to receive further communications from him because he stated and adhered to the said two facts, is evident, not only by the correspondence between him and the Secretary of State, but also by the nature of the thing itself. The Secretary of State, however, in his despatch of the 23d of November, 1809, to Mr. Pinkney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Great Britain, has put this out of all dispute. In that letter the Secretary of State observes:

"It was never objected to him (that is, Mr. Jackson) that he had stated it as a fact, that the three propositions in question had been submitted to me by Mr. Erskine; nor that he stated it as made known to him, by the instructions of Mr. Canning, that the instruction to Mr. Erskine, containing those three conditions, was the only one from which his authority was derived to conclude an arrangement on the matter to which it related. The objection was, that a knowledge of this restriction of the authority of Mr. Erskine was imputed to this Government, and the repetition of the imputation, even after it had been peremptorily disclaimed. This was so gross an attack on the honor and veracity of this Government, as to forbid all further communications from him."

It is clear and indisputable that Mr. Jackson, in his note by Mr. Oakley, keeps concealed and out of view the real and true cause of his dismissal, and does assert two facts to be the cause of his dismissal, which were not the causes of his dismissal. It is observable that, in the letter signed F. J. Jackson, headed "Circular," dated 13th November, 1809, the same words, relative to the same two facts, are used, which, respecting them, are used in the note by Mr. Oakley; but, in the letter headed "Circular," the words "in order to repel the frequent charges of ill-faith which had been made against His Majesty's Government" are inserted so as to make the paragraph in the circular read:

"In stating these facts, and in adhering to them, as my duty imperiously enjoined me to do, in order to repel the frequent charges of ill-faith which have been made against His Majesty's Government, I could not imagine that offence would be taken at it by the American Government, as most certainly none could be intended on my part; and this view of the subject has been made known to Mr. Smith."

In the circular, then, there appears another statement not reconcilable to fact. In the note by Mr. Oakley, Mr. Jackson does not intimate that he stated the two facts, and adhered to them, in order to repel the frequent charges of ill-faith which have been made against His Majesty's Government, and therefore the same view of the subject was not made known to Mr. Smith, which, by the letter signed F. J. Jackson, headed "Circular," is intended, by way of appeal, to be made known to the citizens of the United States. From these premises, it may, without the help of insinuations, be fairly concluded that the words "false or fallacious disguises," are not improperly made use of in the joint resolution under consideration. It may here be further observed that, on this point, Mr. Jackson, if he wrote the letter signed F. J. Jackson, headed "Circular," dated 13th November, 1809, and it has not been denied that he did, is at issue with himself, and any gentleman who may attempt to justify or palliate his conduct towards the Executive Government of the United States may, without the aid of any writer on public law, be able to render a judgment.

I will now, said Mr. R., proceed to make some observations relative to the arrangement of April, made by Mr. Erskine, on behalf of His Britannic Majesty with the Government of the United States. Let it be observed, that I have no intention to become politician for Great Britain, or, on behalf of that Power, to intimate what course of policy would have been, or may be left, for him to pursue. The object of the arrangement of April, was to restore free commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, by repealing the non-intercourse law, as it respected Great Britain, and rescinding the Orders in Council, as they respected the United States; the conditions which, by the arrangement, the United States undertook to perform, were performed in good faith and in full reliance that Great Britain would also with good faith perform; but, instead of performing, Great Britain disavowed the arrangement. The consequences of the disavowal so far as that disavowal respects commercial affairs, is generally known. If Great Britain had, with good faith, performed, on her part, the conditions of the arrangement, what would the consequences have been? Commerce would have been restored between the two nations. Great Britain, with her merchandise and money, has obtained, in as great extent as she desired, the immense produce, consisting of raw materials and provisions, and other articles of the United States. There was every reason to believe that France, in consequence of the Orders in Council being revoked as they respected the United States, would have rescinded her decrees, so far as they respected the United States, which event, in a commercial point of view, would have been advantageous to Great Britain. Under these circumstances, the United States and Great Britain might have progressed to a complete and satisfactory adjustment of all points of difference that had arisen between the two Governments, and the United States would then have remained a neutral nation. The Orders in Council having been revoked, if France had refused to rescind her decrees, the non-intercourse law would have continued in full force against her and her dependencies. It is not necessary, said Mr. R., for me to proceed further in noticing what might have been the consequences if Great Britain had, in good faith, performed, on her part, the conditions of that arrangement; but His Britannic Majesty disavowed that arrangement; and Mr. Jackson, in his correspondence with the Secretary of State, declares that His Britannic Majesty disavowed that arrangement, because Mr. Erskine violated his instructions.

On this statement of Mr. Jackson, an important question presents itself, viz: Did Mr. Erskine violate his instructions? Although, in discussing the resolution, an examination of this question may not be very necessary, it may, nevertheless, under existing circumstances, not be unimportant. Mr. Erskine, at the time of making the arrangement, was Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, with full powers, in that capacity, near the United States. His allegiance and the duty he, in that high character, owed to his Sovereign, his own good name, his integrity, his honor, and his moral obligations, without taking into view the great respectability and high and honorable standing of his family, are strong presumptions that he did not violate his instructions, and it is generally believed that he did not violate them. Mr. Jackson, in his note by Mr. Oakley, to the Secretary of State, in observing "that the three conditions, forming the substance of Mr. Erskine's original instructions, were submitted to him by that gentleman," has used the word "original" antecedent to the word "instruction,"

DECEMBER, 1809.

H. OF R.

(by the word "instruction," it is presumed, he intends the despatch of the 23d of January, 1809,) intimating and thereby implying that Mr. Erskine had other instructions besides that original instruction. Mr. Erskine, in his letter of the 14th of August, 1809, expressly states, Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January, formed but one part of his; that is, Mr. Canning's instructions to him. If, then, Mr. Erskine's assertion, in this case, wanted any corroborating proof, Mr. Jackson, by using the word "original" before the word "instruction," in his note by Mr. Oakley, has given that proof. Mr. Jackson, in his letter of the 11th October, to Mr. Smith, states, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, (that is, the despatch of the 23d of January,) is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement. That may be true, but it will not prove that Mr. Erskine had not any other instructions besides that despatch, which Mr. Jackson, in his note to Mr. Oakley, denominates Mr. Erskine's "original instruction." This word "original" is, as it were, a key to unfold not only Mr. Jackson's obscure and guarded correspondence, in respect of Mr. Erskine's instructions, but also to show what the nature and extent of all his instructions were. So far, then, in this obscure question, there is evidence to believe that Mr. Erskine had other instructions than the despatch of the 23d of January. It may be further observed that Mr. Erskine, at the time he wrote his letter of the 14th of August to Mr. Smith, in which he stated that the despatch of the 23d of January formed only one part of his instructions, did not write it with a design that it was to be kept concealed, but must have anticipated that it would be made public; and that, of course, it would be known to his Government; therefore, he would not attempt to write to Mr. Smith that which he knew was not true. From all these considerations, therefore, it is reasonable to believe—nay, they amount to sufficient proof, so far as, in this case, at present, can be expected, that Mr. Erskine had other instructions besides that original instruction or despatch of the 23d of January; and that those instructions were such as authorized him, if he could not obtain a recognition of all three conditions, specified in the original despatch or instruction of the 23d of January, to obtain a recognition of as many or so much of them, in substance, as he could. That this was the true nature of his instructions, is not contradicted by Mr. Jackson's statement, that the despatch of the 23d of January was the only despatch in which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement; because the arrangement of April, in its extent, although it does not recognise all the conditions contained in the original despatch, does not contain or embrace any that are contained in and intended by that despatch. And that that was the true nature of his instructions is further manifested by what Mr. Erskine himself writes to Mr. Smith on that subject, in his letter of the 31st of July, 1809.

And, in his letter of the 14th of August, 1809, to Mr. Smith, Mr. Erskine, after noticing that Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January formed but one part of his instructions, and that he considered that it would be in vain to lay before the Government of the United States the despatch in question, which he was at liberty to have done, in extenso, had he thought proper, observes:

"But, I had such strong grounds for believing that the object of His Majesty's Government could be attained, though in a different manner, and the spirit, at least, of my several letters of instructions be fully complied with, I felt a thorough conviction upon my mind that I should be acting in conformity with His Majesty's wishes, and accordingly concluded the late provisional agreement on His Majesty's behalf with the Government of the United States."

These declarations of Mr. Erskine are conclusive on the subject of the nature and extent of his instructions; and, indeed, great credit, deference, and respect, ought to be given to these declarations of Mr. Erskine, not by reason only of his own personal integrity and character, but also by reason of his high official character and his great responsibility. If any further evidence is necessary to prove that Mr. Erskine did not violate his instructions, that evidence comes even from Mr. Canning himself, not directly, it is admitted, but in such a manner as to leave no doubt of its applicability and conclusiveness. In the letter of Mr. Pinkney, of the 23d of June, 1809, to the Secretary of State, Mr. Pinkney, after observing that he "had an interview with Mr. Canning," and that "upon the second of the conditions mentioned in Mr. Erskine's instructions, he made several remarks," states that the second condition had no necessary connexion with the Orders in Council; and he intimated that they would have been content to leave the subject of it to future discussion and arrangement." Mr. Pinkney, after further observing in that letter that, "upon the third condition, he said 'a very few words; that he restated what he had thrown out upon the matter of it in an informal conversation in January, and expressed his regret that it should have been misapprehended,'" states that "Mr. Canning immediately said 'that he was himself of opinion that the idea upon which that condition turns could not well find its way into a stipulation; that he had, nevertheless, believed it proper to propose the condition to the United States; that he should have been satisfied with the rejection of it; and that the consequence would have been that they should have intercepted the commerce to which it referred, if any such commerce should be attempted. These express declarations of Mr. Canning respecting the second and third conditions specified in the original instructions of the 23d of January, indubitably go to corroborate what has been already observed respecting the nature and extent of Mr. Erskine's several instructions, and that he was vested with discretionary powers relative to the same second and third conditions.

Considering that Mr. Erskine, by his several letters of instruction, had discretionary powers relative to the second and third conditions, specified in the despatch of the 23d of January; he, in consequence thereof, and to prevent difficulties which would thereon have arisen, did not lay before the Government of the United States in extenso, the original instruction, viz: the despatch of the 23d January; he had submitted the substance of the three conditions, probably as a matter of inquiry; but the result of that inquiry manifested to him that it would be in vain to lay that despatch of the 23d of January before the Government of the United States. There remained, then, for the basis of an arrangement to be made by Mr. Erskine on behalf of his Government and the United States, the first condition specified in the despatch of the 23d of January. This condition is expressed in the manner following:

“That the American Government is prepared, in the event of His Majesty’s consenting to withdraw the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, to withdraw, contemporaneously on its part, the interdiction of its harbors to ships of war, and all non-intercourse and non-importation acts, so far as respects Great Britain, leaving them in force with respect to France and the Powers which adopt or act under her decrees.”

The last sentence in this first condition is that alone upon which any difficulty could have arisen. On this sentence, it may be observed, that the effect of these words is, by force of the terms, limited in duration with the decrees of France; and this limitation was provided for by the embargo laws, and by the non-intercourse law. It would have been improper for the United States to have permitted a principle of limitation in this case to have become a matter of compact with Great Britain; and Great Britain, on principles of reciprocity, ought to have relied on the good faith of the United States that they would have continued the operation of the non-intercourse law against France during the existence of the French decrees, as they respected the United States, pursuant to the provisions of that effect in the non-intercourse law. And by what is stated in the letter of Mr. Pinkney, of the 23d of June, to the Secretary of State, respecting a conversation between him and Mr. Canning respecting the first condition, there is some reason to apprehend that Mr. Canning was rather inclined to that opinion. Be that as it may, Mr. Erskine, at the time of making the arrangement, knew that, in the non-intercourse laws, provision was made for the continuance of the non-intercourse with France during the existence of the French decrees, and that, having that knowledge and knowing that the United States were pledged by their own law to themselves for the continuance of non-intercourse with France, he did not deem it necessary to insist upon a principle which he had good reason to believe he could not obtain, in any other manner to be provided for, than it had been done by the non-intercourse law. This sentence, then, being out of the way, the residue of the first condition remained to be acted on as the basis of an arrangement between the United States and Great Britain. It was acted on, and the arrangement of April was made between Mr. Erskine and Mr. Smith. That arrangement is well known; and it is not necessary to show how exactly and completely it corresponds with that basis. From what has been said, it may be concluded that there are strong and solid reasons to believe that Mr. Erskine did not violate his instructions; and it also evidently follows, as a conclusion, that Mr. Smith did not substitute conditions in lieu of those originally proposed, anything in the letters of Mr. Jackson to the contrary notwithstanding.

I will now, said Mr. R., dismiss the subject with observing, that I will vote against the motion to postpone, and, finally, I will vote for the resolution.

MONDAY, January 1, 1810.

The House assembled this day, but transacted no business of importance.

TUESDAY, January 2.

Another member, to wit: from Pennsylvania, ROBERT JENKINS, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. LOVE presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Alexandria, signed by William Herbert, their President, praying that an act may be passed extending the charter of the said bank for a period of twenty years beyond the fourth of March, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, at which time the present charter will have expired.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. LOVE presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Potomac, praying that an act may be passed granting a charter to the said bank, to take effect as soon as the existing laws of the United States will permit. Mr. L. also presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Union Bank of Georgetown, to the same effect with the petition last stated.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. LOVE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill for the improvement of the navigation of the river Potomac; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House again took up the resolution approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to hold further communication with Francis J. Jackson.

Mr. UPHAM.—Mr. Speaker, as I am called upon to pass upon the resolution on your table, I cannot content myself with giving a silent vote. I feel it my duty at least to protest against it, and to state some of the reasons which influence my opposition.

It certainly is a very important resolution; indeed, it seems agreed by its friends as well as its opposers, to be one of great magnitude, as great as ever came before this House.

It may, in my opinion, lead to the most serious and lamentable consequences. It is nothing less than a conditional, a provisional declaration of war against Great Britain. It has excited the sensibility not only of this House, but of this nation?

Gentlemen, in the discussion, sir, have taken a wide and extensive range; they have given their opinions and stated their creeds upon very many topics respecting our concerns with Great Britain. Indeed they have, in the course of the debate, discussed all our relations with that nation. These subjects, in my opinion, have no immediate bearing upon the question before the House.

The real question before the House is, did Mr. Jackson charge our Administration with a knowledge at the time of the arrangement of the 19th of April last, that Mr. Erskine was acting contrary to and in violation of his instructions, in making that arrangement, and repeat the charge after it had been peremptorily disclaimed.

The position that Mr. Jackson did make and repeat such charge after it was disclaimed, was the cause of breaking off the correspondence and dismissing the Minister. See the printed documents, page 87, in Mr. Smith's letter to Mr. Pinkney, of November 23d, 1809. Mr. Smith says, "It was never objected to him, Mr. Jackson, that he had stated it as a fact, that the three propositions in question had been submitted to me by Mr. Erskine, nor that he stated it, as made known to him by the instructions of Mr. Canning, that the instruction to Mr. Erskine, containing those three conditions, was the only one from which his authority was derived to conclude an arrangement on the matter to which it related. The objection was, that a knowledge of this restriction of the authority of Mr. Erskine, was imputed to this Government, and the repetition of the imputation, even after it had been peremptorily disclaimed." In Mr. Smith's letter to Mr. Jackson of November the 1st, 1809, see printed documents, page 65, it appears that the aforesaid position is the groundwork of all the difficulty. The whole question then in fact before the House is, whether it be true that Mr. Jackson did make such charge and repeat it after it was denied by our Administration.

On the decision of this question depends the decision of the resolution. This charge forms the loop-hole on which are suspended all the anathemas against Mr. Jackson and his Government. This is the string on which seem to hang all the sorrows of the country; on this pivot is to turn the fate of the nation. On this charge is rested war or peace.

As to the circular of the 13th of November, which is called in the resolution the appeal to the people, and made so much of in that resolution, this circular surely was not the cause of the rupture, for it was subsequent; nor was it the cause of the resolution.

It does not appear that it was published by Mr. Jackson, nor by his order or consent or knowledge.

It might have found its way into the newspapers in very many ways, consistent with his innocence, as to its publication. It might have been printed by one of the Consuls, without Mr. Jackson's knowledge. If it were published by him the fact might easily be proved; but it cannot be shown that he did not know of the publication. This would be proving a negative.

But what is this circular? Compare it with the description of it in the resolution. See the circular in the President's Message of the 12th of December, page 4th. In the first place, it states that the correspondence is broken off. In the second place, it states the cause. In the third place, it proceeds to say, "In stating these facts," alluding to the cause of the rupture, "and in adhering to them as my duty imperiously enjoined me to do, in order to repel the frequent charges of ill faith which have been made against His Majesty's Government, I could not imagine that offence would be taken at it by the American Government, as most certainly none could be intended on my part." Mr. Jackson concludes this circular by giving information to the Consuls that it had become necessary to withdraw altogether from the City of Washington, and that he should make the city of New York the place of his residence till he should receive the commands of His Majesty, where their communications to him would be directed. The resolution on your table, sir, makes this circular a very different thing. It makes it the very top of the climax of all the insults towards our Administration. See the resolution. I will read that part of it which describes this letter "That the letter signed Francis J. Jackson, headed Circular, dated 13th of November, 1809, and published and circulated through the country, is a still more direct and aggravated insult and affront to the American people and their Government, and it is evidently an insidious attempt to excite their resentments and distrusts against their own Government, by appealing to them through false or fallacious disguises against some of its acts; and to excite resentments and divisions amongst the people themselves, which can only be dishonorable to their own characters and ruinous to their own interests."

The letter appears to me to be proper for its ostensible avowed purpose. If it be such a one as is fit for the occasion, such a one as the Minister would officially write to the Consuls, provided he had nothing in view but to give them the necessary information—and very different from what it ought to have been to have attained its object if it had been intended as an address, or appeal to the people—surely, by every rule of reason and construction, it should be taken and received to be what it purports to be.

All parties allow Mr. Jackson to be a man of talents and information. If he had intended to excite the feelings and the passions of the people, would you have seen such a letter as this? Would he have contented himself with saying so little and in such a tone? This is conclusive to my mind that he had no idea of appealing to the people. Genet did not appeal to the people in an address like this. Let gentlemen compare the letter of the English with that of the French Minister. If this was really considered so offensive a letter as to be entitled to all the hard epithets bestowed upon it in the resolution, how does it happen that the President of the United States never discovered it? This letter was dated the 13th of November—sixteen days after, the 29th, we had the Message from the President. In this Message the President, who never suffers anything to pass unnoticed, who is always instant in season and not out of season, did not notice this famous letter at all. In this Message, in which the breaking off of the correspondence with the British Minister, and his dismissal, &c., form a principal topic, not a single word is said about this circular. This shows that the President did not consider it as objectionable. He did not view it as an appeal to the people. This idea of its being an appeal to the people was the result of an after and superficial consideration.

I find too, Mr. Speaker, that this letter was not considered by Mr. Smith, the Secretary of State, as so monstrous a thing as it seems to have been by the mover of the resolution. It seems that the Secretary was in doubt whether Mr. Jackson intended the second note delivered to him through Mr. Oakley, the British Secretary of Legation, "the contents of which entirely correspond" with this circular, "as essentially intended as a justification of the correspondence, which had given umbrage, or as a conciliatory advance;" see page 87 of the printed documents. In the Secretary's letter to Mr. Pinkney, he says, "the second note seems to be essentially intended as a justification of the conduct of Mr. Jackson in that part of the correspondence, which had given umbrage. If he intended it as a conciliatory advance, &c.; but whether he had one or other or both those objects in view, it was necessary for him to have done more than is attempted in this paper." Now it seems that Mr. Smith was really at a loss, whether this note, which is essentially the same with the circular, was intended as a justification of his conduct or a conciliatory advance. At any rate, it evidently appears that he did not consider it as a very deleterious thing.

I think, sir, I have shown that this circular, which seems to make so distinguished a figure in the resolution, was in reality no cause of the resolution; that it was an inoffensive thing. I, therefore, consider it out of the case, and that the real question before the House is that which I have stated: Did Mr. Jackson make the charge and repeat it, after it had been peremptorily denied?

I lay stress on that part of the position which says, that after denial the charge was repeated. It seems agreed by the opposers of this resolution, as well as its supporters, that it is inadmissible for a public Minister to charge the Administration at whose Court he is accredited, of a falsehood, even if he be correct in the charge. To this I agree. But if, while Mr. Erskine thought or at least said, he was acting according to the spirit, if not the letter, and agreeably to the wishes of His Majesty, the King of Great Britain, our Administration thought otherwise, or if from all the circumstances they doubted it, in the then peculiar, hard, and oppressed state of this country. I am not sure it was an unpardonable offence for them to proceed in the arrangement. Our citizens were experiencing very great evils and enduring every privation from the system of restriction upon commerce. We had the non-importation act, the proclamation of the 2d of July, 1807, the embargo, and the non-intercourse, upon our shoulders. Now, if by the arrangement all these grievances could be got rid of; if the people could be relieved from this weight under which they were so deeply groaning; indeed, if it could be taken off only for a time, so as to give them a respite, the inducement to do it was great and imperious. Such was the state of our affairs, that there was no great hazard of making bad worse. And if there would have been nothing unpardonable in our Administration in doing this, surely it would not have been so very offensive if Mr. Jackson had made the insinuation: However, I will not enlarge upon this, for if Mr. Jackson made the charge, he unquestionably repeated it after it was disclaimed.

Mr. Speaker, I observed, when I first rose, that gentlemen had taken a wide range in this debate, and discussed all our foreign relations, especially those with Great Britain; and that these topics had no immediate bearing upon the question before the House, and strictly ought not to have been introduced into the debate.

On those collateral points, which have been drawn into examination in the progress of the discussion in general, the advocates and the opposers of the resolution have agreed either absolutely or sub modo.

It has been agreed that Great Britain has encroached more or less upon our neutral rights. It has been agreed too by some, on both sides, that Great Britain has given us cause for war.

Now, sir, although I am no apologist for that nation—I profess to be exclusively an American—yet I am not prepared to say that Great Britain, as a Government, has given us cause of war. I consider the murder of Pierce and the affair of the attack of the Chesapeake, about which we have heard so much in the course of this debate, as well as all others,—I consider these and all other acts which have been disavowed by the Government, as wholly out of the case. Taking into consideration the peculiar and awful state of the world at present, and for a number of years past, and considering that England has been contending for peace, order, religion, and everything sacred, while her grand enemy, Napoleon, has been destroying and trampling all peace and order, and religion, and everything sacred, under foot; that Great Britain has been fighting for the island which she inhabits and for her existence, while the conqueror of continental Europe, instigated by an inextinguishable lust for power, has been fighting for universal domination; taking these things into view, together with the course our Government has pursued towards her, I am not prepared to agree that Great Britain has given us cause of war. I am not prepared to say that she has, as a Government, been more incorrect towards this country than the extremity to which she is and has been reduced would excuse. She has been, as is often said, virtually fighting the battles of the civilized world, not indeed for the sake of the world, but to preserve her own existence. However, it is unnecessary for me to dwell upon or to give an opinion upon this point, for it has no bearing on the question before the House.

It has been agreed by gentlemen, for and against the resolution, that a nation, in order to blockade the ports of its enemy, must so invest with a naval force that port as to render it in some measure dangerous to attempt to enter it. However, this has no relation to the question before us.

It has been unanimously agreed by those who have taken a part in the debate, that the pretensions of the British Government are inadmissible as to the three conditions mentioned in the letter of January 23d, 1809, from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, and proposed as the basis of the arrangement of the 19th of April last. As to the first, the President could not pledge himself that the restrictions should be continued against France, because this must depend upon a legislative act. As to the second, respecting the colonial trade, in the latitude contemplated by Mr. Canning, more especially, no one hesitates to reject it. The third condition, which goes to authorize the English Government to enforce our laws, and thereby encroach upon the sovereignty of our country—this surely cannot, for a moment, even admit consideration. No member indeed on this floor has given it so much countenance as the Secretary of State—no one has allowed that our citizens would come to our Government with an ill grace to complain of an injury which they received from the English Government, in consequence of having vindicated the laws of their own country.

But we have no reason to complain of the English Government for proposing those conditions. In the first place, it is competent as a general rule and upon general principles to one nation, while treating with another, to make any propositions, provided they are not insulting in themselves, and provided they are proposed in a manner comporting with diplomatic etiquette. In the second place, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, surely we have no cause of complaint against Great Britain for proposing those conditions. Two of them, the first and second, originated with the members of our Cabinet, and the third was consented to by our Minister at the Court of St. James; and to say the least, not very severely frowned upon by our Secretary. In the 16th and 17th pages of the printed documents, we see what Mr. Madison and Mr. Smith said to Mr. Erskine as to the first condition: I will read a paragraph or two from Mr. Erskine's letter to Mr. Smith, dated the 14th of last August. "After some other observations, Mr. Madison is stated by me at that time to have added, that as the world must be convinced that America had in vain taken all the means in her power to obtain from Great Britain and France a just attention to her rights as a neutral Power, by representations and remonstrances, that she would be fully justified in having recourse to hostilities with either belligerent, and that she only hesitated to do so from the difficulty of contending with both; but that she must be driven even to endeavor to maintain her rights against the two greatest Powers of the world, unless either of them should relax their restrictions upon neutral commerce, in which case the United States would at once side with that Power against the other which might continue its restrictions," &c. In the 17th page Mr. Erskine adds: "I understood very distinctly that the observations of the Secretary of State, Mr. Madison, were intended to convey an opinion, as to what ought and would be the course pursued by the United States, in the event of his Majesty's Orders in Council being withdrawn." Mr. Erskine proceeds: "In these sentiments and opinions you concurred, as I collected from the tenor of several conversations which I held with you at that period." In the same letter from Mr. Jackson to Mr. Smith, we perceive what Mr. Gallatin said to the former as to the second condition, page 18, of the printed documents. "He, Mr. Gallatin, adverted also to the prohibiting of an adjustment of another important point in dispute between the two countries, as he said he knew it was intended by the United States to abandon the attempt to carry on a trade with the colonies of belligerents, in time of war, which was not allowed in time of peace, and to trust to the being permitted by the French, in peace, to carry on such trade, so as to entitle them to the continuance of it in time of war."

In page 19, of the documents, and in the same letter, Mr. Erskine speaks as follows of the third condition: "As to the third condition referred to by you, specified in Mr. Canning's instructions, I have only to remark that I never held any conversation with the members of the Government of the United States relative to it, until my late negotiation, or had ever mentioned the subject to His Majesty's Government; it having for the first time been presented to my consideration in Mr. Canning's despatch to me of the 23d of January, in which that idea is suggested, and stated to have been assented to by Mr. Pinkney." In page 20th, of the documents, and in the same letter, Mr. Erskine goes on to state what Mr. Smith, the Secretary of State, said as to this third condition: "The third condition you certainly very distinctly informed me could not be recognised by the President, but you added, what had great weight in my mind, that you did not see why any great importance should be attached to such a recognition; because it would be impossible that a citizen of the United States could prefer a complaint to his Government on ac'count of the capture of his vessel while engaged in a trade absolutely interdicted by the laws of his country." This is the account given of the origin of the three conditions by Mr. Erskine. We will now see what Mr. Canning says as to his inducement to propose them.

In the Message of the President of December 12th, page 7. we find that Mr. Canning, in his despatch to Mr. Erskine of January 23d, 1809, says: "As the first and second of those conditions are the suggestions of the persons in authority in America to you, and as Mr. Pinkney has recently (but for the first time) expressed to me his opinion that there will be no indisposition on the part of his Government, to the enforcement by the naval power of Great Britain of the regulations of America with respect to France and the countries to which these regulations continue to apply, but that his Government was itself aware that without such enforcement those regulations must be altogether nugatory; I flatter myself that there will be no difficulty in obtaining a distinct and official recognition of those conditions of the American Government."

Now, Mr. Speaker, exceptionable and inadmissible as these conditions are, yet such were the circumstances under which they were proposed, as to take away all complaint on account of the proposition.

But whether or not Great Britain is justified in offering these conditions to our Administration as the basis of an arrangement, has no immediate bearing on the question really under discussion.

It has been said by gentlemen adverse to the resolution, as well as by those friendly to it, that Mr. Jackson was not over courtly in his correspondence with our Secretary—possibly he was so much on his guard lest he should as far overact in pliability as his predecessor did, that he was carried a little into the other extreme. He might brace so strong against being too accommodating, as to lean too far the other way. I think myself, sir, he took rather too high a tone as to the proposition of Mr. Smith to pass from oral to written correspondence—of this, in my opinion, he made too much.

And, sir, for one, I am ready to allow that in offering satisfaction to this country for the attack on the Chesapeake, in what he calls "a paper of memoranda," which is to be found in the 63d page of the printed documents, Mr. Jackson might as well have been silent as to the proclamation of July the 2d, 1807, since this proclamation, in fact, did not exist at that time. It would have been more conciliatory in his Government to have given up the etiquette of having recorded in the official document offering satisfaction for the attack upon the Chesapeake, the abrogation of this proclamation. I think, sir, also, that the two reserves founded on the doctrine of allegiance in England, in this "paper of memoranda," might as well have been omitted.

I will read, sir, this paper; it was enclosed in Mr. Jackson's letter of the 27th of October last, to Mr. Smith. "The President's proclamation of July, 1807, prohibiting to British ships of war the entrance into the harbors of the United States, having been annulled, His Majesty is willing to restore the seamen taken out of the Chesapeake, on reserving to himself a right to claim in a regular way, by application to the American Government, the discharge of such of them (if any) as shall be proved to be either natural born subjects of His Majesty or deserters from His Majesty's service." "His Majesty is willing to make a provision for the families of such men as were slain on board the Chesapeake in consequence of the unauthorized attack upon that frigate, provided that such bounty shall not be extended to the family of any man who shall have been either a natural born subject of His Majesty or a deserter from His Majesty's service."

On the point of these two reserves, as they have been called, there is unquestionably very great difficulty—there are clashing principles and a conflicting practice. The doctrine in Great Britain is, that a person there born owes an allegiance to the King, of which he cannot divest himself, that he cannot throw off. It is there held that he cannot expatriate himself. And at the same time by act of Parliament a foreigner may be naturalized, and thereby all the privileges and immunities of a subject born in England be extended to him. And by our laws a foreigner may be naturalized and partake of every advantage of our own countrymen, and our Government is as much bound to protect him, on the ocean as well as on land, as it is a native citizen. To reconcile these principles and laws has perplexed the greatest statesmen and civilians. It is not to be disguised that there is here and always has been a difficulty not easily to be adjusted. Now, Mr. Speaker, other things being equal, had the British Government had nothing to induce, or justify, or apologize for, the introduction of these things into this "paper of memoranda," they had better been omitted.

But for the insertion of these points of controversy into his proposals of reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake, perhaps Mr. Jackson and his Majesty, the King of England, supposed they found their apology in the manner that our Administration managed the arrangement of the 19th. of April last with Mr. Erskine. Why, sir, was it necessary for the President to direct Mr. Smith to inform Mr. Erskine, that the non-intercourse law was not passed for the sake of placing his Government, in its relations with ours, on an equal footing with the other belligerent Powers; or to tell His Majesty, the King of England, through his Minister, that it would have better comported with his honor to have punished the offending officer, Admiral Berkeley, more severely? This was on the same subject-matter. These exceptionable points were in the one case and in the other introduced while attempting to settle the affair of the Chesapeake. Whether the conduct of our Administration in this business forms a justification for that of Mr.

JANUARY, 1810.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Jackson and his Government, I do not pretend to determine. But I confess I do not understand why our Administration should be unwilling to have it understood by the English Government that Congress by their proceedings had evinced an intention to place the relations of Great Britain with the United States upon an equal footing with the other belligerent Powers, or why it was necessary to inform His Britannic Majesty what would best comport with what was due to his own honor. However, I presume there were reasons with which I am not acquainted for all this. I will, sir, read the paragraphs to which I have alluded, from the documents accompanying the President's Message of 23d of May last. In page second of those documents, in Mr. Erskine's letter to Mr. Smith, under date of April 17th, 1809, Mr. Erskine says: "It having been represented to His Majesty's Government, that the Congress of the United States in their proceedings at the opening of the last session had evinced an intention of passing certain laws, which would place the relations of Great Britain with the United States upon an equal footing in all respects with the other belligerent Powers; I have accordingly received His Majesty's commands, in the event of such laws taking place, to offer, on the part of His Majesty, an honorable reparation for an aggression committed by a British naval officer in the attack on the United States' frigate Chesapeake."

In the 4th page of said documents, in Mr. Smith's letter to Mr. Erskine, dated April the 17th, 1809, Mr. Smith having expressed the pleasure with which the President receives the assurances that His Britannic Majesty is animated with the same disposition with himself, for an adjustment of the differences between the two nations, and that His Majesty is ready to make atonement for the aggression on the Chesapeake—proceeds as follows: "As it appears at the same time that in making this offer His Britannic Majesty derives a motive from the equality now existing in the relations of the United States with the two belligerent Powers, the President owes it to the occasion and to himself to let it be understood that this equality is a result incident to a state of things growing out of distinct considerations. With this explanation, as requisite as it is frank, I am authorized to inform you, that the President accepts the note delivered by you in the name and by the order of His Britannic Majesty, and will consider the same with the engagement contained therein when fulfilled as a satisfaction for the insult and injury of which he has complained. But I have it in express charge from the President to state that while he forbears to insist on a further punishment of the offending officer, he is not the less sensible of the justice and utility of such an example, nor is he less persuaded that it would best comport with what is due from His Britannic Majesty to his own honor."

Now, Mr. Speaker, since the President had made up his mind to accept of the offered reparation, it really appears to me that it would have been more conciliatory at least to have suppressed these irritating suggestions.

It seems that the last of itself, had there been no other objection, would have been sufficient to have prevented the King of England from avowing and ratifying the arrangement.

I will read, sir, what is said by Mr. Jackson on this point in his letter to Mr. Smith, under date of October the 11th, in page 36th of the printed documents. Speaking of the terms of the satisfaction for the attack on the Chesapeake, tendered and accepted in the arrangement of the 19th of April last, and not carried into effect, Mr. Jackson proceeds as follows: "I believed that I had observed to you in the words of my instructions that if His Majesty were capable of being actuated by any desire to retract an offer of reparation which he had once made, His Majesty might be well warranted in doing so, both by the form in which his accredited Minister had tendered that reparation and by the manner in which the tender had been received. I believe that I elucidated this observation by a reference to the particular expressions, which made the terms of satisfaction appear to be unacceptable even to the American Government at the very moment when they were accepted, and which, at all events, put it totally out of His Majesty's power to ratify and confirm any act in which such expressions were contained."

I agree likewise that from the correspondence so far as it proceeded, there was not very strong evidence to my mind exhibited of concluding a treaty, or a very strong disposition discovered on the part of either agent to do it.

It has furthermore been agreed by those who are against as well as those in favor of the resolution, that a foreign Minister ought not to appeal from the Administration to the people. In the case now under consideration I have not been able to discover that such appeal had been made. In the course of this debate, sir, the subject of diplomatic authority has been fully and ably investigated.

Two points have been illustrated, and to my mind perfectly established on this head. First, that our Administration ought to have known and been furnished with the competent evidence that Mr. Erskine had authority to form the arrangement of the 19th of April, or forborne to complete that arrangement. This has been shown beyond all refutation by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, who introduced this debate on the part of the opposition. He has adduced public law, and the practice of this nation from the time it established its independence, to this point, and has settled it conclusively to my mind.

In the second place, it has been illustrated that Mr. Jackson, to justify his Government and repel the charge of bad faith, had only to show that the arrangement was contrary to and in violation of his instructions. This point may have a bearing upon the real question before the House, as it shows that it was not at all incumbent upon Mr. Jackson to make it appear that our Administration knew that Mr. Erskine was acting against his instructions. If he attempted to do this it was a work of supererogation.

I have, Mr. Speaker, followed the example of other gentlemen, and remarked on topics not intimately connected with the direct point before the House as the basis of the resolution.

The question, sir, after all, is what I have stated: Did Mr. Jackson, directly or indirectly, charge our Administration with making the arrangement of the 19th of April, with a knowledge at the time that he was acting contrary to and in violation of his instructions, and repeat the charge after it had been peremptorily disclaimed?

Has it been shown that such charge was made? Mr. Jackson pleads not guilty—he virtually denies that he intended to make such charge, and explains the facts, &c., as appears by his second note to Mr. Smith, delivered by Mr. Oakley. To this note I have already called the attention of the House. Mr. Jackson “could not imagine that offence would be taken at what he said, as most certainly none was intended on his part.”

It certainly is incumbent upon those who support the resolution to make out their case—the burden of proof is upon them; they will not condemn till they have proved an offence—they will not pass the resolution till they establish its truth.

The very terms in which the charge is couched, as well in the letter of Mr. Smith as in the resolution, create an idea in my mind of something like a doubt in the minds of those who have used those terms, whether in fact any such charge was made—“the repetition of a language implying a knowledge”—“expressions conveying the idea that the Executive Government,” &c.—“The repetition of the same intimation.” There is really something strange and odd to me in the manner of making this charge against Mr. Jackson. It is surely out of the common course of expression. It is like the shade of the shadow of a resemblance.

In the next place, I perceive that some of the supporters of the resolution have found the offence—the exceptionable insinuation—in one page of the correspondence, and some in another—some in one paragraph, and some in another—some in one sentence, and some in another. Indeed, the mover of the resolution has not ventured to point out the particular language containing the offensive insinuation. He says—“the expression contained in the official letter,” &c.—“dated the 23d of October, 1809,” &c.—“Conveying the idea,” &c.—“That the repetition of the same intimation in this official letter, dated the 4th of November, 1809,” &c.

Sir, there is but one way to account for such a diversity of opinion, even among the friends of the resolution, as to the place where we are to look for this offence. If it be so doubtful whence it is to be found, may it not be doubtful where it is to be found at all? There really seems to be great perplexity among the advocates on this subject. If expressions had been used by Mr. Jackson towards our Administration of a nature to authorize the putting an end to the correspondence, and dismissing him as a public Minister, and to justify the resolution on your table, one would imagine there would be no difficulty in designating and agreeing upon the very expressions.

Again, the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of the resolution, have wholly failed to establish to my comprehension the truth of the charge against Mr. Jackson. On the other hand, the gentlemen in opposition to it have, as a work to be sure of supererogation, shown clearly that the insinuation, that our Government knew, at the time, that Mr. Erskine was acting contrary to his instructions, is not contained in any sentence or paragraph of Mr. Jackson in the whole correspondence, that bears on or alludes to the subject. They have, contrary to the general rule indeed, proved a negative. They have satisfied every expression, and at the same time excluded the insinuation.

If we take into consideration and carry in our minds, while investigating this correspondence, what it was necessary for Mr. Jackson to do, in order to justify his Government and repel the charge of bad faith, it will aid us the better to understand him. He surely knew his duty—among all the severe things that have been said of him in the course of this debate, no one has alleged that he was deficient in talents or information. It has been said that he has long been a distinguished member of the English diplomatic corps. He certainly must have known his duty. He could not suppose that it was incumbent on him to do more than to show that Mr. Erskine, in making the arrangement, wholly departed from and acted against his instructions, in order to fully authorize his Government to disavow it. He, therefore, had no inducement to charge our Administration with the knowledge that Mr. Erskine was violating his instructions.

We perceive the object of Mr. Jackson to be as I have stated in the first paragraph in the correspondence, which some gentlemen have pointed out as containing the offensive insinuation. This is to be found in page 31 of the printed documents. Speaking of the disavowal of the arrangement, Mr. Jackson remarks: “I observe, that in the records of this mission, there is no trace of a complaint on the part of the United States of His Majesty having disavowed the act of his Minister. You have not, in the conferences we have hitherto held, distinctly announced any such complaint, and I have seen with pleasure in this forbearance, on your part, an instance of that candor, which I doubt not will prevail in all our communications, inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act, done under such circumstances, as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed.”

Now, sir, it is utterly impossible, that Mr. Jackson could have any allusion, in this paragraph, to the time of making the arrangement. He was speaking of the complaint on account of the disavowal of that arrangement. At the time of making the arrangement, surely there was no disavowal to complain of. Mr. Smith says Mr.

JANUARY, 1810.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Jackson must have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act, &c.—when? Why at the time of the conferences—at a time when he knew that the arrangement was disavowed. Until that time, there was nothing for the pretence of complaint, and at a time when he knew it was made contrary to the instructions of Mr. Erskine.

But, in one of the next sentences of Mr. Jackson, he excludes the idea of all charge of a knowledge in our Administration that Mr. Erskine was acting in violation of his instructions. He proceeds to remark that Mr. Erskine did not show the whole of his instructions, that he did not communicate his original instructions in extenso. If so, it was impossible for Mr. Smith to know, whether or not Mr. Erskine was making the arrangement in conformity to his instructions. "It was not known, when I left England, whether Mr. Erskine had, according to the liberty allowed him, communicated to you, in extenso, his original instructions. It now appears he did not," &c.

Again, in page 32d of the documents, Mr. Jackson observes to Mr. Smith, that the latter had informed him, that he, Mr. Smith, understood that Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions. How, sir, could Mr. Jackson, with any consistency, make this observation to Mr. Smith, while at the same time he was charging him with knowing that Mr. Erskine was acting contrary to his instructions. "You have informed me that you understood that Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions by which to regulate his conduct; and that upon one of them, which had not been communicated either to you or to the public, was to be rested the justification of terms finally agreed upon between you and him." Mr. Jackson then proceeds solemnly to declare to Mr. Smith that the despatch from Mr. Erskine of January the 23d is the only one by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it relates.

Is it possible, Mr. Speaker, to suppose that Mr. Jackson would formally and gravely and solemnly declare to Mr. Smith the very fact, that he was insinuating that he knew long before, that is to say, at the time of the arrangement? The supposition is inadmissible: "It is my duty, sir, solemnly to declare to you and through you to the President, that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, which you have made the basis of an official correspondence with the latter Minister, and which was read by the former to the American Minister in London, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with this country on the matter to which it relates."

But, sir, I will not take up further time in reading documents on this point. It will be seen that in the paragraphs in the 57th and 58th and 70th and 71st pages (which, with those upon which I have remarked, I believe are all in the whole correspondence that have the least bearing upon the real question before the House) that the sole object of Mr. Jackson was to justify his Government and repel the charge of bad faith, by establishing the fact that Mr. Erskine had made the arrangement contrary to and in violation of his instructions.

However, after so many able illustrations of the subject as have been presented to the House, after so many eloquent and powerful gentlemen have sought in vain for the offensive implication, it surely would be idle and vain for me to attempt to search it out. I would no more after all this detain the House for me to try to hunt up the language implying an insinuation and the language conveying an idea, &c., in which the "insult" is to be found, than I would search for the Philosopher's Stone, attempt to ascertain Perpetual Motion, or find the Longitude.

But, Mr. Speaker, supposing, though not allowing, that Mr. Jackson did insinuate or suggest, as stated in the resolution, that our Executive Government had a knowledge, at the time, that the arrangement was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine—waiving all question as to the constitutionality—is it expedient for the legislative branches of the Government to interfere in the case? Without denying or attempting to settle the right, is it expedient?

The case is different from that of the last session. The resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) in that case, went only to approve the conduct of the President. To sanction "the promptitude and frankness with which he met the overtures of Great Britain towards a restoration of harmony, and a free commercial intercourse between the two nations."

This resolution not only approves the conduct of the President, but condemns and censures, in the harshest terms, the conduct of a public Minister, and, provisionally, that of his Government. It does not follow, because it would have been proper and expedient to pass that resolution, that it would be to pass this. Any gentleman, with perfect consistency, who advocated that, may oppose this. Again: By the Constitution, the President is to "receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers." It is the peculiar province of the Executive to receive, negotiate with, and dismiss, if they conduct improperly, public Ministers. What have we to do in the case? The Minister, Mr. Jackson, it seems, has offended our Administration; the Administration has punished him, by putting an end to the negotiation and dismissing the Minister. I ask, again, why should we interfere? If any foreign Ambassador, entitled to enjoy the privileges of a public Minister within the United States, conducts in a manner inconsistent with his character as a public Minister, the President has, unquestionably, a right to dismiss him. If he commits an act contrary to the laws and usages of nations, the President may send such offending Minister out of the United States; and, in certain cases, may send him home to his Government. The President, in my opinion, has all this authority by the Constitution, without any law on the subject. This authority is given by the Constitution by necessary implication. The principle is, that wherever the Constitution or a law makes it the duty of a person to do a certain thing, it, by implication, gives him all the authority necessary to enable him to do the thing with propriety.

In the present case, if the President has not gone far enough; if he has not sufficiently censured Mr. Jackson; if he has not punished him in due proportion to his offence, by breaking off all correspondence with him and dismissing him, let him proceed to send him out of the country; and, indeed, if the President thinks proper, let him send the Minister home to his Sovereign. It is a subject within his sole province, and it is to be managed according to his discretion; and to him belongs the whole responsibility. On the other hand, if Mr. Jackson has already been sufficiently chastised by the Administration, why should we step aside from our appropriate sphere, to add to his chastisement? If we pass the resolution on your table, we punish him in his public and in his private character. He, in the course of this debate—with how much propriety I will not say—has been called the Copenhagen Jackson, a legalized spy, &c.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we are to interfere at all, why do we do it before we know whether his Government will justify his conduct? This is leaping, indeed, before we come to the stile. Is Congress, as the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. STANFORD) observed, in debate, the other day, to oppose itself to Mr. Jackson, as an individual? For Congress to marshal itself against a single individual, is derogatory to the dignity of the American nation.

However, sir, the resolution is such a one as I cannot approve or vote for, on account of the provisional declaration of war contained in it, if I had no other objection to it. It is calculated to compel Great Britain, whether she be disposed to or not, to justify the conduct of Mr. Jackson. It is not to be denied, that Great Britain is a proud nation—a nation that has high and lofty notions of honor. And there is an etiquette as to the point of honor among nations, as well as individuals. If you apply to an individual, whose servant has done you an injury, and threaten him with chastisement in the outset, if he justifies the servant, he will not condescend to consider whether the servant has done right or wrong. He, perhaps, will reply to you, that when you come to him in a manner conformable to the rules of decorum, he will take the case into consideration; until then he has nothing to say to you. This is a principle founded in human nature, and it applies to nations as well as to individuals.

Now, sir, the President is confident that Great Britain will condemn the conduct of her Minister. In the fifth page of the Message of the President, of the 29th of November last, we find him expressing himself on this topic, as follows:

“And it would indicate a want of the confidence due to a Government, which so well understands, and exacts, what becomes foreign Ministers near it, not to infer that the misconduct of its own representative will be viewed in the same light in which it has been regarded here.”

Why shall we refuse to give Great Britain a fair opportunity to fulfil the expectations of our Executive? Why do we threaten “to call into action the whole force of the nation,” if the British Government shall presume “to stand” by Mr. Jackson? Why, indeed, do we threaten with war that nation, if she shall dare to justify her Minister; for the resolution on your table amounts to that—I cannot understand it otherwise? Indeed to my mind, it will not admit of any other construction. Do we really mean to go to war with Great Britain about these insinuations, after all the encroachments upon our neutral rights—the injuries and the outrages on the real causes of war, that gentlemen talk so loud about? Why, sir, the people will not very well understand this. Our yeomanry will not very well like to support a war waged upon so nice and punctilious a point of honor. The farmers will not wish to yield up their hard earnings, their cattle, their grain, the varied produce of their labors—the fruit of the sweat of their brows, to support a foolish and fantastic war, about “expressions implying an insinuation” and expressions, “conveying an idea,” and all the other shadows of shades of diplomatic etiquette.

Again: It is within the province of Congress to decide when this nation shall, in fact, go to war. The Constitution says, Congress shall have power to declare war, &c. Ought we, sir, before we come to the question, to commit ourselves? Shall we be a proper, an impartial tribunal, to decide the important, the awful question, whether we shall have war with Great Britain, in case she should justify the conduct of her Minister. Mr. Jackson, if we pass the resolution? No, sir, we shall have committed ourselves—we shall have pledged ourselves for war, at all events.

But, sir, the resolution not only amounts to a conditional declaration of war against Great Britain, but it is at war with the President's Message, at the opening of this session of Congress, and with the Secretary's letter of the instructions to Mr. Pinkney, of the 23d of November last. The President, speaking of the rupture with Mr. Jackson, in the fifth page of the Message, says:

“The British Government will learn, at the same time, that a ready attention will be given to communications, through any channel which may be substituted.”

In the 88th page of the printed document, we find the President's Secretary addressing our Minister at London, as follows:

“You are particularly instructed, at the same time, in making those communications, to do it in a manner that will leave no doubt of the undiminished desire of the United States to unite in all the means the best calculated to establish the relations of the two countries on the solid foundation of justice, of friendship, and of mutual interest.”

Shall we, sir, counteract the President, by obstructing the channel of farther negotiation, while he is endeavoring to keep it open? While he is presenting the olive branch of peace, shall we, by passing this resolution, fulminate a declaration of war? Must there forever be some stumbling-block thrown in the way of adjusting our controversies with Great Britain? I hope not.

But, were there no other difficulty with the resolution, I could not vote for it, on account of the very awkward situation in which it will place the President. This has been stated and illustrated by a gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PITKIN.) The two Houses might, separately or jointly, approbate the conduct of the President in the form of separate addresses, or a joint address, without reducing him to the very ridiculous dilemma, of putting his signature, officially, to a resolution pledging himself to stand by himself, or, by omitting to do it, virtually refusing to stand by himself. A joint address, according to a rule of the House, might be presented to him in his audience chamber, by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Speaker and both Houses.

I have, sir, intruded much longer on the patience of the House than I intended. The magnitude of the subject, and the deep impression it has made on my mind, form my only apology.

I have attempted to show what was the real question before the House, and how far the various topics, discussed in the course of this debate, were irrelevant.

First. As the supporters of the resolution have wholly failed to make out the charge against Mr. Jackson, and, as I believe in my conscience, it is false, I cannot vote for the resolution.

Secondly. Going upon the ground, for argument's sake, that the charge alleged against Mr. Jackson in the resolution was true, I have endeavored to show that it would be inexpedient to pass it.

In the third place, I have attempted to evince, that the resolution ought not to be adopted, because it amounts to a conditional declaration of war.

I have stated various other points in the resolution, on account of which I could not vote for it.

Indeed, sir, it is, in my opinion, so bad and mischievous in all its bearings and consequences, in the matter and in the form, that I feel it my duty to protest, most solemnly, against it.

Mr. TALLMADGE.—If, at this late period of the debate, any gentleman can rise and address this House, believing that he can command their attention, he has more confidence in himself than I have. If I can throw any light upon the subject, in the remarks which I shall make, so that gentlemen shall be induced to give it a more thorough investigation, it will afford me peculiar satisfaction. Although I cannot promise the House that I shall occupy ground entirely new, on a subject which has been so long and so ably discussed, yet, I hope I shall be able to present it in a light somewhat new. If I should be so fortunate as to induce gentlemen to pause and to reflect, although they may not consent to reject the resolution now on the table, I cannot but hope that a majority may be found to postpone.

It was my intention, sir, at an early stage of this debate, to have submitted my view of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Jackson. If I could have obtained the floor, I intended to have examined the late arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, and the nature and extent of the powers under which he acted, inasmuch as the correspondence in question grew principally out of those subjects. I feel confident, from a careful examination of the whole correspondence, that the insult, complained of by Mr. Smith, and asserted in the resolution, cannot be found; or, if insinuations have been made which induced his dismissal, still the resolution on your table cannot be justified.

The subject of the late correspondence has been so thoroughly discussed, that the bare recital of those letters has become unpleasant to some, and absolutely disgusting to others. My principal object in making any remarks at this time, is to induce gentlemen to reflect before they vote, and not to suffer themselves to be misled by passion or prejudice, either of party politics, or from the recollection of grievances which Great Britain may have inflicted; but to examine the resolution with coolness, and then determine whether, on principles of fair construction, it can be justified by the correspondence on which it is professedly founded. The great object of our assembling here, is to communicate our sentiments freely to each other, for our country's good, and if we are faithful to ourselves and to our constituents, their peace and happiness will be kept continually in view.

In considering the question now pending before the House, two broad propositions, or inquiries, would embrace all the remarks I had purposed to submit for the consideration of this assembly, viz:

First. Whether the declarations contained in the resolution now under debate, are substantially founded in truth?

And secondly. Is it expedient, at this time, to adopt them?

Before the motion for an indefinite postponement was made, I should have thought it proper to have examined the first proposition very minutely. But, on a motion of postponement, it does not appear to me to be strictly within the rule of orderly debate, to discuss the main question, although, by your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and the permission of this House, I know it has become the practice. From this view of the subject, I will pass over all that part of my argument which relates to the first proposition; in doing which, I persuade myself, I shall relieve some gentlemen from attending to a painful investigation. I cannot, however, wholly dismiss this part of the subject, without calling the attention of the House to one important fact, which, by the resolution, is made the climax of insult. It is therein asserted, that Mr. Jackson had published and circulated through the country a circular letter dated 13th of November, 1809, calculated, through false and fallacious disguises, to excite distrust amongst the people, and resentments against their Government, dishonourable to their character, and ruinous to their interests. I solemnly ask this House to inquire, on what this bold assertion rests. Admitting the fact, that Mr. Jackson wrote the letter thus alluded to, to the Consuls of His Britannic Majesty, where is the proof that it obtained publicity by his direction? Is it not incumbent on the advocates of the resolution to prove the fact, before they venture thus solemnly to assert it? Sir, I have no hesitation in declaring that, on this point, we are without the least evidence to support the declaration, and, of course, that it would be assuming and undignified in this House, to suffer that part of the resolution to remain upon their files.

I now proceed to the second point of inquiry, viz: is it expedient to adopt the resolution at this time, and in its present form?

As the question is presented to my mind, I shall consider and discuss it in a three-fold aspect.

First. As it respects the President of the United States.

Secondly. As it respects the people of the United States.

And thirdly. As calculated to bear upon Great Britain.

Although I should occupy some time in examining these three positions, I hope the House will do me the justice to acknowledge that I do not frequently claim their attention in this way.

I proceed, then, to consider the resolution in relation to the President of the United States. It will be necessary, while attending to this part of the subject, to bear upon our minds the peculiar structure of our Government. That I may illustrate my ideas with greater precision, I beg gentlemen to turn their attention to that part of the Constitution where the great legislative functions of the Government are defined. It will occur to every gentleman, that the Legislature consists of the Senate and House of Representatives, and that the President of the United States makes a third branch, having a qualified negative on all our laws. But the President has one peculiar and essential feature in his character; that is, that he has the sole power of receiving foreign Ministers, and the implied right of dismissing them whenever he shall think proper. What has he done in the case, which originated the resolution? He has received Mr. Jackson, the British Minister, in due form, and at a period when he thought proper, he has notified that Ambassador, that no further communication would be received from him. Thus far, the proceeding appears to have been carried on within the Constitutional power of the President. Now, sir, what are we called on to perform by the resolution on your table, which, I trust, every member has read, and heard read, over and over again? We solemnly pledge ourselves to the nation and to the world, to stand by and support the Executive Government in its refusal to receive any further communications from Francis J. Jackson, and to call into action the whole force of the nation, if it should become necessary, in consequence of the conduct of the Executive Government in this respect. Can gentlemen be serious, when they declare that it is necessary for the Legislature to play off this solemn farce to repel a supposed insult, offered to our Secretary of State by a foreign Minister? Is it not rather to fulminate the denunciations of Congress against the Minister, who cannot now be heard in his defence? I am constrained to pronounce the measure, now proposed for our adoption, to be wrong in principle, and unsupported by fact; for I must insist upon it, that, as the House of Representatives, we have nothing to do in this business. His Sovereign has sent him on a mission to this country, and our sovereign, so far as we have one, has received him, and dismissed him for alleged misconduct.

But I have another pointed objection to the resolution, which induces me to urge its indefinite postponement. It purports to be a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States. In the Constitution of the United States, article one, under the 7th section, are found these emphatic words:

“Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved of by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of bills.”

Now, sir, what is proposed to be done with this resolution? Having come to this House, under the sanction of a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, we are now called upon to adopt it in the House of Representatives. After this shall be done, (which, Heaven forbid!) probably the Committee on Enrolled Bills will present it to the President of the United States for his approbation and signature. Suppose, sir, the President should refuse to sign it; is there a Constitutional majority on this floor who would be willing to re-pass it, and thus place the President in so delicate a situation, as to declare that he would stand by and support himself in his Executive conduct? I hope not. But the President, with great propriety, might inform Congress that, in his Constitutional character, he had done all that was necessary to be done on the subject. He might further tell us, that we had no right to interfere with his duties in this case; that the Constitution gave us no control over foreign Ministers, but had vested in the Executive the sole right of deciding in relation to their functions. Could any gentleman, holding the Constitution in his hand, dispute the correctness of such conduct, on the part of the President? Surely not, sir. Do not gentlemen recollect (for some who are now present were members of the House of Representatives at that time) the case which occurred in the year 1796, when the illustrious WASHINGTON presided, and the House made a call for papers? The honorable the Speaker, who now presides over the deliberations of this House, was then a member, and I find, by the Journal, he was among those who favored the call. To illustrate this point, I will, with permission of the House, turn to the Journal of that year. On the 24th of March, 1796, in reference to the Treaty which Mr. Jay had made with Great Britain, we find the following extract:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of the instructions to the Minister of the United States, who negotiated the Treaty with the King of Great Britain, (communicated by his Message of the 1st instant,) together with the correspondence, and other documents, relative to the said Treaty, excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed."

To this request, that great and good man made the following reply, selecting only such parts as have a bearing on the present question:

"With the utmost attention, I have considered your resolution of the 4th instant. In deliberating upon the subject, it was impossible for me to lose sight of the principle which some have avowed in the discussion; or to avoid extending my views to the consequences which must flow from the admission of that principle. I trust that no part of my conduct has ever indicated a disposition to withhold any information which the Constitution has enjoined upon the President as a duty to give, or which could be required of him by either House of Congress as a right. And, with truth, I affirm that it has been, and it will continue to be, while I have the honor to preside in the Government, my constant endeavor to harmonize with the other branches thereof, so far as the trust delegated to me by the people of the United States, and my sense of the obligation it imposes, 'to preserve, protect, and defend, the Constitution of the United States,' will permit."

"As it is essential to the due administration of the Government, that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved; a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request."

"GEO. WASHINGTON."

These were the sentiments of that illustrious personage in the year 1796. When a call was made by the House of Representatives, for almost anything not palpably wrong in principle, it needed the wisdom of the statesman, and the fortitude of the hero, to refuse a compliance. WASHINGTON had the firmness, from a sacred regard to the Constitution which he had sworn to support, to resist that call, although supported by this popular branch of our Government. I well remember the impression which this conduct of the President made upon my mind, as well as the remarks which were made by my countrymen on that memorable occasion. Give me leave, sir, to apply that precedent to the present case. President WASHINGTON thought that the House of Representatives had no right to interfere with the peculiar function of the President of the United States, of which he judged the call, then made, was a case in point. It does not appear to have been any objection, in his mind, that an exposure of the correspondence would have been injurious to the Government; but it was an improper interference with the duties of the Executive Department which induced the refusal. This is precisely my view of the present case; and, under that impression, I object to the resolution, and, for that reason, urge its indefinite postponement."

I know it has been said by some, who advocate the passage of this resolution, that, by the Constitution, the Congress of the United States is defined, as consisting of the Senate and House of Representatives; but, if gentlemen will examine the powers vested in Congress, they will be convinced that it requires the three branches of the legislative government, to give them proper effect. Hence, I infer that the resolution, if adopted, must be sent to the President for his approbation and signature.

Again: Suppose the resolution should be presented to the President, and he should neither sign nor return it, I inquire, where shall it be found, and what would be its true character? If it was a bill, the Constitution has provided for this case; but if a joint resolution, I know not what will become of it, unless it goes through the same formalities. As I do not wish to embarrass the President with so delicate and so novel a case, I hope it will be indefinitely postponed.

I have another objection to this resolution, inasmuch as I believe it is without a precedent in the annals of our country. On examining the Journals of this Government, I have found no case which compares with the present; and, until gentlemen shall turn us to the case, I must believe no such instance exists. I know the cases of Genet and Yrujo have been quoted, but I contend that each of those cases, so far from militating against, do, in fact, serve to establish my position. Omitting to detail the atrocious conduct of Genet, what was done in relation to him on that memorable occasion? The President of the United States, on being informed of his outrageous conduct, in his Executive character alone, took notice of it, and requested the recall of the Minister. But no vote nor resolution was passed by the Senate or House of Representatives sanctioning this conduct of the Executive, nor does it appear that any motion was made in either House to this effect. So, also, in the case of Yrujo, although his insult was palpable and direct, the Executive Magistrate alone took notice of the offence, and no aid or interference was called for, or given, by the House.

It has also been urged, that the approbation proposed to be given by this House to the President of the United States at the last session, is similar to this. What was that case, sir, and what was the resolution proposed? The resolution was offered by a gentleman from Virginia, and is in the following words:

"Resolved, That the promptitude and frankness with which the President of the United States has met the overtures of the Government of Great Britain towards a restoration of harmony, and a free commercial intercourse between the two nations, receives the approbation of this House."

I trust, Mr. Speaker, I need not compare the two resolutions to convince every gentleman present, that there is no similarity between them. One was intended to express the opinion of the House of Representatives alone; the other is a joint resolution to be passed by the Senate and House. One was a simple vote of approbation of an act of the President of the United States, with which nothing further was to be done, than to present it to him as an expression of our public approbation of his Executive conduct; the other is a denunciation of a foreign Minister, accompanied with a threat, that we will go all lengths in support of this conduct. If nothing more was intended by this joint resolution, than to assure the President of the support of both branches of the Legislature, surely this would not be the correct course. A joint address, or separate resolutions, would better express our opinions on the occasion. This would be a measure entirely different from the joint resolution now proposed to be adopted.

Having examined the resolution in relation to the President of the United States, I come to the second proposition, which was to consider the bearing it would have upon the people of the United States. If it can be shown that no good can possibly result to the people of the United States from the passage of this resolution, I presume it will be sufficient to induce gentlemen to pause; but, if I should be able to prove, not only that no good can result, but that it is fraught with manifold evils, I hope the House will consent to postpone. Let us, then, in the first place, inquire, what good can result from the adoption of this measure? Do gentlemen expect, by passing this resolution, to give further information to their constituents, respecting our foreign relations? Will it throw any light on the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the British Minister? It certainly is not calculated for that purpose. The resolution abounds with certain bold asseverations, not, in my opinion, founded on fact, and gives no new information whatever. If no new information is communicated, I inquire, in the second place, is it calculated to rouse the dormant spirit of the country? From the violent remarks of some gentlemen, I should suppose this must be one principal object in view, or why should the case of Jonathan Robbins, the murder of Pierce, and the attack on the frigate Chesapeake, be so frequently brought up to view? Why, but to inflame the minds and irritate the passions of the people, are our ears greeted with such animated harangues, which can have no possible bearing on the present question? If, indeed, this course has become necessary to raise the public indignation up to war proof, then is the pride and glory of our country departed; we are fallen, indeed. Can it be possible that it has become necessary for this Government to collect the most illiberal and opprobrious language, and fulminate the same, in the form of a joint resolution, against a foreign Minister, to rouse the passions of the people against the Sovereign and nation which he represents? Sir, such an attempt must be beneath the dignity of this House, and therefore cannot be the object of this resolution.

If, then, no good can hopefully result, are there not evils to be apprehended, if the resolution on your table should be adopted? All attempts of this sort are calculated to waste the national character; to hold up to view a prominent fact, which I utterly disclaim, that we are to emblazon our own glory by resolutions and proclamations. This, in my judgment, is a great evil, and the people have viewed it in the same light for many years. I wish to see an end to everything of this sort. National honor is a treasure of vast importance to a country, of too much value to be trifled with; and a treasure, too, however vast, that ought not to be drawn upon, but with a sparing hand. If we make too heavy drafts upon it, we shall depreciate its value, in the opinion of the world, and certainly in our own.

As another evil, resulting from this resolution, I am almost constrained to believe that it is meant for nothing but gasconade, as it relates to ourselves. What possible good, sir, can it accomplish? Is it not most apparent that its object cannot be beneficial to our country; that, in truth, it can effect nothing; and, of course, that it is good for nothing? We have resolved over and over again, until the subject has become stale and unpalatable to our constituents. They have heard and seen so much of this national bombast, that they have become fatigued by the farce.

Another weighty objection against the resolution is, that it is couched in harsh, uncourteous, and illiberal language. Can this course have become necessary to heal the wounded honor of our Government? I do maintain, sir, that, from the commencement of our struggle for independence, we stand on high ground in respect to our State papers. The resolutions and addresses of the Old Congress, as well as the correspondence of our public functionaries with foreign Ministers, and especially the addresses of General WASHINGTON to his fellow-citizens and fellow-soldiers, for soundness of matter and eloquence of composition, stand unrivalled in the history of the world. This is a treasure of literary reputation of which I would not deprive my native country by passing this resolution. I utterly object against lavishing this rich fund of national character on such pitiful resolutions as these.

Having dismissed the two first propositions, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the third and last, which was, to consider the bearing this resolution is calculated to have on the British Government. I will carefully endeavor to avoid entering into the relative merits of the correspondence, as I promised at the outset, although it may be necessary occasionally to glance at it, for the purpose of elucidating this part of my subject. If, indeed, an insult has been offered to the Government by Mr. Jackson, the President has done what he thought proper on the occasion, and I would not revise his conduct. I am not disposed to arraign the conduct of the President of the United States in this instance, for he is not on trial before this august tribunal; nor do I mean to arraign the Secretary of State, for he is not on trial; nor do I stand here to justify the conduct of the British Minister. I stand on much higher ground. I appear, in my place, before this honorable House, to prove the impolicy, as well as inexpediency, of adopting this measure, and thereby to avert evils which, I fear, may result from it. I say, then, that the conduct of the President, in relation to Mr. Jackson, is founded on a right, inherent in the Executive, to dismiss a Minister when he thinks proper, and of this he must of necessity be the judge, and acts upon his own responsibility. All this may be done, and has been done before, without any very serious consequences resulting to the nation. But when the measure assumes the form contemplated by the resolution, the Government and people of the United States become parties to the quarrel, and this gives a new aspect to the procedure. When the supposed insult was given, the President of the United States put an end to all farther communications from Mr. Jackson, deeming him unworthy, if you please, to hold any farther correspondence with the Executive Department of our Government.

