I will, first, ask the attention of the House to the condition of the iron works in the district where I reside. In the county of Morris there are about forty establishments for the manufacture of bar iron—in all, about ninety forge fires; most of them are located upon one stream, a branch of the Passaic river. During the restrictive system, and whilst the war continued, these works were in a flourishing condition; the iron found a ready sale, and commanded a good price. At the close of the war, the large importations from Europe reduced the price below the actual cost of making it, and these works ceased. The owners petitioned Congress for relief, by additional duties on foreign iron. In the hope that aid would be granted, they struggled for existence, endeavoring to employ their workmen, rather than discharge them, although every ton of iron made was sold at a loss. In 1815 or 1816, Mr. Dallas, then Secretary of the Treasury, recommended an increase of the duty on foreign iron, to $15 per ton. But, such was the hostility to this important branch of industry, so strong was the joint influence of the merchants and planters, that, instead of advancing the duty, as Mr. Dallas had advised, they reduced it to forty-five cents per cwt. or nine dollars per ton. The consequence was, irretrievable ruin to the great body of iron-masters in every section of our country. Of the forty establishments before referred to, with the exception, perhaps, of four or five, the works have either been abandoned, or have changed owners. The few who withstood the shock, were men who had accumulated property whilst the business was profitable, and who, during the time of depressed prices, merely converted the surplus produce of their farms into cash, by the operations of their forges, following the iron business as a secondary employment; whilst every man who made it his principal concern, who sold his iron and purchased his provisions and stock, was ruined. His forge, his lands, his goods and chattles, were all struck off under the sheriff's hammer, at public auction. He himself was driven to jail; his workmen were unemployed; some of them followed their employer to the jail; some emigrated to new countries; their families were reduced to abject want, and compelled to ask relief from the town, or resort to beggary. The sound of the axe and the forge hammer was no longer heard from the mountains, where, but a few years before, all was life, and action, and gladness.

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the actual condition of these unfortunate people; a condition, not the result of their idleness or prodigality, but of the neglect of their own Government, which had looked on as an unconcerned spectator, upon the ruin of our own citizens, accomplished by the policy of foreign Governments.

About the year 1819, a duty of seventy-five cents per cwt. or $15 per ton, was imposed, under which act many of those works gradually revived, and, with the most rigid economy, their owners were enabled for a time to pursue the business. The general peace of Europe, the disbanding of about 600,000 men, so long employed in arms, had the effect of reducing the price of labor to so low a degree, as to enable the manufacturers in Sweden and Russia and England to undersell us. The importations of iron in 1821, 1822, and 1823, have been so enormous, as to drive American iron from our market. Our average import had been about 20,000 tons annually, but, in 1823, we imported 31,000 tons. Not a bar of American iron can now be sold in our cities, except at a dead loss to the manufacturer. Our citizens, employed in this business, have loaded your table with their memorials, stating their difficulties, and imploring relief. Will you turn a deaf ear to their distresses? Will you suffer these establishments to fall into utter decay? Will the Government be dependent on foreign nations for an article so essential to our national defence—so necessary for every purpose of agriculture? Will you look to Europe for your cannon and muskets, your swords and your ploughshares, your spears and pruning hooks? With your hills and mountains abounding with the richest iron ore on the globe, competent, not merely to supply your own wants, but amply adequate to supply the whole world; with fuel and water power in the vicinity of every mine, sufficient to prepare it for use, will you still look to England and Sweden and Russia, for this indispensable article? Will you transport it three and four thousand miles, merely to give employment to your surplus tonnage? To give your merchants the benefit of the freight, and a profit upon the purchase?

What is the objection to raising the duty on this article? It is said it will enhance the price to the consumer. I admit, Mr. Speaker, it may produce that effect for a limited period; but, in the end, the domestic competition will insure an abundant supply, and at a reasonable price. There is no greater fallacy, than the assertion, so often repeated, that increased duties always enhance the price of the article. On the contrary, I maintain that, when the Government has afforded a duty amounting to a protection from foreign importation, a reduction of price has followed. I would instance coarse cottons as a most conclusive and triumphant proof. In 1816, when the protective duty of twenty-five per cent. was enacted, with a minimum valuation of twenty-five cents per square yard, all the arguments which sophistry and mercantile cupidity could invent, were urged against the measure. All the gloomy predictions, now enforced against this bill, were arrayed. Commerce was to be destroyed; the Navy would be annihilated; the whole nation was to be taxed for the benefit of a few cotton spinners; the poor of the land would be compelled to pay double prices for the coarse garments they wore. The law, however, went into operation, and the coarse cottons of India were excluded. The trade in that article was cut off, and this is the only prediction in the whole catalogue which has been fulfilled. The wants of the country, in respect to coarse cottons, are most abundantly supplied; we produce, from the skill and industry of our own people, an article most essential to our comfort, of a quality vastly superior to any ever imported, and at a price greatly reduced. Sir, if this fact stood alone, it would speak volumes in favor of the policy of this bill. Gentlemen may tax their ingenuity as they please, to account for the success of this measure of national policy, and for the failure of their own predictions; they cannot mislead the public mind. The facts are apparent to the capacity of every man. But, sir, this is only one instance which goes to show the fallacy of the assertion, that increased duties augment the price to the consumer. I might enumerate the various articles manufactured from leather—as boots, shoes, harness, saddles, bridles—cabinet furniture, as chairs and tables—carriages, hats, nails, shovels, and spades, and various other articles, as furnishing conclusive evidence that, where Government has granted an adequate protective duty, to articles of prime necessity, the raw material of which is produced at home, domestic competition invariably produces an adequate supply, at prices generally not exceeding those of the imported articles, and frequently much lower, taking into calculation the quality of the goods.

Taking, then, experience as our guide, may we not expect the same results, in regard to iron? New mines of this valuable treasure are daily discovered, producing, in the greatest abundance, the best iron in the world. Protect your manufactures from being ruined by foreign importation; give them the supply of the home market, which will insure them a regular demand and a ready sale for the fruits of their industry. Let them progress gradually in perfecting their machinery, and in acquiring skill, which experience alone can give. The resources of our country, the enterprise and energy of our citizens, with our experience in relation to other subjects, all justify the conclusion that domestic competition will insure us a full supply, at reasonable prices, of an article so intimately connected with our national defence in war, and so essential to our agricultural, our manufacturing, and our commercial pursuits in peace.

Mr. BAYLIES opposed the amendment in a short speech.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to amend the amendment, by striking out one dollar and inserting eighty cents, as the duty per cwt., and supported his motion by a speech, in which he delivered at length his sentiments on the iron duty.

Mr. ARCHER followed, on the same side, in a speech of considerable extent.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke at length in favor of the duty of eighty cents.

Mr. TOD rose in reply, and, having spoken for some time, after he concluded,

Mr. KREMER called for the previous question.

The House, this time, sustained the call—ayes 98, noes 86.

The question, "Shall the main question be now put?" was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 111, nays 93, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Tennessee, Allison, Barber of Connecticut, J. S. The said main question was then put, to wit: "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" and passed in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 102, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Tennessee, Allison, Barber of Connecticut, Bartley, Beecher, Bradley, Brown, Buchanan, Buck, Buckner, Cady, Campbell of Ohio, Cassidy, Clark, Collins, Condict, Cook, Crafts, Craig, Durfee, Dwight, Eaton, Eddy, Ellis, Farrelly, Findlay, Forward, Garrison, Gazlay, Harris, Hayden, Hemphill, Henry, Herkimer, Holcombe, Houston, Jenkins, Johnson of Virginia, J. Stevenson, J. Stephenson, Taliaferro, Tattall, Thompson of Georgia, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Vance of North Carolina, Warfield, Webster, Whipple, Williams of New York, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of South Carolina.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being then stated, as to the day on which the bill should receive its third reading—

Mr. TOD moved that it have its third reading to-morrow.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that it have its third reading on Monday next, and supported the motion by a few remarks.

On this question a warm debate arose, in which Messrs. LIVINGSTON, MERCER, and WARFIELD, advocated, and Messrs. TOD, KREMER, METCALFE, and STORRS opposed the postponement.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The Chair pronounced this motion out of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS then, at the suggestion of Mr. RANDOLPH, moved that the third reading take place on the 4th of July next.

Mr. WRIGHT made some observations in explanation of the actual state of the question, in regard to the bill.

An unsuccessful motion was made to adjourn.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, moved that the bill be laid on the table.

The Chair pronounced this motion to be out of order, as the bill itself was not, at the present moment, before the House, and the only question before the House being the fixing of the day for a third reading.

The question was then taken on the 4th day of July next, as the day for the third reading, by yeas and nays—yeas 68, nays 131, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Archer, P. P. Barbour, J. S. Mr. RANDOLPH withdrew his motion for Monday, and the bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 15.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the petition of Dean Weymouth, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied with a report of the number of non-commissioned officers and privates of the marine corps, in the service of the United States, and where stationed or performing duty; also, a report of the amount paid to the Lieutenant Colonel of the marine corps the past year, for his monthly pay and emoluments of office, prepared in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th April instant.—Laid on the table.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. FLOYD, respecting transportation of private property in national vessels, purchases of naval stores abroad, &c., was taken up and agreed to, nem. con.

On motion of Mr. CALL, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a compensation to Joseph M. White and William Davidson, of Florida, for services rendered the United States, in the capacity of district attorney and marshal of the district of West Florida.

On motion of Mr. FRANCIS JOHNSON, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing Joseph Kingry, late a private in the service of the United States, on the pension roll.

APRIL, 1824.

Occupation of Columbia River.

H. OF R.

The resolution laid upon the table yesterday, by Mr. HAMILTON, was taken up, read, and again laid upon the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew;" "An act for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner;" "An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the district of Missouri;" "An act for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt;" and "An act for the relief of Thomas Hewes; in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, called for the consideration of the resolution proposed by him for fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress; and, on his motion, the question of consideration of this proposition was taken by yeas and nays.—The vote stood as follows: For considering it, 100; against considering it, 100.

The House being equally divided on the question, the SPEAKER voted thereupon in the negative.

So the House refused now to consider the said resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved—and there was no occasion, he presumed, for him to indicate the grounds of that motion—that when the House adjourns, it shall adjourn to meet on Saturday next. On this question Mr. TOD asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them. The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, and decided in the negative, without a division.

OCCUPATION OF COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee appointed on the 29th of December last, to inquire into the expediency of occupying the mouth of the Oregon or Columbia river; made a report thereon, which was read, and laid on the table. The report is as follows:

The committee to which was referred the resolution of the 29th day of December last, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of occupying the mouth of the Oregon or Columbia river, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave further to report: That they have considered the subject referred to them, and are persuaded, that, both in a military and commercial point of view, the occupation of that Territory is of great importance to the Republic; but, as much has been submitted to the House on these points, by former committees, they have now deemed it necessary only to present a view of the difficulties which would probably present themselves in accomplishing that object, and the manner in which they can be overcome.

To obtain information, a letter to this end was addressed to an officer of the Army, whose integrity in the public service is well known to the House, and whose military knowledge is entitled to the highest respect; that officer, Brigadier-General Thomas S. Jesup, answered so satisfactorily to the committee, that they have presented the answer, in its entire form, to the House, and adopt it as a part of this report.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 26, 1824.

SIR: In reply to your letter, dated the 30th ultimo, requesting me to communicate "any facts, views, or opinions, which may have presented themselves to me, relative to the probable difficulty of making an establishment at the mouth of Columbia river, and the military advantages of that establishment," I have the honor to remark, that, ever since my attention was first directed to the subject, I have considered the possession and military command of the Columbia necessary not only to the protection of the trade, but to the security of our Western frontier. That flank of our country, extending from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, is every where in contact with numerous, powerful, and warlike Indian nations; who, altogether, might be able to bring into the field, from twenty to thirty thousand warriors. Most of those nations communicate, either with the British to the North and West, or the Spaniards to the South. In the event of war, that force, with a few hundred foreign troops, or under the influence of foreign companies, might be made more formidable to us than any force which Europe combined could oppose to us. On the other hand, if such measures be adopted as to secure a proper influence over them, and, in the event of war, to command their co-operation, they, with the aid of a few small garrisons, would not only afford ample protection for that entire line, but would become the scourge of our enemies.

The dangers to be apprehended, can only be averted by proper military establishments; and whether the post at the mouth of Columbia be intended to secure our territory, protect our traders, or to cut off all communication between the Indians and foreigners, I should consider a line of posts extending from the Council Bluffs entirely across the continent necessary. Those posts should be situated, as well with a view to command the avenues through which the Indians pass from the north to the south, as to keep open communication with the establishment at the mouth of the Columbia.

A post should be established at the Mandan villages, because, there the Missouri approaches within a short distance of the British territory, and it would have the effect of holding in check the Hudson's Bay and Northwest Companies, and controlling the Riekarees, Mandans, Minnatarees, Assiniboins, and other Indians, who either reside or range on the territory east, north, and west of that point.

A post at, or near, the head of navigation on the Missouri, would control the Blackfoot Indians, protect our traders, enable us to remove those of the British companies from our territory, and serve as a depot, at which detachments moved towards the Columbia might either be supplied, or leave such stores as they should find it difficult to carry with them through the mountains. It might also be made a depot of trade, and of the Indian Department.

To keep open the communication through the mountains, there should be at least one small post at some convenient point between the Missouri and the Columbia, and on the latter river and its tributaries, there should be at least three posts. They would afford present protection to our traders, and, on the expiration of the privilege granted to British subjects to trade on the waters of the Columbia, would enable us to remove them from our territory, and to secure the whole to our own citizens. They would also enable us to preserve peace among the Indians, and, in the event of foreign war, to command their neutrality or their assistance, as we might think most advisable.

H. OF R.

Indian Reservations in Georgia.

APRIL, 1824.

The posts designated, might be established and maintained, at an additional annual expense not exceeding forty thousand dollars.

By extending to those posts the system of cultivation, now in operation at the Council Bluffs, the expense of supplying them would, in a few years, be greatly diminished. Mills might be erected at all the posts at a trifling expense, and, the whole country abounding in grass, all the domestic animals necessary, either for labor or subsistence, might be supported. This would render the establishment more secure, and, consequently, more formidable to the Indian nations in their vicinity.

As to the proposed posts on the Columbia, it is believed they might be supplied immediately at a low rate. Wheat may be obtained at New California, at about twenty-five cents per bushel, and beef cattle at three or four dollars each. Salt, in any quantity required, may be had at an island near the Peninsula of California. Should transportation not be readily obtained for those articles, vessels might be constructed by the troops.

To obtain the desired advantages, it is important, not only that we occupy the posts designated, but that we commence our operations without delay. The British companies are wealthy and powerful; their establishments extend from Hudson's Bay and Lake Superior to the Pacific; many of them within our territory. It is not to be supposed they would surrender those advantages without a struggle, and, though they should not engage in hostilities themselves, they might render all the Indians, in that extensive region, hostile.

The detachment intended to occupy the mouth of Columbia might leave the Council Bluffs in June, and one hundred and fifty men proceed with the boats and stores; and, as the country is open, and abounds with grass, the remaining fifty might proceed by land, with the horses intended for the transportation across the mountains, and might drive three or four hundred beaves to the Mandan villages or to the falls of Missouri; at one of those places the parties should unite and spend the winter. The latter would be preferable, because there they might be able to establish a friendly intercourse with the Blackfoot Indians, or, at all events, by impressing them with an idea of the power of the nation, restrain their depredations upon the neighboring tribes, and deter them from acts of outrage upon our traders. They might, also, during the winter, reconnoitre the several passes through the mountains, prepare provisions necessary to support them on the march, and down the Columbia; and, if authorized to do so, remove from our territories all British traders on the waters of the Missouri. They would necessarily remain at, or in the vicinity of, their wintering ground, until June, but might be occupied during the months of April and May, in opening a road to the mountains, and constructing bridges over the numerous streams on the route. This work performed, they might, in about twenty days, reach the navigable waters of Clark's river, a branch of the Columbia, and, in ten days more, prepare transportation to descend to their destination, where, after every necessary allowance for accidents and delays, they would certainly arrive by the month of August.

The vessels employed to transport the stores by sea, might leave the United States in the month of November, and would arrive at the mouth of Columbia in April, at least four months before the detachment from the Council Bluffs could reach that point; and, unless the ships should be detained during that time, which could not be expected, the stores would be exposed to damage and depredation, and perhaps, by the time the troops should arrive, would be entirely destroyed. It would, therefore, seem to me a measure of prudence, that at least one company of artillery be transported with the stores. That description of force would be found necessary at the post, and the ships would afford them ample accommodation.

That the route from the Council Bluffs to the mouth of Columbia is practicable, has been proved by the enterprise of more than one of our citizens. It, no doubt, presents difficulties; but difficulties are not impossibilities. We have only to refer to the pages of our history to learn that many operations, infinitely more arduous, have been accomplished by Americans. The march of Arnold to Quebec, or of General Clark to Vincennes, during the Revolutionary war, exceeded greatly in fatigue, privation, difficulty, and danger, the proposed operation; and I believe I may say, without fear of contradiction, that the detachment might be supplied, during the whole route, with less difficulty than in the war of 1756 was experienced in supplying the forces operating under General Washington, and General Braddock, against the French and Indians, on the Ohio.

A post at the mouth of Columbia is important, not only in relation to the interior trade, and the military defence of the western section of the Union, but, also, in relation to the naval power of the nation. Naval power consists, not in ships, but in seamen; and, to be efficient, the force must always be available. The northwest coast of America is an admirable nursery for seamen—many of our best sailors are formed there; without a naval station, however, on the Pacific, the force employed in the whale fishery, as well as in sealing, and the northwest trade, would, in the event of war, with a great maritime Power, be, in some measure, lost to the nation. But, that establishment made, it would afford a secure retreat to all our ships and seamen in that section of the globe; and the force, thus concentrated, might be used with effect against the trade, if not the fleets or possessions of the enemy, in place of being driven to the Atlantic, or perhaps captured on their way.

The establishment might be considered as a great bastion, commanding the whole line of coast to the North and South; and it would have the same influence on that line which the bastions of a work have on its curtains; for the principles of defence are the same, whether applied to a small fortress, or to a line of frontier, or even an entire section of the globe. In the one case, the missiles used are bullets and cannon shot; in the other, ships and fleets.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

TH. S. JESUP.

Hon. J. FLOYD, House of Representatives.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the select committee to which was referred the President's Message of the 30th of March, 1824, relating to the execution of so much of the compact of 1802 between the United States and the State of Georgia, as relates to the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within that State; also, a memorial of the Legislature of the said State; made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

APRIL, 1824.

Indian Reservations in Georgia.

H. OF R.

The select committee, to whom was referred the President's Message, of the 30th of March, with the documents accompanying it, relating to the compact of 1802, between the United States and the State of Georgia, submit to the House, on that Message; and on the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, also referred to them, the following report:

The State of Georgia claimed, on the establishment of the independence of the United States, all the lands now forming the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, with the exception of those portions of the two last States which formed a part of Florida and Louisiana.

This claim was founded upon the charter of incorporation of the proprietary government; on the Royal commissions issued to the Governors of the State, after the proprietors had surrendered their charter to the Crown. The claim was disputed by South Carolina and by the United States. The conflicting claims of South Carolina and Georgia were adjusted by a convention between them, in 1787. The United States recognised, by the treaty with Spain of the year 1795, the claim of Georgia, having refused, in 1788, a cession from the State, on account of the remoteness of the lands, and of the terms proposed by Georgia.

In April, 1798, Congress passed a law in relation to the western part of the territory of Georgia, with a reservation of the rights of Georgia to the jurisdiction and soil.

In May, 1800, another act was passed, containing a similar reservation.

In December, 1800, Georgia remonstrated against these acts, as a violation of her right of sovereignty and soil. The compact of 1802 put an end to the disputes which were likely to arise out of this collision between the General and State Governments. By this compact, the United States obtained a surrender of the right of Georgia to the sovereignty and soil of two States, containing, by estimate, eighty-six millions of acres of land, for the paltry consideration of the payment of $1,280,000 out of the proceeds of that land, and of a promise to extinguish the Indian title to the land within the territorial limits not ceded to the United States, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms. The execution of this compact produced no change in the right of Georgia to the sovereignty and soil of the land within her newly defined boundaries. Its only effect was to throw upon the United States the expense which might attend the extinguishment of the Indian title, an expense which, but for this compact, must have been borne by the State. Nor did this compact, in the slightest circumstance, add to the title of the Indians; it recognised only the claim which they, as Indians, were allowed to have, according to the usages of the States, and the liberal policy adopted towards them by the General Government.

In relation to the Cherokees, the principal topic of the President's Message, it would appear that new doctrines are permitted to be entertained of them, in the opinion of the committee neither consistent with the opinions heretofore entertained, with the practices of the Government, nor with the interests of the Union. The Cherokees claim to be an independent tribe. The President avows the belief that the articles of cession of 1802 is a full proof that the Indians had a right to the territory, in the disposal of which they were to be regarded as free agents.

The acts of the General Government, in 1814, in relation to the Creeks; the language of the President of the United States, in 1817; the language of the Secretary of War, in 1818; of the agent of the Government in that year, in treating with the Cherokees; of the agent treating with them in 1823, does not correspond with the opinions now expressed.

In 1814, General Jackson, acting under the authority of the Government, took from the Creek Indians, for an equivalent named by himself, all the land the United States chose to require, to effect a great object of national policy in regard to the Indian tribes. It cannot be alleged that this was done by virtue of conquest. The letter of the late Indian agent, Colonel Hawkins, of the 11th of August, 1815, laid before the House of Representatives on the 5th of April, 1824, shows that nearly eight millions of acres were taken from the friendly Indians, (our allies in the war,) over and above all the hunting grounds of the upper friendly Creeks, for what was called an equivalent, but which the Indians did not deem such.

In 1817, in his Message at the opening of Congress, the President says, "the hunter state can exist only in the vast uncultivated desert. It yields to the more dense and compact form, and greater force of civilized population; and, of right, it ought to yield, for the earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it was capable, and no tribe or people have a right to withhold, from the wants of others, more than is necessary for their own support and comfort."

In a letter of the 29th July, 1818, the Secretary of War says to Mr. McMinn, speaking of the attempts to prevent the Cherokees from going to Arkansas, "the United States will not permit the treaty to be defeated by such means. Those who choose to remain are permitted to do so in quiet—those who choose to emigrate, must be equally free." And further: "It is vain for the Cherokees to hold the high tone which they do, as to their independence as a nation, for daily proof is exhibited that, were it not for the protecting arm of the United States, they would become the victims of fraud and violence." Mr. McMinn tells the Cherokees, in conformity with this declaration, in his talk to the chiefs, of the 23d of November, 1818, "It must surely be, my brothers, that you view me as an impostor, acting upon my own authority, with a view to deceive the nation, or that you flatter yourselves with the empty expectation that the United States cannot execute a measure of general defence for the safety of her citizens, which shall, in the slightest degree, affect your interest or your wishes." The agents of 1823 assert an unqualified right in the United States to take from the Indians any of their lands for public use. It is asserted, however, by the Secretary of War, that there were treaties existing with the Cherokees, in 1802, which guaranteed their lands. These guarantees were only of the Indian title, as understood by all at the date of the execution of these treaties—a title of mere occupancy, for the purposes of hunting.

The idea of title to the soil was, until lately, unknown to the Indians. Their lands were overrun by them, not inhabited; their rights not transferred, but extinguished, dependent upon the will of the power to whom the sovereignty over them belongs. This sovereign power was Georgia, prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution gave to the United States the authority to manage the affairs of the Indians, for the peace of the Union, and the eventual benefit of Georgia. The Indians had mere occupation; the United States were the agents of Georgia for the extinguishment of this allowed possession. The compact of 1802, required this to be effected out of the general fund. No act of the United States, nor of the Indians, nor of both, could, without her consent, impair the rights of Georgia to the jurisdiction and soil of the territory in question, whenever the Indians should be removed from it, by accident, by contract, or by force. This doctrine is confirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which has declared sales made by States, of Indian territory, valid, prior to the extinguishment of Indian title: That there is a species of seizin in fee, which enables a State to grant to individuals. In fact, the compact of 1802 is the acknowledgment of the United States of this doctrine, as their only title to the soil of Alabama and Mississippi is founded upon it. The Secretary of War, in his attention to the treaties guarantying the Indian title, has entirely omitted to notice the first and most important document in relation to this subject, the Treaty of Hopewell, of 1785—a document sustaining the opinion of the committee, and giving to it, what is now deemed important, the sanction of Indian acquiescence. The fourth article of the Treaty of Hopewell, is, “the boundary allotted to the Cherokees for their hunting grounds, is, and shall be, the following:” The Indians acknowledge, by that treaty, the United States as their sovereign; and, by the 9th article, Congress assumes, for the interest and comfort of the Indians, the power to regulate their trade, and manage all their affairs as they may deem proper. This treaty existed at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and Georgia, as a member of the Union, was vested with the sovereignty and soil of the Cherokee lands, subject only to the Indian right of hunting within the allotted limits, which right, the General Government was bound to extinguish as early as the general convenience would permit.

The duty of the General Government was to do all acts which would accelerate this event; to refrain from all acts which would retard it. Over the territories of the United States, the General Government could rightfully exercise unlimited power, in relation to the Indian tribes. Within a particular State, the sole power was that of agency, for the preservation of peace, the regulation of trade, and the extinguishment of title. To this general obligation, imposed by the Constitution on all the States, a special promise was added in favor of Georgia, in 1802; partially executed; but, to the complete execution of which, difficulties are alleged to exist, which require the interposition of the power of Congress.

How far this promise has been complied with, is attempted to be shown, by two documents, marked A and B, sent to Congress by the President. By the document A, it appears that the Indian title to 15,744,000 acres has been extinguished; and that there remains 10,240,000 acres yet in their possession, as hunting grounds. The first quantity is alleged to be all that could be peaceably obtained on reasonable terms.

The document No. 1, accompanying this report, will show that, since 1802, the United States have been able to obtain, for their own use, more than 30,000,000 of acres in Alabama and Mississippi, in addition to 7,633,400 obtained in 1801; to 5,006,880 obtained for Tennessee, by treaty, from the Chickasaw Indians, subsequently confirmed by a treaty with the Cherokees: 700,000 for North Carolina; and a quantity, an estimate of which is not in the hands of the committee, for South Carolina. No satisfactory explanation is afforded to show how this difference in the quantity of lands procured by the United States, for their own account, and in compliance with their promise to Georgia, has occurred.

The document B is intended to show the expense incurred in the execution of the compact of 1802. It is defective and delusive. It contains no credit for the money received at the treasury of Georgia, viz: the Yazoo fund, $184,515 94. It is omitted to be stated that the $1,250,000 was paid out of the proceeds of the property acquired. It charges the Yazoo compromise as a benefit to Georgia, who had no interest in the settlement but a common interest with the other States. The land procured for the Cherokees, on the Arkansas, is charged at the minimum value of lands surveyed and offered for sale by the United States, and not at its trifling actual cost, about twenty-five thousand dollars.

The committee are at a loss to know what bearing this defective document has on the question of the Cherokee lands. As, however, they presume it has a relation not well understood, they conceive it proper to show, by the statement No. 2, what pecuniary advantages have accrued, and will accrue, to the United States, under the compact with Georgia. By this statement, it appears that $4,512,860 23, exclusive of Mississippi stock, have been received into the public Treasury; that $6,444,821 51 are due from sales made; that the land ceded by the Indians, and not yet sold, is 27,588 800 acres, which, at the minimum price, is $34,486,000. That there remains yet, as hunting grounds for the Indians, 22,977,576 acres.

The balance of profit is sufficiently with the United States to justify contracts for the extinguishment of Indian title for the benefit of Georgia, without great scrutiny as to the amount of expense incurred. The committee agree with the Secretary of War, “that no opportunity of extinguishing the Indian title, on reasonable terms, has been neglected by the General Government,” for its own use; but they do not perceive that the same zeal has been successfully exerted for the State of Georgia. The treaty of 1814, with the Creeks, was dictated by General Jackson to the Creeks, by order of the Department of War. As has been already seen, a large territory was taken from the Creeks.

The policy of the United States, as explained by the Secretary, required a separation of the tribes of Indians from each other, and from the ocean. To this policy a compliance with the promise to Georgia was sacrificed. It is alleged that the obligation to Georgia extends only to the purchase of lands, &c. The term purchase is an interpolation; it is not found in the articles of cession of 1802. It is alleged, also, that this land was obtained by conquest, and therefore the nation was at liberty, laying the contract with Georgia out of view, to pursue its plan of policy. Without entering into any considerations to show that the United States, having obtained, by force not used for that purpose, but defensively, the opportunity to extinguish the Indian title within the limits of Georgia, was bound, in good faith, to use it, it is deemed sufficient to refer the House to the facts, disclosed by the extract from Colonel Hawkins's letter, already quoted,

APRIL, 1824.

Indian Reservations in Georgia.

H. OF R.

that this acquisition by conquest was an acquisition of lands from friends and allies, for an equivalent named by the United States.

The propriety of accommodating the State of Georgia was suggested to the commissioner of the United States by the Indian agent; but the answer was, that the instructions from the Government would not permit a compliance with this suggestion. The committee are of opinion that an acquisition of land to Georgia, to any extent, could have been obtained from the Creeks in 1814. The attention of Congress has been called to the arrangements made with the Cherokees in 1817 and 1819. The arrangement of 1817 was for the purpose of carrying into effect the wishes of the Cherokees, as declared to Mr. Jefferson in 1808, by a deputation from the upper and lower towns. According to the preamble of the arrangement of 1817, the upper towns desired to remain fixed above the Hiwassee river, to contract their society within narrow limits, and begin the establishment of fixed laws and a regular government. The lower towns desired to continue the hunter life, and for that purpose wished to remove across the Mississippi. The wishes of the upper and lower towns were granted, and arrangements made for the removal of the latter across the Mississippi. No line was drawn between the upper and lower towns, although a request was made of the Indians that it should be done by the United States. The arrangement of 1817 provides for the fulfilment of the wishes expressed in 1808, and the promises of the Government of 1809. The wishes of the lower towns was a removal beyond the Mississippi, of the upper, a contraction of their society within narrower limits. By the 3d and 4th articles, it was agreed that a census should be taken of the population beyond the Mississippi, and of those who chose to emigrate thither; and a census of those who chose to remain in their present location. The territory occupied by them on this side of the Mississippi was to be divided according to the relative numbers of those who had migrated, and would migrate, to the remainder; and that portion which fell to the migrators was to be received by the United States in place of the lands furnished to the Cherokees beyond the Mississippi. From this plan, the extinguishment of the title of the Cherokee Indians was anticipated, and would have taken place had it been executed in its spirit by the General Government. It appears, however, that the census was never taken, and that, in 1819, a deputation of Cherokees was permitted to come to Washington to adjust, finally, the difficulties arising out of the treaty of 1817. The lower Cherokee towns, in the limits of Georgia, did not remove beyond the Mississippi. Most of the removals took place from the upper towns, out of the limits of Georgia. In place of the proportion of lands to be abandoned, according to the treaty of 1817, a fixed quantity was accepted, a very small and worthless part of which is in Georgia.

It is alleged by the Secretary of War that the desire of Government was, to have a cession in such form as would separate the Creeks and Cherokees; but that it was found impossible to induce the Cherokees to yield to that proposition, or to any other more favorable to Georgia, than that which was adopted. He does not, however, state that any other was made, with a view to comply with the compact of 1802. The proposition made for the separation of the Creeks and Cherokees, was not for the benefit of Georgia, had it been acceded to, although the interests of the State would have been more advanced than by the actual arrangement; yet, even in that case, the United States would have sacrificed the obligations of the compact to the policy of separating the Indian tribes, and to the consequent acquisition of lands for their own use in the State of Alabama. The committee cannot understand why a cession of the whole quantity of land in Georgia could not have been obtained. The obligation of the Indians was simple—a line, a boundary—and the United States had only to insist upon fixing that boundary, according to the preamble of the arrangement of 1817. The Secretary of War, however, states that the Indians will not yield, and it seems that the United States did yield. It is obvious to the committee that the interest of Georgia was considered a mere secondary object, from the terms of the arrangement of 1819. The preamble to that arrangement is a satisfactory evidence of the entire forgetfulness of the obligations of the compact of 1802.

The treaty is made in consequence of the earnest desire of a great part of the Cherokee nation to remain on this side of the Mississippi, to commence the measures necessary to the civilization and preservation of the nation. The committee are surprised that the occasion was not taken to satisfy the Indians that their continuance in Georgia was impossible, unless Georgia consented to it, and still more so, that the Indians should be encouraged, by this preamble of a treaty, made at the Seat of Government, under the eyes of the President, to entertain that expectation. The treaty of 1817, and that of 1819, show a strange forgetfulness of the limited extent of the power of the United States over the land in question. The Secretary of War, acting under the direction of the Executive Magistrate, and pursuing the example set in 1817, seems to have imagined that the United States and the Indians could do, lawfully, whatever suited their mutual convenience, without regard to the State of Georgia; an error which had been previously committed in treaties with the Creeks. No difference was made between Indian lands within the limits of the State claiming the eventual jurisdiction and soil, and the Indian lands where the soil is the property of the United States. Provisions are made, in both treaties, for vesting individuals with fee simple titles to land, and to convert them, by a short process, into citizens. The right of the United States to do either is absolutely denied by the committee. The General Government can take the property of individuals for public use, but the Constitution withholds the power even to prejudice the claims of any State. Congress can establish an uniform rule of naturalization; the Executive Magistrate cannot make, by an Indian treaty, special exceptions to the established rule. The effect of such acts on the part of the General Government was to be anticipated. The Indians were taught the value of separate property, and the advantages to be obtained by a continuance in their present position. The General Government authorized, also, the establishment of missionaries among the Cherokees, to instruct their children, and to give them a taste for the cultivation of the soil. The committee are not informed that the influence acquired by these missionaries has been exerted to induce the Indians to seek a residence beyond the Mississippi, nor are they informed that the Government has ever thought it necessary to impose upon them such a task. The committee are not to be understood as expressing any disapprobation of the policy of the United States for the civilization of the Indian tribes; they confine themselves to the policy, as it has affected the performance of the promises of the United States, under the compact of 1802. As it relates to that compact, they express their decided conviction that the attempts which have been made to civilize, and permanently fix, the Cherokees in Georgia, is in direct violation of the promise to extinguish their title, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms; nor do the committee perceive the necessity of holding out the idea of permanent settlement in Georgia, as a prelude to the establishment of a regular government for the Indians. As it regards expense, it would certainly be, for the United States, the cheapest mode of effecting this object, as the cost would be paid by Georgia, and the United States would be saved from the onerous obligation of removing the Indians for the benefit of that State; a saving of expense which, however, the United States will not desire, as it involves a breach of their faith.

From the circumstances thus detailed, the House will not be surprised at the present pretensions of the Cherokees, to be regarded as independent, or their declarations, that they will neither sell nor quit the lands occupied by them. Some surprise cannot but be felt at the acquiescence of the United States in the substitution of diplomatic correspondence for Indian talks, and at the manner in which the subject of the Cherokees is presented to Congress. The Legislature of Georgia, at their last session, sent to the Chief Magistrate a memorial on the subject of the compact of 1802. The President of the United States has not laid that memorial before Congress, but has preferred to present to the Legislative body a correspondence of the Secretary of War with certain Cherokee chiefs, which begins, on their part, by a declaration that they would sell no more land; contains a request that no more appropriations should be made for that purpose; and a suggestion that the United States should, in some other way, satisfy Georgia, as, by a cession in Florida. To the formal answer of the Secretary of War, a rejoinder is given, and, on this rejoinder, Congress are informed that its power must be exerted, as it is obvious that the Executive can do nothing further without the intervention of Congress. The President has given his opinion, that the use of force would be unjust, and that without force nothing can be done. What should be done by Congress, is a subject of the most serious and important concern. The parties to the compact of 1802 anticipated the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands in Georgia. The United States agreed to extinguish it, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms. The compact imposed upon the General Government the obligation to use all the means necessary to accomplish the end in view. It was especially their duty to refrain from doing any thing calculated even to retard, much less to render impracticable, the attainment of that end. If the committee have not deceived themselves, it must be apparent, that the United States have omitted to embrace two occasions, when a fuller performance of the conditions of the compact was in their power. It is equally apparent that the United States have not only omitted to express constantly, and with firmness, to the Cherokees, the necessity of their ultimate removal from Georgia, but have held out to them the idea of a permanent residence, as citizens, in that State; have taught them the value of their position, and intimated, that it depended upon themselves, to remain or to remove; have attempted to vest, in individuals, a permanent property in the soil. From these causes, every day increasing in their effect upon the inclination of the Cherokees, have arisen the determination of the Cherokees, as made known to the President. It is the policy of the United States which has created the difficulties; if peaceable acquisition is impossible, that impossibility is the work of the General Government.

In this state of things, encountering contradictory obligations, the course for the Government is plain and obvious. Justice should be done to Georgia. The Indian claim should be extinguished, even should force be required for that purpose; or the consent of the State must be obtained to some arrangement, which will free the United States from the embarrassments arising from its regard to the unhappy condition of the Indians, from a respect to the expectations they have erroneously permitted this tribe to entertain, and from their formal and solemn obligation to a member of the Union.

The committee do not, however, believe that any serious difficulty now exists, to the peaceable extinguishment of the Indian title, on reasonable terms. An order from the General Government for their removal, would be cheerfully acquiesced in, if accompanied by the necessary preparation for the prosperity of the tribe, and a just equivalent for the temporary inconveniences they might suffer. The committee agree with the President, that it would promote essentially the security and happiness of the tribes of Indians, if they could be prevailed on to retire beyond the limits of the States; but, they cannot see the injustice of any measure, short of actual hostility, which would essentially promote the security and happiness of the Cherokees. There is another consideration which should be brought into view; the only plausible objections to the proposed order, is its injustice, and inhumanity, to the Indians. That it is just to promote their essential security and happiness, even by means not agreeable to their wishes, cannot be denied; that it is humane to preserve them from dangers, to which they will be exposed, by an obstinate adherence to their own opinions, is equally true. Their present position is incompatible with the claims of the State of Georgia; the knowledge of the fact, that the United States will not, in consequence of the perverseness of the Cherokees, comply with the obligations of the compact of 1802, will necessarily produce irritations and resentments, the consequences of which may be easily foreseen. The United States may be under the fatal necessity of seeing the Cherokees annihilated, or of defending them against their own citizens. The committee offer to the House the following resolutions, under a full conviction that the adoption of them will not be followed by any consequences injurious to the Cherokee tribe, or to the character of the General Government for justice and humanity.

Resolved, That the United States are bound, by their obligations to Georgia, to take, immediately, the necessary measures for the removal of the Cherokee Indians beyond the limits of that State:

Resolved, That such an arrangement with the State of Georgia should be made, as may lead to the final adjustment of the claims of that State, under the compact of 1802, with the least possible inconvenience to the Cherokee and Creek Indians, within the boundary of the State.

Resolved, That the sum of ——— dollars should be appropriated for the purposes expressed in the above resolutions.

APRIL, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to refer the report to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

To this reference, Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, objected, as giving to this subject an undue preference over other business earlier introduced into the House.

In reply to this objection, Mr. FORSYTH said, among other things, that, if gentlemen had examined the documents connected with this report, they would have seen, that a state of irritation exists, which requires to be allayed, or it would require something stronger than resolutions of this House to allay it.

Mr. LITTLE supported the reference to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as being most proper for a subject which might be considered as of national magnitude, &c.

Mr. ALLEN said his reason for objecting to this reference was, that he was unwilling that the claims of individuals, which have been long pending in this House, and were now in an advanced stage, should be postponed in order to take up a claim which has been but recently introduced into the House, and on which, until this morning, a report had not been made. The present session, he thought, was now too far advanced to go into an investigation of this new matter.

The question was then taken on Mr. FORSYTH's motion for a reference, and decided in the affirmative—82 votes to 75.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The engrossed bill to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports and tonnage, was then read a third time; and the question being stated, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, addressed the Chair. I am, said he, practising no deception upon myself, much less upon the House, when I say that, if I had consulted my own feelings and inclinations, I should not have troubled the House, exhausted as it is, and as I am, with any further remarks upon this subject. I come to the discharge of this task, not merely with reluctance, but with disgust; jaded, worn down, abraded, I may say, as I am by long attendance upon this body, and continued stretch of the attention upon this subject. I come to it, however, at the suggestion, and in pursuance of the wishes of those whose wishes are for me in all matters touching my public duty, paramount law; I speak with those reservations, of course, which every moral agent must be supposed to make to himself.

It was not more to his surprise than to his disappointment, Mr. R. said, that, on his return to the House, after a necessary absence of a few days, on indispensable business, he found it engaged in discussing the general principle of the bill, when its details were under consideration. If he had expected such a turn in the debate he would, at any private sacrifice, however great, have remained a spectator and auditor of that discussion. With the exception of the speech, already published, of his worthy colleague on his right, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) Mr. R. said, he was nearly deprived of the benefit of the discussion which had taken place. Many weeks had been occupied with this bill (he hoped the House would pardon him for saying so) before he took the slightest part in the deliberations on the details, and he now sincerely regretted that he had not had firmness enough to adhere to the resolution which he had laid down to himself in the early stage of the debate, not to take any part in the discussion of the details of the measure.* But, as he trusted, what he now had to say upon this subject, although more and better things had been said by others, might not be the same that they had said, or might not be said in the same manner, he here borrowed the language of a man who had heretofore been conspicuous in the councils of the country; of one who was unrivalled for readiness and dexterity in debate; who was long without an equal on the floor of this body; who had contributed as much to the revolution of 1801 as any man in this nation,† and had derived as little benefit from it; as, to use the words of that celebrated man, what he had to say was not that which had been said by others, and would not be said in their manner, the House would, he trusted, have patience with him during the short time that his strength would allow him to occupy their attention. And he begged them to understand, that the notes which he held in his hands were not notes on which he meant to speak, but of what others had spoken, and from which he would make the smallest selection in his power.

Here permit me to say, observed Mr. R., that I am obliged, and with great reluctance, to differ from my worthy colleague, who has taken so conspicuous a part in this debate, about one fact, which I will call to his recollection, for I am sure it was in his memory, though sleeping. He has undertaken to state the causes by which the difference in the relative condition of various parts of the Union has been produced; but my worthy colleague has omitted to state the primum mobile of the commerce and manufactures to which a portion of the country I need not name owes its present prosperity and wealth. That primum mobile was Southern capital. I speak now not of transactions quorum pars minima fuit, but of things of which, nevertheless, I have a contemporaneous recollection. I say, without the fear of contradiction, then, that, in consequence of the enormous depreciation of the evidences of the public debt of this country—the debt proper of the United States (to which must be added an item of not less than twenty millions of dollars, for the State debts assumed by the United States) being bought up and almost engrossed by the people of what were then called the Northern States—a measure which nobody dreamt any thing about, or which nobody had the slightest suspicion—I mean the assumption of the State debts by the Federal Government; these debts being bought up for a mere song, a capital of eighty millions of dollars, or, in other words, a credit to that amount, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, (with the exception of nineteen millions, the interest of that debt, which bore an interest of three per cent.,) (see note 2, Appendix)—a capital of eighty millions of dollars was poured, in a single day, into the coffers of the North; and to that cause we may mainly ascribe the difference so disastrous to the South, between that country and the other portion of this Union, to which I have alluded. When we, said Mr. R., roused by the sufferings of our brethren of Boston, entered into the contest with the mother country, and when we came out of it—when this Constitution was adopted, we were comparatively rich—they were positively poor. What is now our relative situation? They are flourishing and rich; we are tributary to them, not only through the medium of the public debt of which I have spoken, but also through the medium of the pension list, nearly the whole amount of which is disbursed in the Eastern States; and to this creation of a day is to be ascribed the difference of our relative situation, (I hope my worthy colleague will not consider any thing that I say as conflicting with his general principles, to which I heartily subscribe.) (Note 3, of Appendix.) Yes, sir, and the price paid for the creation of all that portion of this capital, which consisted of the assumed debts of the States, was the immense boon of fixing the Seat of Government where it now is. And I advert to this bargain, because I wish to show to every member of this House, and, if it were possible, to every individual of this nation, the most tremendous and calamitous results of political bargaining.

* By so doing, many of Mr. R.'s strongest objections to the bill were in a manner dissipated, there being no report of these skirmishes. Some of them, with which he thought it indecent again to trouble the House, will be found (substantially) appended to this speech.

Sir, when are we to have enough of this Tariff question? In 1816 it was supposed to be settled. Only three years thereafter, another proposition for increasing it was sent from this House to the Senate, baited with a tax of four cents per pound on brown sugar. It was, fortunately, rejected in that body. In what manner this bill is baited it does not become me to say; but I have too distinct a recollection of the vote in Committee of the Whole, on the duty upon molasses, and afterwards of the vote in the House on the same question; of the votes of more than one of the States on that question, not to mark it well. I do not say that the change of the vote on that question was effected by any man's voting against his own motion, but I do not hesitate to say that it was effected by one man's electioneering against his own motion. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that old Massachusetts Bay, and the Province of Maine and Sagadahock, by whom we stood in the days of the Revolution, now stand by the South, and will not aid in fixing on us this system of taxation, compared with which the taxation of Mr. Grenville and Lord North was as nothing. I speak with knowledge of what I say, when I declare, that this bill is an attempt to reduce the country South of Mason and Dixon's line, and East of the Allegany mountains, to a state of worse than colonial bondage; a state to which the domination of Great Britain was, in my judgment, far preferable; and I trust I shall always have the fearless integrity to utter any political sentiment which the head sanctions and the heart ratifies; for the British Parliament never would have dared to lay such duties on our imports, or their exports to us, either "at home" or here, as is now proposed to be laid upon the imports from abroad. At that time we had the command of the market of the vast dominions then subject, and we should have had those which have since been subjected to the British empire; we enjoyed a free trade, eminently superior to any thing we can enjoy if this bill shall go into operation. It is a sacrifice of the interests of a part of this nation to the ideal benefit of the rest. It marks us out as the victims of a worse than Egyptian bondage. It is a barter of so much of our rights, of so much of the fruits of our labor, for political power to be transferred to other hands. It ought to be met, and I trust it will be met, in the southern country, as was the Stamp act, and by all those measures, which I will not detain the House by recapitulating, which succeeded the Stamp act, and produced the final breach with the mother country, which it took about ten years to bring about; as I trust in my conscience, it will not take as long to bring about similar results from this measure, should it become a law.

All policy is very suspicious, says an eminent statesman, that sacrifices the interest of any part of the community to the ideal good of the whole; and those governments only are tolerable where, by the necessary construction of the political machine, the interest of all the parts are obliged to be protected by it. Here is a district of country extending from the Patapsco to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Allegany to the Atlantic, a district which, taking in all that part of Maryland lying south of the Patapsco and east of Elk river, raises five-sixths of all the exports of this country that are of home growth—I have in my hand the official statements, which prove it, but which I will not weary the House by reading, (see Appendix, note 4.)—in all this country. Yes, sir, and I bless God for it; for, with all the fantastic and preposterous theories about the rights of man, (the theories, not the rights themselves, I speak of,) there is nothing but power that can restrain power—I bless God that, in this insulted, oppressed, and outraged region, we are, as to our counsels in regard to this measure, but as one man; that there exists on the subject but one feeling and one interest. We are proscribed, and put to the ban; and if we do not feel, and feeling do not act, we are bastards to those fathers who achieved the Revolution; then shall we deserve to make our bricks without straw. There is no case on record in which a proposition like this, suddenly changing the whole frame of a country's polity, tearing asunder every ligature of the body politic, was ever carried by a lean majority of two or three votes, unless it be the usurpation of the Septennial act, which passed the British Parliament by, I think, a majority of one vote, the same that laid the tax on cotton bagging. I do not stop here, sir, to argue about the constitutionality of this bill; I consider the Constitution a dead letter; I consider it to consist, at this time, of the power of the General Government and the power of the States—that is the Constitution. You may intrench yourself in parchment to the teeth, says Lord Chatham, the sword will find its way to the vitals of the Constitution. I have no faith in parchment, sir; I have no faith in the abracadabra of the Constitution; I have no faith in it. I have faith in the power of that Commonwealth, of which I am an unworthy son; in the power of those Carolinas, and of that Georgia, in her ancient and utmost extent, to the Mississippi, which went with us through the valley of the shadow of death, in the war of our independence. I have said that I shall not stop to discuss the constitutionality of this question, for that reason, and for a better; that there never was a constitution under the sun, in which, by an unwise exercise of the powers of the government, the people may not be driven to the extremity of resistance by force. "For it is not, perhaps, so much by the assumption of unlawful powers, as by the unwise or unwarrantable use of those which are most legal, that governments oppose their true end and object; for there is such a thing as tyrannical as well as usurpation." If, under a power to regulate trade, you prevent exportation; if, with the most approved spring lancets, you draw the last drop of blood from our veins; if, secundum artem, you draw the last shilling from our pockets, what are the checks of the Constitution to us? A fig for the Constitution! When the scorpion's sting is probing us to the quick, shall we stop to chop logic? Shall we get some learned and cunning clerk to say whether the power to do this is to be found in the Constitution, and then, if he, from whatever motive, shall maintain the affirmative, like the animal whose fleece forms so material a portion of this bill, quietly lie down and be shorn?

Sir, events now passing elsewhere, which plant a thorn in my pillow and a dagger in my heart, admonish me of the difficulty of governing with sobriety any people who are over head and ears in debt. That state of things begets a temper which sets at naught every thing like reason and common sense. This country is unquestionably laboring under great distress, but we cannot legislate it out of that distress. We may, by your legislation, reduce all the country south and east of Mason and Dixon's line, the whites as well as the blacks, to the condition of Helots—you can do no more. We have had placed before us, in the course of this discussion, foreign examples and authorities; and among other things, we have been told, as an argument in favor of this measure, of the prosperity of Great Britain. Have gentlemen taken into consideration the peculiar advantages of Great Britain? Have they taken into consideration that, not excepting Mexico, and that fine country which lies between the Orinoco and the Caribbean sea, England is decidedly superior in point of physical advantages to every country under the sun? This is unquestionably true. I will enumerate some of those advantages. First, there is her climate. In England, such is the temperature of the air, that a man can there do more days' work in the year, and more hours' work in the day, than in any other climate in the world; of course I include Scotland and Ireland in this description. It is in such a climate only, that the human animal can bear without extirpation the corrupted air, the noisome exhalations, the incessant labor of these accursed manufactories. Yes, sir, accursed; for I say it is an accursed thing, which I will neither taste, nor touch, nor handle. If we were to act here on the English system, we should have the yellow fever at Philadelphia, New York, &c., not in August merely, but from June to January, and from January to June. The climate of this country alone, were there no other natural obstacle to it, says aloud, you shall not manufacture! Even our tobacco factories, admitted to be the most wholesome of any sort of factories, are known to be, where extensive, the very nidus (if I may use the expression,) of yellow fever and other fevers of similar type. In another of the advantages of Great Britain, so important to her prosperity, we are almost on a par with her if we knew how properly to use it. Fortunatos nimium sua se bona norint—for, as regards defence, we are, to all intents and purposes, almost as much an island as England herself. But one of her insular advantages we can never acquire. Every part of that country is accessible from the sea. There, as you recede from the sea, you do not get further from the sea: I know that a great deal will be said of our majestic rivers, about the father of floods, and his tributary streams; but with the Ohio frozen up all the Winter, and dry all the Summer, with a long, tortuous, difficult, and dangerous navigation thence to the ocean, the gentlemen of the West may rest assured that they will never derive one particle of advantage, from even a total prohibition of foreign manufactures. You may succeed in reducing us to your own level of misery; but, if we were to agree to become your slaves, you never can derive one farthing of advantage from this bill. What parts of this country can derive any advantage from it? Those parts only, where there is a water power in immediate contact with navigation, such as the vicinities of Boston, Providence, Baltimore, Richmond, &c. Petersburg is the last of these as you travel south* You take a bag of cotton up the river to Pittsburg, or to Zanesville, to have it manufactured and sent down to New Orleans for a market, and before your bag of cotton has got to the place of manufacture, the manufacturer of Providence has received his returns for the goods made from his bag of cotton purchased at the same time that you purchased yours. No, sir; gentlemen may as well insist that because the Chesapeake bay, mare nostrum, our Mediterranean sea, gives us every advantage of navigation, we shall exclude from it every thing but steamboats and those boats called kat' ezochen, per emphasin, par excellence, Kentucky boats—a sort of huge, square, clumsy wooden box. And why not insist upon it? Hav'nt you "the power to regulate commerce?" Would not that, too, be a "regulation of commerce?" It would, indeed, and a pretty regulation it is; and so is this bill. And, sir, I marvel that the representation from the great commercial State of New York should be in favor of this bill. If operative—and if inoperative why talk of it?—if operative, it must, like the embargo of 1807, '8, '9, transfer no small portion of the wealth of the London of America, as New York has been called, to Quebec and Montreal. She will receive the most of her imports from abroad, down the river. I do not know any bill that could be better calculated for Vermont than this bill; because, through Vermont, from Quebec, Montreal, and other positions on the St. Lawrence, we are, if it passes, unquestionably to receive our supplies of foreign goods. It will, no doubt, also, suit the Niagara frontier.

But, sir, I must not suffer myself to be led too far astray from the topic of the peculiar advantages of England as a manufacturing country. Her vast beds of coal are inexhaustible; there are daily discoveries of quantities of it, greater than ages past have yet consumed; to which beds of coal her manufacturing establishments have been transferred, as any man may see who will compare the present population of her towns with what it was formerly. It is to these beds of coal that Birmingham, Manchester, Wolverhampton, Sheffield, Leeds, and other manufacturing towns, owe their growth. If you could destroy her coal in one day, you would cut at once the sinews of her power. Then there are her metals, and particularly tin, of which she has the exclusive monopoly. Tin, I know, is to be found in Japan, and perhaps elsewhere, but, in practice, England has now the monopoly of that article. I might go further, said Mr. R., and I might say that England possesses an advantage, quo ad hoc, in her institutions; for there men are compelled to pay their debts. But, here, men are not only not compelled to pay their debts, but they are protected in the refusal to pay them, in the scandalous evasion of their legal obligations; and, after being convicted of embezzling the public money, and the money of others, of which they were the appointed guardians and trustees, they have the impudence to obtrude their unblushing fronts into society, and elbow honest men out of their way! There, though all men are on a footing of equality on the highway, and in the courts of law, at mill and at market, yet the castes in Hindostan are not more distinctly separated one from the other than the different classes of society are in England. It is true, that it is practicable for a wealthy merchant or a manufacturer, or his descendants, after having, through two or three generations, washed out what is considered the stain of their original occupation, to emerge, by slow degrees, into the higher ranks of society; but this rarely happens. Can you find men of vast fortune, in this country, content to move in the lower circles—content as the ox under the daily drudgery of the yoke? It is true that, in England, some of these wealthy people take it into their heads to buy seats in Parliament; but, when they get there, unless they possess great talents, they are mere nonentities; their existence is only to be found in the Red Book, which contains a list of the members of Parliament. Now, sir, I wish to know, if, in the Western country, where any man may get beastly drunk for three pence sterling—in England, you cannot get a small wineglass of spirits under twenty-five cents; one such drink of grog as I have seen swallowed in this country would there cost a dollar;—in the Western country, where every man can get as much meat and bread as he can consume, and yet spend the best part of his days, and nights too, perhaps, on the tavern benches, or loitering at the cross-roads asking the news,—can you expect the people of such a country, with countless millions of wild land and wild animals besides, can be cooped up in manufacturing establishments, and made to work sixteen hours a day, under the superintendence of a driver—yes, a driver, compared with whom a Southern overseer is a gentleman and man of refinement; for, if they do not work, (these work people in the manufactories,) they cannot eat; and, among all the punishments that can be devised, (put death, even, among the number,) I defy you to get as much work out of a man by any of them, as when he knows that he must work before he can eat.

But, sir, if we follow the example of England, in one respect, as we are invited to do, we must also follow it in another. If we adopt her policy, we must adopt her institutions also. Her policy is the result of her institutions, and our institutions must be, as the result of our policy, assimilated to her's. We cannot adopt such an exterior system as that of England, without adopting also her interior policy. We have heard of her wealth, her greatness, her glory; but her eulogist is silent about the poverty, wretchedness, misery, of the lowest orders. Show me the country, say gentlemen, which has risen to glory without this system of bounties and protection on manufactures! Sir, show me any country, beyond our own, which has risen to glory or to greatness without an established church, or without a powerful aristocracy, if not an hereditary nobility. I know no country in Europe, except Turkey, without hereditary nobles. Must we, too, have these Corinthian ornaments of society, because those countries of greatness and glory have given in to them? But, after we shall have destroyed all our foreign trade; after we shall have, by the prevention of imports, cut off exports—thus keeping the promise of the Constitution to the ear, and breaking it to the hope—paltering with the people in a double sense,—after we shall have done this, we are told, "we shall only have to resort to an excise; we have only to change the mode of collection of taxes from the people; both modes of taxation are voluntary." Very voluntary! The exciseman comes into my house; searches my premises; respects not even the privacy of female apartments; measures, gauges, and weighs every thing; levies a tax upon every thing; and then tells me the tax is a voluntary one on my part, and that I am or ought to be content. "Yes, voluntary," as Portia said to Shylock, when she played the judge so rarely—"Art thou content, Jew? Art thou content?"

These taxes, however, it seems, are voluntary, "as being altogether upon consumption." By a recent speech on this subject, the greater part of which, said Mr. R., I was so fortunate as to hear, I learn that there have been only two hundred capital prosecutions in England, within a given time, for violations of the revenue laws. Are we ready, if one of us, too poor to own a saddle-horse, should borrow a saddle and clap it on his plough-horse, to ride to church or court or mill or market, to be taxed for a surplus saddle-horse, and surcharged for having failed to list him as such? Are gentlemen aware of the inquisitorial, dispensing, arbitrary, and almost Papal power, of the Commissioners of Excise? I shall not stop to go into a detail of them; but I never did expect to hear it said, on this floor, and by a gentleman from Kentucky, too, that the excise system was a mere scarecrow—a bugbear—that the sound of the words constituted all the difference between a system of excise and a system of customs; that both meant the same thing. "Write them together; your's is as fair a name. Sound them; it doth become the mouth as well." Here, sir, I must beg leave to differ; I do not think it does. "Weigh them; it is as heavy." That I grant. "Conjure with them"—excise "will start a spirit as soon as customs."

This I verily believe, sir, and I wish, with all my heart, if this bill is to pass—if new and unnecessary burdens are to be wantonly imposed upon the people—that we were to return home with the blessed news of a tax or excise, not less by way of "minimum," than fifty cents per gallon upon whiskey. And here, if I did not consider an exciseman to bear, according to the language of the old law books, caput lupinum, and that it was almost as meritorious to shoot such a hell-hound of tyranny, as to shoot a wolf or a mad dog—and, if I did not know that any thing like an excise in this country is in effect utterly impracticable, I myself, feeling, seeing, blushing for my country, would gladly vote to lay an excise on this abominable liquor, the lavish consumption of which renders this the most drunken nation under the sun; and yet, we have refused to take the duties from wines, from cheap French wines particularly, that might lure the dog from his vomit, and lay the foundation of a reformation of the public manners. Sir, an excise system can never be maintained in this country. I had as lief be a tythe-proctor in Ireland, and met on a dark night in a narrow road by a dozen white-boys, or peep-of-day boys, or hearts of oak, or hearts of steel, as an exciseman in the Alleghany mountains, met, in a lonely road, or, by-place, by a backwoodsman, with a rifle in his hand. With regard to Ireland, the British chancellor of the exchequer has been obliged to reduce the excise in Ireland on distilled spirits, to comparatively nothing to what it was formerly, in consequence of the impossibility of collecting it in that country. Ireland is, not to speak with statistical accuracy, about the size of Pennsylvania, containing something like twenty-five thousand square miles of territory, with a population of six millions of inhabitants, nearly as great a number as the whole of the white population of the United States; with a standing army of 20,000 men; with another standing army, composed of all those classes in civil life, who, through the instrumentality of that army, keep the wretched people in subjection—under all these circumstances, even in Ireland, the excise cannot be collected. I venture to say, that no army that the earth has ever seen—not such an one as that of Bonaparte, which marched to the invasion of Russia—would be capable of collecting an excise in this country—not such an one as that described, if you will allow me to give some delightful poetry in exchange for very wretched prose, as Milton has described:

"Such forces met not, nor so wide a camp,
When Agrican, with all his northern powers,
Besieged Albracca, as romances tell,
The city of Calliphone, from whence to win
The fairest of her sex, Angelica,
His daughter, sought by many prowess knights,
Both Paynim and the Peers of Charlemagne."

Not such a force, nor even the troops with which he compares them, which were no less than "the legion fiends of hell," could collect an excise here. If any officer of our Government were to take the field a still-hunting, as they call it in Ireland, among our Southern or Western forests and mountains, I should like to see the throwing off the hounds. I have still enough of the sportsman about me, that I should like to see the breaking cover; and, above all, I should like to be in at the death.

And what, said Mr. R., are we now about to do? For what was the Constitution formed? To drive the people of any part of this Union from the plough to the distaff? Sir, the Constitution of the United States never would have been formed, and if formed, would have been scouted, una voce, by the people, if viewed as a means for effecting purposes like this. The Constitution was formed for external purposes, to raise armies and navies, and to lay uniform duties on imports, to raise a revenue to defray the expenditure for such objects. What are you going to do now? To turn the Constitution wrong side out; to abandon foreign commerce and exterior relations—I am sorry to use this Frenchified word—the foreign affairs, which it was established to regulate, and convert it into a municipal agent, to carry a system of espionage and excise into every log house in the United States. We went to war with Great Britain for free trade and sailors' rights; we made a treaty of peace in which I never could, with the aid of my glasses, see a word about either the one or the other of these objects of contention; we are now determined never to be engaged in another for such purposes; for we are, ourselves, putting an end to them. And, by the way of comfort in this state of things, we have been told,

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

by the doctor as well as by the apothecary, that much cannot be immediately expected from this new scheme; that years will pass away before its beneficial effects will be fully realized. And to whom is this told? To the consumptive patient it is said—here is the remedy; persevere in it for a few years, and it will infallibly cure your disorder; and this infallible remedy is prescribed for pulmonary consumption, which is an opprobrium of physicians, and has reached a stage that, in a few months, not to say days, must inevitably terminate the existence of the patient. This is to be done, too, on the plea that the people who call for this measure are already ruined. I will do any thing, sir, in reason, to relieve these persons; but I can never agree, because they are ruined, and we are half ruined only, that we shall be entirely ruined, for the contingent possibility of their relief. We have no belief in this new theory—new, for it came in with the French revolution, and that is of modern date—of the transfusion of blood from a healthy animal to a sick one: and, if there is to be such a transfusion for the benefit of these ruined persons now, we refer the gentlemen to bulls and goats for supplies of blood, for we should be the veriest asses to permit them to draw our own.

We are told, however, that we have nothing to do but to postpone the payment of the public debt for a few years, and wait for an accumulation of wealth, for a new run of luck—

“Labitur et labitur in omne volubilis ævum.”

This postponement of the public debt is no novelty. All debts are, now-a-days, as old Lillie hath it, in the future in rus, “about to be” paid. We have gone on postponing paying the national debt, and our own debts, until individual credit is at an end; until property, low as it is reduced in price by our fantastic legislation, can no longer be bought but for ready money. Here is one, and there the other. I am describing a state of society which I know to exist in a part of the country, and which I hear, with concern, does exist in a greater degree, in a much larger portion of the country, than I pretend to be personally acquainted with.

In all beneficial changes in the natural world—and the sentiment is illustrated by one of the most beautiful effusions of imagination and genius that I ever read—in all those changes, which are the work of an all-wise, all-seeing, and superintending providence, as in the insensible gradation by which the infant bud expands into manhood, and from manhood to senility; or, if you will, to caducity itself—you find nature never working but by gradual and imperceptible changes; you cannot see the object move, but take your eye from it for a while, and like the index of that clock, you can see that it has moved. The old proverb says, God works good, and always by degrees. The devil, on the other hand, is bent on mischief, and always in a hurry. He cannot stay: his object is mischief, which can best be effected suddenly, and he must be gone to work elsewhere. But we have the comfort, under the pressure of this measure, that at least no force is exercised upon us; we are not obliged to buy goods of foreign manufacture. It is true, sir, that gentlemen have not said you shall not send your tobacco or cotton abroad; but they have said the same thing, in other words; by preventing the importation of the returns which we used to receive, and without which, the sale or exchange of our produce is impracticable, they say to us, you shall sell only to us, and we will give you what we please; you shall buy only of us, but at what price we please to ask. But no force is used! You are at full liberty not to buy or to sell. Sir, when an English Judge once told a certain curate at Brentford, that the court of chancery was open equally to the rich and the poor, Horne Tooke replied, “so, my lord, is the London Tavern.” You show a blanket or a warm rug to a wretch that is shivering with cold, and tell him you shall get one no where else, but you are at liberty not to buy mine.

No Jew, who ever tampered with the necessities of a profligate young heir, lending him money at an usury of cent. per cent., ever acted more paternally than the advocates of this bill, to those upon whom it is to operate. I advise you, young man, for your good, says the usurer. I do these things very reluctantly, says Moses—these courses will lead you to ruin. But, no force—ho sir, no force short of Russian despotism, shall induce me to purchase, or, knowing it, to use any article from the region of country which attempts to cram this bill down our throats. On this, we of the South are resolved, as were our fathers about the tea, which they refused to drink; for this is the same old question of the stamp act in a new shape, viz: whether they, who have no common feeling with us, shall impose on us, not merely a burdensome but a ruinous tax, and that, by way of experiment and sport. And I say again, if we are to submit to such usurpations, give me George Grenville, give me Lord North for a master. It is in this point of view that I most deprecate the bill. If, said Mr. R., from the language I have used, any gentleman shall believe I am not as much attached to this Union as any one on this floor, he will labor under great mistake. But there is no magic in this word union. I value it as the means of preserving the liberty and happiness of the people. Marriage itself is a good thing, but the marriages of Mezentius were not so esteemed. The marriage of Sinbad, the sailor, with the corpse of his deceased wife, was an union, and just such an union will this be, if, by a bare majority in both Houses, this bill shall become a law. And, I ask, sir, whether it will redound to the honor of this House, if this bill should pass, that the people should owe their escape to the act of any others rather than to us? Shall we, when even the British Parliament are taking off taxes by wholesale—when all the assessed taxes are diminished fifty per cent.—when the tax on salt is reduced seven-eighths, with a pledge that the remainder shall come off, and the whole would have been repealed, but that it was kept on as a salvo for the wounded pride of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,* who, when asked—why keep on this odious tax, which brings but a paltry hundred and fifty thousand per annum? answered, by subterfuge and evasion, as I have heard done in this House, and drew back upon his resources, his majority—how will it answer for the people to look up for their escape from oppression, not to their immediate Representatives, but to the Representatives of the States, or, possibly, to the Executive? And, permit me here to say, and I say it freely, because it is true, that I join as heartily as any man, in reprehending “the cold, ambiguous support of the Executive Government to this bill.” I do not use my own words; I deprecate as much as any member of this House can do, that the Executive of this country should lend to this bill, or to any other bill, a cold and ambiguous support, or support of any sort, until it come before him in the shape of a law, unless it be a measure which he, in his Constitutional capacity, may have invited Congress to pass. I may be permitted to say, and I will say, that, in case this bill should be unhappily presented to him for his signature, and as an allusion has been made to him in debate, I presume I may repeat it,—I hope he will recollect how much the country that gave him birth has done for him, and the little, not to say worse than nothing, that, during his administration he has done for her. I hope, sir, he will scout the bill as contrary to the genius of our Government, to the whole spirit and letter of our confederation—I say of our confederation—Blessed be God, it is a confederation, and that it contains within itself the redeeming power which has more than once been exercised—and that it contains within itself the seeds of preservation, if not of this Union, at least of the individual Commonwealths of which it is composed.

But, sir, not satisfied with an appeal to the example of Great Britain, whom we have been content hitherto very sedulously to censure and to imitate—as I once heard a person say that it was absolutely necessary for persons of a peculiar character to be extremely vehement of censure of the very vice of which they are themselves guilty—the example of Russia has been introduced, the very last, I should suppose, that would be brought into this House on this or any other question. A gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. POINSETT,) whose intelligence and information I very much respect, but the feebleness of whose voice does not permit him to be heard as distinctly as could be wished, remarked the other day, and, having it on my notes, I will, with his leave, repeat it—Russia is cursed with a paper money, which, in point of depreciation and its consequent embarrassment to her, can boast of no advantage, I believe, even over that of that of Kentucky—so cursed, that it is impossible, until her circulation is restored to a healthful state, she can ever take her station as a commercial or manufacturing nation, to any extent. Nay, more, Russia, with the exception of a few of her provinces, consists, like the interior of America, of a vast inland continent, desolated and deformed by prairies, or steppes, as they are there called, inhabited by a sparse population; and, as an appeal has been made to experience, said Mr. R., I ask any gentleman to show me an instance of any country under the sun that has, under these circumstances, taken a stand as a manufacturing or great commercial nation. These great rivers and inland seas cut a mighty figure on the map, but, when you come to consider of capacities for foreign commerce, how unlike the insular situation of Great Britain, or the peninsular situation of almost the whole continent of Europe—surrounded or penetrated as it is by inland seas and gulfs! May I be pardoned for adverting to the fact—I know that comparisons are extremely odious—that, when we look to Salem and Boston, to parts of the country where skill, and capital, and industry, notoriously exist, we find opposition to this bill; and that, when we look to countries which could sooner build one hundred pyramids, such as that of Cheops, than manufacture one cambric needle, or a paper of White Chapel pins, or a watch-spring, we hear a clamor about this system for the protection of manufactures. The merchants and manufacturers of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, the Province of Maine, and Sagadahock repel this bill, whilst men in hunting shirts, with deer-skin leggings and moccasins on their feet, want protection for manufactures—men with rifles on their shoulders, and long knives in their belts, seeking in the forests to lay in their next Winter's supply of bear-meat. But it is not there alone the cry is heard. It is at Baltimore—decayed, deserted Baltimore, whose exports have more than one-half decreased, whilst those of Boston have four times increased—it is decayed and deserted Baltimore that comes here and asks us for the protection of those interests which have grown up during the late war—privateering among the number, I presume. Philadelphia, too, in a state of atrophy, asks for the measure—Philadelphia, who never can, pass what bill you please, have a foreign trade to any great amount, or become a great manufacturing town, for which she wants all the elements of climate, coal, and capital—this city, now over built, swoln to the utmost extent of the integument, and utterly destitute of force or weight in the Union, wants this bill for the protection of the domestic industry of her free blacks, I presume. New York, too, is now willing to build up Montreal and Quebec at her expense—to convert the Hudson into a theatre for rival disputants about steamboats in the courts below stairs, and for them, and such as them, with a coasting license, to ply upon. The true remedy, and the only one, for the iron manufacturer of Pennsylvania, who has nothing but iron to sell, and that, they tell us, is worth nothing, would be to lay on the table of this House a declaration of war in blank, and then go into a Committee of the Whole, to see what nation in the world it would be most convenient to go to war with—for, fill the blank with the name of what Power you please, it must be a sovereign State, and, though it have not a seaman or a vessel in the world, its commissions are as good and valid in an admiralty court, as those of the Lord High Admiral of Great Britain. In this way you will put our furnaces in blast, and your paper mills into full operation; and many, very many, who, during the last war, transported flour on horseback for the supply of your army, at the cost of an hundred dollars per barrel, and who have since transported provisions in steamboats up and down the Missouri river—very many such individuals would thus be taken out of the very jaws of bankruptcy and lifted up to opulence, at the expense of that people, at whose expense, also, you are now about to enable these iron manufacturers to fill their pockets. New England does not want this bill. Connecticut, indeed, molasses having been thrown overboard to lighten the ship, votes for this bill. A word in the ear of the land of steady habits—I voted against that tax, on the principle, which has always directed my public life, not to compromise my opinions—not to do evil that good may come of it—let me tell the land of steady habits, that, after this bill shall be fairly off the shore; after we shall have cleared decks and made ready for action again; after she shall have imposed on me the onerous burden of this bill, she shall have the benefit of my vote to put on again this duty on molasses—not at this day—this is not the last tariff measure; for, in less than five years, I would, if I were a betting man, wager any odds that we have another tariff proposition, worse by far than that, amendments to which gentlemen had strangled yesterday by the bow-string of the previous question. Fair dealing leads to safe counsels and safe issues. There is a certain left-handed wisdom, that often overreaches its own objects, which grasps at the shadow and lets go the substance. We shall not only have this duty on molasses, I can tell the gentlemen from Connecticut, but we shall have, moreover, an additional bounty on intoxication by whiskey, in the shape of an additional duty on foreign distilled spirits.

* It is a subject of much regret to me, that, at this time, I had not had the benefit of the very able speech of his successor in office, (Mr. Robinson,) which reached the United States a few days after. It ought to be reprinted in every leading paper in the Union. With the good sense, liberality, manliness, and good faith, which characterize the whole speech, he states that Government is pledged to the abolition of the small remnant of the salt tax; and, if insisted on by the Opposition, the pledge shall be redeemed. He suggests, however, the policy of substituting some other reduction in lieu of the small tax now payable on salt, which he conceives to be as little burdensome, at its present reduced rate, as any other, and more easy of collection.

The ancient Commonwealth of Virginia, one of whose unworthy sons, and more unworthy representatives, I am, said Mr. R., must now begin to open her eyes to the fatal policy which she has pursued for the last forty years. I have not a doubt, that they who were the agents for transferring her vast, and boundless, and fertile country to the United States, with an express stipulation, in effect, that not an acre of it should ever inure to the benefit of any man from Virginia, were as respectable, and kind hearted, and hospitable, and polished, and guileless Virginia gentlemen, as ever were cheated out of their estates by their overseers; men who, so long as they could command the means, by sale of their last acre, or last negro, would have a good dinner, and give a hearty welcome to whomsoever chose to drop in, to eat, friend or stranger, bidden or unbidden. What will be the effect of this bill on the Southern States? The effect of this policy is, what I shudder to look at; the more, because the next census is held up in terrorem over us. We are told, you had better consent to this—we are not threatened exactly with General Gage and the Boston Port bill—but we are told by gentlemen, we shall, after the next census, so saddle, and bridle, and martingale you, that you will be easily regulated by any bit, or whip, however severe, or spurs, however rank, of domestic manufacture, that we choose to use. But this argument, sir, has no weight in it with me. I do not choose to be robbed now, because, after I am once robbed, it will become easier to rob me again. Obata principis, is my maxim—because every act of extension of the system operates in a two-fold way, decreasing the strength and means of the robber, and increasing those of the robbed. This is as true as any proposition in mathematics. Gentlemen need not tell us, we had better give in at once. No, sir, we shall not give in; no, we shall hold out—we shall not give in. We do not mean to be threatened out of our rights by the menace of another census. We are aware of our folly, and it is our business to provide against the consequences of it, but not in this way. When I recollect, that the tariff of 1816 was followed by that of 1819–20, and that by this measure of 1823–24, I cannot believe that we are, at any time hereafter, long to be exempt from the demands of those sturdy beggars, who will take no denial. Every concession does but render every fresh demand and new concession more easy. It is like those dastard nations who vainly think to buy peace. When I look back to what the country of which I am a representative was, and when I see what it is—when I recollect the expression of Lord Cornwallis, applied to Virginia, “that great and unterrified colony,” which he was about to enter, not without some misgivings of his mind as to the result of the invasion—when I compare what she was when this House of Representatives first assembled in the city of New York, and what she now is, I know, by the disastrous contrast, that her councils have not been governed by statesmen. They might be admirable professors of a university, powerful dialecticians ex cathedra, but no sound counsels of wise statesmen could ever lead to such practical ill results as are exhibited by a comparison of the past and present condition of the ancient colony and dominion of Virginia.

In the course of this discussion, said Mr. R., I have heard, I will not say with surprise, because nil admirari is my motto—no doctrine that can be broached on this floor can ever, hereafter, excite surprise in my mind—I have heard the names of Say, Ganihl, Adam Smith, and Ricardo, pronounced, not only in terms, but in a tone, of sneering contempt, as visionary theorists, destitute of practical wisdom, and the whole clan of Scotch and Quarterly reviewers lugged in to boot. This, sir, is a sweeping clause of proscription. With the names of Say, Smith, and Ganilh, I profess to be acquainted, for I too, am versed in title pages, but I did not expect to hear, in this House, a name, with which I am a little further acquainted, treated with so little ceremony, and by whom? I leave Adam Smith to the simplicity, and majesty, and strength of his own native genius which has canonized his name—a name which will be pronounced with veneration, when not one name in this House will be remembered. But, one word as to Ricardo, the last mentioned of those writers—a new authority, though the grave has already closed upon him, and set its seal upon his reputation. I shall speak of him in the language of a man of as great a genius as this, or perhaps any, age has ever produced—a man remarkable for the depth of his reflections and the acumen of his penetration. “I had been led,” says this man, “to look into loads of books—my understanding had for too many years been intimate with severe thinkers, with logic, and the great masters of knowledge, not to be aware of the utter feebleness of the herd of modern economists. I sometimes read chapters from more recent works, or part of Parliamentary debates. I saw that these [ominous words!] were generally the very dregs and rinsings of the human intellect.” [I am very glad, sir, he did not read our debates. What would he have said of ours?] “At length a friend sent me Mr. Ricardo’s book, and recurring to my own prophetic anticipation of the advent of some legislator on this science, I said, ‘Thou art the man. Wonder and curiosity had long been dead in me; yet I wondered once more. Had this profound work been really written in England during the 19th century? Could it be that an Englishman, and he not in academic bowers, but oppressed by mercantile and senatorial cares, had accomplished what all the universities and a century of thought had failed to advance by one hair’s breadth? All other writers had been crushed and overlaid by the enormous weight of facts and documents; Mr. Ricardo had deduced, a priori, from the understanding itself, laws which first gave a ray of light into the unwieldy chaos of materials, and had constructed what had been but a collection of tentative discussions, into a science of regular proportions, now first standing on an eternal basis.”

I pronounce no opinion of my own, said Mr. R., on Ricardo; I recur rather to the opinion of a man, inferior in point of original and native genius, and that highly cultivated, too, to none of the moderns, and few of the ancients. Upon this subject, what shall we say to the following fact? Butler, who is known to gentlemen of the profession of the law, as the annotator, with Hargrave, on Lord Coke, speaking with Fox as to political economy—that most extraordinary man, unrivalled for his powers of debate, excelled by no man that ever lived, or probably ever will live, as a public debater, and of the deepest of political erudition, fairly confessed that he had never read

Adam Smith. Butler said to Mr. Fox “that he had never read Adam Smith’s work on the ‘Wealth of Nations.’” “To tell you the truth,” replied Mr. Fox, “nor I neither. There is something in all these subjects that passes my comprehension—something so wide that I could never embrace them myself, or find any one who did.” And yet we see how we, with our little dividers, undertake to lay off the scale, and with our pack-thread to take the soundings, and speak with a confidence peculiar to quacks (in which the regular bred professor never indulges) on this abstruse and perplexing subject. Confidence is one thing, knowledge another; of the want of which, overweening confidence is notoriously the indication. What of that? Let Ganilh, Say, Ricardo, Smith—all Greek and Roman fame be against us—we appeal to Dionysius in support of our doctrines; and to him not on the throne of Syracuse but at Corinth—not in absolute possession of that most wonderful and enigmatical city, as difficult to comprehend as the abstrusest problem of political economy, which furnished not only the means but the men for supporting the greatest wars—a kingdom within itself, under whose ascendant the genius of Athens, in her most high and palmy state, quailed, and stood rebuked. No; we follow the pedagogue to the schools—dictating in the classic shades of Longwood—(lucus a non lucendo)—to his disciples.

We have been told that the economists are right in theory and wrong in practice; which is as much as to say, that two bodies occupy at the same time the same space; for it is equally impracticable to be right in theory and wrong in practice. It is easy to be wrong in practice; but if our practice corresponds with our theory, it is a solecism to say that we can be right in the one and wrong in the other. As for Alexander and Cæsar, said Mr. R., I have as little respect for their memory as is consistent with that involuntary homage which all must pay to men of their prowess and abilities; and if Alexander had suffered himself to be led by the nose out of Babylon and banished to Sinope, or if Cæsar had suffered himself to be deprived of his imperial sway, not by the dagger of the assassin, but by his own slavish fears, I should have as little respect for their memory as for that of him whose example has on this occasion been held up to us for admiration. Speaking of that man who has kept me awake night after night, and has been to me an incubus by day, for fear of the vastness of his designs, I cannot conceive of a spectacle so pitiful, so despicable, as that man, under those circumstances; and if the work dictated by him at St. Helena be read with the slightest attention, no forsworn witness at the Old Bailey was ever detected in so many contradictions as he has been guilty of. No, sir, the Jupiter from whose reluctant hand the thunderbolt is wrung, is not the one at whose shrine I worship—not that I think that the true Amphitryon is always him with whom we dine—he is not the political economist who is to take place of Smith and Ricardo. Will any man make me believe that he understood the theory or the practice of political economy better than these men, or than Charles Fox? Impossible. When I recollect what that man might have done for liberty, and what he did; when I recollect that to him we owe this Holy Alliance—this fearful power of Russia—of Russia, where I should advise persons to go who desired to be instructed in petty treason by the murder of a husband, or in parricide by the murder of a father, but from whom I should never think of taking a lesson in political economy—to whom I would say, rather, pay your debts, not in depreciated paper; do not commit daily acts of bankruptcy; restore your currency; practise on the principles of liberality and justice, and then I will listen to you. No, sir, Russia may, if she pleases, not only lay heavy duties on imports; she may prohibit them if she pleases; she has nothing to export but what some other inland countries have, political power—physical, to be sure, as well as intellectual power—but she does not even dare to attack the Turk; she cannot stir; she is something like some of our interior people of the South, who have plenty of land, plenty of serfs, smoke-houses filled with meat, and very fine horses to ride, but who, when they go abroad, have not one shilling to bless themselves with; and so long as she is at peace, and does not trouble the rest of the world, so long she may be suffered to remain; but, if she should continue to act hereafter as she has done heretofore, it will be the interest of the civilized world to procure her dismemberment, per fas aut nefas.

But it is said a measure of this sort is necessary to create employment for the people. Why, sir, where are the handles of the plough? Are they unfit for young gentlemen to touch? Or will they rather choose to enter your military academies, where the sons of the rich are educated at the expense of the poor, and where so many political Janissaries are every year turned out, always ready for war, and to support the powers that be—equal to the Strelitzes of Moscow or St. Petersburg? I do not speak now of individuals, of course, but of the tendency of the system—the hounds follow the huntsman because he feeds them, and bears the whip. I speak of the system. I concur most heartily, sir, in the censure which has been passed upon the greediness of office, which stands a stigma on the present generation. Men from whom we might expect, and from whom I did expect better things, crowd the ante-chamber of the palace, for every vacant office; nay, even before men are dead, their shoes are wanted for some bare-footed office-seeker. How mistaken was the old Roman, the old Consul, who, whilst he held the plough by one hand, and death held the other, exclaimed, "Diis immortalibus vero!"

Our fathers, how did they acquire their property? By straightforward industry, rectitude, and frugality. How did they become dispossessed of their property? By indulging in speculative hopes and designs, seeking the shadow whilst they lost the substance; and now, instead of being, as they were, men of respectability, men of substance, men capable and willing to live independently and honestly, and hospitably too—for who so par-simonious as the prodigal who has nothing to give? What have we become? A nation of sharks, preying on one another through the instrumentality of this paper system, which, if Lycurgus had known of it, he would unquestionably have adopted, in preference to his iron money, if his object had been to make the Spartans the most accomplished knaves, as well as to keep them poor.

We are told that this is a curious Constitution of ours: it is made for foreigners and not for ourselves—for the protection of foreign, and not of American industry. Sir, this is a curious Constitution of ours, said Mr. R.; and if I were disposed to deny it, I could not succeed. It is an anomaly in itself. It is that supposed impossibility of all writers, from Aristotle to the present day, an imperium in imperio. Nothing like it ever did exist, or possibly ever will, under similar circumstances. It is a Constitution consisting of confederated bodies, for certain exterior purposes, and, also, for some interior purposes, but leaving to the State authorities, among a great many powers, the very one which we now propose to exercise: for, if we were now passing a revenue bill—a bill, the object of which were to raise revenue—however much I should deny the policy, and however I could demonstrate the futility of the plan, I still should deem it to be a Constitutional bill—a bill passed to carry, bona fide, into effect, a provision of the Constitution, but a bill passed with short-sighted views. But this is no such bill. It is a bill, under pretence of regulating commerce, to take money from the pockets of a very large, and, I thank God, contiguous territory, and to put it into other pockets. One word, sir, on that point; I can assure the gentlemen whose appetites are so keenly whetted for our money—I trust, at least, that if this bill passes, there will be a meeting of the members opposed to it, and a general and consentaneous resistance to its operation throughout the whole Southern country—and we shall make it by lawful means; quant à nous, the law will be a dead letter. It shall be to me, at least, as innocuous as the pill of the empyric, which I am determined not to swallow. The manufacturer of the East may carry his woollens, or his cottons, or his coffins, to what market he pleases—I do not buy of him. Self defence is the first law of nature. You drive us into it. You create heats and animosities amongst this great family, who ought to live like brothers; and, after you have got this temper of mind roused among the Southern people, do you expect to come among us to trade, and expect us to buy your wares? Sir, not only shall we not buy them, but we shall take such measures (I will not enter into the detail of them now,) as shall render it impossible for you to sell them. Whatever may be said here, of the "misguided counsels," as they have been termed, "of the theorists of Virginia," they have, so far as regards this question, the confidence of united Virginia. We are asked—does the South lose any thing by this bill—why do you cry out? I put it, sir, to any man, from any part of the country, from the Gulf of Mexico, from the Balize, to the Eastern shore of Maryland—which, I thank heaven, is not yet under the government of Baltimore, and will not be, unless certain theories should come into play in that State, which we have lately heard of, and a majority of men, told by the head, should govern—whether the whole country, between the points I have named, is not unanimous in opposition to this bill? Would it not be unexampled, that we should thus complain, protest, resist, and that all the while nothing should be the matter? Are our understandings (however low mine may be rated, much sounder than mine are engaged in this resistance,) to be rated so low as that we are to be made to believe that we are children affrighted by a bugbear? We are asked, however, why do you cry out?—it is all for your good. Sir, this reminds me of the mistresses of George II. who, when they were insulted by the populace on arriving in London, (as all such creatures deserve to be, by every mob,) put their heads out of the window, and said to them, in their broken English, "Goot people, we be come for your goots;" to which one of the mob rejoined "Yes, and for our chattels too, I fancy." Just so it is with the oppressive exactions proposed and advocated by the supporters of this bill, on the plea of the good of those who are its victims.

There is not a member of this House, said Mr. R., more deeply penetrated than the one who is endeavoring to address you, with the inadequate manner in which he has discharged the task imposed upon him—in this instance, he will say, on his part, most reluctantly. But, as I have been all my life a stammerer in history, I cannot fail to be struck with the fitness of the comparison instituted by a historian of this country with the Roman republic, just as it was in a state of preparation for a master.

Of this quotation, I will, as they sometimes say in the Parliament, for the benefit of the country gentlemen, attempt a translation. "But, after the State had become corrupted by luxury and sloth"—in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, we are told of one who laid by his sequins in good money, and when he afterwards came to use them, he found them to be bits of paper, not worth more than old continental (or Kentucky) money—"by luxury and sloth, again the republic,"—and here I press the comparison—"by dint of its own magnitude, its own greatness, its own vastness; bore up under the faults, the vices, of its generals, magistrates, and that, too, as if effete—(past bearing) since, for a long while"—I hope the comparison will not hold here—"for a long time scarcely any man had become great at Rome by his merit." So, sir, it is with this republic. It does not sustain, by its greatness and growing magnitude, the follies and vices of its magistracy. Had this Government been stationary like any of the old Governments of Europe, of the second class, Prussia, for instance, or Holland, by the political evolutions of the last thirty years—I might say the last twelve years—it would have sunk into insignificance and debility: and it is only upon this resource, the increasing greatness of this republic, that the blunderers who plunge blindfold into schemes like this, can rely for any possibility of salvation from the effect of their own rash, undigested measures. It is true, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; and elsewhere than in the republic of Rome and of other times, than the days of Catiline, it may be said, "Haud sane quisque virtute magnus est."

"'Tis not in mortals to command success!—

But do you more Sempronius—don't deserve it,

And take my word you won't have any less;

Be wary, watch the time, and always serve it:

Give gentle way when there's too great a press;

And for your conscience only learn to nerve it—

For, like a racer, or a boxer, training,

'Twill make, if proved, vast efforts without paining."

I had more to say, Mr. Speaker, could I have said it, on this subject. But I cannot sit down without asking those who were once my brethren of the church, the elders in the young family of this good old republic of the thirteen States, if they can consent to rivet upon us this system, from which no benefit can possibly result to themselves. I put it to them as descendants of the renowned colony of Virginia—as children sprung from her loins—if, for the sake of all the benefits with which this bill is pretended to be freighted to them—granting such to be the fact, for argument's sake—they could consent to do such an act of violence to the unanimous opinion, feelings, prejudices, if you will, of the whole Southern States, as to pass it? I go farther. I ask of them what is there in the condition of the nation, at this time, that calls for the immediate adoption of this measure? Are the Gauls at the gate of the Capitol? If they are, the cacklings of the Capitoline geese will hardly save it. What is there to induce us to plunge into the vortex of those evils so severely felt in Europe from this very manufacturing and paper-policy? For, it is evident that, if we go into this system of policy, we must adopt the European institutions also. We have very good materials to work with. We have only to make our elective King, President for life, in the first place, and then to make the succession hereditary in the family of the first that shall happen to have a promising son. For a King we can be at no loss—ex quovis ligno—any block will do for him. The Senate may, perhaps, be transmuted into a House of Peers, although we should meet with more difficulty than in the other case: for, Bonaparte himself was not more hardly put to it, to recruit the ranks of his mushroom-nobility, than we should be to furnish a House of Peers. As for us, we are the faithful Commons, ready made to hand; but with all our loyalty, I congratulate the House—I congratulate the nation—that, although this body is daily degraded by the sight of members of Congress manufactured into placemen, we have not yet reached such a point of degradation as to submit to suffer Executive minions to be manufactured into members of Congress. We have shut that door; I wish we could shut the other also. I wish we could have a perpetual call of the House in this view, and suffer no one to go out from its closed doors. The time, Mr. R. said, was peculiarly inauspicious for the change in our policy which is proposed by this bill. We are on the eve of an election that promises to be the most distracted that this nation has ever yet undergone. It may turn out to be a Polish election. At such a time, ought any measure to be brought forward which is supposed to be capable of being demonstrated to be extremely injurious to one great portion of this country, and beneficial in proportion to another? Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. There are firebrands enough in the land, without this apple of discord being cast into this assembly. Suppose this measure is not what it is represented to be; that the fears of the South are altogether illusory and visionary; that it will produce all the good predicted of it—an honorable gentleman from Kentucky said, yesterday, and I was sorry to hear it, for I have great respect for that gentleman, and for other gentlemen from that State, that the question was not whether a bare majority should pass the bill, but whether the majority or minority should rule. The gentleman is wrong, and if he will consider the matter rightly, he will see it. Is there no difference between the patient and the actor? We are passive; we do not call upon them to act or to suffer, but we call upon them not so to act as that we must necessarily suffer: and I venture to say that, in any government properly constituted, this very consideration would operate conclusively, that, if this burden is to be laid on 102, it ought not to be laid by 105. We are the eel that is being flayed, while the cook-maid pats us on the head, and cries, with the clown in King Lear, "down, wantons, down!" There is but one portion of the country which can profit by this bill, and from that portion of the country comes this bare majority in favor of it. I bless God that Massachusetts and old Virginia are once again rallying under the same banner, against oppressive and unconstitutional taxation: for, if all the blood be drawn from out the body, I care not whether it be by the British Parliament or the American Congress—by an Emperor or a King abroad, or by a President at home. Under these views, and with feelings of mortification and shame at the very weak opposition I have been able to make to this bill, I entreat gentlemen to consent that it may lie over, at least, until the next session of Congress. We have other business to attend to, and our families and affairs need our attention at home—and indeed I, sir, would not give one farthing for any man who prefers being here to being at home—who is a good public man and a bad private one. With these views and feelings, I move you, sir, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

I ought to have excepted Albert Gallatin, "the apostle of Truth, and the favorite votary of Liberty," as he was hailed by the companion of my early manhood. This gentleman might say, of the place in which he finds himself, what was said of a certain Doge of Genoa, I think, whom the arrogance of Louis XIV. ordered to Paris to make an apology, in his own person, for some offence on the part of that once proud republic, against the dignity of the Grand Monarque.

Had Montgomery, instead of falling on the heights of Abraham—where Montcalm and Wolfe, congenial spirits, also survived to see the Revolution of 1788-'9, brought about, would it have ever been objected to him that, by birth, he was an Irishman? Would his foreign descent have stood in the way of his other claims to the Chief Magistracy of the country?

— "forsook

Were Mr. Gallatin a French or Englishman, there would be some color to this objection. But he is a native of Geneva, and no good Genevese can worship at the shrine of a Bonaparte or a Bourbon. I think it must be his citizenship of Virginia that stands mostly in the way of the elevation of this extraordinary man, who sees himself postponed to persons in no respect considerable, except for the modesty of their pretensions, who have never, and can never, render a title of his public services, and whose names were not known out of their own parish, so late as the acquisition of Louisiana, and the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's second term of Presidential service.

No foreigner, be it remembered, can ever become President, who was not a citizen at the time of the adoption of the new Constitution of 1787. The door will soon be closed against them forever, be their merits and services what they may.

NOTE 2.

The principal of the debt proper of the United States was funded at 6 per cent., but the payment of one third was postponed for ten years.

The interest, the evidences of which were called "indents of interest," was funded at 3 per cent.

Of the assumed debt, one-third was taken, on estimate, to be the amount of interest due upon it, which, at the time, could not be ascertained; and, also, funded at 3 per cent.

These two sums constitute the 3 per cent. stock of the United States.

Of the remaining two-thirds of the assumed debt, two-thirds, being the estimated amount of principal, equal to 2s. 8d. Virginia money, to a dollar, were funded at 6 per cent.; and the remainder (one-third of two-thirds, or 1s. 4d. Virginia money, on the dollar) was also funded at 6 per cent., but the payment postponed in like manner, as on the debt proper of the United States.

This is the origin of the term deferred stock, in our laws and financial statements.

impolicy of the expulsion of the Moriscoes from Spain, and of the Huguenots from France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Never having been "addictus jurare in verba magistris," I have long ago taught myself to believe, that the alleged impolicy of these two celebrated measures (which I have never heard called in question by any authority whatsoever) is one of those "vulgar errors" that ought to go to swell the catalogue of the ingenious Sir Thomas Brown. From the institution of the Passover to the latest experience of man, it will be found that two essentially different and hostile nations cannot peaceably and advantageously inhabit the same territory, and live under the same form of government. I have been led to ascribe the subsequent grandeur and power of France, mainly to the removal of this fruitful source of schism and of weakness. Had the Protestants remained in the bosom of France, their superior industry and intelligence would speedily have raised them to a level with their Catholic enemies and fellow-subjects; and the seeds of incurable division and weakness would thus have been sown, never to be eradicated.

With some millions of wealthy and exasperated Moriscoes in her bosom, could Spain have made the stand she did against the power of Bonaparte? It is this which renders Ireland a dead weight upon England, instead of a powerful auxiliary. Would Virginia have been impoverished in case she had expelled her black population, constituting the great mass of her productive labor at the peace of 1783? Suppose, instead of ceding her northwestern territory to Congress, she had, at the peace of 1783, driven every negro and mulatto, bond or free, across the Ohio? Would she now, think you, be less populous or powerful than she is at present? Would she now be driven to the humiliation of receiving the law, and, perhaps, a master, from the Congressional and electoral influence beyond, not only the Ohio, but the Mississippi—beyond Aurora and the Ganges?

I speak of the results, not of the motives, of those celebrated measures. Was the Reformation not eminently beneficial to England, because it was owing to the low passions and ungovernable caprices of a tyrant, even more odious than Louis XIV. or Philip IV.? Were the motives of his overgrown subjects, greedy for the spoils of the church, panting for the plunder of the rich abbeyes and benefices, less infamous than those of their master? Is the Jackall, who humbly receives the offal carcase, when the hunger of the royal beast is appeased by its blood, distinguished in any way to his advantage from the monarch of the forest?

When Mr. RANDOLPH had concluded his speech—

Mr. HOLCOMBE rose, and stated to the Chair that he wished to make some observations on the subject under consideration. I have been, he observed, so patient and persevering a listener throughout this long discussion, that I feel myself entitled to the indulgence of the House for a short time. The fate of the bill, Mr. Speaker, is no longer doubtful. Signs and indications, which can neither be resisted nor mistaken, have announced its destiny. It will pass, I doubt not, at least in this House, by a small but decisive majority. Such facts, on ordinary occasions, would seem to render all further discussion unnecessary, if not intrusive. But, when the policy of a great nation, in relation to one of its most important interests, is about to assume a new character, or, at least, receive additional impulse; when the manufacturing interest of this country, already under the protection of the Government, is demanding yet more efficient protection, in opposition to the remonstrances and hostility of a large and imposing minority, within and without this House, public opinion seems to require—public opinion, indeed, does require—from the friends of the new policy, the fullest exposition of the views and causes which have led to its adoption.

With such apologies, I come before the House at this late period of the debate. But, sir, I scarcely know how or where to commence my observations. The manufacturing question is utterly exhausted. The field of discussion which it presents has been so long preoccupied, so perseveringly explored, that neither fruit nor flower remains to reward the adventurer. If we refer to history for illustration, nothing can be more familiar than its examples. If to political economy, or the labors of the statists, their tables and statements, their axioms and principles, have been urged upon us, from every department of the House, by friend and foe, even to satiety.

Mr. H. observed, the general principles of the bill had been so fully discussed by others, that he would proceed at once to examine, as rapidly and briefly as possible, the principal objections which had been urged against it. The bill, Mr. Speaker, is combated on this floor by three interests essentially distinct; the agricultural interest of the South, the manufacturing interest of the East, and the general interest of commerce and navigation. For the sake of perspicuity, the objections arising out of the supposed hostility of the bill to each of these interests, will be noticed separately. The protection of the manufacturing interest is said to be hostile to the agriculture of the South. If gentlemen were able to establish the truth of this objection, the principles as well as the policy of the bill would remain, at least to me, entirely indefensible. For I have neither the right nor the disposition to advocate any measure calculated to build up the interest of one section of the Union at the expense of another. I have no personal interest which this bill can possibly promote. I support it, as a measure purely national in its character, intended to advance the prosperity, not of sections only, but of the Union; to equalize all our great interests; to promote, by its direct and necessary operation, the manufacturing interest; to promote, by the creation, or rather the extension, of the home market, the agricultural interest; and, finally, to promote the commercial interest, by enabling the American merchant, by the abundance and cheapness of the fabrics of the manufacturer, to adventure successfully in the great markets of the world; particularly in the opening and growing markets of South America.

The gentlemen of the South must pardon me for believing, as I certainly do believe, that they mistake altogether the ultimate operation of this bill, as far as their agriculture is concerned. It is true, we can only speculate upon this point. But it has always appeared to me that, if there be one section of the Union more deeply interested than another in the friendly operation of our manufacturing policy upon its agriculture, it must be the South, inasmuch as the creation of a steady home market for its rich agricultural staples must be to the South an object of vital and lasting consideration. The European market is at best precarious. A state of war impairs, and may extinguish it. Competition, also, seriously threatens it. The Southern planter, indeed, has already found in it growing and formidable rivals. Cotton, the great staple of the South, is at this moment extensively cultivated for exportation in three quarters of the globe, in India, Brazil, and, lately it would seem, in Egypt. And the time cannot be considered distant when it must form no inconsiderable staple of the whole series of South American Republics. Driven, therefore, as, in a great measure, it appears to me it necessarily must be driven, from the European market, where is the Southern planter to find refuge and protection, except, indeed, in the home market, which it is one of the first objects of this bill to assist in establishing? And a refuge and protection it assuredly will prove, ample and unchangeable, (the derision and infidelity of gentlemen to the contrary notwithstanding,) if we will consent to extend to it, from time to time, that legislative aid which its necessities may require, and which its great national importance will always justify. The American market, at present, consumes probably one-fourth, at least one-fifth, of all the cotton grown in the South; stimulated to excess as that culture has been by the extraordinary demands upon it, growing out of the peace of Europe. Extend, therefore, extend to the cotton manufacture of this country efficient protection, and I mistake, utterly and hopelessly mistake, the genius and enterprise engaged in it, if, before the revolution of another national period—the period of ten years—it be not able to absorb all the surplus cotton of the South,—for a part of Southern cotton, from its quality, will always find a market in Europe; provided, no more additional lands be appropriated to its culture; and the quantity is said already to trespass greatly upon correct agricultural proportions.

But, the gentlemen of the South deny that the cotton market of Europe is in danger. They contend that they will always be able to undersell the foreign agriculturist in it. But, is not this confidence, Mr. Speaker, both dangerous and delusive? Can the labor of the slave be made as profitable as the labor of the freeman? And, if the labor of the slave be not as profitable as the labor of the freeman—and that it is not is almost universally conceded—how will the Southern planter be enabled to compete successfully, in years to come, with the millions of free agriculturists rising up and scattered over the immense and fertile regions of the Southern continent? He will be crushed by the competition; he must be driven from the market. There is, indeed, one method whereby the labor of the slave may be made more profitable than the labor of the freeman. The fact has been established; but, happily, not by the experience of this country, for the process is a dreadful one. It is by furnishing the wretched slave with the smallest portion of raiment sufficient to protect him from the inclemency of the elements, and graduating his coarse food to the minimum barely necessary to sustain, for the purposes of his labor, his miserable existence, stimulated into all its capabilities by the unceasing lash of the task master. A state of society, of servitude, and suffering, not more incompatible with the public opinion of the age than unequivocally abhorrent to the sensibilities of the South.

But gentlemen contend that England will refuse to purchase our cottons, if we refuse to purchase her fabrics. Mr. H. observed that this was no novel argument, but one which had been repeatedly urged in Congress, and also in the reviews and essays of the day. He denounced it; and particularly the principle upon which it is founded, as offensive and fallacious. And what, Mr. Speaker, is this principle? It is, that we, the guardians and protectors of the rights and interests of the good people of these States, should look calmly on, whilst our infant manufactures perish before us; or, that we should see them struggling into existence, unnoticed, unaided, and unprotected. That we should consent to postpone indefinitely one of our greatest interests, and subscribe, officially, to articles of virtual and lasting dependence upon foreign nations! For what? To protect the cotton culture of the South from imaginary extinction! Or rather, which is really the fact, to give to the English manufacturer the monopoly of the American market forever.

But the proposition which is assumed, that England will refuse to purchase our cottons if we refuse to purchase her fabrics, is wholly gratuitous. Long before this Government first manifested any serious disposition to foster the manufacturing interest, cotton had been extensively imported into England from India and Brazil, and its culture in those places sedulously encouraged. The English manufacturer purchases from the cheapest market, (can we suppose he can or will pursue for any length of time any other course?) entirely regardless of the country that grows it. It is true, the prices being alike, and the quality the same, he will purchase the cottons of every other country in preference to ours. And the cause is obvious. He has foreseen, from our uncommon skill as manufacturers, and the extraordinary progress which we have already made in every department of useful industry, that the time is not distant when the monopoly which he enjoys upon these shores will not only be extinguished, but rivals will here grow up to compete, with him, in all the great markets of the world. And hence his disposition to promote, in preference to ours, the agriculture of every nation, where new markets can be created. And this is the course which he will pursue—this indeed is the course which he must pursue—in despite of every effort of conciliation—of every act of favoritism which we may be disposed to extend towards him. As long as we continue to undersell the foreign agriculturist in the European market we shall be preferred—but certainly no longer. Every other consideration is idle—is but dust in the balance when weighed against this obvious, this irresistible fact.

But this bill, Mr. Speaker, is further said to be hostile to the general agricultural interest of this country. I must pass over very rapidly an objection so decisively extravagant. For where in the history of the world has the encouragement of manufactures ever proved hostile to the interests of agriculture? Look to the present age—go to the Lothians of Scotland; the rich agricultural districts of England; the kingdom of the Netherlands; the banks of the Rhine and the Elbe; the Rhone and the Seine; go indeed to every manufacturing hamlet, circle or city in Europe, and witness everywhere the refutation of this extravagant objection. Ask history—summon from the dead the Saracens of Spain, the Lombards of the twelfth century—the Genoese; the Venetian—ask the illustrious house of Medicis whether the fostering care which they awarded to manufactures proved hostile to the agriculture of the beautiful region over which they presided? Even our own short experience amply refutes the objection.

Wherever manufacturing establishments have been successfully located amongst us, the country has, in all instances, flourished around them—exhibiting the strongest evidence of their friendly influence upon the interests of the farmer. And were we disposed to receive, with due courtesy, the representations of our constituents, our tables at this moment would be covered with memorials from our agricultural constituents—at least from those of the middle States and the East and the West, praying for the protection of the manufacturer—experience having dissipated their early hostilities, and convinced them, by the most irresistible testimony, that in the protection of the manufacturer is embraced their own surest and best protection.

But the bill, Mr. Speaker, is said to be hostile to the interests of commerce. This, if sustained, would prove an argument entirely unanswerable. Inasmuch as it would not only render a resort to excises or direct taxation necessary to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government, but involves seriously and lastingly the interests of the Navy. Mr. H. controverted this argument at some length. He maintained that it was opposed by the testimony of innumerable facts, and the universal experience of the commercial world—that commerce is directly promoted by whatever tends to promote national wealth and industry. That the bill, in its present shape, was as judicious a revision of the tariff as could be devised; and, consequently, that the interests of commerce and the revenue, instead of being impaired, would be promptly and decisively promoted by it. That domestic manufactures create a multitude of new wants, and furnish the means of gratifying them; and hence, consumption is increased; and hence, the loss which the revenue sustains by the lessened importation of articles manufactured at home, is more than repaired by the increased consumption of others; and that, if to these considerations be added the steady and extraordinary advance of our population, and the necessary increase of luxury, the interests of the revenue may be fairly regarded, as secure from all future contingency and danger. As a striking illustration of the above positions, Mr. H. referred to the example of England, whose revenue has constantly increased, exactly in proportion as the restrictive system, for the encouragement of the manufacturing interest, has been enforced. Mr. H. contended further, that a more rigid tariff than the present—a tariff for the ample and exclusive protection of the great objects of our industry, would, whatever might be its immediate operation, ultimately advance (and at no distant period too) the interest of commerce. Such a tariff, it is acknowledged, would extinguish some of the fountains of commerce—but open a four-fold number in their stead.

It is impossible for me to say, Mr. Speaker, how far the feeble encouragement which we have thus far awarded to our manufactures, has advanced the interests of the Treasury. But if numerous facts be not entirely fallacious, we have already reaped a golden harvest from the limited sacrifices which we have heretofore so reluctantly made. How is the present remarkably flourishing state of the Treasury to be accounted for, unless we refer it, partly at least, to the friendly operation of our manufacturing establishments upon our foreign commerce? The great markets of Europe are closed upon our agricultural productions. And we have lost, consequent to a state of general peace, the carrying trade of half the world. Besides, sir, from the cultivation of sugar within our own territories, and the lessened importation of West India spirits, the revenue, as formerly constituted, has been lessened millions. But, notwithstanding these fearful fallings-off (and fearful they would have been, and wide-spread and desolating in their influence upon ordinary nations) we are steadily advancing in the career of commercial prosperity. Successive Treasury reports mock the predictions both of friend and foe. The canvass of our marine—I use, or wish to use no figure—still swells upon the remotest seas, and our flag yet streams upon every shore.

And where, I demand, are the realities of those gloomy forebodings—of those appalling pictures of national bankruptcy—of taxes, loans, and excises, conjured up, and so gloomily portrayed, to alarm the fearful and despairing politicians of 1816 and 1820? Faded away forever, and lost in the light of that general prosperity, of that energy and enterprise, of that industry and universal improvement, which is shedding a distinguishing lustre around the present moment, and illuminating, with the intensest brilliancy, the path of our future destinies.

I would not mock, Mr. Speaker, the House with idle tales, with visionary pictures; but I must be permitted to repeat, and to reiterate, again and again, in despite of the sombre picture of the Speaker, and of the innumerable examples of deep distress, embarrassment, and ruin, which have been and may be referred to, during the discussion, that the real, the vital, the lasting prosperity of this country, is not only not impaired, but steadily advancing. And here I am gratified to find myself upon ground, which has been so ably pre-occupied by the distinguished member from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) And further, sir, when we take into consideration the state of the world, growing out of the peace of Europe, and our own peculiar embarrassments, resulting in a great measure from the disastrous and temporizing policy which we have heretofore pursued, our situation, I apprehend, will be found to be one, not of ruin or despondency, but rather of wonder and congratulation. Our prosperity has heretofore resembled a stream, swelled by transient and extraordinary causes, into a torrent. The torrent has subsided, and the traces of its desolation, it is certain, are every where visible. But the stream, sir, the stream remains; sunk, indeed, into its accustomed channels, but still full and flowing, diffusing every where, life, fertility, and blessings, throughout our vast domain. But, wherefore this concession? What, sir! Because this great nation—ay, great nation—in the vigor of youth, and the freshness of her glorious institutions, has been sustained without fainting or falling, under the tremendous pressure of the times, shall we, her rightful guardians and protectors, refuse to lighten officially her immense burdens, or lessen, by every possible means of legislation, the duration of that long minority among nations to which she must otherwise necessarily be subjected?

I have spoken incidentally of the disastrous policy which we have pursued. One moment, sir, in explanation of this policy, of its origin, progress, and results. A state of universal warfare in Europe, by putting into requisition our entire commercial and agricultural energies, flooded us with wealth. Success, by intoxicating, lulled us into a delusion in relation to our real and permanent interests, unbappily as profound as it became universal and alarming. And when the shock of reaction, consequent to the sudden and universal peace which succeeded, awakened us from our golden dreams, we were absolutely astounded to discover that bread could grow in other soils, and enterprise flourish under other flags. Our great markets closed suddenly upon us, and the convulsion which succeeded forms a memorable epoch in our history, and would have proved inexpressibly jeopardous to the safety of the body politic, had not the redeeming spirit of our institutions interposed to save it from dissolution. And even at this moment, it is not difficult to perceive, that a silent but powerful cause of indisposition, if not hostility, to the manufacturing interest, arises from an undefined wish, from a lingering hope, that the circumstances of the world would again open to us the carrying trade, and the profitable markets of Europe. Thus, betraying a disposition to stake, as desperately as ungenerously, our great and lasting interests upon the contingency of foreign war, and the consequent miseries of the human race!

But this bill, sir, has excited the hostility of the manufacturing interest itself, particularly of the flourishing manufacturing interest in the East. A single remark, in reply to this objection. This hostility, ungenerous and unbecoming as it may seem, is perfectly natural. The manufacturer has perceived, (and certainly the perception required no preternatural illumination,) that the ultimate operation of this bill, by bringing additional skill, capital, and competition into the business, will tend to lessen, rather than multiply, his profits. And hence his hostility. A fact worth a thousand speculations, urged, as they may be, with all the zeal and perseverance of the gentlemen of the South. Do not gentlemen perceive the dilemma to which this argument reduces them? The South combats the bill, because it will advance the price of goods; and thus operate as a permanent and oppressive tax upon its agriculture. The manufacturing interest of the East, on the contrary, combats it, because it will destroy monopoly, and reduce the price of the manufactured article below its present value, to the minimum of a living profit.

But, Mr. Speaker, is it correct policy, to stimulate, at this moment, by additional protection, the manufacturing interest of this country? This is the more immediate question before this House? My views, in relation to it, are soon expressed and easily understood. To the manufacture of cotton and woollen goods, of iron and glass, flax, and hemp, and lead, and all other manufactures, the material of which we either possess, or can create in abundance, and which are indispensable for our security and independence in peace and war, I would grant ample, and, as rapidly as circumstances would permit, exclusive protection. Between these, and the innumerable other articles which constitute a great mass of our foreign commerce, I would draw a line of perpetual distinction. The first, as I have observed, I would protect amply and immediately. For the last, I would remain dependent upon foreign nations, or reserve as subjects for future legislation. This, sir, very briefly expressed, is the manufacturing policy which I am disposed to advocate, and of which this bill, as originally reported by the Committee, was a fair exposition; a policy equally removed from the system of bounties and monopolies on the one part, as from the visionary and degrading system of foreign dependence and unrestricted commerce on the other. "A policy which purports not to protect the manufacture of gold and silver; not the velvets of Lyons, or the silks of Spitalfields; not the lawns of Brussels, or the laces of Cambray; not the clinquillierie or the bijouterie of Paris or Birmingham, but such 'as we feel the want of in time of war, and such as may fairly be regarded as of prime necessity, or immediately connected with agricultural wants and pursuits.'—Professor Cooper.

And this policy, whatever may be said or imagined to the contrary, is the growing, and is, indeed, already the favorite policy of the American people. It is an appeal to their interests, their patriotism, and experience, which, from its very nature, must be irresistible. And gentlemen may denounce the bill in the bitterest possible manner; they may originate for it, and affix to it the most opprobrious epithets; and they surely have betrayed no lack of capacity in this respect; they may hold it up to public reproach, to public execration, as high and as perspicuously as they are able—stigmatizing it as a tax, levied most unrighteously upon the agricultural community; as "an odious monopoly," calculated to benefit the few at the expense of the many; as a "voracious idol," which is to swallow up all the other interests of the country; as "a vast experiment," got up for the amusement of speculative politicians; or, finally, as "a hateful and accursed measure," which is to bring down upon the Republic dissolution, penury, and pauperism. But, sir, in despite of this host of imaginary evils—of this storm of epithets, which gentlemen have literally showered upon the bill,—its policy, the American policy of the Speaker—will prevail—will remain fixed and irreversible—its foundation being deeply sunk in public opinion—in the confidence, favor, and affections of the people.

Permit me now to make a few general observations upon the bill. If there be a principle in political economy, or any other science, entitled to unquestionable assent, it is, that commercial restrictions, or a tariff of duties, calculated to protect the manufacturing or home industry, is indispensably necessary, in the present state of the world, to develop the resources, and establish the wealth of nations. It is a principle sustained by the universal testimony of the present and the past. Its truth is written in letters emphatically of gold, in the history of every country that has adopted it, and marked, on the contrary, in characters of ruin and bankruptcy, and utter extinction, in the examples of such as have rejected or abandoned it. It is the great wand, indeed, of the magician, which, when stretched over nations, sheds upon the most unpropitious regions the bounties and blessings of Providence; but which, reversed, withers away from the fairest portions of the globe the munificence of nature. Language, Mr. Speaker, as unequivocal as this, will probably be denounced as declamation; but it is notwithstanding the sober evidence of experience, in every period of the civilized world. Consult both ancient and modern history, and you will find the restrictive system, either in its natural or artificial existences, virtually the basis upon which every nation has erected the superstructure of its distinction and wealth. It was this principle which, upwards of thirty centuries ago, collected upon the rock of Tyre the riches of the ancient world, and which in modern Europe has given to Venice and Genoa, to Holland and England, a rank and influence among nations entirely denied them by the dispositions of Providence. Since the agitation of this subject, I have examined, or rather glanced over, the history of every distinguished modern nation in its relation to manufactures. And it is a striking and gratifying fact to observe in every instance civilization and science, intelligence, and freedom, dominion and wealth, following in their footsteps. From the modern Greeks, (in the twelfth century the most polished people in Europe,) they passed to the Venetians and Lombards. From the Lombards to the Hanseatic towns of Germany and Holland; from Holland to France and England. An imposing and magnificent march—destined to receive its final consummation, (who will presume to doubt?) in the land of Fulton and Franklin!

But the early manufacturing cities and nations of Europe, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) who opened this discussion says, have disappeared—have perished from the earth. And the eloquent gentleman seems to deduce from this fact a general argument against the manufacturing interest, as tending more than any other interest, from the contingent and perishable nature of its capital, to hasten prematurely, the decay of nations. But alas! sir, upon what communities, however constituted, does the breath of time alone pass over, not to blight or destroy? The Eternal City itself is sinking beneath the influences of an agent the most fearful and mysterious in its march of desolation of any of the hitherto visitations of the Almighty. The cities and republics referred to were the creations of accident—of fortuitous circumstances, from the beginning. And they have declined and perished by being absorbed by the nations around them possessing from nature most extensive manufacturing advantages, and availing themselves of them.

It is with nations, Mr. Speaker, as with individuals; and the economy of nations, it has been said during the debate, should be represented in miniature by the economy of well regulated families. I subscribe with pleasure to the doctrine. And the whole policy of the bill before us may be beautifully illustrated by the family of an American farmer. The farmer, in all the essentials of life, of food, and clothing, is perfectly independent. Accidental circumstances—a state of war, for example—brings to him, as it brings to every one, embarrassments and privations; but it does not; it cannot, abridge materially the necessities, or even the conveniences and comforts of his household. He is independent. But, independent as he is, he is willing to continue dependent upon other countries for the finer articles of clothing, and the luxuries of his table. And such is the nature of the independence which this bill contemplates to give to this country. I have not time to extend the illustration further. Yes, sir; it is indeed with nations as with individuals. And, if there be in national economy a spectacle more gratifying than the independence of an American farmer, it will only be found in that more extended and magnificent spectacle—the independence of this great Republic—with all its interests, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing, aided, sustained, advanced, and carried to perfection.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

But, what kind of tariff would gentlemen be willing to tolerate? What, I repeat, is the nature of the commercial system which they are disposed to establish as the permanent policy of this country? It is something which I can scarcely comprehend, and certainly not define. Something, I presume, graduated to the minimum of an ordinary revenue law, and based upon the principle of Adam Smith, that national prosperity is best promoted by an entire dissolution of commercial restrictions—by a free and liberal intercourse among nations. Come, then, let us test for a moment this specious, captivating theory. Let us pursue this free, this liberal system, to its legitimate, its ultimate consequences. Repeal your revenue laws; raze your custom-houses to their foundations; give your commercial restrictions, of every description, to the winds; and, after you have achieved these triumphs over the institutions—the delusions, if you please, of ages—go reap the golden, glorious harvest which awaits you. Alas! you have sown in the winds and must reap the desolation of the whirlwind. The Kalmuc of the Crimea will supply you with bread; the Copt of Egypt, and the Indian of Bengal with cotton; England, as formerly, with your household furniture, and France with the articles of your wardrobe. Your great interests paralyzed; your agriculture languishing; commerce declining; manufactures perishing; your— But, sir, I cannot, will not finish the picture. It is too utterly repulsive and extravagant. But, repulsive as it is, and extravagant as it may seem to be, it is a picture faithfully correct, and exhibits, in strong relief, the desolation and extremity to which the favorite system of gentlemen opposed to this tariff—the system of unrestricted commerce, in the present state of the world, if adopted and persevered in, would necessarily and rapidly reduce us.

But gentlemen contend that manufactures will naturally arise whenever population acquires a certain degree of density; that capital will seek its most profitable investments; will flow into its most profitable channels; and, consequently, that the interference of Government to give it impulse or direction, is to be deprecated as intrusive, unnecessary, and unjust. I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that such opinions are either "jargon or nonsense;" these would be ungracious terms, notwithstanding their recent application, from a distinguished quarter of the House, to a proposition apparently obvious and irresistible. But I do contend, that the doctrine which maintains that manufactures will arise of themselves, in the present age of stern and universal competition, without the aid and protection of Government, if not "jargon or nonsense," is mockery—the bitterest mockery. They cannot arise. It is true, that the ordinary domestic manufactures may arise and flourish, as they have arisen and flourished, in a remarkable manner among us. But the greater manufactures, national manufactures—the manufactures devoted to the great articles of commerce—cannot be established or sustained without the fostering and unceasing aid of commercial restrictions. They will otherwise fail, and sink, and perish, and be withered away from the face of the earth, before the skill, the competition, and enterprise, of older and more protected nations.

But England, gentlemen say, is tired of the restrictive system, and willing and anxious to abandon it. This fact, Mr. Speaker, if established, would prove a strong argument against us, inasmuch as we depend much upon the example of England for the illustration and defence of our doctrines. But what facts do gentlemen adduce, to prove that England is really tired of the restrictive system, and willing to abandon it? Is it from the occasional declamation which we hear, and to which we have been referred, in the English Parliament; or is it from the letters of English commercial agents; or from essays in English newspapers and reviews, written designedly to mislead and bewilder other nations—particularly this country? Is it from sources like these that gentlemen have deduced the proposition that England is tired of her commercial system, (the restrictive system,) and willing to abandon it? England tired of her commercial system! Sir, it is a system so interwoven with every tissue and fibre of her existence, that the relaxation of a moment would seriously endanger its vitality. England tired of her commercial system! England is self-styled "the fast-anchored island"—"the mistress of the seas." Let her but abandon her commercial system, and the bark—the proud, proud bark—of her destinies will be driven, almost instantaneously, from its innumerable moorings, and soon dismantled and a wreck, with the billows of the ocean dashing over it! England tired of her commercial system! England is the Queen of Islands—the great mart of the commercial world. Let her but abandon her commercial system, and this day and generation shall not pass, before she shall become desolate and a waste, and present to history, like the Babylon of the Apocalypse, a mighty and memorable ruin, from age to age, forever. England tired of her commercial system! But, why should England be tired of her commercial system? Has it failed to accomplish any of the great objects for which it was established? On the contrary, has it not rendered her distinguished and wealthy and powerful beyond all example, and beyond all calculation? We are told in Eastern fables of gold unbounded—of riches inconceivable. We read in classic history of Plutus and Midas and the golden sands of Pactolus. But these fables—these brilliant dreams of poetry and romance—have been realized—ay, more than realized—by the commercial system of England. Her land is the land of palaces; her streams are richer than the sands of the Lydian river; and her commercial and manufacturing cities present wealth more abundant than the gold of the modern Ophir, or the multiplied productions of the hither and further India. But, with all her wealth, England is, notwithstanding, gentlemen observe, the land of debt irredeemable, of paupers, and taxation. True, sir, true; the result, however, of every cause rather than her protective system—of her ruinous and interminable wars; of the bitter blessings of legitimacy; of kings and courts and pensioners; and that all-pervading and unceasing spirit of parade and expenditure, which, by the perversion of public opinion, is regarded as indispensable for throwing a becoming splendor round the altar and the throne; and sustaining, what Burke has absurdly denominated the grace and majesty of a great people!

But, sir, the very fact that England has been enabled to accumulate her immense debt, and sustain herself under its tremendous pressure, appears to me to carry with it strong evidences of the extraordinary influences of her system upon the resources and wealth of nations. There are several facts which so strongly illustrate the results of her restrictive system, that I must be permitted to present them to the House. The revenue of England has amounted, in a single year, the Speaker has informed us, to four hundred millions of dollars! An unprecedented fact in financial history. Again, sir. The annual interest of the English national debt amounts, at present, to between one hundred and fifty and one hundred and sixty millions of dollars! a sum greatly exceeding the whole interest and principal of the national debt of this country; and which, moreover, is sufficient to provide for, and maintain comfortably at one great public table, the entire population of the United Kingdom forever! But, sir, there is another fact which exhibits the resources and wealth of England to an extent still more unprecedented and extraordinary. In 1798, when the genius of the modern Cæsar was carrying the victorious arms of the French Republic over Europe; at a moment when the excessive loaning system of Pitt had excited dismay and consternation throughout the moneyed circles, and the Kingdom itself seemed tottering upon the brink, if not of revolution, at least of some great convulsion—at this moment, I say, of universal dependency, the idea was conceived that the attitude of the nation might still be preserved, and the vast expenditures of the war successfully met by additional impositions upon the revenue and income of the people of England, or, in the language of the Exchequer, by creating the supplies within the year. The idea was adopted; England was thrown upon her own resources; and, in less than twenty-three years, in addition to the loans and the ordinary war taxes of the Kingdom, already carried to the supposed maximum of possible payment of endurance, upwards of three thousand millions of dollars were realized from the internal revenues of the Kingdom; a sum largely transcending the entire wealth dug, for ages past, from all the mines of all the world. A single remark more in relation to England. Contrast her situation, for a moment, with any other country that has pursued an opposite commercial system—with Spain, for example. England is, naturally, the land of mist and gloom; a comparatively barren island in the Northern ocean: Spain, the most delightful region in the temperate zone. Three hundred years ago Spain was rich and powerful—so much for the industry of the Saracens: England, poor and resourceless. About this period, they exchanged commercial systems, or rather, they adopted new ones; and the result, after the lapse of three centuries, is before the world. England sways a sceptre, compared with which, the power of the Roman Cæsars shrinks to nothing. But Spain—sir, it would be as possible to give form and stature, and flesh and blood, to the ashes of her ancient kings, as to extort, by any possible means of legislation, from the entire population of the Spanish monarchy, the ordinary revenue of England for a single year. And yet, sir, such is the result, the splendid, the magnificent, the almost inconceivable result, of a system which is so bitterly denounced, even in its least exceptionable parts, in its application to this country!

I will detain the House but a few moments longer. But, before I take my seat, I must be permitted to express my surprise and regret at the extraordinary excitement which the system under consideration has produced. It embraces no monopoly. On the contrary, there is not an article which it purports to protect, which time alone, unaided and unprotected, would not establish. No, sir. The policy of this bill, I mean the policy of efficient protection to the great objects of our industry, is no sickly exotic, whose miserable existence can only be sustained by unceasing nurture and protection; but the hardy native plant that, unassisted, attains slowly to maturity, but which strikes its roots deeply, and extends its branches loftily in proportion to the care and protection which we award to it.

The adversaries of the bill affect to regard it as a question, whether we shall, or shall not become, a manufacturing people. This is not the question. We are already a manufacturing people; the greatest, with the exception of France and England, in the world—at least in the Christian world. We manufacture, by computation, from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of dollars worth of fabrics—similar articles of which we imported, or the greater part of which we imported, before and since the Revolution, from England, France, and Holland. The monuments of our dependence upon the old world, are yet every where visible. Within our immediate vision stands a house (and such houses are found in all the Atlantic States,) built of imported materials, and constructed probably—for in many instances houses were so constructed—by European artificers. The progress indeed which we have made in every department of useful industry is unexampled. And if gentlemen would but look back and observe what we have accomplished for the last thirty years, by means of our own unassisted energies; and then look forward for the same period, and reflect upon what these energies—stimulated and sustained by protective laws, and operating on the rapid development of our internal wealth and resources, may and must accomplish, a single glance at the brilliant prospect would be sufficient—at least should be sufficient to remove all doubts—to extinguish all apprehensions, in relation to the policy under consideration.

But I despair of being able to direct the attention of gentlemen either to the past or the future. They are so deeply interested with the present moment, in combatting the shadows—the Gorgons and Chimeras, which imagination has conjured up from this bill, that both precedent and prospect are alike lost upon them.

But the bill is further denounced as a novel project—as a vast and wanton experiment—as a bill containing new and extraordinary principles. Sir, it is neither project nor experiment. It contains no new nor uncommon principles.

Its principles, indeed, are as ancient as history; and have been incorporated into the policy of every nation, distinguished for success in commerce or the arts. A novel project! Sir, it is the policy we combat—the unrestrictive system of modern economists, the dissolution of all tariffs—which is the real novelty of the day. A system captivating in theory, but totally inapplicable to the present state and temper of the commercial world. The age of free commerce, like the millennium of Patmos, the reign of universal peace, is evidently reserved for times less stern than ours. The temple of Janus, we may confidently predict, will be closed for the last time, and forever, among men, before its revolutions commence. But to close my remarks—What sir, is the real nature of the bill before us? of this “fearful, frightful bill?” of this “stamp act measure?” which is to be the precursor, if we are to credit the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who immediately preceded me, of rebellion and revolution? of this “fire-brand,” which is about to be thrown (not indeed into the Ottoman empire but) into a region of spirits infinitely more fiery and formidable than Turk or Greek—the South? What I demand is the real nature—the pervading spirit—the grand design of the bill before us? Sir, the full front and face of its offending, is this, and simply this, to secure to American industry, by a liberal, progressive, and protective tariff, the monopoly of our own resources—of that vast manufacturing material, which nature, in her munificence, has every where created around us, in immeasurable abundance.

I have nothing further to add, but to thank the House for its indulgence, and apologize for having trespassed so long upon its time.

