What is referencing?

References uniquely identifies a source of information.
Why reference an article in Wikipedia?

• Wikipedia has a policy that all article content must be verifiable.

• Wikipedia is not a place for original work, archive findings without publications or evidence of sources that has not been published.
Two ways to start referencing an article:

- Visual Editor
- refToolbar

Ways to reference your article sources.

• Inline Citation
It is placed at the end of a given bit of your article to support that sentence, paragraph or a statement.

• General reference
This is a bibliographic citation, often placed at or near the end of an article, that is unconnected to any particular bit of material in an article, but which might support some or all of it.
Things to remember

• All information should cite reliable sources, such as published books, mainstream press publications, and reliable websites such as bbc.co.uk and allmusic.com.

• References are added directly after the facts they support.

• Your citation should use one method all through.

• When you are not sure whether a source is reliable, ask other editors on the reliable sources noticeboard.