After this had been done, what further information do we get from the Secretary of State? If gentlemen will turn to his letter, addressed to Mr. Pinkney, our Minister at London, under date of November 23, 1809, they will find the precise view in which it appeared to the President, who undoubtedly dictated that letter. I will only quote the last paragraph of Mr. Smith's letter, found in page 89, of the printed documents, to elucidate this point of my argument:

"The observations, to which so much extent have been given in this letter, with those contained in the correspondence with Mr. Jackson, will make you fully acquainted with the conduct and character he has developed, with the necessity of the step taken in refusing further communication with him, and with the grounds on which the President instructs you to request that he may be immediately recalled."

That part of the letter to which I beg the House particularly to attend, is the following paragraph:

"You are particularly instructed, at the same time, in making those communications, to do it in a manner that will leave no doubt of the undiminished desire of the United States to unite in all the means the best calculated to establish the relations of the two countries on the solid foundations of justice, of friendship, and of mutual interest."

I beg solemnly to appeal to the candor of the House, and to ask the question, whether the resolution now on the table follows up the spirit of the letter from Secretary Smith to Mr. Pinkney? Can it be possible, sir, after the President has directed that a communication of the circumstances should be made to the British Government in such a manner as should preclude offence, that gentlemen can attentively peruse that letter, and then vote for this resolution? I will confess myself mistaken in the conclusion to be drawn from premises fairly stated, if this can be the case. What does the resolution amount to, Mr. Speaker? I forbear to quote the particular expressions of it, for really, sir, it appears to me to contain more virulence and insult than gentlemen are aware of. The language of this formidable State paper, addressed to the British Government, is essentially this: You have sent a Minister here to insult our Government; and, to avenge the insult, we solemnly pledge the whole force of the nation. Are gentlemen prepared deliberately to say this? Is this what gentlemen mean by passing the resolution, or do I mistake its language? Nothing on earth is more easy (and surely we have proved it more than once) than to resolve that we are a great and powerful nation, feelingly alive to a sense of our own honor and importance, and, if you please, that we are the wisest nation on earth. Such measures as these may, for a time, serve to amuse and please the people; but we are now transacting business, of no minor importance, with a great and powerful nation; with a Government jealous of its honor; and it becomes us to weigh well the extent and meaning of this resolution. If it contains language which no gentleman would feel at liberty to make use of to another, one nation, a fortiori, ought not to use it in its intercourse with another. Injuries and insults of this sort cannot easily be submitted to, and, in the present instance, I presume, will not pass unnoticed.

I know it has been said, that a case very similar to this occurred in the British Government. The case of De Palm, the Austrian Ambassador, has been quoted. If I am not very much mistaken, the two cases bear but a very slight resemblance. It will be recollected that, in the year 1726, when the House of Hanover was first established, and George I was on the throne, and several of the European Courts were friendly to the Pretender, De Palm made a formal address to the British Court, in reply to the King's speech from the throne. By express orders from the Austrian Court, this address was published, by way of manifesto to the British nation, in which the King was charged with having uttered palpable falsehoods, to induce his subjects to go to war. This seems to have been briefly the fact; and what line of conduct was pursued by the King in consequence of this appeal? The Austrian Minister was ordered, forthwith, to leave the British dominions, and, I believe, all will say, with the utmost propriety, too. But what followed this? The House of Lords and the House of Commons presented a joint address to the King, assuring him of their loyalty, &c. But this was not all; they saw that war was intended, and they followed up their address by a vote of liberal supplies to meet the exigency, and by raising a large army, and equipping their navy. I ask, then, sir, with much solicitude, is this the precursor of a plan to array our fellow-citizens in arms, and to equip our formidable navy and gunboats for the conflict? Or can it be soberly the view of this House, by such a resolution, to prostrate the public character of Mr. Jackson? Surely, sir, it must be unbecoming the dignity of Congress to assail the character of an individual, a stranger in our country, and protected only by the laws of nations. The supposition is too humiliating, and I cannot and will not believe it. I have another objection to this resolution, inasmuch as it has an aspect to war, through the Executive. The power of declaring war is lodged, by the Constitution, in the Congress of the United States; nor can this power be delegated to any person or persons whatever. As I would not, in any shape, authorize conduct in an individual that might lead this country into a war, so I would cautiously avoid countenancing the Executive in such measures as might bring on a war, without the express consent of the Legislature.

In all the aspects in which I have been able to present this unfortunate measure to the House, it seems to be productive of no good to the United States. Another evil, which most probably will result from it, is, that it has a tendency to widen the breach between this country and Great Britain. Of however little importance some gentlemen may consider a good understanding between the two countries, I confess I deem it to be of such vast importance, that I would throw no obstacle whatever in the way of an amicable negotiation. The President has thought proper to present this case in a pacific manner to the British Government, and I would not widen the breach so long as the door is open to accommodation. But pass the resolution, and let it receive the signature of the President, and I very much misjudge if we speedily have another opportunity to negotiate with that nation. We seem, indeed, to be peculiarly unfortunate in all our attempts to negotiate with Great Britain. In illustration of this remark, I beg leave to quote one or two extracts from the correspondence between Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson. To enable gentlemen more fully to comprehend the force of Mr. Jackson's remarks, and to show that they all have a most pointed bearing on the misunderstanding which finally took place, I will request the House to indulge me in reading only two paragraphs from the letters of Mr. Smith to Mr. Erskine, dated April 10, 1809, preparatory to the late arrangement. At the commencement of that correspondence, Mr. Erskine declares that he had received His Majesty's commands to offer an honorable reparation for the aggression committed by a British naval officer, in the attack on the frigate Chesapeake. The Secretary of State, in reply, says: "As it appears, at the same time, that, in making this offer, His Britannic Majesty derives a motive from the equality now existing in the relations of the United States with the two belligerent Powers, the President owes it to the occasion and to himself, to let it be understood that this equality is a result incident to a state of things growing out of distinct considerations." As if the Secretary of State was determined to impress a belief that the non-intercourse law did not originate in motives of strict impartiality towards the two great belligerents, (for that was the precise ground taken by Mr. Erskine when he made the first overture.) but that it grew out of "distinct considerations."

In the same letter, the Secretary goes on farther to say:

"But I have it in express charge from the President to state that, while he forbears to insist on a further punishment of the offending officer, he is not the less sensible of the justice and utility of such an example, nor the less persuaded that it would best comport with what is due from His Britannic Majesty to his own honor."

Sir, has it really come to this, that the President of the United States conceives himself to be the keeper of the King's honor? I beg leave soberly to inquire, what could have been intended by these sentences? Had such language been made use of to our Government, with that peculiar fastidious jealousy which we seem to entertain for our national honor, I presume we should all have agreed that it was meant as an insult. I can hardly conceive how Mr. Erskine could have viewed it in any other light towards his Sovereign and nation. Indeed, sir, it seems that His Britannic Majesty was not so dull of apprehension, but that he discovered the lurking insult, and, for that reason, would not ratify that part of the arrangement. I am borne out in this conclusion, by an extract from Mr. Jackson's letter of the 11th of October, 1809, in which he says:

"I touch, with considerable and very sincere reluctance, upon that part of your letter in which you state that I had not assigned any reason whatever, why the reasonable terms of satisfaction tendered, and accepted, have not been carried into effect."

"I believe that I had observed to you, in the words of my instructions, that if His Majesty were capable of being actuated by any desire to retract an offer of reparation which he had once made, His Majesty might be well warranted in doing so by the form in which his accredited Minister had tendered that reparation, and by the manner in which that tender had been received. I believe that I elucidated this observation by a reference to the particular expressions which made the terms of satisfaction appear to be unacceptable even to the American Government, at the very moment which they were accepted, and which, at all events, put it totally out of His Majesty's power to ratify and confirm any act in which such expressions are contained."

Could it have been possible, Mr. Speaker, when Mr. Smith wrote the letter to which Mr. Jackson refers, and from which I have quoted an extract, that he could soberly suppose his Britannic Majesty would not feel wounded by our saying what would or would not best comport with his honor? I cannot view it in any other light than an indirect attempt to prevent negotiation, and, in this way, to prevent an adjustment of that most unfortunate affair. I mention this, to show that there is a sort of *fatal*ity (and when I use this expression, I choose it as the least offensive phrase I can select to convey my meaning.) attending our negotiations with the British Government. It seems as if we always must throw into the scale some dead weight, to overbalance every accommodating proposition; and that, for this purpose, when an amicable adjustment is proposed, we must insult as we go along. I cannot sufficiently lament this unfortunate situation of our affairs.

But, above all, and as the most serious and solid objection I have to this resolution, and which imperiously demands its indefinite postponement, I think it does contemplate a course of measures which will lead us to war. I do not mean to be understood that this resolution amounts to a declaration of war; but, sir, so far as I have been able to examine this subject; as far as I can trace the objects and bearing of the late correspondence, from its commencement to the dismissal of Mr. Jackson, and especially the resolution purporting to grow out of the correspondence, my mind is strongly impressed with the concurrence of circumstances tending to involve this country in a war with Great Britain. Against this dreadful, this most unfortunate event, I here enter my most decided and solemn protest. I know, sir, we have been repeatedly told that this is not the intention of this resolution. Every gentleman has read it, and must expound it for himself. I say, then, that the tendency of this resolution, is to lead us into that situation from which we cannot honorably retreat short of a war. In saying this, I impeach no man's motives; but if the resolution does not carry in it the very seeds of war, which, in due time, will vegetate and bear its destructive fruit, then have I no judgment in things of this sort. Indeed, sir, I presume I shall not be considered as going too far, when I assert that the very parent of this spurious offspring (Mr. GILES) has openly avowed his object to be war. How much short of this have some gentlemen come, who have advocated the passage of this resolution in this House? We must make great allowances for national feelings. We are not here to establish a standard for the British nation, or to suppose that the question of peace and war rests with the Parliament as it does with Congress. Let an insult be offered to the King, and to the British nation through him, and if he does not make war upon you, I do not understand the nature of that Government, nor the jealous light in which they view their national honor.

JANUARY, 1810.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Whatever insults may have been offered to the Executive, through the Secretary of State, I do maintain it that the resolution is not the legitimate offspring of the correspondence, and, of course, cannot be justified on that ground. There is enough of irritation on both sides, but its language is absolutely courtly, compared with this resolution. Believing that some of the friends, as well as the mover of this resolution, mean it as a measure leading to war, and, deploring such an event as most calamitous to our country, I should be more than culpable if I did not raise my voice, and exert my feeble efforts, to expose it, and thus, if possible, to avert the evil. It is, therefore, from the most solemn conviction of duty to my constituents and country, that I do thus strenuously oppose so impolitic, so mischievous a measure.

It is a painful consideration to me in another view, that I am compelled to oppose every measure that has a tendency to produce a state of war. I sincerely wish I had good reason to believe that our country is in a situation, not only to defend itself, but to maintain its character and rights through the world. But, let me ask, is this the fact? Is the state of the Treasury such as to justify you in plunging this nation into a war? Can it be possible that gentlemen, after reading the Message of the President of the United States, and giving credit to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, can say that we are prepared for war with one of the most powerful nations on earth? What is the present state of your army? Have you a body of troops equal to the emergency, if war should speedily ensue? What is the state of our fortifications? A report upon that subject has been laid upon your table, and I trust the gentlemen of this House know what it contains. Are they in a suitable condition to meet a war? What is the present state of your navy? Are your frigates in a condition to protect and scour our coasts? Of your gunboats I will say nothing, only that the greater the number, the less efficient should I consider our naval force; inasmuch as our resources, both in men and money, would be diverted to an object in which I have but little confidence in the hour of trial.

Sir, I do consider it utterly impossible that there should be any diversity of opinion in this House, or among our constituents, on the great question of defending our country. Whatever may be the jealousy of parties, or whatever difference of opinion may exist on minor subjects, on the great question of defending our nation against any invaders, there can be but one opinion. To talk of a reluctance in any part of this House to defend the country against any nation on earth, is preposterous in the extreme. If Great Britain should make war upon us, I trust we shall be united in the arduous conflict, although, in the measures leading to it, we are, and shall be, divided.

For the honor of my country, I could most devoutly wish that all party feelings were done away, not only in the House, but through the nation; and that our country's good engaged our joint concern. Inasmuch as this resolution has a tendency to excite those evil passions, and to bring them into exercise, I do exceedingly regret that it has ever been offered for our consideration. Believing, most conscientiously, that the direct and natural tendency of this resolution is to promote discord among ourselves, when harmony is so essentially necessary; and also to bring us into collision with Great Britain—I do most heartily hope it may be indefinitely postponed. So far as it has even a doubtful aspect to such an issue, I do most heartily detest it as an evil, of all others, best calculated to destroy the peace and happiness of this country.

Let it not be said by any man, that war becomes necessary every thirty or forty years, to maintain and support the party in power. This is too ridiculous to need serious refutation. It has long been an adage of statesmen, that the Administration cannot conduct a war, and make a peace. It cannot, therefore, be the policy of the party now in power to drag this country into a destructive war to support their own popularity. Whatever may be my views of the present dominant party, if nothing short of a war could correct or overthrow them, I should say the price is too high; as an honest native American, I should pronounce the premium too great.

H. OF R.

Conduct of the British Minister.

JANUARY, 1819.

From some remarks which have been made during this debate, one might be led to suppose that the valor of the nation belonged to one party, and laid almost exclusively on one side of this House. I trust this is rather a peculiarity of expression, in the ardor of debate, than the sober sentiments of those who utter them. Gentlemen cannot be supposed to mean that there is no honor nor valor in those who oppose this resolution. If we should, indeed, be obliged to buckle on the harness, I hope we shall be able to show the world that we are engaged in a righteous cause; that war is brought to our very doors, without needless provocation on our part. In such a war, I venture to assure you, there would be no want of spirit in our country. You and I, Mr. Speaker, as well as others on this floor, have seen our countrymen in hard and perilous times, and such as were calculated to try men's souls. We cannot have forgotten the conduct of Americans in the Revolutionary war; and if, unfortunately, such another conflict should become necessary, I feel confident that a patriotism and zeal not less meritorious would animate every bosom. It is a high sense of national honor, and a spirit of resistance to every encroachment on our sovereignty and independence that I wish to inculcate, in comparison with which all other is selfish, mean, and contemptible. Some gallant knights may be willing to see this country engaged in war, that they may have an opportunity to enrol their names among the heroes of the age. My ambition, thank Heaven! leads me to no such doubtful and dangerous experiments; but if any man on this floor will risk more for his country than myself, he has more than one life to lose. We are all embarked in the same cause, for the support of which I would hazard everything this country possesses, and all that I hold valuable or dear.

This is really a question too solemn, too important, too big with the fate of this country, slightly to be passed over. I am satisfied gentlemen do not view it in the serious light that I do, or that resolution would never have been sustained in this House for a single day. I feel persuaded, if gentlemen would suffer themselves to consider what is due to each other on the score of civility; if they would but reflect that there is a considerable portion of this House who view the resolution on your table as carrying with it evils dark as Erebus, and which, in due time, will burst on our common country; if they could be brought to see that this is not merely a vote of approbation, but a solemn sanction of the Government, in a case, at best, somewhat doubtful, with a pledge of our national resources to support it, there is candor and good sense enough in this House to postpone it indefinitely. I, once more, call on this House to pause and reflect; for, be assured, it is no ordinary question which demands your attention. It, most assuredly, cannot be considered a simple resolution approving of the Executive conduct; it goes deeper; it strikes at the very foundation of our national peace and prosperity. I fear it will tear up the blessed privileges with which we are favored, and, on slight and trivial grounds, I would by no means put them at hazard.

I have protracted my remarks, Mr. Speaker, on the second position which I laid down, greatly beyond what I had in contemplation when I rose. I hope the House will do me the justice to believe that I speak from a sense of duty, and from no sinister motive. I have nothing to ask from the Government, but protection in my lawful pursuits, for, with great truth, can I declare, that there is no office in the gift of the Administration which I covet or desire. I feel myself to be an independent American, and as such I hope to continue.

Hoping that gentlemen will view this subject in all its bearings before they give their final vote upon the resolution; that they will examine its aspect and consequences, as well towards Great Britain, as in relation to our own country; that they will look well to our means either to meet or expel an enemy, if war should ensue, I shall close my remarks. Every man has a solemn duty to perform to his country and to his God, and to them alone is he responsible.

Having spread this subject before this honorable House in the best manner I was able, I have only to thank them for their attention, and to express my hope that they will consent to its indefinite postponement.

Mr. W. ALSTON said that if the subject of the present resolution had been discussed by all the gentlemen who had spoken on it as it had by the gentleman last up (Mr. TALLMADGE) he should not have risen to take any part in the debate; for that gentleman had declared that in the event of war growing out of the transaction, he would rally around the standard of his own Government. If all had spoken the same language, said Mr. A., I should have been satisfied to remain silent—but, to my mortification, how has the resolution been discussed? Precisely as if the British Minister were arraigned at the bar of the House for offensive language; and if that were the case, his conduct could not be defended with more ardor and zeal by his counsel, than it has been already by gentlemen on the floor. Every offensive word he has uttered has been smoothed down, softened, and attempted to be explained away, and every word the Secretary of State has written, tortured into an offence; they can find throughout Secretary Smith's whole correspondence, cause for offence to the British Minister, Mr. Jackson, but can find no expression in Mr. Jackson's calculated to give the least offence; in fact they can find an apology for every act of the British Minister or his Government, and find fault with and criminate every act of their own. Can gentlemen ask us to put by a resolution, the subject of discussion, which is treated in this way? What would result from our doing so? Would not, I ask, the language in Great Britain be, that the party in the United States favorable to British views and British principles had prevailed? How then, or with what face can we be asked at this stage of the discussion to postpone the consideration of the resolution, after such high ground has been taken in support, not in the defence of the liberties of their own country, but in defence of British insolence and British outrage? Sir, it is as well known in Great Britain as it is here that there are two great political parties here, not only of ins and outs merely, but contending for principle; and when any measure proposed is known to have been advocated by one party and opposed by the other, and is put by, what must be the opinion of that nation to whom it relates? Why, that the party which favors her views is triumphant in America; that Mr. Jackson may remain, and, notwithstanding offence has been taken at his language, that he must be heard. If I did not in my soul view it in this light, I should attach no importance to the resolution. If it had never been presented to my view, I certainly never should have presented it for consideration. If gentlemen are serious in their desire to postpone it, why did they not attempt it before they justified Jackson in his language, and the British Ministry in disavowing the arrangement? I should then have thought them justified in their conduct; and if the motion had been made, and gentlemen had confined their observations to the question of postponement, it might have prevailed.

A great deal has been said on the subject of approbatory resolutions, and it has been said that if we have a right to approve, we have also a right to disapprove. I will ask you, sir, if this principle has not been practised on ever since the commencement of the Government—if one side has not always taken the liberty of offering resolutions approving acts of the Executive, and if the other side has not opposed them? It amounts to this: when a party in power approves an act, they will say, well done, notwithstanding the disapprobation of those in opposition. One gentleman (Mr. POTTEN) has told us that a former President was entirely spoiled by these approbatory addresses and resolutions. I ask gentlemen to turn to the volumes of addresses presented to him, and see whether there be any analogy between those addresses and this resolution. But, sir, it was not the addresses which broke Mr. Adams down, but the party which surrounded him. That party is now out. Does the gentleman from Rhode Island believe that if the party now out were in, and were to pursue the same steps, that they would not be hurled from their seats? It was their alien and sedition laws; their system of persecution and taxation; their system of creating offices with large salaries, with no duties to perform; they carried taxes to the door of every man almost in the nation, and many times the salary of the officer was equal to the revenue to be collected in the district of country assigned to him; this was the system, and not their approbatory resolutions, which drove the party out of power. I appeal to that honorable gentleman, to say what was the aspect of affairs when that party went out of power and the present party came in—was not every description of property we possessed taxed; and was not the whole of the money collected annually expendent, and in addition a constant resort to loans? Was not the national debt every year increasing? And what has been effected since the present party came into power? Have they not abolished the whole system of internal taxation? Have they not put down a whole train of useless and unnecessary officers? And, notwithstanding, has not the public debt been extinguished in a ratio far beyond the expectation or anticipation of the most ardent admirer of republican principles? I believe the gentleman may speak of ins and outs as long as he has a voice, but never find a majority of the American people who will say, give us more of those ins.

The gentleman also says that England will never make peace with you; that she has reaped and is reaping the benefits of our embargo and non-intercourse acts, and as long as such acts exist she does not want peace. Another gentleman (Mr. EMOTT) says, Great Britain is desirous of making peace with us, and that now is the proper time to meet her. What must I infer from this, sir? That the gentleman must be willing to make peace on her terms, as prescribed in the printed instructions containing the three conditions. I cannot believe that the American people can ever be willing to make peace upon the terms which the gentleman himself proposes, for no other inference can be drawn from his argument. A great deal has been said with respect to the powers of Mr. Erskine; that the arrangement entered into between him and the Secretary of State was made without a full power on the part of Mr. Erskine. The gentleman from Connecticut has certainly made a very ingenious speech on the subject, and if his position be correct, his argument is unanswerable. But let us look at what was done, and see if it be that which the gentleman calls it. Was it a treaty? Or was it a convention? It was neither. The British Government had in force certain Orders of Council which were offensive to us. The American Government had a system to meet them. Mr. Erskine, the accredited Minister as well as the Minister Extraordinary of the British Government, makes proposition that if we would do away our restrictive system, he would pledge his Government to remove its Orders in Council. Suppose that this had been in direct violation of his instructions—what was your Government to say to him? Well might gentlemen have said we did not want to make peace with Great Britain, if the President had dared to refuse the offer. Let him but have refused it, and what a triumph gentlemen would have had! We always told you, they would have said to the people, that the Administration did not want peace with Great Britain. Here were terms proposed, and, notwithstanding they were made by an accredited Minister with full powers, the sole representative of his Government at our Capital, still they were refused. What in such a case would have been our situation, sir? Should we have stood upon as high ground, if we had refused to meet him, as we do even now that his act is disavowed? Certainly not. If gentlemen will give themselves the trouble to examine the correspondence before them, particularly a letter from Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State, they will find that Mr. Canning admits that two out of the three propositions could not properly find their way into an arrangement. Why does he disavow the arrangement at all if he admits that those conditions were not material? Was it because offensive words were made use of? Were the terms in which the arrangement respecting the Orders in Council was couched liable to the same objection as we have been told that part relating to the Chesapeake was? The terms of the latter were not so offensive as they have been construed. True, we had nothing to do with the King's honor, which is in his own keeping; but we had a right to our opinion, and certainly had a right to express our opinion with respect to what we thought he ought to have done. If he preferred not to punish the offender in the case of the Chesapeake, it was a proof that he thought we were wrong in asking it; and it was right to express our opinion as it was expressed.

I ask the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TALLMADGE) to examine again the correspondence respecting the arrangement of the affair of the attack upon the Chesapeake, and see whether it may not be considered rather as an acknowledgment on our part, that we have accepted of terms short of what we thought we had a right to expect, and that the mere expressions on our part that it belonged to the King's honor, or that it would more comport with his honor (I do not recollect the express words made use of, neither will I follow the example set me by others in reading documents) to punish the offending officer, was not really so offensive as the gentleman seems to imagine, and that his honor was not compromised by our making use of those expressions. It is therefore to my mind clear, that the disavowal of the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, was not on account of any one of the reasons assigned, either by the British Minister or by his friends in this debate; it was for some other cause, which neither he or they dare to mention. We are indebted to opposition in this country for the disavowal; we are indebted to the authors of such speeches as we have heard in this debate; we are indebted to members upon this floor, who can criminate the officers of their own Government for making use of words, which same words they cannot only justify when made use of by the British Minister, but eulogize his forbearance in not taking offence at them. Yes, sir, these, and circumstances like these, are we to look to for the disavowal.

It is painful to me, sir, to examine the way in which this subject has been handled. Through the whole relation of our difficulties with England, gentlemen have taken upon themselves to hunt up every act of their Government, which could give offence to Great Britain, but have not pointed out one single aggression which Great Britain has committed on us. Is this like Americans? Can they do nothing but heap eulogium on the British Government, and, when we come in collision with it, to justify it instead of their own? If I could see gentlemen taking up the correspondence and justifying one single act of their Government, I should feel much better satisfied with their conduct than I can when they examine every measure, and cannot for their souls find a single act of their own Government but what is wrong.

A gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) thinks very differently from his friend from Rhode Island. He thinks this a very favorable time indeed to negotiate with Great Britain; that she does not stand on that high ground that she did a few years ago. I would ask that gentleman, taking him up on his own ground, if this be not the very time of all others that we should not submit to the degrading conditions prescribed? Can gentlemen collect a single proposition made by Great Britain which would be accepted. Take the correspondence from beginning to end—and I ask whether Mr. Jackson does not confine himself to conditions which have been once spurned, and which Canning himself does not think material? If we had negotiated with Jackson for twelve months, I take it for granted we never should have got from him terms more palatable than those contained in the three conditions in the printed instructions to Mr. Erskine. I cannot find a single favorable sentence throughout his whole correspondence. For myself, I should have been as perfectly willing that the Government should have broken off with him on his first letter as on his last, for in that he said enough to justify our Government in refusing to have anything to say to him. What, sir! After his coming here subsequently to the disavowal of an act which none will say gave us more than we are fully entitled to, and having nothing to propose but the same three conditions, was there any necessity to negotiate under an expectation that anything favorable to this nation would be obtained from it? Surely not.

Some gentlemen, particularly a gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PITKIN,) have wanted us to wait till we saw how Great Britain would take this thing. I venture to say, sir, that if we lie on our oars and do nothing, and the speeches of some of the gentlemen go there, we shall not derive any good from it. She will conclude that we are a divided people, and that the party in America which is most disposed to be friendly to her usurpations has prevailed, and that whatever terms she proposes will be accepted. Under this view of the case, why should we wait to hear from her?

If the British Government had a right to disavow its act, we certainly had the same right to reject the conditions offered to us. She might have disavowed the act without sending a Minister here clothed with power expressly to insult us, and without alleging for it reasons which every man must believe were not true; for, after looking at what Canning has said, no man can believe that the arrangement was rejected because the instructions were not complied with. She is indebted to the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) and not to the sagacity of her Ministers, for another ground for the disavowal; she has not dared to put it on the ground of a want of full powers.

The gentleman from Connecticut last up (Mr. TALLMADGE) is adverse to this resolution, because he thinks it may tend to widen the breach between the two Governments. I think myself the breach is already as wide as it can be. If war grows out of this resolution, I hope the American nation is ready to meet it. If Great Britain thinks proper to declare war upon us, let her come. I am proud that the gentleman would then be with us, and wish all were like him in that respect. It is time certainly that we were done with half-way measures, as gentlemen call them. Let us take a stand, and if any nation takes offence at it and makes war upon us, I hope we shall defend ourselves. But I am not for waiting till we are further prepared before we do resent their conduct. I am not disposed to lay out a cent more in fortifications, armies, navies, or men, before we make at least this stand. I do not believe the enemy is going to come here. If they declare war upon us, let us then prepare for them. Thus we acted when our revolution was achieved. I think upon every view of the subject, that it is proper to adopt this resolution. It is certainly a very different thing from an address of approbation. Whenever a subject is presented to my view, for or against which I must vote, I will view it in all its parts, and consider the consequences which would result from passing or rejecting it. And if it should appear better to adopt it than reject it, I should, as in the present case, certainly vote for it, and of course against the indefinite postponement.

A motion was now made to adjourn, and negatived.

Mr. LIVERMORE said that, before the question was taken, he begged leave to offer a few observations in favor of the motion he had the honor of making for an indefinite postponement.

I will not, said Mr. L., go with gentlemen to Copenhagen to inquire the character of Mr. Jackson; neither is it of importance to me to be informed that Mr. King, lately our Minister at the Court of St. James, remonstrated against his appointment as Minister to our country; although, if this were a proper subject of inquiry, the high opinion I have of the correct conduct and intelligence of that gentleman would be sufficient evidence to me of his unsuitableness for the mission. But his character is not the subject of the resolution; it is entirely foreign to the question, and ought not to have been introduced. It is sufficient for me to know that Mr. Jackson was appointed by his Government Envoy and Minister Plenipotentiary to ours, and had been received by the President, and accepted as such, and that the communication with him had been broken off. It is not for me to say that the President has acted wrong in receiving an improper character, any more than I should be authorized to say he has been guilty of an unaccountable assumption of power in refusing any further communication with him. It would be presumption in me to say so, because the Constitution has delegated to the President the exclusive power to act in these particulars. For the due exercise of this power he is alone accountable to the people, and to them alone he is answerable for the whole of his official conduct. The proper inquiry, then, in relation to Mr. Jackson, is, whether he was a person sent to this country clothed with the privileges of a public Minister—that he had been accredited by the Administration in that capacity? A public Minister had for some time resided in the United States, entitled to all the privileges and immunities known to the laws of nations. He being recalled, Mr. Jackson had been appointed to succeed him, and had been duly accredited. These privileges and immunities, of course, devolved upon him. He was, therefore, entitled to them. Gentlemen thought proper to make many observations respecting the individual character of Mr. Jackson, but I shall not at this time follow their example. Unlike those gentlemen who have taken such a course, I will lay aside as irrelevant everything concerning the British Envoy antecedent to his mission to the United States, and will only consider his character as it appeared in the capacity of a public Minister. Perhaps gentlemen may think it unnecessary to make these preliminary observations, but, considering the course the discussion has taken, and not knowing how long it may continue, and the inferences which have been thrown out, I deem it of some importance to state the question thus: Mr. Jackson was the Minister of an independent nation—a nation with whom we are at peace—entitled to no other respect but such as all other nations are entitled to with whom we are at peace. To use the language of the Father of his Country, “we hold them all, in war, enemies; in peace, friends.” He is, therefore, entitled, by the laws of nations acknowledged by the whole civilized world, to protection, and his character is as much entitled to protection from outrage as his person. In the language of a very elegant writer upon the law of nations, “whosoever affronts or injures a public Minister commits a crime more deserving a severe punishment, as, thereby, the Sovereign and his country might be brought into great difficulties and trouble. The necessity and right of embassies being established, the perfect security, the inviolability of their Ambassadors and Ministers is a certain consequence of it; for, if their persons be not defended from violence of every kind, the right of embassies become precarious, and the success uncertain. Whoever offers any violence to an Ambassador, or any other public Minister, not only injures the Sovereign whom this Minister represents, but he also hurts the common safety and well-being of nations—he becomes guilty of an enormous crime towards the whole world.”

This same writer says: “When the commission of an Ambassador is at an end; when he has terminated the affairs which brought him; when he is recalled or dismissed, his functions cease, but his privileges and rights do not expire at the same time. He retains them till he re' turns to his principal, to whom he is to make a report of his embassy. His safety, his independence and inviolability, are not less necessary to the success of his embassy in his return than of his going.'

I could wish that, in this discussion, we should adhere to the principles laid down by this author. I regret that I have been under the necessity of adverting to this, for it is possible that individuals, by improper treatment of an Ambassador, may produce that state of things which can only terminate in war. If he should be insulted and calumniated, who is to revenge his insults but his Sovereign, who himself is insulted in the person of his representative? Will the Sovereign see his servant treated in this way, without feeling himself bound to defend him? I wish to touch lightly upon this subject, but it certainly is of importance, and deserving of consideration. However, as it is not the subject of investigation to which our attention is principally confined, I shall pass it over, in hopes no further observations will be necessary.

The question before the House at this time is a motion for an indefinite postponement of the resolution. I do not offer this motion from any motive or desire to procrastinate a decision upon this subject. If I had not conceived it to be of the utmost importance to our country that the controversy should be put to rest, I should not have made the motion. The gentleman last up, (Mr. ALSTON,) has intimated that if the motion had been made at an earlier stage of the business, he should have received it in a different light; intimating, I suppose, that he, and other gentlemen, might have been inclined to vote for it. This being the case, I only regret my not having made it earlier. I should have been very desirous that the question should have been discussed and decided upon, and the inexpediency of passing such resolutions with regard to their intrinsic merits determined. If a wider field has been taken in the discussion, sir, it is not my fault; and, if I conceive it unnecessary to answer the arguments of gentlemen, I hope I shall have the indulgence of the House, and in pursuing the course they have taken, I conceive I am entitled to equal privileges with them, even at this late hour, especially when the best interests of the people are jeopardized.

In the first place, let us inquire for what purpose has this resolution been introduced? Upon what grounds was it brought forward? I really apprehend, when this subject is fairly examined, there will not be found the least necessity for this resolution. The President, through his agent, has conceived himself to be insulted. The language of the British Minister, it seems, is not so decorous as he thinks it ought to be. It is said an insinuation has been made, detracting from the honor of the Executive, and consequently of the Government, and the Minister has been informed that no further communication can be received from him. To our Minister in London, representation has been made by our Executive of these facts, and a recall of the Minister is requested. At the same time, assurances are made of the friendly disposition of our Government towards Great Britain, and an earnest desire of cultivating harmony between the two Governments. Sir, the President had a Constitutional right to do as he has done, and we have not the authority to censure him; and even supposing the case to have been doubtful, the President had a right to exercise his own opinion, and if justified to himself, it only remains for the people to consider whether it was wisely, correctly, or honestly done. It is not for us to decide. The Constitution has not submitted this affair to us, and we, having no cognizance of it, neither should condemn nor applaud. He is alone to justify himself to the people, for his official conduct, who have elected him to this important office.

There is little reason for apprehension that this transaction, of itself, must necessarily result in war. It will delay the negotiation, which may prove very disastrous to the country. But war is not the necessary consequence of the dismissal, as it has been improperly called, for it is not a dismissal of the British Minister. But, although such an act cannot, of itself, be a just cause of war, yet the manner of doing it might produce that calamitous event; for every independent Government possesses the right to request the recall of a Minister who should not prove agreeable to it, without affording a cause of complaint, or giving umbrage to the Government from whence he is sent. For instance, if the demand or recall should be accompanied with a menace or any indignity offered to the Government, war must be the inevitable consequence. Do gentlemen think that Great Britain is so depressed as to submit to a menace? Most certainly they do not. Is it not to be apprehended that war, in that case, would as naturally follow as the thunder does the lightning? And I view the resolution too much in the light of a message—and this is one cause, among others, why I wish a postponement. Suppose the President had signified that if his demand was not complied with, war would be declared, or letters of marque and reprisal would be issued—let gentlemen consider what would have been the consequence, and what would be the present situation. Congress have the power vested in them of making war and of issuing letters of marque and reprisal, and possess all sovereign power; the President possesses but Executive authority.

These resolutions are to be an act of Congress, passed by all the branches. In what light they will be received by the British Government I cannot divine, but certainly not very favorably.

These resolutions ought to be postponed indefinitely on another account. And here, too, the cause assigned for the introduction of them altogether fails. It might be going too far to say they were introduced from a lack of wisdom, but certainly, to say the least of them, they were very indiscreetly brought forward. Instead of their being, as they are represented to be, intended to produce union among the different parties, they will have quite a contrary effect. Any man will see at first glance that they were particularly calculated to light the torch of political discord among the people. They were a perfect Pandora's box.

If, as gentlemen seem to declare, the resolutions were to be considered as the test of hostility or friendship to the Government—if opposition to them was to be the criterion of opposition to the Administration—in that ungrateful aspect, they were better calculated to divide than unite the House and the people into one party. They were exactly such a measure as was calculated to create division and dissension throughout this country, without producing one beneficial effect. But, say gentlemen, it is necessary to impress upon foreign nations a belief that we are not a divided people, and that Congress will stand by the President, and that the people will support their Government should any hostile steps be taken with regard to the United States. Why would they excite a doubt of our disposition to support the President against any foreign Power that should choose to attack us? And why would the House be willing to tell them that it believed there were some people to be found, who, in such an event, would not stand by the Government? This would be the effect of these resolutions; at least, they would be so interpreted by foreign nations. I hope no man would be willing to afford evidence of the fact. There could be no necessity for asking the question, "Will you stand by your Government if the country should be attacked?" No doubt ought to be entertained upon the subject. Patriotism ought to be presumed, not rendered doubtful by impertinent inquiries. In this point of view this resolution was unnecessary; was worse than useless. All such abstract-like questions have a natural tendency to show division and weakness in a country or a nation, and discover very little wisdom or policy in the authors.

There is another reason, still stronger, which my duty requires me to take into view in opposing the adoption of the resolution, and I regret that I am compelled to enter into the consideration of it. The propriety of adopting the motion will appear very evident from the examination. It seems to have been the intention of the drawer of the resolutions to induce a belief that the material facts which should support them were to be taken for granted; that they were things so plain and self-evident as not to admit of denial or merit investigation. The resolution asserts that "the expressions contained in the official letter of Francis J. Jackson, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty near the United States, dated on the 23d day of October, 1809, and addressed to Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, conveying the idea that the Executive Government of the United States had acknowledged that the arrangement lately made by Mr. Erskine, his predecessor, in behalf of his Government to the United States, was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine, were highly indecorous and insolent; that the repetition of the same opinion in his official letter, dated the 4th of November, 1809, was still more affronting, &c., in consequence of these outrages and premeditated insults, the Executive Government has," &c.

Thus absolutely taking it for granted that there was such an offensive idea conveyed in the letter of the 23d, and that the insinuation had been repeated in his official letter of the 4th of November. But, before the resolution supported the fact, it ought to appear manifest from the letters that there had been this insinuation and a repetition of insinuations. And was there no room for doubt and difference of opinion? For my own part, I have read over and over again, and have carefully attended to the reading of the correspondence, and the comments of gentlemen, and with all the attention I am capable of giving the subject, I have not been able to find the offensive idea alluded to in the resolution was ever conveyed, and therefore certainly not repeated in either of Mr. Jackson's letters to Mr. Smith. Now that I am called upon to give my assent to such a resolution, and perhaps ultimately to vote upon its merits, and with a full view of all the consequences, I cannot consent to let the occasion pass without stating my objections to the resolution on this account; I cannot agree or concede that to be fact which I do not believe to be such. No man can say he is at liberty to assert that for truth which he knows or believes to be false, let the consequences be what they may. All other obligations are inferior to those of justice and eternal truth, and whoever means to be considered as a just man must adhere to this maxim. But gentlemen have said, will you not stand by your own Government? Will you show to foreign Powers that you are disunited? Will you convince Great Britain that you are an undivided people? These are no arguments to prevail with me solemnly to record an untruth; and if these consequences follow, the fault is not mine in producing them, but the greater is the reason for postponement.

I will now consider the offensive parts of the letters which have been so much commented upon, but I will not tire the House with reading what has been so often read. I will state my own analysis of what I conceive to have been the writer's meaning when stripped of all diplomatic verbiage. One gentleman asserts that the insult is to be found in the third letter, while other honorable gentlemen assert that the first letter, viz: of October 11, was sufficiently insulting to have justified the President in putting an end to all communication with the British Minister. I will attend now to the first letter, or what is said to be the offensive part, and if gentlemen will take the trouble of comparing the letter with my analysis they will find my statement correct. This letter is not mentioned in the resolution. This is the true meaning and signification of the letter: "You have made no complaint of the act of disavowal, and I have seen with pleasure your forbearance and candor, which I doubt not will continue, as you must think it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done by a Minister contra to his instructions or the authority given him."

To me it is impossible to give any other construction to this sentence to comport with truth than what I have given; and it has been well observed, that it is a rule of municipal law, as well as of reason and common sense, that words spoken or written are to be taken in the milder sense. If, in the common occurrences of life, it is considered a mark of weakness for a man to suppose himself insulted when under no necessity of thinking so, how much stronger does it apply to more solemn instructions? Mr. Jackson proceeds:

"It was not known when I left England whether Mr. Erskine had shown you the whole of his instructions; it appears he had not, but he states he showed you the three conditions which, according to information received from this country, were thought would be acceptable. Mr. Erskine reports your observations, and the reason which induced you to suppose others might be substituted: and the conclusion might have been that those substituted in the arrangement were an equivalent, (you both might think them an equivalent;) and the act of substitution shows the original conditions (that is, the three conditions) were made known to you, and of course to the President. But the difference between the original (the three conditions) and those agreed upon is obvious; therefore, His Majesty had the right to disown the act, being done by his Minister contrary to the authority given him. You have supposed that Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions, and upon one not shown rested his justification. I declare to you that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, which was read by Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney, in London, and is the basis of the correspondence with Mr. Erskine, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed for the arrangement to be made."

Mr. Jackson's argument is no more than this: that the conclusion between Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine was, that both thought the conditions substituted (adopted) were equivalent to the original; but by comparing them the difference would be apparent; therefore, His Majesty had a right to disavow the arrangement made.

Mr. Smith, in his letter of the 19th of October, says: "Certain it is your predecessor did not present for my consideration the three conditions," &c. "and the more reasonable terms comprised in the arrangement were adopted." And where is the essential difference between "substituted" and "adopted?" And Mr. Jackson, so far from saying or conveying the idea, or insinuating, as the resolution supposes, that Mr. Smith knew that these instructions, or despatch, or conditions, were the only instructions, despatch, or conditions, says directly the contrary. For he says: "You have supposed Mr. Erskine had two sets of instructions, and upon one not shown rested his justification; but I declare to you that the one shown, was the only." &c. One gentleman has said that the act of the British Minister was not disavowed on account of his want of power, but in consequence of his having violated his instructions, which gave him authority. I have always supposed that power and authority were synonymous in relation to such affairs. But the language of the British Minister here is too plain to be misunderstood, and it is attempting to put a forced construction upon his language, contrary to reason and common sense, to make him say, "you know this was the only one," when he expressly says, "you supposed there were two, but I tell you there was but one." It is true, and I can well imagine it, that my powers of discernment may not be so quick or so accurate as those of other gentlemen, and that may be the reason why I have not been able to discover what other gentlemen so distinctly perceive. One honorable gentleman has said, "there are none so blind as those who will not see." This is rather severe. I will merely answer the gentleman in a couplet from a poet of approved authority, and such I think the gentleman will not deny:

"That optics nice it takes, I woen,
To see what is not to be seen."

I confess I labor under this difficulty.

I will now give the meaning of the offensive part of the celebrated letter of the 23d of October. After assuring Mr. Smith that Mr. Erskine had no graduated instructions, he says: "You are already acquainted with the instructions given, and I have also informed you it was the only one by which the conditions were prescribed. And he (Mr. Erskine) states that the terms accepted by him, which are different from those conditions, were substituted by you in lieu of those proposed by him." Or, in other words: "You are acquainted with the instructions which were given, and I have informed you they were the only instructions. (not that you know the fact from any other source,) and Mr. Erskine states, that in lieu of those proposed by him, you substituted those actually received, which are different from those proposed by him."

There can be no rational construction given to this letter other than this; because, to make Mr. Jackson insinuate that Mr. Smith knew the conditions or instructions were the only ones, when he says, "I have had the honor of informing you that it was the only one upon which the conditions upon which he was to conclude were prescribed," (and these are the exact words,) is to make him insinuate that which is contrary to his expressed words. And his observations upon Mr. Smith's supposition, that there were graduated conditions, go upon the same ground: that he (Mr. Jackson) informed him, Mr. Erskine had no graduated instructions; not that Mr. Smith knew the fact previous to the information he himself had given him. And it appears that the conditions are different from the arrangement made. Surely there could be no indecorum in insisting on this fact, and that in his apprehension it was sufficient justification for His Majesty to disavow the authority of his Minister to make such an arrangement. It is also to be considered that Mr. Jackson had been thrown into this correspondence much against his inclination. He expressed his dissatisfaction at having been deprived of the advantage of a verbal communication, in which any misunderstanding might have been explained with mutual candor. But of all these opportunities he had been deprived, and of necessity driven into a correspondence which has proved so un-conciliatory.

Mr. Jackson is also charged in the resolution with repeating his insulting insinuations in his letter of the 4th of November. Let us now see whether this famous resolution from the Senate is true in this particular. The offensive expressions are said to be contained in page 70 of the printed documents. I will give the meaning, as I have before shown in respect to the other letters. "When there is no freedom of communication between Ministers there can be little useful intercourse. One at least of your epithets (irrelevant and improper were the epithets) abridge this freedom. You may show by argument irrelevancy; but my Sovereign alone must judge of the propriety or impropriety of my allusions, provided I do not deviate from the respect due to your Government."

Mr. Smith had used these epithets, and how is it possible any other reply could have been given? Could it be done in private correspondence? Certainly it could not. Prove (if you please) irrelevancy by argument, but to charge me with impropriety is for my Sovereign alone, provided I show no disrespect to your Government. And how can gentlemen say that this is not correct? He admits that he is not to be disrespectful to our Government, and certainly thereby implies his intention not to be so; but in other respects asserts his independence. And can gentlemen of candor say, after the charge made against him by Mr. Smith, there was any impropriety in saying it? or, of repelling a charge made against him not in its nature the most pleasant?

Mr. Jackson proceeds: "I have avoided drawing conclusions which do not follow the premises advanced by me." Now, what were the premises advanced by him, and what were the conclusions? These were the premises: "You are sensible the conditions shown to you are different from the arrangement made, and I have assured you that these were the only conditions upon which Mr. Erskine was authorized to make an arrangement." The conclusion was this: that the American Government having a knowledge of these facts, would not be surprised that His Majesty had disavowed the arrangement. And, says Mr. Jackson, "far be it from me (this is his meaning) to utter an insinuation not supported by fact; but facts such as I know I must adhere to whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is called in question." Much has been said upon this part of the correspondence, and gentlemen have imagined they have perceived a reiteration of a previous insult; but except there had been a previous insult, there could be no reiteration of such, and except gentlemen are determined to find an insult in the correspondence, none such could appear.

Much stress has been laid upon these words, "least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was unable to substantiate a fact." This expression was merely in answer to a charge of Mr. Smith against him which he thought unmerited, for he does not appear to have made any insinuation, and meant to confine himself to a proper respect for our Government, as the language of this letter purports. And in this way has Mr. Jackson explained himself to our Government through Mr. Oakley. These are his words: "In stating these facts, and in adhering to them, as his duty imperiously enjoined him to do, Mr. Jackson could not imagine that offence would be taken at it by the American Government, as most certainly none could be intended on his part." The facts he mentions as being stated (which I have fully descanted upon) were, first, "that the three conditions forming the substance of Mr. Erskine's original instruction, were submitted to him (Mr. Smith) by that gentleman. The other, viz: that that instruction is the only one in which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine &c., is known to Mr. Jackson by the instructions which he has himself received. Mr. Jackson had no idea, as he could have none, of making any insinuation or stating any other fact; and, as he had no intention of giving offence, was undoubtedly astonished that offence was taken. And why this explanation was not received is not for me to say. It looks a little too much as if it was necessary to find an insult at all events.

I have thus endeavored to inquire into the truth of the propositions contained in the resolution, and to show the reasons why I wish an indefinite postponement. Other considerations of great importance have been brought into view before the House by those who support the resolution, and much learning has been displayed in this discussion. I do not say, however, that much good is likely to result from discussing the resolution in this way. The arrangement which had taken place in consequence of the act of March last, the subsequent disavowal of the authority to make the arrangement, the attack on the frigate Chesapeake, and a variety of other grievances, had all been descanted and enlarged upon. In relation to these subjects I will offer a few observations, and first of all will state as briefly as possible, in the way of narration, the circumstances which led to the arrangement in question.

At the close of last winter, it was found that commerce was totally annihilated by the pressure of the celebrated embargo laws—acts which were at that time found totally insufficient for the purpose for which they were intended. It was discovered by the majority to be, what they had been told long before, entirely useless as a measure of coercion against foreign nations and ruinous to our citizens. At length they determined to change this for some other measure of coercion; a substitute was wanted. Show us a substitute, was the cry; and the non-intercourse was resolved upon. And the minority, although they anxiously strive to get rid of the coercive measure altogether, could not effect it, but were willing to lend their aid and afford all the assistance in their power to free the people from as much of the system as possible. It was then determined to repeal the embargo and pass the non-intercourse act, which was accordingly done. This was the thing that would bring Great Britain to our feet; it would starve the nation; it was to deprive them of getting their necessary supplies of materials for their manufactures, and would deprive manufacturers of the means of subsistence, or the means of gaining a livelihood, and would excite insurrection and rebellion among the people, and compel the Government to submit. But we are now told that this same non-intercourse act is no better than a dead letter. It is known to have no coercive effect whatever; the authority of Government is wholly insufficient to enforce it; whether the plan was a wise one or not, must appear by the sequel. It is now known and acknowledged to be in effect what it was foretold it would be by those who opposed its passage. They then declared it would not operate against Great Britain so as to compel her to do anything she did not choose to do, neither would it operate with severity against any nation except our own people; that these restrictions upon commerce would be injurious to ourselves alone. It will be recollected how long this act was to be continued in force; that it was to expire at the end of the next session of Congress, which was the last Spring session; and in case France or Great Britain should resolve to modify their edicts, so that they should cease to violate the commerce of the United States, the President was authorized to declare it by proclamation, after which the trade suspended by that act and the embargo acts was to be renewed with the nation so doing. By this act, if a certain occurrence should take place, the President was to issue his proclamation declaratory of the fact, after which the trade was to be resumed. This was the law.

I could wish, Mr. Speaker, as the hour is late, the House would consent to adjourn; but, otherwise, I request I may have a patient hearing. The business we are discussing is of importance, and the objection to the motion for a postponement may be easily answered. At all events, I have a right to offer my sentiments freely upon this occasion; and it is nothing more than reasonable that I should have an opportunity by daylight for the purpose. But, however, I will proceed.

The trade was to be renewed upon a certain event. Did that event happen? The fact is denied by those who support this resolution, and it is said that the President illegally issued his proclamation of the 19th of April last, because the event had not happened at that time, and that the non-intercourse is supposed to be still in force as against Great Britain. Let us consider the point. The act enacts that when Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, that they shall cease to violate our neutral commerce, that then the President shall issue his proclamation. Here, of necessity, a discretionary power, or at least a power of judging without appeal, was vested in the President. What was meant by the word edict? The word is not technical, either in this country, in England, or in France. The President must therefore decide, and he did decide, that as far as it related to Great Britain, it was the Orders in Council of November, 1807, and of January following; and there can be no doubt that the idea was correct; and the Berlin, Milan, and Bayonne decrees, were the edicts of France intended by the curious act. But were they revoked or modified? Here the same power of judging was given, and the President, by his proclamation, declared, that on the 10th day of June next ensuing, the Orders in Council would have been withdrawn. The President here put a pretty liberal construction upon the act, but I will not say an improper construction, for the law of necessity made him the sole judge. But having exercised his judgment, and issued his proclamation, his power ceased, or was completed, and the law operated to renew trade. At the time of issuing his proclamation, the Orders in Council had been withdrawn, and a blockade of France and Holland had been substituted; but this was not known, and could not have been the cause of the proclamation. But the true cause and foundation was this: The British Minister, Mr. Erskine, had stated to our Government, that in consequence of the equality produced by the non-intercourse act between the two belligerents, he was empowered to offer satisfaction and reparation for the affair of the Chesapeake, and also informed the Government that His Majesty was willing to withdraw his Orders in Council, in the persuasion that the President would issue a proclamation for the renewal of intercourse with Great Britain. The terms were accepted, and Mr. Erskine, by letter, assures the President that he was authorized to declare that His Majesty's Orders in Council of November and January will have been withdrawn on the 10th day of June; and, in consequence of this assurance, the President promised to issue the proclamation, so that the trade should be renewed, and the proclamation was accordingly issued. This was a stipulation or agreement entered into by the American Government with the British Minister. It was an arrangement of something to be done by one, for something which, in consequence of the agreement, was to be done by the other. It was a quid pro quo; and the agreement, in fact, was this, that the President stipulated that he would issue his proclamation, which would renew the intercourse, in consideration of the other stipulating, in behalf of his Government, that the Orders in Council should, on the 10th day of June, have been withdrawn. If this were not the case, and it were not a mutual agreement for a mutual purpose, it would seem that either party might withdraw from the agreement or arrangement at pleasure. The arguments attempted to be enforced in the discussion, that although full powers were necessary for the affirmation of a treaty, they were not necessary for making this arrangement, would all vanish if gentlemen considered the subject. This arrangement might be called a pact, compact, or agreement, and being a public engagement, the same rules are applicable as applied to treaties, and no rule can be more certain than this—that an agreement is not binding upon the principal when the proxy has not authority to make it; and a Minister could no more enter into an arangement of this matter, without authority, that would bind the principal or sovereign, than he could make a treaty without authority. There can be no distinction between the cases, either in the laws of nations or nature. And it is not now contended by our Government, that Mr. Erskine had authority, but if they do contend that he had such power, the burden necessarily rests upon them to prove it. But he assured the Government that he was authorized, and they took his word for it. There are different ways whereby an agent could derive power from his principal; by a full power, as it is called, which is a general power. But, in this case, treaties or stipulations entered into are not binding until a subsequent ratification of the principal; but agreements may be made to take effect immediately, provided authority is given for the purpose, and this may be done by special power, or by instructions, or orders, for that purpose; and the usual way is by particular instructions, as to any specific object, in this manner—that is, by instructions—the power or authority of the principal is as much delegated as by a particular power. But, in all cases, the power must be strictly pursued, and the law of nations is in conformity with reason and common sense—that the Minister must not deviate from his instructions or authority.

Books of authority have been introduced to prove that a Minister is under no obligation to show his instructions, as was the case of Queen Elizabeth's Ambassador, sent to Scotland with orders to have the Duke of Lennox removed from about the person of the young King, James. There can be no doubt of the propriety of this principle, but then a Government is under no obligation to enter into any agreement with the Minister in behalf of his Government, without he produces his authority, whether by powers, or instructions, or letters; and the Government cannot, with safety, treat with him until he produces his authority; and, certainly, the Government is under no obligation to take his word for it, or trust do it at their peril. The gentleman who first spoke (Mr. ALSTON) has urged, as an objection to the demand of the Minister's instructions, that it might be the means of breaking off an important negotiation. The gentleman added, that if the President had refused to treat with Mr. Erskine on this ground, (that is, not producing authority,) there would have been a great clamor and outcry against him by the opposers of the resolution, and those who accorded with them in sentiment. This was sporting with the feelings of those who did not happen to think with the majority, and the remark has been made about the obstinately blind, who would not see; but a man must be blind, indeed, not to perceive the fallacy of this argument. A man must be stupid, indeed, worse than blind, to blame the President for not entering into an arrangement of his nature with a British Minister who would not produce his authority.

But the books produced most certainly show that the law of nations is upon the subject, and has been considered and decided upon by our own Government. I will here make an observation, which I wish gentlemen seriously to consider. When gentlemen who support the resolution go further than the minority, and say that our Cabinet did not understand this subject, in what light would they wish to hold them up to view? That they do not understand the difference between full powers, or particular instructions, and mere letters of credence? For my own part, I should feel more of the esprit du corps than acknowledge that our Cabinet were below any statesmen in diplomatic knowledge, or had less of diplomatic skill than Talleyrand himself, or any of the Cabinet of the Great Nation.

The authority of a public Minister is like that of all other agents, derivative; consequently he can possess no more power than is given to him. A letter of credence is an instrument that establishes the grade and character of the Minister, and entitles him to all the privileges and inviolability of a Minister of that grade. He can be received only in the quality given him by his credentials. But it requires a full power even to negotiate and form a treaty which is afterwards to be ratified by the Sovereign, and, much more so, every particular authority, to bind the Sovereign without his subsequent ratification. It requires but the application of a man's reason, and a little common sense, perfectly to comprehend this; and a gentleman would find difficulty in completely justifying Government upon such a principle, viz: in treating with a Minister not having authority. Indeed, it seems heretofore to have been considered the duty of the Government previously to know whether the agent possessed the authority of his principal, and this seems fully proved by the cases which have been cited and read. But I think that gentlemen will not insist upon a contrary doctrine.

But let us pursue the course of events. The President, on the 23d of May last, sent his Message to Congress informing them that the British Government had transmitted to their Legation here provisional instructions not only to offer satisfaction for the attack on the Chesapeake, but to make known His Britannic Majesty's determination to send an Envoy, with powers to conclude a treaty; I wish to emphasize these words, "with power to conclude a treaty;" in the meantime to signify his willingness to withdraw his Orders in Council, in the persuasion that the intercourse would be renewed, &c.

It seems that the President did not entertain an idea that the letter of credence did not give this authority. From the documents at that time submitted to Congress by the President, the manner of the negotiation appears, and the result was the arrangement so much spoken of. And the amount of it as respects the powers of Mr. Erskine appears to be this; that Mr. Erskine (mistaking his authority) assured our Government that he was authorized by His Majesty to make the arrangement, and the President accepted his assurances in lieu of the exhibition of his instructions, except the three conditions, which were deemed inadmissible, and those comprised in the arrangement were adopted. It is not our present purpose to inquire whether this proceeding was or was not correct. It will ever be a subject upon which people will fully descant. We cannot suppose the President would enter into a negotiation of so singular a nature without believing Mr. Erskine to have been authorized. He intended to do all the good he could for his country; he therefore entered into the agreement, knowing that it would relieve the people from the burdens occasioned by the non-intercourse, and believing it would be acceptable to Great Britain. The expectation of the President must have been that the arrangement would have been adhered to, and this I am constrained to approve from weighty considerations, though not such as have been advocated by the gentleman from Mississippi Territory, in discharging the detached militia and laying up the gunboats. The first of these objects was burdensome to the people, without the prospect of public benefit; the other, a bill subject to ridicule, and nothing better. But the President must have believed that the arrangement would have been adhered to, otherwise he could not have entered into it to send forth our whole commerce into the claws of certain destruction, for he must have known they would have fallen a prey to the British cruisers in going to Holland if the Orders in Council were not revoked, and the consequence of such a loss of property to our citizens is impossible for me to describe. But such captures of our vessels and merchandise did not take place, notwithstanding the disavowal, and this affords some proof at least that the disposition of Great Britain was not so hostile to this country as has been so much insisted upon. It is a fact worthy of consideration; and when so much has been said of the hostility of Great Britain towards this country, a view ought to be taken of the whole case. The arrangement concluded was indeed disavowed, but orders were issued to prevent any injury arising to our citizens in consequence of the disavowal, and not a single capture, as I learn, has been made, except one or two vessels lately carried into Halifax and condemned on a misconstruction of the orders of repeal and for blockading the ports of France and Holland. But I doubt not the property will be restored.

I must again express my deep regret at the great impatience of gentlemen, inasmuch as the House will not consent to an adjournment. Indeed, I have no desire to speak out the old year and speak in the new, but I am extremely anxious for an opportunity of freely delivering my sentiments without interruption upon so important a question, and of addressing my arguments to gentlemen capable and willing to give me a patient hearing.

I have been attempting to show the reasons which induced me to believe that the President of the United States, when he entered into the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, did not apprehend it would have been disavowed by the British Government, and (as I have before mentioned) for reasons very different from those assigned by the gentleman from the Mississippi Territory. But I agree with that gentleman that if the President knowingly exposed our whole commerce to the certain capture of our property, it would almost have occasioned a civil war, or, at least, a war with the nation so capturing our property. And here I would ask that gentleman to consider, if Great Britain had been desirous of a war with this country, whether an occasion could have presented itself more favorable to their wish? Could they ever have a better chance of a full sweep at our commerce, this too, at a moment when they could with so much plausibility have shifted the odium of the transaction from their own Government to that of the United States? And might they not, with some appearance of truth, have said to our citizens, if you have lost your property from not understanding your true situation, you must lay the blame upon your own Government, which, in the face of the positive instructions of our Minister, has concluded an arrangement which has thus subjected the whole of your property to capture? I put the question thus hypothetically for the consideration of gentlemen.

The question would here return, if the instructions of Mr. Erskine did not authorize him to make the arrangement, could his Government be bound to avow it? I am willing to say that it was impolitic in Great Britain to disavow this act of her Minister, but I do not agree to the truth of the charge alleged against her of perfidy in that transaction. This has been my opinion from the beginning, in relation to this part of the subject: that although I believed the Minister of Great Britain was not authorized to make the arrangement, and consequently that the Government was not bound by direct moral obligation to carry it into effect, yet I must still maintain it would have been good policy for her to have ratified the agreement; and no one has felt more disappointed and vexed at her not doing so. It could not be either just or proper to charge a nation or Government with perfidy in not having avowed an act which they had not authorized to be done; and I cannot bring myself to believe that the reiterated charge of deception and bad faith is well founded. Therefore, although I may condemn the policy, I cannot denounce the principle. But, sir, although I wish, with as much sincerity as any man, that this celebrated arrangement had been acquiesced in by Great Britain, and must condemn her policy for not doing so, it by no means follows that I must consent to adopt the resolution before the House. This perhaps closes the door to all further negotiation. What is the vast importance of the act to be done, that we must stretch our consciences and the sacred truth? That we must assert our belief in certain positions which we cannot believe, for the purpose of providing against something which might possibly take place? To this I cannot consent. I am jealous of the resolution on many accounts. I fear it may produce war. I believe it was intended to bring about that event. I would not accuse any gentleman with intentions they did not profess, but such is my information that I do not believe it will be contradicted. If war is wished for and intended, I believe it may be produced by such resolutions. I view these in the nature of a menace. It contains a pledge to stand by the Government in any consequence which may ensue from the dismissal of the British Minister. Why is it necessary for Congress to pledge itself to stand by the Executive in their refusal to receive any further communications from Mr Jackson? Surely, gentlemen did not mean that the walls of the palace were insufficient to resist the attack of a single individual? It could not be supposed necessary to call out the whole force of the nation to surround the President's house to keep out an insolent foreign Minister. No, sir, it must be understood as it is; a menace to his Government if they should take upon themselves the liberty of countenancing the conduct of their Minister. What effect would a thing of this nature produce coming from the Sovereign of one country to that of another? Certainly not the most conciliatory. The British Government understands our Constitution as well as we do ourselves, and that the President is not the sovereign of this country, although he is supreme executive magistrate, but that the sovereign power is vested in Congress. The President is empowered in certain cases to execute the laws, to appoint public Ministers, to receive and accredit Ambassadors, and to make treaties, with the advice and consent of the Senate. Yet the power of making war and peace, the intrinsic principles of sovereignty, being solely vested in Congress, they were now, as the sovereign of the country, about to issue something so exceedingly like a menace, there would be much difficulty in making the discrimination.

JANUARY, 1810.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

This resolution, if passed, must be sent to the President for his approbation or rejection. It would rather be a laughable situation in which he would be placed of being under the necessity of either condemning or praising his own conduct. This at first view appears rather ridiculous, but upon a more minute consideration it would have a more serious aspect. If the President should approve the resolution, and give it his official sanction, it would be a kind of Constitutional declaration of war. The sovereign power of the country would, in effect, say to the British Government: You must submit and consent to recall Mr. Jackson, as the Executive has demanded, or we pledge ourselves to call out the whole power of the nation against you. I ask gentlemen candidly to consider whether there is not some danger, some probability that Great Britain will view it in this light? And I would further ask, does this resolution agree with the spirit of the President's Message to Congress, or with his instructions to our Minister to request the recall of Mr. Jackson. Has he not asserted his willingness to receive communications from the Government of that country through any other functionary, professing at the same time the greatest solicitude for a friendly understanding with the Government? If, then, this idle resolution should throw fresh difficulties (already too numerous) in the way of negotiation, and a good understanding with that Power, why shall it be persisted in? Why will you proceed to make that worse which is already bad enough?

But many gentlemen who have expressed their disapprobation of the introduction of this resolution, say, as it has been introduced, except we pass it, we shall manifest to foreign nations that we are a divided people. This, sir, is a false conclusion. If the resolution should not be acted on, it would be the same as if it had not been introduced. And here results the benefit of indefinite postponement.

The only course of reasoning upon this subject must lead us to these inquiries; Does the thing comport with truth? for, if it be wrong, and useless in itself, no motives ought to induce us to pass it; no extraneous considerations of this kind ought to find their way into the discussion. Our good sense would direct the proper inquiries to the merits of the resolution itself, and as the truth was found, so ought the discussion to be, without regard to any other motives. Is it so necessary to hold up to foreign nations that we are not a divided people? If this is so important a consideration, the sooner we lay aside the discussing or agitating of this resolution the nigher we must be to effectuating the object.

I do sincerely wish to obtain an indefinite postponement of this ill-devised resolution; and for that purpose I have been so anxious for an adjournment, that I might have an opportunity of fully delivering my sentiments at a time when gentlemen would be candidly disposed to a partial hearing, and I should not be troubled with such frequent interruptions. I entreat gentlemen to consider that this has not been a contest to gain time, and it must be quite immaterial to gentlemen whether the resolution should be passed to-day or to-morrow, or a month hence; but that it should be perfectly understood, with all its bearings and consequences, is all-important for the good of the people.

Many arguments in addition to those offered might be urged for the postponement; but at least I hope gentlemen will give me a patient hearing while I briefly review those already advanced.

I have endeavored to show its tendency to produce war, and that I believe this was originally the intention of those who produced it. Indeed, I have heard this assertion directly made without contradiction. I have also endeavored to show that the resolution was not calculated to produce union among the people, but would have a direct contrary tendency; and that it was an unconstitutional interference with the Executive power by the Legislature, which the people intended should be kept distinct. It goes to establish a principle or precedent, that the two branches of the Legislature may give an extrajudicial opinion upon a case which may afterwards be brought before them in a Constitutional way; for a case may happen in which the Executive might be impeached, for a transaction of this nature; and although the trial is not to be had before the House, yet we are to give a sanction to the unconstitutional principle that the court before whom the trial is to be may prejudge the cause. But in my opinion it is equally improper in us to pledge ourselves in this way. We are the grand inquest of the nation as to subjects of this nature, and by the Constitution it is our duty to inquire into the offence and prosecute before sentence. To me, therefore, there is the utmost impropriety in the course we are now pursuing. I do not undertake to say that in the present case there is any corrupting conduct, which alone is the foundation of impeachment; but I contend for the principle, which is a most important one, and a violation of it leads to the destruction of the Constitution, and consequently of civil liberty, and no man can see the extent of such approbatory resolutions.

I ask gentlemen to consider whether the Executive has not taken pretty extensive latitude in construing the non-intercourse laws? Let us suppose this case to be (which we do not in fact believe it to be, but still it is possible,) that the arrangement had been made with a corrupt intention of giving irrevocable and irreparable advantage to a foreign nation; and suppose our citizens had sustained great losses in consequence and the public character injured—and although this does not appear and no one has any belief in the fact, still it is possible it may exist, and therefore it is possible that the interposition of Congress may be necessary hereafter; and we are about prejudging the case, and, as it were, giving an extra-judicial opinion.