FRIDAY, April 16.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of John Ross, George Lowrey, Major Ridge, and Elijah Hicks, delegates from the Cherokee nation of Indians, representing the unwillingness of the Cherokees to abandon the territory upon which they now reside, declaring their determination to pursue peaceably, agriculture, manufactures, and the mechanic arts, and praying that the General Government will protect their rights.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER also presented a petition, signed by Thomas Law, Walter Jones, and Elias B. Caldwell, a committee appointed at a public meeting of the citizens of Washington, praying the attention of Congress to the pecuniary embarrassment of the country, and the establishment of a national paper currency, as best calculated to remedy the evil.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to divide the district of Kentucky into two judicial districts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of John Mitchell, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. GURLEY, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of relinquishing to the parish of West Baton Rouge, in Louisiana, the title of the United States to a tract of land containing about eight acres front on the Mississippi, for the purpose of making and keeping in repair a levee on said land.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, viz:

1st. An act for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt;

2d. An act for the relief of Thaddeus Maybew;

3d. An act for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner;

4th. An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the district of Missouri;

5th. An act for the relief of Thomas Hewes; were, severally, read the first and second time, and referred; the 1st, to the Committee of Claims; the 2d, to the Committee of Claims; the 3d, to the Committee on Roads and Canals; the 4th, to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the 5th, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A Message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: “An act for enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church, Washington parish;” “An act to provide for the sale of the warehouse at the former quarantine ground, near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, and for the erection of a dwelling house at the Balize, in the said State, for the use of the boarding officer at that place, and for other purposes;” “An act supplementary to an act of Congress, passed on the 30th day of June, 1812, entitled ‘An act making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri;’” “An act for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel, of Philadelphia;” and “An act for the relief of Thomas Shields;” in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

Three Messages were received from the President of the UNITED STATES, to wit:.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. GOVAN, from the committee to which was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the suppression of the African slave trade, reported a bill respecting the slave trade; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this law, if any citizen of the United States, or any person resident therein, shall, in any port or place whatsoever, build, or in any respect fit, equip, man, load, or otherwise prepare, or cause to be prepared, or in any respect fitted, equipped, manned, or otherwise prepared, or be in any respect concerned in equipping, manning, or preparing any ship or vessel, for the purpose of being employed in the slave trade, or in the transportation of slaves from any foreign port or place to any foreign port or place whatsoever, for the purpose aforesaid, every such citizen or other person, so offending, shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding seven years; and such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions and cargo, on board thereof, shall be forfeited. And any citizen, or other person resident as aforesaid, who shall voluntarily serve on board such ship or vessel, or shall sail on board thereof, knowing the same to be intended to be employed in the slave trade, or in the transportation of slaves as aforesaid, shall, on conviction, be liable to be punished by fine not exceeding three thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding five years.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to affect, or in any wise repeal, any acts hitherto passed for the prohibition or suppression of the slave trade; but the same acts, and every clause thereof, shall remain in full force, in the same manner as if this act had not been made.

CLAIM OF DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the claim of D. D. TOMPKINS, which, on motion of Mr. COCKE, was laid on the table a day or two ago, was taken up.

Mr. COCKE then moved to recommit the report to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill. This motion he grounded on the fact that, to agree to the report of the committee, would only leave the matter where it was before. He proceeded to examine, in detail, the report of the committee, in part of which he said he cordially acquiesced, being willing to make every just, and even liberal allowance to this individual, and in other particulars of which he was of opinion the Government was not bound to make to Governor Tompkins any indemnification whatever. He specified the sort of allowances which he was disposed to make, and those to which he objected. He concluded his observations, by moving the instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill, viz :

" 1st. To authorize an allowance of interest on all moneys advanced by Daniel D. Tompkins on account of the United States, from the time of making the advances until its repayment.

" 2d. To provide indemnity for actual losses sustained by him in consequence of the United States failing to furnish him with money and Treasury notes within the time stipulated, and on account of which failure the losses were sustained."

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, made a few remarks expressive of his opinion, that the most liberal adjustment of the accounts of this officer should be made. He would not only settle his accounts liberally, he said, but, if within the powers of this House, he would vote him from the national funds any reasonable amount of compensation besides, for the eminent services he has rendered his country. This country must be reduced low, indeed, if it was not disposed to remunerate such services as his. Such a man as Daniel D. Tompkins was not always to be found when wanted. The virtue and integrity of that man led mainly to the fortunate termination of the war with Great Britain. He would not trammel the settlement of his accounts with the same checks and restrictions as are required upon the settlement of the accounts of a disbursing officer, acting under prescribed rules; for, when the United States had no credit, that individual had not spared his own—at a time, too, when, as our fleets were endeavoring to get to sea, there were men, in a neighboring State, who showed blue lights as a signal to the enemy. The destinies of this nation were, in a manner, in the hands of that man, and his patriotism and virtue saved us from disgrace and defeat, &c.

Mr. McLANE suggested to the gentleman from Tennessee the propriety of a recommitment, with less limited instructions.

Mr. COCKE professed a desire to do every thing that justice should dictate to Governor Tompkins, and any modification of the instructions, compatible with that view of the subject, he was willing to assent to.

Mr. McLANE then expressed his views of this subject. He considered it unfortunate that the subject had been again brought before the House, and was averse to a recommitment of it now, because it was at too late a period of the session to take up the subject de novo, and act upon it. He then stated what was the particular situation of the accounts of this gentleman, adverting to the act of Congress passed at the last session, and the principles of the report of the select committee on which that act was founded. At that time, he suggested, the subject of these accounts underwent an elaborate discussion. The question, whether or not it was proper to make an equitable settlement of the claims of Governor Tompkins, was then decided in the affirmative. If the House were now to undertake to resettle these claims, he did not know when any settlement of a principle by this House was to be considered conclusive. There must be some end to questions of this sort, and he was desirous that the same weight should be given to decisions on questions of right by Congress, as if the same decisions had been made in a court of justice. On the question of commissions, for which the President was disposed to make a liberal allowance to Governor Tompkins, and which the accounting officers were disposed to allow, on the principles usual in the settlement of ordinary accounts, Mr. McL. said, that Mr. Tompkins had procured for the Government, during the war, loans of money for the use of the Government to the amount of one million eight hundred thousand dollars, and had also disbursed those funds; and, without the aid which it thus received from this individual, every one must know that the operations of the war would have been exceedingly embarrassed. For this service, of borrowing and disbursement, it was proposed to allow him a commission of five per cent., which would make an amount of about $95,000. And of this amount, Mr. McL. said, there was a sum of $460,000, for which the Government had agreed to send to the Vice President Treasury notes to take up the personal notes which he had given for it. But the Treasury notes did not arrive until his own notes had become due and been protested, by which his credit was destroyed, to which, in a great degree, all the subsequent losses and misfortunes of this gentleman were to be attributed. The Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. McL. said, did not wish to reinvestigate this case, or they would have been disposed to recommend a more liberal allowance than was proposed. If instructed, however, by the House, it would be their duty to take it into consideration. He replied to some other suggestions of Mr. COCKE, as to the nature of the services rendered by Mr. Tompkins in the capacity of a Major General. If the gentleman had had an opportunity of becoming fully acquainted with the facts on the subject, he would have learned that his services, in that capacity, had been of great importance. On one occasion he had left his family, then in a deplorable situation, and departed in the night for the frontier, where he called forth the militia, and at that moment saved the country. The Committee of Ways and Means, he added, would have acceded to the propositions of the Vice President, in regard to the difference which now exists between him and the Government, if they had not considered the law of the last session so broad as to make any further legislation on the subject unnecessary.

Mr. HAMILTON rose to testify to the fact of the Vice President having exercised military command during the war, which was within his personal knowledge.

The question was then taken on Mr. COCKE's motion, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

And the question was then taken on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, referring the subject back to the final decision of the President, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for the revision of the several acts laying duties upon imports—the question being on Mr. RANDOLPH'S motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. McDURME rose and said, the unsolicited indulgence of the House, to which he was indebted for the opportunity of presenting his views on this interesting subject to-day, instead of being compelled to perform that duty yesterday, under the fatigue and exhaustion of a long sitting, had laid him under obligations of which he was profoundly sensible. The only return, however, said Mr. McD., which I can promise, for the kindness thus shown to me, is the brevity of the remarks which I propose to offer. At so late a stage of this already protracted discussion, I cannot flatter myself with the expectation that I shall interest the attention of the House by the novelty of my arguments, but must be content to indulge the hope that I may not exhaust its patience by their prolixity.

During the progress of this debate upon the various questions which have arisen upon the details of the bill, I have studiously avoided entering into the consideration of the general principles and policy of the protecting system. And I have done so in compliance with this general rule, by which I have determined to regulate my conduct, so long as I have the honor of a seat upon this floor, never to consume the time of the House by discussing any question which is not distinctly before it for consideration. I have the less cause to regret having thus abstained on the present occasion, because it is now obvious that the subject has assumed more than its usual interest, as well from the crisis at which we have arrived, as from the peculiar circumstances under which the question is now presented to us. In all the various stages of our proceedings, we have still had before us the opportunity of reviewing our work. But the question being now on the passage of the bill, whatever decision we shall make upon it, will be, as to us, final and irrevocable. And we are called upon to give this final sanction to the measure, with the fact clearly ascertained, that it cannot be adopted but by a very small majority. Waiving, for a moment, any inquiry into the policy of protecting domestic manufactures, I put it to gentlemen to say whether prudence does not dictate, even to the most firm and independent statesman, that a measure laying very heavy burdens upon the whole community—a measure which, however we may speculate upon the subject, the people must sensibly feel—a measure which has already produced, in some parts of the Union, the most intense excitement, ought to be adopted with a bare majority of the national representatives in its favor? Sir, a Government emanating from the people, and responsible to public opinion, ought not to be indifferent to this prudential consideration. I do not profess to be minutely acquainted with the Parliamentary history of Great Britain; but I hazard little in asserting that no British Minister, in the height of his ascendancy, would venture to pass even a tax bill for the public service, to the extent of this, with a majority so small as that which has ordered this bill to its third reading.

This measure, all agree, is part of a system intended to produce a great and fundamental change in the policy of the country—a change, to be effected by disturbing the relations which now exist between the different portions of the Union and the different classes of society. That such a change as this can be produced by legal regulations, operating, of necessity, as a tax upon the people, without exciting a strong feeling of popular discontent, not to say indignation, is an expectation which gentlemen delude themselves if they indulge. An acute and lively sensibility to every invasion, by Government, of the rights of property, is one of the strongest characteristics of freedom in modern times; and there is no people on earth more distinguished for it than the citizens of the United States. I therefore submit it, respectfully, to the consideration of the friends of the manufacturing interest themselves, whether there is not serious danger that a measure of this character, enacted by a lean majority, will produce a reaction among the people, which may result in the entire prostration of the system they are so anxious to foster and extend.

In soliciting the attention of the House to a very brief examination of the policy of this measure, it is far from my intention to enter into a formal dissertation upon the general principles of political economy. This is neither the place nor the occasion for such dissertations. My observations shall be confined to a practical examination of the question, in reference to the actual state of things in this country, assuming, as a basis, a few palpable and obvious principles, which have long ceased to be questionable in the estimation of the most enlightened philosophers and statesmen of Europe.

Whilst, sir, on the one hand I unequivocally deny, what is maintained by some, that manufacturing industry is, in itself, more profitable than agricultural or commercial, I distinctly disclaim the notion, maintained by others, that the pursuits of agriculture are more profitable than those of manufacture or commerce. All such notions are utterly erroneous and visionary, and are founded upon a misconception of what it is that constitutes wealth, and of the principles which regulate the distribution of capital and labor. What is wealth? The wealth of a nation consists in the abundance of those articles which administer to the necessities, the comforts, and the luxuries of life, according to the existing habits of society. It results from this, that a combination of the products of agriculture and of manufacture is essential to the wealth of a civilized community, such as exists in the United States. With the most unlimited abundance of the products of agriculture, we should be poor without the products of art; and with an equal abundance of manufactures, we should perish without the productions of the soil. It is conceded, on all hands, that we abound in articles of the latter description; and the only question to be debated is, how can we most advantageously obtain the former? Shall we fabricate them ourselves or import them from abroad? To the common understanding of mankind, it would seem to be a self-evident proposition that the cheapest mode of obtaining them is that which a nation ought to pursue, as it is certainly that which individuals would pursue, with a view to the promotion of their own interest. But here we are met with the argument that commerce is a barren and unproductive pursuit. A very few remarks will serve to refute this notion, which, when examined, will be found to be a mere verbal proposition. It is true that commerce does not produce either the one or the other of the elements of wealth, but it communicates value to both. Without commerce the surplus production, both of individuals and nations, would be utterly valueless. Of what value, for example, are the surplus productions of the manufactories of Manchester and Birmingham, either to us or to those who produce them, until, by the agency of commerce, they are brought to our stores and distributed to the consumers? It would be precisely as correct to say that their entire value is derived from commerce, as to maintain that its operations are unproductive. Either proposition would be equally absurd. While, therefore, I view any proposition, which asserts the superior productiveness of one of the great divisions of human industry over the others, as being not only erroneous, but absolutely unmeaning and unintelligible, I admit that the wealth of a community depends upon the maintenance of a due proportion between them. And the question for a practical statesman to determine is, how is this proportion to be maintained, so as to produce the greatest aggregate benefit to the community?

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

On this question, if I may be permitted, and I scarcely know whether I ought to venture upon it, I will lay down a general principle, upon the authority of Adam Smith, who, notwithstanding the terms of sweeping condemnation which have been applied to his speculations, has done more to enlighten the world on the science of political economy than any man of modern times. He is the founder of the science. All that has been since done is but a development or modification of the principles he established. What, then, is his great elementary principle? That labor and capital, if left to receive their direction from individual sagacity, will naturally seek, and speedily find, the most profitable employments. And this is founded upon the idea that individuals are more capable of forming a judgment as to what will promote their pecuniary interests, than the most enlightened Government can possibly be, from the very nature of things. This, however, is denounced as empty theory! Every thing, it seems, which does not result from legislation, from the officious restrictions of Government, is to be regarded as the operation of a ruinous theory. But, sir, I put it to the common sense and common observation of every gentleman in the House, whether this theory does not rest upon the most steady and immutable and powerful principles of human action—principles which never cease for a moment to actuate the great mass of every community. What stronger instinct belongs to the character of man than that which impels him to improve his condition? And what conceivable obliquity of perception can prevent him from discovering, upon a survey of the various pursuits which are open to him, that from which, with his peculiar capacities, he can derive the greatest profit? I can very well imagine the case of a rude and barbarous people, unaccustomed to the enjoyments of civilized life, in which a Government, despotic in its character, and rising much above the existing state of intelligence in the country over which it holds dominion, might produce great and beneficial changes in the pursuits of society by legal regulations. The Government, for example, which should conduct a people from the hunter to the shepherd state, or from the latter to the agricultural, would undoubtedly confer the most signal benefits upon the community. Such a change, however, could be accomplished only by a gradual improvement of the people, and by giving them a taste for comforts and luxuries to which they were unaccustomed. But, I will venture to say that there is not a people on the face of the earth to whom a policy of this kind would be so utterly inapplicable as to the people of these United States. What, sir, is their character? Is there a nation more acute, ingenious, or enterprising, more keen and sagacious in perceiving the avenues to profit, or more prompt and energetic to pursue them? Do they need the direction of this Government to indicate the way to individual prosperity? Shall we undertake to enlighten the capitalists of Boston as to the most profitable mode of investing their disengaged capital? They would laugh to scorn the folly and impotence of such officious dictation. It will scarcely be alleged that our people have not a taste for the products of manufacture. For all the productions of human industry—for all the articles, at least, of which we propose to encourage the domestic fabrication, the people of this country have perhaps too keen an appetite. Indeed, the complaint of the friends of this measure is, that they import them in too great abundance. No legislation, therefore, is necessary to create a demand for those articles. In such a state of things, the general principle is indisputably true, that capital and labor will naturally flow into the most profitable channels of industry, without the control of Government.

But, to this general principle I admit there is an exception, which I will candidly state. And here I will take leave to remark, that, anxious as I am to defeat this measure, which I believe would be ruinous to some portions of the Union, and beneficial to none; yet I would not, if I could, accomplish this object by stating any principle which I believe to be false. An elevated morality, which regards the establishment of correct principles as more important than victory, should characterize our deliberations here. I admit then that when from the revolutions of trade or the progress of society a crisis has occurred in which a great and fundamental change must take place in the distribution of the capital and labor of a nation, a wise, moderate, and cautious legislation may aid in effecting the change, and is even necessary to effect it in the manner most beneficial to the community. But, sir, if we attentively examine the principles upon which this proposition is founded, we shall perceive that useful legislation on this subject is confined to very narrow limits, and that there is much greater danger of doing harm by transcending these limits than by abstaining from legislative interference altogether.

What, then, are the principles upon which the interference of Government can be justified, in such a crisis as that to which I have alluded? In the first place, the habits of a community, operating with something like the force of laws, will induce an adherence to accustomed pursuits, after they have ceased to be profitable. But the principal ground upon which the protecting policy can in any case be justified, is the inability of infant manufacturing establishments to sustain a successful competition with their foreign rivals, even after the country has reached the point at which the domestic article can, with the experience of a few years, be fabricated cheaper than the foreign. And here, sir, the limit of the protecting system is distinctly indicated. It must be satisfactorily shown, that the protection sought is only temporary; and that, after a reasonable time is given to acquire experience and skill, and bring the domestic manufactories to perfection, they can furnish the domestic fabrics cheaper than similar fabrics could be obtained from abroad. Now, if we apply these principles to the actual protection heretofore extended to our domestic manufactures, it will be seen that the Government has already fulfilled its obligations to them, in the amplest manner. Gentlemen have argued this question as if the manufacturing interest of the country had been unjustly assailed by some foreign power, and Congress had manifested the most cruel indifference to their sufferings. But is there the slightest foundation for either of these assumptions? The only power with which our manufacturers have had permanently to contend, is the superior natural advantages of the foreign artisan; and I will now call the attention of the House to the protection which our establishments have actually received from this Government. I venture to assert, that since the commencement of the restrictive system in 1807, the manufacturers of this country have enjoyed an unusual and artificial stimulus from our legislation; and I am perfectly satisfied that it is this extraordinary stimulus that has given them that voracious appetite for prohibition which nothing, it seems, but the absolute protection of all rival articles can satiate.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Manufactures not protected! Why, sir, during the restrictive system, our commerce with the manufacturers of Europe was almost entirely annihilated, and our own manufacturers had little short of an absolute monopoly of the home market. And here, sir, let me call the attention of these practical gentlemen, who so contemptuously discard every theory but their own, to the effect of this restrictive system, upon the distribution of the capital and labor of the country. During the five years of commercial restrictions which preceded the war with Great Britain, when there must have existed in the country a superabundance of surplus capital, suddenly disengaged from commerce, we find that manufactures, notwithstanding they enjoyed the advantages of a prohibitory system, made but a very slow and gradual progress. If gentlemen would duly consult this portion of our experience, I think it would at least admonish them to have a little patience. They would see that, under any possible protection which legislation can provide, particularly in time of peace, when there is no extraordinary consumption of manufactures, these must, in the very nature of things, advance by slow degrees. It cannot be otherwise, unless we ascribe to an act of Congress the magical power of forcing on manufactures beyond the natural capacity of the country, either to produce or to pay for them. Yes, sir, it would be well for us to reflect that it is much more easy to diminish the consumption than to increase the production of manufactured articles, by prohibitory legislation. Such was undoubtedly the effect of the restrictive system. But the measure which gave the strongest impulse to our manufactures, was the war of 1812. And here it is worth remarking, that a war with England gives a stimulus to manufactures, which no other kind of protection can possibly afford. For, at the same time that it cuts off our trade with the nation that principally supplies us with manufactures, it compensates the diminished consumption of them by the people, by the extraordinary consumption of the Government. At the close of the war, the system of double duties was continued till 1816, when the existing tariff was enacted for the avowed purpose of sustaining those establishments which the war had brought into existence, against the extraordinary influx of foreign manufactures, resulting from the universal restoration of peace in Europe. And while I contend that the tariff of 1816 afforded a most liberal protection to the manufacturing interest, I most perfectly accord in the policy which dictated that measure. I distinctly recognise the principle, that, wherever large investments of capital have been made in consequence of a state of things produced by the necessary acts of the Government itself, the Government is under a moral obligation to extend to the interests, thus created, a reasonable protection.

But, sir, what is a reasonable protection in such a case? Can it be expected that the manufacturing interest is to be maintained permanently in the same degree of prosperity that it enjoyed during the war? That it is to be exempted from a participation in that general distress which has pervaded the whole community? This would not only be unreasonable, but utterly impracticable. Nothing but a perpetuation of the war could have accomplished so much for the manufacturers. What, sir, was the light in which the tariff of 1816 was viewed by the liberal statesmen who then supported it? It was intended merely to mitigate the shock which our manufacturing establishments must experience, in passing from a state of general war to a state of general peace. More than this was neither expected nor claimed by the manufacturers themselves. As the persons then engaged in the business had nobly sustained the war, gratitude mingled with justice in the policy adopted. But no intelligent man was so visionary as to expect that, when the ordinary channels of trade, so long obstructed, were suddenly opened, there could still be maintained, by artificial means, the same demand for domestic manufactures as before. It was apparent that many of the existing establishments must go down, and that neither the wisdom nor the folly of human legislation could possibly prevent it. And, sir, such has been the fact. Eight years of probation have elapsed since the passage of the existing tariff, and, if policy or humanity required it of us, it is now too late to relieve the distresses of those manufacturers who made their investments during the war. Those of them who have been enabled to sustain themselves till this time, under the extraordinary pressure of the four or five years immediately succeeding 1816, when the country was almost literally overwhelmed with the surplus manufactures of foreign establishments, can certainly maintain themselves now, when foreign commerce is rapidly returning to its ordinary channels, and contracting within its proper limits. Those who have passed through the furnace, do not require to be protected from the ordinary heat of the sun. And it is a fact that they now stand firm, and constitute the most prosperous interest of the country. As to those who were swept away during the disastrous period to which I have alluded, they are irretrievably destroyed, and beyond the reach of our remedies, unless, indeed, we had the power of producing a resurrection by an act of legislation.

It is obvious, then, that the protection of these establishments, which originated in the war, is not the object of the present bill. It does not even assume this modesty of pretension. Doctrines are now advanced, which never entered into the conception of those who advocated the tariff of 1816—doctrines which, though maintained by gentlemen who have waged a special war of sneers and sarcasms against the theories of political economy, throw into the shade the boldest theories of the French economists. We are now told that it is the duty of a paternal Government not only to protect existing interests against extraordinary reverses which it has contributed to produce, but to create new manufactures and new pursuits, by the mere energy of legislation. The people, it is said, are absolutely idle and in wretchedness, for the want of employment; and a gentleman from New York, (Mr. Wood,) who often edifies the House by his philosophical speculations, has told us, if I understood him correctly, that 30 per cent. of our population are actually in idleness for the want of pursuits to which their labor can be applied. These three millions of people, who are thus destitute of employment, as the gentleman has demonstrated by statistical tables and mathematical calculations, (the obvious and palpable facts to the contrary notwithstanding,) are to obtain employment by the notable expedient of an act of Congress!

[Mr. Wood here explained. His argument was, he said, that thirty-three per cent. of our population produce no more than fifteen per cent. ought to do. Thirteen and a half per cent. only of our population, he calculated, was absolutely employed in productive industry, and in this proportion was included the army, navy, and public officers, amounting to three and a half per cent.]

I am glad, resumed Mr. McDUFFIE, that the gentleman has removed an erroneous impression from my mind as to the extent of his argument. But, even modified and limited as it now stands, it will be difficult to make it pass current for a practical argument. Is it in the power of tables and calculations to make any man seriously believe, in opposition to the evidence of his own senses, and to the result of his general observation and knowledge of the country, that one million of our population are not only idle, but destitute of employment? Shall we be told, in a country like this, abounding with almost interminable wilds of fertile lands, that a tithe of the people are suffering for the want of something to do? Sir, there are innumerable avenues to employment in this country, and if any man were to make his complaint to me that he was without employment, I could tell him simply to go to work. That is the obvious remedy, a remedy in the reach of every one; and, if it were more generally pursued, there must soon be an end of this wretched and delusive dependence upon the quackery of legislation for employment. Sir, I boldly assert that there is not a single individual in the vast extent of this Republic, that cannot readily obtain, not only employment, but such an employment as will enable him to improve his condition. This is the only country on earth where a common laborer, of industry and enterprise, can, in the course of an ordinary lifetime, besides comfortably supporting himself and his family, leave to his children an inheritance of real estate: and, with these facts staring us in the face, we are required to believe, on the authority of tabular statements, that the people can only be saved from suffering and discontent, by the adoption of this measure, to provide them with employment. The gentleman from New York, by way of confirming his general conclusion, has stated that the wages of a laborer in his vicinity, is only twelve and a half cents a day. In answer to this, I can only say to the gentleman, that, if his distressed neighbors will only make a transition from Long Island to any other point in the whole Union, even the most unfavorable, I will be responsible for their obtaining fifty cents per day. But, as the cry of distress has been reiterated until it has made a strong impression upon the country, I beg leave to recur, with a view to illustrate and enforce them, to some remarks which I offered during the discussion of the duty on cotton bagging. I believe the causes of the disease, and the tendency of the proposed remedy, to be equally misconceived, as to some portions, at least, of the Union. I stated, on the occasion to which I have referred, that the distresses of the country, such as they were, resulted from the change of circumstances occasioned by passing from a state of war to a state of peace, in connexion with the excessive issues of bank paper, which threw forward and increased the pressure of the evil. During the war, there was a considerable proportion of our population—those engaged in the military service of the country—who consumed the products of the grain-growing States, but produced nothing. All those States which were near the theatre of war, found a ready market, and high money prices for their grain. To them the war was therefore a source of prosperity, and peace was, in one sense of the word, regarded as a calamity. And whence do we now hear the loudest complaints of distress? Whence come the most strenuous demands for the passage of this bill? From the very points of the Union which enjoyed the advantages of a war demand and war prices for their produce—New York, Pennsylvania, and the Western country. You cannot define the boundaries of any State more accurately, than you can trace the limits of the region of country favorable to this tariff, by the positions of our armies in the late war, and the multiplication of banks during that contest, and since its termination. Pennsylvania and the Western States supplied the Northwestern army, and I believe the Government paid as high as one hundred dollars per barrel, at the theatre of war, for flour purchased in Ohio; a State now unanimous for this tariff. New York, every one knows, was in the immediate neighborhood of extensive and permanent military operations, and supplied numerous armies with provisions. Now, it happens that the very States I have enumerated, have been most afflicted with the curse of banks that did not pay specie, (a delusive expedient to perpetuate the war prices and war prosperity,) and have also been most earnest and persevering in their appeals to this Government for protection. New England, and the Southern States, on the contrary—States which sustained the privations of the war without the same mitigating circumstances, and from necessity regulated their enjoyments by the rules of a severe and self-denying economy, are now to be subjected to an onerous taxation—and for what? Not to relieve the other States from positive distress, but to restore certain interests in them, to the state of artificial prosperity which they enjoyed during the war. During the whole period of that contest, the Southern country was deprived of a market for its great staples; and there was nothing in the military operations of the Government to compensate the loss. Even if the people had devoted themselves to the growing of grain, there were no armies in the field to consume it, and that, like their cotton and tobacco, would have remained without a market. In this state of things they not only ceased to make any progress in wealth, but were compelled to contract their accustomed expenses, and use an economy before unknown to them, to provide a decent maintenance for their families. These habits made the return of peace, to them, the harbinger of prosperity. It is a dispensation of justice resulting from the very nature of things, that those who suffer the greatest privations in war, shall be least affected by the changes resulting from the restoration of peace.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

But, sir, I will venture to assert, that the Middle and Western States have, at this moment, a large share of the means of positive enjoyment as any other portion of the Union. Their distresses are relative, and in a great degree imaginary. It is not what they are, but what they were, that causes the prevailing discontent. The reduction of an inflated currency has reduced the nominal price of property; and the man who, a few years past, estimated his wealth at fifty thousand dollars, and now finds it only twenty-five, complains of his distresses as though he were in want of the necessaries of life. I admit that the Western people are embarrassed, but I deny that they are distressed, in any other sense of the word. Where is the evidence of actual suffering? In some of the Western States, I am informed, they have no poor laws at all, and such a being as a pauper is scarcely known. Regarding, therefore, the aggregate enjoyments of the whole community as the true criterion of national happiness, I should select the Western States as the part of the Union where the highest degree of prosperity prevailed. Indeed, sir, I believe there is not on the face of the earth a region of country of equal extent, where so few are suffering from poverty, and where the means of comfortable subsistence so abundantly reward the toil of the laborer. It is not distress, I repeat it, but discontent, that has excited this rage for creating wealth by legislation. To prove this, I will advert to another standard of prosperity, referred to, very unfortunately, I think, for his own purposes by the honorable gentleman from New York, to whom I before alluded. He told us that the prosperity of a nation was indicated by the increase of its population; and then favored us with a beautiful disquisition on the comforts of matrimony, and the duty of a Government to promote it. I perfectly accord with these views of the honorable member; but I must be permitted to say, that, according to the criterion to which he has referred, there is no other nation so prosperous as the United States, and no part of the Union so prosperous as that from which we hear so much about their distresses. And if the honorable member wishes to promote the cause of matrimony, I would advise him to send his twelve-and-a-half cents per day laborers to the Western country. What, sir! a country which doubles its population in ten years, call upon the Government to relieve it from distress, by creating new employments! The thing will not bear examination. The historian will scarcely be credited, in future time, who ventures to record it. Permit me to call the attention of the House to a few facts, illustrative of this part of the subject, which I am sure will not be disputed. In the States where the public lands are in market, you can purchase land of the first quality for one dollar and fifty cents—one dollar and twenty-five cents, says a gentleman near me—when land of the same quality is worth, in some parts of the Union, fifty dollars per acre. This single fact speaks more than volumes of declamation on the subject of popular suffering. Indeed, it may be safely asserted, paradoxical as it may seem, that the imaginary distresses of the Western country proceed from the very abundance in which they possess the primary aliment of national wealth. What is their complaint? Not, as one would suppose, the scarcity, but the superabundance of the necessaries of life. And here, I will observe, that nothing, in my opinion, has contributed more to the existing derangement in the elements of wealth in the Western States, than bringing the public lands into market injudiciously, and without any regard to the existing demand. The inevitable tendency of this policy, by overstocking the market, is, to reduce lands to the minimum price; and if that were fixed at fifty cents per acre, the land would command no more. The consequence is, that the people purchase large quantities of productive lands, which have all the constituents of value, but scarcity. And, because they have not every thing else in proportion, they are discontented and restless. And I will avail myself of this occasion to declare, that I never will give my vote to bring another acre of the public lands into the market, but under the strongest conviction that there is a fair and natural demand for it. Our very system converts our land into a mere drug in the market, and the people into speculators.

I will now take the liberty of addressing a few words especially to the Representatives of the

H. OF R.

West, on the subject of their own interests. A subject upon which I certainly will not presume to instruct them. But I am sure they will excuse a friendly admonition, when I state the particular topic to which it relates. I am well assured that the permanent prosperity of the West depends more upon the improvement of the means of transporting their produce to market, and of receiving the returns, than upon every other subject to which the legislation of this Government can be directed.

On measures of this description, I have heretofore given them my earnest and cordial support. Most of my colleagues, and many others, who represent the Southern portion of the Union, have pursued the same course. As for myself, nothing will induce me to change my views or conduct on the subject; but I submit it to the dispassionate consideration of the Western gentlemen, whether there is not danger, that, by urging upon us a system which we believe to be oppressive, they will alienate the kind feelings of the portion of the country to which I have alluded, and lose its co-operation in relation to that system of internal improvements, which, in my opinion, is of more importance to the West than all the tariffs that can be passed in half a century.

I will also present another view of certain interests of the West, which are intimately connected with the portion of the country I have the honor to represent.

Gentlemen are aware that a very profitable trade is carried on by their constituents with the Southern country, in live stock of all descriptions, which they drive over the mountains and sell for cash. This extensive trade, which, from its peculiar character, more easily overcomes the difficulties of transportation than any that can be substituted in its place, is about to be put in jeopardy for the conjectural benefits of this measure. When I say this trade is about to be put in jeopardy, I do not speak unadvisedly. I am perfectly convinced, that, if this bill passes, it will have the effect of inducing the people of the South, partly from the feeling, and partly from the necessity growing out of it, to raise within themselves, the live stock which they now purchase from the West. It is at least certain that more will be lost in this trade, than is gained in that of cotton bagging.

I will now attempt to show that the progress which our manufactures have made, and are now making, is as rapid as they can make consistently either with their own prosperity or that of the country. And I must be excused for saying that the attempt to make this a great manufacturing nation, suddenly, and by a single sweep of legislation, is more indicative of restlessness than of wisdom. The country seems to me to have been excited to that kind of feeling which actuates an individual speculator—a vain desire to become wealthy by a bold dash, but utterly regardless of the maxims of prudence, and the habits of industry and economy, which are indispensable to the attainment of his object. The friends of this measure appear to me to have overlooked entirely these practical considerations, upon which the policy of such a measure as this must depend. The progress of manufactures must be regulated, not by our desires, but by our capacities. Now, I believe there is no proposition, in which the gentlemen who are best informed on the subject of manufactures will more generally concur, than that it is essential to their own prosperity that their progress should be slow and gradual. Their success depends mainly upon capital and skill; and it is utterly impossible that they can advance, prosperously, faster than the one is accumulated, and the other acquired. And when I speak of capital as being essential to the progress of manufactures, I mean surplus capital—capital which does not find a ready employment in the pre-existing pursuits which have produced it. It is in vain that gentlemen tell us we have capital, unless they can show that it is disengaged, and seeking investment. And here I will remark to the gentlemen from the Western States, and the interior of the Middle States, who are the most strenuous advocates of this measure, that they cannot participate, to any considerable extent, in the advantages which are anticipated from this system. Sir, if you were to prohibit commerce altogether, manufactures would follow capital; and Boston, Providence, and Philadelphia, the points at which there is the greatest accumulation of it, and the greatest difficulty of investment, would realize the principal part of the benefit resulting from the restriction. Before the interior of the Middle States or the Western States can hope to enjoy the advantages of this system, they must be protected not only against foreign competition, but against that of New England. But I have heard it contended, and I believe the argument has weight, in the estimation of many, that the Boston manufacturers are opposed to this bill, because they dread the domestic competition that it will rear up. There cannot be a notion more absolutely fallacious than this, as will be seen upon a moment's examination. It assumes that the Boston manufacturers, who flourish in defiance of foreign competition, cannot compete with those domestic rivals who are now claiming the protection of the Government, and who admit that they cannot sustain the foreign competition! This involves the absolute inconsistency that the weaker rival is more to be dreaded than the more powerful.

Sir, I repeat it, that almost the entire benefit of any protection you can extend to manufactures, will be engrossed by those portions of the Union to which I have referred, as having superior advantages for that business. But I shall be told that manufactories do already exist in the interior of the Middle States, and in some of the Western States. But upon what principles and under what circumstances have most of those establishments grown up? And what is the extent of the market they can command? To this inquiry I ask the attention of the House for a few minutes. I maintain, sir, that the manufactories to which I have just alluded, have risen up and flourish because they enjoy a sort of local monopoly, and that they cannot command a market beyond the sphere of that monopoly. I will advert, for the purpose of explaining this view of the subject, to what was said very correctly by the Speaker the other day—that it was better for a people, abounding in the products of the soil, to give a high price for manufactured articles, provided they could thereby obtain a market for their produce, than to obtain manufactures at much lower prices, from those who would not take produce in exchange for them. Take, for example, any district of country in the interior, producing a large surplus of grain, which the foreign manufacturer will not take in exchange for his fabrics. Is it not obvious that the manufacturer who would, under these circumstances, erect his establishment in the supposed district, and take the products of the soil in exchange for his manufactures, would enjoy a perfect monopoly of the local market, and be absolutely free from foreign competition? The farmer has nothing to give but grain. This the foreign manufacturer will not take. It is to no purpose, therefore, that the foreign fabric can be purchased cheaper, if the only thing the farmer has to give will not be taken in exchange for it. And, on the other hand, the farmer can well afford to give a higher price to the domestic manufacturer, who will give him a good price for his grain. To present the same idea in another view, the value of any given trade depends as much upon the highness of the price of what is sold, as upon the lowness of the price of what is bought. It results, therefore, that the foreign manufacturer, who will not take the produce of the farmer at any price, must be absolutely excluded from the competition with the domestic manufacturer, provided the latter will take it, even at a very low price. It is upon the same principle, that, within a very small sphere, even household manufactures, in one sense the dearest of any, can hold a competition with those made by the most perfect machinery. The error of the argument, however, which has been founded upon the foregoing principles, consists in the assumption that the manufactures, thus sustained by local monopolies, can, under the protection of this bill, maintain a competition in distant markets, beyond the sphere of the monopoly. But that is impossible. In fact this bill can have no effect at all in favor of those manufactures; for how can they be benefited by excluding foreign manufactures that never come in competition with them? As to the more distant markets, those which are now supplied by foreign commerce, nothing is more certain than that the manufacturers of Boston, Rhode Island, and Philadelphia, will occupy them.

The Tariff Bill.

H. or R.

That our domestic manufactures cannot hold a successful competition with those of other nations, except at the points of the Union most eligibly situated, and, consequently, that the attempt to make this a manufacturing country, in a much greater extent than it is already, is unwise and impracticable, will be apparent, from a few considerations, to which I solicit the attention of the House. In all those manufactures which principally result from manual labor—such, for example, as iron—the high price of labor here, which is the most conclusive evidence of our prosperity, renders it impossible that we can maintain a competition with foreigners. It was stated by a gentleman from Kentucky, on a former occasion, that our citizens labored but eight hours a day, whereas the manufacturers of Inverness and Dundee labored sixteen. And, he asked, emphatically, if we were disposed to compel our population to labor sixteen hours per day, also? I answer, no. But is it not evident that, if our manufacturers labor only eight hours a day, they cannot compete with the foreign manufacturer, who labors sixteen, even if they are equally skilful? Can leisure contend with industry, unless you give it a premium? I do not complain that our citizens devote less time to labor than the people of other countries. I rejoice, on the contrary, that they can live more comfortably than any other people, with half the labor. But I do complain of this attempt to divert their industry into pursuits, in which they must either double their exertions, be involved in ruin, or receive a bounty at the expense of the country. Indeed, the admitted fact, that a common laborer in this country receives double the wages that a common laborer receives in the most favored nations of Europe, and labors little more than half the time, conclusively demonstrates the impolicy of protecting, by duties, those manufactures, of the price of which labor is the principal constituent.

But, sir, I admit that, owing to the improved state of the machinery by which most of the articles we import are fabricated, (those manufactured of wool and cotton,) labor constitutes a very inconsiderable item in their cost. In determining, therefore, the question how far such manufactures can successfully contend with foreign competition, more depends upon the price of capital than upon the price of labor. How, then, stands the comparison between this country and England, assuming the rate of interest as the standard of that comparison? The rate of interest in this country is higher than it is in England, in the proportion of about five to three. The English manufacturer, therefore, has the decided advantage, indicated by this proportion, over the American, so far as capital is concerned; and a much greater advantage, so far as labor enters into the estimate. And these are advantages against which we should have to contend, even if our machinery and skill were equal to those of our foreign rivals. The only circumstances which can tend to counterbalance the disadvantages under which we thus labor, are the superior cheapness of the raw material, and the saving of the charges of transportation, which are incurred upon the imported manufacture. The former advantage exists only in the case of manufactures of cotton; and the latter is quite inconsiderable, owing to the very small bulk of the articles imported, in proportion to their value. The two circumstances taken together, will not put us on a footing of equality with the British, even in relation to cotton fabrics. But, as relates to woollens, as we are laying a high duty on the raw material, the advantage will be on the side of the British manufacturer, in all the constituents of the price of his fabric, the transportation excepted. In this comparative view, I have not taken into consideration, the duties imposed upon foreign manufactures, because my object is to compare and estimate the natural advantages of this country, and that from which its principal importations are made, for prosecuting the manufacturing business. For, it is only when the natural advantages of our own country are not decidedly inferior to those of the country which supplies us, that the application of artificial or legislative aids can be expedient.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

Now, we cannot disguise the fact that Great Britain has a decided ascendancy over us in the aggregate of natural advantages for manufactures. She has a vast surplus capital, the accumulation of centuries. We have very little capital that is not readily absorbed, either in the business which produces it, or in some of the pre-existing pursuits of the country. She has a crowded population, driven, from the necessity of their circumstances, to labor for a bare subsistence. We have a population thinly scattered over a vast and fertile territory, capable of sustaining ten times the number of human beings that now inhabit it. While these permanent natural advantages are against us, advantages resulting essentially from time and the progress of population, and which nothing but time and the progress of population can counteract; it is in vain that we attempt to legislate ourselves into a great manufacturing nation. Nature rises up against it, and every attempt to countervail her laws must be impotent. I admit that it is possible to bring our machinery to perfection, and to acquire manufacturing skill in a comparatively short time. These results may illustrate the power of genius. But what human power can suddenly give this nation an accumulated surplus capital, and a crowded population; or, in other words, convert a young country into an old one? We have all the advantages of a youthful and growing nation; and, if we were wise, we would be satisfied with our lot. But we vainly aspire to attain the advantages peculiar to an old nation, without participating in the disadvantages of age. If capital could be obtained at three per cent., and labor for half its present price, as they may be a century hence, I have no doubt we could surpass the British manufacturers in the excellence and cheapness of their fabrics. But would any one purchase success upon such conditions? In other words, would any one consent to reduce the income of every capitalist in the country thirty-five per cent., and of every laborer fifty, for the mere purpose of enabling our own manufacturers to undersell the British in our own markets?

But, sir, even if it were true, that the interest of this country required that we should give an additional encouragement to manufactures, I think it can be shown that this is almost as injudicious a measure as could be devised for that object. It is obvious that the cotton and woollen are the only manufactures of any importance, which can claim to be protected, consistently with the general interest of the country. These are made by machinery; and nothing is more certain than that it is such manufactures only, that we can hope to make as cheap as we can import them. Now, let us examine the provisions of this bill, as they bear upon these two descriptions of manufacture. As to cotton fabrics, no protection is claimed by those manufacturers who have made the largest investments, and have the deepest interest in them: but protection is obtruded upon them by the officious kindness of those, who, it seems, understand their interest better than they do themselves. But as to woollen fabrics, although they are protected by ultimate increase of twelve and a half per cent. duty, yet this is fully counterbalanced by the ultimate increase of forty-five per cent. duty on the raw material. There cannot be a greater inconsistency than that in a bill professedly designed for the protection of domestic manufactures, the raw material of one of the most important of those manufactures should be subject to a much higher duty than the manufactures themselves! And here I will advert to an authority which has not only escaped the denunciations of the advocates of this measure, but received their most unqualified eulogies—I mean the authority of Alexander Hamilton—of whom, whatever odium the party conflicts of his time may have cast upon his political character, I will say, that this country has never produced a statesman of higher endowments. And although I widely differ with him as to what are said to have been his views of the principles of our Government, yet none of his contemporaries, unless Washington be an exception, entertained more profound and correct views of its policy. The name of Hamilton has been introduced into this discussion, as a sanction to the heterogeneous provisions of this bill. I wish to God, sir, he were living and present, to vindicate himself from so unjust an imputation! Recurring to his recorded opinions, what does he recommend? That a heavy duty should be laid upon unmanufactured wool? The very reverse. He recommended not only that it should be imported duty free, but that a bounty should be given upon the importation. If you really desire to promote and protect domestic manufactures, it is our true policy to encourage, instead of discouraging, the importation of the raw material, so that the manufacturer may obtain it as cheap as practicable. But instead of this, you absolutely lay almost a prohibitory duty upon the raw material. Upon what can this be founded, unless upon the erroneous and unjustifiable policy of buying up different interests to insure the passage of the bill? I presume I may use this language without offence, as some gentlemen have distinctly avowed that they view this measure as a compromise of interests; or, in other words, that one provision is to be regarded as the consideration for another. But, sir, I do most earnestly protest against this principle, as one of the most dangerous that can be introduced into our legislation. Each provision should stand upon its own separate and distinct merits, and if it cannot be sustained in this way, it ought to be abandoned. But, in relation to this article of wool, it is a mistaken notion to suppose that you really promote the interest, even of the wool grower, by laying a heavy duty upon foreign wool. The only effectual mode of benefiting the wool-grower, is to increase the domestic manufacture, and, consequently, the demand for wool; but you defeat this object precisely in the degree that you increase the duty on the raw material. Great Britain has recently made an experiment upon this very subject, which is not unworthy of our attention. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, with a view to reconcile the landed interest to a considerable increase of taxes, laid a duty of six pence per pound on foreign wool, which has, theretofore, been subject to a nominal duty only. The consequence was, that the export of woollen manufactures was rapidly reduced, the market for domestic wool, and consequently its price, were diminished, and all the interests connected with wool were seriously injured.

APRIL, 1834.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

But, sir, there are various other articles embraced in this bill, the duty upon which, so far from promoting manufactures, will operate directly against them. Iron, which enters largely into the cost of the machinery used in all the manufacturing establishments—and hemp, a raw material used in various manufactures, which we propose to encourage, are considered by the friends of this measure as two of the leading articles entitled to the protection of Government. Indeed, we are told that this is not a bill for the protection of manufactures merely, but for the protection of home industry. The argument is, that we ought to discourage, by duties, the importation of every article which can be produced at home, whether it be the product of manufacture or agriculture. Sir, there never prevailed in an enlightened body so perfect a delusion. It assumes that foreign commerce is a national evil, that every nation that can furnish us with the articles we consume cheaper than we can make them, is an enemy to our prosperity; and, in a word, that we should be more prosperous and wealthy, if there were no country in existence but our own. Disguise it as you may, sir, this scheme of protecting home industry in the general, without reference to the kind, involves the almost entire annihilation of foreign commerce. It embraces within its proscription, as I stated on a former occasion, almost every important article of human consumption. When it is urged that too much of our capital and labor are applied to agricultural pursuits, and that we ought to encourage manufactures, because we have not a due proportion of our industry devoted to that essential branch of national wealth; though I believe that existing laws and the natural course of things, will afford all the encouragement that ought to be desired; yet I can understand the argument. It is not only intelligible, but plausible. But when it is contended that we must protect and encourage, by duties on rival productions, not only manufacturing industry, of which it is alleged we have too little, but agricultural, of which we have too much, I confess myself utterly at a loss to comprehend what is the practical end at which gentlemen are aiming. But, whatever may be their aim, it is certain that the result of their system would be the destruction of commerce. If we make every thing we consume at home, we will, of course, import nothing; and if we import nothing, it is a self-evident proposition that we can export nothing.

Sir, we have been urged to the adoption of this measure by the highest considerations that can be addressed to the patriotic spirit of a free people—we have been told that it is essential to the independence of the country and the defensive power of the Government. No man can be more sensible to these considerations than I am; and by no one, I believe, have they been more sincerely and anxiously regarded. There is no sacrifice essential to the independence and safety of the country that I would not make. I would disdain the huckstering spirit that would even count the cost of these objects. But, if I am not greatly in error, the bearing of this measure upon our independence and safety as a nation, is precisely the reverse of what gentlemen have supposed. I believe there is no proposition relative to the policy of this country, in which politicians of all parties so generally concur, as that the Navy is the most important arm of our defence. Now, the naval power of the country absolutely depends upon its commerce and navigation; and you impair the one precisely in the proportion that you diminish the others. The sailors who fight your battles in war, must be trained in your merchant ships during peace. You may build ships, but you cannot make sailors, upon an emergency. How, then, stands the argument on the subject of national defence and national independence? In order to provide iron, and hemp, and clothing—articles of which the production could be increased so as to meet all the demands of the country in six months from the declaration of war—you destroy the elements of our naval power, which cannot exist in war, if they are not created in peace, by the slow and gradual operation of commerce.

But we have been informed, in the course of this debate, that this measure will have the effect rather to increase than diminish our foreign commerce! A most extraordinary anticipation, certainly; and it requires the most unlimited faith in the efficacy of political nostrums, to believe it can be realized. Our commerce now consists in exchanging the productions of our soil for the manufactures and peculiar productions of other countries. The great mass of our imports consists of manufactures.

Now, the professed object of this measure is to provide a substitute for foreign manufactures, and thereby prevent their importation. Is it not self-evident, then, that you will diminish our existing commerce precisely to the extent that you augment your domestic manufactures? But this wonder-working bill, it seems, is to furnish a substitute for those branches of our foreign commerce that it will destroy. If any thing, on such a subject, is susceptible of demonstration, I think it is the delusiveness of such an expectation. Of what, I ask, is this new commerce to consist? It will be at once perceived that it cannot exist without new articles, both of exportation and importation.

What, then, shall we be enabled to export that we do not now? Manufactures, it is said. But, can it be seriously contended that manufactures, which cannot hold a competition with the foreign in our own markets, with the heavy duties which have existed for the last eight years, but require the additional protection provided in this bill, can maintain a successful competition in foreign markets? In other words, when, with an average protection (including duties and transportation) of at least thirty per cent., we cannot command the home market, how is it possible that we can command the foreign markets, in which we shall have no such protection? I do pronounce it to be absolutely a visionary expectation. For at least half a century to come, the British manufacturers will exclude us from foreign markets. A few occasional exceptions, resulting from peculiar circumstances, do not weaken the general proposition.

But, another inquiry remains to be made in relation to the commerce which is to compensate for that which we destroy. What description of articles shall we import in this new commerce? It cannot be manufactures, for our policy excludes these of course. They are to be our exports under this new system. What, then, shall we import? The productions of the soil? These, we are told, are superabundant, and literally rotting on our hands for the want of a market. This new commerce, then, is to realize the splendid but empty vision of exporting every thing and importing nothing! By such a commerce, we should certainly avoid one evil which haunts the imaginations of some gentlemen: The balance of trade would never be against us. But, sir, let us examine this subject a little more minutely. It is said we shall export our manufactures to South America. There we shall come in competition with British manufactures. Admitting, for a moment, that we could sell our manufactures as cheap as the British could sell theirs in the markets of South America, yet we should be excluded, because that country produces nothing that we want; but precisely that which our rivals want. The great staple of South America will be unmanufactured cotton, which is the great staple of this country also. And nothing can be more idle than to calculate upon a profitable commerce, or, indeed, any commerce at all, between two countries that produce precisely the same articles for exportation. The argument, therefore, that our commerce will not be diminished by this system, is, in my judgment, utterly fallacious. And even if it were true, in point of fact, that a new commerce could be substituted for that which we cut off, it would only be giving up a natural and profitable, for a forced and unprofitable trade. And here I will remark that there seems to be a palpable inconsistency in the arguments of the advocates of this measure. They tell us, in one breath, that their object is to relieve the country from its dependence on foreign commerce, and in the next, that our foreign commerce will be increased. If this latter proposition be true, our dependence on foreign commerce will be greater under the proposed system than it now is. And, unless it can be shown that this measure will produce two opposite and inconsistent effects at the same time, it will be difficult to make out the proposition that our commerce will be increased, and our dependence on commerce diminished.

I will now invite the attention of the House to a few remarks as to the practical operation of this bill upon the community. Whatever may be its effect upon domestic manufactures, I speak advisedly when I say it will operate as a tax upon the people to the extent of at least four millions of dollars. And whether the proceeds of this tax shall go into the national Treasury or into the pockets of individuals, the thing about which there can be no doubt, is, that the tax will be paid by the people. If it shall operate merely as a revenue measure, it will not benefit the manufacturers, and is subject to the objection that it is unnecessary, and therefore oppressive, taxation. If it shall operate to exclude foreign manufactures, it is liable to the still greater objection of being not only an oppressive, but an unproductive tax. The people pay, but the Government does not receive. In point of fact, it will probably, for a short time, operate partly as a productive, and partly as an unproductive, tax; partly as an increase of the revenue, and partly as a bounty to the manufacturing interest. But we are advised to submit quietly to these burdens, and to be satisfied with the assurance that we shall, at some future time, obtain the domestic manufacture as cheap as we can import the foreign. Let us examine this idea for a moment. And I would remark, at the threshold of the examination, that it is not sufficient for gentlemen to show that the articles for which they claim protection can be made at home as cheap as they can be imported from abroad under our system of revenue duties; but they must further show that they can be made as cheap as the foreign articles could be imported if there were no revenue duties levied upon them. Suppose, for example, that the gentlemen could clearly make out their case, that all the manufactures we import can be made at home precisely as cheap as we now import them, but no cheaper; and, to make the illustration more complete, suppose that they actually were made at home, and that the foreign importation had ceased. What would be the result? It is true we should obtain the articles as cheap as we do now, but we should lose the whole revenue of the country derived from imposts, and be compelled to resort to other sources of revenue. Even, therefore, in the case supposed, the country would sacrifice above fifteen millions of dollars per annum at the shrine of this anti-commercial system. And this is the strongest case which can be supposed in favor of domestic manufactures. The supposition that they can ever be made as cheap as the foreign fabrics could be imported free of duty, is too extravagant to be indulged for a moment. And yet this supposition, chimerical as it is, must be realized before any benefit can result to the country from this measure, to compensate the great and palpable sacrifices which it involves.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Looking to the operation of this measure upon the different classes of the community, it may be fairly stated as its general result, that it will sacrifice the laboring classes for the benefit of the capitalists. And when I say capitalists, I include as well those who employ capital in some of the products of agriculture, as in manufactures. You propose to protect, by duties, not only manufactures, but wool, hemp, and even grain. Ridiculous as the duty upon this last article is, it serves admirably to illustrate the genius of the system.

Although the manufacturing interest makes the most prominent figure in this scheme of protection, the question is no longer between the manufacturing and agricultural interests, but between all those who produce more than they consume of the articles subject to duty, and those who purchase that surplus production. From this it is obvious, that but a very small part of the community can enjoy the benefit of this system, which operates as a permanent tax upon the remainder. As to the manufacturers we know their number is exceedingly small in comparison with the aggregate of our population. But the smallness of the number of farmers who can be benefited by this bill, is not so obvious. There exists a delusion on this point, which is easily removed. It is supposed that the great mass of the farmers will participate in the bounties provided. But every practical observer must know, in relation to wool, for example, that a great majority of the farmers can produce no more than they consume in their own families. It will be the more wealthy farmers, therefore, who will realize the advantages, such as they may be, of this compromise with the manufacturers, while the small farmers and the whole class of mere laborers will be compelled to bear the burdens of the system, such as they certainly are, without the slightest equivalent. No man has pretended, no man will venture to assert, that the price of labor will be increased by this measure. That, sir, the thing which most deserves encouragement, is left unbountied to its fate. I do pronounce it, that this is a combination, not only of the few against the many, but of the wealthy against the poor; we take from those who have not, and give to those who have. I speak with studied precision when I say, that those who consume what they do not make, are taxed for the benefit of those who make what they do not consume. These are the true antagonist powers of this system.

The experience of Great Britain, of whose prosperity we have had such extravagant descriptions, furnishes a most striking and conclusive illustration of that tendency of the protecting system which I am now considering. It is true, that Great Britain is a nation of vast power and resources. To the eye of a distant beholder, she undoubtedly presents a splendid spectacle. But history, while it records the achievements of her policy and her arms, says nothing of the condition of her people. If you but look beyond the dazzling surface, you will see a vast population pushing their industry to the utmost extent of their physical power, for a bare subsistence, to say nothing of the great proportion (about one-sixth, I believe, of the whole number) who are absolutely or partially dependent upon public charity. Yes, sir, the fact is so universally true in that country, that the wages of labor never rise higher than to the point at which the laborer can barely subsist and perpetuate his race—that it is laid down by the British writers on the subject, as a settled principle of political economy. If, from disease of other casualty, a laborer is unable to work for a week, he runs the risk of perishing. It never enters into the calculation of the British laborer to improve his condition in life; and it is in the power of very few, even to lay up a pittance for the future. Such is the condition of the great body of the people of Great Britain, who have been characterized by the Speaker as the happiest people on earth, and held up to us for our special admiration.

But, sir, even if the prosperity and happiness of Great Britain were much greater than they are, upon what principle of sound reasoning can they be ascribed to her system of commercial restrictions? I am ready to admit, if gentlemen desire it, that her prosperity is derived mainly from her manufactures; but I unequivocally deny that these have been fostered into existence by the restrictive system. A few palpable facts of her history will render this apparent. Which of her manufactures have been the great sources of her prosperity? Those of cotton, wool, and iron, undoubtedly. Will any gentleman venture to say that these have derived their prosperity from the protecting system? Where, sir, is the nation that ever for a moment held a competition with Great Britain in cotton fabrics, and against whom, therefore, protection was necessary? From the first moment of its existence, this manufacture in Great Britain, like the raw material in our Southern States, set all competition at defiance. Neither ever needed or received the protection of Government. Both have succeeded, because the countries in which they respectively flourish are peculiarly adapted to their production. The same remarks are true (though not so strikingly true) in relation to manufactures of wool and iron. On the contrary, those manufactures which have been forced into existence by artificial stimulants, are regarded by all the enlightened statesmen of the present day as so many obstacles to British prosperity. This is emphatically true in relation to the manufactures of silk. In fact, sir, you might as well tell me that the muscular energy of a giant is derived from the fetters he sunders into atoms, as that the prosperity of Great Britain is derived from her restrictive system.

But we have been admonished to adopt this system, with a view to countervail the restrictions and bounties by which other nations sustain their domestic industry; and it was conceded by the Speaker, that, if all other nations would pursue the same liberal policy, it might be expedient to leave commerce unshackled. I am perfectly willing to meet the gentleman upon this ground; and if I do not show that the principal restriction which the existing laws of foreign countries impose upon our commerce operates as a protection to our manufactures, instead of giving them a claim to the protection of this Government, I will acknowledge my entire ignorance of the subject. What, then, is the principal restriction of which we complain? It is the exclusion by Great Britain of our grain from her market. And what claim does this give our manufactures to the interference of Congress? How does it operate against them? On the contrary, is it not perfectly apparent that it operates in a two-fold manner to give them an advantage over their British rivals? By raising the price of grain in England, it enhances the price of labor there; and by diminishing the price of grain here, it also diminishes the wages of the laborer here. As far, therefore, as labor enters into the price of manufactures, this very restriction (of British policy) is a direct encouragement to our manufacturing industry. But, perhaps gentlemen will say, it is the growers of grain whose interests require us to countervail this injurious restriction. But how do you propose to accomplish this object? The British Government injure our farming interest by excluding our grain and reducing its price! And we are called upon to relieve the farmer, not by increasing the price of the grain which he has to sell, but of the manufactures which he must purchase! Sir, there is more spirit than wisdom in such a policy as this: it defeats its own object.

I will now offer a few remarks upon another view of this subject, to which our attention was called by the Speaker. He told us that this Government ought to pursue, as nearly as practicable, such a policy in relation to the different portions of the Union, as each of those portions would respectively pursue, if existing as a separate confederacy. Let us then inquire what would be the relative situation of the principal subdivisions of the Union, if each were free to legislate for itself. And I will first examine the probable condition of that subdivision which the Speaker himself represents—the Western country. If that region were separated from the rest of the Union, and formed a distinct confederacy, how would it stand in relation to this very question? It would derive its supplies of foreign manufactures principally through the Atlantic States. I presume it would, because it has done so heretofore, and it would continue to be the interest of the people to do so. What would be the result? What power would they have in regulating the imposts upon foreign merchandise, and how could these imposts affect their interests? It is obvious that they would have no agency in regulating the tariff of duties, and would yet have to pay, indirectly, the amount of those duties, in the increased price of imported articles they would consume. In a word, the Western States would be tributary to the Atlantic States. When, therefore, the gentlemen from the West call upon us to adopt this measure for their benefit—a benefit which I am sure they will never realize—they require us to do what they could not themselves do, even if separated from the rest of the Union, unless indeed they would cut off all commercial intercourse, not only with Europe, but with the Atlantic States also. But how would the principle laid down by the Speaker operate upon the Southern portion of our Union? If that were a separate confederacy, (which God forbid that it ever should be!) what power could restrain it from pursuing its own most obvious and decided interest, by having a free and unrestricted intercourse with Europe? And when we are about to be deprived of this natural right, and to see our interests immolated at the shrine of a voracious idol, which devours every thing, and produces nothing, it ought not to be a subject of surprise that we oppose the measure as a direct invasion of our most essential rights. And, if I may be permitted to give an opinion as to the true interests of another portion of the Union, I would say, most confidently, that, if New York were a separate State, this would be a most unwise and ruinous policy for her to pursue. For, if there be a State in the Union more interested in foreign commerce than any other, it is New York; and I will add, if there be one more interested than all others, in the cotton trade of the South, that, also, is New York. Yes, sir, that commerce which the majority of her representatives now seem to contemn, is the true source of her prosperity and greatness; and there is no portion of that commerce so important as that which this measure is calculated to jeopardize, if not to destroy—the carrying trade of the South. Without this, the city of New York, the great emporium of the Union, would be deprived of half its wealth, and shorn of half its splendor. And here, sir, I will say a word or two in relation to a view of this subject, which seems to have great weight with the gentlemen who represent the interior of the State of New York. They believe that, by rearing up manufactures, they will create a market for their grain: but, do they not perceive, that commerce furnishes a market for this article, much more extensive than they can reasonably anticipate from the manufactures they can create? The city of New York alone, nourished and sustained by the very commerce which this bill is calculated to destroy, creates, by its consumption, a more extensive market for the grain of the interior than will be created by all the manufacturing establishments which this system will bring into existence in half a century. Indeed, this idea of obtaining a market for grain, by forcing manufactures into existence—an idea which has made a very strong impression upon the farming interest in the Middle and Western States—can never be realized, but to a very moderate extent. In the existing state of the arts, manufactures are made principally by machinery, which consumes no grain—so that it would not, perhaps, be going too far to say, that the agents directly and indirectly employed, by commerce, in supplying the country with a given quantity of foreign manufactures, consume as much of the products of the soil, as would be consumed by the agents who would be employed in the fabrication of the same quantity of domestic manufactures.

While considering the operation of this measure upon the several divisions and interests of the Union, I hope I shall be excused for repeating, with a view to further illustration, an idea which I advanced at an early stage of the discussion upon the details of this measure, the correctness of which, however, has been since repeatedly denied. I stated, and I now deliberately repeat it, that the cotton of the Southern States, the great source of our prosperity, constituting one-third of the whole export of the Union, has reached that critical point in the competition with foreign cottons, when any material derangement of our commercial relations with Great Britain must inevitably expose us to the hazard of losing the market of that country, at least to a very considerable extent. If we cease to take the manufactures of Great Britain, she will assuredly cease to take our cotton to the same extent. It is a settled principle of her policy—a principle not only wise but essential to her existence—to purchase from those nations who receive her manufactures, in preference to those who do not. You have, heretofore, been her best customers, and therefore it has been her policy to purchase our cotton to the full extent of our demand for her manufactures. But, say gentlemen, Great Britain does not purchase our cotton from affection, but interest. I grant it sir, and that is the very reason of my decided hostility to a system which will make it her interest to purchase from other countries than our own. It is her interest to purchase cotton, even at a higher price, from those countries which receive her manufactures in exchange. It is better for her to give a little more for cotton, than to obtain nothing for her manufactures. It will be remarked, that the situation of Great Britain is, in this respect, widely different from that of the United States. The powers of her soil have been already pushed very nearly to the maximum of their productiveness. The productiveness of her manufactures, on the contrary, is as unlimited as the demand of the whole world. She, therefore, has no choice of pursuits. Her surplus capital and labor must be directed to manufactures, or remain idle and unproductive. A demand for her manufactures is, then, from the very necessity of her condition, the primary consideration, to which every other must be subservient in the regulation of her commercial relations. To say, therefore, that she will continue to purchase our cotton, because she can get it a little cheaper than other cottons, after we have ceased to purchase her manufactures, is to suppose that she will be utterly blind to her own necessities; that she will, in fact, abandon, where it is most indispensable, that very policy which the friends of this bill now call upon us to adopt, in a spirit of reckless speculation, without considering that our circumstances are the very reverse of those which render such a policy necessary to Great Britain. In fact, sir, the policy of Great Britain is not, as gentlemen seem to suppose, to secure the home but the foreign market for her manufactures. The former she has without an effort. It is to attain the latter that all her policy and enterprise are brought into requisition. The manufactures of that country are the basis of her commerce; our manufactures, on the contrary, are to be the destruction of our commerce. And yet, in a spirit of blind and indiscriminating imitation, we are called upon to follow the example of Great Britain, by adopting a policy which will produce a result precisely the opposite of that which she has experienced of her policy; or, in other words, we are required to adopt, in deference to British wisdom, a system the very reverse of that which British policy would pursue, under the same circumstances! It cannot be doubted that, in pursuance of the policy of forcing her manufactures into foreign markets, she will, if deprived of a large portion of our custom, direct all her efforts to South America. That country abounds in a soil admirably adapted to the production of cotton, and will, for a century to come, import her manufactures from foreign countries. Under these circumstances, it is obvious that Great Britain will use every effort to stimulate the industry of South America, by the various commercial advantages she has it in her power to present, and to make up, by this new trade, the loss she will have sustained in being deprived of ours. But I must hasten to bring my remarks to a conclusion, lest I should exhaust that indulgent patience which, I fear, I have already taxed too severely. A few words, and I shall have done.

APRIL, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

It would be some consolation to me, sir, if I could believe that the heavy impositions, which must operate so oppressively upon the part of the Union I have the honor to represent, would produce an equivalent benefit to other portions of the Union. If my constituents must be sacrificed, it would in some degree soothe their injured feelings, if they could have this excuse, at least, for quietly submitting to their fate, hard as it is, and unjust as they believe it to be. But even this humble consolation is denied us. We are doomed to suffer, under a clear conviction that our sufferings will administer no relief to the distressed, whether real or imaginary, of any portion of our fellow-citizens. We are to be made the victims of a system "which not enricheth them, but makes us poor indeed"—a system which wages war, not against our enemies, but our friends; not against the hostile regulations of other countries, but against the advantages of our natural position in the world, and the munificent bounties of an all-wise Providence—a system which has originated in discontent, and must inevitably end in disappointment. Against such a system I do most solemnly protest, as a palpable invasion of those rights and interests which I am charged to defend and protect. And I do beseech its advocates, as they regard the principles of justice, the interests of the Republic, or the mutual good will of its members, to pause before they give this bill the irrevocable sanction of their final vote. If, however, they should pass it, even with a majority of a single vote, I shall, as bound by my allegiance, submit to it as one of the laws of my country. I have endeavored, with zeal and fidelity, to discharge my duty as a Representative. I trust I shall never be found wanting in my duty as a citizen. I must take leave, however, to say one parting word to the authors of this measure; I thank God that, if mine is to be the suffering, theirs will be the responsibility.

The Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

When Mr. McDUFFIE had concluded—

Mr. MARKLEY, of Pennsylvania, rose, not, he said, to make a speech upon the bill, although such had originally been his intention; but he thought, after so long a discussion, the House must be ready and anxious to take the final question on the bill. He therefore moved a call of the House.

After the call was concluded, the doors were closed; four members only were found to be absent.

Mr. STEWART then moved to dispense with all further proceedings in relation to the call: his motion was carried.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, rose to call for the previous question. He said he thought the present a proper time to finish the debate. It was known that one member was attending, contrary to the advice of his physicians, and two or three others contrary to the advice of prudence. He admitted that some courtesy was due to those who wanted to speak, but much more, he thought, was due to those whose sense of duty had brought them to the House from sick beds. He was one of those who had intended to present his views of the subject before the final question was taken, and some things had been said on yesterday which called for a reply from the friends of the bill; but he had predetermined to waive his right to do so, and hoped that gentlemen on both sides would consent to close the discussion. No tariff had ever been debated in cold blood, and the old members would support him in saying, that the debate on the present bill was marked with more temperance than on former occasions. He hoped it would terminate in the same spirit of moderation and forbearance that had marked its progress. He assured the House that he made the call under a sense of duty, but in the full spirit of deference for those who might oppose it.

The call was sustained—101 members voting in favor of, and 98 against it.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and demanded another count.

The CHAIR, in pursuance of a rule of the House, then appointed Messrs. RANDOLPH and TAYLOR as tellers; and the members on each side of the question were counted, by passing between the tellers, and returned as follows: In favor of the previous question 103, against it 95.

So the House determined in favor of the previous question.

Mr. WEBSTER then rose. He said he had been waiting in the House for several days, laboring under severe indisposition, in order to make a motion in relation to this bill, which was of vital importance to his constituents; but as he had not yet had an opportunity to do it, he moved that the bill be ordered to lie upon the table. Upon this question he requested the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered; and the House refused to lay the bill on the table—yeas 98, nays 110, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Baylies, P. P. Barbour, Bartlett, Bassett, Blair, Brock, Ordered, That the title be "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," and that the Clerk do carry the said bill to the Senate to ask their concurrence therein.

MONDAY, April 19.

Mr. MCKEAN presented memorials from sundry citizens of the United States, praying that the benefits of the law of the 18th of March, 1818, may be extended, without distinction, to all the Revolutionary few who faithfully served their country in the Revolutionary war.—Laid upon the table.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of New Jersey, praying for the aid of Government, in improving and rendering safe the harbor of Newcastle, Delaware.—Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KENT laid before the House an act of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.—Referred to the select committee, appointed on the 5th of December last, on so much of the President's Message as relates to a connexion of the waters of the Chesapeake and Ohio; by means of a canal.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Hewes," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to authorize the masters of vessels, in certain cases, to clear out either at the custom-house of Petersburg, or that of Richmond; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill concerning the allowance of pensions upon a relinquishment of bounty lands; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the city of Troy, in the State of New York, as a port of delivery.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House such information as may be in the possession of the department, connected with the circumstances under which it is alleged an error was committed in the location of 640 acres of land, reserved to George Harlin, by the 3d article of the treaty made with the Cherokee nation of Indians, on the 27th of February, 1819, with such explanatory remarks as may be justifiable from all the circumstances of the case; in reference to the supposed difference in the value of the reservation as granted by the said 3d article of the treaty, and that which it is alleged was designed to be obtained by it.

Mr. LONGFELLOW laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow, viz :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the correspondence between this Government and France, relating to spoliations committed on American commerce between the years 1793, and 1800; and also, relating to the claims of France upon this Government, for not complying with the treaties of alliance and commerce of February 6, 1778.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, viz :

1st. An act to provide for the sale of the warehouse at the former quarantine ground, near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, and for the erection of a dwelling-house at the Balize, in the said State, for the use of the boarding officer at that place, and for other purposes;

2d. An act supplementary to an act of Congress, passed on the 30th day of June, 1812, entitled "An act making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri;"

3d. An act for the relief of Elijah Van Syckle of Philadelphia;

4th. An act for the relief of Thomas Shields;

5th. An act for enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church, Washington Parish; were severally read the first and second time, and referred—the 1st, to the Committee of Ways and Means; the 2d, to the Committee on the Public Lands; the 3d, to the Committee of Ways and Means; the 4th, to the Committee of Claims; the 5th, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

THE SPEAKER communicated to the House an address of Ninian Edwards, late a Senator of the United States, from the State of Illinois, complaining that injustice has been done him in a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the correspondence between the Treasury Department and the banks in the different States, upon the subject of the deposits of public money in said banks; exculpating himself, and also, preferring certain charges against the said Secretary. The address is as follows:

WHEELING, VA., April 6, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to request you to present the address herewith transmitted, with its accompanying notes and documents, to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

HON. HENRY CLAY,

Speaker of the House of Reps.

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

As certain proceedings at the last session of Congress, under the authority of the House of Representatives, and a recent report to your honorable body, by the Hon. Wm. H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, seem to have been intended, and are calculated, to cast upon me imputations injurious to my character, which I know to be unjust, and which, I think, I can demonstrate to be so, I trust no apology can be necessary for my requesting leave to present my vindication against those imputations, directly to your honorable body; in order that it may be conveyed to the nation through the same channel by which I have been assailed.

This is a right which, under similar circumstances, I should suppose, ought not to be denied to the humblest individual in the Union. In this case, it is due to the nation itself, in consideration of the station I lately held, and that which I have now the honor to hold; and, owing to the peculiar circumstances of my case, it is emphatically demanded, on my account, by every principle of honor, and every regard to justice. Nor is it unprecedented in either House of Congress, in cases which certainly had no greater claim to such indulgence.

It will be seen that I was called upon by a committee of the House of Representatives of the last session, as a witness to testify before it; that I was subjected to an examination, which has not its parallel in the records of any free country; and that, after the lapse of about twelve months, and just as I was on the eve of my departure for a foreign country, an attempt has been made to impeach my credibility, on grounds which must have been, at all times since my testimony was given, within the command of the honorable gentleman by whom they have been so opportunely alleged.

To refuse to permit me to repel such an attack, in the manner proposed, would be to overthrow the longest established precedents, and to establish in their place the odious, oppressive, unjust, and indefensible principle of allowing the credibility of a witness to be impeached, and yet denying to him the right to support it before the tribunal under whose authority he had been called on to testify.

But, independent of all considerations, in regard to myself, personally, I humbly conceive that your honorable body might well desire to receive my vindication, and every corroboration which I can give to my testimony, on your own account, in order to enable you the more clearly to ascertain the truth of, and the more satisfactorily and correctly to decide upon, statements now before you, and not yet acted on.

Notwithstanding all the canting about an "A. B. plot," the ingenious attempts that have been made, and the stratagems that have been adopted, by certain newspaper editors and others, to mislead and deceive the public mind into a belief that the committee, appointed at the last session on that subject, had thoroughly investigated all the statements made by a writer under the signature of A. B. in regard to certain suppressed documents; and that Mr. Crawford had been "triumphantly acquitted," in relation to the whole of them; I assert, without the fear of contradiction, that it is known to your honorable body that neither of those committees extended their investigations into those statements, beyond about four paragraphs, which were mere bagatelles in comparison with other letters and matters that were expressly charged, and incontrovertibly proved, by the documents furnished by Mr. Crawford himself, to have been withheld, contrary to the resolutions of the House which required their production.

These important statements, and the matters and things contained in my testimony, have neither been investigated by any committee, nor acted on by the House; and if my testimony had been, it is now revived by Mr. Crawford himself; and, surely, if it be competent to him to attack it, it cannot be fair or just to withhold from me the equal right of defending and supporting it.

By referring to the resolution of the House, (note 1,) under which the second committee of investigation was appointed, and to my examination by that committee, (3,) it will be seen that the latter fully merits the character I have given to it; that it was wholly unauthorized by any powers delegated to the committee; and that it evinced a far greater disposition to implicate me in some kind of censure, in regard to the public deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, than to investigate the conduct of Mr. Crawford, or to inquire into those subjects for which the committee had been professedly appointed. Whatever may be thought by those who may be at the trouble to examine the list of interrogatories that were put to me, as to the source from whence they originated, none can read some of the following statements and documents, without being convinced, that a very small portion of candor would have rendered a part, at least, of those interrogatories unnecessary and useless, even in the opinion of the committee itself, (3.)

Whatever may have been my agency in procuring the Bank of Edwardsville to be made a depository of public money, it had nothing to do in originating the great system adopted by Mr. Crawford, of employing the local banks, and in several instances, in direct violation of law, by allowing them a permanent deposit of nine hundred thousand dollars, equal to a salary of $54,000 per annum, for receiving and transmitting the public money, which the Bank of the United States was bound to do without compensation, and would have done, without those immense losses to the public, which must inevitably result from the adoption of a plan so contrary to the letter and spirit of the bank charter; and to the avowed intentions and objects of Congress in granting it.

The effect of my application to have the Bank of Edwardsville made a depository of public money, was merely to have deposits made there, that otherwise would have been made in the Bank of Missouri, which previously had been authorized to receive the public moneys, collected by the two Receivers in Illinois, who alone were directed to make their deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville. My agency in this transaction, therefore, did not prevent the depositing of a cent in the Bank of the United States; and your honorable body may well judge, whether the public interest could have been much jeopardized, by the change I recommended, from the following statement, extracted from the documents presented to you by Mr. Crawford.

The Bank of Missouri had a capital of $210,000, of which, the stockholders drew out of it, on pledges of stock, $196,335, leaving only $23,665 for the further accommodation of themselves and others. Upon this last sum, its real banking capital, it discounted and paid on over drafts, to the amount of $244,345 53. The whole amount of its discounts, including payments on over drafts, was $430,680 43; of which sum, its directors alone were responsible for $297,492 13, if, as is presumed to be the case, they are chargeable with over drafts, to the amount of $11,622 27.

To this bank, Mr. Crawford allowed a permanent deposit of $150,000, equal to a salary of $9,000 per annum. He permitted the public money to accumulate in it, to the amount of $726,031 90, in the course of nineteen successive months, ending with the 1st of September, 1819, without exacting those precautionary returns and statements, which he himself considered essential to insure the fidelity of all the banks appointed to receive the public money; and, eventually, he received from it, in part payment of its debts, contrary to the positive injunctions of the resolution of Congress, of 1816, a large amount of uncurrent notes, some of which were not worth twenty-five cents in the dollar.

Much as he has mystified this subject, in several of his reports, and particularly in that one which is part of document 105, (in the 8th volume State Papers, 2d session 17th Congress,) in which he blends a deposit in the Bank of Missouri, of $64,613 58, with "the special deposits which passed through the Bank of the United States," it cannot excuse, or even successfully disguise, the flagrant impropriety of his having received, at par, the uncurrent notes above referred to; for, by the very document last mentioned, it appears that this deposit had been "re-transferred to the Bank of Missouri, and assumed as cash, in September, 1819," which was previous to the receipt of those notes. His own letter to the Cashier of the Bank of Missouri, dated 23d March, 1819, and the Cashier's answer, dated 25th of June, 1819, (4 and 5) clearly show, that no justification for receiving uncurrent paper can be derived from that circumstance. Because, he received uncurrent notes that were not, and could not, have been included in that deposit; for, not to mention other cases, the notes which he received on the "Bank of Georgetown, Kentucky," were not, at that time, even receivable in the land offices. Nor was there ever any contract between the Bank of the United States, or the Treasury Department, with the Bank of Missouri, from which the latter could derive any right to tender, or be any justification for receiving, those uncurrent notes.

But, had it been otherwise, it would not be less difficult to justify the placing of this bank upon a footing so different from that of all other similar depositories of public money.

Under all these circumstances, it would seem incredible, that any injury to the public could have resulted from the change of deposite, for which I applied; and the attempt to subject me to censure, for the small participation which I have had in this business, ought to be considered as a plain acknowledgment of the awful weight of responsibility that rests upon him, whose especial duty it was, to take care of the public money.

My responsibility, however, did not long continue; for, finding the Bank of Edwardsville, on my return from Congress, soon after it had been authorized to receive the public money, involved in some difficulties, I determined to sustain it against the danger that then threatened it, and, after seeing it in a safe situation, to relieve myself from all kind of responsibility for that, or any other bank. Accordingly, in the same year, I made a publication in several newspapers, and in two different States, of my determination to be held no longer responsible for that, or any other bank. This publication can be established by a part, if not the whole, of the respective delegations, now in Congress from the States of Illinois and Missouri. It was forwarded to Mr. Crawford, and I have no apprehension that he will ever deny having received it.

He had, also, been put upon inquiry, in regard to the Bank of Edwardsville, by a bitter philippic, in ample detail, against it, which he received from the Hon. Mr. Benton, of the Senate. This was shown to Col.

Johnson and myself, and a copy of it was transmitted to the bank, where I suppose it now remains.

He was fully apprized of those very difficulties of the bank, which produced my determination to retire from it. They were communicated in letters from myself to Colonel Johnson, which were intended to be, and were, forwarded to Mr. Crawford. The receipt of two of them is acknowledged by his letter to Colonel Johnson, of 15th July, 1819, in which he says, "Yours of the 28th ultimo came to hand this morning. The circumstances connected with the Bank of Edwardsville, as developed in the two letters of Governor Edwards, submitted by you to my perusal, will receive due consideration." In the same letter, he says, "With Governor Edwards I had no personal acquaintance, before the last Winter. The opinion which I had formed of his talents and integrity, from the official correspondence which had been carried on between us, both in the War and Treasury Department, has been confirmed by personal acquaintance.

"The different subjects upon which he had occasion to ask my opinion or decision, during the last session of Congress, were fairly and candidly stated; his comments upon them were judicious, and it afforded me great pleasure to be able, after due examination and reflection, generally to coincide with him." The session here spoken of is the one in which I made the application in favor of the Bank of Edwardsville.

Had Mr. Crawford been as much disposed to profit by the impressive lessons of experience, which he was constantly receiving, as I was by those of a few months only, it might have prevented a vast accumulation of "unavailable funds," and have enabled him, much earlier, to have secured to the Bank of the United States, "in their just extent, the advantages intended to be secured to it by the charter," which he fairly promised to Congress, in his report of the 10th December, 1817, [6] and the necessity for which he seems to have been duly sensible of, in another report, (8 vol. State Papers, 2d session 17th Congress, p. 77,) in which he says, "In the Winter and Spring of 1819, the Bank of the United States was, in the opinion of the enlightened officer who presided over its direction, in a great degree indebted for the preservation of its credit to the forbearance of its creditors, and to the support which it received from the Treasury Department. Such were my impressions of its critical state, that I felt it my duty to accept propositions made by the Board of Directors, which, under other circumstances, would have been declined." It is wonderful, therefore, that, with these impressions, he should have thought it consistent with his duty to have extended such favors as have been noticed to a single local bank; much less to the multitude that shared his patronage, and could not have existed without it.

It would be just as fair and candid to implicate me in the unjustifiable indulgence that has been extended to the Bank of Edwardsville, since its failure, as to endeavor to involve me in any kind of censure for its continuance as a depository of public money after the Fall of 1819. At the time of its failure, its resources were, I am well satisfied, more than amply sufficient to have secured its debt to the Government. But, every man of common experience and observation knows, that the resources of all banks, in its situation, must necessarily become more and more impaired, and are more liable to be misapplied. Yet, strange and incredible as it may appear, I have never heard, nor do I believe, though I reside in the same village in which the bank is located, that Mr. Crawford has collected one cent from it; or made any adjustment with it; or resorted to any measure to coerce the payment of its debt. He, who could find motives for an indulgence so extraordinary, and at the same time so inconsistent with, and detrimental to, the public interest, could not have required either my recommendation or sanction for continuing this bank a depository of the public money after the Fall of 1819.

I come now to the report that contains the dextrous insinuation against my credibility. So much of it as relates to this subject is in the following words, viz: "The honorable Mr. Edwards, late a Senator from Illinois, having stated, on his examination before a committee of the House, on the 13th of February, 1823, that the late Receiver of Public Moneys at Edwardsville had, on his advice, and in his presence, written a letter to the Secretary, enclosing a copy of the publication which Mr. Edwards represents himself to have made some time in the year 1819, announcing his intention of retiring from the directorship of the Bank of Edwardsville, and that he had advised the Receiver to withhold his deposits from the bank until he could receive further orders from the Secretary; and that the Receiver afterwards informed him that he had received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits: The Secretary deems it proper to state, that no such letter from the Receiver is to be found on the files of the Department; that the officers employed in it have no recollection of the receipt of such a letter; and that, on an examination of the records of the Department, it appears that no answer to any such letter, directing the Receiver to continue the deposits, was ever written to him by the Secretary of the Treasury."

This statement bears intrinsic evidence that it was intended to deprive me of the benefit of my justification—not voluntarily made, but drawn from me by the committee, in regard to the Bank of Edwardsville; and to subject me to the odious suspicion of having sworn falsely. Were there any doubt on this subject, it would be removed by the conduct of a distinguished individual, whom it might not be respectful to name in this communication, and who, since I left the city, has not thought it beneath his dignity to go about exhibiting the report, and expressing his opinion that it "placed me in a dilemma." He may yet find it more difficult for his patron to get rid of one, of infinitely deeper interest.

Believing, as I call upon my God to witness I sincerely and confidently do, that Mr. Crawford did receive the letter mentioned in the above report, and that it is now in his possession, or has been purposely destroyed, I can but regard this attack upon my reputation as unparalleled by any thing I have ever witnessed or heard of, as emanating from so respectable a source, except certain manœuvres and stratagems to fix upon a much more distinguished individual of this nation the disgraceful charges of a guilty participation in horse-stealing, and the passing of counterfeit money, which I have somewhere met with in the course of my reading. Malicious insinuation is the resort of a timid mind. Wilful misrepresentation denotes a wicked one.

In regard to the time which has been selected for making this attack upon me, it very much resembles the management which Mr. Crawford resorted to, at the last session of Congress, to defeat a certain applicant for a land office appointment. This gentleman had been before the President for many weeks. He was supported by gentlemen of the first respectability,

APRIL, 1824.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

H. OF R.

and of different parties, in the States of Illinois, Missouri, and Tennessee. No objections to him were anticipated by himself or his friends. And none was made till the President was about to transmit his nomination to the Senate. Then, when a nomination could no longer be kept back, by any contrivance whatever, and not till then, did Mr. Crawford exhibit his objections. The gentleman's residence was too remote, and the session of Congress too far spent, to admit of any defence or explanation from him; and thus he lost the appointment. As this case is strongly marked by certain characteristical traits, which tend to illustrate the objects and design of this well-timed attack upon me, I refer, for a further explanation of it, to my letter to Mr. Crawford on the subject.[7]

In the latter part of the week previous to my departure from the city, on calling to take my leave of the President, I met with Mr. Dickins, to whom, in a short conversation with him, I communicated my intention of leaving the city on the Sunday following, (one day before the date of Mr. Crawford's communication,) and, but for an accidental engagement of the Secretary of State, which prevented his signing a paper that it was necessary for me to carry to the Treasury Department, till after the hours of business in that Department had elapsed, I should have departed from the city before Mr. Crawford's communication was made; and probably should not even have heard of it till after I had left the United States.

But, independently of what I stated to Mr. Dickins, my intended departure was strongly indicated by the business I was engaged in transacting in the public offices. It was generally known; and, if it had not been, it was very naturally to have been expected.

Deprived of all opportunity of defence, a victory over me might, indeed, have been easy; but, surely, the triumph would have been most ignoble.

By way of availing myself of further characteristical traits, I beg leave to state, that an inspection of the public documents is sufficient to show that, in repeated instances, Mr. Crawford's replies to calls upon him by the House for information, &c., have been so tardy and protracted, as to prevent the possibility of investigating them during the sessions in which the calls were made; and to require a great degree of charity—possibly however, not more than is justly due—to resist the belief that he has been as much disposed to evade as to invite a scrutiny into his conduct.

Even the correspondence which accompanied the report in question, though required by a resolution of the 8th May, 1823, to be laid before the House as early as practicable, after the commencement of the then next succeeding session, has been delayed to so late a period of the present session as to render an investigation of it, before the first Monday in December next, impossible.

Notwithstanding all these circumstances, it may be that Mr. Crawford did not intend to take an undue advantage of my absence. He must well know with what indignant condemnation such an attempt would be denounced by every magnanimous and generous bosom. What surprises me most is, that a just apprehension of so degrading a suspicion had not induced him to have exhibited his insinuation a little sooner, or to have declined it altogether. But, whatever may have been his intentions, I could not have been more disadvantageously affected by any contrivance or stratagem that he could have adopted, to deprive me of a fair opportunity of defence.

Scarcely convalescent from a long indisposition, exhausted with the fatigue of travelling, and required to proceed on my journey with all convenient despatch, I must leave him unanswered, or content myself with such a defence as, with all these disadvantages, a very short time of necessary delay on my journey may enable me hastily to present. But, what I regard with the most concern is, that writing, as I must do, without having it in my power to refer to, and re-examine, certain documents, I shall not be able to avail myself of some important circumstances which they would establish, and may be betrayed into some slight inaccuracies, to which all men are liable who have to trust to memory alone. I promise, however, to be more accurate than Mr. Crawford has been, in cases in which he had before him every means of being entirely so.

Having endeavored to establish my right to make my defence before your honorable body, and taking it for granted that a request so reasonable, under all the circumstances that have been mentioned, will not be denied me, I presume I shall be indulged in every legitimate right of defence that belongs to my case.

Among these, it will scarcely be denied that I have a right—

1st. To corroborate my own testimony.

2dly. To show, by any means in my power, that the statements made against me are inconclusive; and, particularly, to avail myself of any circumstance that is presented by the documents in the case in which I was called on to testify, for the purpose of invalidating those statements. And, 3dly. Directly to impeach the credibility of those who have assailed mine.

The latter I shall probably waive; for, though I have, at all times, felt myself at liberty to animadvert upon Mr. Crawford's official conduct, and to defend my own, both of which he has found me prompt to do, in cases that never yet have met the public eye, I never have intentionally treated him with the slightest indecorum, or a want of that respect that is due to his station. (8.) Respect for your honorable body would, of itself, be sufficient to induce me to abstain from the language of passion, or abusive vituperation, before you. Respect for myself would prevent me from it anywhere else. I cheerfully leave that resource to bullies, political tools, mercenary hirelings, and those who, conscious of their inability to defend their own conduct, can find no better means of diverting public attention from themselves to others. I shall, nevertheless, freely urge, and insist on, such facts as I know to be true, disclaiming, however, any other construction of them than the most innocent of which they are susceptible. If I shall point out palpable omissions and violations of duty, or show that letters, which ought to have been communicated to the House, have been suppressed, and that various misstatements have been officially made, I shall attribute them to nothing more than forgetfulness, inattention, inadvertence, or some erroneous, but innocent views of the subject.

This will be sufficient to show that the negative statements of Mr. Crawford, and "the officers employed in the Treasury Department," ought not to prevail against my positive statement on oath. If others should suppose this forbearance on my part a little too fastidious, and that the cases which I shall exhibit are evincive of intentions less innocent, let it be remembered that their views of the subject would unquestionably render the case the stronger in my favor.

APRIL, 1824.

With these preliminary remarks, I proceed to my defence against this mal apropos statement of Mr. Crawford.

It will be recollected, that I was not a volunteer in giving my testimony before the committee, and I can conceive of no motive which could be supposed, by any but a most depraved mind, misled by its own wicked operations, as have influenced me to make an uncandid statement. As to my responsibility, in consequence of having applied to Mr. Crawford to cause certain deposits to be made in the Bank of Edwardsville, in preference to that of Missouri, surely I have shown that enough was known about the latter bank, at the time my testimony was given, to have freed me from all apprehensions in regard to any responsibility that I had imposed upon myself, even if I had not withdrawn, as already stated, from the "Directorship" of the former. But, Mr. Crawford does not deny that he received my publication, and even if he had not received it, it having been made in two different States, and he having been, as I have shown, put upon inquiry in regard to that bank, and informed of the difficulties it had had to encounter, I certainly might rely upon the notoriety of my acts, in this respect, with a much better grace than he relies upon a supposed notoriety of his repeated but unpublished omissions, to comply with the most positive legal injunctions as an excuse for those omissions, which he does in his letter of the 24th February, 1823, to the chairman of the committee of investigation: and in which he also seems, almost, to insist that his violation of his duty was equivalent to a fulfilment of it.

It could have been no object with me to have established an additional suppression upon him; for, if time do not fail me, it will be seen, before I am done with this subject, that I had in my possession proof, whose credibility could not be questioned, of his having suppressed, in a variety of other instances, letters enough, of a much more important character and delicate bearing, for any purpose that the utmost malignity could have contemplated, as possible to be effected by such means. [9.]

The amount of my statement before the committee, as well as I can now recollect it, (not having it in my power to refer it for examination,) but which will be supplied at Washington is,

1st. That, for the reasons therein mentioned, I made a publication of my intention to retire from the "Directorship" of the Bank of Edwardsville.

2d. That I advised the Receiver of Public Money at that place, to withhold his deposits from the bank, till he could receive further orders from the Secretary of the Treasury.

3d. That the Receiver did write to the Secretary on the subject, enclosing my publication, &c.

4th. That the former afterwards informed me that he had received a letter from the latter, directing him to continue the deposits.

Now, it is not denied, and dare not be, that I did make the publication alluded to, and this I could not have done, for the reasons that influenced me, consistently with the known friendship and intimacy that then subsisted between the Receiver and myself, without giving him the advice mentioned in the second part of the above statement. But that I did give that advice is much more strongly corroborated by the fact that the Receiver did actually withhold the deposits, and Mr. Crawford knows it. This might be established by the monthly returns of both the Receiver and the bank. But these are in the possession of Mr. Crawford: I, however, felicitate myself upon being able to satisfy your honorable body of the fact, by documents that have been furnished by himself, but which, thank God, are now out of his power.

By his report of the 27th February, 1823, (8 volume State Papers, 2d sess. 17th Congress, pages 31, 33, and 35,) it will be seen that the amount of deposits stated to have been in the Bank of Edwardsville, to the credit of the Treasurer, was—

At the end of the 2d quarter of 1819, $45,580 68

At the end of the 4th quarter of 1819, 53,191 59

The two first of these statements are presumed to be correct, or nearly so. The latter is entirely otherwise, as I will prove to your satisfaction, if there is any kind of confidence to be reposed in previous statements exhibited to you by Mr. Crawford. Had it been intended to disguise the fact of the Receiver's having withheld the deposits, as above stated, and to give some semblance of plausibility to the recent insinuation against myself, nothing could have been more ingeniously, or more disingenuously, contrived, for these purposes, than this last statement. If it had been truly stated that, instead of $53,191 59, the real amount in deposit, at the end of the fourth quarter, was $98,191 59½, the contrast between this sum and the amount of the previous deposits, might have afforded some corroboration to my statement before the committee. But this, subsequent events have proved, it was intended to question. I will, however, make the case too plain for doubt.

By the report last referred to, it appears that the amount of deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, to the credit of the Treasurer, on the last days of June and September, was a little upwards of $45,000.

By Mr. Crawford's previous report of the 27th of April, 1823, (in which is an ingenious contrivance of placing December before November,) it is shown by the bank returns themselves, that, on the 30th of November, 1819, the amount of deposit was $45,475 04½, and that, on the last day of the succeeding month, (the end of the fourth quarter of 1819,) it was $98,191 59½, [10] and not $53,191 59, as subsequently reported from the Treasury Department.

From the correspondence between the several amounts of deposits in the bank, on the last days of June, September, and November, and the difference between them and that of the last day of December, in the same year, no one can doubt that the Receiver at Edwardsville did actually withhold the deposits as above suggested; unless it can be believed that he did, in one single month, distinguished by no particular circumstances, receive to the amount of $52,716 55, equal to the rate of $692,598 60 per annum.

Let us, then, inquire a little into the probability of his having written to Mr. Crawford, or, rather, into the great improbability of his not having done so.

This gentleman united in himself the office of Receiver and President of the Bank of Edwardsville. As Receiver, he had positive orders to make his deposits in that bank, and was bound to make monthly returns of his accounts to the Secretary of the Treasury. As President, it was his duty to have monthly returns of the state of the bank, and the amount of public deposits therein, regularly transmitted to the Secretary. Is it, then, to be believed, that he should have withheld the deposits contrary to his orders, without having given to Mr. Crawford some reason, either as Receiver or President, for his having done so? And, if he had failed to perform this duty, is it credible that Mr. Crawford would have been so negligent and inattentive to his duty, and so regardless of the public interest, as not to have called him to an account for such conduct?

APRIL, 1824.

H. OF R.

But, if further confirmation of the letter's having been written, and received by Mr. Crawford, too, were wanting, strong presumptions in favor of both may be derived from the very guarded and characteristic artifice by which he would seem equally to deny the receipt of the letter, and that any instructions had been given to the Receiver to continue to make the deposits. Let it be observed, that my statement, as quoted by Mr. Crawford, is, "that the Receiver informed me he had received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits." Mr. Crawford does not deny that such directions were given, but he says, "it appears that no answer to such letter, directing the Receiver to continue the deposits, was ever written," &c. From this peculiar manner of denial, I can but infer that, not being willing, from some cause or other, to admit the receipt of the letter, Mr. Crawford contrived to give the directions under some other form or pretext than that of a direct answer to it. But that such directions were given, I cannot doubt, though I have nothing to rely upon for this opinion but the Receiver's word for the fact. If Mr. Crawford did not write to him specially on the subject of his having withheld the deposits, it can only be satisfactorily accounted for on the supposition that he (Mr. Crawford) did, in some form or other, give such directions as he supposed would produce the proper corrective.

Another fact, in confirmation of my statement, is, that one of the two Receivers who had been directed to make their deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, was ordered to make his elsewhere. But under what pretext I do not know, nor do I recollect ever to have heard; probably, however, under some one equally calculated to disguise the real motive, as the giving of directions, without acknowledging the receipt of the letter that produced them.

It will not, I persuade myself, be considered a trifling corroboration of my statement, that it was not made to the committee for the first time; but that, in a private correspondence between Mr. Crawford and myself, more than twelve months before my examination by the committee, I had asserted the same facts substantially to himself.

In my letter to him of the 9th February, 1823, (which I would not venture to refer to if I had not his answer to it,) I say, "I beg leave most respectfully to suggest, that it would be but an act of justice to me to present my publication of 1819, in which I declared I would be no longer responsible for the bank [of Edwardsville] in any way whatever. This publication was contained in the St. Louis Enquirer, which I believe you took at that time. It was also contained in a paper which I forwarded to you myself. And it was enclosed, and referred to, in a letter from Colonel Stephenson, the President of the Bank, [and the Receiver also] to you, which letter, he informed me, had been answered. Since the Fall of 1819, my connexion with that bank has entirely ceased, except that I am a stockholder in it, without, however, ever having borrowed one cent from it."

In my letter to Mr. Crawford, of 14th February, 1823, I say to him, "I must, however, say, sir, that, as the information, in the Treasury Department, relative to my original recommendation of the Bank of Edwardsville, has, for some time past, been distinctly understood, and freely used at this place, [Washington,] I can but consider it somewhat unfortunate for me, that other communications in the Department, which ought to have terminated all responsibility on my part, have not been equally known. That I was the cause of the deposits being made there, in the first instance, I freely acknowledge. But, that I unambiguously declared, I would not be held responsible for that or any other bank, in any way whatever, after the Fall of 1819; that you were notified thereof in due time; that the deposits have not been continued there in consequence of my recommendation since that period; and that the bank was then in a good situation, I may, I think, according to my present impressions, fairly insist upon. And, if so, the partial information, now in circulation at this place, is not calculated to do me that justice which, I hope, I have a right to expect from your magnanimity. It would, therefore, afford me great pleasure, I assure you, sir, that the whole of my conduct, in relation to that business, should be so fully known as to be no longer misunderstood."

The first of these letters was written five days before his report of the 14th February, 1822. The second bears the same date of the latter. They must both, therefore, have been written before any charge of suppressions had been made or suggested.

Had the existence of the Receiver's letter been denied, or the slightest intimation of questioning it been given, at the time it was thus asserted, I could, and would, have proved every fact contained in my statement in regard to it, by that gentleman himself. But he is now dead. Mr. Crawford knew this before he made the report in question—and dead men cannot contradict living ones.

No one can read the interrogatories that were put to me by the committee, and believe that Mr. Crawford was not well informed of my testimony before the date of his letter to the chairman of the same committee, which was eleven days later than my examination. From the nature of the inquiries which he was then called upon to answer, they afforded as suitable an occasion, as the one he has selected, for questioning my credibility. Why, then, has he so long postponed it? One thing is certain, it never could have been undertaken with greater hopes of success than when it was supposed I should have no opportunity of defending myself.

I will now submit to your honorable body a few remarks, to show that the negative statements of Mr. Crawford, and his "officers of the Treasury Department," however confidently relied upon by him for my total overthrow, are too inconclusive for his purpose.

You have been informed by him that, previous to the calls for his correspondence with the local banks, which were made the depositories of public money, it had been usual to refer all such calls to Mr. Jones, his chief clerk, but that, in these cases, another clerk had been selected to collect the letters, &c., which were called for. Why this change was made, at that particular juncture, (being wholly unaccounted for by Mr. Crawford,) is left to conjecture. Was Mr. Jones incompetent to the discharge of this duty? The very station he holds in the Department forbids such a supposition. Had he proved himself unworthy of confidence? If so, he could not have retained his station; and such is acknowledged to be his stern, unyielding, inflexible integrity, that no one could have supposed him capable of a subserviency in any unfair purpose. I confess I regret that the change was made: for, had it not been, I cannot resist the belief that I should have been spared much of the labor of this vindication. But, without yielding to unavailing regrets, I must be content to take things as I find them. I, therefore, proceed to examine the testimony that is offered against me.

This is substantially, 1st. That no such letter from the Receiver [as that mentioned in my examination] is to be found in the files of the Department. 2. That the officers employed in it have no recollection of the receipt of such a letter. And 3. That the records of the Department do not show that it was answered.

Supposing it to be true that this letter cannot be found "in the files of the Department," it by no means proves that it was not received by Mr. Crawford.

This is not the first occasion on which I have had to regret that a letter received by him could not be found when it became necessary for my defence.

Finding myself grossly misrepresented in relation to a letter I had written to him, and being determined to vindicate myself against the insinuations that were predicated upon it, I wrote to him on the 5th of January, 1821, requesting a copy of it. In his reply, dated 10th January, 1821, he says: "The letter which you have described in yours of the 5th instant, has been sought for in vain. Mr. Jones states that, according to the best of his recollection, he considered it not of a description to go on the files, and that consequently it was not filed. If his recollection is correct, it accounts for the absence of the letter from the files, and for its being lost or mislaid." My letter being thus disposed of, Mr. Crawford, in his answer, impliedly repeated one of the insinuations above referred to. This was promptly repelled by me; and, since then, I have heard no more on that subject.

From this case alone, it might not be unreasonable to presume that some similar disposition may have been made of the letter now in question. But, with every motive to make such an assertion, Mr. Crawford has not ventured to say he did not receive this letter. It will not be difficult to show that other letters, of infinitely more importance, have been received by him, about which it might be truly said, "no such letters are to be found in the files of the Department." He has sometimes another depository for them, in which the letter mentioned in my examination may also have been placed. It may have been addressed to him "without the addition of Secretary of the Treasury," which we have seen it gravely insisted on as giving him a right to consider any letter as "a private paper," though exclusively relating to matters of official duty. Or he may have "considered it not of a description to go on the files;" and thus may "its absence from the files," or "its being lost or mislaid," be very naturally accounted for, according to the practices of the Department.

The probability of this supposition is greatly strengthened by the following case:

Between 1816, and the 31st December, 1819, he received important communications on the subject of the illicit introduction of a large number of African slaves into the United States, which strongly implicated one of his particular friends. By a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the last mentioned date, he was directed to lay before the House copies of such communications as he had received since 1816, and such information as he possessed, in relation to the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States. But, notwithstanding this positive call upon him, I assert, and I challenge investigation, that he did withhold letters and information upon this subject, implicating his friend, which ought to have been communicated to the House, and some of which, he did not even permit "to go on the files of the Department." Of course, it might be very truly said of them, "that no such letters are to be found on the files of the Department; and that the officers employed in it have no recollection of the receipt of them;" for, having been deposited in his own private bureau, those officers could have no means of ascertaining the fact, and the very motives for withholding them from the files, would render fruitless all attempts to find "answers" to them "by an examination of the records of the Department." And yet, there is no doubt of their having been received, and the strongest probability that they were answered also. If the authority of the House of Representatives was not sufficient to obtain their production, the non-production of the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville ought not to excite a moment's surprise.

But it also appears that he, and his "officers of the Treasury Department," have not been able to find a great number of other letters, and even some of his own official ones, when required by other calls of the House; or, if they could have been found, they were suppressed. Of this, the documents furnished by himself afford both abundant and conclusive proof. Many instances might be stated. For the sake of brevity, I will allude to a few of them only.

Several cases of this kind are presented by the correspondence with the Bank of Huntsville. I will refer to but one of them. This is too conclusive for any artifice to elude it; and it requires but a bare inspection of the documents themselves to be convinced of it.

In his letter, "L., No. 7," to the President of the Bank of Huntsville, dated the 30th July, 1819, he says, "You will perceive, by the contents of my letter of the ninth instant, that the failure of the Nashville Bank, and its offices, was, at that time, known to this Department. It was then foreseen that the Bank of Huntsville could not fail to be injuriously affected by that event, and by others of a similar nature, which were then anticipated." The reasons stated in my letter of the ninth instant, in favor of the prompt adoption, by the bank, of the measures necessary to the transfer of the public money in the possession of the bank, beyond the permanent deposits, remain unimpaired."

This letter of the 9th of July, 1819, is also referred to in letter "L., No. 8," from the President of the Bank of Huntsville, dated September, 1819. Yet this same letter of the 9th instant, whose "relevancy to the subject-matter of the call" admits of no question, "was not to be found on the files of the Department," or it was purposely suppressed, for it has not been communicated.

By an examination of the documents No. 66, and No. 119, it will be seen that more than half the correspondence with the Bank of Missouri, though called for by a resolution of the House has been suppressed. The importance and very delicate import of a few of these letters will be noticed presently; in connexion with another subject.

But, though there were two calls in this case, either of which rendered it the duty of Mr. Crawford to have transmitted all the correspondence; and though, in answering the second call, he expressly stated that he had transmitted "all the correspondence required by the resolution, except two letters from the Receiver at St. Louis, which were of a confidential nature," yet, your honorable body will find very strong reasons to doubt the correctness of this statement, and I shall be much surprised if the third call, with which he has so tardily complied, has been sufficient to draw from him all the correspondence, even with the Bank of Missouri. The omission of letters, addressed to the Department, might be accounted for on the supposition that they might have miscarried. But this is a casualty to which the letters, or copies of the letters, of the Secretary himself, which should always remain in the Department, are not liable. They may, however, sometimes disappear, as the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville seems to have done. If not, it will be difficult to account for the absence of a letter of the 30th July, 1819, which is presumed to have been addressed by Mr. Crawford to the Bank of Missouri, upon the authority of a report of a committee of the Legislature of Missouri, at its session in 1822.

APRIL, 1824.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

H. OF R.

This was a committee appointed to examine into the concerns of the Bank of Missouri. Mr. Crawford's letters to that bank were submitted to the inspection of the committee, and the report, which I have the honor herewith to transmit, (11) contains extracts from several of them, among which is one from his letter of 30th July, 1819, of which enough appears to prove that it was embraced by the call, and ought to have been communicated, unless, indeed, it is a mere fabrication by the committee, for which no imaginable motive can be perceived.

I have not time to dwell upon several curious particulars that are disclosed by this report. I beg leave, however, to refer your honorable body to the contract with the Bank of Missouri, as therein set forth. An inspection of it will enable you to decide at once whether it is correctly represented in Mr. Crawford's report of it, and whether he had a right to withdraw any part of the permanent deposits, under any pretence whatever, before the expiration of six months "after it ceased to be employed to receive the public moneys."

In regard to the letters that have been alluded to, I will barely remark, that, if so many of them, actually belonging to the Department, could not be found on "its files," it will not be strange if it shall hereafter appear that the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville has been overlooked; or, if the former were purposely suppressed, there is nothing improbable in the belief that the latter has shared the same fate.

But this letter may have been received by Mr. Crawford, and he may have forgotten it.

This, I presume, I may fairly demonstrate, by showing that his memory has been extremely treacherous, in other instances, of far greater consequence. For this purpose, I beg leave, in the first place, to call the attention of your honorable body to his oath, before the committee.

Regardless of the salutary admonitions of the proverb "of the glass windows," he has treated my oath somewhat freely, and he can have no reasonable cause to complain if his own shall undergo a slight investigation.

On his examination before the committee, he says, "I never sanctioned the omission of any part of the correspondence."

Now let us hear Mr. Dickens, his confidential clerk. On the examination of this gentleman before the same committee, he says, "It is the general direction of the Secretary, when information is called for, to give every thing that relates to the subject. When the call was made, I looked over all the papers, filed and unfiled, relating to the subject. The papers, after selected, are laid before the Secretary; and in this case, he directed me to collect every thing in the office relating to the subject. They were selected and submitted to his inspection. In this case, from the urgency of it, I took the originals and rough draughts. The papers remained some time before the Secretary, while he was making the report, after I gave them to him, and before he communicated to the House."

Let it be recollected that Mr. Dickens is one of Mr. Crawford's witnesses against me, and enjoys his highest confidence. Now, if, this gentleman swears the truth, I would ask, how it could have happened that so many letters of the correspondence with the Banks of Huntsville and Missouri alone were suppressed, without Mr. Crawford's sanction?

The document No. 119, before referred to, most indisputably proves that upwards of twenty letters of the correspondence with the latter bank were suppressed, on the first call for them; and that these very letters were "in the office." If, then, Mr. Dickens did collect, and lay before Mr. Crawford, "all the papers, filed and unfiled, relating to the subject," which he was strictly ordered to do, and swears he did; by whom could the suppression of so great a portion of the correspondence with the Bank of Missouri have been effected? If not by Mr. Crawford, his own statement shows that it must have been done by Mr. Dickens. To permit so flagrant a breach of trust and confidence to pass with impunity, is to sanction it. If this suppression escaped Mr. Crawford's notice, when he answered the first call for those letters, he could not have been ignorant of it, when he shortly afterwards complied with the second call, by transmitting the very letters that had been suppressed. Yet, we have never heard that Mr. Dickens has been punished, in any manner whatever; and from the relation in which these gentlemen stand to each other, it cannot be presumed that he has been even blamed.

Again: Mr. Crawford, in his testimony, says, "It is usual when resolutions require information which the records or files of the office afford, to send copies; but when there is a press of business, the originals are sometimes sent, as in the present case."

Thus, it appears, from the oath of these two gentlemen, that Mr. Dickens delivered all the "originals and rough draughts" to Mr. Crawford: and that the latter sent them all to the House. No one therefore could reasonably expect to find copies among them. Yet, upon an examination of the correspondence with the Huntsville Bank alone, it will be found that about one-third of the pages it occupies, and more than that proportion of the letters, are given as extracts. These, surely, can not be originals, unless Mr. Crawford and the President of the Bank of Huntsville were in the habit of sending extracts of their own letters to each other—a novelty that can scarcely be believed to have occurred.

But, besides the striking variance between Mr. Crawford's statement of having sent the originals to the House, and the fact of this case, the transformation of those originals into extracts requires explanation, at least. It is difficult to conjecture any motive for sending these extracts, instead of the originals, unless it was for the purpose of omitting and withholding something which the latter contained. And if Mr. Crawford "never sanctioned the omission of any part of the correspondence," by whom and with what motives could these extracts have been made, and foisted into the place of the originals?

H. OF R.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

APRIL, 1824.

It cannot be too much to say that there appears to have been considerable forgetfulness in some part of this affair.

Mr. Crawford must also have forgotten the resolution of 1816, when, in direct violation of its positive injunctions, he received from certain local banks, in discharge of their debts to the United States, and at par, the large amount of uncurrent notes which, in his report, he admits he did receive from them.

But his memory must have been much more unfortunately treacherous to him in two other particulars relating to this business; for I shall show that he has made two palpable and important misstatements in regard to it.

Being called on by a resolution of the House of Representatives to state the amount of uncurrent paper which he received from the local banks that had been made depositories of public money received from the sale of public lands, he admits the receipt of a large amount from the banks of Edwardsville, Missouri, and Tombeckee. But, as an excuse for his conduct, he represents those notes to have been deposited in these banks "before the date of their contracts," under which they agreed to account for the public deposits in specie.

This I do most unequivocally and positively aver to be a misrepresentation, and an indefensible apology; and your honorable body cannot fail to be convinced of it, by adverting to the contracts themselves. I will refer to only one of them at present. The very first article of the contract with the Bank of Edwardsville, under which it received the first cent of public deposits, is in the following words, viz: "1. That the public moneys shall be entered to the credit of the Treasurer as cash; which may be seen in document No. 66, letter G, Nos. 1 and 2.

But, for his own opinion upon the subject, even in a case where there had been no express stipulation "to pay cash," I refer your honorable body to his letter L, No. 1, to the President of the Bank of Huntsville, dated the 11th January, 1818, where it will be found that he says: "In making the Planters and Merchant's Bank of Huntsville a place of deposits, at its particular solicitation, it was expected that the transfer of the funds which it undertook to make, would be effected in funds that circulated at par at the place where the transfer was directed. As the Receiver had been directed to receive the bills on no banks which did not discharge them in specie upon demand, it was expected that the bank would be answerable for the amount deposited in specie, or in bills which would be received as specie, at the place to which the money should be directed to be transferred, unless it should state the contrary."

But this is not the worst case. He has, in the same report, misstated the amount of uncurrent notes which he did receive from those banks, making it much less than it actually was; and some of the suppressed letters in the correspondence with the Bank of Missouri will prove it.

This statement, no doubt, will surprise and astonish your honorable body; but you will not long regard it as a proof of temerity. I shall, however, content myself with barely stating enough to carry resistless conviction to your own minds of the truth of it. None shall doubt who will either read or hear the testimony exhibited to you by Mr. Crawford himself.

The suppressed letters B, No. 13, from the President of the Bank of Missouri, dated the 11th October, 1819, and B, No. 19, from Thomas Reddick, agent of the bank, dated the 18th February, 1820, taken in connexion with Mr. Crawford's settlement with the said agent, will prove that the sum of $1,175, which he (Mr. Crawford) received from that bank, though artfully stated so as to disguise the fact, was composed of $290 of notes on the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, and $885 on the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria.

His own suppressed letter B, No. 7, dated the 29th May, 1819, contains a notification to the Bank of Missouri of the failure of the former of these banks. And a friend has furnished me with the following extract from the files of the National Intelligencer in regard to the latter, viz: "August 28, 1819. The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria does not redeem its notes in specie, and its notes no longer pass here currently."

The suppressed letters B, No. 25, from himself to the President of the Bank of Missouri, dated the 14th November, 1820, and the President's answer B, No. 26, dated the 12th December, 1820, will show that he received from that bank $40,156, in notes on the Bank of Tennessee and its branches, which were deposited in the Branch of the United States Bank at Louisville, on the 21st May, 1820, to meet the Treasurer's draft.

A report from Luke Lea, pension agent at Knoxville, to J. L. Edwards of the Pension Office, dated the 27th January, 1823, shows that these notes were "mostly on the branches of the Knoxville Bank."

I have in my possession proof that those branches stopped payment in the Summer of 1819, but I deem it unnecessary to exhibit it, as every member of the delegation in Congress from Tennessee, as well as other members of Congress, must know that they had failed to redeem their notes in specie, long before the notes in question were received by Mr. Crawford. It is only necessary to add, that none of these notes are included in the amount of uncurrent notes reported by Mr. Crawford.

Now, though the probability that these misstatements were innocently made, is somewhat weakened by the suppression of the letters that would have detected their inaccuracies, I do not deem it necessary to insist that they prove anything more than a greater degree of forgetfulness and inadvertence, than to have forgot or overlooked such a trifling affair as the letter mentioned in my examination. If they were intentional, it would prove the statement made against me so much the less entitled to credit.

In making deposits in the local banks of Louisville, Cincinnati, Chillicothe, and of the District of Columbia, (in all of which places branches of the Bank of the United States were established,) and, in some instances, continuing those deposits for years in succession, without making any report thereof to Congress, Mr. Crawford must have forgot, for a very long time, indeed, and on a great variety of occasions, both the letter and intention of the following section in the law establishing the Bank of the United States, viz:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the deposits of the money of the United States in places in which the said Bank or branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said Bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which cases the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

APRIL, 1824.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

H. OF R.

Indeed, I am under the impression that, notwithstanding his compliance with the above requisition, on the 10th December, 1817, which proved that it was then fresh in his recollection, and though his connexion with the Bank of the United States, its pressing wants, and the nature of the business he had to transact with it, were all calculated to recall his attention to that part of his duty, almost every day, he himself has, in some one of his reports, admitted that he had overlooked it through "mere inadvertence."

I regret to have to say to your honorable body, that both the state of my health, and the want of time, absolutely compel me, most reluctantly, to close this investigation of Mr. Crawford's well-timed statement against me. In this situation, I beg leave to refer you, for further facts, of which I might, under more favorable circumstances, fairly and successfully avail myself, to a few of the publications under the signature of "A. B." herewith transmitted.

Avowing myself the author of these publications, and, with the exception of a few unimportant typographical errors, and a mere verbal inaccuracy in regard to the time of a certain report's being made, re-asserting, before your honorable body, and the nation, that the facts they allege are substantially true, I do most respectfully solicit that they may be taken as a part of, and be printed with, this communication. In order to strengthen my claim to this indulgence, combining all the rights of defence, of accusation, and of asking for investigation, which can entitle me, as a citizen of the United States, or an officer of their Government, to appear before your honorable body, I do expressly state:

1. That the honorable William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, has mismanaged the national funds.

2. That he has received a large amount of uncurrent notes from certain banks, in part discharge of their debts to the United States, contrary to the resolution of Congress of 1816.

3. That, being called on by a resolution of the House of Representatives to state the amount of uncurrent notes which he received from these banks, he has misstated it, making it less than it really was.

4. That he has, in his report to the House, misrepresented the obligations of these banks, or some one of them, at least, and predicated thereon an indefensible excuse for his conduct in receiving these uncurrent notes.

5. That he has acted illegally, in a variety of instances, by making and continuing deposits of public money in certain local banks, without making report thereof to Congress, according to law; and

6. That he has, in several instances, withheld information and letters, called for by the House, and which it was his duty to have communicated.

His Oath—Let it speak for itself.

For specifications of these statements, I offer the publications under the signature of A. B., above mentioned, and this communication; and, for proof, I offer that which they respectively refer to.

All this I do defensively; for, if the facts stated be true, no rational man can doubt that they must weaken, at least, the force of Mr. Crawford's statement against me.

I will not charge him with bad intentions in any of those acts. It is more properly the duty of others to inquire into and judge of that matter. I do not ask for an investigation of his conduct. Such a request ought more naturally to be looked for from himself. But I will say, that if, being an officer of the same Government under which he holds his office, I have wilfully and maliciously misrepresented him, in the six foregoing allegations, it is a misdemeanor that would prove me unworthy of the office I hold. I invite him, or any of his friends, to make this charge against me, pledging myself to waive all notice, and, with all the disadvantages of absence, to submit to an investigation thereof by either or both Houses of Congress, and to abide by the decision thereupon. If this proposition is declined, I trust we shall have no more canting about an "A. B. plot." As to myself, I fear not the consequences of any fair investigation, for I know I shall be able, whatever may be the result, to justify myself to the nation. And never having obtained any office by the slightest sacrifice of independence, I never will owe the holding of one to reluctant forbearance, or the courtesy of my enemies.

I will only add, that, if any attempt should hereafter be made, meanly to take advantage of my absence, by those who have forborne to attack me when I could have had an opportunity of defending myself, I must beg of your honorable body, and the nation, to suspend your opinions, and to be assured that there shall be no avoidable delay in vindicating myself. I have in reserve much matter of defensive accusation, and should most certainly have invited your attention to the report concerning the Receivers of Public Moneys at Huntsville, and other matters of no less importance, had time permitted.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

WHEELING, VA., APRIL 6, 1824.

Some desultory conversation took place, as to the proper course to be taken with this communication, between Messrs. A. STEVENSON, FLOYD, CUTHBERT, KREMER, TRACY, McLANE, of Delaware, and WARFIELD.

Mr. FLOYD moved to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved that the address and accompanying papers, be printed, desiring to see the whole truth, whatever it might be. Mr. WARFIELD called for the reading of the address, and the Clerk proceeded accordingly to read it.

The reading had continued about half an hour, when, the address not having been gone more than half through, Mr. WARFIELD said he was satisfied as to the character of the paper, and did not wish the time of the House to be taken up with it longer, as it would obviously require considerable time. Mr. BUCHANAN inquired what the object of the memorialist was, or whether he requested any thing specifically of the House? Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, required that the reading should proceed.

The reading having been finished—

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, he was free to declare, now that he had heard the memorial read, that the style and temper in which it was written, manifested so much personal and party feeling, that he should then withdraw his motion to print, but for one consideration. It is well known, he said, that the distinguished individual whose character is assailed in that memorial, stands in a very peculiar relation to the public, and that every thing which concerns his character, in the smallest degree, will be regarded with the liveliest interest by the people of this country. Sir, we are bound to represent, not merely the interest of the people, but their feelings too; and they will not be satisfied if this accusation is prevented from going abroad to the world. This was all I meant, in saying I wished the whole truth to come out. I was far from meaning to imply, that any gentleman was not willing to have a full investigation of the subject. Mr. T. remarked that, although that House ought not to be made the vehicle of private calumny and detraction, nor be the theatre on which individuals, however elevated they may be, should settle their controversies, yet, when it was recollected how sensitive, how tremblingly alive the people were to every thing which affected the characters of those who stood in the same relation to the public as the officer who was now accused, he thought the whole of the charges brought against him ought to be published. If these charges deserved the character of malignity imputed to them by his worthy colleague, (Mr. FLOYD,) and he was not now disposed to contest the matter with him, or to give any opinion on the subject, that malignity would recoil upon its author. Mr. T. said he had unshaken confidence in the character and integrity of the distinguished officer who had been thus attacked, and he had no doubt that on this, as on all other occasions, the accusations against him would prove to be false and unfounded. He must, however, persist in his motion for printing.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that, in the present delicate affair, the first duty of Congress was, to look to its own course, and preserve its own dignity. He had no idea that this House was to be converted into an arena on which prominent political men were to carry on their personal contests; or a mere instrument, through its power to order papers to be printed, of giving publicity to any thing they might choose to write against each other. If the gentleman from Virginia, who had made the motion to print, did not intend to follow up that motion by any other, he should certainly oppose it—as the only legitimate end of printing papers in this House was for information of members of the House, and not to spread it through the nation. But, if any motion should be made for a committee of investigation, it should have his support; and if the present motion to print, was only preparatory to such a measure, he should not object to it, though he could not consider it as very necessary.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, that when he made the motion to lay the memorial on the table, he had done so, because it was the usual course with such papers; but, since it had been read, he was disposed to have it examined, not, he said, because it purposed to be a defence, but because, it contained specific charges against one of our officers. Mr. F. said he was opposed to the printing of the memorial, until it could be examined by a committee, and determined, on more reflection and investigation, what ought to be done. This was due to the charges made. As to the rest of the extraordinary production, said Mr. F., it cannot be animadverted upon in terms suitable to it. The charges appear to contain nothing but a reiteration of those made by the A. B. conspirators; nor did I think the author of that plot would have ever had the unblushing effrontery to acknowledge himself such. This Iago, however, has chosen to acknowledge the fact, and reiterate the charges formerly made, and seems to think, that his late station as Senator, and his recent appointment by the President, as Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico, will give a more imposing character to the plot, and that, under the sanction of his own name, with the authority of office, that may now be effectuated, which the anonymous writer failed to do.

Every member of the last Congress, said Mr. F., will recollect that two several committees were appointed to investigate this matter; and every one then seemed to consider that attack as the most infamous conspiracy that was ever formed against the reputation of any man. I am unwilling that this House should become the theatre for any political juggler, or the arena where individuals can come to adjust their disputes. I have too high a respect for the dignity of the House, and, I trust, for myself; but, as there is a specific charge, that may be attended to, I am willing to investigate it; though I will not admit that, because he has been a Senator, is now a Minister to Mexico, and enjoying the confidence of the President, that, therefore, his statements are to be received as he would wish them. The writer has not justified himself or defended himself from charges, which he says were made against him, but has cast imputations upon all who seem to have been in the way of his original design, which has been pursued with pertinacious malignity. Were this man's request allowed, and his calumnies printed by the House, would it not be right to receive and print also the defence of Mr. Dickens, or any other citizen? Why has he left the subject of his own defence to attack the character of Mr. Dickens? That could not have been necessary. Mr. Dickens has a right to be heard as well as a Minister to Mexico, as, I trust, every other American citizen has, without regard to station, and when the two former committees of this House investigated this matter, his character was admitted by all to be good, and entirely unexceptionable. I, too, have heard this of him ever since I have been in Congress, though I should not know him, were we to meet in the street; and, all agree, that he has discharged his official duties with honesty and attention, which is, in my opinion, no small recommendation.

Why has this Minister to Mexico, who enjoys the confidence of the President, left the subject of his defence and referred to the subject of the illicit introduction of slaves by a man who was the friend of Mr. Crawford? Is he to be accountable too for his friend's conduct? I do not know any thing of that matter, said Mr. F., but this I know, that one of the gentlemen who suffered by that attack, of which that memorial reiterates a part, has been here demanding reparation for wrongs suffered in that affair; I know him too, to be an honorable man, and that he will have that matter adjusted. His presence here was known, I presume, to the Minister to Mexico, and he should then have taken up this part of his subject. One would think, said Mr. F., that the object of this political Caliban was more extensive than merely to do himself justice, or his scope would not have been so broad. The A. B. conspirator, however, ought not to have again attempted to consummate the object of his wishes, after he had, in such a sort, succeeded in obtaining the appointment of Minister to Mexico and the President's confidence. He had obtained the reward of so much toil, so much industry, and so many dangers, and he ought to have left behind him the honest reputation to those who had it, as it no longer proved a barrier to his march to the Mission to Mexico and the President's favor.

Look at it. Can any man believe, for an instant, from the manner in which this memorial is brought up, that it is not a deliberate design to operate upon those feelings which, at this time, so much agitate this country and this House? How all that volume could be written from Wheeling, on the Ohio river, with a reference to so many public documents, is more than I can comprehend, and more than I believe. There are two or three charges specifically made, and yet, from his absence, he wishes the public to suspend an opinion in regard to him, should matters turn out unfavorable to him, until he can get back. Why then make them? There are, said Mr. F., several persons in the Government, in whom I have great confidence—but I have more in myself; and I wish these charges to be investigated again, and justice done, though I do not doubt it will result, as did the inquiry by the former committees, which I had thought would have prevented all similar attempts; and, considering the question which now occupies the public, and his success in obtaining office, I did not think that one of those conspirators would have had the audacity, in his own name, to avow himself, and show his unblushing front to this House and the nation; though, if my memory does not fail me, I saw in the newspapers, whilst his nomination was before the Senate, a statement which I believed was authorized by himself, that he was not the author of that plot. Had he been known as the author of that infamous conspiracy, I think I hazard little in saying, that the Senate would not have confirmed his appointment. Mr. F. concluded by moving that the memorial and papers be referred to a select committee.

Mr. LIVERMORE suggested to Mr. TUCKER the propriety of withdrawing his motion to print the papers, that a decision might first be had on their reference to a select committee.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, observed, that he thought the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) somewhat mistook the character of an order to print. Mr. T. did not consider that, in doing so, the House lent its sanction, in any degree, to the document ordered to be printed. It was merely to enable the members to examine a subject at leisure, and understand it thoroughly. Here is a very long memorial, containing facts and argument, and much of it subtle argument too, of which it is impossible to judge without a deliberate examination. After it is printed and examined, it may appear that further inquiry is proper—or, it may seem to be unnecessary. I thought it premature, at this time, to give an opinion on the subject. But, as my colleague seems not unwilling to engage in the investigation, and has moved a reference of it to a select committee, my object of giving it publicity will be attained, and I withdraw my motion to print.

Mr. RANKIN wished that the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which the present document refers, might be referred to the same committee.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend Mr. FLOYD'S motion, by adding, "and to print it."

Mr. FORSYTH said, he thought much more importance was given to this subject than it deserved. It was an ordinary question to print a long statement for the use and information of the House, and not for the public. He was never unwilling to print any paper of public interest. During the many years he had been a member of this House, he had never seen any evil arise from printing papers. Whether the House ordered the statement to be printed or not, it would doubtless be circulated in the public newspapers, and he had no doubt it was prepared for that purpose. It was intended, he presumed, as a sort of legacy to the country, by the author, who was going as Minister to Mexico—as a mark of his gratitude for the honor of his appointment. This honorable gentleman, said Mr. F., was a Senator in Congress when the former investigations took place by committees of this House; the committee gave him an opportunity of disclosing all he knew of the allegations, and, after a full examination, reported that they were fully satisfied of the groundlessness of the charges. It was the duty of this Senator, as a public man, at that time, and while he was a member of the Senate of the United States, to hold up to the public every defaulter in office with which he was acquainted; but, instead of doing this, he waits until his appointment to a foreign mission is confirmed, and when he is about to leave the country, sends forth this precious paper, pretending to be a defence of himself, but in reality an attack on a high officer of the Government, to be circulated after he shall have been beyond the reach of any call on him to substantiate his charges. He does not ask us to go into an investigation of the subject; and Mr. F. believed that the writer did not expect the House would take any notice of his communication. That was not the writer's object; he only requests the House to put it on its files—to print it, when he shall not be here to make his charges good. This, I believe, said Mr. F., is the third impeachment exhibited against the Secretary of the Treasury, during the present session of Congress: one of them is by this honorable gentleman; another was by a certain John Henry—a name of evil omen in this country, said Mr. F.—[some member here said to Mr. F., that the person's name was Robert Henry]—I am sorry for it, said Mr. F., as their designs were so similar, it is a pity their names were not the same.

