Knowledge equity is in a danger!

We imagine a world in which every single human being can freely share in the sum of all knowledge. And we are working to create it!

But in our work we are not only enabled, but also limited by the technology we are using.

An important part of content of our articles is served by templates and modules. These are in fact small software pieces, which means that creating and maintaining them requires programming skills. Such technically experienced editors are pretty rare – even medium sized wiki can have only a couple of them. And small wikis often have non even one!

The combination of these factors makes it especially difficult for under-represented communities to participate fully and provide a high quality education content in their language.

But huge part of this problem can be solved!

Templates and modules could be usable on all wikis from a central repository.

It would be similar to images from Commons or data from Wikidata. The tech folks confirmed, that it is possible – now is needed only the political decision.

This revolution is called Global Templates.

Global Templates can be done with a bit of your support!

As Global Templates propose a significant change in how Wikimedia content creation would work, it is needed to know whether there is wide support of editors.