I have also endeavored to show that there was no truth or foundation in what has been alleged for fact for the support of the resolution, and this is my firm belief. It must be a very extraordinary case to induce the adoption of a resolution when the premises are not supported by fact.

As to the powers of Mr. Erskine, or the question upon this head, I will not repeat what I have already said, but I will ask gentlemen attentively to consider whether they were supporting the dignity of their own Government in the course they were pursuing? This subject will be canvassed by the whole Diplomatic Corps throughout the civilized world. In every country where there is printed a gazette or newspaper of any kind, this affair will be discussed. Is it the wish of the friends of the Executive to hold up to the view of foreign nations the incompetency of their own Cabinet or ignorance of the laws pertaining to diplomacy? Was it not infinitely more for the honor of the Cabinet to allow that they supposed Mr. Erskine had competent authority and took his word for it, than that they did not understand what was requisite, to give a Minister authority to conclude an agreement of this nature; and that it was not an arrangement they entered into with the Minister knowing him to be without authority, but that the Minister, misconceiving his instructions, had misled them; and that the object of the President was to get rid of the non-intercourse which imposed such heavy restrictions upon our own commerce and injured no one but our own people, and that these considerations caused him to overlook what ought to have been attended to? This appears to me the most favorable point of view in which the whole subject can be placed.

No one can more deeply regret than I did the unfortunate situation of Mr. Erskine; and if it were necessary I would go as far as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ERBBS) had done the other day in his exculpation. I never knew a more anxious man or one more desirous of preserving the peace between our respective countries, or who appeared more sincerely to have the honor of his king and country at heart; and it is evident to me that his mistake proceeded from his great zeal and anxiety, and that his error was certainly not that of the heart. At the same time I cannot say that Great Britain has acted perfidiously—very far from it. The nation that makes a treaty and wholly disregards it, is justly entitled to opprobrium.

It is a circumstance much to be lamented that certain offensive expressions should have found their way into the correspondence of Mr. Erskine, as coming from our Government. At the time when I first read the letters, the thing struck me disagreeably, but I hoped and expected it would have been overlooked. And I think I can see something of the same nature pervading the whole correspondence with Mr. Jackson—something not of the most conciliatory kind. Should the first letter of Mr. Smith have been presented to me at the time, I think I should have pronounced that the negotiation would have ended in an open rupture. When people meet to negotiate where is the necessity of this austerity or ungracious manner of conversation? What otherwise could have been expected than a similar return?

Having made these observations, I will conclude with saying I most ardently wish an end may be put to this business by the motion prevailing. It will save much controversy in the newspapers, in State Legislatures, and disunion and strife among the people, as well as the national evils to which they may unfortunately expose us, and with these views I submit the question to the decision of the House.

When Mr. LIVERMORE concluded, (half past six.) the motion for indefinite postponement was negatived—yeas 44, nays 73, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 3.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees of Canada and Nova Scotia;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, presented a petition of the representatives of a general committee, chosen by the inhabitants of the Territory of Upper Louisiana, praying that a revision of the laws of the United States for the Territory aforesaid may be made, and that such claims as shall appear meritorious and just, and are not provided for in any existing law, may be immediately confirmed.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. QUINCY presented a petition of a committee appointed by the manufacturers of paper within the State of Massachusetts, praying that an additional duty may be laid upon paper imported from foreign countries.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. MCKIM,
Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further provisions are necessary more effectually to secure the collection of duties imposed by law on imports; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, otherwise.

The following Message was received from the RESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

to the Senate and House of #### Representatives of the United States:

The act authorizing a detachment of one hundred thousand men from the militia, will expire on the third of March next. Its early revival is recommended, order that timely steps may be taken for arrangements such as the act contemplated.

Without interfering with the modifications rendered necessary by the defects or the inefficacy of the laws restrictive of commerce and navigation, or with the policy of disallowing to foreign armed vessels the use of our waters, it falls within my duty to recommend also, that, in addition to the precautionary measure authorized by that act, and to the regular troops, for completing the legal establishment of which enlistments are renewed, every necessary provision may be made for a volunteer force of twenty thousand men, to be enlisted for a short period, and held in a state of organization and readiness for actual service, at the shortest warning.

I submit to the consideration of Congress, moreover, the expediency of such a classification and organization of the militia as will best insure prompt and successive aids from that source adequate to emergencies which may call for them.

It will rest with them also to determine how far further provision may be expedient for putting into actual service, if necessary, any part of the naval armament not now employed.

At a period presenting features in the conduct of foreign Powers towards the United States which impose on them the necessity of precautionary measures involving expense, it is a happy consideration that such is the solid state of the public credit, that reliance may be justly placed on any legal provision that may be made for resorting to it, in a convenient form, and to an adequate amount.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 3, 1810.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, so much of the said Message as relates to the organization and classification of the militia, was referred to the committee, appointed on the first ultimo, on the same subject.

So much of the said Message as relates to raising a volunteer force, was referred to the committee appointed, on the said first ultimo, on the Military Establishment of the United States.

So much of the Message aforesaid as relates to the "naval armament," was referred to the committee appointed, on the first ultimo, on the Naval Establishment of the United States.

So much of the said Message as relates to the finances, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WITHERSPOON said he held in his hand the petition of James Dennes, a disabled man, which he begged leave to present. It is (said he) the claim of a man now in your Navy Yard, who has had the small pox in the natural way, which has rendered him an object claiming the compassion and aid of this House; one of the eyes is entirely out; the vision of the other much impaired. If the petition is received and referred, I will, instead of producing documents to support his claim, present his mangled and pitiable face to the committee. The petition was read and referred.

TRADE TO THE BALTIC.

Mr. BURWELL said that he had given to the subject of our foreign relations as much consideration as he was capable of doing, and digested some plan which appeared to him best adapted to the present situation of the country. It would be recollected, however, that they had seen in the papers that France either had blockaded or did contemplate the blockade of all the ports not embraced in the British orders; and they had seen in the papers a paragraph intimating that a project existed to close the northern ports against all vessels but those of France. He conceived it necessary to call for any information which by possibility might be in possession of the Executive on this subject, as such information, if to be obtained, might have some influence upon his mind as to the course proper to be pursued; and therefore moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House any information he may possess relative to the blockade of the ports of the Baltic by France, and the exclusion of neutral vessels by Russia, Sweden, and Denmark.

The motion was agreed to without opposition, and Mr. BURWELL and Mr. GARDNER appointed a committee to wait on the President accordingly.

CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution from the Senate approving the conduct of the Executive in refusing to receive any further communication from Francis James Jackson, &c.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time.

To morrow was named as the day on which it should be read a third time, and negatived, ayes 32.

The resolution was then ordered to be read a third time to-day.

Mr. NEWTON—Mr. Speaker: It is with regret, sir, I feel myself constrained to offer some observations on the resolution from the Senate now on its passage.

I am not ignorant that I am trespassing on your patience, and that, at this late period of the discussion, I address you to no little disadvantage; but I derive, under such discouragement, great satisfaction in knowing that your politeness and indulgence are at all times the same.

I lament, sir, that the discussion has not been confined to the subject which the resolution presents for consideration, but, as I had no control over the debate, I am compelled to pursue it through the meanders it has taken.

As silence on the observations which have been made, though on points foreign to the one in debate, may be ascribed to an acquiescence in their justness, I cannot refrain from apprising you that I hold myself bound to answer such as shall, in my judgment, demand an answer. This course will compel me to discuss points no ways related to the one before the House.

I shall endeavor to atone for taking this range by giving to each subject a separate consideration, and by observing a due regard to brevity. With this apology, I hasten in the first instance to the discussion of the competency of Mr. Erskine's powers to conclude the provisional agreement of the 19th of April last.

I put aside from this discussion the instructions to Mr. Erskine authorizing him to tender reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake, because his power so to act has not been distinctly questioned. The gentlemen who have preceded me on the same side of the question have sustained, I trust to your satisfaction, and that of the House, the competency of Mr. Erskine's powers to make and conclude the arrangement of the 19th of April last. Persuaded, as I am, that they have performed this task with great ability, I will not tire your patience by passing over the same ground, nor by citing the same authorities on which they relied to support their arguments.

I will permit myself only to take up the discussion at the points which terminated their remarks. I will content myself with furnishing some authorities not pressed into service, in support of the positions taken by them. That Mr. Erskine was a Minister Plenipotentiary, cannot be denied; in that character he was received, and in that he acted until he was recalled, is equally true. The propositions made by him in that character were received and acted upon as the propositions of his Government. The Executive of the United States had no control over his private instructions; no right to demand an exhibition of them; they were given for the government of the Minister's conduct. If he acted in contravention of his secret orders, over which his power was absolute, he became responsible to his Sovereign for his non-observance of them; but his public acts must necessarily be binding and obligatory, originating, as they must be considered, in the general and avowed powers of the Minister, exercised in conformity to his private instructions. If his secret instructions limit his general commission, he is bound honestly to apprise the Government with which he is negotiating of the fact. He ought to say, to this boundary I can go; beyond it I cannot pass. To illustrate this doctrine, which I hold to be sound and correct, I will give as an instance the chaste conduct of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, who, previous to affixing their signatures to the treaty concluded by them with the British Commissioners, publicly apprized the Commissioners that they had no authority to bind the Government of the United States, as their instructions did not permit them to conclude a treaty which should not contain stipulations against impressments. The fate of that treaty is known. It was rejected. The British Government could not complain, because it was previously informed that the Ministers of the United States had no power to form such a treaty.

Mr. Erskine never entertained a doubt but that his powers were competent to the formation of the arrangement of April last. He unhesitatingly declared, in submitting his propositions for suspending as to the United States the operation of the Orders in Council, that he was commanded by His Majesty to submit them to the consideration of the Executive of the United States. I will prove this statement by his letter of April 18, 1809, and others, addressed to the Secretary of State. He says:

"The favorable change in the relations of His Majesty with the United States which has been produced by the act usually termed the non-intercourse act, passed at the last session of Congress, was also anticipated by His Majesty, and has encouraged a further hope that a reconsideration of existing differences might lead to their satisfactory adjustment. On these grounds and expectations, I am instructed to communicate to the American Government His Majesty's determination of sending to the United States an Envoy Extraordinary, invested with full powers to conclude a treaty on all points of the relations between the two countries. In the meantime, with a view to the attainment of so desirable an object, His Majesty would be willing to withdraw his Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, so far as respects the United States, in the persuasion that the President would issue a proclamation for the renewal of the intercourse with Great Britain, and that whatever difference of opinion should arise in the interpretation of the terms of such an agreement, will be removed in the proposed negotiation."

In another letter, of April 19, he says:

"In consequence of the acceptance by the President, as stated in your letter of the 18th instant, of the proposals made by me on the part of His Majesty, in my letter of the same day, for the renewal of the intercourse between the respective countries, I am authorized to declare that His Majesty's Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, will have been withdrawn, as respects the United States, on the 10th day of June next." (1809.)

The above extract from Mr. Erskine's letters leave us in no suspense as to the opinion he had formed of his instructions. In this settled belief that he had conformed strictly to the instructions of his Court, we find him so late as June 15, 1809, when he notified to the Secretary of State the new Order in Council issued on the 26th of April last. In this letter he says:

"In consequence of official communications sent to me from His Majesty's Government, since the adoption of that measure, I am enabled to assure you that it has no connexion whatever with the overtures (of the 19th of April, 1809,) which I have been authorized to make to the Government of the United States, and that I am persuaded that the terms of the agreement so happily concluded by the recent negotiation, will be strictly fulfilled on the part of His Majesty. The internal evidence of the order itself would fully justify the foregoing construction, and, moreover, it will not have escaped your notice, that the repeal has not thereby been made of the orders of the 7th of January, 1807, which, according to the engagement I have entered into on the part of His Majesty, is to be abrogated with the other orders, in consequence of the adjustment of differences between the two countries, and the confidence entertained of a further conciliatory understanding."

Thus it appears that Mr. Erskine, from communications, subsequent to the 26th of April, from his Government, is decidedly of opinion that he acted within the pale of his instructions. His language is free from ambiguity. He says: "In consequence of official communications sent to me from His Majesty's Government, since the adoption of the order of the 26th of April, I am enabled to assure you it has no connexion whatever with the terms of agreement concluded

'by the recent negotiation.'" Nothing can be clearer than that his opinion was made up on a full consideration of all the instructions received by him from his Government. This must be evident to the most superficial observer on reading the following extract from a letter of the 14th August, 1809, addressed by him to the Secretary of State. It is as follows:

"Under these circumstances, therefore, finding that I could not obtain the recognitions specified in Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January, (which formed but one part of his instructions to me,) in the formal manner required, I considered that it would be in vain to lay before the Government of the United States the despatch in question, which I was at liberty to do in extenso, had I thought proper. But as I had such strong grounds for believing that the object of His Majesty's Government could be attained, though in a different manner, and the spirit, at least, of my several letters of instructions be fully complied with, I feel a thorough conviction on my mind that I should be acting in conformity with His Majesty's wishes, and, accordingly, conclude the late provisional agreement on His Majesty's behalf with the Government of the United States."

The British Government could not, from this view, disavow the act of its Minister without incurring, and that justly, the charge of bad faith. To give support and nerve to this inference, I will read a passage from an author of great celebrity, Burlemaqui. The author says: "If he who has a commission to treat has kept within the bounds of the power annexed to his office, though he acts contrary to his private instructions, the Sovereign is to abide by what he has done; otherwise, we could never depend on engagements contracted by proxy." This authority is full, and in point; it covers the whole ground; it leaves no fissures through which crafty politicians can make an escape. On the reputation of the British Government it fixes a blot which nothing short of the power of time can efface.

I will now, sir, endeavor to show that the Executive of the United States, in the formation of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, conformed to the practice heretofore pursued by the administrators of this Government; and, I might add, without the fear of refutation, that it is a practice coeval with the dawn of civilization. I render my thanks to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DAMA) for directing my attention to an authority which sustains the position I have taken. My allusion is to the celebrated correspondence between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Hammond in 1791. I will read such parts of this correspondence as have a bearing on this subject, and I will then show its application.

Extract of a note, November 29, 1791, from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Hammond:

"Permit me, then, to ask whether you are instructed to give us explanations of the intentions of your Court as to the execution of the seventh article of the definitive treaty between the United States of America and His Britannic Majesty? With respect to the commerce of the two countries, we have supposed that we saw, in several instances, regulations on the part of your Government, which, if reciprocally adopted, would materially injure the interest of both nations. On this subject, too, I must beg the favor of you to say whether you are authorized to conclude or to negotiate arrangements with us which may fix the commerce between the two countries on principles of reciprocal advantage."

Note of November 30, from Mr. Hammond to Mr. Jefferson:

In stating to you this indispensable consideration (to wit, the discussion of the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the same treaty.) I must, at the same time, assure you that, in confidence of experiencing a similar disposition in the Government of the United States, it is His Majesty's desire to remove every ground and occasion of misunderstanding which may arise between the two countries; and, in conformity to that disposition in His Majesty. I can add, that I am instructed to enter into the discussion of all such measures as may be deemed the most practicable and reasonable for giving effect to those stipulations of the definitive treaty, the execution of which has hitherto been delayed, as well by the Government of this country as by that of Great Britain. In answer to your question on the subject of the commerce of Great Britain and the United States, I can inform you, sir, that the King is sincerely disposed to promote and facilitate the commercial intercourse between the two countries, and that I am authorized to communicate to this Government His Majesty's readiness to enter into a negotiation for establishing that intercourse upon principles of reciprocal benefit."

In an explanatory note, December 6th, Mr. Hammond expresses himself thus:

"As I am extremely solicitous to avoid any misrepresentation of my letter of the 30th ultimo. I have now the honor of stating to you, in explanation of that part of it to which you have adverted in yours of yesterday, that, although, (as I formerly mentioned in my first conversations with you after my arrival in this country) I am not, as yet, empowered to conclude any definitive arrangement with respect to the commercial intercourse between the two countries, I still meant it to be understood that I am fully authorized to enter into a negotiation for that purpose, and into the discussion of such principles as may appear best calculated to promote that object on a basis of reciprocal advantage. I am farther authorized to receive any propositions which this Government may be pleased to make to me upon this subject."

Mr. Jefferson's answer is dated December 13th:

"I have laid before the President of the United States the letters of November 30th and December 6, with which you honored me, and, in consequence thereof; and particularly of that part of your letter of December 6th, where you say that you are fully authorized to enter into a negotiation for the purpose of arranging the commercial intercourse between the two countries. I have the honor to inform you that I am ready to receive a communication of your full powers for that purpose, at any time you shall think proper, and to proceed immediately to their object."

Mr. Hammond's answer of the 14th of December, is as follows:

"In answer to your letter of yesterday, I can only repeat what I have before stated in my first conversation with you after my arrival, and, subsequently, in my letter of the 6th of this month, viz: that I have no special commission empowering me to conclude any definitive arrangement upon the subject of the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the United States. But that I conceive myself fully competent to enter into a negotiation with this Government for that purpose, in the discussion of the principles which may serve as the basis, and constitute the stipulations of any such definitive arrangement.

"This opinion of my competency is founded upon my instructions, inasmuch as they are to regulate my personal conduct, and upon the conviction that the letters of credence from His Majesty, investing me with a general plenipotentiary character, which I had the honor of presenting to the President of the United States, and his consequent recognition of me in that character, are authorities decidedly adequate to the commencement of a preliminary negotiation."

On receiving this letter, Mr. Jefferson no longer insisted on a previous communication of Mr. Hammond's special commission or instructions. Mr. Hammond derived his powers from his plenipotentiary character and from his instructions which were to regulate his personal conduct. The last he did not exhibit. His letters of credence were in the hands of the Secretary of State.

That Mr. Jefferson was satisfied with the exposition of Mr. Hammond's competency, made out by himself in his correspondence, is clearly ascertained from the subsequent acts and conduct of Mr. Jefferson. The seventh article of the definitive Treaty of 1783, and the formation of a basis for a Treaty of Commerce, depended on the result of the discussion between him and Mr. Hammond. Mr. Jefferson could not, in justice to his own reputation and that of the Administration, commit the interest of his country to a diplomatic arrangement, the execution of which when made should be uncertain; one which should not reciprocally bind both Governments; but he was convinced that he was leaving nothing at hazard, to uncertainty, so far as a right construction of powers was concerned. The following extract from his letter of December 15th, to Mr. Hammond, which opens the discussion with Mr. Hammond, speaks for itself:

"I am to acknowledge the honor of your letter of November 30th, and to express the satisfaction with which we learn that you are instructed to discuss with us the measures which reason and practicability may dictate for giving effect to the stipulations of our treaty yet remaining to be executed. I can assure you, on the part of the United States, of every disposition to lessen difficulties, by passing over whatever is of smaller concern, and insisting on those matters, only which either justice to individuals or public policy render indispensable; in order to simplify our discussions by defining precisely their objects, I have the honor to propose that we shall begin by specifying, on each side, the particular acts which each considers to have been done by the other in contravention of the treaty. I shall set the example."

The language of this extract justifies the propriety of the observations made. It shows clearly that Mr. Jefferson did not receive from Mr. Hammond a communication of his instructions. "I am," says Mr. Jefferson, "to acknowledge the honor of your letter of November 30th, and to express the satisfaction with which we learn

JANUARY, 1810.

H. OF R.

'that you are instructed to discuss with us the measures which reason and practicability may dictate for giving effect to the stipulation of our treaty, yet remaining to be executed.' On reading this, and other parts of the correspondence attentively, every doubt must be removed; even the sceptic will become credulous.

A comparative view of the negotiations carried on with Mr. Hammond under the Administration of President WASHINGTON and the one carried on lately with Mr. Erskine under the direction of the present Chief Magistrate may not be altogether useless. It may awaken reflections.

The observer cannot but see a striking similarity in the negotiations. The object of both was to settle misunderstandings and to remove complaints, by entering into and concluding arrangements which should mutually bind both parties. The correspondence with Mr. Hammond was to obtain, among other things, the delivery to the United States of the Western posts, and also to form a basis of a commercial treaty to be concluded, when adjusted, by a communication from His Majesty of proper powers for that purpose.

Mr. Erskine was charged to make, in the name of His Majesty, reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake, and also to form a provisional agreement with the Executive of the United States, which should suspend as to the United States the Orders of Council of January and November, 1807, on the President's agreeing to issue a proclamation "for the renewal of the intercourse with Great Britain." On the arrangement being made, an Envoy Extraordinary was to be sent to the United States by His Majesty, "invested with full powers to conclude a treaty on all points of the relations between the two countries." This extract is from Mr. Erskine's letter of April 18th, 1809. Mr. Hammond, did not show his instructions, nor did Mr. Erskine. Both derived their powers to act from their plenipotentiary commissions and their private instructions. The present Administration, therefore, ought to be exonerated from censure, for pursuing the same course which was pursued under the Administration of the illustrious WASHINGTON.

I will now prove that, in the late correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Jackson, the same practice has been adhered to. In a letter of October 19, 1809, page 48, addressed to Mr. Jackson, the Secretary of State says:

"Whatever may have been your intention in this part of our conversation (affair of the Chesapeake) or whatever may be the import of the passage to which I have just alluded, I have now the honor of signifying to you that I am authorized to receive, in a proper form, whatever explicit explanations you may choose to make with respect to the grounds of this part of the disavowal; and without inquiring whether your authority be derived from instructions that have been addressed to yourself, or that have devolved on you as the successor of the Minister who had declined to execute them."

It is worthy of remark that the same practice, heretofore observed, was continued after the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement, by the Executive, under circumstances that would have warranted a demand of Mr. Jackson's powers. This demand, however, was not made until Mr. Jackson had assumed so many questionable shapes, that a departure from the common practice became absolutely necessary, to guard the nation from the impositions, sinister views, and equivocations of a diplomatic Proteus.

It is, sir, to be lamented that the judgment should be circumscribed in its operations by the violence of the passions and by the prevalence of prejudices. We are informed by philosophers, that man, in contemplating objects, is too much inclined to see in them those things only that are flattering to his views. Helvetius, who looked into man with a penetrating eye, also noticed this propensity, and has given an instance of its influence in verification of the assertion. He represents a lady and a clerical gentleman viewing the moon through a telescope. The lady, whose attention was given to the contemplation of the most amiable feelings, and propensities of the heart, soon espied two persons;—doubtless, says she, they are lovers, they approach each other with grace and tenderness: the clerical gentleman, whose thoughts were also turned to the consideration of objects no less interesting than profitable, soon discovered that it was a deception of vision, for the persons whom the lady took to be lovers, were, in truth, the steeples of a cathedral.

The deceptio visus is the epidemic of politicians. In the discussion of the resolution from the Senate, its effects are striking. Gentlemen are determined to see error in all acts of the President, and error is accordingly manifest. The President cannot do right, because he was not elected from the true sect.

I now proceed to prove, that His Britannic Majesty was bound by every principle that can give an honest impulse and direction to actions, to carry Mr. Erskine's arrangement into execution. Do unto others as you desire they should do unto you, is a rule of conduct that applies as well to a nation as to an individual. The former is but an assemblage of individuals; such a society has its affairs and interests, it deliberates and takes resolutions in common, and thus becomes a moral person, and, according to Vattel, having an understanding and a will peculiar to itself, and is susceptible of obligations and laws. Government is but the agent of the nation. An individual who receives the benefit of a good action, even without obtaining it by previous stipulation, is irresistibly prompted to reciprocate it. A nation that regards its honor is prompted to act from the influence of a like motive.

The law of nature, which is the basis of the law of nations, inculcates justice, amicable intercourse, and a mutual interchange of good offices. No nation can attain the prosperity it desires, but through the observance of its maxims and precepts. Temporary advantages may be obtained by fraudulent practices; a permanent good can have its foundation laid in principles only that are acknowledge to be correct; principles that receive the universal homage of man, saint or savage.

It cannot be denied but that Great Britain derived incalculable advantages from the stipulations of Mr. Erskine's arrangement. That public wants of the most urgent nature, and individual distresses, were supplied and relieved by the renewal of intercourse with the United States, is likewise manifest. The state of that nation at the time the provisional agreement was made, evidently mortified the pride of its high-toned rulers, and alarmed their fears by showing to the world its absolute dependence on foreign supplies.

A transient view of prospects, then exhibited by her foreign relations, will subtract nothing from the solidity of the position laid down. The ports of Sweden, it is true, were open; that country, however, afforded but chilling prospects to mercantile enterprise. Those who looked beyond the passing moment saw that those ports would not long continue open. The revolution in Spain excited hopes that could be realized only by a series of events over which Great Britain had no control; instead of pouring wealth into her lap, it became a drain for her men and money.

As to the flattering anticipations of commercial advantages with the new Empire of Brazil, and Spanish America, they vanished like a dream. The price current of British manufactures in those markets—the merchant's barometer—was from twenty-five to thirty per centum below first cost.

At the critical period, when the demand for supplies was most urgent, Mr. Erskine tendered his propositions, they were received by the President in a manner the most conciliatory, and accordingly terminated in the arrangement of April last. The supplies which were sent under the faith and protection of that arrangement had nearly reached the destined ports, and were anxiously expected by the nation, when the disavowal of it by the Cabinet of St. James was proclaimed. Even in times so fruitful as these are in crimes, and in every species and description of perfidy, the voice of morality and honor recovered its tone, and pronounced an anathema on the deed. Permit me now, sir, to test that disavowal, which forms a new epocha in the reign of His Majesty, by the rules and maxims of the laws of nature and of nations. Let the sages of those sciences be consulted. Their writings may be resorted to as impartial authorities. If those authorities denounce the act of His Majesty as immoral and unjust, they do so on the sanction of rules and maxims which were in being before the island of Britain emerged from the ocean, that are based on principles coeval with that period of time when the God of nature spoke chaos into order.

Burlemaqui says:

"The Sovereign may also be obliged to execute the engagements contracted by his Ministers without his orders, by the law of nature, which forbids us to enrich ourselves at another's expense. Equity requires that, in such circumstances, we should exactly observe the conditions of the contract, though concluded by Ministers who had not full powers."

This authority is conclusive, and is alone sufficient to bear down and overthrow the master works of sophistry. If more should be wanting, Vattel, Grotius, and other writers of celebrity, can be marshalled in its defence. This authority renders any further argument useless. It establishes my position—that, as His Britannic Majesty obtained a renewal of intercourse between the United States and Great Britain under the provisional arrangement, concluded with the President of the United States by his accredited Minister Plenipotentiary, acting, according to his declaration, in conformity to His Majesty's instructions, His Majesty became bound to execute the arrangement on his part—particularly as His Majesty's subjects had enjoyed a harvest of benefits resulting from the execution of that arrangement by the Government of the United States; and also, as it was impossible for His Majesty, from the nature of things, to place the United States in the same position which they were induced to relinquish, by the act of his Minister; which act grew out of the exercise of powers derived from his commission, and from his private instructions.

Indulge me, sir, in making a few observations on the manner in which authorities have been introduced, and the purposes to which they have been made subservient. My object is to keep subjects bearing an exact similitude to each other as distinct as possible. I expect to derive no advantage from a confusion of things. The executed agreement with Mr. Erskine has been confounded with a treaty, the most solemn act that a Minister can perform. If I prove that the rules, as laid down by those gentlemen who have preceded me, are inapplicable to treaties in the extent contended for, they will be equally so to agreements, particularly to that class called executed agreements. The Sovereign usually reserves to himself the power of ratifying treaties; from this reservation, gentlemen infer that under no circumstances can a treaty be binding without the observance of the formality. They take the rules as laid down, and give them such construction as best answers their several positions, without deigning to inform us how the authors have applied them. I will, sir, with your permission, make two of the authors, Vattel and Burlemaqui answer for themselves. It will be too tedious to hear all.

Those authors do certainly furnish the rules as quoted in relation to treaties; but they do not say that a treaty concluded by a Minister with full powers, is rashly and capriciously to be rejected. Vattel says:

"To refuse with honor to ratify what has been concluded on by virtue of a full power, it is necessary that the Sovereign should have strong and solid reasons, and that he should show in particular that his Minister has deviated from his instructions."

Burlemaqui, on the same point, says:

"In general it is certain that, when Ministers, without the order of their Sovereign, conclude a treaty concerning public affairs, the latter is not obliged to stand to it; and the Minister who has entered into the negotiation, without instructions, may be punished according to the exigency of the case. However, there may be circumstances in which a Prince is obliged, either by the rules of prudence, or even those of justice and equity, to ratify a treaty, though concluded without his orders."

In these passages, the authors give precision and exactness to their rules. If the Minister, with full powers, undertake to conclude a treaty, the Sovereign cannot render it void, "without strong and solid reasons;" in some instances, "a Prince is obliged, either by the rules of prudence, or even those of justice and equity, to ratify a treaty, though concluded without orders."

These authorities make it no ways necessary for me to go further into this point. It is immaterial to me whether gentlemen apply the rules to treaties, or agreements, or conventions; they can by no act destroy the effect which those citations produce. My object was, sir, to give to the authors the right of their own expositions—they have exercised their prerogative. I shall be satisfied with the result, whatever it may be—on their authority I rest—I feel confident I cannot err when I follow them.

Let us now reverse the order of things—let us suppose that the Secretary of State had demanded a sight of Mr. Erskine's instructions, authorizing him to submit certain propositions to the consideration of the Executive of the United States, after his solemn declaration that he had His Majesty's command so to act. Let us suppose that Mr. Erskine had construed the demand into a distrust of the truth of his declaration, officially made, and as an indignity offered to His Majesty's good faith; and, under such an impression, had closed the door of negotiation. What would have been the language of gentlemen on the meeting of Congress in May last? Hostility to Great Britain and partiality to France would have been set to a new note. We should have had a concert of base, treble, tenor, sharps, and flats. Instead of smiles, the President would have received frowns; instead of praises and eulogies on his good sense, prudence, and promptitude in accepting the terms offered, expressions of discontent would have been loud and impressive; they would have been made here, and re-echoed from the shores of the Atlantic, even to the sources of the Missouri.

Past transactions are worthy of remembrance, and sometimes of repetition. The chameleon may take the hue of surrounding objects, but his change of color does not new-model his figure, form, or character.

Let us, for a moment, bring to our recollection the occurrences which took place, and the orthodox opinions which were held, at the time when the honor and dignity of this nation were deeply wounded, (a wound not yet healed,) in the attack of the Chesapeake; when the blood of American citizens was wantonly shed, and when the British squadron, after the commission of an act so atrocious, in violation of the jurisdiction of the United States, anchored in Hampton Roads and interrupted the regular communication between Norfolk and other places. After having taken a review of facts, let us compare the opinions of that day with those subsequently delivered; and, by the standard of consistency, test them.

The President, soon after the commission of those outrages, issued his proclamation, interdicting the entrance of the waters of the United States to the public armed vessels of Great Britain. That act of the President was considered as just and proper, as flowing from moderation and wisdom. The propriety of it was defended on the declaration to the Executive by Mr. Erskine, that it was his firm belief that Admiral Berkeley had acted without orders. Keep in force the proclamation, was the language of that memorable day, until reparation, ample and satisfactory, should be made. Such was the state of the public mind. Mr. Rose arrived; his mission, instead of having the salutary tendency of removing the irritations excited, was eminently calculated to nurture and increase them. Insults were added to injuries. Before he would deign to make known to the President the nature and extent of the reparation he was authorized to offer, he demanded the revocation of the President's proclamation; in plain terms informing this nation that its Government should make concessions to His Majesty for using precautionary measures against the lawless acts of his officers, as a prerequisite to a tender of the reparation His Majesty had condescended through him to offer. This new mode of redress proving no ways satisfactory, Mr. Rose's mission terminated. No sooner was it known that the negotiation with Mr. Rose proved abortive, in consequence of the inadmissible demands made by him, as already stated by me, than the President was openly accused as being the cause of it, by adhering to a "mere punctilio."

Thus, sir, we see, that no Republican President can do right, when his actions are viewed through the medium of party spirit.

The people must judge for themselves. Their good sense is the standard by which public measures are to be tried. To that standard is the last appeal to be made.

I conceive it to be my duty, before I close this branch of my argument, concisely to state, what, in my opinion, are the real causes of the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's provisional agreement. The recommencement of hostilities between France and Austria, combined with other incidents, raised an expectation, that a new and favorable order of things was to take place. This hope never rose in the mind of His Britannic Majesty, without a consequent pressure upon the neutral rights of the United States.

The unprincipled violations of the embargo operated to favor the views of Great Britain, by lessening the efficacy of that salutary measure. A cabinet whose policy, of late, is to pursue the expedient, desperate soever it may be, to accomplish its end, resolved to wait the issue of events, and try the wonder-working powers of its machinations.

The disposition has been manifested by inflammatory publications against the Government of this nation, by opposition to laws constitutionally made, and by crude and wicked projects, the object of which was to sever the Union. Such a state of things would naturally excite, in Powers no ways friendly to our prosperity, a disposition to increase, through intrigue and artifice, the difficulties the nation had to encounter. In times such as the world never before witnessed, dangers of every degree and description beset the highway, to avoid which, the prudent politician saw no means left but to make a temporary stop, to pause. This pause, produced by imperious necessity, the consequence of foreign outrages, would necessarily subject the citizen to inconveniences and privations. As it is too common to impute to the fault of the Government all the embarrassments that are felt and experienced; ambition and finesse, artifice and intrigue, ever on the watch, are prompt to seize the opportune moment, for extending the empire of confusion and distrust, and, on the ruins of social order, to lay the foundation of a power malignant to the happiness of man.

The lynx-eyed tyrants of the world, see, hear, act. The want of union among ourselves inspires them with confidence to commence the works of iniquity, and their machinery is making progress, to demolish the last asylum which benignant Heaven has given to persecuted man. The British Government would not dare to trample on the rights of the nation if union were to dictate the measures that should govern our conduct in all our foreign relations. Will the Orders of Council be revoked? Will honorable reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake be made? Will the almost endless catalogue of our wrongs be redressed, when the energy of union is wanting; when, in the estimation of our own rights, intellect is so deficient, as to discern in the acts of the British Government neither insults nor injuries? When, at the close of Mr. Rose's temporizing mission, a time-serving publication was industriously circulated maintaining this position—"that Great Britain had done the United States no essential injury!"

What, sir, will be the opinion entertained of the American people and Government by the haughty and high-toned rulers of Europe, when the works of Fisher Ames, once the high priest of a political sect in Massachusetts, are read? Sentiments of ineffable contempt will be felt for a people, represented to be so base and degraded. Let Mr. Ames's works proclaim their own merits. The following passages are extracted. I trust in God they will arouse the American Genius from his slumbers:

"Our country is too big for union; too sordid for patriotism; too democratic for liberty."

"I am half of Talleyrand's opinion, when he says, we are phlegmatic, and without any passion except for money getting."

"It is one of the most consuming curses of Heaven, and we deserve it, to commit the affairs of the nation to rulers who find, in their popularity, their rapacity, or their ambition, an interest separate from the interest of the people."

"I have hoped that the sacred shield of cowardice, as Junius calls it, would protect our peace. I still hope."

"After her fall, [Britain,] ours would not cost Bonaparte a blow. We are prostrate, already, and of all men on earth the fittest for slaves. Even our daring avarice would not make a week's resistance to tribute, if the name were only disguised; and I much doubt whether if France were lord of the navies of Europe, we should reluctant at that, or even at the appellation and condition of Helots."

"They [the Administration] need not fear the moral sense, or sense of honor, or any other sense of our people, except their nonsense, which will take special good care to keep on their side."

"It is the nature of these [white birch stakes] to fall in two years; and a Republic wears out its morals almost as soon as the sap of a white birch rots the wood."

"Of our six millions of people, there are scarcely six hundred who yet look for liberty anywhere except on paper."

"The immortal spirit of the wood nymph, Liberty, dwells only in the British oak."

"It is pretty enough to say, the Republic commands and the love of the Republic dictates obedience to the heart of every citizen. This is system—but is it nature?"

"The Republic is a creature of fiction; it is everybody in the fancy, but nobody in the heart. Love, to be anything, must be select and exclusive. We may as well talk of loving geometry as of the Commonwealth."

"Is there in human affairs an occasion of prodigy more shameless or contagious than a general election! Every Spring gives birth and gives wings to this epidemic mischief. Then begins a sort of tillage that turns up to the sun and air the most noxious weeds in the kindest soil. To speak more seriously, it is a moral pestilence that begins with rottenness in the marrow."

"Federalism was, therefore, manifestly founded on a mistake, on the supposed existence of sufficient political virtue, and on the permanency and authority of the public morals."

"The great State of Virginia has fomented a licentious spirit among her neighbors."

To the following passages, I invite the serious attention of our Southern and Western brethren, whether Republicans or Federalists. The slander is general and illiberal. Such are the artifices to support Federal principles in Massachusetts. A power that originates in, and that is preserved by, deception, must expire in a convulsion. Mr. Ames says:

"The straggling settlements of the Southern part of the Union, which now is the governing part, have been formed by emigrants from almost every nation in Europe.

"Safe in their solitudes, alike from the annoyance of enemies and of Government, it is infinitely more probable that they will sink into barbarism than rise to the dignity of national sentiments and character."

"Are not the wandering Tartars or Indian hunters at least as susceptible of patriotism as these stragglers in our Western forests, and infinitely fonder of glory!"

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

It is difficult to conceive of a country, which, from the manner of its settlement, or the manifest tendencies of its politics, is more destitute or more incapable of being inspired with political virtue."

On these extracts I shall say nothing—they they beggar all comments.

From this libel on the people and governments of this nation, I turn with pleasure to a source from which issues the American spirit.

Let the information which flows from it furnish us with a deep conviction that it is in vain to look for justice from foreign Powers, without union.

Mr. Monroe, whose situation afforded him the best means of ascertaining the policy of the British Government, and whose judgment is too enlightened to be deceived, says, in a letter, 4th of August, 1807, addressed to Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State:

"Such is the state of this country at the present crisis, that it is impossible to foresee what will be its course of conduct toward the United States. There has been at all times, since the commencement of the present war, a strong party here for extending its ravages to them. This party is combined of the shipowners, the Navy, the East and West India merchants, and certain political characters of great consideration in the State.

"So powerful is this combination that nothing can be obtained of the Government on one point, but what may be extorted by necessity."

If facts do not open our eyes—if information, chaste and convincing, cannot impress us with the necessity of concert, our fate will resemble that of Prometheus—on our vitals the vulture will continue to prey.

Having proved, I hope to your satisfaction, that the Government of Great Britain was under an obligation to carry the agreement made with Mr. Erskine into execution, I turn to the late correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Jackson, the British Minister, under the influence of feelings that convince me I have yet an important duty to render to my injured country. I lament, sir, that my abilities are inadequate to the performance of it, but they shall, such as they are, be directed to its discharge. I am conscientiously persuaded, in what light soever I view this subject, that Mr. Jackson intended no insult, and that he has insulted, this Government. I say this Government, because if one branch of it be outraged with rudeness and insolence of conduct, the other branches must feel the shock, as the three branches compose but one Government. No sophistry can destroy this position. Suppose, sir, the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GOLD,) who seems to possess the power of torturing words, to bear any meaning, were gravely to tell you that the college of illuminati had established this doctrine, to wit: that if the arm of a man be broken, the body of which is a member can sustain no injury, nor feel pain, because it is a part only that is injured, would you, sir, give your assent to the correctness of the theory? The gentleman cited Vattel, but he forgot to read and comment on those parts which assign to the Executive branch of Government a dignified rank, or to advert to the Constitution of the United States, which is explicit as to the grade it holds in the management of public affairs. For a moment permit me to direct my attention to some observations made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY;) that gentleman has given us a philological disquisition, a labored criticism on the verbiage of Mr. Jackson's letters. The result of his efforts was, that the words, after weighing them with nicety and exactness, did not warrant the inference that Mr. Jackson had insulted the Government of the United States. This criticism is too finely spun; it has a constitution too delicate and fragile for so dense an atmosphere as ours, the humble region of common sense. While we, sir, are slowly and deliberately pursuing the order and course of things; while we are endeavoring to represent objects as they are, the honorable gentleman, disdainful of such drudgery as unworthy his attention, skips over the superficialities of human affairs; like Swift's speculative mathematicians, he leaves the dull pursuits of civil life to plodders. I have to regret, sir, that I am not so philosophically constituted; unfortunately for me, from my school days to the present time, my sense of injury has always been the same; it is quick, it is instantly alive. I did not then, nor can I now, kiss the rod that strikes me.

Having prepared the way for the discussion of this interesting and important subject, I now take it up, insulated, as it ought to be, from other topics. It is in itself abundantly fruitful. The manner in which this correspondence was opened and conducted, is worthy of consideration; it is novel, and without a precedent. It will be admitted by all reflecting men, that the intercourse and communications between Governments should be regulated in a style that forbids the practice of indecorum, levity, or insolence, as the peace and happiness of society are objects of the first moment. Misunderstandings between men in private stations, generally speaking, confine their ill-fated consequences to a narrow sphere, the judicial authority being competent, if exercised by able and virtuous judges, to assign limits to the mischief, and redress to the injured; but when the affairs of nations are intrusted to the management of Ministers, too much caution, prudence, forbearance, and circumspection, cannot be observed, as the misunderstandings between nations, from numerous causes, can seldom be adjusted without an appeal to the sword; an appeal which never fails to involve the innocent with the guilty in its merciless ravages. The United States have, during the wars of Europe, participated largely in their calamities without being a party. The Government of Great Britain has, in no instance, been sparing of its contempt for the rights of neutrality when it possessed the power to annoy or destroy them. The disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement towards this country, and in the appointment of Mr. Jackson as the minister of peace and harmony, the reflecting part of the community saw an utter disregard to the sensibility of a neutral nation.

The manifest policy of this Government being to avoid a collision with either belligerent, determined the Executive to give the new Minister a reception evincive of a disposition to adjust all existing differences in an amicable way. The reception of Mr. Jackson as the accredited Minister of His Britannic Majesty excited a general expectation that explanations would be made for the non-execution of Mr. Erskine's arrangement, and also that a tender of redress for past injuries would be offered. Expectation was however to be disappointed. Mr. Jackson's interviews with the Secretary of State issued in nothing that could afford the least satisfaction. It became highly important, in the state of our political relations, clearly to ascertain the intentions of the British cabinet. As Mr. Jackson had displayed no inclination to act, although his Government was the injuring party, the President, on deliberation, felt it as a duty incumbent on him to give solemnity to his communications with Mr. J. In consequence of this determination, the following letter is supposed to have been written, expressive of the sentiments of the President. The Secretary of State says to Mr. Jackson: "In such a state of things, no expectation could be more reasonable, no course of proceedings more obviously prescribed by the ordinary respect due to the disappointed party, than a prompt and explicit explanation by the new functionary of the grounds of the refusal on the part of his Government to abide by an arrangement so solemnly made, accompanied by a substitution of other propositions."

To prevent misunderstanding on all points the Secretary of State concludes his letter thus: "To avoid misconceptions incident to oral proceedings, I have also the honor to intimate, that it is thought expedient that our further discussions, on the present occasion, be in the written form." Mr. Jackson, either forgetful or ignorant of the right appertaining to every Government of establishing the form of communication between its proper functionaries and foreign Ministers, even of the practice of the British Government towards the Minister of the United States, Mr. Pinkney, who was required to make his communications in the written form, flew into a violent rage, and protested against the requisition of the Secretary of State, as one not having a precedent in the annals of diplomacy to support it. From reprobating this mode of procedure, because it deprived him of all chance of equivocation and evasion, he states, without mincing the matter, that he entertained no hope of the restoration of a thorough good understanding between the respective countries, because he was satisfied that no disposition on the part of the American Government existed to promote it. I will give you Mr. Jackson's own words; in his letter of the 11th of October, 1809, to the Secretary of State, he says: "I shall now proceed to the other parts of your letter, and apply to them the best consideration that can arise from a zeal proportioned to ' the increase of difficulty thus thrown in the way of the restoration of a thorough good understanding between our respective countries."

To understand the state of Mr. Jackson's mind, and to comprehend his meaning, it is necessary to refer to letters subsequently written to the Secretary of State. In one of the 4th of November, 1809, after complaining of his being restricted to the honest mode of communication, the written form, Mr. Jackson expresses himself thus: "As however, I had no choice but to renounce, for the present, the hope of effectuating this desirable object, or to pursue it in the manner prescribed in your letter of the 9th ultimo, so I am now unwillingly compelled to enter upon the consideration of another letter from you under date of the 1st instant, which but too strongly confirms the opinion I before entertained." Mr. Jackson, in his letter of October 23, speaking of Augereau's proclamation to the Catalonians, that had no connexion with the subjects to be discussed between the Secretary of State and himself, travels out of the way for the express purpose of reviving a calumny against the Government of the United States of being under French influence. The following are his words: "Is it not important, at such a moment, that Europe and America should be convinced, that from whatever countries honorable and manly resistance to such a spirit may have been banished, it will still be found in the Sovereign of the British nation, and in the hearts of his subjects."

When all these extracts are brought into one point of view, the meaning is clear. He knew that his letters would be published; and he was determined to impeach the administrators of the Government, before the tribunal of the people, of French influence. Those very persons on whom, a few months before his arrival into this country, the citizens of the United States had passed their judgment by electing them as their Representatives.

Mr. Jackson shows himself well qualified independently to keep alive a charge which originated with the British Government to delude and distract the good people of this country; and I have no doubt but that he will find some of the newspaper editors and dull compilers of pamphlets prompt in lending their aid to propagate any calumny, no matter what, against the Government of the United States. Mr. Jackson's object in coming to this country was to do nothing with the Government, but to find out and to tamper with instruments of corruption.

His policy was to avoid all opportunities of honorable explanation; not to tender just reparation for injuries received, but to seize every occasion of insidiously charging the President of the United States with insincerity towards the British Government. To foment divisions among this people was his great object. I trust in God he has been egregiously mistaken. The American people are too sensible of their own dignity and rights, and too manfully disposed ever to surrender them to France, and too intelligent, from dear bought experience, of British morality and justice, to look for a sanctuary of safety, in an alliance, offensive and defensive, with Great Britain.

The tribunals of justice, however limited they may be in their jurisdiction, have the power of punishing for contempts; and it is to be lamented that the Chief Magistrate of the United States, for as gross indecorum and insolence in the British Minister as could be well practised or devised, should be censured for maintaining with a proper spirit the dignity of his station. I have said enough on this point to prove that Mr. Jackson intended, by his manner of conducting the correspondence with the Secretary of State, to treat with indignity and insolence the Government of the United States; and that his style, in opening and continuing the correspondence, was in conformity neither to the rules which preserve decorum and respect in private life, nor in anywise adapted to inspire confidence, or promote a good understanding between the two countries.

I shall now, sir, undertake to prove that the President of the United States, however well disposed he might be, to meet any fair proposition on the part of the British Government, was prevented from indulging his wishes, on the ground on which he was placed by the conduct of Mr. Jackson, and from serious and well founded objections to his powers and instructions.

As the United States had received, and were receiving great injuries and injustice from the acts of the British Government, in impressments of their seamen, in the attack on the Chesapeake, national ship, in illegal captures and condemnations of vessels and cargoes, and in the dissolution of a solemn arrangement, it was natural to look to the new mission for explanations of past conduct and for redress of wrongs. All expectations on these heads for redress, how reasonably soever they were cherished, were not to be ratified. As to explanations for the non-execution of Mr. Erskine's provisional agreement, the delay which had taken place, and the mode of doing it, evinced a disposition in the British Ministry, utterly regardless of the sensibility of this nation, and of respect for this Government. In the affair of the Chesapeake, reparation was refused, but clogged with such conditions, that the Government would have dishonored itself by acceding to them. They would not be accepted without a wilful and palpable violation and abandonment of rights, derived from the Constitution and the laws of the land.

With respect to the other classes of outrages and injuries, Mr. Jackson declared that he had no powers which authorized him to bring them into discussion. That his powers and instructions had a prospective, but no retrospective relation; that he had no propositions to make, it was ready to receive such as the President could think proper to communicate through the Secretary of State, and eventually to decide on them according to the tenor of his instructions. Would, sir, disrespect assume an aspect more formidable? Could a more pointed disregard to, and contempt for, the rights of this nation be offered, than for the offending Power to preserve silence on subjects of such importance and interest, and yet propose to open a negotiation which should relate to the future concerns of the two countries?

Such propositions could have had no weight with the President, as a denial of justice for past wrongs could not certainly inspire the injured party with a confidence that such propositions originated either in magnanimity, or in principles of fair and honest negotiation. They are invariably the precursors of a temporizing policy and of finished duplicity.

To entice the Executive of the United States into such a negotiation and arrangement, was a masterpiece of cunning. Its ostensible object was to adjust the future relations between the two countries; its real one, to destroy the claims of the United States on the British Government to reparation for past violations of neutral rights. I shall attempt to show how this was to be accomplished.

Two considerations, no doubt, had their influence with the British Ministry; the first was to obtain, through the artifice of negotiation, an acknowledgment of the right to issue the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, including those also of prior dates; this object was to be effected by prevailing on the President to give the go-by to an adjustment of injuries inflicted under the sanction of their authority, and to conclude an arrangement which should relate to future intercourse; which arrangement, if acceded to, while the Orders of Council should be in force, would ever afterwards be insisted on as an acknowledgment of their legality. The second was, that if the negotiation should eventuate in an arrangement, chicanery—for European Governments do not disdain to make it an auxiliary—would soon find in such an arrangement either an implied or express release of all obligations on the British Government to make reparation for any injury or wrong received from the execution of those orders. I might, sir, also add other considerations, but as I have already stated them in the first part of my argument, I forbear to repeat them. The penetrating eye of the President saw instantly through the diplomatic artifice; and the Secretary of State, in a style that evinced his clearness of perception, convinced Mr. Jackson that the tricks of negotiation, however specious, had lost their magic power.

The tendency of his projects was seen and avoided. The Secretary of State, in the following extracts from his letter of the 19th of October, 1809, addressed to Mr. Jackson, proves my assertions. He says:

"Had none of those obstacles presented themselves to the course corresponding with the sentiments and dispositions of the President, I should have felt great pleasure in giving you formal assurances of his readiness to execute the conditional authority with which he is invested for restoring in its full extent, as far as it may depend on the United States, the commercial intercourse of the two countries, and that he would, moreover, be disposed to extend the experiment of a friendly negotiation to every point of difference and mutual interest between them.

"If, indeed, in the event of a successful termination of what relates to the case of the Chesapeake, it be thought that a removal of the difficulties arising from the Orders in Council might be facilitated, by comprehending them in a general negotiation, and the operation of the orders can in the meantime be suspended, the door might be considered as immediately open to that course of proceeding. To such a suspension no reasonable objection can be made, if, as you have stated, the Orders in Council, as now modified, leave the trade of the United States nearly as great as it would be without the existence of such orders, so long as France and the other Powers shall continue their decrees, inasmuch as a discontinuance of their decrees by those Powers confessedly requires an immediate and entire revocation of the Orders in Council. That a suspension of the orders with a view to their being brought into a general negotiation, is more reasonable than a temporary submission to their authority by the United States with that view, is obvious from the reflection, that such a submission would necessarily involve a relinquishment of the principle which they have steadfastly asserted; whereas a discontinuance of the Orders in Council, in the present actual state of things, would not be incompatible with the principle on which they were originally founded."

On this point I shall forbear to say anything more, except to recall to notice some facts relating to past transactions between the United States and Great Britain. By the seventh article of the definitive Treaty of Peace of 1783, the British Government stipulated not to take away "any negroes or other property of the American inhabitants." Yet we find that, when the British army evacuated New York, and embarked for Great Britain, that stipulation was disregarded. The violation of a solemn treaty gave the injured party a right to demand reparation; the demand was urged and evaded.

Since the ratification of Mr. Jay's Treaty, in 1795, though the stipulation in the seventh article of the Treaty of 1783, as above stated, remained as was supposed untouched; yet it has been, and will be, contended whenever a discussion shall take place on that subject, that the United States have, by implication, lost all right to reparation. Let facts and experience admonish us. If we do not keep closely connected past transactions with such as are daily occurring, it will not require prophetic inspiration to inform us, that the chicanery of the British Government will be honored with another triumph in the prostration of American rights.

Having shown that Mr. Jackson's manner of conducting the correspondence with the Secretary of State was indecorous and insulting; having likewise shown, that from his own acknowledgment, he had no powers to redress past violations of rights; and that his mission, in whatever point of view it can be exhibited, was insidious, I will now proceed to show that Mr. Jackson gave the lie, open and direct, to the President of the United States, and likewise to the Secretary of State. I regret, sir, that I am compelled to speak of things as they are. I am not to be informed that some gentlemen fancy that they see Mr. Jackson's conduct, manner, and views, in a different light. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) saw the danger of handling this subject too rashly, the sharp, repellent points of which were to him visible; he touched them not. He retired from a contest which promised as great acquisition of fame. He very prudently took a wider range; in the amplitude of space, like a good pilot, he looked for least danger. Mr. Jackson, in attempting to prove that the President was fully acquainted with Mr. Canning's despatch of the 23d of January, 1809, which formed but one part of the instructions to Mr. Erskine, disregarded those forms of respect towards the Chief Magistrate of the United States that even rude and savage nations exact, and cause to be observed in honor of their chief. Mr. Jackson was early informed that the President had not seen the despatch to which he alluded, nor were such instructions known to form a part of those which Mr. Erskine had received, until a copy of the instructions were communicated by Mr. Pinkney, our Minister at the Court of St. James, some time after the disavowal had taken place. Notwithstanding this information, Mr. Jackson changed his ground, and insisted that, if the despatch alluded to had not been seen by the President, the substance of it had been given to him by Mr. Erskine; thence concluding that, under such circumstances, the President could not look for the execution of the provisional arrangement by the British Government. It is true that Mr. Erskine, in conversation with the Secretary of State, did state certain propositions verbally, which since the disavowal of the arrangement, are found to be in substance the same with those contained in the despatch of the 23d of January, but which Mr. Erskine never informed the Secretary of State were derived from his instructions; all which will evidently appear in the extract from his letter of the 14th August last, which I have read to the House, in arguing on the competency of Mr. Erskine's powers.

The Secretary of State knew, and it was no secret, that the British Ministry had long endeavored to induce this Government to surrender during the war the colonial trade, and he considered the renewal of this proposition by Mr. Erskine as a zealous effort on his part to try again the disposition of this Government on that point; finding himself checked at the outset, he took other ground, which being more compatible with the views of the President, served as the basis of the arrangement of April last. This, sir, is a true statement of facts, which Mr. Erskine's correspondence will prove to be just.

Although Mr. Jackson was repeatedly informed of the facts as stated, he continued to urge the same thing in such a manner as to compel the President, by continuing the correspondence, to acknowledge the truth of his assertions, and to stand self-condemned, as having, in the face of the world, deliberately maintained a falsehood. The President of the United States, conscious of adhering to fairness and honesty in all his nego-

tions with the British Government; having in his possession Mr. Erskine's letters, establishing beyond a doubt his title to that character, he determined to put a period to the repetition of a language implying a knowledge on the part of this Government, that the instructions of Mr. Erskine did not authorize him to conclude the arrangement of April last. In consequence of this determination, the Secretary of State, in a letter of the 1st of November, 1809, addressed to Mr. Jackson, says:

"After the explicit and peremptory asseveration, that this Government had no such knowledge, and that with such a knowledge no such arrangement would have been entered into, the view which you have again presented of the subject, makes it my duty to apprise you that such insinuations are inadmissible in the intercourse of a foreign Minister with a Government that understands what it owes to itself."

This intimation to Mr. Jackson had no effect. In the conclusion of his letter of the 14th of November, he again, in a strain not to be misunderstood, nor surpassed in rudeness, says:

"You will find, that in my correspondence with you, I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was unable to substantiate a fact. To facts, as I have become acquainted with them, I have scrupulously adhered; and, in so doing, I must continue, whenever the good faith of his Majesty's Government is called in question, to vindicate its honor and dignity, in the manner that appears to me best calculated for that purpose."

The President had, after this letter, no choice left him but to submit to the calumnies of the British Minister; to be told that no credit was due to his asseverations, or to sustain with becoming dignity, by terminating the mission of Mr. Jackson, the reputation of the American Republic.

In dismissing Mr. Jackson, I am persuaded, from my view of the whole affair, that the President did nothing more than he was imperiously bound to do. A Government, sir, that knows not how to respect itself, cannot be respected. Timidity never fails to invite aggressions, and to subject the nation that acts according to its suggestions to humiliation and disgrace.

As the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITTIN) has endeavored to show, that no similarity whatever between the case of De Palm and the present can be traced, I will ask your indulgence while I state the case of De Palm. In the year 1727, George the First, in his speech to Parliament, among other charges against the Emperor of Germany, assured them of the truth of this, that His Imperial Majesty had concluded a treaty with Spain, in which was a secret article to place the Pretender on the throne of Great Britain. His Imperial Majesty took umbrage at the King's speech, and ordered De Palm the imperial resident to present a remonstrance to the British Court. The remonstrance was framed in terms unusually bold and pointed, charging the King with calumnious misrepresentations, and hazarding assertions void of foundation." De Palm published this memorial.

Belsham, the British historian, says:

"The allegation contained in this letter and memorial, seem but too well founded; but the intemperate language of these papers gave high and just offence; and Mr. Shippen, Mr. Hungerford, Sir William Wyndham, and all the leaders of opposition in Parliament warmly concurred in the Address to the throne on this occasion, which passed the House without a dissentient vote, and De Palm was required forthwith to depart out of the kingdom."

My object is not to trace similitude of features in the cases of De Palm and of Mr. Jackson, the British Minister. No two faces are alike; no cases are uniform and exact in all their circumstances, but trifling shades of differences do not preclude a dependence on the same principle as a basis. I have a more important object in view than such a comparison; it is to inculcate this doctrine which the case of De Palm illuminates; that the first step to national greatness is harmony and concert in the Government, particularly so when a foreign Power is the opponent. The interposition of the authority and influence of Parliament in support of the Executive Magistrate against the Imperial Resident, De Palm, was proper, disinterested, and patriotic; and the sacrifice of party feelings by the opposition to the welfare of their country, an instance of magnanimity and self-command, not unworthy of the emulation of the American patriots.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) in the range he took, adverted to the following passage in the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney—"Another ground on which protection was asked for, is the supposed tendency of the language of our newspapers to excite popular violence on Mr. Jackson's person. Had he been longer and better acquainted with the habits and spirit of the American people, he would probably never have entertained an apprehension of that sort." The gentleman then asked, to what laws did the Secretary allude? In what courts were redress to be sought? Were the Federal courts to be thrown open and prosecutions to be instituted for libels under the common law? As this is not the first time that questions of this sort have come from that quarter, it becomes necessary to give them a short answer. It is now, sir, as it has always been, the doctrine of Republicans, that religious freedom and the liberty of the press, are subjects on which Congress cannot constitutionally legislate, if the following amendment to the Constitution has any meaning.—Article 1st. "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." And also, that the Federal courts cannot derive any jurisdiction from the common law, authorizing them to take cognizance of criminal offences. If Congress can by law abridge the freedom of the press, Congress can also by law establish a religion; to do either of which I contend no Constitutional power is given. From this view of the subject, I am convinced that the Secretary of State could allude to no other laws than to State laws. The liberty of the people is, thank God, under the guardianship of State sovereignty; and I trust the Republicans will never, while they are influenced by correct principles, usurp State powers. Mr. Jackson has a resort, if he pleases, to tribunals of justice as independent as these United States, composed of judges who are in no respect inferior to those of the Federal courts, in talents, abilities, or worth. No complaint can therefore be made either by His Britannic Majesty, or Mr. Jackson, his Minister, since the same tribunals of justice that protect the reputation and honor of the President and every other American citizen against the abuses of the press, are also open to him. The Constitution and laws of the United States are in other cases fully competent to his protection.

I shall now sir, take the liberty of directing my attention to some observations, which fell from a gentleman from the State of New York, (Mr. GARDENIER,) whom I am glad to see in his place. That honorable gentleman has told us that the intercourse with Great Britain would not be abandoned by the Northern farmers, as a commercial connexion with that country affords a vent for their surplus produce; and also that the interest of his constituents essentially depended on its renewal. I will undertake to convince that gentleman, that he ought to occupy other ground, by showing that a trade carried on with Great Britain alone would leave on the farmers' hands three-fourths of their surplus produce—a fact not very consoling to the farmers and planters of the United States. [Mr. GARDENIER rose to correct a misstatement into which Mr. N. had fallen. Mr. G. said if Mr. N. had added that the Northern States would not abandon their commerce with Great Britain for light and trivial causes, he would be correct.] I am willing, sir, to take the argument of the gentleman with this limitation, that the commercial intercourse with Great Britain should not be surrendered or abandoned for light and trivial causes. I have said enough on the conduct of Great Britain towards the United States, to show whether their complaints arise from, and whether the acts of this Government are founded on light and trivial causes. The view which I shall take of this subject and the facts connected with it, notwithstanding the explanation, will still be the same. Permit me, sir, to express my regret, that arguments on great national subjects, instead of being general and comprehensive, should be narrowed down and confined to local considerations. It is certainly improper and impolitic to cut the United States up into districts and slips, and to legislate for each division. This chequered patch-work sort of legislation comports not with the design of this Government, nor with the interest of this nation. Correct and enlightened policy inculcates liberal and enlarged views—sacrifices of local and minor interest to the promotion of the general good, and particularly this truism: that the health and vigor of the members are derived from the sanity and vigor of the body. My object is to show that our trade to Great Britain is far from being lucrative, that we are not dependent on her for our commercial prosperity, and that a trade confined to her ports solely for a short space of time, would have a paralyzing effect on agriculture. I shall arrive at my object by a plain statement of facts. The following extract is from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the House of Representatives in 1806—it will support my assertion. The report says: "On the exports to the dominions of Great Britain in Europe, it may be observed, that the tobacco is supposed to exceed the amount wanted for their own consumption; that as the laws of Great Britain do not permit for home consumption the importation of the greater part of the articles of foreign merchandise in American vessels, those which appear to have been shipped from the United States have generally been either cleared for England and a market, or when landed, warehoused for re-exportation; and that flour and wheat, which are not a permanent article of exportation to Great Britain, constituted more than two-thirds of the value of the provisions exported to that country in 1802 and 1803. Although the quantity of cotton exported to Great Britain is increasing, and its value amounted, in 1804, to near six millions two hundred thousand dollars; yet the total value of the exports to that country did not in that year, exceed, in articles both of domestic and foreign produce, thirteen millions two hundred thousand dollars, while the importation amounted to twenty-seven millions six hundred thousand dollars, making a balance in favor of Great Britain of fourteen millions two hundred thousand dollars. As this balance must necessarily be paid out of the proceeds of the exports of the United States to other countries, it follows that on the value of those exports depends the ability to pay for British manufactures to that extent; and that the quantity imported for home consumption or re-exportation must be affected by every obstruction to the commerce of the United States with other countries."

In the year 1803, the value of the exports of the United States in domestic produce to all parts of the world, amounted to more than forty-two millions of dollars, and, in 1807, to the value of forty-nine millions of dollars.

The exports of the United States, to all parts of the world in foreign produce, in 1804, amounted in value to thirty-six millions of dollars, and, in 1807, to forty-nine millions of dollars.

Thus, it appears, by regular calculations, that Great Britain does not take of our domestic produce, in value, quite thirteen millions of dollars, and of foreign produce not more than two millions two hundred and sixty thousand dollars. Hence, the following facts are evident, to wit: that if the United States were confined in their trade solely to Great Britain, domestic produce to the value of thirty odd millions of dollars would remain on the hands of the farmers and planters for want of a market; and between thirty-five and fifty-six millions of dollars in foreign produce would remain a dead capital in the country

H. OF R.

A consequence not generally taken into calculation would inevitably result from a trade confined to Great Britain alone. Such is the spirit of speculation, that it must be active. Shipments to Great Britain, in such a state of things, would be made; the markets would become glutted; the price of produce would sink below first cost, and bankruptcies would ensue, the effects of which would reach the peaceful mansions of the farmer and mechanic. I shall say nothing on the head of making Great Britain the depot of the produce of this country, to be by her transhipped to other countries; the Government of the United States revolts at such a pretension. It will never submit to wear the badge of colonial vassalage.

I will now show that the Northern States are not so much interested as the Middle and Southern States are, in the continuance of friendly intercourse with Great Britain.

The exports to Great Britain, in domestic produce, consist of the following articles:

Cotton	- - - - -	$5,000,000
Tobacco	- - - - -	3,200,000
Provisions	- - - - -	2,160,000
Lumber, naval stores, and potashes	- - - - -	1,570,000
All other articles of domestic produce	- - - - -	900,000

From this statement, if attentively considered, it will appear that the Middle and Southern States supply Great Britain with domestic produce to the value of eleven millions seven hundred and seventeen thousand dollars, and the New England States and State of New York with not more than amounts to one million seven hundred and twelve thousand dollars.

This last-mentioned sum, when divided into portions between the New England States and State of New York, will not very logically and arithmetically prove that the Northern States are more interested than the Middle and Southern States in a commercial intercourse with Great Britain.

It is, sir, far from my intention to derogate in the least from the commercial importance of the Northern States; nor is it my intention to make invidious comparisons. I have been reluctantly compelled to sift, to analyze the dogmas which have been so often pronounced with confidence on this floor, and to vindicate the character of the State I have the honor in part to represent, from the charge of being hostile to commerce, and particularly with Great Britain. I trust, sir, that I have shown that Virginia as a producing State is interested in commerce equally with her sister States; but I am satisfied that she will be among the last to surrender one national right to obtain a miserable pittance of commerce.

Much has been said, sir, on the subject of revenue, and many have deplored, in a manner not to be mistaken, the diminution of the same. It becomes important to understand the state of the Treasury, and the causes which have contributed to lessen the receipts. Every man who considers the situation of this country in a sober and temperate manner, must perceive that the fiscal operations of the United States have not been injured by any act of the Government. As most of our revenue is derived from commerce, any depression which the latter suffers must have a tendency to decrease the former. Our commerce with foreign nations is independent of the control of this Government. Each nation has the right and the power of executing the same within its dominions. A revenue which depends on commerce must necessarily be uncertain and capricious. It may be great to-day—to-morrow it may be less by half than on the preceding day. The arbitrary edicts of Government are to commerce what the state of the weather is to mercury in the tube of a thermometer; it rises and falls from the influence of causes over which there can be no control. The war between Great Britain and France is of a character that has no parallel in the history of the world. The law of nations in all former wars afforded some sort of protection to neutrals, but now it is a dead letter. Great Britain and France, by orders and decrees, prostrate, in the twinkling of an eye, the wise and venerable monuments of ages. In their rage against each other, and from the instigation of envy and jealousy at the prosperity of others, they respect no law nor rights. In the plenitude of power, their will is the law. From the convulsed state of Europe, the United States just rising from the confusion and depression of a long revolutionary contest for independence, had and still have a difficult part to act. Their policy has been to avoid being parties to a contest which promised no advantage. And it will require all the sagacity of the historian, who records the events of these times, to determine whether hostilities or alliances have been most fatal to the nation whose misfortune it has been to take sides. Suffice it to say that the commerce of the United States has suffered much from the orders and decrees of the belligerents.