Mr. F. concluded by saying, he hoped the communication would be printed as a matter of course, and that the subject might go to a select committee for investigation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, (who was not a member of Congress when the former investigation took place into the subject of the bank correspondence and the alleged suppression of a paragraph in one of the letters,) said that, since he had taken his seat as a member, he had bestowed much attention on the report of the committee of investigation, and he was perfectly satisfied with the correctness of the conclusion, which the committee had come to; but he was willing it should again be investigated, and therefore withdrew his own motion to print the statement of Mr. Edwards.

Mr. SANFORD thought a matter of so much importance should be referred to a committee composed of a member from each State; that is, twenty-four members.

This motion was rejected almost unanimously, and a committee of seven members was ordered.

Mr. McARTHUR moved that the committee be appointed by ballot, instead of by the Speaker; which motion was also negatived.

Messrs. FLOYD, LIVINGSTON, WEBSTER, RANDOLPH, TAYLOR, McARTHUR, and OWEN, were appointed the said committee.

On motion, the committee were then empowered to send for persons and papers.

FORTIFICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. McLANE the previous orders of the day were dispensed with, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "making appropriations for completing the several fortifications of the United States—Mr. LATHROP in the Chair.

In relation to the appropriation of $125,000, for the fort at Mobile Point, Mr. COCKE called for further explanation, which was given by Mr. McLANE, Mr. HAMILTON, and Mr. OWEN of Alabama.

Mr. McLANE moved to change the appropriation of $50,000 from Fort Fayette, in New York harbor, to the projected work on New Utrecht Point, in the same harbor; and supported the motion by giving a statement of the circumstances bearing on the question.

Mr. COCKE opposed the amendment, as going to authorize a new fortification, before those already commenced were finished.

Mr. HAMILTON spoke in reply, and defended the propriety and necessity of erecting the work proposed.

Mr. McLANE confirmed the same view, and explained the connexion of the proposed fort with the general plan of defence.

Mr. SHARPE stated some further facts, and contended that the proposed fortification, as a necessary defence to Fort Lafayette, was not a new measure, but only completing what was already begun.

Mr. COCKE again urged his objections, and was replied to by Mr. CAMBRELENG and Mr. McLANE.

Mr. COBB thought that a clause in an appropriation bill was not the mode in which Congress should express its will for the extension of the plan of defence; and that the size and location of the several fortresses should be designated by law before money was appropriated for building them.

Mr. McLANE replied, and Mr. COBB explained, and enforced the grounds he had taken, and Mr. HAMILTON spoke in reply.

The question was then taken on Mr. McLANE's motion, and decided in the affirmative—85 to 45.

Mr. McLANE moved further to amend the bill, by inserting a clause to appropriate, for the gradual armament of the fortifications, one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HAMILTON supported this amendment. He stated that a bill to this effect, appropriating a larger amount, had passed the Senate, and was referred to a committee of this House. That committee had agreed not to press the passage of the bill from the Senate, provided the amendment, now proposed, were agreed to by the House.

Mr. COBB and Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, were opposed to the incorporation of this appropriation with the bill now before the House, desiring that it should be separately presented.

Mr. HAMILTON replied.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, made some remarks in reference to the prices which had been heretofore given for cannon, and the means which ought to be taken for procuring them.

Mr. McLANE said, he did not particularly wish to press the subject on the House at this time. He therefore withdrew his amendment.

Mr. McL. then moved to amend the bill, by inserting an appropriation for certain improvements to be made in the buildings attached to the Military Academy at West Point. This amendment was rejected—37 to 72.

Mr. STEWART moved to amend the bill, by inserting an appropriation for surveying the route of a canal to connect the waters of the Chesapeake with the Ohio, and of the Ohio with Lake Erie, $9,000. Mr. S. read an extract from the late Message of the President to prove the propriety of this amendment.

Messrs. MERCER and VANCE, of Ohio, opposed this appropriation; and Mr. STEWART spoke again in support of it. The amendment was rejected, without a division.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. FORWARD gave notice that he should, on Thursday next, ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole, to take into consideration the bill "imposing a tax on sales at auction."

Mr. CROWNSHIELD gave notice, that he should, to-morrow, ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, "to provide for building ten additional sloops of war."

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 20.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the district of Missouri," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the petition of John Top, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LONG laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved. That the Postmaster General be requested to lay before this House a statement of all the post routes now established, not included in his statement of unproductive post routes already submitted to the House; together with a statement of the amount paid for the transportation of the mail on each route, the number of mails on each route per week, and the amount of profits arising from each one. Also, the amount that would be saved by discontinuing certain unproductive routes, as proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; likewise, the amount that might be saved by having one mail instead of two, on all routes where there are now two mails a week.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, a committee was appointed on the part of this House to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to examine and report what business ought to be acted upon at the present session; and, also, at what time the session may be closed, by the adjournment of the two Houses.—Messrs. TAYLOR, McLANE of Delaware, FORSYTH, RANKIN, and CAMPBELL of Ohio, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

Mr. CUSHMAN submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved. That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying a duty on stills, or on spirits distilled from foreign and domestic materials, within the United States.

The resolution was read; and, on the question, Will the House now consider it? it was determined in the negative.

The resolution of Mr. LONGFELLOW, calling on the President for information respecting certain spoliations on our commerce by French cruisers, was taken up, and, having been supported by Mr. L. in a few observations, was adopted.

Mr. FORSYTH suggested that the same information had been called for by a resolution of the Senate, but, afterwards withdrew that objection to the resolve, which finally passed nem. con.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant, requesting a detailed account of the disbursement of the sum appropriated by the acts of the 30th April, 1818, and of the 3d March, 1819, for making certain improvements in the grounds connected with the public offices and the President's house, I transmit a report from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, which contains the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1824.

The SPEAKER, by leave, presented the memorial of Amelia Eugenia de la Rue, heiress of M. De Beaumarchais, in relation to her claim for repayment of moneys advanced by her late father for the service of the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR expressed a hope that the memorial would receive the early attention of the House.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, chairman of the committee to whom was referred the papers in relation to this claim, after some observations on its importance, gave notice that he should, on Tuesday next, call up the consideration of the committee's report on the subject.

INDIAN RESERVATION.

The resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, calling for certain information from the War Department, in relation to an Indian reservation, was taken up. Mr. M. said it was doubtless expected of him to assign some reasons for the call on the War Department for the information sought by the resolution, which he should endeavor to give in as concise a manner as possible. It will be recollected, said he, that some time since, a petition of the said George Harlin, alluded to in the resolution, was presented, setting forth that he held, by virtue of the treaty alluded to, a reservation of 640 acres of land; that, in the location of this reservation, for the want of better knowledge of the geography of the country, he committed an error in its location, and did not cover the land he designed, and asked the liberty of changing its location to a more favorite and valuable tract. A bill, embracing the prayer of his petition, has been reported, and is now on file. Since it was so reported, I have received several communications from gentlemen of the first standing and respectability in the county and neighborhood where this reservation is situated, remonstrating, in the strongest terms, against the propriety of the passage of this bill, stating, among other objections, that the tract of land which the petitioner wishes to obtain has been made more valuable by means of the labor and improvements placed upon it by unfortunate settlers, and the high state of cultivation it has been put in, together with the accidental circumstance of the establishment of the seat of justice for the county immediately on its borders. It is also intimated, sir, that this idea of a mistake and wish to change the location has originated in speculative motives.

Now, sir, that we may have all the light and information of which the subject is susceptible, and act understandingly, and be enabled to do justice to the present occupants, who, I have no hesitation in saying, are more entitled to our sympathies than an Indian, I have proposed the resolution calling upon the proper department for all the information in relation to the transaction, and hope, sir, it will be acceptable to the House to adopt it. The resolution was agreed to.

APRIL, 1824.

ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. FORSYTH submitted the following resolution for adoption by the House :

Resolved, That the President be officially informed that this House has ordered an investigation of the memorial presented to this House on the 16th instant, by N. Edwards, lately appointed Minister to Mexico ; that the said N. Edwards may be instructed not to leave the United States before that investigation has taken place.

The question of consideration of this motion being called for, (a previous, but not usual question,) was taken ; and there were : for considering the motion 61 ; against considering it 84.

So the House refused now to consider the proposition.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, then rose, and said that, connected with the subject, he would take occasion to say, that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) was absent from the House this morning when that part of the Journal was read which announces the names of the persons appointed on the committee to consider the memorial of Mr. Edwards. As he believed that, from considerations of delicacy, the gentleman from Virginia would not wish to be a member of the committee, Mr. M. took this mode of appraising him of the fact, that he might have an opportunity of asking to be excused from serving upon it.

Mr. FLOYD rose, and requested the gentleman from Alabama, if his allusion was to him, to repeat his statement. Mr. M. accordingly, in substance, repeated his statement.

Mr. FLOYD then said that, in a case of delicacy concerning him, (Mr. F.,) he had hoped that the gentleman from Alabama was the last man in this nation to undertake to make suggestions, and he did not think his doing so showed any delicacy on his (Mr. M.'s) part. I am, said Mr. F., the sufficient judge of my conduct in such a case. Perhaps the gentleman from Alabama may be acquainted with some circumstances of the A. B. Plot, so called in the discussion last Winter, and subsequently. If I know any thing of myself, however, I am capable of doing justice to every individual in this nation, whose conduct may be presented to me, in my official capacity, for examination. When a specific charge is made against a public officer, after the friends of that officer, and myself by name, have been called upon, through that paper which is the channel of every thing but truth, to propose an investigation, I thought it became peculiarly my duty to investigate the charge. What I think of the accuser in private life is for me to consider, and does not touch my public duty. Mr. F. here alluded to a friend of the gentleman from Alabama, (as we understood him,) who had for several successive sessions called upon this House for the impeachment of a judge, whom, it seemed, he had previously attempted to bribe, &c. ; and here, he said, were charges one, two, and three, asserting certain accusations against the Secretary, and calling for an investigation. This, surely, was sufficient reason for an investigation being pressed by those thus called upon. The devil himself might prefer charges here—it would not change our opinion of that personage—but it would surely be a particular reason for an investigation by those who are implicated. So far as the gentleman from Alabama is concerned, said Mr. F., perhaps there may be other reasons for consulting motives of delicacy. When I do want suggestions of that sort, I should think very differently of myself from what I have been accustomed to do, were I to be obliged to go to him for them.

The SPEAKER said there was no question before the House, and the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama having been made and answered, the conversation must drop.

Mr. MOORE then rose, and moved that the gentleman from Virginia should be excused from serving on the committee.

The question of consideration being called on this motion, the mover withdrew it.

Mr. MOORE then asked to make a remark in reply to Mr. FLOYD ; but the SPEAKER declared it to be out of order. Mr. MOORE wished to know if it would be in order to ask leave of the House to speak in reply ? The SPEAKER thought not.

Mr. MOORE then renewed his motion, in the following words, with a view in this way to have an opportunity of addressing the House.

Resolved, That JOHN FLOYD, a member of this House, be excused from serving on the committee appointed yesterday, on the subject of the memorial of Ninian Edwards.

The question being taken on considering this motion, it was decided in the negative, almost unanimously ; and so this matter ended.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The amendments yesterday reported by the Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for erecting fortifications were read.

The House agreed to the several amendments, with the exception of that which substituted some other words for the term reconnoissance.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the appropriation of $50,000 for a fortification on Narragansett bay. He objected to the general policy of erecting insulated fortifications for the defence of single towns. He thought that the strength of the Government ought to be devoted to securing two or three great points, such as New York, the Chesapeake, and the Mississippi ; and he called upon the chairman of the Military Committee for information on the subject.

Mr. HAMILTON replied, and went into an illustration, at some length, of the present system of exterior defence to which the bill had reference.

Mr. DURFEE, of Rhode Island, succeeded, and replied to the objections of the gentleman from Tennessee, supporting his observations by extracts from the reports of the Commissioners of the Navy, stating the importance of Narragansett bay as a rendezvous for the Navy. He contended that its fortification was a national, and not a merely local object. He showed its value to an enemy, and quoted authorities to show that the British were well aware of the importance of this point on our coast.

APRIL, 1824.

Fortification Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. COCKE replied. His observations, he said, had not had any exclusive reference to this point, but to the general system on which the Government seemed to be acting, but which had never been submitted to, or affirmed by, the judgment of this House. He should oppose the appropriation till that system had been fully explained, and the House had had an opportunity to approve or condemn it.

Mr. DURFEE rejoined, and further referred to documents in support of the expediency of the appropriation.

Mr. STEWART opposed the appropriation for this fort, on account of the time and the manner in which it was asked for. He would vote to complete such works as are begun, but for no new works, until the whole system is exhibited, and Congress can determine how far it is proper to go in its adoption. He advocated at large, as a preferable system of defence, the adoption of canals along the seaboard, and wished that both these systems should be submitted to Congress. He also referred to the large contributions of the Western States for the defence of the seaboard.

Mr. FARRELLY, in reply, advocated the propriety of the present fortification, and of forts in general, as a suitable support to the exertions of militia for the defence of the country, and referred to the history of the late war for confirmation of the correctness of his position.

Mr. BARTLETT rose in reply to Mr. STEWART, and condemned the strain of some of his remarks, as referring exclusively to the interests of the West. He noticed the objections made to the appropriation, which, he contended, did not apply to it. The present fort might be erected without pledging the country to any general extension of the system of defence, by means of fortifications. He dwelt on the importance of this point as one necessary to be defended.

Mr. McARTHUR wished for further information as to the total cost of the fortifications contemplated for protecting Narragansett bay.

Mr. McLANE replied, and gave a general account of the contemplated system of defence. He went into an extended exposition of the importance and necessity of the fortification now asked for; he stated the capacity of the country generally to sustain the expenses of defending itself; and on this part of the subject, declared that, according to the present prospect of its finances, the national debt will be extinguished by the year 1832, even allowing for any diminution occasioned for a time by the proposed tariff.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, supported the appropriation in a short speech.

Mr. TRACY was opposed to the measure, which he did not think warranted by the finances of the country. He was of opinion that we are going too far and too fast in these appropriations.

Mr. FULLER replied to the gentleman last up, combated the several objections which had been advanced, and contended that this was a proper time to commence the fortifications in Rhode Island.

Mr. DURFEE corrected what he considered to be a misstatement of Mr. TRACY, on the expenses of the general system.

Mr. ROSS, intending to vote against the appropriation, stated the views that would govern him, and he adverted to the misapplication of part of the moneys heretofore appropriated for fortifications of importance superior to that now in question, &c.

Mr. TRACY explained, in reply to Mr. DURFEE, and further insisted on the views he had formerly expressed.

Mr. COBB called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COCKE now modified his amendment, so as to strike out, also, the appropriation for a fort on New Utrecht Point, in the harbor of New York.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, opposed the motion, and adverted to the experience of the war of the Revolution, as showing the necessity of such a fortification. He insisted that it was sound economy to put up these forts; great interests were jeopardized by admitting the erection of these defences, and double expense incurred for an inefficient defence by militia.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, in a short speech, advocated the striking out.

Mr. SHARPE replied. He thought these forts could not be commenced a day too soon. If New York and Rhode Island were not thought worth protecting, he should vote against the whole bill. On the requisition of Mr. S. the question was divided, and being first on striking out the appropriation for Narragansett bay—

Mr. TRIMBLE said he had no objection to these appropriations, provided the whole amount granted this year for the purpose of erecting fortifications, did not exceed $500,000. The haste with which the system had heretofore been pursued had brought the nation to loans, and to postponing the payment of the public creditors. He thought that it would be sufficient for the present year to buy the land for these forts.

Mr. WOOD replied, and dwelt on the necessity for fortifications. In the late war, the nation had paid three hundred and twenty-six thousand militia, besides her regulars. With sufficient forts, twenty-six thousand would have done as much. Money applied wisely in defence, was the best means of preventing the augmentation of the public debt.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, was opposed to the appropriation. He discussed the merits of the general system devised for fortifications, which he thought was going beyond the resources of the country.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, again rose, and replied to the objections urged in various parts of the House, and made a variety of explanations on the subject of the bill.

Mr. TRIMBLE said a few words in reply to Mr. WOOD, on the expenses of the last war, as arising not from the want of forts, &c., but of sufficient roads, and other conveniences for the movement of troops.

Mr. HAMILTON advocated the appropriation, and went at large into a defence of the system of permanent fortifications, of which this was a part.

Proceedings.

APRIL, 1824.

Mr. COBB remarked on the present state of the national funds, and contended that the balance now in the Treasury was almost all liable to be drawn out by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to comply with the national engagements.

The question was then taken on striking out the appropriation for the fort at Narraganset Bay, and decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 120, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Bartley, Beecher, Blair, Brown, Buchanan, Buck, Buckner, Campbell of Ohio, Cary, Cobb, Cocks, Conner, Culpeper, Day, Edwards of North Carolina, Findlay, Floyd, Foot of Connecticut, Gaslay, Gist, Henry, Johnson of Virginia, F. Mr. COCKE then withdrew the residue of his amendment, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 21.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Archibald Clarke; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the warehouse at the quarantine ground, near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, and for the erection of a dwelling-house at the Balize, in said State, for the use of the boarding officer at that place; and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel, of Philadelphia," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill of this House, for the relief of the same individual.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew," reported the same with an amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The following bills from the Senate, viz: "A bill in addition to the acts relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States;" also, a bill "for the relief of William Duane," were twice read and referred.

The amendments of the Senate to a bill from this House concerning invalid pensioners, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (ayes 69, noes 54,) on the state of the Union.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD moved to take up the bill from the Senate, authorizing the building of an additional number of sloops of war. The question being taken, it was decided in the negative, ayes 69, noes 71. The Committee then rose.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, the House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "supplementary to an act providing for the correction of errors in the entry of lands at the land offices."

The bill was read. On motion of Mr. RANKIN, it was slightly amended in the 1st section.

The question being on rising and reporting the bill, a debate arose, in which Messrs. RANKIN, of Mississippi, CAMPBELL, of Ohio, COOK, of Illinois, MCCOY, McLEAN, of Ohio, SANDFORD, of Tennessee, CONWAY, of Arkansas, and HENRY, of Kentucky, took part.

Several farther amendments proposed to the bill were rejected, and the bill was reported to the House.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Captain Thomas Staniford," reported the same with an amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, who were instructed on the 12th instant, to inquire into the expediency of so modifying or amending the act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade or fisheries, and regulate the same, so as to exempt all vessels and boats employed in navigating the canals in the State of New York, from the necessity of being enrolled or licensed, and from the payment of tonnage duties, reported, that it is inexpedient so to modify or amend the said acts; which report was read and concurred in by the House.

Mr. NEWTON, from the same committee, reported a bill to allow the bounty to vessels employed in the cod fisheries, in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. LONG, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of the present session, authorizing the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of tax, as to authorize the said executors to collect arrears of internal duties.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act concerning the invalid pensioners," with an amendment. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to the acts relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Colonel William Duane;" and a joint resolution fixing the time for an adjournment of Congress; in which amendments, two bills last mentioned and resolution, the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the District Court in the District of Missouri," was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the President of the Washington Canal Company, of their receipts and expenditures, during the last year, made in obedience to the requisitions of their charter; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. LONG, of North Carolina, moved that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act for the relief of John B. Mebane, as to include in its provisions, internal duties as well as direct taxes, to be collected by his executors.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. LONG, on the subject of post routes, was taken up. He explained the object of the resolution, which was opposed by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in a few remarks.

Mr. LONG then modified his resolution by omitting all but the following:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to lay before this House a statement of the amount that would be saved by discontinuing certain unproductive routes, as proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; likewise the amount that might be saved by having one mail instead of two, on all routes where there are now two mails a week."

Mr. COCKE and Mr. REED opposed the resolution, and, at the motion of Mr. MCCOY, it was laid on the table.

ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. McDUFFIE offered the following:

"Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to furnish the President of the United States with a copy of the memorial of Ninian Edwards, recently presented to the House, containing certain charges against the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that he regretted that the subject had been presented to the House at all; but, since it had, he thought the facts should be submitted to the President of the United States, that he might take such course as he may deem proper in this matter, it being a dispute between his own officers.

Mr. SAUNDERS accorded in the propriety of the resolution, and suggested an amendment, that the President be informed of the organization of a committee, by this House, to investigate the case. This course, he said, would not surprise the President. If the President should choose to recall Mr. Edwards, he would have it in his power to do so. He might be permitted to say, that the course of Mr. Edwards was not the same as that pursued towards Mr. Hamilton; then Secretary of the Treasury, in 1794. Mr. Giles called for information, and boldly offered and supported his motion, and did not throw charges into the House, and leave them to pursue them if they could. The same course ought to have been pursued by Mr. Edwards in this case, instead of which he has departed hence on his way to a foreign station, and thrown his charges back upon those he has left behind.

Mr. WEBSTER said, he hoped he might be excused for making a single remark, without going farther. It was obvious that the committee, which had been appointed, had no time to make any progress in investigating the charges of Mr. Edwards, at this session. He hoped the House had confidence enough in the committee to agree to the motion he should now make, which was, to defer acting upon this motion until to-morrow morning. With this view, Mr. W. moved that the motion lie on the table.

This course was agreed to, without a division.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The engrossed bill making appropriations for the fortifications of the United States, was read a third time.

Mr. COBB moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend it, as to reduce the total sum appropriated for the present year to $400,000; and supported the motion by a speech, in which he insisted that the system of defence, to which this bill has reference, had never been adopted by the Government of the United States. It might have been desired by one of the Departments, but had received no sanction from Congress. He wished to have the whole system spread out before the House, and to know its form and extent. He at present knew little or nothing about it—and he should oppose all appropriations, at least for new works, until Congress had opportunity to investigate and decide upon the eligibility of the general plan.

Mr. LITTLE moved to amend the motion by striking out 400,000 and inserting 500,000.

Mr. COBB spoke in explanation.

Mr. LITTLE replied, and advocated the propriety and necessity of permanent works of defence. During the late war, more money had been expended in temporary works, now useless, than all that had since been appropriated to the erection of the large and valuable works that have been erected. He thought, in the present state of the Treasury, it was perfectly proper to proceed with the system of defence which had been commenced.

Mr. TRACY, advocated the amendment, and contended that, in general, $500,000 was as much as could advantageously be applied to this object, within a year. He replied to the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, drawn from the last war, which, he insisted, would go to show the propriety of a great standing Army, and an immense Navy. This branch of expenditure should be restricted, as well as other branches. If so large a sum was indispensable for Fort Jackson, and the fortification at Mobile Point, let it be taken from other parts of the plan. If these sums were granted now, more would probably be asked for next year, &c.

Mr. OWEN spoke in reply—and contended that it was bad economy to grant the sums necessary for completing these works, in such small parts at a time, as to delay their completion, and expose what was already done to loss and injury, by standing still, and going to partial decay, &c.

Mr. STEWART was in favor of the amendment. Granting $500,000 would be proceeding as we have heretofore done, gradually increasing the sums appropriated. If more was given, it would possibly lead to a wasteful expenditure. The best preparation for war was, to preserve the credit of the country, and reduce its debt.

Mr. MERCER went into a recapitulation of what had been done by Government in relation to the plan of general defence. Congress had formerly thought an annual appropriation of $800,000 expedient. He thought the amount should approach that sum still as far as the state of the country and of the Treasury would allow. He referred to an attempt, once made, to reduce the standing army to two thousand men. General WASHINGTON had suggested, as an amendment to this plan, a proviso that the enemy should never invade the country with more than two thousand men. He thought a similar proviso ought now to be inserted: that no nation should declare war against the United States within twenty years; the period some gentlemen proposed for completing the defences of the country. Mr. M. adverted to the experience of the last war, and stated what had happened at Norfolk. He concluded that the interior had an equal interest with all other parts of the country in the defence of the coast, as going to render less necessary the services of the militia, &c.

Mr. LITTLE withdrew his motion.

Mr. TRACY renewed it, and Mr. COBB accepted it as a modification.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to amend the motion by striking out the clause for instructing the committee, and leaving the question simply on a motion for recommitment.

Mr. COBB objected to this amendment.

Mr. McLANE opposed the recommitment, and stated that there never had been any settled rule or ratio of appropriation for fortifications determined by the practice of the House, but the sums voted had always been governed by the exigency of each year. He went into a history of the several appropriations which had been made, explained the necessity of the present appropriations, and replied to some of the objections urged against them.

Mr. WOOD opposed the notion of being restricted to an annual sum for appropriations for this object. The object of expenditure was a definite one, but how much should be given in each year, must depend on circumstances. He dwelt on the distress on the coast occasioned by the approach of an enemy, and argued that this was the chief danger to which the country was exposed in war. He stated the condition of New York harbor, and reprobated the idea of abandoning the new work proposed for its defence. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia aimed at an abandonment of the system of defence altogether.

Mr. COBB replied, and further insisted on the ground he had before taken; and he read extracts from documents to support his argument. He did not understand, and could not discover, what was the plan on which we were now proceeding. No war was impending; and he thought that Congress was not bound to adopt every magnificent scheme that should be suggested by any Department of the Government. He saw no limit to the expenditure; for he did not know where the plan stopped. Every extension of the plan of fortification, necessarily involved an increase of the Army, and a proportional augmentation of the national expenses. There was another bill on the table for arming the fortresses. If both should pass, the appropriation this year, for fortifications, would exceed $700,000. Once begun, the works must be gone on with and completed. He was not opposed to all systems of defence, but wished that Congress should have the modification of the system.

Mr. FULLER thought that the views of the gentleman from Georgia should have led to a different course. He was surprised he would attempt so small a measure as the cutting off $100,000 from an appropriation of $800,000. He contended that the system had been laid before Congress in a series of reports, and, by appropriations thereon, Congress had given it so much sanction as amounted to an adoption of it. He insisted that confidence must be reposed by the different departments of the Government in each other, and by a Congress of one period in that of another. He stated the caution with which surveys had been made; the waste and loss which would ensue from temporary erections, &c. The appropriations had been continued, by the good sense of this House, from year to year, and he hoped this would not be the period at which they were to be suspended.

Mr. McCOR went into a history of what had already been done by Congress, and referred to the useless works on Dauphin Island; the loans which became necessary from too great expenditures on these objects, and the subsequent reduction of the public expenditures, &c.; and he called for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentlemen from Georgia.

Mr. DUFFEE remonstrated, at some length, against the House retracting what it had yesterday deliberately done. He insisted on the wisdom of measures of defence even in an economical view, and particularly on the expediency of the measures proposed by the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIN declared the motion now offered to be the same which the House had yesterday rejected by a vote of nearly two to one, viz: whether the new works at New York and Rhode Island shall be commenced? He trusted, as no new argument had been adduced to-day, no new result would be obtained.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. COBB to recommit the bill, &c., as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Beecher, Brown, Buchanan, Buck, Buckner, Campbell of Ohio, Cary, Cobb, Cocke, Conner, Culpeper, Edwards of North Carolina, Findlay, Foot of Connecticut, Fersyth, Gatlin, Gazlay, Hall, Harris, Henry, Hooks, Johnson of Virginia, F. The question was then put, Shall the bill pass? It passed in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The joint resolution from the Senate fixing a time for the adjournment of Congress—15th May next—was twice read.

Mr. ROSS moved to refer it to the joint committee yesterday appointed on the part of this House to determine on what business shall be taken up at the present session, and at what time the two Houses shall adjourn.

Mr. ALLEN opposed the commitment, remarked at some length on the evil of prolonged sessions of Congress, and adverted to the early adjournment of Congress of 1816, when a compensation was substituted for a per diem allowance, and the arduous duties which that Congress had nevertheless accomplished, &c.; and he called for the yeas and nays on the question of commitment.

Mr. WRIGHT was opposed to an early adjournment, while important business remained undone, and objected to a decision upon the resolution whilst a joint committee, appointed to consider the subject, had not yet reported, &c.

Mr. MCCOY inquired whether it was in order to subject a resolution from the other House to a committee consisting in part of members of the House which had already passed upon the resolution.

The CHAIR pronounced it to be in order.

The question was then taken on the commitment, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Bartley, Beecher, Breck, Brown, Buchanan, Burleigh, Cady, Campbell of Ohio, Cary, Cassedy, Condict, Crafts, Craig, Durfee, Eddy, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Ellis, Farrelly, Findlay, Foote of New York, Frost, Gatlin, Gazlay, Hall, Harris, Hayden, Hayward, Hemphill, Henry, Holcombe, Jenkins, Johnson of Virginia, F. Stephenson, Stoddard, Strong, Swan, Test, Tod, Tracy, Trimble, Tyson, Udree, Vance of North Carolina, Vance of Ohio, Van Wyck, Vinton, Warfield, Whittlesey, White, Williams of North Carolina, Henry Wilson, Wood, Woods, and Wright—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Baylies, P. P. Barbour, Bartlett, Bassett, Buck, Buckner, Cambreleng, Carter, Clark, Cocke, Collins, Conner, Crowninshield, Cushman, Day, Dwight, Eaton, Edwards of North Carolina, Foot of Connecticut, Fuller, Gist, Govan, Gurley, Hamilton, Harvey, Hogeboom, Hooks, Houston, Isaacs, Kent, Lathrop, Lee, Leftwich, Letcher, Litchfield, Locke, Longfellow, McCoy, McDuffie, McKean, McKee, McKim, McLane of Delaware, Mangum, Mercer, Moore of Alabama, Neale, Nelson, O'Brien, Owen, Plumer of New Hampshire, Poinsett, Rankin, Reed, Rives, Saunders, Sibley, Arthur Smith, William Smith, Spaight, Spence, Standefer, A. Stevenson, Taliaferro, Tattnall, Thompson of Georgia, Tomlinson, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Van Rensselaer, Webster, Whipple, Williams of Virginia, and Wilson of South Carolina—77.

So the resolution from the Senate was referred to the joint committee yesterday appointed on the motion of Mr. TAYLOR.

And the House adjourned.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

APRIL, 1824.

THURSDAY, April 23.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Benjamin King, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill from the Senate "for enclosing the burying ground of Christ Church, Washington Parish," without amendment; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDOLPH wished to move to reject the bill; but, in this stage of the proceeding, the motion was not in order.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to authorize the building of lighthouses, light vessels, and beacons, therein mentioned, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, submitted the following, which lies one day:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be laid before this House the proceedings of a court martial lately held at Norfolk, for the trial of Lieutenant Beverley Kannon, of the United States Navy."

The amendments made in Committee of the Whole to the bill "for correcting errors in entering lands at the land offices," were read and agreed to by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Ninian Edwards, vindicating himself and accusing Mr. Secretary Crawford, pursuant to instructions of the committee, communicated the following minutes of its proceedings, viz:

"The committee, to whom was referred a communication from Ninian Edwards, report the following minutes of their proceedings to the House of Representatives:

APRIL 21, 1824.

Present, all the members of the committee.

Voted, That the committee ought to proceed to make inquiry into the matters contained in the said memorial, and connected therewith.

Voted, That, for the purpose of such inquiry, the attendance of the said Ninian Edwards upon the committee, to be by them examined, is requisite; and that his attendance be accordingly ordered.

Voted, That the chairman do inform the House of the foregoing resolutions of the committee; and inasmuch as it is suggested that the said Ninian Edwards is about to leave the United States on foreign diplomatic service—

Voted, That the chairman do move the House that information of said communication, of the votes of the House thereon, and of the foregoing resolutions of the committee, be communicated to the President of the United States."

The latter proposition having been put into the form of a motion by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, and the question being upon agreeing thereto—

Mr. FOSYTH, of Georgia, said, he had the honor, a day or two ago, of submitting a motion to the House on this subject, the object of which he had not an opportunity to explain, in consequence of a call for the question of consideration. The object I had in view, said Mr. F., was the same as that which the committee seem to have had in contemplation in their report of this morning. I understand this to be, to prevent any collision between the orders of the Executive branch of the Government and those of the Legislative. I understand the committee to have determined on calling Mr. Edwards before them to ascertain what he has to say upon this subject, in addition to what he has stated in his memorial. As a matter of courtesy, that being the case, it is proper for the House to give notice of the fact to the President of the United States, that the individual in question might not seek to escape, under the plea of Executive orders, from the investigation which he has himself asked of this House to institute. The object of my motion was the same with that now before the House, and it appears to me that the form of mine was more proper than the form of that which has been submitted. What interest has the President of the United States in knowing what are the votes of any committee of this House? All that is necessary for him to know is, that this House has taken up the subject for investigation. We do not ask from him any thing to enable us to exercise our rightful power in this matter, and our motives for acting are therefore of no importance to the due information of the Executive. The simple announcement of the fact is sufficient. Under these impressions, Mr. F. moved to strike out all the above, after the word "Ordered," and insert, in lieu thereof, his motion, in the following words:

"That the President be officially informed that this House has ordered an investigation of the memorial presented to this House on the 19th instant by Ninian Edwards, lately appointed Minister to Mexico; that the said Ninian Edwards may be instructed not to leave the United States before that investigation has taken place."

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, said, as the course pointed out by the committee would attain all the objects which the gentleman from Georgia had in view, he did not see why the change should be made. If the gentleman will attend to the terms of the proposition before the House, said Mr. R., he will see that there is nothing in it which, in the smallest degree, compromises the proceedings of this body; that we are acting by our own inherent power; that it is not proposed to call on the Executive Department, though a co-ordinate branch of the Government, for any ancillary aid. We are acting by our own virtue and power; but, having done so, we have thought it proper to advise the Executive branch of the Government, that he might take such order on the matter, in his own exclusive sphere, as to him may seem fit and proper. And what more can we do? I hope the amendment will not be adopted, but that we shall decide on this motion, and give to the chairman an opportunity to make a further motion, which he is authorized by the committee to make.

APRIL, 1824.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

H. OF R.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, it was true that, on a former occasion, when the gentleman from Georgia presented his motion, he (Mr. T.) did call for the question of consideration upon it. The reason why he had done so, was, that the subject had just been referred to a committee without any special instruction. The first question, it was apparent, which would present itself to that committee would be, Does the memorial contain sufficient matter to justify proceeding in the investigation of its contents? That question had not been, in any manner, decided, when the gentleman from Georgia offered his motion. It was not until last night that the committee came to the determination that it was proper that they should proceed in their inquiry. This, Mr. T. said, was necessarily a previous question to be determined. For, if the committee had been of opinion that the subject was not, for any reason, fit to be inquired into, it would not have been proper to give to the President the intimation in question. After the committee had decided the preliminary question, the next step was to require the attendance of Mr. Edwards. The House will perceive that the committee propose to apply to the Executive for no power, but to notify him of the decision requiring the attendance of Mr. Edwards, as a fit regard for that comity and respect which is due from this House to a co-ordinate branch of the Government. Mr. T. believed that the notification of both these decisions of the committee was necessary, for the purpose of apprising the President of the reasons of this House for requiring the attendance of an individual who was known to be absent on diplomatic services, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, did not see that any difficulty was presented by this question to the House. Here, said he, is a communication referred to a committee of this House, in the course of investigating which, the personal attendance of an individual, understood to have been recently despatched on a foreign service, is found to be necessary, and is required. All that the committee aim at, therefore, is to inform the Executive of so much as to show that business before us requires the personal attendance of one whom he has despatched, or is about to despatch on foreign diplomatic service. This is all that is proposed by the resolution now before the House.

Mr. KREMER, of Pennsylvania, rose, and observed that, before he voted on this question, he must know whether the committee can wait for the return of the person proposed to be sent for. He knew not, for his own part, where Mr. Edwards was to be found. The session was now near its close, it would be unnecessary to send for him, if, when he came, the House had adjourned, or the committee was not prepared to go on. If we do send to Wheeling, when our messenger gets there Mr. E. will be gone, and we shall be pursuing him from town to town nobody knows how long.

If it was in order, he should move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion to lay the subject on the table was decided in the negative, by a large majority.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said, the objection he had to the matter now before the House, would apply as well to the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, as to the recommendation of the committee. He could perceive no necessity for the further interposition of the House, and it might be improper to call for it. We have referred the memorial to a committee, said he, with what propriety it is not for me now to say, and have vested that committee with full power to send for persons and papers. We could give no greater power. Under the authority already possessed, the committee were authorized to send for this individual, without our interference, and he thought they should do so. If the public character of the individual rendered it improper to compel his attendance, without the interference of the Executive, it would be competent for the committee, without applying to this House, to request such interference. He had some experience of parliamentary proceedings, and he believed it unprecedented for a committee, vested with full powers, to call upon the House to do what might be as well done without their aid. He could easily conceive, that a subject of no great magnitude, in itself, might be clothed with much artificial importance, by such proceedings; and he saw no propriety in the committee reporting the journal of their private proceedings, from time to time, to this House. He was averse to the repeated agitation of the subject in this manner, to the prejudice of other business, by the daily or weekly report of the journal of the committee's proceedings. He desired a full and prompt investigation; the prompt the better; but he thought the committee had ample power over the subject, and he hoped the House would not be called upon to act unnecessarily in the business.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, referring to the intimation, as he understood it, of the committee, that the presence of Mr. Edwards was so necessary that the investigation of the charges made by him could not go on without his presence, said he thought there could be no such indispensable necessity for the presence of Mr. Edwards here. The House would perceive, he said, that any individual, intending to do a serious mischief to another, might select a particular moment to prefer charges against another, and, by abandoning his position, preventing an investigation of his motives as well as his charges, leave an erroneous impression on the public mind. It was desirable that the accuser should be where he places his accusation; the common sense of mankind shows that the accuser ought to abide by the consequences of his accusation. But, if he flies from that responsibility, the investigation should not, therefore, be delayed. Such delay would be to furnish the individual with an opportunity of doing all the mischief he desired. Unless it could be ascertained that the individual in question could be brought to this place within a reasonable time, it was desirable, it appeared to him, that the investigation of his charges should not be delayed until he could be sent for.

Mr. WEBSTER replied to the gentleman from Delaware, as to the report made from the committee. It was certainly no unusual thing for the chairman of a committee to make a motion in this House, by the instruction of the committee; and, if a portion of the minutes of the committee were coupled with it, he did not see that that would alter the case, as to the expediency or propriety of the practice. With respect to the suggestion, which had been made, that sending for Mr. Edwards would procrastinate the inquiry, the gentleman from Georgia was not to suppose that the committee was going wholly to suspend this investigation, to wait for anybody's attendance.

Mr. McLANE, still fully impressed with the correctness of the view which he had taken of this matter, moved to recommit the report.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he hoped the motion for recommitment would not prevail; and he rose for the purpose only of calling the attention of the House to a fact, that the select committee have acted by the authority and in the name of this body, and that, whether gentlemen think that Mr. Edwards ought to be brought before the committee or not, the writ is now on its way; that it will be served upon him; and that he will be brought here, whether we vote in one way or another, on this question. In case this inquiry is to be prosecuted, said Mr. R., I cannot consent to act, on that committee, except by the imperious mandate of this House, without the presence of the informer. The committee having first resolved that this inquiry should be prosecuted—that the informer should be brought before the grand jury, have reported the fact—for what? That the House, being one of the co-ordinate branches of this Government of ours, should communicate to the other co-ordinate branch, that which, in courtesy, the other branch ought to be put in possession of. What do we ask of the President? To aid us to bring this Minister before us? No; we need no authority from him. We will, in despite of any man in this land, have him before us. If, indeed, he shall have made his escape from the country, we cannot follow him to Mexico; but, any where short of the Balize, the warrant of this House is as high authority as any known in this land, and, as such, I trust it will be supported. If I had thought that, in the act of that committee, the privileges of this House, the privileges of the American people in their Representatives, had been compromised, no consideration that man can name, would have induced me to give it my sanction. It was at my motion that the order was passed to bring the accuser before us. I hope the House will proceed as proposed. The committee have maintained the authority of this House, which I never will surrender, and have, in their report, acted to the Executive with that comity and urbanity which, when it shall cease to prevail between the co-ordinate branches of any Government like ours, must throw every thing into confusion.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, said it had been, and should be, his course, pending this subject, to abstain from saying any thing in relation to the merits of it, and to abstain from exhibiting any thing like feeling in relation to it. In his opinion, the course which the committee had pursued, on this occasion, was a proper one. The Executive had probably given its orders to this individual, and his actual position might not be so well known to any one as to the Executive. Mr. C. thought it was probable that, before any process could reach him, he would have left Illinois, and might have reached New Orleans, and the information communicated to the Executive might be effectual to answer the end of the process of this House reaching him. Mr. C. concluded by repeating that he would not trust his feelings on this occasion, for he wished to suppress them, so far as to speak on the merits of this controversy, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH asked if he had understood the gentleman from Illinois rightly, when he informed the House that this person was now on his way to New Orleans, and about to pass thence from the United States?

Mr. COOK said that he had so stated, presuming it to be the fact.

Mr. FORSYTH said it was only what he suspected. The Parthian throws behind him his poisoned arrows as he retreats, and then flies beyond the reach of pursuit. But, Mr. F. said, he could not fortunately leave the United States before the process of the committee could reach him. The vessel which was to have the honor to bear him out, had not yet left the navy yard at this place, and, as he would scarcely venture to sail without the protection of the guns of the nation, he could yet be overtaken.

Mr. COOK said that, when up before, he had intended to suggest, that the vessel which was destined to carry Mr. Edwards to Mexico, was yet at this place; that by this vessel, information could be given to him of his presence being desired here; and that the only, at least most probable way, in which the process of this House could reach him, and he could be recalled for the purposes of this House, would be by means of this vessel.

Mr. FLOYD said that the committee had thought it necessary that this individual should be present during the examination of his charges. They were perfectly aware that the authority with which they were invested by the House, was sufficient for all the purposes of bringing him here, and, in the course which they had pursued, had no object but to give the President of the United States, in a respectful manner, information of the course which it had been thought proper, by the committee, to pursue; and he hoped the opposition to it would be withdrawn.

Mr. McLANE said he was not anxious to embarrass the proceedings by the motion which he had made, under the conviction, in his own mind, that the President ought not to be called upon to do what the House has the perfect power to do. He was anxious for this investigation to go on. He thought, with the gentleman from Virginia, that the informer on this occasion ought to be present; but he thought, also, that the whole matter was already within the power of the committee. To save trouble to the House, however, he would withdraw his motion for recommitment.

APRIL, 1824.

H. OF R.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, said the House had given the committee all the powers which it possesses in relation to this matter. The question is now, whether it is necessary to call upon the House to aid the committee to carry its powers into execution. The committee have all the powers of this House on the subject, and have certainly the same power to communicate the fact of their proceedings to the President, that this House has, and on the same principle on which they would have power to ask information from him.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he had not offered his first motion on this subject (that which the House refused to consider) before this House had referred the inquiry into the subject to a committee, with power to send for persons and papers. It appeared to him, he said, at the time he made the motion, that such a proceeding was absolutely due, in courtesy to the Executive. Perhaps, he said, he had some little feeling on this subject, arising from the difference of the manner in which his proposition, and the nearly similar one of another gentleman, had been received. He saw no necessity, however, for pressing his amendment, though he could not see any occasion for all this particularity on the subject. In deference, therefore, to the wishes of several of his friends, whose opinions he always respected, he withdrew his motion for amendment.

The question recurring on the report of the Committee—

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, said, he was rather sorry that the gentleman from Georgia had withdrawn his motion, because it was perfectly free from any ambiguity, which the proposition of the committee was not. If the amendment had prevailed, however, he could not have voted for this reason: He was one of those who hoped, the other day, that the motion for printing the memorial would have prevailed, and that he should thus have been enabled to judge of the necessity of the presence of the accuser. At present, he said, he did not feel himself competent to decide whether his presence was necessary or not. He, for one, moreover, was not willing to notify the President that the committee thought the interposition of the authority of the House necessary, because the committee are themselves competent to do it, and, if they think proper, it is their duty to do it. There was another consideration on this subject, which Mr. F. thought must occur to the mind of every one. Is it possible, is it probable, at any rate, that Congress will remain in session for two months to have the presence of this gentleman? It would take a month to give notice to this individual, another month to get him here, and after he got here, the investigation of the case by the committee would not occupy less than two or three weeks. A full investigation of this case, Mr. F. hoped, would take place at the next session. Under the present circumstances, he saw no occasion for giving information to the President of the opinion of the committee.*

Mr. BARTLETT, of New Hampshire, said, he was desirous of understanding rightly what was the object of the motion before the House. If he had a correct view of it, some other gentlemen who had spoken had not. It had been suggested, that there was not time to send for this person, and that the House ought not to give this notice, to the Executive, because by so doing it would commit itself. Those questions, said Mr. B., are not now before the House. The House has confided the question to a select committee; that committee has decided it, and it is a question no longer to be discussed. I do not understand the resolution as it is understood by one gentleman, as being intended to give facility to the execution of the power which the committee have undertaken to exercise, but as intending this, and nothing more: that this person, whom the committee have sent for, who, they have said, shall come here, and who, I have no doubt, will come here, is a person whom the President, with the consent of the Senate, has ordered on service to a foreign Government. Some time ago, we gave to the President power to appoint Ministers to certain Governments, whenever he should think it expedient to do so. We have, by the act of our committee, temporarily revoked that power so far as he has exercised it in this particular instance. He has said, that Ninian Edwards shall be Minister to Mexico; we have said, that he shall not go. If the United States have great interests at stake in Mexico, and it is necessary we should have a Minister there, it is proper that we should inform the President that the person whom he has appointed for that purpose we have recalled. If the President sent him, and we, in the plenitude of our power, ordered him back, is it not necessary that the President should be informed of the fact? It had been suggested, that the committee has the power to communicate this information to the President. My opinion, said Mr. B., is, that they have not. They have not the power to communicate directly with the President on the subject, but they have the power to give information on the subject to this House, of which they are the organ, and, the information being so

Messrs. Gales & Seaton: You will oblige me by correcting an error in reporting, in your paper of this morning, the remarks made by me, respecting the investigation of the charges in Mr. Edwards's memorial. In stating the impropriety of protracting the session of Congress for several months, to examine Mr. E. personally, I observed, "that the committee ought immediately to proceed in the investigation; and that, if his presence should be found to be necessary, I hoped the examination, as far as he was concerned, would be made at the next session."

I by no means intended to express the opinion that the investigation ought to be deferred, being clearly of the opinion, that no time or means, within the power of the committee, ought to be neglected.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant, given, the question now is, whether it be proper to give it to the Executive. If the appointment of a Minister was necessary, it continues to be so. If it was necessary a month ago, no change of circumstances having occurred, the interest of the country now equally demands that a Minister proceed directly to Mexico; in which case it might be necessary for the President, on receiving this information, to designate some other person for this station, &c.

Mr. BUCK, of Vermont, made a few observations, the import of which were, that it was not material whether this information were given to the Executive by the committee, or by a vote of this House—so that whether the present proposition was agreed to or not, appeared to him to be of little importance.

The question was then taken on the report of the committee, as above stated, and it was agreed to, almost without a dissenting voice.

Mr. FLOYD then moved that the Clerk of this House be directed to adopt measures to expedite the printing of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon which the said communication is founded, and that the said communication, with its accompanying documents, be printed; which was agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. FORWARD postponed his motion to take up the bill "laying duties on sales at auction" till Monday next.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the Chair,) on the following bills, viz: "A bill granting to the Territory of Arkansas the right of pre-emption to certain quarter sections of land;" "A bill changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, lake, bayou, or water course, in the State of Mississippi and Territory of Arkansas;" and "A bill granting to the counties of each State and Territory of the United States, in which the public lands are situated, the right of pre-emption to quarter sections of land for seats of justice within the same."

Considerable discussion took place on amendments to these bills, in which Messrs. MOORE, of Alabama, WICKLIFFE, OWEN, WHIPPLE, LETCHER, MCCOY, and RANKIN, took part.

Finally, the bills were ordered to a third reading.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the report of the Committee of Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Richard G. Morris.

Mr. BASSETT, of Virginia, moved to reverse the resolution reported by the committee, by striking out the word "not."

The report was read.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, suggested the inexpediency of farther proceeding in the consideration of this affair.

Mr. BASSETT pronounced the whole report to be deceptive—the case had never been thoroughly or fairly examined.

Mr. TAYLOR explained.

Mr. BASSETT resumed, and went at length into the illustration and defence of the claim of the petitioner, referring occasionally to documents in support of his statements.

Mr. LITTLE, chairman of the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, spoke in reply.

Messrs. P. P. BARBOUR and WRIGHT advocated, and Messrs. WHITTLESEY, LITTLE, and McCOR, opposed the amendment; and the question being taken, it was negatived by a large majority.

The Committee then rose, and reported their agreement to the original report—
And the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 23.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Colonel William Duane," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was recommitted the bill to provide for the sale of lands conveyed to the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. ALEXANDER, in relation to Lieutenant Kennon's case, was taken up, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAYWARD, the Committee on the Public Buildings were instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing three of Capellano's marble busts of Washington, to be placed in the public buildings, under the direction of the said committee.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

An act supplementary to an act approved on the 3d of March, 1819, entitled "An act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices;"

An act changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, lake, bayou, or water-course, in the State of Mississippi, and Territory of Arkansas;

An act granting to the counties or parishes of each State and Territory of the United States, in which the public lands are situated, the right of pre-emption to quarter sections of land, for seats of justice within the same; were, respectively, read the third time, and passed.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of yesterday, I have received a copy of the proceedings of the committee to whom was referred a communication from Nislian Edwards, lately appointed a Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico, in which it is decided that his attendance in this city, for the purpose of being examined by the committee, on matters contained in the said communication, was requisite. As soon as I was apprized that such a communication had been made to the House, anticipating that the attendance of Mr. Edwards might be desired, for the purpose stated, I thought it proper that he should be informed thereof, and instructed him not to proceed on his mission, but to await such call as might be made on him, either by the House, or its committee; and, in consequence, a letter was addressed to him to that effect, by the Secretary of State.

JAMES MONROE.

APRIL 23, 1824.

The Message was read, and laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. LEFTWICH, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BRENT in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Mary James." The report of the Committee of Claims on the case having been read, the bill was reported to the House without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. STERLING in the Chair,) on the bill "to alter the judicial districts of Pennsylvania." The blanks in the bill were filled, and it was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LATHROP in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Isaac Collier and others;" and on the bill "allowing bounties to persons employed in the cod fisheries, in certain cases;" which bills were reported without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to authorize masters of vessels, in certain cases, to clear out at the custom-house of Petersburg, or that of Richmond;" was read the third time, and passed.

PRE-EMPTIONS—PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WHIPPLE, from the Committee on Public Lands, who were instructed by resolutions passed by the House, on the 31st December, 1823, the 2d and 23d of January last, to inquire into the expediency of granting pre-emption rights in the purchase of public lands, in certain cases, and to whom was referred the petition of Hardy Doyal and George Caperton, and the petition of L. C. Davis, made a report thereon; which was laid on the table.

The report is as follows:

Before adverting to the particular cases embraced by the resolutions and petitions referred, the committee deem it proper to make some general observations on the subject of pre-emption grants, as connected with the general policy of the Government in relation to the public lands.

By reference to the various laws on the subject of pre-emptions, it will be perceived that, where the United States have acquired territory where settlements existed at the time of the acquisition, the persons having made such settlements have been permitted by the Government to retain their lands by paying therefor the minimum price, subject to a reasonable limitation as to the quantity to be retained.

In cases where territory has been acquired from foreign Powers by treaty, this privilege has been extended to the period in which the United States took the actual possession of the ceded territory. Some modifications of these principles have, at times, and under particular circumstances, existed, but the main principle has been generally adhered to.

The committee are of opinion that an extension of these principles would be injurious to the Government, as well as to those who may hereafter become the purchasers of the public lands, and probably to those, also, who may venture to settle upon Government lands without authority hereafter.

It cannot be perceived by what principle persons having no color of title should, after lands on which they have settled were known to belong to the United States at the time of making such settlement, claim the pre-emption right to such lands.

Should the Government sanction applications of this nature, an inducement would be offered to persons of an enterprising disposition to anticipate, in every quarter, the Government in its sales of the public lands, and to settle upon and improve the most valuable tracts of land, which they would claim at the minimum price, whenever such lands were brought into market by authority of the United States.

Purchasers of land finding themselves prevented from acquiring good lands, would abstain from purchases, and resort to illegal settlements, in the hope of obtaining that at the minimum value, which they could not obtain at fair and open sale.

Thus, a competition would be excited among a certain description of our population, to locate themselves upon the public lands without much regard to lines or boundaries, and with very little respect for the rights either of the Government or their Indian neighbors.

When it might become necessary for the Government to offer for sale the tracts on which these settlements had been made, the persons interested would find arguments at hand, in their poverty and distress, and the situation of their families, to show why they should be permitted to retain their homes and their improvements.

Abuses like these would necessarily attract the attention of the Government, and induce Congress to adopt rigorous measures to repress them, by which many who had thus precipitately made unauthorized settlements would be deprived of their labor and again be compelled to begin anew, thus losing the labor of years.

A system of indulgence to those who trespass by making unauthorized settlements upon the lands of the United States, after those lands are known to be the property of the Government, would, in the opinion of the committee, be productive of much perplexity to the Government as well as of injury to those concerned in the purchase and settlement of the national domain.

The committee will now proceed to consider the several resolutions and petitions referred to them, which relate either to pre-emption rights or to indulgences prayed for by those who have made unauthorized settlements upon the public lands.

By the resolution of December 31st, 1823, the committee are "instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of granting to actual settlers in that part of the State of Louisiana, lying east of the Mississippi and island of New Orleans, a right of pre-emption to public lands, in the same manner, and for the same period of time after possession thereof by the Government of the United States, as was granted to such settlers in the late Territory of Orleans, after possession thereof as aforesaid."

H. OF R.

Pre-emptions—Public Lands.

APRIL, 1824.

It will be perceived, by reference to the act of Congress of April 12th, 1814, that pre-emption rights were granted to actual settlers in that part of the State of Louisiana west of the river Mississippi, up to the date of said act, that is, to the 12th April, 1814.

The United States took possession of this portion of the State of Louisiana on the 10th of December, 1803, consequently, settlers for a period of eleven years after the possession of the territory of Orleans by the United States, had the right of pre-emption of the lands on which they had settled secured to them.

In that portion of the State of Louisiana which lies east of the river Mississippi and Island of New Orleans, a different rule was adopted.

The Government did not get possession of this portion of the ceded territory until the Autumn of 1810; prior to which time it was under the Government of Spain, consequently, settlers in this portion of the territory had the right of pre-emption secured to them by the act of 1814, only for a period of four years after the possession by the United States.

The resolution, therefore, contemplates extending to all who had made settlements on the public lands of the United States, in the portion of the State of Louisiana east of the river Mississippi, up to the year 1821, the right of pre-emption of the land on which they have settled.

The committee deem it inexpedient to extend the right of pre-emption in this manner.

The act of the 12th April, 1814, extended equally to all portions of the State of Louisiana, and if any inequality existed in the situation of the people of different sections of the State, this circumstance ought not of itself to be made ground of claim upon the Government. Those who reside east of the river Mississippi and Island of New Orleans, had, by that law, the right of retaining their lands at the minimum value, although they had settled on them without leave of the Government, four years after the lands were, by solemn transfer and formal possession, known to be the property of the United States: the Government has, therefore, treated these settlers with great lenity and indulgence; and if some of their neighbors have, by the peculiarity of their situations, derived greater benefits from the act of April 12th, 1814, the committee cannot, on this account, be induced to deem it proper to sanction the principle that persons ought to be encouraged to settle upon the public lands for ten or eleven years after they are known to be the property of the United States. It may, however, be doubted, whether the act of 1814 has not operated nearly equally upon the settlers on the public lands within the State of Louisiana. It was well known by the people, that the whole territory acquired by the treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States, would ultimately fall under their Government, and there can be little doubt that many settlements were made within the territory in anticipation of this event, hence, the time of taking possession of different portions of that tract of country, could produce very little inequality with respect to those who had pre-emption rights granted them by the act of the 12th April, 1814.

By the resolution of January 2d, 1824, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of granting the right of pre-emption to all persons to mill seats on public lands, where the same may have been actually improved as such by them."

It will be readily perceived that, if the Government should sanction a principle of this kind, these valuable appendages to the public lands would be universally taken up and occupied to the great injury of the Government, and with no advantage to those who may wish to purchase public lands, except to the favored individual.

The committee are therefore of opinion, that it would be injudicious and that it is inexpedient to adopt such a provision.

By a resolution of the same date, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of granting to actual settlers prior to the 1st of July, 1820, in the State of Alabama, the right of purchasing, by pre-emption of at least one quarter section of land, embracing their family residences."

The committee refer to the general observations in the commencement of this report, and again repeat that they can see no sound reason for permitting persons who have knowingly made unauthorized settlements on the public lands, to have and enjoy peculiar privileges and indulgences; they are therefore of opinion that the adoption of such a measure would be impolitic and inexpedient.

By a resolution of January 23d, 1824, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of reviving the law of the 25th March, 1816, relating to the settlers on the lands of the United States."

This act, as will be seen by reference to it, provides that persons settled on the public lands of the United States, may, upon application to a register, recorder, or marshal, or to such person as either of them may appoint, be permitted to remain on such lands, provided the applicant shall sign a declaration, purporting that he or she has no claim to the lands on which he or she may be located. Books are to be kept and a registry of the applications and permissions is to be made, and such forms prescribed as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States may direct. The persons availing themselves of the provisions of this act are to be considered as tenants at will, and to obligate themselves not to commit waste, and to yield quiet possession when the lands shall be sold by the Government.

The committee can see no good reason for renewing this law, which has been continued in force until the 3d March, 1819, a period of three years.

Those who had located themselves on the public lands prior to, and until the 3d of March, 1819, have had opportunity to avail themselves of the benefits of this act, and those who have since that time made unauthorized settlements on the vacant lands of the United States can have no just ground of complaint, if left to the ordinary operation of the laws relating to such persons.

To revive the law of 1816, would be to hold out inducements to settle on the public lands, under the expectation, that until such lands were sold, the persons making settlements would be permitted to cultivate and improve them for their own profit and benefit. Were the Government to grant these facilities, it is easy to perceive that no regard whatever would be paid to the regulations of the laws forbidding unauthorized settlements upon the public lands.

The experience of the Government would lead us to conclude, that the final request of these settlers would be for pre-emption rights, or at least to be permitted to retain their crops. But the committee trust that enough has been said to show the indefensible nature of this proposition; they will therefore dismiss it.

APRIL, 1824.

Penelope Denney.—Alvin Bronson.

H. OF R.

The petition of Lewis C. Davis was referred to the committee on the 26th January, 1824. He states that he purchased a quarter section of land in the State of Alabama, for which he gave fourteen dollars per acre, that he is unable to pay for it and was compelled to relinquish it, and prays to be permitted to re-enter the land at the pre-emption price. There appears to be nothing in this case to entitle the petitioner to particular favor, and the committee see no cause why he should not be subjected to the operation of the laws and regulations of the Government relative to such cases.

The petition of Hardy Doyal and George Caperton, of Alabama, referred to the committee on the 27th January, 1824, states that the petitioners have erected a gristmill on the public lands and cleared a farm adjoining it; that they have expended their whole property in the enterprise; they therefore pray to be permitted to take a certain quantity of land including their mill at the pre-emption value, and that the Government should grant them a credit of six months from the issuing of the patent.

The committee deem it unnecessary to enter into detailed reasoning to show the inadmissibility of this proposition. It is sufficient to remark, that it is in direct contravention of the policy which it is believed the Government ought to pursue, for the purpose of putting a stop to unauthorized settlements on the public lands.

PENELOPE DENNEY.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Penelope Denney." Several documents were read. The question being still pending from a former sitting, in January, to amend the bill, by providing the support of Mrs. Denney from the Navy Pension Fund, instead of the Treasury of the United States, a debate arose, in which Messrs. CAMBRELENG, FULLER, WOOD of New York, WARFIELD, and BUCHANAN, took part.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to strike out the enacting clause—and the debate was then farther continued by Mr. FULLER, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. WARFIELD, and Mr. SHARPE.

In this debate, the merits of Denney were not disputed, nor the wants of his mother, but it was objected to the bill that it introduced a new principle in the pension laws of the United States, by providing for parents; the present laws only making provision for widows and children; and it was further argued that, if given at all, the pension should come out of the Treasury of the United States, and not out of the Navy Pension Fund. That fund, consisting of contributions of prize money, was, at its creation, pledged to a class of persons to which cases of this kind did not belong, and it would be a breach of public faith to touch it.

The question was then taken on striking out the enacting clause, and decided in the negative—ayes 58, noes 63.

The question then recurring on striking out the clause of the bill which provides to pay the pension "out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States," and inserting, in its place, "the Navy Pension Fund," the debate was resumed by Messrs. BRECK, CAMBRELENG, FULLER, HAMILTON, and BUCHANAN; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 89, noes 58.

The bill was then reported to the House; the amendment was agreed to, and the question being on ordering it to a third reading, Mr. BRECK called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. METCALFE then moved to lay the bill on the table, which was negative—ayes, 50 noes 83.

The yeas and nays, on ordering the bill to a third reading, were then taken, as follows: Yeas 62, nays 98.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Brent, Cady, Cambreleng, Carter, Cary, Collins, Condict, Conner, Cook, Crafts, Craig, Cuipeper, Cushman, Dwight, Ellis, Foot of Connecticut, Foote of New York, Garnett, Gurley, Hamilton, Harris, Hayward, Hemphill, Herrick, Herkimer, Hogeboom, Houston, F. Johnson, Kidder, Kremer, Litchfield, Livingston, Locke, Longfellow, McDuffie, McLane of Delaware, Mallory, Marvin, Miller, Mitchell of Maryland, Moore of Kentucky, Morgan, Nelson, Plumer of Pennsylvania, Richards, Rives, Saunders, Sanford, Sharpe, Spence, James Stephenson, Strong, Taylor, Test, Thompson of Kentucky, Tyson, Van Rensselaer, Van Wyck, Wood, and Woods.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allison, Barber of Connecticut, P. P. Barbour, Bartlett, Bassett, Beecher, Breck, Buchanan, Buck, Buckner, Burleigh, Burton, Campbell of Ohio, Cobb, Cocke, Crowninshield, Cuthbert, Day, Eddy, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Findlay, Floyd, Fuller, Garrison, Gazlay, Gist, Hall, Harvey, Hayden, Henry, Hobart, Hooks, Isaacs, Jenkins, Johnson of Virginia, Kent, Lathrop, Leftwich, Letcher, Lincoln, Little, Livermore, Long, McArthur, McCoy, McKean, McKee, McKim, McLean of Ohio, Markley, Martindale, Matlack, Matson, Metcalfe, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Neale, Newton, O'Brien, Own, Patterson of Pennsylvania, Patterson of Ohio, Plumer of New Hampshire, Prince, Rankin, Reed, Ross, Scott, Sibley, Sloane, Arthur Smith, William Smith, Spaight, Standefer, Sterling, Stoddard, Taliaferro, Tattall, Tod, Tomlinson, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Udree, Vance of North Carolina, Vance of Ohio, Vinton, Warfield, Whipple, Whitman, Whittlesey, White, Williams of New York, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, Henry Wilson, and Wright.

So, the bill was rejected.

ALVIN BRONSON.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Alvin Bronson."

The memorial of the petitioner, and report of the Committee of Claims, were read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, stated his objection to the claim, and called for the reading of an opinion of Chief Justice McKean, of Pennsylvania, on a similar case.

Mr. WHITTLESEY contended that that case was not analogous, and went into a recapitulation of the circumstances.

Mr. MCCOY declared that, by recent testimony, his view of the case was now changed, and he advocated the claim.

The bill was then reported, without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

SATURDAY, April 24.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GAZLAY offered the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States do cause to be executed the act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the 3d of March, 1803, as far as the same relates to a township of land situated in the tract of land patented to John Cleves Symmes, and reserved for schools.

The House refused to consider the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN gave notice that, on Monday next, he should call up the joint resolution, offered by him some time since, on the subject of the adjournment of this House.

An engrossed bill "to provide for the sale of lands conveyed to the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes;"

An engrossed bill "for the relief of Mary James;"

An engrossed bill "to alter the Judicial Districts of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes;"

An engrossed bill "for the relief of Isaac Collier and others;"

An engrossed bill "for the relief of Alvin Bronson;"

An engrossed bill "to allow bounties to persons engaged in the cod fishery, in certain cases," were, respectively, read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the joint committee appointed to report what business required the attention of Congress during the present session, and at what time Congress shall adjourn, made a report in part with respect to the business to be taken up, which is divided into classes, and reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That all the legislative business before the Senate; the bills before the House of Representatives, mentioned in schedule No. 1, 2, 3, 4; and so many of those mentioned in schedule No. 5, as time shall permit,—be acted upon at the present session. That precedence be given to private claims, examined and sanctioned by the committees to which they were respectively referred, and to bills of a public nature which it is believed will not require protracted discussion. And that those which are embraced in schedule No. 5, which shall not be decided upon before the rising of Congress, be preferred in the orders of the day, at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR explained the arrangement which the committee had made, and the resolution was adopted.

DAILY RECESS, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That, after this day, until otherwise ordered, the House will daily take a recess, from two o'clock until four o'clock, in the afternoon.

Mr. CAMPBELL spoke in opposition to the resolution. There would be a difficulty in procuring a quorum. The evening session must be short. He was utterly opposed to nocturnal sessions, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR replied, and insisted that the measure proposed was the best mode of avoiding the necessity of nocturnal sessions. It would obviate the necessity of prolonging the session,

At the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, the motion was modified, so as to propose a recess from two o'clock until four, and the hour of meeting in the morning to be ten o'clock.

Mr. DWIGHT inquired whether, if this resolution should be adopted, it is probable the committee would concur in the date of adjournment resolved upon by the Senate?

Mr. TAYLOR replied, and explained.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. STEWART, WRIGHT, LITTLE, TAYLOR, McCoy, KREMER, and STEWART.

Mr. TATNALL wished to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether they included in the calculation they had made, in reference to a time of adjournment, the investigation of a late document submitted to the House by Ninian Edwards. He thought the House bound, having ordered that investigation, not to adjourn till it was fully gone through.

Mr. TAYLOR replied, and repeated the explanation he had already given.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the resolution on the table. The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 52, noes 91.

The resolution was then adopted, and the arrangement of the orders of the day was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN moved that the joint committee be discharged from the consideration of the joint resolution from the Senate, on the subject of adjournment.

The House refused to consider the motion.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill "for the relief of David Giffin and Samuel Hoag." The report of the Committee of Claims in the case was read. The bill was then reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. TEST, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill "for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Mims, deceased." The report of the Committee of Claims was read; and the bill being reported, was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. ROSS, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDICT in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of the assignees and legal representatives of John H. Piatt, deceased." The report of the committee was read. The bill was reported, without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

Donnelson, Hurd, and others.

H. OF R.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDS, of New York, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LATHROP in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of George B. R. Gove." The report of the Committee of Ways and Means was read; and the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SHARPE in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Joseph Wheaton." The report of the Committee of Claims, on his case, was read. The bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. FULLER, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. COBB in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of William Blagrove." The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in this case, was read. The bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. STERLING in the Chair,) on the bill for the relief of "John Thomas." The report of the Committee of Military Affairs, relating to this case, was read. The bill was then reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDIOT in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of certain persons who have paid duties on certain goods imported into Castine." The report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in this case, was read.

Mr. COCKE spoke in opposition to the petition of the persons concerned in this bill, and called for the reading of further documents.

Some conversation then arose between Messrs. COCKE, McLANE; MCCOY, FOOT of Connecticut, P. P. BARBOUR, and WEBSTER; after which the Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment; and it was ordered to a third reading a week from this day.

On motion of Mr. HAYWARD, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. COCKE in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of William N. Earle." The memorial of the petitioner was read. The bill was then reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. REED, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LATHROP in the Chair,) on the bill "releasing the owners of the ship General Jackson from the payment of certain duties." The report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the case was read. The bill was then reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDIOT in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of the corporation of St. Ann's church, Detroit, and for the extension of Larned street." The report of the Committee on Military Affairs, in relation to this case, was read. The bill was then reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HERRICK in the Chair,) on the bill "authorizing the issuing of debentures to Bernard Thooft." The bill was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Arthur H. Henley," which was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

DONNELSON, HURD, AND OTHERS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SHARPE in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of John Donnelson, Stephen Hurd, and others." Mr. RANKIN stated, at length, the circumstances of this case, and advocated the claim of the persons named in the bill.

Mr. COCKE opposed the claim.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, called for the reading of a former report on the case, and opposed, at considerable length, the passage of the bill.

Messrs. THOMPSON of Georgia, ISACKS of Tennessee, and RANKIN of Mississippi, at great length advocated the bill, going into a recapitulation of the whole transactions between the United States and the State of Georgia, in relation to the Yazoo claims, &c.

Mr. COBB moved to amend the bill by inserting the name of Thomas Carr among those for whose relief it was drawn. This motion was supported by the mover, but was not agreed to by the Committee.

The bill was then reported to the House without amendment, and, without taking the question on its third reading, the House adjourned till Monday next.

MONDAY, April 26.

Mr. NEALE presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying that they may be restored to their parent, the State of Virginia.— Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the President to exchange five arpens of land on the south side of the public lot at Baton Rouge, for an equal quantity of land on the north side of said lot; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the same committee, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing the obstructions in the river Iberville, placed in it by order of the Commanding General, during the late war, made a report; which was read, and laid upon the table.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize the surveying and making a road from Detroit to Chicago; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the purchase of an additional quantity of land, for the enlargement of the site of Fort Washington, and for completing the title in the United States to a part of that on which the said fort is now erected.

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the Committee on Private Land Claims were directed to report whether the claim of Dussuau de la Croix to certain lots in the town of Mobile, ought not to be confirmed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act explanatory of an act, confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile;" and "An act supplementary to 'An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia;" in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were read twice, and referred; that "explanatory of an act confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile," to the Committee on Public Lands; and that "supplementary to an act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia," to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The engrossed bill "for the relief of David Giffin and Joseph Hoag;" an engrossed bill "for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Mims, deceased;" an engrossed bill "for the relief of George B. R. Gove," were severally read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

An engrossed bill "for the relief of William Blagrove" was read a third time. Mr. KREMER opposed the passage of the bill; and it was advocated by Mr. HARVEY and Mr. FULLER. Mr. KREMER then moved to lay the bill on the table. The motion was negatived, ayes 26, noes 79; and after some further conversation, the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The engrossed bill "for the relief of John Thomas & Co.;" an engrossed bill "for the relief of William N. Earle," were read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

An engrossed bill "for the relief of Jos. Wheaton," being read a third time, Mr. COOK asked for information, and spoke against the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the reading of a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury on the subject, which was read, and the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

An engrossed bill "for the relief of the corporation of the church of St. Anne, and to authorize the extension of Larned street, in the town of Detroit;" an engrossed bill "authorizing the release of certain debentures to Bernard Thooft," were read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

JOHN H. PIATT.

An engrossed bill "for the relief of the executors and legal representatives of John H. Piatt," having been read a third time, Mr. FORSYTH moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until the second Monday in December next.

Mr. ROSS spoke in opposition to this motion, and in favor of the passage of the bill. He went at considerable length into a recapitulation of the circumstances of this case, showing that the claim of Mr. Piatt's heirs grows out of his relation as a contractor for the supply of the army ten years ago.

Mr. LIVERMORE took a similar view of the case, and remonstrated against the postponement, in a speech of considerable extent.

Mr. FORSYTH shortly replied, not in a direct denial of the equity of the claim, but expressing a desire for a better understanding of it.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, spoke at length in favor of the bill, which, he contended, did not go to the whole extent of what was justly due to the claimants. He gave a history of what had been done; read the opinion of Mr. Pinkney on the construction of the law under which the claim is advanced, and argued from the whole case, the propriety of immediately passing the bill.

Mr. McARTHUR testified to many of the circumstances of the case of this claimant, who had been ruined by adhering to his contract, and died in extreme distress. Mr. McA. passed a strong eulogium on his honesty, activity, and patriotism.

Mr. DWIGHT explained the facts on which the claim rested, and advocated its equity.

Mr. WRIGHT bore witness to other facts, and confirmed the views of his character and claim which had been already given.

Mr. McCoy advocated the passage of the bill. He had gone into an extensive examination of the case, and was fully satisfied of the justice of the claim. The bill fell short of appropriating all that was due to the estate of Mr. Piatt.

Mr. FORSYTH replied—stated his views of the law on which the claim was founded, and on which he differed from the gentlemen who had spoken on the other side. He nevertheless withdrew his motion for postponement.

Mr. McLANE further dwelt on the nature of the law, defended the interpretation given to it by Mr. Pinkney and by the Second Auditor of the Treasury, and urged the passage of the bill.

Mr. MALLARY read a letter of the late Mr. Piatt, in which he refuses to abandon a disadvantageous contract, and resolves to go on in supplying the army at Detroit, trusting to the equity and liberality of the Government.

Mr. LONGFELLOW called for the reading of the contract—and spoke at length in opposition to the passage of the bill, occasionally referring to the accounts in support of his views.

Mr. CULPEPER spoke in favor of the bill. He had been a member of this House when the claim was first presented, and his only doubt about the bill was, whether it went to the extent of what was due.

Mr. McCoy explained a number of facts in answer to Mr. LONGFELLOW.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, went into the history of the contract, and of the law which passed for the settlement of the accounts of Mr. Piatt, and explained the reason of the discrepancy between the settlement allowed by different accounting officers of the Treasury, and stated some of the dying expressions of Mr. Piatt.

The question was then taken, and the bill was passed with a single dissenting voice.

An engrossed bill "for the relief of Arthur H. Henly," and an engrossed bill "releasing the owners of the ship General Jackson from the payment of certain duties," were read a third time, and passed.

DONNELSON, HURD, AND OTHERS.

A bill "for the relief of John Donnelson, Stephen Hurd and others," being taken up, Mr. Cobb renewed the motion he had made on Saturday in Committee of the Whole, for inserting the name of Thomas Carr in the 4th line of the bill—and stated the reason for such insertion. He went into a full statement of the transactions to which the bill refers—and maintained that Carr had the same right to compensation with Donnelson, Hurd, and others.

Mr. Cook opposed the amendment, and was proceeding to adduce the reasons for the opposition, when the hour of recess arrived—and the House had a recess till 4 o'clock.

The House met after the recess; and the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Cobb, to insert the name of Thomas Carr—

Mr. WHIPPLE spoke in opposition to the amendment:

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved indefinitely to postpone the bill.

Mr. RANKIN opposed the indefinite postponement, and went at some length into the facts of the claim, enforcing the arguments he advanced on Saturday.

The CHAIR refused to take the question on indefinite postponement until that on the amendment should have been decided.

Mr. COBB further advocated the propriety of inserting the name of Thomas Carr—referring to documents to support his arguments.

Mr. Cook followed on the opposite side, and contended that there was no proof that Mr. Carr had performed any service as a commissioner.

Mr. FORETTE spoke in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, and contended that Mr. Carr had performed important services.

Mr. WICKLIFFE replied to Mr. RANKIN; spoke against the amendment, and referred to documents to confirm the sentiments he advanced.

Mr. WHIPPLE insisted on the grounds he had formerly taken, in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON argued that, though Mr. Carr had not been engaged in exploring lands, he might, as commissioner, perform other important duties, worthy of recompense.

The question being then taken on the amendment, it was carried—ayes 92.

And the bill was then ordered to a third reading—ayes 79, noes 76.

A motion was made to adjourn, which was lost—ayes 70, noes 85.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, the House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. DWIGHT in the chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Robert S. Forman." The report of the Committee on Private Land Claims, in this case, was read, and the bill was reported and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. OWEN, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, in the chair,) on the bill confirming to the heirs and legal representatives of the late Don Miguel de Esclava, the title to certain lands in the town of Mobile. The report of the Committee on Private Land Claims having been read—the bill was reported.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 27.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Maturin Guichot; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Firman and others; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the Joint Committee of Conference, appointed on the part of this House, to meet a committee on the part of the Senate, in relation to the Navy Appropriation bill, made a report, recommending a compromise of the difference between the two Houses as to the item of contingent expenses of the Navy; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War on the case of George Harlin, made in obedience to an order of this House, of the 20th inst.; which report was committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill for the relief of said Harlin.

Mr. HAMILTON moved that the rule adopted on Saturday last for holding a daily recess from two till four be rescinded. Mr. COCKE objected to this motion, and moved that it lie on the table. And the question being taken on laying it on the table, it was decided in the negative—ayes 41, noes 70. The question then recurring on rescinding the rule, Mr. KREMER opposed the motion, and called for the yeas and nays upon it, which were ordered. Mr. HAMILTON spoke in support of rescinding the rule. Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, spoke in opposition to it, and moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed to to-morrow. The question on postponement was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 62, noes 70. Mr. WARFIELD spoke in favor of rescinding; and the question was decided in the affirmative—ayes 100, noes 69. So the rule was rescinded.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to certain acts of the State of Alabama;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONDIOT moved the following amendment to the rules and orders of the House, viz:

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

APRIL, 1824.

"When a bill is engrossed for a third reading, it shall be headed by the Clerk to the chairman of the committee reporting it; and it shall be the duty of such committees carefully to examine and compare such engrossed bill, and report thereon to the House."

The said amendment was laid on the table until to-morrow.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House, at the next session, a detailed report of the system and plan of fortifications as at present contemplated by the Government and established by the Board of Engineers; and also the plans and surveys of such fortifications, with an estimate of the amount necessary to complete the same; and also the amount expended on fortifications since the year 1815.

An engrossed bill "for the relief of Robert S. Forman" was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

An engrossed bill "to authorize the President to exchange five arpents of land on the south side of the public lot at Baton Rouge, for an equal quantity on the north side of said lot," was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

An engrossed bill "for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of John Donnellson, Stephen Hurd, and others," was read a third time. Mr. MILLER called for the yeas and nays; but the House refused to sustain the call. The question recurring on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the negative—ayes 61, noes 76. So the bill was rejected.

The question then recurring, from yesterday, on ordering the bill "for the relief of Don Miguel de Esclava" to a third reading, Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, moved an amendment, striking out that part of the bill which confirms to M. de Esclava, among other tracts, the title of 5,000 arpents of land, on Dog river, near Mobile. Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, opposed the amendment at considerable extent, and was replied to by Mr. BRENT, who advocated the amendment on the ground that the establishment of the principle contained in it would bear hard on his constituents, as the passage of the section proposed to be stricken out, would be destructive to a large class of land claims in Louisiana. Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, spoke in favor of granting the tract under discussion, and opposed the amendment at considerable length. Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, without going into the merits of the claim, moved that, as the principle of the bill admitted of a great extent of debate, and the session was far advanced, and much time could not be devoted to private claims, the bill be postponed till the first day of the next session; which motion was agreed to, and the bill was postponed accordingly.

Mr. SLOANS moved a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the bill "for the relief of Donnellson and others," and the question being taken on reconsidering, it was negatived—ayes 73, noes 74.

The House went into Committee of the Whole,

(Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Charles Humphrey." The report on his case having been read, the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BUCK in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of the representatives of Elijah Brush." The report of the Committee of Claims was read, and the bill being reported to the House, was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LATROFF in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Joseph Mareschall." The report of the Committee on Military Affairs, in this case, was read. Mr. HAMILTON moved to fill the blank in the bill with the sum of $288, which was agreed to. Mr. H. then moved an amendment, remitting the costs of a suit of the United States against Mareschall; which was carried. The bill was then reported, as amended, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. VINTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HARVEY in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Bazzel Wells." Mr. VINTON stated the facts of the case; and the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. MCCOY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BEECHER in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Joseph Smith, of Alexandria." The report of the Committee of Claims was read. The bill was then reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. STERLING in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Malachi Burns." The report of the Committee on Private Land Claims, in this case, having been read, and a small error in the bill having been corrected, it was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. MCCOY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. FENDLAY in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Stephen Brace." The report of the Committee of Claims having been read, the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LEPTWICH in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Lemuel Arms." The report of the Committee of Claims was read—when the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. TAST in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Mareen Deval." The report of the Committee of Claims was read. Mr. WHIGST moved to amend the bill, by striking out $81 93, and inserting $67 18, which was agreed to; and the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio in the Chair,) on the bills "for the relief of Samuel Rist," and "for the relief of John Hall." Mr. EDWARDS stated the case of Samuel Rist, (an insane soldier.) The Chairman of the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims in the case of Hall, stated the circumstances in his case. Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the bill, by adding to it the following clause; "and to allow Lewis Joseph Beaulieu $250 per annum, in place of the pension allowed to him by the Continental Congress. Mr. EDWARDS objected to the amendment, as being not in order. The Chair pronounced it to be in order; and the report of the Committee of Claims in the case of Beaulieu, was read. The amendment was rejected, and then the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WHITTLESEY in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Joshua Bennett." The report in this case being read, the bill was reported and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair, on the bill "for the relief of Elliot Rucker." The report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads having been read, the bill was reported and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TOMLINSON in the Chair, on the bill "for the relief of Catharine Louderman." A bill from the War Department on the case of Louderman, was read. Mr. CADY moved an amendment placing Thomas Burk on the pension list. The Chairman pronounced the amendment to be out of order. The bill was then reported.

Mr. McCoy objected to ordering the bill to a third reading, as setting a precedent which might have extensive consequences. Mr. CULPEPER replied, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOOGBOOM in the Chair, on the bill "for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Bradford." The report of the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims in this case having been read, the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WICKLIFFE in the Chair, on the bill "for the relief of Thomas Williams." The petition and documents in this case were read, and the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the message from the Senate, accompanied by a report of the joint committee of conference, signifying that they had receded from their amendment formerly insisted on to the bill making appropriation for the naval service of the United States for the year 1824, and proposing certain other amendments, was taken up.

Mr. COCKE spoke in opposition to one of the amendments, which recognises per diem allowances for extra services by officers of the Navy, and he moved to lay the bill and report on the table, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. McLANE, who urged a speedy passage of the bill, for which the public service was suffering. He explained the several amendments proposed, and replied to the objections of Mr. COCKE.

Mr. COCKE insisted on the objections, and supported them by a series of remarks, which he closed by renewing the motion to lay the bill on the table. The motion was lost, and the House concurred in the report of the committee of conference.

On motion of Mr. McCoy, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. ALLEN in the Chair, on the bill "for the relief of Nathaniel Jones." The report in the case having been read, the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. McCoy, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. COOK in the Chair, on the bill "for the relief of John Holliday." The report of the Committee of Claims having been read, the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CRAFTS in the Chair, on the bill "for the relief of Benjamin Desobry." Mr. CAMBRELENG having stated the circumstances of the case, the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CADY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CULPEPER in the Chair, on the bill for the relief of Jonas Duncan. The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the case having been read, the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. STRONG in the Chair, on the bill for the relief of John Wilmot. The report of the Committee of Ways and Means having been read, and a blank date in the bill supplied—

Mr. COCKE spoke in opposition to the bill, and moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. McLANE replied, and urged the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in this case.

Mr. TRIMBLE made some remarks on what had formerly been done in this case.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, explained the facts to which the bill refers.

Mr. McLANE read the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, made in 1818, which he explained and enforced.

Mr. COCKE withdrew his motion to strike out; and the bill was reported and ordered to a third reading.

The House, on motion of Mr. McCoy, went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TEN Eyck in the Chair, on the bill "for the relief of J. Ottramare."

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means not being in his place, Mr. McCoy moved that the committee rise, and the bill lie over till further information could be given to the committee.

Before the question was taken, the petition of Mr. Ottramare was read, and the bill was reported, but, on motion of Mr. TRACY, was laid on the table.

H. OF R.

William P. Nimmo.—Daniel Carroll.

APRIL, 1824.

WILLIAM P. NIMMO.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the House, by a vote of 88 to 51, took up the bill for the relief of William P. Nimmo.

Mr. WHITTLESEY having spoken in support of the passage of the bill—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, observed that, since this bill was formerly considered, a general bill had been reported, proposing to make provision for all cases similar to that of Mr. Nimmo. If that bill should pass, this one would be unnecessary; if not, it would be wrong to distinguish this sufferer from the others. He moved to lay the bill again upon the table; but withdrew the motion, to give way to Mr. NEWTON, who advocated at length the equity of the claim, and pressed the passage of this bill. Mr. STRONG spoke in reply, and moved the postponement of the bill to the first day of the next session.

The question being taken on this motion, it was decided in the negative—ayes 65, noes 71.

Mr. SHARPE moved the reference of the bill to the same committee to whom was referred the general bill for similar cases to the present.

The question being taken, the votes stood—ayes 70, noes 69.

The SPEAKER voting against the recommitment, it was lost by the equality of votes pro and con.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill, Mr. SANDFORD opposed and Mr. WHITTLESEY advocated it. When the question on the passage of the bill was taken, and decided in the affirmative—80 to 66. So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

WEDNESDAY, April 28.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of James, Jehu, and Nathaniel Brooks, accompanied by a bill for their relief, or the legal representatives of either of them, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. HARVEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of John K. Carter, accompanied by a bill for his relief, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made the following report:

"The Committee on the Public Buildings, to whom was referred the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of purchasing three of Capillano's marble busts of Washington, having had the subject under consideration, report:

"That, however laudable it may be in the Government to cherish a disposition friendly to the fine arts, and to patronize ingenious artisans, or politic to adorn our public halls or libraries with the likenesses of departed sages or heroes, it is inexpedient to purchase these busts, at this time, under existing circumstances."

The report was concurred in.

The resolution offered yesterday, by Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, calling on the President of the United States for information in relation to the plans of fortification now pursued by Government, was taken up.

Mr. COCKE suggested that the inquiry ought to be further extended, and wished that the resolution should be laid on the table one day more, that it might be modified.

Mr. FOOT not acceding to this suggestion, Mr. COCKE then moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was carried.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit:

For the relief of James Duncan;
For the relief of Lemuel Arms;
For the relief of John Wilnot;
For the relief of Joshua Bennett;
For the relief of Nathaniel Jones;
For the relief of John Holliday;
For the relief of Charles Bradford;
For the relief of Elliott Rucker;
For the relief of Catherine Louderman;
For the relief of Malachi Burns;
For the relief of Bazael Wells;
For the relief of the representatives of Elijah

Brush;

For the relief of Joseph Mareschal;
For the relief of Charles Humphreys;
For the relief of Joseph Smith;
For the relief of Maren Duval;
For the relief of Samuel Rist;
For the relief of William Hull;
For the relief of Thomas Williams;
For the relief of Stephen Brace;
For the relief of Benjamin Desobry;

were severally read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The following bills, all of a private nature, viz:

A bill for the relief of Hugh McCulloch;
A bill for the relief of Robert Strain;
A bill for the relief of John S. Moffet;
A bill for the benefit of the Columbian Institute, (allowing the Institute the temporary use of certain public lots in Washington);

A bill for the relief of Judah Alden;
A bill for the relief of Henry Lightner;
A bill for the relief of George Fisher;
A bill for the relief of Landie Richardson;
A bill for the relief of David Cooper;
A bill for the relief of Jacques Myctte, Francis Charpentrie, and Jean B. Laducier;

A bill for the relief of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and others;

A bill for the relief of Peter Yandes;
A bill for the relief of David Beard;
A bill for the relief of Thomas L. Ogden, and others;

A bill for the relief of Mary H. Hawkins;
A bill for the relief of Solomon Sibley;
A bill for the relief of J. M. C. Montgomery; and A bill for the relief of Frederick Perley; were severally considered and discussed, in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading.

DANIEL CARROLL.

On the bill "for the relief of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and others," an extensive debate arose.

Mr. MCCOY went at length into a statement of the facts of the case, and spoke in favor of the bill.

APRIL, 1824.

Claim of Daniel D. Tompkins.

H. OF R.

Mr. COCKE opposed its passage, and moved to strike out the enacting clause. Mr. MCCOY replied and explained; and a desultory debate arose, in which Messrs. COCKE, MCCOY, WARFIELD, BRENT, LIVERMORE, LITTLE, GAZLAY, and ROSS, participated—when the motion to strike out the enacting clause was negatived.

Mr. HAYDEN moved to amend the bill by striking out $1500 and inserting $1000; and the debate was further continued by Messrs. MCCOY, REYNOLDS, LETCHER, and BRENT.

The question being taken, was decided in the negative—ayes 65, noes 66. The Chairman voted in the negative. So the amendment was lost. The bill was then reported.

Mr. COCKE called for the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to a third reading; and the question being taken was decided—yeas 78, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Archer, Baylies, J. S. Barbour, Bassett, Brent, Buchanan, Buck, Cambreleng, Cobb, Collins, Condict, Cook, Crafts, Craig, Cushman, Cuthbert, Duffee, Dwinell, Eaton, Eddy, Farrelly, Foot of Connecticut, Forward, Garnett, Gurley, Hamilton, Harvey, Hayward, Henry, Hogeboom, Hooks, Jenkins, J. To-morrow was then assigned for the third reading of said bill.

CLAIM OF DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

The House of Representatives having referred back the accounts and claims of Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of New York, to be settled on the principles established by the report of the committee, and the law founded on it, in the last session, I have reconsidered the subject, and now communicate the result.

By the report of the committee, which it was understood was adopted by the House, it was decided that his accounts and claims should be settled on the four following principles:

First. That interest should be allowed him on all moneys advanced by him for the public, from the time of the advance to that of his being reimbursed.

Second. That a reasonable commission should be allowed him on all moneys disbursed by him during the late war.

Third. That an indemnity should be allowed for all losses which he had sustained by the failure of the Government to fulfil its engagements to send him money, or Treasury notes, within the time specified, to be deposited in certain banks, as collateral security, for loans procured by him, at the request, and on account of, the Government.

Fourth. That he should not be held responsible for losses incurred by the frauds and failures of sub-agents, to whom moneys were advanced through his hands.

On the first: That of interest on his advances for the public, I have allowed him $14,438 68. This allowance is made on advances admitted by the accounting department, and on the declaration of Mr. Tompkins that the remittances made to him, after his advances, and previous to the 24th of December, 1814, when a very large sum was remitted to him, were applied to public purposes, and not to the reimbursement of his advances.

On the second head: That of a reasonable commission for his disbursements, during the late war, I have allowed him five per cent. on the whole sum disbursed by him, amounting to ninety-two thousand two hundred and thirteen dollars, thirteen cents. I have made him this extra allowance in consideration of the aid which he afforded to the Government at that important epoch, in obtaining the loan of a considerable part of the sums thus disbursed.

On the third head: That of an indemnity for losses sustained by him, in consequence of the failure of the Government to fulfil its engagements to send him money or Treasury notes within the time specified, I have allowed him $4,411 25, being the amount of the loss sustained on the sale of the Treasury notes, for which he was responsible.

On the fourth head: That of losses sustained by him by any frauds or failures of sub-agents, none such having been shown, no allowance whatever has been made to him.

From the amount thus allowed to Mr. Tompkins, after deducting the sum paid him, under the act of the present session, and the moneys charged to his account, there will remain a balance due him, of $60,238 46, as appears by the sketch herewith communicated.

In making a final decision on Mr. Tompkins's claims, a question arises, shall interest be allowed him on the amount of the commission on his disbursements? The law of the last session grants to the President a power to allow interest on moneys advanced by him to the public, but does not authorize it on the commission to be allowed on his disbursements. To make such allowance belongs exclusively to Congress. Had his claims been settled at the end of the last war, on the principles established by the law of the last session, a commission on disbursements would then have been allowed him. This consideration operates with great force in favor of the allowance of interest on that commission, at this time, which I recommend to Congress.

I think proper to add that the official relation which I bore to Governor Tompkins, at that very interesting epoch, under the highly distinguished and meritorious citizen under whom we both served, enabling me to feel very sensibly the value of his services, excites a strong interest in his favor, which I deem it not improper to express.

JAMES MONROE.

APRIL 28, 1824.

The Message and document were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

And then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 29.

Mr. SCOTT, by leave of the House, presented a representation and memorial of the Bank of Missouri, by Thomas F. Riddick, its agent, in relation to its transactions with the Treasury Department of the United States, and praying that the Secretary of the Treasury may be directed to settle the claims of the said bank, upon the principles of equity.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GAZLAY submitted a joint resolution, for the appointment of a trustee on behalf of the United States, to carry into execution an act of Congress of 3d March, 1803, relative to a township of land in the State of Ohio, reserved for an academy in the grant of John Cleves Symmes; which said resolution was read twice, and ordered to be laid upon the table.

The resolution of Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, calling on the President of the United States for certain information respecting fortifications, was, on motion of Mr. COCKE, taken up and considered.

Mr. COCKE offered an amendment to strike out the word "established," [by the Board of Engineers,] and insert the word "recommended," which was agreed to.

At the motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the word "government" was stricken out, and the word "President" inserted in its stead.

The question being on adopting the resolution, as amended; some debate arose, in which Messrs. COOK, LITTLE, and FOOT, took part.

Mr. POINSETT offered an amendment to qualify the call for information, by a clause which limits it to such only as may be communicated without injury to the public defence.

Mr. CONDUCT moved that the resolution be farther modified by adding to it a clause in these words: "so far as the same has not heretofore been communicated." This amendment was not agreed to, and, on motion of Mr. LITTLE, the resolution was laid on the table.

The following engrossed bills of a private nature, which were yesterday ordered to a third reading, were this day read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence, viz:

A bill for the relief of Hugh McCulloch;
For the relief of Robert Strain;

For the relief of John S. Moffett;
For the benefit of the Columbian Institute;
For the relief of Judah Alden;
For the relief of Henry Lightner;
For the relief of George Fisher;
For the relief of Landie Richardson;
For the relief of David Cooper;
For the relief of Peter Yandes;
For the relief of David Beard;
For the relief of Thomas S. Ogden and others;
For the relief of Mary H. Hawkins;
For the relief of Solomon Sibley;
For the relief of J. M. C. Montgomery;
For the relief of Frederick Perley;
For the relief of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and others;

On the passage of this bill, Mr. McARTHUR called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. Farther documents were read, and Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, chairman of the Committee of Claims, spoke in favor of the passage of the bill. The question on its passage was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 82, nays 79. So the bill was passed.

The following bills, of a private nature, were then considered in Committee of the Whole, reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading, viz:

A bill for the relief of Morris Goldsmith and Anthony Roderick;

A bill for the relief of Robert Blean;

A bill supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington;

On this bill some discussion arose between Messrs. KENT, NEALE, LITTLE, CULPEPER, and ALEXANDER, of Virginia.

Mr. ALEXANDER offered an amendment:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Board of Aldermen and Board of Common Council, in joint meeting, shall have power to judge of the legality of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of the Mayor, and to order new elections when they may deem the same necessary. And, in cases where a new election may be ordered, the Mayor for the preceding term shall continue to act as such, until a Mayor shall be elected and qualified. And, if the Mayor for the preceding term shall be incapable, or shall refuse or neglect to serve as such, then the two Boards, in joint meeting, may elect a person as Mayor until a Mayor shall be elected and qualified as aforesaid. And, in case the Mayor shall, at any time, become incapable of acting as such, by reason of absence, sickness, or disability, the two Boards may elect a Mayor, to act until such incapacity or disability shall be removed."

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, noes 67.

The bill being reported to the House, Mr. LITTLE offered the foregoing amendment.

On this amendment, the debate was renewed by Messrs. LITTLE, CULPEPER, NEALE, COOK, TRACY, and TAYLOR; and the question being taken, it was rejected.

A bill for the relief of Jacob Slough;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Fry and Spalding;

H. or B.

A bill for the relief of Samuel Cleaveland ;
 A bill to compensate William Cocke for certain military services rendered the United States during the late war ;

[This bill was amended by a section allowing to John T. Johnson, aid of General Harrison in the late war, the pay of a captain, together with the emoluments usually allowed to the aids of generals in the militia service.]

A bill for the relief of Dean Weymouth ;

For the relief of John Mitchell ;

For the relief of John Topp ;

For the relief of Archibald Clark ;

For the relief of Benjamin King ;

For the relief of Maturin Guichot, (with an amendment ;)

For the relief of Joseph Firman and others, (with an amendment ;)

For the relief of James, Jehu, and Nathaniel Brooks, and the legal representatives of either of them ;

For the relief of John K. Carter.

Also, the following bills from the Senate :

For the relief of Joseph Wood, of Ohio ;

For the relief of Josiah Hook, jun.

This bill gave rise to much debate. A motion was made to lay it on the table, and negatived. Many documents were read. A motion was made to postpone indefinitely, and, after extended argument, in which Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, LONGFELLOW, McCoy, WEBSTER, and WHITLSEY, took part, the indefinite postponement was negatived by a large majority, and the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading, as also was the one preceding it.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill "making appropriations for deepening the channel leading into the harbor of Presque Isle, and for repairing Plymouth beach ;" which was twice read and committed.

Mr. McCoy, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill "for the relief of Edward and Owen Evans ;" which was twice read and committed.

And then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 30.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act of Congress, passed on the 13th day of June, 1812, entitled 'An act making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri,'" reported the same with amendments ; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LITTLE from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," made a report ; and the amendment was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Edward Barnard, administrator on the estate, &c., of John B. Fanning, deceased, late a purser in the Navy of the United States, accompanied by a bill ; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of Robert Brotherton ; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHIPPLE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of the registers and receivers of public money of the several land offices ; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. TATTNALL, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into and report, at the next session of Congress the extent to which it is expedient to adopt the system of defence, proposed in the several reports of the board of engineers, for the defence of the maritime frontier of this country ; the amount which it is estimated the works in contemplation, approved of by the committee, may cost, specifying the location and estimated cost of each particular work ; and also, the amount which it may be proper and expedient to appropriate annually for gradually effecting the above contemplated plan of defence.

The House proceeded to consider the bill to authorize the issuing a register to the brig William, of New York, and the said bill being amended, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Hook, junior," was read the third time, and, being on its passage, it was ordered that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. WARFIELD offered the following :

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, (so far as the said act extends to the District of Columbia,) passed in the year 1785, entitled "An act ascertaining what shall be recovered on protested bills of exchange ; and to repeal an act of Assembly therein mentioned."

Mr. BUCHANAN called on the mover for an explanation, which was given at length by Mr. WARFIELD ; and the resolution was agreed to.

The following engrossed bills, viz :

A bill for the relief of Morris Goldsmith and Anthony Roderick ;

A bill for the relief of Robert Blean ;

A bill for the relief of Jacob Slough ;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Fry & Spalding ;

A bill for the relief of Samuel Cleveland, jun. ;

A bill for the relief of Dean Weymouth ;

A bill for the relief of John Mitchell ;

A bill to compensate William Cocke for certain military services rendered the United States during the late war, and for the relief of John T. Johnson ;

A bill for the relief of John Topp ;

A bill for the relief of Archibald Clark ;

A bill for the relief of Benjamin King ;

MAY, 1824.

A bill for the relief of Maturin Guichot ;
 A bill for the relief of Joseph Firman, and others ;
 A bill for the relief of James, Jehu, and Nathaniel Brooks, and the legal representatives of either of them ;

A bill for the relief of John K. Carter ; were, respectively, read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill for the relief of Jacques Myotte, Francois Charpentrie, and James B. Laducier, having been read, Mr. VINTON, of Ohio, moved for its indefinite postponement, on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence of the petitioner's having performed military services in Illinois. Mr. COOK replied, and advocated, at length, the equity of the claim. Mr. RANKIN strongly doubted, and thought the presumption, from the circumstances of the case, was against the claim. Mr. COOK farther defended its justice, in a speech of considerable length—to which Mr. RANKIN rejoined, and the debate was farther continued by Messrs. COOK, VANCE, of Ohio, FORSYTH, and WHIPPLE :

And the question being taken on Mr. VINTON'S motion, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 86, noes 45.

So the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The engrossed bill "supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington ;" and the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Joseph Wood, of Ohio ;" were read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

Mr. TUCKER moved to take up the report of the Committee on the claim of the heirs of Beaumarchais ; which was agreed to—ayes 63, noes 52 ; and the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BASSETT in the Chair,) on the report. Mr. T., having commenced a detailed statement of the circumstances of the claim, and made some progress, the Committee rose, on motion of Mr. CLAY, with an understanding that this subject shall be taken up on Monday next.

The following bills, viz :

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Joseph C. Boyd ;

A bill for the relief of Celestin Moreau, of Louisiana ;

A bill rewarding the officers and crew of two gigs, or small boats, under the command of Lieut. Francis H. Gregory, of the United States Navy ;

A bill for the relief of Hanson Kelly ;
 severally passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to a third reading.

Mr. A. STEVENSON, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, in relation to the accounts of Daniel D. Tompkins, reported a bill, (in blank,) "making appropriation for the payment of the amount adjudged to be due to him ;" which was twice read and referred.

Mr. A. STEVENSON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill "authorizing the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of taxes ;" which was twice read, and ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. F. JOHNSON gave notice, that on Tuesday next he should move the House to take up the bill "to reduce one of the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department."

The bill from the Senate, for the relief of James Johnson, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to a third reading.

The bill from the Senate, "for the relief of the legal representatives of Andrew Mitchell, deceased," was taken up.

On a motion of Mr. COOKE, indefinitely to postpone this bill, (which is for the remission of duties on a still, not worked while its owner was a volunteer officer in the late war,) a considerable debate arose ; in which Messrs. COOKE, McCoy, BROWN, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, BUCHANAN, WARFIELD, LIVERMORE, and WHIPPLE, took part. And the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 61, noes 65 ; and the bill was then ordered to a third reading—ayes 67, noes 54.

The following bills from the Senate, viz :

A bill for the relief of Napier, Rapelye, and Bennett, of Charleston, South Carolina ;

A bill for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine ;

A bill for the relief of Dean Weymouth, (with an amendment, including two other invalid soldiers in the increase of pension given by the bill ;)—

Were, respectively, considered in Committee of the Whole, and, having been reported to the House, were ordered to a third reading.

A bill for the relief of Sarah Venable and Jane Morgan, was amended in Committee of the Whole, and, having been reported to the House, was laid on the table ; and then the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 1.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of Elisha Snow, junior ; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was recommitted the bill for the relief of George Harlin, reported the same without amendment ; it was then ordered that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The following engrossed bills, viz :

A bill to authorize the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of taxes ;

A bill to authorize the issuing of a register to the brig William, of New York ;

A bill for the relief of the administrator of John B. Fanning, deceased, late a purser in the Navy of the United States ;

A bill for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel, of Philadelphia;

A bill enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church, Washington Parish;

Also, the following engrossed bills, viz:

A bill for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner;

A bill for the relief of J. Otremaire;

A bill for the relief of Edward Evans;

A bill for the relief of Robert Brotherton; and

The bill from the Senate for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Benjamin Lincoln, David Humphreys, and Silas Griffin, were respectively considered in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading.

And the House adjourned.

MONDAY, May 3.

The SPEAKER laid before the House an attested copy of a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, "approving of the declaration of the President of the United States in favor of the cause of liberty in the Western hemisphere;" which resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt," made a detailed report thereon, recommending that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was recommended the bill confirming to the heirs and legal representatives of the late Don Miguel Esclava sundry claims to land in the city and county of Mobile, in the State of Alabama, reported the same with an amendment; which was read and agreed to; and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to certain acts of the State of Alabama," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of William Kellog, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill to authorize the issuing of a register for the schooner Five Sisters; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, on Wednesday next.

The following engrossed bills, viz:

A bill for the relief of Robert Brotherton;

A bill for the relief of Edward Evans;

A bill for the relief of J. Otremaire;

were severally read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The following bills from the Senate, viz:

A bill for the relief of Charles Gwynn, of Baltimore;

A bill for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel, of Philadelphia;

A bill for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner;

A bill for enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church, Washington parish;

A bill for the benefit of Alfred Moore and Sterling Organ, assignees of Morris Linsey;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Firmin Le Sieur;

A bill for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew, as amended;

A bill for the relief of Amasa Stetson, as amended;

A bill for the relief of Captain Thomas Staniford; were severally read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from THOMAS J. ROGERS, resigning his seat as a member of this House, from the State of Pennsylvania; which was laid on the table; and it was ordered that the Governor of Pennsylvania be informed of the vacancy occasioned by this resignation.

CLAIM OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, from the Military Committee, to which was referred the

H. OF R.

Claim of Massachusetts.

MAY, 1824.

Message of the President of the United States on the claim of Massachusetts for services rendered by the militia of that State during the late war with Great Britain, made a report, accompanied by a bill "to authorize the settlement and payment of the claims of the State of Massachusetts for certain services rendered during the late war." The following is a copy of the report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the Message of the President of the United States, "on the claim of Massachusetts for services rendered by the militia of that State during the late war with Great Britain," beg leave most respectfully to report:

That, in considering the subject submitted to their investigation, they have been fully impressed with its intrinsic importance, and its association with events which were once the occasion of much sensibility and excitement. They trust, however, that they have approached the discussion, devoid of all prejudice, with an honest desire, in doing justice, to sustain those great principles of concord and power, which are essential to the durability of this Union.

Your committee deem it entirely unnecessary that they should recite all the circumstances comprising a history of this claim, as they are generally known to the nation, and are to be found in an authentic shape, in the documents accompanying the President's Message. To this source your committee would ask a special reference.

It will be sufficient for present purposes to premise, that a large portion of the claim of Massachusetts does not appear to be affected by those Constitutional difficulties which so long, in the consideration of the Executive of the United States, operated as an impediment to its adjustment.

Your committee are unanimously of opinion that the services rendered by the militia of Massachusetts, which may be considered beyond all exception, and as entitled to remuneration, are comprised in a class of cases in which, by the spontaneous impulse of the militia, with or without the sanction of the Executive of that State, or with or without a requisition on the part of the officer of the United States commanding the department, they assembled, either for the purpose of repelling actual invasion, or under a well founded apprehension of invasion. It is, in fact, on this principle, and on this principle only, that the claims for militia services of the various States have been audited and allowed at the Department of War. Services of this description, patriotically performed, ought not to be prejudiced by a pre-existing difference of opinion between the Executive of Massachusetts and the commanding officer of the United States forces, as to an abstract construction of the Constitution, when such a difference of opinion appears to have had no sort of effect on the extent and character of the services afforded. But, on the other hand, your committee are equally unanimous in declaring that, in all cases where the acts of the Executive of Massachusetts gave a direction to the services of the militia of that State, in opposition to the views of the General Government, the claim for such services is altogether inadmissible; for these, the government of Massachusetts may be considered to have incurred an ulterior and exclusive responsibility to her own people.

Your committee waive the discussion of the question how far the renunciation, on the part of the Executive and Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, of the unconstitutional principles on which the then Governor of that State acted, in the early stages of the war, is necessary to the allowance of any portion of the claims of the State for the services in question. These claims, when first presented for adjustment, immediately after the late war, were considered rather in the mass, than in reference to the particular items of which they are composed. In fact, at that early period, the principles on which the claims for militia services ought to be audited and allowed, were but imperfectly fixed. The subsequent presentation and examination of the claims of the several States, for such services, have shed much light on this subject, and have afforded many advantages at the present moment in examining those of Massachusetts. Distinctions, important to the elucidation of principles, and to the ascertainment of justice, have been taken, and sustained, which might naturally have been overlooked at the commencement of the discussion.

Your committee, however, cannot abstain from indulging in one remark, that, if the fact of the Government of Massachusetts having declined, for some years subsequent to the late war, to renounce the unconstitutional doctrines of her then Executive, as developed in the opinions of the judges of her supreme judicial court, can be supposed ever to have borne upon that portion of the claim which the committee have recommended for payment, the recent disavowal of her present Executive and Legislature furnishes at least a belief that all danger of a future collision between the General Government and the States, in reference to the authority of the former over the militia of the latter, has been permanently removed. In this light, the committee cannot but regard the renunciation as honorable to the Chief Magistrate and Legislature of Massachusetts, and as highly useful in fixing the true interpretation of the Constitution, on an interesting and important point. This disavowal, in consonance, as it is affirmed, with the sentiment of the great mass of the people of Massachusetts, is, indeed, a reiteration of the language which was expressed by the Senate of that State, as early as October, 1812, at the moment when the unfortunate irritation between the National and State functionaries was most exasperated, and when remuneration for these services formed neither a subject of calculation or desire.

Your committee, in conclusion, recommend that, in all cases where the militia of the State of Massachusetts were called out in conformity with the desire of an officer of the General Government, or to repel actual invasion, or under a well-founded apprehension of invasion, during the late war, the claim of the State for such militia services be allowed, under the usual rules of auditing and allowing similar claims; provided the number of troops so called out were not in undue proportion to the exigency.

Your committee likewise recommend that the claims of Massachusetts, not comprehended in the above description of cases, be disallowed. And, in conformity with the foregoing principles, ask leave to report a bill.

Mr. HAMILTON moved to refer this report to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, objected to this course, as giving undue preference to this over other business. He wished it to be referred in the usual course of business, for the purpose of discussion, simply to a Committee of the Whole.

MAY, 1824.

Proposed Adjournment.—Occupying Claimant Laws.

H. OF R.

Mr. HAMILTON urged the importance of this claim, as claiming from them urgent consideration. The course which he now proposed had been pursued in regard to certain claims of the State of Georgia, and he thought the claims now reported upon were at least equally entitled to attention from the House. The misrepresentation in some cases, and misunderstanding in others, under which this claim labored, rendered it highly expedient that it should have a prompt examination, when he had no doubt of being able to satisfy the House of the expediency of providing for its liquidation, &c.

Mr. COBB said he did not mean to utter a single word in opposition to the justice of this claim. It was very probable the gentleman from South Carolina might be able to convince even incredulity itself on the subject. My only objection to the proposed reference is, said Mr. C., that there is no resemblance between this case and that of the Georgia militia claims, to which, I presume, the gentleman refers; but, if there were, that the subject of those claims of Georgia is before an ordinary committee, and not a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I am willing to give this claim the same direction as they have received.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that, with regard to the Georgia militia claim he knew it had taken that direction. The claim of Georgia to which he alluded, however, was that last reported upon, respecting the Indian reservations within the limits of that State.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. HAMILTON, and decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the report was then referred to a Committee of the Whole.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the joint committee appointed to consider the subject of the day for terminating the present session of Congress, reported an amendment to the resolution from the Senate on that subject, proposing to substitute the nineteenth day of May for the day proposed by the Senate:

The question being on agreeing to the amendment thus reported—

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, professed himself, for one, to be unprepared to vote upon this question now, for want of the means of ascertaining what time would be required for the completion of all the necessary business before the House. Advertising to the committee appointed on Mr. Edwards's address, he remarked, that, although he should be as unwilling to institute such an investigation as any member of the House, yet, having constituted a committee for that investigation, he was, for one, unwilling to terminate the session, until it was completed. Until, therefore, he could know when that investigation would end, he could not give his consent to any proposition fixing a day for the adjournment. We shall probably have satisfactory information on this subject within a few days, and to give the House time to receive it, he would move that the report of this committee should lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR said, if the gentleman had intended to address an inquiry to him as to the time at which the committee of investigation might be able to report, he could only answer, that he had no information to communicate to the House on that point, except that the committee in question were actively engaged in the discharge of their duty. The joint committee had confined their inquiry and report to the legislative business before the House.

Mr. McLANE here rose, and said he had not intended to direct an inquiry to the gentleman as a member of the committee of investigation—he did not think it would have been proper to do so. Believing, however, that this House ought not to fix on a day of adjournment before it finishes its proper business, he moved to lay the report on the table.

Mr. STEVENSON wished to have it postponed to a day certain, and named Monday next, to which Mr. McLANE assented. Mr. BASSETT, however, renewed the motion to lay the report upon the table.

On this question, which admits of no debate, Mr. ALLEN required the yeas and nays, which were ordered and taken accordingly. There were for the motion, 101; against it, 78.

So the report was ordered to lie on the table.

OCCUPYING CLAIMANT LAWS, &c.

On motion of Mr. LETCHER, of Kentucky, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr DWIGHT in the Chair, on the remonstrance addressed to the Congress of the United States, by the State of Kentucky, on the subject of the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Green vs. Biddle, involving the constitutionality of the occupying claimant laws of Kentucky, as they are usually called.

Mr. LETCHER then submitted a proposition, in the following words:

“Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, requiring, in any cause decided in the Supreme Court, in which shall be drawn in question the validity of any part of the constitution of a State, or of any act passed by the Legislature of a State, that — justices shall concur in pronouncing such part of the said constitution or act to be invalid; and that, without the concurrence of that number of said justices, the part of the constitution, or act of the Legislature, as the case may be, so drawn in question, shall not be deemed, or holden, invalid.

“Resolved, That the justices aforesaid, in pronouncing their judgment in any such cause, as aforesaid, ought to be required, by law, to give their opinions, with their respective reasons therefor, separately and distinctly, if the judgment of the Court be against the validity of the part of the constitution or act drawn in question, as aforesaid.

“Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill in conformity to the preceding resolutions.”

Mr. LETCHER observed that, in the much celebrated and never to be forgotten case of Green vs. Biddle, the judgment pronounced and the principles decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, had given great alarm to the people of Kentucky. As that was a case which bore upon the present question, and which, indeed, had immediately led to the resolutions and memorial now before the committee, it might not be irrelevant for him to take a very brief review of it.

He did not intend, he said, to make a tedious law argument; he would, however, suggest, in the threshold, if any gentleman, from Virginia or elsewhere, felt the slightest wish to attempt to maintain that decision as correct, upon any of the well-settled doctrines of the law, without wishing to be understood as using language of a gasconading character, he would say, the limited delegation from Kentucky were ready, at any time, and before any tribunal, to meet them.

In the year 1789, Kentucky, then an integral part of Virginia, and being desirous of becoming an independent State of the Federal Union, entered into a compact with Virginia, with a view to a separation for that end. It consisted of eight articles; one of which was drawn into dispute in the case to which he had alluded; and the decision of the Supreme Court upon it, had virtually declared that Kentucky, although nominally a sovereign and free State, has, nevertheless, no legislative jurisdiction over her own soil. She is a sovereign State; but yet has no power to pass any law for the aid, the convenience, the comfort, and the protection, of her own citizens. This decision, the people of Kentucky had viewed as a most ruinous and extraordinary one; and it is only because they have entertained the liveliest hope that the case still admits of some remedy, that a greater excitement has not prevailed.

But what, said Mr. L., are the laws of Kentucky, which that decision has pronounced a violation of the compact, and therefore unconstitutional? and what were the circumstances under which they were enacted? The first act of the Kentucky Legislature passed in the year 1797, the second in 1812. Each had for its object, in case of his eviction, by a paramount title, to secure to the occupant, who had settled upon the land in good faith, believing it to be his own, and who had made valuable improvements upon the same, a reasonable compensation for those improvements.

The necessity of these several laws grew out of the condition of the country. The early settlers of the State had to contend with the most complicated and appalling difficulties. They had not only to encounter every species of toil, of peril, and of suffering, incident to the settlement of an unexplored wilderness, but they had to struggle with a formidable and savage foe, in a war of ten years' duration. When, sir, they had conquered this enemy, and in some small degree begun to enjoy the fruits of their efforts, innumerable claims were set up to the land, which they had first conquered and then defended; claims which grew out of the mistaken policy, not of Kentucky, but Virginia. That policy had literally covered the country over and over again with a great variety of conflicting claims. These adverse claims necessarily occasioned, to the first settlers, the great distress, and trouble, and litigation. The early adventurer to the country, who had experienced every sort of privation, was very illy requited for his boldness, his industry, and his enterprise. Just after he had been able to obtain a good tract of land, to build houses, to clear fields, with the most flattering prospects before him of providing for a dependent family; at the moment he was prepared for the enjoyment of quiet and repose, suddenly he found himself expelled from the possession of the very farm he had been laboring to improve; with nothing left him, but the privilege of buying and improving another place, and again losing it at law, without the most distant hope of compensation for his labor thus employed upon it. Such was the melancholy condition of the first settlers in Kentucky. This state of things brought about the injurious practice of buying and selling every sort of land claim, some real, others fictitious; of alarming the ignorant and illiterate; of extorting money for a compromise; of swindling, in all its various moods and tenses—in short, sir, of creating a system of speculation, of fraud, and oppression, from the effects of which we shall never, I fear, be able, to get entirely rid. The existence of such afflicting evils required a speedy remedy; that remedy was the immediate passage of the law of 1797. It was a just and beneficent law, imperiously called for by existing circumstances, demanded by every consideration of justice, and most salutary in its operation. It is a duty, said Mr. L. which every Government owes to each and all its citizens, to furnish every means in its power to diffuse among them happiness, contentment, and equal rights—to reward industry, by protecting every one in the free enjoyment of the benefits of his own labor, and to prevent the cunning and the idle part of the community from fattening upon the proceeds of their neighbors' hard earnings. The Legislature of Kentucky, therefore, in the enactment of those laws, acted correctly, if they were not already precluded from the rights of legislation over the soil of the State, by the terms of the compact. Now, what are the provisions of this compact, which bear upon this question, and which, in the opinion of the court, amount to a consent upon the part of Kentucky never to exercise legislative rights in connexion with her freehold?

The third article, to which the court refers, in exclusion of the residue, to maintain the correctness of their opinion, is in the following words: "That all private rights and interests of lands within the said district, derived from the laws of Virginia, prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure, under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in this State."

To understand correctly the meaning of the words expressed in the foregoing provision, by the contracting parties, it becomes important to look to the relative condition of each, and to ascertain the contemplated object of the contract. Kentucky, unprotected and unaided, had experienced all the fortunes and all the horrors of an Indian war. She had waded through her troubles, had been weighed in the balance, and not found wanting; had borne down every opposing obstacle, and proved herself worthy of enjoying all the blessings, the privileges, and immunities, of a free and sovereign State. She petitioned Virginia to aid her in obtaining them. Virginia was ready, willing, and anxious to render her every facility. All the feelings of Virginia towards her were of the most partial and benevolent character; she felt as a parent to a child. Indeed, there existed mutual affection; each understood well the situation of the other. In this state of things, they made the compact. The object was—what? Why, to enable Kentucky to set up for herself; to confer upon her the right of enacting laws to suit her condition; to adopt such regulations as were most conducive to her own interest, and to superintend her own internal affairs in a manner most agreeable to her own will, free from any and every control of the mother country.

Occupying Claimant Laws, &c.

How, then, are you to interpret the words of the stipulation just referred to? The first and best rule is, to use as much common sense as you can well employ, in giving a construction to any contract, and to lay aside the doctrine of "construction construed;" to crowd in as few artificial, unmeaning distinctions, as possible; and to endeavor to ascertain the fair meaning of the parties, as expressed by the words of the contract.

"That private rights and interests, &c., derived from the laws of Virginia, &c., shall remain valid and secure," &c. What was the nature of those private rights here agreed to be made secure? They were rights and interests of an imperfect character, such as surveys, warrants, entries, &c., which were preparatory to obtaining a grant or patent from the Government; not absolute rights, which had been made complete by the emanation of grants; for this obvious reason: the latter class required no agreement to make them valid and secure; they were already as much so as they could be, even with the strongest provisions—they were vested rights. It would, therefore, be at once saying that neither of the parties to the aforesaid instrument understood what they were doing, to suppose they would have engaged in a serious negotiation to guard against an evil which could not happen. "Rights derived from the laws of Virginia," &c. The term "laws of Virginia," as here used, as understood by both parties, as understood in common usage, meant nothing more nor less than the statute laws of Virginia, as contradistinguished from the statute and common laws of England—the acts of the Virginia Assembly, which had from time to time been enacted, creating rights of various kinds, such as poor rights, settlement and pre-emption rights, village rights, military rights, &c. Under these Virginia statutes, many of the citizens of Virginia had become interested, to a considerable extent, in inchoate rights to lands in Kentucky, which grew out of this course of legislation. Virginia, therefore, felt anxious (and very justly too) to make a provision of this kind, to enable those who had, under the several acts aforesaid, vested capital in the purchase of these lands, and whose rights were incomplete, to have them made secure; and Kentucky, willing also that Virginia should act a faithful part towards her own citizens, agreed to the aforesaid article; the meaning of which is, that she, (Kentucky,) on her part, would pass no law which would destroy those inchoate, equitable rights, created by the State of Virginia; that she would present no obstacles in the way to prevent their ultimate perfection. Sir, the term "laws of Virginia," is still understood in Kentucky, and Virginia also, up to the present period, in legal as well as common style, to apply distinctly and exclusively to the Virginia code of laws, without the slightest connexion with or dependence upon the common law of England. The parties, therefore, who draughted this compact, never once thought of including the common law. If such had been their object, it was very easy, by the use of a single expression, to have made a declaration to that effect. But the principles of the common law could not very well apply to the situation of the country. To prove, however, that the interpretation given by the court of the clause to which I have alluded is wholly erroneous; we have but to look a little further into this compact, and examine for a moment the fourth stipulation. What does it declare?

"That the lands within the proposed State, of non-resident proprietors, shall not in any case be taxed higher than the lands of residents, at any time prior to the admission of the proposed State to a vote, by its delegates in Congress, when such non-residents reside out of the United States; nor at any time, either before or after such admission, where such non-residents reside within this commonwealth, within which this stipulation shall be reciprocal; or where such non-residents reside within any other of the United States, which shall declare the same to be reciprocal within its limits; nor shall a neglect of cultivation or improvement of any land within either the proposed State or this Commonwealth, belonging to non-residents, citizens of the other, subject such non-residents to forfeiture, or other penalty, within the term of six years, after the admission of the said State into the Federal Union."

The second rule of construing a contract, (if not already laid down by legal writers, ought to be,) is, to examine the whole of it; to see if all the parts will harmonize, and to look into the consequences, which will of necessity result by this or that mode of construction; and to ascertain, by such and such interpretation, whether the object of the contractors is or is not defeated. This second rule has been entirely overlooked by the court in pronouncing their decision; the fourth article makes no sort of figure whatever in the opinion delivered; and, by construction, one might presume they did not see it. It is however, very clearly expressed by this clause of the contract, that Kentucky, after the expiration of six years, for a failure upon the part of non-residents to cultivate or improve any of the land within her boundary, belonging to them, might properly and justly subject such lands to forfeiture, or might affix any other penalty she, in her sound discretion, should think fit.

Now, sir, a question necessarily presents itself, not for the consideration of the Supreme Court, for they have made their final decision—Are those occupant laws as rigid, as severe, as hard, in their operation against non-residents, as a law creating forfeiture of land, in pursuance of the power unquestionably given to Kentucky, in the foregoing clause? Surely not. Kentucky, then, for adopting the measures which she has done to protect her citizens, has manifested a greater forbearance in relation to non-residents than the court has given her credit for. She has refused to extend her powers of legislation, so as at once to put an end to all controversies, with which she has been so much oppressed.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. L., the construction given by the court to the third article of the compact is wholly inconsistent with the stipulations contained in the fourth. It renders the latter null and void. It defeats the very object and purpose which each of the contracting parties had in view. It confers all the benefits of the agreement upon one side, without any corresponding advantage on the other; one party gets all, the other nothing. Such was not the wish and understanding of those who formed the agreement. In a few years after its date, the first occupant law, it will be seen, was adopted by Kentucky. Her course of policy was not a matter of secrecy; Virginia was apprized of it, and fully acquiesced in its justice. No murmuring or complaining is heard of. Had then the course of legislation upon the part of Kentucky have been so highly unjust—so entirely in opposition to her agreement—is it not fair to presume, when the whole subject was fresh in the recollection of all, that some dissatisfaction would have displayed itself? No official communication, however, is sent to Kentucky, alleging a breach of faith. Again, in confirmation of the right to pass these several laws, we have a long course of legal decision, by the inferior and appellate courts, for the last twenty-five years; by judges, too, whose firmness, intelligence, and legal acquirements, are in no manner lessened in consequence of the Supreme Court's declaration, in this same opinion, that the Kentucky courts may have made such and such decisions, but they had never seen them. These judges, whose decisions are treated so cavalierly, sir, (it might be said in strict truth) would not fear a comparison of legal skill, even with their Supreme Honors. We have, sir, in support of our laws, our Legislature, our lawyers, our judges. Indeed, more—we have the disinterested and concurrent testimony of other gentlemen, not citizens of the West, high, very high, in legal reputation, who are practitioners before the same court, most decidedly upon our side of the question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, look for one moment to the effects and consequences of the construction contended for by the court. Kentucky comes into the Union—how? Possessed of equal rights and privileges with the other sovereign States? No; a mere appendage; in no better situation than when a district, without the ability of regulating her own internal concerns. Her expectation was to be ranked among her sister States as an equal. But, how wofully has she been disappointed! Now, she is told, for the first time, she surrendered and relinquished all pretensions of that sort long since. Construction brings about all this. Yes, construction! Its mighty powers are irresistible; it bears down every thing before it; it creates new principles; it infuses the spirit of the common law into a contract, against the will of both parties; it destroys laws long since established; and it is daily acquiring new strength. From this case, and others to which reference might be made, the result is plain, that, unless some regulation is made, and some necessary and salutary restraints are adopted, the Supreme Court, by its extensive jurisdiction, as it now exists, will finally draw into its vortex all State authorities.

My proposition, Mr. Chairman, is not of a mere theoretic and speculative character. It introduces no new and dangerous principle. If you desire to amend your Constitution, it cannot be done unless by a concurrence of two-thirds of all the States. If, upon the passage of any bill upon your table, the President of the United States chooses, in the exercise of his Constitutional privilege, to put his veto upon it, what is the result? It is returned with the objections, and cannot be incorporated into your statute book, as a law, without a majority of two-thirds of both Houses concur in declaring it shall be. But a minority of your Judiciary, upon the most solemn and important questions, involving the rights, the interests, and prosperity, of a whole community, can so expound laws and constitutions, as to prostrate all State rights! This, sir, most certainly is an evil which may be remedied by judicious and prudent legislation. It is an evil which is growing rapidly, and which, if not checked, will produce very serious discontent.

Sir, said Mr. L., the resolutions which I have the honor of presenting for the consideration of this Committee, cannot, I apprehend, endanger the dignity or importance of the judges. Their firmness will not be weakened; their intelligence will not be affected; their reputation will not be impaired by their passage. I would agree to no proposition which had for its object such results. It is indispensably necessary, in every well regulated Government, to have the most enlightened judiciary, prepared at all times to do their duty, without fear, favor, or affection. A timid, time-serving court, in any country, is worse than a nuisance. But, sir, in legislating upon this subject, let it not be forgotten that judges, at last, are but men; perfection and infallibility are properties which do not attach to them. Let us, therefore, increase the chances of a correct decision upon such occasions as are embraced by the resolutions, by requiring five to concur.

Mr. Chairman, how does the matter stand, according to the present state of facts? You have now seven Judges upon the Supreme Bench; four constitute a quorum. Say three are absent, upon some Constitutional question which comes before that tribunal, vitally important. The arguments are heard; three concur in declaring the law unconstitutional—one dissents. The judgment of the court below is reversed. A decision is obtained in this way by a minority. One of the judges writes his opinion, and two hear it read, perhaps, say agreed, as we often do; in this House, without knowing the question—more for the sake of form than substance. Their decision goes out, is published, and is received by the State courts, as binding authority. Suppose, at the next term, all the judges are present—a similar question is again before the court; the absentees concur with the one judge who dissented upon the former occasion. What, then, is the consequence? You have two contradictory decisions in relation to the same subject matter—both sent out as a sound exposition of Constitutional law, as precedents for the country. One decision determines A shall have this property; another declares B, whose cause was precisely such a one as A's, shall not recover in his case. Thus stood the cause from Kentucky; four judges present—three concurred in believing the laws involved in the controversy were against that clause of the Constitution of the United States, which declares, among other things, that no law, impairing the obligation of a contract, shall be passed. One dissented. Try the weight of intellectual authorities pro and con; put them in the scales—which will preponderate? The judge who dissents, most assuredly is at least equal to one of the three who concurs in the decision. There are then two left in the balance. I will not stop to inquire whether they were likely to understand the kind of case submitted to their consideration, involving intricate doctrines, in relation to a species of land titles with which they were in nowise very familiar. Let it be conceded, for the sake of argument, that they deserve to be ranked amongst the most enlightened jurists of the country—you cannot, however, make more than two upon that side of the question. Look to the opposite scale—and what have we? The Legislature of a whole State, year after year, have asserted, in the most unqualified manner, their Constitutional right to enact these laws. They so decided, upon mature deliberation, not influenced by excitement. All the judges of all the courts have, by a long course of decision, without exception, maintained the same power; they have done so, after having repeatedly given to the subject the fullest investigation. Two Judges of the Supreme Court, strangers, in every sense of the word, to the subject, have asserted no such right existed. Upon whose decision would you place most reliance? Which is entitled to the greatest share of confidence—that of the two, or the collected wisdom of a whole State, both of the political and the legal kind? Which, under all the circumstances, is most likely to be correct? The answer is by no means perplexing. One leading principle, in all our institutions, is, that a minority in the exercise of any official duties shall not control. But, in this instance, there is a departure from the rule; a minority has given an exposition of the Constitution, upon a question of the first magnitude, which is to be acknowledged by all as correct doctrine, and treated accordingly. Can this be right? Is it according to the spirit and genius of our Government? But what is there objectionable in requiring five to concur, before any law of a State shall be held null and void? There is more safety in such a regulation than to leave it as it now stands. You may rest assured, sir, the States would be much better satisfied with a decision unfavorable to their laws by five judges than by two or three; and, should it become the duty of the court, in the administration of justice, to make such decisions, five will not hesitate to do it. There is little or no danger of the judges of the Supreme Court being under the influence of the several States. The danger is altogether upon the other side. They are not dependent upon the States for their office, or the emoluments of it. No reason does or can exist, therefore, to suppose that the judges of this court ever did, or ever will, lean in favor of the States, against the General Government.

