

Copyright,

When a creator creates a work, it is usually protected by copyright. You are not allowed to copy the work, unless you have the permission of the creator or the publisher the creator sold the rights to.

Copyright in general is a good thing. But copyright, licenses, patents and other restrictions can hinder progress and they have been extended more and more the last decades. If you want to use copyrighted works, it might be difficult to find the creator, or you have to pay much money – often even not to the creator, but to a publisher.

Luc Tuymans (*1958), Belgian painter: 'Foundations'. For obvious reasons, this painting cannot be shown here.

free licenses,

You want to publish a work in a way that others can use it under reasonable conditions? A license is a legal text that explains what is allowed to do with a work. Creative Commons is a non profit organisation that provides 'free licenses'. Many works published under a free license you can find on Wikimedia Commons, the media archive of Wikipedia.

For example, this is a photograph taken by Robin Müller. He published it referring to the free license CC-BY-SA. It is a Creative Commons license. You are allowed to use and copy and alter this picture, but you have to name the creator and the license. New works based on this (for example a collage of freely licensed pictures) must get the same license.

See for more information:
<http://commons.wikimedia.org>

This leaflet is produced by the Wikimedia Foundation

public domain

Works unprotected by copyright belong to the 'public domain'. You are absolutely free to use such works. Even if you would plagiarize them, you could not be taken responsible for copyright violations.

The US Government, for example, publishes works in the public domain, because the tax player has already payed for them. But to many creators, public domain is too radical. Totally unprotected works can be abusively taken by wrong doers and frauds.

Marianne von Werefkin (1860-1938): 'Plattfabrik'. The artist died more than seventy years ago, the painting is in the public domain.