Can it, therefore, be a matter of wonder that the revenue should experience some diminution, which depended, in times like these, on the prosperity of commerce? No little consolation is, however, derived from knowing that though our embarrassments have been great, the revenue has been such, as, by able management, to support the Government without resorting to taxes, and to enable the Republicans to pay large debts contracted in times of Federal prosperity.

If a loan of four millions should be required, it will be borrowed to pay a creditor. No new debt is thereby created.

Although a loan to that amount should be made, yet the national debt is diminishing, inasmuch as an appropriation to the amount of eight millions of dollars is made for the payment of the public debt.

As a great deal has been said about the revenue, it is necessary that the observations should be fairly met. From some remarks and hints, a supposition may be entertained that the present administrators of the Government have been lavish of the public treasure—that they have been prodigal. To rebut such insinuations, let facts be stated. On vague assertions no reliance can be had; a comparative view of the Federal and Re-

Indian title extinguished to many millions of acres on the eastern side of the Mississippi.

The credit of the nation is such as to command whatever it may require.

The resolution from the Senate is said to have a war aspect. If it has, I am too blind to see it; but, for argument sake, let us suppose it takes strong ground. Can we, sir, from the conduct of the British Minister, do less? When the Government is insulted by the Minister of a foreign Power, we owe it to our constituents, and to ourselves, to maintain its rights and dignity. To do less would be, in my opinion, to tarnish, if not to surrender, that independence so honorably achieved by the valor of our ancestors. No man in this nation has a greater abhorrence to war and its demoralizing tendencies, than I. I am unwilling to draw the sword, unless imperious necessity urges an appeal to it as indispensable. But, will the fear of war put it at a distance from us? Is fear the ægis that is to shield this nation from it? History informs us that suppliant nations have felt most severely its scourge. No nation that ever purchased a peace, but gave a premium for war. To look danger in the face, is to disarm it. Did our ancestors, of glorious memory, obtain independence by half-way measures and indecision? No; they resolved to be free, and became free.

They determined not to submit to the power of the British Parliament, to tax them. They resisted the insignificant, contemptible tax, not because it was oppressive, but because the payment of one cent would establish the right of the British Parliament to tax them. Without a Government, without money, without a Treasury, without credit, without arms—in short, without anything necessary to carry on war except union and stout hearts; they refused to pay the tea tax, and in defence of those rights which nature's God had given them, they commenced the contest. In a righteous cause they had nothing to fear.

That God who led the persecuted through the fiery furnace untouched and unhurt, led them also through Revolutionary horrors and carnage, and, on the ruins of their oppressors, erected the standard of independence. Shall we, sir, under a Government of our own choice, and with means not inferior to those of any nation whatever—shall we, in this temple dedicated to liberty and independence, strike the consecrated standard? I trust in God we shall not. If necessary, I trust we shall, heart and hand, unite to carry it again victorious through the ranks of our enemies, and erect it again on their ruins.

As an observation has been made tending to show that opposition to the administration of the Government is not inconsistent with an enlightened zeal for liberty, or attachment to the Constitution, it becomes necessary to understand the extent and force of the observation before we give to it the importance of a political maxim. If no more be meant than that a Representative of the people is bound to give every act of the other branches of Government a dispassionate investigation, and to withhold his assent from measures which he is conscientiously convinced, cannot promote the public good, I accord to the justice of it. The sovereign power of the nation being intrusted and confided to our exercise, and to that of the other co-ordinate branches of Government, we are solemnly called upon to exert our energies, mental and physical, for the desirable purpose of deriving from the Constitution every good that it is susceptible of bestowing. We have pledged ourselves to the citizens of United America so to act; we are bound to fulfil the expectations of the people; and to transmit to posterity a freehold patrimony of liberty and independence.

These blessings are now within our reach; they will never descend to posterity, if we permit the bane, the poison of all free Governments, the spirit of faction, to assail the constituted authorities; it is a friction that will, by a slow and ceaseless action, wear away and ultimately destroy the springs that give to Republics an irresistible force. I am not, sir, the advocate, nor will I be, of any measure which shall not derive its origin from a Constitutional or correct political principle. I will, to the best of my weak judgment, pursue that line of conduct which appears just and proper; which, while it teaches me that I ought to respect myself, informs me that respect is also due to those who are honored with the confidence of the nation, and are made the depositaries of its power. No measure should be con-signed, from the prevalence of party spirit or feelings, either to blind approbation or to blind reprobation. Personal considerations should give place to sentiments of patriotism. The ambition of ministering as the high priest at the altar of a party should be merged in that elevated enthusiasm that would make us worshippers in the true faith at the altar of our country. The constituted authorities would then, each in its appropriate sphere, perform its Constitutional functions; accomplishing the end of its creation, in feeling and obeying the genial influence of the people, the centre of the system. The despots of the world would tremble at the power of the nation when that power would be wielded by the nation. If the best interest of this nation should not be properly secured and maintained as it ought, I trust in God that the citizens of United America will awaken, to behold the dangers that surround them; that they will trace effects to their cause; that they will ascend to the fountains from which all their misfortunes flow; that they will, at a crisis like this, rise in the majesty of their strength, and communicate to the national arm the power of the nation.

Mr. STANLEY said he did not flatter himself he could add anything to the information which the House already possessed on this subject. Yet, as a measure was about to be adopted, which without the possibility of yielding any advantage, would, in his opinion, fix a stain on the national character, and put at hazard the peace and prosperity of the country, he felt impelled by the imperious call of duty, to raise his feeble voice against it. Permit me here, said Mr. S., to express the surprise and regret with which I have heard observations from those who support the resolution, which, having no connexion with the resolution itself, are calculated, if not intended, to excite the passions of the House or of the people; to furo-rize the public mind; to mislead our judgments in deciding the question, and to obtain a result rather from passion than reason. I allude to the repeated recital of British outrages, the bombardment of Copenhagen, and the attack on Constantinople. A calm discussion of the question itself, would probably lead to as correct a decision, and be not less honorable to the American Congress. The danger of foreign influence has been mentioned to us, by way of caution, I presume. A solicitude on this point can be but commendable, though I hope unnecessary. It may be the fate of this country to be cursed with men whose ill-directed ambition, and predominant selfish views, lead them to support the interest and the designs of foreign nations, though adverse to the interests and honor of their own. If such there be, let them be marked as objects of suspicion, scorn, and contempt.

It has also been the fate of other countries, and may be the misfortune of this, to possess in its bosom, and to cherish in its confidence, men, who from an equally base and corrupt self-love and ill-directed ambition, become supple courtiers, political sunflowers, cringing demagogues; who, worshipping the idol power, whether in the hands of a military commander, a protector, or a consul, tender an implicit obedience and united support to every measure which emanates from the Executive, the source of office and profit. Such men bring upon a country the curses of undue domestic influence. Not to know and not to fear the dangers both of foreign and domestic influence, is to close our eyes on the light of history, and to disregard the testimony of ages. The States of Greece, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPER) reminds us, fell from foreign influence; the unhappy Kingdom of Spain at this moment groans and bleeds from the same cause. And, sir, from domestic influence, Rome had her Cæsar, England her Cromwell, and France now drags the chains of Bonaparte. Should it ever become the settled doctrine in this country, that the opinions and the measures of the Executive are entitled to our prompt acquiescence and blind support; that, like the devoted soldier, a mere military machine, we are not to pause over a vote; that free discussion of the merits of the Executive shall authorize suspicion of the purity of the citizen; the time will be fast hastening when a throne shall be erected upon the ruins of the Constitution of the United States, and the name of America be added to the list of those Republics which have "risen like the rocket, and fallen like the stick." Whether either of these parties exist in this country, I need not at this time inquire; no circumstance could render such an inquiry in this place other than unpleasant. I have suggested the possibility of their existence, and their evils, with a view equally pure, I hope, with that of those who have before alluded to them, and to excite a caution which well merits the attention of the American people.

Associated in this House with gentlemen, all of whom I am to presume are actuated by the same love of country; who alike feel the obligations of honor, conscience, regard to the Constitution and responsibility to our constituents—I cannot but believe they act on this occasion with motives as pure as my own. Yet, sir, feeling myself bound by these high sanctions to pursue the course pointed out by my own judgment, and the dictates of my own conscience, I am compelled to declare, that I disapprove the conduct of the Administration in the affair with Mr. Jackson, and that I am decidedly opposed to the resolution before us.

From the view I have taken of the correspondence between Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson, my mind is satisfied—

That the letters of Mr. Jackson do not contain the insult to our Administration which is imputed to them by the resolution. That, if they did, the Congress of the United States are not required either by duty or policy to interfere in the business—and that if they will interfere, the resolution under consideration is improper. On each of these points I will submit a few observations.

In regard to the insult said to be contained in Mr. Jackson's letters, my remarks shall be brief, with no other reference to the letters already so often repeated, as to have become "dull as a tale twice told," than I may conceive necessary to be intelligible. The offensive idea "that the Executive Government of the United States had a knowledge that the arrangement lately made by Mr. Erskine in behalf of his Government with the Government of the United States, was entered into without competent powers on the part of Mr. Erskine for that purpose," is said in the resolution to be conveyed in Mr. Jackson's letter of the 23d of October, and to be repeated in that of the 4th of November. Yet, as if it was on all hands admitted that no such idea could be found in these letters, all who have most anxiously desired to find it, have endeavored to establish it by recutting to Mr. Jackson's letter of the 11th of October, and there point us to that part of the letter, where Mr. Jackson in reply to Mr. Smith's declaration, that an explanation was expected of the grounds of the disavowal by His Britannic Majesty of the arrangement made between Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine, informs Mr. Smith, that he had seen with pleasure the forbearance of Mr. Smith, to complain of this disavowal. "inasmuch as you could not but have thought it unreasonable to complain of the disavowal of an act done under such circumstances as could only lead to the consequences that have actually followed." He adds, "It was not known when I left England whether Mr. Erskine had, according to the liberty allowed him, communicated to you in extenso his original instructions; it now appears that he did not. But in reverting to his official correspondence, and particularly to a despatch addressed on the 20th of April to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I find that he there states, that he submitted to your consideration the three conditions specified in those instructions, as the groundwork of an arrangement which, according to information received from this country, it was thought in England might be made, with a prospect of great mutual advantage. Mr. Erskine then reports, verbatim et seriatim, your observations upon each of the three conditions, and the reasons which induced you to think that others might be substituted in lieu of them. It may have been concluded between you that these latter were an equivalent for the original conditions; but the very act of substitution evidently shows that those original conditions were in fact very explicitly communicated to you, and by you of course laid before the President for his consideration. I need hardly add, that the difference between these conditions, and those contained in the arrangement of the 18th and 19th of April, is sufficiently obvious to require no elucidation; nor need I draw the conclusion, which I consider as admitted by all absence of complaint on the part of the American Government, viz: that under such circumstances His Majesty had an undoubted right to disavow the act of his Minister."

As the offensive idea is alleged to be an allusion to the circumstances under which the arrangement with Mr. Erskine was concluded, which justified the King in disavowing it; intimated to be known to our Administration at the date of this letter; it is necessary to search, from the evidence before us, what those circumstances were upon which the King justified his disavowal; these found, we shall be at no loss to fix Mr. Jackson's allusion, and then to inquire whether these circumstances, thus alluded to, were in fact known to our Administration. It appears from the documents before us, that the King's Order in Council of the 24th of May, 1809, announcing the provisional agreement concluded by Mr. Erskine and the disavowal of it, assigns as the sole ground of the disavowal, that the said agreement "was not such as was authorized by His Majesty's instructions." And Mr. Pinkney, on the 28th of May, informs Mr. Smith, that the British Minister, Mr. Canning, had in their interview on the 25th of May declared "that the British Minister (Mr. Erskine) had acted in his late negotiation and engagements with you, not only without authority, but in direct opposition to the most precise instructions;" that these facts were communicated by Mr. Pinkney, and known to our Administration before the arrival of Mr. Jackson, appears from the correspondence between Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine in July and August. Mr. Jackson also, in his letter of the 11th of October, says that his Government "with frankness, promptitude, and a most scrupulous regard to national honor, gave notice to the American Minister in London of the disavowal of the motives of it, and of the precautions spontaneously taken by His Majesty to prevent any loss or injury accruing to the citizens of the United States from an agreement however unauthorized, made in His Majesty's name." And in his letter to Mr. Smith, 23d of October, explicitly declares "His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it." And to dispense with a recital of each particular in which the instructions were disregarded, Mr. Jackson adds, "These instructions I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were at the time in substance made known to you; no stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement."

We thus find the British Government on every occasion, and through every agent, assigning the violation of instructions, and the want of authority in Mr. Erskine to conclude the agreement, as the sole ground of the disavowal, and relying on that ground, and no other, to shield them from the charge of perfidy. With this evidence before us; with the admission of Mr. Jackson "that the instructions were not made known in extenso;" with the correspondence of Mr. Smith and Mr. Erskine showing the knowledge of our Administration of the instructions to Mr. Erskine and of the grounds of the disavowal of his arrangement prior to the arrival of Mr. Jackson in the United States, does it consist with candor and good sense; is it not a palpable violation of both, so to torture the language of Mr. Jackson in his letter of the 11th of October, in allusion to the circumstances which "could only lead to the disavowal," and to the knowledge of them by our Administration, which prevented their complaints to him on his arrival as to make them convey an idea that a distinct and different ground of disavowal existed than that which his Government and himself had before repeatedly assigned; to impute to him the insinuation that the restricted authority of Mr. Erskine was known at the time of the arrangement, when he had explicitly declared that the instructions were not made known in extenso," and thus to fix upon him the absurdity of contradicting himself!

Such construction, and such an imputation, in my opinion, is at war with every sound rule of construction, and every honorable principle of just and fair dealing. It is worthy the observation of those gentlemen who so clearly see an insult in this letter of the 11th of October, that they have found what had escaped the jealous perspicacity of Mr. Smith, and the patient research of the draughter of the resolution; since Mr. Smith, in his reply of the 19th of October, gives no intimation of anything offensive in this letter, and the resolution confines the insulting idea to the letter of the 23d of October. We come now to the letter of the 23d of October, in which, according to the resolution, is contained the "insolent and indelicate expressions, conveying the idea that the Executive Government of the United States had a knowledge that the arrangement lately made by Mr. Erskine with the Government of the United States was entered into without competent power on the part of Mr. Erskine." The offensive idea is said to be found in the following part of Mr. Jackson's letter: "I have no hesitation in informing you that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was concluded in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand by your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were at the time in substance made known to you; no stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred than by a reference to the terms of your agreement." There is no equivocation in this language. He says the instructions were made known in substance—an expression which from its very terms excludes the idea of being made known in full extent; and that it is true, as Mr. J. here alleges, that the substance of

Mr. Erskine's instructions were made known, appears from Mr. Smith's letter of the 19th of October. "Certain it is that your predecessor did present for my consideration the three conditions which now appear in the printed document; that he was disposed to urge them more than the nature of two of them (both palpably inadmissible, and one of them more than merely inadmissible) could permit, and that on finding his first proposals unsuccessful, the more reasonable terms comprised in the arrangement respecting the Order in Council were adopted." And Mr. Erskine himself declared to his Government, 20th of April, as stated by Mr. Jackson to Mr. Smith, 11th of October, and not questioned by him, "that he had submitted to the consideration of Mr. Smith the three conditions specified in his instructions, as the groundwork of an arrangement," and adds the reasons which induced Mr. Smith to think "that others might be substituted in lieu of them." These expressions of Mr. Jackson are unequivocal, free from obliquity, and cover no insinuation. They assert a single fact, the existence of which is established by the letters of Mr. Smith himself. To find in them a meaning "conveying the insolent and indecorous idea that our Government knew of Mr. Erskine's restricted authority" is to give to language a signification different from that heretofore received, and to exert a strength of imagination to which I have no pretensions. But in the letter of Mr. Jackson of November 4, is said, by the resolution, to be found "the still more insolent and affronting" repetition of the same insinuation. In the conclusion of this letter Mr. J. complains, not intemperately, of the liberty Mr. Smith claimed of styling his remarks "irrelevant and improper," a freedom which I should regret to believe would be justified by our Secretary's ideas of decorum. Mr. Jackson concludes in the words which are said to contain this offensive repetition of the imaginary insult: "You will find in my correspondence with you, that I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me, and at least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was unable to substantiate a fact."

If Mr. Jackson had really uttered an unfounded insinuation, he here certainly repeats it, because he adheres to all he had before said, and retracts nothing. But if, as I believe, he had not made any insinuations, but had directly and obviously referred to facts which were either admitted or had been substantially proved, and more especially as he has not anywhere made the insinuation charged, "that our Government were acquainted with Mr. Erskine's restricted authority," the conclusion seems to be irresistible, that he could not here repeat an insinuation which he had not previously made. This paragraph obviously means that he had abstained from such an insinuation because "he was unable to substantiate the fact." Nor can I conceive how this declaration could be offensive to Mr. Smith, unless received by him as presenting a contrast to his own department, in which case he owes his feelings to his own conscientious sensibility.

Were it, however, otherwise, and if, instead of an insinuation so hidden that a Secretary of State only can discover it, Mr. Jackson had given a direct and unequivocal insult, the Congress of the United States are not required either by duty or policy to interfere. The Constitution has wisely created different branches of the Government, committed to each its separate cares and duties, made each independent of the other, intending thereby to secure the separate deliberation and separate responsibility of each. To attain its blessings, these valuable objects of the Constitution ought not to be defeated. To the President alone is given the power to receive Ministers and to treat with them, and as in the course of this duty he becomes personally interested in the department of foreign Ministers, if they demean themselves disrespectfully towards him, he is clothed with the power to break off intercourse with them at pleasure, and so far to suspend their ministerial functions. This power has been repeatedly exercised by our Presidents, as the Constitution intended it should be, upon their own responsibility. And it is the highest policy of this Government, in order to obtain the advantages of the free judgment and decision of the President, so to conduct towards him that he should learn to act without fear of the censure of Congress on the one hand, and without any hope on the other, that their countenance shall shelter his measures from scrutiny. This policy, and the strict inviolability of the Executive power in all cases of treaty, were emphatically settled in the case of Jay's Treaty, in which the President, (whose independent example deserves more respect than it has met from his successors,) standing upon his own responsibility refused to submit to the House of Representatives any papers relating to that negotiation, except the treaty itself. Yet if the plan proposed by these resolutions be adopted; if we by formal resolutions approve the conduct of the President in an affair so exclusively his own, as that of the rupture with Mr. Jackson, may we not on some future occasion, as observed by my honorable colleague, (Mr. MA-CON,) claim the right of censuring in matters equally within his sole and peculiar province? If, then, we are to interfere with Executive duties, not merely as sycophants, applauding his every act, but as freemen condemning what we do not approve, the inevitable consequence must be, a conflict between the Executive and Legislative Departments, in which the wounds of either can only be inflicted through the Constitution; or (an issue equally fatal) the advantages intended to be derived from separate deliberation, distinct responsibility, and mutual jealousy and watchfulness of the separate departments disappear, in a miserable complaisance of acting by previous concert, and thus propping each other before the people.

But, sir, to sanction this resolution, we have been referred to the resolutions of the British Parliament in the year 1787, in the case of De

Palm, the Imperial Minister. Sir, I conceive precedents of legislative flattery or complaisance, in other terms, professions of duty and allegiance to the Executive of this country, are not happily drawn from the records of Great Britain. I consider it dangerous, if not degrading, that a republican Congress should consider their conduct towards the President as justified by the example of correspondent humility of an English Parliament towards a King. But, independent of all these considerations, the case of De Palm has already been shown to be so entirely unlike the one before us, that I am surprised the gentleman last up (Mr. NEWTON) should have ventured again to have relied on it in support of the resolution before us. Let me again briefly notice the circumstance which distinguish De Palm's case from Mr. Jackson's: De Palm, by command of his Sovereign, the Emperor of Germany, (as he expressly declares,) in a memorial by him addressed to the King, and published to the nation, charged the King with "distorting things in his speech to their worst sense, stating others destitute of all foundation, empty, frivolous, supported by no manner of truth," with "want of sincerity in endeavoring to excite the nation," and concludes that "His Imperial Majesty had strictly enjoined him to declare these things to the King, to the Kingdom of Great Britain and to the world." In this publication we are not driven to a laborious investigation of every word to strain the imagination and torture our complaisance to find, or to acknowledge we have found an insinuation. The charge of falsehood and hypocrisy is directly made, by order of one Monarch to another. And this, too, at a period when the Sovereign thus charged, George I, was but recently seated on his throne, by a precarious and disputed title, not well-seated in the affections of his subjects, among whom the sparks of rebellion and disaffection soon appeared not to have been extinguished; charges so infamous, made and published by the Emperor's express command, could but excite alarm of increasing the disaffection of the people, encouraging the many and powerful supporters of the cause of the Pretender to the throne of his ancestors, and thus of bringing both George the First and his Parliament, as traitors, to the scaffold. Under such circumstances, well might the Parliament and King resolve to "stand by" each other, since upon mutual safety their lives and fortunes depended. Mr. Jackson made no direct charge of any improper conduct in our Government; the front of his offence is said to be an insinuation, which, if it existed, came only from himself, not from his Sovereign, and has already been sufficiently repelled by the President's demand of his recall and refusal further to communicate with him.

Still further, if it were conceded that in any case of disagreement between the President and a foreign Minister, Congress could with propriety add the weight of their anathema to the correction previously inflicted by the President, the present case does not require it, because Mr. Jackson has openly and honorably tendered an atonement for the imagined affront. In his message by Mr. Oakley, of the 13th of November, he declares "his regret at the construction put on his correspondence; that he could not imagine that offence would be taken at it by the American Government, as most certainly none was intended on his part." We have been referred in this debate, in justification of the measure now proposed, to the course which our feelings would dictate in case of insinuations deemed affrontful in private life. Permit me to ask, what man of sensibility, what chivalrous knight who bends in devotion to the imperious voice of honor, would not in private life be satisfied with the explanation here offered?—the explicit declaration directly and respectfully made, "I regret my conduct toward you is viewed as offensive; most certainly no offence on my part was intended?" With no pretensions to knowledge on this subject, I can only say, that my feelings would in such a case be satisfied with such an apology. This apology was refused; because, it is said, Mr. J. had previously demanded his passports. The documents before us exhibit this demand. Mr. J. it seems was so far unacquainted with the American people, as to apprehend personal violence from those whose abuses were, it is true, not sparingly bestowed upon him even before his arrival, from certain presses in the United States. Passports, in diplomatic language, I understand to be a permission to leave the Kingdom, found necessary from the jealous caution existing in Europe from the situation and junction of territory, divided by imaginary lines. Mr. Jackson demanded not such passport, but for such "document, passport, or safeguard," as might protect his person and the persons of his family from violence; so the Administration understood him, and granted him, not a passport to leave the United States, but "a certificate of his public character." Thus, sir, on this unsubstantial pretext, is rested the rejection of this frank apology by the Administration; and we, as if fatally bent on discord, are, without necessity in my opinion, about to follow their injudicious example.

But, sir, said Mr. STANLEY, waiving for the present every other objection, I disapprove the resolution on account of the improper language in which it is couched, and from an apprehension of the consequences to which it may lead. If it be determined that the miserable system of words is to be continued, that we are still longer to rely on resolutions to support the national interests, and retrieve the national character, we should at least remember the respect a nation owes to itself, that the language of reproach may be so used as to degrade those who adopt it, no less than those to whom it is applied; as a gentleman who should stoop to a gutter to attack an enemy, could not expect to rise without having partaken of the soil which he had scattered. We charge a public Minister, the accredited representative of the British Empire, with "indecorum and insolence," with "the crime of direct and aggravated affront, of insidious attempts, and of using false and fallacious disguises." It has been said of a throne, and ought, I should hope, to be equally applicable to the representatives of a Republic, "that every ray which beams from it should bear the character of purity, nobleness, and grandeur." Is the language of this resolution that of "purity, nobleness, and grandeur?" On the contrary, intemperate, harsh, and opprobrious, does it not violate those very principles of decorum of which we profess to be the champions, and in thus correcting Mr. Jackson's offence of indecorum not only commit ourselves, but descend to hectoring as well as abusing? The reply of Scipio to the Romans on an occasion of this kind, presents an example worthy of our imitation. The Carthaginians having abused the sanctity of the character of the Roman Ambassadors, their Ministers were brought before Scipio, and he was asked, what return should punish the perfidy of the Carthaginians? His reply, worthy a Roman, worthy an American, was, "do not do yourselves that which you condemn in the Carthaginians." If Mr. Jackson has been guilty of using insolent and indecorous language, let us not degrade ourselves by committing the same offence.

It is worthy of observation that upon former occasions of differences between our Executive and foreign Ministers, no such course as that now proposed has been adopted. Genet, the Minister of the French Directory, violated our rights of sovereignty no less than the principles of decorum. He issued commissions to raise troops within our territory, to be employed against a nation with whom we were at peace. He appealed from the decision of WASHINGTON to the people. In an official letter he accused the Secretary of State (Jefferson) with the despicable duplicity of "holding a language official and a language confidential." His recall was requested, and he was recalled. In the case of Yrujo, the Spanish Minister, his deportment, insolent and affrontful, gave offence to the late President. He was simply requested to be recalled. On these occasions, where the offence was not, as in the present, a doubtful "intimation," an equivocal "insinuation," but a direct and outrageous injury and affront, no means were used to excite the passions of this people, or to wound the feelings of the nations whose representatives had offended us; no resolutions of Congress were resorted to; no threats were fulminated; no pledges of standing by the President were made. The President discharged his duty by requesting the recall of the offending Ministers, and the people were content. Why is a different course now necessary? Not that by an assurance we may give confidence to the President of the readiness of the people to support the Government of their country, if the rupture with the British Minister (however mistaken its policy) should lead to war. Neither the President, nor any other man, can doubt our promptness to defend ourselves if attacked. Such a declaration implies a doubt of the fact, and a doubt on this point is not more degrading than unjust to our character. One view in the resolution must be to prop the conduct of the Administration in this affair, and sorry I am to say, that their conduct needs a more substantial apology than this resolution can afford, or any that I have yet heard.

I further see in this resolution not only the protraction of a settlement of our differences with Great Britain, but an intention to precipitate us into a war with that country. Language so harsh and affrontful applied to the British Minister, accompanied with what has aptly been called "a defiance to battle to the British nation," cannot be expected to conciliate, but to wound and irritate; it may lead to retaliating measures, and plunge us directly into war. I may be mistaken in this apprehension, but I will state the grounds of it. The unquestioned fact that the honorable mover of this resolution (Mr. GILES) desires an immediate war with Great Britain; the declaration of that gentleman in his speech in support of them, that he thought it probable Great Britain would make them a pretext for war; the pledge made in the resolutions to call forth the resources of the United States, predicated only on a conviction that war may result from them; and added to all these, the course adhered to in this House, in which the repeated declaration of the tendency of this measure to produce war has been met not by a denial of this suggestion, but by an enumeration of the wrongs of Great Britain to us and other nations, and by a recurrence to the weakness of our past measures, as confirming and justifying the effect of the resolution in producing war as more energetic.

Gentlemen have a right to prefer war to peace; but when they mean to produce a war, why bring it about by indirect means? Why not with honorable frankness avow war to be their object, and meet us before the people upon the open ground of war or peace, and not under the pretence of providing a salvo for our wounded honor apply an evil instead of a remedy; offering a boon, but in truth presenting an "asp in the basket of figs?" Whenever this country is disposed for war, let it boldly speak an unequivocal language and prepare for battle. These half-way measures confess to the world we wish to stab, but dare not strike.

But, sir, if war is to be sought, why choose it with Great Britain alone, while France as well as England continues her aggressions on our rights? From England we have impressments, blockades, and Orders in Council. France, less cruel to us than to other nations to whom she has extended "friendship and protection," yet permits us to exist as a nation, but violates a solemn treaty made with us; burns our ships upon the ocean; imprisons our men; sequesters and confiscates our property; and by her decrees prohibits our trade with all the world not subject to her dominion. In this state of our relations to both nations, I find nothing to induce us to strike at England alone, or so to act as to provoke the blow from her. Besides, sir, that I see not the justice of going to war with England alone, or the policy of beginning it with that nation whose absolute command of the ocean gives her the power to do us most harm, I am opposed to any war in the present state of the world, and the present situation of our own country. The only legitimate objects of war are the redress or the prevention of injuries. Can we at this time go to war with France and England, or with either, with a reasonable prospect of effecting these ends? With an empty Treasury; a revenue sunk so low as to render loans necessary for the support of Government; fortifications so incompetent to their object that we keep secret the report of the department on their situation; an inexperienced Army; a Navy dwindled into gunboats, despicable for either attack or defence, and efficient only as a moth in the public purse! With these evidences of want of preparation gentleman talk of going to war! In a war under such circumstances, I see the immediate loss of millions of dollars of property placed by our trade in the grasp of Great Britain; vexatious draughts of our citizens to fight Indians and Canadians; the impressment of our seamen into the despised and degrading gunboat service, under the specious title of draughts of "marine militia;" heavy taxes; the production of our farms rotting, and the farmer and merchant impoverished for want of commerce; your seaport towns bombarded and in ashes. These are the consequences which every man must perceive to be inevitable from a war in our present situation. Weighty as are all these evils of a war at this period with Great Britain, there is another still greater than these; one which at once puts in jeopardy not only our republican form of government, but our very existence as a nation. I mean an alliance with Napoleon! Dazzling as has been the path of this man's glory, I pray gentlemen to reflect a moment on the fate of those nations to whom his "friendship and protection" have been extended, and to pause before they throw our country into that embrace which has proved fatal to the independence of all who have heretofore submitted to it. And for what are these evils to be endured? Because the sensibility of our Secretary of State is wounded by an obscure intimation—a suspected insinuation from the British Minister! Sir, before gentleman draw the sword for this cause, let the question be submitted to the people, and let them answer in the next elections. Are you for war with Great Britain for this cause? On this point I fully agree with my honorable colleague, (Mr. MACON.) The people of North Carolina, at all times averse to war, can yet submit to any sacrifices of blood and fortune when necessary for their honor or safety. But I know them not, if they will approve the war which it is the object of this resolution to produce.

The arrangement of April last between our Administration and Mr. Erskine, stipulating on our part for the removal of the restrictions of the non-intercourse and non-importation laws, as to Great Britain, and on her part the discontinuance of her Orders in Council on the 10th of June, and the disavowal of that arrangement by the British Government, though not necessary to be considered as coming to a decision on the resolution before us, yet, having a near relation to the subject, has been brought into the discussion. I may be pardoned, therefore, for expressing my view of that matter. Standing upon the high republican ground, that the Administration, if not our servants, are assuredly not our masters, I shall, in the investigation of their conduct, use the freedom which belongs to a freeman, while I cannot forget the candor which becomes me as a man and a member of this House.

I ask then, sir, whence has arisen this new difficulty, this additional point of collision between us and Great Britain, which has given birth to that controversy which the national councils are now called upon to consider; a controversy which is said to have inflicted a wound on our honor, which this resolution or war alone can heal? I say, sir, and I say it with regret because the evidence which satisfies my mind is painful to me, that the Administration in the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, if they did not disregard, certainly neglected their duty, in overlooking an objection which existed to that arrangement; I mean the want of power in Mr. Erskine to conclude it. Great Britain, as we all now know, has disavowed that arrangement, because entered into without any authority on the part of Mr. Erskine. Mr. E. was the resident Minister of Great Britain, and in that character it appears concluded that arrangement. Sir, books of the highest authority in the laws of nations, Wicquefort, Grotius, and others, have been read to us in this debate, which established beyond question, that a Minister resident has not by virtue of his general letter of credence any power to conclude a treaty, or to make any stipulation binding on his Government—that to enable him to pledge the good faith of his Sovereign to the performance of any stipulation he may make, distinct powers, delegating special authority to negotiate and conclude, are necessary. I have waited with an anxious hope, that if the authority of these writers could be impeached, or if the reverse of the proposition laid down by them could be established, some gentleman would have done it. That, if no gentleman here possessed the necessary information, some friend of the Secretary of State would have obtained his illustration of the point, and have favored us with it. So far from this having been done, gentlemen have satisfied themselves with feeble efforts to shake the high authority of this principle in the laws of nations, by their own assertion of its error, or by the production of passages from writings perfectly irrelevant to the subject.

The gentleman from the Mississippi Territory (Mr. POINDEXTER) and the gentlemen first and last up from Virginia (Messrs. ERBES and NEWTON) resort to what logicians call "begging the question," they have taken that for granted which is the matter in dispute, the very thing required to be proved. They assume it as a fact that Mr. Erskine was a competent agent to conclude the stipulation with our Administration, and then search the civil law, and show from Pothier (what no one denies) that the bona fide act of an authorized agent, whatever may be his secret instructions, is binding on his principal; a rule by the by which however established between individual, principal, and agent, will appear not to apply as between a Government and its agent. Sir, the question is, was Mr. Erskine a Minister resident, authorized to conclude a treaty, or agreement, or arrangement, and to bind his Government by its stipulations? The opinion of the most respectable writers on the laws of nations having been read, I need only refer to them; they concur in deciding that such Minister has no such power. The practice of the British Government and of our Government since its existence have been in strict conformity with this opinion. In every case where a Minister resident has concluded a treaty, a special full power, or an authority separate and distinct from his general letter of credence, has been given. In the negotiation with Mr. Hammond, the British Minister resident in 1791, his full powers were at the threshold demanded. Separate powers were granted to our Ministers at London and France, under Washington and Adams; and to Monroe at London, under Mr. Jefferson; these cases all establish the same principle. In corroboration of all these authorities of law and usage, the Administration were reminded of the principle, and seem themselves to have entertained this opinion previous to bringing us into this dilemma. Mr. Pinkney writes them from London, the first letter in the President's communication, (its date is not given,) that he had suggested to Mr. Canning, "that it would be well (in case a special mission did not meet their approbation) that the necessary powers should be sent to Mr. Erskine." And the President informed us at the commencement of the last session of Congress, that "the British Government had transmitted to their Legation here, provisional instructions not only to offer satisfaction for the attack on the Chesapeake, to make known His Britannic Majesty's disposition to send an Envoy Extraordinary with powers to conclude a treaty, but moreover to signify his willingness in the meantime to withdraw his Orders in Council, in the persuasion that the intercourse with Great Britain would be renewed on the part of the United States."

In opposition to all this, gentlemen oppose their assertion; Mr. Erskine had power to conclude the arrangement which he made. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NEWTON,) to show that he had this power as Minister resident, reads to us the opinion of Mr. Hammond, in his letter to Mr. Jefferson in 1791; that his general plenipotentiary character, and his recognition as such, "are authorities decidedly adequate to the commencement of a preliminary negotiation." This is admitted. Mr. Erskine had the same power to commence a preliminary negotiation; but he did more, he concluded an agreement; he concluded the agreement without producing any special, separate authority, giving him such power, nor does it appear any was demanded from him. Let us hear Mr. Secretary Smith in his defence upon this point. In his letter to Mr. Jackson, 19th of October, he says of Mr. Erskine, "that he had, or

‘at least, that he believed he had sufficient authority to conclude the arrangement, his formal assurances, during our discussion were such as to leave no doubt.’ And in his letter to Mr. Pinkney of 23d of November, 1809, he says, ‘certain it is that the British Government in former like cases, as will be seen by the adjustment of that part of the affair at Nootka Sound, which is analogous to this case, did not consider any such distinct full power as necessary.’ As to the case of the adjustment of the British difference with Spain respecting Nootka Sound, I have not an intimate recollection of its circumstances, but I have recently recurred to the adjustment entered into by Mr. Fitzherbert, the British Minister, and Count Florida Blanca, the Spanish Minister, and find in the declaration of the Spanish Secretary of State, that Minister declares, that “being thereto duly authorized” he offers certain terms. The British Minister in his counter declaration, accepting the proposed terms of adjustment, declares that he, being thereto duly and expressly authorized, accepts the said declaration. And the “convention” signed 28th October 1790, adjusting the dispute, in conformity to the previous declaration, states that the Ministers, “after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, have agreed upon the following articles,” &c; and the convention concludes that the “said Plenipotentiaries of His Britannic and Catholic Majesties have in their names and in virtue of their respective full powers signed the present convention, and set thereto the seal of our arms.”

If there is in this adjustment anything which bears out the idea of our Secretary of State, that no “full power” was necessary to authorize Mr. Erskine to conclude his arrangement, I confess it has escaped my research. As to Mr. Erskine’s opinion or assurance, that his powers were competent, and the entire reliance placed on such opinion and assurance, I feel humbled as an American at the avowal, by the Administration, that they had relied upon the judgment of a foreign Minister as to the extent of his powers, instead of judging for themselves; that (for in fact it amounts to this) they had surrendered their understanding to the keeping of a British Minister! The course of propriety and of duty was plain, they should have demanded his separate powers, or his special authority to conclude an arrangement; he must have produced them, or the negotiation should have ended. His instructions are sacred and cannot be demanded, but if his powers and his instructions are contained in the same instrument, as in the case of Mr. Erskine, both must of necessity have been shown. The British Government were apprized of this, and therefore authorized him to communicate his instructions in extenso.

Str, from a near and particular view of this affair I am compelled to conclude, and the conclusion is one from which I derive no pleasure, that the Administration, in the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, have overlooked what it was their incumbent duty to have attended to; they have, from indifference to consequences, or ignorance of their duty, neglected to ascertain what were the powers or authority of Mr. Erskine; they have concluded a treaty with a man not authorized, and have made an arrangement “under circumstances which could only lead to the consequence which have followed,” a disavowal by Great Britain. They stand convicted before the American people of having slumbered on their duty in this business, and to their misconduct or neglect are we indebted for this additional ground of difference with Great Britain, and all the consequences which may flow from it.

I have said, that a consequence of this want of attention was the right of Great Britain to disavow the arrangement. This is decided by my honorable colleague, (Mr. MASON,) who, while he admits that a Minister resident cannot without special authority conclude a treaty, yet contends this arrangement was not a treaty, but an agreement or arrangement—in which ground he has been followed by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES.) My colleague (Mr. ALSTON) denies it even to be an agreement, and says “it is only a promise by our Administration to do one thing, and a promise by Great Britain in consideration thereof to do another!” This distinction between a treaty and an agreement, or arrangement, is not supported by any reasoning from the laws of nations. Vattel says, sec. 153: “A treaty is a pact made with a view to the public welfare by the supreme power, either for perpetuity or for a considerable time. Pacts with a view to transitory affairs are called agreements, conventions, and pactions.” Sec. 206: “Public pacts called conventions, articles of agreement, &c., when they are made between sovereigns, differ from treaties only in their object. Treaties, conventions, and agreements, are all public engagements, in regard to which there is but one and the same right, and the same rules”—nothing can make this exposition plainer. “A convention or arrangement between two Governments is an agreement for the public welfare, differing from a treaty only as a simple contract differs from a deed or specialty; the object is less important, being a transitory affair, therefore the contract, is less solemn and less formal.” Speaking of the disavowal, Mr. Smith, in his letter to Mr. Jackson, quotes from Vattel: “to refuse with honor to ratify what has been concluded on by virtue of a full power, it is necessary that the Sovereign should have strong and solid reasons, and that he show in particular that his Minister has deviated from his instructions.” Vattel and Mr. Smith here agree that the principal is not bound by the act of his proxy, who deviates from his instructions; the rule of the civil law in Pothier, insisted on by the gentleman from Mississippi, to the contrary notwithstanding. In the same section of this author it is said: “The rights of the proxy are expressed in the instructions that are given him; he ought not to deviate from them; but everything he promises within the terms of his commission and the extent of his powers bind his constituent.”

JANUARY, 1810.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

And sec. 208: "If a public person, an ambassador or general of an army, conclude a treaty or a convention without orders from his Sovereign, or without being authorized to do it by the power of his office, he goes beyond the bounds of his commission, and the treaty is null, as being made without a sufficient power."

It appears then that a Minister resident, without a distinct, additional authority, called "a full power," cannot conclude a treaty—that Mr. Erskine had no "full power" for that purpose—that an arrangement respecting transitory affairs, such as that concluded with Mr. Erskine, is an agreement "regarding which there is but one and the same right and the same rules" as regard treaties; and being concluded "not only without authority but in direct opposition to the most precise instructions," as we have seen from the instructions themselves, the consequence by the law of nations is, that the arrangement was null, and not obligatory upon Great Britain.

The resolution further states, that the rupture with Mr. Jackson was for the interest of the United States; to sustain this idea gentlemen in this debate assert that he offered and insisted on propositions which were insulting, and originated in a hostile disposition, and that without acceding to such degrading conditions no treaty of adjustment of differences could have been made. Sir, there, is a mistake in fact in all this. I will recall the attention of gentlemen to parts of the correspondence and documents before us, which will show how entirely incorrect is this statement.

Mr. Erskine has been introduced and relied on as a witness in this case by the Administration; I may therefore, correctly I presume, appeal to his testimony for facts. The House will recollect that the three conditions which Mr. Erskine was instructed to propose to our Administration, upon our assent to which Great Britain would revoke her Orders in Council as to the United States, which conditions are now deemed so highly insulting, were, first: That we should withdraw our non-intercourse and non-importation laws so far as respected Great Britain, and continue them as to France. Second, That we should relinquish during the present war the colonial trade, from which we were excluded in time of peace; and third, That the British Navy should aid in enforcing our non-intercourse law with France by capturing our vessels found violating the law.

The proposition contained in the first of these conditions was made by our Administration to Great Britain in August, 1807. Congress have by law assented to it—and Mr. Erskine declares in his letter to Mr. Smith, 14th August, 1809, that Mr. Madison said if either Britain or France relaxed their restrictions upon neutral commerce, the United States would at once side with that Power against the other which might continue its aggressions."

The second condition, Mr. Erskine says, page 8, Mr. Gallatin "so far assented to as to say he knew it was the intention of the United States to abandon the attempt to carry on a trade 'with the colonies of belligerents in time of war which was not allowed in time of peace, and to trust to their being permitted to carry on such trade in peace, so as to entitle them to a continuance of it in time of war." Mr. Erskine adds, he supposed Mr. Gallatin to mean "the trade from the colonies of belligerents direct to their mother country, or to ports of other belligerents, because the right of such trade had been the point in dispute; whereas the right to carry on a trade with the colonies of belligerents to the United States had never been called in question, but had been recognised by His Majesty's Supreme Court of Admiralty." Mr. Erskine also says to Mr. Smith, (page 21,) that during the negotiation which led to the conclusion of the provisional agreement, he found no reason to believe difficulties would occur in the accomplishment of the two former conditions, "as far as was in the power of the President as to the first, and from the duty of Congress to assert the rights of the United States against the Powers who would adopt or act under the decrees of France," and that he "received assurances that no doubt could be entertained, that a satisfactory arrangement might be made in a treaty upon the subject of the second condition, according to his explanation of it."

The origin of the two first conditions is thus settled—both are proved to have originated from the high, and if gentlemen please I will say the pure source of our Administration—the guardians of the honor and interests of our country. Whatever may be thought of their policy, gentlemen cannot, I presume, consistently with justice to the British Government and respect to our Administration, think them insulting, degrading, or hostile to our interests. As to the third condition, the first trace we have of it is in the conversation of Mr. Canning and Mr. Pinkney on the 18th and 22d of January, as stated by Mr. Pinkney.

Mr. Canning, speaking of the proposal which had been made by the United States for the removal of the embargo as to Great Britain, asks, "In what way was the effectual operation of our embargo as to France, after it should be taken off as to Great Britain, to be secured? That our vessels though cleared for Great Britain would go to France, whatever penalties our laws might denounce against offenders, and he therefore presumed that the Government of the United States would not object, after it had itself declared a commerce with France, &c., illegal, and its citizens who should engage in it delinquents, and after having given to Great Britain by compact an interest in the strict observation of the prohibition, complain if the naval force of this country should assist in preventing such commerce." Mr. Pinkney does not state any objections by him to this idea; Mr. Canning (though it now appears erroneously) conceived that Mr. Pinkney assented, to the stipulations; Mr. Erskine was therefore instructed to propose it.

Here was the origin of this third condition—it was suggested by Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney on the 22d of January. Mr. Pinkney did not object to it, his assent to it was therefore inferred, though doubtless erroneously, since Mr. Pinkney says, 6th June, his observations "did not look to the admission of this object into any stipulation; he viewed it only as a consequence, that might and would if France persisted in her unjust decrees grow out of arrangements similar to those offered in August last."

As to the character of this third condition, degrading as its admission into a stipulation would be, neither our Minister at London nor our Administration appear to have taken any alarm at its proposal; not even as conveying an "insinuation." Mr. Erskine tells Mr. Smith, page 21, "the third condition you certainly told me could not be recognised by the President, but you added, what had great weight upon my mind, that you did not see why any great importance should be attached to such a recognition, because it would be impossible that a citizen could prefer a complaint to his Government on account of the capture of his vessel while engaged in a trade absolutely interdicted by the laws of his country." Mr. Pinkney considered it as a consequence that would grow out of the arrangement; and Mr. Canning in his conversation with Mr. Pinkney, 22d of June, as detailed by Mr. Pinkney in his letter of the 23d, says, "he had misapprehended Mr. Pinkney in January; that he was himself of opinion that the idea upon which that condition turned, could not well find its way into a stipulation—that he should have been satisfied with the rejection of it."

This is the history of the three conditions up to the arrival of Mr. Jackson in the United States. The two first, if not suggested by, were at least approved by members of our Administration; the third originated in a misapprehension of Mr. Pinkney's conversation; its recognition was by Mr. Smith in his conversation with Mr. Erskine treated simply as "not important;" by Mr. Pinkney considered barely as unnecessary, as its operation would follow as a consequence of the adjustment proposed: but in August, 1809, by Mr. Smith considered, and I agree justly so considered, as "irreconcilable to the dignity and interest of the United States." It is a little strange that a mere proposition coming from Great Britain, should excite the liveliest sensibility, when the actual execution of the same project by France has been, so far as we know, silently acquiesced in! Sir, we all know France has a decree, for enforcing our embargo by capture of all our ships found abroad during its continuance, as being in contravention of that law. The Administration may have remonstrated against this decree of Napoleon as "irreconcilable with the dignity and interest of the United States." No evidence of that fact has been submitted to us. Under these circumstances of the case officially appearing before me, I cannot so far violate my feelings and my understanding, as to say, that the mere proposal of these three conditions was an insult to the United States.

We are told in this debate, repeatedly, that a negotiation with Mr. Jackson would have been useless, as he insisted on the preliminary admission of the three degrading conditions. Sir, it is not strange that gentlemen should stumble upon the same mistake over which our Secretary seems so frequently to have broken his shins. It is not true that Mr. Jackson insisted on these conditions; the very reverse—his express and repeated declaration that he did not insist on them appears in the documents before us. It is certain that Mr. Smith, not less than three times in the correspondence, asserts that Mr. Jackson does insist on these conditions, and Mr. Jackson as often expressly disclaims any such demand.

On the 11th of October, Mr. Jackson writes Mr. Smith, page 72: "On the subject of His Majesty's Orders in Council, I have had the honor of informing you that His Majesty having caused to be made to the Government of the United States certain proposals founded upon principles, some of which were understood to originate in American authorities, and others to be acquiesced in by them; and having afterwards ascertained, in the manner mentioned in a former part of this letter, that the sentiments of the American Government were so different from what they were at first understood to be, I was not instructed to renew to you those proposals, nor to press upon your acceptance an arrangement which had been so recently declined, especially as the arrangement itself is become less important and the terms of it less applicable to the state of things now existing."

In page 39, he says: "Such, sir, are the grounds on which it has appeared to His Majesty to be unnecessary to command me to propose to the Government of the United States, any formal agreement to be substituted for that which His Majesty has been under the necessity of disavowing; but I am directed to receive and discuss with you any proposal which you may be authorized to make to me on this head." Mr. J. continues: "As no disposition has hitherto been shown on your part to make any proposal, it has been impossible for me to state by anticipation (nor was I instructed so to do) what might be the answer that I should eventually think it my duty to return to you; consequently, I could not have made with that view the statement contained in the 4th section of your letter, and the three subdivisions of it. Such a statement would have been obviously inconsistent with the former part of my overture, which you very correctly record in the 3d section, viz: that I was not instructed to make to you any proposal whatever upon this subject."

Again, 4th of November, page 68, Mr. Jackson writes Mr. Smith: "You say that it is understood that His Britannic Majesty perseveres in requiring, as indispensable conditions on the part of the United States, an entire relinquishment of the right to trade with the enemies' colonies, and also a permission to the British navy to aid in executing a law of Congress."

"This same statement is contained in your letter of the 9th instant, and represented as the

JANUARY, 1810.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

' substance of what had fallen from me in our previous conferences. In my answer to that letter, I took the liberty of showing that such a supposition was erroneous, and I have looked in vain to my letter of the 23d, to find in it any suggestion of a similar tenor. I believe, therefore, that by reference to my two letters you will find, that the statement now again brought forward is contained in neither of them, that it made no part of my previous conversation with you, and that I have in no way given room to suppose that I ever made any such statement at all."

Language affords no terms of negation clearer than those employed by Mr. Jackson. He unequivocally denies insisting upon any previous conditions, or having made any previous proposals whatever. Yet gentlemen tell this House and the nation, that negotiation was useless, because Mr. Jackson insisted on the three conditions contained in Mr. Erskine's instructions! The testimony afforded us by the Administration itself, satisfies my mind that such declaration is wholly founded in error. Neither, sir, can I subscribe to the declaration contained in this resolution, that in the rupture with the British Minister, the Administration have manifested a just regard to the interests of the United States. The interests of our country demand peace, as essential to the enjoyment of commerce and the fruits of agriculture, and as best suiting the dispositions of our people. This rupture, far from securing, puts in jeopardy the peace of the country; without improving our means to sustain war, widens the breach already subsisting between Great Britain and us, and interposes new obstacles to those already existing to a settlement—a result the very reverse of a just regard to the interest of the United States.

We have been asked by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) why are not our difficulties with Great Britain settled? If the question had been why they were not now in a train of settlement, I should say because the Administration, rejecting overtures for negotiation, have shut the door in the face of the messenger of peace. On the 23d of October, Mr. Jackson informs Mr. Smith that his instructions authorized him "to receive and to discuss any proposal made on the part of the United States, and eventually to conclude a convention between the two countries." And on the 4th of November he informs him—"It will not, I dare say, have escaped your recollection, that I informed you at a very early period of our communications, that, in addition to the usual credential letter, His Majesty had been pleased to invest me with a full power under the great seal of his Kingdom, for the express purpose of concluding a treaty or convention. I well remember your testifying your satisfaction at the circumstance; and I have now only to add that I am ready, whenever it suits your convenience, to exchange my full power against that with which you shall be provided, for the progress of our negotiation."

Here is a solemn declaration that he had a "full power" to treat and conclude a treaty, and also an offer to produce his power and enter on the negotiation whenever the Secretary should appoint. If the sincerity of Mr. Jackson was doubted, the production of his authority was tendered and might have been inspected. Stress is laid on the word "eventually," as covering an ambiguity. This appears to me a refined quibble: to conclude "eventually," can only mean to conclude in the event of their agreeing upon terms. Strike the word out, the expression is not stronger or more explicit: continue it, the force is not diminished, or rendered obscure. This refusal stands without explanation and without excuse.

"The case of the Chesapeake remains unsettled." Sir, no man more sensibly feels, and none would at greater hazards avenge that insult and wrong, if atonement be improperly withheld, than myself. Why is it at this time unadjusted? The British Minister, Mr. Erskine, offered an amend, which our Administration acknowledged to be satisfactory, and consented to accept. Yet the Secretary of State, in the very act of acceptance, indulging a spirit of asperity at least unnecessary at that stage of the business, not only expressed dissatisfaction at the terms, but conveyed an unequivocal insult to the King of Great Britain. In this note accepting the terms offered, he adds, a different course would better have comported with the honor of His Majesty! In plain English, Mr. Smith says, in a paper to be submitted for the sanction of the King: "The King has not acted as became a man of honor!" In private life, unquestionably such an acceptance of tendered satisfaction would have compelled its retraction. We find therefore, the King having rejected the arrangement, Mr. Jackson in his letter to Mr. Smith, 11th of October, assigning the reasons of the rejection, declares His Majesty, "was warranted in doing so both by the form in which his Minister had tendered that reparation, and by the manner in which that tender had been received"—that he had, in conversation before, "referred to the particular expressions which made the terms appear unacceptable even to the American Government, at the very moment when they were accepted, and which at all events puts it totally out of his Majesty's power to ratify and confirm any act in which such expressions were contained."

Regarding the affair of the Chesapeake, Mr. Jackson made proposals for settling it; they were stated to be the same which Mr. Erskine was instructed to offer. But we are told these had been previously refused, and to have accepted them would have been disgrace. If this be granted, does it follow there would have been any degradation in again refusing them? To this hour the proposal remains unanswered. How shall a settlement ever be effected, if, when an unacceptable proposition is made, the objections are not stated, so that others may be substituted? I understand not this policy, nor admire pride when the great interests of a nation are at stake. To me, sir, it appears, that in this business of the rupture with Mr. Jackson, the best interests of the United States have been overlooked, or immolated on the altar of punctilio. I conclude, sir, by declaring that, in my opinion, this resolution is calculated to excite the feelings not only of the British Monarch, but of a powerful people; that, without fitting us for battle, it tends to increase the animosity already unhappily existing; that it shuts the door to further negotiation; fixes a stain on the national character in condescending to use language unworthy a great people; and finally, I cannot but fear it will prove (if the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISK) will permit me the use of his figure) "the winding-sheet" of the peace of this country.

Mr. FINDLEY spoke in favor of the resolution.

Mr. GARDENIER, after some prefatory remarks, moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to the third Monday in February.

A motion was made to adjourn, which was negatived, by yeas and nays, 82 to 26.

Mr. GARDENIER's motion was then negatived—yeas 39, nays 74, as follows:

Mr. TAGGART commenced a speech against the resolution.

A motion was made to adjourn and negatived, by yeas and nays, 59 to 15.

Immediately after this, it appearing that there was not a quorum present, a motion was made by Mr. MARION to adjourn, which was negatived, 40 to 24.

Mr. MARION wished to adjourn to meet again this evening, as gentlemen appeared determined to sit it out.

This motion was not in order.

A motion being again made to adjourn, was negatived 42 to 21.

Mr. FISK moved "that the attendance of the absent members be required forthwith."

Mr. DANA called for the reading of the clause of the Constitution and of the rule of the House authorizing such a motion.

Mr. WILSON moved to adjourn. The yeas and nays on the motion being required, Mr. W. withdrew the motion.

A quorum now appearing, Mr. FISK withdrew his motion for compelling the attendance of absent members; and Mr. TAGGART proceeded in his speech, and concluded about half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. GARDENIER made a motion to recommit the resolution, and spoke at some length in favor of the motion. His object appeared to be a modification of the language of the resolution.

JANUARY, 1810.

Conduct of the British Minister.

H. OF R.

Mr. WHITMAN moved that the House adjourn, which was negatived, 71 to 44.

Mr. GOLD and Mr. MACON each spoke against the resolution.

Mr. GARDENIER moved to adjourn which was negatived, 70 to 41.

Mr. GARDENIER then (at ten o'clock) commenced a speech against the resolution; when he had been speaking near an hour, a quorum not appearing within the bar, a motion was made by Mr. LEWIS to adjourn, which was negatived, 55 to 34.

Mr. GARDENIER proceeded. At two o'clock having spoken nearly four hours, he himself moved an adjournment.—Negatived, by yeas and nays, 75 to 33.

Mr. GARDENIER resumed the floor.

The SPEAKER decided that he had spoken twice to the question, and could not speak again.

Mr. GARDENIER asked leave to speak a third time, stating at the same time that he did not consider himself as having spoken twice, one time having given way for a motion to adjourn. He waived asking leave, however, and moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject till the second Monday in February. And on this motion he proceeded with his speech; which he concluded about four o'clock, having occupied the floor six hours.

Mr. SAMMONS.—I rise with some diffidence to speak, but the course this debate has taken, makes it my indispensable duty to my constituents, to give my opinion. A member from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER) has appealed to the members from that State in particular, how they could reconcile it to their friends, relatives, and neighbors, if they voted for those resolutions now under consideration, and invited a discussion. Although, I have not been in the habit of speaking in public, being called on in this public manner, I shall proceed to give the reasons on which my opinion is made up. When that is done, I shall inform my colleague who my friends, relatives, and neighbors, were in the Revolution. This I will not do to gratify the gentleman from New York; but such of my constituents as may read his speeches, and other speeches for three weeks past, of two or three hours at a time, lest they should think I had made up my opinion on theirs. No, Mr. Speaker, not on their opinion nor their lengthy speeches, but on something more substantial, on the documents of the correspondence between our Government and Great Britain, communicated to this House by the President—on this information alone I judge. The correspondence is plain; it speaks for itself; every citizen can read and judge for himself, and will be more likely to form a correct opinion, than from the most eloquent speeches delivered in this House. It would therefore be superfluous to make much explanation. Sir, I approve the conduct of the President in the dismissal of Mr. Jackson, inasmuch as a most violent and outrageous insult was offered to the honor and dignity of the nation by Mr. Jackson. What, sir, shall we let the President stand alone? No; he stands as President of the United States, and in that capacity he is to perform the Executive duty, agreeably to the Constitution and laws of our Government, and as such the nation ought to support him. I hope the time has not arrived when a foreign Minister with insolence shall charge the Executive with a falsehood. That was the true meaning of his language—and when he was requested to desist he again insisted on it as a matter of fact. If the President had received any further communication he would for ever have lost my confidence, and, I believe, that of the nation. I will support the Executive in every just and lawful act to protect the Constitution, laws, and independence of our Federal Republican Government, at present as a Representative, and at any time as a militiaman, as I have done before, against any foreign enemy or domestic faction. If we are patriotic Americans, we had rather part with our lives than our liberty, which has been acquired by the blood of thousands of our fellow-citizens in the Revolution.

Our business here is to look to ourselves and our interest; to protect it, not to destroy it. We hear much talk about the great Napoleon and the success of the French. Our business with them in reality extends no farther than to maintain our national rights against their encroachments, and whenever that subject shall be acted on, I shall act on the same principle as I do in relation to England. Let us do one thing first, or else I fear we shall do worse than nothing. Is it our business, or can we direct the French in their relations with other nations? The great Napoleon, as he has often been termed in this House, is in the power of the God of Armies, as an axe or hammer in the hands of a workman. Thus far and no farther shall he go. Since his numerous armies failed on the Island of St. Domingo, I have thought that he was not destined for conquest in this quarter of the world, if such an attempt should be made. We hear much of our weakness, and it is insinuated that this country would become an easy prey to France. If we consider the distance between the two countries, we shall be convinced France could not carry on a war with prospect of success. But, say gentlemen, the English nation may be a bar in the way between us and France. I say, if we give up our national rights and independence to this bar, (the English navy,) we have nothing worth contending for. If we contend for liberty and give it up to England, France could not take from us what we did not possess.

As this resolution is a matter of difference between this Government and England, I shall confine myself more to that subject. We hear repeated again and again, in debate, the great power of the British navy; and much said of our inability to oppose them. I differ in opinion with gentlemen on this point. I consider the British to be in a most terrible situation. It has been the opinion of political writers, that England could not long support her Government without allies against her powerful enemies. She is nearly, if not altogether excluded from her European allies. I believe her foreign Ministers have nearly all returned home except this Jackson, and I wish in my heart he was out of our jurisdiction: he does no good here, but may do much harm. This great nation with her navy, has got enough to do at home to blockade her enemy's ports—let her withdraw the remnant of her armies from Holland, Spain, and Portugal, and watch a most inveterate enemy which would take the first opportunity to attack her at home. These remarks on the situation of England have been extorted from me against my wish: we have nothing to do with the affairs of other nations except where they interfere with us. Let us talk plain—I say gentlemen in opposition have advocated the cause of England and degraded their own Government. The gentleman from New York has said that England did not encroach on the rights and independence of the United States, or words to that effect. I had taken it down, but I have lost my notes—it is no matter; I have the substance in my head. Again, he says, you are going to pass censure on the Minister of a great and powerful nation! But, sir, what does he mean when he says, When shall England and we come together again? Does he mean under the old colonial government? [Mr. GARDENIER wished to explain. Mr. SAMMONS insisted on the rules of the House, and was permitted to go on.] Shall a young lawyer, said he, who spoke or detained the House about eight hours, who knows nothing about the Revolution by which our liberties were acquired, and not much about many things he may say in this House, embarrass the proceedings of Congress by speaking of forms, punctilios, and many other terms he may collect from his law books? Etiquette is of no consequence to the nation, sir. I wish to act on the principle of the matter, not the form—the substance, not the shadow. I am sent here by freemen who expect to be heard, and I will speak as a freeman. I conceive the two nations have never been together since the Declaration of Independence. Are not the English warring on us by plundering our property on the high seas, and impressing our seamen? Must the British Orders in Council, through their Courts of Admiralty, be binding on us in all cases in our lawful commerce with other nations? It is not three years since that shameful act committed on the frigate Chesapeake, where the Americans received a deep wound; their blood was spilt in a cowardly manner; when they expected they had met with friends, they had their matches burning. This shameful act, said the British Government, was not authorized; although done by the immediate command of one of their Admirals (Berkeley); that the Government would make suitable reparation. Mark the result—the prisoners taken were forced into their service and there retained, and the British Minister who made an arrangement on terms accepted by our Government, they say, was unauthorized; and so say the opposition to this resolution. In the dismissal of Mr. Jackson, the President did an honorable act, and I believe everyone who considers it impartially, by common sense and the independent right of the nation, will say so. In the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the President committed a fault: it was to put too much faith in either the Government or its creature, the Minister, or in both. I forgive him, because he acted the honest part; he however was not cautious enough for deception. Our Government have always acted on the principles of justice and right with England, and all other foreign Governments, whilst they only tried to embarrass justice and invade our national rights.

Much has been said about the manner of negotiating; it seems to be an opinion of some gentlemen that foreign Ministers must have instructions for every act they do, and show them. Does not reason teach us otherwise? I might then as well come direct from that Government to ours, "these are our terms"—there would be no negotiating. Is there any gentleman, who, with a moment's reflection, will believe that the British Minister at Copenhagen showed to the Danish Government his instructions, and the intention of his Government to surprise them, though in perfect peace? Do not we know that the British diplomacy is a very material part or branch of their Government, by which they have had it in their power to do more mischief, and bring more confusion and destruction on other Governments, than all their fleets and armies could accomplish, when, if they had told the truth where they were received at foreign Governments, they could have done very little mischief? Is it not stated in the Annual Register as a fact, that the people in Vendée, a department of France, received supplies of powder and money from England, by which a most bloody civil war was carried on with the then Republic of France? Would that and similar acts have hastened the downfall of the French Republic, and established a monarchy in its stead, were not British diplomacy employed in almost every part of Europe? I ask if they have brought peace where they have been received of late years? Have we any reason to believe that they would act more favorably towards us than other nations, if they could divide us, or if we were weak enough to confide in their fidelity? Since we have the examples of other divided nations before us, let us unite under the Government of our choice, and take into consideration the real situation of our country, with a full determination not to yield our national rights. England will soon give up her contemptuous policy towards us, and France will be compelled to respect us as a nation.

The gentleman from New York speaks frequently of WASHINGTON. There is no man holds WASHINGTON's name in higher veneration than I do, and I never suffer any censure on his character to pass before me in silence; but, as much as I respect his name, my national liberty and independence I consider of much more importance. I have seen WASHINGTON—he appeared to be but a man; of his good qualities no one doubts. He is no more. After his death, he left us a legacy—he left us a free people, an independent nation; which I for my part am determined to support, and those who will not, should not talk about WASHINGTON's principles for a cover of deception. At all events, says the gentleman, we should avoid a war, for we do not know if we could get another WASHINGTON. Sir, we the people, in general, knew little or nothing about WASHINGTON's name when the troubles with England first began. Have we no man to rely on? Is there not one of the old Revolutionary characters appointed to a high station in the Military Establishment—the defender of Fort Stanwix or Schuyler, a man of genuine patriotism and undoubted confidence?*

I must again enjoin the duty of the nation on this House. To Congress the people look for protection—let us not disappoint them—let us not eat the people's bread, and live in luxury on their money. Let us do one thing first; that is my way as a farmer, and I see it applies to this business also. There is no man more for peace than I am; but is there any other way to obtain it than to be prepared for war, with a prospect to carry it on, united and determined, as Americans? Upon no other single point will Great Britain do us justice. The times call for energy—a middle course will no longer do. I say, with others, if this resolution was not before us, I would be satisfied for the present to go on with other necessary business. But we are acting on it. Shall we then tell the nation and the world, that we are divided from the Executive? The President has acted, and cannot retract without disgrace to himself and his country. In the Summer session a great deal was done. Yes, sir, we then united like honest men; things went smoothly—every party was eager to be foremost to act for the general interest. My heart rejoiced to see the liberality of Southern gentlemen, voting for generous appropriations; there was nothing appeared for selfish views; a great jealousy appeared to be done away. Every gentleman I conversed with, though of different politics, said the President does well, makes no difference in nominating to office, and is no party man, but will act for the good of all. I hope I shall not come too closely on the motives of any party. The people were so taken in with the opening of trade, that no party could have got a party of the people. I approve the conduct of the President, inasmuch as he has not once charged the British Government with the act of their Minister, Mr. Jackson. They may make peace if they are willing to come to terms of justice. The olive branch is held out to them. What choice will they make? I believe a bad choice. Every single act of that Government seems to be to embarrass other nations, but turns out more ruinous to themselves. Will she then provoke us to a war; by continual encroachments on our national rights, with unabating contempt, the sooner to hasten her own destruction? We have nothing else to expect, unless, indeed, England finds us prepared for war, ready to act, and determined to defend our rights. If the spirit of the nation was awakened it is possible they would hesitate. It is in vain to ask or favors—but, tell that Government, you must to justice; if not, we will no longer submit. Is not their conduct a mere mockery of us? Does not Jackson talk plain? I am come to discuss and receive proposals. Who can doubt him? He had no other object but to entangle and embarrass, without directions to make a treaty till they farther saw what was going on here and in Europe. It is time we should attend to the business of the nation, and pass this resolution. Why should more time be lost unnecessarily.