Occupying Claimant Laws, &c.

A gentleman near me, Mr. Chairman, whose opinions and suggestions at all times, in this House and elsewhere, deserve the highest consideration, will allow me to correct his misapprehensions. In a whisper, loud enough to be heard, he fears that great harm might grow out of the proposed resolutions, and that they are a Kentucky project. If great injury would be likely to ensue by their adoption, I should think it could be made manifest by argument. Let the dangers be pointed out. Let us see whether the evil which is likely to happen is equal to that now in existence. The gentleman will find some difficulty in proving that all is right; that a minority of the court should decide any question, and that nothing ought to be done. I will hear him with great pleasure. Perhaps he can remove every difficulty. We have "already lost the land;" we have nothing left but the argument, and we may lose that also.

Why, sir, is this called a Kentucky project? It is not to have a mere local operation. It is not to be limited to any particular place. It is general in its character; it applies to the whole nation; it is co-extensive with the existence of the evil, and is intended as a remedy. It is true, Kentucky feels an anxious solicitude upon the subject; not from local and selfish considerations, but from a most thorough conviction that the General Government is greatly interested in the adoption of some measure in relation to the Supreme Court.

I am sorry, sir, that almost every measure which has been brought before this House, for some months past, is emphatically styled "the Kentucky policy—the Kentucky measure." These local distinctions had much better be avoided; they are not pleasant. They have no good effect, particularly when uttered in connexion with marked indications of malice and hatred against a whole people. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has, from the commencement of this session, and more especially in a very recent debate, manifested a strong spirit of this sectional sort. He has sought every possible occasion to pour forth his gall and bitterness, and to display his wit, against the people beyond the mountains.

He has given to this House a most ludicrous description of their dress, their appearance, their manners, and their habits. He has taken peculiar pleasure in attempting to exhibit them before this nation as uncivilized savages, rather than as American citizens. I must, said Mr. L., take the liberty of declaring to that gentleman that he is most grossly and inexcusably ignorant of the character, the feelings, the intelligence, and the habits, of the Western people. Sir, with the utmost frankness, I admit, their external appearance is not the most fashionable and elegant kind; they are not decorated in all the style, the gaiety, and the taste, of a dandy of the first water. Their means are too limited, and their discretion is too great, I trust, for the indulgence of such foppery and extravagance. The fact is, a dandy is not a character in great demand, with either sex, in our country; and when, by chance, one happens to go there, even with his slender share of intellect, he soon discovers that is not the proper theatre for him to acquire glory and renown, and accordingly he makes his exit suddenly. I concede, also, that the Kentuckians, in the general, would not make a brilliant figure at a levee or drawing-room. Their bows would not be quite so obsequious, their smiles not quite so fascinating, their manners not quite so refined, as the orders in council or etiquette of the day might demand. They have not acquired that gracefulness of action, that ease of deportment, that elegance of accomplishment, so as to make you three bows in two seconds; nor have their representatives acquired never-fading laurels for their proficiency in that great science. The people of our country do not attach the least importance to beings entirely lost in admiration of themselves, and devotion to personal appearance. Such trifling follies they leave to the weak; to those who can do nothing else, and who have the means of indulging in a taste so illy directed, and so little envied. Let those, sir, who have a pride of that kind, enjoy, to the fullest extent, all its charms, and all its consequence.

Again, we are told these bear-hunters, these fellows with their leather leggings, rifle guns, and moccasins, get every thing they ask for; but not being contented, wish to control the whole political concerns, and to direct the destinies of this nation. Why, sir, are such unfounded and illiberal assertions made, in relation to the people of the West? What fact have you to authorize such imputations? Who, from that quarter of the country, ever attempted to manage every thing, to direct every thing, and require every thing? Ah, sir, there was a time—I hate to think of it; it is with most painful and unfeigned reluctance, I can bring myself to allude to it—there was a time, however, when it would have been better for this nation if these backwoodsmen could have had a little more direction in the management of your military operations in this quarter. Perhaps you have some faint recollection of the time when a few of His Majesty's troops travelled a distance of fifty miles, over broken ground, and through thick woods, burnt your Capitol, made your palace soldiers' quarters, and compelled your citizens to abandon their habitations, and to seek a shelter in the distant woods. That was the very time, sir, when five hundred of those persons, who have been made the subject of ridicule, and who are stigmatized with the epithet of the moccasin gentry, and hunting-shirt gentlemen, would have won for themselves imperishable fame; would have saved millions of money to your country; yes, and would have saved, also, your national honor.

But, sir, said Mr. L., it is not to the exterior of men we should look. Fortune affords advantages which may enable one to appear well, when, in truth, there is nothing worthy of admiration. It is the conduct, the deportment, the principles of men, we should examine. Will the people of the West, will Kentuckians, fear an examination of this sort? Can they not undergo the most strict scrutiny as citizens, as patriots, always prepared to present themselves at their country's call; ready, upon all occasions, to afford the most prompt and timely assistance, when that assistance is required? Who can boast of a preference over them? Of the past, however, I will not speak. I will not make disagreeable and invidious comparisons. Let the firmness, the valor, the suffering, of the people of the West, during our recent conflict, be forgotten. Say nothing of the laurels which they won in battle; say nothing of the many patient feats of starvation they endured, without a murmur. Withhold, if you choose, the gratitude of the nation; but I beg of you to do justice to their private virtues, to allow them, at least, a character for integrity of motive, for benevolence of heart, for hospitality of conduct. Suffer me, sir, to tell you, these Kentuckians, who have been treated in the debates with so much unkindness, are about the very finest fellows in this Government. I make no exceptions. Try them in any way you may select, and you will readily acquiesce in the truth of my assertion. Their hospitality is without ostentation, without parade, without hypocrisy; it is not contaminated, and I trust never will be, by the fashionable vices which might be enumerated, as the tip of the tan in some other places. If a Kentuckian meets you, gives you a hearty shake of the hand, and says, "Sir, I am very happy to see you," he tells you the truth; he utters not the commonplace, unmeaning compliments; he speaks the language of his heart. If he make declarations of friendship, you may believe him. If you visit him, there is no waiter to meet you at the door, and avow his master is not at home, when he is actually in the house; and should you spend a few hours unceremoniously with him and his family, in social conversation, so soon as you retire, he will not say, after pressing you to make it convenient to call and see him again, "Oh! what a tiresome visitor; I was never more out of patience in all my life; such another visit would really kill me; I hope he will never come again." And, after you are gone, your reputation is not assailed. No; these wise and happy inventions are unknown to the people of the West. I wish I could use the same remark in relation to the people every where else. Why, sir, you may visit the humblest cottage in our country, and you will find every thing to admire. So soon as the faithful dog, by his saluting bark, announces that a stranger is coming, your astonishment would commence; you would have the singular felicity of beholding a most delightful spectacle—about twelve or thirteen fine, ruddy, well-formed, hearty-looking young Democrats, would run out to see the stranger; and upon entering the house, you would be met by a very plain, unaffected woman, to all appearance about thirty years old, whose countenance would at once tell you to make yourself easy; you would meet with kindness, and, in casting your eyes around, you would see two more little fellows, who were too small to run out at the first alarm. Presently, would come from the labors of the day, an honest, good-looking man, to rest himself awhile in the bosom of his family, dressed, sir, not in fine ruffles and broadcloth, with powdered hair, but in good, substantial, plain clothes, manufactured by the industry of his wife; and, upon entering into conversation with him, an ample theme for reflection would be afforded; you would wonder how one in his humble station could have known so much, upon so many subjects, with such limited opportunities. You might here see a model worthy of admiration, indeed, of imitation—conjugal felicity, parental and filial affection, undivided and unfettered: And here, too, the philosopher, as well as the statesman, might learn some useful and practical lessons. In some short time, you would find a repast set before you, if not of all the niceties, and luxuries, and parade, which are to be met with elsewhere, of good plain wholesome diet, among which would be one of the most pleasant dishes that can possibly be prepared in any country, and that is, a hearty, sincere welcome, without apologies and without price. Sir, these are the very citizens of whom the nation ought to be proud. They constitute the bone, and sinew, and strength, of your Government. In the hour of peril and danger, they are always ready to rally around the standard of their country. Call upon them to maintain the honor of the nation, to defend her rights, they set up no Constitutional scruples, in answer to your call, about crossing boundary lines!

Such are the people of the West, the people of Kentucky; and such are those whom our State, by the exercise of her legitimate rights of legislation, has attempted to shield, and protect, from the iron grasp of the land speculator. Are they not entitled, from every consideration, to the kind attention of the Government? These, sir, are the people for whom our occupant law was enacted. Do they not deserve the protection of their Government? What man is there, who could stand by, without exclaiming, "This is not right, to unhouse such families as these, take from them their little improvement, and proclaim—go hence; what you have labored for, I will enjoy."

Again, sir, we are told, such are the extraordinary demands of the people of the West, who have swallowed up all the loaves and fishes, such are their repeated claims there is no such thing as tolerating them—"like sturdy beggars, they will take no denial;"—that rebellion must be the ultimate consequence. For myself, I protest against this mode of legislation; this display of sectional feeling; of crying out to one part of the Union! "You get every thing—we get nothing; the Government is kind to you, careful of your interests, whilst ours is neglected, overlooked, and forgotten." Sir, these suggestions and assertions, so far as the West is concerned, are not true. What have we ever received from the fostering hand of the Government? Point out the single instance. Yes, the public lands, it is said, were sold for our accommodation. But who got the money? It all came into your coffers; we never have enjoyed the benefit of a single copper. But, we are told, the Government has been good enough to suffer us to enjoy the privileges of a mail. A mighty privilege, indeed! one for which we ought, in humble submission, with bended knees, to acknowledge the most unbounded gratitude, for your very great condescension. What news do you send to the West by these mails? Very good, I hope. No, sir; doleful, melancholy tidings are conveyed to them weekly. You bid them be industrious, labor hard—you have more demands against them—your account is already very great; but you are going on every day to make it still more enormous: eight hundred thousand dollars to be appropriated to the erection of fortifications—where? not in the West, but in the East—$250,000 to be added for this purpose—$200,000 for that purpose; and $100,000 to be paid out of the public Treasury, to one gentleman, for his patriotism. This is the kind of news you send them by your mails. But, sir, do you ever tell them of any public moneys to be expended in the West? No, sir; no such letter in your statute book; no one there gets $100,000 more than he ought to have, for services rendered in the late war. But you say, all this is so very oppressive, it is not to be borne—rebellion rather than oppression. Why, sir, we should like very much that sort of oppression, of enjoying all the public expenditures. It would be quite comfortable. If you must have rebellion, suffer me to tell you, you had better travel any other road than over the mountains. In the language of the gentleman from Virginia, it would be a stumpy road.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is a most fruitless and unpleasant topic; and really there is no apology for its introduction into the debates of this House, under any circumstances whatever. And why it should make a figure so often, in reference to the West, I am at a loss to perceive. No national or individual advantage is likely to flow from its discussion. If any gentleman, sir, is so mad as to suppose, by the use of such idle threats, his dignity or his importance is enhanced in the estimation of the country, the sooner he is restored to his right reason, the better. He adds nothing to his reputation as a statesman, or to the goodness of his heart as a citizen. I hope never to hear another allusion, in this House, to that subject; for, let it be understood, by these presents, that we, the people of the West, will never suffer any rebellion to take place. There is not the most distant prospect of it; the declaration of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. R.) to the contrary notwithstanding. I do not see that gentleman, at this moment, in his seat. I regret his absence. I had a particular desire, sir, to tender him my best respects, for the many kind civilities he has, voluntarily, paid to the people I have the honor, in part, to represent. His polite attention shall not go unrewarded. I hope to have the pleasure, upon some suitable occasion, in my awkward way, to acknowledge the great debt of gratitude which is so justly due to that gentleman.

Mr. FORSYTH offered the following amendment, as a substitute to the first of the above resolutions:

Resolved, That a quorum of the Supreme Court, to transact the business of that tribunal, should consist of such a number of the Justices composing it, that a majority of the quorum shall be a majority of the whole court, including the Chief Justice.

Mr. FORSYTH supported his motion in a short speech; and Messrs. WICKLIFFE, CLAY, FORSYTH, WEBSTER, MERCER, P. P. BARBOUR, RANDOLPH, and TRIMBLE, respectively, spoke at considerable length on the question.

Mr. WICKLIFFE addressed the Committee, in substance, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The subject is an important one; and, on that account alone, I hope to engage the attention of the Committee in its discussion. Some of the friends of the measure on your table, were inclined not now to press it, under the belief that the time was unfavorable to the full and free discussion which its magnitude demanded. The duty of those, charged by the remonstrance, with its presentation here, required, at their hands, an effort, in furtherance of the views of the Legislature of Kentucky; and I am gratified to discover a wish in the Committee that the debate should now progress.

The character of this question, which proposes an important modification in the Judiciary act; the deep interest which one of the States feels upon the occasion; require of Congress an indulgent, and, I hope, a favorable consideration of the resolutions submitted by my colleague, (Mr. LETCHER.) Were it a subject in which the State of Kentucky was alone interested, her representatives on this floor would regard the determination of the Committee now to progress with its discussion, more an act of kindness to them, than a matter of right. But it is one involving a principle of vital importance to the whole Union; and, although presented to us by a single State, (inferior to none in the practice and support of Republican principles,) it demands of Congress a dispassionate deliberation.

I will not unnecessarily consume your time, and I hope not to exhaust your patience, whilst I endeavor, in a few words, to call your attention to the true character of the question, presented by the remonstrance and resolutions now before us.

It may not be improper, in order to arrive at that object, to state some of the causes which have brought them into existence, and forced them upon our attention. You are informed, by the memorial of the Legislature of Kentucky, accompanied by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, (of which it complains,) that the power of that State to pass certain laws, denominated the Occupying Claimant Laws, is denied by that court; that they violate the compact between the States of Virginia and Kentucky; and, therefore, impugn the 10th section of the 1st article of the Constitution of the United States, which declares, among other things, "That no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." A question naturally presents itself to the mind of every person unacquainted with the history of Kentucky and her internal police: "Are these laws of such mighty importance as to call forth, in strong language, the feelings of the Legislature? Are the principles settled by the case of Green and Biddle, and the evils which flow from that decision, such, that the Legislature of Kentucky cannot, by some modification of the laws in question, avert or palliate them?" I answer, Yes; such is their character. They are laws rendered necessary to the prosperity and happiness of the State, by the fatal policy pursued by Virginia, in the disposition of her vacant lands, in the then district of Kentucky. And if the court be correct, to the extent of the principles assumed in that opinion, no legislative aid, no change or modification of these laws, can avert or palliate the miseries which must inevitably ensue. The people, in the exercise of their high and sovereign powers in convention, cannot rid themselves of the effects of the principle settled by the Supreme Court; which principle is fixed like an incubus upon the rights of the State. We can do nothing but present our grievance before you; point to the injury which has been inflicted; and beseech you to adopt the measure on your table, and thereby strengthen the ramparts of State sovereignty. It is by the preservation of legitimate State rights, that you give the best security to the stability and happiness of this Union.

I said, sir, these laws were rendered necessary to the prosperity and happiness of the citizens of Kentucky, by the misguided policy of Virginia; a policy ruinous but liberal, benevolent and patriotic in its objects. With the exception of the delegation of Virginia and Kentucky, but few, if indeed any, of the members of this House are acquainted with the mode by which lands were acquired, and are now held, in the latter State. Prior to the Revolution, large portions of those lands were granted by the Crown to the officers of the army engaged in the French and Indian wars, which preceded the Declaration of Independence. Toward the close of the Revolution, many persons, as if in quest of danger, penetrated the wilderness; and after many dire struggles with the savages for empire, maintained with loss of much blood their infant settlements. Virginia, (in a spirit of justice to her creditors, and in fulfilment of that pledge of public faith of which she has always been proudly tenacious,) after securing to the early adventurers and settlers in Kentucky, what are called "settlement and pre-emption rights, poor-rights, and corn-rights;" (terms well understood by the citizens of Kentucky,) opened her land office, 1779-80; and by it she poured out the contents of a Pandora's box upon the ill-fated inhabitants of the State. By the provisions of the land law of 1779, warrants for land were issued to any and every person, upon the payment of the State price in the paper currency of Virginia. The proprietors of these warrants were required to locate the same by an entry in the surveyor's books, with such certainty and precision, that each subsequent locator, in like manner, could appropriate the adjacent residuum. I am certainly correct when I tell you, that warrants for three times the quantity of vacant land, then owned by Virginia, in the district of Kentucky, were issued. In many districts of country in Kentucky, I have known to exist there, four, five, and six, distinct adversary claims to the same tract of land. Hence the phrase, in frequent use, "that Kentucky is shingled with land claims." Many of these claims were settled by the original proprietors and first adventurers to that country; men who had to contend with dangers, and endure sufferings, not easily to be imagined by the present population; and more easily conceived than described by those who witnessed and participated in them.

In this state of things, removed at a great distance from the seat of government in Virginia, laboring under difficulties and embarrassments, which were not felt and duly appreciated by the great body of the people of Virginia, the citizens of the then district of Kentucky petitioned the Legislature of Virginia to permit them to become a free and sovereign State. The politicians who filled the public councils of the State, at that period, upon becoming more intimately acquainted with the wants, interests, and difficulties of the people of Kentucky, were satisfied that their future happiness and prosperity depended upon the favorable issue of their application.

In 1789, a law passed the Legislature prescribing the conditions upon which this new government was to be established. This is what is termed, in the decision of the Supreme Court, "The compact with Virginia." By the seventh section of that compact, it is provided that all private rights and interests of lands within the proposed district, derived from the laws of Virginia, prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now in existence in this State.

The latter clause of the eighth section reads as follows: "Nor shall a neglect of cultivation or improvement of any land within the proposed State, or this Commonwealth, belonging to non-resident citizens of the other, subject such non-residents to forfeiture, or other penalty, within the term of six years after the admission of the said State into the Federal Union." These are, substantially, the only parts of the compact which have any connexion with the present subject.

This compact is made a part of the constitution of Kentucky. The Supreme Court, in their opinion, do not decide upon it as a part of the constitution of the State, but as a contract between the State of Virginia and the State of Kentucky. Whether this act of the Virginia Legislature can be denominated a contract, within the meaning and purview of the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits "a State from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts," is a question I leave for others to decide. It is not necessary for my purpose that I should here discuss it. Virginia, at the date of the compact, had no statutory provision similar to the occupying claimant laws of Kentucky. She had not then felt the necessity of them—circumstances since that time have made it necessary for her to protect the occupants of her land, under a practice adopted by her courts, not very unlike the laws of Kentucky. I believe many States in the Union have been compelled to resort to such laws. As early as 1796, Kentucky commenced her legislation upon this subject. Her best and wisest statesmen projected and approved the law which was then enacted. This law provides, in substance, that if any person shall peaceably, and in good faith, seat and improve land, to which he shall have a title derived from the Commonwealth, upon eviction therefrom, by a paramount title, he shall be paid for all valuable and lasting improvements which he shall have made upon the land before notice of the adversary claim, and subjects the occupant to the payment of rents and profits, after suit brought; and also compels him to account for all waste, &c., committed upon the land; and to pay for the deterioration of soil. Is there any thing unjust or iniquitous in this law? I answer, no. It received the sanction of the courts of Kentucky, and was acquiesced in by all classes of her citizens. There was no murmuring, no denial of the power in this State, to legislate upon the subject, from 1796 to 1811 and 1812, at which period the act of 1796 was repealed, and that of 1812 passed. Then it was, for the first time, I believe, made a question of Constitutional power in the State. The law, however, passed, not without a violent opposition, by a respectable and intelligent minority, who, I believe, were governed more in the opposition, by the question of policy and expediency, than Constitutional power.

It is due to candor to state this law did not receive the sanction of the Governor of the State. It was suspended for twelve months. Its principles were the subject of free and full discussion before the people; and at the succeeding Legislature it was passed by a Constitutional majority of both branches, the Governor's objection notwithstanding.

This latter act exempts the occupant from the payment of rents and profits, until after judgment of eviction or decree shall be pronounced against him. It compels the successful claimant to pay the cost of seating and improving the land; and moreover provides, that, if the valuation of the improvements shall exceed three-fourths the value of the land in its unimproved state, then the successful claimant may compel the occupant to keep the land, and to pay for the same the amount of valuation fixed by commissioners to be appointed by the court. These commissioners are directed to make the estimates, as well of the rents, profits, and value of the land, as the costs of seating and improving the same, together with the waste and damage committed, and reduction of soil. The report of these commissioners upon oath, (seven in number,) was to receive the sanction of the court, and to be made the basis of their judgment. Until the court had thus disposed of the question of improvements, &c., no writ of possession could issue upon the original judgment. Such are the outlines of the two acts of the Legislature of Kentucky, passed under a most thorough conviction that she possessed the power, and deeply impressed with the belief, that they were demanded by the condition of the country.

H. OF R.

Occupying Claimant Laws, &c.

And, whatever may have been said about the infraction of Constitutional law, the purity of the motives of the Legislature who passed, and the judges who approved their adoption, has never been, cannot be, questioned. It requires the efforts of refined legal subtilty to demonstrate clearly the unconstitutionality of those laws. The eighth section of the compact permits the Legislature of Kentucky, after six years, to subject the lands of non-resident proprietors to forfeiture for non-cultivation. From this clause, it seems a milder power might be inferred—one of less magnitude—a power which, by its exercise, saves to the non-resident his land from forfeiture for non-cultivation, by requiring him to pay the meritorious occupant for doing that which the State had a right to compel him to do, viz: the improvement of his land within her territory. The delay incident to the investigation and trial of a land cause, (to say nothing of the designed procrastination of it by the artful claimants, with a view to swell the item of rents on the final account,) furnished a very just reason for a change or repeal of the act of 1796.

Suits have lingered upon the dockets for twenty years, and, in some instances, longer. Under the act of 1796, the occupant was charged with the rents after the commencement of the suit; and it not unfrequently happened that, after losing his home, and his labor of twenty years, he was ruined by a demand for rents of land which he believed to be his own. It was thought the act of 1796 was defective in other respects. The number of suits was continually increasing, and the occupants not only feared the loss of their lands and improvements, but ruin by a claim for back rents. The gradual improvement of the country was consequently retarded.

I have been thus particular, Mr. Chairman, (and, I fear, tedious,) in order that the Committee and the public shall understand the nature and character of those laws. I am anxious that the councils of my State shall be acquitted of all impurity of motive.

If I have given you a correct history and character of these laws, (and I believe I have,) you will acknowledge that Kentucky ought to feel on this subject; and she has, through her Legislature, expressed that feeling to the nation.

Not long after the passage of the act of 1812, its validity was questioned in the appellate court of the State. The judges of that court, men of intelligence, and who, as jurists, would not be shaded in a comparison with the justices of the Supreme or any court, decided, not by a minority, but by the undivided opinion of the whole court, that the Legislature had the power to pass the law of 1812.

This decision, supported by reasons irresistible, the Supreme Court, (although the book which contained it, was in the Library of Congress, to which they had unlimited access,) say they "have not had an opportunity of examining it." It was not my purpose, nor is it required of me, by the nature of the proposition on your table, to maintain the validity of those laws; nor will I indulge an uncharitable opinion of those whose interest or duty it was to contest them. I am only anxious to evince to the Committee their importance, and to satisfy them they were not the enactments of hasty and inconsiderate legislation, but the productions of soberness and reason, dictated by a sound policy, imperiously demanded by necessity, and approved by the judgments, not only of the people, but the Legislature and the courts of the State. When laws of so much importance to the prosperity and happiness of a State, sanctioned by successive Legislatures and courts, consisting of judges of great talents, shall have been prostrated by the opinion of three justices, however learned and dignified, it becomes the duty of the States to inquire into the expediency of so organizing that court that more security shall be given to their respective rights. The opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Green and Biddle may be correct; it is, nevertheless, unsatisfactory and afflicting to my constituents; nay, sir, to the whole State—unsatisfactory, because it is the opinion of a minority of the members of the court, without the aid of its head, opposed to the opinion of the Legislature, and the inferior and superior courts of the State; afflicting, because the character of the State has been traduced—not by the court, but by those who, like the justices, were unacquainted with the real condition and character of the people for whose safety and protection these laws were enacted. I will not contend, as some have done, that the case of Green and Biddle was not legitimately before the court, nor that it was an act of usurpation in the court to have assumed jurisdiction of the cause. The question involving the validity of these laws was fairly presented to the court for its decision. I admit the right and the power of the Judiciary to decide upon Constitutional questions; and, when fairly presented, it becomes their duty to decide them upon their Constitutional responsibility. I am desirous, therefore, that, whenever the occasion arises for the exercise of this high and important power by the Judiciary, it shall be exercised in the mode best calculated to administer justice, and inspire confidence in the public mind. What better mode can you adopt, combining these two great objects, than the one suggested by the resolutions offered by my colleague?

The prostration of those laws, so indispensable to the prosperity of the State; laws which secured to the industrious occupant, should he be unhoused by a better title, an indemnity for his labor bestowed upon the land; and of a policy, existing for twenty-five years, sanctioned by a large majority of the Legislature; approved and sustained by the unanimous decisions of the supreme court of the State; made the basis of numerous compromises and contracts, was well calculated to produce a shock in public feeling, and to call forth the almost unanimous voice of the whole State, against the correctness of the opinion of the three justices of the supreme court.

I have said, the power to decide upon Constitutional questions, involving the validity of the laws or constitution of a State, appertain to this court. Yes, sir, they have the power, not only to fritter down the sovereignty of the State governments, but to set at defiance the legislative powers of Congress. It is necessary that the power to decide upon Constitutional law, should be vested in the judiciary; and it is the duty of the Representatives of the people to watch, with a vigilant eye its exercise. I do not mean to say, that the power, in this case, has been intentionally abused. Its exercise, however, by a minority of the court, has spread dismay over the whole State. In ordinary cases, where the Legislature may have trespassed upon the confines of the Constitution, and the encroachment is repelled by the judiciary, reform and amendment may take place. Was this the condition of Kentucky: did the decision leave a hope that any future legislation upon the subject, even in conformity with what Virginia, since the compact, has prescribed for her own citizens, was permissible, we should not not feel so sensibly the effects of the opinion of the court. The court deny to Kentucky the right to legislate in reference to this subject. Virginia has parted with the soil and sovereignty: she cannot therefore legislate; nor can the two States, by any alteration of the terms of the compact, (if the decision be correct,) resume the power in themselves, jointly or separately, to legislate upon the question of land titles, acquired prior to 1792, in the State of Kentucky.

Did Virginia possess the power, and were her statesmen made acquainted with the real condition of those for whose benefits those laws were passed, I know that she estimates too highly the blessings of a free Government, to refuse relief, such as that extended by the Legislature of Kentucky, to those whose lands were lost by adversary titles.

Kentucky has no hope that she can be relieved by any act of Congress, from the evils which the misguided policy of her parent State forced, and the decision of the Supreme Court has riveted, upon her. She must, and she will, with that firmness and patriotism with which she has been hitherto characterized, maintain, under all circumstances, her attachment to the Union, her reverence for the constituted authorities of the Government. She has never deserted the General Government, nor is she willing to be abandoned by it.

It is her anxiety for the preservation of this Union, which has produced the memorial on your table. She believes it is best preserved by a due regard to the inviolability of State rights; and, sir, what does she ask you to do? To declare, by law, that the solemn act of the Legislature, the Constitution, the sound and settled policy of the States, shall not be prostrated by your judiciary, which was once thought the weakest department of Government, unless there shall be at least the concurrent opinion of five judges. I would extend it further, and say, they should not declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, without such coincidence of opinion. This, by many, is thought not necessary; and since I have reflected upon the subject, I do not recollect that they have, in any instance, decided against the validity of an act of Congress, save one, which required some unimportant duty to be performed by themselves, under the pension act. I have thought it would be altogether useless legislation, and this determination is strengthened by the fact, that the alien and sedition act received the support of the Federal judiciary. The doctrine of "incidental, resulting, and necessary powers of Congress," recognised by the court in the bank and other cases, furnishes us ample security in the free exercise of our powers, if it does not tempt us to transcend them.

The ill fate which has befallen my State, in that court, induced me to make some little examination into the "current of decisions," where the rights of States were directly or collaterally drawn in question; and, sir, I find them, like the needle, which always directs us to the same pole, invariably tending to the amplification of the powers of the General Government, and a corresponding restriction of State sovereignty. Georgia, Pennsylvania, Virginia, New York, Ohio, and Kentucky, have shared, each in their turn, the same fate. I do not recollect a single case before that court, in which the question of State power, in conflict with the supposed powers of the General Government, was involved, where the decision has been in favor of the power claimed by the State. I will not undertake to say that the whole of these opinions were wrong. I must be permitted to say that the States have been extremely unfortunate before that enlightened tribunal. At the rate they have heretofore progressed, it will not take long to fritter down the State governments to "mere petty corporations," acting by the authority and permission of the General Government—I should have said the weakest department of that Government. It is time for the States to inquire into the cause of this state of things; and in order, at least, to inspire greater confidence in the opinions of that tribunal, which shall declare null and void their constitutions, and the solemn acts of their legislatures, they should cause a greater volume of intellect to flow into the judicial channel. The powers which the Supreme Court possesses under the Constitution, to be exercised in the manner prescribed by the 25th section of the judiciary act are tremendous; such as, if abused, from ignorance or by design, may, one day or other, shake this confederative Republic to the very centre. Let us provide, then, by law, as far as we have the power, against the chances of such an event. Is there any valid objection to the resolution? Is there any thing in them contrary to the theory of our Government? Will it prevent, or obstruct, a due administration of justice in that court? I have not been able, in my own mind, to anticipate any evil consequences which are to grow out of the adoption of the resolutions offered by my colleague; I have not, as yet, heard any opposition suggested; and I shall conclude, under the hope that none will be made. At least, I shall have the consolation of having discharged a duty which I owed to my State, whose interest and character are dear to me; and which, I regret I have not been able to do in a more acceptable manner.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, wanted to say a few words, and would detain the Committee only a few minutes. He thought the subject might be placed in a new aspect, as important as any that had been given to it. What, said he, is the question; and how does it come before us? A compact exists between the States of Virginia and Kentucky. A citizen of Kentucky, holding a title to land there under the laws of Virginia, or a non-resident (say a citizen of Virginia) holding, in like manner, a title to lands in Kentucky, derived from the laws of Virginia or Kentucky, brings an action at law or suit in chancery for the land, and obtains a judgment or decree in his favor, under which he is put in possession of his right. The occupant, who was sued, holds a title of record for the same land, derived under the same code of laws, which title he exhibits to the court, and thereupon demands payment for the value of the lasting improvements made by him on the land, and requires an assessment of the value of those improvements under the laws of Kentucky, usually called the "Occupant laws;" the adverse party contests the right of the occupant to claim payment for his improvements, upon the plea that the Occupant laws are in violation of the compact between the two States. The Supreme Court of the United States and the inferior courts take cognizance of the case under the second section of the third article of the Federal Constitution, in which article we find the following clauses, among others, viz: "The judicial power (of the United States) shall extend to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects." And thus the right and power of the State of Kentucky to pass the Occupant laws, and the validity of the laws themselves, are drawn in question before the Supreme Court. Mr. T. referred to the case of Green and Biddle as an example, the details of which would be found in the remonstrance from the Legislature of Kentucky. It was known, he said, that only four of the seven judges sat in that case, three of whom were of opinion that the State of Kentucky had no power to pass the Occupant laws just referred to, and the other judge dissented; so that, in point of fact, only three judges concurred in the opinion declaring those laws invalid. In this respect it is a question of State powers and State rights, and he would like to know when and how a minority of the Supreme Court became possessed of the power to decide against the validity of a State law? Was it right to suffer a minority of the court to exercise such broad powers? The friends of State rights insist that a law of Congress ought to pass, declaring that no decision shall be given by the court in such cases, unless a majority of all the judges shall concur in it. His own opinion, looking to the policy of the question, was, that the law ought to require a concurrence of at least five of the seven judges, if not all of them. Would any member show him a solid objection to that number? Look, said he, at the root of the question: each State has plenary power—legislative, executive, and judicial—over all its municipal concerns. The power of each is paramount within its own limits, except in those cases where all have brought themselves under Federal subordination. The States grant to Congress and the nation the supremacy over certain enumerated subjects, and they retain the supremacy over all other subjects. Now, suppose the States to be yet independent of each other, and foreign to each other, as they were before the Federation; how would two or more of them decide a dispute between them, or between their citizens? Exactly as all sovereigns have done, and are compelled to do—abandon the dispute, or settle it by making war, or by reprisals, to enforce the right, or by sending ambassadors to make a treaty of settlement and compromise; or by referring the matter in contest to friendly sovereigns as arbitrators. But the framers of the Constitution foresaw that Federal and State rights and powers might come in conflict with each other, and that controversies might arise between two or more States, or between a State and citizens of other States, or between citizens of different States; and they knew that the system of Federation would be incomplete, unless some mode could be devised by which such disputes could be peaceably adjusted, because they must have known that such disputes had dissolved and destroyed all the old confederations of the old continents. Two modes of adjustment were suggested, first, to leave each State the right of naming friendly arbitrators upon each contested question as it should arise; and, second, to constitute a body of perpetual arbitrators. The first mode was in use among the ancients, and the last was once in use, and probably yet is, among the Swiss Cantons. It is the mode adopted in our Constitution; the power is vested in the Supreme Court, and its subordinate courts, and the judges are constituted a perpetual body of friendly arbitrators. He called them friendly arbitrators, because there was no magic in the word judge—all judges being nothing more nor less than friendly referees. The court takes the place of friendly sovereigns, and are agreed upon before-hand to determine certain high disputes, which, if that provision had been left out of the Constitution, would have been settled by war or by treaties, as among other sovereign powers. But the Constitution itself is in the nature of a treaty; it is an agreement—a solemn compact—a compact of union—a perpetual treaty of union—and therefore he thought it strictly proper to say, that the States, and the people of the States, had stipulated and agreed that the judges of the Supreme Court should be friendly arbitrators, to determine all controversies arising in the class of cases enumerated in the second section of the third article of that instrument; and here the main question comes forward: How many of these arbitrators ought to concur in a decision, where the validity of State laws are disputed? Shall all concur, or a bare majority; or some intermediate number; or can a minority decide? We are here debating the proposition, but no one ventures to defend the propriety or policy of letting a minority exercise the power. Shall it be left to a bare majority? Can we deduce a sound rule from the theory or practice of our Government? The Constitution is silent on the subject. It declares that—"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." The Federal courts were established by the law of September, 1789, and that law enacts that the Supreme Court shall consist of one Chief Justice and five Associate Justices, any four of whom are declared to be a quorum to do business; but it omits to say how many shall concur in giving a decision. That omission, however, was supplied by the compulsive operation of the law: If the six judges sat in a cause, three of them could not decide against a State law; but if four of them were ready to concur, the court could then give judgment; but four is two-thirds of six; and so, from the necessity of the case, a State law was not invalidated until two-thirds of all the judges were against it. If only five judges sat in a cause, three, being a majority of five, could render a decree; and if only four sat, three of them must concur, or else the court would be equally divided; and thus it happened from necessity that no decision could be made against a State law, unless two-thirds of the whole court concurred when all sat, or three-fifths when five sat, or three-fourths when only four sat. And here he entreated gentlemen to remark, that no state of things could possibly occur, in which a minority of the whole court could invalidate a law. The conformation of the court put it out of the power of the body to encroach upon State rights by the invalidation of State laws. By the act of February, 1807, the court is to consist of seven judges, but no further regulation is made in that law, and of course four continued to be a quorum to do business. But as three is a majority of four, or of five, and a minority of seven, it is obvious, that when only four or five of the judges sat in a cause, a minority of the body could invalidate a State law. The act of 1807 ought to have directed how many of the judges should concur upon questions touching State rights, but it was then neglected, and Congress is now called upon to supply the omission. Shall we leave the court to regulate itself, or shall it be put "under such regulations as the Congress shall make." How shall we find a rule? By analogy, by looking into the theory and practice of the Federal Government and the State Governments, by consulting the reason of the thing, by following the dictates of sound policy.

By analogy: State power and State rights are put in question, and therefore the case of two sovereigns, referring a matter in controversy to other friendly sovereigns, bears a close analogy. It would be called, at the bar of the court, a case in point; and yet there is not a case to be found in all the books of international law, wherein three or more friendly sovereigns have decided a dispute referred to them, unless all of them concurred in the opinion. In such cases, an award by a minority, or a bare majority, would be pronounced as an outrage upon the parties making the submission. No sovereign would submit, and no nation ought to submit, to an umpire of minorities. Mr. T. again asserted, that by our own Constitution, the judges are put in the place of friendly sovereigns, acting as referees between sovereigns, so far, at least, as State rights and State laws are drawn in question before them, and that, therefore, they ought to govern themselves by the rules and usages adopted by those who arbitrate between sovereigns. These rules would require a concurrence of all the judges, and he thought it quite probable that the time would come, when those rules would have to be adopted. Take the case of a reference in court, to three arbitrators, by consent of parties; all of them must concur in the award, unless the order of reference specially declares, that any two of the number may decide the matter. From this, and similar cases, he argued, that all analogies required a concurrence of the whole body of judges or arbitrators. In all the State constitutions, there are clauses declaring what number of members shall form a quorum to do business in the legislative body; and why? Because it is generally understood that, without such a clause, none of the members could rightfully act until all were present. A similar clause, he said, would be found in the Federal Constitution.

But again: in all the States, without exception, if a court is constituted of three or more judges, we shall find a law declaring how many of the judges shall form a quorum to do business: and why? Because it is believed every where, that, without such a regulation, no cause could be heard unless all the judges were on the bench. The rule of quorums is sometimes found in the constitution of the State, as in Ohio; but is generally found in the State laws. And in the case before the Committee, the Congress of 1789 must have held the same opinion, or else, why enact that four judges of the Supreme Court should be a quorum? In fact, said he, we find the general principle every where, and in all the departments of our Federal and State Governments. And all the exceptions to it appear to have grown up under special provisions. This much at least was clearly true as to all our judicial departments; first, that the body cannot fractionize its integral powers; second, that its power of action belongs to its integer, and not to fractions of it, unless the law has so provided; and, third, that there is no judicial usage to justify this alarming arrogation of power by enormities, more especially as all the exceptions are found to rest upon special reasons, which only fortify the general principle. It is true that our system operates upon majorities generally; and yet we often find departure from that principle; not in behalf of minorities, but always in favor of augmented majorities approximating unanimous concurrence. For instance, the Federal Constitution cannot be amended unless three-fourths of the States concur. Now, it is known to every one, that the construction of the judges is the true reading of the Constitution, and the person and property of every citizen must stand or fall by it. But these constructions are in the nature of explanatory amendments; and surely, if less than three-fourths of the States cannot amend the Constitution, less than three-fourths of the judges ought not to construe it. The analogy, as it struck him, was too close to be resisted. Similar provisions were to be found in the State constitutions, and if any of the States have allowed a minority of their own judges to invalidate their own laws, that was their own affair; and it did not thence follow, that the same State ought to permit a minority of the Federal Court to send a mandate into its territory, abrogating its municipal laws and State regulations. There was one question which he would barely state, but not discuss, because it was too grave to be lightly considered. Can a minority of the Supreme Court render a judgment or decree abrogating State laws? Is such a judgment obligatory on the States, or is it not a dead letter in law? Are a minority of the judges legally competent to render such a judgment or decree? He had no doubt that this question would be made before long at the bar of the court. In his opinion, the court ought themselves to have settled it, when they, for the first time, gave a decision against the validity of State laws.

As a matter of policy: Was it safe and fitting that a State law should be vacated by less than five judges out of seven? If it could be shown, that, according to juridical usage, a court has the power of declaring that a majority of its body should be a quorum, and that a majority of that quorum may determine ordinary cases, it would not follow, in his opinion, that the Supreme Court ought to arrogate such power. That court sits in judgment upon a class of cases, such as were never submitted to the arbitration of any judicial tribunal. It is invested with higher powers than were ever before conferred upon any judicial institution. It may vacate a treaty made between the United States and foreign nations; it may invalidate a compact or treaty made between the General Government and one or more of the States; it may vacate a compact or treaty between two or more States; it may invalidate a law of Congress; it may vacate a State constitution, or annul one or more of its clauses; it may invalidate a State law, or annul and reverse the judgments and decrees of the highest judicial authorities of the States! And these are only a part of the extraordinary powers with which it is clothed, over and above the ordinary powers vested in a court of justice. It is in fact a political body, invested with high political powers and functions. It is a perpetual arbiter between political bodies—between sovereign powers. Was there no danger in suffering a minority or a bare majority of such a body to decide such grave and solemn controversies between such parties? Suppose this Committee was now sitting as a Convention to frame the Constitution, and, after vesting the Supreme Court with those high powers, under the name of jurisdiction; let us imagine that some member has offered a proposition to permit a minority or a bare majority of the court to pass judgment on these great questions, involving matter of such deep concernment to the States,—would any member of this House vote for the proposition? He thought himself justified in saying that no one would venture to give it his sanction. The last thing a free people ought to surrender, should be the power of making their own laws; and, next to that, the power of repealing them. A State makes a dangerous grant of power, when it gives another body the power of annulling and vacating its own laws against its own consent. Such a power ought to have strong checks upon it. A bare majority is not a sufficient counter-guard. The concurrence of five-sevenths ought to be required, and entire unanimity would perhaps be still better. A court ought to do justice; and next to that comes the policy of giving general satisfaction, if it can do so and do right. But the Supreme Court will never be able to give general satisfaction, so long as it allows a minority of its body to abrogate State laws. Such things might be tolerated by good men, in peaceful times; but among bad men, and in bad times, no one ought to be held responsible for the consequences.

Mr. T. insisted that all the States had an equal interest in the proposition before the Committee. The case of Green and Biddle had been fully explained by his colleagues; and he would only add that, in his opinion, the judges did not understand the cause, or the points involved in it; and that the decision was not sound law. He did not think that any five of the judges could be brought to concur in that opinion; and (waiving the pride of consistency) he did not believe that the same judges would again concur in it; he was sure, that among first-rate judges upon any State bench a different decision would have been given. Wairing the question of sheer law, and keeping a single eye to the justice of the matter, he had as yet met with no man who condemned the Kentucky acts of Assembly, after fully understanding them; and in his opinion it would be easy to show that, under all circumstances, the State had acted with a degree of liberality and forbearance towards non-resident landholders which ought to command the respect of all enlightened statesmen. He knew that contrary impressions had been made by land speculators and their advocates upon persons unacquainted with the situation of the country; and it was a duty which the State owed to itself, as a member of the Union, to vindicate the moral justice of its laws against the unjust aspersions thrown upon them. But as the Committee did not then wish to pursue that branch of the inquiry any further, he would reserve what he had intended to say until some one should arraign those laws as unjust in principle; if, indeed, any one could be found possessing temerity enough to do so. He hoped that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) would be rejected, and that the blank in the resolution would be filled with the number five.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 4.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Shields," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Lewis Dolive, and others, inhabitants of Mobile, in the State of Alabama, for compensation for cattle taken for public use in the late war; which report was laid upon the table.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of granting relief to certain purchasers of public lands lying between Ludlow's and Roberts's lines, in the State of Ohio, made a report, accompanied by a bill to authorize the President of the United States to enter into certain negotiations relative to lands located under Virginia Military Warrants, lying between the said lines; which bill was read twice, and ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law that, in all suits now pending, or which may hereafter be pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, where is drawn in question the validity of any treaty, or statute of a State, or the constitution thereof, or of any authority exercised under any State, on the ground of repugnancy to the Constitution, treaties, or laws, of the United States, no judgment shall be pronounced or rendered until a majority of all the justices of said court, legally competent to sit in the cause, shall concur in the opinion, either in favor of or against the validity thereof; and, until such concurrence, such suit shall be continued under advisement: Provided, however, That said court should not, by such provision, be prevented from rendering judgment in any such suit when it should be of opinion that the final adjudication of the merits thereof did not require the decision of such Constitutional or legal question as aforesaid.

The resolution was read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the House took up the bill "concerning invalid pensioners," with the Senate's amendment, (striking out the names of a part of the pensioners.) Some conversation took place between Messrs. LITTLE, CULPEPER, CADY, and TRACY. Mr. CADY moved to lay the bill on the table; which was negatived.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the House disagreed to so much of the Senate's amendment as strikes out the names of the pensioners at first included in the bill, with the exception of the names of Sutton, Lord, and Zimmerman.

Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, advocated the case of Sutton; Mr. LONGFELLOW, that of Lord; and Mr. CADY, that of Zimmerman—pensioners included in the Senate's amendment.

On the question of agreeing with the Senate to strike out the name of Ebenezer Lord, there were 69 ayes, and nays 58; so his name was stricken out.

The questions on Sutton and Zimmerman were also decided in the affirmative; and their names were agreed to be stricken out.

The engrossed bill "for the relief of the heirs of Miguel de Esclava," was read a third time, and passed.

DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM.

Mr. MOORE, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the memorial of the Trustees of the institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb in the State of Kentucky, made a report on the said memorial, accompanied by a bill for the benefit of the said institution; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

Your committee entered upon the investigation of the subject referred to them, deeply impressed with the conviction that the great object of human legislation is to promote the happiness, as well as the security of the species. Its legitimate sphere extends beyond the erection of fortresses, the creation of military and naval armaments, fiscal arrangements, the punishment of public crime, and the reward of public virtue; and it is, when it interposes its benignant power in behalf of those domestic institutions, which are formed to alleviate the ills which originate in the infirmity of our nature, that its advantages are most generally felt and acknowledged by the mass of society. In the infancy of nations, indeed, institutions of this character are so limited in number and extent, as to claim but little attention, because the necessity of them is less obvious and imperative. But, as wealth, refinement, and population increase, bringing in their train a melancholy series of casualties and anomalies, the necessity of some provision for human infirmity becomes more apparent, and charity finds a rapidly expanding area, in which she may exercise her godlike propensities. For evidence of this truth, we may appeal to the universal history of civilized nations, as well as to the annals of those States of our Commonwealth, which have made the most rapid progress in population. If institutions, precisely similar to that to which the attention of your committee has been called, are less numerous, and of mere recent origin, than other receptacles of human misfortune, these circumstances may be attributed, partly, to the relative paucity of cases, partly to an amiable weakness, which has prevented parents from banishing their children, thus affected, from the cheering comforts and endearments of home and kindred, and partly to the incredulity which has so long prevailed on the subject of any effectual alleviation which the skill of man could devise and apply. The influence of these causes has, however, been, for some time, diminishing. The fame of the philanthropic Abbé de L'Épée, has reached the utmost limits of the civilized world, and humanity triumphs in the conviction that, even in cases which come so entirely home to the "bosoms and business" of mankind, the imperfections of our nature may be, in some degree at least, corrected by the skill and perseverance of science and of art. Entertaining these general views, your committee admit neither difficulty nor hesitation, in applying them to the case which has been referred to their consideration.

The Kentucky institution for the tuition of the deaf and dumb, appears to your committee to have strong claims on the protecting benevolence of Congress. It is the only institution of the kind existing in all that vast and fertile range of country which lies west of the Alleghany chain of mountains. Institutions of this description, can never, for reasons which we deem sufficiently obvious, become so general, even in the diminished ratio of the number of persons for whose benefit they are founded, as those which have for their object the instruction of the more favored, and, happily, far more numerous portion of our species. Your committee, therefore, believe, that the National Legislature would pursue a wise policy in adopting as its own, and cherishing by its protecting care, a few establishments of this kind, already in successful operation. Applications have already been made for the admission of pupils, from many of the circumjacent States; nor have such applications been made in vain. Kentucky, forgetting her inability, in the zeal and fervor of her philanthropy, has placed the unfortunate sons of her sister States upon an equal footing with her own. The aid solicited by the petitioners is a boon asked, not for a single member of the Confederacy, but for a whole section of country rapidly increasing in population and resources, and justly entitled to the attention of Congress. The deaf and dumb asylum was incorporated and endowed by the Legislature of Kentucky, in 1822, and went into operation in the Spring of the following year. At the late session of that body, a most respectable committee, composed of two members of the Senate, and four of the House of Representatives, was appointed to visit and examine the institution. In their report they say, "that they remained in Danville, and visited the asylum on two successive days, and were greatly gratified in witnessing the progress made by the pupils, whose facility and correctness in comprehending the signs made by the teacher, and in expressing their ideas, exceeded any thing that could have been anticipated by the most sanguine friends of the institution. All those who had been instructed for four months in the asylum, wrote good hands, spelled correctly, &c." And the committee, after noticing, in the highest terms of approbation, the administration of the institution, concluded by recommending it "to the continued and extended patronage of the Legislature." The number of pupils, at that time, was fourteen; five more were expected in a few days, and it was anticipated that, in the course of the present year, the whole would amount to forty. The trustees have ascertained that more than one hundred and thirty persons in Kentucky needed the benefits which that institution alone could confer, and of these more than one-third could receive them only from public munificence. It is believed that the number of cases in the adjacent States will bear a like proportion to their population. Under these circumstances, the following resolution passed both Houses of the Kentucky Legislature. "Resolved, That a respectful memorial from the Legislature be transmitted to the Congress of the United States, on behalf of the Kentucky Institution for the tuition of the deaf and dumb; soliciting their attention to the petition of the trustees of said institution for the aid of the National Legislature." From some cause, unknown to us, the memorial thus ordered, was never presented by the committee appointed to prepare it. Your committee find that the principle and policy of extending relief to institutions of this character, have been recognized by the Congress of the United States, in a grant made to the Connecticut asylum, and in that case they discover a strong precedent to justify the passage of a bill for the benefit of the Kentucky asylum. They, therefore, beg leave to report a bill.

POST OFFICE BILL.

On motion of Mr. F. JOHNSON, the previous orders of the day were dispensed with; (ayes 76, noes 59,) and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill "reducing into one the several acts for establishing and regulating the Post Office Department."

Mr. LONG offered an amendment, inserting after the words "Military post," the words "or town;" which was not agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved that the Committee rise, with a view of taking up the subject of the Beaumarchais claim; which was negatived, only 44 rising in its favor.

Mr. LITTLE moved to strike out the words "one fourth," in the first section of the Post Office bill, and insert "one sixth," but, on suggestion of Mr. JOHNSON, modified the motion to "one fifth."

Mr. RANDOLPH opposed the amendment, and moved to strike out the whole clause, from the 19th to the 25th line, viz:

"And where a route has been in operation two years, and does not produce one-fourth of the expenses incident to the same, he shall discontinue the transportation of the mail on such route, except it be the only route that leads to the seat of justice of any county, a place where a land office is established, or an important military post, and report the same to the next session of Congress."

He advocated his motion by a short speech.

Mr. MALLARY took the same side, and Messrs. ROSS and LIVERMORE further advocated the motion.

Mr. LITTLE then withdrew his amendment in favor of that of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. J. JOHNSON opposed the amendment, and advocated the retaining of this clause of the bill, which he insisted was likely to produce a great saving to Government, without any serious inconvenience to the people.

MAY, 1824.

Post Office Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. HAMILTON advocated the amendment, and contended that the saving contemplated would be a bad and narrow economy.

Mr. WICKLIFFE spoke in reply, and stated facts to show that the provision in the section would be wise and salutary.

Messrs. SAUNDERS and LIVERMORE followed in opposition.

Mr. F. JOHNSON offered so to amend the section as not to make it imperative, but only discretionary, in the Postmaster to strike out such routes as did not produce more than one-sixth of the expense of transporting the mail.

Mr. WHIPPLE hoped the section would be retained, and assigned various reasons in its favor.

Mr. MANGUM opposed the section in a short speech, and advocated the amendment, on the ground of the indispensable necessity of diffused information in a free Government.

Mr. ISACKS spoke a few words on the same side; and, the question being then taken, was decided in the affirmative—ayes 75, noes 37.

So the section was stricken out.

Some further amendments were agreed to, in respect to certain dates in the bill, making its operation commence three months later than at first.

Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, moved a proviso to the third section, in the following words:

“Provided, That no postmaster shall be considered as in arrears, until a reasonable time be allowed him (the postmaster) for settling his accounts.”

Mr. SHARPE opposed this amendment as unnecessary, since postmasters are only to settle once in three months.

Mr. COCKE, also, objected to its adoption.

Mr. OWEN replied, and insisted on the difference between being in arrears to Government, for want of an opportunity to settle, and being a defaulter, after such opportunity has been afforded.

Mr. WRIGHT went into some details of the establishment, and suggested, as a preferable amendment, the following words:

“Provided, That the postmaster shall not have refused to pay any draft made upon him by the Postmaster General.”

Mr. F. JOHNSON explained that part of the bill proposed to be amended, and replied to the arguments for the amendments.

Mr. REED opposed the whole section, as over strict, and calculated to defeat its own object.

Messrs. WHIPPLE, WOOD, and BARTLETT, spoke in reply, and defended the provisions of the act in its proposed form.

Mr. GAZLAY suggested an amendment, which went to strike out the word “arrears,” and insert a clause which provides, “that the postmaster shall have neglected either to transmit his accounts or to forward the money he owes.”

Mr. TEST suggested another amendment, which went to strike out the words “is in arrears,” and substitute the words “shall not at the time be in default.”

The question was taken on this amendment, and decided in the negative—ayes 36, noes 76.

Mr. GAZLAY offered the following amendment: “Provided every postmaster shall execute the duties of his office, and his securities be holden until his successor be appointed and qualified.”

Messrs. F. JOHNSON and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, opposed this amendment, and Mr. GAZLAY defended it, as common in all other offices, and necessary in this.

Mr. BRADLEY opposed, and Mr. REED advocated the amendment.

Mr. WHIPPLE replied, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved to strike out, in the 4th section, “in a penalty equal at least to one year’s salary,” and insert “in such penalty as the Postmaster General shall require;” which was agreed to.

Mr. MCKIM moved to strike out “eight,” and insert “four,” in the 5th section; agreed to.

Mr. GAZLAY opposed, at considerable length, the whole of the 7th section of the bill.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, moved to amend the 8th section by inserting, after the words “a free white person,” the words “of not less than eighteen years of age.”

Messrs. LIVERMORE and McLEAN, of Ohio, opposed, and Mr. COCKE supported, the amendment; and, the question being taken, it was rejected.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to amend the 12th section, by striking out “one” and inserting “two.” The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR stated, at length, the case of the Postmaster at Fredericksburg, and pleaded the propriety of raising his salary.

Mr. F. JOHNSON acknowledged the salary to be inadequate, but opposed making an insulated provision, in a bill of this kind, while so many other cases of a similar kind might be urged.

Mr. A. STEVENSON replied, and quoted provisions of the bill for the Postmaster at New Orleans, at Wheeling, and other offices. If it was proper in their case, it was equally proper in this.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR further supported his application, and insisted that the case of Mr. Gray, the postmaster at Fredericksburg, was a stronger one than any other which could be produced in the whole United States, and he challenged such production. He read extracts from the printed documents in support of his position, and followed them by a speech of considerable length.

Messrs. F. JOHNSON and INGRAM replied, and stated what had been attempted towards providing better salaries for postmasters, and the want of success which had arisen from the want of funds in the Department.

Mr. LIVERMORE opposed the motion, and contended that the compensation was fully adequate to the labor.

Mr. COCKE replied, and maintained that, even with the proposed addition, the salary would be a miserable pittance in comparison to the duties performed.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR rejoined, and reiterated and extended the arguments before advanced, and compared the compensation of the Postmaster at Fredericksburg with that at New York, Baltimore, and other Atlantic cities.

Mr. LIVERMORE spoke in reply, and denied that the character or talents of the individual had any thing to do with the question, except his honesty. The duties were not so heavy as was supposed.

Mr. CULPEPER wished to make some remarks, and moved that the Committee rise. The motion was negatived.

Mr. CULPEPER then stated a number of facts in relation to the duties of postmasters.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and was decided in the negative—ayes 51, noes 68.

After some other not important proceedings on the bill—

Mr. McKIM moved that the Committee rise, which was carried—ayes 82. The Committee rose accordingly, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 5.

The Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the consideration of the petition of William Eaton, and leave was given to withdraw the same.

Mr. TATTNALL was appointed on the Committee on Military Affairs, in the place of Thomas J. Rogers, resigned.

The Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt," were discharged from the consideration thereof; and the bill was recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. COCKE laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved. That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House at its next session, a detailed report of the system and plan of fortifications, at present contemplated by him, and as recommended by the Board of Engineers, including the plans and surveys of said fortifications, so far as, in his opinion, the same may be communicated without injury to the public service; and, also, the number and position of the fortifications, heretofore at any time erected, or which are now erecting, or to be erected, for the defence of the coast, harbors, and frontiers of the United States, distinguishing those on the seacoast in one class, and those on each frontier, in like classes, and including all the fortifications which are to be preserved, as part of the plan for the future defence of the country: And, showing, under proper heads, the State in which each is situated, when begun, which of them are finished, and when; with the magnitude of each; (as well those erected before, as since the year 1815,) the aggregate amount expended in erecting such as are completed; the amount of repairs since made, particularly upon those that were finished prior to the year 1815; the amount expended on those now erecting, and the estimates to complete the same; the number of guns, of every description and caliber, for each fortification, to complete its armament; the total cost of a complete armament for each; the force required to garrison each in time of war; the same in time of peace; noting those actually occupied, and with what force; and showing which, and how many of those erected prior to the year 1815, are found useless in the contemplated plan of defence; which, and how many of them have been; or are to be, abandoned; and the cost of each so abandoned, or to be abandoned; distinguishing between the original cost and subsequent repairs.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of a register for the schooner Five Sisters," was read the third time, and passed.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

The engrossed bill for the relief of certain persons who imported goods into Castine during the late war, was read a third time, and the question upon its passage, gave rise to some debate.

[The case of these persons is substantially as follows: They were importers of British merchandise into Castine, in the Province of Maine, during the late war, whilst the place was in the possession of the British forces, on which they paid duties to the British authorities. When that port again passed into the hands of the United States at the close of the late war, the officers of the United States demanded payment of duties on the goods which they found there, having been thus imported. The importers, to avoid difficulty in regard to their property, gave the bonds required of them, for the duties. When these bonds became due, a part of them were paid, and payment of part of them was resisted, and successfully resisted in the courts of the United States, by whom the importers were exonerated from the payment of their bonds. The object of this bill is to refund to those who had paid their bonds the amount thereof, so as to place them on the same footing with those who had refused to pay them, and were sustained in that refusal by the courts of the United States.]

The passage of the bill was opposed by Mr. COOKE, and supported by Mr. McLANE of Delaware, who explained the principles which governed the Committee of Ways and Means in reporting the bill. It was also supported by Mr. SHARPE, Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. LINCOLN; and opposed by Mr. GAZLAY, Mr. MALLARY, Mr. GARRISON, Mr. FOOT of Connecticut, Mr. BUCK, Mr. WHIPPLE, and Mr. TOD.

The ground of the opposition to the bill was, that the importers paid to the British authorities nominal duties only, and that great part of the goods imported were transported overland into the United States, thus evading payment of duties to the United States, and the portion found in store by the officers of the United States took a similar course, and were actually the first goods brought into the markets of the United States at the close of the war.

The question on the passage of the bill was taken by yeas and nays: For the bill 89, against it 86; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

POST OFFICE BILL.

On motion of Mr. F. JOHNSON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department.

Mr LONG, of North Carolina, after stating some change of opinion in relation to the vote of yesterday, refusing to increase the compensation of the Postmaster at Fredericksburg, moved a reconsideration of that vote.

The motion was supported by Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, Mr. HOGEBOOM, and the mover, and opposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, of New York, and Mr. GAZLAY, of Ohio, and decided in the negative—ayes 47, noes 61.

The question then recurring from yesterday, on a motion to strike out the extra allowance to the Postmasters at Warrenton, Wheeling, and New Orleans.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, stated the details of the business transacted at the office at Warrenton, and opposed the striking out of so much of the clause as relates to that office.

Mr. GAZLAY replied, and argued against the allowance.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, supported his motion to strike out the whole of these extra allowances, on the ground of equal dealing to all the officers in this kind of employment.

Mr. WICKLIFFE spoke in opposition to the extra allowance to the Postmaster at New Orleans.

Mr. GURLEY, of Louisiana, spoke in reply, and contended that this compensation was reasonable and necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, took the same ground with Mr. WICKLIFFE, and went somewhat into detail, in a statement of the facts connected with the business of the offices, &c.

The question, at the request of Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, was divided; and being on the extra allowance for the post office at Wheeling—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, opposed the abolition of it. Mr. GURLEY argued in favor of the extra compensations, particularly that at New Orleans, and corrected some alleged mistakes in point of fact. Mr. ROSS contended that the postmaster at Wheeling was as much entitled to the compensation he received as either of the others in question.

The question being then taken on striking out each of these extra provisions, it was carried almost unanimously, in each case, to strike them out.

Mr. SAUNDERS then moved to strike out all that part of the section which relates to the Postmaster at Washington, as follows:

“The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to allow to the Postmaster of the city of Washington, in addition to the allowance made by this act, for postage collected, and for free letters received by him for delivery, a commission of five per cent. on the amount of mails distributed at his office: Provided, nevertheless, That the whole annual emolument of the said postmaster, including the extra compensation of one thousand dollars which is hereby allowed him, shall be subjected to the restrictions imposed by the forty-second section of this act.”

Mr. F. JOHNSON opposed this motion; and, on the question being put upon it, there were in the affirmative 65, in the negative 27.

This not being a quorum, the discussion was renewed by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, who went into a calculation to show that the effect of the motion would reduce the salary of the Postmaster at Washington, from $1,900 to $900 per annum, which he opposed.

Mr. COCKE replied; and was followed by Mr. LIVERMORE, on the same side.

A motion was then made by Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, to strike out the enacting words of the bill, which was decided in the negative, by a large majority; and, the question being then taken on striking out the clause last recited, it was decided in the affirmative. So the clause was stricken out.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to add to the section, as now amended, the following words: “Whenever, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the compensation allowed by law is inadequate to the service required of him, (viz. the postmaster,) he may make him such further allowance as the public interest may require.”

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. ROSS opposed the amendment, and it was rejected by a large majority.

On motion of Mr. LATHROP, the Committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

Post Office Bill.—Florida Treaty Awards.

MAY, 1824.

THURSDAY, May 6.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom the subject had been referred, by sundry memorials from inhabitants and millers, residing in Virginia, reported a bill further to regulate the inspection of flour, in the county of Alexandria; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. KENT, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled, "An act altering the times of holding the courts in the District of Columbia," reported the same with an amendment; which was read, and agreed to by the House, and the amendment ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill, granting a tract of land to the parish of West Baton Rouge, on certain conditions; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the cases of Joseph M. White and William Davidson, of Florida, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The resolution, yesterday offered by Mr. COCKE, calling on the President for information in respect to the fortifications, was taken up.

The mover offered an additional clause in the words following: "And in all cases wherein sums of money have been already expended, or authorized to be so expended, the authority therefor, by reference to the amount and date of each appropriation; with a like reference to the law under which any of said works were erected." Agreed to.

Mr. LITTLE objected, that resolutions had already passed requiring, in substance, the same thing with that now offered.

Mr. COCKE replied, and explained. It was desirable to have a general statement of the whole mass of information on this subject in one document—it could not now be procured except imperfectly, and in detached parts. After some farther conversation between Mr. SHARPE and Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, by leave of the House, presented a memorial and petition of divers inhabitants of the city of Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, holders of Virginia military land warrants, representing their inability to locate the said warrants, on lands set apart for that purpose by the State of Virginia, lying between Ludlow's and Roberts's line, in the State of Ohio; and praying that other lands may be set apart by the United States, to satisfy said warrants; which memorial and petition was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts allow to the Clerk of this House an account for an adequate and reasonable compensation to the person employed by him to prepare an Index to the volumes containing the Executive communications, &c., directed to be prepared, by a resolution of this House, at the present session of Congress.

POST OFFICE BILL.

Mr. F. JOHNSON made a few observations on the necessity and importance of taking up and going through this bill, which has been already partially acted upon; the system, extensive and cumbersome, required several modifications and improvements which had been carefully prepared, after mature reflection, by the Postmaster General and the Committee of this House, and he should consider the vote of the House, on going into Committee of the Whole on the bill as indicative of its determination to pass the bill or not, at the present session.

The House then went into Committee on the bill, (Mr. TOMLINSON in the Chair.)

Mr. JOHNSON offered a substitute to the 19th section; which was read.

Mr. CLAY now rose, and observed that a bill of such great extent, containing more than forty sections, and involving some new principles of criminal law, could not, at this late period of the session, receive that mature attention which it required. There was scarcely a possibility that it could pass both Houses at the present session; and it would only consume time peculiarly precious. He therefore moved, that the Committee rise, with an understanding that leave be refused to sit again.

Mr. F. JOHNSON opposed this motion, on account of the importance of the bill, &c.

Mr. CLAY replied, in a few words, and the question on rising was then decided in the affirmative—ayes 76, noes 62.

The Committee rose accordingly; and, on giving leave to sit again, there were ayes 70, noes 76.

So the House refused leave to the Committee to sit again, and the bill was then laid on the table.

FLORIDA TREATY AWARDS.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LATHROP in the Chair,) on the bill "to authorize the creation of a stock to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, to provide for the awards of the Commissioners under the treaty with Spain of the 22d February, 1819."

Mr. McLANE explained the object and provisions of this bill. He went into an examination of the stipulations of the Florida treaty, and contended that the United States are thereby bound to pay the whole sum of five millions, whatever might be the proceeds of the sales of the lands ceded. To do this, the treaty suggests three different modes, and the selection of one of these is a question of expediency, of which this Government is to judge—and he stated the comparative advantages of different modes, and contended that that provided in the bill is the most advantageous. He objected to the creation of a 6 per cent. stock, payable out of the public lands, and maintained that it would be a saving of nearly one million of dollars at once to pay the money at the Treasury, borrowing a like amount at a rate not exceeding five (possibly four) per cent. per annum. He offered an amendment, which would cause the clause amended to read as follows:

MAY, 1824.

Florida Treaty Awards.

H. OF R.

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be and he is hereby authorized, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to cause to be issued and sold to the Bank of the United States, or to others, at a sum not less than the par value thereof, certificates of stock," &c.

Mr. F. JOHNSON opposed the bill as premature—and thought it would be better to pay the claimants for spoliations by Spain, by offering them either stock or lands in Florida. It would be better to wait for the report of the decisions of the board of commissioners before provision was made to pay the amount of their awards.

Mr. McLANE replied. The decision referred to must, by the treaty, be rendered in June next—so that provision must now be made to meet it.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR was of opinion that the payment of the capital of the five millions might be postponed till the public lands were sold; but, that, in the interim, the interest must be paid on the amount awarded.

Mr. CLAY maintained that, by the treaty, we are not bound to pay interest on the capital of five millions, and thought it was premature to pay it at this time. The mode selected to discharge the debt was the most onerous of those pointed out in the treaty, and though something had been said of getting the money at four per cent. he doubted if such would turn out to be the fact. If it could be had at that rate, why was not such rate put down in the bill? He went into a discussion of the stipulations of the treaty, and compared the three optional modes of paying the money agreed on. He differed from Mr. BARBOUR in the opinion that the interest must be paid, whether the lands are sold or not. He thought both principal and interest were payable out of the sales of the lands in Florida. He would prefer issuing a stock, both the principal and interest of which should be payable out of the fund created by the sales of the Florida lands. The saving proposed by the bill, between five and six per cent. was deceptive. The stock, when thrown into the market, would not bring more than 75 per cent. and yet must be paid at par. He opposed the bill, and gave warning that, if its passage were pressed, he should offer amendments, the effect of which should be to make the stock payable only out of the sales of the lands.

Mr. STORAS went into a history of the Florida treaty. He contended that, by its provisions, the Government is bound to its citizens to make satisfaction for the Spanish spoliations, as soon as the amount of their claims shall be liquidated. He, therefore, thought Congress had no moral right to leave this stock unprovided for till the next session. He insisted that interest on this stock must be paid, as interest on all the other Government stock is paid, and might not be left to run on till the lands shall be sold. He thought the sooner the debt was paid, the better, especially if the money can be had on low terms.

Mr. McLANE rose in reply. He had spoken on authority, when he had said the money could be got at four and a half per cent. Such an offer had actually been made—and five had been inserted in the bill as a measure of precaution, to cover fluctuations in the money market. It would not be wise to defer this payment to next session: as then five millions of the war debt must be provided for. The measure now proposed was not one of the Committee of Ways and Means. It had been urged upon the House by the people of the United States. Mr. McLANE defended the mode now proposed as only meeting the spirit and form of the treaty stipulation. He denied that the interest might be deferred. If it might, and should be so deferred, in seventeen years the sum would be doubled, and the claimants lose their debt. He insisted that the difference between the interest of four and a half and six per cent. would be an actual saving to the Government. Suppose the Florida lands should not bring the five millions, the Government must make up the deficiency.

Mr. LIVERMORE contended, that, if the lands failed to bring the whole sum, the Government is not, under the treaty, bound to pay any more than the actual amount of sales. He recommended that, if money could be had at four and half per cent. the bill should be altered to that rate.

The debate was farther continued by Messrs. RANKIN, CAMBRELENG, MALLARY, BUCHANAN, and LIVINGSTON, who advocated, and by Mr. TAYLOR and Mr. CLAY, who opposed the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the Committee rise and report progress, with a view that leave might be refused to sit again. The motion was negatived, ayes 69, noes 76.

The debate was then renewed, by Mr. FORSYTH, who spoke in favor of the passage of the bill.

On motion of Mr. SHARPE, the bill was amended by reducing the rate of interest at which the five millions may be borrowed, from five per cent. to four and a half per cent.

Mr. CLAY moved so to amend the bill as to make it read—

"The Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to cause to be issued certificates of stock of the United States to any amount not exceeding the sum of five millions of dollars, and bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, from the — day of June, 1824, which stock, so created, shall be redeemable out of the proceeds of the sale of the lands ceded to the United States by the aforesaid treaty."

Mr. McLANE opposed the amendment, and the debate was further prosecuted by Messrs. CLAY, FOOT, of Connecticut, CALL, REED, and ARCHER.

The question on the amendment of Mr. CLAY was then disagreed to, ayes 62, noes 89.

Mr. COCKE offered the following amendment, which was adopted, nem. con.

"And provided, also, That, in all cases where the person or persons in whose name, or for whose benefit and interest, the aforesaid awards shall be made, be in debt and in arrears to the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury shall retain the same out of the amount of the aforesaid awards, in the first instance, and a warrant or certificate, as the case may be, shall issue only for the balance."

The bill and amendments having been read, were reported to the House.

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the first day of December next.

Mr. J. supported his motion in a short speech, and called for the yeas and nays upon it; but afterwards withdrew his motion to postpone.

Mr. ROSS renewed the motion made by Mr. F. JOHNSON, to postpone the consideration of the bill to the first day of December next.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke in opposition to the motion, and in favor of the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, added a remark on the same side; and the question on postponement was then decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—yeas 53, nays 105—as follows:

FRIDAY, May 7.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was recommitted the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M.

Belt," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GAZLAY moved to consider the resolution, some days since offered by him, in relation to a lot in Symmes's patent; which was carried. The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MERCER called up a joint resolution, offered long since by Mr. VAN RENSSLAER, (now absent on leave,) and which makes provision for including the Capitol and public grounds under the police regulations of the Corporation of the City of Washington.

The House agreed to consider it, and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The following bills from the Senate, viz:

A bill altering the times of holding the courts in the District of Columbia;

A bill declaring the consent of Congress to a certain act of the State of Alabama; and

The engrossed bill further to regulate the inspection of flour in the county of Alexandria were respectively read a third time, and passed.

A communication was received from the Post Office Department, containing a statement of contracts made during the year past.

A bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Colonel William Duane," was considered, in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading.

A bill "for the relief of Thomas Shields" was taken up, in Committee of the Whole, reported to the House, and was then ordered to lie on the table.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred that part of the President's Message which relates to repairs of the Cumberland road, made a report thereon; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

The committee, to which was referred that part of the President's Message which relates to the repairs of the Cumberland road, report:

That, in the opinion of the committee, the Congress of the United States have complete power to establish tolls on the Cumberland road, for the purpose of defraying the expense of future repairs, and of providing, by suitable penalties, for its protection against future injury. This right in Congress has been solemnly declared by both branches of the Legislature, on several occasions, and in particular by the passage of a bill for the erection of toll-gates on this road, containing the usual penalties, which bill passed in the Senate and House of Representatives by considerable majorities. The principle contained in the bill, in the opinion of the committee, assumed no State jurisdiction; it was simply the exercise of a power to secure the full enjoyment of a law of the United States, which had been constitutionally enacted. The act of an infringement of a United States law, with a few exceptions, must necessarily be committed within the territory of a State, but he who commits the offence is to be punishable by the United States. This does not carry with it any State jurisdiction; and it would seem to be a position indispensable, that, in order to give efficacy to the laws, the General Government must be invested with a power to protect its own Constitutional legislation.

The General Government cannot acquire exclusive jurisdiction, except over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings; the States can, in no other instance, give jurisdiction to the United States. The General Government derives its whole power from the Constitution, and it can neither be increased nor diminished, in the slightest particular; by any other means than by an amendment of the Constitution.

The General Government and the States are to act in their own proper spheres, upon the powers they respectively possess; they cannot exchange powers, or, by any consent or combination of powers, give or take jurisdiction from each other.

To recommend a law to authorize the President to enter into an arrangement with the several States through which the road passes, to establish tolls, each within its limits, would imply a doubt on this important subject, which the committee do not entertain.

Concerning the policy of the measure, also, the committee will most respectfully suggest, that it probably would not answer the end expected. The mixing of authorities over this road might lead to unpleasant results; one State might erect toll-gates within its limits; and the other refuse; in that case, the road would belong to different jurisdictions; and, even if all were to unite in the erection of toll-gates within their respective limits, different interests might be felt, and the road unequally repaired. The Western States, too, might complain of the state of repairs, which would produce irritation and uneasiness among sister States.

And, as regards the States themselves, would they be willing to undertake the trouble of the management of a road, not made mainly for their own accommodation?

If they enter into any arrangement, they must take care that it is annually complied with. One statement must be annually sent to the State Legislatures for their examination, and another account of the proceeding must be sent, annually, to the General Government, for its inspection.

If the States do not comply with the arrangement, the right over the road must be receded to the United States—some might comply, and others fail; in this case, the road again would belong to different jurisdictions.

And, if there should be a difference of opinion as to a compliance with the arrangement, how is it to be adjusted? Would any of the States be willing to hold a jurisdiction so conditional and dependent—one by which they would be obliged to render an annual account of their proceedings to another authority? It appears to the committee, that the superintendence of the road ought exclusively to belong to a single jurisdiction.

It has been the constant and anxious solicitude of the Committee on the Cumberland Road, that the expense of repairing it should be raised by the collection of tolls; and it is believed that it is the general wish of the western section of the country, that the road should be maintained at the expense of those who use it, and not by the annual appropriation of money.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to authorize the President of the United States to enter into any arrangement with the several States, or any of them, on the subject of the Cumberland road.

NAVIGATION OF WESTERN RIVERS.

Mr. HENRY, of Kentucky, moved to postpone all previous orders of the day, to go into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "for improving the Ohio and Mississippi rivers;" and a bill "for deepening the harbor at Presque Isle, and for repairing Plymouth beach;" which was carried—ayes 69, noes 46.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on these bills, Mr. MARKLEY in the Chair.

Mr. HENRY, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the two first sections of the first of the above bills, and insert the following:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to take prompt and effectual measures for improving the navigation of the waters of the Ohio river, by causing channels to be cut through all the bars which cross the current of said river, from Brownsville, in Pennsylvania, to the Mississippi, upon which said bars there shall not be, at the lowest stage, at least three feet of water; or by causing dykes or sluices, and wing walls, to be constructed upon said bars, or by such other mode as, in each particular case, may be deemed most advisable."

Mr. HENRY made an explanatory statement of the facts, and of the nature of the plan proposed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE objected to the plan proposed in the amendment, and thought the improvement should be confined to the eradication of trees partially sunk in the river.

Mr. RANDOLPH coincided in this view, and stated the result of experiments on the Rappahannock and Roanoke rivers.

Mr. HENRY replied, and defended his amendment.

Mr. CLAY suggested the following modification, viz: to strike out the clause which describes the mode of improving the river by dams, sluices, &c., and insert the following "so as to insure, at the driest season, a uniform depth of three feet of water over each of said bars; and, for this purpose, the President is authorized to employ any of the engineers in the public service which he may deem proper."

The amendment, thus modified, was agreed to, nem. con.

The blank for the distance below the surface at which the planters and sawyers shall be cut off, was filled with ten feet.

Mr. SOOTR moved to amend the bill in the fourth section, by including in its provisions the river Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The blank for the sum to be appropriated was filled with $75,000.

Mr. CLAY moved to rise and report the bill, and accompanied the motion with a series of observations on the circumstances of the case for which the bill provides.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill concerning the navigation of the Ohio and Missisissippi, and asked leave to sit again upon the other bill committed to it; which was granted.

FIVE MILLIONS NEW STOCK.

The engrossed bill "to authorize the creation of a stock to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars to provide for the awards of the Commissioners under the treaty with Spain, of the 22d of February, 1819," was read a third time.

Mr. BEECHER moved to lay the bill on the table. The motion was negatived—only 45 members rising in favor of it.

Mr. SLOANE expressed an opinion unfavorable to the bill, and demanded the yeas and nays on the question of its passage; which were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, delivered his sentiments in opposition to the passage of the bill; and was followed on the same side by Mr. GAZLAY.

Mr. SHARPE spoke in reply, and the debate was further continued by Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. CALL, and Mr. TEST; all of whom opposed the bill. Mr. FARRELLY spoke in its support.

Mr. TEST addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I have very seldom intruded myself upon this House, and nothing, sir, but the firmest conviction, that to be silent would be a dereliction of my duty, could induce me, at this time, to ask the indulgence of the House to offer a few remarks upon the subject under consideration. I am called upon, by the bill upon your table, to vote away five millions of the people's money, and such is the repugnance of my mind to the feature and principles of that bill, that I feel myself called upon, by every consideration of justice and sound policy, to place upon it my solemn veto. I shall endeavor to condense my ideas into as few words as possible, to render myself intelligible; and, although I cannot hope to change the opinion of a single member of this House, after the protracted discussion which the subject has undergone, yet I cannot feel that I shall have done justice to my country, if I pass it by in silence. The charge against the Government, to the extinguishment of which the moneys intended to be raised by the operation of the present bill is to be applied, arises out of a treaty concluded between the United States and the persons exercising the Government of Spain in the year 1819, wherein it is stipulated between the two Powers, that "the Government of the United States shall pay to its own citizens a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars, for spoliations committed upon our commerce, and unlawful seizures made by Spain, of the property of our citizens;" the payment to be made immediately, "at the Treasury, or by the creation of stock bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands in Florida; or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may by law prescribe;" these payments to be made "after certain Commissioners, named in the treaty, or a majority of them, shall have adjusted and allowed the claims," which claims, it is admitted on all hands, never have, as yet, been adjusted and allowed, and which have been under consideration about three years. The decision of this question depends in part upon the construction which may be given to the above clause of the treaty, and the policy proper to be pursued under that construction. Hence, two general questions present themselves for our consideration—1, What is the proper construction to be given to this treaty? and 2, What shall be a correct policy to be pursued under that construction? In the solution of the first question, it becomes necessary to inquire, what were the motives or causes which led to the making of, or entering into, the treaty? What is the nature of the obligation imposed upon the contracting parties? and, lastly, What rights do the claimants derive under it? There are two leading causes or motives for making and entering into treaties between nations—one is of a nature mild and peaceable, for the extension and regulation of friendly relations already subsisting between the parties; the other is of a nature adverse and hostile, for the reparation of friendly relations which once subsisted between them, but which had been broken off, and for a redress of grievances which had occurred during the suspension of those friendly relations, and comes in place of war. In the last general class of causes, there may be various motives for entering into a treaty with a foreign Power—as when you are totally incapable of contending on equal grounds, for the want of an adequate force, or the want of due preparation, or, where the nation with which you contend has nothing to indemnify you for going to war; and when, from their peculiar situation, to go to war with them would not add to your honor or your present or future safety; and, under all or any of these circumstances, the most powerful nation would find a sufficient motive, and be fairly warranted in making a treaty, inadequate to the purposes of equal retribution and indemnification.

The causes which led to the making of the treaty under consideration seem to be of the latter kind; that is, for the reparation of friendly relations which once subsisted between this Government and Spain, and for the redress of grievances which occurred during the suspension of those friendly relations; and is expressed in the treaty to be for spoliations committed on our commerce, or "unlawful seizures made by Spain of the property of our citizens." As the causes or motives which led to the promulgation of this treaty are only adverted to as matters of reference in its construction, and as they are set out in the treaty itself, it would seem a waste of time (which has now become very precious) to go into a detail of the various aggressions which induced this Government to call upon Spain for indemnity, and more especially as every honorable gentleman in this House must be well acquainted with them.

The next inquiry which occurs is, what is the nature of the obligations imposed upon the contracting parties? Every treaty comprehends several duties or obligations. Those which arise between the contracting Powers as bodies politic; those which exist between the citizens or subjects of those Powers; those which subsist between the respective Governments, and the citizens or subjects of each Power; and those which are common to the Government, and its own citizens or subjects. Without going very deeply into abstract reasonings, it seems necessary, to inquire a little into the nature of Governments, to come to a correct conclusion upon the case before us. Man, in a state of nature, independent of all political regulations, is bound to act honestly toward his fellow-man, and to do him all the good he can without subjecting himself to an injury; hence, where one man in this state of existence does another an injury, that other has a right to indemnity in some mode allowed by the law of nature, and, under such circumstances, might redress his own wrongs. But, having entered into the social compact, he is precluded from doing so: and, being so precluded, he has a right to call upon his Government to do that for him which he is not at liberty to do for himself; but, at the same time, that he has a right to call upon his Government to redress wrongs committed against him by other Governments or their subjects, he has no right to expect any other reparation than that which he himself could have obtained, with competent power to enforce his claim; or, in other words, he can have no claim to an indemnity from his own Government which would not have been in the power of the aggressor to make. The examination of these principles will lead to a correct understanding of the obligation which the Government is under to those claimants for whose benefit the money in this bill is to be applied. Let us for a moment refer to the relative situation of the Government to those claimants, and see how they stand toward each other. It is a well established, fundamental principle of the social system, that a man gives up a share of his natural rights and privileges, that he may have the remainder better secured to him; and one of those privileges which he surrenders, as before hinted, is his right to redress his own wrongs; and having given up that privilege, he has a right to expect of his Government to redress them, so far as shall be convenient and proper, taking into view every circumstance connected with its accomplishment. The Government, therefore, takes upon itself the task of redressing the wrongs of its subjects or citizens, agreeably to the principles before stated, keeping always in view the good of the whole community. Therefore, when it makes a treaty with an aggressing Power, it is its duty to provide for its own indemnity and the indemnity of all its subjects, if convenient, and reasonably practicable; hence, it becomes a protector or guardian for them, not only to see that other nations do them justice, but to do them justice itself; and from this parental and protecting character, and none other, arises all the claims which its citizens or subjects have upon it; and for the purpose of carrying into effect all its functions with the greater facility, it is divided into departments, each of which has assigned to it certain limited and defined powers, and which every other department, as well as every citizen, is bound to respect, confide in, and submit to, so long as it acts within the sphere of its own authority; among these departments, or divisions of the Government, is the treaty-making power, and which is as perfect and absolute in the exercise of its various functions, and is entitled to as much deference, as any other power acting within the scope of its authority; and when that power has been exerted upon a particular occasion, its act is binding, not only on those immediately connected with the transaction, but upon the whole community.

Having examined the general powers of the Government, and its duties towards individuals who compose it, so far as they seem necessary for my purpose, I will apply those principles to the case before us, and see what will be the result. If I have laid down a single principle which is not substantially warranted by the authorities, or which will not stand the test of ethical analysis, I shall be open to correction and conviction by honorable gentlemen opposed to me. In this case, then, the Government of Spain has made unlawful seizures of the property of the claimants; this Government, as the guardian and protector of their rights, has interposed between them and Spain, and concluded the treaty now under consideration, to indemnify and remunerate them for losses sustained in consequence of such unlawful seizures. For the clear understanding of the nature of the obligation of the Government to those claimants, it will be necessary to give the several clauses of this treaty a separate and distinct consideration. As it regards the adequacy or inadequacy of the redress secured by it to those claimants; or, in other words, whether it be a provident or improvident treaty, I conceive, is not a subject for our present consideration. If, however, I were to give an opinion, I should say we had a right to presume it was the best that could have been gotten at the time. There is no honorable gentleman in this House that does not know the deranged—nay, the miserable vassal and bankrupt condition of that nation at the time it was made. And, although it may suit some honorable gentlemen to decry the treaty and the treaty-makers, I am disposed to make the best of the one, and think the most charitably of the others. Yet, however improvident the whole treaty may be, and inadequate the redress to the claimants, it is not for us now to change the nature of the former, or make up the deficiency in the latter; a duty has devolved upon us to carry it into effect, according to the terms of it, as the treaty-making power has laid them down—for that having passed upon it, it is conclusive with us. It is a co-ordinate branch of the Government, it has its powers to exercise, and its duties to perform; and, having performed them, it is not for us to violate our trust by trampling upon its authority, even if it had acted wrong; for, by so doing, we should make ourselves particeps criminis. If the honorable gentlemen who signed this treaty have looked over the interests of these claimants, and have taken an insufficient indemnity, let the responsibility rest with them; let us do our duty, and carry it into effect, in the manner they have prescribed. It was their duty to make the treaty; it is ours to carry it into effect according to its terms. The honorable gentleman from New York cannot see in this treaty a triple alternative; I think I can very plainly see a double one.

H. of R.

Five Millions New Stock.

The language of the treaty is: "The Government may, after the Commissioners shall have admitted and allowed the claims to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, pay them immediately at the Treasury, or in the creation of stock at six per centum per annum, payable from the proceeds of sales of the public lands in the territories ceded, or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may prescribe by law."

If these, then, are the terms of the treaty, what is the duty of the Government resulting from it, as regards the claimants? It is the duty of the Government now to discharge its obligations to the claimants in good faith, according to equity and justice. Obligations between the Government and the people are like all other obligations, and ought to be construed like them. I lay down the following as correct rules of construction with regard to contracts: All implied contracts (of which this is one) are to be construed according to equity and natural justice, taking into consideration all the circumstances connected with the transaction, or that thing which forms the consideration for making it. That each has a right to have it performed according to his reasonable expectation. That, in express contracts, where there is an alternative, or more than one mode of discharging them, the obligor has a right to select which of the modes he pleases; but when he has selected his mode, or made his choice, he is not at liberty afterwards to change it without the consent of the obliged. I further lay it down, as a fundamental principle with regard to trust and trustees, that the trustee can never be made accountable beyond the value of the trust estate, and that, where money is to be paid out of a certain or uncertain fund, you can never make the trustee or holder of the fund pay the money out of his own estate; and in no case can he be required to pay if until it becomes due. Here, then, it appears clearly, by the terms of the treaty, that the Government intended to reserve to itself the right to take into its own hands the fund out of which this money was to be paid, if circumstances would seem to warrant it—that is, if it should appear the lands were likely to turn out a productive fund, the object of the Government, no doubt, was to hold the land and pay the money immediately at the Treasury, or in such other manner as Congress might prescribe. Several reasons for such construction urge themselves upon the mind with great force.

It is said, by an honorable gentleman on the side of the question with myself, who is somewhat acquainted with its geography, that, although it is called "a land of flowers," it is, in fact, a land of sand heaps, musquitoes, frogs, serpents, and alligators. I know nothing of it myself, except what I have gathered from the general history of the country. But, I presume, its history or geography, at the time of the purchase, was very little known, which rendered its value very uncertain indeed, besides which, it may be recollected, that, by that same treaty, a part of that beautiful country, west and south of the Sabine river, and said to be more valuable than all the Floridas, was ceded to Spain as a part of the consideration for making the treaty—leaving it, indeed, very doubtful whether all the lands ceded to the United States would be more than sufficient to the demands of those claimants. Again, it does appear evident, that something of this kind must have borne weight with the treaty makers, as they have only undertaken by the treaty to secure to the claimants, a sum of not more than five millions of dollars—leaving the balance, which is said, by some, to amount to more than ten millions, to future negotiation or total abandonment, guarding, very cautiously, all the time, against pledging the Government, in any shape, for more than five millions of dollars. And further, for the very purpose of meeting the contingent or uncertain value of the Florida lands, they introduced the optional provision in the treaty, before alluded to, which secures to the Government the right to keep those lands, should they be found valuable, as an indemnity for the cession of the lands beyond the Sabine; and at the same time to exclude the idea of a responsibility beyond the value of the Florida lands. The Floridas, while under the dominion of Spain, had already occasioned a hiatus in our sovereignty along the Gulf. To obtain possession of it, therefore, was considered a matter of great importance; and, no doubt, a sacrifice of a portion of land beyond the Sabine was made for the purpose of accomplishing an object of so much importance to the Government as that of securing the control of a maritime frontier, from the northern extremity of Maine to the mouth of the Sabine. I think, then, I am fairly warranted in saying, that, considering every circumstance connected with the transaction, the deranged and impoverished condition of Spain, the probability of her total incapacity to make any reparation for injuries done us, the peculiar situation of the Floridas in relation to the United States, and the necessity of taking them, or nothing, this country at the time, still bleeding with wounds inflicted by a recent war, the facility, which its possession by a foreign Power gave to drain the Southern country of its black population, the miserable imbecility and corruption of the Spanish authorities, calculated rather to favor than detect and punish piracies; besides the reflection that the sinuosities and indentations of the coast, being eminently calculated to furnish a safe retreat in case of pursuit—hence, I say, under all these considerations, it was thought advisable to obtain the dominion and sovereignty of the country, if it could be had without actually paying money out of the Treasury—and hence, the sum stipulated to be paid the claimants was limited not to exceed five millions of dollars; and, at the same time, the payment confined to, and contingent upon, the value of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in those territories. This accounts, too, for the peculiar phraseology of the treaty in stating, "The five millions to be paid by the creation of stock, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, within the territories ceded." If it were intended that the whole of these claims should have been paid, why limit them to five millions? or, if it were intended that even this sum should be positively and unconditionally paid, why introduce the above restrictive clause? Why, I say, make it payable by the creation of stock with interest payable from the proceeds of the sales of those lands? The reason, I think is very obvious. It was never intended to pledge the Government beyond the value of those lands, and at the same time to make for the claimants the best possible bargain that could be, under these restrictive circumstances. I am here met by a position taken by some of the friends of this bill, that Government is bound, at all events, to pay the interest, annually, on the stock created, and that to issue it, redeemable only out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands in Florida, would be creating a stock, in its nature irredeemable, which is always unfavorable, say they, for the Government, as it goes to create a perpetuity, except at the caprice of the holder.

In reply to this proposition, I would remark, (and I think I am warranted by the rule of construction and the language of the instrument in making it,) that you cannot torture the words of the treaty, or so distort its meaning, as to draw from it such a conclusion. If the treaty-makers had intended that such construction should be given to it, why were they not explicit—why not put down the very words to be paid annually? Why use the circumlocution they have, when they might have come to it at once? Why leave it in doubt, or to construction? I say they have placed it, in my mind, beyond all doubt, and I conceive, in the mind of the whole world, except by the most unnatural distortion of the fair import of the words. Why did they not say the claims should be paid by the creation of stock at six per centum per annum, if such was their intention? If such language had been used, and they had stopped there, there could have been no misunderstanding, even with the most illiterate; or had they said they should be paid at the Treasury without saying more, no men—not even the claimants themselves—could have pretended to misunderstand them. They might have been much more concise, and have only said, the United States shall satisfy the claimants to the amount of five millions of dollars; that would have ended the matter with the most sceptical mind, and Government would have been left to its discretion to pay it in any way satisfactory to the claimants. But they have gone on and said, "Those claims should be paid, not exceeding five millions of dollars, in the creation of stock, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable from the proceeds of the sales of the lands in the territories ceded;" and the friends of the bill supply the words payable annually, not out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, but at the Treasury of the United States: for such is the effect of the construction for which they contend. Here principles for which I contended in the outset apply. The Government becomes a trustee for the claimants; it has negotiated for them; has made the best bargain it could for them, without going into a doubtful contest with the sword. It has secured to them a fund of uncertain value, of which it is willing to give them the whole benefit, if it becomes necessary to the satisfaction of their claims; reserving to itself, however, the right to the surplus, if any there be. I say that it is a fair presumption that it was the best bargain that could have been made for them with a bankrupt nation. The Government being the natural, or rather the legal guardian, of the claimants, it stands completely in the place of a trustee for them, and by no principle in equity can it be required to pay more than the value of the fund which it holds. Let it be however a good or bad bargain, it has been made by the treaty-making power of this country, a power over which this House has no immediate legal control. It is a contract completely binding upon this House, the nation, and the claimants themselves; and unless we mean to trample upon one of the constituted authorities of the country, and usurp a power never intended by the Constitution to have been placed in our hands, we shall conform ourselves to the contract made by that power. It is the duty of the Government, as the guardian of these claimants' rights, to make the best of the funds placed in its hands for them; and if they can be paid their interest annually out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, agreeably to the contract made for them, they ought to be paid; if not, they ought to be paid as speedily as possible, but without encroaching upon other funds of the Government. What will be the principle established by the passage of the bill upon your table? You not only set aside the solemn act of a co-ordinate authority, but, sir, you establish the principle, that, unless you can obtain complete pecuniary redress by treating with a nation, you must go to war. An honorable gentleman on my right tells you that the Government has interfered between the claimants and the Spanish authorities; it has undertaken their cause, and prevented them from seeking redress in their own way against that Power; and now, says the honorable gentleman, after interfering, and preventing them from making the best bargain they could, you are not willing to make them full reparation.

Why, sir, this is but begging the question, and is in fact only quarrelling with the constituted authorities of the country; it is admitting the Government had the right to interfere and make a bargain for the claimants, (which is the fact,) but because they have made, as gentlemen say, a bad bargain, they will not comply with it. Because the Government has not been able to obtain for them full indemnity for their losses, it must make them up for its goodness in interfering in their behalf. It is saying to the Government, you have been good enough to interpose your power, and obtain for us a partial redress of our grievances; we admit you have done the best you could, but as you have not done all you could, we now require of you to do the balance. We have trusted you to endeavor at obtaining the claims which were due to us; you have got for us all you could, but we are not satisfied. You ought to make us whole. When they are told that the Government had done the best it could for them, that is true enough, say they, but it has not done all it could—it might have gone to war; and as it has not done so, we now require it to pay us the whole amount of our claims. The principle which gentlemen on the opposite side contend for is really this: that where the Government interferes to negotiate, and cannot succeed in securing a perfect indemnity for all the losses of its citizens or subjects, it is bound, under every circumstance, to go to war, or make them full reparation for the aggressions of the enemy. What, then, sir, is the true nature of the contract between the Government and these claimants? Why, clearly, sir, that when those Commissioners, mentioned in the treaty, shall have admitted and allowed their claims to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, that the Government should create the stock for that amount, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, and issue certificates to the holders, (not subject to pay interest annually at the Treasury, as the gentlemen contend for;) but payable from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in those territories. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, a certificate of such stock were issued for a thousand dollars, expressing upon the face of it, that it would be good to the holder for the sum mentioned, payable out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the Floridas, and it were by accident to fall into the hands of any man but a stockjobber or a broker, (I have no insidious allusion to any set of men,) or into the hands of any man unacquainted with (the science of) this kind of dealing—for it has really become a matter of science at this day—would it ever strike him for a moment that he was to receive it in any other way than that expressed upon its face? I say, sir, would it ever strike him that he had nothing to do but to go to the Treasury of the United States once in every year and draw his sixty dollars' interest? Would he not be perfectly astonished, sir, on being told that that was the effect of the paper which he held in his hand? I ask the question emphatically, sir, would it not astonish him to hear, that, although these lands were not worth even the trouble of selling, yet he would be entitled to receive sixty dollars annually for his certificate. I say, sir, it would be matter of perfect astonishment. Nothing can be more plain than that the contract between the Government and these claimants is simply this: that after the claims are admitted and allowed, and not till then, they shall be paid by the creation of stock at six per cent. per annum, to be paid (principal and interest) out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the Floridas, and in no other manner whatever; and, sir, as a matter of justice, it becomes the duty of the Government to offer these lands for sale as soon as convenient, and in the way best calculated to secure for them a fair price. And, sir, I say again, with the firmest conviction of its truth and rectitude, that this Government is not responsible beyond the value of the lands. The nature and extent of the obligation being thus ascertained, it will not be a very difficult matter to determine the rights of the parties or claimants under it. It may be necessary, however, to make some general observations with regard to the rights of individuals in relation to their own government. As a man, when he enters the social compact, relinquishes the right of revenging his own wrongs, or procuring redress in his own person, it is the duty of his government to do that for him which he has put it out of his power to do for himself; and to observe, at the same time, to do justice itself; but it is not to do more than justice, for whatever it does more than justice to one individual, is so much injustice done to another.

H. OF R.

Five Millions New Stock.

The present claimants can have no pretensions to the lands ceded, but only to the proceeds of the sales, so far as may be necessary to satisfy their claims, to the amount of five millions of dollars, and the interest on their stock, and no more; for, as the Government has interested itself so far as to permit the treaty-making power to negotiate for them, that power is unlimited in its operations, as respects the subjects within its sphere; so that, whatever stipulations it may have made in their behalf, those stipulations are conclusive between them and the Government, and no power under heaven has a right to infringe them, or set them at naught. No matter how improvident the treaty, made by the proper authority, acting within its sphere, it is binding on the Government, as well as on the individuals for whose benefit it was made. A treaty once made and ratified, no matter how absurd it may appear in its terms, it is fair to presume, was the best that could have been gotten, and that it was better, at the time, to have entered into it than to have gone to war; and were it otherwise, a nation or an individual could never be safe in relying upon a treaty. And if the treaty-making power were to enter into an absurd compact which was totally inadequate to secure the Government, or the individuals concerned, it ought never to be ratified; but, after it has received the solemn sanction of the revisory power, there is, and ought to be, an end to the matter, and the Government, as well as the individuals concerned, have no right to claim any other redress under it than that which it has expressly or impliedly stipulated to give them. Hence, those claimants, so long as they claim a right under this treaty, must be content to take such as is guaranteed by it, or none at all; for it is by that and that alone, they have any right whatever. This position will appear perfectly clear on a little reflection. These claims are said to be due for unlawful seizures of vessels and property, which, from every appearance, were chiefly insured, and for which the insurers have made indemnity to the insured, whereby the claims under this treaty have fallen into the hands of insurance companies, brokers, and underwriters. They were adventurers in the habit of this dangerous kind of speculation, and of receiving premiums in proportion to the hazard they run; and, perhaps, with all these apparent losses, have made their fortunes, and have been quite as successful as they had a right to expect. Whatever premiums were paid them, have not been charged to the loss of the shipper, but have been put upon the goods of other shipments, with a premium again upon that premium, all which went to enhance the price of the articles, and has been paid by the consumers, and which operates as a tax upon the people at large; hence, it may be said that the people have once paid these claims; besides viewing those claims in this light, as being in some measure different from those which are the immediate result of useful labor, (though I admit them to be legal, and, indeed, honest,) the treaty-makers were, perhaps, induced to make a more precarious indemnity than they otherwise might have done. Hence, I take it, these adventurers come with a poor grace, after having made their fortunes in those hazardous speculations, and after having in fact virtually received the amount of their claims, to ask any other redress than that stipulated for them in the treaty. They could have recovered nothing from the belligerent or aggressing nation without the aid of the Government; they have, therefore, no right to expect any other redress than such as it was able to procure for them. Private adventurers, whose property falls into the hands of the enemy, are not entitled to remuneration from the Government, nor is the Government responsible for property seized by the enemy, unless the seizure happens in consequence of its having been in the occupation of the Government at the time of the seizure. I believe, sir, no one will contend, that, in this case, the Government was bound farther than merely to negotiate for the claimants, and make for them the best bargain it could; that bargain has been made; they are now claiming under it, and I say, and say it without fear of contradiction, that they have no right beyond it.

The next inquiry that presents itself is, what is a correct policy to be pursued under this contract, agreeably to the construction I have given it? Governments, like individuals, are bound to do justly; they are never at liberty, wrongfully, to take from one part of the community to give to another; and as they can only subsist by what they receive from the people, all which one individual, or portion of the community, receives over and above its due portion, must, as a natural consequence, be taken from the other. They are not authorized even to be liberal, unless they are thereby to attain an end of more importance than the value of the bounty bestowed; for liberality, although a virtue in an individual, may be rendered a species of oppression in a Government. It follows, of course, that whatever these claimants receive, more than the fair value of their right under the treaty, which has been made in their behalf, must be taken from the other part of the community, and so far would be doing palpable injustice to them. And, sir, I aver that, by the passage of the bill upon your table, you rob the honest, industrious part of the community of more than a million of dollars, to put it in the pockets of those adventurers, who are not at all entitled to your favor. To discover the effects of this bill, it is only necessary to examine into the principles it adopts. It proposes to create a stock of five millions of dollars, at an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable, annually, at the Treasury, redeemable at pleasure, without any regard to the special provisions of the treaty, or to the lands which form the fund out of which it ought to be paid. There are several objections to this mode of discharging this obligation of the Government to these claimants. In the first place, the money is not due to them; the Commissioners have neither admitted nor allowed the claims. We are told, to be sure, by honorable gentlemen, that they will be adjusted by the first of June next. I would ask, sir, what evidence we have of the fact? They have been in a course of arrangement now for three or four years, and for aught we know, or can know, they may continue under arrangement between the parties for seven years to come, and all this time the Government must be paying annually three hundred thousand dollars interest on the stock; and my word for it, sir, if you pay the claimants the amount of their demands, and leave them to future adjustment, you will have them adjusted with a vengeance. Or, suppose you keep the money in the Treasury, will the pleasure of having five millions in the Treasury compensate for the three hundred thousand dollars which you annually wring from the sweat of the poor man's brow? And what, sir, is the excuse urged for creating this stock at this time, before we are under any obligation to pay it? Why, sir, that we can now borrow the money at four and a half per cent. when, perhaps, as gentlemen say, we cannot, at the end of twelve months, borrow it at less than six. Let us examine this policy a little and see if it will bear the test of investigation. You are to borrow the money now at four and a half per centum per annum, or, in other words, you are to sell the stock which you create at one and a half per cent. advance, whereby gentlemen say they gain a profit of seventy-five thousand dollars. This sum, to be sure, is worth saving to the Government; but, sir, what follows? The moment you sell the stock it begins to bear an interest of six per cent. per annum against you, and in three months your profit is all gone. If your claims should remain, in the course of adjustment, for the space of a year, you are out of pocket two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars—and I say they remain so for that time; or longer, for aught we know. We are told by an honorable gentleman from Delaware, that money is less valuable now than when this Congress commenced its present session—suppose that to be the fact, and I am not disposed just now to question it, have we any evidence it will be more valuable in twelve months from this time? What are the causes which have led to its depreciation, the gentleman did not stop to inquire, nor shall I; but the causes, I take it, are obvious, and I think it equally obvious that those causes are not likely to cease to operate within a twelvemonth, if any judgment can be formed from a view of the present state of the world, and more especially of Europe, which always has, and so long as we pursue this miserable course of policy that drives domestic industry from the country, always will have a powerful influence, not only upon our pecuniary concerns, but upon the general concerns of the nation.

Another pretext, (for it can really be no more if my construction of the treaty be correct, and that it is I have no doubt,)—I say another pretext is offered for going into this measure now, which is, that the nation is pledged to pay these claims so soon as they shall be admitted and allowed by the Commissioners appointed to adjust them, and that they may possibly get them adjusted before the next session of Congress; and, that if the Government shall not be ready to discharge them at the time they shall be so adjusted, our faith is broken, the pledge is gone, public confidence destroyed. If any weight ought to be allowed to such an argument, in any case resting upon contingencies, it cannot be admitted in this case. Such an argument would come with a very poor grace from these claimants, who have kept their claims hanging before the Commissioners for years, waiting, as I presume, for evidence, while those Commissioners were drawing upon the Treasury for their support. Why have they not been adjusted before this time? We have heard no complaint of the Commissioners neglecting their duty; the fair presumption is, that the fault, if any, is with the claimants—and even if there be no fault with either, the argument has no weight. What, sir, is the language of the treaty under which they claim? It is, that when those claims are admitted and allowed, they shall be paid by the creation of stock; hence, there can be no obligation on the Government to create the stock until they be admitted and allowed. There is no stipulation in the treaty to have the money waiting in the Treasury until it shall suit those claimants to get their accounts adjusted. It is certainly a very extraordinary doctrine to propagate in this House, that the faith of the nation is pledged to travel out of its ordinary course of legislation to accommodate a few individuals who may chance to have claims upon it. It goes the whole length of saying that we shall continue in session until it shall please those gentlemen to be ready to receive their money, or that we must anticipate them, and pay half a million of dollars interest upon the stock created, for fear we should not be prepared to pay those individuals their money the moment they get their claims ready for presentation, and thereby be guilty of a breach and violation of public honor and faith. Such a doctrine, I trust, will find but few advocates in this House, and such arguments bear but little weight with those whose minds are open to conviction. Again, sir, there is no obligation upon this Government to pay money in this case, nor is there any on the claimants to receive it. They may, therefore, if they think proper, refuse your money and require your stock, and it is stock they are entitled to;

and my word for it, if your stock is better than money, as contended by some honorable gentlemen, these claimants, who from their characters are well acquainted with per cent. per annum calculations, will certainly require it, and those gentlemen who are such sticklers for public faith, dare not deny it to them. Gentlemen may tell us the public faith is only pledged for the money, as the Government is at liberty to pay them in such manner as Congress may prescribe. True, such is the language of the treaty, but those wary claimants will tell you there are three modes pointed out for the extinguishment of those claims, one of which is to discharge them with stock bearing interest at six per centum per annum; that you have thought proper to adopt that mode of payment; that you are not now at liberty to choose another, and put them off with less than their contract; money is not stock, nor stock money. The Government is bound to perform its contracts specifically, if required to do so, and money, in equity, will not discharge a contract for stock. Indeed, as I before remarked, an argument proposing to make such a change, in the nature of their contract, would come with a very ill grace from those gentlemen who are such sticklers for a firm adherence to public faith. There is another objection, sir, to the policy of this bill. You pledge the Government immediately and directly for a sum of money it never was intended to be made responsible for, but upon contingencies. In support of this position, I think I need only remind the House of the argument in relation to the construction of the treaty. The honorable gentleman from Delaware tells us that the Government is bound, at all events, to pay the interest annually upon the stock created. I have no doubt but it would be bound to do so, if there were funds in hand sufficient, arising from the proceeds of the sales of the Florida lands, and not otherwise.

If the construction which I have given to this treaty be a correct one, the Government cannot be responsible beyond the value of the Florida lands. And, sir, suppose the lands were at this time really worth more than the five millions; nay, suppose they were worth ten millions—I still insist upon it, it would not be good policy to take them and pay the claims. In the administration of the fiscal affairs of the nation, you must, in general, be governed by the same rules that govern private concerns. The great question to be settled here is, whether it would be good policy to take the fund and pay the claims or not. If it be not policy to do so, this bill ought not to pass; for, in passing it, you violate one of the most obvious principles of political justice; you take from the many that which is their right, and give it to the few who have no right. Suppose you adopt the principles of the bill, and create the stock in the manner proposed, you enter into a new contract, not immediately with those claimants, but with other persons. The moment the certificates are handed out, even suppose they fall into the hands of those very claimants, they are no longer known as claimants under the Spanish Treaty; they assume another character of creditors; they have a fair claim on your Government for five millions of dollars, chargeable with six per cent. interest thereon annually, for so many years as it may be unredeemed. And, sir, when you have done so, what have you done, and what have you got? Why, sir, you have riveted upon the necks of the people a yoke they will never be able to throw off, until they have performed the servitude, until they have served the favored few, the darling objects of this bill, to the amount of five millions of dollars—no small sum in these hard times. I say, sir, you have fixed, irrevocably fixed, upon the community the yoke, and that without any the smallest shadow of right to do so.

And, sir, what are you to get in lieu of your five millions of dollars? I will not say a land of mosquitoes, frogs, serpents, and alligators. I will suppose the best that can be said of it. You know not what you have got; you have got some wild lands in a country whose geography no man in this House can know with any certainty; you have relinquished the bird in the hand for the bare possibility of obtaining the one in the bush. You have indemnified a few insurance companies and underwriters, and have saddled the nation with a certain debt of five millions, and the interest until paid. By the bargain you drive, you violate one of the first rules of private economy, that is, "never to buy, at any price, an article you can neither use nor sell." Have you not already more public lands than you can dispose of to advantage? Are they not the greatest drug in the market? Have you not lands in nine different States and Territories? And, sir, will the Florida lands pay the interest on the capital vested? They certainly will not. If, indeed, you appropriate the proceeds of the sales of all the public lands in the United States, they will scarcely pay the debt and interest in ten years. If you make a calculation of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in that State where the population is increasing more rapidly than in any other State in the Union, and at that period, too, when there were more lands sold, perhaps, than at any other—I mean the years 1820-1-2; upon such calculation, sir, it will be found that this debt and the interest can scarcely be paid in one hundred and fifty years. I have allusion to the State which I have the honor in part to represent. The sales of the public lands in that State, if I mistake not, averaged in the years 1820-1-2, three hundred and thirty two thousand one hundred and sixty-five dollars. From this sum deduct the interest of the debt, which is three hundred thousand dollars, and we find a balance of $32,165 to be applied annually to the extinguishment of the original debt. And, sir, can you hope that the lands in Florida will ever be as productive as the lands in Indiana? If so, it is a vain hope, which will never be realized.

One further view of this subject, and I have done. Gentlemen may endeavor to make themselves believe those calculations are fallacious, and my views visionary. I presume a fair method of calculating, and one that no honorable gentleman can object to, will be to compare the value of the two kinds of stock. What would be the difference in value of stock, payable from the proceeds of these lands, the value of which is totally unknown, and the value of that kind of stock proposed by this bill? The one directs you to the Treasury of the United States annually, for the sum of three hundred thousand dollars; the other leads you through this land of reptiles described by my friend from Virginia. I say, what is the fair value of each, and what the discrepancy? This tests the policy of the bill. I put it to every honorable gentleman in this House, what difference would you make in the price of the stock? Would you make 20 per cent.? If so, you are throwing away a million of dollars on the claimants. But, sir, I say there is forty per cent. difference; and, if so, you are throwing away two millions.

Mr. Speaker, I intended to have gone more into detail upon this subject, and am sorry my state of health will not admit of it. However, as I remarked in the outset, I can hardly hope to have changed the opinion of one honorable gentleman in this House. I can say no more: nor could I have rested satisfied to have said less. I do think this bill is, in its operation, calculated to defraud the public. And, sir, I can never consent to stand and look on in silence, and see the honest community defrauded of its rights in any form: and, sir, if this bill passes, I say it robs them of two millions of dollars.

When Mr. TEST had concluded—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved its recommitment to the Committee of Ways and Means, and supported the motion by a speech.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yes 73, noes 93.

The question then recurring on the passage of the bill—

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, rose, and delivered, at considerable length, his views, in reply to the gentlemen who had opposed the bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON also spoke on the bill; and Mr. WRIGHT renewed the motion to recommit the bill.

After some remarks from Mr. BARTLETT, the question was again taken on recommitting the bill, and decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, by yeas and nays.—For the bill 117, against it 68, as follows:

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

SATURDAY, May 8.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to establish Bowdoinham, in the State of Maine; Troy, in the State of New York; and Fairport, in the State of Ohio, ports of delivery; which was read twice, and laid upon the table.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of William Duane," was read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, called up his resolution for adjournment; but the House being thin, and Mr. COCKE having moved for a call of the House, Mr. A. waived his call for the present, giving notice that he should move for the consideration of the resolution on Monday next.

POLICE OF THE CAPITOL.

The engrossed resolution for the regulation of the police of the Capitol, (one provision of which authorizes the extension of the authority of the corporation of Washington to the public grounds about the Capitol,) was read a third time. Mr. WOOD, inquiring the particular object of the latter provision, Mr. LATHROP, in the absence of the chairman of the committee who reported it, said, that, as he understood it, the object was to give such authority to the corporation of Washington as should carry into effect its provisions against the establishment of grog-shops or stands, on the public property, &c. A motion was then made to lay the resolution on the table, and agreed to.

Subsequently, the resolution was again taken up, on the motion of Mr. MERCER, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. COCKE spoke against that part of the resolution which authorizes the appointment of a deputy, by the Marshal of the District, during each session of Congress, to attend and preserve order in the precincts of the Capitol, considering it wholly unnecessary to appoint an additional officer, while the House had so many officers and messengers, &c.

Mr. MERCER expressed his regret that this resolution should give rise to any discussion, but went on to say, that some provision of the sort was absolutely necessary. There is now no police in the central part of the Capitol or its exterior, &c. The exhibition (of the Panorama of Paris) now going on in the centre building, was by permission of the officers of the two Houses, but not by their authority, for the obvious reason that they have no authority there. As to the officers of this House, they cannot attend to the police of other parts and avenues of the building, because their presence is necessary here, to attend to their duties within this Hall. There were a variety of petty offences liable to be committed on the premises, which it was necessary to the dignity and character of this House to provide against.

The resolution was further opposed by Mr. ROSS, on the ground of the sufficiency of this House, by its officers, to protect its own dignity, &c.

The resolution was further supported by Mr. WOOD, who said, having examined the resolution, he was decidedly in favor of it, and would even go further, if it were necessary. It was obvious to every sense, that there were nuisances here which required removal, some of them, he intimated, of such a nature that there was no man of honor whose moral sense must not revolt at encountering them, &c. He hoped, therefore, that the resolution would pass.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, said, that the gentlemen who supported this measure seemed to be very much alarmed by something, which for his part he did not understand. We have sat here, said he, for many years, without any inconvenience to the body politic, or, as far as I know, to the body natural. I should be as willing as any one to expel from the temple those who sell doves for the sacrifice; but the doves of Venus will not, I believe, fly in the face of any one, if he will let them alone. We do not, therefore, want a police here to protect ourselves from such evils as these. We have a doorkeeper, with his deputies, and an assistant doorkeeper, always on their posts, (except that we have given the latter leave of absence for a while.) I thought, too, sir, we had the power of exclusive legislation over this District; but this resolution proposes to put us under the protection of the corporation of Washington. Not believing this to be necessary, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question on this motion was determined in the affirmative, by a small majority.

VIRGINIA MILITARY LANDS.

On motion of Mr. VANDER, of Ohio, the House took up the bill "authorizing the President of the United States to enter into certain negotiations relative to lands located under Virginia military land warrants, lying between Ludlow's and Roberts' lines, in the State of Ohio."

[This bill provides, "That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to ascertain the number of acres, and, by appraisal or otherwise, the value thereof, exclusive of improvements, of all such lands lying between Ludlow's and Roberts' lines, in the State of Ohio, as may, agreeable to the principles of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Doddridge, lessee, against Thompson and Wright, be held by persons under Virginia military warrants, and on what terms the holders will relinquish the same to the United States; and that he report the facts at the commencement of the next session of Congress."]

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, presented a memorial on the subject, which had been transmitted to him by an individual in the State of Ohio; which was read.

Mr. VANON, of Ohio, stated the grounds of the bill, and the merits of the titles which are proposed to be quieted by it. He replied, also, to certain statements in the petition just read, which he considered not entirely accurate.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, with a view to cover as well the claims not located, as those which are, and which it appeared to him equally proper to provide for, moved to lay the bill on the table, to allow him time to prepare an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. VANON said, that, however the description of claims referred to by Mr. BARBOUR might require future legislation, he did not think it ought to be connected with this bill, which embraced a distinct class of cases.

Mr. BARBOUR withdrew his motion, with a view to introduce his proposition separately from it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill by adding to it a provision requiring a statement of the amount paid by the purchasers to the General Government for the land, and when paid, to be included in the communication to Congress.

After some observations from Mr. RANKIN and Mr. VANCE, this motion was withdrawn by the mover, under the impression that the information might be otherwise obtained.

Mr. McCoy, of Virginia, expressed his doubts of the expediency of legislating on this subject at all. When Congress did legislate on the subject, they ought, at least, to give the holders of military warrants the option of locating the warrants on other lands than those now open to them, &c.

Mr. McARTHUR, of Ohio, feeling himself interested in this bill, said he should decline voting upon it. He stated, however, some of his views on the subject, one of which was, that the bill was one-sided, regarding the United States only, and could not prejudice any interest of the United States. He had hoped the claimants under Virginia would have been allowed a participation in the investigation proposed by this bill, but the committee, it seemed, had determined otherwise. Some of the statements in the petition which had been read, he pronounced to be false, and it had apparently been drawn up without any knowledge of the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, further explained and defended the provisions of the bill, gave a history of the case embraced in it; and, on his motion, the report of the select committee in the case, was read.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without opposition.

NAVIGATION OF WESTERN RIVERS.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole, made yesterday, upon the bill making an appropriation towards removing the sand bars and obstructions to the bed of the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri rivers, and the question being upon agreeing to the amendment, which introduces a substitute for the original bill—

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, objected to the amendment, as too far enlarging its extent, and leaving it without a sufficiently definite object. If a system of internal improvement were to be adopted by the General Government, he should not be hostile to the object of this bill as a part of it. Considering this amendment as not sufficiently specific, or guarded, he should, if it succeeded, be obliged, under present impressions, to vote against the bill.

Mr. SHARPE, of New York, was in favor of the object of the bill, but had considerable doubt of the practicability of the means proposed to carry it into effect. In New York, he said, large sums of money had been appropriated for dams and sluices, &c., in its great river; and, after the expenditure of all this money, the navigation of the river was worse now than it was before ever a dollar was laid out upon it. The moment a bar was removed from one place in the river, a substitute for it was created in another. Those bars had increased to such an extent, that the steamboat cannot now find her way to Albany; and he feared that the attempt to remove the sand bars in the Ohio, Missouri, and Mississippi rivers, might place those rivers in the same situation. We may begin, said he, with $75,000, which is a very small beginning; we may remove the bars from one place, but I fear it will only be to create them in another, &c. The bill, he thought, proposed to begin on too large a scale; and, if he was compelled to vote on a proposition so general as this amendment, he should be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. HENRY said, the bill on the table proposed to test the great system of internal improvement, by its application to a precise and definite object. The advocates of that system, said he, have taken high ground. They contend that Congress have power to establish roads and canals, and to improve existing channels of intercourse, for national purposes; and that it is expedient to exercise it. Their adversaries, with some few exceptions, waive the question of expediency, and stake their whole defence upon a denial of the power.

Before I proceed to notice the main question, I take this opportunity to declare, that I am a friend of State sovereignty; that I regard it, in its appropriate sphere of action, as the best security for the success of our great Republican experiment; and that I would be among the last to give my assent to the passage of any law, however apparently expedient, which could only be enacted by encroaching upon those powers, which have been exclusively retained to the States or to the people.

After the elaborate and able discussion which has already taken place, during the present session, upon the bill "to procure the necessary surveys for roads and canals," it would be almost presumptuous in me to enter at large into the Constitutional question of power. I might, indeed, assume it in argument, to be the settled rule of the Government that Congress have the power to do what is proposed to be done by the bill under consideration. I might, also, fairly contend, that the Constitutional difficulty is not at all involved in the present investigation. Let it be remembered, that the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, are the boundaries of neighboring States; and, with the exception of Louisiana, that they do not pass through the territorial limits of either of the States; that they are the common commercial highways of all who inhabit the vast regions through which they flow; and are justly regarded, not as the property of particular States, but as common stock—as national property. The inquiry, therefore, shall be directed, throughout, to the naked questions of expediency, necessity, practicability, and propriety.

In the particular case before us, it could not be expected, that a single State would take upon herself the burden of accomplishing an object, in which so many other States were equally concerned. And, if she were willing to do so, it is certain that the plans adopted for the purpose, would be satisfactory to all who are interested in the result? Might not jealousies, feuds, and border animosities ensue, gradually engendering those hereditary hatreds, which would, by and by, break out in open hostility? But, suppose an association of several States is formed, for the effectuation of this desirable object; would the mischief be diminished? The patriots who framed the Constitution, were not indifferent to the dangers to be apprehended from the supposed or actual existence of separate interests, which might, eventually, give birth to several distinct confederacies, each pursuing its own objects in its own way.

Among the leading motives, which led to the adoption of that instrument, the necessity of guarding against such sectional and selfish alliances, was not the least influential. And who would not shudder, to see a combination among the States and Territories composing the valley of the Mississippi, for the protection of a class of interests which were avowed and admitted to be peculiar to themselves? If we regard the Union as worth preserving, we must sedulously avoid every tendency, in principle or in practice, which might, by possibility, endanger its security. Let the people look to the national Government, as the fountain of all benefits, which are to be felt by the whole nation, or by more than one of its members. We shall thus avoid, not only those petty contentions, which merely disturb the public tranquillity; but also those dreadful disorders, which might, at some distant period, rend in twain our glorious and happy Union.

Let us next inquire, whether it is necessary to exert that power "to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers?" The report upon your table exhibits a brief narrative of facts, making out the strongest possible case for the interposition of Congress. The bars which cross the channel of the Ohio, render it impassable, except by vessels of the smallest size, during six months of every year. The obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi are not peculiar to any season. They proceed from the impetuosity of its current, and the nature of the country through which it rolls on its resistless mass of waters to the ocean. Its navigation is always dangerous; and the surprise, which a passenger could not but feel, after a survey of its numerous impediments, would be, not that so many boats were wrecked, but that so many should escape. It may be safely affirmed, that a stronger case for the interference of Congress can never occur.

In relation to the plan recommended in the report, and provided in the bill, for improving the navigation of the Mississippi, I am happy to find that there is no division of opinion. As regards the navigation of the Ohio, I am sorry to perceive that we are likely to encounter more difficulty from collision among ourselves, than from all other sources of danger put together. In order to meet the views of an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. STEWART,) and, also, to gratify several gentlemen from Ohio and Kentucky, I consented to such a modification of the original bill, as would extend the contemplated improvements to Brownsville, where the national road crosses the Monongahela. This, however, was not acceptable to another gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. RUCHANAN,) who has submitted an amendment, substantially restoring the provision of the original bill, with the exception that the mode of operation is left, in each particular case of obstruction, to the discretion of the engineer. It is impossible that gentlemen should think precisely alike. In such cases, it is the duty of a legislator to concede something, in deference to those whose judgments he is obliged to consult, and whose good will he must conciliate. I exhort my worthy friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. STEWART,) the firm and vigilant sentinel of the interests of his constituents, with whom I have acted with so much pleasure on former occasions, not to withdraw his countenance and his aid from this measure, because he cannot get it fashioned, in all respects, according to his wishes. It is of paramount importance to obtain a recognition of the principle embraced in the bill, and the particular modification of it is comparatively immaterial. For the sake of conciliating the opinions of all who are friendly to the principle, I am willing to yield my own opinions as to its details; and, with this view, I do not hesitate to accept the amendment. In the mean time, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. STEWART,) and all others who think and feel with him, may assure themselves that when the great scheme of internal improvement comes to be matured, the removal of every obstacle to the free and safe navigation of this noble river, will claim and receive the early and special attention of Congress.

But the gentleman (Mr. STEWART) objects to the amendment because it requires an experiment to be made upon one of the six bars, indicated below the falls of Ohio, and makes the improvement of the remainder of said bars dependent upon the success of that experiment. Now, to me; there seems to be no just grounds of objection upon this score. A similar provision is to be found in the original bill. Upon much reflection, I then thought such a provision necessary, and I think so still. Anxious as I am; sir, for the improvement of Western navigation; sensible, as I have long been, that we have a just claim to an equal share of the benefits resulting from the expenditure of money; and happy as I should be to hasten and to hail the day when the great system which will contribute so much to equalize that expenditure, is put fully into operation, I am still more anxious that the Government should get a good bargain for every dollar that is expended in the West. I wish for no lavish or unjustifiable appropriation of the public money. My sole object is, to promote such lasting and valuable improvements as will benefit the whole community; and, when we draw money from the public Treasury, to be sure of getting a fair equivalent, to the objects upon which it is expended.

Having thus endeavored, I trust not in vain, to bring the friends of the principle together, upon the ground of mutual concession, I will direct your attention, for a moment, to the vast importance of the interior communication which the bill proposes to facilitate, and the value of the commerce of which it is the channel. Upon this head, it will be sufficient to say that eight of the States, together with all western Pennsylvania and Virginia, and two Territories, have scarcely another vent by which the surplus productions of their industry can be conveyed to market.

The Government has done much for the protection, I might almost say, for the creation, of foreign commerce. What are the principal stipulations in all our treaties with foreign Powers? The regulation of commerce. Why do we maintain diplomatic relations with the nations of Europe and America, at an annual expense exceeding $100,000? For the protection of foreign commerce. Why do we submit to pay tribute to the piratical States of Barbary? For the protection of foreign commerce. For the same purpose we establish lighthouses, seawalls, buoys, and remove all obstructions to the navigation of the bays, harbors, and inlets, which communicate with the ocean. To say nothing of the late war, which was commenced for commercial aggressions, during the last year we fitted out a formidable and expensive naval armament for the extirpation of the pirates, whose wanton depredations had become the terror and the scourge of our commercial adventurers in the Gulf of Mexico. We complain not of this. It was all right. It is the duty of the nation to cherish, by every means in its power, the prosperity of this great interest. We have borne our share of the burden; we have borne it cheerfully. But, whilst so much has been done, and is still doing, for the benefit of the seaboard, may we not insist that it is high time to do something for us? Whilst the care of the nation is liberally extended to every other interest, shall the farmer, the staff of the Government, be comparatively neglected? We now put it to the magnanimity and justice of our Atlantic brethren to say whether they will not protect our agriculture and our internal commerce, against the bars, the sawyers, the planters, the snags, those stationary pirates of the Ohio and Mississippi?

In point of expense, there is no doubt that the heavy losses sustained upon those rivers, in a single year, would be more than sufficient to defray the whole charges of the proposed improvements. In the report upon your table, the average estimate of loss, by accidents, in each year, is stated to be from five to ten per cent. From five to twenty per cent. would have been nearer the truth. In that report, there is also a passing allusion to a most shocking calamity—the loss of the steamboat Tennessee; a disaster which is hardly surpassed in the annals of shipwreck! I do not mean to harrow up your feelings, by dwelling upon the sad particulars of that dreadful scene! I hope, however, that the recollection of the ills we have suffered will beget a lively attention to this great concern; and that we shall deserve that high recommendation—

The people's servants, they protected all.”

Mr. BASSETT, of Virginia, denied that the people of the Atlantic States derive any other benefit from foreign commerce than such as the people of the West equally participate in. To both of them, commerce furnished, at diminished cost, and with increased facility, articles of necessity or convenience, &c. The lighthouses, and other expenditures of that sort, he said, were not for the benefit of the persons living near them, but of the whole country, and, properly considered, the people of the West were as much interested in them as the people of the East. Mr. B. decidedly objected to the principles of this bill, which he considered to be as unconstitutional as if the Constitution itself rose up against it. He considered it directly in the teeth of the Constitution, and was therefore opposed to it in any shape.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, replied at large to Mr. BASSETT. He explained the nature of the obstructions to the navigation of the Western rivers, and the importance of removing them, if practicable. The Mississippi and the Ohio, he said, were not interior but boundary rivers. They washed twelve States and Territories, and formed the only channel of communication with the ocean. His plan for executing this improvement, he said, would be, first, to remove the snags in the Mississippi, because the improvement in the navigation of rivers must begin at the mouth of them, &c., and thence to proceed up the river.

Mr. BUCHANAN, that he might be distinctly understood as to how far he was willing to go on the subject, stated the comparative merits of the bill, and the amendment now under consideration. By the bill, an experiment was to be made in removing a sand bar; if successful, it was to be followed up by other similar operations; if not, the attempt was to be abandoned. The amendment, however, reported by the Committee of the Whole, was as indefinite in its terms as language could make it; it pledged the Government to proceed to remove every obstruction to navigation from the town of Brownsville to the mouth of the river Ohio, and down the Mississippi, and this Herculean work was proposed by an amendment to the bill, which could scarcely be understood, as read from the Clerk's table. Mr. B. said he was friendly to the improvement of the navigation of the Western waters, and also to the improvement of that of the Susquehanna, the Hudson, and the Connecticut, and he was willing that the experiment should be made in the Western waters, before it is made in the Susquehanna, though he by no means admitted that they possessed superior claims. His objection was, not to the object of the bill, but to the indefinite terms of the amendment.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, having been one of the members of the committee which reported this bill, and assisted in preparing the amendment, rose to explain the grounds on which it was presented to the House. He adverted to the surveys and reports which had been made by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, furnishing all the facts of the actual condition of the river, and recommending the very measure now proposed for improving the navigation. The losses sustained at present by those who navigate the rivers Ohio and Mississippi, were estimated as high as from five to ten per cent. on the amount; and, when it was recollected that the commerce with Pittsburg alone amounted to a million and a half of dollars, the amount of the annual loss would be enormous, and to justify a much larger expenditure than is now proposed. He compared this expenditure with those for improving and protecting other bays and rivers, affecting but one or two States, whereas eleven States bounded on this river; and asked with what conscience gentlemen on the Atlantic could ask this House for a hundred thousand dollars a year for its lighthouse establishment, and refuse the people of the West, for their navigation, this pittance of $75,000.

Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana, had no objection to the object of this bill, but considered the amendment, as it now stands, embracing as well all the tributary streams as the main streams of the Ohio and Mississippi, as too comprehensive; and moved an amendment, the object of which was to confine it to the latter.

Mr. SHARPE made some additional remarks on the subject, the general import of which was, that he thought the appropriation now to be made ought to be confined to the purposes of an experiment.

Mr. MERRON, of Virginia, delivered those views of this subject which his personal knowledge and investigations suggested. Any attempt to extend the improvements of navigation to the streams tributary to the Ohio, would, he believed, be entirely inconsistent with any reasonable limit to the expenditure on this object; for, he believed, nothing short of a canal the whole way from Brownsville to Pittsburg could effect a navigation of that distance. He was in favor of the amendment of Mr. BRENT, with a farther amendment, that the expenditure should commence from the mouth of the Mississippi. At some future day, he hoped to see a general system adopted for the purposes of internal improvement, founded on the very local feelings which opposed any improvement of a particular point, by embracing all objects of this description calling for the national interposition. Mr. M., in conclusion, exposed the error of those who attribute to the seaports the payment of the imposts, which are not paid by them, but by the consumer, in the West as well as the East—and the error, on the other hand, of supposing that expenditures for improving navigation profited only those who lived near the seat of it, &c.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, he verily believed, if the simple question were presented to appropriate money to improve the navigation of the Western rivers, nine tenths of the House would be in favor of it. The bill was embarrassed by its details, and, if it was lost, would fall by them. These details were unnecessary, and he wished they might be excluded by some amendment.

Mr. CONWAY, Delegate from Arkansas, proposed an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to give the President a general power to apply $75,000 to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi, Ohio, and the Missouri, as high up as Franklin.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that every amendment offered to the bill, proved that a general amendment was necessary, embracing the object of making an experiment to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, which a decided majority of the House would be in favor of. To allow of its being properly prepared, he moved to lay the bill on the table.

Which motion was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table accordingly.

After refusing two successive motions to interrupt the regular progress of the assigned orders of the day—

The bill to confer certain powers on the Levy Court of the county of Alexandria, passed through a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LATHROP in the Chair,) and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WABASH AND MIAMI CANAL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. ROSS in the Chair,) on the bill to authorize the State of Indiana to open a canal through the public lands, to connect the navigation of the rivers Wabash and the Miami of the Lake.

Mr. CALL, Delegate from Florida, moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "ninety feet," proposed by the bill to be given for the location of the canal, and insert in lieu thereof a provision for giving the square of a mile on each side for the whole length of the canal.

In support of this motion, Mr. CALL delivered a speech of some length, which he commenced by replying to an anticipated objection on the score of precedent, by saying that a grant of land for a road was in principle the same as a grant for a canal, and a grant similar to this, for a road through a part of the State of Ohio towards Detroit, had been lately made. He then turned his attention to the importance of the canal proposed to be made, which, he said, would open a communication which would connect New Orleans with the Western Lakes, to the great facilitation of military operations for the purposes of defence, &c., not to speak of the facilitation of commerce. But this channel, however important, it would not be possible to open, for a long time at least, without the aid of a grant of the public lands, &c.

Mr. RANKIN, the Chairman of the Committee of Public Lands, stated the views of the committee on the subject. They duly appreciated the importance of such a canal, believing it to be the best point for the connexion of these waters, but were restrained, by principles on which they had always acted, from going beyond the space necessary for a canal, and for assisting the collection of tolls thereon. If Congress intended to give a grant to this canal, or any other road or canal, it was much preferable that the grant should be in money, rather than in land. The road which has been spoken of, was claimed as a right, accruing under the treaty of Brownstown, and could not be considered as a precedent for this measure. With regard to the expediency of granting aid to this measure, Mr. R. said, if it should be included in a general system of internal improvement, he should be in favor of it, but was opposed to acting upon it in the manner now proposed.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, made a few remarks, expressive of the deep interest he felt on this subject, and of his conviction that the benefit to accrue from it to the United States, would doubly repay the whole expense of making the canal.

Mr. TEST, of Indiana, explained the geographical character of the country through which the canal is to run. It was a measure so perfectly practicable, that he believed the deepest part of the canal from the surface, supposing the canal to be a dead level, would not be more than twenty-five feet. Its length would be only from fifteen to twenty miles. The country on both sides of the route was extremely rich, as rich, indeed, as it possibly could be, and capable of producing a vast amount of agricultural products. On the importance of this work to that country, and to the United States generally, he dwelt at some length, and then replied to the objections made by Mr. RANKIN, on the ground of the obligations of the compact with Virginia, and showed by computation that the proposed appropriation of land would advance the value of the public lands to a much greater amount than that of the proposed appropriation.

On motion of Mr. TRACY, of New York, the Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, May 10.

Mr. CALL presented sundry documents in relation to a claim of Moses Elias Levy, to a tract of land in the Territory of Florida.—Referred.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, presented a memorial of the Judges of the Fourth Circuit of the United States, in the district of Maryland, and of the members of the bar of the said court; praying for an alteration of the times fixed for holding court; which memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for an extension of the system of granting pensions for Revolutionary services; which memorial was laid upon the table.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the acts relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Stephen Jenks & Sons, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. J. T. JOHNSON moved to consider the resolution of the joint committee, fixing a day for the adjournment of this House. The motion was negative—ayes 80, noes 85.

The bill from the Senate "to confer certain powers on the Levy Court of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," was read a third time, and passed.

The bill "to authorize the President of the United States to enter into certain negotiations relative to lands located under Virginia military land warrants lying between Ludlow's and Roberts's lines, in the State of Ohio," was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate."

Mr. BEECHER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported on the petition of Moses Shepherd. After some objections and inquiries from Mr. COCKE, the report was laid on the table.

NAVIGATION OF WESTERN RIVERS.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, the House took up the bill "for the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers."

Mr. BUCHANAN offered, as an amendment to the bill, the following:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the navigation of the Ohio river to be improved over the following sand bars, or either of them, at his discretion, to wit: the sand bar which crosses said river one mile and a quarter below Flint island; the sand bar two miles above French island; the bar just below Henderson; the bar below Straight island; the bar below Willow island, in the Mississippi bend; and the bar opposite to Lower Southerland, below Cumberland island; and, for the purpose of ascertaining and directing the best method of carrying the provisions of this act into effect, he may employ any of the engineers in the public service which he may deem proper: Provided, nevertheless, That an experiment shall first be made upon one of the sand bars, and if, in his judgment, it shall be successful, then, and not otherwise, he is hereby authorized to cause experiments to be made upon the remaining bars."

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, was opposed to this amendment of the bill, as being calculated to embarrass it, and, in effect, to defeat it. He objected especially to the proviso, which requires a previous experiment before the appropriation is to be applied. The obstacles in the Western rivers are, he said, so various in their kind, that an experiment on one could not apply to the rest of them—and the President must depend on the opinions of others as to the success of the experiment when made, &c. He preferred direct legislation on the subject to any contingent provision. Mr. S. went on at considerable length to show the propriety of the amendment adopted in Committee, making Brownsville the point of commencement where the proposed improvement met the national road, and rendered complete and entire the chain of communication between the East and West, &c., stating a variety of facts to show the great advantages to the West which would result from this measure.

Mr. HENRY, of Kentucky, replied, and advocated the amendment, on the ground that it was of paramount importance to obtain a recognition of the principle embraced in the bill, and that the particular modification of it was not of so great importance. For the sake of conciliating the opinions of all who were friendly to the principle of the bill, he was willing to yield his own opinion as to the details of it; and, with that view, he was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, moved to amend the proposed amendment so as to cause two experiments to be made instead of one, &c.

Mr. BUCHANAN rejoined—expressed his regret that the debate should be renewed—the committee's report was confined to certain bars in the river which were not of different kinds, but of one kind; and all he wished was, that a trial should be made on one of these before money should be expended on the rest.

Mr. TRIMBLE advocated the amendment. He was in favor of an experiment, and thought it ought first to be attempted on the lower part of the river.

Mr. McARTHUR was indifferent whether one or two experiments were made in the Mississippi, but advocated the propriety of extending the experiment to the Ohio river also, the obstructions in which were quite as dangerous to property as those in the Mississippi.

Mr. STEWART suggested to Mr. MALLARY to modify his motion so as to require two "or more" experiments.

Mr. MALLARY did not accept of the suggestion. Mr. KREMER advocated the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN. He had had some experiments in attempts to remove sand bars in the Susquehanna, the result of which had been very unfavorable. He therefore wished an experiment made on one of those in the Ohio.

Mr. HOGBOOM, of New York took similar ground, and stated the difficulties which had been experienced in the Hudson, where vast sums had been thrown away in attempts to remove sand bars, without any permanent benefit from the expenditure.

Mr. POINSETT, of South Carolina, suggested that there was a great difference between removing obstructions from sand in tide rivers and those where the stream always ran one way. In the former class of streams, the removal of one sand bar was succeeded by the formation of others; but, in streams like the Mississippi and the upper part of the Ohio, where the water always ran in one direction, the case was very different.

The amendment of Mr. MALLARY, proposing two experiments, was agreed to—ayes 77, noes 71.

Mr. BUCHANAN's amendment, as thus amended, was then put, and carried.

The several other amendments, reported by the Committee of the Whole, were then agreed to.

Mr. McARTHUR then offered an amendment in the fourth section, to make its commencement read as follows; "And for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Mississippi river, from the mouth of the Missouri to New Orleans, and of the Ohio river, from Pittsburg to its junction with the Mississippi," so as to include the Ohio river in the experiment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, the House agreed to take up the report of the committee on the claim of Beaumarchais. The motion was carried—ayes 81, noes 54.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio in the Chair, on that report.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: It is well known to most of the Committee that Mr. Beaumarchais, in the first years of the Revolution, furnished clothing and military supplies to the United States to the amount of several millions of livres; that his account has been finally settled at the Treasury, and the whole amount paid, except one million of livres, which the accounting officers of that Department contend he received from his own Government, and was one of the nine millions which

MAY, 1824.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

H. OF R.

Louis XVI. gratuitously gave to the United States. It is admitted by the claimants that he did receive a million in behalf of the United States, but they say, and the agents of the French Government say, that it was given him to be expended in secret service money, and that he has satisfactorily accounted for the disbursement of it to his Government, to whom alone he was accountable. From this decision of the Treasury Department, an appeal is made to Congress.

Hitherto, Mr. Chairman, the merits of this claim have hinged upon the fact whether the million in question was received by Mr. Beaumarchais, for the purchase of supplies; or not; and, as the arguments adduced on either side of the question are, in the absence of the highest evidence, derived from a great mass of circumstantial testimony, and are comprehended in long and numerous documents, I will beg leave to call the attention of the Committee to the most important facts. Such a review will give the necessary information to those who have not found time to read the report, and refresh the memories of those who have.

Early in the year 1776, Mr. Beaumarchais called on Mr. Arthur Lee, then an agent of the United States, in London, and informed him that the French Government were willing to furnish the United States with supplies to the amount of two hundred thousand louis d'or, which he proposed to transmit through the French West Indies, under color of a commercial transaction. Mr. Beaumarchais soon afterwards returned to Paris, and there made a more special and formal arrangement with Mr. Silas Deane, also an agent of the United States, for the transmission of these supplies; and to give it the appearance of a commercial adventure, and conceal it from the British Government, it was further agreed that tobacco, and other American products, should be remitted to Mr. Beaumarchais.

In pursuance of this arrangement, eight cargoes of military stores, clothing, and other merchandise, were shipped, by Mr. Beaumarchais, to the United States, in the years 1777 and 1778—and, during the same time, France furnished the American Commissioners, who were, at that time, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Lee, and Mr. Deane, with two millions of livres in cash, and they obtained a third from the Farmers General. During the shipment of these supplies, there seemed to have been great uncertainty, on the part of the Commissioners, about the source from whence they were derived. Mr. Lee, judging from what had passed between him and Mr. Beaumarchais, and from the subsequent assurances of the French Minister, always insisted that they were derived principally from the King—while Mr. Deane seemed to think that we were indebted for them solely to Mr. Beaumarchais. On a comparison, however, of their several letters; it is impossible to reconcile the statements of the different Commissioners with one another, or those of the same gentlemen, at different times.

In the year 1778, Mr. Deane was recalled, and Mr. Adams, late President of the United States, was sent to supply his place. In September of that year, the three Commissioners wrote to the Count de Vergennes, then Premier of France, stated their doubts about the source of these supplies, and requested to know of him what part of them had been furnished by Beaumarchais, and what part by the King—that both they and the people of the United States had always believed the greater part of the supplies had been furnished by His Majesty, and that they would discharge the obligation as soon as Providence should put it in their power. To this application Mr. de Vergennes answers, that the King had furnished nothing—that he had permitted Mr. Beaumarchais to furnish himself from his arsenals, on condition of replacing the articles, and that he would, as to these articles, interpose to prevent the United States from being pressed for immediate payment. This correspondence was transmitted to America, and in the following year, Congress directed their President, Mr. Jay, to write to Mr. Beaumarchais, acknowledging the debt and promising payment. From that day to this, he has stood upon the books of the Treasury as a creditor for the whole amount of these supplies, and payments were made him from time to time. Besides the remittances in tobacco, and other domestic products, equal to about 10 per cent. of the value of the supplies, bills were drawn in his favor, on our Commissioners in France, for between two and three millions of livres, payable in one, two, and three years.

In the year 1782, Mr. Deane returned to France, and made a settlement with Mr. Beaumarchais, by which the balance due to him was about nine hundred thousand dollars. This settlement, however, was not ratified by Congress, because it was said Mr. Deane had no authority to make one; and because, I presume, Congress did not approve it. But in 1784, Mr. Barclay, who was appointed our Consul General to France, was vested with authority to make a settlement with Mr. Beaumarchais, subject to the ratification of Congress. He accordingly made one, differing not materially from the settlement since made at the Treasury, but it did not receive the confirmation of Congress. Probably this settlement would have been ratified, if a circumstance had not come to light, which is a curious one, as well in the history of diplomacy, as in the life of that distinguished man, Dr. Franklin. In the year 1786, on a settlement of the account of Mr. Grand, our banker in Paris, it was discovered that he had given credit but for eight millions received from the French Government by way of gratuity, instead of nine, which, in a treaty dated three years before, Dr. Franklin had acknowledged to have received. Dr. Franklin, on being informed of the variance, applied to Mr. Grand for an explanation, who, in turn, applied to the Count de Vergennes, but he refused to state to whom the million in question was paid; and that, as it was paid out of the Royal Treasury on the 10th June, 1776, (which was before Dr. Franklin arrived in France, and before Mr. Grand became the American banker,) a copy of the receipt for this million could not be necessary for their exoneration. It was then conjectured by Dr. Franklin that Mr. Beaumarchais had received this million. In 1788, a committee of three members of Congress (of which Mr. Arthur Lee was the chairman) had the subject of Mr. Beaumarchais' accounts referred to them for settlement; and, in their report, by not allowing many of his claims for commission, insurance, and other charges, and charging him with some supposed losses,—they made him a debtor to the United States to a large amount.

H. OF R.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

After the adoption of the new Constitution, Mr. Beaumarchais, complaining of the injustice that had been done him, renewed his application to the Government; and, in 1793, a settlement of his accounts was made by the Auditor, under the superintendence of Mr. Hamilton, on more liberal, and it appears to me more correct principles, by which a balance was found due to him of upwards of two millions of livres. But the report recommends that payment should be suspended until some further explanation should be given of the "lost million," as it was often called. But, in the following year, Mr. Gouverneur Morris, as Minister from this country to France, applied to the Minister for Foreign Affairs for information relative to the million that remained unaccounted for, and, by a well-timed compliment, succeeded in obtaining the receipt for this million advanced in June, 1776, by which it appeared to have been paid to Mr. Beaumarchais.

In the following year, Mr. Beaumarchais wrote a long and eloquent memorial on the subject of his claim, in which he insisted that he had rendered an account to his own Government of the money he had received from it. But the coincidence of sums and dates furnished such strong circumstantial evidence against him, that he was held chargeable at the Treasury for the million he had received in June, 1776. After his death, (which took place about 1799,) the claim was renewed, in behalf of his representatives, in 1802, by Mr. Petion, the Chargé d'Affaires from France; and in 1805 by Mr. Turreau, the Minister Plenipotentiary, who then stated, for the first time, that, on an examination of the archives of his Government, it had been discovered that the million received by Mr. Beaumarchais in June, 1776, had been paid him for a secret political service. On the last application, the subject was referred to a committee of this House, who, after charging Mr. Beaumarchais with the million in question, reported a balance of about forty-one thousand dollars, which was paid him, with interest. In the succeeding year, Mr. Turreau again pressed the claim on the notice of the Government, and stated that the million had been paid for a secret political service, but not for the purchase of supplies. The subject was not then acted on by the House. Since that time it has been repeatedly brought before Congress, and from first to last the memorial of the present claimants has been referred to six different committees, exclusive of that of the present year—three of whom reported in favor of the claim, and three against it.

On the question whether Mr. Beaumarchais received the million, of June, 1776, for the purchase of supplies, or not, (the point on which the committee chiefly differed,) there is much circumstantial evidence on both sides. The following facts are unfavorable to the supposition that the supplies were purchased from his own funds: The mediocrity of his fortune; many of the articles furnished were drawn from the King's arsenals; the repeated declarations of the French Minister to our Commissioners; the letter of the Minister to the King, in May, 1776, in which he speaks of advancing a million for the use of "the colonies;" the letter from the King of France to the King of Spain, in which he says he has furnished money and other succors, ostensibly on the score of trade; and, lastly, the letter of Mr. Beaumarchais himself, of December, 1776, wherein he states his advances to have been about one million of livres.

But, on the other hand, there is the solemn declaration of Mr. De Vergennes that the King had furnished nothing. He certainly was not warranted in saying the King had furnished no supplies, if he had furnished money to purchase supplies. But, again: there can be no doubt but Mr. Beaumarchais must have been held accountable to his Government for this million, for whatever purpose it was put into his hands. But if it was intended as douceurs for persons about the Court, or to procure intelligence, or to bribe foreign agents, or for any of those purposes for which secret service money is usually employed, it is said, and it seems not improbable, that the vouchers in such cases are destroyed. The evidences of such details they might wish to withhold, not only from the world, but from their successors. But there could be no reason to destroy the vouchers, if they related merely to the purchase of supplies. The absence, then, of all vouchers of the particulars of disbursement affords some evidence that the money was expended for one purpose and not for the other.

On weighing this conflicting evidence, I am free to admit, Mr. Chairman, that there is a preponderance of testimony that Mr. Beaumarchais received the million in dispute, for the purchase of supplies; and, if France had been passive on the occasion, or, if we had paid any valuable consideration to her for this million, I should think we were justified in charging Mr. Beaumarchais with that amount. But, when it is recollected that we received these supplies immediately from Mr. Beaumarchais, have settled the account upon our own terms, that the million which we claim as a credit was paid, not by us, but by France, as an act of bounty, and that the French Government insists that this bounty was used for another purpose—when these things are recollected, it does seem to me, that we are precluded from entering into a contest with France on this subject; or, in other words, that we cannot, consistently with our honor or self-respect, pay off an undisputed debt, with a doubtful and disputed gift. On this occasion, Mr. Chairman, I cannot recognise one rule of morality for the nation, and another for individuals. I would pursue the same course in public as in private life; and, as an individual, I never could seek to give the bounty of a benefactor a direction which he objected to, for the purpose of making a discount to the acknowledged debt of a third person. Sir, in this case, France is right, or she is not. If she is right, that the million was furnished to Beaumarchais for secret service money, then we have no pretext for refusing to pay him the balance of his account; but, if she is wrong, then the error consists in claiming our gratitude for nine millions when she has given us but eight, which can in no manner affect the account of Beaumarchais.

The whole of the present difficulty has grown out of the mistake of Dr. Franklin, in the treaty of February, 1783. When he signed that treaty, suppose he had been aware that but eight millions of livres had actually been received, and that he had said to the Count de Vergennes, "You call on me to acknowledge the receipt of nine millions, as the gift of your Government, while I know only of eight; show me how the other million was used for our benefit, and I will freely acknowledge that too;" if, in answer to this, the Count de Vergennes had said, what his successors have said, that the million was used for a "secret political service," can it be believed that Dr. Franklin would have hesitated to receive the assurance, and to sign the treaty which he actually did sign? If he would not, there would have been no ground for the present dispute. But, let us suppose that he would not have been content with the simple assurance of the French Minister, then either that Minister must have given him satisfactory evidence concerning the disposition of the doubtful million, or he would have acknowledged only eight millions, in either of which cases Mr. Beaumarchais's claim is indisputable. Assuredly, if our agent had signed a treaty under a mistake, as he himself states, that mistake should be rectified with the French Government, which should either give us a satisfactory explanation, or hold us bound in gratitude but for eight millions, neither of which can affect the claim of Beaumarchais.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to be consistent with ourselves, with regard to the declarations of the French Government. When Monsieur de Vergennes declared to our Commissioners, in September, 1778, that the military supplies were furnished solely by Mr. Beaumarchais, we acquiesced in that assurance, and required no further proof. Again: Mr. Gallatin, in his late correspondence with the Duke de Richelieu, Minister of Foreign Affairs in France, stated, that if the French Government would make an explicit negative declaration, that the million paid to Mr. Beaumarchais, in June, 1776, was not applied to the purchase of supplies, the difficulty with the accounting officers of the Treasury would have been removed. And, although the answer of the Duke de Richelieu may be considered as somewhat equivocal, yet that which Mr. Turreau had made in 1807, was as positive and explicit as it could be. Had this declaration been made the year before, it would seem, from Mr. Gallatin's letter, the million would not have been deducted from Beaumarchais's account; and, it having been made since, the same consequence should follow. On every ground, then, Mr. Chairman, I am free to say I would vote at once for an appropriation to the whole amount of this claim, whatever may be my private opinion of the source whence Mr. Beaumarchais derived the million; it being certain that he did not derive it from us, and that we have used the supplies which it purchased. But, as our citizens have claims against France for spoliation on their commerce to a large amount, (probably twenty times as much as this claim,) and the French Government has itself introduced Mr. Beaumarchais's claim into the negotiation, I think we may adjust the whole together, without any dereliction of national justice or honor, and I therefore hope the Committee will adopt the resolution for that purpose offered by the committee.

When Mr. TUCKER had concluded—

Mr. DWIGHT called for the reading of the report of the Committee of this House in 1814, (and of which committee Mr. LOWNDEN was chairman,) unfavorable to the claim.

Mr. FARRELLY called for the reading of the opinion of the Attorney General, Mr. RODNEY, in 1807.

Mr. CLAY, in a short speech, expressed a very decided opinion in favor of the claim.

Mr. LIVERMORE took the opposite side, and delivered a few observations in opposition to an allowance of the claim.

Mr. DWIGHT then rose, and went at great length into the whole subject, in reply to Mr. TUCKER and Mr. CLAY, quoting a number of documents in support of his statements, and concluded his speech with offering a resolution that the petitioner have leave to withdraw her petition.

Mr. FARRELLY followed in reply, and spoke at considerable length, to show that the demand was just, and ought to be allowed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose in opposition to the claim, quoted declarations of the Count de Vergennes, remarked on the opinion of Mr. Pinkney, and adduced general arguments against allowing any part of the demand.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, rose, and, expressing a desire to deliver his sentiments, which were most decidedly in favor of the claim, moved that the Committee rise.

The Committee rose accordingly, and had leave to sit again.

Mr. STEWART gave notice that he should, on Thursday, ask the House to consider the following resolution, submitted by him some time since:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to report a bill appropriating the annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and the dividends of the United States Bank stock, commencing from the 1st of January, 1823, to the purposes of internal improvements, to be distributed among the States according to their representation, and to be expended on objects to be designated by Congress, within or bordering on the respective States, unless where any State may consent that its proportion of the fund shall be applied to an object not immediately connected with its territorial limits."

And then the House adjourned.

MAY, 1824.

TUESDAY, May 11.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred, yesterday, a memorial upon the subject, reported a bill for altering the time of holding the circuit court of the United States for the fourth circuit, in the Maryland district; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of William Loughrey, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That all moneys which shall be received on account of the sales and entries of the public lands, after the 4th day of July, 1825, ought to be appropriated exclusively to the support of common schools, and the construction of public roads and canals; and that the said moneys ought to be divided between the several States and Territories, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives of the United States, and applied by them respectively, to the aforesaid purposes, in such manner, and with such limitations and conditions, as the Congress may prescribe.

Mr. COCKE suggested, that a proposition, nearly similar, was already before the House, and moved to lay the resolution on the table, till the other should be discussed, but subsequently withdrew his motion; and Mr. STRONG replied, and explained the object of his resolution; and, after some further conversation between the mover, Mr. COCKE, and Mr. COOK, the resolution was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing a survey to be made, under the direction of the President of the United States, of the south shore of Lake Erie, from Carrying river to Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania; and of causing surveys to be made of the mouths of such bays and rivers, or other places, within the boundaries aforesaid, as the engineer, who may be employed for the purposes aforesaid, shall deem necessary or important; at which to construct or improve harbors, for the security and promotion of the commerce on said Lake; with plans of the places so designated, and estimates of the expense of constructing or improving such harbors.

The resolution was ordered to be laid upon the table.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of War, containing the information called for by the resolution of the 10th of March, requesting the names of all the officers of the army who have been brevetted; stating their lineal rank and brevet rank; when brevetted; and the amount of money paid to each; and when paid; which report, with the accompanying documents, contain the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

MAY 11, 1824.

The Message was read, and laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Navy on the memorials of merchants and others from Baltimore, for farther compensation for damage sustained by the sinking of their vessels in the entrance of the harbor of that city in the late war; which report was laid on the table.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the Committee of Investigation in the case of Ninian Edwards, stated that that committee had received from the Secretary of the Treasury a communication in reply to the memorial of Mr. Edwards, and asked that it might be printed; which was ordered accordingly.

NAVIGATION OF WESTERN RIVERS.

The engrossed bill making an appropriation for improving the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, was read a third time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays on the question of its passage; and they stood, yeas 155, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Tennessee, Allison, Baylies, Barber of Connecticut, J. S. Barbour, Bartley, Bescher, Blair, Breck, Brent, Brown, Buckner, Burleigh, Cambreleng, Campbell of Ohio, Cassedy, Condict, Cook, Craig, Crowninshield, Cushman, Durfee, Dwight, Eddy, Ellis, Findlay, Forward, Gurley, Harris, Harvey, Hayden, Hemphill, Henry, Herrick, Herkimer, Hobart, Holcombe, Houston, Ingham, Isacks, Johnson of Virginia, J. Claim of Beaumarchais.—Proposed Adjournment.

H. OF R.

[After the call was concluded, Mr. BURTON and Mr. BUCHANAN, both accidentally absent when the yeas and nays were called, wished to be allowed to record their votes—the former against the bill, the latter in favor of it; but the leave was not granted, and, according to the rules of the House, could not be, without unanimous consent.]

So the bill was passed and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the Chair,) on the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the report of the committee to whom was referred the claim of the representatives of M. de Beaumarchais.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, who was by custom entitled to the floor, having yesterday moved for the Committee's rising; then rose, and delivered, at great length, his views in favor of the claim.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, delivered his views in opposition to the claim; and concluded his speech, by moving that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, with a view that leave be refused.

The question on the Committee's rising, being then taken, was decided in the affirmative—ayes 105, noes 40.

The question, on granting leave to sit again, was decided in the negative—ayes 60, noes 91.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the report of the committee was then ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, moved to postpone all the previous orders of the day, to take up the bill "for extending the national road from Wheeling to the Missouri. The House refused to take it up.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, called up the consideration of the joint resolution for an adjournment, and required thereon the yeas and nays.

The question of consideration was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows—yeas 80, nays 73.

So, the House took up the resolution.

Mr. KREMER, of Pennsylvania, opposed the resolution, on the ground that an important investigation was pending before the House, which ought to be terminated previous to adjournment. Charges of great weight had been brought forward against a public officer, which had been referred to a committee of this House, and ought to be decided upon before the House adjourned. He therefore moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ALLEN required the yeas and nays on the question of laying it on the table.

Mr. KREMER, at the request of several members, withdrew the motion for the present.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, said he had voted to take up this resolve, in the hope that the House would be put in possession of such information as should enable it to act understandingly on this subject, with reference to the investigation which the House had instituted, in consequence of the address of Mr. Edwards, the late Senator of Illinois. That individual has been sent for, under the authority of the House. Mr. M. was not disposed to adjourn, before time was allowed for his arrival, for his subsequent examination, and for due deliberation, by the committee and the House, upon his testimony. How is it possible, said he, that we can ascertain at what time we can adjourn, unless we should receive from that committee, or from some other source, information to guide our decision?

Mr. M. said, he rose now to inquire, from the Representative from Illinois, the State in which Mr. Edwards resides, when his arrival might, by computation, be expected, that the day for adjournment might be so fixed as to allow time for his arrival, and some days to spare, that the committee of investigation might have an opportunity to make a report, in whole or in part, so as to determine what course in regard to this matter became the dignity and the honor of the House, which, for one, he would do all in his power to maintain. If the time which should be fixed, should prove too short to allow of the transaction of the necessary business of the session, there would be no difficulty in extending it. In thus expressing his wish that some day should be fixed for the adjournment, Mr. M. said he was actuated by no outrageous zeal to do the public business, much less by any very special view to the saving of the public money, considering the public money as nothing, compared with public justice. He desired, however, to see some period fixed for the termination of the session.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, said—Teach me so to number my days, that I may apply my heart to wisdom, is doubtless the prayer of every individual in this Hall. Teach us so to number the days of this session, that we may apply ourselves to the appropriate business of it, is equally proper, though not perhaps equally important. Under this impression, he had voted to consider the resolution appointing the day of adjournment. The tariff bill in the Senate, and the communication of the Hon. Mr. Edwards to this House, seemed calculated, more than any thing else, to retard the hour of adjournment. He hoped that some of the committee who had charge of the communication of Mr. Edwards, would express their opinion whether the public good required that Congress should continue in session until the arrival of Mr. Edwards, who had been sent for. For his own part, he said, he had never been able to find any thing in Mr. Edwards's letter of public consequence, which might not have been communicated at the opening of the session, and he had been surprised that that gentleman had thought fit to keep the secret in his own breast all the time he was here, and to send back his complaints at so late an hour, and after he had taken his departure from the city. If this subject may be viewed in the light of a prosecution, there can be no absolute necessity, because witnesses have been summoned, for the Court to continue in session until their arrival. The opinion of the committee of investigation, as to what the public good requires, ought, in his opinion, to govern our decision in this instance. The Senate must have control of our resolution, until the tariff shall have been disposed of.

H. OF R.

Canal in Indiana.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, rose to answer the question which had been addressed to him, as to the time at which Mr. Edwards might be expected to arrive here. From having travelled the journey some ten or a dozen times, and sometimes in the mode in which he presumed Mr. Edwards would take, Mr. C. was of opinion that he might be able to reach this city on the 23d or 24th of this month.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, observed that much time had been spent on the subject of the tariff. It was now before the Senate, and numerous amendments are understood to have been made to it in that House. When the bill should be returned to this House, as amended, if it pass the Senate, much discussion will probably arise on it, and a reasonable time should be allowed for the deliberate consideration of that bill. This was due to the House and to the nation. It was unworthy of the House to bind itself to a day, in order to spur members to diligence and despatch. The first duty of the House, was to attend to the public business. He was therefore opposed to fixing a day for adjournment, at present.

Mr. TOP, of Pennsylvania, observed that, if the resolution must pass, he hoped arguments of a little more force and consistency would be advanced in its favor. When the House sent for Mr. Edwards, it knew that no certainty respecting the time of his arrival could be attained at that time, and nothing had occurred to change the uncertainty on the subject. He replied to Mr. LIVERMORE, and observed that, in that affair, this House was not the court, but, as far as it could become so, the accuser. It had given all the weight it could to the charges submitted. It had directed its committee to proceed in the investigation, and it was bound in consistency to allow time for the return of its messenger, unless it meant to suppress the investigation altogether.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he had not been present when this motion was brought up, nor had any other member of the committee of investigation. But, in regard to one interesting topic which belonged to this discussion, he remarked that the House was apprized that the officer of this House had been deputed in quest of the witness, and, as he understood the matter from the statement given by the member from Illinois, barring accidents, he presumed that he may be expected to be here by the 23d or 24th of the month. But, as far as he understood it, Mr. W. said, the House was as able now to form a judgment of the probable time of the arrival of Mr. Edwards, as it could be a week hence, as, in the Western country, a traveller might often outstrip the mail, and in all probability no intelligence would be received of the arrival of the messenger at the place of residence of the person summoned earlier than the 23d or 24th of the month. It seemed to him, Mr. W. said, that the best course would be, now, to fix a period for adjournment so far remote as to give the party summoned an opportunity to come here and be examined touching the subject. To fix a period for adjournment earlier than that, would be wholly inconsistent with all that had been hitherto done. He thought a period should be fixed, however important the subject of inquiry might be, beyond which the House would not wait, for the arrival of Mr. Edwards, some days beyond that at which it had been suggested he might arrive, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, agreed entirely with the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the general view he had taken of the subject, except that he thought, for the present, it would be best to lay the resolution on the table. He knew there was a strong disposition in the House to adjourn; but, for himself, he could not vote for an adjournment till the individual referred to should either have arrived, or it should be ascertained that he would not come.

Mr. WEBSTER replied that the objection to that course was, that no farther information was to be expected, with any probability, as to the coming of Mr. Edwards before the 23d or 24th of this month; and, from this time to that, the House would be in precisely the same situation that it is now.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, was opposed to fixing on any day at present. Information might, by some accident, arrive before the time mentioned, which would enable them to do it. But, fixing on the day now would also have a tendency to protract the discussion of the tariff in the other House, and was calculated to defeat that measure.

Mr. TRACY, of New York, moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays on this motion, which were ordered; and the question of laying it on the table was decided as follows:—Yeas 99, nays 87.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

CANAL IN INDIANA.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. MARVIN in the Chair,) on the bill "authorizing the construction of a canal through the public lands, in the State of Indiana, between the Wabash and Miami of Lake Erie."

The question recurring, from Saturday, on Mr. CALL's motion to strike out "ninety feet," and insert "one mile," for the extent of the reservation on each side of the canal—

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, objected to the amendment, as trenching on the terms of the cession of the Northwestern Territory by Virginia to the United States, which declare that the whole of that cession shall be a fund for the payment of the common expenditures of the United States.

Mr. RANKIN took the same ground; the proposed canal was a local work, and not one of the "common expenditures" of the United States, and thought it was better to give money than land in aid of it.

Mr. TEST contended, that giving a mile on each side of the canal did not violate the terms of the cession more than 90 feet—it was in the spirit of that cession, because it enhanced the value of all the rest of the lands ceded. Unless this land was given, Indiana would be unable to effect the object. This was the only opportunity, at once, of giving timely aid to the canal, and of enhancing the value of the public lands.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, denied that this canal was a local measure, and he stated its effects on the Union at large. He advocated the amendment—and read an extract from the writings of Mr. Fulton on the benefits of canals. He replied, also, to the objections of Mr. ALEXANDER, &c.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, thought that, if the canal would so greatly enhance the value of the public lands, it would be better for the United States to make the canal than to give all the benefit of the work to Indiana. The calculation was, that the canal would cost only $300,000, and they asked land to the value of $500,000. He for one would never consent to give it.

Mr. CALL, Delegate from Florida, spoke in reply, and urged the present low value of the public lands in that quarter as an argument in favor of the bill. All that was proposed to be given would, at present value, amount only to $35,000. The additional value would arise from the enterprise and industry of the State of Indiana. He replied to the arguments of Mr. ALEXANDER, and dwelt at some extent on the value of this line of water communication, and the facility of making the canal.

Mr. SHARPE, of New York, thought the only question was, whether this was the proper time to engage in the undertaking. He wished farther information on this point, and expressed some apprehensions of the danger of the precedent.

Mr. RANKIN replied, and explained the facts of the case, and repeated and confirmed the arguments he had before urged.

Mr. JENNINGS called for the reading of the memorial of the Legislature of Indiana on this subject. It was read accordingly.

Mr. JENNINGS stated the topography of the country through which it was proposed to cut this canal. He adverted to the opinion of General WASHINGTON, in favor of this and other Western water communications. He went at considerable length into a discussion of the objection from the terms of the Virginia cession, and of the practicability and general importance of the measure.

Mr. TEST followed in farther explanation of the bill and the amendment.

Mr. McCox delivered at some length his objections to the amendment, as granting to one State what was intended only for general objects. He urged the danger of the precedent, the difficulty with which Virginia could get enough land to pay her Revolutionary soldiers, &c.

Mr. SHARPE thought the grant in the amendment very large, and the time for completing the work too great. This measure would be superseded, moreover, by the general plan for internal improvements. He thought it was enough, at present, to provide for surveys, as had been already done.

The question on the amendment moved by Mr. CALL, for giving a mile on each side the canal, being then taken, was decided in the negative.

The Committee then took up a bill to authorize the Territory of Florida to open a canal through the public lands; and, having gone through it, reported the latter bill, which was ordered to a third reading, and asked and obtained leave to sit again on the former.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 12.

Mr. BRENT, from the committee appointed on the 4th of March last, upon the subject of the sale of public lots, within the city of Washington, made a report; which was read, and laid upon the table until to-morrow.

Mr. SCOTT laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House any information which he may possess, in relation to the intercourse and trade now carried on between the people of the United States (and particularly the people of the State of Missouri) and the Mexican provinces; how, and by what route that trade or intercourse is carried on; in what it consists; the distances, &c.; the nations of Indians through which it passes; their dispositions, whether pacific or otherwise; the advantages resulting, or likely to result, from that trade or intercourse.

An engrossed bill for altering the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the fourth circuit of the district of Maryland, was, on motion of Mr. McKIM, laid on the table.

An engrossed bill to authorize the Territory of Florida to open a canal through the public lands to unite the river St. John's with the bay of Augustine, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

A bill "to regulate the fees of the registers of wills in the District of Columbia" being under consideration in Committee of the Whole, a prolonged debate arose on some of its details; in which Messrs. SWAN, NEALE, COCKE, SHARPE, KENT, and FINDLAY, took part; when the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill granting certain lots of ground to the city of Mobile, and to certain individuals of said city. The bill having been slightly amended, was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading.

JOSIAH HOOK, Jr.

On motion of Mr. LONGFELLOW, the House took up the bill from the Senate for the relief of Josiah Hook, jr., (collector at Castine,) who was prosecuted for the amount of a seizure during the war, and had judgment recovered against him.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, went at length into a statement and legal examination of this case, with a view to show that the collector had been negligent in his duty.

Mr. LONGFELLOW, of Maine, spoke, in reply, and, after a full statement of the facts, contended that no such negligence appeared as should subject Mr. Hook to the loss of the money for which he had been sued.

It was admitted, on both sides, that he was a vigilant and faithful officer, and had acted in good faith when he made the seizure.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, took the same view of the subject, and opposed the report of the Committee of Claims. The supposed neglect arose from a mistake of eminent counsel, and a mistake which, at that time, prevailed in the Treasury itself.

Mr. BARTLETT, of New Hampshire, rose in reply, and quoted dates and statutes to show that it was through the negligence of Mr. Hook, the Government had suffered very heavy loss, the expense of losing which amount it was now applied to to pay. He had no personal hostility to the claimant, but rather the contrary, as he always understood him to be an excellent officer.

Mr. COCKE, of Tennessee, declared that the opinion he had formerly held in opposition to this claim had been changed, by a fuller investigation of the case; and he should vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, replied to Mr. BARTLETT, and went into a legal argument to show that the loss of the Government was not owing to the neglect of the collector.

Mr. LIVERMORE, advocated, at considerable length, the same side of the question, and the debate was farther continued by Messrs. BARTLETT, LIVERMORE, LONGFELLOW, and MCCOY; when the question being put, the bill was passed, and returned to the Senate.

INDIANA CANAL.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the Chair,) on the bill to authorize the State of Indiana to open a canal through the public lands; and the question recurring from yesterday on the amendment granting ninety feet of land on each side of the proposed canal, it was agreed to.

The blank in the second section was so amended as to require the survey to be finished within three, and the canal to be finished within twelve years.

Mr. TEST offered an amendment to the third section, the effect of which will be to reserve from sale, till further ordered, the sections of land through which the canal shall pass, and those adjoining these on each side, and he supported the motion by a series of explanatory observations.

Mr. RANKIN, of Mississippi, objected to the amendment as a departure from the course heretofore adopted in similar cases, and as calculated to retard the settlement of the State of Indiana.

The question being taken, the amendment proposed by Mr. TEST was negatived—ayes 41.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended.

Mr. TEST renewed in the House his motion for reserving from sale the sections of land through which the canal shall pass, and those adjoining them on each side.

Mr. VINTON, of Ohio, argued the necessity of this reservation from the terms of the contract of cession, as well as from principles of policy.

Mr. WHIPPLE, of New Hampshire, advocated the amendment, in a few observations, and, the question being taken, it was rejected—ayes 55, noes 59.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HARBOR OF PRESQUE ISLE, &c.

On motion of Mr. FARRELLY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "for improving the harbor of Presque Isle, and for repairing Plymouth beach."

Mr. NEWTON explained the facts with respect to Presque Isle, and commented on the report of the Board of Engineers, by which it appears that the work is important, and practicable, and that its expense will amount to about $35,000. The State of Pennsylvania having made an appropriation in part for the work, the bill is for the purpose of supplying the deficit.

Mr. FARRELLY spoke from personal knowledge of the importance of Presque Isle, and the loss of lives and property which had occurred for want of a good harbor there.

The blank in that part of the bill which relates to the work at Presque Isle, was filled with the sum of $20,000.

Mr. NEWTON, then stated the circumstances of Plymouth beach; the value of that harbor to all vessels pressed by hard weather in the neighborhood of Cape Cod; and the danger of its being seriously injured and ultimately destroyed, for want of the repairs contemplated; and moved to fill the blank for this work with $20,000.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, confirmed, from personal knowledge, the accuracy of the statement given by the chairman of the Committee of Commerce.

Mr. HOBART added some particulars to the statement, in respect to the beach of Plymouth, and the amount of navigation interested in the safety of the harbor, and its advantages as a harbor for vessels of war, &c.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, supported the appropriation, and made some remarks on the readiness of Western members to vote for the improvements on the seaboard, and the liberality which members from the Eastern sections of the Union had recently shown in voting improvements on the Western waters.

The motion to fill the blank with $20,000, was carried without opposition.

The Committee then took up a bill to authorize the State of Kentucky to open a canal round the falls of the river Ohio, at Louisville.

MAY, 1824.

Public Land Debt.

H. OF R.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, went into a detailed discussion of the value and importance of the proposed canal. He stated the estimate of the expense. More than three thousand boats, he said, passed these falls annually, and damages to the amount of $150,000 had been sustained, in a year, for want of this improvement. If the canal were made, steamboats could be substituted, in navigation, for the flat-bottomed boats now employed. He referred, for further statements, to the report of the committee on the subject.

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, thought that the Committee was not yet prepared to act on the last bill, and moved that it rise and report that already acted on.

The Committee rose accordingly, reported the bill for Presque Isle and Plymouth beach, and it was ordered to a third reading.

Progress being reported on the bill respecting the canal at Louisville, the House refused leave to the Committee to sit again upon that bill.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CADY in the Chair, on the bill "granting pre-emption to certain actual settlers in the district of Jackson Courthouse;" which bill was slightly amended, and, being reported to the House, was ordered to a third reading.

PUBLIC LAND DEBT.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, "to provide for the extinguishment of debts due to the United States, by purchasers of public lands."

Mr. RANKIN stated, at length, what had been previously done by Congress, on the subject, explained the object of the bill under consideration, and offered an amendment extending its provisions to certain town lots reserved by the United States.

The Committee then rose, the bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "to extinguish the Quapau title to lands in the Territory of Arkansas." The memorial from Arkansas and the report of the Secretary of War thereon, having been read—

Mr. CONWAY moved an amendment to the bill, striking out all after the enacting words, and substituting a clause appropriating $5,000 to enable the President of the United States to make a treaty with the Quapau Indians.

At the suggestion of Mr. CLAY, the sum was increased to $7,500; and the bill, as thus amended, was reported and ordered to a third reading.

And then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, May 13.

Mr. HARVEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to revive and extend the term of certain pensions which have expired by limitation; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Nathaniel Sylvester; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Herman Fisher; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting—

1st. A list of balances which have remained unsettled, or appear to have been due from collectors of the customs, &c., more than three years prior to the 30th of September, 1823.

2d. A list of balances on account of the old internal revenue and direct tax, on the books of the Register of the Treasury, which have remained unsettled or appear to have been due more than three years prior to the 30th of September, 1823.

3d. A list of balances due by Receivers of Public Money, on account of the sales of public lands, which have remained due or unsettled on the books of the Treasury, for more than three years prior to the 30th September, 1823.

Which letter and lists were laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a printed copy of an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year 1822, with an appendix, containing statements of the debt of the United States, and of its redemption, to the close of the year 1822; which letter was laid upon the table.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

An act to authorize the State of Indiana to open a canal through the public lands, to connect the navigation of the river Wabash and the Miami of Lake Erie;

An act granting a right of pre-emption to certain actual settlers in that part of the former province of West Florida included in the district of Jackson Courthouse, in the State of Mississippi, and in the district of St. Helena Courthouse, in the State of Louisiana;

An act making appropriations for deepening the channel leading into the harbor of Presque Isle, and for repairing Plymouth beach;

An act granting certain lots of ground to the corporation of the city of Mobile, and to certain individuals of said city;

An act to regulate the fees of the Registers of Wills in the several counties within the District of Columbia;

An act making an appropriation towards the extinguishment of the Quapau title to lands in the Territory of Arkansas; which were respectively read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of public lands," was read the third time, and passed, with an amendment.

The resolution laid on the table by Mr. SCOTT yesterday, was taken up, read, and agreed to by the House.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:
In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 15th of April, requesting the President to cause to be communicated to the House a statement of the supplies which have been sent from the United States to any ports of South America, for the use of our squadron in the Pacific ocean; of the amount paid for such supplies, with the names of the owners of the vessels; and other details therein specified; I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of the Navy, which, with the documents accompanying it, furnishes the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

MAY 13, 1824.

The Message was read, and laid upon the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House of the following title, viz: "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. They have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: An act relative to the Patent Office, and to the salary of the Superintendent thereof; An act in addition to an act establishing Navy hospitals; and An act for the relief of Alexander McNair; in which bills the Senate also ask the concurrence of this House.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill "enabling the claimants to lands within the limits of the State of Missouri to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims."

The bill was reported to the House as amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," were read, and referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, viz:

1st. An act relative to the Patent Office, and to the salary of the Superintendent thereof;

2d. An act in addition to an act establishing Navy hospitals;

3d. An act for the relief of Alexander McNair; were read the first and second time, and referred—the first to the Committee of Ways and Means; the second to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and the third to the Committee of Claims.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the disposition of three several tracts of land, in Tuscarawas county, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes; which was reported with amendments, which were concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time tomorrow.

PUBLIC LOTS IN WASHINGTON.

The following report was yesterday made by Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana:

The committee appointed by virtue of a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 4th day of March, 1824, have had the subject which that resolution proposes under consideration, and submit the following report, viz: A letter from J. Elgar, Commissioner of the Public Buildings, dated 5th of May, 1824, by which it appears that the gross amount of the sales of the public lots, in Washington City, as made by the Commissioners and Superintendent, was six hundred and eighty-nine thousand four hundred and forty dollars eleven cents, subject to a deduction for losses, occasioned by failures of purchasers, the amount of which has not been ascertained. The committee have not been able to obtain information from the books of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, of the number of public lots sold, when sold, by whom, to whom, and for what price each lot; what part of the purchase money has been paid, and the exact balance due. To obtain this information, would require more time than probably remains of the present session of Congress, as the Commissioner of the Public Buildings states that it could not be done in less than two months.

As to the disbursements which were made by the late Samuel Lane, Commissioner of the Public Buildings, the committee find that a balance of $22,961 77 was due by the late Samuel Lane, Commissioner of the Public Buildings, at the time of his death, together with the balance of $1,740 14, which he had received on account of the sales of city lots; and that, since his death, his estate has received credit for different sums of money amounting to $9,076 6, which leaves a balance due the United States of $15,590 85; that his executor has not yet completed the settlement of his estate; and, therefore, it is impossible for the committee to say how much of that balance will eventually be refunded to the United States. It is probable the balance will be somewhat diminished, but that a large sum will remain unpaid.

The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be made, and submitted to this House, upon the first day of the next session of Congress, a full and complete statement of the exact number of lots belonging to the United States, in the city of Washington, which have been sold by the public agents for that purpose, when sold, by whom, to whom, and for what price each lot was purchased; what part of the purchase money has been paid, the amount due, and by whom due, and when payable; whether the debts are well secured, and whether the money received has been applied; to what purposes, and by whom.

The resolution with which the report concludes being taken up for consideration, a debate arose upon it, of which the following outline will serve to give a general idea:

Mr. COCKE said the report of the select committee, now under consideration, was not as full a response to the resolution as the documents before them would have warranted, although a complete and full report to all the objects of inquiry might not have been had at the present session of Congress. The number of lots sold, and price of each, was not so much desired as information in what manner the money placed in the hands of officers for disbursement was applied, and the objects of its application; especially, whether any law existed to authorize the expenditure. To this inquiry, the resolution creating the committee, directed their attention, and used the words "whether all the money received had been applied to objects authorized by any existing law; how much thereof has been paid into the Treasury." To these inquiries the committee might have reported, as the evidence was within their power. They have not, said Mr. C., pretended to state the amount which was appropriated, each year, for the repairs and completion of the Capitol, the President's House, and public offices, or to show what disposition was made of it. They have reported the sums due at the time of the Commissioner's death, and state the payments made since by his representative, leaving a balance still due to the public of more than fifteen thousand dollars. Besides the appropriations for those objects, Congress authorized large sums to be expended to purchase furniture for the President's House, and placed its disbursement under the control of the President. The letter of the Register of the Treasury accompanying the report, and to which the committee refer, shows that the sum of thirty-eight thousand dollars of the money, applicable to the purchase of furniture, was placed in the hands of the late Commissioner, thirty thousand dollars by the draft of the President, and the residue by its receipt from Mr. Whann, who had previously drawn it by the authority of the President.

The committee declined to inquire, or report, what disposition has been made of this $38,000, alleging that it was a private transaction between the President and Commissioner Lane; that, as the money was to be expended under the direction of the President, he could appoint whomsoever he pleased, as his agent, and that the resolution did not authorize the inquiry. In this, sir, I think the committee are mistaken. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to the last clause of the resolution, to wit: "and what disposition has been made of the money placed in the hands of the late Superintendent of the City, for disbursement." I know that it was the intention of the mover to inquire into this expenditure, and I believe the resolution warrants it.

Before I advert to a settled account between Mr. Lane's executors and the agent of the President, I will use the language of Mr. Vinson's deposition now before me, "that it was generally understood that Lane was insolvent at the time he entered the army, and that he was not considered a man of property at the time he commenced on the duties of his office as Commissioner;" and this statement is corroborated by the amount of the assets which came to the hands of his representatives.

The first item of the settled account between Colonel Lane and Mr. Monroe is a charge by Mr. Monroe against Lane.

To amount of furniture sold to the United States, and carried to his credit with the United States - - - - - $9,071 21

On the opposite side is a credit—
By cash for furniture - - - - - 10,000 00

I am unable, sir, to account for this difference in amount.

The second item of the charge is—

Amount of ditto, bought by Mr. Lee, paid for by Mr. M., and credited to S. Lane, with United States $9,659 66.

The third item, which appears to relate to the furniture, is, a balance of $38,000, public money, appropriated for furniture, not accounted for by S. Lane, and for which Mr. M. is responsible, $1,556 15.

Amount paid to Mr. M. for articles for the President's House, and for which the vouchers were delivered to S. Lane, $778 21.

Error in the sum allowed for Geater, $36, paid for mattresses, being for the house.

Amount of check on the Bank of Columbia, for the amount in the hands of Mr. Whann, $6,000.

Check on the Bank of Columbia, $1,500.

The other items of charge, I am not prepared to explain; but the whole amount of charge is $29,950 96; against this sum, is the $10,000 before spoken of, as a credit, with sundry other items for cash paid to individuals, for Mr. Monroe, by Lane, some of which, sir, I shall notice.

Cash paid Mr. Yard, $2,000.

I have no document to show for what articles this sum was paid, but the committee was informed by one of its members, the gentleman from Virginia, that the President's carriage constituted a part.

It appears, from this account, that the sum of $2,785 49, was paid by Mr. Lane, to Russell & La Farge, and for which Mr. Monroe has entered a credit. The account of those individuals I hold in my hand, which Mr. Monroe, on the 4th of May, 1818, endorsed as just, and approved by him. The letter accompanying the account, after the usual compliments, states:

"We have the honor to enclose, herewith, duplicate bills of lading, of which one is sent by us to the collector of the customs at Alexandria, for forty-one packages, amounting, as per invoice enclosed, to francs 83,036 30. Bill of lading for five cases paper hangings, amounting, as per invoice, to francs 6,185 55. Bill of lading for thirty-nine cases, containing 1,300 bottles Champagne and Burgundy wine, as per invoice, francs 5,962 47; and bill of lading for seven cases, of which six are for Mrs. Monroe, amounting to francs 9,056 30, and one for Mrs. Deatur, amounting to francs 803—for which we have debited the account of your Excellency, by virtue of the letters of credit of your Excellency and of Colonel Lane."

The account of Russell & Lafarge also shows the application of $12,000, which has been remitted to Europe, and the net proceeds of which they had received. The residue of their account, I understand, was paid by Mr. Lane, for which, I presume, the above credit in the settled account, constitutes a part.

The next item that I shall notice, is the sum of $266, paid to Mrs. Elzey, a milliner, in this city, as I am informed; of the particular items, I have never inquired. The sum of $96 62½, paid Mr. Mauro, and credited, appears, from his statement before me, to be for brandy, wine, spirits, lemons, demijohns, tea, porter, and mustard, delivered by orders of Colonel Lane, for the use of the President's House. The sum of $28, paid Mr. Graeff, and also credited in the account, appears from his statement to be for two cases of claret. The next item of $124 25, paid to Thomas Coote & Co., is by his statement, for beer, delivered to Mr. Monroe, and paid for by Colonel Lane. As to the other items of credit, I have no statement to show for what the sums were expended; but the amount of credits given in the account, is $36,466 51½, leaving a balance due S. Lane of $6,515 55½; and immediately below the balance thus stated, is the following entry: "Tom's expenses and a cart to Albemarle, in 1817, $60," which, if added to the above balance, would make $6,575 55½.

Sir, I have founded these observations on documents now on my table. If I have erred I regret it—they are made from a sense of duty which I owe to my constituents—and I have no unfriendly feelings to gratify. The furniture of the President was valued, before delivery to the Government; but as he had authority to direct the disbursement of the money, it seems to me that it was making a contract with himself. The settlement of which I have been speaking, was made in June, 1822; on the 18th November following, as well as I recollect, $2,000 was paid into the Treasury and credited to Colonel Lane: 1st. To balance the furniture account, for which Mr. Monroe seems to have held himself responsible, and the residue to his credit as Commissioner of the Public Buildings. On the 2d January following, one other $2,000, was paid and credited to Lane's account.

If, sir, I am not mistaken in the views I have taken, an inquiry ought to be had. To this end I move you to recommit the report, with instructions to inquire—

"In what manner the money arising from the sale of city lots has been expended: in what manner the money appropriated by Congress to complete a repair of the public buildings has been disbursed; and how the money appropriated to purchase furniture for the President's House has been disbursed; by whom, and to whom paid, and for what."

Mr. BAYLIES, of Massachusetts, spoke in reply, and explained and defended the report of the committee, stating the reasons why the report did not go into farther statements.

Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana, (who made the report from the committee,) replied to the observations of Mr. COCKE nearly as follows: He said it had been stated by the honorable gentlemen that he opposed this report, to have impartial justice done, and that he was actuated by a consideration for the public interest. Mr. B. then observed that he meant not to arraign the motives of the gentleman, but he could assure the House that the members composing that committee were as true friends to their country and to impartial justice, as the honorable member who had stated it. [Here Mr. COCKE interrupted Mr. B., and declared he meant no insinuation against the committee, and that he believed their conduct flowed from the best of motives.] Mr. B. continued. I receive the explanation for myself and for the committee; but the statement made of the facts has not been given with the candor the gentleman ought to have observed. He has made a statement of accounts between the President of the United States and Lafarge Russell & Co., of France, Samuel Lane, of this city, and others, of their private transactions, and has stated them as if these accounts had been contracted for the public, and paid out of the public money, when he knows full well that such are not the facts. He has thrown out insinuations against the Chief Magistrate of the nation, calculated to tarnish the honest reputation of that patriot, which he has earned in the faithful service of our country. As a member of the committee, Mr. B. observed, he was acquainted with those facts, and would state them to the House, and he vouched for their correctness. Mr. Monroe took the Presidential Chair after the war, after the President's House had been reduced to ashes, with its furniture in it, and Congress, as usual, made an appropriation to purchase new furniture. The President wrote to Lafarge, Russell & Co., of France, to send, for the use of the President's House, certain descriptions of furniture, and also to send several articles for his own private use and that of his family. These merchants, in making out their account, blended the public and private account of the President together, and made out one account, which was forwarded to the President, with a draft for the money. This draft arrived when Mr. Monroe was absent in the discharge of an important and useful duty to his country. Mr. Lane, who was the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, and the proper person to pay the charge for the furniture to the President's House, paid for it, and, the President being absent, as his friend, he also paid for the articles for the private use of the President, not out of the public money, but out of his own money, and charged Mr. Monroe with it upon his private account. A subsequent settlement took place, in which Mr. Monroe paid this sum to Mr. Lane, as a private debt; all the other cases named by the gentleman from Tennessee, are of the precise, same nature; all of them private transactions between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Lane. Several years after these accounts were settled, Mr. Lane died, and it appears that his estate is in arrears to the United States. It is now contended that because Lane received public money, that, therefore, the money he paid for Mr. Monroe on his private account, must be presumed to have been paid with the public money, and that Mr. Monroe knew it, and must pay back the money to the United States, although he has fairly and honestly accounted for it to Mr. Lane. Who ever heard of such an unjust, illiberal, and unjustifiable attack?

As regards the charge about the furniture of the President taken for the United States by the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, the proceedings in that case can show the accusation of indecenty, indelicacy, made by the gentleman, to be incorrect. There was no furniture when Mr. Monroe went into the President's House, fit for its use. Mr. Lane proposed to purchase some valuable furniture that had been sent from France to Mr. Monroe. Mr. Monroe agreed to let the United States have it on condition that he might re-take it when he went out of office, upon repaying the money he received for it. To this effect a written agreement was made, and is on file. The furniture was then valued by two highly respectable gentlemen, (General Van Ness, of the city, and General Mason, of Georgetown,) assisted by two mechanics, judges of its quality, and, after estimation made, it will be seen, by Mr. Lane's letter, that the President sold it for twenty-five per cent. less than similar furniture could be purchased for. All these facts were shown in the committee, and why did not the gentleman, (Mr. COCKE,) if he is actuated by no other motive than impartial justice, state them to the House? Mr. B. then observed that there was something wrong in this business. He would not indulge in observations which this attack might justify. The object of it occupied too elevated a stand, was too well known to his country, and had served her too faithfully in every situation to which he had been called, to be reached by any ungenerous allusions, whether made in the discharge of a public duty, or to gratify other views. From this statement, the House will perceive, Mr. B. continued, that the committee acted correctly in not interfering with the private concerns between Mr. Lane and the President. He then showed that the subjects submitted to the Committee had been properly considered, and that the report was as full as it could be made.

Mr. B. concluded by deprecating a false impression produced by the observations of the gentleman from Tennessee, injurious to the President, whose conduct he indicated as not only pure and honest, but as honorable, in a high degree; and expressed his hope that the motion of the gentleman, (Mr. COCKE,) would be rejected, and the report of the committee approved, and, by its approval, an expression might be given to the conduct of the President. He wished it so to be considered.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, followed Mr. B., and expressed his unfeigned regret at the course pursued by the gentleman from Tennessee. He alluded to the personal intimacy he had enjoyed and esteem he had felt for Mr. Monroe from his boyhood; uttered his scorn at the style of insinuation in which a private account had been examined on this floor, which was wholly of a private character, and which it would degrade the House to meddle with. He went into a detailed statement of the conduct of the President in relation to the expenditures for his family use and for the furniture of the President's house, and closed with moving that the amendment proposed by Mr. COCKE, lie on the table. But this motion he withdrew, to give an opportunity for reply.

Mr. COCKE rose in reply, and explained some of the observations he had before made—went into a further examination of the account of the late Colonel Lane, and of his transactions with the President, and persisted in maintaining that the report ought to have gone farther than it did, in the investigation of these particulars.

Mr. A. STEVENSON, of Virginia, said, that it was due neither to the character of the distinguished individual concerned, nor to the duty and dignity of the House, to reply to the observations just made. He observed that, when the Chief Magistrate now in office should retire, he would retire poor, and that no man would have it in his power to detect the public money in his hand, and that it would be found that that officer had acted in the affair adverted to, and all others of a pecuniary nature, not only with purity, but with liberality.

Mr. KREMER, of Pennsylvania, expressed his hope that the motion to lay the resolution on the table would never be renewed: that the investigation should be made and fairly met, and the opinion of the House expressed by yeas and nays, that it might be seen who they were who had assailed a man grown gray with honor in his country's service.

Mr. MERCER rose to explain why he should not renew the motion he had made, to lay the subject on the table. He stated what had been done in the select committee, and urged the unreasonableness and impracticability of endeavoring to obtain, in the few remaining days of the session, information which nine weeks had been insufficient time to procure. He concurred with his colleague, in the opinion that the President, instead of having appropriated improperly any part of the public money, was, and would be found, a creditor, rather than a debtor of the nation. He gave a testimony to the purity and honor of Mr. Monroe's private character, and expressed a hope that, by yeas and nays, the House would mark its sentiments of what had passed in relation to this subject.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROSS expressed a determination to vote for the recommitment. He entertained the highest respect for the Chief Magistrate, but thought, on the principles of a republican government, that officer, as well as any other, should be held to a strict account for public moneys intrusted to his hands. He should not feel any greater delicacy from the fact of his being a Virginian, (which had been alluded to by Mr. STEVENSON,) than if he was from Ohio, or Michigan, &c., and he thought the investigation was due to the President himself.

Mr. STEVENSON explained. In alluding to Mr. Monroe's being a Virginian, he only meant to state one of the reasons why he felt it his duty to vindicate his good name.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, expressed his surprise at the course of the debate. The evidence on which the grovelling and unworthy charge of peculation was now attempted to be brought against the first officer of the Republic had been in the possession of a committee of this House ever since last Winter. He expressed a high sentiment of respect for the character of Mr. Monroe, and thought that he was the very last person against whom the charge of an avaricious love of money, and base collusion with a subordinate officer, would ever be brought, or could ever be substantiated. He trusted this House, at this late period, would not enter into another investigation, probably of groundless charges.

Mr. COCKE then rose, and stated that since there seemed much objection to the motion, in point of time, he would consent to withdraw it till the next session.

Proceedings.

MAY, 1834.

The question then recurring on concurring with the committee in the resolution reported by them—

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, rose, and wished distinctly to understand whether or not the gentleman from Tennessee meant to charge the Chief Magistrate of the Union with an embezzlement of the public money. If he did, it was proper that that gentleman should remember, that it was due to this House and to this nation that an accuser, bringing such a charge, should be himself without suspicion. That gentleman could appreciate the effect of injurious charges on the reputation of persons holding distinguished stations, having been himself the subject of them—

[Here Mr. LITTLE called the gentleman to order.]

The Chair pronounced him to be not out of order.

Mr. HAMILTON proceeded, and observed that, in certain public prints of this city, the gentleman from Tennessee had been openly charged with fraudulent conduct—

[Here Mr. SPEAKER pronounced Mr. HAMILTON to be out of order.]

Mr. POINSETT, of South Carolina, rose to corroborate the statements made by the gentlemen from Virginia, and was proceeding to say that he had seen an explanation of these transactions the most satisfactory and honorable to the President, when

Mr. SPEAKER asked him to give way to allow Mr. H. to proceed.

Mr. HAMILTON then resumed, and expressed his reprobation of the course pursued in introducing a charge of this magnitude and complexion at such a period of the session, and his confidence in the unblemished purity of the character now attempted to be destroyed.

Mr. BRENT stated that the delay in bringing forward the report of the committee was to be attributed to the chairman alone, (Mr. COCKE,) and stated certain facts in relation to the course of the committee's proceedings.

Mr. COCKE rose in reply, and denied that he had ever been absent from the committee's meetings. His sole object was to have a full and fair investigation, &c. With respect to himself, he admitted that insinuations had been brought forward against him in a certain print, and at a proper time he meant to notice them, and to explain the facts to which they had reference. He declared his determination to persevere in doing his duty to the people in this House, whatever feeling it might excite in the minds of some gentlemen towards him.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, then rose and observed, that, having been three years since on a committee to whom these accounts had been submitted, he felt it to be his duty to testify to the vigilance, integrity, and perseverance in his duty of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee—whom he commended for probing radically every rotten part of the public expenditure. He thought that gentleman had, on the present occasion, done himself immortal honor, by breasting the storm in this House.

Mr. VINTON, of Ohio, asked an explanation of Mr. COCKE, which he gave; when,

Mr. BARTLETT, of New Hampshire, moved to lay the report of the committee on the table.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 77, noes 89.

The resolution having been again read—

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, rose and said, that, approving the resolution, he should vote for it, but he protested against any conclusion being drawn from that vote as to the matter which had been discussed that morning. In making this protestation, he did not intend to sanction the statements or opinions of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. COCKE.) All he meant was, that he gave no vote upon a question which had not been examined.

The SPEAKER suggested the propriety of dispensing with the yeas and nays on this resolution; there seemed to be no opposition to it; but, Mr. MERCER, who had moved for their being taken, continuing to insist upon them, they were ordered accordingly.

Mr. COBS and Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, made in substance a similar protest to that of Mr. FORSYTH.

When the question on concurring with the select committee, in the resolution reported by them to the House, was decided by yeas, unanimously, in the affirmative—yeas 183, nays none.

So the resolve was agreed to.

FRIDAY, May 14.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom a petition was referred on the 22d of March, upon the subject, reported a bill granting to the Corporation of Tuscaloosa, certain lots, and privileges over the reservations and commons, in said town; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of James Lenox, William Maitland, G. B. Abeel, Gulian Ludlow, and Hector Scott; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, covering a report, and statement of balances due by receivers of public money, on account of sales of public lands, against whom suits have been instituted; which communication was read, and laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, it was

Resolved, That, from and after the commencement of the present session of Congress, there be allowed to the Postmaster of this House four dollars per day, during the sessions; and that the Committee of Accounts be authorized to make him such further allowance for services rendered, as such Postmaster, during the recess of Congress, as they shall think reasonable and just; and that the same be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz :

An act to revive and extend the term of certain pensions, which have expired by limitation ;

An act to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Nathaniel Sylvester ;

An act enabling the claimants to lands within the limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims ;

An act providing for the disposition of three several tracts of land in Tuscarawas county, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes ; and respectively read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill further to amend the judiciary system of the United States. The bill was amended by substituting the third Monday of January for the first Monday of January, as the day of commencing the Winter term of the Supreme Court, (the court at present meets on the first Monday of February.)

Mr. W., despairing of getting through a discussion of the whole provisions of the bill, moved to strike out all after the first section ; but, at the suggestion of Mr. BRANT, moved that the Committee rise, (with the understanding that a separate bill be reported to cover the object in the first section of this bill ;) the Committee then rose, and had leave to sit again.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved to postpone the orders of the day to take up the bill for employing Mr. Peale to paint an equestrian statue of WASHINGTON. The motion was lost.

A similar motion in favor of some other bills was also lost ; when, on motion of Mr. MCLANE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to revive and continue in force the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth sections of the act further to provide for collecting duties on imports and tonnage ; which was slightly amended, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "to authorize the building of lighthouses, light-vessels, and beacons, therein mentioned, and for other purposes." Several amendments were proposed and agreed to. Some discussion arose on the location of a lighthouse on the south shore of Lake Erie, for which two different positions were proposed—the Committee preferring the mouth of Grand river, and Mr. WRIGHT offering a resolution in favor of a point between Erie and Sandusky bay. Mr. WHITTLESEY having explained the facts, the amendment was rejected, and the bill reported to the House.

Mr. BESCHER moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table. The motion was lost. The House concurred in the amendment, when the further consideration of the bill was postponed to to-morrow.

The Committee of the whole House to which have been committed, respectively, the bill granting donations of land to certain actual settlers in the Territory of Florida ; and the bill providing for a grant of land for the seat of government in the Territory of Florida, and for other purposes, were discharged from the consideration of the said bills.

OCCUPYING CLAIMANT LAWS.

The resolutions some time since offered by Mr. LETCHER (in relation to decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States) were taken up—ayes 80, noes 48.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on those resolutions, which are as follow :

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, requiring, in any cause decided in the Supreme Court, in which shall be drawn in question the validity of any part of the constitution of a State, or of any act passed by the Legislature of a State, that — justices shall concur in pronouncing such part of the said constitution or act to be invalid ; and that without the concurrence of that number of said justices the part of the constitution or act of the Legislature (as the case may be) so drawn in question shall not be deemed or holden invalid.

"Resolved, That the justices aforesaid, in pronouncing their judgment in any such cause, as aforesaid, ought to be required by law to give their opinions, with their respective reasons therefor, separately and distinctly, if the judgment of the court be against the validity of the part of the constitution or act drawn in question, as aforesaid.

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill, in conformity to the preceding resolutions."

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend the first resolution by striking out all after the word Resolved, and inserting—

"That provision ought to be made by law that in all suits now pending, or which may hereafter be pending, in the Supreme Court of the United States, where is drawn in question the validity of any treaty or statute of the United States, or where is drawn in question the validity of any statute of a State, or the constitution thereof, or of any authority exercised under any State, on the ground of repugnancy to the constitution, treaties, or laws, of the United States,—no judgment shall be pronounced or rendered until a majority of all the justices of said court, legally competent to sit in the cause, shall concur in the opinion either in favor of or against the validity thereof ; and, until such concurrence, such suit shall be continued under advisement: Provided, however, That said court should not, by such provision, be prevented from rendering judgment in any such suit, when it should be of opinion that the final adjudication of the merits thereof did not require the decision of such continuance or legal question as aforesaid."

The CHAIR decided this amendment to be out of order, as there was another amendment pending.

Mr. FORSYTH, who had offered this amendment, withdrew it, to allow discussion on that presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CLAY spoke in opposition to the amendment, and in defence of the resolution as offered by Mr. LETCHER. He objected to that part of the amendment which prescribes that a majority of the judges, "competent" to decide, shall be required—there being no umpire to decide upon their competency; and if two declined, a majority will be only three judges. He thought that when four judges should be found on one side and three on the other, the united decisions of the State Legislature and State Judiciary, together with the three Supreme Court judges, would outweigh the judgment of the remaining four. He insisted on the equity and policy of requiring five judges to concur when the whole authority of one or of many States was to be set aside. He adduced the case of the bankrupt laws, passed by a majority of all the States, as an illustration of the position. He thought that no danger could arise from such an arrangement to the interest of the General Government. It would soothe the States whose laws were set aside, and conciliate the confidence of all parties concerned.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR met the objection made to the resolution of Mr. LETCHER, that, if it prevailed, a minority might control a majority, by refusing to concur in their decision. This, he said, was no more, but much less, than happened every day in the case of an ordinary jury, where one man's refusal controlled the decision of eleven men.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke in reply, and stated a difference in these two cases, since, in the one, a minority did virtually give a decision, (because the court must decide, one way or the other,) whereas, in the other, the refusal prevented a verdict, and no decision was given on either side. He went into the general principles on which the Supreme Court was erected, by the Constitution, as a safeguard to the General Government against the State Governments, when disposed to violate the Constitution. He maintained that no greater number should be required when a State was a party, than when an individual, claiming under a State law, was a party—because the authority of the State was involved in its laws. He stated the improbability that all the seven judges should, in each case, attend; and, if one judge should be involved in the question, five only would be left. If this resolution passed, not even four out of these five, could decide. He referred to the late case of the steamboat monopoly. In that case one judge was absent, and if it had happened, as it might, that another was indisposed, or interested in the question, so as to leave a court of five judges only, four out of the five would not have been competent to pronounce a decision, if the provision of Mr. LETCHER'S resolution had been law. It was a fair presumption, that State judges would lean toward the authority of their own State. A mere majority of those judges could decide against the United States, but now, more than a majority was to be required to decide against a State. This was unequal. The very case of the bankrupt laws, quoted by gentlemen, furnished a strong instance. He protested against a greater number being required to decide a cause one way than the other. He passed a eulogy on the Supreme Court as a tribunal. Its whole weight with the community rested on the strength of the reasons it brought for its decisions. He adverted to the encomium pronounced on a great judge in New York, (Chancellor Kent,) and subscribed to it with the most entire assent, and he quoted from an introductory lecture lately delivered by that jurist a very decided testimony to the distinguished character of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CLAY replied—and while he subscribed to a very high opinion of the Supreme Court, he could not acknowledge that the moment a man was appointed a member of that court, he became exalted above his whole species in intellect and virtue. He spoke of their power practically to make the Constitution, by giving, authoritatively, their interpretation of it. He warned the country of the consolidating influence of this power, and maintained the necessity of guarding the State tribunals. The Supreme Court was virtually an umpire between the General Government, and the States—its appointment was by one of these two parties, and its bias might be expected to be towards that party on which every member of the tribunal was dependent.

On the subject of the attendance of judges, he had attended sixteen or seventeen terms, and had never witnessed more than two, at the most three, where a full court was not present. In the steamboat case, he asked whether, had four Supreme Court judges decided against three, the opinion of the Supreme Court of New York; of Judge Kent, (than whom there was not more, at the utmost, than one greater jurist on the bench of the Supreme Court,) and of the Court of Errors of that State, added to the opinion of three judges of the Supreme Court, ought not to outweigh the opinions of four Supreme Court judges?

In reference to the argument respecting a jury, he observed, that the want of a verdict, when all did not agree, was not owing to the mere declaration of law, but to the reason of the case, on which the law was founded. He viewed the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts as worse than nothing in the case, and he concluded by expressing an earnest hope that it would not be adopted.

The debate was farther continued by Mr. BUCKNER, who spoke in opposition to the amendment; when, on motion of Mr. METCALFE, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The Committee of Manufactures reported the bill from the Senate, "to amend the several acts laying duties on imports," recommending the concurrence of the House in the amendments made to it by the Senate, with certain exceptions. The bill and amendments were referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to print the committee's report. The motion was opposed by Messrs. TON and TAYLOR; when it was superseded by a motion to go into Committee of the Whole upon the bill.

The yeas and nays being required on this question, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 72, as follows:

Stevenson, J. Stephenson, Taliaferro, Tattall, Thompson of Georgia, Tucker of South Carolina, Vance of North Carolina, Warfield, Webster, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of South Carolina—72.

The House, accordingly, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TAYLOR in the Chair.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill were about to be read by the Clerk, when an inquiry was made whether those amendments could be present, when they had been ordered to be printed? On this subject a desultory conversation arose, in which much excitement was evinced. Messrs. CUTHBERT, WEBSTER, A. STEVENSON, CAMBRELENG, METCALFE, McDUFFIE, CLAY, TOD, and HAMILTON, took part in this conversation. When the amendments of the Senate were all read—

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, thinking it due to the House that it should have the amendments before it in a printed form, and having ascertained that this could be effected by to-morrow morning, moved that the Committee rise.

The motion was carried—ayes 97, noes 91.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for printing the bill and amendments; on which a desultory debate took place between Messrs. CAMPBELL, FOOT of Connecticut, McARTHUR, RANKIN, WRIGHT, HAMILTON, TAYLOR, and CLARKE; and it was finally ordered.

SATURDAY, May 15.

Mr. HARVEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act establishing naval hospitals," reported the same with an amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VINTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, upon the subject of the lands set apart for the purposes of public schools, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill to authorize the Legislature of said State to sell and convey certain tracts of land, granted to said State for the use thereof; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. A. STEVENSON,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to cause to be prepared a general index to the latest edition of the laws of the United States, from the commencement of the present form of Government, as well as the treaties with foreign nations and the Indian tribes; in which shall be specified the year in which each law or treaty was passed or concluded, as well as the volume, and page of the volume, in which it will be found; and to cause the said index to be printed, and a copy thereof, in a bound form, to be delivered to each member of Congress, at the next session.

Ordered, That the third reading of the bill to revive and continue in force, the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh sections of the act, entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the 3d of March, 1815, be postponed until Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed a bill, entitled: "An act for the relief of the representatives of Samuel Mims, deceased, with an amendment; in which the Senate ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: An act for the relief of John H. Howland, of New York; an act to permit Anna Dubord to bring certain slaves into the State of Louisiana; an act for the relief of the representatives of John Donnelson, Stephen Hurd, and others; an act authorizing an examination and survey of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina; of Saint Mary's, in Georgia; and of the coast of Florida, and for other purposes; in which four bills last mentioned, they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE TARIFF BILL.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took into consideration the bill for amending the several acts laying duties on imports, with the Senate's amendments thereto.

The first amendment having been read, as follows:

"First. On Russia, Hollands, and Ravens duck, osebunburgs, burlaps, and ticklenburgs, a duty of fifteen per centum ad valorem."

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

MAY, 1824.

Mr. TOD moved to strike out "Russia, Holland, and Ravens," and insert "sail," so as to read "on sail duck."

This amendment was advocated by Mr. McKIM, and agreed to.

The second amendment having been read, as follows:

"Except worsted-stuff goods and blankets, which shall pay twenty-five per centum ad valorem."

It was agreed to.

The third amendment having been read, viz:

To strike out, "until the thirteenth June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, and after that time a duty of thirty-seven and a half per centum ad valorem;" and insert, "Provided, That, on all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall not exceed thirty-three and a third cents per square yard, shall be charged with a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem"—

Mr. TOD opposed this amendment, as holding out a strong temptation to the importer to undervalue his goods, (an evil already complained of.)

Mr. WEBSTER proposed to amend this proviso, by making a distinction in the goods to which it applies between those made in this country and others—and he moved the following amendments:

First. To strike out the words, "or of which wool shall be a component part."

Second. To insert, after the word, "except baizes and flannels," so as to make it read, "Provided, That, on all manufactures of wool, except baizes and flannels, the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall not exceed thirty-three and a third cents per square yard, shall be charged with a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem."

Mr. INGHAM, although preferring this proposition to the Senate's amendment, objected to it as operating against an important manufacture now much and increasingly used in this country for negro cloths, and which was made of woollen and cottons.

The question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurring on the proviso, as thus amended, a desultory debate arose between Messrs. INGHAM, MARVIN, CAMBRELENG, POINSETT, MALLARY, WRIGHT, McDUFFIE, TOD, A. STEVENSON, COBB, SHARPE, WARFIELD, FORSYTH, MERCER, HAMILTON, and WEBSTER, in relation to the fact of the use of this kind of mixed goods for negro cloths, their relative quality, cheapness, and warmth—in comparison to cloths made wholly of wool—the probability of fraud in the invoices—the exclusive operation of the tax on the Southern States—the effect upon the health of the slaves, &c.

The question being taken on the proviso, as amended, it was rejected—ayes 83, noes 85.

So the Committee refused to insert the Senate's proviso to the first section of the bill.

The fourth amendment, which is to strike out the word "silk" from those on which 25 per cent.

ad valorem is charged—and the insertion of the following words: "and on all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component material, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, a duty of 25 per centum ad valorem, on all other manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component material, 25 per centum ad valorem" also,

The fifth amendment, which is to decrease the minimum on cotton goods from 35 to 30 cents per square yard; also,

The sixth amendment, which is to strike out only so much of the prospective duty on wool as increases that duty by an annual addition of 5 per cent. from 30 per cent. until it shall reach 50 per cent.; also,

The eighth amendment, which strikes out the duty on "Venetian" carpeting; were respectively agreed to.

The ninth amendment, which is to strike out "two cents per pound," as the duty on hemp, and substitute "thirty-five dollars per ton," having been read—

Mr. TOD moved to insert before the words "thirty-five dollars," the words "at the rate of," which was agreed to.

The tenth amendment, which is to strike out the words "On flax three cents per pound," was agreed to.

The eleventh amendment, is to strike out the following clause: "On cotton bagging, four and a half cents per square yard, until the 30th day of June, 1825; and, afterwards, a duty of five and a half cents per square yard."

Mr. CLAY requested a division of the question. It was divided accordingly; and, the question first being on agreeing to strike out the first clause, viz: "On cotton bagging, four and a half cents per square yard," it was negatived—yeas 76, nays 99.

So the Committee refused to concur with the Senate's amendment to the first part of this clause.

The question then being put on striking out the remainder, it was agreed to without opposition.

The twelfth amendment, which is to change the specific duties on cutting knives, scythes, sickles, reaping hooks, spades, and shovels of iron or steel, to an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent.;

The thirteenth amendment, which changes the specific duty on iron screws, and on screws of iron for wood, called wood screws, to 30 per centum ad valorem;

The fourteenth amendment, which is to strike out the duty on frying-pans;

The fifteenth, changing the specific duty on vessels of copper, to an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent.;

The sixteenth, which changes the specific duty on quills, to an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent.;

The seventeenth, which changes the specific duty on slates and tiles for building, to an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent.;

The eighteenth, which changes the specific duty on black lead pencils, to an ad valorem duty of 40 per cent.;

MAY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

The nineteenth, which strikes out the duty on tallow ;

The twentieth, which inserts a duty on oats, of ten cents per bushel ;

The twenty-first, which inserts a duty on prunelle and other shoes or slippers of stuff or nankeen, 25 cents per pair, and on laced boots or bootees, one dollar fifty cents per pair ;

The twenty-second, which strikes out the duty on pepper, pimento, cassia, cocoa ;

The twenty-third, which inserts a duty on ginger of two cents per pound ;

The twenty-fourth, which strikes out the duty on filberts, pine apples, oranges, lemons, and limes ;

The twenty-fifth, which inserts the "highest rate of duties" in place of the word "same," on all window glass, imported in plates, uncut ;

The twenty-sixth, which strikes out the duty on glass beads ;

The twenty-seventh, which inserts in the clause laying a duty on books the following ; "except books printed in Latin or Greek ; on all books printed in Latin or Greek, when bound, fifteen cents per pound ; when not bound, thirteen cents per pound ;

The twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth, which reduce the duty on other books, when bound, from 37 to 30 cents per pound, and, when in sheets or boards, from 33 to 26 cents per pound ;

The thirtieth, which changes 12½ per cent. ad valorem to 7½ per cent. ad valorem, as the rate now paid, on which an additional duty of 12½ per cent. is to be laid, and adding certain words, so as to make the whole clause read : "A duty of 12½ per centum ad valorem on all articles not herein specified, and now paying a duty of 'seven' and a half per centum ad valorem ; 'with the exception of patent adhesive felt, for covering ships' bottoms, which shall be admitted free of duty, until June 30th, 1826 ;"

And the thirty-first, which strikes out the duty on all foreign distilled spirits ; were respectively agreed to.

The thirty-second amendment, which is to strike out the 4th section of the bill being read—

Mr. WEBSTER moved to concur in so much of the Senate's amendment as strikes out the allowance of drawback "on nankeens," and the words "imported in American vessels from beyond the Cape of Good Hope." Agreed to.

The question then recurring on agreeing to strike out the residue of the 4th section—

Messrs. CLAY, TOMLINSON, and RICH, advocated striking out the whole section, not on its principle, but as objecting to a disagreement with the Senate on a matter of this kind—and, also, apprehending frauds on the revenue. Messrs. POINSETT, LIVINGSTON, MERCER, and CAMBRELENG, opposed the striking out.

The question on striking out the residue of the section, was decided in the negative—ayes 74, noes 79.

So the section, as amended, was retained.

The thirty-third amendment, which is to strike out the fifth section of the bill was agreed to without objection.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House. The question was taken on the several amendments, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, and agreed to, with the following exception :

On agreeing to the proviso, in the first section, in relation to woollens under 33½ cents, excepting baizes and flannels, the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 96, as follows :

The SPEAKER voting in the negative, produced an equality of votes, which amounted to a rejection of the motion. So the House refused to concur with the amendment of the Senate, which inserts the proviso.

After the vote agreeing to a duty of 4½ cents on cotton bagging had passed the House, Mr. MERCER objected to the term "cotton bagging," as equivocal, and moved to reconsider the vote of concurrence. And the vote being reconsidered, after a prolonged and animated debate, the question on concurring with the Senate, in the first clause of the amendment, which strikes out the duty on cotton bagging, was decided in the negative—ayes 82, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Archer, P. P. Barbour, J. S. The House then agreed to the said amendment, to wit: to strike out these words "until the 30th June, 1825; and afterwards a duty of 5½ cents per square yard."

Other amendments were then concurred in; and the question arose to concur in that which proposes to strike out the following item, viz:

"On all foreign distilled spirits, fifteen per centum upon the duties now imposed by law, and in addition thereto."

And being put, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 84, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Archer, Baylies, Barber of Connecticut, P. P. The residue of the said amendments of the Senate were then agreed to by the House, with an amendment to that which proposes to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

A motion was then made by Mr. Moore, of Kentucky, that the House do reconsider the vote by which it disagreed to so much of the third amendment of the Senate as proposes to insert a proviso in said bill, subsequently amended in this House, to read as follows:

Provided, That on all manufactures of wool, except baizes and flannels, the actual value of which at the place whence imported shall not exceed 33½ cents per square yard, shall be charged with a duty of 25 per centum ad valorem.

And the question being put to reconsider said vote, it was determined in the negative—yeas 94, nays 100, as follows:

The Clerk was then directed to acquaint the Senate of the decision of this House on their said amendments.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Mims, deceased," was read, and concurred in by the House.

And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, May 17.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial purporting to be from Louis Charles, Duc de Navarre, Dauphin de France, &c., representing himself to be the legitimate heir to the French Throne, and praying the friendly interference of the Government of the United States in his behalf.—Laid on the table.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act relative to the Patent Office, and to the salary of the Superintendent thereof," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill "to regulate the mode of practice in the courts of the United States for the district of Louisiana;" which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred a memorial of the Navigation Company for the purpose of connecting the waters of the Tennessee with those of the Alabama; as also, a resolution, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of making provision for connecting the waters of the Coosa and Tennessee rivers, made a report thereon; which was ordered to be laid upon the table.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, viz:

1st. An act to permit Anna Dubord to bring certain slaves into the State of Louisiana;

2d. An act for the relief of the representatives of John Donnelson, Stephen Hurd, and others;

3d. An act for the relief of John H. Howland, of New York;

4th. An act authorizing an examination and survey of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina; of St. Mary's, in Georgia; and of the coast of Florida, and for other purposes, were read the first and second time, and referred; the 1st, to the Committee on the Judiciary; the 2d, to the Committee on the Public Lands; the 3d, to the Committee of Ways and Means; and the 4th, to the Committee of Commerce.

The bill to authorize the establishment of certain lighthouses, which had been discussed on Saturday, was again taken up. The discussion on the proper point on the South shore of Lake Erie, for the erection of a lighthouse, was resumed.

Mr. BARTLEY, Mr. NEWTON, Mr. TAYLOR of New York, Mr. TOMLINSON, Mr. McARTHUR, and Mr. WHITTLESEY, engaged in the debate.

An amendment, offered by Mr. BARTLEY, which proposes to erect a lighthouse at the mouth of Cayahoga river, (Cleveland,) was rejected—ayes 58, noes 66.

Mr. BARTLEY then offered an amendment, to strike out the words "Grand river," and insert "the most proper place on the South shore of Lake Erie."

This amendment was also rejected; and then the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CONNER called for the consideration of the resolution fixing a day of adjournment. The House refused to consider it—ayes 73, noes 75.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved the following resolution, which he supported by a short speech:

Resolved, That the petition of Eugenie Amelie Beaumarchais de la Rue be referred to the President of the United States; that he be requested to cause the same to be considered in the pending negotiations with the French Government, relating to the claims of American citizens, for property illegally seized and confiscated; and if found to be just, then, and in that case, to be allowed in the final adjustment of the aforesaid claims."

The House refused now to consider this resolution by a small majority.

On motion of Mr. McARTHUR, the House took up for consideration the report of the Committee of Roads and Canals, in favor of the claim of Moses Shepherd.

Mr. BEECHER explained the principles of the report. Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, advocated the claim; and the resolution recommended in the report was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to make up the account of Moses Shepherd for the work done on the Cumberland road, upon the principles adopted by the committee in their report on the said petition; and if he should, from the facts and evidence known to him, applicable to the rights of the parties, differ in opinion with the committee in part or in whole; then, in that event, also state the account as to him shall appear to be right in equity and justice, the contract considered; and that he transmit the same to this House at the beginning of the next session of Congress, with all the evidence and documents in his possession, that he may deem necessary to a fair and full investigation of the claim of the petitioner.

Mr. FORWARD moved that the House take up the bill "laying duties on sales at auction." The motion was negatived.

Mr. FORSYTH made a similar motion in respect to a bill "to extinguish the title of certain Indians to lands in Georgia."—Negatived.

Mr. CALL moved for the consideration of the bill "granting donations of land to certain actual settlers in the Territory of Florida;" from which the Committee of the Whole was discharged on Saturday last. This bill was then read; its principles explained by Mr. RANKIN, in reply to some queries and objections of Mr. McCoy. Mr. CALL made further statements in explanation, and the bill then was ordered to a third reading.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

An act to revive and continue in force the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh sections of the act, entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the 3d of March, 1815; "An act to authorize the building of lighthouses, light-vessels, and beacons, therein mentioned, and for other purposes, were read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have concurred in the amendments proposed by this House to the first and fourteenth amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports;" they insist on such parts of their third and sixteenth amendments to the same bill as have been disagreed to by this House, and they recede from such parts of their forty-eighth amendment as was also disagreed to by this House. The Senate adhere to their amendment, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners;" they have agreed to the first amendment proposed by this House to the bill which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Dean Weymouth;" and have disagreed to the second amendment to the said bill. They have passed bills of this House of the following titles, viz: An act for the relief of J. Ottramare; An act for the relief of John S. Moffit; with amendments to each, in which the Senate ask the concurrence of this House. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Alexander Scott, late collector of Pensacola;" and a joint resolution to authorize the purchase of a certain number of the copies of the Journals of Congress, from 1774 to 1788; in which bill and resolution the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled, "An act for the relief of Alexander Scott, late Collector of Pensacola," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint "resolution from the Senate, to authorize the purchase of a certain number of the copies of the Journals of Congress, from 1774 to 1788," was read twice, and referred to Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. WOOD, and Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate informing of their disagreement to the second amendment proposed by this House to the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Dean Weymouth:" whereupon, it was resolved, that this House do recede from their said second amendment.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate informing of their adherence to their amendment to the bill of this House, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," disagreed to, in part, by this House: whereupon, it was resolved, that this House do recede from their amendment to the amendment of the Senate to the said bill, and that they do agree to the same.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of J. Ottramare," was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John S. Moffit," was read, and also referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of the Navy, together with the proceedings of a court martial lately held at Norfolk, for the trial of Lieutenant Beverly Kennon, as requested by a resolution of the House, bearing date the 25th of April, 1824.

JAMES MONROE.

The Message was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved that the House take up the bill "to discontinue certain post roads, and to establish others." Carried, ayes 94.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDICT in the Chair, on that bill. Much discussion took place on the details of the bill. A motion was made to strike out the entire section, which provides for discontinuing roads. Before any decision was had upon it, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The message received from the Senate, stated, among other particulars, that they had receded from the 1st and 14th amendments of the Senate to the bill amending the several acts laying duties on imports, viz: that which strikes out "Russia, Hollands, and Ravens" duck, and substitutes "sail" duck; and that which inserts "at the rate of" before the duty on hemp by the cwt., and insisted on their third amendment (which strikes out the minimum on woollens and inserts a proviso;) and also insisted on their 16th amendment, (which strikes out the duty on cotton bagging.)

Mr. FORSYTH moved that the House recede from its disagreement to these two amendments of the Senate.

Mr. TAYLOR objected to this motion, and preferred that a conference should be requested between committees of the two Houses.

Mr. SLOANE moved for a call of the House before taking the question of Mr. FORSYTH's motion. It was agreed to—ayes 81, noes 73.

The roll was called—when farther proceedings in relation to the call were dispensed with.

The motion to recede from the two amendments was divided; and the question being first put on receding from the disagreement to the amendment with relation to woollens—[the effect of receding being to adopt the Senate's amendment to the first section of the bill, which strikes out the words "until the 30th of June, 1826, and after that time a duty of 37½ per cent. ad valorem," and inserts the following proviso: "Provided, That, on all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall not exceed 33½ cents per square yard, shall be charged with a duty of 25 per centum ad valorem."] ]

The question on receding from the amendment was taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. DWIGHT, of Massachusetts, said he rose to ask the indulgence of the House to excuse him from voting on the two questions of disagreement with the amendments of the Senate—an indulgence, he said, which he was sure the House would unanimously grant, when they understood the grounds upon which it was claimed. An honorable friend had entertained, in common with himself, and almost all others, an opinion that the tariff bill would not come back from the Senate. They were both anxious to leave town, and had agreed to depart this morning. Another question of importance had unexpectedly detained him. The gentleman from Virginia, who was, upon all questions of the tariff, opposed to himself, had left town, and he felt himself bound in honor not to vote.

Mr. DWIGHT was excused from voting—ayes 115.

The yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Baylies, P. P. Barbour, J. S. Barbour, Bartlett, Blair, Brent, Burleigh, Burton, Cambrelong, Campbell of South Carolina, Carter, Cary, Cooke, Conner, Crowninshield, Culpeper, Cushman, Guthbert, Day, Durfee, Dwinell, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Forsyth, Frost, Garnett, Gatlin, Gist, Govan, Gurley, Hamilton, Herrick, Hobart, Hogeboom, Holcombe, Hooks, Isaacks, Kent, Lee, Leftwich, Lincoln, Litchfield, Livermore, Livingston, Locke, Long, Longfellow, McCoy, McDuffie, McKee, McKim, McLane, Mangum, Mercer, Mitchell of Maryland, Moore of Alabama, Morgan, Neale, Newton, Owen, Plumer of New Hampshire, Poinsett, Rankin, Reed, Reynolds, Rose, Saunders, Sanford, Sharpe, Sibley, Arthur Smith, Alexander Smyth, Wil-

The SPEAKER voting in the negative, the motion was lost. So the House refused to recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate (as above stated) and insisted in striking out the proviso, and on restoring the duty of 37½ per cent.

The question was then put, will the House recede from their disagreement to so much of the sixteenth amendment of the Senate as proposes to strike from the said bill these words:

"On cotton bagging, a duty of four cents and a half per square yard."

And determined in the negative—yeas 87, nays 103, as follows:

It was, thereupon, resolved, that a conference be asked with the Senate, upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill aforesaid; and that managers be appointed to attend the said conference on the part of this House; and Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. TOD, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. TRIMBLE, and Mr. BEECHER, were appointed the said managers.

SUPREME COURT.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to alter the time of holding the sessions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. METCALFE offered the following amendment to the bill:

“Be it further enacted, That, in any case now or hereafter depending in the Supreme Court, in which shall be drawn into question the validity of any part of the constitution of a State, or of any part of an act passed by the Legislature of a State, unless two-thirds of the whole number of Justices composing the said court shall concur in pronouncing such part of the said constitution or act to be invalid, it shall not be held or deemed invalid.”

Mr. METCALFE, of Kentucky, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker—It is an indispensable duty, which I owe not only to the Legislature of Kentucky, but particularly to those whom I have the honor immediately to represent, that I should, on the present occasion, exercise one of the privileges properly pertaining to the Representatives of a free people—a privilege which I but seldom claim, but which, I am persuaded, will be liberally and generously accorded to me, provided I do not abuse it, by the enlightened patriotism and magnanimity of the body over whose deliberations you preside.

In looking around me, however, I behold an audience composed, not only of the most distinguished statesmen, but mainly of the brightest luminaries of the law in this Union; and reflecting that this is a question peculiarly suited to the investigation and discussion of lawyers, and that I am not a member of that respectable profession, it would require more hardihood than I possess to shield me entirely from feelings of embarrassment—feelings which, I presume, do not result from any unusual timidity of character; nor am I willing to admit that those feelings proceed from any indisposition on my part to express my sentiments here, or elsewhere, either upon this, or upon any other subject, but more especially upon a subject of such vital importance, and so deeply interesting to those from whom I derive my power, and whose agent I am. But I cannot help perceiving that I am liable to be taken in the net of legal technicality, at least. Besides, I am conscious of the magnitude of this question—of the anxious solicitude with which my countrymen look forward to the decision which may ultimately be had upon it—of the want of time in this body to investigate it fully during the present session, and my own want of preparation, or learning, or capacity, to do it any sort of justice. A knowledge of one truth, however, affords me some consolation. In the eyes of wise and honorable men, even the rude, uncultivated man, in his efforts to do good, in whatever light the strength of those efforts may be viewed, will always find some favor. And in this question, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. M., the interest of the most humble, as well as the most exalted, of our citizens, is deeply, very deeply, involved. Indeed, it must be conceded that, in such a question, the most humble are the most interested—it being a maxim, admitted by all, denied by none, that the further you remove power from the people, the further you put their rulers out of their reach, or beyond their control, the greater will be the oppression of the industrious and productive classes of the community, the more abject and miserable will be the condition of the unlearned, the ignorant, and the poor.

I unhesitatingly give it as my opinion that a poor man, for an inconsiderable sum, ought not to be subject to a suit in the Federal court. In matters of contract and dealing between man and man, if no difference is made, or attempted to be made, between resident and non-resident citizens; if no obstacle is thrown, or attempted to be thrown, in the way of the latter, which does not equally apply to the former, either as it respects the process by, or the principle upon, which their respective rights are to be decided, the enactments and adjudications of the States ought to be final—if you please, the supreme law of the land. Cite a poor man, or a man who, in point of wealth, is not above mediocrity, especially if he is not very dextrous and crafty in the management of law suits, to appear himself, or by counsel, hundreds and thousands of miles from home, for the purpose of trying his title to the little all he possesses, and he has but little prospect of success; besides, it is not very material whether he gains or loses his cause—the process by which he arrives at a decision, robs him of all he is worth, and leaves him in penury, want, and misery. Such laws are not only exceedingly vexatious, but a departure from the benign and salutary principle of administering justice as near to every man's door as practicable. And is it not doubly vexatious, unequal, and partial in its operation, to allow a non-resident to institute his suit in the State courts, thereby apparently waiving his right to use the Federal courts; and, after harassing the resident for many years, and subjecting him to much cost and trouble, before the former tribunals, then to allow the said non-resident, by appeal, writ of error, or some other process, to revive the suit which he had lost before the tribunals of his own selection in the Federal courts? Do you call this justice, or sound policy?

A distinguished poet has said: "He that thinks must govern him that toils." A doctrine which I shall not attempt to controvert. But, said Mr. M., if the thinking few who rule, are not to be responsible to the toiling million, for their conduct, it requires no great share of penetration, or of experience, to satisfy the mind that the latter will, sooner or later, become the slaves of the former, and all the labor of their hands, over and above what their absolute necessities require, will go to enrich and pamper their thinking masters.

If, said Mr. M., I may be permitted to use the appropriate, elegant, and I will venture to say, among philanthropists and lovers of human equality, the never-to-be-forgotten figure of the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) I will say, that, if you divide society horizontally, placing the thinking few, who rule, above, and the toiling million below, the prediction which I have just now uttered, will soon come to pass. In behalf of that toiling million who are now struggling and groaning beneath the weight of that horizontal partition—an intolerable load—allow one of themselves, who never expects or desires to be placed upon the upper side of it, for a short time, the kind indulgence of the House.

We have the happiness, it is true, to live under a Government, the model of which is not to be found; and it is in vain to search for its likeness, either in ancient or modern history—a Government which may be considered as the offspring of an union of many Governments, and, in its turn, the prolific parent of many more, all of which are united and uniting in one, with continual increase of numbers—a splendid system, in which the divisions of power are vastly numerous, but extremely complicated, requiring the keenest intellectual perception, the most discriminating powers of mind, with much learning, experience, and soundness of judgment, to enable us to assign to the different Governments, and their various departments, their due portions respectively, and proper limitations of power.

If any one of these departments, or of the different functionaries, shall attempt, by virtue of the soft and easy process of construction, to gain an accession of power, not fairly delegated or authorized by the Constitution; and thereby to prevent a co-ordinate, or any other branch of the Government, from exercising the power and discharging the duty which properly pertains thereunto, it certainly becomes us to impose some restraint upon the usurping department.

If, in reality, there exists a disposition on the part of this court to encroach upon the authorities of the States, as is believed to be the case by many of the most patriotic and wise republican statesmen in the Union, will not the proposition which is now under consideration, if adopted, have a tendency to check that disposition, or to render the effects of it less frequent and common than under the present arrangement? That it will have such a tendency, must be admitted. But, on the other hand, if the fears and apprehensions of those who look upon the court with an eye of jealousy, are unfounded and unreasonable, the tendency of this amendment will be to remove that jealousy, to reconcile discordant departments, and to give more satisfaction and peace to society.

Of late, we have the mortification very frequently to hear of conflicting claims of power, between the Federal and State Governments, between the various departments of the several Governments, and more especially between the Federal judiciary and the States.

How are we to check the growing evil? Will the proposition which is now under consideration do it? For my own part, said Mr. M., I answer with trembling uncertainty—for it is not exactly the plan which, above all others, I would prefer—in the affirmative. It would most certainly diminish the chances, and lessen the probability of encroachment. In cases wherein the validity of State laws are brought into question, and laws, too, which have received the sanction of the State courts, so large a majority of this body of magistracy will seldom if ever concur in giving an opinion against such enactments and decisions, unless they are clearly and manifestly unconstitutional; a thing which it is believed will but seldom occur; and when it does, the opinion of the court will be so well supported by argument so strong and conclusive as to carry conviction wherever it goes—and thus, by reconciling all parties, the court will regain its popularity and high standing among the citizens of this Republic—the Federal and State Governments, and their different departments, will then move on harmoniously, while the people are contented, prosperous, and happy.

If the eye of the patriot is turned to the present condition of things in this country, what a singular and disheartening spectacle does he behold! By some, it is insisted that the Federal Government is aiming at consolidation. By others, and myself among the number, it is believed that the Federal Judiciary is aiming, by virtue of the spherical sovereignty which it claims for itself, at the supreme control of the State governments; and assuming to itself political, as well as judicial power.

On the other hand, it is insisted that the State governments are in the habit of reeling from their proper orbits, of impinging upon the Federal authorities, and thereby creating great confusion and disorder. And it is probably true that none of those governments, and that no one of the different departments, do in every instance confine themselves, as strictly as they ought to do, within their respective Constitutional limits; and, at other times, by failing or refusing to fill up the whole space allotted to them, as much injury is produced as by transcending their respective limits. Indeed, I presume this is true. But, whenever a conflict occurs between the Federal and

H. OF R.

Supreme Court

MAY, 1824.

State authorities, whether in the right or wrong; the former is sure to prevail against the latter—hence, the necessity and propriety of restraining this strong power, and of guarding the weak against its usurpations and encroachments; and, at the same time, it would be wholly useless to impose any additional restraint upon the State authorities, because of their comparative feebleness, their want of strength to resist the Federal authorities. It is notorious that they cannot long make defensive, much less can they make offensive war.

But, how to remedy those evils, and at the same time to guard and protect the people against the hurtful and pernicious consequences of these alarming conflicts, is the question. To effect this desirable object, said Mr. M., is what the proposition contemplates. Can there be any danger in making the experiment? I put this question most respectfully, and with due deference; but I put it emphatically—Can there be any danger in making the experiment?

There are other difficulties, too, resulting more, I believe, from the happy, or rather, the unhappy, faculty we have in construing or misconstruing the Constitution, than from any real defect in that instrument. Look at the various and contradictory constructions which have been put upon it, not only by subordinate departments, but by the highest functionaries of this Government; and from thence let any man, if it be possible for him to do so, move on to the conclusion that it is either wise or politic to compel all the departments of the State governments, legislative, executive, and judicial, all of whom are sworn to support the Federal Constitution, as well as their honors, to yield their own opinions upon the Constitutional validity of State laws, and to bow submissively to the constructive dictum of three members, a minority of the Federal Judiciary.

For instance, the sanction of the enlightened Executive of this nation is withheld from a measure which he acknowledges to be one of vast importance, and well calculated to promote the lasting prosperity and happiness of the citizens of this Republic; because, forsooth, his Constitutional scruples will not allow him to sign the bill. From this doctrine of the President, the inference is irresistible that the Constitution is incomplete, or a very bad one; since, under its provisions, we are either not authorized to do that which the public good requires, or prohibited from doing it.

Now, it is admitted on all hands that the State governments have no power to make national roads for national purposes; so that the power of performing a work of indispensable utility to this noble Confederacy exists nowhere. In what nook or corner does this power lie concealed? It has fled from the world, and left us in a most awkward predicament. What a singular spectacle, then, does this nation exhibit, when compared with other nations—shorn by itself of a portion of that sovereignty or power which remains as a shield of protection and security to the happiness and well-being of every other civilized nation on the globe!

Turning our eyes from this extraordinary decision—this singularly chilling and enfeebling construction of the Constitution, to certain difficulties which have arisen between the Federal Judiciary and one of the States; (for it would not be proper, at this late period of the session, for me to occupy the time of the House with remarks upon similar difficulties with the other States; and I feel it my duty, as respects my own State, to treat the subject with as much brevity as possible,) and the heart of the patriot sickens at the dark and gloomy prospect before us.

The State of Kentucky is known to be composed of what was formerly a district of Virginia. Prior to the separation of the former from the latter, owing to the improvident and mistaken legislation of Virginia, from three to five times as much land as was contained within the limits of the then district was sold for a price to myriads of purchasers. It was utterly impossible for these poor deluded purchasers so to locate their respective quantities of land as to avoid confiction with each other. The laws of Virginia on that subject being very defective, the expeditious manner in which the locations had to be made, among the bears, wolves, panthers, and savages, of the howling wilderness; added to the fact that there was not only not a sufficient quantity of land upon which to make the locations—but not the one-half or one-third of the necessary quantity;—and consequently it did so happen that Virginia received pay for, and conveyed, with all the solemnities of a patent from that Commonwealth, the same tract of land to from one to more than ten different individuals.

Now, I entreat the House to bear in mind these indisputable facts. It is only by understanding the truth of our condition, and the causes by which that afflicting condition was produced, that honorable members can duly appreciate our complaints, or know how to apply the remedy.

Here, then, we find this fair and fertile portion of the soil of this Union sown, and thickly sown, over by the hand of the parent State, (though doubtless unintentionally; for with all my heart do I acquit the Representatives of that day, of my native State, of any unjust or dishonourable motive,) with the seeds of contention and strife; leading to a scene of landed litigation, the most dark and dismal in its aspect that ever frowned malignity upon any community; more ruinous and afflicting and demoralizing in its consequences—more corrupting in its influence—than the imagination of one who has not witnessed its effects upon society can possibly conceive of.

This enormous firebrand, thus inadvertently thrown into the bosoms of our countrymen, had been permitted to burn for many years, with unabated fury, to the great terror and dismay of all good citizens; driving many of them beyond the limits of the State, and preventing others from settling in it; and operating as a curse upon the cultivators of the soil, and also upon every other class of citizens, except upon the iniquitous land-jobber, and such others as derive a profit from landed litigation.

Supreme Court.

H. OF R.

At length, the representatives of that injured people attempt to extinguish this burning fury, by discharging a most solemn duty, which they ought to have discharged many years before. And, in the fair exercise of one of the first and highest, the most legitimate, and last to be dispensed with, attributes of sovereignty that any State or Government can possess; and a portion of sovereignty or of power, which their ancestors or predecessors not only never intended to deprive them of, but which, in the very nature of things, they could not barter away even if they had not been debarred the right of doing so, as they most clearly were, under the provisions of the Federal Constitution, which allows no State to be introduced into the Union fettered, or upon any other footing than the old States. The Legislature, I repeat it, in the fair exercise of its Constitutional power, passes a law, which has for its object to secure to the innocent and deluded occupant a reward for the labor and capital which he has vested in improvements, in removing the load of timber with which the soil was covered; making fences, gardens, raising orchards, erecting comfortable buildings—the shelter which was intended to protect the husbandman, his wife, and hardy offspring, the future props and stay of his country—to cover their heads, and shield them from the inclemency of the seasons; and in all things to promote the peace, and happiness, and prosperity of the country. And what can be more just and equitable than such a law? especially when it is considered that the benefit of its provisions extended to no other than to those deluded purchasers whose titles to the land is deducible of public record; and at the same time leaving it at the election of the successful claimant either to pay for the improvements, or to compel the occupant to keep the land at its original unimproved value? And this law passed at so late a period, too, that it was not then possible for any lawyer, judge, or jury, in the State, to decide, with any sort of certainty, who had the best title to the land. This difficulty resulted from a number of causes: the lapse of time, the death or removal of the early adventurers to the country, by whose testimony, perhaps, the occupant, some fifteen or twenty years ago, might have established his better title to the land, without inconvenience; the names of licks, springs, buffalo and Indian traces or trees, for which the entry calls, as places of notoriety, have now undergone some change, or cannot be satisfactorily established, and probably, if established at all, it is done by subornation and bribery. Under this state of things, was there any thing unjust or dishonorable in the conduct of the Legislature of Kentucky in passing a law which made the labor and capital of the husbandman, vested by him in improvements, as sacred to the possessor as the little pittance of capital in a depreciated and worthless currency, which had been applied by the adverse claimant as well as himself in purchasing a land warrant? On the contrary, does not such a law rest on the principles of eternal and immutable justice? And was not such a law called for, and loudly demanded, by the soundest and wisest policy? And will any disinterested and enlightened statesman of the present age pretend that the sons and daughters of Kentucky, comprising the present and all future generations, have been sold by the first settlers of the district, in order to become a separate State, into worse than Egyptian bondage? That, for the mere name of governing themselves, they have not only parted with that privilege, but have also deprived posterity forever of the right of exercising it? Can the enlightened and well-informed mind contemplate such absurdity, and not recoil with the profoundest astonishment?

But the Legislature of Kentucky did pass a law, the validity of which was contested by the nest of worthies with which that State abounds, and has long abounded, and who are known by the mild name of land speculators. The Federal, not the Delphic oracle is consulted, and the response is, that the law is unconstitutional and void, the first settlers of that district having bartered away a portion of that power and sovereignty which belongs to, and is exercised by, every other State in this Union, and by every other people or Government on the globe, having bartered away the right of succeeding generations, and succeeding legislators, throughout all time to come, to suit their legislation and their laws to the ever-varying condition of things, which necessarily arises in the progress of civil society." Such, in substance, is the response which has been uttered and proclaimed to the world; and even more than this, for it goes to establish the fact, that the said first settlers of the district not only banished from Kentucky that portion of her sovereignty, but that they absolutely extinguished it; that they did not even leave it with Virginia, which State, I verily believe, if she had the power, would grant us relief in some form or other.

But, what is the consequence of this decision? The cords of peace and social intercourse, by which society is bound together like a band of brothers, is cut asunder; the home of the husbandman is again rendered insecure; the hand of industry is paralyzed, and discouraged from the performance of its duty, the oracular music of this trio of the Federal judiciary having fallen sweetly upon the ears of a set of men, who ought to have been drummed out of Kentucky many years ago, with a certain appropriate march at their heels, announcing to them that the delectable and happy business of land jobbing would again become profitable, up they spring, like so many birds of prey; with keenly whetted beaks, they pluck the crumbs from the hand of honest industry; and they pluck anew at the vitals of society, the very heart-strings of which they would pull away if they could. Now, as the response runs "the bleeding victim may writhe in agony, but there is no power beneath the sun by which a remedy can be applied. It is true, that society is greatly retarded in its march to prosperity and happiness, but the die is cast, and, like the decree of fate, it is unalterable!"

Such are the effects of a decision which has been given by this, not soon to be forgotten—three; to whom your laws seem to attach something like infallibility, but who could not, by possibility, in their situations, have understood the subject.

Now, what opinion would a stranger form of the boasted excellence of our Constitution, after being told of the decisions of the Executive and Judicial branches of this Government upon it, and of the consequences resulting from those decisions? The one denies the existence of any power in Congress, or elsewhere, to pass a good and wholesome law, the effect of which would be, in a thousand ways, to promote the national interest, and to bind together, and forever to perpetuate this grand and noble Confederacy; the other denies the existence of any power in the Legislature of a State, to remove one of the most afflicting evils—an evil of such magnitude that it is an abomination to the land where it exists—from society.

I understand this decision of the court to mean nothing more, or less, than that their honors have a right to take the consciences of all the departments of the State governments under their sovereign care and protection. I understand it to be a denial of the right of the Representatives of the people, by statutory provisions, to regulate the affairs of the people. If the doctrine maintained by the court be correct, their own peculiar notions of what is equitable between man and man, between adverse claimants of land, and so on, as the different individual cases may arise and be submitted to this august three, is to be the supreme law of the land. Have we come to this? Is it true that our ancestors or predecessors have deprived us of the power of passing a plain law, which may be read by the plain, unsophisticated farmers of our country, as they run; and a law which, by reading, they may understand? Are we to have no page in our statute books, indicating to the toiling husbandman what are his rights, or in what way the fruits of his labor and industry are secured to him? Instead of referring him to the statute books for such information as he may desire respecting the laws, is it intended to turn his eyes upon the judges of the Supreme Court, and tell him that the law is, or will be, whatever their honors may choose to make it?

Would not a stranger think it very strange, that neither the National or State legislators had a right to do the things to which I have referred? That the Constitution had no redeeming spirit in it; that the people had no redeeming spirit left in them; that the Constitution was continually presented as a stumbling block in the way of good and wholesome enactments, but never in the way of the passage of a bad law?

But, sir, said Mr. M., the fault is not in the Constitution. It is in those who construe and misconstrue that instrument.

In referring to these facts, said Mr. M., I intend no ungenerous imputation against those high functionaries of the Government—no disrespect whatever; for they have the same right to their opinion that I have to mine; and it is as much their duty to exercise it. But, having given an opinion which I conceive to be most glaringly erroneous, and most afflictingly injurious and hurtful to those whom I have the honor immediately to represent, my object is, as it ought to be, to effect an amendment to the law, which will go to save my countrymen in future from the effects of a decision to be given by this feeble, and yet powerful three. And my reference to the opinion of the President has been made for the purpose of showing that you do not, by placing a man in an elevated station, render him infallible; and thereby, to prove the unsoundness of the policy that would bestow upon such a tribunal as this the power of dictating according to their peculiar notions of what is the orthodox construction of this charter of our rights, to each, and to all of the departments of the State governments. Three individuals! a majority of the court, as now organized, truly; but a minority of the whole court are to decide upon the Constitutional validity of State laws; and to annul adjudications of the State courts; and from their decision there is no appeal; it is irrevocable.

Before, said Mr. M., I consent to the judgment of such a power, in the hands of such a tribunal, I must be convinced that the whole three are beings of a superior order; that they are not the slaves of human passion; that they do not love power; that they are not to be set in motion by that powerful spring of human action, called self-interest; that they have an exemption from all the frailties of human nature; and, in fine, that the link which they form in the chain of created beings, is at least half way between that little forked, feeble animal, that inhabits this our planet, and those superior intelligences that fill the celestial regions. For be it remembered, that this is the controlling power of this Government—a power of such superior dignity, that it has become the Government itself; and he that questions, or attempts to expose its decisions, is sure to be accused of having a devil, or to be denounced as a rebel against his country.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. M., that the proposition now under consideration, will, if adopted, by adding hereafter an additional number of members to the court, not only bring together more talent, but a greater variety of knowledge of the laws of the States generally, and of the true interests of each section of the country in this wide-spread and flourishing Republic. And the court will be less liable to corruption, or to be suspected of corruption. For it is well to bear in mind, that millions and millions of dollars, as was actually the case in this decision against Kentucky, may be involved in the immediate consequences of their decisions. Upon the whole, nothing can be more clear, if the proposed amendment is adopted, than that it will greatly increase the chances of a correct decision, diminish the chances of corruption, lessen the probability of encroachment, and do much for the restoration of the court to the confidence of the people. I am aware, said Mr. M., that any decision of this court, no matter how erroneous it may be, no matter how unjust, or injurious, or ruinous to society, will always have its supporters. Even when the motive is good, and interest the same, we cannot always think alike. And, besides, there are individuals in every country whose interest is not only separate and distinct from that of society generally, but so completely at war with that general interest, that those who are influenced by it, stop at nothing for the accomplishment of their purposes. With such men as these, the most ruinous and desolating decision will be the most warmly supported; and this I conceive to be most clearly and unequivocally the case in relation to the decision against the occupying claimant laws of Kentucky.

Supreme Court.

H. OF R.

The writer of that decision seems to console himself, from his knowledge of the fact, that he is to be sustained in his opinion by some of the Kentuckians themselves. The honorable writer, however, does not appear to bestow a single thought upon what I know to be another fact; and that is, that these same learned Kentuckians are the very mercenaries to whom we are indebted for all the evils of which we complain, and that through the united instrumentality and well-concerted plans of this host of mercenaries, who, having long banqueted, and still delight to banquet, upon the distresses and agonies of society, it is, that this injurious and hurtful decision has been obtained. And these are the men who now run with every prop, no matter how insignificant, to support and uphold this decision—these are the selfish patriots and juggling political managers of the wire, who have deluded the court, by persuading their honors that their opinion has the approbation and sanction of many of the independent and well-informed men of Kentucky. The voice of the husbandman toiling on his farm, not being heard by this court, his rights are disregarded, the truth of his condition unknown. For one, I do not wonder that the puffing eulogies of this decision, by such men as these, should resound in our ears, and in the ears of the honorable court too, whose praises from such a source can never be envied them. Such notes may jingle sweetly upon the ears, and thrill to the hearts of the very venerable three, who, I have no doubt, are as innocent as they are ignorant of the causes from whence they proceed. But to me, and to my neighbors, who, unfortunately for us, have some practical experience in this thing; to me, and my countrymen, who are now struggling beneath the weight of that horizontal partition, of which we have had such an appropriate and suitable description, but which, with three members of the Federal court on the upper side of it, becomes an intolerable load; these notes, or this sound, is not unlike the requiem of so many grave-diggers, or the hosannas of so many coffin-makers, over the fruits of a desolating and terrible pestilence or epidemic, against which it is pretended that no antidote can be applied.

Upon the whole, sir, said Mr. M., I am fully persuaded, that unless the law in relation to this court is amended, so as to extend protection and security to the industrious and productive classes of the community, against the arts and chicanery of that set of individuals who love to riot upon the fruits of the labor of others, the blighting breath of the Federal judiciary will be more dreaded in this land of liberty, than the coming of an Egyptian sirocco. Mr. M. said there were yet many strong points of view in which this subject might be presented to the House; but, as no one had denied the right of the Legislature of Kentucky to enact any law upon this subject—as no one either attempted to question the validity of the laws, or to advocate the decision of the court, by which it seemed they were to be rendered a nullity, he would not, at so late a period of the session, trespass upon the precious time of the House, to whom he tendered his thanks for the politeness which had been extended to him.

When Mr. METCALFE had concluded—

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, rose and opposed the amendment, as practically operating to leave the constitutionality of any State law interminably uncertain. He vindicated the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Cohens, (formerly referred to in the debate on Mr. LETCHER'S resolutions,) and maintained that that decision was virtually a decision of the question whether the United States have or have not a Government.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, said, a consideration to which he should allude, in the few remarks he was about to submit, he hoped would be received as a just excuse for now troubling the House. Before he made that allusion, however, he begged leave to say a word or two on the general principles involved in the motion of his friend from Kentucky. It had been urged that the Supreme Court was subject to the influence of the Government, under which it derived its creation. In reply to this, he said, the Constitution of the United States was the creature of the several States forming the Confederacy, and, for the purposes of its institution, it was as much the creature of the people as the constitutions of the several States; and the Judges of the Supreme Court, therefore, were as much the judges of the people for those purposes, as the State judges were for the purposes of local adjudication. But he would ask, whether there was likely to be a greater inclination on the part of the Supreme Court, to increase the powers of the Federal Government, than there might be in the State judges to enlarge the powers of the States? In many States, it was known, he said, that the judges hold their appointments for short or limited periods. In some cases, they are appointed by the Legislatures. If, then, the Legislature should, under a particular state of excitement, adopt a particular measure supposed to be for the relief of the State, although in contravention of either the Federal or State Constitution, he should submit whether judges thus circumstanced, thus dependent on the Legislature for a renewal of their appointments, were not at least—he would ask if they were not more—likely to yield to the popular feelings and excitement in such State, and carry such law into effect, than the Supreme Court would be, from a mistaken love of power, to thwart the just and Constitutional measures of any State? He thought, under such circumstances, the Supreme Court would be the safest tribunal to decide the question, even with reference to the permanent interests of the State itself. But, said he, if you require the concurrence of so large a proportion of the members of that tribunal, do you not endanger the wholesome correction which it was intended that court should make of any measures of abuses which the States, under a state of excitement, might adopt?

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

MAY, 1824.

The Constitution of the United States secures to the citizens of each State the rights of citizens of the several States. The citizens of one State may hold property in any other State. They may contract with the citizens of any other State, and are entitled to a just remedy to enforce such contracts. Might it not happen that non-residents might acquire large claims against the citizens of any given State? Such, for example, as was the case a few years ago in relation to Eastern merchants with the people of the West. Such, indeed, as was the case with the people of the State whence this proposition originated, and the merchants east of the mountains. In such a case, if the debtor State should adopt unconstitutional measures for the relief of its citizens, would not the principle requiring the concurrence of a large portion of the Judges of the Supreme Court to correct such a procedure, more expose the creditors to the injury, than the usual mode of decision would the debtors? Such a principle, indeed, he conceived well calculated to alter the whole theory of our Government.

The object of government was as well to protect minorities as majorities. This principle would go far to destroy those rights.

But the particular case, which might by possibility occur for the decision of this tribunal, was one of grave and serious importance. He said the United States had admitted the State he had the honor to represent into the Union, under a compact that slavery shall not exist within its limits. At present, a large portion of the citizens of that State were under the impression that the introduction of slavery would tend greatly to relieve their pecuniary embarrassments, embarrassments which, indeed, afflicted every portion of the West. Acting under the influence of a strong anxiety to relieve themselves from their distress, many of them were now disposed to test the binding character of this compact, and to abrogate it. Without intending to express any opinion on the effect of this compact, he would remark that, should a majority of the people decide on the adoption of the measure, it would doubtless make a case for the decision of the Supreme Court; and, should it happen, it will be a fearful question. It will involve nothing less, sir, than the balance of power between the slave and non-slave holding States. Those who witnessed, as well as those who know of, the convulsive discussion in this House on the Missouri question, cannot fail to appreciate the magnitude of this subject. In deciding that question, should it ever arise, if a majority of that court shall be found to decide against the validity of the act of the State, but not a sufficient majority under the provision now under consideration, it could not fail to shake the nation to its centre.

While this tribunal may be called on to decide questions of such momentous magnitude, he thought it behooved the House to examine well the effects of the principle now proposed. For such examination, we certainly are not prepared at this time, and the amendment, therefore, should not now be adopted.

Mr. A. STEVENSON, of Virginia, suggested that, as the session was far advanced, and this subject was of great moment, it would be most expedient to withdraw the amendment at this time.

Mr. METCALFE expressed some reluctance at adopting this course, but finally consented to withdraw the amendment; and, having done so—

The bill was ordered to a third reading.

TUESDAY, May 18.

The Committee on Commerce were discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing an examination and survey of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina; of Saint Mary's in Georgia; and of the coast of Florida; and for other purposes;" and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. JOHN T. JOHNSON,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized and directed to pay to each messenger, for his extra services, fifty dollars, in addition to what was allowed at the end of the last session.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to the House a report, with accompanying documents, received from Alexander Hamilton, one of the Commissioners of land titles in East Florida; deeming the statements therein contained to be worthy of the particular attention of the House, and of a nature which may, perhaps, require their interposition, or that of both branches of the Legislature.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 18, 1824.

The Message was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz: An act providing for a grant of land for the seat of government in the Territory of Florida, and for other purposes; An act granting donations of land to certain actual settlers in the Territory of Florida; An act altering the time of holding the sessions of the Supreme Court; were read the third time, and passed.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to discontinue certain post roads, and to establish others.

Various amendments were made in the details of this bill—a motion was made by Mr. BARTLETT, of New Hampshire, to strike out the 2d section, which discontinues certain routes from and after the 25th of April next. The motion was negatived. And the section was gone through, and almost the whole of it stricken out, line by line; when the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

MAY, 1824.

Day of Adjournment.

H. OF R.

The Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill to alter the judicial districts of Virginia, and for other purposes, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

DAY OF ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CONNER, of New York, moved to consider the joint resolution on a day of adjournment, and called for the yeas and nays on the question of consideration; which were ordered.

Mr. COCKE moved for a call of the House, previous to calling the yeas and nays.

The motion was carried—yeas 62, noes 50.

The roll was then partly called, when Mr. TAYLOR moved to dispense with the further call; which was agreed to. The question of consideration was then taken by yeas and nays, and determined as follows—yeas 99, nays 73.

So the House agreed to consider the resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, proposed the 26th instant.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, proposed an earlier day.

Mr. CULPEPER, of North Carolina, was opposed to an adjournment at so early a day as even the latest which was proposed. He adverted to the appointment of a committee of investigation on charges preferred against a high officer of the Government, and to the summons which had been despatched by an officer of the House for the person who preferred those charges. The House had been heretofore informed that, allowing time for going and returning, the individual in question might be expected to arrive here by the 26th of this month. For his part, he said, he was unwilling to go away without allowing a reasonable time for the return of the messenger, &c. The charges which had been preferred, had been considered of sufficient importance to entitle them to investigation, and he was not disposed to adjourn until that investigation was completed, and the whole facts of the case reported to the House, when, he said, he would express his opinion of the merits of it, regardless of consequences, and he hoped the House would do the same.

Mr. WARFIELD, of Maryland, said, that every one knew that the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House had gone for the purpose of bringing to this House Mr. Edwards, to be examined respecting certain charges which he had preferred against one of the highest officers of the Government. Whether, in sending for him, the committee of this House had done right or wrong, was not now the question; but, having done it, he was of opinion that a due respect to the parties interested, to public opinion, and to consistency in the course of this body, would induce the House, at all events, to continue the session until the person to whom he referred should have had a reasonable opportunity of reaching the Seat of Government. Otherwise, said he, in what situation before the public shall we present ourselves? He was as willing as any gentleman to bring this session to a close; but, a due respect to the distinguished officer whose conduct is arraigned, and to every consideration connected with the subject, forbade, in his opinion, an adjournment earlier than the 31st instant; which day, therefore, he proposed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, put it to the House whether, under the circumstances known to them, they would remain in session to await the arrival of the officer of this House. He had just been informed that the Sergeant-at-Arms arrived at Louisville, so as to leave that place for Edwardsville on the 4th of this month; by the 10th of the month he may have reached Edwardsville; by the 17th he may have arrived at Louisville, on his return: it will take 8 or 10 days to get thence to Wheeling, and three or four days thence to this place, supposing no interruption of the journey to occur: and when it is recollected that there was no regular chain of steamboat navigation, and that travellers have sometimes to wait several days for a passage, could it be in the contemplation of any gentleman to wait here until the messenger returns—say, till the 15th, or even the 10th of June. He wished the resolution were made blank, so as to fill it with such day as a majority of the House should be found to approve.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, said that, when this subject was before the House the other day, the member from Illinois stated, from his knowledge of the distance, &c., that an answer to the summons of this House might be expected by the 23d or 24th of this month. From the facts which had since come to the knowledge of the gentleman, Mr. W. said, he should like to know what was his present opinion on that subject.