I shall now give a short account who my friends, relatives, and neighbors, were in the Revolution. They were a kind of people at that time called Whigs—near them was another kind of people called Tories. I have been particular to make a distinction of two kinds of people because they differed in principle. It so happened that the Whigs talked about liberty—a number of them collected to raise a liberty pole. Colonel Johnson, then Superintendent of Indian Affairs, a very lucrative office, Sir John Johnson, and many others of their connexion, attended at the place in order to embarrass and stop the progress of liberty. The Whigs that were collected were farmers, and could not argue with these great men, but were determined to take part with their own country, not a foreign Government. Colonel Johnson addressed the meeting, and requested or rather commanded them to desist and give up their visionary projects. This did not satisfy the Whigs, and, as the spirit of liberty spurred them on, they could no longer remain silent. One of them made some reply on the right of Americans to oppose certain acts and impositions of the British Government. Colonel Johnson continued his discourse. What, says he, would these colonies do? would they dare to go to war with so great and powerful a nation as England? They have no navy, and are in no situation to build ships-of-the-line. A few regiments of regulars, with the faithful subjects, (meaning the Tories,) will march through any part of the Colonies. Your seaports will be totally destroyed, and we will send the Indians and Canadians on your backs. It will soon be over with you, and your rebel leaders will be hanged. They did not speak of a war with England as terrible as we now hear it spoken of, nor did they say one word of the justice and rights of the people. A war soon commenced, when they joined the British, their real patrons, and deluded many honest people to go with them, who afterwards imbrued their hands in the blood of their neighbors. From the commencement to the close of the war, the British, with their Indian allies and Tory friends, did carry on a most terrible, inhuman, predatory war, with fire and sword. Enormous barbarities were inflicted on my friends and neighbors, desolating our frontiers without regard to age, sex, or condition, with almost a total loss of property. Those of us whom the fortune of war put in their power, were confined in prisons, there to languish in irons, of which one of my nearest relatives partook a share. To such people I can say that I am not afraid to return, when I support the principle they once contended for. At the same time I assure my colleague, that I have no consideration in giving my vote on this resolution or any other question to acquire popularity from any political party or neighbors.

The difference between this country and England is a great national controversy of principles, which has nothing to do with our party differences. Before the Revolution, all the most humble petitions setting forth the right of the Americans, laid before the foot of the Throne, could get no redress, but were treated with contempt—in a similar manner as our present remonstrances are now treated; but patriotic Americans then only inquired what was right, what was just, and on a matter of just principle they met their enemy; and there was no consideration about loss of property, but liberty or death. With arms and the undaunted spirit of freemen we persevered. Yes, sir, in the records of our Revolution you find that the brave men who followed WASHINGTON, could be traced by the blood of their feet over the frozen ground; they, however, did not charge this to their own Government, but England. Was this a matter only for themselves? No, sir, it is left for us to defend, and there is no right in us to give it up to England under any consideration or pretension whatever. By the solemn oaths we have all taken before our God to support our Constitution and laws, we are compelled to defend it. We have nothing from England as a gift, but forced her by arms to acknowledge our independence—and we are in duty bound to defend it by arms. And until we can convince her, as we did before, I fear she will not let us alone, unless she sees the spirit of freemen raised. Let us then unite as Americans. With respect to myself, the Journals of this House prove my politics; they are not confined to any party consideration. I do not care whether a proposition comes from a Federalist or a Republican. I only consider the subject of the matter, and what I believe to be right I support with my vote. I have yet great hopes we shall act together—if we can, on this question. Yes, sir, when I see in the opposition men who deserve well of their country, in particular an honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) now in his seat, I hope we shall unite. I lately read an account of a detachment which he commanded, and in a gallant manner surprised a post of our inveterate enemy, the British; he surely will defend the old principles, and will not suffer the honor of his country to be laid in disgrace before any foreign Power.

Mr. POTTER spoke for half an hour in explanation of his former subject.

The question was then taken on postponement as moved by Mr. GARDNER, and negatived without a division.

And at length, at half past five o'clock, the main question on the final passage of the resolution was taken and carried—yeas 72, nays 41, as follows:

Another member to wit: from Delaware, NICHOLAS VAN DYKE, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two statements of the importations in American and foreign vessels, from the first of October, to the thirtieth of September, which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

last; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Military Establishment for the year 1809; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House another letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the expenditure and application of moneys drawn from the Treasury between the fourth of March and the thirtieth of September last; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of Joab Garret, referred to them on the twelfth ult.; which was read at the Clerk's table, and the resolutions therein contained, agreed to as follow:

"Resolved, That Joab Garret be permitted to withdraw his entry from the northwest quarter of section number two, in township number seven, of range number seven, in the Vincennes district, and the money paid by him on the said purchase be placed to his credit on any entry he shall or may have made in the same district."

"Resolved, That, from and after the first day of June next, any person making application to the Register of any of the Land Offices of the United States, for the purchase of a tract of land, shall produce to him a memorandum in writing, stating the number of the section, half section, or quarter, as the case may be, and of the township and range for which he shall make application, and subscribing his name thereto, which shall be filed and preserved by the Register in his office."

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that the Committee on the Public Lands do prepare and bring in the same.

RULES AND ORDERS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee appointed to report rules and orders for the government of the House. The report contains the following, among other rules:

"The previous question shall be put in this form: Shall the main question be now put? It shall only be admitted when demanded by one-fifth of the members present; and, if decided in the affirmative, shall be instantly put without amendment or further debate; and, if decided in the negative, the business shall proceed as if the previous question had not been called."

"On a previous question there shall be no debate."

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to strike out the first of these. This motion was supported by Messrs. LIVERMORE, GARDENIER, QUINCY, SHEPPEY, ELY, TICKMAN, WHEATON, DANA, and EMOTT; and opposed by Messrs. REEA, BASSETT, ROSS, SMITH, SOUTHARD, BOYD, FINDLEY, W. ALSTON, FOOT, and JOHNSON.

The arguments in favor of striking out the rule relating to the previous question were, generally, that it had for its object the abridgment of the freedom of debate, and was following too closely the practice of the British Parliament; that this House being constitutionally a deliberative assembly, it was not for the majority to say, thus far shall debate be permitted, and no further; for, if they could do this, they had the same right to say that the minority should have no voice; that it would prevent the minority from showing the enormity of the doings of the majority, and would shroud their acts in the mantle of darkness; that at present much time might indeed be consumed in useless debate, but that this evil ought to be regulated by a sense of propriety, and not by a rule of the House; that, if this rule were adopted, the most important measures might be decided without a word of debate, although on hearing arguments gentlemen might have changed their opinion of them; that this rule might remind the House of the circumstance, that, when the Abbe Sieyes had presented a constitution to the consideration of Bonaparte, the conqueror was charmed with the feature of a dumb Legislature; that legislation without debate was always favorable to tyranny; that the introduction of a rule providing for the previous question was not even necessary for the purpose which its advocates had in view; for, from late experience, it was known that whenever the majority were disposed to force a question, they had it in their power so to do; that such a rule was unconstitutional, because the Constitution forbade Congress to restrain the freedom of speech; and if they could not restrict the people in the freedom of speech, much less surely could they abridge that privilege in this House—the sanctuary of liberty; that every member of this House had a right to deliver his sentiments on any subject before the House, and could not be deprived of it; that this privilege, like the freedom of speech, was productive of some evil, but the moment either was restrained, such restraint was an invasion of the principles of free government; that the rule, however colored, amounted to this—that no member of the minority should be allowed to speak until a vote of permission for that purpose was first obtained from the majority. It was asked, would the renovation in the public councils have been effected, if the freedom of debate had not been permitted at the time when everything was going to ruin? If such a rule had been proposed in 1798, the nation would have been told, by those who now support this rule, that it was the vital stab to liberty. That which had been wrong yesterday, was wrong to-day; that which would have been wrong in the majority, could not be right in another. It was also said, by several of the supporters of Mr. LIVERMORE'S motion, that the rule proposed to be stricken out was at war with political liberty, incompatible with the freedom of debate, and in defiance of the spirit of the Constitution; that majorities, who could not be supposed to be wholly exempt from the infirmities of human nature, might, from the influence of passion, rush headlong into a measure, without the least consideration; that rapidity was not so much an object in legislation as wisdom; and a multitude of laws often proved an evil.

Finally, that this rule, at the present time particularly, ought not to be adopted, as the House might shortly have to decide the question of peace or war, on which much deliberation undoubtedly would be requisite.

On the other hand, it was remarked, in support of the rule, that the evil intended to be guarded against by it, was blended perhaps with some of the best sensations of the human mind—a perseverance in what is deemed right by each—and that the question what was right could not be decided by any direct standard to which the human mind can resort; that it is the principle of this as of every free Government, that the majority shall rule, and, without assuming that the majority is always right, its decision was the best standard to which they could resort; that the majority, being responsible for all measures adopted, ought not to be prevented from acting till too late by a determined opposition; that, if the minority infringes the right of the majority to govern, there should be some rule to prevent the violation of the principles of the Government; that the privilege each member possessed of delivering his sentiments, however precious, was not so valuable as the right which each member possessed of acting; and the restriction of this privilege would not be so alarming as the destruction of the Government, which might be the consequence, as the rules of the House at present stood, if the minority were obstinately bent on preventing the House from acting; that, although the project of a dumb Legislature might have charmed Bonaparte, he never would have had an opportunity to approve any constitution, had it not been for the anarchy, confusion, and unrestrained licentiousness, which prevailed in the National Convention, and which finally destroyed it; and it was to prevent such anarchy, and abuse of the freedom of debate, that this rule had become necessary; that minorities, too, were subject to the failings of mankind, and that passion might operate upon them, when a most urgent law was to be passed, by speaking for six hours at a time, solely to prevent the Legislature from acting—from doing that for which they were expressly chosen; that there was no fear of the measures or the acts of the majority being veiled in darkness; for, supposing (what was very improbable) an abuse of the rule, the press was open to every man, and could not be restrained; that the idea of the unconstitutionality of such a rule was absurd; for the same mode of argument would prove that the House had no right to prevent any member from speaking more than twice to the same question, although the Constitution declares that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings; that experience had shown that such a rule was necessary to prevent the consumption of the time of the House by a member's speaking four, five, six, or eight hours, merely for the purpose of spinning out time, and moving to adjourn, calling the yeas and nays on the motion to give himself time to take breath, and then making frivolous motions for the purpose of speaking still longer on them; that, in order to do the public business, if no such rule was adopted, it would be necessary for the people to select their Representatives, not for the strength of their intellect, but for the robustness of their constitutions, and their capacity of enduring fatigue; that the abuse of the freedom of debate had become so flagrant as to impede all public business, unless those desirous of doing it would sacrifice their health, and perhaps their lives, in sessions of nineteen or twenty hours in length, and this, too, after a subject had been debated ten or twelve days. It was also said that this was no new rule—that it had existed in this body, with various modifications, since the commencement of the Government, and within two years, when the decision of the House had done it away in practice, though it still remained in the rules; that it had existed in the British Parliament for two centuries; that argument against a rule or law, drawn from the possible abuse of it, would go to the destruction of all law and government; that this rule had never yet been arbitrarily enforced, and probably never would, as its object was more to remind members of the propriety of conceding a little to their fellow-members, and treating them with decorum, than for the purpose of actually putting an end to debate; that no majority would improperly use this rule, because, if they did, they were responsible to the people for it, who would not fail to redress the evil. The novelty in this case was said to be, not that such a rule should have been proposed, but that, after having existed, under every Administration, it should now be moved to reject it.

The opponents of the rule replied, that this rule was wholly different from former rules on the subject, as it excluded debate on the previous as well as the main question. It was also said, that the doctrine laid down that the majority should govern was an arbitrary doctrine. It was natural for majorities to seek to increase their power. It was true, that the people might apply the corrective to abuses of power by the majority; but it might as well be said, after a violation of the right of habeas corpus had deprived the citizen of his liberty, or after an ex post facto law had swept him off, that some twenty years hence the people would apply the corrective. A majority might set out with the best views, but might do acts to produce the most disastrous consequences. The majority always did wrong when it took means to silence opposition, and to humble those who opposed them. This had been the doctrine ten years ago of those who advocated this rule, and it was the correct doctrine still. It was said that the argument that the licentiousness of debate had destroyed the Government of France, as used in support of this rule, might remind the House of the Hibernian who cut his throat to save his life. The House were called upon to destroy the principles of freedom in order to prevent slavery. If the majority had a right to prevent the minority from expressing their opinions, they had the same right to send them home—to banish them from the Capitol.

This debate was continued, in a warm yet decoratory manner, till 4 o'clock; when, on motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, January 6.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation of moneys for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and ten, together with an account of receipts and expenditures for the last year, and a statement of balances unexpended on the thirtieth of September last; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report on the subject of the Navy Pension Fund; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of Louisiana, praying that the second grade of Territorial Government may be established in said Territory.—Referred to Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, Mr. GRAY, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. HUFTY, Mr. GARDENIER, Mr. SEAVER, and Mr. HOLLAND; with instructions to examine and report their opinion thereon to the House.

Mr. HOLLAND moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of encouraging the manufacture of iron, by making a donation of a certain portion of land to such persons as may erect iron works within the Territories of the United States.

The said resolution was read, and, on the question taken thereon, disagreed to by the House.

Mr. EFFES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, asked and obtained leave to present a bill to revive and continue in force the first section of an act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers;" which was twice read and committed.

[This law laying the duty commonly called "The Mediterranean Fund," expired on the 1st instant. The bill now reported proposes to continue it till the 4th March, 1811.]

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. BASSETT, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message at the commencement of the session, which relates to the Naval Establishment, made a report, in part; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

The committee appointed on that part of the President's Message relating to the Naval Establishment, report, in part, that they found that the frigates now in ordinary was the only part of the subject requiring immediate attention. Besides the motives presented in the Secretary's letter for an immediate reparation of these frigates, the eventful situation of our country furnishes a strong inducement to placing those valuable ships in a state to aid in the protection, not of our ports only, but of those numerous exposed situations on the water, with which our country abounds. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the hulls of the frigates now in ordinary ought to be immediately repaired, and that ——— dollars, out of any money in the Treasury, is appropriated for the same.

Accompanying this report, was a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, stating his opinion that the frigates in ordinary do require material repairs; that the increasing injury which will result from their remaining in their present situation may be estimated at 30 per cent. for the first year. The following estimate of the expenses of repairs is also submitted:

For repairs of vessels now in commission	- $150,000
For freight, store-rent, and all other contingent expenses	- 75,000
For the repair of frigates now lying in ordinary, and keeping the gunboats that are not in service in a state of preservation, &c.	- 450,000
For freight and other contingent expenses	- 100,000
Total	- $775,000

PREVIOUS QUESTION

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business.

Mr. LIVERMORE's motion being still under consideration, Messrs. BLAISDELL, GARDENIER, and BACON, supported, and Messrs. ROSA and MCKEN opposed it.

On the question being taken, the motion was negatived—56 to 47.

Mr. QUINCY moved to amend the rule by striking out some words and inserting others, so as to make the rule similar to that which has heretofore existed on this subject.

Mr. RHEA called for a division of the question, and the House refused to strike out the words—59 to 36.

Mr. BACON moved to amend the rule, by adding at the end of it the words, "on the main question," so as to allow the previous question to be debated.—Negatived, ayes 22.

Mr. QUINCY moved to amend it, by adding the words, "But the previous question shall never be put until every member who chooses to speak shall have spoken once on [the main question." Mr. QUINCY and Mr. TALLMADGE supported the motion, and Mr. RHEA and Mr. W. ALSTON opposed it.

Before the question was taken, on motion of Mr. SMILIE, the Committee rose; reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, January 8.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill to prescribe the mode in which application shall be made for the purchase of land at the several land offices, and for the relief of Joab Garret; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. DESHA presented a petition of Daniel Boone, of the Territory of Louisiana, stating that he has employed the greater part of his life in exploring the Western wilds. and in promoting the settlement and civilization of that part of America, and that by a construction of the land laws applicable to the said Territory, he has been deprived of a piece of land to which he conceived himself entitled, and praying that, in consideration of the services before stated, Congress will extend to him some evidence of the liberality of his country.—Referred to Mr. DESHA, Mr. VAN DYKE, and Mr. KENAN, with instructions to examine and report their opinion thereon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to revive and continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Military Establishment, made a report, in part, on that part of the Message of the President of the United States, of the 3d instant, which relates to the raising of a volunteer force; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The report is as follows:

"The Committee on the Military Establishment of the United States, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States of the 3d instant, as relates to raising a volunteer force, report, in part, that they have taken the same into consideration, and are of opinion that it is highly expedient to place forthwith the country in a more complete state of defence, and recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That provision be made by law for raising and embodying a volunteer force of twenty thousand men, exclusive of officers, to be enlisted and held to serve for the term of — from the time of their being in actual service."

ARMED MERCHANTMEN.

Mr. LIVERMORE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to cause to be laid before the House a copy of any instructions issued to the collectors of the several districts of the United States relative to refusing clearances to any private armed vessels of the United States.

Mr. EFFES moved to amend the motion by adding to the end of it the words "during the present or any former Administration."

Mr. LIVERMORE accepted the amendment as a part of his motion.

Mr. RHEA objected to the motion because he could not see the object the gentleman had in view, the laws of the United States not having authorized the arming of any private vessels.

Mr. LIVERMORE and Mr. PITKIN supported it, as calling for information to which no one would object, and which might have a bearing on subjects under the consideration of the House.

The motion was agreed to—51 to 24.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION ACT.

On motion of Mr. MAOON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill "respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes."

After the Chairman had read through the third section, which interdicts the entrance into the United States of all vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France,

Mr. LIVERMORE said he thought it proper to examine how this interdiction of the entrance of all private vessels would operate. He had waited for some gentleman of the committee to explain what would be the operation of the bill, but none had come forward. He thought it worthy of inquiry how far, if this bill were passed, Great Britain might countervail the restrictions imposed by the United States. In the present form, he conceived the bill might operate very injuriously. The Committee ought to consider what articles were to be exported from the United States and what to be brought back in return. Every article exported was bulky, as cotton, tobacco, &c., whilst the manufactures imported in return did not occupy much space. If this bill, as it stood, were to be passed, would not the consequence be a law to prevent the entrance of our vessels into the waters of Great Britain? If it were in the power of Congress to confine the carriage of the products of the United States absolutely to their own registered vessels, some benefit might result to the shipping interest of the United States from such a measure; but it was not in the power of Congress to tie up the hands of Great Britain and France. If the United States were to enter into a warfare of this nature, it would be playing a game which would operate to their own disadvantage, and not to that of foreign nations. He believed it would be found that the duties on tonnage, and the discriminating duties on imports, had carried this system as far as was expedient; and he could not see any benefit to result from prohibiting foreign vessels from entering our waters.

Mr. SAWYER said that he, too, was opposed to this section, and the whole bill altogether, because it was not strong enough; it was evaporating the spirit of the nation in mere commercial regulations. After every insult for so many years past, our wrongs were now to be expiated by restrictions on our own commerce! We invite aggression by continuing the same system. If this was the ne plus ultra of resistance, he said he could not consent to give it his vote. It would not satisfy the people, and it ought not; they were tired of this mockery of resistance of these commercial restrictions and resolutions of approbation. The least that could have been expected from the Committee of Foreign Relations would have been a bill authorizing the issuing of letters of marque and reprisal. No reparation had been obtained for the affair of the Chesapeake, no release of our impressed seamen, nor any revocation or modification of the Orders in Council; and yet, for the mere pittance, the slight vestige of our former trade which the orders left us, the House was called upon to continue to carry on commerce with Great Britain and France. If the conduct of the nation were not more energetic, he said we should forfeit the little character we had acquired, and call down on us the contempt of every nation on earth; we should become contemptible even in our own eyes, for it was impossible for any man to contemplate the state in which we are, and the measures which had been, and were proposed to be taken, without feeling absolutely debased. We had, he said, tried this system for several years; it had done no good, and it was time to try some other. Gentlemen were now persevering contrary to the evidence of their senses, to the impulse of their feelings, and, he believed, to the wishes of the nation. While no French ships and scarcely any English ships now came into our waters, the formal prohibition of their entrance would but give a pretence for the indiscriminate capture of all our commerce, without producing any benefit whatever to the United States. Mr. S. concluded by moving that the Committee rise, with a view to postpone the subject till the 3d Monday in February.

Mr. MAcon adverted to the very opposite reasons for which the two gentlemen who preceded him had opposed the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts thought it was so strong that it would ruin us, by drawing upon us countervailing acts; and his colleague thought its weakness would only warrant further aggression on us. The Committee of Foreign Relations, he said, had been well aware of the situation in which they were placed. The Message of the 29th of November had been understood to be a pacific one. It had been acknowledged on all hands that the non-intercourse was totally useless. It was necessary that something should be done; and the committee had agreed to report this bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts had told the House, that if they adopted this bill, and Great Britain and France should countervail its provisions, the United States would suffer. At present, Mr. M. said, they captured and condemned our vessels, and they could not injure us much more in that way. The real question was, whether, as the President in his Message had shown a disposition for further negotiation, Congress would lend him their aid in it. Suppose Great Britain did countervail, and say that our ships should not go to her dominions, then the bill had provided that neither Amelia island, Halifax, or any other intermediate port, shall be a place of deposit. But, as our exports were the most bulky, if it were to be agreed that each nation should carry its own products, we should carry fifteen or twenty times as much as Great Britain would, and the advantage would be greatly on our side.

The bill had been reported in such a form, Mr. M. said, as that such parts as should not be agreeable to the House should be struck out. His colleague had thought the bill too weak. If Congress were to adopt the bill, did it prevent them from adopting more energetic measures? Certainly not. This bill differed wholly in its nature from the non-intercourse law, because it took off the restrictions from ourselves and put them on our assailants. It appeared to him, under the present situation of the country, that the committee must have been unfortunate indeed if it had reported a bill for issuing letters of marque and reprisal; for, last Winter, when matters stood much the same as they did now, the question had been tried in this House with perhaps as few votes as anything ever received which had been talked so much about. When the question had been stated on issuing letters of marque and reprisal forthwith, instead of at a distant day, where then had been the energy called for? A reference to the yeas and nays on that vote would show how few had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. M. said it was evident from the whole tenor that its object was to take the restrictions from our own nation and lay them on Great Britain and France; and it was an object worthy of consideration in the passage of this bill, that it was such a one as the nation could stand to for any length of time. If the Committee were to strike out every clause in the bill but that which repealed the non-intercourse law, he should be opposed to rising till they agreed to that one. At every place in the nation where even a boat could come, the people were satisfied that the non-intercourse law could not be enforced. If it was a mere dead letter, it should be repealed, and they should thus put every man in the nation on the same footing.

As he did not with his colleague think this a very weak bill, neither did he with the other gentleman think it a very energetic bill. He said he should have liked to have heard this talk of energy when the Chesapeake was attacked, and when the celebrated Orders in Council were issued; but the time for it had passed. They could not all, it seemed, get warm at the same time. It was best to take such measures now as the nation could stand to, and as would enable the President to settle our disputes with one or both belligerents; and this bill was calculated for that purpose. Whether the bill would satisfy the people or not he was totally ignorant. He himself could never tell here what would satisfy those whom he represented, and all that he could do was to act as he thought right, and depend on such conduct for their approbation. Last Winter the measures which his colleague now called paper measures were too strong for him, for he wanted to open a gate to go to the West India islands. This bill was different from the non-intercourse law, as it opened the world to the commerce of the United States, and shut their ports to the vessels of Great Britain and France. Mr. M. said he had hardly expected a complaint against the bill from gentlemen from the East, though he had thought from another part of the nation there might be a complaint. He cared very little what was done, so that there was not too much energy in it. He was not for a declaration of war just now, and he took this opportunity of saying so. The nation was not as much prepared now for war as it had been last Winter, or as it had been when the Chesapeake was attacked. As to the petty quarrel between Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson, he did not think that it changed the state of affairs one iota.

Mr. PICKMAN expressed his hope that the motion for the rising of the Committee would not prevail. He considered the bill as a very important one, and sincerely hoped that it would meet that cool and deliberate discussion to which its importance, and the respectability of the committee who reported it, entitled it. There were some parts of the bill which met his cordial approbation; there were other parts to which he could not give his assent till his objections to them were removed. The first section of the bill (interdicting the entrance of our waters to the public armed ships of Great Britain and France) he approved. He said it would be recollected that, at the last session of Congress, he had voted for the motion for excluding the armed ships of both Great Britain and France. He had done it because he thought it a disgrace to admit into our waters armed ships sailing under orders to capture our vessels; and he hoped they never would be admitted under such circumstances. With respect to the third section, he confessed that he had not entirely made up his mind. He did not think, however, that it would authorize either Great Britain or France to pass such decrees as his colleague seemed to think they would do, for it would not essentially change our commercial relations with them, as they are now prohibited from carrying on commerce with our ports, and our vessels are prohibited from going to theirs.

Mr. P. said it would also be recollected by gentlemen that he had spoken against the non-intercourse law at the last session, and did not vote for it because he had believed it totally ineffectual for the purposes for which it was passed. He had thought then, and experience had confirmed the truth of his opinion, that it was totally inefficient; that our citizens could not be restrained from violating it, and that it would operate only on those honest men who were disposed to pay a regard to the laws of their country, although they doubted their expediency. The fifth section of this bill, (prohibiting the importation of French or British goods from any other part of the dominions of either than where they were grown or manufactured,) he said, was liable to some of the same objections as the non-intercourse law. He conceived it utterly impossible thus to prevent the importation of the produce or manufactures of Great Britain and France, as, if prohibited directly, they would be imported circuitously through St. Bartholomews, &c., and our merchants might innocently import the produce or manufacture of those countries, after purchasing them as the produce of the neutral country. At present so numerous and so complicated were the various restrictive laws, with respect to our commerce, that it was almost impossible for the most honest man to construe them correctly. This information he said he derived from the Collector of the port of Salem, in Massachusetts, who, he believed, was disposed to give as fair a construction to the laws as any man in the United States. Mr. P. said it was very requisite that this or some such bill should pass, for the reason that it went to take off all the restrictions from our own citizens and throw them upon the subjects of those nations which were pirating on our commerce. He hoped the motion would not prevail for the Committee's rising, but that they should go on and give the bill a full and deliberate discussion.

Mr. TAYLOR said, if, indeed, this bill was as nerveless as it had been represented by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. SAWYER,) and from other quarters, he believed it would be easy to demonstrate that the course which the gentleman himself had proposed to give this subject was infinitely more nerveless, and destitute even of infantine strength. [Mr. SAWYER said he had made no proposition.] Mr. T. said he alluded to the proposition for postponing the consideration of the subject till February. Are we, said Mr. T., on a bed of roses? Will the House recollect the situation in which we are? It is true that I was not an admirer of the present project—I did not give it my support in the committee—but, nevertheless, when I reflect on the situation in which we shall be if this bill be postponed, I conceive it is necessary to vary our situation. The non-intercourse law has produced the effects foretold. You have given up the carrying trade—the bone of contention—the very object which the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) very truly told you excited the envy of Great Britain to your rival. Where are we now, sir? A gentleman, upon whose information I can rely as correct, has slipped upon my table a paper containing the information that there are now at Amelia island one hundred British merchant vessels ready to take the bread from our merchants, who, in fact, have only the alternative of coming along to Amelia island, whence our produce will be immediately shipped across the Atlantic. Now, would it not be nerveless, indeed, to arrest the consideration of this subject for two or three months when this is the state of things?

I understand that our custom-house offices are hermetically sealed; that, although British goods are found on the shelves of our merchants, yet, as the non-intercourse law has said that they cannot be imported, they get into the country without the custom-house officers receiving a single cent to pay the public burdens. This is precisely the situation in which the gentleman from North Carolina wishes us to continue for six or eight weeks longer. Let this bill be adopted or not, I do not like gentlemen to condemn it in the lump, unless they will be kind enough to make some specified proposition to substitute in the place of the clauses of it, which shall better our situation. We must act on it. We are, as the country now stands, the enemies of the commercial interest, for we are giving foreign nations the entire benefit of our commerce, and depriving our honest citizens of the advantages which this bill will offer to them. If it is of importance that our flag should be unfurled on the ocean as a commercial nation, it is necessary that we should now act. Every commercial town, port, and harbor, knows the course the thing is taking. The American vessel takes its departure with a cargo of produce, and returns to this country no more unless it has cast away its character of American and become a foreign vessel. It is probable, sir, that among those vessels at Amelia island are many that were American, but are now changed to English.

I am decidedly against the Committee's rising. Some parts of the bill may be good, some bad; but there certainly is a clause in the bill which will keep pirates and plunderers from our ports and harbors; and as to energy, I can tell those who talk of it that there is a clause in this bill which may prevent us from being Copenhagened; that a port may be so well fortified by nature and art combined as to oppose an armed force approaching, and yet which may not be competent to repel it after it has been received in peace and friendship within our ports and harbors.

Mr. LIVINGSTONE declared himself also opposed to the Committee's rising. He wished to know what was the extent of trade now carried on with our ports in British bottoms, and what its amount? He said he knew that there was a small trade carried on in small vessels from Nova Scotia to the United States, and which was very beneficial to the citizens of the United States; the stoppage of which, as proposed, would operate very unequally. It was a trade which could not so well be carried on by vessels of the United States. If Congress commenced this business, they might show Great Britain how she also might lay additional restrictions. Some of the sections of this bill, Mr. L. said, he thought it would be proper to retain; but there were some that he entirely disapproved. As to the non-intercourse, there was no occasion for repealing it in relation to Great Britain, because it was not in force against her; and this he thought he could demonstrate at a proper time.

Mr. SAWYER said, if he had as much confidence in the efficacy of the bill as the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MAOON,) he should make no opposition to it; but he expected nothing from it. If, said Mr. S., we take upon ourselves a war-like attitude, and evince a disposition to be independent, we shall produce such an embarrassment that the present Ministry of Great Britain will have to treat with us or retire from power. But, if we do no more than pass such a bill as this, we shall encourage them to go on till we shall be stripped, by Orders in Council, one after another, of every vestige of commercial rights. What are we afraid of? Can any change be for the worse? Why are we afraid of going to war? Shall we not have to borrow money to pay the current expenses of the year? We should only have to do the same in war. Never was there a more favorable moment for it. By the Treaty of Vienna, England is left without a chance of gaining a footing on the Continent. If we take a manly and independent ground, we shall compel her Ministry to respect our rights. Are we to wait for her to declare war first? If we do, we may wait forever. She will never declare it as long as she can carry it on as she does now without declaring it. Although I am opposed to a navy, yet I am desirous, when we have one, that its powers shall be exerted. If we were to send it to sea, and make a bold irruption into Canada, we might produce some effect, but never by such measures as these.

Mr. SHEFFEY said, that, not having expected this bill would so soon be called up, he had not given to it that attention which he should otherwise have done, but he had paid sufficient attention to it to conceive it worthy of consideration. It had been observed by gentlemen apparently opposed to it, that it was not sufficiently energetic on the one hand, and on the other that it would embarrass commerce. Taking it for granted, said Mr. S., that we ought to adopt a stronger measure, is that a reason why this bill should not be passed, and remain in force until our present peaceful attitude is changed? If a strong measure were to be brought forward, it would probably supersede this bill. But what, sir, is the energy of which gentlemen talk? If they want war, why do they not come forward and lay a declaration of war on the table? What are energetic measures if this be not what is meant? Let us, if it be deemed expedient, give a right to our merchants to defend themselves against England and France, but do not let us be diverted from the bill. It does not appear to me to be the sentiment of the majority of the House that we ought, at this time, to change the attitude of the country; it does not appear to be the sentiment of the Chief Magistrate. Prepare for the worst, but go no farther. This is the energy I would recommend. Make preparation, but take no steps of hostility.

Let us consider this question on the objection from the other side of the House. If gentlemen are not willing to go to war, what will they do? Or, will they do anything beyond a preparation for defence? Will they suffer the non-intercourse to remain in force? I see no disposition on any side to do this. We see that the prosperity of agriculture requires commerce. Nothing but the most imperious circumstances operating on the nation can prevent the exportation of certain products of agriculture. The non-intercourse on this account is not enforced, or is evaded. Thus situated, what is its tendency? To corrupt the people. As a measure of coercion, it is certainly a phantom; for what effects does it produce? Are not the manufacturers of England now furnished with the raw materials necessary for their fabrics, and with everything you could give them? You make the farmer and planter pay the circuitous price for European goods, whilst his produce is reduced, by the want of competition in the market, to the lowest possible price. Under these circumstances the non-intercourse, I presume, is not to be continued.

France and England, Mr. S. said, had granted us no commercial rights, and there was, therefore, no call for liberality towards them. The United States ought to carry on commerce, because necessary to the support of agriculture, and they ought to carry it on to the greatest advantage to their own citizens. And what then should be the course pursued? Not to destroy commerce by non-importation and non-intercourse acts, but to carry it on so that it should be beneficial to the Government in point of revenue, and to those who carried it on. What should Congress do to make it so? They ought to foster the rights of navigation. He said he would ask gentlemen to turn over the page of history and see what had tended more to promote the prosperity of England than her navigation act—an act which gave a decided preference to British navigation? The object of this bill was not only to give preference in our ports to American vessels, but it went to the entire exclusion of the vessels of Great Britain and France so long as their injurious edicts should remain in force. Mr. S. said he would state his ideas on an objection which he had understood to be made to this plan, viz: that it would operate injuriously on the farming interest, because there would be a redundancy of produce in the market—to the carriage of which the tonnage of the United States would not be equal, and that, therefore, there would be a depression in the price of produce. He presumed that a contrary effect would follow. There were abroad, he said, a number of American vessels trading, not with the United States, but between foreign ports, or engaged in circuitous voyages. Now, the direct trade would certainly be most advantageous; all the vessels thus employed would immediately return home to engage in the direct trade.

It appears to me, at all events, said Mr. S., that the bill is worthy of consideration. If energy be wanting, the passage of the bill will not preclude it, but will be continuing the existing state of things to the greatest advantage until that state is changed. If the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. SAWYER) means raising an army and invading Canada, as he intimated, I most cordially disapprove of it. I will not alter the course we have at present taken. On the other hand I consider that we are not indebted to France or England, and therefore should not act towards them in the same spirit as if we had been fairly and justly dealt by. If they would exercise liberality to us I would act correspondently towards them. If we had received any liberality at their hands, it would be improper to exclude their vessels from our ports. But, as it is, commerce and navigation will be promoted by the bill—that commerce and navigation which must continue so long as our character of agriculturists and merchants is not converted into that of manufacturers; an event which I, for one, hope never to see. So long as this nation remains in its present state, so long ought we to give to our citizens all the advantages that can be derived from commerce. Independently of this, if anything be done, it ought to be promptly done. The merchant does not at present know to what ports to go; but, if you open to him the right to go to France and England, your act will not only operate advantageously to him, but will augment the price of produce in the planter's hands.

Mr. BURWELL said he did not suppose that this question involved a discussion of the details of the bill, and he did not therefore rise to discuss them; but he deemed it his duty to say, that, in his opinion, the course proposed to be pursued by this bill was the proper one. It will not be denied, said he, that I have always been favorable to the system of commercial restriction, and that I have given my approbation to it so long as there was the smallest probability of its operating advantageously, and so long as the people of the United States expected good effects from this course. But I am of opinion that it has been fairly abandoned, and that any further attempt to coerce by commercial restrictions would be futile and ridiculous. I believe the present situation of the world is favorable to the assertion of our rights against one of the belligerents, viz: Great Britain. But, sir, I think that the spirit of the nation is evaporated, and we have been so long tricked by her artifices, that I despair of taking any measure of the kind at this time which would not meet with such opposition as to make it useless in effect. A single fact will suffice to awake the attention of the House to our present situation. The effect of the non-intercourse law is to sink to the lowest price the value of our produce, and to raise still higher that of articles of foreign growth or manufacture. It is a fact perfectly notorious that the country is as full of foreign articles as it has been for years past, and that the products of the Southern country have been reduced to the lowest state of depression; and when it is obvious that, so far from producing an effect abroad, the non-intercourse is not regarded at all, I ask, why persevere in it when against your own interest? My opinion is, that it should be removed; and, when removed, we shall either enjoy such a commerce as will give vent to our surplus produce, or we shall discover the true character of the edicts in force against us. If it be found that all the evils complained of, as flowing from our own Government, proceed actually from the belligerent decrees, the nation will unite in support of our fair commerce.

It will be recollected, said Mr. B., that I offered the other day a resolution calling upon the President for any information he may possess relative to the policy of the Northern Powers. It appears to me that we ought to trade to every country whose ports are open to us. To illustrate my idea, if the Powers in the North of Europe are willing to receive our productions and exchange theirs—although the British, by their Orders in Council, and the French, by their blockading decrees, may interdict our entrance—I think every American here and elsewhere would force a commerce under those circumstances, whatever may be the consequence. For my own part, as respects France and England, I confess that I think the honor of this country receives a salvo from the conduct of these nations; for such, at the present, is the unsettled state of commerce, although we might compel them to a temporary relaxation, the same system would again be resorted to when opportunity offered. And until there shall be a reasonable prospect that justice or political morality shall be adhered to, I am clearly of opinion that we ought to go to war with neither of them, but maintain peace if possible. So long as any nation permits to us a reciprocal commerce, I am one of those who are willing to unite and force that commerce. I would not force a contraband trade, but the carriage of our own produce I would force to the utmost power of the nation.

My colleague (Mr. SHEFFEY) made some remarks on one part of the effect of the bill, viz: on the transportation of our produce, in which he was certainly correct. Our tonnage is more than competent to the transportation of all our produce; and this view does away a very strong (if correct) objection to the bill: that by restricting importation it would decrease the competition, so as to raise the price of freight and destroy the price of produce. So long as we have sufficient tonnage, this cannot take place. We shall, at least, be justified in making the experiment; and if it be found that it will foster our navigation, certainly the gentlemen from the Eastern States would not complain of a provision which gives to them an exclusive advantage; for it is perfectly immaterial to the Southern country, in point of interest, if its produce gets to market, how it gets there. I should, indeed, be surprised if Eastern gentlemen, who are so much concerned, should oppose a regulation intended exclusively for their benefit.

As for countervailing regulations being anticipated, I should presume gentlemen need not make themselves very uneasy on that score, for they already exist. Although the Orders in Council have undergone a modification somewhat favorable, yet the act of Parliament on the subject has laid a discriminating duty so great that a merchant saves the price of the freight by giving the preference to a British ship; and though the duty has been somewhat lowered, it is still so high that it is impossible for American ships to come in competition with British vessels. And let me ask, sir, when the British Government has set the example, ought we not to give a similar advantage to the American flag in our ports, to put them at least on a reciprocal footing? What I have stated are facts which cannot be controverted.

I do not suppose, however, that any regulation which we could adopt would keep the tonnage of the United States on its present respectable footing. I do not suppose any act could have that effect, because, if gentlemen will only turn their attention to the ports closed against us, they must be satisfied that our trade can never again be as extensive as it has been. It must diminish at least one-half; and it does not appear possible for us to be able to give employment to all our present tonnage.

Mr. B. concluded by saying, that he rose only to express his anxiety to see this subject acted on.

He wished to see every commercial restriction done away. After the experience which the nation would have under a trial of the system proposed by the bill, Congress would be better able to judge what course ought to be pursued; and if it were found at last absolutely necessary to the protection of our rights to take the attitude of war, he flattered himself there was still sensibility enough in the nation to point their resentment to the proper course. He hoped the Committee would persevere till they got through the bill.

Mr. SAWYER's motion for the Committee's rising was then negatived without a division. This was understood to be a peremptory decision against postponing the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to read the fourth section of the bill, which provides "that, from and after the passing of this act, it shall not be lawful to import into the United States, or the Territories thereof, in any vessel or vessels not owned wholly by citizens of the United States, and registered according to law, any goods, wares, or merchandise, &c., from any port or place situated in Great Britain or France," &c.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he could not conceive why a discrimination was here made between registered and sea-letter vessels, as both were known to the laws of the United States. He wished some member of the committee who reported the bill to explain it.

Mr. TAYLOR observed, that, if Congress adopted the idea suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) in which he (Mr. T.) concurred, that the United States should protect their flag in its commerce with whatever nation should hold out the hand of fellowship towards us, it seemed important to the nation that they should understand for what it was they had undertaken to adopt this principle. Would gentlemen hold out the same protection to a vessel condemned and purchased by one of our citizens in a port of France or England, or to a vessel built abroad, as they would to our own registered shipping? It was, indeed, singular that gentlemen, who represented that portion of the people of the United States who were the almost exclusive ship-builders, should feel a hesitation in embracing this proposition.

Mr. QUINCY conceived that this was a proposition which more properly belonged to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures as a permanent commercial regulation; and, indeed, he had understood that that committee had this subject under consideration. Some exception, too, ought to be made in favor of sea-letter vessels, now owned by citizens of the United States, to prevent the law having a retrospective operation.

Mr. TAYLOR said he should have no objection to an amendment which should make an exception in favor of sea-letter vessels now owned by American citizens. But if the door were left open to all sea-letter vessels, there might be persons who would be very willing to lend a cover to the ships of Britain, France, or any other nation, provided they got handsome commissions for lending the American name. He wished not to leave room for the abuse heretofore charged upon us of covering foreign vessels with our character.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to strike out the 4th section. His reason was that in practice no beneficial effect would be produced to our own merchants, and much injury might result. Though in theory, registered vessels of the United States were built and wholly owned by American citizens, yet in practice, registered and sea-letter vessels were in some cases equally owned by foreigners; and it was impossible by law to prevent foreigners from having a concern in them. As this section therefore would be inoperative or useless, he moved to strike it out.

Mr. LIVERMORE'S motion was negatived, 24 only rising in the affirmative.

The fifth section was read. [This section provides that no goods, wares, or merchandise, whatever, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain or France, or any of their colonies or dependencies, shall be imported into the United States after the 15th day of April next, in any manner, from any port or place other than in the countries, colonies, or dependencies of those Powers in which such goods shall have been grown or manufactured]

Mr. CHITTENDEN, after a few remarks, moved to amend the section by adding to it a clause to the following effect:

"Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prohibit the importation of salt from any port in Great Britain or France and their dependencies."

Mr. PICKMAN moved to strike out the whole section, because he conceived it utterly impossible to carry it into effect if adopted, and it did not comport with the declarations of gentlemen that they were desirous of doing away all restriction on ourselves. In case of a war between England and the Powers in the North of Europe, prize cargoes might be purchased to great advantage by our citizens in the Baltic or elsewhere; but this bill would prohibit their importation, although British goods might be scarce here, and serious inconveniences ensue from their scarcity. Whether such a traffic would be of advantage or not, it would be almost impossible to prevent it. Mr. P. mentioned an instance in which he himself had lately seen goods with French marks on a merchant's counter; and that, when expressing surprise at seeing French goods here in the present state of commerce, he had been told that they were English goods marked by the British manufacturers with French marks, with a view of facilitating their introduction into countries where the importation of British goods was not by the laws permitted. This section he also conceived would further tend to increase the practice of smuggling.

Mr. TAYLOR asked the gentleman whether the merchant, on a voyage to obtain British or French goods for the supply of his neighbors, would send to St. Petersburg, or Stockholm, or to Archangel, round the northern point of the Continent, for these British goods, when he could get them so much less circuitously? No system which ever was adopted (said Mr. T.) could embrace extreme cases. We are now legislating to insure a good bargain to the merchant who may happen to be at St. Petersburg when a cargo is condemned. The supposition of such a case indeed is too unlimited; for, in case of such a war, the people in the north of Europe, not receiving British goods through a direct channel, would give at least as much for the prize goods as our merchants could. But, to come nearer home, let us take Amelia island, Halifax or any other port in the British Provinces. Suppose this section were struck out of the bill—what would be the consequence? Great Britain would say "you shall not enter our ports; true, we want your produce and want you to take our manufactures; the exchange is convenient to us, but you shall not have the monopoly of carrying it on; you shall not touch our ports in Europe, but we will leave Halifax open to you." Why sir, we should revert to the very state of things from which we are endeavoring to extricate ourselves. That would be the effect of striking out the section. It was the object of the committee who reported this bill so to place this system that, in the retaliation which might be made by Great Britain, if any were attempted, she should have no advantages, but should do it at her peril; that every step of retaliation should serve as a bounty to the manufacturing interest now springing up among us; that we should affect her somewhere, whatever course she should take. I do not say but there may be defects in the bill, but this is not one. It is to prevent any intermediate British port from being made the entrepot for the exchange of our produce for her manufactures. The same observations will apply with equal force to any commerce which may exist between this country and France. She has islands in the West Indies which might be used for the same purpose.

Mr. GARDENIER asked if it was the intention of the committee to prohibit the importation of British or French goods from neutral ports?

Mr. TAYLOR. Undoubtedly it is.

Mr. SHEFFEY remarked that this was a complicated bill, and required mature consideration. As the Committee had progressed considerably, he moved that it now rise to give an opportunity to reflect at leisure on its various provisions.

Mr. MACON said he had no objection to give time for consideration, and that the Committee should rise for that purpose. But he hoped the Committee would to-morrow again resume the subject, and decide on the bill as early as possible, as the non-intercourse law at present in existence was daily evaded.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

tory of Indiana; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported to the House their agreement to the resolution therein contained, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the election held for a Delegate to Congress for the Indiana Territory, on the 22d May, 1809, being without authority of law, is void; and consequently the seat of Jonathan Jennings, as a Delegate for that Territory, hereby declared to be vacant.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole; when an adjournment was called for, and carried.

TUESDAY, January 9.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the times for holding the two terms of the district court for the district of Maine, now by law holden on the last Tuesday of May and the first Tuesday of September; so that the former shall hereafter be holden on the fourth Tuesday of June, and the latter on the second Tuesday of September; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. WHITMAN, Mr. HUFFY, and Mr. SHEFFEY, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting his report made in obedience to the act of the 21st of April, 1806, entitled "An act concerning public contracts;" which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill to revive and continue in force, for a further time, the first section of an act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," was read the third time, and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the unfinished business of yesterday, respecting the contested election of Jonathan Jennings; when, on motion of Mr. GHOLSON, the further consideration of the report was postponed until to-morrow.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION ACT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes. Mr. PICKMAN'S motion yet under consideration.

Messrs. PICKMAN, LIVERMORE, POTTER, and ROSS, supported, and Messrs. MACON, FISK, SHEFFEY, and TAYLOR, opposed the motion.

Those who supported the motion contended that the 5th section of the bill, having for its object the prohibition of the importation from neutral countries of goods, the produce or manufacture of France or England, and also the importation from the colonies of the belligerents of the produce or manufacture of the mother countries, and vice versa, was inexpedient in practice, and could not be executed; that it would be impossible to distinguish between the productions of different countries; that it was a notorious fact that large quantities of produce were daily imported through St. Bartholomew's, which, being a small island, it was known was not capable of producing the quantities of produce exported from it—but that it was and always would be impossible to distinguish between the produce of that island and those contiguous to it; that salt, for example, was an article, the place of manufacture of which could never be ascertained; that this section would in this respect possess the inconveniences of the non-intercourse law; as it could not be carried into execution; that if one belligerent, viz: Great Britain, were to rescind its decrees, and intercourse was to be renewed with the nation so doing, the produce of the colonies of France might be innocently purchased at British ports as the produce of the latter; that there were certain articles of English manufacture, viz: low priced woollens, which were almost necessities of life, and as such would find their way into the country; that this section was at war with the other principles of the bill, which were said to be to remove the restrictions from our own citizens and impose them on the citizens of France and Great Britain; that many evils would result from this section which could not now be foreseen. It was also said that the principle of regulating commerce on the ocean by such provisions was absurd; that it would be curious to hear of Louis XVIII. issuing decrees for the Government of France, which would be food for laughter for Napoleon; that we should act equally absurdly in passing such provisions as these which could not prove effectual; that the whole bill might be a pretty thing in theory, like the plan of a building or chart of a road—but, when reduced to practice, would amount to nothing.

To this it was replied by the opponents of the motion for striking out the 5th section, that the whole bill might not be perfect, or might not comprehend such a system as in a different state of the country and of the world ought to be adopted; that the great objection to the first sections of the bill had been that their provisions would probably be met by a countervailing policy on the part of the belligerents which might be carried into effect in two ways—by restrictive regulations, or by additional duties; that this 5th section had been incorporated in the bill for the express purpose of meeting the first mode of retaliation, and of keeping the carriage of our produce in the hands of our own merchants exclusively; that if the importation of the manufactures of Great Britain was permitted from any port whatever of her dependencies, she, having Canada, Nova Scotia, and her West India islands, would exclude our vessels from England, send her manufactures to those colonies, throw the whole carriage into the hands of the British merchant, and compel our merchants to become mere coasters; that the effect of this section would be, that she might send as many of her manufactures as she pleased to her colonies, but that they could not be imported here; that if this section could not be executed, the United States would be just in the situation in which they now are with the non-intercourse law, and the question would then come before them either to declare war or relax even from this measure; that a subsequent section of the bill made provisions for the execution of the 5th; that there was no doubt however but this law would be better executed than the non-intercourse law, because it would not be the interest of the merchant to violate it; that the argument for striking out the section, because it possibly might be violated, would be equally strong if urged as a motive for the abolition of all our revenue laws, because they made a difference in duty on articles exported from different places; that, although some articles could not be identified with the places of their growth or manufacture, yet nineteen-twentieths could; that if the section were to be struck out, the bill itself should be rejected, for it would then be a milk and water measure indeed; and if the bill were to pass without it, all the commerce of the United States would be thrown into the hands of Great Britain, as well as all the profit derived from the transportation of it.

In the debate on this motion were mingled many general remarks and observations on the principle of the bill.

Mr. SEYBERT.—Mr. Chairman, I am unaccustomed to public speaking, and, therefore, reluctantly lay before this honorable Committee the sentiments and opinions which I entertain on the bill now under discussion. My duty impels me to exhibit to the American people in general, and to my constituents in particular, the principles which actuate and govern my decisions as one of the representatives of the people. I hope the Committee will indulge me for a few moments with their attention.

It cannot be denied that all the commercial regulations of the United States materially affect the district which I have the honor to represent in this assembly. It would be a useless task to detail the extent of the commerce of the city of Philadelphia, it is well known in all parts of the civilized world; from that port the American flag has proceeded to the remotest regions. I do acknowledge that the city of Philadelphia, in common with every part of the United States, owes much of its prosperity to commerce; from this circumstance it may be inferred that I should on all occasions, and at all hazards, step forth as one of the champions of any commercial system which, in the least of its features, bore a semblance in favor of mercantile interest. To this I answer, sir, that every vote which I shall give in this House shall be pronounced upon principles which I can reconcile to my judgment, and which my reason shall proclaim to me to be right. I consider the lucre gained by commerce or any other branch of industry, as sordid and beneath the dignity of freemen, when it is to be obtained at the expense of national honor and sovereignty. Whenever, sir, I can support any commercial regulation of an opposite tendency, it shall receive my warmest approbation. I maintain the doctrine that "the only sure foundation of commercial prosperity, is national independence and civil liberty." These sentiments, if I mistake not, comport with the true character of a republican legislator, and they are generally adopted by the friends of my country. It is proper that the provisions in the bill should now be examined; for this purpose I will take a review of such sections of it as seem to me to be connected with the great principle in question.

In the 5th section of this bill its most prominent features are apparent. As this section is now under consideration, I will proceed to state the view which I have conceived of the system contemplated by the bill.

By the 5th section a direct trade between the American States and Britain and her dependencies, and also a direct trade with France and her dependencies, is declared to be admissible, provided that said trade shall be carried on in vessels wholly owned by American citizens.

The 9th section contains a revoking clause, which, in case Great Britain and France or either of them shall rescind the restrictions which they have respectively laid upon our commerce, enables the President to make void the condition contained in the 5th section, whereby the necessity of the vessels being wholly American, in which such trade is carried on, is done away; so that the vessels of either nation so rescinding may freely enter our ports and harbors, with or without cargoes, as was the case before such restrictions were laid.

What will this nation gain by the passing of this bill? Or, rather let me ask, what shall we lose by such proceedings? I could readily answer this question, by declaring it as my opinion, that the act itself would be a direct submission to the views and interests of one of the great belligerent Powers—I mean Great Britain. In fact, we should thereby prostrate the national sovereignty. Whether we enrich England, at the expense of our neglected industry, is a matter of small consideration. But when we do it at the expense of our sovereignty, it is a blow which divides the roots—the tree falls never to rise again. Any gain to this nation which the supporters of this bill can assert to be the consequence of its passage, is entirely imaginary. A pretended advantage is that of confining the trade to our own vessels. This is mere pretence; for it is well known that British agents themselves do now, and ever will give a preference to a trade with our ships as long as there is a discriminating duty in their favor. The doctrine of the British is, bring your raw materials and take away our manufactures. It would be well enough, if both England and France would agree to the terms therein expressed; but is it probable that they will? I, for my part, think they will not. What change of measures has taken place in the European councils to induce this change in our commercial system? It may be just to remark that I am no advocate for the present non-intercourse law; for I believe it to be worse than nothing. But, will the passage of the bill in question make things better? I think it will not. Have Britain and France become more just as respects our commercial rights? Can we persuade ourselves that Great Britain will permit our vessels to pass to the Continent unmolested? Again, what assurances have we that the vessels and cargoes which might arrive in France will be received and respected? This is inconceivable to me, and must only be the reverie of a fertile imagination. Past experience should prove to us the delusion of such a doctrine; we cannot deduce such inferences from the data, detailed in the letters of Jackson and Champagny, as communicated to us in the President's Message of November last.

That Great Britain will not permit the operation of this bill, as respects the Continent of Europe, must be evident to every reflecting mind who will take the pains to collect the facts detailed in the debates of the House of Commons prior to our independence; she evinced an hostility to the progress of these States, as respects her commerce and manufactures, as early as the year 1763. It is unnecessary for me to relate the particular restrictions; they may be seen by referring to Parliamentary debates, vol. 28, p. 207. I will also refer you to the questions proposed to the celebrated Franklin by the British House of Commons; the questions prove the uneasiness of the Government, fearing that we should meet with success in our manufactures, and the answers do immortal honor to the American patriot. At this period it was a popular sentiment in Great Britain, concerning these States, then colonies, "that everything was to be dreaded from their increase of population and skill in agriculture, the arts, and manufactures." As early as the year 1750, the British Parliament enacted, that no slitting mill or forge, or any iron works, should be established in America. The British have ever been desirous to keep us in the "gristle," and were intent upon preventing our ever hardening into manhood. They always entertained views equally hostile towards Ireland; and their system of oppression is continued, although they have incorporated Ireland as a part of the British empire. Can we for a moment suppose that she now will favor our commercial intercourse? We cannot for a moment allow that Great Britain will admit our communication with the Continent of Europe, unless under her infernal system of granting a license to trade. Permit me to take a short review of the principles and practice adopted on these occasions. How ill-founded in principle to carry on a trade with nations with whom they are at war, and to interdict the same trade to neutrals, unless they act under a special license! This is in direct proof that "self-interest is, among nations, certainly the great moving principle; no national measure, perhaps, is, at any time, the result of pure generosity or good will." Forged papers are issued, and vessels arrive from one European port in another, in the course of a few days, as if they had been carried by magic influence across the wide spreading waters of the ocean, from the United States. Can we, for a moment, think of a submission like this? Our national sovereignty is thereby relinquished; we are degraded beneath the rank of colonies; nevertheless, some of our merchants, who pretend to reputation and character, do not hesitate to accede to the terms of this diabolical system of oppression. Under a state of things like this, who can pretend that "virtue is honored, and vice always detested," or that, as republican citizens, "we fear blame more than punishment?" Facts have lately been published which prove to what extent this fraud on nations is carried in Britain. I will call to your recollection the case of "the Good Hope, a neutral vessel, laden with brandy and bound from Rochelle to Hull; she was captured and sent into England; she was tried on the 7th of November last before the British Admiralty Court; her license had expired, but Sir William Scott observed, that under the obstructions existing in respect to the commerce of England, the most liberal construction should be given to the licenses. She was therefore restored, paying the captor's expenses." The Mercury, under similar circumstances, was tried at the same time, and was restored with freight and expenses. What American who has ever heard of the spirit of 1776, would not resist such infringements of neutral rights, and such violations of sovereignty? This state of things reminds me of the answer made by Anacharsis to Solon, when he conversed with him about his intended reformation in the State: "Alas!" said he, "all your laws will be found to resemble spider webs; the weak and small flies will be caught, and entangled, but the great and powerful will always have strength enough to break through." Should this bill finally pass this House, I think we may reasonably conclude that the following will certainly be some of the consequences of its adoption.

Our sovereignty being thus prostrated, the lion, once laid low, will resume his dominion, and triumphantly tyrannize over all mankind. The banners of Britain, with her system of oppression, will be carried from pole to pole; her former restless colonies will not pass unobserved. Let me ask, would it not be more becoming the dignity of a weak nation, by a voluntary offer on her part, to reassume her former secondary character? We might then have some pretensions to the protection and mercy of our ancient parent State; nay, we might deceive the world, by declaring that it was the wish of the majority of the sovereign people.

The passage of this bill will certainly lead to a war with one or both of the great belligerent Powers of Europe, for, according to the Orders in Council, we dare not trade with France and her dependencies; according to the decrees of France, we dare not trade with Great Britain and her dependencies. This bill admits of a trade with both Powers, under the restriction, that it is done by means of vessels wholly American. Since neither of the belligerents will rescind their orders or decrees to enforce a law founded on this bill, we must permit our merchantmen to arm for their defence; the consequence of which will be resistance to attacks from either belligerent. Thus shall we be led to hostilities with both of them. I am opposed to this system. It is well for us to avoid a contest with either of them, and far better to avoid it with both.

If we are to adopt a preference in favor of one or other of the belligerents, since they will not act upon fair principles themselves, it is proper that we should take a fair view of the American commerce carried on with Great Britain, and that with the Continent of Europe. It is of moment to determine which of the two is the most advantageous to the United States. This can only be answered by taking a correct view of the extent and importance of each, as shall be demonstrated by a reference to the amount of our exports and imports to and from each of those countries. We will now proceed to this investigation; it shall be founded upon the official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. I will take the calculations for three years—1802, 1803, and 1804.

In the year 1802, domestic produce was exported to Europe to the amount of - - $36,180,000
Foreign articles exported same year - 35,775,060

Total amount of exports from the United States for 1802 - - - - $71,955,060

In the year 1803, domestic articles were exported from the United States amounting to - $42,135,000
Foreign articles exported same year - 13,594,000

Total amount of exports for 1803 - - - - $55,729,000

Amount of domestic articles exported from the United States to Europe in 1804 - - - $41,470,000
Foreign articles exported same year - 36,230,000

Total exports for 1804 - - - - $77,700,000

Of our domestic articles in the year 1802, Great Britain received in amount - - - - $19,014,943
Foreign articles - - - - 4,910,148

Amount total for 1802 received by Great Britain - - - - - $23,925,091

In 1803, Great Britain received of domestic articles $23,597,903
Foreign - - - - - 1,771,170

Total for 1803 - - - - - $25,369,073

In 1804, Great Britain received domestic articles to the value of - - - - - $19,346,517
Foreign - - - - - 2,486,285

Total for 1804 - - - - - $21,832,802

Deducting the amount of exports, both domestic and foreign, which Great Britain receives of the United States, from the amount total of exports, made to Europe, we shall find the balance in favor of the Continent as follows:

For the year 1802 - - - - - $48,029,909
1804 - - - - - 55,870,118

So that, if a trade had been carried on with Great Britain, and that with the Continent had been relinquished for the three years mentioned, we should have sustained the enormous loss of profit, arising on the exports, of $134,229,954. This, at ten per cent., would amount to very little less than $14,000,000—nearly $5,000,000 per annum. It might also be further remarked, that many shipments made to English ports do not remain in Great Britain, they are frequently consigned to a market on the Continent, the arrangement being an accommodation to the convenience of commerce. This would considerably lessen the amount of British commerce with the United States. All our exports to the Continent remain and are consumed there.

Independent of the amount, we may try this question in another way; we furnish England with raw materials necessary to her existence; she returns to us those materials manufactured; thus she derives a considerable profit on her industry, amounting to a balance of $14,000,000 annually against the United States, according to the most favorable calculations. We might ourselves, if we pursued a proper system, save all this to the State, and thus should we be more happy and independent. There are two ways of effecting this great purpose—first, either by our abandoning such articles as are not necessary to the comforts of civilized life, of which there are many; and, secondly, by an application of the industry of our fellow-citizens to such raw materials as are usually shipped to England. To this last I should give the preference, and we must one day or other resort to it if we wish to retain our national sovereignty. All writers and all nations consider a system of national industry, properly directed, as the true source of national wealth and power. In proportion as we are industrious, so are we happy. Man, naturally prone to idleness, is too apt to indulge, and thus to fall into apathy ill becoming his nature. By rousing our national spirit, and exercising our industry at home, we shall be led to an investigation of our internal resources, the extent of which we are as yet unacquainted with; the importance of which can only be deduced by the utility and extensive application made of such as are already known. A single article from these States has been known to confirm the reputation and fortune of individuals of the British nation; nay, they have been deemed objects worthy the attention of the Parliament. Situated as we are, I am astonished when I hear it so frequently reverberated from the walls of the Capitol, that our Treasury is exhausted, and that the nation must suffer a natural death for the want of resources. Providence has been bountiful in giving us an over proportion of the most valuable articles which nature can furnish to man, to supply his necessities, and to defend himself in times of danger. We have been negligent of them, while Europeans dispatch persons to investigate the regions of North America. Our immense forests will furnish timber for ship building, and every other purpose; our iron mines are inexhaustible, and, according to an intelligent writer, "iron mines seem to be put into men's hands as the instruments of their own independence;" our beds of mineral coal are not yet sufficiently traced, and coal has been emphatically termed "the soul and mainspring of British wealth." It would be an endless task to recount what we have. I ask you to tell me what useful productions we have not?

JANUARY, 1810.

Our population is already considerable, and the genius diffused through it stands unrivalled by foreign competitors. The true spirit of liberty, founded upon wisdom and principles of sound policy, will lead the persecuted to come to us from abroad, and the mildness and equality of our laws will confirm them in the just rights of men, by securing to them every blessing which civil liberty, and the application of their industry, can furnish. This subject is inexhaustible; to the nation it is all important. I was led astray by the magnitude of the object, and ask of you pardon for this aberration. Upon the internal resources are based the glory, the happiness, the prosperity, and, above all, the independence of my country. This is my apology for the digression. I shall vote against the bill. It was my intention to have taken a minute view of the tendency of each of the sections of this bill. This, I concluded, was unnecessary, as in my opinion its provisions, under existing circumstances, cannot be carried into operation. Therefore, I have directed my attention to the general principle upon which it is founded; and this cannot be put into practice. Why, then, shall we pass a bill which cannot be carried into operation?

Mr. ROSS viewed it in the same light. He said it was a truth to which gentlemen shut their eyes, but of which they as well as the people would be if they were not now convinced that nothing short of actual force could give protection to commerce. Instead of such a milk and water measure he wished to see a provision authorizing the President to fit out the whole Navy of the United States and send it to sea, and authorizing the merchants to arm in defence of their lawful commerce.

Mr. POTTER was decidedly opposed to the bill; he conceived it would produce in practice a complete embargo and non-intercourse.

Mr. SHEPPEY thought it the best measure which, under the present circumstances, could be adopted, and pledged himself at the proper time to prove it.

Mr. FISK remarked that the Committee of Foreign Relations, in performing its duty, had by no means prevented the adoption of any measures which the Army or Navy committee might think proper to recommend.

Mr. LIVERMORE repeated his idea, expressed yesterday, that the non-intercourse law was not now in force as to Great Britain; because it had been legally suspended, and could not be renewed without legislative sanction. He did not blame the President for having issued the proclamation of the 9th August, for it was certainly proper that the fact of the non-ratification of the arrangement should be known to all, that they might govern themselves accordingly.

The Committee rose at a little past 4 o'clock, without taking a question on Mr. PICKMAN'S motion, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 10.

Mr. VAN HORN presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, praying that an act may be passed directing the Marshal for the District of Columbia to receive and take into his custody the bodies of persons taken in execution of writs of capias ad satisfaciendum, issued on judgments rendered by a single magistrate, in cases where the judgment should not exceed twenty dollars.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION ACT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France. The motion for striking out the 5th section yet under consideration.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said, that upon a question of so much national importance as that immediately under consideration, he could not reconcile it to his feelings or his sense of duty to give a mere vote, and not to give his views of the subject. The motion to strike out the section involved in his opinion the whole merits of the bill, and on motions of this kind, so broad in their effects, a latitude had been allowed to gentlemen, and they were permitted to take wide range, and consider all the principles contained in the bill. He should, concisely, take this course. My opinion, said he, is that the more deliberately and fully the principles of the bill shall be investigated, and its bearings understood, the more it will be found conformable to the Message of the President, protective of the honor of the nation, and promotive of its commercial interests.

At the commencement of the present session we received a Message from the President. Examine the ground taken in the Message, and particularly that part of it referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, and compare it with the principles of the bill, and it will be found that the one is strictly conformable with the other. The President informed us he had broken off all further communication with Francis James Jackson, the British Minister, in consequence of his insolent and intolerant conduct, but that he had left the way still open for the negotiation through any other organ; that he was still ready to receive communications through any other less offensive accredited person, who should conduct himself with proper decorum and decency. This certainly is not a war stand. The President, like his predecessor, is for keeping the door still open for amicable adjustment of our differences with the belligerents, and avoiding a state of war as long as is consistent with national honor. This is the policy adopted in the Message, and there is nothing in the bill inconsistent with this policy. Again: the President states, in his Message, the difficulty, nay, almost the impracticability of enforcing the non-intercourse law; but it certainly cannot be considered from any part of the Message that, in the event of the repeal of the non-intercourse there is nothing to be substituted. To carry on negotiation, and to aid it, this bill has been thought proper to be introduced. Our commerce has been attacked by French decrees and British orders. This bill proposes resistance, and a determination that, in defiance of these decrees and orders, we will have commerce.