Mr. COOK said that, when he made a statement on this subject some days ago, it was impossible that he should be apprized of the obstructions to the progress of the messenger of the House. He had stated that he might return by the 23d or 24th of the month, but that was upon the supposition that no difficulty had occurred in his progress in the river. Since making that statement, he had seen a letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms, that he was not able to leave Louisville before 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 4th of May. He might reach Edwardsville in five or six days. If an opportunity should present itself for resuming his journey by water, he might return to Louisville in five days, say by the 15th of this month. It was not probable that he could reach this place in less than fifteen days after his arrival at Louisville. It would not be reasonable, therefore, to calculate on the arrival of the messenger or Mr. Edwards sooner than the 30th of the month, under any circumstances. And if the House is disposed to wait for him, said Mr. C., as I sincerely hope it is, that object will be entirely defeated by fixing on an earlier day for the adjournment than the last of this month. Mr. C. repeated, that he most sincerely hoped that the House would continue in session until Mr. Edwards should arrive.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said, that there was no member of the House who would remain here, were the session prolonged, at greater personal inconvenience, or sacrifice of interest or of feeling, than himself. But it was too late now for gentlemen to listen to considerations of that description. The decision has been taken. Every genleman must have known, when this investigation was instituted, that it would be attended with serious inconveniences. I was myself fully aware of it, said he, and it was for that reason, among others of higher import, that I was opposed to the institution of this committee of investigation. The House, however, determined to go on, and it does appear to me to be due to the parties and to the character of the House, that it shall now be carried through, and that every opportunity shall be given, to all the parties concerned, for a full investigation. Laying aside all personal considerations, the public good demanded this course. From what had been said by the honorable member from Illinois, it was apparent that an earlier day for the arrival of Mr. Edwards, than the last day of the month, could not be fixed. But the reasons which influenced him, Mr. McL. said, would prevent him from voting, at this time, to fix any day of adjournment. The committee of investigation had sent for the individual who preferred the charges which are under investigation. If I understand the process with which our officer is charged, said he, it does not authorize the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring this individual here. It is a mere summons to him to attend, which he may obey, or not. He probably may not be ready—few individuals would be ready, at so short a notice, to set off on so long a journey, the day he receives the summons. In any event, he cannot get here before the thirty-first of the month, and perhaps not for some days later. And for what purpose, sir, have we sent for him? Is it to present himself here, and say, "Here I am," and thus let the business end? That is certainly not my view of the case. Here is a charge which the House has deemed of sufficient importance to institute an inquiry in relation to it. They have sent for Mr. Edwards, to deliver what testimony he may be able to afford in relation to it. After this is done, time should be allowed for an investigation of all matters connected with this individual; and I am free to say that I, for one, want time to follow it up. I do not want merely to have Mr. Edwards here, and to have a report made upon the subject, but I want to have a full investigation. For these reasons I am not willing now to fix a day of adjournment. If that be done, in what situation will the House be placed? Suppose that any accident should occur to prevent the arrival of Mr. Edwards on the thirty-first: the day being now fixed, the House will have adjourned, perhaps, the very day before he arrives. This course, Mr. McL. said, he conceived, would be unjust to the party whose reputation had been assailed in the address to the House. He was willing, at all risks, to remain till this individual should come—have been examined by the committee, and the result reported to this House, and acted upon. If necessary to public justice, he would wait here until midsummer to see these objects accomplished.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, entirely concurred in most of the views of the gentleman from Delaware, but he differed from him as to his conclusion. From the information which had been given to the House, by the gentleman from Illinois, it was perfectly evident, and must strike the mind of every body, that Mr. Edwards cannot be expected to arrive here before the fourth or fifth of June. If the House waited for his arrival at all, consistency and a sense of duty would require them to remain in session until he was examined, that the information which he possesses may be eviscerated and laid before the House. On a moderate calculation, this will take to the tenth of June; and, said Mr. B., I ask whether we will delay our adjournment till that day on this account, or whether we shall not rather adjourn at an otherwise convenient season? If I thought, that, to await the arrival of Mr. Edwards was of any importance to the country, or to the distinguished officer whose conduct is implicated by the charges, I would remain here at any sacrifice. But I am not of that opinion. When Mr. Edwards presented his charges to this House, he referred for the foundation and support of them to documentary testimony, and to that alone. That testimony, with the charges, is in the possession of an able and impartial committee as was ever raised in any public body. I am persuaded that the committee is, or can be in one or two days, ready to report upon that testimony. Now, I ask, how can the Secretary of the Treasury be implicated by an adjournment, without waiting for Mr. Edwards? The proofs are here; the committee is diligently engaged in the examination of them, and are ready (or can be in a short time) to make their report; and I protest against the idea of the House having committed itself, or pledged itself in any way, to wait for Mr. Edwards. The House has not, in any way, confirmed the decision of that committee to send for Mr. Edwards. At the time this accusation of Mr. Edwards was brought to the House, I tried three several times to get the floor, to move to lay it on the table for one day. Had this been then done, I am persuaded we should have had no further trouble with it. Believing that the House is not pledged, and that it is not expected of us to wait for Mr. Edwards; and that, as regards our legislative business, we shall be perfectly prepared to adjourn on Monday, I will propose that day. In any event, the motion of my friend from Maryland ought not to prevail. If the House determine to wait and examine Mr. Edwards, they ought to adopt the views of the gentleman from Delaware, and not at this time fix upon any day for the adjournment. If otherwise, the earliest day that had been named should be taken.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, said he was as little disposed as his friend from Delaware to adopt a course calculated to preclude any decision on this subject, that was due to the character of the House, or properly subservient to the ends of justice. But, believing that the views which he had taken of this subject were erroneous, he could not but believe, if the House came to the decision which he recommended, it would not subvert the purpose of justice, but only vexatiously prolong the session. He begged leave to call the attention of the House more directly to the subject involved in this question. What is it? said he. An officer who has received an appointment within the gift of the Executive of this country, has made a charge against an officer in the Cabinet of the Executive. Instead of directing this charge to his proper Chief, the Executive, the accusing party has improperly, and I regret it, thrown it into this House. Under the excitement of the moment, which I also regret, this charge took what I conceive an improper direction in this House. It has been put into the possession of a committee, acknowledged on all hands to be exceedingly well qualified to investigate it. But, in reference to the course which the House ought now to take, Mr. H. said, it is very proper that the grounds of the accuser himself should be taken into consideration. In support of his charges, to what does he refer us? To his own testimony hereafter to be delivered? To oral proof of any description whatsoever? To any evidence beyond the walls of the Capitol? No; but to documents already in the possession of the House. Under a belief that this individual may have done wrong, to the character of the officer to whom his charges relate, a messenger has been despatched by this House to summon him here. That was supererogatory, for the Executive had anticipated this act of the House, and, with great propriety, because that is the branch of the Government to which he is at present amenable, transmitted to him instructions to await the proceedings of this House. His presence here, however, Mr. H. said, was not in the slightest degree material to the decision of the case before the House. Now, if the individual preferring these accusations could have any just ground of complaint against the House for not awaiting his arrival, he admitted it would be proper that they should do so. But, could he, under all the circumstances, have any cause of complaint on that score? Mr. H. conceived not. He understood (he said) that it was in the power of the committee of investigation, from the materials which they have collected, to make a report in the course of four or five days. Admitting that, in the result of that investigation, it might arise, that justice required, on one or the other hand, further measures, was this House to take them? No; for, he said, he did not apprehend that, in any event, it was proposed to carry the matter to the extent of impeachment. What then? Was it desirable to have a debate got up in this House, to involve the discussion of angry and irritating topics—a discussion which, it is possible, would be attended with most unpleasant consequences? If ultimate justice was necessary to be done, by whom is it to be done? By the Executive of the country; and, if either individual concerned shall conceive that any injustice has been done to him, to that authority let him appeal for redress. Mr. H. here disclaimed, most positively and emphatically, any intention of unkindness in regard to either of the individuals, in the course which he was disposed to pursue. But, remaining here, at vast cost to the country, and at vast inconvenience to the individual members of Congress, he should consider wholly unjustifiable. The gentleman from Delaware, he said, had admitted some things fatal to his own argument. It was impossible, he had remarked, to say whether Mr. Edwards would be able, from ill health, or other circumstances, to come at all. The very uncertainty attending this subject was conclusive why an early day should be fixed upon for adjournment. If Mr. Edwards can come at all, he will probably be here by the 24th or 25th, as estimated heretofore, and, as yet, possible. But, honestly believing that it was not necessary he should be present, Mr. H. said, he should vote for an adjournment on the 26th instant.

Mr. MURGER, of Virginia, said, if he was unwilling to fix the time of adjournment at present, it was not from regard to the accuser, whose charges had, from the choice of the individual himself, been made from a point distant from the Capitol, when he might have made them here, had he supposed it due to himself to be present at their investigation. Certainly, after delaying the mission to Mexico for eighteen months, the Executive would have had no difficulty in granting the Minister five or six days more for that purpose. With regard to the interests of the accused, and of the country, one thing it was highly important to know, viz: whether the testimony of this individual was considered by the committee of investigation to be material or not. This House had no agency in sending for him. The warrant was issued antecedent to any proceeding on the part of this House upon the subject. We are to infer, from the fact that the committee sent for him, that Mr. Edwards is deemed a material witness. The committee had no right to send for him unless his testimony was considered important. We have, therefore, a right to suppose that his testimony is material, because otherwise he would not have been sent for. If his testimony is material, and we adjourn before his arrival, the public opinion will be, that we have arrested the investigation of his charges. If that be the only question to be decided, my mind, said Mr. M., is made up. I will not do any act that shall compromise the dignity or justice of this House. Unless we have information, from the committee, that the witness is not deemed a material one, I cannot consent to adjourn short of the period when Mr. Edwards may arrive and be examined. Was it possible, Mr. M. asked, that the House would receive this accusation, appoint a committee to investigate it, and then adjourn without acting conclusively upon it? It was highly important, to the proper decision of the pending question, to know from the committee what were the views which he entertained of the consequence of Mr. Edwards's testimony; and Mr. M. rested the question on this ground—that, if the testimony of Mr. Edwards was material, the House ought to remain in session until he arrived, and that the House had a right to presume it was so, until informed by the committee to the contrary.

Mr. MANGUM, of North Carolina, said he was as anxious as any member of the House could be, to leave this wretched place, and return home, if, contrary to his opinion of the matter, a sense of duty would allow of an adjournment as early as was proposed. It had been said that the act of calling for Mr. Edwards was not the act of this House, and, further, that the presence of the accuser is not necessary—and that he himself has shown that it is not. But, said Mr. M., we have committed the investigation of this matter to a committee composed of gentlemen esteemed on all sides of the House for their superior intelligence and unquestionable integrity. That committee, in its wisdom, has decided, and, I believe, with perfect unanimity, that Mr. Edwards should be brought before them. It is to be presumed there are some matters of fact which he is expected to disclose, which make his presence necessary; and, until I hear to the contrary from that committee, I shall oppose my humble opinion and voice against an adjournment before Mr. Edwards's arrival. And this view of the case appeals most strongly, not to the friends of the distinguished person who stands accused before us, and in so delicate a relation to this House and to the nation, but to the friends of Mr. Edwards. What will be the consequence if, after the solemn decision of our committee, that it is necessary Mr. Edwards should be brought before this House, we should say his presence is entirely unnecessary, and that a reference to documentary testimony only is necessary? If such be the fact, why is it not announced to the House from the proper source, the committee which sent for him? It is not announced, and I, therefore, presume that the opinion still exists that Mr. Edwards ought to be here. And, whilst this is the fact, we shall treat the just claims of this high officer (the Secretary of the Treasury) with worse than scorn and contumely, if, after having sent for his accuser, we adjourn before he comes, and deprive the accused of the opportunity of a full and fair investigation of these charges. On the other hand, what have you done? Have you not, to a certain extent, endorsed these charges? That which never could have stuck to the character of the Secretary, have you not fixed there, by a solemn act, in recognising the claim of these charges to investigation? And will you abandon the investigation, and, as far as you can, suffer the obloquy to remain? It has been said that it is due to both these high officers, the accuser as well as the accused, that this investigation should not be closed without waiting for Mr. Edwards. As to one of these persons, Mr. M. said, he differed from the gentleman who thus said; because, as to the accuser, he could have made his charges at any time, as well as when he did make them—and, if it had been absolutely necessary that he should be present during the investigation, he could have procured himself the opportunity of being so, without the invitation of this House. He selected his time; and, near the close of the session, when he is at a distance from the Seat of Government, he has preferred to present his charges. We have partially sanctioned those charges by consenting to investigate them; and shall we submit to the humiliating construction of abandoning the inquiry by adjourning before the investigation is closed? To try the sense of the House on the subject, whether it is prepared to act upon its present information, he moved, that the resolution lie on the table.

The question on this motion was taken without debate, by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, of Virginia, then rose and said that he should vote for adjourning on the 31st of the present month. He should not be in favor of waiting till that day for the arrival of the individual who had been sent for, and the prosecution of the inquiry which had been commenced, were that to be the sole object. But he thought that the time of the House might be fully and usefully occupied in business of a public and strictly parliamentary kind. He had been informed by a gentleman, on whose accuracy, in matters pertaining to the business of this House, he had been in the habit of relying, that there yet remained as many as ninety bills and thirty reports of committees, yet unacted upon, or only in part attended to. These would usefully occupy the time, and it was very possible that, before the day he had mentioned, the person expected might arrive. He thought the gentleman from Illinois mistaken in his calculation when he said that that person could not be here before the 31st instant. He believed that the journey from Louisville to this city might be accomplished in ten days; and, in that case, the messenger might return by the 24th of this month. He considered the House bound to allow a reasonable time for the arrival of the person whose attendance it had required. Public opinion, with what justice he should not say, would set down every individual of this House, on one side or the other, in this affair, and would attribute every part of their conduct to partiality and design. It was the duty of the House, as much as possible, to avoid giving occasion for such reflections. It had been objected that the sending for Mr. Edwards was only the act of a committee. True; but that committee received its authority to send for him, from this House; they have reported their proceedings in sending for him to this House, and this House has transmitted those proceedings to the President of the United States; and thereby given to the act of sending for him every sanction which the circumstances would admit. The accuser had made a variety of statements in relation to the officer accused; it was proper that he should be put upon his oath, and cross-examined. On the whole, considering the public interest, the dignity of this House, and the character and public station of both the individuals concerned, he could not consent to vote for an earlier day than the 31st instant.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that, as in a case of fact with which he was not personally acquainted, he must rely on the opinion of some other person, he thought it proper to take, as his best guide, the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, who, being an inhabitant of that part of the Union through which the person sent for had to travel, was to be presumed best acquainted with the probable time at which he could arrive. That gentleman declares it as his opinion that he cannot be in this city before the 30th of the present month. If so, the 31st was, of all days in the year, the most improper and the most unlucky that could have been selected. He had much rather agree to an earlier or a later day. The question to be settled was, whether the House shall wait for the witness who had been summoned? If it determined to wait, then the 7th or 8th of June would be the earliest period which it could, with propriety, fix for adjournment. As to the expediency or in expediency of waiting, he meant to express no opinion, far less to represent that of the investigating committee. It was agreed, on all hands, that the ordinary legislative business, which demanded the attention of the House, might be got through with by the 24th or 25th instant. If the House did not choose to wait for Mr. Edwards, he presumed one of those days would be a proper one; if it did choose to wait, then the 7th or 8th of June would be the proper time. At all events, he considered the middle ground as the worst.

Mr. WARFIELD rose in reply, and said he was very sorry that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts should consider the 31st day of the month as so peculiarly unlucky. That day, he believed, came on a Monday. If it had fallen on a Friday, he should have been less surprised at the opinion, as he had heard Friday called the hangman's day. He had proposed that day, on the first suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, that Mr. Edwards would probably arrive on the 24th, in which case the 31st would leave ample time for any examination the House or the committee might require. That the House can get through with the legislative business by the 24th, was mere matter of opinion. An honorable gentleman from Virginia, on whose minute attention to the business of this House he had been in the habit of relying, had just told the House that it had business enough to occupy its attention till the 31st of the month; in which case, he did not see how that could be considered as an "unlucky" day, or as "middle ground." It was true, the House itself had not sent for the individual, but its resolution had empowered a committee of its own members to send for persons and papers. No farther act of authority was needed, and the House had sanctioned the act of the committee so far as it could do so.

It was urged that the personal testimony of this witness was not material; that he had referred to documentary evidence for every part of his charge, and that none other was requisite. If this was the fact, the House need sit no longer; and, if the committee of investigation will report that fast to this House, he would vote for a speedy adjournment. But he considered the argument as unsatisfactory. No such fact had been reported by that committee. On the contrary, they had themselves sent for this witness. He viewed the reputation of all parties as involved, and he heartily assented to the sentiment that, let the result strike where it may, the investigation should proceed. He trusted the House would persevere, as he thought they could not, with propriety, retrace their steps.

Mr. Cook said, in rising, that he had not taken the floor to discuss the propriety of fixing on any particular day for the adjournment of the House. He was disposed to think that, from the course this business had taken, the presence of the person sent for might be material to the accused, and to the other party also. The House having so far acted as to recognise the propriety of sending for Mr. Edwards, it appeared proper, with regard to consistency of conduct, that the House should wait for his arrival. What he more particularly rose for, was to reply to some remarks of the member from North Carolina. As (said Mr. C.) no member of the House appears disposed to express an opinion in regard to the merits of the matter now before the committee of investigation, I was some little surprised that the honorable gentlemen should venture or think it necessary to express an opinion as to the merits of the claim of either party concerned to be heard before this House, or contest the claim of one party as he did, when he intimated that the situation of the absent party claimed no indulgence at the hands of the House. The honorable member spoke of the time of preferring the charges, and said, in substance, that other and previous times might have been selected, and, not having been, that party had no claim on the consideration of the House. It is to correct this statement only that I have risen, for my honest wish was, and is, not to indulge in feeling in regard to this matter until I see something which is in my opinion calculated to place in an unfair light the facts respecting this controversy, and then the relation in which I stand to the House, to the country, and to the party* which has preferred these charges, would require me to correct such erroneous statements; and for this purpose I now rise. I will state the circumstances of this case, in a preliminary point of view, without attempting to state what will be its ultimate result. It is known to this House that a report was made by the Treasury Department to this House on the 22d of March. That report impugned the veracity, and of course impeached the character of Mr. Edwards. Upon the face of the document itself, it is to be presumed, and I believe it can be incontestably proved, that it was that report which elicited the Address of Mr. Edwards to this House. But, the gentleman from North Carolina says that a previous time might have been selected for it. Let me remind the gentleman, who was not a member of the last Congress, that this House did then undertake to investigate a part of this subject. There is nothing, upon the ground of his silence upon this subject, that can in any degree justly prejudice Mr. Edwards's standing on the same footing with the individual whose conduct he has arraigned. They both stand on the same ground. The individual who has sent this memorial to Congress, has his reputation assailed; and, in the course of the argument of his memorial, he goes on to show that the foundation is not solid—and this argument he addresses to this House, to whom the report in question was made. These individuals, therefore, ought both to be considered as standing on the same ground. Let justice be done to them; let the truth be disclosed; and, nearly as I stand in relation to one of them, I am willing to see justice done, and the sharp edge of truth cut whosoever shall come in the way of it. It is not just—it is not consistent with the nature of the discussion this morning, to express opinions to the prejudice of one or the other of these individuals. I have myself abstained from doing so, and trust I shall continue to abstain, having risen now only to correct what appeared to me to be incorrect in the view which had been taken by the gentleman from North Carolina.

* It may be proper for the due understanding of this passage, and of others in the debate, to state that Mr. Cook is the son-in-law of Mr. Edwards.

MAY, 1824.

Mr. TAYLOR here required the previous question, but the House refused to sustain the call.

Mr. MANGUM then replied to Mr. COOK. He said he could not but exceedingly regret that the gentleman from Illinois should have misconceived the remarks which he had made. If I understood myself, if the House understood me, and I beg the gentleman from Illinois now distinctly to understand me, I expressed this opinion: that the situation of the Secretary of the Treasury is at this time one of peculiar delicacy, as it relates to his standing towards the American people; that, these charges having been preferred at this late period of the session, and the House of Representatives having instituted an inquiry into them, it behooved the House to prosecute this inquiry to a close. I did draw a distinction, and I believe that every gentleman in this House who is unconnected with the parties in point of feeling, will sustain me in it, between the relative situation of the parties. This is not as interesting a matter to the accuser as to the accused. The personal attendance of the former is in nowise necessary, unless he is in turn assailed, and he desires a suspension of opinion until he can be heard. Were these charges referred to a committee for the purpose of trying Mr. EDWARDS? Is it with a view of ascertaining whether he is guilty or not guilty that this committee has been instituted? I had understood to the contrary, and I regret that the gentleman should be so fastidious on the occasion—on an occasion on which he professes not to have any feeling, and, it is to be presumed, has none. It is because this committee is raised, not to try Mr. EDWARDS—upon whose merits I expressly disavow having formed any opinion, and much less would I now express any, if I had formed one—but to try the Secretary of the Treasury, that he is most interested in it. It is due to consistency—it is due, if I may say so, to an honorable course, not to abandon this inquiry after having instituted it. Upon this subject, I hope my course has appeared perfectly correct in the estimation of every gentleman in the House, the one from Illinois excepted. I mean not to throw myself into the arena as the partisan of any man. If a blow is to fall, let it light on the right one, fall where it may. The public mind is excited by this subject. All circumstances call upon us to pursue the investigation; and, if I were a political enemy of the individual accused before us, I should feel myself bound to prosecute the investigation whilst his friends claimed it. And if when it is brought to a close, the accuser cannot substantiate his charge; if the blow fall on him, and he stagger under it, it will not have been aimed at him either by this House or others. If it fall on the Secretary, it will be because it was aimed at him; and, whilst he claims a trial; whilst his friends claim a thorough investigation of these charges, shall we refuse him a right which is due to the vilest culprit in the land? I hope, sir, I shall be understood, when I expressly disavow appearing here as the partisan of any body. I am only the humble defender of what I consider to be due to the character of this House, to the individual charged, and to a just respect to the people whom we represent.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said, he entirely concurred in the opinion that, granting all sufficient time for the arrival and examination of Mr. EDWARDS, the House might be able to adjourn by the 7th day of June, and he proposed that day accordingly. It was due to the character of this House that it should remain here till that time, even at great expense, and great personal sacrifice. He adverted to the necessity of acting on this case with precision and on mature reflection, that improper conclusions may not be drawn, as to the motives which govern the House in its course, by the people of the United States. This memorial of Mr. EDWARDS, said Mr. F., bears date the 6th of April, and, by due course of the mail, should have arrived here on the 10th day of that month. The first information which the House had of the existence of this packet, was on the 19th of April; and, by a singular coincidence, that was the very day when the Senate fixed upon a day for the adjournment of the two Houses. The House of Representatives, with a feeling which a sense of justice was calculated to inspire, instituted a committee to investigate the subject, and clothed it with power to send for persons and papers. On the 21st, a resolution was submitted by me, which was not agreed to, to communicate the fact to the Executive. On another day, a nearly similar resolution was offered by another gentleman. On the 22d, the committee reported a part of their proceedings, and advised this House that they had ordered the messenger of the House to pursue Mr. EDWARDS, for the purpose of calling him before them. This messenger left the City of Washington on the 24th. To make the greater speed, he passed by Baltimore, under the absurd pretext that he was liable to be interrupted in his journey by the usage of the stage office giving preference to other passengers, as if it were possible for any stage-coach usage to arrest the messenger of this House. He went down the river from Wheeling, and arrived at Louisville on the 3d; and we are now informed that it is impossible he can arrive here before the 4th of next month. In what situation, sir, shall we be placed if this investigation be suspended; if the House adjourns without waiting for this individual? What was the object of the address in which the charges have been preferred? To defend the reputation of the late Senator from Illinois? To defend himself! How? By accusation of another? It is not worth while to mince matters in a case of this kind. It is impossible for any individual.—

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, here rose, with permission of Mr. FORSYTH, to explain, that the messenger of the House, in going by Baltimore, had acted by the advice of others who knew, by experience, that it was the surest route, with a view to expedition.

Mr. FORSYTH disclaimed any intention to blame the messenger, having no doubt he had acted upon advice and information of others—there certainly was a day lost by his taking that route. Mr. F. resumed his argument. It is impossible, said he, for any member of the House to read this address to believe that the object of the person making the charges was to punish the individual charged, through the agency of the powers of this House. My own impressions are, that the individual expected that his address would be printed, under the sanction of this House, and that no further notice would be taken of it; and that it would be the foundation for assailing the reputation of the individual whom he accuses, through the ensuing Summer—for what purpose, everybody can understand. This object has been disappointed, by the investigation which the House had ordered. In justice to the individual whose conduct is assailed—I speak not of him as an officer; not of the purity of his character, and the integrity of his conduct, which I believe to be, in truth, his only reproach—but of his pretensions to the first office in the gift of the people—this investigation should be fully prosecuted, unless this House means to make itself a party in the projects of the individual who has addressed it. A portion of the charges contained in his address have been rung through the country these twelve months past, or more, without effect. A part of them have been investigated in this Hall, to the utter confusion of the assailants of the Secretary. What is the object of the address which now embodies them? Unquestionably, to give to them an artificial importance, to put a stamp of credit on what had been already condemned by the people. And by whom is this investigation carried on? I mean to excite no unpleasant feeling in the mind of any gentleman in this Hall; but it is proper, in coming to the determination which we are to make on the question now before us, that all things should be considered, which bear upon it. It is known that there were, at the commencement of this session, five individuals presented to this House as candidates for their favor and that of the people, for the Presidential office. It is known that a majority of this House is favorable to the claims of the four other candidates in opposition to the claims of the remaining one. It is by this House, thus disposed, that this investigation has been instituted. What will be the inference, if these charges are left in suspense, by the adjournment of this House? I ask gentlemen to consider, what will be the effect of such a course? I am sure sir, that there is no member of this House who is desirous to do injustice to the individual in question; but I put it to every member of this House, whether he does not at least leave a “loop to hang a doubt upon” if he agrees by his vote to an adjournment before Mr. Edwards arrives. All that is wanted is, that the individual sent for should be brought here, and questioned—“What have you more to say? What are these defensive accusations which you talk about as having in reserve?” A single hour, after his arrival, will suffice for his answers to these simple interrogatories. It is due to the nature of the subject, that we should wait for the arrival of Mr. Edwards. As it is stated, that there is reason to believe he may be here by the 30th of the month, and seven days will be sufficient for every possible allowance of time for his examination, and a report by the committee, and decision by the House upon it, I am in favor of fixing on the 7th June as the day of adjournment.

Mr. COOK said, it must be painful, it could not but be painful, to a dignified and enlightened body, whose duty it was most solemnly to decide upon the merits of the matter before the committee of investigation, to see, upon an incidental discussion of this description, the motives of individuals misrepresented, and erroneous statements made, either from improper views, or because the facts were not correctly understood. The honorable gentleman from Georgia, said he, has stated his belief as to the motive of the individual who lately transmitted an address to this House, which he has ascribed to motives, at which, if true, every honorable mind ought to revolt. He stated, that the memorial was presented, not with the hope of bringing on an investigation, but to have it printed without being investigated: If I have misunderstood the gentlemen, he will correct me—[Mr. FORSYTH said, the gentleman understands me correctly.] I am not now, nor at any other time, if I can avoid it, about to give any opinion as to the merits of this controversy—but let the language of the memorial speak for itself. In the 18th page of it, the memorialist states that, under calls for information respecting the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States, information called for by the House had been withheld, and says, in making the statement, “I challenge investigation.” And, at the conclusion of his memorial, he says, that, if his charges are made in malice or in falsehood, it is a misdemeanor that would prove him unworthy of the office he holds, and expressly invites the Secretary, or his friends, to make the charge against him. Language like this, said Mr. C., is in direct repugnance to the idea that he wishes to shrink from an investigation of his charges, and that he merely wished to afford food for the newspapers during the recess of Congress. Whether it be true or not, I ask whether it is proper for a member of this House, who is to pass upon this case before God and man, to express so decided an opinion, which would go to stamp infamy upon one of the parties in this controversy. I ask whether this is consistent with the dignified attitude which we ought to occupy. The honorable gentleman had better wait for his opinions until the report from the committee be made, for that committee, able and honest as he believed them to be, would present nothing but the truth in their report. Then is the time to express such an opinion, if the facts shall warrant it; and, sorely as I shall regret it, on account of the particular relation in which I stand to that individual, let the power of truth be brought upon him—if it be sufficient to crush him, if due to justice, and the character of the country, let it be so. I will not undertake to express an opinion, as to the merits of the Secretary—I will wait until the facts shall come in solemn form before us—in that form which shall justify us in expressing an opinion thereupon, before this House and the nation. If malice be proved, let the seal of reprobation be stamped upon the author of the address. Sincerely as I should lament it, my duty to myself and to my country would oblige me to express the truth upon the evidence before me.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the gentleman from Illinois was not well acquainted with the address, or he would not have put upon it the construction which he had: for the author of it expressly says, after making various charges against the Secretary of the Treasury, "I do not ask for an investigation of his conduct;" and yet, with this staring us in the face, the gentleman tells us that the object of the address was an investigation! Whether the opinion I have formed of the motives of the addresser be just or not, is for the House and the country to judge. It has been formed from a fair and simple view of the facts. The conclusion appears to my mind, and must be to every prejudiced mind, irresistible. Whether I am disqualified by this opinion, forced upon me by facts universally known, from passing upon this case, it is not for the gentleman from Illinois to undertake to determine.

I have never mingled in this transaction: my opinion is formed from what has appeared publicly in this House, and from the documents before us; I know nothing further of this transaction.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, observed, that there was by no means that necessity for the arrival and personal presence of Mr. Edwards, which seemed to be supposed. Since sending for him, the committee had investigated farther into the facts of the case, and, he believed, they were in circumstances to make a report satisfactory to themselves and to this House. In the meanwhile it was very possible that that gentleman may come from Louisville in ten days. He could not think it needful for the House to sit here till the 8th of June. Should he not come even till the 30th, the House can, in that case, give its powers to a committee, and the committee may sit during the recess; at all events he could not approve the present proposition, and must vote against it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, said, that he concurred with his colleague (Mr. WEBSTER) in the opinion that, if the inquiry which has been commenced is to be prosecuted, the session must, necessarily, be protracted at least to the most distant day yet named. But, as he was of opinion that no measures were to grow out of that investigation directly affecting either of the parties, he thought it might safely be committed to the bar of public opinion. Let the people investigate—they would investigate the case, and the public voice will pronounce upon the parties at issue. On this ground he was in favor of the earliest day named, which was Monday the 24th. From what had already been manifested, in the course of the present debate, it must be easy to see what collisions of feeling will be the result, if the discussion is to be pursued on this floor. Who could set limits to that discussion? He did not mean to impugn the motives of honorable gentlemen—he did not doubt the purity of their intentions. But we are human beings—we have passions and prejudices which would mingle with the operations of our judgment. The American people would approach the subject with greater calmness—they were not in the same atmosphere which surrounded the members of this House, and he was for leaving it to their decision.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, rose, not to engage in the debate, but to suggest, with great deference, that the opinion of every gentleman must, before this time, be made up as to the proper time for terminating the session, and to entreat that the question might be taken without further debate.

Mr. MERCER rose to state the ground on which he should now vote. He had distinctly appealed to the committee to know whether they would consider the testimony of the individual who has been sent for material to the investigation before them. I have not investigated these charges myself, said he. The ground of them are to be found in four volumes of documents which I have not had time to examine. Upon the silence of the committee, in answer to my distinct application to them, I shall consider the testimony of that witness not material, and shall, therefore, vote against a late day of adjournment.

The question was then taken on fixing on the 7th day of June, and decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the first day of June, and decided in the negative, 96 to 75.

The resolution was then made blank.

Mr. SAUNDERS, of North Carolina, declared that he had voted for the latest day, and for the 1st June; but as the House appeared to be determined not to allow time for Mr. Edwards to arrive, he should now vote for the earliest day proposed.

After a few observations, from Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, who proposed and advocated an adjournment on the 22d, and from Mr. ROSS, in favor of the 27th instant, the question was taken on filling the blank with that day and agreed to, 101 votes to 73.

This amended, the resolution was passed, and returned to the Senate, who agreed to the amendment.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 19.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the amendment of the Senate to the bill for the relief of J. Outramare, reported their disagreement to the same; and the question being taken, Will the House concur in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means? it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the same committee, to which was referred the amendment of the Senate to the bill for the relief of John S. Moffit, reported their agreement to the said amendment, which was concurred in by the House.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John H. Howland, of New York," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Alexander McNair," reported the same, with an amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate have passed acts of the following titles, to wit: "An act to enable the President to hold treaties with the Indian tribes, and for other purposes;" and, "An act to provide for the punishment of certain crimes when committed in any navy yard, fort, arsenal, magazine, dock-yard, lighthouse, or other place belonging to the United States;" in which they ask the concurrence of the House.

The joint resolution authorizing the purchase of 630 copies of the Journals of the Old Congress, from 1774 to 1788, was read a third time, and, after some conversation between Messrs. TAYLOR, and FORSTH, it was passed—yeas 87, noes 40.

On motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, the House again took up the bill "for establishing a Territorial government in Florida."

Mr. CALL moved to fill the blank for the salary of the Judge of the Supreme Court with $2,000.

Mr. TAYLOR opposed the motion for $2,000, and moved to fill the blank with $1,500.

This amendment was opposed by Messrs. CALL, and BARBOUR, and carried—yeas 64, noes 56.

Mr. TAYLOR offered a farther amendment, to strike out $500 as the salary of the District Attorney, and insert "the same salary as is provided by law for the District Attorney of the State of Kentucky." The motion was decided by yeas and noes as follows—yeas 77, noes 62.

Mr. CALL offered an amendment to the fourth section of the bill, which was adopted, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. CAMBRELING moved to take up the bill in relation to the accounts of Daniel D. Tompkins. Negatived.

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved to take up the Post Office bill. This motion was carried, and the House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to discontinue certain post roads, and to establish others. A great number of amendments were made to this bill; a long list of new post-roads were agreed to, and a few unproductive routes, of small importance, were stricken out.

Mr. F. JOHNSON offered the following amendment:

"Be it further enacted, That the sum of fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, and made subject to the order of the Postmaster General, to aid in defraying the expense of transporting the mails; to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated."

The amendment was rejected.

Several farther alterations were made; when the Committee rose and reported progress.

PIRACY IN THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. POINSETT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to "piracies, by which our commerce in the neighborhood of the island of Cuba has been afflicted," and to the "depredations which have been committed on the lawful commerce of the United States, under other pretences, and other color, in the neighboring island of Porto Rico," made a report thereon; which was read, and laid upon the table. The report is as follows:

That the prompt and energetic measures adopted by Congress, at the commencement of their last session, seconded by the zeal and enterprise of the officers intrusted with the command of the light squadron destined to suppress piracy in the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico, have succeeded in putting a stop to the piracies by which our commerce had been afflicted in the neighborhood of the island of Cuba, as far as a foreign force, unaided by the public authorities of the island, could succeed in accomplishing this object.

These piracies had been continued for years, under the immediate observation of the Government of the island of Cuba, which, as well as the Spanish Government, has been repeatedly and ineffectually required to suppress them. Many of them have been committed by boats, which remained concealed in the harbors and under the head land, until they discovered their prey, which they captured, plundered, and destroyed upon the shores of the island. When pursued by a superior force, the pirates have escaped to the shore; and our commanders have been refused permission to land in pursuit of them, even on the desert and uninhabited parts of the island.

It appears, from the most respectable testimony, that these atrocious robberies were committed by persons well known in Havana and in Regla, where they were organized into a band; and that the traffic in their plunder was carried on openly; that they were sometimes committed by vessels equipped at Havana and at Regla; and that they cautiously avoided molesting Spanish vessels, but attacked, without discrimination, the defenceless vessels of all other nations.

The present Captain General of the island of Cuba has acted with great courtesy towards our commander and officers engaged on this service, and has co-operated with them, by arresting the pirates who had escaped to the shore, nor has he complained when our officers have found it necessary to pursue them, and to break up their haunts on the desert and unfre-quoted keys that surround the island. In no case, however, within our knowledge, where pirates have been seized by the authorities of the island, have they been brought to that punishment their crimes merited; and those who are well known to have fitted out piratical cruisers, and to have sold their plunder with the utmost notoriety, are suffered to remain in Havana and Regla, in the unmolested enjoyment of the fruits of their crimes. Under these circumstances, the British and American squadrons in those seas may repress piracy, so long as they continue cruising in the neighborhood of the island; but there is reason to apprehend, that, on their removal, similar outrages on our commerce will be renewed. In the opinion of your committee, piracy can only be effectually suppressed by the Government of Spain, and by the authorities of the island taking the necessary measures to prevent piratical vessels or boats from being equipped or sailing from any part of the island, and to apprehend and punish every description of outlaws, as well those who actually commit acts of piracy, as those who receive and traffic in goods plundered on the high seas.

The commerce of the United States with the island of Cuba, superior to that with Spain and all its other dependencies, and fully equal to that with France, claims in a peculiar manner the protection of Government. The safety of that commerce requires that the Government of Spain should be urged to adopt prompt and vigorous measures, effectually to suppress piracy in the neighborhood of the island, and to co-operate with the maritime Powers most interested in effecting this object; and, your committee are of opinion, that, for the protection of this important commerce, and of the persons and property of our fellow-citizens, when in the ports of the island, the residence of consuls, or authorized commercial agents of the United States, at these places, is absolutely necessary, and ought to be insisted upon.

Privateers, distinguished from pirates only by commissions of most equivocal character, from Spanish officers whose authority to issue them has never been shown, have been equipped in the island of Porto Rico, and have committed outrages and depredations upon the persons and property of the citizens of the United States; outrages, which no commission could divest of their piratical character. With no other naval force than a frigate, a brig, and a schooner, they presumed to declare a blockade of more than twelve hundred miles of coast. To this violation of all the rights of neutrality, they added the absurd pretension of interdicting the peaceable commerce of other nations with all the ports of the Spanish Main, upon the pretence, that it had heretofore been forbidden by the Spanish colonial laws; and, on the strength of these two inadmissible principles, they issued commissions in the island of Porto Rico, to a swarm of privateers, which have committed extensive and ruinous depredations upon the lawful commerce of the United States. Frequent remonstrances have been made, both to Spain and to the authorities of the island, by the Executive, without producing any effect. During the last Summer, a special agent was sent to Porto Rico, to obtain the restitution of American vessels captured by the privateers of that island, and to collect documentary evidence of the trials and condemnation of others. To the first demand, the political chief referred the agent to the Government of Spain, declaring that he could not, without an open infraction of fundamental laws, take cognizance of causes legally determined; that the officers of that province could not proceed, but by the express orders of the Supreme Government, and to that, the United States, after the example of Great Britain, must have recourse.

It appears by the testimony collected by this gentleman, that it had been the practice of these privateers, not to send in their prizes to the large and frequented ports, where impartial judges could determine on the validity of the capture, and where the captured could have the means of fairly defending their rights; but to send them into distant and obscure seaports, where the courts are notoriously corrupt, and where the captains and owners were deprived of the means of making even statements of their cases. There are many instances of vessels condemned most unjustly; and, even where they have had the rare good fortune to escape condemnation, their owners have been subjected to ruinous costs and charges; and, in some cases, before the vessels have reached the port, the cargoes and property have been plundered, and the officers and crew treated in a cruel and barbarous manner.

In San Juan, the principal town of the island of Porto Rico, attempts have been made to assassinate the commercial agent of the United States, and the master of a merchant vessel, in order as they believe, to prevent them from taking legal measures to recover property unlawfully captured. Your committee deem it unnecessary to enumerate the vessels that have been captured and condemned without the color of justice, or to recapitulate each particular case of barbarous outrage committed upon the persons and property of the citizens of the United States, by privateers fitted out in the ports of Porto Rico; outrages, which, in their opinion, would justify reprisals and a rigorous blockade of the ports of that island. Your committee forbear to recommend the immediate adoption of those measures, only, because the Minister of the United States at Madrid has been instructed to remonstrate with His Catholic Majesty on the culpable neglect of the Spanish authorities in the island of Porto Rico, and to require indemnity for the losses sustained by the citizens of the United States, from the lawless conduct of the commanders of privateers, bearing His Majesty's commission. That this remonstrance and demand was not made earlier, arose from circumstances beyond the control of Government. The former Minister had left Madrid before his instructions on this subject reached that place, and the subsequent invasion of Spain by France, and the conduct of the French commander of the blockading squadron off Cadix, retarded the arrival of our present Minister. While the committee advise, that Government wait the result of the negotiation now pending, at Madrid, or, at all events, the answer to the remonstrance of our Minister at that Court, before a resort is had to reprisals and blockade; they earnestly recommend, that two or more small cruisers should be constantly kept off the ports of San Juan, and in the Moro Passage, so as to protect our commerce, and intercept at the entrance of San Juan, Aguadilla, Mazaguez, Cape Roco, and Ponce, American vessels unlawfully captured by Spanish privateers; and, that the commanders of the United States vessels of war be instructed to capture, and send into a port of the United States for trial, any privateer that commits an outrage on the persons, or plunders the property, of citizens of the United States, on the high seas, whenever good and sufficient testimony of such piratical act can be obtained.

Government of Florida.—Regulation of Steam Vessels.

H. OF R.

GOVERNMENT OF FLORIDA &amp;c.

A bill "to amend an act, entitled 'An act to amend an act for the establishment of a Territorial government in Florida,'" was read by sections and amended. On the item which fixes the salary of the District Attorney, some debate arose, in which Messrs. COCKE, P. P. BARBOUR, CALL, TAYLOR, and WRIGHT, took part.

Mr. CALL proposed to fill the blank with five hundred dollars. Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, to fill it with two hundred.

The former sum was carried—ayes 71, noes 62. When the bill and amendments were, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," made a report thereon.

Mr. TOD moved for a call of the House previous to taking a vote on this report. The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. A. STEVENSON moved to lay the report on the table until the House should be fuller.

This motion was agreed to—ayes 81, noes 72.

Mr. COOK offered the following joint resolution, which was twice read, and, on motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, was laid on the table :

Resolved, &c., That the several States which have been admitted into the Union, under any compact prohibiting such States from levying and collecting a tax on land for five years next succeeding the sale of such land by the United States, be, and they are hereby, severally authorized, whenever they may deem it expedient, to subject all lands hereafter sold by the United States, within their respective limits, to the same tax that they may levy and collect on lands not subject to the provisions of such compacts."

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee to whom the bill from the Senate, "authorizing the purchase of 300 copies of Way & Gideon's edition of the Journals of the old Congress," was committed, reported the same with an amendment, which altered the number of copies from 300 to 630. The House agreed to the amendment, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading this day.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, the bill "for altering the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the district of Maryland," was, by consent, amended by substituting May for July; and the bill was then read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

A bill "to alter the judicial districts of Virginia and for other purposes;" and the engrossed bill "to alter the time of holding the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina," having undergone several amendments, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. STEWART offered the following, which lies one day :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this House any report that may have been made by the Superintendent of the Cumberland Road, showing the manner in which the appropriation made during the last session of Congress for the preservation and repair of the said road has been expended."

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, rose, and said, that he had understood from several members who voted yesterday for an adjournment on the 27th, that they had done so because they considered the silence of the members of the committee of investigation to the inquiry, Whether the evidence of Mr. Edwards was necessary? as equivalent to an admission that they did not think his examination necessary. Mr. L. said he rose to correct this erroneous conclusion. The members of the committee had not answered, he presumed, although he only spoke for himself, because no other vote had ever been taken as to the necessity of such examination, except that by which the witness had been ordered to attend; and no member of the committee could, therefore, express the opinion of that body in answer to the inquiry. The fact, however, was, that every member of the House could as well judge of the propriety of waiting for the arrival of Mr. Edwards as the committee could. The committee had no other evidence than that before the House. He thought it necessary to make this explanation, to give any gentleman who had voted under an erroneous impression, an opportunity to move for a reconsideration.

REGULATION OF STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. VINTON offered the following :

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, that no license to navigate any of the waters of the United States shall be granted to any boat or vessel hereafter built and moved or propelled by fire or steam, upon the principle of construction commonly called "high pressure;" nor to any boat or vessel heretofore built and moved or propelled by fire or steam, that shall hereafter be fitted up or provided with any engine or other machine intended to move or propel such boat or vessel upon the principle of construction aforesaid."

Mr. LIVERMORE was desirous of information on the difference of construction between steam engines of high and of low pressure.

Mr. VINTON said he believed the Parliament of Great-Britain had, some years ago, prohibited, by law, any boat or vessel from navigating the waters of that country by steam propulsion, upon the principle of construction embraced in the resolution he had the honor to submit; that, when he first heard of the existence of such a law, he was forcibly struck with the propriety of adopting some regulation upon that subject in this country, also; and he thought our disastrous experience was sufficiently ample and mournful to leave no doubt in the mind of any gentleman present, of the policy of providing a speedy remedy for so alarming an evil. For himself, he said, the many accidents from explosion, upon almost every public water of the United States, producing death in its most terrific forms, and in none more so than the recent casualty in the harbor of New York, (the melancholy intelligence of which, yesterday, excited in every part of this Hall the deepest sensation,) had satisfied him, not merely of the propriety, but of the absolute necessity of legislative interposition for the preservation of the lives of our people. A country agitated with terror and dismay looks to us for protection, and demands, at our hands, security for the future—a security which, he trusted, would not be denied. For these reasons, he had brought forward this subject, at the present time, with the hope of now calling that attention of the House to it, which might result, on some proper occasion, hereafter, in a concentration of its united intelligence, as well as that of the very able committee to whom the resolution was proposed to be committed, in devising some way of putting a stop to this tragic waste of human life. Mr. V. said it must be perfectly familiar to every gentleman present, that boats are navigated by steam upon two different constructions, one of which is commonly denominated high and the other low pressure. The latter is universally admitted to be comparatively free from liability to explosion, and much less dangerous, on the occurrence of such an accident. Notwithstanding this advantage, which ought to be a matter of the very first consideration with all engaged in this business, who regard the lives, happiness, and peace of mind of their fellow-men, yet, in many, if not all the waters of the United States, except the Hudson, boats are propelled by high pressure, and that, too, after the most multiplied and calamitous experience of its danger. This, Mr. V. said, was particularly the case on the rivers Ohio and Mississippi, where more than one hundred vessels are now navigated by steam, (and the number almost daily increasing,) a great majority of which are constructed upon this dangerous plan—and here, as might be expected, until quite lately, has been the principal theatre of these distressing accidents. Two reasons he had heard assigned for the introduction of this description of boat upon those waters, though, in his opinion, there was but one, and that entitled to not much weight. It had been said the high pressure possessed a greater power, giving to the boat a greater velocity of motion, and consequent momentum or ability to resist and move up against a strong opposing current, like that of the Mississippi. If boats moved by low pressure were unable to overcome the currents of our rivers, it would present a strong argument against acting upon his resolution; but he doubted whether there was any such difference of power in point of fact. The high pressure boat was somewhat less expensive, and cost, perhaps, something less to navigate it; and this, he believed, was the real motive for the introduction of this dangerous description of navigation. Whatever justification interest might furnish to him who thus endangers, and perhaps destroys the life of his fellow-mortal, or however his cupidity may lead him, with full knowledge of this disastrous experience, still to persevere in exposing, even to possible danger, the lives of those who commit themselves to his care and protection, he felt assured this House would not for a moment give its sanction to such a motive, nor permit it to be put in contrast with the comfort, and safety, of the travelling public, and, he might add, the anxious solicitude of friends, and all connected with it in the various relations of life. Numerous as these accidents have been, yet this species of navigation continues to increase, and nothing short of the power of Government can arrest its progress within any reasonable time, and, until the evil shall correct itself by the waste of life, give that security to the people of this country which they have a right to claim at our hands, and we are in duty bound to guaranty to them. Boats are constructed upon the cheapest plan, and with a view almost exclusively to velocity of motion. The traveller is always in haste to go forward, and hence, the fastest running boat obtains the highest character. This naturally keeps up a constant and most dangerous competition, that has been, and ever must be, fruitful in disaster. The comparative history and experience of steam navigation on the Hudson, and the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi, are decisive of this question. No accident, Mr. V. said, had ever occurred on the former river, from explosion, within his knowledge; but it was to be feared the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which had unlocked its waters, would give rise to the introduction of this kind of navigation also, from which it had hitherto been excluded. Compel your boats to adopt a different construction, and while interest will insure diligence in the prosecution of the voyage, the standard of character will at once be changed. That boat will obtain the best reputation which best consults and promotes the ease, comfort, and enjoyment, of its passengers. In short, all experience, every principle of policy, humanity, and regard for the lives and welfare of the people of this nation, call upon the House for its speedy and effectual interposition to give practical security to the enjoyment of this most valuable invention.

The Tariff Bill.

The resolution was advocated by Messrs. POCKETT, MCKIM, BUCHANAN, and WARFIELD. Mr. LINCOLN, and Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, wished the resolution extended, so as to prohibit an improper material for the construction of boilers in steam engines.

Mr. ABBOT thought the session too far advanced to admit of the proper time to mature a law on this subject. It required much research and practical information.

The resolution was adopted.—

TARIFF BILL.

The report of the Committee of Conference in relation to amendments to the Tariff bill, was read again.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the House concur with the report of the committee, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. FORSYTH made a motion, prefaced by some general observations on the character of the bill, (which he maintained was, as amended, no longer a bill to protect manufactures, but merely to increase the revenue,) to postpone indefinitely its farther consideration, and asked the yeas and nays on that question; which were ordered.

MAY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. TAYLOR explained the course adopted by the Committee of Conference, and defended the report as accomplishing all that would be attained under existing circumstances—and urged a concurrence in the result; since the two branches of the Legislature had got so nearly to one point as to be within half a cent, on a single duty, of each other's measures.

Mr. TRIMBLE expressed a hope that the friends of the bill would adhere to each other, and not lose a measure for which they had been struggling for years because the amount of one contested duty was half a cent below the point they wished. He made a few observations on the share of favor dispensed by the bill to Kentucky and the West—and, though not approving it as just or sufficient, was yet willing to acquiesce, and hoped other members from the West would do so too. In the course of his remarks, Mr. T. incidentally passed a merited eulogium on the character and services of the late General Wayne, to whose son, sitting near him, he was willing to appeal as an umpire between himself and the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CAMBRELENG contended that the bill was now wholly a revenue bill—he dwelt upon the large amount it would add to the burdens of the country, the needlessness of such an increase, &c.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, spoke in support of the view given by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR) advocated the bill as being, what was so long desired, a judicious revision of the duties. He replied to the argument of Mr. CAMBRELENG, and adduced calculations to show that the increase of the revenue which its effect would produce was opportune to the state of the finances, as it would enable the nation to redeem the 6 per cents. and extinguish the national debt by the year 1834.

Mr. CAMBRELENG spoke in reply, insisting on the view he had before given; and then

The question on indefinite postponement was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 120, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, P. P. Barbour, J. S. Barbour, Brent, Burleigh, Burton, Cambreleng, Campbell of South Carolina, Carter, Cary, Cobb, Conner, Crowninshield, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Forsyth, Frost, Garnett, Gatlin, Gist, Goyan, Gurley, Hall, Hamilton, Hoeks, Kent, Lee, Leftwich, Lincoln, Litchfield, Livingston, Long, McCoy, McDuffie, McKee, Mangum, Mercer, Moore of Alabama, Neale, Owen, Poinsett, Rankin, Reed, Reynolds, Saunders, Sandford, Arthur Smith, Alexander Smyth, William Smith, Spaight, Spence, A. So the House refused indefinitely to postpone the bill.

Mr. FORSYTH objected to the principle of taxing the Southern States, in the article of cotton bagging, to however small an amount, for the benefit of a particular district of the Union, and he gave notice that, should the motion of concurrence with the committee of conference be rejected, he should submit a motion, that this House recede from its disagreement to the Senate's amendment.

After a few remarks from Mr. TRIMBLE, in reply to those of Mr. FORSYTH, the question was taken on concurring with the report of the committee of conference, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 66, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the House did concur in the report of the said committee of conference, which is as follows:

1st. That the House of Representatives do recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and do agree to the same, with the following amendment: after the word "wool," where it occurs in the proviso, strike out the words, "or of which wool shall be a component part;" and insert, "except flannels and baizes."

2d. That the Senate do recede from so much of its sixteenth amendment, in reference to the specific duty on cotton bagging, as is disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and that the clause be modified, so as to read, "on cotton bagging, three cents and three fourths of a cent per square yard."

Mr. WEBSTER gave notice that, to-morrow, (Thursday,) he should call up the consideration of the bill from the Senate in relation to the election of President and Vice President, and that, also from the Senate, in relation to imprisonment for debt.

THURSDAY, May 20.

Mr. HARVEY, from the Naval Committee, reported a bill "for the relief of William Townsend;" which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. WHIPPLE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill from the Senate, "for the relief of the representatives of John Donnelson, Stephen Hurd, and others," with an amendment, inserting the name of Thomas Carr, in which the House concurred—ayes 66, noes 53.

On the question of its engrossment for a third reading, a short debate arose, in which Messrs. COBB, WHIPPLE, ISACKS, HOUSTON, and CULPEPER, took part, and the motion to engross prevailed.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. STEWART, calling for certain information from the President of the United States, as to the application of the money last year appropriated for the repairs of the Cumberland road, was taken up, and agreed to.

The following bills from the Senate, viz:

An act to provide for the punishment of certain crimes when committed in any navy yard, fort, arsenal, magazine, dock yard, lighthouse, or other place belonging to the United States; An act to enable the President to hold treaties with certain Indian tribes, and for other purposes; were twice read, and referred to committees.

The following engrossed bills, viz:

A bill altering the time of holding the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina; An act to alter the judicial districts of Virginia, and for other purposes; A bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish a Territorial government in Florida, and for other purposes;" were severally read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

On the last of these bills, the discussion of yesterday was renewed. The provisions of the bill were objected to by Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, and defended by Mr. CALL, of Florida, and Mr. SCOTT, of Missouri.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "to authorize the surveying and making of a road from a point on the northwest boundary of the State of Ohio, near the foot of the rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie, to Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan;" which was read by sections.

The facts were stated and explained by Mr. VANCE. The road, partly opened by the troops during the late war, passes over many deep morasses, through a country sparsely peopled, and is of importance as a military road on the frontier, &c. He adverted to the disasters which had been experienced for want of a road between these points, and moved to fill the blank in the appropriate clause with the sum of $20,000.

This sum was objected to by Mr. SANDFORD, of Tennessee, and advocated by Mr. McARTHUR, who explained, from personal knowledge, the necessity of the road, and the aspect of the country through which it is proposed to pass.

The amendment passed nem. con., and the bill was reported and ordered to a third reading.

THE POST OFFICE BILL.

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved to resume the consideration of the Post Office bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, suggested the propriety of recommitting it.

Mr. F. JOHNSON objected to this course, and then the House, having given leave to sit again, went into Committee of the Whole, on that bill.

A variety of amendments were proposed, the greater part of which were adopted. The bill was then reported to the House, as amended, and a number of farther amendments were proposed and carried. One of the amendments, proposed by Mr. MOORE, went to extend the privilege of franking letters, during the whole time any member retained his right to a seat on this floor. Another (offered by Mr. COCKE,) went to repeal that privilege as now extended to 30 days before and after the sessions of the House, and confine it to the time the House is in session—while another, (offered by Mr. COOK,) took a middle course, and extended that privilege to sixty days before and after the session.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved an amendment appropriating fifty thousand dollars in aid of the Post Office Department, to enable it to meet the additional post routes now agreed to: and he supported his amendment by a speech, in which he advocated the principle of expending the funds of the country for the diffusion of intelligence.

MAY, 1824.

Accounts of Daniel D. Tompkins.

H. OF R.

After much discussion, this amendment was adopted—ayes 76, noes 50.

An amendment offered by Mr. INGHAM, which required the Postmaster General, whenever the disbursements of the Department exceeds its income, to suspend so many of the least productive routes as amount to the balance, was negatived—ayes 54, noes 76. As was also the following, offered by Mr. WHIPPLE:

That the bill be re-committed to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, with instructions that the Committee report the number of miles added to the present post routes by the bill, the expense of carrying the mail on the same, the amount of available revenue which accrued to the Post Office Department during the last year, and the expenses thereof for the same period, with the balance, if any, which now exists against the General Post Office.

The bill and amendment were then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ACCOUNTS OF DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriation for the payment of the claim of Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of the State of New York.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to amend the bill by striking out that part of it which allows interest on the commission allowed Mr. T. on disbursements for the Government.

The letter of the President of the United States on this subject, was read.

Mr. A. STEVENSON went into a history of the settlement of Mr. T.'s accounts, and advocated the propriety of the allowance proposed in the bill on principles of public justice. He dwelt with warmth on the services of the individual concerned, and insisted that the appropriation was no more than his due.

Mr. WICKLIFFE acknowledged the merits of Mr. Tompkins, but contended that his claim was to be put on the same footing with every other. He went into an examination of several provisions of the bill—to many of which he did not object—but he could not assent to the allowance of interest on commission. This was not required or warranted by any statute, nor was it allowed in private transactions.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, spoke in reply—allowed that if there was nothing to discriminate this from ordinary cases, it would be improper to make the allowance—but contended that it was a case of marked and very peculiar character. He showed that the injuries of the individual concerned arose from the inability of the Government to pay his just demands at the time when they were due—he stated the promises under which he had acted in aiding the Government. The violation of those promises, and his consequent ruin; he contrasted the principles on which Government had settled with others, and contended that, even if the bill passed, he would not be as well dealt with as they. He adverted to the pressure on the national credit during the late war, and insisted that rules which applied in a time of peace and tranquillity could not, with fairness, be applied to transactions under all the exigencies and risks of a state of war.

The debate was farther continued by Messrs. WARFIELD and WICKLIFFE, who opposed, and Mr. STEVENSON, who supported the bill.

Mr. A. STEVENSON moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting words, and inserting the following: "That there shall be paid to Daniel D. Tompkins out of any money, &c., the sum of $136,799 97; deducting therefrom the amount paid him in virtue of the act to amend an act appropriating a certain sum of money for the relief of Daniel D. Tompkins, amounting to ——— dollars, as a full compensation and discharge for his claim against the United States, arising out of the advances made, losses sustained, and services rendered, by him during the war between the United States and Great Britain: that being the amount found due to him from the United States, by the verdict of the jury in the case of the United States of America vs. D. D. Tompkins, decided in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. That the act heretofore passed, referring the claims of said Tompkins, shall be, and is hereby, repealed."

On this amendment a discussion arose, in which Messrs. STEVENSON, CADY, CAMBRELENG, INGHAM, FORSYTH, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, took part.

Mr. CADY, of New York, wishing to state certain facts more fully, and to express his views on this subject, moved that the Committee rise.

This motion was not carried—ayes 70, noes 72.

Mr. McDUFFIE supported the amendment of Mr. STEVENSON, as going to enable Congress to do an act of justice to a meritorious individual, without involving any principle which might be drawn into injurious precedent. He testified, in the most explicit and cordial manner, to the merit and value of the services of Mr. Tompkins during the late war, and remarked on the ruinous consequences which had ensued to his private fortune.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR took the same side, and observed that, if there was on this side of the grave an object of interesting contemplation, it was a great and good man struggling amidst surrounding difficulties, and in danger of being overwhelmed by them. All his impressions concerning the conduct of the individual concerned in this bill were of the most favorable kind, and he did not know whether he might not, unconsciously, be too much influenced by his feelings to be a perfectly unbiassed judge. Mr. B. then went into a review of some of the calamitous scenes in the early part of the late war. He adverted particularly to the time when this Capitol was nothing but a heap of smouldering ruins; when the metropolis was ransacked; when the inhabitants of his own State were in uncertain dread of an attack of the enemy on Baltimore or Richmond; when an attempt was made to renew the project of Burgoyne, to divide the United States into two moieties by gaining possession of the State of New York;

H. OF R.

Accounts of Daniel D. Tompkins.

MAY, 1824.

when it was almost a literal fact that the vessel of State was aground; when we had neither men in the field, nor money in the Treasury, nor credit with those who had it to lend:—at this period, the services of Governor Tompkins were tendered. He went into the service of his country with a fortune ample and unembarrassed. During his continuance in it, no palaces had risen like exhalations; no equipages flashed like meteors; yet he came out of the war ruined in fortune, ruined in credit, having not only lost his own property, but sacrificed that which he possessed by his connexion in life, and was reduced to absolute poverty. Mr. B. said, it might do very well to read in history of a Cincinnatus, who returned from the highest station in the State to hold a plough, and who still retained a lofty standing among his countrymen. If such things ever had existed, they certainly did not exist at the present day. He made some forcible remarks on the effects of poverty, and, having again deprecated any undue influence of feeling over his judgment, he proceeded to the naked question of right, adverted to the verdict which had been rendered in favor of the claims of Mr. T. by a jury at New York, on the circumstances under which it was rendered, and the weight to which it was entitled; and though he did not admit it as authority which ought to bind this House, and admitted that verdicts might be influenced by prejudice, by a strong current of party feeling, and other causes, yet, till evidence should be produced to shake the decision which the New York jury had given, after a full and laborious investigation, he should presume it to be a correct finding in the case, and rejoiced that the dictates of his own judgment united with and corroborated the feelings of his heart toward the claimant.

Mr. BARTLETT proposed that the amendment be so modified as to admit that part of it which relates to the decision of a grand jury in the case.

Mr. STEVENSON accepted this modification, and altered his amendment so as to read: "The sum of $101,609 97, as a full compensation and discharge for his claim against the United States, arising out of advances made, losses sustained, and services rendered by him during the war between the United States and Great Britain."

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to amend the amendment by striking out no more than a part of the first section of the bill.

Mr. KREMER moved that the Committee rise, and accompanied the motion with a few remarks, it was negatived—ayes 60, noes 79.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied to the remarks of Mr. CADY, and called upon him to state the information he possessed and to which he had alluded. He went into some history of the crisis in which the services of Mr. T. were rendered. He regretted the offering of the amendment, and would prefer that the bill remain as at first reported—he thought the House ought to comply with its decision at the last session, and carry the principles then sanctioned into full effect.

Mr. CADY replied to Mr. CAMBRELENG, and complained that he should be forced into the debate by his colleague. He avowed no hostility to Governor Tompkins, and disclaimed any reflection on the President of the United States or his officers. He adverted to the short period in which he had served in the field, the services of others equally meritorious, the allowances made to the claimant by the State of New York, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied—and observed that his only object had been to elicit from his colleague any information he might be willing to communicate on the subject.

Mr. WARFIELD moved to rise.

The motion was negatived—ayes 70, noes 87.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, inquired of Mr. STEVENSON for the items which made up the sum he had moved. Mr. STEVENSON explained that he had founded the calculation on the verdict of the jury of New York, and deducting from it such sums as had been paid Mr. T. at the Treasury.

Mr. WILLIAMS replied, and still wished for particulars.

Mr. MCCOY spoke in opposition to the amendment.

The debate was then further continued by Messrs. WRIGHT, of Ohio, KREMER, of Pennsylvania, BEECHER, of Ohio, INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, who opposed the amendment, and Messrs. J. S. BARBOUR and HOGEBOOM, who advocated it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. STEVENSON, (founded on the New York verdict,) was decided in the negative.—Ayes 61, noes 74.

The question then recurring on the amendment proposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, (which strikes out all the first section except the enacting clause,) it was decided in the negative.—Ayes 62, noes 77.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to fill the blank in the second section, with the sum of $115,000—and, the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 86, noes 65.

The bill was then reported as amended.

Mr. MCCOY moved to adjourn. Negatived—ayes 63, noes 70.

Mr. WRIGHT then gave notice, that, if the House refused to concur in the report of the committee, he would move to fill the blank with $60,000, and the ayes and noes on concurring were called for and ordered by the House.

The question of concurring in the committee's report—filling the blank with $115,000—was then decided in the affirmative—ayes 78, noes 61, as follows:

Mr. WICKLIFFE then moved further to amend the bill by striking from the first section the following:

“That the President of the United States, in the final decision of the claims of Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of the State of New York, against the United States, be, and is hereby, authorized to allow the said D. D. Tompkins interest upon the amount of the commission which may be allowed him for disbursements.”

And the question thereon being stated, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 21.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a statement of the extent of the post roads, amount of postage collected, compensation of postmasters, incidental expenses, cost of transporting mails, &c., in each State and Territory, in the years 1820, 1821, and 1822; prepared in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 17th of December last; which was read, and laid on the table.

Mr. COCKE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled “An act to enable the President to hold treaties with certain Indian tribes, and for other purposes,” reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled “An act for the relief of Alexander Scott, late collector of Pensacola,” reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill to allow a salary to the collector of Pensacola.

The Committee on the Public Lands were discharged from the consideration of the Message of the President of the United States, of the 18th ultimo, accompanying a communication from Alexander Hamilton, relative to titles to lands in Florida; and the said Message was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. And the said committee were also discharged from the petition of Marianne Lasselle and others, and leave given to withdraw the same.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, it was Resolved, That the Commissioner of the Public Buildings dispose of the building south of the Capitol, now used for committee rooms, to the best advantage, and that the same be removed.

Mr. TRIMBLE laid the following resolution on the table for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House, at an early day of its next session, whether any, and what, provision can be made, by law, to distinguish between importations made by aliens, or on foreign account, and those made by citizens of the United States. And, also, report the amount of duties which accrued on imports during the year 1822, or 1823, classing the imports according to the aggregates of the several credits allowed by law upon the duty bonds, so as to show the aggregate under each head of credit, for the year selected; and so as to show, also, by estimate, the amount of interest that would have accrued upon the bonds, if the several credits had been allowed upon the payment of interest at the rate of six per centum per annum.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire whether further legislative provision is necessary to carry into effect the act of Congress of the third of March, 1823, entitled “An act to establish a national armory on the Western waters.”

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed JOHN GAILLARD President of the Senate, pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice President of the United States. The Senate have passed a bill of this House, entitled “An act to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers,” with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying three statements prepared in obedience to the act establishing a Mint, showing the expenses of that establishment; which report was laid upon the table.

The engrossed bill “to authorize the surveying and making of a road from a point on the northwest boundary of the State of Ohio, near the foot of the Miami of Lake Erie, to Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan,” and the bill from the Senate, “for the relief of the representatives of John Donnelson, Stephen Hurd, and others,” were read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOLANE, of Delaware, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, in the Chair,) on the bill “making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1824.”

Several amendments having been made, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

POST OFFICE BILL.

The engrossed bill “to discontinue certain post routes, and to establish others,” was then read a third time; and, having been slightly amended, the question was put, “Shall it pass?”

Mr. BEECHER spoke a few words in opposition, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 93, nays 46, as follows:

COMMITTEE ROOMS, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the joint committee appointed by the two Houses of Congress to make such distribution of the rooms of the centre building of the Capitol, as the business and convenience of the two Houses require, made the following report, viz:

The joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, to which was referred the resolution directing them to make such distribution of the rooms of the centre building of the Capitol as the business and convenience of the two Houses of Congress require, report:

That, in the centre building, besides the Rotunda and Library room, (the purposes of which are already designated,) there are the following rooms:

The committee have appropriated the room in the third story, adjoining the Library room, and on the north of it, and the room adjoining thereto on the east, numbered 22, as reading rooms, to be connected with the Library. They recommend that the room adjoining the last mentioned, and on the east of it, numbered 23, be appropriated as a consultation room for the use of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. They also recommend, that, until Congress shall make a further disposition of the large room under the Library, in the second story, the same may be occupied by the Columbian Institute as a place for holding their meetings, and a place of deposit for their books, papers, furniture, and collections.

As to the remaining rooms, the committee have appropriated all those north of the centre of the building, except the fourth story, to the Senate; and all those south of the centre, together with the whole of the fourth story, to the House of Representatives.

The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the distribution of the rooms in the centre building of the Capitol be made agreeably to the above report.

The report and resolution were read, and agreed to by the House.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, it was then resolved that a committee be appointed to make distribution of the rooms in the Capitol, appropriated to the use of the House of Representatives; and Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. KERT, Mr. TOD, Mr. HEMPHILL, Mr. CONDUCT, and Mr. EDDY, were appointed the said committee.

H. OF R.

ACCOUNTS OF DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

The House took up the bill "making provision for the settlement of the accounts of Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of the State of New York."

The question recurring, from yesterday, on the motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, to strike out the first section of the bill, he modified that motion, by proposing, as a substitute for the part stricken out, a section which went to allow only the amount settled at the Treasury, and contained in the President's Message on this subject, (viz, $60,239 24.) He supported this amendment by going into a summary view of the pecuniary transactions between Mr. TOMPKINS and the Government, and contended that the sum already allowed to that individual, was equivalent to a salary of $76,000 per annum for his personal services, a reward much greater than had ever been given to any other person for public services. Mr. W. referred to similar exertions made by others to support the national credit, &c.

Mr. LIVERMORE spoke in reply, and contended that, having referred the settlement of these accounts to the President, and having received his decision, it was unworthy of the dignity of the House to go into a farther contest of the claim. He remarked on the justice of the principles on which the claim rested, but said it was too late to investigate those principles, since the President had given his award. It was better to pay him his demand than to occupy the time of the House in passing eulogies on his patriotism and services.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said, that there was no dispute, on either side, whether the amount awarded by the President was to be paid, but only concerning an item on which the President had not made up a determination, viz: the allowance of interest on his commissions. He denied that the amount of these commissions was due as soon as the money was disbursed by Mr. Tompkins, since there was no law which sanctioned any such demand. Those commissions were not due till the law was passed which allowed them; and, if any interest on the commissions was due at all, it would not be due farther back than the date of that law. He contended for a principle of equal dealing with all claimants—which he insisted was a fundamental principle of this Government. He condemned the idea of settling a debt of moral gratitude in dollars and cents. Interest was never allowed, by law on a running account, and this account was not settled till last year. He deprecated the precedent which the proposed act would establish. If it passed, its principle must be applied to the multitude of various claims which are presented to this Government.

Mr. MANGUM replied, and took the opposite side of the question, contending against the presumption that Government is always both ready and willing to pay a just demand against it; a presumption which, in many cases, could not be denied to be in flat contradiction of fact. He showed how the claim arose, and contended that Governor Tompkins had been a lender to the Government to a great amount, at a moment of its utmost need—when the President and all the Secretaries could not raise $3,600, to pay the most pressing demand. He maintained the equity of allowing, that, if commissions were due at all, they were due as soon as the disbursements were made.

Mr. ROSS argued, that as the President had awarded a sum different from that found by the New York jury, the House ought not to consider itself under any obligation to be governed by it. He went into a review of the settlement of Mr. Tompkins's accounts, as made by the Treasury and allowed by the President, and contended that it ought not to go any further.

Mr. ELLIS protested against the negative vote of all who yesterday opposed the passage of the bill being interpreted as expressive of an opposition to the whole claim, but only so much of it as respected the interest on commissions. Many who gave that vote were willing to subscribe to the account as audited at the Treasury. He objected to any argument from the patriotism or services of the claimant; the claim was a matter of justice, and not a question of generosity or gratitude. He maintained that interest was applicable only to cases of absolute certainty—it followed certainty in a debt, as the shadow followed the substance. These commissions were wholly uncertain previous to the act which allowed them. Neither the sum on which they were to be allowed, nor the rate by which they were to be allowed, was ascertained till the law settled it. He did not object to the allowance of interest on the balances due—it had his hearty assent—although it was a departure from the ordinary rule of the Government. He thought the extraordinary circumstances of the advances made, was sufficient to justify it. But he objected to the principle of allowing interest on commissions, and deprecated the precedent.

Mr. McLANE rose in reply—maintaining that this was not a claim for interest on commissions as such; but for interest on a balance justly due, into which those commissions happened to enter; if the balance was due the interest was also due. As to the rate of commissions being greater than usually allowed by Government on disbursements, he contended that they were not allowed in this case on mere disbursements, but on the raising of money on private responsibility and disbursing it at personal risk, (and which had issued in the ruin of the individual.) To the argument from precedent, he replied by adducing a long list of cases taken from the records of the Treasury, in which interest had been allowed.

The debate was then farther continued by Mr. COOKE, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. WARFIELD, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. TOD, Mr. MALLARY, and Mr. REYNOLDS, who advocated the amendment of Mr. WICKLIFFE; and Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. McLANE and Mr. BRANT, who opposed it, and contended for $115,000.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Reluctant as I am to enter into debate on this question, or to oppose the passage of a bill, having for its object the settlement of the claims of an highly distinguished and meritorious public officer, a sense of public duty impels me to present to the House my views upon the subject under consideration. But, before I proceed to examine the case, it may be well to give you my conception of the real state of the question before you.

The bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, contains two provisions of widely different character—one for paying to the Vice President $60,239 24, the sum awarded by the President; the other for paying, in addition to that sum, the further sum of about $55,000, as interest upon the commission of five per cent. allowed him for disbursing the public money. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky goes to the rejection of the whole bill, and to substitute a simple provision, appropriating a sum for the payment of the award of the President, without the allowance of interest. I am, sir, in favor of the substitute; and, if it be adopted, shall vote for the bill, but, if rejected, shall feel myself bound to vote against the bill. I am in favor of this appropriation, because it is the decision of the President, the umpire chosen by ourselves to settle this claim; and it is not my design to enter into an examination of the meritorious and distinguished services of the late Governor of New York, or of the allowances made him by the President. But, sir, it may be important to recall to your recollection the situation of the affairs of this country, and the position the claimant occupied in relation to them, at the commencement and during the rendition of these services.

The present Vice President, during the late war, filled the gubernatorial chair of New York, at a salary of $7,000 or $7,500 per annum, and at the same time acted as a Major General in the service of the United States, in the receipt of pay and emoluments, in addition to the salary as Governor, of at least $4,000 per annum, making a total amount of pay, &c., of upwards of $11,000 a year. As Governor he was commander-in-chief of the military force of New York, and bound in duty, as such, to provide for the protection of that State. As Major General of the United States, he was equally bound to secure his command from the inroads of the enemy, and I believe his command was the whole State of New York. In discharging the duties pertaining to him, in the very important station he filled, he exhibited a zeal, vigilant industry, and perseverance, that could only be incited by an ardent attachment to the Constitution and liberties of his country, and a fixed determination, at any and all hazards, to sustain her cause, as well against foreign enemies as domestic foes. This conduct secured to him the admiration of his countrymen, and entitled him to their gratitude—an admiration and gratitude in which I claim to participate in no small degree. Sir, every citizen in a republic owes to his country the exertion of every faculty of mind and body, and however meritorious the services of this distinguished individual were, they reached only a faithful discharge of the duties of his station.

Owing to causes which it is unnecessary for me to explain to you, the affairs of your Treasury became extremely embarrassed during the war, and its credit sunk so low that it could not, without difficulty, raise a dollar to meet the many and urgent demands upon it; and, while at the lowest point of depression, the calls for protection, along an extended and exposed frontier, were the most pressing. An emission of Treasury notes was resorted to, but the combined efforts of brokers and stock-jobbers sunk them immediately below par. The necessity of defending the great and important city and State of New York, was palpable, but the means of affording protection seemed to be without the reach of the General Government. Governor Tompkins was urged to negotiate loans from the banks in New York; the Treasury of the Union was pledged for the ultimate payment, and for the transmission of Treasury notes, to be held as collateral security. This is evidenced by matters of general notoriety, and by the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, which I shall have occasion hereafter to notice. Governor Tompkins received, in addition to the assurances of the Executive Department, those of many influential men in New York, of the ultimate ability and disposition of the Government to indemnify him. The banks refused the loan direct to the National Government, (probably because no law authorized it to be made,) and Governor Tompkins was only able to procure the advances by using his own credit, backed by his friends. In this way, about $900,000 was procured from the Corporation of New York; (to be expended in protecting the city) and the banks; and Governor Tompkins disbursed this sum, and about as much more, $1,844,262 67.

In the discharge of the various duties confided to him, some irregularity in his vouchers was to be expected, and a consequent embarrassment. In the settlement of his accounts with the State of New York, as well as with the General Government, difficulties occurred, and balances were reported against him. That of New York, to an amount of about $100,000, was released to him by a legislative act, while the Treasury reports on his accounts with the United States remained unpaid. The act of Congress prohibiting the payment of salaries, &c., to any officers against whom balances were standing upon the Treasury books, until those balances were paid, occasioned a suspension of the salary of the Vice President, and drew from him a request to have suit against him. Suit was brought against him in the District Court of New York, and a verdict found in his favor, accompanied by an unofficial certificate, which I need not notice; for no one since has regarded it as furnishing any evidence in support of the claim. In this state of things application was made to Congress, and the prohibitory clause of the law was repealed, so far as regarded the salary of the Vice President; and the accounting officers of the Treasury were authorized to settle his accounts upon principles of justice and equity, subject to the revision and final decision of the President. It is manifest that the claims of Governor Tompkings were not predicated upon any laws of the United States, existing at the time of his disbursements, or at the time of the passage of the act of February, 1823, otherwise that act would have been useless.

Sir, the accounts of this officer, under the law just mentioned, were adjusted at the Treasury, and a balance reported in favor of Governor Tompkins of $35,190, which was communicated by the President, in a Message to the House, on the 7th December last, in which you are told, that, having the report and the claim for additional allowance under consideration, the President is of opinion that a large sum ought to be allowed to Governor Tompkins, which would have been before decided on, had he not delayed the decision, at his request, I know not what induced the request for delay; for it does not appear that any vouchers were wanting, nor is any reason whatever given for it. An appropriation was recommended for the balance reported, and we unhesitatingly made it. This Message was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means—one of the ablest in the House—and, it is worthy of remark, that, although the President only reported in part, and did not surrender the power given him to decide on the residue of the claims, the allowance of which had been delayed, in consequence of Governor Tompkins's request, or even doubt their extent—yet that committee reported that the powers vested in the President, under the act, were amply sufficient to a decision of the claim, and recommended its reference back to the President, to be settled, upon the four following principles:

First, That interest should be allowed to him on all moneys advanced by him, for the public, from the time of the advance to that of his being reimbursed.

Second, That a reasonable commission should be allowed him in on all moneys disbursed by him during the late war.

Third, That an indemnity should be allowed him for all losses which he had sustained by the failure of the Government to fulfil its engagements to send him money, or Treasury notes, within the time specified, to be deposited in certain banks, as collateral security for loans procured by him at the request, and on account of, the Government.

Fourth, That he should not be held responsible for losses incurred by the frauds and failures of sub-agents, to whom moneys were advanced through his hands.

This report was concurred in by the House, without opposition, and is, to my mind, a singular interference with the Executive in the performance of a power limited in its terms only by his discretion. But, sir, the report speaks the opinion this able committee then entertained of the principles by which the Executive and ourselves should be governed in settling the accounts of Governor Tompkins, and furnishes me evidence, which the committee will certainly deem creditable, that the allowance of interest on the commission, (which is now so eagerly pressed by them,) was not then considered by them as embraced within any recognised principle. This House, in adopting this report, made its assumptions and principles its own.

The President again had this account under consideration, and, in his Message, of the 28th of April, communicated to you the result. He states that, under the first head of allowance, he had allowed Governor Tompkins $14,438 68, on the "declarations of Mr. Tompkins" that the remittances made to him after his advances, and previous to the 24th of December, 1814, when a very large sum was remitted to him, was applied to public purposes, and not to reimburse his advances; that, under the second head, he allowed him $92,213 13, or five per cent. on the whole sum disbursed by him, "an extra allowance, in consideration of the aid which he afforded to the Government at that important epoch, in obtaining the loan of a considerable part of the sum thus disbursed." Under the third head, he allowed $4,414 25, being the "amount of the loss sustained." Under the fourth head, "no loss being shown, no allowance whatever has been made." These sums amount to $111,063 06, and leaves, after deducting the payments and sums charged to his account, due to Governor Tompkins a balance of $60,239 46, the sum the proposition under consideration provides to pay. The President tells you also, sir, that, upon this settlement, a question arises as to interest on the commission, and that, inasmuch as if the claims had been settled upon the principles of the law of the last session, the commission would have been paid him, that "consideration operates with great force in favor of the allowance," which he recommends to Congress, to whom he considers the question exclusively to belong.

I do not understand this as recommending the payment of interest, but as presenting to our consideration the reasons which suggested themselves to him for an allowance not embraced within any general principle, or the provisions of the law of the last session. The law of the last session authorized the settlement of these accounts upon principles of justice and equity; and if justice and equity require of us to pay the $55,000 interest upon this commission, which the President considers an extra allowance, it was embraced within the express authority given in the act. Sir, I mean no disrespect to the Executive, nor would I treat his recommendations lightly; but my public duty is a paramount consideration, and in my character of a guardian of the public Treasury, I cannot consent to appropriate the people's money without my own mind is satisfied that justice requires it. If the President had decided that the interest should be paid, I should have felt bound, because by law the matter was referred to his decision. The allowance is not made by the President, and was not heretofore considered by the Committee of Ways and Means as proper, but seems to be an after-thought of the committee, influenced by feelings of gratitude, and to be pressed rather as a matter of experiment than conviction. I feel myself warranted in saying this, sir, by the course pursued by the committee. If the allowance rests upon principles of justice and equity

H. of R.

Accounts of Daniel D. Tompkins.

why not present it to us and urge it upon that ground alone? If dependent upon these principles, the whole sum is due, and the committee should insist upon every dollar of it; yet we are one moment urged to give $115,000, which is several hundred dollars short of the interest computed upon their own principles, and the next moment besought to give $100,000, predicated upon the unofficial certificate of the New York jury, which is some $14,000 less than the interest would swell this balance to. These several sums are all pressed upon you, as resting upon the same principles of justice and equity! Sir, those principles are unchangeable, and gentlemen cannot vary them to answer their varying purposes. When gentlemen seek to change the settled rules of conduct, they should at least endeavor to observe the rules of consistency in the reasons they offer to effect their end.

It is urged, sir, that this is an extraordinary case, and not subject to the common rule. That the services rendered were of the highest character, and most eminently beneficial; and the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) urges us to make a distinction between the rule applicable to the settlement of a blacksmith's account, and the rule applicable to the great and beneficial services of this distinguished citizen! I must be permitted to look at this claim, when presented, as a matter of account, at least; in the same way I would look upon the demand of the humblest individual in community, and to settle it by the same rule. The doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina is not founded in any principle known in this Government, and I, for one, sir, will protest, as long as I can raise my voice, against applying one rule of justice in the adjustment of the claims of the rich and powerful, and another more contracted, to those of the poor mechanic or laborer, who perform your service.

Again, it is urged that Governor Tompkins has claims upon the gratitude of this nation, which should induce a departure from the established rule, to allow this interest. If your grateful feelings induce you to give, and you will say in your bill, they are the moving cause of your apprehension, the claim would be better than it now is; yet I should be compelled to oppose it. The gratitude of this nation never has been, and, I trust, never will be, measured by dollars and cents, or satisfied by appropriations of money. The fine feeling of patriotism, which all are proud to cherish, should not be dedened by the admission of such a principle. I do not intend to examine the merits of the allowances made by the President, but when gentlemen charge the American people with ingratitude; when they attribute to the advocates of this proposition motives adverse to the principles of justice, I must claim your indulgence a short time, while I notice them. Your public officers are paid by salaries, per diem allowances, or perquisites, and it is no uncommon thing to incur the responsibility of disbursing large sums of money; but it is believed this is the only instance where it has been claimed that a salary officer, disbursing money in his official station, was entitled to a broker's commission upon disbursements. I know many gentlemen in the West, who served during the last war, and rendered valuable aid to the Government, who were called upon to disburse large sums of money, (and one, who is now near me, not only disbursed large sums of money, but frequently exerted his own credit to procure funds to sustain his command,) and yet, I believe, no one of them ever thought of making a charge of commission upon the sums disbursed. The case of Stetson, of Boston, employed in the supply department, has been alluded to by the gentleman from North Carolina, as a strong case, and has but a few days ago been under your consideration. He was merely a disbursing officer, and under no obligation, except that of the patriot, to expend a dollar beyond the funds in his hands. His case, among the documents on your table, shows an expenditure by him of about $750,000, much of which he had advanced of his own funds, and procured loans from individuals and banks for much more. He saved you a large amount of money by his unremitting industry, besides keeping your Army from great suffering and distress. The law under which he acted allowed him a commission of 2½ per cent. provided it did not exceed $2,000 a year. He kept an exact account of interest. He presented his account to you, and after pressing it upon you by every consideration, you rejected his claim as interest, and compromised, by allowing him, and it was all he could extort from you, a sum not quite equal to the $2,000 a year, and far short of 2½ per cent. upon the moneys he disbursed. What distinguishes that claim from this? Cases of this kind are numerous. Your tables are loaded with them; but your rules as to them are inflexible.

These are the ordinary cases of persons going beyond the requirements of their duty, to serve the country, although the exertions used, and the responsibilities incurred, are of an extraordinary and meritorious kind. If you begin to make exceptions, where will you stop? This Government, sir, has not been ungrateful or illiberal to this meritorious officer. On the contrary, the facts of the case show an extraordinary liberality. It is said the services of Governor Tompkins continued for a period of eighteen months. If you compute his salary as Governor, his pay and emoluments as Major General, the allowance by the Legislature of New York, and the allowance by the President, exclusive of interest, he will get about $230,000, or near $13,000 a month. There are no three officers of the Government, including the President, that has been allowed as much. Yet we are told the people are ungrateful, and that we are persecuting this individual. The President considers the allowance he made as an "extra" one. The committee propose to go further than we have gone before in any case, and because we cannot see our way clear, we are charged with opposition to this officer, and of lending our aid to persecute him. You have seen, sir, the imputation is wholly groundless. I regret that I felt called upon to make these observations, but the course taken in opposition seemed to require it. Before I quit the subject, allow me to add, that not only the President's Message, but the report of the Committee of Ways and Means themselves, and notorious facts, warrant the assumption that the loans were negotiated by Governor Tompkins, as the agent of the Government, upon the credit and on account of the Government; and, if it had not been for an ultimate dependence upon, and confidence in, the Government, no loans would have been effected; whatever reason there may have been for securing the ostensible responsibility of Governor Tompkins, the credit must have been mainly given to the Government, and obtained under an agreement between the Government and Governor Tompkins.

The proposition, sir, is an important one, and, in order to give every gentleman an opportunity to record his vote on the question, I call for the yeas and noes.

When Mr. WRIGHT had concluded—

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and stood—yeas 83, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Massachusetts, Baylies, Bartlett, Bartley, Beecher, Blair, Buck, Buckner, Burleigh, Cady, Campbell of Ohio, Cocke, Cook, Crafts, Culpepper, Cushman, Dwight, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Ellis, Forward, Harris, Harvey, Henry, Herrick, Hobart, Hooks, Houston, Ingham, Isaacs, Jennings, Johnson of Virginia, J. NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, P. P. Barbour, J. S. Barbour, Breck, Brent, Brown, Burton, Cambreleng, Campbell of South Carolina, Carter, Cary, Cassidy, Cobb, Collins, Conner, Crowninshield, Cathbert, Day, Dwinell, Eaton, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Foot of Connecticut, Foote of New York, Frost, Garrison, Gatlin, Gist, Govan, Gurley, Hall, Hamilton, Herkimer, Hogeboom, Holcombe, Kent, Kidder, Lawrence, Litchfield, Livermore, Livingston, McDuffie, McKim, McLane of Delaware, Mangum, Markley, Marvin, Mitchell of Maryland, Moore of Alabama, Newton, Owen, Poinsett, Richards, Rose, Saunders, Scott, Sharpe, Alexander Smyth, Spaight, A. Stevenson, J. Stephenson, Stoddart, Taliaferro, Tattnell, Taylor, Ten Eyck, Thompson of Georgia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyson, Udree, Vance of Ohio, Van Wyck, Wayne, Whipple, Williams of New York, Henry Wilson, and Woods.

So the amendment of Mr. WICKLIFFE, which appropriates $80,239 24, was adopted.

The bill was then reported, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 22.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that no license shall be granted to any boat or vessel hereafter built or fitted up, and moved or propelled by fire or steam, upon the principle of construction commonly called "high pressure," made a report, accompanied by a bill for the regulating of steamboats, and for the security of passengers therein; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the same committee, who were instructed to inquire whether any law exists in contravention of the provisions of the Convention of the 3d of July, 1815, between the United States and Great Britain; and, also, to inquire into the expediency of countervailing, by law, any duties or port charges on American commerce and tonnage, which Great Britain may lay thereon, in her colonies or elsewhere, made a report thereon; which was read, and laid upon the table.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations to carry into effect certain treaties; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1824. (Indian expenses.)

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which the subject was referred, made a report relative to a purchase of additional ground in the vicinity of Fort Washington, to be added to the site of said fort; which report was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. HERRICK, the House took up the bill "to erect Bowdoinham, in Maine; Troy, in New York; and Fairport, in Ohio, into ports of delivery.

Mr. STRONG moved to insert the city of Hudson; which was agreed to, and the bill was then reported and ordered to a third reading.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers," were agreed to by the House.

A bill "to establish an additional land office in the State of Missouri," was ordered to a third reading this day, which it subsequently received, was passed, and sent to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the House went again into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1824," (Indian department); and the question recurring on an additional item for compensating the commissioners to ascertain a suitable site for a national armory on the Western waters, Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to amend the amendment, by a proviso limiting the completion of the survey to one year from the present time. This amendment was opposed by Mr. CLAY. Mr. McLANE made some statements of the facts of this survey; and Mr. WILLIAMS replied to Mr. CLAY in explanation, and withdrew his motion.

MAY, 1824.

The bill was then further amended by a proviso to extinguish the title of the Creek Indians to lands within the limits of Georgia.

The same Committee then took up the bill "making appropriation to carry into effect certain Indian treaties," and also the bill "making appropriation for the Library of Congress;" which having been amended, the three above bills were reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading to-day.

On motion of Mr. BRENT, the House took up the bill "to authorize the legal representatives of the Marquis de Maison Rouge, and those claiming under him, to institute a suit against the United States to try the validity of their titles;" which was amended, by extending the time allowed for this suit, and adding a proviso saving bona fide claims which have been confirmed.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading this day.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill "authorizing the employment of additional clerks, messengers, assistants, and other persons, in the several departments of the Government."

Mr. COOKE moved to strike out that part of the bill which provides a clerk for the Surgeon General, and supported the motion by a speech, and the reading of the rules of the Medical department. The motion was opposed by Mr. INGHAM, and rejected by a large majority. Several amendments were made, providing for extra clerk hire, &c.

The same Committee also took up the bill relative to the Patent Office, and to the salary of the Superintendent thereof.

On this bill considerable discussion took place between Messrs. INGHAM, McLANE, LIVERMORE, ROSS, and WARFIELD; and, on motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, the enacting clause was stricken out. The Committee then rose, the amendments were concurred in by the House, and the former bill was ordered to a third reading this day.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with their resolution of the 14th of April last, respecting Prize Agents, which report contains the information requested.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 22, 1824.

The above communication was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SHARPE in the Chair,) on the bill to allow a salary to the collector of the port of entry for the district of Pensacola, and to abolish the office of surveyor; which was amended by allowing a salary to the collector of Nantucket; and being reported to the House, was ordered to a third reading to-day.

The bills "granting land to the parishes of Point Coupee and of West Baton Rouge on certain conditions," (viz: making a levee,) were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1824," was read the third time, and passed. The title was amended by adding "and for other purposes."

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act authorizing an appropriation for the use of the Library of Congress," was read the third time, and passed. The title was amended by adding thereto these words: "and for furnishing rooms in the Capitol."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House, entitled An act for the relief of George Fisher, with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed bills, and a resolution, of the following titles, viz: An act for the relief of Joseph Forrest; An act in further addition to "An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization," and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject; An act to amend an act, supplemental to an act, entitled "An act to carry into effect the ninth article of the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain, the 22d of February, 1819," approved the 3d of March, 1823; An act to extinguish the Indian claims to lands within the State of Missouri; Resolution authorizing the Secretary of State to furnish a copy of Tanner's American Atlas to each of the Ministers Plenipotentiary and Chargés des Affaires of the United States at foreign Governments; in which the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

An act to authorize the legal representatives of the Marquis de Maison Rouge, and those claiming under him, to institute a suit against the United States, and for other purposes;

An act making appropriations to carry into effect certain Indian treaties;

An act concerning pre-emption rights in the Territory of Arkansas;

An act granting a tract of land to the inhabitants of Point Coupee, on certain conditions;

An act reserving to the Wyandot tribe of Indians a certain tract of land in lieu of a reservation made to them by treaty;

An act to allow a salary to the collectors of the Districts of Nantucket and Pensacola, and to abolish the office of Surveyor of the District of Pensacola; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Alexander McNair," was read the third time, and passed, as amended.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the President to hold treaties with certain Indian tribes, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed, as amended.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Fisher," were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, viz:

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate. And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, May 24.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend an act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act to carry into effect the ninth article of a treaty concluded between the United States and Spain the 22d day of February, 1819,' approved the 3d of March, 1823," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be laid upon the table.

The Committee on the Public Lands were discharged from the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Fisher," and the said amendments were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the punishment of certain crimes, when committed in any navy yard, fort, arsenal, magazine, dock-yard, lighthouse, or other place belonging to the United States," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the further consideration of the Message from the President of the United States, of the 18th instant, communicating a report of Alexander Hamilton, respecting land claims in Florida, and the same was again referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, the Doorkeeper was authorized to continue one of the messengers in his service during the recess of Congress, to be employed in cleaning and preserving the furniture, and in cleaning and airing the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG laid the following resolution, on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to ascertain and report to Congress, at its next session, the rate of interest at which the Bank of the United States will continue the United States' loan of seven millions.

On motion of Mr. GURLEY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. INGHAM in the Chair,) on the bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse districts; which was amended; and, having been reported, was ordered to a third reading.

The resolution offered a few days since, by Mr. TRIMBLE, in relation to importations by natives and aliens, was taken up, and agreed to.

A bill from the Senate "for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt," was read a third time. Mr. COCKS moved to lay the bill on the table. The motion did not carry. Its passage was then advocated by Messrs. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, KENT, WHITTLESEY, SHARPE, NEALE, A. SMYTH, and WARFIELD, and opposed by Messrs. COCKE, WHIPPLE, and McCOY; when it was passed, and sent to the Senate.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange a stock, bearing an interest of four and a half per cent., for certain stocks bearing an interest of six per cent;

An act establishing Bowdoinham, in the State of Maine, Troy and Hudson in the State of New York, and Fairport, in the State of Ohio, ports of delivery;

An act granting a tract of land to the parish of West Baton Rouge, on certain conditions;

An act authorizing the employment of additional clerks, and certain messengers and assistants, and other persons, in the several Departments; were severally read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act to amend an act for the establishment of a Territorial government in Florida,' and for other purposes," with an amendment; in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: An act to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes; An act for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris; An act to complete the survey of the southern and western boundary of the State of Missouri; An act for the relief of the legal representative of Thomas Robinson, deceased; and An act explanatory of an act, entitled "An act to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of public lands," approved on the 18th day of May, 1824; in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. A. STEVENSON, the bill for the relief of Joseph M. White and William Davidson; and,

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the bill regulating the mode of practice in the Circuit Court for the District of Louisiana—were ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LEE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. STERLING in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of certain distillers in the United States." The bill was slightly amended, and, having been reported, was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House took up the bill "to abolish the office of measurer."

This bill was opposed by Messrs. WOOD, SHARPE, and CAMBRELENG, and advocated by Messrs. NEWTON and TOMLINSON.

An amendment was offered by Mr. WEBSTER, excepting from the operation of the bill the port of Boston, which was successively modified by adding to the exception the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Salem, Charleston, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion prevailed—ayes 61, noes 50.

Engrossed bills, of the following titles, viz:

An act for the relief of certain distillers in the United States;

An act for the relief of Joseph M. White and William Davidson; were, severally, read a third time, and passed.

The bill "to regulate the practice of the circuit court of the United States, in the district of Louisiana," being read a third time, Mr. COBB expressed a wish for further information before he was called upon to vote on its passage. Messrs. LIVINGSTON, BRENT, and WEBSTER, went into an exposition of the principles of the bill, and explained the circumstances of that part of the United States, in respect to the legal practice which had prevailed there, and the oppressive operation which an introduction of the practice under the common law would have, an evil to be strongly deprecated.

Mr. ROSS spoke in opposition to the bill, as introducing the principles of the civil law, and leading to a fruitful harvest of litigation, especially among those settlers in Louisiana who had been educated in other States.

The bill was then passed, and sent to the Senate.

The Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill concerning wrecks on the coast of Florida, were discharged from the consideration thereof. The said bill was then amended, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, viz:

1st. An act to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes;

2d. An act for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris;

3d. An act to complete the survey of the southern and western boundary of the State of Missouri;

4th. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas Robinson, deceased;

5th. An act explanatory of an act, entitled "An act to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of the public lands," approved on the 18th of May, 1824; were, severally, read the first and second times, and referred: the

1st, to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. CONWAY, BRENT, LETCHER, SCOTT, and HORTON; the

2d, to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the 3d, to the Committee on the Public Lands; the 4th, to the Committee on the Judiciary; the 5th, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act to amend an act for the establishment of a territorial government in Florida, and for other purposes,'" were read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the bill reserving to the Wyandot tribe of Indians a certain tract of land in lieu of a reservation made to them by treaty, was considered, and ordered to a third reading.

French Spoliations.

H. OF R.

On motion of Mr. CONWAY, the bill "concerning pre-emption rights in the Territory of Arkansas," was taken up, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. COOKE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BRENT in the Chair,) on the bill from the Senate "making appropriation to enable the President of the United States to hold treaties with certain Indian tribes; and, being reported without amendment, was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BURTON in the Chair,) on the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt," and "for the relief of Alexander McNair, of Missouri."

The reports of the Committee of Claims were read, when the bills were reported, and ordered to a third reading.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which have been referred during the present session sundry petitions and memorials from insurance companies, and from merchants, and other citizens of the United States, upon the subject of spoliations committed on their commerce, on the high seas as well as in certain ports, under the orders or decrees of the Government of France, subsequent to the year 1806, made a report thereon, which was laid upon the table. The report is as follows:

The Committee of Foreign Relations on the several petitions of Archibald Gracie, Ezra Davis, Matthew, Thomas S., and Levinus Clarkson, William Gray, and others, of the Merchants' and Insurance Companies of Philadelphia, of the merchants and underwriters of Baltimore, referred to them by the House, report: That the petitioners ask the intervention of Congress for the recovery of their just claims against France, for spoliations committed, and property seized or destroyed, under different pretexts, since the year 1806. These claims are alluded to by the President, in his Message, at the opening of the present session of Congress, as resting upon the same principle with other claims which have been admitted by the French Government, and are the subject of the correspondence of the Minister of the United States with the French Government, communicated to the House of Representatives on the 5th of February last. To this correspondence the attention of the House is invited, for a full and fair understanding of the claims of the present petitioners, and of the other citizens of the United States, having similar demands against France, but who have not joined in this application for redress.

The committee have seen, with surprise, that, although the attention of the present Government of France was especially invited to this subject in 1816, and has been repeatedly recalled to it, since that time, that France has not yet thought proper to enter upon the discussion of it. No other answers have yet been given to various official communications of the Minister of the United States, than those required by the mere obligations of international courtesy.

The committee are of opinion that measures ought to be taken to impress upon France the necessity of an early and definite adjustment of this subject; and they would offer such measures to the consideration of the House, if the hope was not entertained that the Government of France would be found, during the ensuing Summer, prepared to investigate it.

The committee are confident that a fair examination, entered into with a disposition to do full justice, will be followed by an arrangement satisfactory to all parties.

The claims of our citizens may be divided into four classes:

1. For property sequestered.
2. For property condemned, regularly, under the Berlin and Milan decrees.
3. For property irregularly condemned under the same decrees, including that condemned by imperial mandate, without the intervention of any judicial tribunal.
4. For property burnt or destroyed at sea; a portion of it after the decrees authorizing such destruction had been repealed.

The first class includes, in addition to other property not acted upon by the judicial tribunals, the seizures at Antwerp in 1807, at St. Sebastian in 1809-10, in Holland in 1810, under a secret article of the treaty incorporating Holland with France. The right of the claimants to an immediate and full indemnity for all property sequestered and never condemned, cannot be plausibly contested. It was put under sequestration by an imperial decree, on suspicion that it was English property, merely to give time to ascertain whether it was English or not. That it was not English, is now well known to the Government of France. Had it been English, it must have been given up or paid for, under the fourth article of the additional articles of the treaty of the 30th May, 1814, between that Power and Great Britain. By that article, the parties stipulate to release all property put under sequestration since 1792. If the property of our citizens seized at Antwerp, St. Sebastian, and in Holland, had been what it was, without the shadow of reason, alleged to be, payment would be due for it to English owners. A singular spectacle will be exhibited, if payment is denied when the motive for the seizure is shown to have been false, or should any doctrine of France place the property of a neutral in a worse situation than if it had belonged, as was suspected, to an enemy. Such doctrine cannot be advanced by France, unless she intends to instruct other Powers, that, in all future wars in which she may be engaged with a formidable rival, it will be more prudent to be her enemy than her friend. Nor can the committee anticipate any grounds upon which a decision unfavorable to the other claims embraced in the other three enumerated classes, can be justly made, resting as they obviously do upon the immutable bases of justice and national law.

A due regard to those relations of amity that have ever united this Government with France, to the stipulations of her treaty with us, to her character for liberal justice to foreign claimants, will doubtless induce the Government of that country to adjust those claims whenever they are fairly considered.

Under the hope and expectation that attention will be given to this interesting subject by France, prior to the next session of Congress, the committee, without asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the several petitions referred to them, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House, at the next session, as early as the public interest will permit, the correspondence which may be held with the Government of France, prior to that time, on the subject of injuries sustained by citizens of the United States since the year 1806.

TRADE WITH MEXICAN PROVINCES.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, viz :

FIRST.

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 13th instant, requesting the President to communicate any information he may possess, in relation to the intercourse and trade now carried on between the people of the United States (and, particularly, the people of the State of Missouri) and the Mexican provinces; how and by what route that trade or intercourse is carried on; in what it consists, the distances, &c.; the nations of Indians through which it passes; their dispositions, whether pacific or otherwise; the advantages resulting, or likely to result from that trade or intercourse; I herewith transmit a communication from the Department of State, which contains all the information which has yet been collected in relation to those subjects.

JAMES MONROE.

MAY 24, 1824.

The said Message was read, and laid upon the table. The communication is as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, April 27, 1824.

SIR: Permit me, through you, to communicate to his Excellency the President of the United States, the following ideas; from which, if circumstances would allow of their going into operation, much good might, perhaps, result to the young and enterprising of the West, as well as to the nation generally. I mean the interposition of the General Government for the protection of an intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of the northern and eastern parts of Mexico. This intercourse has been, on a small scale, attempted by a few brave and enterprising men from the State of Missouri, but with much risk of lives and property. The latter, they have frequently been robbed of by the Indians. These evils can only be prevented by means of a negotiation, to be opened by the General Government, with the Indians, through which the route would pass, from a favorable point on the Missouri river to Santa Fe. The Indians should be made responsible for depredations committed on citizens of the United States, as on citizens of the Republic of Mexico visiting the United States.

The benefits which would result from a safe intercourse between the United States and those parts of Mexico, it might be considered presumption in me to comment on. Its many important advantages will be obvious to the judgment of those much more capable of doing justice to the subject than myself. I will therefore submit it with the following few remarks:

1st. A safe intercourse between the citizens of this Government and the northern and eastern parts of the Mexican dominions, will awaken the inhabitants of the latter to the blessings of a republican system of Government; blessings which the American people wish all nations to enjoy, and the value of which will be more deeply impressed on the minds of strangers by an experimental knowledge of our enjoyments.

2dly. Many advantages will flow from the commerce to which the establishment of a safe intercourse will naturally lead; and many of the productions and manufactures of our country will be exchanged for silver, mules, horses, and other articles, in demand with us.

3dly. The establishment and protection of safe intercourse would not only essentially benefit the people of the two Governments, but would be attended with a beneficial result as it relates to the Indian nations, through which the communication would pass, and those bordering on them. Some of these nations yet know little of the American character. The most effectual mode of maintaining friendship with the Indians, is to impress them with a deep sense of your superiority. This, when judiciously attended to, does not require a great expense; and the saving of much blood will unquestionably result from a timely interposition on the part of the Government.

4thly. A portion of the Western people have been in the habit of hunting and trapping for a living; should the privilege be denied them of following their pursuits in the Indian country, they will seek other employments. All cannot be engaged in the Indian trade, and some will extend their enterprises into the Mexican dominions. These, if not protected by Government, they will hazard at their own risk; difficulties with the Indians will inevitably follow; and a train of mischievous consequences can alone be prevented by laying of the foundation, on the part of the General Government, of a proper understanding with them.

5thly. The city of Mexico is situated at so great a distance from the northern and eastern limits of the Republic, that a safe and harmonious intercourse cannot be opened and maintained without the establishment of an agency at Santa Fe, in strict subordination to the Government at Washington, and the American Minister at Mexico.

Such an agent would have much in his power towards producing and maintaining the proper friendly understanding between the American people and the citizens of Mexico, as well as with the numerous Indian nations. This agent would be extremely useful to the Government, in keeping a constant communication of the state of affairs in that section of the country with the Government at home, as well as with the American Minister at the city of Mexico. Such an agent ought to have the charge, in a certain degree, of the Indians bordering on the Mexican Republic.

6thly. The route in contemplation would pass through a healthy country, and would be attended with many facilities, too numerous at present to detail. Those who would not have the means of visiting Mexico in a more expensive mode, could pursue this route, with little comparative cost.

The establishment, the encouragement, and the protection of this intercourse will be, I have no doubt, cheerfully met on the part of the Mexican Government; and, with the means thus afforded them, the day will rapidly approach when the people of that country will become genuine, orderly, and patriotic republicans.

Respectfully, I have the honor to be, &c.

A. McNAIR.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec'y of State.

In compliance with a resolution of the 20th instant, I transmit, herewith, to the House of Representatives, a report of David Shriver, Superintendent of the Comberland Road, stating the manner in which the appropriation made at the last session for the repair of that road has been expended, and also the present condition of the road.

Five Millions New Stock.

JAMES MONROE.

MAY 24, 1824.

The Message was read, and laid upon the table.

FIVE MILLIONS NEW STOCK.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the bill "to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange a stock bearing an interest of five per cent. for certain stock bearing an interest of six per cent."

Mr. McLANE moved to amend the first section of the bill by inserting the following:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, empowered to borrow, on or before the 1st day of April next, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars, at a rate of interest payable quarter yearly, not exceeding four and a half per centum per annum, and reimbursable at the pleasure of the Government, at any time after the 31st day of December, 1831, to be applied, in addition to the moneys which may be in the Treasury at the time of borrowing the same—to pay off and discharge such parts of the six per cent. stock of the United States of the year 1812, as may be redeemable after the 1st day of January next.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Bank of the United States to lend the said sum, or any part thereof: and it is hereby further declared, that it shall be deemed a good execution of the said power to borrow, for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to cause to be constituted certificates of the stock signed by the Register of the Treasury, or by the Commissioner of Loans for the whole or for any part thereof, bearing an interest not exceeding four and a half per centum per annum, transferrable and redeemable as aforesaid, and to cause the said certificates of stock to be sold: Provided, That no stock be sold under par.

Mr. McLANE prefaced this motion by a statement, in explanation, of considerable length.

This amendment was agreed to, and the other parts of the bill were correspondingly altered; when the bill and amendments were reported to the House.

Mr. F. JOHNSON opposed the passage of this bill, not believing it necessary to borrow at present; as there was a considerable balance in the Treasury, and by an estimate of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) the operation of the tariff will increase it three millions. He went into a calculation to show the balance of revenue would increase every year; and that this country would lose, instead of gaining by postponing the debt at a reduced rate of interest—and he moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the 1st day of April next, (which amounts to an indefinite postponement.)

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, had not intended to rise on this question, but deemed it necessary to reply to the gentleman from Kentucky,

(Mr. F. JOHNSON,) who had referred to his revenue estimates, and to the fate of a former stock exchange bill. That gentleman had very much misunderstood him. He had never been so absurd as to circulate that a tariff, which would go into operation on the 30th of June and 1st of January next, levying additional duties, payable at distant periods in 1825, could contribute directly to the revenue of 1824, whatever might be the effect of anticipated importations. Considering that bill as it actually passed, as a revenue measure—and an unnecessary one, too—he had presumed that, when in operation, it would augment the annual receipts. We are not now making any distant calculations—the period is near at hand. The first proposition in the bill, is to convert that portion of the six per cent. payable on the 1st January next, which we may not have the means to redeem, into a stock bearing an interest of four and a half per cent. or less. It is presumed that, after redeeming $8,600,000, in seven per cents, authorized during the present year, and estimating the revenue of 1824 above the Treasury estimate, which can now be safely done, there will be, on the 1st of January next, including the usual amount of the unexpended appropriations, about five millions applicable to the redemption of the debt due on that day. The object of the bill is to enable the Government to reduce the interest on the amount unredeemed. The second proposition is, to renew, at a diminished rate of interest, that portion of the sixes falling due on the 1st of January, 1826, which we shall not be able to redeem. With regard to the period of the final redemption of the public debt, Mr. C.'s calculation corresponded, in its result, with that of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE.) Assuming a revenue of twenty millions—less than the actual revenue for two years past—and a permanent expenditure of ten millions—more than the annual expenditure during the same term—ten millions, at least, would remain annually applicable to the payment of the interest and the redemption of the public debt. With such a revenue, and such an expenditure, without estimating the increase of revenue under the new tariff, the public debt would be extinguished in 1835. Such calculations are, however, always to be considered as hypothetical, being founded on an anticipation of continued peace.

The gentleman from Kentucky is mistaken in supposing that the stock which we had proposed to exchange in 1822, is the identical stock we are now about to pay off. From 1825 to '28, sixty-five millions become payable—that bill contemplated exchanging only a part, leaving about thirty millions to be redeemed with the revenue anticipated. With regard to the failure of that negotiation, it was owing entirely to our delay in adopting the measure. Before proposals could be issued a reaction had occurred in the money market, which rendered the negotiation impracticable, except for a small amount. In that case, too, it was at the option of the creditor to accede or not to our proposals; the stock was not then redeemable. The bill before us contemplates a negotiation at and near the period of redemption, and of a different character. From the fate of that measure, however, we may draw an argument against postponing the bill under consideration. The rate of interest is low—much below our former anticipations; a second reaction may happen, and in that event Government will be compelled to negotiate a loan on less favorable terms, or continue to pay six per cent.

If we are to found our calculations on the rate of interest in England, there would not now appear to be the same danger of reaction. The moneyed and stock operations of that great banking house of nations, seem to regulate the affairs of the commercial world; and they have undoubtedly an influence on interest even in this country. Nevertheless, the period is favorable for reducing the rate of interest on our unredeemed stocks; there is no probability of our gaining anything by delay, and we may lose—he hoped we should adopt the measure in season.

Mr. McLANE again rose, and further extended the explanation he had before given. He submitted a calculation to the Committee.

Mr. F. JOHNSON spoke in reply, and insisted that the view presented by the gentleman from Delaware was fallacious. He went into an extensive argument in support of the ground he had taken, and referred to various statements and calculations to show, that the Treasury did not need the proposed loan in order to pay off the public debt, and that the nation would be a loser by the pretended saving in the rate of interest.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, in reply, advocated the plan proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, and reduced the calculations to a simple form, which he presented in a few words, and appealed to the common sense of the House, whether it was not better to pay  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. interest, on an unpaid debt, than 6 per cent.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rejoined in a few remarks, and was followed by Mr. McDUFFIE, who defended the policy of the plan provided for in the bill.

The question on postponing the further consideration was then put, and decided in the negative—ayes 36, noes 102.

The bill and amendments were then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REGULATION OF STEAM VESSELS.

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "for the regulation of steamboats, and for the security of passengers therein."

On this bill a discussion arose, in which Mr. TOMLINSON advocated its passage, Mr. DWIGHT proposed an amendment, and Mr. WICKLIFFE urged its postponement till the next session. [The bill proposes to lessen the danger of high pressure steam engines by adding to that safety-valve which is in the control of the engineer, another, to be in the exclusive possession of the captain of the boat, and which shall be loaded with no more than a prescribed weight, viz: one-third of the pressure by which the boiler has been proved, or one-sixth of that which it is capable of sustaining.] Mr. INGHAM objected to restricting low pressure engines to a pressure of seven pounds to a square inch, adverted to the vast amount of property now invested in high pressure engines, and hoped that, with the exception of so much as provides that notice be given to passengers whether the engine of any steamboat is of the high or of the low pressure construction, the bill would be postponed till next session.

Mr. POINSETT replied, and explained the facts in relation to low pressure engines, and insisted that no injury could result to the holders of high pressure engines in consequence of this law.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought the House was not prepared in its present state of information to legislate on a subject so extensive and important in its effects—and went into a series of remarks in support of this position.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to strike out all of the bill excepting the fourth section.

Mr. POINSETT explained the facility of adding a safety-valve.

Mr. DWIGHT observed, that, from the words of the bill, it could have no effect till the next day of issuing licenses, which will not occur till April next, and in the mean while Congress would hold another session—he moved that the Committee rise; but, again withdrawing the motion, the discussion was farther prosecuted by Messrs. LIVINGSTON and DWIGHT. The Committee then rose and reported the bill, and on the question of leave to sit again,

Mr. LIVINGSTON insisted on the views he had before expressed, and earnestly advocated the passage of the bill. Leave was refused to the Committee to sit again.

When it was agreed to have a recess till five o'clock.

FIVE O'CLOCK, P. M.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a joint "resolution providing a place of deposit for the Portrait of Columbus, and directing the distribution of certain copies of the Declaration of Independence, now in the Department of State," in which they ask the concurrence of the House.

The resolution was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. CONWAY, from the select committee to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. BRENT, the House took up the bill "supplementary to an act providing for the examination of titles to land in that part of the State of Louisiana situated between the Rio Hondo and the Sabine river."

The blank was filled with two hundred dollars, and then the bill was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the execution of the resolution of this House, directing the disposition and removal of the building south of the Capitol, now used for committee rooms, was suspended until after the next session of Congress.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

An act concerning wrecks on the coast of Florida; An act supplementary to "An act providing for the examination of titles to land in that part of the State of Louisiana situated between the Rio Hondo and the Sabine river;" were severally read the third time, and passed.

On the bill concerning wrecks on the coast of Florida, some debate arose. It was contended, in defence of the bill, that when American property, wrecked on that coast, was saved by the Providence wreckers, not only a high salvage was paid to foreigners, but the goods, being taken into Providence, paid high duties to the British Government, and the result usually was, that nearly the whole of the property was lost.

On the other hand, it was insisted that this consideration was as nothing in comparison to affording to vessels and crews in distress the aid now derived from those wreckers.

It was rejoined that, if the British wreckers were driven off by the operation of the act, their places would immediately be filled with our own citizens, all the foreign duties would be saved, and some chance enjoyed of getting the property saved.

The bill was passed by a large majority.

A bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts," was read a third time, and passed.

The further consideration of the bill "to regulate steamboats, and provide for the safety of passengers therein," was postponed till the first Monday of November next—yes 67, noes 47.

The following bills were ordered to a third reading:

A bill authorizing repayment for land erroneously sold by the United States; and a bill to authorize the Legislature of the State of Ohio to sell and convey certain tracts of land granted to said State for the use of the people thereof.

The engrossed bill granting to the corporation of Tuscaloosa certain lots and privileges over the reservations and commons in said town, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

TUESDAY, May 25.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Fisher," reported their agreement thereto.—The amendments were read at the Clerk's table, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in further addition to 'An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject,'" reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARVEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing an examination and survey of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina, of St. Mary's, in Georgia, and of the coast of Florida, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris," made a report thereon, recommending an amendment to said bill; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act explanatory of an act confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile," reported the same without amendment; it was then, on motion, postponed indefinitely.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extinguish Indian claims to lands within the State of Missouri," reported the same with amendments; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to complete the survey of the southern and western boundary of the State of Missouri," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act explanatory of an act, entitled 'An act to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of public lands,'" approved on the 13th day of May, 1824," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. COOK then moved to amend the said bill by adding an additional section thereto; when the bill was ordered to be laid upon the table.

Mr. COCKE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were instructed by resolution, adopted on the 26th of March last, to make certain inquiries, therein specified, in relation to the late system of trade with the Indian tribes, made a report; which was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, it was Resolved, That there be allowed to the Postmaster of this House, for his prompt and faithful services as such, an extra compensation of one hundred dollars, in addition to what was allowed him at the end of the last session of Congress, making an extra allowance of three hundred dollars, to be paid by the Clerk, out of the contingent fund.

On motion of Mr. NEALE, the Clerk was directed to procure, and cause to be deposited in his office, fifty copies of the laws, &c., of Congress in relation to the District of Columbia, as compiled by Samuel Burch.

Mr. COCKE wished further time to inquire, before passing this resolution.

Messrs. NEALE and KENT explained the facts, and supported the resolution. A debate of considerable spirit then arose between Messrs. LIVERMORE and WOOD; and Mr. COCKE moved to lay the resolution on the table. Negatived—ayes 51, noes 59.

After further observations from Mr. NEALE, Mr. LIVERMORE moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Library.—Negatived.

Mr. SHARPE advocated the adoption of the resolution, and, having been modified so as to read "fifty copies," it was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HERRICK,

Resolved, That so much of a resolution, passed by this House on the 23d day of December last, as contains the following words, viz: "And the amount of postage which accrued on each route, after deducting the compensation of postmasters and incidental expenses, for one year next preceding the first day of April last," be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

The resolution submitted by Mr. CAMBRELENG, yesterday, was taken up, read, and agreed to by the House.

On motion of Mr. STRONG, the Secretary of State was directed to report, at the next session of Congress, his opinion upon the claim of Pelatiah Fitch, of the State of New York, which was referred to him by order of this House of the 9th day of January, 1822.

Mr. STEWART laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House, at the next session of Congress, the amount of losses sustained during the last eight years upon bonds given for the duties upon imports, distinguishing the amount in each year; and to state whether any, and if any, what measures should be adopted by Congress, to prevent similar losses in future; and also, what effect the total repeal, or a limitation, of the credits now given for said duties would, in his opinion, have upon the revenue.

The joint resolution from the Senate, providing a place of deposit for the portrait of Columbus, and directing the distribution of certain copies of the Declaration of Independence, now in the Department of State, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CONDUCT submitted the following joint resolution, viz:

1. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to institute, with all convenient despatch, an inquiry into the causes of those fatal disasters which have so frequently occurred on board steamboats navigating the waters of the United States, and that he be authorized to call to his aid the knowledge and experience of such engineers and skilful men, as he may deem competent and best qualified to decide.

2. Resolved, That the said Secretary be, and he is hereby, empowered, after such advisement, to prescribe and publish such rules and regulations for constructing the apparatus of vessels propelled by fire or steam, the mode of regulating the power, the materials composing the boilers, with all other regulations, which, from time to time, he may deem necessary and proper, to afford the best security to the lives of passengers and crews.

3. Resolved, That, from and after the — day of —, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold a license from any vessel propelled by fire or steam, until satisfactory proof be made that the owner or commander thereof has, in all respects, conformed to the rules and regulations prescribed for such vessels, and any license granted thereafter shall be considered null and void, on failure of the owner or commander to comply with the terms.

4. Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report his proceedings hereon, at an early period of the next session.

The resolution was read, and the question was put, Will the House now proceed to consider the same? And was determined in the negative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles viz: An act supplementary to an act, approved the 3d March, 1819, entitled "An act providing for the correction of errors, in making entries of land in the land offices;" An act changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, bayou, lake, or water course, in the State of Mississippi and Territory of Arkansas; An act for the relief of John Mitchell; An act to authorize the masters of vessels, in certain cases, to clear out, either at the custom-house of Petersburg, or that of Richmond; An act supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, passed 15th May, 1820, with amendments to each; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Alexander Scott, late collector of Pensacola;" which was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time now. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land claims in the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, derived from the Government of France and Spain;" which was reported without amendment, and laid on the table.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the masters of vessels in certain cases, to clear out, either at the custom-house of Petersburg or that of Richmond, were read and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Mitchell," were read and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, lake, bayou, or water course, in the State of Mississippi and Territory of Arkansas," were read and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, approved the 3d March, 1819, entitled 'An act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land in the land offices," were read and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, passed 15th May, 1820," were read and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel White;" which was reported without amendment, and the bill read a third time and passed.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of persons suffering losses in the Seminole war.

The amendments before under consideration were adopted. The bill was then reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John H. Howland, of New York;" which was reported without amendment, and read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill explanatory of an act, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers, volunteers, and other persons, engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians," passed the 14th May, 1822.

Mr. RICH explained the purposes of the bill, and offered an amendment, extending the provisions of the act to field officers, and to horses slain in battle. The amendment was supported by Mr. MCCOY and Mr. ISAACS, and adopted.

Mr. COBB moved a further amendment, extending the relief proposed by the bill, to wagoners, whose horses were impressed. On this amendment a debate of some extent arose, which was suspended, that the report which follows might be received. The Committee then rose, and had leave to sit again.

REPORT ON THE ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the committee appointed on the 19th of April ultimo, on an address or memorial of Ninian Edwards, preferring certain charges against the Secretary of the Treasury, made a report; which was read. The report is as follows:

The select committee, to which was referred the memorial, or address, of Ninian Edwards, report: That, immediately on their appointment, as the House has already been informed, they communicated a copy of this address to the Secretary of the Treasury; and they also ordered the attendance of Mr. Edwards to be examined before them, as a witness, touching the various charges in the memorial. For, although, in that address, he refers to papers and documents, accessible to the committee without his presence, as the main supports of his charges, yet the committee were of opinion that these charges were not such as should be either lightly made, or superficially examined; and that it ought not to content itself with any investigation short of one in which the accuser should have an opportunity of being personally present, the better to sustain the charges, if they were capable of being sustained, or to bear the proper responsibility, if, failing to sustain them, he should appear to have brought them forward, in a form thus positive and imposing, from personal and improper motives, or upon frivolous pretexts. And the committee is still of opinion that this investigation ought not to be finally closed, without the personal examination of Mr. Edwards; and, in proceeding to make any report on the subject, at the present time, and before such an examination is had, the committee acts only from the necessity imposed upon it, by the approaching close of the session, and by a sense of duty which dictates that it ought not to postpone, to a distant day, all communication to the House on a subject so interesting to the Government, and so nearly affecting the honor and integrity of one of its highest officers.

Under the influence of these motives, the committee makes this report, as the result of its examination of the papers referred to in the address, and such other proofs as the committee could command. Whatever is here said, therefore, must be received with the qualification, that, although the committee do not know that Mr. Edwards, if present, could communicate any fact likely to be important, they do not know, on the other hand, that he might not do so; and he has had no opportunity to be examined, or to give any reply to the answer of the Secretary, which the committee has received, and which has already been printed, by order of the House.

The address contains two general charges against the Secretary; one, of mismanaging the public funds, under which various illegal transactions are alleged, in reference to the deposits of the public moneys in certain banks, and the mode in which such moneys were allowed, afterwards, to be repaid; the other, imputing to the Secretary the suppression of papers and documents, or failing to communicate them, when they ought to have been communicated, in answer to resolutions of the Houses of Congress.

The committee has given its attention to each of these divisions of charge.

And, first, as to the conduct of the Treasury Department, in regard to the deposits of the public moneys in the banks, and the manner in which such banks were allowed to repay to the Treasury the balances of such deposits.

By the resolution of Congress of April 30th, 1816, it is declared "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing, or becoming payable, to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid, on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing, or becoming payable, to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received, otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid, on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States."

At the time of the adoption of this resolution, debts acquiring to the United States, whether on account of the sales of public lands, or at the custom-house, or from other sources of revenue, were, in fact, received, in some parts of the country, but evidently in disregard of the law, in the notes of the State banks which did not redeem their paper by cash payments. By this resolution, it was obviously made the duty of the Treasurer to correct that departure from law, as soon as practicable; and it was, as is equally obvious, imperative on the Department, after the 20th February, 1817, to allow nothing to be received in payment of debts due to the United States, but the legal money of the United States, Treasury notes, notes of the Bank of the United States, or of those State banks the notes of which were payable and paid, on demand, in cash.

The Bank of the United States was incorporated in April, 1816, and went into operation at the commencement of the next year. By the act of incorporation it is provided and declared, "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank and branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which case, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

The present Secretary of the Treasury was appointed to that office in October, 1816.

In the early part of the year 1817, it is represented by the Secretary, and it appears to be true, that an arrangement was made with the Bank of the United States, by which the public funds were to be deposited in the branches of that institution, in all places where such branches existed; and where there were no such branches, that bank was to designate certain State banks for which it would be responsible, and in which such public moneys should be deposited; and notes of all banks which the Bank of the United States would receive in deposits as cash, and none other, were to be received on sales of the public lands.

It is further represented, that, in the execution of this arrangement, difficulties and controversies arose between the Bank of the United States and the State banks thus employed in receiving the deposits of the public moneys; and, ere long, the Bank of the United States signified to the Department of the Treasury that it could not continue such arrangement; and that, thenceforward, it could receive nothing in deposits, as cash, but the legal currency of the country for its own notes. The agreement with the Bank of the United States terminated, for these reasons, on the 30th June, 1818.

It would appear that many of the State banks which had, in 1817, resumed specie payments soon after this period, that is to say in the latter part of 1818, discontinued such payments; and that the debt due to the United States, on account of the sales of the public land, had very greatly increased; amounting, in the early part of 1819, to not less than $18,900,000. The public expenditure in the Western States was not such as to require, within those States, the disbursement of the money received on account of this debt; but much the larger part was to be remitted, either to the Seat of Government, or to other places in the Atlantic States.

About this period, also, the Bank of the United States issued orders prohibiting its Western branches from issuing any of their own notes for circulation, even in exchange for, or on deposits of, specie.

Under these circumstances, the Secretary of the Treasury appears to have entered into arrangements with some of the local or State banks, generally those which had acted as agents of the Bank of the United States, for the purpose of employing them as depositories of the public money, and in the transfer of such money, when required, to places where it might be wanted in the course of Government disbursements.

Among the earliest of these, was that proposed to the Bank of Missouri, by letters from the Secretary, of the 1st and the 11th of July, 1818, immediately after the termination of the agreement before mentioned with the Bank of the United States; which letters, indeed, have the form of circulars to all the banks in which the public moneys were at that time deposited, that is to say, the banks which have been employed by the Bank of the United States, during the continuance of its arrangement before mentioned, with the Treasury. The Bank of Missouri was one of these. It was now informed that, since that agreement had come to an end on the 30th of June, all sums deposited in the Bank of Missouri after that time, must be subject to the drafts of the Treasury, and would be drawn for, as occasion should require, in the following manner, viz: if in favor of individuals, drafts to be paid at sight; if in favor of the Bank of the United States, in sixty days; drafts of the latter description to be so made that the money should be drawn out and transferred gradually, and not ex massæ. The reason of this distinction between drafts to individuals and drafts to the Bank of the United States, appears to be, that drafts in favor of individuals, being probably intended for funds to be expended in the neighborhood of the bank, would be ordinarily paid in the notes of the bank itself, or other similar paper; but that those in favor of the Bank of the United States would be such as required payment in specie, or in United States' Bank bills, or transfers of credit to its branches; operations which might reasonably require time. On the 1st of August, the Bank of Missouri signified its acceptance of the conditions of this proposition.

On the 21st of December, 1818, the Secretary, by letter, addressed to the President of the Bank of Edwardsville, signified his disposition to employ that bank also in receiving the deposits of the public moneys; and, on the 1st of February following, that bank assented to the terms. A similar arrangement was made, nearly at the same time, with the Bank of Illinois, the Bank of Huntsville, and the Tombigbee Bank.

Shortly after the date of these transactions, however, a more general system of employing State banks, for the purposes before mentioned, was adopted, and conditions more precise, and which were thought more favorable to the banks, were proposed. The leading feature in this new proposition was, that, as an inducement to undertake the engagement, it was agreed, on the part of the Treasury, to allow to the bank a permanent deposits of a stipulated sum, not liable to be drawn out or diminished, except in a specified case. The use of this deposits was to be the equivalent for the responsibility of receiving and keeping the funds, and the expense of transferring them, without further charge on the Treasury, to such places as might be agreed on, or required.

Arrangements of this nature were made with the Bank of Steubenville, Bank of Chillicothe, Franklin

Bank of Columbus, Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Indiana, Bank of Illinois at Shawneetown, Branch Bank of Kentucky at Louisville, Bank of Tombigbee at Saint Stephen's, Planters and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville, Bank of Missouri, Bank of Edwardsville, and Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati.

The terms, in general, agreed to between the Treasury and these several banks, were, in substance—

1st. That the bank should receive, in deposits, to the credit of the Treasury as cash, from the receivers of public moneys, all current notes of such banks as maintain cash payments; with power, however, to discontinue to receive the notes of any particular bank on giving reasonable notice of such intention to the Receiver.

2d. That the bank should pay, at sight, all drafts from the Treasury; and should also transfer, on request, all sums on hand beyond the amount of the stipulated permanent deposits, to the Bank of the United States, or certain enumerated branches of that bank; and that a fixed sum should remain in the bank, as before mentioned, as a permanent deposit, to be transferred, however, to the Bank of the United States, in six months after the termination of the agreement.

3d. That, if the money were wanted for disbursement in the neighborhood of the banks, it might be drawn for, at sight, notwithstanding such drafts might reduce the permanent deposits below the stipulated sum.

The amount of this permanent deposit was to be increased, if it should appear that the bank should receive and transfer such large sums as that the expense thereof should not be considered as compensated by the benefit of the deposits which had been stipulated. It was also prescribed, that the bank should render to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the Treasurer, duplicate monthly returns of its accounts with the Treasurer; and to the Secretary, confidential monthly returns of the state of its own affairs; showing, also, the credits of all public officers in the bank; and also quarterly lists, or returns, of all its debtors; to the end that the Secretary of the Treasury might determine on the propriety of continuing the public deposits in such bank.

Such was the general nature of the arrangements as they were adopted and entered into with the banks. There were, however, variations in some other particulars. In the Bank of Steubenville, for instance, the public money in the bank, or due from it at the time of the arrangement, was declared not to fall within the arrangement: in other instances, nothing is said of such balances; and, in others again, it was declared that they should be embraced by the agreement.

The following table shows the amount of the permanent deposits allowed to each bank, respectively, as the equivalent for the services rendered, or expected to be rendered, by it to the Treasury:

Bank of Steubenville	$50,000
Bank of Chillicothe	100,000
Franklin Bank of Columbus	20,000
Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Indiana	40,000
Bank of Illinois at Shawneetown	50,000
Branch Bank of Kentucky at Louisville	100,000
Bank of Tombigbee at St. Stephen's	100,000
Planters and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville	75,000
Bank of Missouri	150,000
Bank of Vincennes	75,000

Bank of Edwardsville	40,000
Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati	100,000

The amount of these permanent deposits is nine hundred thousand dollars, the interest on which sum, at six per centum, would be fifty-four thousand dollars.

It is alleged in the memorial, that this sum of fifty-four thousand dollars was thus annually paid for receiving and transmitting the public money; a service which, it is said, the Bank of the United States was bound to perform without any compensation. The committee does not see the ground of this obligation on the Bank of the United States. That institution is, indeed, bound to give necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, but this can only mean cash funds; and it is bound, also, to receive money in deposits for the United States; but it is not bound to receive in deposits, as cash, the bills of any banks whatever but its own, although they may come within the provisions of the resolution of 1816. The committee does not perceive anything in the principle of these arrangements with the banks, either in violation of law, or contrary to the usage of the Government; since the Treasury has, for many years, had agreements with more or less of the banks, by which the public moneys were deposited in such banks, and drawn from them when wanted; certain terms and conditions, as to the mode of drawing, being stipulated, such as were thought beneficial, both to the Treasury and the banks. Indeed, it may be proper to observe here, that it seems to have been assumed, by different officers at the head of the Treasury Department, that it was their duty to direct its operations to the support of different moneyed institutions whenever their affairs required support, so as to defeat combinations against them, and preserve an equilibrium of credit among them. And the practice appears to be in conformity with this principle from a very early day. That benefit may occasionally result, and has resulted from such operations, is evident; but this is no legal employment of public funds. It is nothing but a gratuitous loan. The existence of the practice, however, as well as the avowal of the principle by different officers at the head of the Treasury, will be found by referring to a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the President of the Senate, of the 25th February, 1823, in answer to a resolution of that body. Such, however, was not either the object, or the character, of the agreements with the State Banks, which are the subjects of this examination.

On the 1st of August, 1820, the Treasury issued circular instructions to the Receivers of Public Moneys, authorizing them to receive, in addition to specie and bills of the Bank of the United States and its branches, notes of the incorporated banks in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Richmond, and in the States of South Carolina and Georgia, (except the City Bank of Baltimore,) and of those specie-paying banks in the State in which the Land Office is situated. "This instruction," it is added, "supercedes those which have heretofore been given on the subject, except in so far as they prohibit the receipt of the paper of any bank which does not discharge its notes, on demand, in specie; and that prohibition must, in every case, be rigidly adhered to."

Among the banks with which these negotiations were made, the attention of the committee was called, particularly, to the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati, the Bank of Chillicothe, and the branch of the State Bank of Kentucky, at Louisville, as forming the subject of a charge that does not apply to the others. In the several places where these banks were situated, the Bank of the United States had offices of discount and deposit, and the law incorporating that institution, as has been before observed, creates an obligation on the Treasury of the United States to use them as places of deposit, in preference to any other banks, unless the Secretary shall, for special reasons, otherwise direct; and, in that case, such reasons shall be laid before Congress at its then, or next session. The charge is, that no such communication was made to Congress. This omission is acknowledged by the Secretary, who says it was owing to inadvertence, and that the inattention to the provision of the law was unimportant, inasmuch as the provision was intended, obviously, for the benefit of the bank; and the bank had full notice. The notoriety of the fact is also relied on, to show that no improper conduct, or desire to conceal it, produced the omission.

The committee sees no reason to doubt this statement, or to attribute any improper motive to the Secretary, in this inattention to the directions of the act.

The charges relative to the Bank of Missouri are, in substance,

That this bank was unworthy of credit at the time the deposits of public moneys were suffered to accumulate in it to a large and improper amount:

That the permanent deposit allowed it was illegal, and unreasonably large:

That those returns and statements of its affairs, which the Secretary had himself considered essential, were not exacted:

And, finally, that, in payment of its debt, a large amount of uncurrent notes was received, some of them not worth twenty-five cents in the dollar, contrary to the positive injunctions of the resolution of 1816.

The committee thinks it very probable that the Bank of Missouri did make an improper, perhaps an excessive, issue of its paper; although the mode adopted in the address, of estimating that excess, appears not altogether correct, as it omits to mention the permanent deposit of the Government in calculating the fund on which the emission might be made. If the capital of the bank were, as is stated, $210,000, and its permanent deposit from Government $150,000, supposing it to have no other deposits, a discount to the extent of $430,000 would not have been alarmingly excessive, supposing the loans to have been limited to safe hands, and that punctuality of payment might have been expected. It is probable that a failure in this latter respect was the immediate cause of the bank suspending its payments.

The sum of $726,000, which appears, at one time, to have been in this bank, was certainly a very large sum to have been suffered to remain in a country bank; but, whether it was a greater accumulation than ought to have been allowed, is a question that depends on many considerations, chiefly on that of the solidity of the institution, which itself again depended on the solvency of its debtors. Of this the committee has no other evidence than that arising from the report of the committee of the Legislature of Missouri, appointed to examine the affairs of the bank, who declare that the debts due on personal security, as well as those secured by mortgage, are safe. If this were well founded, the bank, even at the time it stopped payment, had, in those two items alone, more than enough to pay all it owed.

What information, to put the Secretary on his guard, would have been derived from the monthly returns, the committee cannot determine. They appear to have been furnished only up to the 1st of February, 1820. Nor has the committee observed any demand made by the Secretary for a compliance with this stipulation, at any time between that date and the time the bank stopped payment. Whether, however, if it had been demanded and complied with, any different result, favorable to the United States, would have been produced, it seems impossible to determine, because, judging from the last and most unfavorable return, made immediately previous to the stoppage of the bank, nothing in those returns would have appeared to indicate any danger.

A more important part of the charge is, that the Secretary received from this bank, in part payment of its debt, a large amount of uncurrent notes, contrary to law.

By the first arrangement made with the bank, which has been already stated, it was not responsible, as far as the committee can perceive, for the solvency of the banks, the notes of which might have been deposited in it by the public receivers. When the new contract was made, in August, 1819, it did not form any part of that contract, as it did with some of those of the other banks, that the bills already on hand should be at once passed to the credit of the Treasury as cash, as may be seen by a copy of the contract annexed to this report, marked B. So that the important question is, whether those notes were received before or after the 9th of August, 1819, the day on which the bank assented to the new contract. If before, then they are received on account, and at the risk of Government; if after, at the risk of the bank.

The committee think there were sufficient reasons to justify the Secretary in believing them to have been received before the 9th of August, because, by the letter of the bank, of that date, it appears that a much larger sum in notes essentially of the same description, was in possession of the bank: and an offer is therein made to transfer them to various other banks, to the order of the Treasury. And, by the statement marked E, annexed to the address of Mr. Edwards, it appears that, as early as the 6th of September, 1819, a much larger sum, in notes of the description of those thus offered by the bank, had actually been received on account of the Treasury from the several receivers, and were then on hand. On this point the committee also refer to the deposition of Thomas F. Riddick, hereunto annexed, marked F.

The committee think it proper to add, that, of the whole sum received by the Treasury in these notes, from the Bank of Missouri, a sum of about twenty thousand dollars only appears to be unpaid; and of this sum it is stated by the Treasury there are hopes that a considerable part will be secured.

A very large part of the address is occupied with observations on the transactions between the Treasury and the Bank of Edwardsville. This bank was made a depository of public money, at the solicitation of Mr. Edwards himself, in December, 1818. It stopped payment in September, 1821, owing, at that time, a balance to Government of forty-six thousand two hundred and two dollars and forty-three cents.

It is not deemed necessary here to repeat all that is said on that subject, in the address and the answer. The address, in this part of it, seems to have two objects—one to clear Mr. Edwards himself from any imputation on account of having procured the public deposits to be made in the bank originally, and to repel the supposition that he had been the means of continuing them after they became unsafe; the other to charge the Secretary with continuing the deposits after he ought to have been alarmed for their safety, and with receiving uncurrent notes from the bank against law; and also with the negligent omission of proper means to collect the debt due from it to the Government.

It appears to be for this double purpose, that the address alleges that in 1819 its author made a publication, announcing his intention to withdraw from the bank in which he had been a director, and no longer to be considered responsible for its engagements; which publication, as is alleged, was transmitted to the Secretary; that he also advised the Receiver of Public Moneys to withhold the deposits from the bank until he should receive further orders from the Treasury; that the Receiver, thereupon, wrote to the Treasury, enclosing Mr Edwards's publication, and (as he afterwards declared) received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits. The Secretary has said, that no such letter from the Receiver was on file in the Department, and that none of its officers had any recollection of such a letter; and, moreover, that there was no record of any answer. The address, notwithstanding this declaration, aims to prove that such letter was written; and, among other arguments, adduces the fact that there was, about this time, an actual suspension of deposits at the bank; which the address attributes to the caution of the Receiver, under the advice which had been given to him. To this, it is answered by the Secretary that this suspension was owing to the negligence, not the caution, of the Receiver; that the Receiver was directed frequently and repeatedly to continue his deposits, and to make them regularly and punctually—danger then being apprehended, not from the bank, but from the continuance of large sums in the hands of the Receiver.

Without entering into a detail of all the facts connected with this subject, it seems to the committee that there is no doubt that Mr. Edwards did make a publication (paper C) in the newspapers in 1819, as he represents, and that he gave such advice as he represents, to the Receiver. But there is no evidence that the Receiver communicated it, or wrote on the subject of it, to the Secretary. Indeed, it is not very probable he would have done so. It is to be remembered that he was President of the Bank, as well as Receiver of Public Moneys, and he would hardly advise the Secretary that he, as Receiver, could not repose confidence in the Bank, the President and head of which he was.

The committee does not deem it at all material to inquire whether the Secretary received or saw a copy of Mr. Edwards's publication. There is nothing in that communication which should have alarmed him for the safety of the public money in the Edwardsville Bank; for, although Mr. Edwards announces his intention of withdrawing from a participation in the direction of it, he speaks in most decided terms of its solvency and safety. While the committee sees no reason to believe that Mr. Edwards acted with any impropriety in procuring the deposits of the public money in that bank, or in regard to the continuance of such deposits, it perceives, on the other hand, no reason whatever for supposing that the Secretary continued the deposits after being admonished by the Receiver that they were unsafe. On the contrary, the committee thinks the correspondence fully shows that the deposits were omitted (or thought to be so) through negligence and fault; and that, in enforcing and insisting on them, the Secretary was governed by a proper regard for the security of the public funds. The committee, however, would take this occasion to observe that, in their opinion, the appointment of the Presidents of the local banks, in which public moneys are deposited, to be Receivers of the Public Moneys, to be deposited in the same bank, is injudicious; that it has happened in several cases; and that inconvenience or mischief may not be unlikely to result from such a practice.

As to the charge of receiving uncurrent notes from this bank also, contrary to law, the committee thinks that the construction, which appears to have been contended for by the bank, and acquiesced in by the Secretary, of the first article of the arrangement between them, is not the true construction, especially if nothing be regarded but the terms of the contract. The words of the first article are, "that the public moneys shall be entered to the credit of the Treasurer as cash." It would seem impossible that these terms could mean any thing else than that, for the amount of these deposits, the bank should become directly debtor to the United States, and that this debt, thus assumed, should, like others, be legally paid. If this construction, which the committee has given to the contract, be correct, these notes were illegally received.

The Secretary's view of the case appears, however, to have been different. He says the term "cash" was used in opposition to the term "special deposit," and was not intended to subject the bank to the payment of specie for notes which were not convertible into specie; and that it was not understood by either of the parties, that the bank was responsible for the credit of other banks whose notes were deposited in it. The correspondence sufficiently shows that the bank expressed the same opinion, at an early period of the connexion, and long before this case arose. The construction insisted upon was, in effect, that the bank was to receive such bills as the Receivers had lawfully taken, and wished to deposit; and, as these would be of different banks, more or less remote, the bank should, for the compensation which it received, be at the expense of collecting them, so that the proceeds might be transferred, without farther expense or trouble on the part of the Government, to the order of the Treasury; but that, nevertheless, if any such bills became discredited, while in this process of collection, by the failure of the bank which issued them, the loss should fall on the Government.

Although the committee do not agree to the correctness of this construction, yet they see no reason to doubt that the Secretary may have honestly supposed that the banks entered into the arrangement with this understanding of its meaning; nor any ground to believe his conduct, in this respect, to have been governed by any improper motive. It ought to be added, that the Secretary states that one reason for receiving these bills from the Edwardsville Bank was, that he had at that time some reason to apprehend a want of punctuality or good faith on the part of that bank itself.

The case of the Bank of Tombigbee, as it is explained in the Secretary's answer, does not call for any particular observations. It is not unlike that of Edwardsville, except that, in the former case, no loss appears to have occurred. The loss in the case of the Bank of Edwardsville, arising from the receipt of uncurrent notes, will be twenty thousand dollars; unless it should turn out, as the Secretary says he is assured it will, that the notes will yet be paid.

The committee has requested of the Department to be informed of the present amount due to the United States from the following banks, to wit: The Branch Bank of Kentucky, at Louisville; the Huntsville Bank; the Bank of Missouri; the Bank of Vincennes; the Bank of Edwardsville; and the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati; and of the present circumstances of those banks; and, whether there be reason to apprehend loss from any other bank in which the public money is deposited.

In answer to this request, the Secretary has communicated a statement of the Treasurer, giving the information required, which accompanies this report, marked D.

By this it would appear, that the balance now due the Government from these banks, is four hundred and forty thousand eight hundred and twenty dollars and sixty-three cents.

The committee has no particular information of the measures which have been adopted to enforce the collection of these balances. In regard to some of them, as has already appeared, the Secretary expresses a confident hope of ultimate payment; a great portion of the amount, however, may be considered as lost.

The amount of money collected on account of internal taxes, and from the sales of the public lands, mostly the latter, since 1816, is stated by the Secretary at twenty-one millions of dollars. If of this sum half a million should be lost by means of the failure of the banks which have stopped payment, the loss would be less than two and a half per cent. on the whole sum.

Considering the great and violent shock which credit of all kinds has sustained within this period in the Western States, and comparing this amount of loss, if it should eventually happen, with that of the Bank of the United States, of other banks, and of individuals, arising in the same part of the country, from similar causes, the committee is of opinion that the result does not show in the Treasury Department any want either of fidelity or prudence in the management of the public funds.

The other division of the charge contained in the Address, relates to the alleged suppression, or withholding of papers called for by different resolutions of the Houses of Congress.

One specification under this head is that relating to the correspondence between the Secretary and Mr. Stephenson, the President of the Edwardsville Bank. The opinion of the committee on that subject has been already given, and need not be repeated.

Another relates to the correspondence with the several Western banks generally. The charge is, that material parts of it were retained, when all was called for by the House.

The first call was made on the 9th of January, 1822, and was, as the committee think, limited in its proper construction to a requisition for the correspondence relative to the contracts for making deposits. In this way, the Secretary says, he understood it; but, that he did, nevertheless, transmit letters not directly embraced by the resolution, but which, he thought, were necessary to elucidate the subject.

The next resolution was on the 12th of March, in the same year, and the only correspondence it called for, was that with the Missouri Bank, and there is no reason to believe that this was not substantially complied with.

A third call was made in the same year, on the 8th of May, requiring the correspondents with all the banks that had not before been communicated.

The committee have not been able to discover, in the very voluminous return to this last resolution, any material letters not before communicated, except a circular instruction to the Western banks, directing them to note, on the back of each return of the Treasurer's account, a description of the moneys credited in such return, and the amount of each, according to a form of return therein given. This form is the same with that in which the return referred to in Mr. Edwards's Address, marked E., is made out. This circumstance would seem to give a greater weight to the evidence to be drawn from that paper, considering it as an official document intended for the Treasury, under the agreement.

Another charge of suppression, incidentally made, but which the committee deem it proper to notice, relates to a report made by the Secretary, in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 31st of December, 1819, calling for such information as he possessed in relation to the introduction of slaves into the United States. On this point, the committee addressed an inquiry to the Secretary, and received from him the answer annexed to this report, marked E.

Although they are of opinion that there were papers in the Department containing information called for by the resolution, and which ought to have been communicated, yet, judging from the statement made by the Secretary, in his answer, connected with the fact that the papers in question were communicated to the Attorney General, it is the opinion of the committee that the omission was not caused by a design to screen the person implicated from punishment or blame.

As to the other cases in which the Secretary is charged in the Address, with having suppressed or withheld papers or information called for by the Houses of Congress, the committee is of opinion that, although papers coming within the scope of the resolution, or call, were not, in some instances, communicated, such omissions were either the result of accident, or of a belief, on the part of the Secretary, or of the persons necessarily employed by him on such occasions, that the papers so omitted were not called for, or were not material; and the committee have seen no evidence that any documents or information has been withheld from the House, from the operation of any improper motive or design.

Referring to what has been said in the introduction to this report, and repeating that Mr. Edwards has not had an opportunity of supporting his charges, by his presence and testimony, the result of the facts which have appeared to the committee, thus far, in this investigation, and of their deductions from them, when applied to the recapitulation of charges, as stated at the end of the Address, is—

First. That the evidence referred to, and examined, does not support the charge of having mismanaged the public funds.

Second. That the uncurrent notes, mentioned in the second charge, appear, by evidence satisfactory to the committee, to have been received and deposited by the public receivers, at a time when they were receivable under the resolution of Congress of 1816. That, in the principal case, that of the Bank of Missouri, the bank did not make itself responsible for such notes as cash, and therefore the Secretary was bound to receive them from the bank; that, although the banks of Tombigbee and Edwardsville were liable to account for such deposits as cash, if the construction which the committee gives to their contracts be correct, yet, that both the Secretary and the banks expressed a different opinion as to the meaning of those contracts, and that the Secretary, in receiving fifteen thousand dollars from the one, and twenty thousand dollars from the other, of those banks, appears to have acted according to what he supposed to be the rights of the parties, and with a proper regard to the interest of the United States, under the circumstances which then existed.

MAY, 1824.

H. OF R.

Third. That no intentional misstatement has been made to the House, of the amount of uncurrent bills received from the banks; although a sum of two hundred and eighty dollars of such bills was omitted through mistake.

Fourth. That, although the Secretary may have misconstrued the effect of some of the contracts with the banks to the extent before mentioned, the committee find no grounds for the charge that he has misrepresented them, inasmuch as the contracts themselves were submitted, with his report, to the House.

Fifth. That the Secretary did omit to communicate to Congress the reasons which led him to direct the deposit of public moneys in the three local banks of Chillicothe, Cincinnati, and Louisville, where the Bank of the United States had branches, but there is no reason for supposing that any concealment was intended, or that the omission was occasioned by design.

Sixth. That in some instances, papers called for by resolutions of the House have not been communicated with other papers sent in answer to such calls, but that these omissions have happened either from accident, or from a belief that the papers so omitted were immaterial or not called for; and that there is no evidence that any document or information has been withheld from improper motives.

Having already expressed the opinion that this investigation ought not to be terminated, until the person preferring the charges shall have been examined, and regretting the circumstances which render such an examination impracticable during the present session of Congress, and thinking that Mr. Edwards may be expected at Washington within a few days, the committee feel it their duty to recommend to the House that they be required to sit after the adjournment, for the purpose of taking his examination, if an opportunity shall be presented.

Conditions proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Bank of Missouri, for the future employment of that bank as a depository of public moneys.

1st. The bank will receive from the Receivers of Public Moneys, and others having moneys to deposit on account of the Treasurer, the paper of such banks as pay their notes in specie on demand, or are otherwise in good credit, and whose paper is in circulation in its vicinity, a list of which banks will be furnished by it to the Secretary of the Treasury, and will credit the same to the Treasurer of the United States as cash. The bank may, however, discontinue to receive the paper of any of the said banks; but, in such case, it will give immediate notice thereof to such Receivers and others, who usually deposit public moneys in it; and the notes of any such banks, which may have been received by them before such notice, shall nevertheless be taken and credited by the Bank of Missouri as cash.

2d. The bank shall pay, at sight, all drafts which the Treasurer of the United States may draw on it; and it shall, from time to time, transfer to the Bank of the United States, or its branches at New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or New Orleans, in such moneys as will be received by them as cash, the excess of public money remaining on deposit, after such drafts are paid, over and above the sum of $150,000; which sum of $150,000 shall remain on deposit in the Bank of Missouri during the continuance of this arrangement, and shall be transferred in like manner by the bank, within six months after it shall cease to be employed to receive the public moneys. It is agreed, however, that, if the amount received by the bank shall be so large as that the expense of remittance shall exceed the benefit of the deposit, the sum which is to remain on deposit in the bank shall be proportionably increased.

3d. The bank shall render to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the Treasurer of the United States, duplicate weekly returns of its account with the Treasurer, and shall also render to the Secretary of the Treasury, monthly returns of the state of its affairs, which latter returns shall be considered confidential, and will, in no case, be made public, they being intended solely to aid the Secretary of the Treasury in determining on the propriety of continuing or discontinuing the arrangement with the bank.

4th. It is understood that if the moneys deposited in the Bank of Missouri, under this arrangement, can be disbursed at the bank, the drafts of the Treasurer shall be paid at sight, notwithstanding such payments may reduce the deposit below the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1824.

SIR: I have received your note of this day's date, and now enclose you a copy of the publication of Mr. Edwards, made in 1819, in reference to the Bank of Edwardsville, in the Edwardsville Spectator and St. Louis Inquirer, and from the former copied in the Illinois Gazette, published at Shawneetown, and from which last mentioned paper the enclosed is taken.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DANIEL P. COOK.

The Hon. JOHN FLOYD.

FROM THE EDWARDSVILLE SPECTATOR.

To the Editors of the St. Louis Inquirer:

GENTLEMEN: The honorable Secretary of the Treasury having, at my particular application, directed

H. OF R.

Report on the Address of Ninian Edwards.

MAY, 1824.

certain deposits of public money to be made in the Banks of Shawneetown and Edwardsville, I feel myself called upon, by the repeated publications in your paper against the latter bank, to make the following statements, merely for my own justification, without, however, either wishing or intending to engage in any further controversy upon the subject, unless it should become necessary to support the facts themselves, which I shall state.

Whatever might have been the original intention of those who had been most active in procuring the incorporation of the Bank of Edwardsville, I did sincerely believe, at the time it was about to be put into operation, that it was intended to be conducted with the utmost prudence and honesty; and, with that belief, I, myself, subscribed for one hundred shares. I personally knew that $30,000 had been, actually, and bona fide, paid upon the stock subscribed; and the election of directors was a further confirmation to me, that nothing like fraud or imposition was contemplated.

The gentlemen chosen, as directors, were—

1. Col. Benjamin Stephenson, formerly Delegate in Congress; then, and now, Receiver of Public Moneys in the Land Office at this place.
2. William Kinney, Esq., a Senator in our State Legislature.
3. Abraham Prickett, Esq., a member of our House of Representatives.
4. Joseph Conway, Esq., Clerk of the Superior Court.
5. Doctor Joseph Bowers, a gentleman of the first respectability, and highly distinguished for his professional abilities.
6. Mr. Robert Pogue, a respectable merchant of this place.
7. T. W. Smith, Esq., with whom I had no previous acquaintance, but in favor of whose character I have seen the most flattering and pointed testimonials from members of Congress, the Vice President of the United States, and several other gentlemen of the first respectability in the State and city of New York.
8. Major Robert Latham, whom I had known from infancy to manhood, and against whose honor I had never heard the slightest insinuation; and
9. Myself.

Reposing that confidence in a board composed of those gentlemen which their individual characters did justify, I felt myself warranted in giving it, as my opinion, to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, that the public deposits could be as safely confided to them as to the directors of any other institution whatever; and I am happy to say that Mr. Crawford, who has been regularly informed, and is intimately acquainted with the general conduct of the board, has had no reason to believe that my confidence was misplaced.

To say nothing of the three last named directors, whose residence among us is of more recent date, the five first named, who, in my absence, constituted five-eighths of the board, are generally and well known; and I hazard nothing in stating that there is not one man of respectability in this State, that knows them, who will deny that their characters forbid the belief that they could so far degrade themselves as to become the wicked accomplices or willing instruments of effecting the fraudulent designs, that, by its enemies, have been imputed to the bank. The personal interests of the directors could have afforded no such temptation; for the accommodation that any of them have asked, or received, has been very moderate; and it is a fact that the President, and several of them, have never yet borrowed a cent from the bank.

As to General Payne, who subscribed for a greater amount of stock than any other individual, and who has been so frequently alluded to in the publications against the bank, I can only say that he has uniformly stated to me that his object in purchasing the stock was to set apart a fund, and to obtain facilities for the payment of public lands, which he then had purchased, and thereafter intended to purchase; and as far as I am informed, his conduct has corresponded with his professions; for, while he has recommended the utmost caution and circumspection in the management of the bank, neither he, nor any of his connexions, has ever obtained a loan from it.

But, whatever may have been the objects of any one or more gentlemen, it is certain that the bank has been managed with such caution and discretion that I am convinced it could have nothing to fear from a comparison of its situation with that of any other bank in the United States; and so far from "struggling," as you suppose it to be, "in the last agonies of death," I pledge my honor that the amount of specie in its vaults exceeds, by several thousand dollars, twice the amount of its notes in circulation; and that it is able to pay, at a moment's warning, the whole amount it owes the Government; which statement it would be folly for me thus publicly to make, if it were not true, because I well know the Secretary of the Treasury possesses the means of detecting and exposing any error which it might contain.

My object, however, in this address, is not to support the future credit of the bank, but merely to show the grounds upon which my recommendation of it was predicated; its present condition; and that the expectations which I authorized, have, so far, been completely fulfilled.

For, notwithstanding I do verily believe that neither the Government, nor any individual, is in danger of being intentionally imposed upon by the bank, so long as it continues under the control of its present directors; yet, intending to be absent from the State; and considering the disastrous pressure of the present times; the hostility which the bank has to encounter; and particularly the opposition of gentlemen in this State, high in office, who have been extremely anxious to get other banks into operation, with the aid of "foreign capital," as it is termed, I have determined to resign my seat in the directory, and to withdraw from all future responsibility of any kind whatever, in relation to this or any other bank, without making any further unsupported effort to retain any portion of the public deposits in this State—leaving it to the directors to maintain their credit by their own good conduct, and to the Secretary of the Treasury to judge for himself upon the returns he requires how far it may be prudent to trust them.

I will only add, that in the support which I have heretofore given to the Banks of Shawneetown and Edwardsville, I have been wholly uninfluenced by any motives of pecuniary interest; and that I never have applied for or obtained a loan from either; nor am I under any kind of obligations to them.

Very respectfully, I am, &c., &c.,

NINIAN EDWARDS.

In answer to the letter of the Honorable Mr. Floyd chairman of a select committee of the House of Representatives, of the 1st instant, the Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to transmit the accompanying statement from the Treasury, showing the balances at the credit of that officer, in the banks mentioned in Mr. Floyd's letter.

By this statement, it appears that the Branch Bank of Kentucky, at Louisville, owes nothing to the Treasury; the debt lately due by that institution having been entirely discharged in August last.

Of the present condition of the other banks mentioned by Mr. Floyd, the Secretary is not sufficiently informed to offer any opinion. As far, however, as relates to the debts due by them, respectively, to the Treasury, he has the honor to state:

1. That the debt due by the Planters and Merchants' Bank, at Huntsville, is considered safe, and is in a course of payment—having been reduced, since the report made by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 14th of February, 1822, from $64,044 to $45,167 11.

2. That the debt due by the Bank of Missouri is also considered safe, having been secured in a manner acknowledged by persons competent to judge on the subject, to be satisfactory; and, moreover, that some portion of it is understood to have been already paid to the agent.

3. That the debt of the Bank of Vincennes was heretofore supposed to have been secured; but, that some doubts have since arisen, both as to the validity and the value of part of the security; and that, although no correct opinion can now be formed on the subject, there is reason to suppose that a loss will be eventually sustained by the United States. To what extent this may be the case, cannot at present be estimated: but measures will be taken to guard the interests of the Treasury as far as practicable.

4. That the Bank of Edwardsville, and the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati, having failed to make any provision by security or otherwise, for the payment of the debts due by them to the United States, suits have been instituted against them. In these cases, also, some loss is expected, though no correct opinion can now be formed as to the extent.

The Secretary has no reason to apprehend loss from any other bank in which the public money is deposited.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 30, 1824.

The Secretary of the Treasury has had the honor to receive the letter addressed to him, on the 13th instant, by the Hon. Mr. Livingston, on behalf of a select committee of the House of Representatives.

As the correspondence with Mr. D. B. Mitchell, to which the Committee refers, though relating partly to public transactions, was unofficial; it was not placed on record in the Treasury Department. And, on examination, it appears that only two of the letters included in it have been preserved. These are Mr. Mitchell's letters of the 19th of February, and 28th of April, 1818; the former of which has been found on the files of the Department, and the latter among the private papers of the Secretary. They are both transmitted herewith.

To explain the circumstance of public matters being introduced into an unofficial correspondence between two public officers, it is proper to state, that Mr. Mitchell, having been Governor of Georgia, and having for many years taken an active part in the public affairs of that State, had long been personally well known to the Secretary; and that during the Secretary's residence at Washington, though his own duties left him but little leisure for private correspondence, Mr. Mitchell had been in the habit of writing to him freely and frequently; introducing into his letters, as may naturally be supposed from the former and actual-situation of the parties, a variety of topics, both of a public and local character. It is, also, to be observed, that although Mr. Mitchell, as Indian agent, was not precluded from any official correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury, yet, as it was the War Department to which, under the President, he was officially accountable, it was to that Department that his communications, in relation to his public duties, were properly to be addressed. And it appears by a publication, which has been since made by Mr. Mitchell, that, on the 3d and 18th of February, 1818, he communicated officially to the Secretary of War, the same information, in substance, respecting his conduct in relation to the Africans, as was contained in his private letter of the 19th of February, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

An examination of Mr. Mitchell's letters, of the 19th of February, and 28th of April, will show that they were not merely unofficial, but in part at least, private and confidential. The letter of the 25th of December, 1817, which is the only other letter of Mr. Mitchell required by the committee, is believed to have been of the same character; but in what degree, is not now recollected.

Although it was no part of the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to have taken official cognizance of the subject of Mr. Mitchell's letter, of the 25th of December, even if the letter had been official, yet he submitted it to the President: and, as the circumstances communicated in it appeared to show a defect in the existing laws on the subject, he submitted it, also, to a committee of the Senate, which had been appointed to inquire into the expediency of making further provisions by law for preventing the introduction of slaves. Whether the letter was returned to the Secretary by that committee, or what disposition was finally made of it, he is now unable to state. He has written, however, to Mr. Roberts, who was chairman of that committee, for such information as he can furnish: and when the answer is received it shall be communicated to the committee.

The additional circumstances disclosed in Mr. Mitchell's letter of the 19th of February; induced the Secretary to submit it to the Attorney General; and while it was before him, the letter of the Collector of Darien, of the 9th of March, 1818, containing his official report of the seizure of the Africans was received, and was also submitted to the Attorney General. As the opinion of the Attorney General recommended that the case should be left to the decision of the Courts, before which it was then supposed to be pending, the Secretary informed Mr. Mitchell of the fact; presuming that, as far as the Secretary was concerned, the affair was then terminated; as, indeed, it soon after was, by the delivery of the Africans to the Executive authority of Georgia. As this letter was written in answer to unofficial letters, and, probably, contained allusions to some of the private matters noticed in those letters, it was not made official; and, consequently, was not placed on the records of the Treasury Department. Copies of unofficial letters are rarely retained by the Secretary; and, of this letter, none was taken.

The opinion of the Attorney General, however, was filed in the Department; and, it appears, that with it were filed the papers upon which the opinion was founded, viz: Mr. Mitchell's letter of the 19th of February, and the letter of the Collector of Darien of the 9th of March.

There is reason to believe that it was owing to the circumstance of these papers having been filed with the opinion of the Attorney General, that the letter of the Collector of Darien was overlooked when the papers were collected to be transmitted under the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st of December, 1819. It will be seen by the endorsements made on the original resolution [which is herewith transmitted,] by the Secretary and Mr. Jones, the Chief Clerk of the Department, that the duty of collecting the papers called for by the resolution was assigned by the Secretary to the Chief Clerk, and was performed by him. And, by the interlineation in his handwriting in the original rough draught of the Secretary's report, under that resolution, [which is herewith transmitted,] it will be seen that the report passed through his hands from the Secretary to the House. From the lapse of time, that gentleman is not now able to explain why the Collector's letter, of the 9th of March, was not transmitted with other letters; but the probability is, that, in collecting the papers required, his examination was confined to the files of the several collectors and officers of the customs, without recollecting that this letter of the Collector, and Mr. Mitchell's letter of the 19th of February, had been put up with the Attorney General's opinion, and placed with it on the file set apart for that officer's communications. The originals, of the opinion and of those papers, with the endorsements made on them at the time, are now transmitted in the same state as that in which they were filed; and, it is believed, that their appearance affords intrinsic evidence that they were so filed.

The papers herewith transmitted, include all the correspondence in the possession of the Secretary, or in the Treasury Department, having relation to the subject of the letters required by the committee, not heretofore communicated to the House of Representatives.

It has been insinuated by Mr. Edwards that these letters were withheld by the Secretary, in violation of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st December, 1819, for the purpose of screening Mr. Mitchell. The charge, however, is contradicted by the facts; and particularly by the facts upon which it purports to be founded. The letter of the Collector of Darien, of the 14th of March, which was communicated under that resolution, and to which, as well as the other papers, communicated by the Secretary on the 11th of January, 1820, the committee is respectfully referred, begins thus: "I had the honor to address you per last mail, and to enclose to you papers respecting forty-seven African negroes, taken by the Surveyor of Darien, from one Jared E. Grece, on their way to the Alabama Territory, through the Indian nation, and forty-one others at the Creek agency, from the negro houses of the agent for Indian affairs." Here, then, is a disclosure of the very fact, which, if the Secretary's design was to screen Mr. Mitchell, it was fatal to disclose, viz: that a large number of Africans, who had been illicitly introduced, had been seized, not only at Mr. Mitchell's residence, and at the seat of his authority, but in his own negro houses. It will be seen by the committee, that the Collector's letter of the 9th, though it contains the details of the seizure, does not more strongly implicate Mr. Mitchell than he is implicated by this disclosure. But, whatever may be the purport and bearing of the letter of the 9th, that letter is particularly pointed to in the letter of the 14th, as containing papers respecting the seizure of those negroes. And, if there had been a design to suppress the letter of the 9th, it was necessary to its success that this reference to a letter which would have defeated the design, should also have been suppressed. But, upon what principles that govern human conduct can the design of favoring Mr. Mitchell, at the expense even of honor and of duty, be reconciled with the suppression of papers that tended to his justification? For it will be seen by the committee that Mr. Mitchell's letters, which the Secretary has been charged with concealing and withholding, represent his conduct in the transaction referred to as that of a vigilant, intelligent, and faithful public officer. And, it is believed that, if the guilt or innocence of Mr. Mitchell were to be determined on no other grounds than those afforded by the communications made to the Secretary by the Collector of Darien and himself, all of which (with the exception of the letter of the 25th of December) are now before the committee, Mr. Mitchell would be free from suspicion. So far, then, from having been improperly influenced by any sentiment of partiality towards Mr. Mitchell, in withholding these papers, it is believed that if any error has been committed by the Secretary in relation to them, it is on the other side. If, on the one hand, the letters of the Collector inculpate Mr. Mitchell, so, on the other hand, his own letters justify him; and, though one letter of the Collector was omitted to be communicated to the House, yet, on the other hand, all the letters of Mr. Mitchell were omitted. So that, as far as Mr. Mitchell was concerned, the charge was presented without the justification.

It is believed that, while the circumstances stated in this communication explain satisfactorily the reasons why the correspondence referred to by the committee was not laid before the House, under the resolution of the 31st December, 1819, it is demonstrated by the communications made by the Secretary to the President, to the committee of the Senate, to the Attorney General, and to the House itself that there has been no wish nor intention on the part of the Secretary to withhold from the proper authorities any information, whether made known to him officially or unofficially, of the violation of the law, in the case alluded to, or of Mr. Mitchell's conduct in the transaction.

H. OF R.

souri, having been called on by the committee of investigation, on the Address of Ninian Edwards, to state whether or not it is known to him that the sum of $138,179, paid by the Bank of Missouri to the Treasury of the United States, in bills of certain banks, was received by the bank on public account, prior to the arrangement made by the Secretary of the Treasury with said bank, by which the bank became bound to pay in specie or its equivalent—

Answers: That it is known to him that the bank did receive all the notes transferred by said bank to the Treasury, amounting to $138,179, from the several receivers of public moneys, prior to the 9th of August, 1819, the day when the bank became, for the first time, bound to pay cash for all deposits on public account, made after that date.

Thomas F. Riddick further states, that he was elected a director of the Bank of Missouri when the bank first commenced its operations, and has continued, until this day, either as director or president; that he has always taken an active part in the direction of said bank; and that all its affairs and business has passed under his immediate inspection; that the paper marked E, accompanying Mr. Edwards's Address, is a copy from a memorandum kept by John Dales, former cashier, in his lifetime, for the purpose of showing to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount received by the bank in funds at par, and the amount received in notes under par, that, on final settlement, the bank might pay in kind, according to its receipts.

That the Bank of Missouri did transfer, in Eastern funds, to the Bank of the United States and its branches, near $450,000; which funds were worth four per cent. premium to the bank; and he believes that the price of good bills at Louisville, Kentucky, was at that time four per cent. and upwards—a part of the time as high as six. These funds were transferred, on drafts issued by the Treasurer of the United States, for the use of the Treasury.

He further states, that a part of the balance due by the Bank of Missouri to the United States has already been paid, and that the remainder is in a course of payment; and he verily believes the ultimate payment to be well secured.

ANSWER

Of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Address of Ninian Edwards.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 8, 1824.

The Secretary of the Treasury has had the honor to receive the letter of the honorable Mr. Floyd, chairman of a select committee of the House of Representatives, dated on the 28th ultimo, transmitting the "Address of Ninian Edwards," and expressing the readiness of the committee to receive any communication which the Secretary may think proper to make, in reference to the same, and he now submits the following remarks in answer to the accusations contained in that address:

But, before he enters upon an examination of the subject of the "address," he thinks it due to himself to disclaim the imputation of having taken advantage of the moment of Mr. Edwards's departure to arraign the testimony which had been given by him before a former select committee of the House. As the Secretary had no recollection of the communication to which that testimony referred, and as they were not on record in the Treasury Department, he considered himself bound to state the fact; and the occasion which was presented by the transmission to the House of other papers relating to the same subject, appeared a suitable one for making the statement. The terms in which it was made, will show that no disrespect toward Mr. Edwards was intended. And, if the occasion was not earlier presented, the delay, so far from being caused or sought by the Secretary, was produced by circumstances beyond his control. For reasons stated to the House at the last session, the papers could not then be transmitted; and, although considerable exertion was used, it was not until the day on which they were sent to the House, that the preparation of them was completed.

It is not deemed necessary, in this communication, to recapitulate the injurious allegations contained in the "Address." The lateness of the session requires despatch; and this answer shall be brief and explicit.

The first charge to be noticed relates to two letters which Mr. Edwards, in his testimony before the committee, on the 13th of February, 1823, had stated to have passed between the Receiver of Public Moneys at Edwardsville, and the Secretary of the Treasury; and which, not having been communicated to the House under the resolutions of the 9th January, 1823, and 12th March, 1823, agreeably to Mr. Edwards's alleged expectation, and which the Secretary having stated to be neither on file nor on record in the Department, nor to be recollected by himself or his officers, he is accused of having suppressed or denied.

As the resolutions under which it is alleged that these letters should have been communicated, call only for the correspondence between certain "banks" and the Secretary, it is unnecessary to explain why, among the letters which were communicated, any correspondence between a "Receiver" and the Secretary was not to be found. Nor is it easy to imagine how any one, informed of the tenor of those resolutions, should have entertained the expectation of seeing the letters in question among the papers which were transmitted.

The blame of not having communicated these supposed letters, having been thus easily removed, by referring to the terms of the resolutions themselves, which show that no such letters were called for, the next question is, whether such letters ever passed between the parties.*

In the absence of all direct testimony in support of his assertion, Mr. Edwards has resorted to probabilities, and has endeavored to infer a confirmation or corroboration in its favor, from circumstances that are susceptible of no such interpretation. That which he chiefly relies upon is the omission of the Receiver at Edwardsville to make his deposits in the Edwardsville bank, in the fourth quarter of 1819, which, he states, was in consequence of his publication and advice; and, he asks whether it is to be believed that the Receiver would have withheld the deposits, contrary to the Secretary's orders, without giving him a reason; and whether, if he had done so, the Secretary would not have called him to account.

* Two facts must have occurred, if these communications were made, to account for the letter of the Receiver not being on file, and for the Secretary's answer not being on record, or among the rough drafts: 1st. That the letter itself has been lost; 2d. That the answer was not copied. Though the concurrence of these two facts is possible, it is highly improbable.

H. OF R.

Answer of the Secretary of the Treasury.

MAY, 1824.

The means exist, in the monthly returns of the Receiver, and the correspondence between him and the Secretary, on record in the Department, by the aid of which this may be investigated. Copies of these papers are herewith transmitted.

By these it will be seen that the first instructions given to the Receiver to make his deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, were of the 21st December, 1818; that, in pursuance of these instructions, he made his first deposit in that bank on the 28th February, 1819; of $12,000, at which time he retained in his possession a balance of $20,092. On the 31st of March, he deposited $4,500, and retained a balance of $18,600. On the 30th April, he deposited $5,861, and retained $19,168. In May, he made no deposits, and in June, only $8,179, retaining $19,143; and from that time to the 30th December, he made no deposits. Whence, it appears, that, with the exception of a small sum in June, amounting to less than one-third of the money then on hand, he made no deposits between the last of April and the last of December, a period of eight months; during which he retained an increasing balance of from $20,000 to $56,000; and that, even on the last of December, he did not pay over, by about $10,000, all the money then in his possession.

Instead of a withholding of the deposits, in the fourth quarter of the year, here is a retention of them, with the exception before noticed, for eight months. It was scarcely contended that all these omissions of duty were the result of the advice given by Mr. Edwards to the Receiver, to withhold the deposits, until he could receive the Secretary's instructions. On the contrary, it will be shown, by the correspondence, as far as it is susceptible of being shown, negatively, that no part of these moneys was withheld from deposit upon that pretext.

On the 6th of August, at about which time the Receiver's monthly return, for June, was received, the Secretary wrote to the Receiver to know why he retained the public moneys in his hands, contrary to his instructions, and informing him that, as there was a bank at his place of residence, there could be no excuse for his doing so.

On the 18th September, (see No. 20,) Mrs. Stephenson, the wife of the Receiver, answered this letter, in consequence of the absence of her husband, and informed the Secretary that, from what she had heard in conversation between the Receiver and others, she believed he had retained the money to meet the drafts of certain public agents in that country, which the Secretary had authorized him to purchase. And it is to be observed, that, though this was the "Fall of 1819," Mrs. Stephenson said nothing of Mr. Edwards's publication or advice.

On the first of November, (see No. 23,) the Secretary wrote again to the Receiver, complaining of the continued detention of the public money in his hands, which he presumed had been the result of his letter of the 9th of April, (see No. 17,) and directed that, immediately on receipt of this letter, he will pay into bank the whole of the public money in his possession on the 30th instant, and further instructing him not to consider the letter of the 9th of April as authorizing him to retain the public money in his hands at the end of each month. Here it appears that, so far from attributing the withholding of the deposits to the cause alleged by Mr. Edwards, the Secretary attributes it to the cause assigned by Mrs. Stephenson in her letter of the 18th September. And it is worthy of remark, that this is the last letter on record, from the Secretary to the Receiver, in relation to the deposits, in the year 1819; and that this was the last letter written to him on that subject in that year will appear by a reference made to it in a letter from the Secretary to the Receiver, of the 20th of April, 1820, (see No. 26,) which is more particularly noticed hereafter.

On the 28th October, (see No. 22,) the Receiver, who had then returned home, wrote to the Secretary, acknowledging the receipt of a letter of the 21st of September, (see No. 31,) with a new form of an account current.

On the 5th of November, (see No. 24,) the Receiver wrote to the Secretary, enclosing a draft, which he had purchased, transmitted his monthly return for October, and noticing a small error in his account for August.

On the 16th of November, (see No. 25,) he again wrote to the Secretary, enclosing the second of the draft which he had transmitted on the 5th. But in all this time there was no allusion to Mr. Edwards's publication and advice, although "the Fall of 1819" was now nearly gone.

At last, on the 31st of December, (see No. 12,) the Receiver made a deposit in bank; in consequence, it is fairly to be inferred, of the peremptory order of the Secretary of the 1st November, and in consequence of that only.

That Mr. Edwards's publication and advice were not the cause of the retention of the money by the Receiver before the 18th of September, is manifest from Mrs. Stephenson's letter of that date.

That no such cause of retention existed, within the knowledge of the Secretary, before the 1st of November, is manifest from his letter of that date. If the Receiver had, at any time between the date of his wife's letter and of his own letter of the 15th November, made the communication alleged by Mr. Edwards, it is to be presumed that he would, in some manner or other, have alluded to it in that letter, or in the previous one of the 5th of November. He must have discovered, on his return from Kentucky, that the Secretary was dissatisfied with him for retaining the public money in his hands. He must have been aware that every subsequent return which he transmitted to the Treasury, as it exhibited an increasing balance, and as it showed that he had made no deposits in bank, would aggravate the Secretary's dissatisfaction. Under such circumstances, what would be so natural for him, when he had occasion to write to the Secretary, as to make some allusion to the communication which explained the reason of his apparent disobedience, and to the instructions which he had expected in answer, for the government of his conduct in that important particular? The presumption is, that if such a justification of his conduct as is now pretended had existed, he would without doubt have assigned it; but, instead of doing so, he contented himself with the excuse made by Mrs. Stephenson. Therefore he was silent on the subject. He waited the result of her letter. That he received in December; and, accordingly, in December it is found that, in partial compliance with the peremptory order contained in the Secretary's answer to his wife's letter, he made a deposit in bank.

That no other letter was written to him on the subject of his deposits, after that of the 1st of November, is to be inferred from the tenor of the Secretary's letter of the 20th April, 1820, which was produced by his renewed remissness. This letter begins thus:

"On the first of November last, you were instructed to pay into bank the whole of the money in your hands on the 30th of that month, and not to retain the public money in your hands at the end of each month. By referring to your monthly returns for the months of December, January, and February, it appears that the instruction has not been complied with—a sum exceeding $10,000, upon an average, having been retained by you during those months. As the bank in which your deposits have been directed to be made, is established in the place in which your office is kept, the retention of the money, or any part of it, one day beyond the expiration of the month, is without any apparent excuse." After again repeating the directions for him to deposit, and remarking upon some irregularity in his returns, the Secretary concludes thus: "It is expected that all regulations addressed to public officers will be promptly complied with; and that, when, from any circumstance, this should be found impracticable, the cause of non-compliance shall be communicated without delay."

MAY, 1824.

Answer of the Secretary of the Treasury.

H. OF R.

If any instruction in relation to his deposits had been given to the Receiver, since the order of the 1st of November, that order would scarcely have been referred to alone. And, if any excuse or explanation had been received by the Secretary, subsequent to the 1st of November, such as would have been afforded by Mr. Edwards's publication and advice, the order of the 1st of November would not have been repeated and renewed as an order unsatisfied and unanswered. The style and manner of this letter of April 20 indicate not only that neglect had occurred, but that no explanation had been offered for the neglect. The Receiver's answer confirms this conclusion. The Receiver had found, by the letter of the 1st of November, that, so far, the excuse offered by Mrs. Stephenson of retaining money to meet the Indian payments, had been admitted. But, when, in the month of April following, he was called upon to account for his subsequent omissions of duty, omissions for which that excuse would no longer avail, would he not, in justification of himself, have naturally referred to any and every letter that he had written on the subject; and if, in any such letter, he had made a communication of the kind alleged by Mr. Edwards, would he not, on this occasion, have made some allusion to it?

All these circumstances, corroborating each other so fully, are not only irreconcilable with the inference which Mr. Edwards draws from the withholding of the deposits by the Receiver, but they lead inevitably to the conclusion, that the alleged communication of his publication and advice, as a reason for withholding the deposits, was never made to, or received by, the Secretary, and that no such letter, as he alleges to have been written by the Secretary, was ever written in consequence of any such communication.

There is, however, other testimony furnished by the Receiver and Mr. Edwards themselves, which confirms this conclusion.

Mr. Edwards has stated, on oath, that he made the publication, and had it specially communicated to the Secretary by the Receiver, for the purpose of apprising the Secretary of his intention to withdraw from the bank, and his determination to relieve himself from all responsibility in regard to it, leaving the Secretary to judge for himself, from the returns, which he required it to make, of the propriety of continuing it a depository of public money; that, "according to the pledge which he had given in his publication, he resigned his seat as a director. And, though he was once elected to the same station since that time, he refused to accept it, nor has he had any thing to do with the management of the bank, since the Fall of the year 1819."

Yet, in the following Winter, Mr. Edwards is found presenting himself to the Secretary, not only in the character of a director of the bank, but of a director, specially delegated and authorized by the bank to conclude an important arrangement with the Secretary, in respect to the terms on which the bank was to continue a depository of public money. By the printed papers accompanying the Secretary's report to the House, of the 27th of April, 1822, it appears that, on the 16th of February, 1820, Mr. Edwards being then in Washington, transmitted to the Secretary a letter from the bank to the Secretary, signed by this very Receiver as President of the bank, containing a list of the directors, for the year 1820, in which Mr. Edwards's name is included; that, at the same time, he also transmitted to the Secretary a letter from the bank, signed by the same Mr. Stephenson, informing the Secretary that Mr. Edwards, "one of the directors of the institution" is authorized to suggest certain modifications of the contract between the Secretary and the bank, and to conclude such arrangements as he may deem acceptable, "which will be considered obligatory;" and he likewise transmitted, at the same time, a letter from the bank addressed to himself, signed also by Mr. Stephenson, stating to him at large the changes desired by the bank, and the reasons therefor.

Is this compatible with the impressions which the statement, contained in his testimony, is calculated to produce? If he had ceased to be a director, and publicly withdrawn from all concern in the management of the bank, in "the Fall of 1819," how was it that Mr. Stephenson, the Receiver, the President of the Bank, who, as well from his official situation as from "the known friendship and intimacy" (Address, page 14) which Mr. Edwards has stated to have subsisted between them, may be supposed to have known something of his conduct and views in regard to the bank, should, so soon after Mr. Edwards's public withdrawal, have written to him, and constituted him, in his character of director, the representative of the bank, in a negotiation with the Secretary—that Secretary whom Mr. Edwards was so anxious to satisfy of his having no connexion with the bank? And, finally, how could he, if such had been the fact, communicate to the Secretary, without explanation, all these papers, which were totally at variance with it? If he had supposed the Secretary to have been informed, at the time of his having withdrawn from the bank, in 1819, would he not also have supposed that the Secretary would be at some loss, on receiving these papers, to understand what was Mr. Edwards's actual relationship to the bank? If he had not wished to be considered, by the Secretary, as a director and agent of the bank, which the papers purported, would he not, in some way, have given him to understand that he was not so? Instead of doing this, in his letter to the Secretary, accompanying the papers, he referred to them as fully explanatory of their object, and thereby gave his assent to their contents.

Evidence might, indeed, be more positive; but, taking all these circumstances in connexion with each other, it is doubtful whether any negative evidence could more satisfactorily establish the conviction, in any candid mind, that no such communications, as Mr. Edwards has alleged, ever passed between the Secretary and the Receiver.

Mr. Edwards claims to have found a further confirmation on the Receiver's letter having been written and received by the Secretary, in the expressions used by the Secretary in speaking of the letter alleged to have been written to him by the Receiver. This idea, however, is groundless. There is no real difference in the meaning of the words employed by the Secretary and those of Mr. Edwards, in relation to the letter. If the Receiver had discontinued the deposits, for reasons stated by him to the Secretary, (as Mr. E. alleges,) and if he had, in consequence, received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits, (as Mr. E. also alleges,) such a letter, whatever might have been its form, was, in fact, an answer to the letter of the Receiver. The denial of the Secretary that any such answer was recollectcd, or was on record, so far from being evasive, was direct and explicit, and covers, as was intended, the whole ground presented in the charge.

But this charge, contradicted, as it is, by all the facts which have been adduced in the case, is also rendered more improbable by the want of any assignable motive for the Secretary's alleged conduct on the subject. What object had he to serve by continuing the deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, if he had received any communications which authorized the opinion that they were insecure in that bank? Mr. Edwards has charged him with an improper partiality for the Bank of Missouri, yet it was that bank from which the deposits were taken, to be placed in the Bank of Edwardsville; and it was to that bank that they must have been restored, if they were withdrawn from the Bank of Edwardsville. There was no other bank within reach. If the charge of favoritism towards the Bank of Missouri were well founded, the Secretary would have readily availed himself of the pretext furnished by the alleged communication of the Receiver, for restoring the deposit to that bank.

The instructions given to the Receiver at Kaskaskia, to deposit in the Bank of Missouri, so far from confirming the allegation, that a letter from the Receiver at Edwardsville, enclosing the publication of Mr. Edwards, had been received by the Secretary, lead to a contrary conclusion. The correspondence with that Receiver, at the period in question, is herewith transmitted. It appears that, on the 18th of September, 1819, this Receiver wrote to the Secretary, enclosing his account current for the month of August preceding; and, as there appeared, by that account, a large balance of public money in his hands, amounting to about $30,000, he seems to have considered it necessary to explain the cause. His explanation was the same as that offered by Mrs. Stephenson, for a like retention of money, to meet the Indian payments; and, in this case, as in the other, not any publication of Mr. Edwards, or any circumstance affecting the character of the Bank of Edwardsville, which, if such had existed, he was bound by the Secretary's instructions to communicate. It was known to the Secretary that it was not so convenient for this Receiver to deposit at Edwardsville, between which place and Kaskaskia there was very little communication, as at St. Louis, with which there was frequent intercourse. In the next letter written to this Receiver by the Secretary, which was on the 1st of November, 1819, the Secretary without alluding to any publication of Mr. Edwards, or any letter from the Receiver at Edwardsville, which, if any had been known to him would naturally have been alluded to on such an occasion, directed the Receiver at Kaskaskia to deposit in the Bank of Edwardsville all the money in his possession, at the close of the month, and afterwards to deposit in the Bank of Missouri. The Receiver did not make this deposit, for reasons stated by him in his letter of the 10th of January, 1820, until the 3d of that month, as will be seen by the list of moneys deposited by him on that day. From his silence on the subject, it is evident that there was nothing in the circumstances of the bank to render the deposits improper.

The accusation of having presented contradictory statements of the amount of public money in the Bank of Edwardsville, and of having transposed other statements from that bank, in the communications made by the Secretary to the House, and of having done so for the purpose of disguising the truth in relation to the deposits in that bank, with a view to their bearing on the charge connected with these supposed letters, is altogether without foundation. The bank statements of December and November, which are referred to, either formed part of, or accompanied the letters, which they immediately follow in the printed papers; the first having been written on part of the same paper as the letter of the 7th of January, 1820, to Mr. Edwards, and the letter having been enclosed in the letter of the 6th of January, and both the letters and statements having, when transmitted by Mr. Edwards, in his letter of the 16th February, been, it is believed, in the same order as that in which they appear in the documents. The Treasury statements, from which the balances in the Bank of Edwardsville, at the end of the 3d, 3d, and 4th quarters of 1819, are quoted by Mr. Edwards, were prepared, by the Treasurer, from materials in his own possession; and the Secretary had no more to do with the preparation of them, than Mr. Edwards himself. They were communicated as the statements of that officer. The cause why the statement of the fourth quarter of 1819, differs in amount from that rendered by the bank for the same period, is, that, in the former, the Treasurer has deducted from the sum standing to his credit in the bank, the amount of two drafts which he had drawn on the bank, and which had not been paid at the time, when the bank statement was prepared. The sum stated by the bank is, therefore, more than that stated by the Treasurer, by the amount of these drafts. This is more particularly shown in the accompanying note from the Treasurer, all of whose statements are prepared on the same principle, and have always been so prepared. It is considered unnecessary to dwell longer on this branch of the subject. That no such communications, as Mr. Edwards alleges, were made, is believed to be conclusively demonstrated; and if so, no arts could have been resorted to for the purpose of concealing them. But, at every stage of this investigation, this remark naturally suggests itself; that even if both the communications alleged had actually been made, there was nothing in that fact for the Secretary to conceal; Mr. Edwards has stated, on oath, his opinion, that, in the Fall of 1819, the Bank of Edwardsville was in as good a condition as any bank in which the public moneys were deposited; and, if so, what necessity was there for the Secretary to discontinue the deposits? Whether Mr. Edwards was, or was not, a director, and whether he did or did not choose to be responsible for a bank, if the bank were in a good condition, was a matter that ought to have had very little influence upon the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury. In connexion with this charge, it is to be remarked, that it is true that communications were made to the Secretary against the Edwardsville Bank, and particularly in a letter from the President of the Bank of Missouri, of the 9th of August, 1819. But, as the Receivers, both at Edwardsville and Kaskaskia, were instructed, by the Secretary's letter of the 31st-December, 1818, that, if any circumstance affecting the character of the Edwardsville Bank, should come to their knowledge, they should communicate the same to the Department, and as no such information was received from them, and as the bank continued to fulfil its engagements, there was no sufficient reason for discontinuing the arrangement which had been made with it. The fact is, that it was not until two years after the letter of the President of the Bank of Missouri referred to, that the Edwardsville Bank stopped payment. But although this charge is considered as sufficiently answered, the only remaining circumstance presented by Mr. Edwards in its support shall also be noticed. He represents himself to have stated, in two letters written by him to the Secretary, in February, 1822, that he had made such a publication, that the Receiver had transmitted it, that the Receiver's letter containing it had been answered, and infers, from the Secretary's silence on the subject, admission of the fact.

That the Secretary did not reply to this, or to any of the other matters contained in those letters, resulted from his having declined any correspondence with Mr. Edwards on the subjects to which they referred, in consequence of a menace which the first of them contained. This will be seen by the Secretary's answer, which, together with Mr. Edwards's letters, are here-with transmitted.

The next principal accusation to be examined, relates to the Secretary's transactions with the Bank of Missouri, and charges him with having, in the arrangements made with that bank, in regard to the public deposits, allowed it advantages for which it rendered no equivalent, and with having received from it uncurrent bank notes, which he was neither bound nor authorized to receive. The direct connexion between the Treasury and the Bank of Missouri began on the 1st of August, 1818. Before that time the bank had acted as the agent of the Bank of the United States. It had fulfilled its engagements with that institution with good faith; its condition was considered sound and prosperous; and its reputation stood high, as well in the Atlantic as in the Western States. The large amount of money to be received from the sale of public land in that quarter, rendered a connexion with such a bank not only convenient but necessary.

In the first arrangement with the bank, there was no stipulation as to what kinds of money it should receive or pay for the Treasury. The Receivers were instructed to receive the notes of such banks as paid specie on demand for their notes, and no others; and to deposit them in bank to the credit of the Treasurer. When public disbursements were to be made, the Treasurer issued his drafts, and the bank discharged them in such funds as it had received.

On the 23d of June, 1819, the Secretary, in the execution of a general system, which had been adopted with the approbation of the President, for the reasons stated in his report to the House of Representatives of the 14th February, 1822, and in his letter to the chairman of a select committee of the House, of the 24th of February, 1823, proposed a new arrangement to the bank. By this arrangement, the bank was to receive the notes of such specie-paying banks as were in good credit, and in general circulation, and to account for them as cash; to transfer to the Bank of the United States, or its branches, the surplus of the money which it might receive, that could not be disbursed at the bank; and, for the expense and risk of making those transfers, which were expected to amount to a very considerable sum, it was to have a standing deposit of $150,000, which standing deposits was always subject to be reduced by any disbursements that could be made at the bank. This arrangement was accepted by the bank on the 9th of August, 1819. It was modified in August, 1820, by limiting the local bank notes to be received to those of the Atlantic cities, and of the State of Missouri, and thus it continued until the bank stopped payment on the 14th of August, 1821. To estimate, justly, the advantages offered to the bank by this arrangement, it is necessary to examine what were the probable services to be rendered by the bank under it. About the time when the Secretary's proposition for allowing a standing deposits was made to this bank, there was a balance remaining in bank, over and above what could be expended there, of upwards of $640,000; and this, too, after the bank had transferred upwards of $100,000. This large balance had accumulated in rather less than a year. Taking into consideration the revival of credit among the Western banks, which had then taken place, it was reasonable to suppose that the payments into that bank would not decrease more than one half during the next year; upon this supposition, the amount to be transferred under the arrangement would be about $320,000 a year. The risk and cost of transferring money from St. Louis to Louisville, which was the nearest point to which it could be transferred, has been stated by the President of the bank, in his letter of the 29th November, 1819, to be at least three per cent., which upon that sum would be $9,600; and that was reasonably to be looked to, at the time the arrangement was made, as the value of the service probably to be rendered under it, in this respect, by the bank to the Treasury.

It is true that, from causes not then to be foreseen, the subsequent payments into the bank fell short of what had been anticipated. But it is also true, that the whole of the stipulated standing deposits was not always on hand. It has already been stated that this standing deposits was, at all times, liable to be drawn upon by the Treasury. By the Treasurer's statement of quarterly balances, accompanying the Secretary's report to the House, of February 27th, 1823, it appears that it had been so drawn upon, and that, at the close of six different quarters, the whole amount in bank, for which drafts had not actually been issued, was less than the stipulated amount of standing deposits by an average of $20,000. By a statement accompanying the letter from the President of the bank, of the 30th June, 1821, it appears that, at the close of ten successive months, "the whole sum in bank was actually less than the amount of the stipulated deposits by an average of $20,000;" and if, at all other times during the two years' continuance of the arrangement, the full amount were in bank, the average of the sum actually in bank, during the whole period, would have been but $140,000. But, it is to be observed that, in estimating the value of such a deposits to a bank, the certainty of its continuance, for a given time, at least, is to be taken into consideration. In respect to this standing deposits, there was no such certainty; it depended wholly on the convenience of the Treasury. It was constantly subject to drafts for any part, or even the whole; and it was frequently drawn upon. The idea, therefore, that this stipulation, in regard to the standing deposit, was equal to an allowance to the bank of $9,000 a year, is wholly fallacious.

It is proper to look, on the other hand, to the services rendered by the bank. During the continuance of the arrangement, the bank transferred, at its own risk and cost, $454,000 in cash, and about $98,000 in notes in kind. Calculating, then, the value of the transfers at the rate stated for transferring to Louisville, which was the nearest point, at three per cent., and the value of the standing deposit actually on hand at six per cent. a year, (the rate of interest,) it appears that the services actually rendered by the bank, in transferring the public money, may be estimated to amount to $17,800; and that the benefit enjoyed by the bank from the standing deposit, without making any deduction on account of its uncertainty, may be estimated at $16,000; thus leaving a balance in favor of the bank. But, allowing the advantage and the service to be equal, in this respect, nothing then remains but the advantage derived by the bank from the temporary and uncertain possession of the surplus which sometimes remained over and above the deposit, as a compensation for all its other services, in becoming responsible for the notes received by it, in converting them, as far as was requisite, into such funds as might be transferred to the United States Bank, or as might be required in payment of Treasury drafts, which were always demanded in specie or its equivalent; and which, as appears by the letter from the President of the Bank, of the 30th June, 1821, were always so paid. Hence it appears that not only were no undue advantages intended to be granted to the bank by the arrangement, but that, supposing the payment of the debt now due by it to be secured with interest, (as is believed to be the case,) the bank has actually enjoyed no advantages under the arrangement for which it will not have rendered an equivalent.

It is true, this bank has failed. But, it appears by a document produced and relied upon by Mr. Edwards, that after a thorough examination by order of the Missouri Legislature, that its failure is not attributable to any act of dishonesty on the part of the directors, but to that cause only which has produced a general suspension in the Western country; and that, "with a reasonable indulgence, it will be enabled to redeem its notes and pay all its debts." The sum due by it to the Treasury is already in a course of payment, and its ultimate discharge with interest is deemed, by persons who are well acquainted with the security, to be well secured.

The correspondence which led to the reception of the uncurrent notes, which Mr. Edwards has charged the Secretary with having improperly received from the Bank of Missouri, commenced with the letter of the President of the Bank, of the 9th of August, 1819. He there proposed, among other transfers, to transfer $50,000 in such paper of North and South Carolina and Georgia as was authorized to be received; $40,000 in notes of the Bank of Virginia; $103,000 in notes of the Bank of Kentucky and its branches; $15,000 in notes of the Bank of Vincennes; and $70,000 in notes of the Banks of Tennessee, (such as were authorized to be received); and $25,000 in such Ohio notes as were authorized to be received,—all of which were then in bank.

It is to be observed that the letter in which this proposition was made, is the same letter which contains the acceptance by the bank of the arrangement under which it was for the first time to be responsible in cash for all the public money which it might receive. If then it can be shown that these notes had been previously received on account of the Treasury, and were at that time on hand, the agreement of the Secretary to receive the whole or any portion of them, so far from being a subject of blame, was an obligation of duty.

It is also to be observed that all notes which the bank here proposed to transfer were not actually transferred. Before the Secretary's answer was received, the bank had, on its own account, otherwise disposed of a great portion of them; and there were finally transferred the following:

Of Tennessee notes, viz:
Bank of Tennessee and branches	$40,156
Nashville Bank and branches	29,844
Of North Carolina notes, viz:
State Bank of North Carolina	42,000
Of District notes, viz:
Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria	890
Franklin Bank	285
Of Ohio notes, viz:
Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati	11,845
Miami Exporting Company	8,661
Bank of Cincinnati	3,846
Bank of Muskingum	291
Farmers, Mechanics, and Manufacturers' Bank of Chillicothe	350
Bank of Marietta	4
Bank of Steubenville	7
Making together	$136,179

The Kentucky Bank notes mentioned in the Secretary's letter of the 2d March, 1820, were not transferred—having been otherwise disposed of by the bank. Nor were the Georgetown Bank notes, mentioned in the same letter, then transferred; and it is only within a few days that the Treasurer has received from the agent of the Missouri Bank an order for transferring them.

That the notes, thus received from the bank, had been properly taken by the Receivers, will appear from the instructions given to those officers by the Secretary, copies of which are herewith transmitted; and that, at the time those instructions were given, they were considered, by the Secretary, as the notes of banks which discharged their notes in specie, on demand, and, consequently, notes which, by the resolution of Congress of the 30th April, 1816, were authorized to be received in payments to the United States, is manifest from the terms of the same instructions, in which the Receivers are positively interdicted from taking the notes of any bank which does not discharge its notes on demand in specie.

That these notes were received by the bank from the Receivers, during its first arrangement with the Treasury, and, consequently, previous to its engagement to account as cash, and that, at the time they were offered to the Secretary, they were actually in the possession of the bank, is established by evidence adduced by Mr. Edwards himself. This evidence is statement E, prepared at the Bank of Missouri, and laid before the Missouri Legislature by a committee which was appointed to examine the report of the bank, and which committee represents itself to have had before it, and carefully examined, the books, notes, and such other papers of the bank, as were necessary. The statements is "Of moneys on hand, September 6, 1819, received of the several Receivers of Public Moneys; being such as they were authorized to receive, by the honorable William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury." It purports to have been taken from a register kept by the Cashier of the bank, from the 8th August, 1818, to the 6th September, 1819; which period includes only twenty-seven days not embraced by the first arrangement, under which the bank was accountable only in kind. By this statement, it appears, that the bank had then on hand, notes, taken from Receivers, of a description not receivable by it on general deposits as cash, amounting to $569,064; of which $283,757, were of the kinds transferred by it to the Treasury. Hence, it appears, that, instead of the Secretary's having received of the bank uncurrent notes which he was not bound to receive, the bank not only took upon itself the conversion into cash of other notes, to a large amount, which it had a right to pay over to the Treasury in kind, but that of the very description of notes which Mr. Edwards has censured the Secretary for having received, the bank had actually a right to require that he should receive more than double the amount of what he did receive.

It would be a great mistake, however, to suppose that the notes, which were received of the Bank of Missouri, were the notes of insolvent banks. Those of the Bank of Tennessee, and its branches, were immediately placed to the credit of the Treasurer as cash; those of the Nashville Bank and its branches, and of the North Carolina Bank, have long since been paid; those of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, Bank of Marietta, and Bank of Steubenville, were cashed by the banks to which they were transferred; of those of the Miami Exporting Company, $5,320 76, have recently been collected. Thus, of the whole amount transferred, there remains unpaid only about $22,000, and, of this sum, it is believed the greater part will be ultimately paid.

Considering the state of the currency in the West, during the time, and the large amount received by this bank, which was about $1,164,000, it is doubtful whether any individual transactions, of equal extent, though attended to with great care, would have been followed by less ultimate loss.

That the charge of having favored this bank, at the sacrifice of the public interest, is without foundation, must be evident from the facts which have been here exhibited. That the bank does not consider itself as having been favored by the Treasury, is proved by the fact that a claim has been preferred by the bank for an allowance, upon the ground that the services, which it has rendered to the Treasury, have not been sufficiently compensated. And it is a remarkable coincidence of circumstances, that, at the very time that a charge is preferred by Mr. Edwards against the Secretary, for having done too much for that bank, the agent of the bank is at Washington, petitioning Congress, because the Secretary has done too little.

The transactions with the Bank of Missouri being thus explained, the only other acts, included in the charge against the Secretary, of having received uncurrent funds, in payment from banks, are the receipt of $15,000, in notes of the State Bank of North Carolina, and $18,562, in notes of the Bank of Kentucky; the former from the Tombigbee Bank, and the latter from the Bank of Edwardsville.

Although, by a rigid construction of the arrangement, by which these Banks agreed to account for the public deposits, received by them, as cash, the whole amount might, perhaps, have been demanded of them in specie, or United States' Bank notes; yet, such was never the intention of the parties. The term "cash" was used, in opposition to that of "special deposits," and was not meant to render the banks liable for the payment of specie, for notes, which they might receive, on behalf of the Treasury, and which might cease to be convertible into specie. Such a construction is opposed by the Tombigbee Bank, in its letter of the 13th of August, 1819, [see M. No. 6, [86.]] although the President of that institution expresses its willingness to leave the construction to the "justice and liberal policy" of the Department. It is more emphatically disclaimed, however, by the Bank of Edwardsville, in its letter to the Secretary, of the 18th of April, 1820, [see G. No. 3, [86.]] and in his letter to Mr. Edwards, of the 6th of January, 1820, [see A. No. 2, [119.]] heretofore referred to. In that letter the bank maintains that "It is not supposed that any construction of the conditions, upon which the deposits were received, can render the bank the guarantee of those banks, because it would be contrary to every principle of reason, to suppose that the paper of other banks, who have, or may, suspend specie payments, shall, by the mere act of deposits, in this Institution, by the Receivers, be converted into specie, or its equivalent, and this bank held accountable for it as such. We are persuaded this never was the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury, nor can be inferred, from the conditions upon which the deposits are made." This letter, as it was written by the President of the bank, to one of its Directors, whom it had constituted an agent for negotiating a modification of its arrangement, with the Treasury, may be naturally supposed to contain its real views. And, although Mr. Edwards now denies the construction then contended for, by the bank, yet, from the terms in which he communicated the letter to the Secretary, it is presumed that he then gave it his assent.

But, although this construction could not be formally acknowledged by the Secretary, without leading to the evil which the terms of these arrangements were partly intended to prevent, that of "special deposits," yet, it was always his intention, whenever the case presented itself, to admit such an interpretation of the contract, as might be equitable, and not injurious to the public interest. The letter of the Tombigbee Bank, of the 3d of August, 1819, stating that there were then on hand, in that institution, $15,000, in North Carolina notes, which had been received, on deposits, for the Treasurer, and which it had not yet been able to exchange, although no care had been spared in effecting that object, "since some difficulties were understood to affect the bank," presented a case of this kind. At that time, the State Bank of North Carolina had not stopped payment, although it did so before the Secretary's answer was communicated to the Tombigbee Bank. The Secretary, having called upon the State Bank to disclose the means of paying such of its notes as had been received, on account of the Treasury; and having been informed, by the bank, that it did possess the means, and would speedily apply them to that object, consented that these notes should be transferred, from the credit of the Treasurer, in the Tombigbee Bank, to the credit of the Treasurer, in the State Bank of North Carolina; and, by that bank, they were afterwards paid, as were all the other claims, of every kind, which the Treasury had upon it.

H. OF R.

Answer of the Secretary of the Treasury.

MAY, 1824.

The case of the Edwardsville Bank, added to the equitable considerations which were presented in that of the Tombigbee Bank, were considerations of policy. The communication of the Hon. R. M. Johnson, made on behalf of the bank, and referred to in the Secretary's letter of the 2d February, 1821, [see G. No. 8. [66.] which communication was made with the concurrence of Mr. Edwards, stated that the bank had on hand upwards of $20,000, in notes on the Bank of Kentucky, which had been received on account of the Treasurer before the suspension of specie payments by the bank. This representation being corroborated by an examination of the bank statements and certificates, as appears by the Secretary's report to the House, of the 27th April, 1822; and there being then some reason to apprehend a want of punctuality or of good faith on the part of the Bank of Edwardsville, the Secretary consented that these notes should be transferred at the risk of the bank, from the credit of the Treasurer in that bank, to the credit of the Treasurer in the Bank of Kentucky. In doing so, the Secretary considered himself not only satisfying the demands of equity, but promoting the public interest; inasmuch as the Bank of Kentucky, though it had suspended the payment of specie, was known to be solvent. Although the notes, thus transferred, have not yet been paid, the most positive and formal assurance has been given, that the debt is perfectly safe, and will most certainly be repaid at no very remote period.

Mr. Edwards has offered an extract from the Secretary's letter of the 11th of December, 1818, to the President of the Planters and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville, as proving that the Secretary's conduct in receiving these notes, is at variance with his own interpretation of the obligations of the banks in that respect. But, by referring to the letter itself, it will be found that, in presenting the extract, an important omission has been made, by which the Secretary's opinion on the point is wholly misrepresented. As quoted by Mr. Edwards, the passage is in these words: "In making the Planters and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville a place of deposit, at its particular solicitation, it was expected that the transfer of funds which it undertook to make, would be effected in funds that circulated at par, at the place where the transfer was directed. As the Receiver had been directed to receive the bills of no banks which did not discharge them in specie on demand, it was expected that the bank would be answerable for the amount deposited; in specie, or in bills which would be received as specie, at the place to which the money should be directed to be transferred, unless it should state the contrary. "But," as continues the Secretary, (and this is the part omitted by Mr. Edwards,) "as no explanation of this nature has been made or sought on either side, this requisition will not be rigorously required." There is, however, no question concerning this bank, as no uncurrent notes were ever received from it.

The charge of having received uncurrent notes from the Banks of Missouri, Edwardsville, and Tombigbee, contrary to the agreement with those banks, and contrary to law, being thus answered, there remains, in connexion with this branch of Mr. Edwards's accusation against the Secretary, only that of having, in his report to Congress, misstated the amount so received. Upon a thorough examination, however, it is asserted, that all the notes received from those banks, for which the Treasurer did not receive a cash credit in the banks to which they were transferred, were specified in the report made by the Secretary on the subject, with the exception of $285, in notes of the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, which formed part of the funds received from the Bank of Missouri, agreeably to his letter of 20th of March, 1820, but which, in his report of the 14th of February, 1822, were accidentally omitted to be mentioned. That there was no intentional concealment on this subject, is evident, from the manner in which the Secretary complied with that part of the resolution which referred to it. By the resolution he was required to state whether any uncurrent or depreciated paper had been received from certain banks, which the Government was not bound to receive. As the Secretary was of opinion that all the paper of that description which he had received from those banks, was paper that he was bound to receive, he might, without blame, have answered, that none such as were alluded to in the resolution had been received. Desirous, however, to put the House in possession of all the facts, he stated what uncurrent paper had been received, and why it had been received; and he included in the statement paper to the amount of several thousand dollars, which, at the time he made his deposit, had actually been paid in cash. Under these circumstances, it might have been reasonably supposed that this trivial omission was, as was truly the case, wholly accidental and unintentional.

The charge of withholding letters and information called for by the House, rests upon no better foundation. This, however, may have originated in part, in the want of attention to the true import of the resolution under which these letters and information were called for. The resolution of the House, of the 9th of January, 1822, as printed, required "a statement showing in what banks the moneys received from the sale of the public lands have been deposited since the 1st of January, 1818; the contracts under which the said deposits have been made; the correspondence between them and the Treasury Department relative thereto," &c. It has been doubted whether, according to the proper rules of construction, the correspondence here called for, related to any thing more than the contracts. It is believed, however, that this doubt gives place to certainty upon an inspection of the resolution, as transmitted to the Secretary by the Clerk of the House, between which and the resolution as printed, there is a remarkable difference in the punctuation. That which appears in the latter as the first member of a sentence, terminating with a semicolon, is, in the original, (see annexed No. 41, which is herewith transmitted,) a complete sentence ending with a period. By this difference, the words "relative thereto," are made applicable exclusively to the contracts; and, of course, the correspondence required by the resolution is the correspondence between those banks and the Treasury, relative to the contracts under which the moneys received from the sales of public lands since the 1st of January, 1818, have been deposited.

It will be seen, however, that, in the collection of the correspondence, it was not confined to that object; but, that, in addition to every thing which related thereto, there was communicated so much of the other correspondence with the banks referred to, as would enable the House to form a just opinion of the whole subject, not only of the arrangements with these banks in this particular, but of the relationship subsisting between them and the Treasury.

The resolution of the House, of the 12th of March,

May, 1824.

Answer of the Secretary of the Treasury.

H. OF R.

1822, had reference only to three banks, those of Edwardsville, Tombigbee, and Missouri; it called for no correspondence except in relation to the Bank of Missouri, and, as it required all the correspondence in relation to that bank, not before communicated, all such correspondence as could be found was transmitted. Yet, although these two resolutions are distinct from each other in their requirements, Mr. Edwards affects to consider every letter which was communicated under the latter as having been improperly withheld under the former.

That some of the papers transmitted under this resolution might not, with propriety, and perhaps with advantage, have been sent under the first resolution, is not asserted. Whether any such, if any such there be, were accidentally omitted, or whether they were not deemed necessary to an understanding of the subject, is not now recollected. As there was no consciousness on the part of the Secretary that any of his transactions required concealment, or merited censure, and as it was supposed that the object of the resolution was exclusively to obtain information, the whole aim in selecting the papers and making the communication, was to put the House in possession of such information, and such only, as would best serve to elucidate the subject to which it related.

But, to whatever cause the omission of any of these papers is attributable, the omission itself is unimportant. It is believed that the papers communicated under the second resolution, or the great mass which has been communicated under the third resolution, disclose no new fact which it was important, in relation to the subject of the resolution, either to communicate or to withhold. The idea of concealment was wholly out of the question. The delicate nature of many of the letters communicated under the first resolution, shows, perhaps, a leaning the other way. But, there was really nothing of moment to be concealed. The general outline of the arrangements with the Western banks was well known. They had been published in most of the newspapers in the countries interested in them; and they were familiar to many gentlemen in Congress, some of whom had been among the first to press upon the Secretary the necessity and advantage of such arrangements.

Disclaiming, then, in the most unqualified manner, any wish or intention in the Secretary, of concealing any part of his conduct in relation to those banks, the opinion is confidently repeated, that, after an examination of all the correspondence that has been, at various times, communicated to the House, it will be found that, although more ample details are exhibited, because the papers subsequently presented are more numerous, as clear and faithful a view of the connexion between the Western banks and the Treasury, was presented under the first resolution, as is exhibited in the whole mass of the correspondence. But, if the fact were otherwise, nothing could be more unjust than to consider the omission of every letter not communicated under that resolution, as a suppression with an improper design.

Although these explanations may be deemed a sufficient answer to Mr. Edwards's charge of suppression, generally, yet, there are some particular instances which he has specially dwelt upon, and to which he attaches particular importance, that it may be well specially to notice. The first of these is, the circumstance that "extracts" were communicated instead of entire letters, in parts of the correspondence with the Planters and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville.

By referring to the letters alluded to, and which have been transmitted entire, under the last resolution of the House, it will be seen that the parts omitted to be communicated, relate to an occurrence wholly of a temporary nature, entirely unimportant in itself, and having no bearing whatever on the subject of the call. It seems that, after the termination of the arrangement between the Bank of the United States and the Bank at Huntsville, the Cashier of the former drew certain drafts upon the amount standing at his credit in the latter bank. These, the Bank at Huntsville declined to pay, under an erroneous idea that it was accountable to the Treasury for the money.

As soon as this was made known to the Secretary, he wrote to the Huntsville Bank, to remove the misunderstanding. The bank justified itself by quoting certain expressions of the Secretary's circular, of July, 1819. The Secretary replied that, if the bank had quoted correctly, the circular must have been imperfect, and desired to have it sent back for examination. It was sent back; and was found to be inaccurately copied; the misunderstanding was removed; and the drafts were paid; and there the whole matter ended. In the passages relating to this subject, notice was also taken of the accidental omission of the bank to render some returns. These are the parts of the letters in the correspondence which were not communicated; and this explanation will show with what little reason it has been inferred that every omission in the correspondence contains something which the Secretary must have an improper motive to conceal.

These observations apply to all the extracts transmitted in that correspondence, except the letter of the President of the Huntsville Bank, of the 30th September, 1819. As this letter does not appear to have been transmitted under the last resolution, it is presumed to have been mislaid. The purport of the preceding part of it is not recollected, but search is now making for it, and as soon as it is found, it will be communicated.

An additional importance is attached, by Mr. Edwards, to the circumstance of "extracts" being sent in this case, as contradicting that part of the Secretary's testimony before a former select committee of the House, which, speaking of the correspondence generally, states that, in consequence of the pressure of business, the original letters and rough drafts had been communicated under the resolution of the 14th February, 1822. No such contradiction, however, can be imagined without misinterpreting the obvious import of the Secretary's words. He spoke of the communication generally; and it is a fact well known, that it consisted almost entirely of originals and rough drafts. But it is irreconcilable with common sense, to suppose that he meant to convey the idea that papers which bore on their face the title of "extracts," which he had himself communicated and described as "extracts," were either originals or rough drafts.

Neither the Secretary nor Mr. Dickens has any where said, in their testimony, as Mr. Edwards supposes, that the latter delivered all the originals and rough drafts to the Secretary, and that the Secretary sent them all to the House. The fact is otherwise. All the correspondence with the banks referred to, was not called for, as has been already shown; nor was it ever asserted that all was sent. Mr. Dickens collected, as he has stated, all the correspondence that he could find, filed and unfiled, that was likely to have any bearing on the subject; from this he selected

H. OF R.

Answer of the Secretary of the Treasury.

MAY, 1824.

such as, in his judgment, was required by the resolution; and such "extracts" as were made, were made under the exercise of this judgment. After the papers had been thus selected and arranged, he laid them before the Secretary, together with such statements in relation to other parts of the resolution, as the Secretary might require for his report. These papers were in the possession of the Secretary while he prepared his report, but were referred to no further than was necessary for that object; and the correspondence thus prepared by Mr. Dickens, was transmitted, in the same state, to the House. This circumstance will explain the appearance of the marks on the passages which Mr. Dickens has stated to have been marked by him for the purpose of calling the Secretary's attention to them, and which, if they had been observed by the Secretary, would have been acted on by him, either by directing the marks to be removed, or extracts excluding those passages to be prepared.

To remove all pretext for the insinuation which Mr. Edwards has founded upon the circumstance of Mr. Dickens having been employed to select the papers, in this case, instead of Mr. Jones, the Chief Clerk, to whom it had been usual to commit the selection of papers required by Congress, it is proper to state, that the resolution of the House did, in this instance, take the usual course of reference to Mr. Jones; and that it was at his request, and upon his suggestion of the propriety of referring it to Mr. Dickens, because of his better knowledge of the subject, that the duty was transferred to him.

There is one other omission in the correspondence which has been emphatically alluded to by Mr. Edwards, and which shall, therefore, be particularly noticed. It is a letter from the Secretary to the President of the Bank at Huntsville, of the 9th of July, 1819; and is more than once referred to in other parts of the correspondence: whether it had been communicated or not, was never a subject of investigation with the Secretary, until the notice taken of it in Mr. Edwards's address rendered the inquiry necessary. After a thorough examination, however, it could not be found, either among the records or rough draughts; but, on referring, as a last resort, to a file of confidential correspondence which is kept by Mr. Jones, the rough draft of the letter was there discovered. A copy of it is herewith transmitted. According to the views with which the correspondence was selected, under the first resolution of the House, this letter was one which would have been then communicated. It is believed, however, that the sentiments and opinions disclosed in it, are far from furnishing a subject of blame to the Secretary; and, as he had communicated a letter of similar import, written on the same day, to the Tombigbee Bank, it may be inferred, that he was not withheld by any improper considerations of delicacy in respect to the matters to which they both relate, from communicating this letter also. It is believed that the letter to the Tombigbee Bank, of the 9th of July, 1819, was also marked "confidential," and the opinion is strengthened by the reference made to it as "confidential," by the President of the Bank, in his letter of the 13th August, 1819. The word "confidential," was probably omitted through inadvertence, in the copy that was retained in the Department; and thus it went upon the ordinary records. If this opinion is correct, the communication of this letter corroborates the fact that the omission to communicate the letter to the Huntsville Bank, was not owing to the matters it contained, but to the circumstance of its being on a file not before the person by whom the correspondence was selected.

The Secretary is not aware, that any other letters on the confidential file appertain to the objects of the present inquiry. He submits, however, such of them as are addressed to banks, to the examination of the committee. He takes the occasion, also, to tender to the committee; as he did to the committee appointed under the resolution of the 6th of February, 1823, the inspection of any of the records or correspondence in the Department, that may be deemed necessary to elucidate any of the matters connected with the inquiry.

Having disposed of all the minor topics of accusation brought against the Secretary in Mr. Edwards's address, it now remains to notice the grave charge which he has preferred, of having mismanaged the national funds. As far as this charge is founded upon the particular transactions which have formed the subject of the foregoing observations, it is presumed to be sufficiently refuted. The only remaining ground of charge then is, the measure of employing the State banks as depositories of the public moneys in the Western country.

The circumstances by which this measure was rendered necessary, and the views with which it was adopted under the sanction of the President of the United States, have already been explained in the Secretary's report, of the 14th February, 1823, and in his letter to the select committee, of the 24th of February, 1823, to which a reference is now requested. It may be proper, however, to remark here, that, throughout the Western country, a general and severe distress had followed the resumption of specie payments. On the part of the Treasury, every disposition had been entertained to make the demands of the Government press lightly on a suffering people. With this view the Receivers and Collectors had been authorized, generally, to receive in payments to the United States all the specie paying bank notes in circulation; and the Bank of the United States had liberally seconded the views of the Treasury, by authorizing the reception of these funds from the Receivers and Collectors. This experiment, though it gave relief to the public debtors, had been found injurious to the welfare of the bank; and, by a proper regard for its own safety, that institution considered itself constrained to decline the reception of almost all of those funds which form the currency of that portion of the country, and of those which alone it could prudently take, scarcely any were in circulation. What effect this change had upon the state of things may be inferred from a few extracts from some of the communications which were about that time made to the Secretary in relation to the subject.

"The debtors of the United States," say the Directors of the Bank of Vincennes, in their memorial of the 9th January, 1819, "in the Western country, labor under distressing and almost insuperable difficulties in meeting their engagements; not so much from the want of means; as from the scarcity of such funds as are receivable in payment of public lands. Should the country continue in its present situation with respect to these funds, many an honest citizen, many an industrious farmer, who has migrated to this country, and has paid his last eighty dollars as a first instalment on his quarter section of land, will be compelled, at the end of five years, to leave his favorite spot, his cabin, and all the comfortable improvements, which the labor of his own hands has acquired, and with his wife and children, seek a new home, without money to procure it. And why? Because the produce of his farm, although he may have an abundance to spare, will not command such funds as Government demand for the completion of his payments. Other representations, which are herewith transmitted, from Senators and Representatives, whose character is a sufficient guarantee for the truth of their statements, corroborate these views. The Hon. Mr. Herrick, in a letter of the 11th of March, 1818, considers the adoption of some measure on the subject as desirable, as well with a view to relieve the people, as to preserve their affections for the present administration of the General Government. The Hon. Waller Taylor, in a letter of the 31st March, 1818, encloses a letter from a respectable source, stating that twenty per cent. had been given by those who had payments to make in the land offices, to obtain such money as would be received; that few entries of land were made; and that many who had come from a distance to enter land, had gone away without doing so, because the money they had brought, though consisting of the notes of banks of established character, could not be received. And Mr. Taylor concurs in opinion, that the operation of the existing system was prejudicial to the purchasers of public lands, as well as the citizens of the State. In a joint letter addressed to the Secretary, on the 18th April, 1818, by fourteen Western members of Congress, viz: the Hon. Joseph Desha, William H. Harrison, Robert Moore, Henry Baldwin, William Hendricks, James Noble, Waller Taylor, Richard C. Anderson, Levi Barber, Thomas Speed, John W. Campbell, Samuel Herrick, Peter Hitchcock, and Philemon Beecher; these gentlemen all concur in stating, that "every mail from the West brings us the complaints and requests of the people, on the subject of the pecuniary state of our country;" and they conclude, by recommending, as a measure of vital importance, the redemption of such Western paper of specie-paying banks, as were in good credit. The Hon. J. McLean, of Illinois, in a letter of the 5th of June, 1819, speaking of one of the districts in that State, makes the following representation: "I am well assured, from my own knowledge, and the letters of respectable gentlemen in that part of the country, that, if every note that will be received in payment of land, and every dollar of specie that is in the country, were in the hands of those indebted to the Government for land, it would be insufficient to enable more than one tenth man of our settlers to comply with his engagement. I almost daily receive letters from the people of Shawneetown Land District, and of that part of Illinois included in the Vincennes District, stating that they are in a situation truly distressing, and that, unless there be some amelioration in the directions to the Receivers, that the time is but very short, until they expect to see the little farm and dwelling they have provided for the support and shelter of themselves and family, torn from them by the merciless avaricious speculator. I am sorry to be constrained to say, that their apprehensions are but too justly predicated, and that they represent facts."

These are letters which have presented themselves on a hasty reference to the files of the Department. It is well remembered, however, that numerous and earnest personal representations were made by other gentlemen in Congress, both as to the pecuniary distresses of the Western country, and the necessity of a change in the existing regulations. Representations like these, could not be received with indifference. It is to be recollected, also, that, at the time when this state of things existed, the debt due for public lands amounted to about twenty millions of dollars; the greatest part of which had been contracted during the suspension of specie payments. Upon mature reflection, therefore, and with the approbation of the President, it was deemed advisable to make the arrangements with the Western banks, which are the subject of Mr. Edwards's condemnation.

The details of these arrangements are so fully exhibited in the Secretary's former communications on the subject, that it is not thought necessary here to explain them.

As far as the interests of the people, and of the Treasury, were concerned, it is believed that those arrangements were not merely defensible, but commendable. As far as the measure affected the interests of the Bank of the United States, it is believed to be equally deserving of approbation. In a letter written by the Secretary to the President of that institution, on the 14th September, 1819, he thus explained the motives which, as far as the bank was concerned, influenced his course on the subject:

"It has been my constant endeavor, for more than twelve months past, to prevent, as far as practicable, all collision between the Bank of the United States and the State banks; as far at least as that collision might be connected with the transactions of this Department. It is not my intention, therefore, to give drafts upon the State banks for public money, without previously arranging with them the mode of payment.

"Acting upon the same principle, I have endeavored, in the course of the present year, to make arrangements with the State banks in the Western States, by which they should become the depositories of the public money collected in that section of the Union. I considered the deposits there positively injurious to the bank, for the following reasons, viz:

"1st. That the offices had already extended their discounts in Ohio and Kentucky, further than was consistent with the interest of the bank.

"2d. That every dollar deposited in them on account of the Government, that could not be disbursed there, would have to be employed in discounts, or transferred to the bank in Philadelphia, or its Eastern offices.

"3d. That owing to the state of exchange, transfers could only be made by the transportation of specie across the mountains.

"4th. That, owing to the geographical position of Kentucky and Ohio, the public expenditure would be extremely limited.

"5th. That the transportation of specie from the Western to the Eastern States, by the bank, invariably had produced, and would continue to produce, irritation in the public mind against the bank.

"An additional reason for endeavoring to make State banks in that section of the Union the depositories of the public money, was to increase the receipts, by enabling the public debtors to pay in the notes of specie-paying banks, which would not be received by them, without increasing that collision, which it was my desire to diminish."

These views, it is believed, were too just, not to meet the approbation of the distinguished individual who presided over, and of the enlightened Board which then directed the affairs of, that institution. Accordingly, Mr. Cheves, in his answer of the 5th October, 1819, thus expresses himself: "The Board entirely concurs with you in the views you take, as to the Government collections and deposits in the Western States, which they believe to be calculated to ease the moneyed pressure on that portion of the country, as well as to meet the interests of the Government, and relieve the bank from embarrassing collisions with local banking institutions."

It happened, however, that, in three of the places where the banks were situated, with which the Secretary had made these arrangements, branches of the Bank of the United States were also established. By the charter of that bank, it was the duty of the Secretary to have stated to Congress, at its next session, the reasons why he had directed deposits of the public money to be made in these three banks. This statement, through inadvertence, was not made, as the Secretary has stated in his letter of the 24th February, 1823, to the select committee of the House. But, as a full explanation of the motives of these arrangements had been made to the Bank of the United States, whose interests it was the object of that provision in the charter to guard, and as that institution had approved of the arrangements, and as the arrangements themselves had been published in various newspapers; and as the facts which were to be reported to Congress were of general notoriety, it is submitted, whether the Secretary could have had any motive for withholding the formal communication of the information to Congress.

On the policy of the measure adopted by the Secretary in the employment of the Western banks, it is presumed there can be no doubt. That it has not been entirely successful, is considered to be a subject rather of regret than of censure. But that it has been mainly beneficial it is thought will not be denied by those who candidly examine the subject in all its bearings. And although very little ultimate loss is expected, yet if the whole sum now due by those banks which have stopped payment were to be lost, it is believed that the advantages which have resulted to the country will have been cheaply purchased at that cost.

As some misunderstanding in respect to the special deposits seems to prevail in the public mind, resulting from the misrepresentations that have been made on the subject, it may be proper to take this occasion to remove it.

About the time that the present Secretary of the Treasury took charge of that Department, the special deposit amounted to upwards of three millions of dollars, being, on the 31st of December, 1816, $3,031,459, all of which has since been converted into cash funds, except $291,803. At the date of the Secretary's report of the 22d February, 1823, the amount of the special deposit was $927,107, including the $291,803 above mentioned. Of this sum of $927,107, about $64,000 have since been paid.* Hence, it appears, that of the whole sum now on special deposits, only about $571,000, including the sum due by the defaulting Western banks, have become special during the present Secretary's administration of the Department. When it is considered that this embraces a period of about seven years, during which great disorders have existed, and a great revolution has been effected in the currency, and during which upwards of one hundred and sixty-three millions of dollars have been paid into the Treasury, exclusive of loans and Treasury notes; and that of this sum, upwards of twenty-one millions and a half of dollars having been received from the sale of lands, and internal duties and taxes must have been collected in those portions of the country where the greatest disorders existed; when these circumstances are considered, it is believed that the sum which has become uncurrent during the Secretary's administration of the Treasury, instead of furnishing ground either of censure or surprise by its magnitude, justifies the conclusion, that in this respect, as he trusts will be found the case in all others, the Secretary of the Treasury has not mismanaged the national funds.

* This sum consists of $5,220 76 received from the Miami Exporting Company, $18,728 40 from the Bank of Huntsville, and $40,943 38 in discharge of the debt due by the Branch Bank of Kentucky, at Louisville.

It is believed, however, that it will now be proper to include in the special deposit the sum due by the Bank of Columbia, amounting to $273,361 87; of this sum, all but forty thousand dollars were special when the present Secretary came into the Treasury, and was placed in this bank for the purpose of being converted into cash funds, as stated in the Secretary's report of the 14th of February, 1822. Having effected this object, the bank is now in a condition to refund the money, but an arrangement has been made by which the payment of it, with interest, has been, it is believed, well secured.

In conclusion, the Secretary has the honor to state, that, although it is believed that every material charge contained in the address of Mr. Edwards has now been satisfactorily explained, yet if, in the opinion of the committee, any further explanation be deemed necessary, it will afford him pleasure to give it, either personally or in writing.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved that the report be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. FORSYTH hoped that a copy would be sent, by order of the House, to the President of the United States.

The question was divided, and being first put on laying the report on the table, it was carried.

Mr. COOK expressed an intention to address the House, should the report be called up for consideration, and hoped it would be printed in time.

The question on printing was then put, and carried.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then offered, by direction of the committee, the following:

"Ordered, That the committee, to which was referred the Address of Ninian Edwards, be required to sit after the adjournment of the House, for such time as shall be necessary, in their judgment, for further examination; that any additional report which may be made by them, be filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and that any three members of the committee be a quorum for the transaction of business."

Mr. WILLIAMS wished that the resolution should be suffered to lie on the table for one day.

Mr. TAYLOR hoped that the House was prepared to act on the resolution without delay.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to lay it on the table; and, the question being put, it was carried—ayes 92.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved that a copy of this report be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the President of the United States. He observed, that the same courtesy which had dictated the former communication, when the memorial was presented, and the committee had sent for Mr. Edwards, was proper on the present occasion.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that, with great deference to the honorable gentleman from Georgia, it appeared to him that, when the resolution proposed in the report of the committee should be adopted, it would then be proper to make such communication, but not in the present stage of proceeding.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to lay the resolution he offered on the table, till the determination of the House with respect to that reported by the committee should be known.—Agreed to.

PUBLIC LAND DEBT.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the House took up the bill from the Senate, to provide for the extinguishment of the public debt due to the United States by the purchasers of public lands.

Mr. C. offered an amendment, which goes to extend the provisions of the act to a class of settlers not now included in its relief; and supported it by a course of observations explanatory of the circumstances of the case.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, proposed to amend it by confining its operations to a different class.

Mr. COOK objected to this amendment, as leaving a deserving class of sufferers without any relief.

Mr. VANCE suggested to the gentleman from Illinois to modify his amendment, by a proviso, guarding it from misapplication.

Mr. RANKIN spoke in opposition to the amendment of Mr. COOK.

When, it being found that a quorum was not present, a call of the House was moved, and ordered.

The roll was called, in part, accordingly, when a quorum appearing, the farther call was dispensed with.

The debate was then resumed by Messrs. COOK, WOOD, McARTHUR, McCoy, WHIPPLE, and LIVERMORE; when all the amendments were rejected. The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS BOUNDARY.

On motion of Mr. CONWAY the House, in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SHARPE in the Chair,) considered the bill to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas.

On this bill an animated debate of considerable extent arose, in which Mr. RANKIN opposed the extension of the present boundary of that Territory, as violating the provision of Indian treaties, as giving an improper size to the future State into which this Territory will soon be formed. He denied the right of the settlers to the lands they occupied, and contended that that Territory ought to afford a resting place to the Indians from the eastern side of the Mississippi, &c.

Mr. CONWAY remonstrated with warmth against forty thousand Choctaw Indians turned in among the settlements of Arkansas, to turn out those who had subdued the wilderness, and were surrounded with improvements, the fruit of their own labor, fields, mills, cotton factories, distilleries, &c. He contended that the limits of the Territory should be removed farther to the West, to allow room for these Indians, having a separate home from the whites, &c., and to give strength to Arkansas as a future frontier State.

Mr. WOOD made some remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CONWAY explained.

Mr. CLAY advocated the passage of the bill—represented the hardships of the circumstances of the settlers—considered the new Territories as younger daughters in the common federative family, and, as such, entitled to an indulgent policy—denied that the size of the territory must necessarily govern the size of the future State to be formed out of it, and even if it did, he urged the policy of making Arkansas a strong frontier State. The bill only asks the Indians to consent to remove the line farther west, and does not violate any treaty. It had received the deliberate consideration of the Senate, and he hoped it would pass this House.

Mr. RANKIN rejoined. If this extension of the limits be allowed, the whole must be received as a State, or a small section of its western part must remain (probably forever) a Territory, or else the Indians must be driven still farther west.

Mr. CLAY responded. If Louisiana was not as large as the gentleman could wish, it was an argument rather for than against this bill. He (Mr. C.) had opposed the treaty by which Texas was ceded, and Louisiana consequently reduced in extent. If Louisiana was comparatively weak, the greater need that the adjoining frontier State should be a strong one.

The debate was further continued by Mr. WOOD, Mr. F. JOHNSON, and Mr. ISAACKS, when the Committee rose, and reported the bill to the House; and, the question being put on its final passage, it was decided in the negative—ayes 52, noes 58.

Two Messages were received from the President of the United States; the one transmitting an addition to the Digest of Foreign Commercial Law, previously transmitted—the other, certain documents called for in relation to foreign spoliations on our commerce, &c.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 26.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the representative of Thomas Robinson, deceased," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time this day.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act amendatory of an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, passed the 15th of May, 1820," reported their agreement to the same. The amendments were then read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill for the relief of John Mitchell, agent of prisoners of war at Halifax, with a further amendment, ordering certain parts of his account to be settled on principles of equity, and a balance of five thousand dollars passed to his credit, (lost by the absconding of a third person,) were concurred in.

The resolution, yesterday offered by Mr. CAMBRELENG, calling for information with respect to the amount of French spoliations, was called up, and being by the mover amended so as to extend to thirty instead of eight years, was adopted by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Forrest," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was laid upon the table.

The resolution laid on the table yesterday, by Mr. STEWART, was taken up, read, and agreed to by the House, amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House, at the next session of Congress, the amount of losses sustained, during the last thirty years, upon bonds given for the duties upon imports, distinguishing the amount in each year; and to state whether any, and, if any, what, measures should be adopted by Congress, to prevent similar losses in future; and, also, what effect the total repeal, or a limitation, of the credits, now given for said duties, would, in his opinion, have upon the revenue.

Mr. HAMILTON laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the War Department be instructed to lay before Congress, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a statement of the present state of the works at Dauphin Island, and of the materials which were collected at that point; as well, also, a statement of the probable loss which the country may have sustained from the suspension of said works; and that he, moreover, be instructed to submit a plan and estimate for the works to be erected on Dauphin Island; provided, the Executive should still deem such fortifications necessary.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the representative of Thomas Robinson, deceased," was read the third time, and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, made on the 24th instant, on memorials and petitions upon the subject of spoliations on the commerce of the United States, committed by authority of the French Government; whereupon, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House, at the next session, as early as the public interest will permit, the correspondence which may have been held with the Government of France, prior to that time, on the subject of injuries sustained by citizens of the United States since the year 1806.

A message from the House informed the Senate that they have passed bills of this House, of the following titles, with amendments, viz: An act authorizing the employment of additional clerks, and certain messengers and assistants, and other persons, in the several departments; An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1824, and for other purposes; [Indian affairs.] An act to authorize the building of lighthouses, light-vessels, and beacons, therein mentioned, and for other purposes; An act enabling the claimants to land within the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims; in which amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill last mentioned, was read and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the building of lighthouses, light-vessels, and beacons, therein mentioned, and for other purposes," were read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the employment of additional clerks, and certain messengers and assistants, and other persons, in the several Departments," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1824, and for other purposes," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris," was taken up. The report of a committee in the case was read. Mr. HAMILTON and Mr. BARBOUR stated the history of the transactions to which the bill alludes. The latter gentleman advocated the passage of the bill, and the former opposed it. Mr. WARFIELD, Mr. STRONG, Mr. HAMILTON, and Mr. COCKE, further opposed, and Mr. McCoy advocated the passage of the bill; when, on motion of Mr. STRONG, the Committee rose and reported progress. Leave was refused to sit again, and the bill was laid on the table—ayes 65, noes 41.

Mr. WHIPPLE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred a Message from the President of the United States, communicating a report from Alexander Hamilton, a land commissioner in Florida, made a report thereon; which was read; whereon, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared and transmitted to the Commissioners for the examination of claims and titles to lands in Florida, such instructions touching their powers, and the performance of their duties, under the existing laws, as he may deem necessary, from an examination of the report of Alexander Hamilton, one of the Commissioners, and the report of the other two Commissioners for East Florida.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to adopt such means as he may deem necessary for the safe-keeping and security of the public records of the Spanish Government, in relation to lands in Florida.

ARKANSAS BOUNDARY.

A motion was made, by Mr. ROSS, that the House do reconsider the vote, taken yesterday, on the question, Shall the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes," be read a third time? and on the question, Will the House reconsider the said vote? it passed in the affirmative.

The question was again put, Shall the bill be read a third time? and passed in the affirmative. To-day was then assigned for the third reading of the said bill. The bill was, accordingly, read a third time. And, on the question, Shall it pass? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander of Va., Alexander of Tennessee, J. S. Barbour, Breck, Brent, Buckner, Cocke, Condict, Cook, Craig, Cushman, Findlay, Floyd, Foot of Connecticut, Forward, Harris, Henry, Holcombe, Houston, Ingham, Isacks, Jenkins, Jennings, F. #### CASE OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved for the consideration of the resolution reported yesterday by the committee of investigation in the case of Ninian Edwards. Carried—ayes 83, noes 26.

Mr. A. SMYTH moved to amend the resolution by striking out so much of it as provides that three members shall be a quorum of the committee—carried.

Mr. FORSYTH moved farther to amend the resolution by adding a clause directing that a copy of the committee's report and accompanying documents be transmitted to the President of the United States.

Mr. COOK moved to amend this amendment by including the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress in relation to his transactions with the Western banks; the correspondence laid before Congress on that subject, and the report in relation to the illegal introduction of Africans into the United States, among the papers laid before the President.

On these amendments and the following questions, a debate arose. The gentleman who took part in it were Messrs. COOK, FORSYTH, JENNINGS, and WEBSTER.

Both the amendments were rejected.

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the resolve was amended so as to direct that the Clerk cause the final report of the committee to be printed and transmit a copy to each member of the House.

The question then recurring on the resolution as amended—

Farther debate took place. In the course of it, Mr. A. SMYTH moved to lay the resolve on the table; which motion was negatived—ayes 49, noes 58.

The question being put on the resolution as amended, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 74.

So the resolve was agreed to.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

Mr. McDUFFIE offered the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to avail himself of all the means in his power, to ascertain whether any farther evidence can be obtained in relation to the claim of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais; and that, if any such evidence shall be obtained, that he communicate the same to this House, at an early period in the next session.”

Mr. McDUFFIE stated the reasons in favor of the above resolution; the principal of which was, a wish to show the French Government that this country is disposed to do justice in the case of the Beaumarchais claim.

Mr. FORSYTH stated that it formed a part of the instructions of our Minister to France, to negotiate on all just claims of citizens of the two nations against each other's Government, which included this case, and that this proposition was therefore unnecessary.

Mr. McDUFFIE thought, that, though this was true, yet it was expedient to adopt the resolution, to prevent mistaken impressions, which might be produced by the late vote of this House on that claim.

Mr. SHARPE feared that the resolution might be the means of holding out false hopes to the claimant, that this House might recognise her claim—which were better prevented.

Mr. LIVERMORE observed, that this would be the first instance of the chief executive magistrate of a country's being called on to search for evidence in support of the claim of a private foreign citizen against his own Government. He hoped the resolution would not prevail.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the resolution, it was decided in the negative.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

In presenting this resolve for consideration—

Mr. W. said he presented this resolution now with the intention of asking the House to act upon it early at its next meeting. He thought the next session would be a favorable opportunity to settle this important question one way or the other. Causes were understood to be pending before the Supreme Court in which the power of the States to pass bankrupt laws, so far as to operate on subsequent contracts, was to be decided. The court having heard arguments on that question, and now holding the causes under advisement, a judgment might probably be expected at the commencement of the term. That decision, which ever way made, would present a fit opportunity for taking the sense of Congress on the expediency of a uniform bankrupt law. If the decision should be against the power of the States to pass such acts, then it might be hoped that members from those States which had, in fact, hitherto maintained such laws, might be willing to co-operate with others in the establishment of a general system. If it should be in favor of the State authority, on the other hand, then the question would be, whether it were better to have a general system, under the authority of this Government, or a local system, in each State? In one event, the question would be, between a general uniform bankrupt law and no bankrupt law at all; in the other, between one uniform system and twenty-four different and clashing systems. He had intended to present, not merely a single resolution, but a series of resolutions, describing the outline of such a system as appeared to him expedient to adopt. But other engagements had not allowed him sufficient leisure. He earnestly hoped that members would take this important subject into consideration, and that the House would be prepared to act upon it at the next session.

The resolution was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the Senate's amendments to the bill "for the building of certain additional lighthouses, light-vessels, &c. After an extended discussion, a part of those amendments were agreed to, and the residue dissented from, when the result was reported to the House.

[While the House remained in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CLAY rose and said, that he would ask a single moment's attention of the Committee whilst he said only one word in respect to a resolution which he had had the honor to present some time ago. The resolution to which he referred was that which proposed an expression of the feelings of Congress in regard to an attack supposed to be meditated by Allied Europe upon the independence of Spanish America. He had offered that resolution in consequence of information disclosed in the President's Message, at the opening of the present session of Congress; and most certainly, if the design imputed to the Allies had really been entertained, every consideration connected with the interest, the safety, and even the independence of this country, called for the most deliberate attention to his proposition. But such a purpose, abominable as it would have been, ought not to be attributed upon any other than the strongest evidence. Events and circumstances, subsequent to the communication of the Message, evinced, that, if such a purpose were ever seriously entertained, it had been relinquished. For his part, whilst he was disposed to keep a vigilant eye on every movement of the Allies, as to America, and to be ready to give his feeble co-operation to every measure calculated to repel their aggressions, if any such should be attempted, on the independence of any part of America, he was, on the other hand, unwilling to give them any just cause of offence against us. But, to pass the resolution, after all that has occurred—in the absence of any sufficient evidence of their cherishing inimical designs on this continent—might be construed by them as unfriendly, if not offensive. Under the full conviction, therefore, that they did not entertain any purpose so diabolical as that would be of attempting to reduce Spanish America to its ancient subjection, or of compelling it to adopt the monarchical form of Government, he should continue to abstain from pressing upon the attention of the House his resolution; and should allow it to sleep where it now reposes, on the table.]

And then the House determined to take a recess until seven o'clock, P. M.

EVENING SESSION, May 26.

The House resumed its session.

The bill from the Senate "in addition to the several acts regulating naturalization" was taken up and passed.

COMMITTEE ROOMS, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee appointed to make distribution of the rooms in the Capitol appropriated to the use of the House of Representatives, reported that the committee had distributed the rooms in the following manner:

- To the Speaker, No 3, of the south wing;
- To the Committee of Elections, The room in the fourth story of the centre building over No. 23;
- To the Committee of Ways and Means, No. 77 of the south wing;
- To the Committee of Claims, No. 50 of the south wing;
- To the Committee on Commerce, No. 40 of the centre building;
- To the Committee on the Public Lands, The north west corner room of the fourth story;
- To the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, No. 42 of the centre building;
- To the Committee of the District of Columbia, The southwest corner of the basement story;
- To the Committee on the Judiciary, The room in the fourth story over No. 14;
- To the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, No 69 of the south wing;
- To the Committee on Public Expenditures, No. 43 of the centre building;

H. OF R.

To the Committee of Accounts, No. 83 of the south wing;

The Committees on Expenditures in the different Departments, shall have the right of holding their meetings in the rooms appropriated to the committee appointed on the subjects to which they severally relate;

To the Clerk of the House and his Clerks, Nos. 14, 15, 16, of the centre building;

To the Sergeant at Arms, No. 2 of the south wing;

The unappropriated rooms shall be subject to the order and disposal of the Speaker until the further order of the House.

The said report was read; whereupon it was resolved that this House do agree to the same.

The bill "to complete the survey of the southern and western boundaries of the State of Missouri," was taken up, at the urgent instance of Mr. SCOTT, and passed.

The bill "to complete the surveys of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina, St. Mary's in Georgia, and the coast of Florida, and for other purposes," was taken up, on motion of Mr. POINSETT, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHIPPLE, it was Resolved, That all the bills which have been ordered to a third reading, but which, owing to a rule of the House, cannot be transmitted to the Senate, be postponed to the first Monday of November next.

The bill "more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," was taken up, on request of Mr. SCOTT, and passed.

Ordered, That the bill to authorize the legislature of the State of Ohio to sell and convey certain tracts of land granted to said State, for the use of the people thereof; and the bill authorizing the repayment for land, erroneously sold by the United States; which bills were, on Monday, the 24th instant, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, respectively, be read the third time on the second Monday of December next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, passed on the 13th of June, 1812, entitled 'An act making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri;'" which was reported with amendments; which were read and concurred in by the House, and the amendments ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-day.

Mr. CONDUCT moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inquire, and report to this House at the commencement of the next session of Congress, what are the material causes of those fatal disasters, which have so frequently occurred on board steamboats, in the waters of the United States; and what regulations may, in his opinion, afford better security to the lives of passengers and crews: And for the purpose of this inquiry, the Secretary is hereby authorized to call to his assistance the knowledge and experience of engineers, and others, skilled in navigating and constructing vessels propelled by fire or steam.

The rule, which requires that a proposition requesting information to be furnished by the Head of an Executive Department shall lie on the table one day, for consideration, being, in the case of the above resolution, dispensed with, by the unanimous consent of the House:

The question was taken to agree to the said resolution, and passed in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the Clerk of this House was directed to make the same compensation to the extra clerks, employed to expedite the engrossing and enrolling the bills of the House, as has heretofore been allowed by the committee, for similar services.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act passed on the 13th June, 1812, entitled 'An act making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri,'" was read the third time, and passed, with amendments.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, Ordered, That the Clerk of this House cause to be prepared a list of all business remaining undetermined, which, by an existing rule, is to be resumed, in the state in which the same now is, and acted upon at the next session of Congress; designating that which is committed from that which is laid on the table; and that a copy of said list, when printed, be forwarded by mail to each member of this House.

THURSDAY, May 27.

The House met at 8 o'clock.

Several communications were received from the President of the United States, announcing his approbation and signature of bills passed by both Houses.

CASE OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. TAYLOR then rose, and said, that it had yesterday been decided that three members of the Committee of Investigation, in the case of Mr. Ninian Edwards, should not be a quorum of that committee. He had understood that one of the members of that committee had left the United States, and that another was gone home to his residence in Alabama. It was very desirable that the committee should be filled up; and, with a view to that object, he moved that two members be added to the committee, to supply the place of the two members present.

Mr. WEBSTER said, he rose partly to second the motion of his honorable friend, but more particularly to express his astonishment at a paragraph which he had this moment seen in a Richmond paper, of Tuesday, in a communication signed "John Randolph, of Roanoke." The paragraph is in these words:

"It was at my instance, and not without considerable resistance on the part of a majority of the committee, that the Secretary had the opportunity given him to file his answer to the accusation of Mr. Edwards."

A regard to my own character, sir, said Mr. W., and to the character of the committee with whom I am associated, does not allow me to pass over this statement; and I rise for the purpose of saying that the order in committee for communicating the address to Mr. Crawford, for the purpose of giving him an opportunity of answering it, was not made at the instance of Mr. RANDOLPH; and, further, that no one of the committee made any opposition to that motion. I hope I am fully and distinctly understood—I wish to be so. And I again assert that no one of the committee intimidated the least opposition to the motion. Fortunately, the original minutes of the proceedings of the committee are preserved, and the entry, as it now stands, in the handwriting of one of the committee, is as follows:

“APRIL 28, 1824.

“Committee met. All present.

“On motion of Mr. TAYLOR,

“Ordered, That the chairman transmit to Mr. Crawford a copy of Mr. Edwards’s memorial, and the accompanying papers, together with a copy of the resolution creating the committee. To which Mr. RANDOLPH proposed the following amendment: ‘And inform him that the committee are proceeding in the examination, and that they are ready to receive any communication which he may think proper to make, in reference to the same;’ which amendment was accepted by Mr. TAYLOR; and, thus amended, was unanimously adopted.”

Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, thought the measure proposed by the gentleman from New York was not necessary. He thought the present committee entirely competent to the business which had been referred to them, and that it would be best to leave them to settle their own affairs. It must be a very disagreeable thing to remain confined here after the session of the House was closed, and he would not willingly impose upon another that to which he should be averse himself. He regretted, for his part, that this matter had ever been brought before the House, and that it had been referred to the committee, giving it thus an importance which did not properly belong to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, observing that the House was very thin, thought it best to defer the consideration of the motion till a fuller House should be obtained; and with that view moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. A. SMYTH expressed a hope that the mover would consent to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he could not consider the measure proposed as at all necessary. Every gentleman, he believed, was entirely satisfied with the present committee, and prepared to place every proper confidence in the proceedings—and he wished a division of the House on his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. POINSETT observed, that there was evidently not a quorum of members present; and from the best information he could obtain, he was induced to believe, that so many had last evening and this morning availed themselves of the various conveyances which were departing in all directions, that there was not a quorum left in the city—and he hoped the gentleman from New York would not persist in his motion.

Mr. Cook then observed, that the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, yesterday, (Mr. A. SMYTH) required of the committee of investigation to ask what had now been moved by the gentleman from New York. He did not think the measure was at all required by the parties concerned. The examination of their case might be safely left to the present committee, without any augmentation; and he thought it would be best, under all circumstances, that the committee should agree to withdraw the motion.

Mr. ELLIS spoke a few words to the same effect.

Mr. TAYLOR then observed, that it would probably be the best course to lay the resolution on the table by unanimous consent, in the hope, that, in the course of an hour a quorum might be obtained.

Mr. POINSETT observed that he had, from the first, been opposed to directing the committee to sit in the recess; but the House had determined otherwise, and he now thought that it was wholly unnecessary that other members be added. So far from being increased within an hour, he believed the number of attending members would be lessened.

Mr. LIVINGSTON rose and said that he had that instant come into the House, and that a paper had been put into his hands, containing a letter signed by an honorable member of this House, who was also a member of the committee appointed on the address of Ninian Edwards, which letter contained a statement that he thought incumbent on him, as a member of that committee, to notice. It is there said that “it was at his (Mr. RANDOLPH’S) instance, and not without considerable resistance on the part of a majority of the committee, that the Secretary had the opportunity given him to file his answer to the accusation of Mr. Edwards.” Mr. L. said he was bound to declare that there was not on his part the slightest opposition, nor did any other member of the committee express any, or show the least disinclination to communicate the accusation to Mr. Crawford, or to give him an opportunity of answering it; that, on the contrary, it was one of the first measures proposed after the papers were printed; that the motion was made, as appeared by the minutes of the committee, by a member from New York, to communicate the papers, that Mr. RANDOLPH’S amendment was adopted by him, and it was unanimously agreed to, as amended. Mr. L. said that the statement could only have arisen from a very great misapprehension of the proceedings of the committee; but that it conveyed so serious a charge on their character and impartiality, that he appealed to the recollection of all the members now present, to declare whether the statement he had made was not correct.

Mr. McARTHUR said that he distinctly recollected the proceedings of the committee on the 28th April—that it was upon the motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the order was made to transmit to Mr. Crawford a copy of Mr. Edwards’s address, and the accompanying papers, together with the resolution creating the committee, which was acquiesced in by all the members then present. Mr.

MAY, 1824.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

H. OF R.

FLOYD, perhaps, suggested the propriety of first examining the communications and documents, but did not urge the suggestion. Upon Mr. RANDOLPH's arrival, the proceedings of the committee were read to him, when he remarked that he hoped the committee would not be delayed in its investigation for the Secretary's answer—that he was for progressing with the investigation, but was willing that the Secretary should be advised of it; and moved to amend the motion of Mr. TAYLOR, as stated in the minutes of the committee. That the modification proposed by Mr. R. was accepted by Mr. TAYLOR, and unanimously adopted. That he was confident that the statement relative thereto, which appeared in the Richmond Enquirer of the 25th instant over the signature of JOHN RANDOLPH of Roanoke, is not correct.

Mr. FLOYD said that he had just come in, and did not know very well what it was the gentleman had been saying. If, as he was told, it related to the occurrences in the committee, he could only state the impression which was made on his memory, though he did know that he was correct, but believed he was. So far, however, as he was told what Mr. RANDOLPH had written, it seemed to him that there was evidently some mistake in the business. He presumed it must relate to conversations in the committee, rather than to the measure adopted by them. A proposition was read by some member, he believed the gentleman from New York, to this effect: that the chairman be directed to transmit a copy of Mr. Edwards's address to the Secretary of the Treasury, and request his answer. This was conversed on, and the latter part stricken out. Mr. RANDOLPH came in and made the motion to amend the proposition of the gentleman from New York, very similar to the first; which proposition was then put to the committee, and a vote taken, which seemed to be satisfactory to all, and was so noted, he believed, by the committee. This seemed to him to be nearly the state of facts, as he remembered them.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he held in his hand the original paper containing the resolution offered by Mr. TAYLOR. It had at first been proposed to request an answer from Mr. Crawford, but it was suggested that there might be some objection to that form. This was afterwards modified so as to say the committee would receive any communication Mr. C. should think proper to make.

[Here, for the present, the conversation dropped.]

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the Clerk, on the order of the Chairman of the Committee, pay witnesses who may attend the committee of investigation, the usual allowance per diem for their attendance. Agreed to.

Mr. STEWART offered the following:

"Resolved, That the members of the committee appointed on the memorial of Ninian Edwards be paid at the usual rate of compensation, for the time they may remain in session, during the recess of Congress, out of the contingent fund."

At the suggestion of Mr. POINSETT, and there being no quorum, Mr. S. withdrew the resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the following:

"That a committee be appointed on the part of this House, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he may have other communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn."

After a short time,

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Joint Committee, appointed to wait on the President, reported that they had performed that duty, and that the President had informed them that he had no farther communication to make to Congress.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are ready to close the present session of Congress by an adjournment on their part, and that the Clerk go with the said message.

Mr. TAYLOR then rose and said that, in reference to the letter of Mr. RANDOLPH, that had appeared in the public prints this morning, he thought it proper to observe, in corroboration of what had been said by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that his recollection was very distinct that the original motion made by him in committee was stronger, and went farther, than the order finally adopted. It not only required that Mr. Crawford should be furnished with a copy of Mr. Edwards's memorial, and the accompanying papers, together with a copy of the resolution creating the committee, but that Mr. Crawford should be requested to answer the same. It having been suggested that it ought to be left to Mr. Crawford's option whether or not to communicate an answer, the suggestion was approved by him, and the latter clause withdrawn accordingly. Mr. RANDOLPH's amendment was adopted by the committee, as expressing their decision, on the point to which it referred, more precisely than it would do either with or without the latter clause. Opposition was not made by any one of the committee to giving Mr. Crawford an opportunity of answering the accusation of Mr. Edwards.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, the House was then adjourned by the SPEAKER till the first Monday of December next.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION.

The select committee, (of the House of Representatives,) to whom was referred the memorial, or address, of Ninian Edwards, having, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 26th of May, continued to hold its sittings, after the adjournment of the House, until the 21st day of June, have agreed on the following report:

In recommending, in their former report, a continuance of the existence and powers of the committee, it will be remembered that the reason given for that recommendation was, the obvious propriety, before a final close of the investigation, of having the personal presence and examination of the author of the address which had occasioned the appointment of the committee. Such examination has now been had. Mr. Edwards attended the committee, in obedience to its summons, on the 7th of June; has been examined as a witness, by its direction, cross-examined by a gentleman attending in behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury; and his testimony, together with that of the other witnesses, is communicated with this report; as are, also, various documents and papers, which have been referred to, and produced, in the course of the examination.

A paper, in reply to the communication heretofore received by the committee, from the Secretary, and another, in the nature of an argument on the whole case, have also been presented by Mr. Edwards, and considered by the committee.

The evidence has run into much detail, and some parts of it, probably, have not a very material application to the main subject of inquiry. It seemed proper, however, to the committee, to allow to those concerned a liberal indulgence in this respect.

After a patient attention to all the evidence, and to whatever has been urged, in the way of reasoning on the case, the committee see no cause to change or modify, in any material respect, the result to which they came on the former investigation, and which they have already submitted to the House. On the contrary, they find, in this further and fuller examination, a corroboration, generally speaking, of the opinions which they have heretofore expressed.

On some parts of the inquiry, indeed, evidence has now been produced to points which were not, individually and particularly, taken into the consideration of the committee on the former occasion. To these, perhaps, some reference ought now to be made. They may be considered as new articles, or new specifications of charge; and although not very definitely or formally made, yet, as evidence has been taken, intended to support them, they become subjects of consideration.

One of these respects the deposits of public money, made or allowed by the Secretary, in the banks of this District, at the instance and on the solicitation of the banks themselves, and as an accommodation to them, at a time of considerable pecuniary pressure, in 1819.

In their former report, the committee expressed their opinion in relation to deposits of this nature; and referred to a public communication of the Secretary, in which the facts were avowed, and in which a practice, of a like character, was stated to have been of early existence and long continuance. The committee did not deem it necessary to call for proof of that which was admitted; as it was of opinion that the practice itself was irregular and dangerous, it did not think it material to inquire, particularly, whether, in the only case in which loss was apprehended from this cause, the probability of such loss was either greater or less than the Secretary had supposed. This apprehended loss is in the case of the Franklin Bank of Alexandria. In the letter of the Secretary to the President of the Senate, of the 25th of February, 1823, he says, in regard to this bank, that a letter of the District Attorney, therewith communicated, showed that there was no danger of loss to the United States.

The evidence now offered and received, tends to show that there is a probability of final loss from this bank; but in other respects there is no new view of the case presented.

The debt due to the Government from the Bank of Vincennes, has also been brought forward, and made the subject of inquiry and proof. Nothing distinguishing this case from those of other Western banks in which the public money had been deposited, and in regard to which loss had happened, or was expected, had attracted the attention of the committee, as important to be considered, at the time of their former report.

The case of this bank had been previously made the subject of a report to the House by the Secretary, on the 21st of February, 1824, in answer to a resolution passed on the thirty-first of January preceding, in which a statement of the debt, and the means which had been taken and used to secure it, were laid before Congress. The evidence now taken, relates principally, as in the preceding case, to the amount of the loss which may be expected to be incurred.