The first great question to be negotiated between Great Britain and the United States is the outrage on the Chesapeake. The honor of the nation is most materially involved in this atrocious act. I ask gentlemen if they are prepared to abandon entirely all idea of reparation for this base, cowardly, and murderous attack? If not, they must give their consent to the first and second sections of the bill, because they have an entire and intimate connexion with that affair. When that infamous outrage was committed, what was the measure promptly adopted by the then President? To interdict, by proclamation, the armed vessels of the British from entering our waters. When Mr. Rose came here he made it, at first, a sine qua non that the proclamation should be suspended before reparation should be made; but, afterwards, he did consent that the withdrawing the proclamation and the reparation should be contemporaneous, provided our Government would first, as a reparation due to the British nation, make a degrading concession for the molestation of the boats at Hampton, and should further, basely concede that the men taken out of the Chesapeake were British deserters. These disgraceful concessions our Executive would not, nay, could not make. Of course, the negotiation was broken off, and Mr. Rose returned, as it must have been originally designed by the British Ministry he should, without making any atonement. Reparation is then offered in the arrangement with Mr. Erskine. That act is disavowed, and at this moment atonement remains to be made. Congress, after the arrangement with Mr. E., by a law of last session, under a full confidence that England would not be guilty of a violation of faith, which has few parallels in history, withdrew the interdiction. As we are precisely in the situation with regard to the affair of the Chesapeake, we were in at the time of the issuing of the proclamation of the President, the first and second sections of the bill then propose to put the country in the precise state it was in at the time prior to the arrangement with Mr. Erskine. But it not only restores that state of things, but is precautionary as to the future. It has been well observed, sir, that if these sections are stricken out, and British vessels permitted to enter our waters, they would come into our ports before our towns without resistance. If entrance into our waters be interdicted, their very approach may be rendered more difficult, and by resistance prevented altogether. We are all well aware that the Copenhagen firebrand is still among us, enjoying Anglo-American hospitality. Were we to strike out the first and second sections of the bill, in this view of the subject, our seaports might be endangered. I, therefore, consider the first and second sections of the bill important in relation to the affair of the Chesapeake; and, also, as a precautionary measure with relation to the safety of our seaports, and as it regards too the honor of the nation.

With respect to the third section, and all the other sections to the ninth, including the section proposed to be stricken out, the policy of their provisions will be evident by a fair investigation of the subject. To obtain a regard to our neutral rights, and to resist the French decrees and British orders, which, under pretext of retaliation, proclaimed in effect to the world, that there should be no neutrals and no neutral rights, the embargo was resorted to as a coercive measure; and I have no hesitation in declaring my opinion, that but for English emissaries, factious intrigues, and the want of virtue demonstrated among that class of citizens whom it was designed to protect, it would have effected its intended object. What was the operation of it? Its great principle was non-exportation. The provisions necessary to carry it into effect operated upon our own citizens. From the unmerited clamors against it and from the causes I have stated, it was abandoned. Non-intercourse was substituted, its great principle being non-importation. It was taken instead of an absolute repeal of the embargo, which was then, from the complexion of the House, seriously apprehended, which, by many, was considered absolute submission, and the non-intercourse still held up resistance such as it was. Gentlemen well know the unpleasant circumstances under which it was resorted to. In consequence of the difficulty of carrying its provisions into effect, and the scandalous evasions practised under it, it has become in a great degree inoperative. In the present state of things, the carrying trade is principally thrown into the hands of the British, through Amelia island, Halifax, and other places of depot, and thence smuggled into the country. Where, then, does the American merchant go to obtain British manufactures? Not to England, but to those entry-ports. Through these, too, British vessels have the carriage of all your produce. In fact, England, by the evasions practised under your laws, has nearly a monopoly of your carrying trade. Facts bear me out in this statement. I have seen a letter from a person of confidence, stating that, at Amelia island alone, at this very moment, there are one hundred British vessels, and the produce of the United States is strewed along the shores for exportation in them, and that large contracts have been entered into by American merchants to supply British vessels with the produce of the United States. The American carrier derives no advantage but the carriage to Amelia island. It is thence carried to Europe in British bottoms. I ask gentlemen if this state of things can or ought to be tolerated? If gentlemen are prepared to say that American produce shall be carried to Amelia island and there deposited, and thence shall be carried in British vessels, exclusively, to a foreign market; and that the farmer shall sell his produce subject to a deduction for double freight and double charges, and that the British merchant shall have the benefit of the exportation of our products, they will vote for striking out the sections in the bill, which cut up this abominable trade.

Gentlemen have asked what good is to result from this section. One great good will be its cutting up this trade entirely. By the fifth section, no articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any foreign nation, can be imported into the United States, except immediately from the country where it is grown. The bill classifies foreign countries, and prohibits the importation from any one class of any articles which are not of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of that class. If this section remains, you cannot import from Amelia island any article of British manufacture, for it would be liable to seizure. But gentlemen may say that British goods are now liable to seizure, and yet find their way into the country. But, sir, the embargo and non-intercourse differed from the present bill in this respect. The embargo and non-intercourse operated on your own citizens, and the feelings of our citizens were excited in favor of their fellow-citizens, violators of the laws. The great principle of the present law is, that it is to operate on foreigners. There are in the bill no penalties and forfeitures; nothing but condemnation of vessel and cargo. And I call upon gentlemen to name one instance where a foreign vessel has been arrested in the violation of the laws of the United States, that a condemnation has not taken place. The Admiralty Courts of the United States have uniformly enforced our laws, and will do it still. These cases are not tried by a jury, but wholly by a judge, who has power to sift a case to the bottom; and, the violation being proved, a condemnation takes place. Foreigners only can be sufferers by the bill. The courts can be trusted with enforcing the laws of the United States, and every infraction of this law will be punished by them. They are and will be competent to it.

From this view of the subject, it is very apparent that this law will operate on a trade disgraceful to those carrying it on, and disgraceful to our country. If it have no other good effect, it will remedy the evil under which we now labor.

But, sir, the provisions of this bill are calculated to give to our citizens the whole carrying trade of the products of the United States, and the import of all the articles that are useful to the United States. Under the embargo we had no commerce; under the non-intercourse law, the restrictions are such as to prevent our commerce from having a full range. The object of this bill is to give to our fellow-citizens the exclusive monopoly of the carrying trade, and of bringing every necessary into the United States. We take the strong ground not only that we will have commerce, but that we will have it solely and exclusively to ourselves.

Sir, I do not mean, nor can it be meant by other gentlemen, that we should stop here. We will, as I have said, have commerce, and a monopoly of it. We will, also, if necessary, take a further step. After determining and resolving to have commerce, I will agree to force it. How to force it? Some say by convoy, and some say by arming our merchant vessels. I shall, after the determination to have commerce, be ready to determine to use arms in support of it, and to give our merchants also power to arm. Commit yourself to have commerce, sir, and you must go further. You must protect it by convoy, by arming your merchantmen, by any way ingenuity can devise. This is but one great step in the system. We are to determine and proclaim to the American people that we will have commerce. If it be considered that that commerce will be in danger, it is for the wisdom of Congress to point out a remedy or a means of enforcing our right to it.

The motion now before the House involves, in my opinion, a question of the last moment to the interests of the United States, and as such I approach it with great seriousness. I do conceive that the motion now before the Committee involves the question, whether the Congress of the United States will abandon commerce. I have no hesitation in saying and believing, and when I examine it I believe I can convince the House, that this question is not propounded too broadly. Pass the twelfth section of this bill, repeal the non-intercourse, and then stop; have no substitute. I have heard no gentleman propose a substitute. If you stop there, you sacrifice the best interests of the country, abandon all commerce, consent to give up the ocean, and there is an end to any attempts hereafter to restore commerce to any kind of consequence whatever. The consequence will be this: England will not pass a law or issue Orders in Council to shut her ports against you. No, sir. She is well skilled in all commercial matters, and in adopting measures to promote her own commerce and shackle the commerce of the world. We know it from woful experience. What will be the course she will pursue? What is she now in the enjoyment of? The carrying trade of all your commerce to and from your coasts. Will she abandon it? No, sir. Will she, if you repeal the non-intercourse, suffer you to enjoy one particle of trade more than you have now? She will not. What will suggest itself to them to secure the present state of things which they now enjoy and will not abandon? When you repeal the non-intercourse, she will enact discriminating duties; she will exclude your vessels from participation in trade. The prices in Europe for American produce will not bear any advance at all, so as to be exported subject to a discriminating duty. You would cut off from the citizens of the United States the carrying of their own produce. I ask gentlemen if this be an extreme case? if it be not substantial ground? If she does not shut her ports against you, she can resort to as effectual a measure.

She has a right to lay discriminating duties, and will exercise it.

But gentlemen say, pass this law, retaining the fifth section, and England will pass countervailing acts. What, sir, will be their operation? By the sections of this bill, all British vessels are precluded from coming into the ports and harbors of the United States. No vessel, unless owned by a citizen of the United States, is to be at liberty to import any goods, wares, or merchandise, into the United States. The British built and American naturalized vessels are equally excluded. England shuts up her ports. What will be the operation of the measure? American vessels are excluded from the ports of Great Britain. Then how is England to obtain her raw materials, as no English vessel can enter our ports? But, if this plan should be followed by Great Britain, a complete embargo and non-intercourse will be produced. Agreed, sir. Will it affect the United States alone? No, sir; it will operate with more than equal force upon Great Britain. She will, by her own act, create an embargo and non-intercourse on her own citizens. She is shut out from all direct trade with the Continent; she will be, if this bill pass, shut out from all trade with America in her own vessels. The effect will be that, if she produces an embargo and non-intercourse upon our citizens by her countervailing acts, she produces it upon the British nation also. If she does, her citizens have been supplied most abundantly with the raw materials, and are still importing them. When manufactured, they must remain in the warehouses of her manufacturers. This will bring upon her a distress at least equal to anything that we shall feel from a state of non-intercourse, and her citizens will not bear it. I have, therefore, no apprehension that the British will pass countervailing acts. The manufacturer cares not what vessel carries his goods to market; but let the British pass countervailing acts, and no vessel whatever can carry them to market. He will have no vent for his fabrics. He cannot export them to this country in British vessels, because they are prohibited from entry; nor in American vessels, because they will not be permitted to enter British ports; nor circuitously, because the fifth section of this bill cuts up any such trade.

This, sir, is the view which I have taken of the principles of this bill; but I have no hesitation in saying, that in the present posture of our affairs, if this were the only measure contemplated to be brought forward, I should be among the discontents. I should conceive that Congress were abandoning the rights of the people and their independence. The Committee of Foreign Relations, however, have discharged their duty according to the extent of their powers; they could do no more; they have acted on the subject referred to them. But they are not the only committee to whom the welfare, safety, and independence, of the nation are intrusted. There are other committees which have important subjects before them. Sir, I am in favor of the adoption of this bill with a view to commercial regulations; but I hope and trust we shall not stop here. I hope that we shall take up the late Message of the President and adopt precautionary military measures, and take further steps. We have already before us a resolution from the Military Committee, which is another link in the great chain.

Mr. Jackson has been dismissed by our Government. A question will present itself to the British Government whether they will support or disapprove his conduct. Sir, I am one of those who firmly believe that the insults of Mr. Jackson were not generated in the City of Washington, but that they were premeditated; that he has acted according to instructions; that the ground he has taken was examined before he left England, and his instructions framed accordingly. If that was premeditated, and we do anticipate a state of things hostile to us, we are then to adopt precautionary military measures, to anticipate what will be the result of this great question. If the British Ministry support Mr. Jackson, they will go further; and if they do, I call upon gentlemen to know whether it would not be a dereliction of duty not to prepare for it. I am gratified to find, by looking over the reports of the Secretary of War, at the session after the affair of the Chesapeake, that we are provided with muskets, powder, saltpetre, and every species of military stores for a three years' war, if necessary, and that the only thing wanting is men. And when they are authorized to be raised, and other precautionary measures adopted, I, as an American citizen, shall sit down perfectly at ease as to any state of things which the Spring season may present.

I have thought proper to trouble the Committee with these observations. I come here to act, and not to make speeches, because I consider that our situation calls loudly for acts, and that speeches may be dispensed with; but, on this important question, I have thought it my duty to say thus much.

Mr. SMILES said he had given all the attention which he was capable of to this debate, and he had at least been able to discover what were the views of different sides of the House. One set of gentlemen, it appears to me (said Mr. S.,) perfectly consistent with all their past conduct, is for doing nothing, but for leaving our trade to roam at large and take its chance. Whether those gentlemen have the same feeling as myself with respect to our injuries, I do not pretend to say; but their opinions have been uniform, and I dare say may be honest. There is another set of gentlemen in this House who are for what they call energetic measures. A third set, which I believe I may denominate the moderate party, is for pursuing measures different from either—I mean those in favor of the present bill. Why, sir, cannot those gentlemen who are in favor of energetic measures agree with those who are for pursuing moderate measures, which they only consider beginning our opposition, depending upon us for hereafter adopting measures which in their opinion may comport with the interests of the nation? They may rest assured that they will not get at their object by joining in opposition to the bill with those who are for doing nothing. As to energetic measures, sir, I really am surprised to hear gentlemen now talk of them. If they mean a declaration of war, no one of them pretends to bring forward such a measure. They are well aware that a motion for a declaration of war under present circumstances would not pass this House. I do not know, sir, what may be the opinion of other gentlemen, but I for one do not mean to stop here. We are now upon a part of the business which will carry us safe at least as far as respects commercial regulations. The House seems to be pretty generally agreed that we should interdict our waters to foreign armed vessels, and also as to getting rid of the non-intercourse law. If the clause now under consideration were to be struck out, there would be an end to all commercial regulation. If gentlemen wish for any commercial regulations, they certainly wish to retain this clause.

JANUARY, 1810.

I will observe, sir, with respect to war, in my opinion it would be a preposterous measure in Congress at this time to go into it. The President of the United States has dismissed Jackson for his misconduct, but has nevertheless declared that he is still willing to negotiate with any other agent who may be sent out. Now how would a declaration of war by Congress comport with this transaction? No man could seriously think it proper that the Executive and Legislature should run counter to each other. At all events, before a step is taken to produce a war, we ought to wait till we hear what step the British nation has thought proper to take in consequence of the dismissal of their Minister. I ask again of gentlemen who are for energetic measures, whether they had rather rely upon the friends of this bill than upon that class who are for doing nothing at all? I mean no reflections upon them, for no doubt they think they are right; but surely we do that are for doing something are rather to be depended on for doing something better, than those who are for doing nothing. At the same time, sir, I am willing to declare that I am not yet ripe for war. I have my fears on the subject, and wish that before this business is settled we may not be under the necessity of terminating it by that expedient. I still, however, have hopes that we will not. Two questions are to be decided before we go to war. 1. Whether we have cause for war? That question, I believe, all would answer in the affirmative. 2. Supposing that we have just cause of war, whether it would be the interest of the nation to go to war? As I do not believe it would, sir, I confess I am in favor of the measure now under consideration. If we do not agree on this bill, I see that the House is divided into three parties and will do nothing.

Mr. POTTER.—It has been observed by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. MONTGOMERY,) that the non-intercourse is very injurious to this country, and that it gives the English an exclusive privilege to carry our produce to market, and that they understood commercial regulations, and that there was no danger of Great Britain retaliating in this respect, that it would be an outrage. I agree that they understand commercial regulations, and they can very easily evade the operation that is intended by this act, without retaliating fully; for if they shall leave the port of Halifax open for our vessels to carry our produce, and no other, what will be the consequence? All their ports will be open to our vessels to take away their produce and manufactures, and only one for us to carry our produce to. If we want their manufactures we must send a ship with cash to purchase: or if we want to pay in produce we must then return and send another ship to Halifax with the produce of this country to dispose of to English agents, at a very low price, to be taken to Great Britain in their own vessels; so that she will be the carrier of our produce in the same manner that she now is under the operation of the non-intercourse. When that bill passed everything was predicted that has happened, and although it passed by a majority of this House it appears now to have no advocates, and the same thing will, I presume, happen to this. The same gentleman observes, that if Great Britain should shut her ports against us it would be an outrage, as though it was not as great an outrage for us to shut our ports against her. For my own part I am tired of this unequal commercial warfare, operating only on ourselves. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) says there are three parties in this House: one for war, one for peace, and one for something else. I do not believe that there is any party in this House for declaring war. I wish that gentlemen who find fault would devise some system that they would be satisfied with; for my part I would retain the first section until the attack on the Chesapeake should be atoned for; and the section repealing the non-intercourse—leaving our trade to be carried on in the same manner as before our restrictions.

Mr. LIVERMORE said when he heard gentlemen professing anxiety to protect commerce he could not but view them as friends. It seemed that they were both pursuing the same object, though one or the other must have mistaken the road. Both had in view to promote the commerce of the United States, but both could not be right in the course they took. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MONTGOMERY) had expressed a great anxiety lest the carrying trade of this country should devolve in the hands of the subjects of Great Britain. I, said Mr. L., certainly feel as great an anxiety as that gentleman that this should not be the case. I think I have motives more urgent far than any the gentleman can have. I have to be sure not only the same motives as an American, but also the additional reason that the people whom I represent are a commercial people, and more immediately interested in this business than many whom that gentleman represents. My constituents have an interest in it. It is to some of them their delight. Their all depends upon commerce. They have been a great deal injured by what has taken place. Many of them have been driven to beggary. I have witnessed this at home in every walk I take. I know that people have been ruined by the embargo, though previous to it in good business. I hear their complaints and can enter into their feelings. I not only hear their observations but can draw conclusions myself. I have therefore a better opportunity of knowing what will redound to their interest.

According to the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania there are three classes in the House; one for war, one for commercial regulations, and another which certainly will not join the class in favor of war. Of that class am I, and can assure the gentleman that he is correct in that opinion. There seems to be an apprehension on all sides that Great Britain may attempt to monopolize the trade of this country. We appear also to agree in the position that it is the non-intercourse which now operates so severely on the people of the United States and bids fair to deprive them of the whole of the carrying trade. It has been well observed that there are now a great number of vessels at Amelia island ready to take in our produce and export it to Great Britain, and that the non-intercourse law is the occasion of it. Here then is a disease afflicting the people of this country. What is the remedy for it? Surely there cannot be a better one than to remove the cause. Repeal the non-intercourse, and bring it back to where it was. In the political as in the natural body, the radical cure of a complaint can only be effected by removing the cause of it. It was foretold that this obnoxious non-intercourse law would not operate to do any good, but precisely in the way in which it has operated. Now, sir, what do gentlemen propose as a cure for the evil? They revive the idea, so fashionable twelve months ago, that we must have a substitute for it. What was said then will equally apply now, that the only substitute for a bad measure is a repeal of the measure itself. It does not by any means follow that we ought to have any substitute. If gentlemen will show the necessity of a regulation to make people better than well, there might be some occasion for a substitute. From the natural situation of the United States they possess advantages over the Old World, which would insure to their commerce, when not impaired by empirics, a decided superiority. It is cheaper to carry our produce in our own vessels than in those of the subjects of Great Britain. This gives a preference to the people of the United States that will secure to them the carrying trade. As to the returns, goods can be imported into this country from Great Britain and her colonies to more advantage in our own vessels than in the vessels of foreigners, because the discriminating duties and tonnage gives the preference to our own vessels. What necessity is there then for any further law to regulate this business? We have got the whole carrying trade. Do you, sir, want to be better than well? There is such a thing as making assurance doubly sure; but in attempting this do you not endanger the whole? That is what I dread. When the gentleman talks to me about regulating commerce and doing something for the benefit of it, I fear he will bring about that state of things which he says he apprehends. I hope the gentleman will not conceive I am an enemy to commerce because I differ from him. But how is its prosperity to be insured? That is the question; to which I answer, by leaving it to take care of itself.

What security have we that Great Britain will not retaliate our interdictions? It has been said, and gentlemen have not answered it, that Great Britain has certainly the power of laying a discriminating duty on all articles imported from this country. Suppose a discriminating duty of ten per cent. were laid—what would be the operation of it? It would give a decided advantage to the British shipping, and would also give them an opportunity to deprive us of the carrying trade.

But the gentleman says, there is a regulation in the bill which will counteract that, viz: that you shall not import from any port anything else but the growth or manufacture of the country where it may be situated. I do not conceive, with the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. POTTER) that this will produce either a non-intercourse or embargo; for I do not believe, while a vessel sails on the ocean, that Great Britain will be deprived of our manufactures, or we of theirs. But we may be made to pay dearer for her manufactures, and that will be the only effect of it. It will increase the smuggling of goods; for it is impossible for the art of man to prevent the running of goods into this country, where the premium is sufficient to pay the risk. If you put on 50 or 60 or 100 per cent. premium on the advanced price, it will but be an additional motion to evade your laws; and while they have vessels to navigate the ocean, and people to ply them, and while there are ports and harbors innumerable on the continent of the United States, and islands at proper distances, it is impossible but this should be the case. In addition to them, too, look at the islands along the whole extent of the coast of Canada. If you make an attempt to prevent direct importation, it will cost more than the whole revenue of the United States to keep people to guard the avenues to it on the St. Lawrence, Lake Ontario, and the other lakes. It will be impossible to prevent smuggling. The only way to prevent it, as the great William Pitt did, is by taking off the duty, and thus reducing the bounty to smugglers. Now, as to the carrying trade, suppose we make a regulation, that our produce shall not be carried directly to England but in American bottoms. Are the ports of England the only ports through which our produce could get to that country? We have heard a great deal of talk about Amelia island—that is the very place to which our produce would be carried. But Amelia island is not the only place; there is Madeira, Teneriffe, Fayal, Cadiz, and other places for depots—and our produce would go in this roundabout way with double freight, which would ultimately come out of the pockets of the planter. What is now the situation of cotton, tobacco, and such articles? They are low in price, because the non-intercourse act prevents them from going directly to a market—and we are now going to establish a regulation to continue this state of things. If, sir, Great Britain would sit still tamely, and not retaliate when she has means in her power, all this would operate very well. But can gentlemen suppose that would be the case? It is this that I deprecate. I am against every part of the bill except the two first sections, and that which repeals the non-intercourse. Every gentleman who has spoken is in favor of the two first sections, and I have heard no one against it. But I have no inclination to embarrass our commerce by the shackling regulations; and therefore hope this section, as well as several others connected with it, will be stricken out.

JANUARY, 1810.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said he was opposed to striking out the fifth section of the bill. He observed that it did not appear very necessary in this case to speak of the embargo and non-intercourse laws; the embargo had passed away, and the non-intercourse, if at any time it had any effect, is not now considered to have any effect intended. To bring into view at this time, a consideration of those things which prevented the effect of the embargo or of the non-intercourse laws, will not be a conciliatory subject, and it does not now appear very necessary to contemplate what the effects of the embargo or of the non-intercourse would have been, if these several laws had in their operation been supported by the pure principles of patriotism or by the naval force of this nation.

The non-intercourse law has not had the effect intended, and the existing state of things under the law imperiously requires the adoption of some other measure. An arrangement between the United States and Great Britain has been made, and the stipulations of that arrangement have, on the part of the United States, been with good faith performed. Great Britain disavowed that arrangement, recalled Mr. Erskine, and sent another Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States; and the conduct of that new Minister compelled the Executive Government to refuse to receive any further communications from him. These events present additional reasons for the adoption of measures different from those now existing. The United States have heretofore desired to be and remain neutral, the principle of neutrality, as respects Great Britain and France is retained in this bill, and the fourth and fifth sections of the bill contain provisions relative to commerce with these two nations and their dependencies. The fourth section confines that commerce to the ships and vessels of citizens of the United States, and the fifth section contains provisions for regulating and directing the mode of conducting that commerce. Commerce with nations other than those of Great Britain and France and their dependencies is not affected by this bill; except in this, that the products and manufactures of Great Britain and of France, and of their respective dependencies, are prohibited to be imported into the United States except from ports and places respectively in Great Britain or in France, or in their respective dependencies.

The gentleman who is Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations heretofore did say, that he considered the United States at war since the time of the attack on the Chesapeake frigate. With the opinion of that gentleman, said Mr. R., I agree to a certain extent, and this bill may be said to have relation to that opinion. Be that however as it may, the Committee on Foreign Relations has reported this bill, containing restrictions which that committee, at this time, judged fit, agreeably to existing circumstances, to be adopted. The provisions and restrictions proposed in the bill correspond, in a certain degree, with those which a state of war will produce. If the bill shall become a law, the provisions thereof will not be unchangeable; they will be subject to future alterations, which the Congress of the United States may judge necessary to meet existing circumstances. It has been said of a celebrated politician that he always adapted his policy to existing circumstances.

Although this bill may be said to originate from the embargo and non-intercourse laws, it may notwithstanding that be considered as the beginning of a new system; if there is reason to believe that the United States shall be engaged in war, this bill contains provisions which may be considered preparatory to that state of things.

Mr. R. observed, he would not contemplate what Great Britain would think or do, if this bill became a law. That Power when about to issue Orders in Council did not consult the United States, respecting the propriety of them as they may have relation to the United States; that Power has for years past legislated for its own interest, without respect to the welfare of the United States; and it is a duty of the United States to legislate for their own interest.

It is probable, that provisions, other, and expressive of more energy, than the provisions contained in this bill, would have been more consistent with the opinions of many, but it ought to be observed, that the Executive is a part of the Government of the United States, and that by the Constitution he is vested with certain powers. The Executive Government had, prior to the meeting of Congress, taken a lead in the affair of the United States with Great Britain. In the letter of the Secretary of State of the 8th of November, 1809, to Mr. Jackson, he, after being notified that no further communications would be received from him, is informed that, "in the meantime a ready attention will be given to any communications affecting the interest of the two nations, through any other channel that may be substituted;" and the Secretary of State in his letter of the 23d of November, 1809, to Mr. Pinkney, states, "you are particularly instructed, at the same time, in making those communications, to do it in a manner that will leave no doubt of the undiminished desire of the United States to unite in all the means the best calculated to establish the relations of the two countries on the solid foundation of justice, of friendship, and of mutual interest;" and the President of the United States in his Message of the 29th of November, 1809, to both Houses of Congress, uses the following language—"the British Government will learn, at the same time, that a ready attention will be given to communications through any channel which may be substituted. It will be happy if the change in this respect should be accompanied by a favorable revision of the unfriendly policy which has been so long pursued towards the United States." Such is the view taken by the Executive Government of this interesting subject. If Great Britain will not favorably revise the unfriendly policy which has been so long pursued towards the United States, this bill having become a law the provisions thereof will be preparatory for the approaching event.

The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the power to declare war, and to the Executive Department of the Government of the United States the power to make treaties, and of course to use every endeavor which he may deem just and proper to preserve peace. Between these two Departments of the Government of the United States it is requisite, that on the question of peace or war there be unanimity of sentiment and of action.

The question was taken on Mr. LIVERMORE's motion and negatived, 31 only rising in the affirmative—about a hundred members present.

Mr. CHITTENDEN's motion, for permitting the importation of salt from any port or place, was amended, on the suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR, so as to confine the importation to vessels of the United States, and thus amended, passed without opposition.

The bill was then read through by sections.

Mr. MACON moved to insert in the section which provides for the revocation of the law by the President whenever the belligerent edicts should cease to violate the lawful commerce of the United States, the words "in his opinion;" so as to give the President the power to judge when they shall cease to violate our lawful commerce.

Mr. MONTGOMERY opposed the insertion of the words. The United States had once been tricked by a manœuvre of the British Ministry, and he did not wish them again to be placed in that situation. He would not again be willing to withdraw our measures till the revocation of the decrees was placed beyond all doubt. He should have preferred the insertion of the word "actually," so that the President should have no authority by proclamation to suspend the law until the belligerents had actually ceased to violate our rights by their unjust decrees.

Mr. MACON replied that the amendment would not add much to the discretion of the President; for, as the section already stood, it would be a matter of opinion when the belligerents ceased to violate our rights. There must be some mode of ascertaining when their decrees were so changed as to cease to violate our neutral rights.

The amendment was agreed to without a division.

Mr. VAN DYKE proposed a provision for the remission of penalties incurred under the non-intercourse act prior to the 10th of June, 1809. He referred to the President's Message, recommending the measure, to show the propriety of adopting it.

Mr. MACON and Mr. MONTGOMERY observed that the part of the Message of the President of the United States had been referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, and that it would be improper to include such a provision in this bill.

Mr. NEWTON observed that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were prepared to report on the subject.

Mr. VAN DYKE's motion was negatived without a division.

After making several verbal amendments, the Committee rose and reported the bill.

The House agreed now to consider the report of the Committee, 62 to 45.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to strike out the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th sections, leaving only so much of the bill as provides for the repeal of the non-intercourse and the exclusion of foreign public armed vessels from our waters.

Doubts arising whether the motion was now in order,

Mr. MILNOR moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Friday, as he wished to have an opportunity fully to examine the bill and compare its several provisions.

Messrs. QUINCY, LIVERMORE, and PITKIN, supported the motion on the same grounds.

And, on the question, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till Friday, 72 voting in the affirmative.

The House resumed the report of the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of Jonathan Jennings. Before the House came to a decision on it, a motion was made to adjourn and carried.

THURSDAY, January 11.

A Message received yesterday from the President of the United States was read, transmitting a report of the operations of the Mint, for the year 1809.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEWIS, from the committee appointed on the twenty-second ultimo, on a Message from the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Surveyor of Public Buildings, presented a bill making further appropriations for completing the Capitol, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. LEWIS, from the same committee, also made an explanatory report; which was read, and committed to the same Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, which relates to the organization of the militia of the United States, presented a bill authorizing a detachment from the militia of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Richard Taylor; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

REMISSION OF FORFEITURE.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of Levin Jones; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson. The report is as follows:

The petitioner states that his schooner has been seized at Norfolk, Virginia, for bringing to that place from Charleston, South Carolina, certain French passengers and their slaves. These unfortunate people were driven from the island of Cuba, and were destined for the port of Norfolk, but the vessel on board of which they embarked was wrecked on Crooked Island. They were taken from the wreck by Captain John Weaver, of the brig Harriet and Martha, and landed at Charleston. Petitioner states that, at the request of the Collector of Charleston, and other gentlemen of great respectability, he took the Frenchmen and slaves and landed them at Norfolk, with the permission of the Mayor.

In doing what he did, he states he was influenced by no other motive than that of humanity towards the unfortunate sufferers.

The committee do not hesitate, from the proof before them, to exonerate the petitioner from any intention of violating the law. No case can better claim the equitable interposition of Congress. The schooner of the petitioner was seized because the slaves were not inserted in the manifest, in pursuance of the ninth and tenth sections of the act, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and eight," passed the 2d of March, 1807; the necessity of doing which, the petitioner was not aware, nor was he reminded by the Collector of Charleston, with whose knowledge he had taken the slaves on board, that the law required him to insert their names in the manifest.

If the slaves had been carried to Norfolk, the port or which they were destined when they were embarked at St. Jago de Cuba, the vessel importing them would not have been forfeited under the "Act for the emission of certain penalties and forfeitures, and for other purposes," passed the first session of the eleventh Congress. The case of the ship Clara, the property of Andrew Foster and Jacob P. Giraud, to which the National Legislature extended relief, is, in principle, the same with the present. The committee are of opinion that any penalty and forfeiture, which may have been incurred by the petitioner, ought to be remitted.

They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

CLAIM OF ELIZABETH HAMILTON.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Elizabeth Hamilton, referred on the 5th ultimo; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next. The report is as follows:

That it is stated by the petitioner, that her late husband, Alexander Hamilton, served as Lieutenant Colonel in the Army of the United States during the Revolutionary war; that, in common with other officers, he was entitled to five years' full pay as commutation for half-pay during life; that her husband, being in Congress at the time the resolution passed making this provision in favor of the officers of the Revolution, in a letter to the Secretary of War he relinquished his claim to commutation; and the petitioner prays for the amount of said commutation. It does not appear, from any evidence from the Secretary of War, or of the Treasury, that the late Colonel Hamilton ever did relinquish his right to half-pay or commutation, nor can the committee believe that it would be proper or generous that such relinquishment should be relied on as a bar to a just claim upon the United States for meritorious services against the representatives of such claimant. It appears, from a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, that the late Colonel Hamilton received pay as an officer up to the end of February, 1782, and no later. And there is no evidence upon the Treasury books, or books of the War Office, whether at this or what period Colonel Hamilton resigned. The committee, however, have been furnished with a document, which induces the belief that Colonel Hamilton did not resign his commission until after the 28th day of October, 1783, which document is in these words: "In pursuance of an act of Congress of the 30th day of September, 1783, Lieutenant Colonel Hamilton is to take rank as Colonel by Brevet, in the Armies of the United States of America. Signed at Princeton, October 26, 1783, by Elias Boudinot, President," &c.

The committee are of opinion, that the resolution of Congress, upon a liberal construction, did not require actual service, and that the officer should be in the receipt of his pay to entitle him to commutation; but that he should have a commission, and be at all times liable to be called on to perform the duties of his station. The committee are confirmed in this opinion, when they recollect the situation of the United States and the Army in the year 1783, and in fact, from the capture of Cornwallis and his army at Little York, in the State of Virginia, in the year 1781. But this claim is, like all other claims of this description, barred by the statute of limitation. The following resolution is offered:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of Jonathan Jennings.

[The ground on which the Committee of Elections have reported against the right of Mr. J. to his seat, is, that the proclamation of the Governor directing the election of a delegate was illegal, having been predicated on a liberal construction of the law of Congress, taking their probable intention into view, instead of following the letter of the law. The committee did not examine into the alleged irregularities attending the election when held, resting their report on the illegality of the proclamation of the Governor under which the election was held.]

The debate turned principally on the construction of the laws for dividing the Territory of Indiana, and for the extension of the right of suffrage.

JANUARY, 1810.

A motion was made to recommit the report; but before it was decided, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 12.

Mr. SHEFFEY observed that at the last session a committee had been appointed to inquire into the expenditure of public money for the eight years preceding, by whom several reports had been made; but that committee not having concluded the business committed to them, and the gentleman at the head of the committee (Mr. RANDOLPH) not yet having taken his seat, he thought it his duty to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report, so far as the same has not already been done, whether moneys drawn from the Treasury between the third day of March, 1801, and the fourth day of March, 1809, have been faithfully applied to the objects for which they have been appropriated, and whether the same have been regularly accounted for.

The resolution was adopted without opposition.

Mr. SHEFFEY, Mr. W. ALSTON, Mr. MILNOR, Mr. MOSELEY, Mr. SHAW, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. MORROW, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. MACON gave notice that, on Monday, he should call for the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, a committee was appointed to inquire what regulations were necessary to expedite the printing ordered by the House of Representatives.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business on the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of Jonathan Jennings.

The following is the resolution reported by the Committee:

Resolved, That the election held for a Delegate to Congress for the Indiana Territory, on the 22d of May, 1809, being without authority of law, is void, and consequently, the seat of Jonathan Jennings, as a Delegate for that Territory, hereby declared vacant.

A motion was made to strike out the words in italic; which was negatived—yeas 51, nays 45.

This subject was diffusely debated on this day as well as yesterday; and the question was decided by yeas and nays about three o'clock to-day.

The House refused to concur in the report of the Committee of Elections. For concurrence 30, against it 83; majority against it 53.

A motion was made by Mr. W. ALSTON to recommit the report to the Committee of Elections, which was negatived, only 30 members rising in the affirmative.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Jonathan Jennings, returned as a Delegate from Indiana Territory, is entitled to his seat in this House.

But, after debate, Mr. LIVERMORE withdrew his motion.

BRITISH, FRENCH, AND DANISH CAPTURES.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to the House of Representatives the report of the Secretary of State on the subject of their resolution of the 6th December last.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 12, 1810.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 12, 1810.

The Secretary of State respectfully reports to the President of the United States, agreeably to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of December, 1809, that the enclosed papers from A to E contain, in substance, the information which has been received at his office respecting seizures, captures, and condemnations of ships and merchandise of the citizens of the United States, under the authority of the Government of Denmark.

A. Memorial of sundry Americans at Christiansand to the President of the United States, dated August 11, 1809.

B. Translation of an extract of a letter from Peter Isaacson, lately appointed Consul of the United States at Christiansand, to the President of the United States, dated August 11, 1809.

C. List of vessels which have been carried into the ports of Denmark and Norway, received from Mr. Saabye, Consul of the United States at Copenhagen.

D. Extract of a letter from Mr. Saabye to the Secretary of State, dated August 1, 1809.

E. Resolutions and memorial of merchants of Philadelphia.

The Secretary of State reports to the President that information has been received at this office, within the period embraced by the resolution referred to, of the capture of American vessels by those of Great Britain, under various pretences, viz: for dealing by bills of exchange in an enemy's country, for colonial produce; violating the British Orders in Council of January and November, 1807; for infringing the blockades of Martinique; for being engaged in the Vera Cruz and colonial carrying trade; and of the seizure of some American vessels at Curraçoa, at Ceylon, and in China, for reasons not distinctly stated. It is to be observed, however, that the papers in this office afford but a very imperfect account of the British captures of American property; and it is for this reason that a detail is not attempted in this report; more particularly, as no official accounts have been received on which to ground one.

The Secretary begs leave, likewise, to state to the President, that, within the period embraced by the resolution, property, to a considerable amount, belonging to the United States, has been captured and seized by the French for violations of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and under other pretences; that in some instances, the merchant vessels of the United States have been burnt at sea by French cruisers, and in others, the indemnity of the vessels and property has been purchased by the means of bills of exchange drawn by the captains of the American vessels upon their owners, at a rate imposed by the captors. The accompanying statement of American vessels condemned by the Imperial Council of Prizes at Paris, from the 18th of December, 1806, to the 26th May, 1809, received from Mr. Warden, acting as Consul of the United States at Paris, more particularly explains the grounds of French captures.

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

I communicate to the House of Representatives the report of the Secretary of State on the subject of their resolution of the 3d instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 12, 1810.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 12, 1810.

The Secretary of State has the honor to report to the President, in conformity to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d instant, that no information has been received at the Department of State relative to the blockade of the ports of the Baltic by France, and of the exclusion of neutral vessels by Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. As it is presumed, however, that the enclosed papers, the first a translation of an ukase of the Russian Government, dated on the 14th of May, 1809, and the second, a translation furnished to this Department on the 10th of January last, by the Chargé des Affaires of Denmark, of such parts of the instructions given to the privateers of that country on the 14th September, 1807, as were supposed to be most interesting to neutrals, and may have some connexion with the object of the resolution, they are respectfully submitted.

R. SMITH.

These Messages, with the documents accompanying the same, were ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, January 15.

Two members, to wit: from New York, GURDON S. MUMFORD, and from Kentucky, MATTHEW LYON, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION ACT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill concerning commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion made by Mr. LIVERMORE to strike out seven or eight sections could not be received until the House had decided on the amendments reported to the bill by the Committee of the Whole.

Some debate took place on the point of order.

Mr. BURWELL moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow. On reflecting on the situation of the United States, he said, there were some propositions which appeared to him proper either to be incorporated in this bill or to form the subject of a separate bill. On Friday last a Message had been received from the President of the United States, containing information as to our commercial relations, which he had expected would have been laid on the tables of the members this morning, and from which he should derive information necessary to enable him to make up his mind as to the course proper to be pursued; but the Message was not yet printed. Under present impressions, he said, he thought it proper and consistent with the honor of the country to make out the commercial rights for which we are prepared to contend. From the reading of the Message he had just alluded to, it struck him that there was no obstacle existing to the trade to the north of Europe. He thought this was an extensive trade which could be enjoyed to our emolument without in the least committing the honor of the nation. Another thing to be inquired into, was, whether, for the maintenance of acknowledged rights, the naval force of the United States was to be used? If, under a solemn decision of the House, it was not to be employed, it would be time to give up everything like naval preparation—for, unless to defend our just rights, for what was it to be used? Gentlemen, Mr. B. said, might object to the course which he proposed, as involving matters of great difficulty, and as tending to bring the United States into collision with foreign nations as to the construction of the law of nations. For himself he said he was disposed to adopt some equitable and fair standard, by which to be guided. He would define our rights in relation to contraband, the right of search, and the principles of blockade, by law; and he would resort to the laws of nations, the treaties between us and England, and the various treaties of modern date fixing the meaning of neutral rights. But he would resist the claim to capture and condemnation upon pretexts novel and frivolous. The rights which a state of war gives to the belligerents should be scrupulously respected, the fair exercise of them should never be opposed; if, however, the property of the citizen and the trade of the country should be attacked by reviving the doctrine that certificates of origin, &c., were causes of condemnation, we should be at issue, and he trusted that upon grounds so honorable, so truly and exclusively American, we should never recede. To consider this deeply interesting subject he wished further time to be allowed, and therefore moved to postpone it till to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN LICENSES TO TRADE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on the bill "to deprive in certain cases vessels of their American character, and to prevent under certain disabilities any citizen of the United States taking a license from any foreign Power to navigate the ocean or trade with any other foreign or independent Power."

The following is the bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That if any person, being a citizen of the United States of America, shall solicit, take, accept, or use, or suffer any person acting by, or under his or her authority to solicit, take, accept, or use a license or permission, procured from any foreign Power whatsoever, or any paper, writing, or document, purporting to be a license or permission, issued under the authority of any foreign Power whatsoever, for his or her vessel, to pass to, or trade with, any other foreign and independent Power, such person shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, in any court having competent jurisdiction, shall be fined in a sum not less than two thousand, nor more than ten thousand dollars, and be imprisoned for a term not less than six months, nor more than two years; and such person shall forfeit the right and privilege of owning or navigating ever afterwards, any vessel entitled to the benefits and privileges of a vessel of the United States, and shall forever be disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. And the register or sea-letter, together with all and every other paper or muniment belonging to such ship or vessel, shall become utterly null and void; and no register or sea-letter shall ever afterwards be granted, under authority of the United States, to such ship or vessel.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures arising under or incurred by virtue of this act, may be sued for, prosecuted and recovered, with costs of suit, by action of debt, in the name of the United States of America, or by indictment or information, in any court having competent jurisdiction to try the same, and shall be distributed and accounted for in the manner prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety nine.

Mr. McKIM moved to amend the bill by inserting after the words "independent Power, in the 14th line, the following amendment:

"Or shall, in any foreign port or place where his or her vessel may load, or have been laden in whole or in part, or from which she may depart or have departed, for any other foreign port, or in such other foreign port, solicit, accept, receive, or use, or cause to be solicited, accepted, received, or used any false or colorable papers (in the nature of a clearance or manifest) purporting that such vessel did depart from the United States."

Mr. LIVERMORE observed, that, for his part, he was against the bill in toto; for he believed that it would benefit the dishonest to the injury of the honest part of the community. It would benefit those who cared nothing for law, for oaths or for character, and who would forego everything for the love of gain. The citizens of the United States might not continue to carry on this trade, but their vessels would, under the direction of foreigners. It was impossible, he said, to control a vessel after she had got out to sea; the vessel indeed might be subject to forfeiture after it returned, but it was no object with its owners that she should come back at all. There were, it was well known, in the United States many adopted citizens who cared no more about the country than they did about Ethiopia, and there were native citizens who were not attached to their country and felt no obligation to obey its laws. This bill against foreign licenses would promote their interest; for Congress could no more prevent the practice than they could prevent the wind from blowing. It was no penalty to the owners of such vessels to say that they should not return to the United States, for a single profitable freight would pay the cost of the vessel. Instead of repressing, this bill would assist this very traffic. Why were Congress always attempting to regulate that which they could not regulate? He wished to see an end to this system.

Mr. McKIM said it was obvious to the most unreflecting mind that the practice of carrying on trade under foreign licenses must be attended with injurious consequences to the fair trade of the United States. It exposed our vessels to inconvenience, often to capture and ultimate confiscation. This reason alone was sufficient for putting a stop to a trade which was besides disgraceful to the country. He was satisfied with the bill as far as it went; but there was another injury of a different description against which he wished to guard, which was the sailing with forged papers or clearances purchased in a foreign port, and produced as evidence of the origin of the voyage in this country, instead of a foreign port. These frauds, he said, were frequently discovered, and, being detected, gave birth to a general prejudice against all American commerce.

Mr. LIVERMORE observed that there was already a law in existence to punish forgeries of the custom-house papers, if gentlemen could contrive a mode of getting the offenders here. But what availed it to make laws under which it was impossible that offenders could be brought to trial?

Mr. McKIM said he was disposed to pay great respect to the legal knowledge of the gentleman from Massachusetts; but he contended that there was no law in existence to punish the accepting, receiving or using clearances forged in a foreign country. And when they were used abroad to the prejudice of the country, the offenders ought to be punished when they return. The gentleman had said, when up before, that this law would be evaded by some, that it would not operate on all. This Mr. McK. said he readily admitted, for no law could be enacted sufficient to punish all culprits; but it was consonant with the essential interests of the country that this practice should be punished, and it was no reason against it that a few offenders might escape.

Mr. McKIM's amendment was agreed to, 60 to 31.

Mr. NEWTON remarked that a bill similar to the present had passed the House of Representatives by a large majority at the second session of the tenth Congress, but had been postponed indefinitely by the Senate. He said it presented almost a self-evident proposition; it required no reasoning to elucidate its provisions or enforce its necessity. Was the American flag prostituted, or not? Was it the duty of Congress to prevent its prostitution, or not? Mr. N. said that the response of every gentleman would be in the affirmative. This bill went as far as it was in the power of Congress, to effect that object. It was then their duty, and he had no doubt the Legislature would perform it, to exert all the power which the Constitution of the United States had given them to chastise the prosecutors of this trade.

Mr. PICKMAN said there existed one objection to the section now under consideration, which it must strike every gentleman in the House ought to prevent the passage of the bill in its present form. He said it went to the utter destruction of the trade to the Baltic, the most profitable pursued by the United States. No vessel was permitted to go through the Sound without taking a license from the Government of Denmark to proceed—and this license all nations had paid for. Now he submitted it to the gentlemen whether they would pass a law which would go to the destruction of the best trade which the nation enjoyed. It certainly was no disgrace to the United States, to do that which all other nations of the world had thought proper to do. This being a law without limitation, it would not be modified or repealed without the consent of all three branches of the Legislature, no matter what injuries should be found to flow from it. These commercial regulations, Mr. P. said, often produced embarrassment, and never ought to be adopted but upon urgent necessity, and then with a cautious hand; and it was certain that our commercial regulations for several years past had injured our own citizens more than foreigners. If such a law was passed, it ought to be so modified as not to prevent our citizens from taking the customary license from Denmark to pass the Sound.

Mr. NEWTON said that this bill was only designed to prevent our citizens from taking a license from one foreign Power, for instance England, to trade with another foreign and independent Power, say France. The only legal trade which he knew of that would be prevented by the bill was the trade from Batavia to Japan, which did not amount to more perhaps than one voyage a year. With respect to passing the Sound, it was well known that all nations passing into the Baltic paid some duty there. He conceived the bill would not affect this trade.

Mr. PICKMAN said that if the bill were as gentlemen described it, he should not perhaps object to it. If it was only to prevent our vessels from taking licenses from Great Britain to trade to France, it was much too vaguely and generally expressed; for the trade to the Baltic was clearly included within the bill.

Mr. SHEFFEY thought that this bill might do a great deal of mischief by cutting up the carrying trade—not the colonial trade, sometimes so called, but the real carrying trade. It was well known that foreign nations regulated their commerce, and that in many instances certain foreign productions were only permitted to be carried in their own vessels, unless in particular instances where relaxations were made, which relaxations must be manifested by licenses or permissions. Unless therefore gentlemen would cut up this trade, which he had understood it was not intended to surrender, they ought to pass this bill. It did not appear to him, either, that this bill would prevent the evil against which it was intended to guard. It was the giving a neutral color to foreign cargoes which he understood was complained of. This bill did not come up to that object, as there was no provision in it tending to prevent it but the amendment just agreed to. The short discussion which had taken place, he said would turn the attention of gentlemen to the bill; and he moved that the Committee should rise, to give time for further consideration, before they agreed to pass a bill which would cut up half the trade of the United States. Whether or not a license was necessary on all occasions where it was used, it was certain on some occasions it was. Wherever there was a relaxation by any nation in its navigation laws, there must be something like licenses or permits issued. He wished to see some modification of the bill, or some better definition of the mischief to be guarded against.

Mr. NEWTON said he did not know of any carrying trade intended to be abandoned by the bill. The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures in reporting the bill before them had confined themselves to one object, viz: to prevent the prostitution of the American flag. Would gentlemen tell him what foreign trade there was from Denmark to any port in the Baltic? Denmark was herself a commercial nation, and carried on her own trade. The trade hence to Russia was a direct trade, and did not interfere with the trade from one foreign port to another. As permits to trade, he knew that licenses had been given by nations having colonies to favorites to trade with those colonies. And this bill would not prevent that species of trade, being only designed to put an end to the trade in American vessels to one independent Power, under permits from another.

Mr. SHEFFEY said that if permits were given to pass into the Baltic after payment of the duties, this bill would certainly cut up that trade. As to a nation's never giving trading licenses or permits except to its colonies, the gentleman was incorrect. England had often given licenses to import particular articles from abroad. Supposing that the importation of corn to England were generally interdicted, and necessity should compel her to give licenses to import corn from the United States. Such a trade would be interdicted by this bill. These crude ideas Mr. S. said he threw out to induce gentlemen to reflect on the subject. He had himself no enmity to the bill, for he really wished for a remedy for the evil at which it was aimed.

Mr. PICKMAN said there was a trade carried on in the Baltic which was immensely valuable to the United States, and which could not be prosecuted without the consent of the Danish Government. Large parcels of cotton had been lately sent to the Baltic and had found a favorable market, and the demand was likely to increase. If this bill should cut up the trade to the Baltic, it would do more injury to the trade of the United States than every other regulation of commerce which had ever been made. He was confident, he said, that on reflection the bill would undergo great modification before passed, or would never be passed.

Mr. MCKIM said that if a doubt existed as to an interference with that trade, he had no objection to the introduction of an amendment expressly to exempt it from the operation of the bill. He said that he as a merchant had no knowledge of any such licenses as those which Mr. Sheffey had mentioned. He explained what trade he wished to affect by the bill. England, having West India colonies, was shut out from the Continent, and her own ports were filled with West India produce. She had prohibited the vessels of the United States from going to the Continent, for the purpose of smuggling this produce there herself. American vessels, however, were employed in this smuggling trade, and furnished with permits to proceed on their voyage for that purpose. They then proceeded under licenses on a voyage which every independent nation had a right to prosecute without license or permission from any other Power. This he was desirous to prevent. As to the Committee's rising, he said he had no objection to it, for he was convinced the more it was considered the more evident the necessity of the measure would appear.

The Committee then rose, 59 to 38, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

PREVIOUS QUESTION.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the rules and orders reported for the government of the House.

Mr. QUINCY's motion being yet under consideration viz: to amend the rule respecting the previous question, by adding to it substantially as follows:

"Provided, That the previous question shall not be put until after every member who chooses to speak shall have spoken once on the main question."

Mr. BASSETT moved to strike out the words in italic and insert "reasonable debate."

Mr. Cox supported the rule and Messrs. LYON and UPHAM opposed it.

Mr. BIBB moved that the Committee should rise; not because he was opposed to the rule, but because he thought he could get at his object with less difficulty another way. There was in existence at present a rule which had existed and been enforced until, about two years ago, by a construction put upon it by the House, it had been rendered null. He was in the majority on that vote, but confessed he had discovered his error, and had no doubt that a majority of the House would now reverse the decision they had then made and reinstate the rule in its former station. With the view of trying this question the first opportunity, he wished the Committee to rise. The Committee rose, 54 to 48.

Mr. BASSETT expressed a hope, if this rule was to remain as it stood at present, that all the old rules would be retained, and the Committee should be refused leave to sit again.

On this motion debate arose. Messrs. QUINCY and PITKIN spoke against the rule, and Messrs. SMILIE, HOLLAND, BIBB, and SOUTHARD, in support of it. A motion for adjournment put an end to the debate.

TUESDAY, January 16.

Another member, to wit: from South Carolina, RICHARD WINN, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON,

Ordered, That the petitions of the officers of the Navy presented on the twentieth of February, one thousand eight hundred and eight, be referred to the committee appointed on that part of the Message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of the session, which relates to the Naval Establishment.

On motion of Mr. QUINCY,

Ordered, That the report of the Comptroller of the Treasury, in relation to unsettled accounts and balances, made to this House on the first ultimo, be referred to Mr. QUINCY, Mr. MUMFORD, Mr. BARD, Mr. LYON, and Mr. BURWELL, to consider and report thereon to the House.

REMISSION OF FORFEITURE.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of Jeremiah Reynolds, which was read and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson. The report is as follows:

The petitioner states that he took on board of his vessel, at Curaçoa, in September last, certain French passengers, with six slaves, the property of the passengers. The Frenchmen, in their affidavits, state that it was their intention, when they were driven from Cuba, to come to the United States, but that they were prevented for want of an opportunity. In this dilemma they embarked for the town of St. Domingo, in the island of Hispaniola. That, on their arrival at this last mentioned place, they found it in the possession of the united forces of Great Britain and Spain. Not being permitted to land, they were compelled to go to Curaçoa. At this last place they were admitted to land, but not before they had given security to take the first opportunity that offered for the United States. The petitioner does not, from any document before the committee, appear to have been constrained by the constituted authorities of Curaçoa to take on board of his vessel the French passengers and their slaves. The petitioner, in consequence of bringing the slaves, the property of the Frenchmen, to New Orleans, has incurred heavy penalties, and subjected his vessel to forfeiture.

The affidavits accompanying the petition were taken with the knowledge of Philip Grimes, the United States' Attorney for the Orleans Territory.

The committee are of opinion that the case of the petitioner is not embraced by the provisions of the law remitting certain penalties and forfeitures, and for other purposes, passed the first session of the eleventh Congress, as that law relates to voyages direct from Cuba. Had the petitioner brought the passengers with their slaves from Cuba, he would have incurred neither penalty nor forfeiture. This case differs from those which have been sustained by Congress in this circumstance, only—the passengers, with their slaves, were, in the cases relieved, brought from Cuba; in the present, from Curaçoa. The cause of this was not the fault of the French passengers. When they were forcibly expelled from Cuba, no passage could be procured for the United States; of course they were compelled to seek shelter in some other island, until an opportunity should offer. At Curaçoa they were permitted to land, first giving security to leave the island as soon as possible. In this situation the petitioner found them, and, on their application, took them, with their slaves, to New Orleans, where he landed them. From this view of the petitioner's case, the committee are clearly of opinion that it is within the scope and protection of the principle on which relief was extended by the aforementioned law. The want of an asylum for the distressed refugees, gave existence to that law.

The present case is therefore fairly entitled to the same equitable interposition of Congress, as the Frenchmen could find no refuge in any of the islands, and the committee are convinced that the same measure of justice should be meted, not only to the petitioner, but likewise to the French passengers. With these impressions, the committee do not hesitate to recommend the adoption of the following resolution.

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner is reasonable and ought to be granted.

PREVIOUS QUESTION.

The order of the day on the unfinished business was resumed. The question still under consideration, whether the Committee of the Whole should again have leave to sit again.

Mr. DANA expressed a desire of having the whole subject referred to a select committee, and spoke decidedly against the rule for the previous question.

Messrs. MOSELY, SHEFFEY, NELSON, DANA, and PITKIN, also opposed the rule; and Messrs. JOHNSON, ALSTON, RHEA, and ROSS, supported it.

The Committee was refused leave to sit again, 53 to 48.

The House then agreed now to consider the rules.

Mr. DAWSON moved to strike out the rule for the previous question, for the purpose of inserting a rule to the following effect—That the previous question should be taken on the demand of one fifth of the members present, and should be in this form, viz: "Shall the main question be taken?" And if determined in the negative, the subject shall not further be discussed; if decided in the affirmative, debate shall proceed.

Mr. NELSON called for a division of the question, so as to take it first on striking out the rule as reported.

Mr. SHEFFEY called for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. PORTER said that he should not have protracted the debate by any remarks of his, did he not conceive that the rule reported by the committee, and now under consideration, had been unfairly treated by its opponents. Instead of meeting it by argument, it had only been declaimed against by the introduction of popular topics, which had really nothing to do with its merits, and by denouncing the motives of those who supported it as unfriendly to the liberties of their country.

I will not, said Mr. P., yield to any member on this floor in respect for that great Constitutional privilege, the freedom of speech. And it is because I venerate that great attribute of liberty, it is because I wish to see it retain its proper character and influence, that I am unwilling to invest it with power which would enable it to subvert every other privilege that is secured to me by the Constitution. To give to it the powers which have been contended for, would be to alter its character, to make it not the freedom, but, as was properly said by a gentleman from North Carolina, the tyranny of speech. And all the declamation and eloquence which have been displayed in opposition to the rule have been founded on the false assumption that it was an abridgment of the liberty of speech. It, in fact, is nothing more than a just and necessary restraint upon its licentiousness.

The members of this House, sir, have an unquestionable right to express their sentiments on any proposition which shall be submitted to their decision; and there is no doubt but it would be a violation of the letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution to deny the right of debate. But, on the contrary, there is still less doubt that it would be a most flagrant violation of the Constitution to clothe this privilege with forms by which it might crush the legislative powers of this House, and suspend every other function but that of speaking. I say, sir, it is the Constitutional right of the members of this House to debate, but it is also a Constitutional duty of a majority of the House to act, and to act with reasonable expedition. We are bound not only to pass laws for the general welfare of the country, but to pass them in time to meet the public exigencies. Suppose the country were to be invaded by an enemy, (and this is an event not unlikely to happen at this moment,) what would be the duty of this House? The answer is obvious. It would be our duty not only to adopt measures for repelling the enemy, but to do it with a promptitude suited to the urgency of the occasion. Suppose, too, (a supposition which may, but I hope never will be realized in this country,) that there should be, at such a time, twenty members within these walls who were the advocates and secret allies of the enemy, and who could combine to paralyze the strength of the nation and to resist every effort of the House for its defence, by executing, in the fullest extent in which it has been claimed, the freedom of debate. Must the majority sit here day after day, and week after week, to hear these propositions and discuss them, and take no measures for the defence of the country? Must we remain supine and inactive, and see our towns burned, our citizens murdered, the capital invested, and content ourselves in patiently listening to arguments which profess to convince us that these enormities are just, and ought not to be resisted? Must we, in short, tamely suffer our throats to be cut for fear of invading the sanctuary of speech? Such a doctrine as this, sir, will not be advocated on this floor, and yet this is precisely the situation in which we might be placed by the operation of our present rules, or rather by what I consider the unfortunate and erroneous construction which has been put upon them. It has been acknowledged by most of those who have spoken upon the other side of the House, that such is the latitude given to debate by the present rules as to put it in the power of a very inconsiderable minority (I certainly do not speak of the present minority) to obstruct the proceedings of this House altogether. And is there no danger in this, sir? Do the gentlemen whose fears for liberty are so active on this occasion, and whose sensibilities are so deeply wounded at the idea of confiding a discrimination to a majority, feel no alarm in committing so fatal a power to a minority?

That there may be such a thing as an abuse of the right of debate no one will deny. That this right has been more than once abused we need not the lights of history to be informed. It is within the recollection of us all. Nor will it be denied that there must be, somewhere, a power to prevent the recurrence of such abuses in future. This power is placed in the discretion of a majority of this House by that clause of the Constitution which authorizes us to determine the rules of our proceedings. It is very properly placed here, sir, in order that we may have the opportunity of ascertaining as far as possible the undefined and conflicting pretensions of speech with the performance of our great and imperious duties.

What then, sir, is the rule reported by the committee, which has excited so much alarm? It is this: that the previous question shall be put at the instance of one-fifth of the members present, and, if carried in the affirmative, shall put an end to all debate upon the main question. In other words, the meaning of the rule is, (for I do not wish to disguise it,) that the majority shall have power to stop debate when in their opinion it has been sufficiently extended. This rule is said to be a violation of the Constitution, inasmuch as it gives to the majority a discretionary power over debate, which, however, may be so exercised as wholly to prevent debate on any question, and in that way to abridge the Constitutional freedom of speech. If the delegation of a discretionary power be a violation of the Constitution, because that discretion may be abused, then the Constitution has violated its own principles, for I need not inform the House that every article of the Constitution gives discretionary power, and that every such power is liable to be abused. It is not the rule, but the Constitution which gives to a majority of this House a discretionary power over debate, and the rule only describes the manner in which this discretion shall be exercised. But, sir, the Constitution has not given, nor does this rule, which is a mere confirmation of the power vested by the Constitution, give to this House a right to prevent debate altogether. It merely gives a discretionary power, which must exist somewhere, to decide when debate has been sufficiently protracted. And this is not an arbitrary, capricious discretion, but a discretion to be exercised under the oaths we have taken to support the Constitution, which Constitution enjoins on us the twofold obligation to pass laws for the benefit of the country, and to pass them in such manner as shall not violate the just freedom of speech. The great and fundamental mistake through the whole of this discussion has been in considering this rule as delegating to the majority of the House a power to be exercised ad libitum, for the purpose of suppressing debate altogether, when no such power is given. The rule, in fact, creates no new power but merely prescribes a practical mode of exercising a power previously delegated by the Constitution; and in the exercise of this power under the rule we are not absolved from the limitation and restrictions to which the original power vested by the Constitution was subject.

I shall not contend that because the Constitution has confided to this House a discretionary power over debate, we are therefore authorized to transfer the exercise of this discretion to any other body. We certainly are not, because this discretion is intrusted to the House in consequence, if I may so say, of a personal confidence reposed in the members as such, and which they alone are to exercise. If, then, we are to make a rule authorizing the Speaker, for instance, or any number of members less than a majority, to suspend debate, whenever they might think proper, this would be violating the Constitution, because it would be creating a new power, or, which is the same thing, reposing a discretion where it was not authorized by the Constitution. But, inasmuch as the proposed rule confides this discretion to a majority of the House, which, technically speaking, is the House, it places the power precisely where the Constitution had placed it, and therefore, being in conformity with the Constitution, cannot be a violation of it.

I presume it will not be contended that the power given to the House in relation to the subject is a mere power to make rules, but that these rules must be so made as to be certain and positive in their operations, and preclude the exercise of any future discretion in the application of them. Such a principle once assumed must be carried through. If we can have no discretion over one subject, so never can we over another, and the application of the principle would go to overthrow a great part of the rules by which this House, as well as every other similar body, has always been governed. It would take away the discretion of the House as to the times of its daily meeting and adjournment. It would take away our discretion as to the priority of subjects on which we may act. It would take away our discretion as to the causes for which a member may be expelled, because all these discretions might be abused. I say, therefore, sir, that the rule cannot be unconstitutional on the ground of its adopting a principle which has been recognised by the immemorial usage of this House.

But, sir, I confess that the objection which has been made to the unconstitutionality of the proposed rule is, so far as it goes, a fair objection to its expediency, to wit: that it places a power in the hands of the majority which may, on the spur of the occasion, and in a bad temper, be exercised indiscreetly and oppressively on the minority. It is better that our rights should be defined than contingent, and if a rule can be devised by which the rights of the minority to make speeches can be put out of the power of the majority, and which rule shall not at the same time invest the minority with a power to prevent the majority from the performance of their Constitutional duties, this is the very rule which I would wish to see adopted, and would support with all my heart. But, sir, such a rule is impracticable; it is not in the nature of the subject. I defy you or any other member of this body to form a standard rule by the application of which to any future debate you can determine whether that debate be reasonably or unreasonably conducted. The subject is intangible. It is not to be controlled by pre-established rules. The liberty and licentiousness of speech have been happily compared to the colors of a changeable silk, in which you may distinctly perceive that there are two colors, but you can neither tell where the one begins or the other ends. You cannot mark by any permanent rule the boundaries between liberty and licentiousness, like the colors of the silk, which do not depend upon any intrinsic difference in the texture or dyes of the different parts of the cloth, but which are accidental effects of the light and shade and position. So the character of debate, as to liberty and licentiousness, cannot be determined by the nature of the subject adopted, nor by the number or length of the speeches which may be made; but it will depend on the accidents of time, place, and circumstances. That which at a time of imminent pressure and peril, such as I have before alluded to, requiring the immediate interposition of the legislative powers of this House, might be deemed the most insufferable abuse of the liberty of speech, might, at another time and on another occasion, be considered as perfectly reasonable and proper. As the subject, then, is in its nature wholly unsusceptible of regulation, it must be left to the sound discretion of the House, to be exercised in each particular case.

The amendment of the rule proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) affords as strong an argument as could possibly be adduced against the practicability of reducing the powers of the House, in relation to this, to any fixed laws. His amendment proposes to limit the power of the majority as to taking the previous question, by providing that it shall not be put until every member shall have had an opportunity to speak once to the main question. I confess that this amendment is plausible, and it would even be unexceptionable could any provision of this nature be so, because it restricts the rights of the minority, or in other words the freedom of debate—as far as they can be restricted by any general rule. The right to speak at all, necessarily includes the right to speak once; and as we can make no discrimination between the privilege of the different members, a rule permitting each member to speak only once would be as rigid a limitation of the liberty of speech as could be imposed; and yet a rule, even with this limitation, would be putting the majority completely in the power of the minority. Let us see what would be the effect of such an amendment.

The present minority, as the gentlemen have been pleased to call themselves, consists of something more than forty members. Among these it seems to be ascertained, if my colleague (Mr. JARDNER) is correct in his estimate, that there are at least thirty, each of whom can speak sensibly on any subject for three hours together. It is not, however, to be presumed that every minority will be blessed with such extraordinary powers of speech. Not, therefore, to take an extreme case, we will suppose that these thirty members, instead of three hours, could only speak three minutes sensibly on any question. Suppose these members, with these inconsiderable means, should enter into a combination—but I am now following out the course marked out by the opponents of the rule, and am arguing not what will be the probable use, but what may be the possible abuse of power—each minority man would then occupy three minutes with his main speech. But suppose that during the speech he should, by way of protracting the debate, or by way of episode, (if an episode be a proper appendage of a speech,) make only two motions for an adjournment, and back these motions by a call for the ayes and noes, which he would have a right to do, by an express provision of the Constitution, a provision of which the gentlemen seem peculiarly tenacious on questions of adjournment; the speech then, with its episodes, would occupy about one hour, and the whole thirty speeches would consume thirty hours, or one week of the time of this House. When the main question should thus have been fully and constitutionally discussed, according to the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts, an amendment to the main proposition might be offered, which would bring a new question before the House, and in which the gentlemen might repeat their former speeches, and consume another week—for I take it to be well settled, from what has passed in the House to-day, that you are not to question the logic of any member, but that he is at liberty to deliver any speech upon any subject, provided he apprizes you that it is to be applied to the subject under debate. In this way amendments might be proposed so long as the subject should be capable of amendments, and after this, questions for adjournment, for indefinite postponement, for postponement to a particular day, and to another particular day, might be multiplied to such an extent as effectually to prostrate the powers of a majority over the licentiousness of debate. It is true, sir, that the case which I have put is hypothetical, but it is so only in the extent to which I have carried it; for we have seen all these arts of procrastination practised with the most perfect success, and they have been carried so far as wholly to prevent the passage of a law, only because the majority have not thought it proper to exercise their power to such an extent.

The only question, then, that remains is, will it be better to make a rule to invest the minority with a power which they may abuse so as to subvert all law and place the country in a state of anarchy, or will it be preferable to invest the majority with a power which they may misuse so far as to prevent the liberty of debate in this House? I confess I find no difficulty in the choice. A dumb legislature, as much as it has been burlesqued, would be infinitely preferable in my mind to a mere talking assembly. The one, it is true, might alarm our fears, but it would, as a legislature ought to do, command our respect. The other would only excite our contempt.

I shall therefore vote for the original rule, because I think it the only practicable one in relation to this subject, and because I have no apprehensions that the majority will abuse this more than any other discretionary power given to them by the Constitution. And I shall vote against all the amendments which have been proposed, as unconstitutional, inasmuch as they divest this House of the power to perform its Constitutional duties.

Further debate took place. Messrs. NELSON and PITKIN supported the motion, and Mr. BASSETT opposed it. An adjournment again put an end to the debate.

WEDNESDAY, January 17.

A new member, to wit: DAVID S. GARLAND, returned to serve as a member of this House for the State of Virginia, in the place of Wilson Carey Nicholas, resigned, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee appointed on the first of December last, presented a bill extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of Madison county, in the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson.

[This bill is to release the brig Joseph Ricketson, seized under the act prohibiting the importation of slaves, for having, on the 25th day of July last, taken on board three refugees from Cuba, with their domestic slaves, six in number, and landed them at New Orleans.]

This bill was amended so as to include similar cases of Levin Jones and James Reynolds; and, thus amended, reported by the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of John N. Stout. [This bill authorizes the settlement of the claim of Mr. Stout as keeper of the district jail in Kentucky, for certain services.] The bill was gone through, reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another. The bill being gone through without objection, was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. NEWTON reported a bill "for the benefit of American seamen."

[This bill provides that no vessels shall hereafter enjoy the benefits and privileges appertain-

ing to vessels of the United States, unless the mate, as well as the captain, and the mariners or crew of the vessel, or at least — of them shall be citizens of the United States.]

The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

DANIEL BRADLEY.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Daniel Bradley, referred on the fifteenth instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

That it is stated by the petitioner, that he, in 1790, was ordered with a detachment out of the 4th United States' regiment under his command to remove intruders from lands claimed by the Cherokee Indians; that, becoming obnoxious to those whom he removed, some of the party privately took from him a valuable horse which the petitioner had with him, and which he considered necessary to perform his duty, carried said horse to a private place on Cumberland mountain, and shot him; and concludes by praying compensation for the value of said horse. The committee have no evidence independent of the petition as to the facts in this case; and assuming the ground that the facts are true, no compensation ought to be granted, for it does not appear that it was made the duty of the petitioner to have a horse in the discharge of his duty as an officer; nor does it appear, if that were the case, that the Government was to find him a horse. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Mr. BURWELL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be instructed to inquire into the manner in which the contract with the Clerk for supplying this House with stationery has been executed; and, also, the expediency of changing the present mode of supplying the members so far as to furnish, at the commencement of every future session, to each member a quantity of stationery not exceeding — dollars in value.

After debate, the first clause of the resolution was agreed to without a division; and the second clause was agreed to by yeas and nays—111 to 8.

The unfinished business of yesterday was postponed till to-morrow—59 to 47.

FOREIGN LICENSES TO TRADE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to deprive, in certain cases, vessels of their American character, &c.

Mr. FISK said, as he was in favor of the bill, and the principal objection which had been made to it was that it could not be enforced; to meet that objection he thought proper to offer the following amendment as a new section to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of enforcing obedience to this act, the President of the United States shall be, and hereby is, authorized to employ such portion of the Navy of the United States as he shall deem necessary, which force, so to be employed, shall act in conformity to instructions to be furnished to the commanders by the President, directing them to examine and send into the nearest port in the United States for adjudication and punishment those detected in violating this act."

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again; and Mr. FISK'S amendment was ordered to be printed.

WEST POINT.

Mr. GOLD, after some remarks on the state of the public property, and the doubts existing as to the boundary line of the public land at West Point, on the subject of which suits had been, or were about to be, brought by claimants, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the state of the public Arsenal at West Point, in the State of New York, and the condition of the public property there deposited, and to consider of the means necessary for the security and preservation thereof; and, also, to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for ascertaining and settling the converted boundary of the public land at said place, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FISK rose to offer a resolution in some degree connected with the subject embraced by the resolution submitted by his colleague. It was well known that this fortification had been, and might be again, a very important station. It was now out of repair, and might be put into a state of repair with a small sum of money. For the purpose of inquiring into this desirable object, he submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our fortifications be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repairing the fortifications at West Point, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The motion was agreed to.

DETACHMENT OF MILITIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing a detachment of the militia of the United States.

[This bill provides for a detachment of 100,000 militia, to be ready to march at a moment's warning, but not to serve a longer time than six months after they arrive at the place of rendezvous. Volunteers may be accepted.]

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the blank for the sum to be appropriated and held in readiness to carry into effect the intention of the bill, when necessary, was filled with one million of dollars.

And, the bill being gone through, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The reason why the Committee did not report the bill to the House, was a suggestion, by Mr. DANA, of a wish to obtain information on the manner in which the former acts of a similar nature had been carried into effect. For which purpose, Mr. D. moved a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for information of the manner in which the late laws authorizing detachments of the militia of the United States had been executed. But, before a question was taken on the resolution, the House adjourned.

11th Con. 2d Sess.—39

THURSDAY, January 18.

Mr. LOVE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act for the establishment of a turnpike company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

A motion was made by Mr. DANA, to rescind the vote taken yesterday upon a resolution proposed by him; and the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was then made by Mr. DANA, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary for the Department of War be directed to lay before this House a general account of the returns of the respective quotas of the two last detachments of one hundred thousand militia, including volunteers, required of the several States and Territories by the President of the United States, in pursuance of the law respecting such detachments.

And the question thereon being taken it was resolved in the affirmative.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson, and others, was read the third time.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act for the relief of Harry Caldwell and Amasa Jackson, Jeremiah Reynolds and Levin Jones."

An engrossed bill for the relief of John N. Stout was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to authorize the removal of slaves from one part of the District of Columbia to another was read the third time and passed.

PATENT RIGHTS.

Mr. BACON reported a bill for the encouragement of learning and promotion of the useful arts.

[This bill extends the privilege of obtaining a patent for any new invention or discovery, to any person residing within the United States, whether a citizen or not. The former laws on that subject restricted this privilege to citizens of the United States, or to persons who had resided two years therein. In lieu of the present term of fourteen years, for which patents are granted, the bill provides that an inventor, upon paying thirty dollars, may receive a patent right to his invention for a term of seven years, at the expiration of which time, upon paying sixty dollars, he may renew his patent for a second term of seven years, and after that upon paying ninety dollars may renew it for a third term of seven years; and all former patentees for a term of fourteen years under the present laws, may renew their patents for one term of seven years. That the damages to be recovered by patentees for violations of patent rights shall in no case be less than three times the price at which the right to use the invention patented has been usually sold by the patentee. That the Secretary of State may, with the concurrence of the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, or Navy Departments, or any two of them, refuse altogether to issue a patent to any person claiming it. That the Secretary of State shall publish annually, in a newspaper printed at the seat of Government, a list of all patents granted the preceding year, to whom and for what purpose. That the President of the United States be authorized to cause to be built a suitable building for the reception and preservation of the books, maps, charts, models, and designs, of the authors and inventors, which may be deposited therein agreeably to the provisions of the bill. The residue of the bill is an adoption of most of the principles of the former patent laws, with some variance in the details; and repeals all former laws on the subject after the 30th of September next, when this act is to take effect.]

The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

INSTRUCTIONS TO ARMED VESSELS.

Mr. DANA observed, that instructions had been issued at various times for the conduct of our armed vessels. He supposed that it might be convenient to gentlemen to have a collection of them, whatever they may have been, that they might have a whole view of the subject. He was aware that instructions have been given, perhaps by all the different Administrations, which it might be thought proper should not be communicated; and had therefore made an exception as to such. He said he had drawn the resolution in such a manner as to be perfectly impartial in respect to former Administrations, and strictly respectful as respected the present President of the United States.

The following is the resolution offered by Mr. DANA, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House, copies of the orders or instructions issued under the present or any former Administration, with respect to foreign armed ships or vessels, of whatever description, being within the waters of the United States, excepting such parts as may, in his judgment, be improper for communication.

Messrs. DANA and GARLAND were appointed to wait on the President of the United States with the resolution.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION ACT.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, and for other purposes.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole under consideration.

A motion was made by Mr. LIVERMORE to strike out several sections of the bill.

The SPEAKER decided that such a motion could not be made, until the amendments, reported by the Committee of the Whole were decided on.

Mr. LIVERMORE appealed from this decision; which was reversed by the House, 65 to 48.

Mr. LIVERMORE then moved to strike out the fifth section.

Mr. HAVEN said, that since he had been a member of that honorable House he had taken no active part in the discussion of the various and important subjects which had been presented for consideration; that he had listened with attention to gentlemen better qualified and more accustomed to debate than himself, and had been satisfied in giving a silent vote. But on this motion he trusted he should be excused, while he deviated from the rule he had prescribed to himself, and attempted to offer a few thoughts on the bill under consideration.

From the observations which had fallen from gentlemen from every part of the House, while the bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, there appeared, said Mr. H., to be but one sentiment as to the propriety of passing the first and second sections, which interdict the entrance into our ports and harbors of the public armed vessels of Great Britain and France, the two great belligerent Powers. There appeared also to be no difference in sentiment as to the propriety of the eleventh section, which repeals the present non-intercourse system—at least he had not heard any gentleman advocate the continuance of that system; all were convinced of its total inefficacy, either as a system of coercion or retaliation. It was therefore on the other sections of the bill on which gentlemen differed in opinion, as to the effect which their operation would produce both on ourselves and the belligerents.

It is urged, observed Mr. H., by those who advocated the passage of this bill, that its tendency will be to give to American shipping the exclusive privilege of transporting to market all our important exports, and also of bringing into the United States the manufactures and productions of other countries which we receive in exchange. In short, that to American shipping would be exclusively confined, so far as respects Great Britain and France, the whole of our export and import trade. Such a state of things was truly desirable, it was consonant to the feelings and wishes of every true American. And, sir, could I be convinced that the passage of this bill would have the remotest tendency to produce such a state of things, and leave us at the same time in the full enjoyment of commerce, I would most cheerfully give the bill my hearty support. But, while we are about to enact laws which very materially affect other commercial countries, it is the part of wisdom to inquire, what will probably be the operation on them, and whether the reaction on ourselves will not be ultimately injurious. There are usually two sides to a bargain, and in this point of view most commercial regulations should be considered. What will be the effect of this law on Great Britain, unquestionably the greatest commercial Power in the world? She will find her commercial flag interdicted an entrance into our ports and harbors, and the accustomed rights of hospitality almost denied her. What conduct should we naturally expect she will pursue on such an occasion? Will it not be, that your flag will be excluded from her ports and harbors? But gentlemen say, we have nothing to fear from this, that the great importance of our exports to her, the necessity of her having a supply of our raw materials for the prosperity of her manufactures, and her great anxiety for disposing of her manufactures, will present arguments sufficiently cogent to induce her not to adopt such a measure. This may be true, and I am willing to accord in sentiment with those who believe that American shipping will not be interdicted an entrance into British ports; but that some measures of retaliation will be adopted I have no doubt. We cannot expect that Britain will surrender to us this exclusive commerce, if by new regulations, she can give further encouragement to her own navigation, and at the same time not prevent a supply of our raw materials, nor restrict the exportation of her manufactures, we may be assured she will adopt them. And that this object can be effected by additional duties on imports in American vessels, and by an increase of tonnage duty will be evident to the mind of every gentleman who reflects on the subject. And what sir, will be the consequence of such a measure? Will it not bring about the very state of things which we now so much deplore? Will it not give to Great Britain the carrying trade of our produce? The direct trade I do not mean, (for her vessels will be excluded our ports,) but the circuitous trade, the trade which, by the operation of our non-intercourse system, she at this time monopolizes. To exemplify my idea, should a new countervailing duty of three pence per pound be laid on cotton when imported into Great Britain in American vessels, and should be admitted free of duty in British bottoms, this duty will be more than equivalent to an ordinary freight across the Atlantic; and the consequence will be, that the Southern planter will find a better market for his cotton in Amelia island than in Great Britain; and by the bill he is not prohibited from exporting his cotton where he pleases. Thus, sir, though our import trade from Great Britain in American bottoms may continue uninterrupted, yet our export trade, so far as respects the transporting of our produce to its ultimate market, a trade of infinitely greater magnitude, will be wholly cut up.

Again, sir, in regard to France, the other great competitor—what will probably be the operation of this bill so far as respects that Power? At present, in consequence of the British Orders in Council and the Berlin and Milan decrees, all direct trade with France is suspended—it is too hazardous to be undertaken. But an indirect trade with her to a very considerable extent is carried on—large quantities of American produce find their way into France, through some ports in the North of Europe through Spain, and ports in the Mediterranean not included in the British Orders in Council, and we receive in return French wines, brandies, &c. Now, sir, by this bill all this trade will be annihilated. We may indeed get our produce into France in this indirect mode, but it is well known the means of payment for this produce is afforded by the exchange of their produce in return, which it is impossible to import direct from France during the operation of the Orders in Council, and by the bill we are prohibited from importing directly—thus producing in effect so far as respects France absolute non-intercourse.

Now, sir, I would humbly ask of gentlemen why are we to abandon all this trade—cui bono? In the few observations made I have confined myself to viewing the subject in a commercial light; and not having heard any reasons assigned which satisfy my mind as to the necessity or expediency of the measure, I feel obliged to give my vote for striking out the section.

When Mr. HAVEN concluded, the question was taken on striking out the 5th section, and negatived—yeas 50, nays 72, as follows:

Several amendments made to the bill in Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out of the clause limiting the duration of the bill till the end of the next session of Congress the word "next" and insert the word "present," so as to limit the bill to the end of the present session.

Mr. PITKIN expressed his astonishment at such a motion. Could any object be answered by excluding foreign ships, &c., for two or three months? Were gentlemen afraid that the British Parliament should hear of the bill and countervail its provisions by that time? If that was the object, he wished it to be stated.

Mr. RYAN, of Tennessee, moved to strike out the whole of the clause of limitation. He could not see what reason there could be for limiting the existence of the law even to the next session of Congress. He required the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. LIVERMORE regretted exceedingly that any opposition should be made to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, for certainly the sooner there was an end to the bill the better.

Mr. MACON said that the bill had grown out of the present situation of the United States, and was only intended to meet that situation. It never was intended to make this a permanent regulation; for, after the present state of things was done away, there would be no necessity for the bill. He could see no good to be answered by striking out the limitation, because no one had an idea of its remaining in force after our disputes with the belligerents were settled. Before the end of this session, which probably would be a pretty long one, Congress would have had experience of the bill. If it was found to be injurious, it might be suffered to expire; if beneficial, it might be re-enacted. Before the end of the session, also, we should hear from England and France, and it would be known what course they would take. If we were to have war, the bill would be useless.

Mr. SHEFFEY observed, that striking out this clause would not continue the law after the belligerents should have revoked their edicts against our neutral rights; for there was an express provision in the bill that whenever they were so revoked the President should rescind the law as to the Power relaxing its decrees. It was a bill to be in force until the relations with the belligerents were changed, either by actual war, by a revocation of their edicts, or by new legislation. There could then be no reason for its limitation. Was it the object of gentlemen, he asked, that this bill should expire before one of these changes took place? If gentlemen were not satisfied that the bill was proper to be continued in force till a change in our relations, this acting experimentally was improper. Now, Mr. S. said, either England and France would continue their decrees, or they would not. If they did continue them, this bill would operate. Would gentlemen give them a right freely to enter our waters as long as they continued their edicts? He presumed not. Either England would counterveil the provisions of the bill, or she would not? If she did, it would become a new subject of legislation. The course hereafter to be pursued by us would depend on her own conduct. By limiting the bill as proposed, they would throw out to the world the idea that they were afraid of the experiment, and therefore had limited its duration. It would show that the whole bill was a mere experiment; and therefore Mr. S. said, he should vote for striking out the clause altogether.

Mr. QUINCY said that the observations made by the gentleman from Virginia offered the bill in a new shape. He did not recollect that any gentleman had before advocated this bill as a mode of coercing Great Britain and France, or that any gentleman had suggested even that it would be an inducement to the belligerents to repeal their edicts.

Mr. SHEFFEY said that the gentleman had certainly mistaken him. He had not supported the bill as a measure of coercion, but had bottomed his support of it on this. The United States had received at the hands of the belligerents nothing but illiberality and injustice. Should we then share our commerce with them? He had not supported it as a measure of coercion, but as a measure of expediency and justice to our own citizens.

Mr. QUINCY said he should know better how to vote on the bill if gentleman would explain what they meant by the provisions of it. Mr. Q. went into an argument of some length to show that the bill could not operate as a measure of coercion, nor even as an inducement to the belligerents to rescind their decrees; nor as a benefit to the mercantile interest of the United States.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, spoke in reply.

Mr. GARDENIER spoke at some length in explanation of the reasons why he should vote for the bill. Before he concluded his remarks, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 19.

Mr. LOVE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to authorize a jail to be built in the county of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. VAN HORN presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Alexandria county, in the District of Columbia, stating the many inconveniences to which they are exposed in consequence of the defects in the law applicable to the collection of promissory notes; the law which protects real estate from the liability to the payment of debts; the law which provides that executions shall not issue from one county to another; the law for the relief of insolvent debtors; and the law relating to interest upon bonds, notes, and accounts; and praying that such amendments may be made in the said acts as are therein suggested, or such others as to the wisdom of Congress shall appear advisable and expedient.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

A motion was made by Mr. JENNINGS that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee to whom were referred petitions of the citizens of the Indiana Territory, praying for an extension of their right of suffrage, be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing and directing the Executive authorities of the several States and Territories of the United States, respectively, to deliver, upon demand, any person or persons who shall have been charged with any crime or crimes, and who shall have fled from the Territory of Indiana, in which they shall have been charged, and who shall be found in any of the States, or in any other Territory of the United States, to the Executive of the Indiana Territory, to be removed into the said Ter-tory for trial; and that the said committee have leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was read, and the farther consideration thereof postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. NEWTON reported a bill "to prevent the issuing of sea-letters except to certain vessels." The following is the bill:

"Be it enacted, &c., That in future no sea-letter or other document certifying or proving any ship or vessel to be the property of a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall be issued, except to vessels entitled to be registered—any law or laws heretofore passed to the contrary, notwithstanding."

CONVOY AND ARMING.

Mr. BURWELL rose to submit to the consideration of the House the propositions of which he had given notice a few days ago. He should not now enter into a discussion of them, but wished them to lie on the table and be printed. He said, he should, if he had an opportunity, make a motion to recommit the bill now before the House respecting commercial intercourse, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was the disposition of the House to incorporate these propositions in that bill, or to make them the subject of a distinct proposition.

Mr. B. said, it had always appeared to him, since the abandonment of the embargo, that further commercial restrictions would be unavailing. He had hoped the reasonable course of the Government would have insured a respect to our rights, but he now found the relations between the two countries to be yet unchanged. He said, he had declared some days since, that he was decidedly against war, if it was possible to avoid it, and he was of the same opinion still. He would not, if it could be avoided, engage in a contest with either or both of the belligerents, or connect the nation with either of them. At the same time, however, he was equally confirmed in the opinion that the time had arrived when it became the duty of the United States to maintain by force, if necessary, their right to carry on commerce to every country which will receive it on fair and honorable terms. The object of the resolution he was about to submit, was, to obtain a decision of the House, whether they would employ our naval force to convoy our trade to those nations not having in force decrees against our commerce, and whether they would permit associations among our merchants for the purpose of arming and defending themselves in their trade to any foreign nation. At the same time, Mr. B. said, it was proper to declare it as his opinion, taking a view of the uncertain situation of affairs, and having reference to the late negotiation, and the possible course which may be pursued by the British Government in relation to this country, that it was a duty which they owed to themselves and to the nation to place the country in the best state of defence. With that view, he said, he would co-operate in any system which might be digested for preparing for war. He again declared that it was not his object to promote a war system. His object was merely defensive, as it contemplated nothing more than to defend those rights of the United States which were not questioned in this House or elsewhere by any American, whatever his political opinion. Whenever the nation was called upon to take this course, he hoped it would be able to defend its rights. In presenting this proposition to the House, he had merely offered his view, which it would be presumption in him to say was entirely correct; but it was the result of his mature consideration. Mr. B. then read the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be required immediately to employ the public armed vessels for the purpose of convoying and protecting the ships and vessels, the property of citizens of the United States, laden with goods of their growth, produce, or manufacture, and not contraband of war, in their trade to and from ports open for their reception by the regulations of the Government under whose jurisdiction they are situated, and not being actually blockaded or invested by a competent force: Provided, such Government shall not have in force edicts or decrees against neutral commerce; and that the owners and crews of merchant vessels owned, laden, or destined as aforesaid, be permitted to associate and arm for their defence against illegal capture and molestation, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. B. said, there were two other views of this subject, which he had not touched upon. It would be hereafter for the House to decide whether it would be proper to permit the public vessels of the United States to recapture vessels taken under orders and decrees; and whether it would be proper to authorize the merchants to associate and arm, and to permit them to capture any vessel by which they may be attacked.

Mr. DANA suggested the propriety of the variation of a word in the resolution, which was more peremptory than the style generally used when speaking of the President of the United States. Heads of Departments were required, but the President was generally requested or authorized to do any act. Mr. D. said, he was glad that it was brought forward; that a specified proposition was presented which the House could really understand, and which seemed to be approaching somewhat to serious business.

Mr. BURWELL said, he had no objection to the modification suggested, but he thought the expression "request" was confined to calling upon the President for information, a case in which it was at his option to comply or not.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION ACT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill concerning commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, and for other purposes.

Mr. REEA's motion to strike out the limiting clause yet under consideration.

Mr. STURGES.—Not being a merchant, and as the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. HAVEN) did yesterday, in a very able and lucid manner, in my opinion, point out what would be the operation of the particular provisions of this bill, and the probable results, I shall confine myself to the general principle.

It may properly be viewed in two respects : 1. As a commercial regulation, as a pacific commercial regulation merely. 2. As a coercive, hostile measure, intended to compel our enemy to do us justice for the injuries she has heretofore inflicted, and a preventive against future injuries. This bill has been called a navigation act. With much parade it has been termed the American Navigation Act.

Sir, I never had a very high opinion of navigation acts. I very much doubt whether any nation which has adopted them has ever derived any real commercial advantages from them. The great error of legislation in this respect has been, I apprehend, that they have done too much; they have been too much disposed to meddle in a concern they had nothing to do with. If Legislatures would be contented with giving protection to the citizen in the enjoyment of his rights, they would do (generally speaking) as much as they ought to do. Leave it to the ingenuity of the citizen, and his own sense of interest how to direct his industry; his advantage would thereby be much better promoted, and of course much greater would be the advantage of the community to which he belongs.

Our attention is very often called to the famous navigation act of Great Britain. If any commercial benefits have ever been experienced by that nation from that law, they have been accidental. It is certain that that measure did not originate in any cool, wise considerations or calculations of commercial advantages. Every gentleman here present must know the circumstances under which it was adopted. It was enacted during the usurpation of Cromwell—a time of faction—and was dictated by a spirit of animosity towards their neighbors, the Dutch, and with whom the English Commonwealth, so called, soon after engaged in a most cruel and unjust war. It is even at this time, and has ever been problematical in the opinion of the best writers upon political economy, whether that measure has not, in a commercial view, proved injurious to the English. Being a naval power, that it may have contributed to their defence, will not be denied. But such an object or such effects are not contemplated or wished for by the friends of the bill now under consideration.

The celebrated Adam Smith, in his "Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," speaking of those cases in which it will generally be advantageous to lay some burden upon foreign for the encouragement of domestic industry, says:

"The first is, when some particular sort of industry is necessary for the defence of the country. The defence of Great Britain, for example, depends very much upon the number of its sailors and shipping. The act of navigation, therefore, very properly endeavors to give the sailors and shipping of Great Britain the monopoly of the trade of their own country, in some cases by absolute prohibitions, and in others, by heavy burdens upon the shipping of foreign countries."

And after mentioning the principal dispositions of their navigation act, and which contains several of the principles of the bill now under consideration, which are mostly objectionable in my mind, he proceeds to say:

"When the act of navigation was made, though England and Holland were not actually at war, the most violent animosity subsisted between the two nations. It had begun during the government of the Long Parliament, which first framed this act, and it broke out soon after in the Dutch wars during that of the Protector and of Charles the Second. It is not impossible, therefore, that some of the regulations of this famous act may have proceeded from national animosity. They are as wise, however, as if they had all been dictated by the most deliberate wisdom. National animosity, at that particular time, aimed at the very same object which the most deliberate wisdom would have recommended—the diminution of the naval power of Holland, the only naval power which could endanger the security of England."

"The act of navigation is not favorable to foreign commerce, or to the growth of that opulence which can arise from it. The interest of a nation in its commercial relations to foreign nations is, like that of a merchant with regard to the different people with whom he deals, to buy as cheap and sell as dear as possible. But it will be most likely to buy cheap, when by the most perfect freedom of trade it encourages all nations to bring to it the goods which it has occasion to purchase; and for the same reason it will be most likely to sell dear, when its markets are thus filled with the greatest number of buyers. The act of navigation, it is true, lays no burden upon foreign ships that come to export the produce of British industry. Even the ancient alien's duty, which used to be paid upon all goods exported as well as imported, has, by several subsequent acts, been taken off from the greater part of the articles of exportation. But if foreigners, either by prohibitions or high duties, are hindered from coming to sell, they cannot always afford to come to buy; because coming without a cargo, they must lose the freight from their own country to Great Britain. By diminishing the number of sellers, therefore, we necessarily diminish that of buyers, and are thus likely not only to buy foreign goods dearer, but to sell our own cheaper than if there was a more perfect freedom of trade. As defence, however, is of much greater importance than opulence, the act of navigation is perhaps the wisest of all the commercial regulations of England."

"These are the lessons of wisdom and of common sense; and if legislators would study them, reflect and practise upon them more than they have done, the citizen in his commercial enterprises would probably prosper in a higher degree, and the Government itself experience less difficulties. Our commerce has been uncommonly prosperous. Experiments of this kind are highly dangerous. Supposing there is a possibility that the measure proposed if adopted may prove beneficial. Will any gentleman have the confidence to say he is certain it will prove so? And can any one think it wise and discreet upon a mere possibility or conjecture to hazard an experiment of this kind upon so important a subject?"

Sir, we are young and inexperienced. We are about to compete in a commercial warfare, with an old and experienced nation—with adepts in this science. It cannot be considered as derogatory to the sagacity of our Councils to doubt whether our skill is equal upon subjects of this kind to that of our enemy. But grant that there is nothing in this circumstance against us. Our enemy has a power to enforce her regulations which we have not, and this certainly must give her an important superiority. Our commerce has heretofore prospered, not owing to the regulations of the Government, but to the free unembarrassed enterprises of the merchant. Every judicious and candid merchant will tell you that the check our trade has received, has in a great measure been caused by our own unwise interference.

A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) the other day informed us, that the operation of the provisions of this law would almost solely be in favor of the Northern shipping interest; and he expressed his surprise to hear objections from that part of the Union. It does so in appearance, and that is all; it is only appearance.

That gentleman will pardon me when I say I do not, and cannot thank him for the boon he tenders to us. I seriously believe that the bill, if it shall pass, will nearly destroy the whole commerce of the country. Our commerce being destroyed, the discriminations it proposes will afford a miserable compensation to any portion of the community. If that gentleman and others are willing to benefit us, we request them to take off and keep off the shackles; let us have a free trade; permit us to be freemen; for such a boon we will sincerely thank them. If it is thought inexpedient to protect our commerce, at least leave it to shift for itself.

If Great Britain should accept the gauntlet we propose to throw to her, and she should retaliate by countervailing regulations, can any man in his senses doubt who will be the greatest losers in the contest? It is unnecessary to be precise in stating the amount of our products exported to her and her dominions, or the amount of her manufactures into this country; suffice it that I am correct in stating that the greatest proportion of our domestic produce goes to her markets, and a very trifling part, comparatively, of her products and manufactures comes to ours.

Mr. Speaker, I have hitherto considered the bill as merely a commercial regulation. I will now view it, secondly, in another aspect, viz: as a hostile, coercive measure, intended to compel our enemy to do us justice for the injuries we have received from her.

I shall not deny upon this occasion that the injuries we have received from her have been many and great; that strictly, according to the former practices and usages of nations, we have had just causes of war. But still I must be allowed to say that our Government has not been immaculate—they have not been faultless. But, allowing our injuries to have been ever so enormous, will any one, after our long and sad experience, say that this is the way to avenge them? Will it not be making bad still worse? Can this possibly be an effectual remedy for our just complaints? Sir, it is a continuation of a system of errors, which originated in an error four years ago, and it is like all other errors committed by an individual or a community, which, if uncorrected, will always progress and increase so as to involve their authors in difficulties greater and greater. We ought to have the magnanimity at least to stop and reflect. The sooner certainly the better.

It is candidly confessed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) that the injurious effects predicted of the non-intercourse act have been verified; that it has operated detrimentally to our own country, and beneficially to our enemy; that the grower of his products has greatly suffered in the depression of his price, and that the price of every article imported has been much enhanced.

Will not that gentleman be also so candid as to acknowledge that the evils predicted from the partial non-importation law which passed in 1805-6 have been verified? That gentleman was not a member of Congress at that time, but we that were then members, know that it was then foretold no good could possibly come from it; that its only tendency would be to increase the irritation and widen the breach between the two countries.

Will not that gentleman be also so candid as to acknowledge that the evils predicted to arise from the embargo have been verified?—that sovereign remedy for all our diseases—a measure which was to bring Great Britain to our feet, by depriving her of the necessaries of life, and the raw materials so indispensable to her as a manufacturing nation! But, sir, I forbear to dwell upon this delicate topic. I know it is calculated to excite unpleasant sensations.

And will not gentlemen be so candid as at least to ponder and hesitate before they say with too much confidence that the evils predicted from the measure now proposed, if adopted, will not also be verified?

I entreat every gentleman to candidly and seriously ask himself this question: If the embargo could not so distress our enemy as to bring her to terms, is there a possibility that this measure will?

I object to the proposed measure, as its effects are calculated to degrade the American character still more than it is. You cannot maintain your honor and dignity by this system of railing and scolding. If it is the wish and intention, by measures of this kind, to provoke and produce war, it would be much more manly and magnanimous to prepare ourselves and declare it. It would have a tendency to command the respect of our citizens, and the respect, and, if possible, the fear of our enemy. But let it be understood that I am not for war. I think it both unnecessary and inexpedient. But we must do something. This is frequently said in private conversation. This is a principle (as it is understood by those who say it) I do not subscribe to. Sir, I had rather do nothing than do something which is worse than nothing. If I find myself sick, if I cannot get a medicine which will be salutary, I will not take poison or any other prescription which will have no other effect but to increase my disorder.

It is also said, a further attempt is to be made at negotiation, and the President must have something in his hands to aid him in it. This has always been the plea; it was at the time of passing the partial non-importation law; of the embargo; of the non-intercourse. Such kind of weapons will not answer; their inefficacy has been tested by too much experience. But it is asked what will you do? You Federalists, you minority men, are forever objecting, opposing, and for pulling down. I confess this character pretty justly belongs to us. We are opposers and objectors; your system ought to be opposed and objected to. If it is not destroyed, we seriously believe that ruin will ensue. The remedy is to pull down the building you have erected; remove the rubbish; make the way clear once more; its foundation is in the sand; the longer it is continued, the more tottering it will become, the more dangerous its fall; for it will assuredly fall. Our cause is not yet desperate. I humbly trust that Heaven has in store many blessings to be showered down upon this once favored land, whenever we will in earnest, and as honest and skilful workmen, endeavor to help ourselves. Sir, as the amendment now under consideration proposes to make this a permanent law, I shall vote against it. And, if adopted, I shall vote against every section of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS said that following the example of other gentlemen, he should, on this question, express his opinion on the principles contained in the bill now before the House; in doing this he felt some diffidence, as his sentiments on the operation of this bill were so different from those expressed yesterday by a gentleman from New Hampshire; however, he would proceed. When the embargo was given up, the non-intercourse was substituted as a measure of coercion—of commercial restriction—and as a kind of protest against the British Orders in Council and French decrees. Experience has proved that the law cannot be executed; it has been evaded in almost every direction; its continuance seems to be given up by all parties. He had another and very serious objection to its continuance: its operation is partial, it bears particularly hard upon that part of the country which he had the honor to represent; the exports of that part of the country being principally confined to lumber, which was a bulky and cheap article, being wanted almost exclusively in British ports; that it would not bear the circuitous transportation; of course the non-intercourse was almost as effectual as an embargo upon that part of the country.

In relinquishing the non-intercourse, he viewed the principles contained in the present bill as forming a system more energetic than those contained in the non-intercourse law. They could be carried into execution. Gentlemen object to the third section of this bill; if retained, Great Britain will lay countervailing duties; she has already done it by her act of Parliament of last winter, laying additional and discriminating duties, which were first proposed as a transit duty, afterwards modified and made permanent by said act. It is true the operation of these discriminating duties has not yet been felt in this country. The embargo, non-intercourse, and the disavowal of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, have prevented British ships from coming here and enjoying the whole carrying trade of this country. If the third section of this bill, which he considered as among its best features, and the only safeguard against British monopoly, together with all the commercial restrictions, were stricken out as advocated by the opponents of the bill, he would ask gentlemen what would be the practical operation as it respected American vessels. In his opinion it would operate in the following manner: For instance, take the article of cotton. The act of Parliament lays a duty of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  pence per pound on cotton when imported in an American vessel, and two pence one-sixteenth when imported in a British vessel; throw away the fraction, and say that the difference is a penny per pound; even this small sum will amount to a complete exclusion of American vessels from the carrying trade. A penny and a half per pound for cotton may be considered as a peace freight. Suppose a British and an American vessel of equal burden—say three hundred tons—should load in one of our Southern ports with that article at one and a half penny per pound, and go to a British port, such a vessel would probably make about nine thousand dollars freight; the cotton on board the American vessel having to pay the additional duty, which at one penny per pound would amount to six thousand dollars, would leave only three thousand dollars for the charter of the ship and disbursements, while the British ship not having the same duties to pay would make a net freight of nine thousand dollars. It is not to be presumed that any merchant will ship on board an American vessel under such circumstances, while a British vessel was to be had; of course ours must lay by the wharves until all the British are employed.

Gentlemen seem to intimate that there is no danger of British vessels coming to this country, and entering into competition with ours. There can be no competition where the balance is so much in their favor, and they infer this from the documents laid on our tables, stating the small amount of foreign tonnage employed in the American trade. Are there no causes for this small amount of tonnage? The embargo, non-intercourse, and the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement, together with the immense employment Great Britain has given of late to her surplus tonnage in the transport service, is the true cause of so few coming here. Has not the charter of her merchant ships risen from about sixteen to twenty-seven shillings per ton charter for the transport service? While under such pay they had no cause to seek other employment. He begged gentlemen to turn their attention to what might be the state of things, provided that all the commercial restrictions should be stricken out of this bill, and that the ships of Great Britain should be excluded from Spain, Portugal, and the Baltic; that the transport service should be given up—will not an opening be presented to them in this country? Will they not flock here under the advantages of their discriminating duties, and take the whole carrying trade? What then will follow? Our ships, thrown out of the carrying trade, must lay at the wharves, or return to the lumber business, and by their number overstock the markets.

Sir, are gentlemen under no apprehension that, if they should do away all commercial restrictions, and submit to the discriminating duties of Great Britain and her Orders in Council, that the Continental Powers will not consider this as abandoning the commercial rights of this country, for which we have been so long contending, and exclude us from their ports, as having submitted to all the British impositions? What then will be our situation? He believed it was a well-acknowledged fact, that if the American commerce was excluded from the Continent, the trade to England would not be worth a rush. Take for instance the article of tobacco; this country produces about 80,000 hogheads annually, and there is supposed to be a crop and a half on hand; Great Britain consumes annually about 12,000 hogheads. Prohibit the exportation of this article to the Continent, it would pour into Great Britain in such quantities as to glut the market, and thereby reduce the price below the freight and charges. So of cotton and many other articles.

Sir, Great Britain has laid discriminating duties, and issued her Orders in Council interdicting our going to friendly ports. What does the provision in the third section of this bill say? For these acts your vessels shall not be permitted to enter our ports, thereby completely putting to rest the discriminating duties so far as they respect this country. He considered the exclusion of British merchant vessels as the most effectual and energetic measure that could be adopted. It was a measure that could be executed; if we cannot prevent the smuggling of goods, we can prevent the smuggling of ships into our ports.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen seem to be very much alarmed, lest Great Britain should countervail by shutting her ports to our vessels. This may or may not take place. If she can employ her shipping in any other trade she will not shut her ports to us, but consider the relaxation as beneficial to her, as it will give her the raw materials, the expenditure of much money in her ports, and take away her manufactures. If she cannot otherwise employ her shipping, and the third section remains in the bill, then it will have its effectual operation upon her—the strongest measure that we can adopt against her shipping interest. If the restrictions in the bill are stricken out, it is immaterial to the ship-holders of this country whether she shuts her ports to us, and thereby compels our vessels to lay at the wharves, or whether she sends such a quantity of shipping to this country under the advantage of her discriminating duties as to take the whole carrying trade to herself, the result is the same.

Mr. C. observed, that if British ships should be admitted freely into our ports with their present advantages, it would drive ours out of the market. They would be obliged to lay at the wharves, or to seek employment in the smuggling trade abroad, by taking British licenses and forged papers. He deprecated this as one of the worst of evils; it was ruinous to our national character; much of our present commercial embarrassment arose from this source. He wished as far as possible to retain the honest carrying trade of the country. He wanted no advantage; only put us upon an equal footing with other nations, and he believed we could enter into a successful competition.

He was utterly astonished to hear gentlemen from the Northern States oppose the bill, who profess themselves friendly to commerce, especially some gentlemen, who have declared that they did not believe that Great Britain would retaliate by shutting her ports. If she does not shut her ports, what more could the Northern ship-holders ask? The Southern members are disposed to give by this bill to the Northern ship-holders the exclusive privilege of carrying their produce to market—a complete monopoly. In this he presumed they would find their account in so doing. At present the freight from the ports of the United States to Amelia was about half a penny per pound; from Amelia to a British port four pence, so that the whole freight amounts to four pence half penny sterling per pound. If this bill should pass it will have a tendency to reduce the price of freight very much—say one-half—in which event the Northern tonnage will find good employment, and the Southern produce carried to market for one-half the present cost. At all events there will be a competition between the British vessels at Amelia and the American in our own ports.

As to the limitation of the bill, he was decidedly of the opinion that it ought to be limited to the next session of Congress. Yet he was almost afraid to vote against the present motion lest the motion made by the gentleman who introduced this bill should obtain. The limitation of the bill to the end of this session of Congress would, in his opinion, destroy the bill; it would render it completely nugatory. He hoped the bill would pass in its present form, and be limited to the next session of Congress.

Mr. Root said he was in favor of the limitation proposed to the bill by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MAOON,) because the fifth section of the bill would not go into operation till the 15th of April, and if it were to expire with the end of the present session of Congress, it would probably never be in force. He wished any course to be taken which would defeat the operation of that odious feature in the bill. There were other sections which he deemed valuable; but the fifth section was one of the most disgusting ever prosented to his view. The reason assigned, said Mr. R., for this provision of interdicting the importation of any produce other than from the port or place where it is grown or manufactured, is, that it is designed to break up this British carrying trade to and from Amelia island and, perhaps, Halifax. But will gentlemen reflect for a moment upon the cause of this sudden growth of Amelia island into notice? But a year ago, and Amelia island was scarcely heard of. You have brought it into notice by your laws, and are now about to pass a law to take away its consequence. Repeal the non-intercourse, remove the cause, and Amelia island will be no longer of any importance. Take away the non-intercourse, and would our merchants pursue this circuitous course? Certainly not, sir. The operation of the fifth section, if really carried into effect, would break up the trade to Amelia island, but whither would it transfer it? The importance of Amelia island would be immediately transferred across the Atlantic; Great Britain will become the depot for all our produce, and the British the carriers of it. Your merchants will make their shipments directly to Great Britain, and she will have the exclusive carriage of our commerce; for, as long as the British Orders in Council and Napoleon's folly continue, we shall certainly not be able to carry our produce to the Continent. We shall ship it to Great Britain, and her licensed smugglers will carry it to Holland, and to ports in other parts of the Continent. It appears to me that this will be more injurious to the American character, than the letting this little island grow into importance.

To be sure, my colleague (Mr. GARDENIER) has told us that the operation of this bill will be a complete non-intercourse with France and a free intercourse with Great Britain, and therefore he likes it. Having the same views with him of its operation, I dislike it. The same cause induces him to approve it. It appears to me that Great Britain, with all her crimes upon her head, is one of the most favored nations on earth. She has issued orders, which she enforces by an immense navy, and the Emperor of France, by sequestering our vessels and cargoes when they go there, aids in enforcing these orders; and, as if that was not sufficient, it appears to me that you are about to lend your assistance also. It appears to me that, under the fifth section of this bill, the produce of France cannot be got here. You may get your produce there. There may be some spot, perhaps, in the North of Europe, or some little spot between the Elbe and Dardanelles through which we can get our produce to France; but still we cannot receive hers in return. This will, in a great measure, prevent shipments thither, inasmuch as our merchants cannot there procure return cargoes. They must go to Great Britain for them. You are about, with what feeble might you have, to enforce the British order in aid of her immense navy and the power of Napoleon. I have another objection to the passage of the fifth section. It appears to me that, however often Great Britain may violate the permanent articles of the Treaty of London, commonly called Jay's Treaty, we had rather avoid the infringement of those articles. I believe it is better that we should stand on high ground; that, if ever the happy time shall arrive, either before or after war, (for now a war is waged on one side only,) when we shall come to an amicable adjustment of differences, there will be no pretence which Great Britain can allege for the violation of the ten permanent articles of the treaty. If we were to violate one article of it, our future negotiators would probably have to recede a little. We know the pretences which were formerly alleged for not carrying into effect the Treaty of Peace, because the United States, it was said, had violated one article, and therefore they would not carry into effect that relative to the delivery of the Western posts. The third article of Jay's Treaty, now in existence, provides that there shall be forever an interchange of trade by inland navigation, and otherwise, between the Provinces of His Britannic Majesty and the United States, and that it shall not be prohibited, except in articles altogether prohibited in the Atlantic ports. Now, by this section, sir, we admit British goods by the Atlantic ports, and prohibit their importation through Canada. This provision is a direct infringement of this treaty. Conceiving, then, that this bill, if passed into a law, will be a direct infringement of Jay's Treaty, I am therefore unwilling that the bill should be passed into a law.

The non-intercourse law, it is said, is worse than nothing, because it is not carried into effect, or is evaded. If that law be evaded, how are we to carry this into effect? Will your custom-house officers be able to ascertain, with precision, whether a piece of cloth be manufactured in Germany or Holland, whether, in the Empire of France or the Kingdom of Denmark? Or, if Spain should not be considered as a dependency of France, are its fruits, wines, &c., always distinguishable from those of France? Nothing more is necessary, than for vessels to take an invoice from the port whence they ship their goods, and they will be naturalized in less time than citizens. The merchant makes an oath that he has no doubt the bill of lading is correct. Custom-house oaths are already sufficiently cheap. I am told they can be purchased for two-and-sixpence each. They will soon be worthless, as the bill is inviting our citizens to make false oaths, or cover their traffic in some way falsely at the custom-houses. It will be as easily evaded as the non-intercourse. It is not forgotten, when clearances were given for St. Bartholomews, that that became the most productive island in the world. How much Jamaica rum, sugar, coffee, &c., was imported as the produce of St. Bartholomews? Pass this bill, and would not St. Sebastian's, on the Bay of Biscay, very soon produce the best French wines? I presume it would. The provisions of the bill will soon be evaded, and it will only be an inducement to our citizens to become more corrupt than at present. What good is to be derived from the provision of the fifth section? Is it for the advantage of your merchants that they should have to return with half a freight, or none at all? If they could possibly run into some nook, and sell their produce for a French market, instead of bringing back goods, they would have to go to Great Britain and get a cargo. Your merchants will not thank you for such a provision. If it is to be of no advantage to the Government, if no revenue is to be derived from it, and the merchants are cursing you for passing it, do not, for Heaven's sake, let us sanction it.

I wish, if we are to repeal the non-intercourse, and to have something in lieu of it, that we should have something more substantial and efficient than this bill. If not for commercial benefit, it must be designed for coercion. It may be a feeble coercion to France, because it will be a complete non-intercourse with her. But the Emperor himself will not yield to your wishes for the exclusion of intercourse; because, on your coming into his ports, he subjects your vessels, if not to confiscation, to sequestration. I dislike this mawkish dish, I wish it higher seasoned. I am not for coming down by degrees; I am not for receding, as Great Britain aggresses and advances. I do not know but this bill, with this clause in it, is fated to pass this House; but I really hope that the provision proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) this morning, for convoy and arming, will be incorporated into this or some other bill. If we are to protect commerce, let it be, in some way, to benefit ourselves or operate on our enemies. Will this operate on Great Britain? No, sir; it will not even irritate her so as to induce her to pass countervailing acts. She will thank you for it; it is making her the carrier of everything but the little she wants for her own consumption. With this view of the subject, I hope the motion for making the bill unlimited, will not pass. I wish it to expire before it can come into operation, and, therefore, shall vote to limit it to the end of the present session.

Mr. SAWYER.—It was my intention to offer an amendment to this bill, by way of a new section, allowing the President to grant convoys; but as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) has brought that forward as a distinct proposition, leaving this bill upon its original ground, I must still continue my opposition to it. This bill, as it now stands, is a remedy we have tried in various shapes already, but still the disease gains upon us. First, we tried it in the shape of a non-importation act; then, in that of an embargo. Last session the non-intercourse was to do wonders, and now this bill is to be a perfect panacea. Gentlemen, in the course of a few months, have got heartily tired of the non-intercourse, (I wish they may not as soon get tired of this,) and have been as violent against it as they were formerly in favor of it. Why, forsooth, say they, the people will not mind it. Well, if our own citizens will not obey an act of their Government, is it likely that foreign nations will? I wish I may be mistaken, but I fear Great Britain will retaliate on us in a way that will make all her former acts lenity in comparison. We to exclude her ships, and expect she will admit ours! The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEPPEY) said, England has adopted this discriminating policy for years, and it is one of the sources of her prosperity. True, but she had some way of enforcing it, of silencing all opposition to it. If she encountered any French decrees or Orders in Council, she did not oppose them as we do. She found the ocean free for her ships, or she made it so: Had any nation dared to impose tribute on her, or subject her ships to a license, she would not have met them with bills and resolutions. She would not have submitted to such conditions, and she would have shown her resolution, not by words, but by actions. Witness her conduct towards the Dutch during the last century, and the Northern Powers. She was not satisfied with mere reports of committees. To be sure, some reports were made by her, but they were those of cannon. Well, in consequence of her refusing to live upon the mere offers of trade, she obtained the choice bit. Let us beware of the consequences of a contrary conduct in us. I wished this subject postponed, in order that we might adopt some of those maxims ourselves. I wish to make her feel, as well as hear, our resolves. I wish the lightning and thunder to burst upon her together. If they do not accompany each other, they have no power. Besides, I am afraid, if this bill pass before we adopt any vigorous measures, it will be used as an argument against their adoption. It will be said that we have gone upon the system of trade upon any terms, and it would be inconsistent with that idea to adopt warlike measures. In my opinion, those acts that are intended to have a bearing upon foreign nations, as well as those of an internal nature, ought to have some penalty or sanction annexed to them to secure them from violation; and I believe the want of this sanction is one of the causes why all our former acts of this kind have been nugatory. What will be the effect of this act without some such penalty? You have seen it in the past. Great Britain will wait till our House adjourns before she attempts to countervail us, and then seeing we are still playing the old game into her hands, that we can do nothing decisively for several months, that her northern colonies are safe, her West India trade unmolested, and ours unprotected, she will then, under some plea of necessity, issue new orders, under the cover of which she will reap another rich harvest of plunder from our merchants, and all this without the open appearance of war. Gentlemen are willing to urge her into a declaration first, but not to declare it themselves. There is no necessity of our declaring it; we can play her own artillery on her; we can easily carry it on, as she does, under the cover of commercial policy; and if we have not yet had cause enough to adopt such pretexts, I should like to know when we shall. We have only to gild the pill, by calling it an order, a retaliatory measure, a defensive system, and we may rob and steal, and murder and impress, as much as we please, and still it is no war. We could surely authorize our public ships to convoy our merchantmen in their lawful trade, and to recapture such as were illegally taken; those, for instance, which she seizes for merely having certificates of origin signed by French Consuls, though bound to ports permitted by her orders. We could aid her in carrying into effect some of her own regulations against trading to enemies' ports, by capturing, in turn, such of her ships as we might find violating those regulations. We could, on a small slip of paper, blockade the world, and capture everything that presumed to violate our sovereign will. We could take compassion on her territories, her money in the funds, her debts, and graciously undertake the care of them for her. We could do all this, and more, and still it would be no war. As long as the manner is modern and fashionable, the matter ought to be disregarded. We really talk about commerce as if the whole world was open to use, whereas, there is not a single port in it that we can calculate on with the least certainty. We have conceded so much that we are obliged to ask as a favor what we ought to demand as a right, this, too, from a nation that has it not in her power to prevent our enforcing it, in a single instance, if we would act with proper spirit. Tell it not in Gath, that at the very time Great Britain is driven from the continent of Europe, the whole civilized world leagued against her, and she upon her last prop, the independent States of America should meanly surrender her last rights to her, and yield the ocean without a struggle. The little island of England, in its last agonies, like the combatant in the Olympic games, has but barely time to give us a convulsive squeeze, make us cry out, quarters, and expire. She deserves the crown, though she falls to-morrow. Can we pretend to claim the privileges of neutrals after this? Can we expect France to show us any respect when we have so little for ourselves? I should not be surprised to hear the whole North of Europe, and the South, too, was shut against us. A nation that will surrender its rights to a solitary Power for the mercenary views of a pitiful and sinking trade, deserves to be spurned from the presence of every nation on earth. I really am afraid that the French Emperor will, before long, convene a general Congress, in which the principles of the armed neutrality will be adopted, and we not suffered to participate in them.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MA-oon) has laid great stress upon the first Message of the President, but entirely overlooked the second. In his Message of the 20th of November, after giving us a summary view of our foreign relations, and the refusal of Great Britain to fulfil the agreement of her Minister Plenipotentiary, with becoming delicacy he leaves to us the adoption of such measures as the occasion called for. But the second Message speaks more than the mere language it contains. It clearly shows that the President was not satisfied with the course we were pursuing; for, if he had thought this bill equal to the occasion, why recommend other measures? He waited until he saw we were about to surrender the rights of the country. He saw this ominous bill stalking through the House, and his delicacy gave way to the impulse of his feelings and his well-grounded apprehensions, or he would have continued aloof upon the original ground of modest reserve. It was then he came forward, and recommended such measures as would alone save our honor and vindicate our rights. And I can truly say, he was the oracle of the popular sentiment; he gave a just direction to the popular will, and spoke the genuine sentiments of an American. If each one of us would act with a similar spirit, the nation's honor might yet be saved, and her rights secured on a broad and solid foundation. But the moment this bill is passed in its present shape, they are bartered away. It is a release to Great Britain of all the stipulations conceded to us in the bill of rights; it is the most absolute and unconditional submission to her sovereign will, and against it I do most solemnly protest. But the gentleman says, we ought to be doing something, our citizens are daily violating the non-intercourse act; the price of our produce is low, and foreign goods exorbitantly high. The gentleman talks as if it was really in our power to will a thing, and it should be done; as if all foreign ports were open to us and waiting to hail our welcome ships. Do you really believe this bill will raise the price of our produce, or diminish that of foreign goods? Is it a magic wand which is to annihilate all orders and decrees, disarm cruisers, dissolve proclamations of blockade, and restore us to the full and free enjoyment of the ocean? And cannot we enforce obedience to our own laws; must we afford to foreign nations the disgraceful sight of being obliged to repeal our laws as fast as we pass them, because we have not honesty enough in the country to obey, nor power enough to enforce obedience? It will be a blasting evidence of the low and humiliating degree to which we are sunk by the corruption of mercantile avarice. What will the nations of Europe think of us when they see our ships skulking about their shores, endeavoring to find out some solitary port into which we can beg admittance? If the miserable remnant of trade, which we can thus obtain, will raise the price of our produce, I am wofully mistaken. It is only in proportion as our foreign market is extended, that our produce will rise in value; not in proportion to the solemn mockery, or the studied phraseology of our commercial acts. And, as our foreign market has contracted in proportion as we have yielded to the unjust pretensions of belligerents, it can only be enlarged by a contrary line of conduct. But we have neglected to use our most ordinary privileges so long, that we are now really afraid to employ them. We are even afraid to convoy our own ships, to let them arm, in their lawful defence, measures that any Government of Europe would look upon as matters of course. There is scarcely telling the time when, or the nation that has not extended this common right to its citizens. Great Britain has done it from time immemorial. Are we afraid of provoking war, by allowing this universal right to our citizens. If it does, I, for one, am willing to meet it. But, inasmuch as this bill, without some amendment of this kind, without some salvo of our honor, or some protestation against the unjust claim of foreign nations, would be pusillanimous submission and acquiescence under those claims. I trust there never will be a majority in this House found to give it their sanction, until such an amendment be received.

Mr. POTTER.—I hope this motion, which is to make this bill permanent, will not prevail, and that we shall adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman who reported this bill, limiting the duration of the law to the end of the present session. Then, if it pass, it will immediately relieve the country from the operation of the present non-intercourse, and give the present intended restrictive system an opportunity of dying a natural death.

It has really appeared to me, from the commencement of this debate on this bill, that we are legislating entirely for the very arch-merchants and the great capitalists, and that the great agricultural interests are hardly thought of, and that the farmers had hardly a single solitary friend in this House.

Being a farmer myself, and my estate being principally in land, I must claim the indulgence of the House while I state the operation of the whole of the restrictive system on that class of people.

When the embargo was first laid it raised the prices of all foreign produce and merchandise in the hands and possession of the merchants from twenty to fifty per cent., and it reduced the price of the produce of the farmer much in the same proportion; a farmer being obliged to buy of the merchants the necessaries of life at their own price. The merchants, owning the floating capital of the country, and having the management of the finances, by stopping new discounts, checking in notes already due, and collecting their own debts, could purchase the produce of the farmer at his own price, and sell his goods in the same way; and by the time the merchant had sold off his merchandise at great profit and had possessed himself of the produce of the farmer, the embargo is then taken off and the merchant given an immediate opportunity to ship the produce thus purchased to very great profit. Then the settlement with Mr. Erskine gave them another opportunity to import foreign produce and merchandise to very great advantage; but no sooner had they done this than the dismissal of Mr. Jackson took place, which gave them another opportunity to put an enormous profit on their last importations, and another opportunity to depress the price of the produce of this country, and to purchase it again very low. And now, as soon as they have got this year's crop ready to ship, the non-intercourse is to be repealed, which will give them another chance to ship the hard earnings of the farmer to very great profit, and again to import more foreign merchandise to sell at their own price; and by the time the merchants can make one voyage under the contemplated law, the English will retaliate, which will again raise their goods in their hands. The poor friendless farmers, doomed by these laws to slavery and poverty, go to work and raise another crop, and by the time the merchant has bought it again very cheap, the farmers and common people will be so oppressed and distressed by this system, that Congress will be compelled to repeal the embargo law. But the merchant will have again sold his merchandise, and have another opportunity of shipping the hard earnings of the farmer for another year. Thus, sir, you are enabling the rich merchant and great capitalist—who already have too much money for their own benefit or for the good of the public, who are pressing this system because it operates exclusively in their favor, who are very rich already and whose avarice increases with their wealth—to enrich themselves beyond all former examples from a class of people who I presume will not be silent under their sufferings much longer.

This, sir, is the true operation of the system, and many people would say that these merchants, whose business it is to buy cheap and sell dear, are not so much to blame for taking these advantages of the times, as the Government is for giving them an opportunity to do it, and the people for continuing men in power who thus oppress them.

Notwithstanding all your restrictions and prohibitions, all our surplus produce has found its way to a foreign market to great advantage after it has been bought of the growers of it for a very small price, and English goods have found their way into this country without paying anything towards the support of Government, and the merchants' capital in the United States is now as great as ever it was. It has only changed from the correct merchants, who have been against this system, and the farmers, to those of great capital, who, while they have pretended to be in favor of this system, have been trading all the time and have made immense fortunes by it. We all agree that the non-intercourse, that passed this House without a friend or advocate, and has not at this time any gentleman willing to own he had anything to do with it, ought to be repealed. It permits the exportation of our produce to neutral ports and prohibits the importation of British goods. But, sir, they find their way into this country. The duty is a sufficient risk, and if Bonaparte, with his decrees, with his armies, with all his powers and severity, cannot keep British goods out of his dominions, from clothing his army, nor even off his own back, I believe, with such an extent of seacoast and boundary as we have, together with the manners and habits of the people of this country, with such other inducements as they have in point of interest, that it is in vain for us to attempt to keep them out of this country. Why should we suffer all these privations and restrictions? Or why punish ourselves? For, while we are complaining about the decrees and orders of France and England, and while Great Britain is preventing us from trading with France, and France doing all she can to prevent us from trading with England, and they at war with one another and all the world, they are, when it suits their interests, very cordially trading with each other.

It is pretended by some gentlemen that the exclusion of British ships is to be of great advantage to the American ship-owners, because then our ships will have the exclusive right to carry our produce to market; and it has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUTTS) that the difference in the freight of an English or American ship of three hundred tons, would be about six thousand dollars in favor of the English, in consequence of the difference of duties. Suppose this is correct. Excluding British ships would not lower the duty on cotton exported in American ships; it would be more likely to raise it. If the statement made by the gentleman be correct, what is the inference to be drawn—that the American ship-owner does not make so much profit, but the planters get a better price? But, sir, the Eastern ship-owners except those who are in favor of this restrictive system, and who monopolize almost our whole trade, and who have found their account in it, say this is not correct, and they do not want this discrimination. It would seem, by the observations of the gentleman, that the farmer had no interest in this business, and that the question was not how much money should be made out of them, but who should make it, the American or English ship-owner. As the planter or farmer does not freight or ship his own produce, if the English ships are admitted, the competition will be the greater and our produce must raise in price. If you exclude British ships there will be no competition, and the price of cotton will be reduced nearly to the amount of duty.

It really appears a mystery to me, and for my life I cannot see into the motives of the Southern gentlemen wishing to confer what they call a great favor on Eastern ship-holders, that they generally protest against, and say they do not want it, when its whole operation is so manifestly against their own interests. It is a kind of magnanimity that I cannot comprehend.

It is time for the Southern planter and Eastern farmer to consider themselves as one great family, and, having one common interest, to look out for themselves. Let us therefore take off these restrictions, and relieve ourselves from the speculation of the large capitalist and merchant, who are in favor of this system, because it operates exclusively to their own advantage. Let us have commerce free. The interest of the farmer and merchant is inseparable when commerce is unrestrained: the merchants are agents for the farmers. If this system was once abolished, the correct merchant, of moderate capital, will again resume his business. There will then be a competition in the market for the produce of this country. The farmer also will receive a valuable consideration for his hard earnings, and be relieved in some measure from his embarrassments, occasioned by the present system.

We are making a law, and Great Britain can control its operation. We are making an instrument for them to set to music at our expense.

Gentlemen say that Great Britain will not pass countervailing orders. It is in vain to think that she will not retaliate in some way or other. If you and I, Mr. Speaker, were neighbors, I should visit you with a very ill grace after I had myself shut my door upon you. There is no better way to judge of this business than to suppose Great Britain should pass such a law to interdict our vessels from her ports, while our ports were open to her vessels. What would be the feelings of every American on such an occasion? I believe there would be but one opinion on the subject; and, for my own part, if one of her vessels should enter our ports under such circumstances, if she could not be got rid of in any other way, I would be one to go on board a gunboat, as much as I detest them, to endeavor to serve her as the French served our floating colonies when they met them pursuing their lawful business on that element of which they are so desirous of establishing the freedom.

What can the object of this bill be? Can it be further to punish ourselves by reducing the people of the United States to greater misery and distress than they have already experienced? Or can it be to produce retaliation, on the part of Great Britain, so that we shall have a complete embargo and non-intercourse operating almost exclusively upon ourselves?—for Great Britain will supply herself by the repeal of the non-intercourse, in a short time, with everything she may want from this country for many years to come. Or can it be the object of our Government, by this law, to bring on a very unpleasant state of things between Great Britain and this country that will lead to war, or that they may have this miserable weapon in their own hands, to dispose of in a future negotiation; that the people may be told, that notwithstanding all their sufferings under the whole of this restrictive system for three years past, it has been the means of bringing about a settlement? I hope not. The embargo and non-intercourse were put into their hands for that purpose, and have been offered to be relinquished, if the British orders should be rescinded. But they have answered no other purpose than to give the rich an opportunity to speculate on the poor; and this will answer as little purpose abroad, and much the same at home.

Much has been said respecting the British Orders in Council operating against us; but if they were rescinded, by agreement with this country, we could not send a single vessel to any port that we could not if our restrictions were repealed. The very consent of the English would be a sufficient cause of sequestration, at least with the French. I may have been wrong in saying that we would not carry our property to France; but, sir, for many years past, I never have heard of the return of any that has been carried there. It is like death and the grave, from whence there is no return. This has been the case with all our property that has been carried to France for many years, and I presume it would be the same with any more that we may hereafter send there.

I entreat gentlemen to take things as they are.

and not as they ought to be; and let us do the best we can in the situation we are in. Let us not punish ourselves because we have been injured by France and England, who have been governed in their conduct towards us by their own ambition and interest, and not by a sense of justice. Let us therefore reject this motion tending to make this law permanent, and adopt the amendment made by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) by which means we shall get rid of our present embarrassments, and, at the end of this session, of the whole of this system. With that view, I shall vote against the amendment under consideration.

I have represented the oppressions of the whole of this system on my constituents, not that I suppose it would influence this decision, but because I consider it my indispensable duty so to do, that the interest of the farmer might be brought into view before this House, in hopes that the time is not far distant when the merits and sufferings of that class of people will be a little more attended to than they have been for many years past.

Mr. LIVERMORE opposed the principle of the bill, and Mr. MACON supported it.

Mr. KEY was proceeding to debate the principle of the bill, when—

Mr. SHEPHERD, after protesting against the practice prevailing in the House of debating the principle of a bill, on a motion to amend, and expressing his regret at being impelled by his duty to attempt to put a stop to it, required the decision of the Speaker, on the question whether, on a motion to amend a particular section, it was in order to debate the general provisions of the bill. Mr. S. reduced his particular objection to Mr. KEY's argument to writing as follows:

"That he thought the gentleman from Maryland out of order, because he says his object is to show that there are features in the bill which ought not to be adopted, and consequently that the bill ought not to be unlimited, and, therefore, the amendment ought not to prevail."

The SPEAKER decided that Mr. KEY was not in order.

Mr. KEY appealed from this decision, which was confirmed by the House, without debate—yeas 68, nays 46.

Mr. PITKIN spoke against the motion.

The question on Mr. RHEA's motion, to strike out the clause of limitation, was decided in the negative—yeas 28, nays 102, as follows:

Mr. MACON's motion to limit the bill to the end of the present session, by striking out the word "next," and inserting "present," now recurred.

Mr. FISK and Mr. SOUTHARD opposed, and Mr. MACON and Mr. LIVERMORE supported the motion; which was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 71, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON, after some remarks on the present desultory mode of doing business, laid on the table, for consideration, the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules and orders of the House:

“That Friday, in each week, be set apart for the consideration of reports and bills originating from petitions.”

SATURDAY, January 20.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year 1810; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1810; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, also presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government, during the year 1810; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. VAN HORN presented a petition of Rebecca Hodgson, William B. Hodgson and Joseph Hodgson, of the city of Washington, widow and orphan children of Joseph Hodgson, deceased, praying to be compensated for the loss of a house situated in said city, which was consumed by fire whilst in the occupancy of the United States as an office for the War Department.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION ACT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill concerning commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, and for other purposes.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved the following as an amendment to the bill: “And be it further enacted, That the operation of the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th sections be suspended until after the — day of — next.”

The blank Mr. L. proposed to fill with the first day of January next.

The reasons urged by Mr. LIVERMORE for the motion were, that vessels of Great Britain and France which had sailed into our ports under expectation of being hospitably admitted, would be liable to forfeiture immediately on their arrival in our ports, which would be an act of great injustice. For instance, a British vessel might have sailed from some part of the world for a port of the United States, under the arrangement of April, without a knowledge of its having been disavowed; that another section of the bill would do equal injustice to our own citizens by making it penal after the 15th day of April to import British or French produce indirectly—for instance, although such trade is not now legal (admitting the non-intercourse to be in force as to Great Britain, which however Mr. L. denied) yet a vessel might have sailed on a voyage beyond the Cape of Good Hope between the period of the arrangement and that of its disavowal, and might on its return bring a cargo of such interdicted products. The intention being innocent in both these cases, it would be the greatest injustice that the vessels should be subject to forfeiture.

It was said in reply, by Mr. SHEFFY, that the cases supposed could scarcely happen; that time sufficient had elapsed between the disavowal and the present time to cover all probable cases of foreign vessels arriving; that it was very improbable that a case should occur in which our own citizens could suffer, for it was by no means an usual mode of conveyance to import the manufactures of Great Britain circuitously, through ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope; that the doctrine on which the gentleman grounded his motion was, that it was proper to legislate on exceptions instead of on a general rule; that even if these supposed cases should occur, the same power was by another section vested in the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to this bill, which he now possesses in relation to the non-intercourse law, viz: to remit penalties, when in his opinion innocently incurred. Mr. S. further remarked, that if any amendment were necessary to the bill, it certainly was not such a one as that now under consideration, which went to destroy the principle of the bill by suspending its operation till the first of January, 1811, when by its own limitation it was to expire the 3d of March, 1811.

Mr. LIVERMORE's amendment was negatived, ayes 24.

Mr. MUMFORD observed, that this was a very important bill, which he believed had not been published in any of the papers north of the Sarquehanna; and, having been detained from the seat of Government, till within a few days, by a severe dispensation of Divine Providence, he had not himself had time maturely to consider it. I consider it, said he, a momentous question; a subject of great importance, involving some of the best interests of this nation. There are many features of the bill to which I have not much objection. It appears to contain three principles; the first, to exclude foreign armed ships from our waters, has a bearing on the affair of the Chesapeake; an outrage which I can scarcely think of with patience, and which, in my opinion, was tantamount to a declaration of war; and, could I have had my way, I would have driven them from our own waters at every hazard. The second is on the principle of a navigation act, which I should like to see enlarged upon, and made a permanent system. I should wish to see some further provision in the bill to meet the counter-vailing law which will most likely be passed by Great Britain. As to the eleventh section, which repeals the non-intercourse law altogether, I cannot give my assent to it. I have insurmountable objections, sir. What are we to do? Did we not, in the last winter session, enter our most solemn protest against the decrees of France and Great Britain; and, after serious debates of days and weeks, this House did most solemnly resolve, by one hundred and twenty-one votes to two, that they would not submit to the obnoxious decrees of the belligerents? And wherein does your situation differ now from your position then, but in the aggravation of accumulated insults and wrongs? By repealing the non-intercourse altogether, you submit to those very orders and decrees. I should prefer to have the non-intercourse continued and enforced without further provision in the law. All this talk about not executing our laws is an inadmissible doctrine. I hope never to hear it repeated again. This is a Government of laws; and if a law be once surrendered, under an idea of our not being able to execute it, there will soon be an end of representative government. I care not about the clamor that you cannot execute your laws. Employ all the military and naval force of the nation to execute them. If you do not make your laws respected, your republican form of government will receive such a shock as will shake it to its very centre, and may eventually terminate in a military despotism.

What will be the effect of the dismissal of Mr. Jackson, I cannot say; but, from the best information I can obtain, a war with us appears to have become more popular in Great Britain, and I doubt very much, indeed, whether the Ministry have not contrived to make it a popular project. It is very popular with the navy, and they rule England much in the same way as the military rule France. It is a common saying with them that no other commerce is now to be seen on the ocean but the American stripes; and they with difficulty restrain their inclination to seize it under some frivolous pretext. Sir, if you renew our intercourse direct with Great Britain, what will be the consequence? Will you supply your enemy with the very means of destroying you? Gentlemen say that the non-intercourse was of no effect. What is the fact? Let us examine that argument, the best of all others. The moment the President's proclamation renewing the non-intercourse was known in Great Britain, cotton rose from eleven to twenty-four pence sterling, per pound, more than double the price that it was when the trade was direct; naval stores rose considerably more than doubled in price, and other articles in proportion. A British vessel arrived in the port of New York during the interval of a direct trade, with a damaged cargo, which sailed from England before supplies arrived. When the captain was asked how the goods happened to be damaged, his reply was 'because he could not, at that time, get sufficient tar and pitch for the necessary repairs of his vessel.' And I have been informed it could not be had, at one particular period, under eight or ten guineas per barrel. If the non-intercourse had been properly enforced, it would have had a serious effect on them. The partial operation of this bill will carry the great bulk of our produce to Great Britain only, and you, will injure the fair direct trade to the Continent, which has become very lucrative for our own products. However we may differ in opinion on the indirect trade, yet I do hope the nation will consent to foster, protect, and defend the commerce arising out of the productions of our own soil. If gentlemen do not choose to defend the carriage of sugar and coffee, let the merchants take that risk themselves; but I think it is high time that we should protect the productions of our own country, carried by our own citizens, in our own vessels. If it shall be determined that we will not protect this direct trade, we may as well give up all commerce at once, and adopt some other system. I would suggest this course: that the President of the United States should be authorized to cause the armed vessels to assemble at, and convey from the ports of the United States, American vessels loaded with the products of our own soil, manned by citizens of our own country. Proof before a magistrate that the whole are bona fide the property of citizens of the United States shall be exhibited to the respective collectors of the customs, to examine, and certify to them that the articles loaded on board of such vessels are wholly the produce of our own country; and the collectors shall also be satisfied that it is the property of citizens of the United States, and produce as aforesaid; that an abstract of the proof so exhibited to the collectors, should be delivered by them, under their respective hands and seals, to the commander of the vessel that the President of the United States should designate for that purpose, which commander should be authorized to proceed to such ports and places as have no decrees violating the lawful commerce of the United States. And if, in the prosecution of this trade—authorized, I conceive, by the law of nations—he should meet a ship of war of either belligerent, I should, under my present impressions, be willing that the commander of the convoy should exhibit to either of them, as the case might happen, these documents, proved before your own officers to be the property as aforesaid, stating to them, briefly, that he had the honor to bear a commission from the Chief Magistrate of this country, that the vessels under his convoy were really and bona fide the same as described in the proofs set forth by an officer acting under the orders of his Government, and that he was not bound to any port actually invested or blockaded. If, under these circumstances, your direct trade should be molested, the officer should be authorized to resist, and defend his convoy to the last extremity. If, sir, you will not protect and defend such a trade, we ought to surrender our commerce at once, and let the nation know what they have to depend upon. This is the view I have of the subject at present, and I cannot consent to let loose the commerce of my country to be exposed to become a prey to the first marauder that chooses to molest it; and, by way of amendment to this bill, I now take the liberty of offering two new sections for the consideration of the House. After the tenth section, add the following:

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the armed vessels of the United States to be held in readiness to protect and defend, by convoy, the merchant ships and vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States, and navigated wholly by citizens of the United States, loaded with the articles of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States and Territories thereof, contraband of war excepted, bound to such foreign ports or places as have no decrees violating the lawful commerce of the United States.

And be it further enacted, That the citizens of the United States who shall put their ships or vessels under protection or convoy of the armed vessel or vessels of the United States, shall be permitted to arm in their defence; and for the better security of the property of the citizens of the United States, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby authorized, to require the collectors of the customs in the several ports of the United States to receive from the owners of the ships or vessels and their cargoes, belonging to the citizens of the United States, such proof of the property loaded as aforesaid; and in case the said property loaded on board the said vessel shall be satisfactorily proven to the collector of the port from whence the vessel shall depart, to be of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States or Territories thereof, contraband of war excepted, belonging wholly to the citizens of the United States, the said collector shall deliver the proofs of the property so loaded on board of the respective vessels, with a certificate under his hand and seal, that he is satisfied with the proofs exhibited to him; and the whole of which he shall deliver to the commander of such ship or vessel as the President of the United States may designate for that purpose.

A motion was then made by Mr. MONTGOMERY to amend the bill, by inserting the following section:

And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby authorized, to give instructions to the armed vessels thereof, to seize any vessel or vessels evading or violating this law, and to bring the same into any port of the United States, or the Territories thereof, for adjudication.

Mr. BURWELL moved to recommit the bill for the purpose of a more full discussion of the amendment offered.

Mr. SHEFFEY spoke in favor of the propriety of making the proposition in question the subject of a separate bill. He deprecated the charging this bill with propositions not connected with it, and which would defeat its passage. He was proceeding to show the impropriety of passing the amendment, but was called to order by Mr. KEY, and resumed his seat.

Mr. SMILIE was, like the gentleman who preceded him, opposed to blending peace and war measures, and therefore he said, he was opposed to the recommitment of the bill.

Mr. BURWELL withdrew his motion for recommitment; for he said he was aware of the propriety of making the proposed amendment the subject of a distinct bill.

Mr. MILNOR renewed the motion. His object appeared to be to strike out of the present bill a part which he deemed wholly inconsistent with the proposed amendment.

Mr. PICKMAN supported the motion on the same grounds.

Mr. GARDENIER opposed a recommitment, as he was content to vote for the bill as it now stood.

Mr. MACON was opposed to recommitment, conceiving the proposed amendment to embrace a subject not necessarily connected with the present bill.

Mr. GHOLSON spoke in favor of a commitment of the bill, but wished it to be committed to a select committee for the purpose of new-modelling it, conceiving the bill to be objectionable in its present shape.

Mr. MILNOR varied his motion thus—"that the bill be recommitted to a select committee, with instructions to divide the same by introducing the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and twelfth sections in a separate bill." Mr. MILNOR's object was to have a bill reported to retain only the features of exclusion of armed vessels and repeal of non-intercourse.

Mr. GHOLSON required a division of the motion, so as to take the question simply on recommitment.

Messrs. EPPES and TROUP spoke in favor of recommitment, with a view to procuring a report of a bill characterized by stronger features.

Messrs. DANA and QUINCY were in favor of recommitment, with a view to expunging from the bill those features which they deemed too harsh.

Messrs. MACON, SMILIE, and McKEE, spoke against commitment, because they were satisfied with the bill in its present form, and because amendments, if necessary, could be as well made without commitment.

[In the course of this debate several gentlemen proceeding to discuss the propriety of the amendment proposed on the motion to recommit, were declared out of order; and in one case, an appeal being made to the House the Speaker's decision was confirmed by a large majority.]

The question on recommitting the bill to a select committee was decided by yeas and nays, 53 to 61, as follows:

MONDAY, JANUARY 22.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the House proceeded to consider the resolution proposed by him on Friday last; and the same being again read, the following words, to wit:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules and orders of the House:

"That Friday in each week be set apart for the consideration of reports and bills originating from station."

The question was taken that the House do agree thereto, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 15.

Mr. EMOTT presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of New York, praying that a mode of trial by jury, as established by the laws of the several States, may be established and enforced in the courts of the United States; and, at least, that the same may be established and enforced in the courts of the United States held within the State of New York.—Referred to Mr. EMOTT, Mr. GHOLSON, Mr. MCKEE, Mr. BACON, and Mr. ROSS, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the committee appointed on the sixth instant, presented a bill further to provide for the government of the Territory of Louisiana; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

MARITIME PRECINCTS.

On motion of Mr. DANA,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the propriety of adopting any legislative provisions respecting the extent of the maritime precincts of the United States, and the safeguard of navigation within the same; and whether, in addition to the existing provision against captures within a maritime league from any part of the shores of the United States, it would be proper, by law, to authorize the President of the United States, for the benefit of the commercial interests or revenue thereof, after reasonable notification, to prohibit foreign armed ships or vessels from seizing or molesting any vessels employed in the coasting trade, or merchant vessels bound to or from the United States, whenever the same may be in any of the roadsteads of the United States, or in any other waters within sight of land, and within a line extending from one cape or headland to another, along the coasts of the United States; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the propriety of making any supplemental or amendatory provision, by law, for completing a survey in which shall be designated the islands and shoals, with the roadsteads of the United States, and the courses and distances respectively between headlands, together with any other matters proper for an accurate chart of the coasts within twenty leagues from the shores of the United States, as agreed and declared by the definitive Treaty of Peace, in seventeen hundred and eighty-three; and, also, for making examinations and observations with respect to St. George's Bank, and any other bank or shoal, and the soundings and currents beyond the distance aforesaid, to the Gulf Stream; and that the committee have leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

CONVOY AND ARMING.

On motion of Mr. BURWELL, the House proceeded to consider the resolution proposed by him on Friday last; and the same being again read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized immediately to employ the public armed vessels for the purpose of conveying and protecting the ships and vessels the property of citizens of the United States, laden with goods of their growth, produce, or manufacture, and not contraband of war, in their trade to and from ports open for their reception, by the regulations of the Government under whose jurisdiction they are situated, and not being actually blockaded or invested by a competent force: Provided, Such Government shall not have in force edicts or decrees against neutral commerce, and that the owners and crews of merchant vessels owned, laden, or destined, as aforesaid, be permitted to associate and arm for their defence against illegal capture and molestation, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law.

A motion was made and seconded that the said resolution be referred to the consideration of a select committee.

And the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 160, nays 18, as follows:

STATE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. NEWTON said he rose to submit to the consideration of the House a resolution of some importance. He said he was satisfied, when gentlemen became acquainted with the objects embraced by it, they would readily extend to it their patronage. Gentlemen are aware (said he) of the situation in which this country is placed with respect to the belligerent Powers. It becomes us at this crisis to be extremely circumspect, to render our particular attention to every object connected with our defence. The President of the United States, not long since, by message, has informed us that he conceives it necessary to place at his disposition a detachment of militia, of one hundred thousand men, and also twenty thousand volunteers. In this state of things, it becomes important to make some inquiry into the standing army of the United States. It is necessary for us to know what is the number of the standing troops; the distribution of them in our frontier garrisons, or forts; whether the organization be such as it ought to be; whether any abuses have crept in—and, if they have, to apply the corrective. We are placed here as the people's sentinels, and it is our duty to direct our attention to objects of this vast importance. Premising thus much, I beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, by the proper department, a statement of the number of troops composing the regular army of the United States, the number stationed at each of the frontier garrisons, or forts, and particularly the condition of that detachment of the regular force allotted for the defence of New Orleans, the number sent there, the different dispositions which have been made of the detachments, and the present effective force of the same, with such other information as he may deem necessary to communicate respecting the state of the army.

Mr. DANA suggested the propriety of qualifying the resolution, as it embraced perhaps too minute an inquiry into the state of the garrisons, and might require information which it might not be proper to communicate; in which case, however, Mr. D. trusted that the President would have firmness enough to withhold such information as he should deem improper to make.

Mr. DAWSON said he could see no possible advantage which could result from the passage of this resolution; that it might, on the contrary do much harm, by exposing the situation of our frontiers. The President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief, had a right to make such disposition of the Army as he thought proper; and it was a subject which did not properly come within the cognizance of the House.

Mr. NEWTON replied that Congress had the control of the Army, by being annually called upon to vote appropriations for its support; and it was their duty to inquire into the state of it, and to examine whether it was adequate to the public exigency.

Mr. TALLMADGE coincided with the gentleman last up, in the opinion that this was information which the House ought to have; it was their duty to obtain it. He suggested a modification of the resolution. He said it would be desirable to know not only the particular force of the United States, but how it was officered, where the officers were stationed, and in what duty they were employed whilst in the pay of the Government.

On the suggestion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the resolution was varied, by striking out the words in italic, and substituting the following: "a return of the Army of the United States, specifying the particular force of each regiment or corps, with the destination of the principal officers commanding the same."

Mr. GHOLSON was opposed to so general an inquiry. He had heard no intimation that the general state of the Army required inquiry; for aught he had heard, its general state was good. If there had been misconduct at New Orleans, he wished to see an inquiry leading directly to that point; he wished, by narrowing the inquiry, to come honestly and fairly at the object in view.

Mr. NEWTON said the House ought to have before it a view of the whole state of the Army, and not to confine their view to any particular limb of it. He thought great advantage would result from the Army's annually passing in review before the Legislature. He hoped the whole resolution would pass.

The question was taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative by a great majority.

Messrs. NEWTON and SHAW were appointed a committee to wait on the President with the resolution.

NAVIGATION OF THE MOBILE.

Mr. POINDEXTER said it would be recollected that a memorial had been received from the inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory complaining of the enormous duty levied by the Spanish Government on vessels navigating the Mobile. It was in the power of the Executive Department alone, at present, to remedy the evil. He wished to know if any steps had been taken on the subject, and therefore moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any, and, if any, what steps have been taken by the Executive Department of the Government to obtain for the citizens of the United States residing on the waters of Tombigbee and Alabama rivers, the free navigation of the Mobile river to its confluence with the ocean; and also, what amount of duty is demanded by the Spanish Government at the town of Mobile on articles the growth or manufacture of the United States, which are conveyed through said river to and from the city of New Orleans

Agreed to; and Messrs. POINDEXTER and POYDRAS appointed a committee to wait on the President with the resolution.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION ACT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill concerning commercial intercourse, &c.

The SPEAKER decided, that as the subject of conveying and arming our merchant vessels was specially referred to a select committee of the House, it was out of order to move the same in an amendment to a bill—and therefore Mr. MUMFORD's amendment offered on Saturday last could not be received.

Mr. MONTGOMERY then renewed his motion to add the following as a new section to the bill.

And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby authorized, to give instructions to the armed vessels thereof to seize any [British or French] vessel or vessels evading or violating this law, and to bring the same into any port of the United States, or the Territories thereof, for adjudication.

Mr. SHEFFEY moved to amend the amendment, by adding to it the following words:

“Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the capture or search of any foreign vessel without the jurisdiction of the United States.”

The motion was negatived.

Mr. MONTGOMERY modified his amendment by inserting the words in italic.

The amendment moved by Mr. MONTGOMERY was opposed by Messrs. BACON, SHEFFEY, KEY, PITKIN, and DAW, chiefly on the ground that it was asserting a right on the part of the United States which they did not admit in other nations, viz: to capture vessels on the high seas for the violation of a municipal law. It was said that no violation of a municipal law could take place unless the offending vessel was within the jurisdiction of the United States; and the right to capture vessels for intention to evade a law or violate a blockade was one against which we had always protested, and therefore ought not ourselves to assert. It was further said, that the detention of vessels, for the purpose of search at the discretion of an armed vessel, whether of the United States or of foreign nations, would operate to the great distress and sometimes to the ruin of the merchant.

It was said in reply, by Mr. MONTGOMERY, that the amendment only authorized detention or capture in cases of actual violation of the law, and not in cases of a supposed intention so to act; that none of the extreme cases supposed could occur, as the commanders of our armed vessels would in all cases act under express instructions from the President of the United States, who would no doubt guard them so as to avoid improper conclusions; that cases of violation of the laws at present occurred in the mouths of our rivers, to the prevention of which the revenue cutters were not competent, and for which purpose the frigates would be advantageously employed.

The question was then taken on Mr. MONTGOMERY's amendment, and passed in the negative—yeas 47, nays 76, as follows:

Van Rensselaer, Laban Wheaton, Ezekiel Whitman, and James Wilson.

Mr. MUMFORD said he was opposed to the bill in its present form. He considered the concessions made to one of the belligerents by this bill as abject colonial submission. He never could consent to surrender the honor and best interests of his country in any manner whatever, and he was convinced, in his own mind, that the present contemplated measure would have that effect. There were principles in the bill, he said, which he liked; but there were others to which he had serious objections. He considered the non-intercourse as a solemn protest against the Orders in Council and decrees of the belligerents, and he hoped it would be continued; at least, until we are better prepared, by placing the country in a complete posture of defence, or that some other stronger ground should be taken.

However, he had been baffled in his amendment respecting convoy. By a sort of legerdemain the go-by was given to it. He assured the gentleman from Virginia that the question should not be smothered. He was determined to do all in his power to have the question brought fairly before this House, and decided whether this nation will protect the fair and lawful commerce of the country. He wished not to see it go out wholly unprotected.

I do hope, sir, that the House will consent to postpone this bill until the third Monday in February, and I now make a motion to that effect. What, said he, are we about to do? But a few days ago, this House voted nearly two to one, and your Clerk has scarcely done recording those votes, that you would support the Chief Magistrate in the dignified and praiseworthy course he had taken in dismissing the Minister of Great Britain. He has recommended the calling out one hundred thousand militia, twenty thousand volunteers, and fitting out the frigates, and yet, with all these hostile features staring you in the face, you are about adopting a bill containing principles which in three weeks it may become necessary to retract. I do not like this legislating backwards. This bill operates all on one side; it will supply one of the belligerents with raw materials essential to carry on her manufactures, and with the very naval stores which are most likely to aid her in support of a war on her part against you, and which she cannot now procure from the Baltic. Is it politic, is it wise, when such gigantic events are daily taking place in the Old World—at such an awful period, in the contemplation of which the human mind is lost in wonder and amazement—to press a decision of this important question, on which pivot turns the whole of your foreign relations? I do hope the motion to postpone will prevail, for such is the detestable Machiavelian system of the Old World, no one can scarcely form any correct opinion of what course they may pursue in consequence of the measures we have taken; but if we reason from their past conduct, by analogy, we have much to apprehend. I may be mistaken, but I should not be much surprised to hear, before the third Monday in February, that one of the belligerents had embargoed your ships in her ports, and ordered all the others on His Majesty's high seas to be brought in for legal adjudication. What did they do in the war of 1756? They commenced by seizing, under frivolous pretext, about four hundred sail of French merchant vessels. In our Revolutionary war, they did the same with Holland. They commenced by capturing all the Dutch vessels they could find, and then talked about treating with their High Mightinesses. And, more recently, this same conduct has been pursued in the case of three Spanish frigates, who were, after the manner of the Chesapeake, fired into, and their subjects murdered without any previous notice or ceremony. And what reason have we, sir, to expect any better treatment. I do not wish to afford them an opportunity to gratify their insatiable appetite by serving us in the same manner, to which we shall be exposed by the passage of this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR said that he presumed, from the arguments urged by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MUMFORD) who had just made the motion to postpone, it would be proper to enter in some degree into the merits of the bill. In fact, in no other way, could we get at the proper answers to his arguments; for, to show that the bill ought to pass, and that speedily, would be to show that it ought not to be postponed.

We are told, sir, that it ought to be postponed, because it is submission; and if, indeed, we were now, for the first time, about to make this descent; if we were now high and dry, and could, by this postponement, continue for a few weeks, or some days, in a state of honorable and effective resistance to the unjust and oppressive edicts of the belligerents, I should think the argument unanswerable. I will not gainsay the definition of the gentleman, (this definition corresponds with the definition of submission, as given in the celebrated report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, made last winter. I subscribed to it then, and I must do so now,) but I will say, that the principles of this bill are less humble, less abject, than those contained in the non-intercourse law, which was founded on the project of the gentleman from New York, and which he wishes now to be continued in force.

The House cannot have forgotten who, on this side of it, first made motions to break down the system of embargo; who first cried out for the merchants for permission to go somewhere; to St. Bartholomews, to Gottenburgh, to any place not inhibited by the belligerents; that the merchants must have commerce; must have it immediately. In vain we replied, wait a little while; let the system have a fair trial; we too desire a fair, an honorable commerce; by waiting a little, this will be secured to you. In vain did the former Foreign Relations Committee demonstrate that this hide-and-seek commerce—that this commerce, the lines of which, as defined by the proposed resolution, would be following the course of the injurious edicts, and would be, what the gentleman now talks about, submission. All would not do; the embargo was destroyed, and the non-intercourse was passed. Then the supplies which he now wishes to withhold from the British Navy got out of our country, and into Great Britain. The fears now expressed on this head come too late. These might, at that time, if they had been urged by the gentleman from New York, have had great weight. Then we condemned our immense mercantile tonnage to the humble condition of coasters, or to the more humble condition of skulkers into the little holes and corners in Europe left open by the lenity or oversight of the belligerents. I will not speak of the other effect of the non-intercourse law; of its inducing, by its restrictions, a part of your merchantmen to run away, to expatriate themselves, and to become a reproach and infamy among nations.

But, to speak in the mildest terms of its effects, and the effects of the abortive efforts of our Executive to get rid of as much of it as he could honorably, and in obedience to its provisions, I will say that at our meeting here in November we found more than an hundred millions of our property afloat on the ocean. True it is, sir, that for the measures that led to this state of things, I individually bear none of the weight on my shoulders; but now, as I am compelled, and all are compelled to act under this state of things, we must take things as we find them; and as respects the welfare of the nation now to be sought, it is no matter who voted this way, that way, or the other. There now rests upon us all, upon every branch of the Government, a high, a paramount responsibility, increased, immensely increased by the state of risk in which we find so much of the property of our country.

From the gentlemen who talk about energy, and rail against this bill, I have heard of no proposition for lessening this risk; on the contrary, the high tone they adopt would tend to increase it. Actuated by the view I have taken of our situation, the first proposition I (as a member of the committee who reported this bill) made to the Committee was, to lay on an embargo for six weeks, in order to enable the Government, when our property was drawn home, to take what course it pleased. It was hardly entertained there; in fact, only the politeness of the person who seconded my motion, enabled me to introduce it there. I believe I do not hazard a contradiction when I say that it would be rejected by a large majority of this House, and, whether satisfied or not, I have acquiesced in this sentiment myself; perhaps, from the terms of the President's first Message in the present session, and from the known determination of our citizens to have commerce at all events, and under any circumstances, I might have been too fast.

To be sure, when I saw the account of Mr. Jackson's dismissal, I hardly expected a peace Mes- sage from the President at our meeting. Nay, sir, in viewing the insult as coming from the British Ministry, or British King, if you please, I was disposed at first sight to object to our Administration's placing to the credit, or rather discredit of the Minister, "the act of his Government," &c. From all the consideration I have been able to give this subject, I still believe that, in point of fact, the thing is as I first conceived it to be; and that, only in form, as in the attack on the Chesapeake, it was the act of the individual, and, as in that case, there might be room left for the British Government to disavow it. In truth, sir, if we suppose the opinions of the moral part of the world—the moral part of their own citizens—of any importance to Great Britain, the ground of collision between our Government and their late Minister, if they could possibly maintain it, would be the only excuse or palliation to their disavowal of the arrangement made by that Minister. But, when this ground was attempted to be assumed, and when the insulting allegation was made by Jackson, what was the President bound to do? Certainly, not to permit this ground, utterly false and unfounded, so dishonorable to himself and to the nation, to be assumed and maintained in the harshest terms by the Minister. Say he was at liberty to consider the insult as coming from the Minister or, the Government, on which ought he to have imposed the demerit? He might have reflected, and no doubt did, that we were unprepared for war; that almost the whole commercial capital of the nation was in a state of exposure to the captures of the British cruisers; and, on perusing the correspondence between the Secretary of State and that Minister, he could nowhere find that that Minister had vouched his Government as responsible for his insolence, or that the insult had proceeded from instructions from his Government. How could the affair eventuate other than it did? The offence was placed to the individual, he was dismissed, and the annunciation directed to be made of that event by our Minister at London was correspondent. It expressed a just sense of displeasure at the conduct of the individual, but a pacific disposition towards the Government.

The position then, sir, which I assume from the foregoing reasons, is, that the pacific attitude discoverable in the President's Message grew out of the state of our own affairs as produced by our own laws, and also out of the very circumstances of the affair of Jackson; superadded to which, I might also mention the continuance of the old dilemma; the equal infringement upon our neutral rights by the two great belligerents; if not equal in fact, equal in their disposition to injure us. I might add, too, that in making war upon one of these, you would be submitting to the views of the other—views upon which they had originally oppressed you. If it was improper a year ago under this consideration to single out your adversary, and at a time when your commerce was all within your own ports, much more so would it be now. Thus situated, what are we to do? The non-intercourse law, a dead letter as to all its designed effects, except one effect—the closing of your Treasury box to the admission of one cent of duties from British and French goods—the system of smuggling maturing every day; can gentlemen be willing that we should remain in this state?

After all that has been said, I think the bill on your table contains more of relief, more of safety, and less of degradation, than any plan that has been spoken of by its opponents. I will not say that it is the best that can be produced; but, provided you will not call in your commerce, which even the men of energy have inveighed against, I will say it is the only practicable plan of getting on till something better can be done, and is a plan carrying with it a protest against the injustice of the belligerents. It is not a new plan. I wish it had been adopted when first offered to you. A colleague of mine (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS, not now a member of this House, and whose absence all of us must regret) offered it when we were discussing the non-intercourse law. It then failed, as did also another project connected with it, to wit: the laying double duties on goods brought from the belligerents.

It was then proposed to take off all commercial restriction on our own citizens who had suffered so much by the injustice of foreigners—by the system of coercion adopted to procure relief from that injustice, and which, by our repealing it, we had rendered abortive—and to substitute in their stead restrictions on the commerce with us, of the subjects or citizens of those nations which had done us the injustice; thereby securing to the class of citizens who had been the most injured the monopoly of the carriage of our own produce, and of the supplies from these nations to us. If this state of things can be effected, even one of the opposers to this bill (the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. HAVEN) has acknowledged it would be a state most devoutly to be wished for. Though an advocate for the bill, I perhaps do not estimate it so highly as that gentleman does. I wish for better times; I wish for peace; I would ask for no more.

By the by, I must say a word concerning the plan for double duties, which passed in this House, but which was lost in the Senate; and by its failure there, we shall be obliged to borrow three millions of dollars for the year 1810. It was no doubt a very convenient thing for the forehanded capitalist and British agent who had sent orders, extended on account of the expected non-intercourse, to escape the payment of this double duty; and it will be equally convenient for them, now that they have received their goods, that the non-intercourse law should be continued till they have made sale of them at a price increased by its continuance. It is to defeat this kind of monopoly that I wish the bill to be speedily passed. It is to prevent what the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PORTER) the other day talked about—the making the rich more rich, and the poor more poor, out of the misfortunes of our country—that I wish the bill not to be postponed. We ought not, say gentlemen, to pass this milk-and-water thing, after we have voted in favor of the resolution in which we have expressed a determination to call forth the whole energies of the nation, if necessary, in support of our Government against all consequences that may result from the dismissal of Mr. Jackson. It was not pretended by the friends of that resolution that it was designed to put an end to all negotiation: on the contrary, they defended it as being free from this tendency, when its opponents had urged that argument against it. But, what are we to do, in the meanwhile, until the time it shall become apparent that it is necessary to call out the whole force of the nation? Do the war speeches of gentlemen, when they say that they do not mean war, prepare us for that occurrence? Every little helps, is the old saying, which I would here apply to this subject. Pass this bill, by which you would resume the good work of replenishing your Treasury, and thereby prepare the ways and means of resistance which by the resolution you have promised. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKMAN,) in his discussion on the details of the bill, has said much of the advantages lately derived from an indirect trade with France, of the wine and silks obtained at Tonningen. In reply to all this, I ask, would not the trade direct to France, if it could be carried on with safety by our merchants, be still more profitable? But, the British Orders in Council affect this trade. Is this the only obstruction? Would not French sequestrations also affect it? Those who have opposed this bill have demonstrated that it will be a coercive system upon France. I was glad to hear it. What do we want France to do? To withdraw her edicts—to respect the rights of property of our citizens in her ports—to respect our neutral rights as a nation. Are we furthering the pursuit of these objects by conforming to these edicts—by skulking into a Danish port, there to deposit what she may want of us, and to take her eleemosynary scraps which she sends there for our humble acceptance; and when, too, this circuitry of voyage is performed at almost as great risk of capture, by one nation and another, as would be run in the voyage direct to France? If there was safety after arriving in port in France, I have little doubt but that the enterprise of our merchants (and perhaps their cunning) would find the way there, maugre all the blockading decrees and British navy.

It is the submission prescribed by your non-intercourse law that has degraded us as a commercial nation into the condition of that lowest caste of Hindoos, who, in receiving the charity of the higher castes, stand at an humble distance till the donor has deposited his bounty, and has withdrawn to a distance sufficient to escape the pollution which the touch or even the sight of the abject being is supposed to occasion. I wish for no trade upon these terms. When I know my surplus of produce is wanted by my neighbor, and I want a part of what he has to spare, I choose to meet him face to face. I despise your sneaking bargains. When there is humiliation and degradation imposed by one party without previous provocation on the part of the other in their intercourse, the freeman, the American (such as he ought to be) is bound, if he cannot retaliate, to reject with disdain the intercourse thus offered; nay, I would not offer the unequal terms of intercourse contained in this bill to any nation in Europe, unless it were expressly in retaliation for previous known and acknowledged injuries imposed by that nation on us. I have said that this bill is less submissive than the non-intercourse law: with respect to France, I hope I have proved my position. Let us see if it will hold good with England, also. From the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) I derive this information, which, though not new, yet, as coming from him, is entitled to additional weight, viz: that the blockading orders; Orders in Council; disavowals of arrangements fairly made; the whole catalogue of impressments, attacks, insults, &c., of the British Government—have proceeded from the jealousy of our growing commercial importance, and from a desire to secure to themselves the monopoly of the carrying trade, and of the commerce of the world. In the law now proposed to be repealed, is there anything countervailing this object? Why need I repeat the arguments against this plan, urged last year, all of which have proved true by actual experience. Our merchantmen have been turned into coasters to deposit at Amelia island, or at some near neutral port in the West Indies, all the supplies of naval stores, and of raw materials for her manufactures, which Great Britain may want; nay, the outlet is so circumscribed by her orders, and by her own law, that she obtains more than she wants for her own use. With but a bare possibility of escaping her rapacious jaws, which we are told yawn wide for our destruction, we have aided and assisted her monopolizing spirit, both as to obtaining the whole quantity of the surplus produce of our country, and that too at reduced prices—at not half its worth; and, as if this were not bad enough, we insure to her the profit of carrying it across the Atlantic! Will the complete reversal of this latter effect—the asserting our right to the exclusive carrying where we please of the surplus products of our soil—be more submissive than the former policy? No one can say so. It is true, say gentlemen, we want this carrying trade to the fullest extent, as detailed in the bill, but we cannot get it; it is dangerous to attempt it. Great Britain is all-powerful; she will retaliate; she will drive your vessels from her ports, or she will impose such heavy duties as to create the effect of another embargo and another non-intercourse. As to her exclusion of our vessels from her ports, or her being willing again to revive the effects of the embargo, the little experience she has already had of it, will occasion her to deprecate it as the worst of evils to her. Three, four, and five hundred per cent. rise in the price of naval stores; three hundred per cent. on cotton—the kind of benevolent aid her Government had to give to the poor weavers of Manchester!—are mementoes sufficient to prevent Great Britain from producing, by her own act, such a state of things. But, she will impose countervailing restrictions, in form of duties. Let it be recollected that her system of impost and excise—her system of taxation—has extended to everything that the ingenuity of her greatest statesmen and calculators could think; that her necessity has occasioned her to collect in one year, the enormous sum of nearly eighty millions sterling, exclusive of loans. Let it be recollected, that she cannot have loved us better than she loved her own subjects. I think that it is fairly inferable, that if she has not squeezed us to the utmost, in the way of excessive duties, there must have been an all-powerful reason for it—some settled policy. Can any one be at a loss for this policy, when the famous Order in Council is recollected, which consigned to the flames the surplus cotton brought into her ports, in order to prevent its finding its way to other nations, who might rival her in the manufacture of it. Her discriminating duties, her orders, and all her other short-sighted measures in hostility to us, have aroused a spirit for manufacture among our citizens. Great Britain has held out the bounty; let her increase it at her peril. Every restriction—every countervailing measure offered by her—will give impetus to the manufacturers in this country. I confess I feel no sensibility under these apprehensions, which appear to alarm some gentlemen so much: I should grieve very little if she did retaliate.

But we are cautioned not to enter into this commercial warfare with her—she is so powerful and mighty, and is fighting for her existence; (there is some indication of weakness in this, though;) she will never give up to you; her high-towering notions—her national pride—will compel her, whether for her interest or not, to retaliate. But, I would answer, if she does retaliate, against her own interest, the victory in the long run will be ours. The more they injure our fair trade, to them and from them, the more victorious shall we be; the more they plunder us on the ocean, the more shall we prize our homes, our own soil, our domestic arts, our manufactures—the more we shall become united, and weaned, and independent of her.

But, the question is not whether we shall now commence this commercial warfare, but whether we are so submissive and so abject as to be afraid to retaliate on this “all-powerful nation.” If her power is to be the conclusive argument against it, it would apply as well (nay, with greater force) against our resisting her with the sword, if she were to attempt to subjugate us in the old mode—in the mode she once attempted, but attempted in vain.

On this point I will only add further, that in addition to the discriminating duties so clearly detailed to you by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CURTIS) and their tendencies so irrefutably deduced, Great Britain has even given us cause of war, as some gentlemen on the other side of the House have lately admitted. Can “this milk-and-water project,” (as some of its opponents call it,) adopted as retaliatory, and in protestation (which I believe is a better word) against all her unjust conduct towards us, and which is indeed so far short of the retaliation commensurate to the injury—I say, can this bill, if passed, be supposed capable of producing the dire consequences which are so often detailed to us? I believe it will make less noise over the water (and that I acknowledge is its weakness) than it does here among ourselves.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross,) in opposing this bill, and in urging us to make an energetic stand, in fact I should call his speech a war speech,) branched out into a violent philippic against the embargo. Did he recollect that this contest, which he was inspiring us up to undertake, was with a maritime Power? I need not magnify her power—that has been done by others. Did he recollect, what I have before adverted to, that more than one hundred millions of our property was afloat, and liable, at the shortest notice, to be swept from our possession? Did he reflect that the bankruptcies which would be occasioned by such a stroke, would not only affect the mercantile interest, but also the agricultural? for they are so intimately linked together, that the distress to the one class would be a distress to the other. Did he reflect that this loss of capital, lessening the aggregate wealth of the nation, would also be lessening by so much the resources of the nation for defence, and would be adding to the resources of our enemies for our annoyance? Did he reflect, that at the commencement of a war with a maritime nation, this same embargo would be necessary as an incipient step to be taken by any Administration, whether of one political denomination or the other? Why, then, attempt to revive the prejudices which have been created, more by feeling than by sound judgment, in a part of our political community? I shall believe he has pondered well the subject, and is seriously in earnest for war, when as a precursor to it, he shall offer to this House a resolution for laying on an embargo. On the whole, sir, the state of the world—our own particular state—the pacific stand our Administration has taken—all conspire to convince me that the bill on your table, less “submissive than the non-intercourse law,” ought to pass; and that, if even we mean to take the step in advance, inasmuch as it proposes replenishing of your Treasury, it ought to pass.

Mr. Ross said he was opposed to the passage of the bill before the House, because it was not suited to the present state of the foreign relations of the United States. In order to form a just idea of the bill (said he) we must require what can be done. We are reduced to this situation, that one of three courses must be adopted by this House. We must either abandon commerce and the ocean altogether; or suffer England to regulate commerce for us; or we must protect commerce by force. These are the only three courses left for this nation to pursue at the present crisis.

Is the nation prepared to abandon commerce altogether? Are the representatives of the people prepared for it? If their declarations convey their ideas, we are not prepared for such a state of things. It has been declared from all sides of this House that we would not submit to the principles contained in the British Orders in Council. To abandon the ocean to yield up commerce, is submission to the British Orders in Council; and therefore, I presume, we are not prepared to take this course. Are gentlemen prepared to set the wealth of the nation afloat and to suffer England to regulate that small remnant of commerce which is left to us? If they are, they will vote for the bill under consideration. England at this moment tyrannizes over the sea, and has as absolute control over the commercial world as Napoleon has over the European continent. She owes much of that power, in my opinion, to the feeble and inefficient measures pursued by the United States for years past. Whatever you may say upon paper, unless it contain some practical provisions of protection, she will continue to regulate your commerce, to give it such direction as she may think proper, and to enforce her Orders in Council. I have understood that gentlemen say that they never will submit to the principles of the Orders in Council; and therefore they cannot adopt this course of suffering England to regulate all our commerce. Then what is the course left for the United States to pursue? That of protecting their independence, protecting their commerce, sustaining their neutral rights by force. This is the only honorable course left for the American people and Government to pursue, and being the only honorable course, all our measures are predicated on false principles, and will only tend to reduce us still lower in the estimation of foreign Powers than we are already. I am aware that it is a maxim as old as the Roman Government, or older, that in medio tutissimus ibis, that the middle course is best. That maxim has been resorted to by us for years past. It has produced no good, has been found by experience to be inefficient in the present unexampled state of the world, and therefore I think it would be wisdom to abandon it. Is not the bill on the table still pursuing the middle course? Does it not contain the same principles which have been resorted to in different ways for years past? If it does, and gentlemen are satisfied that all those principles hitherto attempted to be enforced have been unavailing, why will they cling to such principles as the ark of our political salvation.

The principles of non-importation, embargo, and non-intercourse, have all been resorted to, and all have been found ineffectual. I am therefore opposed to this bill; because I consider it the fourth edition of the embargo principle, which has been found to be an ineffectual remedy for the evils under which we are suffering. I am aware that I may be asked if the embargo principle is to be found in the bill under consideration; and it behooves me, as this is one of my objections to the bill, to point them out to this House. What are the embargo principles, sir? Principles restrictive of commerce, undertaking to regulate and restrict commerce completely or partially. This bill undertakes not only to restrict the commerce of the United States, but the commerce of the great belligerents also, to limit its operation, to narrow down the extent which it would have without any law in operation on that subject. So far, therefore, it partakes of the embargo principles, and so far it is exceptionable in my view of the subject; inasmuch as the embargo principles have been found to be inefficient, inasmuch as the very friends of those principles have declared that they have been found inoperative, or to operate only on our own citizens and not on our enemies. It is a good rule, sir, that Government and protection are reciprocal. By what authority do you undertake, upon what moral or political principle do you assume the right to regulate and restrict commerce, when you refuse to afford it any protection? If the Government should refuse to protect its citizens, the ties and the obligations which the citizen would owe to that Government would be dissolved, and he would cease to owe allegiance thereto. By a parry of reasoning, if the Government refuses to protect the citizen in his lawful commerce, it loses the ties of allegiance which he owes to that Government. Thus much, sir, as respects this measure being an inefficient one, not corresponding with the situation of our foreign relations, being too weak and too feeble to meet the exigencies of affairs; being in fact, what gentlemen have declared on all sides of the House they will not submit to, a submission to the British Orders in Council.

But, sir, I am told that this bill is only an entering wedge, the first stepping-stone, a system to be adopted calculated to effect all those purposes for which I am so anxious; and that the reason why the whole system is not produced at once is, that different committees, having various duties to perform, have charge of the different branches of that system. This answer is not satisfactory to my mind. I should have been pleased to have seen each of these committees exhibiting to this House a complete system; by which means the House would had a complete plan from each of these able organs, from which to make choice of that which appeared to them best, and would not have been compelled, as they are now, to judge of its disjointed parts without seeing the whole. Are embargo principles, partially restricting the commerce of the country, necessarily a part of a greater system calculated to protect our rights? It is surprising to me that those principles should have been incorporated into this bill which have been apparently abandoned. But, sir, we are all men, and nothing more. The chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. MACON,) whose policy is completely embargo, considering it, no doubt, the best for our country, mingles it with all his measures in all his speeches. It is not surprising, therefore, that he should mingle it in a great system said to be calculated to protect our rights and prevent our submission to the British Orders in Council.

We have also been told, sir, in the course of this debate, that there are three parties in the House—one for strong energetic measures—and that is my ground; another more cautious, wise and prudent, disposed to adopt temporary measures and wait for some miracle to relieve them from embarrassments. This portion of the House, we are told, may probably follow those who are for energetic measures, whilst those who are for doing nothing will never follow us; and we are therefore called upon to unite with those who will in a certain event join in with us. This, sir, forcibly reminds me of the fable of the fox and the goat. The fox having tumbled into a well, had been casting about a long while to no purpose how he should get out again; the goat came along, peeped in and saw the fox, and asked him if the water was good? Good! says the fox, ay, so sweet, that I am afraid I have surfeited myself, I have drank so abundantly. The goat upon this, without any more ado, leapt into the well; the fox mounted on the goat's shoulder, leapt out, and ran away laughing at the snare into which he had led the goat. Sir, with this premonition before my eyes, I should be a greater dupe than the goat to leap into the embargo system. It has injured my country, surfeited my friend, (Mr. SMITH,) and therefore cannot be good for me. I must therefore decline his invitation to join him in continuing measures productive of no good, but much evil.

I am for manly resistance, and for declaring, in our laws, as well as in our speeches, that the embargo ground is no longer tenable. These reasons, I hope, will satisfy those who think I ought to sacrifice my opinions to that of a majority of any party, that I am correct to do so in this instance. Here I stand or here I fall on principles practically proved for ages past as the only ones calculated to meet a great crisis in our affairs, involving invasions of our rights and a total disregard of all the principles of justice or morality. It is a practical system—no fine-spun theory. It is a system known to be good, by experience, to meet diseases of this kind. Ages have approved it, wisdom has ratified it, and it is therefore that plan on which I should choose to risk my reputation, however small.

What is this bill, sir? What good is intended to be produced by it? They who brought it in appear to have very little faith in it, when they were willing to limit it to this session. Is your country in that tranquil situation, or your foreign relations of so conciliatory a nature, that the Legislature can be indulging themselves in enacting temporary provisions, in which no five men agree as to the effects they will have or the manner in which they will operate? It is true, sir, that the gentleman who sits before me, (Mr. CUTTS,) who is fully equal to giving information, has endeavored to show the House its operation. As far as I understood his reasoning it went to prove, not that this bill would produce any general beneficial effect, but, that it would by repealing the non-intercourse law, permit lumber to be exported, which is the staple of his State, and too bulky to be smuggled out of the country, as the productions of other States are daily done under that law. This only proves the non-intercourse law should be repealed. Let that be done without a retention of its principles. If not, let it remain until the people in the commercial States shall compel their Representatives to adopt some practical remedy for the injuries they have received, and the evils they endure.

Really, sir, this bill appears to me to be a sort of sop given to Cerberus, not to lull him to sleep, but to stimulate his vigilance; not to induce him to unbar the gates of commerce, but to invite still further rapacity; not to promote the good of the country, but to amuse the people a little longer.

Perhaps this bill might be useful were moral obligations felt and acknowledged by the great belligerents. But is that the case? If not, you ought to adopt measures calculated to meet the actual state of things. Indeed, sir, when I reflect on our situation, and hear gentlemen gravely advocate this bill, as calculated to protect our commerce and prevent the injustice and restrain the violence of the belligerents, it reminds me of the anecdote of the Bedlamite, who talked rationally on all subjects except politics, but the moment that subject attracted his attention, that moment he exclaimed: "I and the Czar Peter hold the balance of Europe." We seem to talk rationally on every subject but commerce; the moment that is touched we seem to forget that power and force are necessary to give efficacy to our laws: we seem to forget our commerce is as completely controlled by Great Britain as the Bedlamite was by the walls which surrounded him. The Czar may, for aught I know, eventually protect the rights of neutral nations, but we shall assist him, while we adhere to the principles contained in this bill, like the maniac did his predecessor—only in imagination.

On this point I have another authority. I confess that the authority which I shall quote has never been recognised by the great Plenipotentiaries who met at the Treaty of Westphalia, but it is of much older date, and has been sanctioned by all mankind. I mean Æsop's fables. He tells that he met in the street a man who had been bitten by a dog, and had in his hand a crust of bread dipped in the blood of the wound. "What are you going to do with it?" asked Æsop. "I am instructed," replied the sufferer, "to give it to the dog who bit me, and it will insure a cure." Æsop said, "take care none of the other dogs see you give it, or you will be bit by them all." Yes, sir, and this bill appears to me to be a crust of bread dipped in the wounds of this country, given to Great Britain; and I advise this House to beware that none of the other nations of Europe see you hand the crust, lest they bite you also. This tale is to be found in a book of as much wisdom if not as high a character as the writings of the famous Grotius, who was recognised (as a learned gentleman has told us) as good authority at the Treaty of Westphalia. Let us therefore profit by its instructions.

But, what is to be done, gentlemen ask. Why, sir, assume the tone of manly resistance. Forget not that you are descended of fathers who dared to assert their rights. Look back to '75 and '76. The nation was then an infant Hercules resting in his cradle; we are now grown to manhood. And if the infant Hercules in his cradle did not fear to oppose the domineering conduct of Great Britain, why should Hercules, grown to manhood, dread her power? We are told that we have now no resources, that the Treasury is impoverished, and therefore that the course which is the only one steering clear of submission cannot be resorted to. In what, sir, do the resources of this country consist? The resources of our country consist in the wealth and affluence of our citizens; and if they are wealthy and affluent, our Treasury is always full. You possess the power to call a portion of it into the Treasury whenever the emergency of affairs requires it, and the people will freely resign a portion of it to protect their rights when in danger. Who pretends to say that the people of this country are not affluent? We have it officially before us, that money to almost any amount can be procured by loans; and though I am not one of those who approve of loans as a system, yet it must, in time of need, be resorted to—may we must resort to it this very session. And to whom on this occasion must you resort? To the merchant, whose rights you refuse to protect, and whose rights have been violated. What has reduced us to this situation? Crippling our commerce, instead of protecting it. Indeed, if I understood the gentleman from New York, who was on the committee who reported the bill, in the different speeches which he has made on the subject, the bill under consideration does not beat in unison with his pulse. If it does not, and the principle on which it is predicated be radically wrong, I ask why he does not come forward and openly avow it? Let those who believe the principle of the bill to be good rally around it, and those who doubt take their own course, and vote against the bill, rather than for a doubtful expedient.

Why should we go to extremities, is asked. Sir, war ought to be avoided so long as it can with honor, so long as it can with any beneficial result. But are you not now at war, sir? Has not Great Britain invaded your rights? Has she not trampled on your independence? Has she not committed all the depredations she can? No gentleman can deny it, or that she will not now permit just what commerce suits her purposes, and no other. Are the people ripe for such a degradation? Is this House ready for it? If not, she has trampled on all your rights, and the question results—would it be more beneficial to abandon commerce altogether, and submit to the British Orders in Council, or to make a manly resistance and assertion of our rights. When gentlemen examine this subject to the bottom, it would seem to me that they would not hesitate for a moment to say that the only honorable and dignified course is a manly resistance.

What has Great Britain done to induce us to take this firm stand? She has destroyed all our commercial rights; we have not an iota of commerce but what we enjoy at her pleasure. At her pleasure? No; at the pleasure of an officer on board a frigate at sea. At her pleasure? No; at the pleasure of an inferior judge of an inferior Court of Admiralty. If gentlemen will attend to the injuries stated in the Declaration of Independence and to our present situation, they will find that our present corresponds with our then situation in almost every point. Great Britain has refused her assent to an equitable settlement of our differences; she has refused atonement for the affair of the Chesapeake; she has cut up our trade with all parts of the world; she has plundered our seamen, ravaged our coast, and destroyed the lives of our people; she has constrained our fellow-citizens taken captive on the high seas to bear arms against their fellow-citizens, to become instruments of oppression on their own people and of the violation of our commercial rights; she has excited or attempted to excite the people of this country against their own Government. In every stage of these oppressions we have sought redress, by negotiation, in the most humble manner. The cup of humiliation is filled to the brim. The world knows it—you must not shut your eyes against the fact, that you have no alternative, but an abandonment of the ocean and submission to Great Britain, or the protection of our rights by force. Before you submit, burn your Declaration of Independence, tear down the emblems of liberty which adorn this splendid hall, and trample them under foot, that they may not exist to reproach us with a departure from the spirit of our fathers. I wish that the spirits of the departed heroes could rise in this assembly during the discussion of this question. If they had addressed you, would they tell you of your weakness, or appeal to your fears by proclaiming your inability to protect your rights? They would banish such idle stuff from this hall.

What does the Declaration of Independence tell you? That you have a right to establish commerce. Britain tells you that you have not a right, and you are at issue on one of the great principles of freedom. Does not your Declaration of Independence declare: "That as free and independent States they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do?" Britain says we have not the power—and what are we about to do? To submit; for this bill is submission. Before we submit, let us make one effort at least to preserve the independence of our country; let us take the advice of Hercules to the carter: "Whip thy horses, set thy shoulders to the wheel, and then call upon Hercules." Let us set our shoulders to the wheel; and, if we cannot protect our rights, then and not till then, let us fold our arms and call upon Hercules.

Mr. DANA observed that, although opposed to the bill, he should vote against postponement, because of the embarrassment and fluctuation such a course would produce in mercantile transactions.

The question was taken on postponement and negatived.

Mr. GARDENIER assigned reasons why he deemed it proper to vote for the bill. When he concluded, an adjournment was called for and carried, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 23.

Mr. MUMFORD presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of New York, to the same effect with a petition presented yesterday from sundry other inhabitants of the said State.—Referred to the committee appointed yesterday on the petition aforesaid.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting an account of the contingent expenses of Government for the year 1809.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the fitting out, officering, and manning, the frigates belonging to the United States," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of John Thompson, referred on the second instant; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next. The report is as follows:

That, from documents accompanying the said petition, and seeming upon the face of them to be correct and authentic, it appears that the petitioner was a captain in the Revolutionary war, and belonged to a regiment commanded by Colonel Hazen, called "the Congress's own regiment;" that after he had served as captain in the said regiment, "with honor and reputation," for about one year, he entered as a colonel into the service of Pennsylvania, to defend that State against the Indian incursions, having previously solicited and obtained from Major General Sullivan leave to retire from the Army, on account partly of his ill state of health, but principally because his proper rank had been withheld from him; that in recruiting and for the pay and subsistence of his company in the said Congressional regiment, the petitioner expended considerable sums of money, which your committee are convinced have never been fully reimbursed to him: and that, from two accounts made out by Edward Chinn, paymaster to the regiment, one during the war, and the other in the year 1788, and from a letter written in 1809, by Mr. Neuzer, the Register, it is manifest that the petitioner's account has never been finally adjusted.

The petitioner has exhibited an account showing a balance of two thousand six hundred and twenty-nine dollars and five cents in his favor against the United States; which account, together with the vouchers supporting it, the committee have attentively investigated. Every item in the account is established to the entire satisfaction of the committee, except the charge of three hundred and forty-three dollars and thirteen cents, for the pay of the company in the month of August, 1777. The embarrassing and difficult situation of the regiment in relation to the enemy in that month, is offered by Captain Thompson as the cause of his not being able to produce a regular pay-roll in support of the charge or particular item alluded to. Let this item be stricken from the account, and then it appears that the United States are indebted to the indigent petitioner in the sum of two thousand two hundred and eighty-five dollars and ninety-two cents; but by the several resolves and statutes of limitation passed by Congress, his claim, in the eye of the law, is satisfied. The petitioner, however, alleges that, in his case, the principles of equity ought to control the rigor of the law, because he endeavors to prove, and has indeed satisfied the committee, that the settlement of his account within the time limited by law, was prevented by circumstances not within his power.

The letter of the Register already referred to, and his certificate thereto subjoined, show that the petitioner attended in person, and also by Mr. Nourse, his agent, at the office of the Commissioner of Army Accounts, in New York, for the purpose of getting his account settled, but that an adjustment of it did not take place in consequence of "some difficulty" arising out of the unsettled situation of the accounts of Lieutenant Colonel Antil, of the aforesaid regiment. To obviate this difficulty, the petitioner states that he had made unremitting efforts for the liquidation of his account with Edward Chinn, the paymaster of the regiment; presuming that if he could succeed in this, his account would then be admitted by the agent of the United States. It appears, as well from the said letter of Mr. Nourse, as from the petitioner's representations, that his efforts were fruitless, and that Chinn not only refused or neglected to make a complete statement or settlement of the petitioner's account, but the petitioner moreover alleges that he was unable in due time to obtain from him such papers as were deemed indispensable for its adjustment. Chinn died; the statute of limitations began to operate, and here the subject rests.

In reporting in this, as in all other cases, the committee consider themselves bound by the law of the land. Could they indulge their feelings on the present occasion, they would not say to an old soldier, who has bravely fought the battles of his country, that his just claim is extinguished by the mere lapse of a given number of years, during which he had not the means of enforcing it. Not compassion alone for a poor soldier, but the mandates of justice, would impel them to speak a very different language. Conforming, however, to the positive limitations of Congress, they submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION BILL.

Mr. EPPES moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill till to-morrow; which was negatived, 51 to 50.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to amend the bill, by inserting after the clause for repealing the non-intercourse law the following words: "except so much thereof as repeals certain acts therein mentioned." The reason assigned by Mr. G. for this motion was, that, the embargo law being unlimited; and the non-intercourse law repealing the embargo being a temporary law, it might be conceived that when the non-intercourse law expired or was repealed, the embargo law would be revived and again in force. This not being the intention of the House, he was desirous to put an end to all doubt on the subject.

The motion was agreed to without a division.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, the words "or having sea-letters" was inserted after the words "registered vessels" in the 5th section, ayes 78. The operation of this amendment will be to permit the sea-letter vessels now in existence to enjoy the same privileges under this bill as registered vessels.

Mr. HALE spoke against the bill.

Mr. MACON said, he had spoken so often in the Committee of the whole House on the bill, as well of the principles which it contained, as on the detail, that he regretted to be under the necessity of again speaking, but observations had been made, which compelled him to do it; he promised, however, that this should be the last time he should address the House on the question, and that he would endeavor to keep as clear as possible of the arguments heretofore delivered.

It is no question now, sir, whether the nation be in a worse situation than it has been. If it be in a worse situation, that situation has been produced by the unjust acts of Great Britain and France, neither of which can with truth charge the nation or its Government with partiality for the other. France pays no regard to her treaty with us, and Great Britain attacked the frigate Chesapeake, and impresses our seamen; put these out of the list of wrongs done us by them, and there is no difference in their conduct towards us. The true question then for us to decide is, what ought to be done in the present state of the country, and of the two great belligerents of Europe? If we mean to continue at peace with both, there can be no doubt but we ought honestly to endeavor to do that, which shall be right as it relates to both. This House has heretofore formally resolved, and I believe every member who has addressed you has declared, that he would not submit either to the Decrees of France, or the Orders in Council of Great Britain. Do nothing, and what follows? I will not say; but the nation will surely decide. The bill before you has never been considered by me a very strong measure; though not a strong measure, it is certainly very far from submission, and such a measure as can in this nation be carried into complete execution; to say the least of it, it is a fair protest against the acts of both Great Britain and France. And can you do more at this time and preserve peace? If open war be preferred, there is cause enough against both.

If the bill be rejected, what pacific system will you adopt? None has been mentioned during the long time this bill has been debated; it would seem, therefore, to follow, that no better had been yet thought of. The first objection made to the bill, was, that it would operate solely on England; but, very lately, it has been discovered that it will scarcely be felt in England, and that it would operate solely on France. Can any argument more strongly demonstrate the impartiality of the bill, than these contradictory objections? If, however, it be true, that it will operate harder on them than on the other; that is not owing to the bill, but to their different conditions, with which we have nothing to do; it is their acts and not the uncommon situation in which they both now stand, that have injured us. The bill declares to both, that their public and private ships shall not enter our waters, and that their produce and manufactures shall not be brought here, except in the manner prescribed in it, and either of them may at any time, by withdrawing their unjust edicts, prevent the operation of the bill as to the nation withdrawing. And really it seems a little strange, that no one has attempted to amend the bill, so as to make it operate impartially, accordingly to his opinion; when it has been objected by some, that it would operate partially against England, and by others, that it will operate partially against France. The truth is, sir, that a fair examination of it will convince any man, that the system will operate as equally on both nations as any that can be devised, in their present situation; and in determining what we ought to do, we ought not for a moment to forget the power which one has on the land, and the power which the other has on the sea, nor ought we to expect that France will regard the freedom of the sea, when she does not regard the freedom of the land; nor ought we to expect that Great Britain will regard the freedom of the land when she does not regard the freedom of the seas. In examining our foreign relations, especially with respect to a Legislative act, we ought always to have in view the situation of the two belligerents: without this it will be difficult indeed to preserve our neutrality and peace, and those who think it unwise to preserve these any longer, will undoubtedly vote against the bill. But, before they do this, I hope they will look at the Governments which have at one time or other taken part in the wars and struggles of Europe for the last twenty years. Many of the Governments are destroyed; no matter whether Republics or Monarchies, all shared the same fate, and new Governments have sprung up in their places without a single Republic among them. I ask gentlemen to tell me, what must have been the condition of the people during all these wars and all these revolutions? To those who talk so much about war, I address myself; and it is a little strange, that notwithstanding we have so many war speeches, we have no war motions.

The United States are now the only neutral nation in the civilized world—to them is committed the sacred trust of preserving neutral rights, and to no nation are they more valuable. And to those who talk so much about war, permit me, sir, to inquire, whether they can seriously believe we shall be so likely to do this by war, against those who do not respect them either on land or water, as by other means; if they do seriously believe that we can compel France and England in any reasonable time to do this, I am willing to confess they have rather more faith on this point than I have. But, if we cannot easily compel England and France to observe our neutral rights, does it follow that we should not keep up a protest against the violations of them? to me it seems not; but, on the contrary, that it is our duty to do so; that whenever the time shall arrive, when the Governments of civilized nations shall incline to respect the public law and morality, that then there may be a standard to appeal to; and then, if not before, we shall find the advantage of the plan now proposed over that of war, and then we shall reap a real advantage from the course which this nation has so honorably pursued, and which it is still her interest to pursue, I mean impartial neutrality. While Europe continues in her present state no consideration, unless we are actually attacked, ought to induce us to go into the war, either on the side of England or France. They have both been anxious that we should engage in it on their side, and would no doubt make fair promises to persuade us to engage; but when once engaged, you would be considered as bound to them at least for the war, and their fair promises all forgot. Those who complain so much of our present situation, and those who speak so often and so much about war, for they both oppose the bill, ought to cast their eyes on the nations of Europe who have been plunged into the war, either to better their condition or vindicate what they supposed to be the honor of their Government, and compare our situation with that of the nation which they may think has suffered least, and they will find cause to rejoice that their lot has been cast to live under a Government and in a nation, both of which has had discretion enough to keep out of the war which has nearly ruined all that engaged in it.

I should like to be informed, whether the gentlemen who talk so much about war have turned their attention to the existing state of commerce? Have they ascertained the number of sailors now in foreign ports and on the high seas? Have they calculated the value of the ships and cargoes now out of the limits of the United States, so that they can inform the House of the number of seamen and the amount of capital, which may be jeopardized by the adoption of war measures? Have they, as a preparatory measure, advised that messengers should be immediately sent to Europe, and to the ports of Asia frequented by our merchant ships, to inform our countrymen of their danger, and advise them to return home as soon as possible? Have they even thought of an embargo, to prevent the sailors, the ships, and cargoes, now at home, from leaving the country? And whatever may be said at this day about an embargo, I agree to the truth of an observation, made by a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. TAYLOR,) that no Administration, which acts wisely, ever will go to war without first laying one to get the sailors, vessels, and capital, which may be in foreign countries, at home, before a declaration of war shall be made. We have been told that we could take the Canadas; this is not doubted, but, while we are taking them, Great Britain may take as many of our vessels and as much property now without our limits as would be four times their real value—without considering the unfortunate situation of the seaman who is made a prisoner, probably before he knows that the country is in war. Considerations like these seem to have no weight; no matter what consequences result, we must have energetic measures; war pell-mell, to get clear of this bill, which is said to be downright submission. This seems to me, especially in the present state of our affairs, to be a new sort of submission. Is it submission, openly to tell the two most powerful nations in the world, you shall not come here? No, it is not. The very prohibition is an act of sovereignty; while one declares it to be submission to France, another declares it to be submission to England; though both agree that it is submission, they disagree as to the Power to which it submits. Nay, sir, it has been said, that this is entirely a mercantile question, and that farmers and planters ought to have nothing to do with it. Then farmers and planters ought not to pay any part of the expense which may grow out of the present state of our affairs. The fact, however, is, that the nation is made up of planters, farmers, merchants, mechanics, and professional men, and all have an interest in the question; and it surely affects the pecuniary interest of the planter and farmer, more than it does that of the others. Double freight does not affect the merchant. He makes his profit, and the agricultural people pay it—for every expense attending his trade, he lays an additional advance on his goods, and the agricultural people make all good to him. Besides, sir, the President in his first Message told the House, that he had authorized our Minister at London to inform the British Government that another Minister would be received here, undoubtedly with a view to adjust our differences by negotiation. What would be thought of our Government, if, after making this communication to a foreign Power, we were to do that which some gentlemen have told us we ought to do—make open and manly war? Nay, sir, suppose Great Britain should send another Minister, and instead of his finding the Administration ready to receive him, and to treat with him as he expected, he is met by a declaration of war, and told to return home? This would not be like the dismissing the late Minister for indecent expressions in his letters. To me it seems there would be nothing candid, nothing honorable in transacting our national affairs in this way; it would be a departure from the principles which have always governed the nation.

There is nothing in the bill which prevents the Legislature from adopting any other measure—the bill may pass, and the House may hereafter adopt such energetic measures as may be thought advisable.

A gentleman from New York (Mr. ROOT) lately told us, that which we had been told before, that the bill was resistance to France and submission to England. He has completely proved that Napoleon had submitted to England, as he did that we were about to do it. He told us that Napoleon by his folly was aiding England to carry her Orders in Council into effect. If then to carry her Orders in Council into execution be submission, Napoleon has submitted; but neither his folly nor the bill on the table are submission.

My colleague, (Mr. SAWYER,) who is for very strong measures, seems to think that the friends of the bill consider it a certain cure for every complaint to which the body politic may be subject. None of them have yet said so much for it.

All that they have contended for, according to my understanding, is this, that in the present state of Europe, and of the United States, they have not been able to discover a better system, a system that would operate less on ourselves, and at the same time have some operation on England and France. My colleague said a great deal about war and energy. I have already endeavored to show, that war, under the existing circumstances of the nation, would be injurious; I will only add that, by declaring it at this moment, you would put it in the power of Great Britain to take probably one hundred millions of our property, and twenty or thirty thousand of our sailors.

I have not seen the force of the observation of my colleague, as applied to the question now before the House, that Great Britain enforces her orders on the ocean by her navy. He cannot, I am sure, suppose that our little navy, with all their bravery, could enforce our laws on the ocean, if opposed by all the maritime strength of the world; and the navy of Great Britain is able to do this. It is done by physical force and not by words; and when we talk about maritime war, we ought to compare the means we have with the end to be obtained. He thinks this the proper time to make war on Great Britain, because she is on her last prop and almost ready to fall. If it be so, there is no occasion for us to give aid, to kick her down. Let Bonaparte have the sole credit and honor of putting her down. I understood my colleague to say, that the friends of the bill were desirous of having a war with Great Britain, but were afraid to declare it. This, sir, is not the case with me. I am not afraid to declare my sentiments upon any question, either of war or peace. I am not desirous of war with any nation on earth, nor will I consent in the present state of the world to enter the war which has so long ravaged Europe, either on the side of France or England. But whenever the National Government shall declare war, I shall be found as ready to adopt the necessary measures to carry it on successfully as any man in this House or in this nation. Again, he told us that this is the very time to make the attack, because all the nations of Europe are leagued against her—this is no reason with me, because I am most decidedly against joining any European league, or having an alliance with any European Power. I am opposed to joining the fate of this happy country to that of any nation in the world; nor do I wish to have a Minister at the Congress, which Napoleon is to call to settle the maritime rights and secure the freedom of the sea. I have no faith that it will be done by him. Give him power on the water, and he will do as he has done on the land. Give Great Britain power on the land, and she will do as she has done on the water. But, above all, this weak bill produced the second Message of the President of the United States. If that Message has any bearing on the question, according to my weak understanding, it is most decidedly in favor of the bill; indeed it is not easy to conceive how the President with propriety could have said more