The only remaining charge which may be regarded as not before examined, is an allegation, or intimation, that, owing to the fault of the Secretary, the pensioners and public creditors of the Government in East Tennessee, were, in some instances, paid in bank paper not equivalent to specie.

The circumstances attending this transaction seem to be fully stated in the testimony of Hugh L. White. It does not appear that any knowledge of these payments having been made in depreciated paper was communicated to the Senate. The measures adopted by him for the reasonable provision of a proper fund at the place of disbursement, were, as far as the committee can judge, suitable and judicious. He had a right to expect the payments to be made in specie, or its equivalent; to be informed if any thing should happen to prevent such payment. No information was given to him of any disappointment of his expectation in this respect, by those whose duty it was to pay; and no complaint appears to have been preferred by those whose right it was to receive.

In regard to the contested letter of Benjamin Stephenson, of the 12th of October, 1819, the committee see no cause to change the opinion which was entertained, and which they intended to express in their former report—that, although the letter was written, as stated by Mr. Edwards in his testimony, there was no evidence that Mr. Stephenson communicated or transmitted it to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The committee do not deem it necessary to extend their report, by protracted observations on the various parts of the evidence, as the whole is submitted to the House. They content themselves with saying, that, in their opinion, nothing has been proved to impeach the integrity of the Secretary, or to bring into doubt the general correctness and ability of his administration of the public finances. To this point, as the main object of inquiry, the chief attention of the committee has been directed; and they have come to the result, which has now been stated, with the unanimous concurrence of the members present. Other points there are, of less importance, but which may, nevertheless, be supposed not to have escaped consideration by the committee. These, however, under all the circumstances, they have thought it proper to leave, without observation, in the light in which they are placed by the evidence.

TESTIMONY AND DOCUMENTS

Accompanying the Report of the Special Committee of the House of Representatives,

ON THE MEMORIAL OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

James Lloyd, of the Senate, sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Questions by Mr. Cook, in Mr. Edwards's behalf.

Question. State, if you please, what is meant by a special deposit made in banking institutions.

Answer. That will depend on the custom of the place, or the usage of the bank where the deposit is made. A special deposit is not a very definite term. A piece of blank paper, said to contain a thousand dollars, may be a special deposit; as may a bundle of notes left at a bank for collection or safe-keeping. Some banks receive, as special deposit, paper issued by other banks in the same State, or in other States, and which is repaid by the bank receiving it in the same bills as those in which it was deposited or in bills of banks previously designated. I should consider as special deposit that which did not mix nor mingle with the general circulation of the bank.

Q. Are special deposits ever made without designating the amount and description of money, or the things deposited?

A. I should think they were, sometimes, merely for the purpose of safe-keeping. More generally, there would be a label on the outside, specifying the contents of the bundle, box, &c., deposited. It may be noted in the memorandum book of the Cashier, but does not enter into the transactions or records of the bank at all. Plate is often deposited in this manner, and other valuable articles. In one of the Boston banks, I have now a deposit of this description.

Q. When deposits are made for safe-keeping, is it ever understood that the bank is allowed to trade upon them as its own funds?

A. Never, I believe. Some of the banks in Massachusetts keep accounts in two kinds of money; Boston money, for example, and foreign money; which latter means bills of banks located out of the city. If a sum is deposited, repayable in foreign money, the banks designate on a list, generally posted in the banking house, a certain number of banks whose bills they will receive as "foreign money," which money they use; and if they repay the sum deposited in the bills of these banks, they deem the contract fulfilled. If any one of these banks becomes insolvent previous to the payment, it is my opinion that the bank receiving its bills runs the risk of the loss thence accruing.

Q. When a deposit is made of foreign money, or such as is not received as general deposit, but subject to be refunded to the depositor in paper of a similar kind to that deposited; if paper of a similar kind, at the time of making the deposit, should afterwards depreciate in value, would the depositor be bound to receive it in its depreciated state, in payment of such deposit?

A. I should say yes to a question thus specific; but I do not know whether, strictly considered, the notes of different banks can be viewed as precisely similar. If the bank specifies beforehand in what money it will repay, it is a special contract, and the depositor must abide by his own agreement. But, if one of the banks in whose paper the deposit is agreed to be repaid, has subsequently failed, the bank receiving the deposit would not, in my opinion, be authorized to repay the deposit in the notes of such bank as had thus failed. What rate of depreciation would justify a bank in offering to pay, or a depositor in refusing to receive, depreciated notes, I cannot state.

Q. Where money of any description is deposited in any bank, and is mingled with the funds of such bank generally, and the bank uses it in its general transactions, is not such bank always considered liable to pay the amount in legal money to the depositor?

A. I should consider the bank liable, if the deposit is received and credited as general deposit.

Questions by Mr. Webster.

Q. By a general deposit, you understand a deposit to be credited as cash in account?

A. Yes.

Q. By a special deposit, you understand a deposit for safe keeping merely?

A. Yes; or a deposit on particular conditions.

Q. If there be a deposit of an intermediate character between a general deposit and a deposit for safe-keeping, where, though the particular notes deposited may be used or put in circulation by the bank, yet the bank is not answerable for the amount in cash; do the rights of the parties, in such case, depend mainly on their contract or agreement? or is there any general bank usage which would govern the case?

A. I know of no established usage. The conditions of the deposit are indicated by the terms prescribed by the bank from time to time, which are frequently varied, by it according to its sense of its own interest.

Q. Is your knowledge of bank usage confined principally to that prevailing in the banks of the Atlantic cities; or does it include the usage of the Western banks?

A. It is confined wholly to the former.

JAMES LLOYD.

Question by Mr. Edwards.—Have you any recollection of the sum of forty thousand one hundred and fifty-six dollars of notes on the Bank of Tennessee and its branches which was directed to be transferred by the Bank of Missouri to the branch bank of Louisville, and which was to be subject to the drafts of the Treasurer in favor of the Bank of Tennessee?

Answer. I think it proper to state to the Committee, that my memory of the transaction is not to be entirely depended on, as it took place several years since, and latterly my mind has been so much taken up with other concerns, that I may not recollect correctly some matters relative to this. So well as I remember, it was in the Fall of 1819 the Knoxville Bank received from Mr. Crawford a letter, the substance of which was, that he proposed to give the Bank at Knoxville a draft on the Bank of Missouri for the whole amount of Tennessee paper then in the hands of the Missouri Bank, and which had been received by it for the United States, which should be payable at Louisville in Kentucky, in Tennessee bank paper; and that, upon the receipt of such draft, the State Bank at Knoxville should place to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States a like sum as specie, which would be drawn for as the Government might have occasion to use it, in that quarter of the country. On the receipt of this letter, he was answered that we could not agree to such an arrangement; that, as to the amount of Tennessee paper upon the Bank of the State of Tennessee and its branches, we were willing to accept such draft on the Missouri Bank upon the terms proposed in his letter; that, as to other Tennessee paper, that did not belong to the State Bank or its branches, we could not agree to receive it. In pursuance of this arrangement, early in the year 1820, I think in March or April, a draft was received from the Treasury for $40,156, on the Bank of Missouri, payable at the place and in the descriptions of notes agreed upon. I think the amount was placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, immediately after receiving the draft. We had no correspondence with the Bank of Missouri, but only with the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as I can remember, at this time; and upon this point I feel pretty certain I am not mistaken. After waiting what we supposed a reasonable time, to allow the Missouri Bank to have the money at Louisville, where the draft was to be paid, I went, and took a young man with me, to receive the money. For form's sake, the draft was transferred to me. I went to Louisville, (and no particular place in Louisville being specified in the draft where the money was to be paid,) I went to the Branch Bank there: I found no funds provided to meet the draft; and after waiting a few days without being able to hear any thing which induced me to think a longer delay would be useful, I had the draft protested, a copy of the protest forwarded to the drawer, with such notice as would make him responsible, and returned to Knoxville. Some time afterwards, I think in the same year, a letter was received from the Cashier of the United States Bank, stating that a bundle, said to contain the $40,156, had been forwarded, and left there by the Missouri Bank, for the purpose of lifting this draft; but as we had had the trouble and expense of going once to receive it, we took no notice of this communication, and wished to have the money sent to us at our own place, at the expense and risk of the Missouri Bank. We were content with the paper, and ready to receive it, at any time. Thus matters stood, until we heard that the Knoxville Bank had failed. I advised that the Knoxville Bank should again send to get this money. This was in the Winter of 1821. As soon as they could make the arrangement, they sent on and received the money at Louisville early in the year 1822. I understood that the whole amount of $40,156 was received in notes of the Knoxville Bank and its branches. In the meanwhile, the Treasury continued to draw on the Knoxville Bank, and, as President, I directed the Cashier not to pay cash for these drafts, but, if current money would be taken, to make advances in it, though the money was not yet received for the draft, under a belief that, ultimately, the Secretary would cause the amount of the draft to be paid to our bank.

My impression was, that when the Missouri Bank had received these notes, the banks were all paying specie, but that afterwards the branches had ceased to do so. The first information we got was from Mr. Cochran, Cashier of the Branch Bank of the United States at Louisville, that the money was ready for us, and was in the same Summer, viz., of 1820, as I believe, but cannot be certain. I never exchanged a line with the Missouri Bank, nor received a line from it, according to my best recollection. I considered our transaction only with the Treasury. The mail from St. Louis to Knoxville was at that time tedious, and not very regular. I am yet ignorant of the reason why the money was not ready for us at Louisville. I had no reason to doubt, nor have I now, that the Treasury did all that was reasonable towards notifying all parties concerned of having given the draft. The amount of notes on the principal bank itself was small in comparison to that on its branches.

I understood that the draft for $40,156 was a mode of transfer from one bank to another, for the purpose of having placed to the credit of the United States as cash or general deposit this sum which the Bank of Missouri could not transfer to the Bank of the United States. We paid creditors of the United States who presented drafts in current bills, though not in specie, and there were no complaints at the time, of which I have at present any recollection. We did not pay the specie, because the fund had not been received upon the foundation of which we had agreed to pay it; and if any blame is due, it is due to myself in preference to the Cashier; as I forbade him to pay the specie, as it related to this transaction, until the fund for which we had agreed to pay it should be paid to us.

Question by Mr. Edwards. I want to know the character of Mr. Lee, whose report is in my hand?

A. I have seen that report. Mr. Lee is a man of the utmost integrity; and if that report varies from my statement as to this transaction, it is more to be relied on than my own statement, which is from memory, without the same means of being correct which Mr. Lee had.

Q. Was a part of the money deposited to be suffered to remain in the Bank?

A. The Treasury was to draw out the money only as the wants of the Government required; something may have been said as to the time it was to remain in the bank; but I have no recollection of any positive agreement on that subject. Mr. Crawford's letter shows the understanding upon that subject more correctly than I can state from memory merely.

Q. What was the discount on your paper?

A. None upon that of the principal bank; but upon that of the branches, and other Tennessee paper, it has fluctuated from ten to twenty-five per cent.

Q. What were notes on the branches of the Knoxville banks worth at that time?

A. I cannot recollect at that particular time. The depreciation taken for a series of years was from ten to twenty-five per cent., as before stated, in East Tennessee; in West Tennessee the discount has been sometimes higher.

Q. Did not the pensioners receive from ten to twenty per cent. less than if they had received specie?

A. The money in which they were paid was of the kind which was at the discount before stated.

Question by Mr. Taylor. At the time these payments were made at the Bank of Knoxville, was there a credit in that bank to the United States?

Answer. Yes: and that credit always stood as a specie credit; but we thought that it was more than balanced by the draft unpaid; and we held the Treasury responsible for the amount of that draft.

Question by Mr. Webster. In other transactions, did you pay specie for the drafts of the United States?

Answer. Our rule always was, to pay in such funds as had been placed with us, if the payee so wished. If the fund on which the draft was drawn was specie, we paid it in that, if desired. If the fund was other than specie, we did not pay specie.

Question by Mr. Edwards. In crediting the draft from the Treasury, in your favor, was the word "cash" used?

Answer. I cannot remember. The intent was to credit it as cash. A deposit, when nothing is said to the contrary, is considered by us as being payable in cash, if demanded. We viewed special deposits of certain kinds of notes as not binding us to repay in those identical notes, but only similar notes, or such as the depositor would be as well satisfied with.

Q. Did you receive deposits from the Treasury in drafts on the Bank of Tombigbee?

A. That draft never was included in the arrangement before spoken of; and nothing has been received, by us, upon it; and, if it ever was credited, on our books, I don't remember it. That bank is, however, a specie-paying bank, as I have understood and believe.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Was the paper of the Huntsville Bank received at your bank?

A. We never had a draft on the Bank of Huntsville. The paper of that bank is esteemed rather better than our own branch notes; and we have, until long after this transaction, made no distinction between it and what is called, by us, current Tennessee paper.

Q. Was the notice of the protest, at Louisville, forwarded to the Treasury?

A. I do not recollect, farther than that I took the ordinary steps to make the drawer liable, before leaving Louisville; and, upon my return, in May, wrote the letter now shown me, by one of the committee, to the Secretary.

Q. When you received the draft, did you credit the amount to the Treasury?

A. Yes, as I now believe. That, I think, was our understanding of the agreement, and I suppose and believe we complied with that part of it.

Question by Mr. Webster. Did you inform the Treasurer that you did not pay his drafts in specie but in your own bills?

A. I have no recollection of making any communication to Mr. Crawford on that subject. The cashier may have given such notice—but I do not know that he did. I gave him no orders to do so; and think, if he had done so, I should have known it.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Do you believe that any one pensioner would have taken your bills, if he had supposed he could get specie?

A. Doubtless he would have preferred specie to any of the bills in which he was paid.

Questions by Mr. Forsyth, on the part of Mr. Crawford. Did you hold the United States responsible for the amount of its draft on the Bank of Missouri? A. Yes.

Q. How then did you refuse to pay in specie?

A. We thought that, as the money for the draft had never been paid to us, it was a just interpretation of the agreement that we should not pay in any thing till we received the proceeds of the draft; but preferred advancing in such funds as we could spare, to having the drafts protested.

Question by Mr. Edwards. When you received the amount of the draft, was it not chiefly in notes of your branches?

A. I understood so, but have no personal knowledge, as I was not then in Knoxville.

Q. Had not most, or all, of those branches then stopped payment?

A. They had ceased cash payments when we made the agreement, but my impression is, that when these notes were received in the Bank of Missouri, the banks all paid specie. This answer is given, however, upon the presumption that the Missouri Bank had received them as they represented to the Secretary. How that fact was, I, of course, do not know.

Q. What means has a director of knowing from what persons a sum, say of $100,000, found in bank, and received in a series of months, has been so received?

A. I can only speak as to the rules of the bank to which I have belonged. As to the rules of others, I could only speak from information. By the rules of ours, the President, Cashier, &c., can inspect all accounts of every person whatever, but no individual Director has such power; but the Board of Directors, if they choose, have as much right as any of the individual officers, to examine any and all accounts; but any information thus acquired would be confidential, and is intended to prevent any improper conduct, and to enable the directors and officers to discharge their respective duties, to the public, and to individuals.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. As the President of the bank, would you not have preferred advancing in current notes, with the Government bound to pay the draft, to its having been paid punctually, and your being bound to pay in specie?

A. I would have preferred that the payment of the bill should have been made when I was at Louisville, and that the transaction should have gone on as originally intended; because we would then have been as able as we ever may be to lift our paper, and as I never expected more from the Government than payment at our bank in the same kind of money specified in the face of the draft; but at the same time felt a confidence that the Government would cause us to be paid in such funds at our own place—it could make but little difference, as most of the pensioners were very probably paid in branch paper, or funds equal to it, and I have ever believed, as President, that the interest of the bank was most promoted by acting honestly. I make this observation without feeling that the question was intended to doubt our integrity.

H. L. WHITE.

Question by Mr. Edwards. I wish you to state what you know concerning sums of money obtained by the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Answer. In January, 1819, I was President of that bank. At that time, there was a run on that bank, and the bank was much embarrassed. I waited on the Secretary of the Treasury, and he loaned, at one time, $17,000; at another, $20,000. I showed him a statement of the concerns of the bank, proving its condition to be good, and reminded him of former loans by the bank, to Government, in an hour of necessity. He replied, that he would consult the President of the United States, and let me know the result; and, when I called again, told me the Government was disposed to do all it could to relieve the bank, as well as the other banks of the District, and gave me a draft on the Bank of Alexandria for $17,000. This was on or about the 12th of January. On or about the 23d of the same month, I called on him again, and he gave me another draft on the same bank for $20,000. I understood these sums as loans or deposits, made to relieve and aid the bank. I continued President of the bank a few weeks, and, soon after I left, it stopped specie payment for a time, some time about the middle of March.

Q. Has the bank repaid any of these loans?

A. I went, this morning, to look at the books of the bank, and find that the amount appears to have been repaid.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. When did you first call on the Secretary?

Answer. It was on Friday—but, as I understood he was much engaged, on Saturdays, in receiving visits of members of Congress, I called again on Monday, when I received the $17,000.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Were there any deposits made, by Government, in that bank, previously to those you have now spoken of?

Answer. There were not, I believe, except the money which had been loaned to the Government previous to the time I speak of.

JAMES SANDERSON.

Jacob Morgan, of Alexandria, sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I was Cashier of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, for a time after Mr. Sanderson left it. There were some loans obtained by Mr. Swan, President, from the Secretary of the Treasury, and received by me. Mr. Sanderson had left it. One loan, I think, was of $10,000, another of $20,000. The first was returned in a short time, say thirty or sixty days, and a few weeks after the first, the second loan was obtained. This latter was not repaid, when I left the bank, which was, I think, in 1821. When I came into the office of cashier, I found little specie, and a very small amount of current money, and about $30,000 of notes in circulation. (I reduced these, before I left, to less than $7,000.) The second loan, of $20,000, was, as I understand, subsequently paid, or secured to be paid, through the Bank of Alexandria, but when I left the bank, the two loans mentioned by Mr. Sanderson, and the second, mentioned by me, remained unpaid. This last was received in Treasury drafts on Carolina and Virginia. I went to Raleigh, in North Carolina, and exchanged the drafts for Virginia paper. The Raleigh bank then paid specie, and was willing so to pay these drafts, but I did not wish to take away the specie. The first $10,000 were obtained to enable the bank to pay specie, but this being found insufficient, the second loan was obtained. The bank paid some of its notes as it was able, and as fast as the notes were paid, they were withdrawn—but many notes were not paid when presented. I did understand, from the Secretary of the Treasury, that the loans were obtained in order to enable the bank to wind up its affairs. The Secretary frequently applied to me for repayment, and being told by me that the bank was unable to do it, he insisted upon interest being allowed on the loan, which was agreed to by the bank. I do not recollect when this agreement for interest was made—not, however, before the money had remained due for a year. Nor do I remember from what date the interest was to be calculated. The present statement I make from memory, merely—not having had access to the books of the bank for several years.

Augustine Newton sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I was Cashier of the Franklin Bank, and became so in March, 1821. There is a credit on the books of the bank to the Treasurer of the United States, for $48,000. The money was obtained before I went into office. Mr. Crawford was once at the bank while I was cashier, say in August, 1821, applying to have the money either paid or secured; at which time the bank agreed to transfer to him all its property, as security, and that this loan was the first debt to be paid. The charter of the bank expired on the 1st January, 1822—but I have the books in my possession.

The discounted notes were first to be resorted to, and if these proved insufficient, resort was to be had to stock notes. A small sum, less than $1,000, has been collected. The notes are now in suit, by Mr. Swan, district attorney. The stock notes are notes given by stockholders for stock, for the payment of which stock is pledged as security. I know of no reason for the agreement that one class of notes was first to be sued for, unless it may have been the convenience of the debtors on the stock notes. All the real property was also transferred. It consisted of a few houses, taken for debts.

The agreement was accepted by Mr. Crawford, before the expiration of the charter, and sent to Mr. Swan to have a regular conveyance drawn up. That conveyance was not consummated till after the charter had expired, say in October, 1822. Many of the notes assigned were under protest, and some of them in suit. Notes, including stock notes, to the amount of $185,000, and real estate to the amount of $5,000, were offered to be transferred, but Mr. Crawford did not at that time accept of the offer, because it did not extend to the payment of interest; but afterwards, the interest being stipulated for, the agreement was accepted, and the transfer made in October, 1822, as I have above stated. The stock notes are still in my possession. They have never been endorsed to the Government by any one. If suits can be sustained, there will be ample funds to repay the loan.

When I went into the office of cashier, I was under the impression that provision had been made by Congress for continuing the charter of the bank for five years beyond the time originally limited for its expiration. I continued under that impression for a long time, and I believe the directors were under the same impression.

AUG. NEWTON.

June 9, 1824.

Mr. Newton again called, (10th June.)

The transfer above referred to, from the bank to the United States, was made on the 3d October, 1822.

The terms of the agreement were finally arranged and assented to by the parties, on the 5th December, 1821.

A. NEWTON.

I was Cashier of the Union Bank of Alexandria. In June, 1819, owing to the heavy pressures upon the bank, and considering a disadvantageous loan had been made by this bank to the Government, and believing as I then did, and do now, that unless some temporary relief could be obtained at the moment, a serious inconvenience would have resulted to the institution; under such circumstances a committee was appointed to solicit from the Honorable William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, temporary aid—which he was pleased to grant, under the condition that the amount should be refunded, when demanded. The sum received from the Treasury was $30,000, in June, 1819, and having received information that it must be refunded in January 1820, a part was paid in the latter month, and the balance in February of the same year; and although the funds we received from the Treasury, were not, nor could have been desirable, under any other circumstances than those above mentioned, yet, interest was paid upon the same. The money thus received from the Treasury was all, I believe, paid into the Office of Discount and Deposit of the Bank of the United States at Washington, either by deposits or drafts, of the Treasurer through that bank upon us.

The solvency of the Union Bank was, I believe, never questioned at any time during its operations.

C. T. CHAPMAN.

June 9, 1824.

James L. McKenna sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am Cashier of the Bank of Alexandria. I became so in 1811. The bank has never had a loan or an indulgence from the Treasury. It has always had the deposits of the Government from the collector. It has made advances to the Government, when under pressure, and, at one time, remonstrated with Mr. Crawford on the closeness with which the public deposits were drawn. The average amount of public money remaining on deposit, in the bank, since Mr. Crawford has been Secretary of the Treasury, has been less, I think, than it was during the incumbency of Mr. Gallatin.

June 9:

J. L. McKENNA.

I had an agency in obtaining one of the loans made by Mr. Crawford to the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, when that bank was in difficulty. I accompanied Mr. Sanderson in his visit to the Secretary when he obtained the second loan, and represented the injurious consequences of permitting that bank to fail. I redeemed repeatedly the notes of that bank out of the hands of brokers and others. Mr. Crawford seemed dissatisfied at the second application so soon after the loan of $17,000. He applied to me for my opinion of the solvency of that bank, and whether the loan would enable it to redeem its paper. I represented the circumstances of the bank as being safe, (to the extent of its debts, but that its stockholders might lose,) though I doubted the sufficiency of the loan to enable it to redeem its paper. I represented the permitting the Mechanics' Bank to fail, as being calculated to injure, and the granting of the loan to benefit, materially, the commercial interests of Alexandria; and Mr. Crawford acquiesced in the wishes of Mr. Sanderson, and made the loan in drafts on some of the Eastern banks, in sums of two, three, and four thousand dollars each.

Question by Mr. Edwards. When a general deposit is made in your bank, without any thing being said on either side, is the amount demandable in cash?

Answer. Always—except when plate or notes of District banks are left for safe-keeping, to be delivered to order. J. L. McKENNA.

William Rhodes sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I was Cashier of the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, from May, 1816, to June, 1819. When I left that bank it was indebted to the United States, I think, in the sum of $48,000. I cannot certainly tell when it became indebted, but believe it was in 1818 or 1819. It became indebted, as I understood, in consequence of an application by our directors to the Secretary of the Treasury for a loan. There were, I believe, three such applications. At the first we received $18,000, at the second $18,000, and at the third $12,000. The money was advanced to the bank to relieve it from its embarrassments. I feel very certain as to the aggregate amount of $48,000, but am not so sure as to the amount of the different sums obtained at each application, nor respecting the time when they were obtained. My impression is, that the loans were all obtained within the course of about six months. I cannot state whether interest was or was not to be allowed upon them. I have no further knowledge of the transaction than that I received the warrants from the Treasury, and passed the amount to the credit of the United States. I now recollect that I was in one instance requested by the directors to write a letter to the Secretary, requesting a deposit in our bank; which I did, accordingly, but I do not remember at what time, nor whether it was before or after the first loan.

WILLIAM RHODES.

I am Cashier of the Bank of Columbia, and have been for more than two years. Since I have been cashier, the bank has been indebted to the United States, in all, about $300,000. The bank was appointed agent for the Treasury, to collect certain uncurrent money. The whole amount above mentioned did not, however, consist of such collections. There were some balances—about $40,000—left from former transactions with the Treasury. The sum I have mentioned was owing by the bank when I became cashier, and has remained about the same ever since. When the United States Bank went into operation, the Bank of Columbia owed the Government from $30,000 to $60,000—a part of which was drawn for by the Treasury, say about $15,000. The balance has not been drawn for, and remains a cash debt to the United States.

I do not know precisely what arrangement was made with the bank respecting the collection of uncurrent notes; but I have understood that so much of those notes as the bank could collect and turn into current money, might remain in the bank on deposit; but I cannot state for how long a time. About $200,000 worth of uncurrent notes have been thus converted, and credited, as cash, to the Treasury; part of the residue has been drawn out by the Secretary of the Treasury, and part remains now in the bank. These uncurrent notes were a part of those reported as uncollectable by the Bank of the United States, and were received from that bank by an order of the Treasury.

Question. What is the amount of notes delivered for collection, and what were the dates of delivery, and specify on what banks?

Answer. The amount of notes delivered for collection was $545,991 37, as appears by a statement now delivered, marked Z, in which also the dates of the orders for the delivery of the notes to the bank will appear. The notes were actually received between the months of December, 1818, and August, 1819. The banks whose notes were so received, are so numerous, that it has been impossible for me at this time to make out the list. A statement of a number of them is, however, contained in a paper now delivered, marked Y.

Q. What were the amounts of these notes cashed by the bank?

A. $238,361 87, as also appears by the paper marked Z.

Q. What was the amount of uncurrent notes drawn out of the bank by the Treasury?

A. $123,102 59, as appears by a statement now delivered and marked X.

Q. What is the amount of such uncurrent notes now on hand, and where are they lodged?

A. $53,661 40, lodged, principally, at the several places contained in a statement now delivered, and marked W.

Q. What is the total amount of the debt now due from the Bank of Columbia to the United States?

A. About $372,000, of which $318,361 87 is cash, and includes about $30,000 standing to the credit of the Treasurer, on sundry accounts, and the remaining balance of $53,661 40 is special deposit.

Q. What probability is there of the United States recovering this debt?

A. In my opinion the security given for the debt is amply sufficient, and I believe that the whole will be recovered. The bank owes in all about $800,000, and the nominal amount of its assets is more than a million and a half of dollars. An agreement has been made with the Bank of the United States to assign to it property and debts to secure the debt due from the Bank of Columbia to the Bank of the United States, and to the United States. For the whole of the above amount of $318,361 87, excepting the sum of $30,000, above specified, the Government received a credit on the books of the bank, as cash, in 1819 or 1820. At that time the Bank of Columbia paid specie. The above sum, credited as cash, was suffered to remain in the bank from that time to the present. This, as I understand, was in pursuance of an agreement with the Treasury.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

This deposit was the only compensation the bank received for the trouble of collection. I do not know that any time was specified for the continuance of the deposit. The Secretary of the Treasury has pressed the bank very much for the amount; more, I think, than he ought to have done, considering the trouble and expense to which the bank was put.

Case of Nintan Edwards.

In addition to the balance, as stated in the account current, there is due to the United States, on the books of the Office of Pay and Deposite, on sundry accounts, about $30,000.

Alexander Kerr sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am Cashier of the Bank of Metropolis, in this city, and have been so for ten years past. It was one of the banks in which public deposits were made previous to the existence of the United States Bank. When the Bank of the United States went into operation, the Bank of the Metropolis owed to the United States about $90,000, which was drawn for by the former in one check. This sum had come into the bank by deposits of individuals only, and not by loan. There is a deposite now in the bank, to the credit of the United States, in consequence of payments for Western lands being made partly in bills which the United States Bank would not receive as cash, and which were received by the Bank of the Metropolis, and receipted for to the Treasurer of the United States, as cash. The notes were on specie paying banks; we received them as cash; and considered the accommodation to the Government quite equal to any benefit received by the bank. The sum has gradually increased and vibrated, from 40 to $60,000. It was never made at the solicitation of our bank; but the Secretary of the Treasury directed persons wishing to pay for lands as above stated, to apply to our bank, to know if we would receive the notes, and credit them as cash; which we agreed to do. The amount of deposite, as reported to the Treasury the 1st day of January, of the present year, was about $60,000. Neither specie nor United States notes, to any considerable amount, were included in the above deposits.

ALEXANDER KERR.

June 10, 1824.

Jonah Thompson sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am President of the Bank of Alexandria, and have been since March 1st, 1819.

The bank never applied to the Secretary of the Treasury for a loan, but have always had the deposits from the custom-house. On the 9th of January, there was an application, and understood to be the wish of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the Bank of Alexandria would assume and pay the sum of forty-six thousand dollars to the Government. The Bank of Alexandria gave credit to the Government for the amount, and the Mechanics' Bank agreed to secure it by notes and real estate. The bank pays the drafts of the Government when called upon. It has a deposite of more than $139,000. The Bank of Alexandria has never applied to the Treasurer for any indulgence, to my knowledge.

JONAH THOMPSON.

Edward Jones sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am Chief Clerk in the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have heard of a letter mentioned by Mr. Edwards as having been written by Mr. Stephenson, Receiver of the Public Moneys at Edwardsville, to the Secretary of the Treasury—I first heard of it very lately—I believe the first intimation I had concerning it was derived from Mr. Edwards's memorial to Congress.

Question by Mr. Cook. Did you ever see, in the Treasury Department, previously to Mr. Edwards' memorial, any letter or notice in any of the public papers, concerning Mr. Edwards' having withdrawn from the directorship of the Bank at Edwardsville?

Answer. Never.

Question by Mr. Cook. Does the correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury, and the banks which are depositories of the public moneys, pass through your hands?

A. Yes. When the Secretary is in town he opens the mail himself, writes on the different bundles such directions as will designate what is to be done with each, so that they may respectively be acted on; they are then sent out to me, and I distribute them amongst the clerks.

Q. Have you read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to Congress on the 22d day of March, of the present year?

A. Yes, I have.

Q. Did the Secretary consult you in making out that report?

A. No.

Q. Did he say any thing to you in reference to that report before it was made?

A. No.

Q. Do you, or do you not, know that the letter from Mr. Stephenson, referred to by Mr. Edwards, has since been found in the Treasury Department?

A. No, I do not know any such thing.

Q. Have you heard that that letter has been found?

A. Never.

Q. Do you remember whether the Secretary of the Treasury received the St. Louis Requirer in 1819?

A. I do not recollect. I have seen that paper several times in the Department. Papers are frequently sent to the Secretary, which he has not subscribed for, and after a few numbers are sent and no subscription obtained, they are sent no longer.

Q. When, according to your best recollection, did you first see that paper in the Department?

A. I do not recollect.

Q. Do you think it was several years past?

A. I have seen it within two years.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Does all the official correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury pass through your hands?

A. Yes.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. In order to distribute the different papers sent out to you by the Secretary, is it not necessary that you should read them?

Answer. To read them all would occupy more time than I can spare; but on merely opening them I can immediately perceive whether they are from banks or Receivers of Public Moneys, or what is their general character.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Who makes the endorsements on these letters?

Answer. If they require an immediate answer, I usually draw the answer, and in that case I endorse them myself; but if they do not require immediate attention, or do not need any answer at all, I hand them over to a young man who assists me, and he makes the endorsement. The greater part of the letters received are of the description first mentioned. I do not draught all the answers; but most of the letters are of such a kind that there are precedents for the answer required.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. When calls are made upon the Secretary of the Treasury for papers, does the direction usually pass through your hands?

Answer. Yes, it usually does. (The direction is generally endorsed on the back.) In some few cases it has been sent immediately by the Secretary to the person having charge of the papers.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. To which of the clerks go the letters from the Receivers of the Public Moneys?

Answer. They remain with me, unless where they contain inquiries for directions concerning the kinds of moneys to be received, and the place of deposit; in which case they are considered as pertaining to the duty of Mr. Dickins.

Question by Mr. Cook. Where and by whom were the copies of the voluminous documents laid before Congress at the present session, in answer to a call for the correspondence of the Treasury with the Western banks, made?

Answer. That is a question which I cannot answer very fully. I had no share in making out those copies. Mr. Dickins was engaged in superintending that business—a Mr. Elkins, a Mr. Phillips, and a Mr. Washington, were employed; and Mr. Laub, an extra clerk in the office.

Question by Mr. Cook. Was any part of the correspondence taken away from the Department to be copied?

Answer. I was told by Mr. Richards, who had the largest portion of the letters from the banks to copy, that he took them with him to Connecticut. I also understood from Mr. Elkins that he took some of those assigned him to his lodgings. Those given to both these gentlemen were letters from banks to the Department; those given to the extra clerks were records taken from the files of the office.

Question by Mr. Cook. At what time did this copying commence?

Answer. I think about the first of last July.

Question by Mr. Cook. At what time was it finished?

Answer. A few days before the report went into Congress. It occupied some days to arrange so great a number of copies of letters; but as soon as that was done, and the report made out, the whole was sent in. I understood that the arrangement intended was, that each letter should be followed by the answer to it; but I had no hand in the business, from the commencement to the end of it.

EDWARD JONES.

Clement Smith sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am President of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, and have been for about four years. The bank has not been in that time indebted to the United States, nor is there a credit now on the books to the United States.

CLEMENT SMITH.

Overton Carr sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am Cashier of the Patriotic Bank, and have been since its establishment in 1815. The bank had one deposit from the Treasury of $10,000, on the 13th of September, 1819. It was made at my request, in consequence of the pressure then existing in the concerns of the bank. It consisted of a draft on Salem, Massachusetts, for $5,000; Portsmouth $2,000, Bristol $1,000, Petersburg $2,000. On the 11th February, 1820, this loan was repaid by a deposit in the United States Branch Bank in this city. Interest of 6 per cent. was paid on the deposit, and a loss was sustained of 1½ per cent. in converting these funds into cash, which was done through the agency of brokers. The banks drawn on were specie-paying banks, and their notes current in their own States, respectively. The loss arose merely from the rate of exchange. The bank has never before or since been indebted to the United States.

OVERTON CARR.

I am Cashier of the Branch Bank of the United States in this city, and have been since its institution.

Question by Mr. Cook. In what manner was the deposit of $1,175 made by Colonel Riddick in that bank, and how was it credited to the United States?

Answer. To the best of my recollection, it was entered to the credit of the United States—part as cash, and part as special deposit—perhaps $285 entered as special deposit on paper of the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, the residue entered as cash. I have no memorandum with me to refer to, but presume the above to be the transaction referred to in the question.

RICHARD SMITH.

Thomas Swann sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question. Please to state at what time the transfer of the effects of the Franklin Bank of Alexandria to the United States was made, for the purpose of securing certain loans made to it by the Treasury, and all the circumstances connected with such transfer.

Answer. I was applied to as the Attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, by the Secretary of the Treasury, some time in the Summer or Fall of 1821, to carry into effect an agreement which had been entered into between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, in relation to a debt of about $48,000 due from the Franklin Bank to the United States. The agreement appeared to have been entered into on the 23d of August, 1821, and the bank bound themselves to transfer to William H. Crawford, and his successors in office, all the debts due to that bank, and all the real estate of every description belonging to the bank, and all the notes given by the stockholders of the bank, on account of stock by them severally subscribed thereto. The real estate was to be disposed of on the most advantageous terms, and the whole amount of the moneys collected were to be placed in the Bank of Alexandria, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. The debts were to be collected by gradual instalments, excepting the stock debts, which were to be applied, in the first place, to the payment of the deposits and issues then due from the bank; and, in the second place, to make up any deficiency that might be due to the United States. Schedules of the debts due to the bank were annexed to the agreement.

Very shortly after this application was made by the Secretary of the Treasury, I prepared a deed of assignment for the purpose of carrying this agreement into effect, and made various efforts, in the course of the Fall of that year, to get it executed by the Board of Directors of the Franklin Bank, but without effect; objections and difficulties, of one sort or other, were constantly made, and an indisposition to execute the assignment, as I thought, manifested on the part of the board. I had understood that the deposit had been originally made by the Secretary of the Treasury in that bank at the instance of General Thomson Mason and Mr. Jno. T. Ricketts, who were then Directors of the bank, and, if they had been alive at the time that I prepared the assignment, I have no doubt that the assignment would have been promptly executed; but the death of these gentlemen, and of my brother, William T. Swann, who had acted as the President of the bank, produced, I am inclined to think, the delays which attended the final completion of this business. After making my efforts to get this paper executed, I was requested to send it to the Secretary of the Treasury; and I accordingly did so, and I believe that a correspondence took place between him and the bank upon the subject of the deed; it was returned to me about the month of May, 1822, and was finally executed by the Board of Directors of the bank some time afterwards, the precise period I do not now recollect. At the time it was executed none of us, I believe, were aware that the charter of the bank had expired. The impression generally was, that a power had been reserved to it, in common with the other banks of the District, to wind up its affairs, and the time given was, I think, five years; but so it was, upon looking at the law, the Franklin Bank was omitted, and its charter at an end, before the deed of assignment was finally executed.

When this information was obtained, I was requested to turn my attention again to the original agreement, and to see whether the United States would be able to recover their moneys upon that paper—upon considering that paper, it seemed to me that the notes which had been negotiated in the bank while it was incorporated and endorsed in blank, might be applied to the use of the United States, and I accordingly obtained possession of those notes, and filled up the endorsements payable to the United States, and brought suits at law upon those notes in behalf of the United States, which suits are still mostly depending.

As to the stock notes, no measures have yet been taken upon them, nor did the agreement with the bank authorize any steps to be yet taken, but when it may be necessary to resort to them, it seemed to me that a court of chancery would compel the payment of them and give to the United States the same relief as if the assignments had been regularly made.

If the United States should be able to enforce the payment of these stock notes, I should entertain no doubt but that the money due to the United States may be obtained—but otherwise, a considerable loss would be sustained.

THO. SWANN.

I am Cashier of the Union Bank of Georgetown, and have been since its institution in 1809. That bank received one deposit in August, 1819, from the Treasury, of $25,000. The bank was under some fears on the subject of the resumption of specie payments, and application was made to the Treasury for aid, and the loan was obtained; which was repaid in October following, by deposits in the United States Bank or its branches. No other deposit has since been made by the Treasury in the Union Bank, to my knowledge. No interest was paid on the above loan.

D. ENGLISH.

Thomas Dungan sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and have been about eight years.

Question. Have you heard of a letter said by Mr. Edwards to have been written by Mr. Stephenson, Receiver of Public Moneys at Edwardsville, to the Treasury, in 1819.

Answer. Not until lately, when it has been mentioned in the public papers. I never heard of it until after Mr. Edwards's memorial was communicated to Congress.

Q. Was it after that memorial was presented to Congress that you first heard the subject spoken of?

A. I have answered that question.

Q. Have you heard any thing of that letter's having been found in the Treasury Department since that memorial was presented to Congress?

A. I have not.

Q. Do you know whether the St. Louis Enquirer was received at that Department in 1819?

A. I do not know.

Q. Did you see the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 22d of March of the present year, previous to its communication to Congress, or did you know any thing of the subject of its contents before it was communicated ?

Case of Ninian Edwards.

A. I did not see or copy any part of the report before it went to Congress. I had only a general knowledge of its contents, such as every body else had, from the call to which it was an answer. My business in the office did not lead me to any special knowledge of that report.

THOMAS DUNGAN.

Samuel M. McKean sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I never heard of the letter said to have been written by Mr. Stephenson, Receiver of Public Moneys at Edwardsville, to the Treasury Department, before the evening of the day on which Mr. Edwards's memorial was presented to Congress. I attend, among other things, to that part of the business of the office which relates to the remission of fines and forfeitures, and also to the issuing of commissions. I have never heard of that letter's having been found by any one in the Treasury Department.

S. M. McKEAN.

Peter G. Washington sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and have been since 1st July, 1822. I copied a portion of the documents submitted to Congress the present session by the Treasury Department. I first heard of Mr. Stephenson's letter to the Treasury on the day after the memorial of Mr. Edwards was presented to Congress. I have never heard that that letter has been found in the Department since the presentation of that memorial. The letters addressed to the office in general, and among them those which contain the correspondence with the banks, are mostly deposited in the room in which I am employed, and are considered as placed more particularly under my charge; and I think, that, had such a letter been found, I must have heard of it. The letters have always been under my charge since I went into the office; but every gentleman in the office has free access to them as a matter of course in the discharge of his official duty—my duty in relation to them consists in placing and keeping them on the proper files, and restoring them to their places when removed. The custom of the office in relation to letters sent from it, is to preserve in the Department the draught of letters, and to send away the fair copy of that draught made by one of the clerks. The original draught is sometimes made by the Secretary himself, and if it is sufficiently fair, the original itself is sometimes sent, and a copy retained. These copies or draughts are filed, and usually recorded monthly. No directions were ever given me by the Secretary to search for the letter of Mr. Stephenson; as I before said, I never heard of that letter until Mr. Edwards's memorial was presented. The instructions of the Secretary were, that all the letters to and from banks should be communicated to Congress; in consequence of which, many letters were so communicated which I did not conceive to be embraced in the call of the House.

PETER G. WASHINGTON.

Peter G. Washington again called.

Question by Mr. Webster. Are you able to state at what time the copying of the correspondence with the banks commenced, by order of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was called for by a resolution of the House of Representatives of May 8, 1822, and which was communicated with a letter of the Secretary to the House, of 22d of March, 1824 ?

Answer. Soon after the adjournment of Congress, in 1823—I think, in April.

Question by Mr. Cook. Look at the paper now shown to you. [Here Mr. Washington was shown a paper, submitted to the Committee by Mr. Edwards, as the enclosure contained in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Cashier of the Bank of Edwardsville, dated 1st of November, 1819.] Do you know the handwriting ?

Answer. I do.

Q. Will you state whose it is ?

A. It is the handwriting of the late Edward Fox, formerly a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Q. Do you know who copied the letter of the 1st of November, above referred to, for the purpose of being communicated to the House, with the report of the Secretary of the 24th of March last ?

A. I do. It was copied by myself.

Q. Did the original copy of the enclosure accompany the original letter, when copied by you ?

A. It did not. The enclosure was a letter to a Receiver. The letters called for, were letters to and from banks.

Q. Do you, or do you not, know that the Secretary of the Treasury could have commanded the same means during the recess of Congress, in 1822, for the purpose of preparing the documents to accompany the report made on the 22d March, 1824, as were employed during the succeeding year, to prepare the same documents; and, if so, do you know what reason prevented their employment ?

A. The power of the Secretary of the Treasury, on that subject, must always be the same. In his report of February, 1823, he states why all the correspondence with the banks was not then communicated; and I know of no other reason than the one he assigned.

Q. Do you know of any reason to doubt the truth of the facts, stated in that report, as the cause for not sooner communicating the correspondence ?

A. I do not.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. At what time did Mr. Crawford return from Georgia to Washington, in that year ?

Answer. Late in the Fall.

PETER G. WASHINGTON.

Robert Newell sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I never heard of the letter of Mr. Stephenson to the Treasury, until I read the memorial of Mr. Edwards to Congress. I have been in the office three years. I had charge of the letters in the apartment where Mr. Washington now is, for a time. I never saw such a letter as that said to have been written by Mr. Stephenson, in the Department. It is now nearly two years since I left that room. I have heard nothing of such a letter's being found in the Department, since Mr. Edwards's memorial was presented to Congress. Nothing was ever said to me, either by Mr. Crawford or by any other person, respecting that letter, previous to Mr. Crawford's report of the 22d of March, 1824.

R. NEWELL.

Asbury Dickins sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I am a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not recollect that I had any agency in the negotiation concerning the collection or securing the loan to the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, after the time at which the terms of the agreement were settled, which appears to have been on the 5th of December, 1821. I never heard any thing, as I now recollect, of the letter said to have been written to the Treasury, by Mr. Stephenson, of Edwardsville, previously to the Secretary's directing me to draw up the report of the 22d of March last. I wrote the report, according to directions previously given me, by the Secretary; and, when it was completed, I read it to him. Before receiving those directions, I do not recollect to have heard Mr. Stephenson's letter spoken of by any one. At the time Mr. Edwards was examined, last year, before a committee of the House of Representatives, I was not present. I may have, afterwards, read Mr. Edwards's deposition concerning that letter. But, when I received the directions above alluded to, I had forgotten every thing in relation to it. I received Mr. Crawford's instructions to prepare the report a few days before the papers were ready which were to accompany it. He expressed impatience at the delay which had taken place, and urged me to use despatch myself, and to hasten the other persons employed. The greater part of the correspondence of the Secretary with the banks, has passed through my hands, ever since I have been in the office, which has been since October, 1816. I had no instructions to search for the alleged letter of Mr. Stephenson, until the time I received Mr. Crawford's instructions to draw up the report. He then directed me to have the search made. I made the search, accordingly, but did not find such a letter, nor have I since heard of its being found. I searched for it on the files of the office. The letters had been put away in bundles. I directed the messenger to bring me the bundles which contained the letters of the period alluded to. I searched all of those bundles, and examined all the files of letters they contained. Those bundles were not in my charge, and I cannot say how long they had remained untouched—they are usually put away by the junior clerks. They may be said to be in the particular care of Mr. Jones, or rather the messenger; they are put away in cases. The report, as I believe, bears date the same day it was sent to the House, which, I think, was, also, the same day on which the fair copy was written. I do not remember that I had any conversation with Mr. Crawford, on the subject of that letter, between the time when I first received his instructions to draw up the report, and the time when I read the draught of the report to him. He then inquired whether I had made the search directed, and I informed him that I had, and of the result. Mr. Richards, as far as I recollect, returned the letters he took away to copy, in October or November. When he returned, I employed several persons in making farther copies. At the time I had the first conversation with Mr. Crawford, concerning the letter of Mr. Stephenson, he directed me to search the records for an answer to that letter, which I did, accordingly, and found none.

ASBURY DICKINS.

The Bank of Missouri had a capital of $250,000, of which $40,000 was placed in an office of discount and deposit at St. Genevieve, which said office was entirely under the control of the principal bank, in all respects; the cashier and all the directors and officers were appointed by the mother bank, and removed at pleasure. Their general operations were also directed by the principal bank, at St. Louis. The office at St. Genevieve loaned money on personal security, but never on pledge of stock. Stockholders residing at St. Genevieve pledged their stock at St. Louis, if they wished to borrow on that security; not more than eighty per cent. was allowed on such pledge, which was considered only as collateral security. These loans were always considered safe, and better than any personal security. I believe that the stock has never fallen below eighty per cent.

A large amount of public moneys had accumulated in the bank prior to the 9th August, 1819, but it consisted, for the most part, in notes of the various banks of the West, which had been received by the land offices, and could not be used in the Treasury in discharge of debts due by the Government. The Bank of Missouri, at its own expense and risk, (and for which they have not as yet been allowed any compensation.) converted those funds to a large amount, say $600,000, into such funds as would pay the Treasurer's drafts at St. Louis. But the Government having no occasion to disburse any considerable amount at St. Louis, (as the bank were informed,) made a proposition to the bank to transfer its funds to the Bank of the United States, and certain of its branches; and, as a compensation for this service, agreed that $150,000 should remain in bank as a permanent deposit, but which might, nevertheless, be drawn on whea-disbursements could be made at St. Louis; agreeing, also, that further compensation should be made if the deposits should not be found adequate for the service proposed to be rendered. This was accepted in part on the 9th August, 1819, and a sum, amounting to near $450,000, before and after that time, was paid to the Bank of the United States and branches, or funds worth four per cent. premium to the bank. The permanent deposit was frequently drawn on, and reduced to an amount considerably below $150,000. The bank has been allowed no compensation as yet for this service beyond what the uncertain benefit of this deposit might have been worth to them, which, under circumstances, ought to be estimated at a very small sum. Moreover, the Bank of Missouri had to encounter the hostility of nearly all the institutions of the West from whom the Bank of Missouri had to make demand for specie funds, or such other funds as would satisfy the Treasurer's drafts; and, also, from gentlemen connected with those banks. This fact will be seen by a reference to the printed correspondence with banks. See letters from the President of the Bank of Kentucky to the Secretary of the Treasury, May 25, 1819; September 29, 1819; letter from honorable W. H. Crawford to President of the Bank of Kentucky, July 30, 1819; also, letters from honorable Ninian Edwards, a Senator of the United States, May 10th and 12th, 1819, directed to Thomas F. Riddick, one of the Directors of the Bank of Missouri, which said letters last named are filed with the Committee of Ways and Means, in support of a petition presented by Thomas F. Riddick, as agent for the bank.

It will also be seen, by reference to the several agreements made by the Bank with the Treasury Department, and the general correspondence; also, the original certificates of deposits, that the Bank of Missouri never became bound, until the 9th of August, 1819, to pay over to the Treasury any other or better funds than such as they should receive from the land offices, not having it in their power, before the said 9th of August, to direct what kind of paper should be received in payment for lands; this was, before that date, regulated by a list furnished the different Receivers, by the Treasury Department, and, whether at par or not, was received from them by the Bank of Missouri, and certificates of deposits, issued by the cashier, stating the amount received in par funds, and the amount received in such paper as had been authorized by the Treasury Department. The bank, therefore, clearly had a right to pay over such funds as was received by them; and the Government, in common justice, is bound to make compensation for the risk and loss incurred by the bank, in converting those funds into such other funds as could be used by the Treasury, in payment of demands against them.

Whenever these fair demands of the bank shall be liquidated and settled, the amount that will be then found due the United States will be much lessened, and the amount that has been transferred by the bank ample, and greatly more than sufficient to satisfy every cent justly due by the bank to the United States. The amount that now stands charged on the books of the Treasury, if the nominal amount of all the moneys of every description paid into bank by the land offices, without any deduction having been made for services rendered, and for risk and loss in exchange.

It will also be seen, by reference to the reports of the bank, and the report of the committee of the Missouri Legislature, that the Bank of Missouri did, at all times, conduct its operations with great care and circumspection, never having an average discount including notes on pledges or stock (with the exception of the deposit of $150,000) greater than the capital stock, and never having its paper signed for circulation to a greater amount than $204,938 29, of which sum (if the books of the bank were within my reach,) I am satisfied it would be found that the average amount in circulation, from the completion of the payment of the capital stock, to the day of suspension, did not exceed $80,000; the greatest amount that appears ever to have been in circulation, was $153,899 50; of which sum $25,000, or near that amount, was specially deposited in the Branch Bank of the United States at Lexington, and belonged to the Bank of Missouri; at the time the bank suspended payment, only $86,000, or thereabouts, was in circulation.

The suspension, in August, 1821, cannot, therefore, be attributed either to excessive loans, or to an excessive issue of the paper of the bank; but to the general situation of the Western country, which rendered it impossible for the bank to collect from its debtors, with sufficient promptness, to meet the demands for specie, created by the pressure that existed at that time, and to the circumstance of this bank being almost the only one who continued to pay specie on demand in the Western country.

Question by Mr. Cook. Were you President of the Bank of Missouri in 1821?

Answer. I was.

Q. by same. Do you believe that the account and monthly returns made by that bank were correct, just, and true?

A. I believe they were, and that the statement made by myself, and forwarded to Mr. Crawford, under date of 30th June, 1821, was also just and true.

Q. From what land office were the largest deposits made in the Bank of Missouri, between the 1st of July, 1818, and 9th August, 1819?

A. From the land office at Franklin.

Q. When did General Smith make his first deposit?

A. I believe on the 7th December, 1818.

Q. How much larger do you suppose these deposits were than those from any other office?

A. Something more than twice the amount from the office at St. Louis.

Q. What was the amount of General Smith's deposit between the aforesaid periods?

A. I believe they amounted to $460,966 76; this I take from a memorandum in my possession.

Q. Were any of the notes received from him refused to be received as cash, and were they specially entered? If so, state the circumstances, and whether General Smith was apprized thereof.

A. General Smith very seldom made his deposits in person. His office being near two hundred miles from the bank, they were generally placed in bank by some person in whom the General had confidence, travelling to St. Louis or to the eastward, or by boats trading on the Missouri. I do not remember that the bank ever had any difficulty with General Smith or any other person, about his deposits. I believe they were always made in the same funds which he received for lands, and certificates were issued to him by the cashier, stating the kind of funds deposited which certificates were, no doubt, forwarded by him to the Treasury Department, as vouchers.

Q. What amount of internal taxes were deposited, much or little?

A. I do not remember of any deposits being made of that description.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. When were the deposits of the Tennessee paper made by the Bank of Missouri, at Louisville?

A. I believe in May, 1820, having promised Mr. Crawford to have it forwarded as soon as I arrived at St. Louis, which was done by a special agent. I was afterwards informed that the agent of the Nashville Bank received the amount of the Nashville Bank paper, but that the agent of the Tennessee Bank had left Louisville a short time before the arrival of the special agent of the Missouri Bank at Louisville, and deposited it in the Branch Bank of the United States.

Thomas F. Riddick states; that while a director of the bank, he had access at all times to the books and papers of the bank, being nominated by the President to act in his place pro tem, when he was absent at his farm, or was holding Indian treaties, or otherwise unable to attend; that he counted the Tennessee and other paper transferred to the Treasury, before the proposition of the 9th August, 1818, was made, and that he took with him, when he left St. Louis for Washington City, in December, 1819, a considerable part of the funds intended to be so transferred, and made a deposit at Chillicothe, and in the Branch Bank of the United States at Washington; which deposits made a part of the charge against him as agent of the bank, as contained in the monthly returns made to the Treasury in the months of January and February, 1820. Also, that what I have stated before the committee of my own knowledge is true, and what I have stated as matter of opinion, I believe to be true.

Q. by Mr. Cook. When you discounted notes for individuals, in what kind of money did you advance the amount of such notes?

A. Those discounts were usually left in deposit, and drawn for in small sums at different times. They were then paid generally, in notes of the Bank of Missouri, or in such other funds as the bank had at the time, or as the party demanded.

Q. Did not the amount of discounts by the Bank of Missouri always very greatly exceed the amount of its notes in circulation?

A. It is my impression that it always greatly exceeded that amount.

Q. Did not so much of the money advanced for discounts as exceeded the amount of the bank's own paper, consist of moneys deposited in it by the Government?

A. It consisted in part of such moneys, but not wholly, because some part of those moneys were in notes that the bank could not use.

Q. Did the bank ever refuse to receive deposits made by General Smith as cash?

A. So much of the deposit as was in cash was received as cash; so much of it as consisted of bills was received for as such; but the whole amount was credited together, without distinction.

Q. Did you, in receiving deposits from the Land Offices, ever keep a separate account of paper and of cash?

A. A memorandum of the sort of funds received was kept by the cashier, but it did not go into the books of the bank. But, in private accounts with individuals, a separate account was in some instances kept for cash and for notes, by inserting in the ledger, opposite to the sums paid, the words "cash," or "foreign notes," as the case might be. When deposits were made on account of the United States, a certificate was issued by the Cashier, stating whether the deposit had been made in cash, or in such notes as the Land Offices were directed to receive.

Q. Was not the principal part of the funds deposited by Government in the Bank of Missouri, transferred to the Branch Bank of the United States at Louisville, and other banks in Kentucky?

A. There was no transfer made to any other bank in Kentucky but the bank at Louisville. The transfers made by the bank will appear in the communication of the Treasurer No. 2, dated March 1st, 1823.

Q. Were not the funds which you say were worth four per cent. premium, and paid over by the bank to Government, derived from the Government deposits?

A. Some part of them might have been; the greater part was by the purchase of bills on the Government, sent to the Bank of the United States at Philadelphia, and to the Branch Bank of the United States at Washington City, for collection on the part of the bank.

Q. Were not these bills paid for in the funds that had been deposited in the bank by the Government?

A. They were paid for out of the general fund of the bank.

Q. Did such general fund embrace the public deposits?

A. There was no distinct account kept between the public fund and the general fund of the bank.

Q. Was any premium paid by the bank on those Government bills in their purchase? and if so, on how many, and to what amount?

A. A premium was frequently paid by the bank upon such purchase. I cannot say, without a reference to the books of the bank, to what amount. A premium of two per cent. has in some cases been paid, but it varied from par to one and a half and two per cent. When the bank sold their own bills on the Bank of the United States, it sold them at four per cent. premium.

Q. By what means did the Bank of Missouri acquire funds in the Bank of the United States, on which it could draw bills?

A. By collections made in the Bank of the United States for and on account of the Bank of Missouri, and perhaps in some instances by deposits made there by individuals to the credit of the Bank of Missouri.

Q. What description of debts were they which were collected by the Bank of the United States for the Bank of Missouri?

A. A part of them were bills drawn by individuals, and a part of them were bills drawn by persons authorized to draw on the Secretary of the Treasury for the expenditure of public moneys. Much the greater part, I believe, however, were bills drawn by individuals.

Q. You stated that the Government funds in the Bank of Missouri, at the time it suspended cash payments, consisted of bills which could not be converted into cash, or such suspension would not have happened. I wish you now to state what amount of bills deposited on account of the Government was in the Bank of Missouri at the time the suspension of cash payments took place.

A. I was not correctly understood, if it was supposed that I said that the Government funds in bank at the time of the suspension consisted of bills. Although a credit then stood on the books of the Bank of the United States, the money corresponding with that credit was not actually in the bank. The amount due the Government, as appeared on the books of the bank, was very near the amount allowed as a permanent deposit, which was payable six months after the bank ceased to be employed as an office of public deposit.

Q. What sum did, then, remain in bank, of bills which had been entered to the credit of the United States?

A. A very small amount, perhaps about five thousand dollars.

Q. When the arrangement was made with the Bank of Missouri, under which it was to retain a permanent deposit, what was the amount first understood it should so retain?

A. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Q. Was there not an arrangement made with the Secretary of the Treasury by letters of August and September, 1819, by which the same moneys were to have been received by the Government, or a considerable portion of them, as were received under the subsequent arrangement of March, 1820? And did not the bank fail to comply with the first arrangement alluded to?

A. The letter of the bank of the 9th of August, 1819, and the arrangement made by me, in March, 1820, will answer that question. Whatever paper, under the first arrangement, was not transferred, the bank, of course, was accountable for in cash.

Q. Was not a part of the same paper which was to have been transferred under the first arrangement, afterwards received under the second, in a depreciated state?

A. No. I believe that all the paper transferred to the Government was of the same value at the time of the transfer, as it was at the time it was agreed to be transferred by letter of the 9th of August.

Q. Was not a considerable part of the paper transferred under the arrangement contained in the letter of the 20th of March, 1820, greatly below par?

A. It was.

Q. What amount of it, as nearly as you can recollect, was below par?

A. Something more than one hundred thousand dollars.

Q. Did the Bank of Missouri ever receive an answer, from the Secretary of the Treasury, to the following clause in a letter signed by Augustus Chouteau, President, and dated 9th August, 1819, viz:

"As to the Bank of Edwardsville, the only one near us, we cannot give it our confidence. Their paper is received with distrust, even in their own neighborhood, and passed from hand to hand as soon as possible. Owing to the intimate connexion which it had with the Bank of St. Louis, which cannot pay its debts, and has entirely discontinued business, the capital stock of that bank has been taken for the most part, and is now owned by five or six individuals, some of them living out of the State, and the direction secured to such persons as they may choose to appoint. There are other objections which we forbear to mention."

A. I never saw any answer to this clause, and believe that none was ever received by the bank.

Q. Was the opinion here expressed by the Bank of Missouri, concerning the Bank of Edwardsville, continued to be entertained by the former, for any length of time after the date of that letter, and how long?

A. I cannot positively say, as to any other person but myself; but my impressions were changed after I understood, from common report, that the Bank of Edwardsville had determined to forfeit the stock of those persons who should not pay the requisitions of the bank. I understood that General Payne, of Kentucky, and others; were stockholders to a large amount, and I believed that they would fail to pay for the stock subscribed if demanded in cash. This, I think, was my impression at the time, but it was derived merely from report then prevailing.

I am a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I first heard of Mr. Stephenson's alleged letter to the Department, since Mr. Edwards's memorial was presented to Congress. I was not consulted, previously to the report made by the Treasury to Congress, on the subject of its correspondence with the banks, as to my knowledge of the receipt of the alleged letter from Mr. Stephenson. John Forsyth, of the House of Representatives, sworn at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I first heard of the alleged letter of Mr. Stephenson to the Treasury, after Mr. Edwards's memorial was presented to Congress. A day or two after Mr. Crawford's report came into Congress, I read that report, but had no conversation with any person respecting Mr. Stephenson's letter until afterwards. I never have heard from the Secretary of the Treasury, from any person connected with the Treasury Department, or from any member of Congress, that such a letter has been found. I was shown by a member of the House of Representatives a letter from a gentleman in Richmond, in which the writer stated that a passenger on board the steamboat from Washington down the river, had said that Mr. Cook, a member of Congress from Illinois, had Mr. Crawford's answer to the letter of Mr. Stephenson ready to produce, on which I called upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and mentioned to him what I had heard. He replied "it was possible, but it scarcely could be so."

J. FORSYTH.

Jonathan Jennings, of the House of Representatives, sworn at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Cook. In the report made by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, 14th February, 1822, he states, that "for the public money on deposits in the Bank of Vincennes at the time of its failure, collateral security has been obtained." I wish you to state your knowledge of the nature of that security.

Answer. The collateral security consisted of assignments of certain bonds given to the Bank of Vincennes, in behalf of the State of Indiana, and a note of a Mr. Piatt and his endorsers, as also a transfer in trust for the use of the United States, of certain real property. The value of the collateral security, when given, I should have estimated, provided there had been no substantial objections to the character and circumstances under which the assignments and transfers were made, as being worth a sum not to exceed $80,000; the greater part of which, however, since the assignments and transfer, owing to various causes, has become unavailable to the United States, and, in my opinion, the residue will not yield more than $20,000.

Q. Do you know of any steps taken since the arrangement of 1821, to get security for this debt?

A. I know of none, except what was obtained through General Noble, at Brookville, Indiana, in the year 1822; of the value of which I am unacquainted.

Question by Mr. Floyd. Had you any agency in procuring the Bank of Vincennes to be made a depository of public moneys?

Answer. Among others, I recommended that measure. The bank then appeared from its quarterly returns, submitted to me as Governor of the State, to be entirely solvent. Those returns contained only the general accounts of the bank; nor was the institution required by any provision of its charter, to submit any list of its debtors, and the amount owing by each, to any State authority; which it uniformly refused to do when applied to for that purpose.

Question by Mr. Floyd. When the bank thus refused, and you were Governor, did you communicate that refusal to the Secretary of the Treasury, or did you at any time express to him any doubts or suspicions touching its solvency.

A. I never entertained any doubt of the solvency or integrity of the Bank of Vincennes, until late in the year 1820, and the records of the State government will show, that, in my communications to the Legislature, I did not recommend an examination into the situation of the bank until December, 1820; prior to which time, it will appear, however, from the communications of the Secretary of the Treasury to the bank, that the latter had committed a breach of its engagements with the former, in failing to pay drafts drawn by the Treasury as early as the 19th of October, 18th of November, 28th December, 1819, and 10th of March, 1820; of which failure to pay those drafts, I have no recollection of having had any information, until the session of Congress before the last. I was informed, however, of one small draft, drawn on the bank by the Treasury, having been dishonored during the Winter of 1820-21, shortly before I personally examined said bank. Upon this examination, I discovered the bank had not two hundred dollars of available funds, and that a draft drawn upon it for moneys in favor of the Pension Agent for the Indiana roll, had been diverted from its legitimate object, to the prejudice of the Government. I advised the Secretary of War of the circumstances.

I made no communication to the Secretary of the Treasury when the bank declined giving a list of its debtors, and the amount owing by each. The bank was not bound to give such list, nor was it required by me only in compliance with resolutions of the Legislature, nor was it incumbent on me, or necessary, to detail to the Treasury Department such refusal on the part of the bank, and the reasons offered by the bank as inducing a refusal, on its part, to give publicity to such list, inasmuch as the Secretary of the Treasury made the rendition of such list, by the bank, quarter yearly, to himself, a condition upon which deposits were to be made in the Bank of Vincennes, and which was acceded to by the latter.

JONATHAN JENNINGS.

Langdon Cheves sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

I became President of the Bank of the United States on 6th March, 1819, and continued till the beginning of January, 1823. I know but very little concerning the liability of local banks to the Government of the United States. My duties in the United States Bank consisting wholly of superintendance, I could not concern myself with the details of its business. I considered the liability of local banks to the Government as a matter external to the business of the United States Bank. The chief of what I do know on that subject is derived from a letter from the Cashier of the Branch Bank of the United States, at Louisville, dated 2d May, 1820, a copy of which I now produce. [Here Mr. Cheves read the letter.]

Question. When the Treasury of the United States gave drafts to the Bank of the United States on any of the local banks, did the Bank of the United States feel itself bound to receive in payment of such drafts any thing else than its own paper, or the legal currency of the country?

Answer. The Bank of the United States did not feel itself legally bound to receive any thing but its own paper and the legal currency of the country. But it was in the habit, with a view of being useful to the Government and the country, of receiving almost any thing that it could convert, safely and conveniently, into cash.

Q. The rule of the United States Bank in receiving deposits is, that, when a deposit is made generally, the bank is liable for the amount of such deposit in cash, is it not?

A. That is the general rule, to which I recollect but one exception, which was under a particular arrangement in respect to certain Western banks, by which the bank received deposits from Receivers of Public Moneys in current bills of these banks, and credited them as cash, on the condition, that if not duly paid, they should again be charged to the Government.

Q. This exception grew out of an arrangement which took place after you entered into the superintendency of the United States Bank, did it not?

A. Yes.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. Do you know what is the per centage of the loss of the United States Bank on their debts in the Western States?

A. I cannot state with accuracy. It exceeded ten per cent. and amounted, perhaps, to fifteen.

Q. As President of the bank, you had, of course, constant intercourse with the Secretary of the Treasury; can you testify as to the zeal, integrity, and ability, with which that part of his duty, which relates to the collection of the public moneys, was performed, so far as it came under your observation?

A. I had much and anxious intercourse with the Secretary of the Treasury personally, and by letter, in relation to the currency of the country, and the collection of the public debts, as well in the Atlantic as the Western States. It was a crisis of unexampled difficulty. The great object was to restore and preserve a sound currency, generally, through the Union. As it regarded the Atlantic portion of the Union, it appeared, to my judgment, to involve the soundness of the currency; but, as it regarded the Western States, it seemed to me to involve the existence of any currency at all. I understood, distinctly, that it was the object of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the Western States, to prevent its sudden and total prostration. In my opinion, the Secretary of the Treasury displayed much ability, great zeal and industry, perfect integrity, and commanded as much success as was practicable, under the circumstances of the times.

Q. by Mr. Cook. In expressing this opinion, do you do it with a full knowledge of the connexion between the Treasury Department and the Western banks in which the public moneys were deposited, and of the manner in which those banks fulfilled their engagements with the Treasury?

Case of Ninian Edwards.

A. I do not do it with a full knowledge of these circumstances, but I do it with a great deal of knowledge of the subject. If this question be intended to refer to my answers to previous questions concerning the arrangements between the Western banks and the Government, it is necessary to state that I understand those questions and answers to refer to the details which governed the transactions of those banks with the Government, of which I am ignorant; but the answer which I have just given refers to the general conduct and the success of the measures of the Treasury, and I know them from my correspondence and intercourse with the Secretary, and from the operations of the Bank of the United States, through which large sums of money were collected for the use of the Government in the Western States.

LANGDON CHEVES.

Hon. Ninian Edwards sworn, by order of the Committee.

Question by Mr. Livingston. You stated in an examination before a former committee, in your answer to the 8th interrogatory, that you had prevailed upon Colonel Stephenson to write a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the propriety of continuing deposits of public money in the Bank of Edwardsville, and that you saw him write the letter, and enclose a publication made by you therein. The committee wish to know whether you read that letter immediately after it was written, and; more particularly than is stated in that deposition, what passed between yourself and Colonel Stephenson on that occasion?

A. The circumstances under which it was written were these: Colonel Stephenson was, at that time, the Receiver of Public Moneys, and also the President of the Bank. He was very unwilling that I should withdraw from the bank, and supposed that my doing so would be likely to impair its credit, and increase the responsibility upon him for the deposits in it. I was myself glad of the opportunity of circumstances so favorable to my advising him with success to write the letter to the Secretary, and he was very easily prevailed upon to do so, and applied to me to write such a letter for him, as I thought he ought to write to the Secretary; and I accordingly wrote the draught of such letter—went to his office—remained there until he had copied it, and afterwards compared the copy made by him with the draught. At the same time that he wrote the letter, he enclosed, to be sent with it, as I believe was his intention, a printed copy of my publication announcing my intention to withdraw from the Bank of Edwardsville. I have no doubt that he sent the letter, because, from the conversation I had with him, it appeared to be his desire to send it, so far as I could discover; and his subsequent conversation left no doubt on my mind that he did send it. I have no recollection of having seen the original draught abovementioned from the time it was copied by Colonel Stephenson until the time of my late return to Edwardsville. It was then shown to me by Thomas Lippincott, who was employed in doing business in the Land Office, and who took it in my presence among the files of that office. The copy now presented was made out, I think, by himself, and is either sworn or affirmed to as a true one. Mr. Lippincott is a gentleman of fair and respectable character, and, as I understand and believe, was secretary or clerk to one branch of the last Legislature of Illinois. Although I cannot swear that this is a literal copy of the original draught, I know it to be substantially correct, nor have I the least doubt of its being literally so. Upon the original draught, as found in the files of the office, was an endorsement, in the handwriting of Mr. Stephenson, the words of which were, as far as I recollect, the following: "Copy to the Treasury Department, October, 1819," or words to that effect. An additional reason which induces me to believe that the letter was sent, is, that the said Mr. Lippincott also showed me the copy of another letter which he took from the files of the office, which was in the handwriting of Colonel Stephenson, the late Receiver, and purported to be a letter from the said Receiver to Mr. Crawford, dated, I think, the 23d October, 1819, which, from the subject of it, appears to refer to the before described letter.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. Was there any part of the original draft of the letter from Mr. Stephenson of October 12, 1819, underscored?

A. I do not recollect that there was. I perceive that there is an underscoring in a part of the copy now presented, which may have been done in consequence of the object for which this copy was taken; which, originally, was not that it might be sworn to, but that it might be published. It was sworn to subsequently to the arrival of the summons from this committee to myself.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. Was that underscoring made by you, or at your request?

A. I do not think it was made by me, and I do not remember that it was made at my request. I do suppose it was made by the gentleman who took the copy, and that it was done by him in consequence of his knowledge of my object in searching for the letter.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. You say that you perceive a part of the copy is underscored. Is this the first time you have noticed the circumstance?

A. I do not recollect noticing it heretofore, but think it is highly probable that I did, as the copy was intended for publication, and this is a point to which I should naturally have wished to call the public attention, and of which wish the gentleman who made the copy was well apprized.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. Your belief is that this underscoring was done before the affidavit was attached to the copy?

A. Such is my belief. I have no doubt of it.

Q. This copy has been already published. Have you seen the publication of it in one of the public newspapers of this city?

A. I have.

Q. Was the copy for that publication furnished by you?

A. I submit to the committee whether that is a proper question.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

[Mr. Forsyth here stated that he had a particular reason for making the inquiry. The letter as published contains a part in italics which corresponds to the part underscored in the copy now presented; and he wished to ask whether the types of the publication were set from this copy?]

A. I have no objection to answer, provided the committee think it a proper question. This copy is that from which I suppose the publication was made, as it was furnished by myself for that purpose.

Q. How long was it out of your hands?

A. Not more than a day or two, as well as I can recollect.

Q. Was it sent to the editors of the paper in which it was published, or was it delivered personally?

A. I do not recollect which. My impression is, that I delivered it to some person to take it to the printers—probably Mr. Cook. Whoever took it, I consider the act as equivalent to a personal delivery of it by myself.

Q. Did you search, or cause search to be made, in the office of the Receiver at Edwardsville, for the answer of the Treasury Department to the letter of which you now present a copy?

A. I went to the office for the special purpose of endeavoring to ascertain if there was not a letter in it from Mr. Crawford to the late Receiver, directing him to continue the deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville.

Q. Did you find the answer to the letter of which you now present a copy?

A. I found a letter from Mr. Crawford, of the 6th of August, 1819; I think; another of the 1st of November, of the same year; and one of April (probably the 20th) 1820. The second of these, viz: that of the 1st of November, it is my opinion, was written in consequence of the letter of the Receiver of October 12th, 1819.

Q. You state, in your examination before the committee of the last Congress, that Colonel Stephenson informed you, after he had written that letter, that he received a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury directing him to continue the deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville. In your letter to the Secretary, of the 9th February, 1823, you say that he (meaning Mr. Stephenson) informed you that that letter had been answered. I wish to know exactly what the declaration made to you by Mr. Stephenson was; whether he said he had received an answer to the letter, or whether he said he had received a letter directing him to continue the deposits in the Edwardsville Bank.

A. The letter of the 12th October was written previously to my coming on to Congress. On my return from Congress, after the session succeeding the date of this letter, I asked the Receiver what answer Mr. Crawford had given to that letter. He told me either that he had received a letter from Mr. Crawford directing him to continue the deposits, or that Mr. Crawford had written to him directing him to do so; from which I understood him that he had received an answer from Mr. Crawford. I am positive he told me that he had received a letter from Mr. Crawford, directing him to continue the deposits; but, whether he alluded to the letter of the 1st November, 1819, or to that of the 20th April, 1820, or to any other letter in particular, I do not know; for I do not recollect to have seen either of these letters from Mr. Crawford until my late return to Edwardsville.

Q. Did not you consider that letter which you draughted for Mr. Stephenson, as a letter from the Receiver of Public Moneys to the Secretary of the Treasury?

A. It was certainly a letter from the Receiver of Public Moneys, but he was, at the same time, President of the Bank of Edwardsville. I perceive, from the copy, it is dated at the "Receiver's Office." I know that the Receiver's letter was written there from the draught alluded to.

A. You state that you returned from Congress in the Spring of 1819, and found the Bank of Edwardsville under great pressure. I wish to know whether you apprized the Secretary of the Treasury that such was the fact, or advised the Receiver of Public Moneys to withhold deposits in that bank on account of it?

A. I do not recollect that I did write directly to the Secretary myself; but I am under an impression that the President of the Bank did write him a letter, the object of which was to induce him to forbear drawing upon the bank while it was under difficulty. I made a communication to Colonel Johnson, during that Summer, whose brother-in-law held more stock in the bank than any other person, of the difficulties with which the bank was then struggling, and with a view that he should, and the expectation that he would, communicate the same to Mr. Crawford. I am induced to believe that he did so, from a letter from Mr. Crawford to Colonel Johnson, of the 15th July, 1819, which I now submit to the committee, and which acknowledges the receipt of a communication from me to Colonel Johnson, upon the subject alluded to. Nothing of this, however, was done with a view to show Mr. Crawford the danger to Government of continuing the deposits in that bank, but rather to induce him not to draw upon it at that particular time.

The difficulties of the bank I considered, at that time, but temporary; I thought it could be conducted through them, and did not feel myself at liberty to withdraw from it until this had been done, which finally was effected, as I conceived, in a great measure, by my own diligent management of, and my assistance to the bank.

I do not recollect that I did particularly advise the Receiver of Public Moneys to withhold deposits in the Edwardsville Bank at that time, nor until after I had made my publication in the St. Louis Enquirer.

Q. After your publication, and when you considered the bank as out of danger, you then advised the Receiver to withhold deposits?

A. Yes. My object in that publication was to free myself from all responsibility for the bank—to state what I believed to be the real truth concerning it, and to leave the public and the Secretary to judge for themselves, how far they could confide in it without any responsibility on my part.

Q. You state that you enclosed a copy of this publication to Mr. Crawford; was it accompanied with any thing written to him, or simply covered with an envelope, and directed to him?

A. I think it was simply enclosed and directed to him, and that nothing was written but the direction.

Q. Did you not write, at Mrs. Stephenson's request, a letter purporting to be from her to the Secretary of the Treasury, and dated 18th September, 1819?

A. I submit to the committee whether this is a proper question. I am perfectly willing to answer it if they so decide; and I am also willing to waive the objection.

[The committee having decided that the question was a proper one—]

A. I did write a letter for Mrs. Stephenson, which I believe she copied, signed, and, I have no doubt, sent, in reply to a letter from Mr. Crawford to Colonel Stephenson, which was received during his absence on a journey to Kentucky; and the original draught, which was written by myself, I have lately seen on the files of the Receiver's Office, at Edwardsville.

Q. Do you recollect whether Mr. Stephenson was in Edwardsville at the time your publication in the "Enquirer" appeared?

A. I do not.

Q. After your publication, and before the writing of this letter of Mr. Stephenson's, which you allege to have been written, you knew that complaints had been made, on the part of the Treasury, of his withholding deposits of public moneys in his hands?

A. I have no knowledge of having seen or heard any thing on that subject, saving the letter which arrived at Edwardsville directed to Colonel Stephenson, during his absence.

Q. Do you, or not, know that, before or about the time of this transaction, in the Spring, Summer, or Fall of 1819, Colonel Stephenson had loaned large sums of money to different individuals?

A. I do not recollect of knowing or hearing of any such loans by him. A list, I understood, was found after his death, of moneys loaned; but this was subsequent to the time mentioned in the question; nor do I remember hearing the name of more than one individual to whom it was then ascertained he had loaned money.

Q. You insinuate, in your memorial to Congress, that there was a letter written by Mr. Crawford to the Receiver at Edwardsville, which was, in reality, an answer to the letter alleged by you to have been written by Mr. Stephenson, but which was so contrived as to appear not to be such an answer; can you assign any conceivable motive which could lead to such a course on the part of Mr. Crawford at that time?

A. Mr. Crawford, as I believe, had received much information against the Bank at Edwardsville, some of which appears in the documents, and particularly the letter of the President of the Bank of Missouri, dated, I think, 9th August, 1819. This was naturally calculated to excite his fears for the safety of the deposits; my withdrawal from the bank was calculated to confirm those fears; and I think it highly probable that he might not have been willing to disclose any circumstance which was calculated to increase his responsibility for continuing those deposits in that bank; and I believe those deposits were continued there more through the influence of General Payne and his connexions, than from that of any other persons.

Q. I understand you, then, to say that Mr. Crawford at that time anticipated the failure of that bank, and sought to provide a screen from the responsibility of having continued the public deposits there.

A. My opinion is, that he did receive my publication and the Receiver's letter, and that he has withheld them, and I have already assigned the motive which I supposed might have governed him in doing so; but, whether that resulted from an actual anticipation of the failure of the bank, or from an apprehension only, that it might fail, I do not undertake to decide.

Q. You state that you determined to sustain that bank, and you lay great stress on the circumstance of your withdrawal from it; will you state how you were enabled to sustain it?

A. I endeavored to sustain it by my influence, by my own funds, and by my personal attention to it.

Q. Did you make any deposit about that time with a view to sustain it? and if so, to what amount?

A. I aided it by advancing my own money or bills; but cannot say to what amount. I held myself ready to give it further assistance, if it had required it.

Q. When you stated that you did not see the draught of the Receiver's letter until "your late return to Edwardsville," did you mean your return in April or May last?

A. I did.

Q. Did you see that draught after it was copied of the Receiver and examined, and previously to its being taken from the files by Mr. Lippincott?

A. Not that I recollect.

Q. Was a letter-book kept in the office of the Receiver at Edwardsville?

A. I believe there is.

Q. Is this letter from the Receiver copied in that book?

A. I think that in the letter-book I saw, that letter does not appear. There are also other letters, and one or more, I think, from Mr. Crawford, which are on the files in the office, which are not recorded in the book I examined, or if they were I did not see them.

Q. Are there any of the letters from the Receiver to the Department of the Treasury, of the same year with the alleged letter, which are not recorded in that book? I include Mrs. Stephenson's letter in this question.

A. My examination of the letter-book was so slight that I cannot pretend to say whether it was so or not. I do not recollect whether Mrs. Stevenson's letter appears upon the letter-book or not. It is my impression that Mr. Crawford's letter of the 1st of November, 1819, is not recorded in the book that I saw, though I cannot speak with certainty about it.

Q. Were you not engaged, prior to your journey to Edwardsville, in preparing a publication with respect to these documents against Mr. Crawford?

A. To that question I positively object. My communication to the House is here; it speaks for itself; it cannot be material when or where it was written.

[The committee decided he was not bound to answer.]

Q. You have stated in your communication to the House of Representatives that you are the author of the A. B. publications which accompanied your address; are you not also the author of the other A. B. publications which appeared either before or since in the Washington Republican against the Secretary of the Treasury?

A. To that question I object to answer. I am answerable only for those A. B. publications which I have acknowledged.

[The committee decided that he was not bound to answer.]

Q. Have you not, at another time, denied your being the author of the said A. B. publications which you now avow?

A. To this question I also object to answer.

[The committee decided that he was not bound to answer.]

Q. The packet I now present to you contains the original address presented by you to the House of Representatives; will you please to separate those parts of that address which were sent to this city by mail, from those parts which were supplied after its arrival here?

A. The communication is before the House as a whole, and as a whole was referred to this committee. I do not feel myself under any obligation to state how its several parts got here.

[The committee decided that he was not bound to answer.]

Q. I wish to know whether you are not the author of the printed letter now shown to you, and which is contained in the Washington Gazette of the 24th December, 1821, and dated the 12th of that month, and purporting to be written by a gentleman in Ohio?

A. I do not consider myself bound to answer the question, unless the committee shall so direct me.

[The committee decided that he was not bound to answer.]

Q. Are you the author of all those A. B. publications which accompany your memorial to Congress.

A. I am.

Q. Were not the materials of your memorial to Congress collected and prepared by you before you had seen that letter of Mr. Crawford to Congress which you allege to be the ground of that memorial?

A. I had no intention last session of attacking Mr. Crawford, unless it should be necessary to my own defence, or unless I myself had been attacked. I had no knowledge of Mr. Crawford's report until the morning after it was made. A copy of it was then brought to my room by Mr. Cook, in consequence of which I changed my determination to have left here on that day, and endeavored then to collect such documents as I thought might be useful to me in case I should reply to it. Not one word of my address to the House was written in the City of Washington, nor have I any recollection of having conversed on the subject of Mr. Crawford's report with but three members of the House of Representatives, viz: Mr. Cook, Colonel Moore, and Mr. Campbell of Ohio. I left the city the next day, the 24th, without any settled plan of answering it, and, with the aid of no other materials than those I collected here in the city, and my own memory: In making the references which are contained in my address to the House of Representatives, I had recourse, in general, to the A. B. publications which I had collected here, and which contained a reference to those documents. I occasionally made some notes on my journey to Wheeling, where my address was written, and from which place it was sent to this city; and I expect the documents referred to by Mr. Forsyth, as having been furnished here, were obtained by Mr. Cook, to whom I wrote for that purpose. I regretted the necessity that I felt myself under to write at all, and would not have done so, if I could have hoped, by any more pacific means that would not have been degrading, to have obtained a withdrawal of an insinuation which I conceived was calculated to injure me. Every single thing used in my address to the House was collected from a mass of my own private papers, and by two of my friends as they could get them elsewhere, after the report of Mr. Crawford was presented. These things, thus-collected, with the aid of my own memory, constituted the materials from which my address to the House was written.

Q. Did you not, immediately after Mr. Crawford's report was made to Congress, and before you left this city, state to Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, that you then had twenty or thirty pages prepared against Mr. Crawford? State what conversation took place between you and Mr. Campbell, on that subject.

A. I think it was on the morning I left this city, that I met with Mr. Campbell, who introduced a conversation concerning this report of Mr. Crawford's, by asking me whether I had seen the report, and appeared, from the remarks which he made, to consider that report as containing an attack upon me. He spoke of its being presented at so late a period of the session. In the course of the conversation, I mentioned to him that I considered it, on this last account, as being very ungenerous, or words to that effect. I stated to him that I had, during last Summer, received information that I was to be attacked at the then ensuing session of Congress; and I think it is probable I stated to him the particulars of that information. Thinking it so probable that I may have stated it, I will now repeat what the information was. In travelling through Kentucky last Summer, in Russelsville, I received a confidential communication from Virginia, stating that I was to be attacked, as is before alleged; that Governor Coles, of Illinois, was expected to co-operate in the attack, and advising me to come on a week or two before the meeting of Congress, to be prepared for it. In consequence of this information, and not expecting to return home for some considerable time, I wrote to Mr. Cook to call upon Governor Coles upon the subject. And I have since seen a correspondence between Mr. Cook and Mr. Coles, on the subject, which I mention, because it affords to any who may be inclined to make a further inquiry, the means of ascertaining the truth of the fact. Under an expectation thus produced, I had been engaged in writing, and in preparing for the warfare which I expected was to come on, and I believe I stated that fact to Mr. Campbell. I know that I alluded to it, in speaking to him, but there is nothing copied into my address that I had previously written with that view. In consequence of the impression which Mr. Campbell's conversation left upon my mind, that he thought I ought to answer Mr. Crawford's statement, I wrote back to him, while on my journey, that I should do so the first leisure time I got, and intimated that I did not expect to occupy more than three hours in doing it. I do not know whether he received the letter, but I expect that he did.

Q. Did you not state, in that conversation; to Mr. Campbell, that you had written twenty or thirty pages against Mr. Crawford, which you could not complete until you got to Wheeling, for want of documents which you expected to find there?

A. I do not recollect that I made such a statement to Mr. Campbell; but I think I made some allusion to what I had written, and stated some things, in general terms, admitting my preparation to meet, and determination to repel, an attack that I had expected would have been made upon me; but I cannot suppose that I could have stated to him any thing like preparation for the particular case of Mr. Crawford's report, which was entirely unexpected to me.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. In one of the A. B. publications, which accompany your memorial to the House of Representatives, you refer to a short article calling the public attention to suppressions by the Secretary of the Treasury, which produced an investigation in that House. Do you allude, in this part of your publication, to the article which was the foundation of what you call, in your address, the A. B. plot?

[The Committee decided that this question was inadmissible.]

Question by Mr. Forsyth. When did you reach Wheeling, after leaving this city, on the 24th of March last?

Answer. My impression is, that I arrived there on the first Sunday in April, which was the 4th day of that month.

Q. When did you leave Wheeling?

A. I have no distinct recollection of the precise day, but think it was on or about the 12th of April.

Q. Did you apply to the President of the United States, or the Secretary of State, before you left Washington, for permission to remain here for a short time, for the purpose of defending yourself from the accusation which you understood Mr. Crawford to have brought against you?

A. I did not. I have never seen the President since I saw the report of Mr. Crawford to Congress.

Q. Was there any thing in your instructions which prevented you from remaining in Washington which did not equally apply to your remaining at Wheeling, on this business?

A. I had no written instructions at that time. But the President had expressed great anxiety that I should get off as soon as possible; and the arrangement was, that I should leave this city, so as to attend to my own business, and be ready to meet the vessel at New Orleans on the 1st of June, at farthest, which was to carry me out. In conformity to which, I left this city on the 24th, went to Baltimore to settle some private business, and also to lay in some articles which I intended to take to Mexico. I afterwards went to Wheeling, where I also had private business to attend to, connected with a part of my business in Baltimore.

Q. You knew, then, that you were not expected to leave the United States till the 1st June?

A. The arrangement was, that I should reach New Orleans by the 1st of June at farthest; and this left me but little time, considering the extent of my business, to arrange my private affairs, preparatory to going to Mexico. I did not believe, at the time, nor do I yet believe, that the President would have consented to my staying for the purpose suggested by Mr. Forsyth.

Q. Was not the vessel in which you were to embark, in a course of preparation for her voyage, when you left this city?

A. If the vessel had arrived here, I did not know it. It was expected that she could reach New Orleans about the 15th of May; but there was no certainty; and, I think, she had not arrived.

Q. You say "it was expected." What do you mean by that expression?

A. I waited upon the President in consequence of a wish he had expressed for my early departure; and, in conversation with him, he requested me to go to the Secretary of the Navy, and inquire about a vessel to carry me out on the mission. I called on the Secretary of the Navy, who called in Commodore Rodgers to consult upon the subject—and, from them, I understood, that the vessel, in which it was concluded I should go, had not arrived, but was, shortly thereafter, expected. Commodore Rodgers spoke of some repairs which would have to be made upon the vessel; made some calculation as to the time these repairs and the voyage to New Orleans would take; and, in this way, "it was estimated that the vessel could probably reach New Orleans about the middle of May, or between that time and the 1st of June."

Case of Ninian Edwards.

Q. You stopped at Wheeling, then, instead of at Washington, for your own personal convenience?

A. I left here because it was necessary to attend to my business at Baltimore, and a part of my business at Wheeling, which was in the route to my own home, that I intended to visit previous to my departure.

Q. I see, by referring to your address, that, in addition to the numbers of the Washington Republican, there are ten numbered documents, from No. 1 to No. 10. Were not all these documents in your possession at the time Mr. Crawford's report was made to Congress?

A. They were not. I had no expectation of such an attack as was contained in Mr. Crawford's report—and had made no preparation in anticipation of such an attack as constitutes the subject of that report in relation to myself.

Q. Which of these documents were then in your possession?

A. I had No. eleven (11)—I had also No. 7—I had the paper from which No. 3 is taken—all among my papers, but not collected for any purpose of attack. I may have had some of them in the published documents; but, I think I had, at that time, none of those documents in my possession. I was preparing to leave the city, and, if I had had any printed documents but my own, I presume I must have returned them; and my own I had sent to Mr. Cook. Nothing was collected or prepared for the subject of my memorial, or to be used for any such purpose, till after Mr. Cook furnished me the copy of the report.

Q. Did you send your address by mail from Wheeling?

[The Committee decided this to be an improper question.]

Q. Do you know when that address arrived in Washington?

A. I do not know, but presume it must have arrived here the latter part of the week before it was presented to Congress. After it was written in part, it was detained for some time, with the hope that I should have been able to obtain a document I wanted, from the residence of the honorable Mr. Ruggles, about ten miles from Wheeling—to which residence I sent twice to procure it. It was kept open from the paragraph preceding the last on page 24 of the printed address. I had intended to have pursued the subject farther at that time; but, from indisposition, from the want of the document I desired, and from my anxiety not to be longer detained, I concluded not to do so; and I referred to the A. B. publications in consequence thereof. I had to have a copy of it made, which would, of itself, have occasioned some delay, and this was increased by waiting for the document above alluded to. I sent on the copy of such part as was ready, as I believe, by mail before the original was forwarded. I think I enclosed it to Mr. Cook. When I left Wheeling, my intention was, to avail myself of the earliest opportunity of making an additional defence; and I did not expect to be able to make a full defence until I could reach Edwardsville, where I hoped to find some of the documents that would establish the truth of my statements. On my journey, at Shawneetown, in Illinois, I found my publication of 1819, announcing my intention to retire from the Bank of Edwardsville, from which place I transmitted that publication to this city; and, after my arrival at Edwardsville, I wrote another address to the House of Representatives, and had obtained documents to accompany it, which I was prepared to transmit when the Sergeant-at-Arms arrived at my house—intending, if Congress had adjourned, to get the same inserted in the National Intelligencer, if I could.

Q. Did you transmit the original of your address by mail? and, if so, when did you put it into the post office at Wheeling?

A. I did not put it into the post office myself; I gave it to a gentleman to put in for me, the post office being at a considerable distance from my lodgings, and I expect he did so, in time for its arrival here in the latter part of the week before it was presented to Congress.

Q. Who was that gentleman?

A. It was some one of the gentlemen about the house where I stayed, but I don't recollect which one.

Q. On what day of your stay at Wheeling, did you deliver it to him?

A. I have no recollection except from the calculation which I think I then made as to the probable time of its arrival here, and I, therefore, suppose it must have been about the 10th or 12th of the month.

Q. You intended, then, that it should arrive the latter part of that week?

A. I knew from the time I delivered it to be put in the mail, that it could not arrive before that time—and I intended it should arrive by the due course of mail.

Q. Do you know when the copy of your address was finished?

A. I do not know the particular day; but I think that the copy, so far as one was made, was sent on by the first mail after it was finished. And that it was sent in the mail before the original was sent.

Q. Please to read this address in the Washington Republican of January 20, 1822, signed A. B., and addressed to Gales & Seaton. Is that the publication to which you refer in one of the A. B. publications communicated with your address, (page 62 of that address.) A. It is.

Q. Were you not just about to leave Edwardsville when the messenger from the House of Representatives arrived?

A. I expect I should have left it for New Orleans in about three days.

Q. Did you find, in your examination of the office of the Receiver, any letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, to which that conversation could possibly refer, which you had with Mr. Stephenson after your return from Congress, respect-

*The 8 preceding pages are erroneously paged: folio 3000 should read 2800, &c.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

ing the letter he is said to have written on 12th October, except the letters of the first of November, 1819, and the 20th April, 1820?

A. I did not.

Q. I remind you that in the 4th quarter of 1819, there was a deposit of upwards of $50,000, made by Mr. Stephenson, in the Bank of Edwardsville, and I ask you whether you think it possible he could have referred, in that conversation, to the letter of the 20th of April, 1820?

A. At the time of that conversation I did not know what deposits he had made after 12th October, 1819, nor to what amount. I think it possible he may have referred to the letter of April, 1820, although I consider that the letter of the 1st November, 1819, was the letter written in consequence of the Receiver's letter of the 12th October preceding. The letter of November directs the Receiver to deposit the money he should have in his hands on the last day of that month, in the Bank of Edwardsville; but I think it contains no express order in regard to future deposits. A letter of the same date was written by Mr. Crawford to the Cashier of that bank, with an enclosure, and the paper I have presented to the committee was delivered to me by the Cashier of the bank as being that enclosure, from which it would appear that both the Receiver at Kaskaskia and at Edwardsville had been directed to make their future deposits in the Bank of Missouri, until otherwise ordered. And it appears, by the letter of the 20th April, that the Receiver at Edwardsville was specially directed to make his deposits in the Bank at Edwardsville. Being President of the bank, to the Cashier of which the letter was directed, he may have supposed he was bound to take notice of the information which it is natural to suppose he must have received concerning the order contained in that enclosure. But these are all circumstances which have come to my knowledge since the conversation alluded to, and I cannot undertake to say what letter it was the Receiver referred to in that conversation.

Q. Do you know that in January and February, 1820, notwithstanding this circumstance, he did make deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville?

A. I do not. I was at Congress during the time spoken of, and I have no recollection of having known any thing at that time concerning his deposits; all I know on the subject is from recent publications. I am under the impression that, during the Winter succeeding the letter of 1st November, either Colonel Johnson or myself was written to on the subject of the enclosure above spoken of, but my recollection is so indistinct that I cannot speak with any certainty about it.

Q. It is stated in an account current of Benjamin Stephenson with the United States, printed with Mr. Crawford's publication, ordered to be printed on the 11th of May, No. 13, that there was cash deposited in the Bank of Edwardsville, on the 31st January, 1820, amounting to $2,526 82; and in another account, No. 14, that there was cash deposited in the same bank, by Stephenson, on the 29th February, $2,881. If these statements are true, do you now think it possible that the letter of the 20th April was the letter alluded to in that conversation before mentioned by Mr. Stephenson?

A. I still think it possible. His own letter being silent on the subject of the future deposits, he may have thought that that would have justified him in continuing to make those deposits; and yet, from the enclosure above referred to, Mr. Crawford may have intended to prohibit their being made there. I have already stated that my impression is, that Colonel Johnson, or myself, received a letter on the subject of that enclosure, and suppose the enclosure and the Receiver's letter together may have occasioned the latter some uncertainty how he was to act.

Q. You speak of your impressions concerning a letter to yourself or Colonel Johnson. By whom was that letter written?

A. My impression is that it was written by the President of the bank, who was also the Receiver. Colonel Johnson's brother-in-law holding a very large portion of the stock of that bank, he has been principally relied upon for some years past to make all negotiations with Mr. Crawford concerning it that have been made here, and we have generally had conversation upon the subject when he has had to act in those cases. If I received the letter, no doubt it was communicated to him; and if he received one, it is equally probable that it was shown to me.

Q. Do you know that the Receiver at Edwardsville ever saw that paper called the enclosure in the letter of 1st November?

A. Of my own knowledge, I do not, but I should think it very strange if he had not seen it, he being the President of the bank.

Q. In examining the records in the Receiver's office, did you see a letter from Mr. Crawford of the 1st November?

A. I did.

Q. Does it contain any direction to the Receiver to deposit moneys in the Bank of Missouri?

A. I think not. I have already stated that I believe it is silent as to his future deposit, after the one therein specially referred to.

Q. The letter to the Receiver, of 1st November, and the enclosure of which you speak, differ in this respect. That part of the enclosure which relates to the Bank of Missouri is not found in the letter to the Receiver. Is there not this difference?

A. The letter which I saw at the Land Office at Edwardsville from Mr. Crawford to the Receiver, of November 1st, 1819, I feel confident contains no directions to make the deposit in the Bank of Missouri, but is silent, as I have before stated, as to future deposits.

Q. Could the Receiver, if he had seen this enclosure, have doubted about the propriety of continuing his deposits, with the letter of 1st November in his hands?

A. I think he could.

Q. In giving your advice to the Receiver in the Fall of 1819, did you give it in the character of his friend, or as a person holding a high place in the Government, with a view to promote the public interest?

A. At that time I had lost confidence in banks generally, so much so that I did not wish to be held responsible for any bank. I advised the Receiver as a friend to him, and also with a view to free myself of all responsibility for the bank, by placing things in such a situation that Mr. Crawford could act in the case as he should think fit on his own responsibility, leaving the funds in the Receiver's hands entirely to his control.

Q. Did you consider the funds of the United States safer in the hands of the Receiver than in the Bank of Edwardsville for ninety days?

A. I considered the funds, at that time, as safe in the hands of either, with this difference, however, that the bank might have been more liable to use them than the Receiver.

Q. Did you not, after or about this time, write to a Paymaster or Paymasters, recommending, suggesting, or soliciting him or them to pay the troops of the United States in notes of the Bank of Edwardsville?

A. I have no recollection of having written to any Paymaster at all on the subject. I had at that time as much confidence in the notes of the Bank of Edwardsville as in any other of the local banks. Their notes were receivable in the Land Office, and were current in that part of the country, and I should suppose might have been taken by persons to whom the Paymaster was to make his payments, as safely as any other notes in that quarter of the country, nor should I have had any objection to recommend them to any Paymaster as readily as any others of the notes of the local banks which circulated there. I think about that time I had heard of some order having been given by the War Department, which, as well as I now remember, required the troops to be paid either in Missouri paper or in specie; and I think I wrote to the Secretary of War, and probably to other persons, probably to Colonel Johnson, complaining of the order.

Q. Do you recollect whether it was before or after you attended Congress, that you wrote these letters?

A. I do not recollect the time, but I suppose it must have been after the first, and before the second session I served in Congress. The bank only got into operation a short time before my departure for Congress, in 1818. I recollect but little of the case alluded to. I am, however, strongly impressed with a belief that there was, or that I so understood it, an order to Paymasters that I considered very partial to the Bank of Missouri.

Q. Was the letter which you wrote at the request of Mr. Stephenson, dated on the same day on which it was copied?

A. I do not recollect, but I presume it was.

Q. Did you see him, on that day, enclose a printed copy of your publication? and were both in the same package?

A. It was on the same day, and I think both letter and paper were put in one cover.

Q. Was the Land Office then kept in Mr. Stephenson's house, or in a separate building?

A. It was in a separate building, not far from his house.

Q. Did you see him carry the letter to the post office; or do you know that he did so?

A. I did not see it put in, nor do I know that it was. The post office was at a considerable distance from the place.

Q. At what time of the day, in the morning or the afternoon, was the copy taken?

A. I do not recollect.

Q. Did you make the draught at the office, or in your own house, before you went there?

A. I think it was written in my own house.

Q. Was it made on the same day on which it was copied, or the day before?

A. I do not recollect, but I think it was on the same day.

Q. At what hour of the day did the mail leave Edwardsville for Washington City, at that time?

A. I do not remember the hours of arrival or departure.

Q. How long does it usually take letters to reach Washington City, from Edwardsville, by mail?

A. From sixteen to eighteen days, I think, in regular course of mail, and when the weather is good; but it may be very much delayed when the weather is bad. The mail has been very irregular.

Q. What is the average time in which you have received letters from that place, when you have been in this city? Would twenty days be an unreasonable allowance?

A. I do not know how to make an average; miscarriages are more liable to happen in the Winter time, not only from accidents, but from the accumulation of letters, and I cannot now specify in how long a time I have received a single one of my letters after it was mailed from there. I think I have received much fewer in twenty days than those which have taken a longer time. The mail has been irregular in the Winter time, during the sessions of Congress, or letters at least have arrived very irregularly.

Q. I understand you to have said, that, but for the Secretary's report to Congress, on the 22d of March, you would have gone quietly to Mexico, without disturbing yourself with any of those charges against him?

A. I believe I have stated, and I now state again, that I should not have made the attack upon Mr. Crawford, if I had not considered him as attacking me.

Question by Mr. Webster. Have you been pretty well acquainted with the general operations of the Treasury, in the Western States, for several years, in regard to the collection of the public debts?

A. I have been, in regard to the collection from the sale of public lands, but of the special facts contained in the documents, I had no other means of knowing than every other member of Congress, except what I knew from being a director of the Bank at Edwardsville, while I was such.

Q. When did you first become a member of Congress?

Case of Ninian Edwards.

A. I was elected in 1818.

Q. Have you continued a member, without intermission, from that time until your recent diplomatic appointment?

A. I have.

Q. Have you, generally, attended the sessions of Congress?

A. I have.

Question by Mr. Livingston. Do you know any thing farther, of your own knowledge, in support of the facts and specifications against Mr. Crawford, contained in your memorial?

A. Nothing that I recollect, at this time, that relates to the matters specifically alleged in my Address to the House.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

June 16, 1824.—Mr. Edwards being again called.

Question, by Mr. Forsyth. You state that you received from the Cashier of the Bank of Edwardsville an enclosure, contained in a letter from Mr. Crawford to him, of 1st November, 1819. Can you state whether there was not another paper enclosed in that letter?

A. I cannot. I neither saw nor heard of any other.

Q. For what purpose was your address to Congress, and the letter to the Speaker accompanying it, sent in a different manner and to a different person from the documents and the copy of the address, which you state was first sent?

[The committee decided that the question should not be put.]

Q. You state, in one of your addresses to the public, at Louisville, dated 18th May, 1824, that you sincerely believed, and had been advised by your most dispassionate friends and other impartial gentlemen, that it was absolutely and essentially due to your own character to enter into this controversy with Mr. Crawford. I wish you to state who these dispassionate friends and impartial persons were.

A. I object to the question.

[The Committee decided it should not be put.]

Q. Did not your affidavit, before the committee of investigation of the last Congress, with respect to this correspondence, which you allege took place between the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Stephenson, impose upon the Secretary the necessity, when he made his final report, either to produce that correspondence or to account for the omission to produce it?

A. I submit the question to the committee.

[The Committee decided it should not be put.]

Q. Do you think it possible that, in the year 1819, a letter should have come by mail, from Edwardsville to Washington, from the 16th of October to the 1st of November following?

A. Judging from the statement I have to-day seen, from the Post Office Department, I should think it was not; but, if the letter of the Receiver did not leave Edwardsville before the 16th of October, I do not believe that Mr. Crawford's letter to the Receiver, of the 1st of November following, was written or sent on the day of its date, unless the letter of the Receiver was sent, by private conveyance, to Louisville, and mailed there.

Question, by Mr. Floyd. When, in your deposition, heretofore taken, you mention the name of "Colonel Moore," to what Colonel Moore did you allude?

A. To a representative in Congress from Alabama.

Q. by Mr. Floyd. You state that you had prepared another address to the House of Representatives, subsequently to writing the first, which, should Congress have adjourned, you intended to get published in the National Intelligencer, if you could. What was your object in wishing to have it so published?

A. I thought I had obtained sufficient testimony to establish my innocence of the charge or imputation which I understood Mr. Crawford as having made against me; and I wished to lay that testimony and my address before the people of the United States.

June 19th.—Mr. Edwards further examined.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. Have you, or have you not had, in your possession, the paper which you say Lippincott found in the Receiver's office in your hand-writing, at any time since the 12th of October, 1819?

A. I presume that the draught of the letter of the Receiver of the 12th of October is alluded to. There is nothing that I more firmly believe than that I have never seen that paper from the time it was copied by the Receiver, as has been before stated, until it was found by Mr. Lippincott in the office, in April or May last, as has also been stated. I then had it in my hands, and read it, I believe, more than once, but never had it in my possession, out of the office, after it was so found by Mr. Lippincott.

Q. Do you know who prepared the rough draught of the letters from the President of the Edwardsville Bank to you, of January 7, 1820, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the same date, and to the Secretary of the Treasury of the 18th of April, 1820, or either of them?

A. I do not.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

James Noble, of the Senate, sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Q. You were employed by the Treasury in some arrangements with the Bank of Vincennes, were you not? Will you be so good as to state whether, in your opinion, the debt due by that bank to the Government is secured, or any part of it, and, if any, what?

A. So far as I had the agency in it; which is to the amount of about $26,000, I believe and consider the debt as secured.

Q. Do you consider the claims of the United States on that bank, apart from the collateral security, as being safe?

A. As to the residue of the claim which the United States has against the Bank of Vincennes, I know nothing of it, except from information which has been derived from the Directors, who say that the bank is able to pay the debt, and has secured its payment. A part of that debt, consisting of $10,000, (not included in the $26,000 beforementioned,) was transferred by that bank to the Treasurer of the United States, in a draft on John H. Piatt, secured by two good endorsers; and, from very recent information, I learn that this draft is now in the hands of the Treasury Department, or the District Attorney, Mr. Dewey, and in a train to be recovered. A further sum of $7,000 is secured in obligations against the State of Indiana, which is a matter in negotiation between that State and the Treasury of the United States.

Q. Have you had any conversation with Governor Edwards concerning Mr. Crawford's management of the Western banks, and concerning his authorship of the A. B. letters?

A. I have; and it was introduced by himself.

Q. State that conversation, with the time and circumstances.

A. The precise day I cannot recollect; it was pending his nomination made by the President of the United States to the Senate, as Minister to Mexico; and it was after the 21st or 22d of February last. I make this statement, from the fact, that on the 21st or 22d of February, I went to Mrs. Queen's to board, where Governor Edwards resided, and this conversation was after I went there. He stated that he was about to be attacked in the Senate of the United States for the purpose of defeating his nomination; that party and political spirit was now high; that he understood that charges would be exhibited against him, and that it had been so declared in the Senate Chamber. I remarked to Governor Edwards that he well knew, according to the rules of that body, while on Executive business, secrecy was required; that I was not at liberty to mention any occurrence, or the remark of a single member, excepting so far as related to myself; that I was not governed by party or political feelings or motives; that I adhered to the expression made use of by Jefferson—and the only inquiry with me was, is he capable and is he honest? Governor Edwards then remarked, that, although secrecy was required in that body, yet he was informed almost every day of the transactions and remarks of individuals when his nomination was called up; and he added, "Noble, I shall not forget you." I then replied, that I did not understand his meaning. He said it was unimportant—he was satisfied I was not governed by the party feelings which were then prevailing. It was on the day, in the evening of which this conversation took place, that I had moved to take up his nomination in the Senate. This must have been his meaning, when he said he would not forget me; for he explained it the next day, and said he had heard that I had done so. Mr. E. farther remarked, that he knew me to be the decisive friend of William H. Crawford; and, said he, I am considered as being his bitter enemy—and I am charged with being the author of the numbers signed A. B.; but, (raising his hand,) I pledge you my honor, I am not the author, nor do I know who the author was. Crawford and I, said Mr. Edwards, have had a little difference, but I have always considered him a high-minded, honorable, and vigilant officer of the Government; he has been abused about the Western banks and the unavailable funds; (leaning forward and extending his hand,) he added, now d—n it, you know we both live in States where there are many poor debtors to the Government for lands, together with a deranged currency. The notes on various banks being depreciated, after the effect and operation of the war in that portion of the Union, and the banks, by attempting to call in their paper, having exhausted their specie, the notes that were then in circulation became of little or no value. Many men of influence in that country, said he, have united to induce the Secretary of the Treasury to select certain banks as banks of deposit, and to take the notes of certain banks in payment for public lands. Had he not done so, (meaning Mr. Crawford,) many of our inhabitants would have been turned out of doors, and lost their lands; and the people of that country would have had a universal disgust against Mr. Crawford; and I will venture to say, said Mr. Edwards, notwithstanding I am considered his enemy, that no man in this Government could have conducted the fiscal and financial concerns of the Government with more integrity and propriety than Mr. Crawford did. I farther remarked to Governor Edwards, in speaking of his nomination, that, inasmuch as he was nominated by the President, unless some charge was brought against him, I had already evinced in the Senate my disposition to vote for the confirmation of his nomination, without any previous consultation with him; but added, if I had the power of making the nomination, I would not have nominated him; and, as an evidence of it, I had written a letter to Mr. Monroe, urging the nomination of William Henry Harrison, and with that letter I had enclosed the unanimous recommendation of the members of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of General Harrison.

Question by Mr. Cook. When Governor Edwards mentioned to you that he received information of what the Senate was doing, did he not at the same time observe that he was a member of the Senate, and had a right to know what they were doing as much as any other member?

A. If he made that observation, I do not recollect it. He might have done so.

Q. When you had this conversation with him, had not the Richmond Enquirer on that, or some day not long before, been received in this city, containing an allegation that Mr. Edwards, "the author of the A. B. plot," had been nominated as Minister to Mexico? and can you say positively that the denial of the authorship on the part of Mr. Edwards did not relate to the plot instead of the writings themselves under that signature? and did not the conversation grow out of that publication?

A. I saw an article in the Richmond Enquirer, stating that Ninian Edwards, the "author of A. B." or "of A. B. plot memory," (I do not recollect which,) had been so nominated. The paper

Case of Ninian Edwards.

I saw at the boarding-house of Mrs. Queen, and I think in the hands of Mr. Elkins; whether it was before the conversation with Governor Edwards, or afterwards, I do not distinctly recollect. I am inclined to think it was after the conversation; but I am very well satisfied, that, in the conversation with Governor E., when he declared himself not to be the author of A. B., and pledged his honor to the declaration, that I understood him to have an explicit reference to the numbers signed A. B. which appeared in the Washington Republican; and I so understood him, because he had reference to the reports of the two committees who examined into that subject at the previous session of Congress. No allusion whatever was made in this conversation to the article in the Richmond Enquirer.

Q. In the course of the conversation, was reference made to any particular numbers of the publications signed A. B.

A. There was not.

Q. Was the name of General Cooke at all introduced?

A. It was not.

Q. When did you first mention the conversation you have now repeated as having passed between yourself and Governor Edwards? and to whom?

A. According to the best of my recollection, I never repeated it to any person until the evening of the day that I was informed that Governor Edwards's address was presented to the House of Representatives; on that evening, in conversation with several of the members of that House, amongst whom were Mr. Reed and Mr. Nelson, some of whom said that Governor Edwards had avowed himself to be the author of A. B., and others said that he had not done so, I remarked that they must have misunderstood the address, for Governor Edwards had pledged his honor to me that he was not the author of A. B. In the same evening I made the same remark to Mr. Elkins.

Q. Did you mention the subject to any member of the Senate?

A. Not while his nomination was pending, nor before his address appeared; afterwards I spoke of it, without reserve.

Q. I perceive from the Richmond Enquirer that a letter, purporting to have been written in the Senate Chamber, and dated April 26, 1824, states, that "Mr. N. Edwards declared to Mr. Noble, Senator from Indiana, that he was not the author of the A. B. publication; he did this pending his nomination as Minister to Mexico; in consequence of this declaration, Mr. Noble states that he voted for him:" Did you make any such communication to any member of the Senate?

[Mr. Forsyth objected to this question, and the Committee decided the question was improper.]

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Colonel Benton, of the Senate, on the subject of your conversation with Mr. Edwards?

A. Yes.

Q. In the conversation you had with Mr. Edwards, did he speak of the original plan adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury for the relief of the people of the West, or did he speak of the manner in which that plan was executed?

A. He spoke of the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury generally.

Q. Did you understand the conversation you have mentioned as intended to affect your vote on the then pending nomination?

A. I did not suppose that that was its design, nor had it any such effect upon myself. I considered him as speaking as an honest man. If he had told me he was the author of A. B., it would not in my opinion have had the least weight with me whatever in relation to my vote; for I considered that matter as done with, and I had already taken an active part for him in the Senate.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. What do you now understand as having been the effect intended to have been produced by that conversation?

Answer. Governor Edwards having pledged his word and honor to me, unsought for, that he was not the author of A. B.; and having expressed his opinion of the integrity and vigilance of the Secretary of the Treasury, and mentioned that he expected an attack in the Senate, as I now suppose from the friends of Mr. Crawford, I consider him as having expected that I would take this information that he gave me into that body, and it would be the means of securing the confirmation of his nomination.

Question by Mr. Cook. Did Governor Edwards request you to mention what he had said to any members of the Senate, or did he afterwards inquire whether you had done so?

A. He did not.

Q. Did you, in the conversation with Mr. Edwards, signify to him that his being or not being the author of A. B., would have no influence on your vote?

A. I did not.

JAMES NOBLE.

Witness called again.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Please to state the value of each division of the property you received at Brookville as security for the debt of the Bank of Vincennes to the United States.

Answer. As to the value, it would be but mere opinion, and I cannot, from recollection, name each division of the property. But, at the time the property was conveyed by mortgage to the Treasurer of the United States, I supposed and believed that it would cover nearly the sum of $26,000, according to the terms of the mortgage, and the valuation fixed on the property by two disinterested persons who had valued it previously to its being conveyed by the owners to attorneys or trustees for the use of the Directors of the Bank of Vincennes, and for the purpose of discharging their debts, as will fully appear from a report of the Treasury Department, marked F, and dated 29th April, 1822, (see Executive papers of second session of 17th Congress.)

Q. What is its present value?

A. It is impossible for me to state.

Q. Was it not your opinion, while my nomination was pending, and shortly after you came to Mrs. Queen's to lodge, that there would be no opposition to it in the Senate?

A. It was my opinion that there would be an opposition, and you yourself told me that there would; but the fact turned out that there was no opposition, for reasons which you know. You know that the opposition was expected from Colonel Benton, and he was sick. I did not know what the charges to be brought against you were, and I told you at the same time that if there were no charges brought, I should vote for you and should not regard political feeling. You remarked to me that the friends of Mr. Crawford would oppose you. I replied, that some of those whom I knew to be his friends would scorn such a line of conduct—I mean, would scorn to suffer political feeling to bias their votes in such a case.

Q. Where did the conversation which you have testified as having passed between you and myself take place?

A. In my room, at Mrs. Queen's.

JAMES NOBLE.

John Mason sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Have you, or not, had a conversation with Mr. Edwards, concerning the A. B. publications? and if so, state what it was.

Answer. I had such a conversation with Mr. Edwards, and, as far as I recollect, it occurred while his nomination was pending in the Senate, and before it had been confirmed, but of this I will not be positive. He stated to me that there would probably be, or that he had expected, an opposition in the Senate, and that one of the grounds of that opposition was the authorship of the A. B. publications, which had been imputed to him; that as to that, although it was well known that he had taken a decided stand against Mr. C., he had done nothing which he had hesitated to avow, or would hesitate to avow, (I cannot be certain which he said,) and that his opposition had been open and fair.

J. MASON, Jr.

Mr. Mason called again

Question. When you first saw me, after I occupied the back room of Mrs. Queen's boarding-house, what was the state of my health?

Answer. You were, as I thought, quite ill.

Q. Was not this shortly after my nomination?

A. It was.

Q. Was it at this time that you had the conversation you have related?

A. It was subsequently to this visit.

Q. Had I not then got well?

A. You were then certainly much better.

J. MASON, Jr.

Daniel P. Cook, of the House of Representatives, sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Question. Did you receive the address of Mr. Edwards, to Congress, by mail? and if so, at what time?

Answer. I received it on the Saturday next previous to the Monday on which it was presented to the House, accompanied by a letter through the mail, from Wheeling, requesting me to place it in the hands of the Speaker, after supplying some documents which were referred to in the memorial, but were not forwarded with it. These documents I supplied, and, on the next day, did place it in the hands of the Speaker.

Q. Was the address itself communicated by mail?

A. Yes.

Q. Did the address come through the mail addressed to you?

A. No.

Q. To whom did it come addressed?

A. I submit to the committee whether this is a proper question.

[The committee decided that the question ought not to be put to the witness.]

Q. State what reasons you have for knowing that it came by mail at all?

A. By the mail preceding that which I believe brought it on, I received a copy of a part of the same memorial, with a letter from Mr. Edwards stating that he expected by the next mail to forward it complete; and by the next mail I received a second letter from him, stating that he had by that mail forwarded the memorial, as suggested in his former letter; and the person to whom it was sent did early on that day place the memorial in my hands, which was in the original blank envelope, having the post mark of Wheeling upon it, and directed by Governor Edwards, whose handwriting I know; and therefore I believe that it came by mail.

Q. Was it opened?

A. The seal of the envelope had been broken.

Q. I think it was early in the day that you received your own letter and this envelope?

A. I think it was not later than ten o'clock.

Q. Do you not know that Mr. Edwards is not the author of those A. B. publications printed in the Washington Republican, which he has avowed in his memorial?

A. Since I understood he was the author of any of them, I have understood from him that he was the author of all those which relate to the subject of this investigation. I did understand that the first number of those publications was communicated to that paper by a different person, but I have since learned from Mr. Edwards that he wrote all of them which refer to the subject of this investigation, and I know nothing to the contrary.

Q. Did you, in supplying documents for that memorial, furnish any but printed ones?

A. I furnished none others. The rest came in the packet.

Q. Was postage charged on the packet you received?

A. If there was I have no recollection of it. I am sure I paid no postage.

D. P. COOK.

Mr. Cook called again.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. Please to separate those papers which you furnished for the memorial of Mr. Edwards, from those which came enclosed to you.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

A. I furnished one, and am not certain but two, of the A. B. publications; and I furnished Nos. 1 and 2 of the documents annexed to the memorial. My impression is that these are all which I furnished.

Q. You state that the seal of the envelope which was handed to you had been broken. Were the papers within it sealed up and directed to you?

A. They were not. I received six or seven newspapers and documents directed immediately to myself, but the memorial was not.

Q. What motive did Mr. Edwards state to you for sending the memorial to you indirectly?

A. He expressed none. The memorial and the letter to the Speaker of the House came in the same envelope.

D. P. COOK.

Jeremiah Elkins sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Q. Had you a conversation with Mr. Edwards about the A. B. publications?

A. I have heard him allude to those publications, and mention his being charged with the authorship of them.

Q. State what took place?

A. I think it was an article in the Richmond Enquirer which led to the remark I heard him make, in which article it was stated that "Mr. Edwards, of A. B. plot memory," or words to that effect, had been nominated by the President as Minister to Mexico. Mr. Edwards observed that he was not the author of those publications; or, as I think the expression was, that he was no more the author than the editor of the Enquirer himself.

Q. by Mr. Cook. Where and when did this conversation take place?

A. It was at Mrs. Queen's boarding-house, and during the dependency of Mr. Edwards's nomination before the Senate. I cannot recollect the particular day.

Q. Was any other person present at this conversation?

A. Probably there were others present. I think it was either at dinner, or during the time that the boarders were coming in to dinner. Mr. Edwards inquired whether any gentleman took, or had seen the Richmond Enquirer, that he understood there was in it an article to the effect stated above, and then made the remark relative to it which I have mentioned.

Q. Can you remember in what part of Mrs. Queen's house he then had his room?

A. I do not recollect.

Q. Did General Noble then board there?

A. I think it was about the time General Noble came there—probably within a day or two before or after. Of this, however, I am not certain.

Q. Do you remember having any conversation with General Noble about that article in the Richmond Enquirer, before the presentation of Mr. Edwards's memorial?

A. No. I might have had, but do not recollect any.

Q. Had you the Richmond Enquirer, in which this article was contained, then in your possession?

A. It is impossible for me to recollect. The Enquirer was taken by Mr. Locke, a member of Congress from Massachusetts, who then lodged at Mrs. Queen's.

Q. Did you, at or about that time, hand or show that paper to General Noble?

A. I do not remember. Such a thing might have occurred without my recollecting it.

Q. Is that the only conversation you ever had with Governor Edwards on the subject?

A. I do not recollect any other.

JEREMIAH ELKINS.

Witness again called.

Q. by Mr. Cook. Did Mr. Edwards, in making the denial you have referred to, use the words "A. B. plot," or "A. B. publications?"

A. I knew of no difference between the two, and therefore do not recollect.

JEREMIAH ELKINS.

William W. Seaton sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Did you ever have a conversation with Mr. Edwards, relative to the authorship of the A. B. publications?

Answer. Mr. Edwards spoke of those papers to me, incidentally. He came to our office to have, as he said, a free and frank conversation. It was the first time he had been there, to my knowledge, for a year. It was during the pendency of his nomination before the Senate as Minister to Mexico, and some time before Mr. Crawford's report was made to Congress. He wished to know, he said, if we would publish his defence. I asked him what defence—a defence against whom? He replied, that he expected to be attacked, and whenever he turned upon his enemies, he generally got the better of them, (or words to that effect.) He further said, (and this I remember distinctly, for he twice or thrice repeated it,) that when he commenced, he never stopped at the line of just retribution. I answered him, that, if he was attacked in our paper, he should have the free use of it to defend himself; that if he was attacked any where else, he should have the same rights extended to him as were extended to all other citizens; but he could have no positive promise of publication, until we had read the matter which he wished published. Passing then from that subject, Governor Edwards said he knew that we had thought him for some time hostile to us, on account of that foolish business of last session, (or that A. B. affair of last session—I do not recollect which phrase he used,) but he had nothing to do with it. Mr. Gales was present during the greater part, if not the whole, of this conversation. It was on the authority of this conversation alone, that we expressed in the paper our belief that Mr. Edwards was not the author of the A. B. publications.

Question by Mr. Cook. Had you not, previous to this conversation, said to others that you did not believe Mr. Edwards was the author of the A. B. publications?

Case of Nintan Edwards.

Answer. At the time the A. B. papers appeared, it did not strike me that Mr. Edwards was the author; and when the subject was continued in the Franklin Gazette, after Congress had adjourned, and Mr. Edwards gone to Illinois, I believed that another member of Congress was the author. Such being my impression, I may have stated it, but do not recollect having done so. But the conversation with Mr. Edwards was the only authority beyond conjecture we had for stating that he was not the author; nor should we have published the paragraph, but for that conversation.

Q. Can you say distinctly that in that conversation Mr. Edwards did not speak of an imputed plot; and, in saying that he had nothing to do with it, that he did not refer to a plot, and not to the publications?

A. I do not distinctly recollect Governor Edwards's language, except so far as that it left a strong impression on my mind that he disclaimed having any thing to do with the A. B. business. He spoke of it generally, and I do not recollect that he made the distinction referred to in the question now put.

Question by Mr. Livingston. When you speak of the A. B. business, the A. B. plot, and the A. B. publications, do you not mean the same thing?

Answer. In applying some of those terms, I have used the language commonly applied to them, and understand them all to mean the same thing.

Question by Mr. Cook. Was not the word plot, as applied to the subject, first used in the National Intelligencer?

Answer. I cannot tell. It has frequently been used in the National Intelligencer; but I believe that epithet was applied to it by the public as early as it was by the National Intelligencer.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Do you not recollect that in the conversation which I had with you and Mr. Gales, I stated, that, in consequence of certain rumors about the publications of A. B., and what had been stated in your paper about an A. B. plot, that I might find it necessary to say something about yourselves, and show that there was no A. B. plot in the case at all—or words to that effect? And did not Mr. Gales reply?

Answer. Such a remark may have been made, but I cannot call it to my recollection. As it seems Mr. Gales replied to the remark, it is possible it was addressed to him; and on this account I may not particularly have noticed it.

Q. In saying (as you have done) that I intimated that I had nothing to do with the A. B. affair, did you not consider me as rather alluding to any effects it might have upon you, than upon others?

A. Your object at the time appears to me to have been to remove any impression of your entertaining feelings of hostility to us; but the concurrent impression which you conveyed to my mind was, that you were not the writer of the A. B. publications.

Q. Was not this an inference of your own, from the general scope of the conversation, rather than from any expressions of mine?

A. Your exact language I do not remember.

I can only speak with certainty of its effect upon my mind, which is as I have stated. We thought the denial clear, because that was the "good reason" spoken of in our paragraph, which we stated ourselves to be in possession of, for not believing you to be the author.

Q. Did I not expressly state, in connexion with the conversation about the A. B. affair, that I had no intention of injuring you?

A. I think not; because that would have been a virtual admission that you were the author—and we understood you to deny being so.

Q. Do you not recollect my making the following remark—that I never was the aggressor in any controversy, and never would be; but that when attacked, I did not know that I always stopped at the just bounds of retribution?

A. Of this remark, I remember distinctly only that part which I have already stated; but the residue may have been expressed by you in connexion with it.

Q. In Mr. Dickins's testimony, he mentioned you as having procured the copying of some of the bank correspondence. By whom was this copying executed, and under what circumstances?

A. Being informed last Fall, by Mr. Little, of this city, that he should be glad to obtain from some of the public offices some clerical employment to fill up his leisure time, and knowing that, in times of pressure, writing was given out by some of the public offices, I inquired of Mr. Dickins, in the month of October last, if there was, in the Treasury Department, any extra writing he could give out. He mentioned that the voluminous bank correspondence, called for by a resolution of Congress, was more than the clerks in the office could get ready, and, as others were employed on it out of the office, if I knew of any trust-worthy person, he would give him a part of it to do. On my vouching for the integrity of the gentleman mentioned, Mr. D. gave me a bundle of the letters, which he wished might be copied without delay, as the Secretary of the Treasury was anxious to transmit the correspondence to Congress early in the session. These letters were transcribed in three or four weeks and returned. Soon after, Mr. Dickins called on me, and said he was afraid the other persons would not be able to get the remainder of the letters copied in time, and asked me if the same gentleman would undertake some more. He left another bundle with me, which were also copied. On their being returned, I inquired if he could tell me how soon the correspondence would be sent in. He could not say, as there was yet much of the correspondence remaining to be transcribed. I told him the same gentleman, and one or two others, also, would be glad of as much writing as they could get. I then received from Mr. Dickins a third large bundle of the letters, and they were immediately put in hand. I afterwards received several messages from Mr. Dickins to hurry the copying, as the Secretary was very impatient to send the correspondence to Congress, and as, after the copying should be completed, it would take much time to compare the transcripts with the originals. To—ward the latter part of the copying, I received, every day, a message from Mr. Dickins, urging despatch, as all the rest of the copying was finished, and he was so importunate to have it done, that I was induced to obtain for Mr. Little the aid of an additional person. The precise time that this copying was completed, I do not remember, but it was, I think, some time in March.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

Charles H. W. Wharton sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Have you ever had a conversation with Mr. Edwards about the authorship of the A. B. publications? If yes, relate it.

Answer. Yes. I have had a conversation with him on that subject in December or January last, at his lodgings, at Mrs. Queen's. Mr. E. said he was not the author of the A. B. plot, that he did not know any thing about it.

Q. In what manner was this denial made, and in what words, so far as you can recollect?

A. The manner appeared to be solemn; the expressions were—"He would be d—d if he knew any thing about that d—d A. B. plot."

Q. How came he to say any thing about the A. B. plot?

A. I called upon Mr. Edwards for the purpose of procuring recommendations to the different Secretaries of the Departments with a view to obtaining for myself a clerkship. He stated that he was intimately acquainted with all of them, and could give letters to all of them, except Mr. Crawford, and a letter to him would do no good, for, (to use his own expressions) that he and Mr. Crawford "did not set horses together;" "that Mr. Crawford was under a belief that he was the author of the d—d A. B. plot, the authorship of which he disavowed; and he concluded by saying that he considered Mr. Crawford a very clever and honorable man.

Q. by Mr. Cook. Are you certain that Mr. Edwards, in speaking of an A. B. plot, did not say that he knew nothing of any plot?

A. I have correctly stated the conversation as it occurred.

C. H. W. WHARTON.

John S. Barbour, of the House of Representatives, sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Cook. Have you had any conversation with Mr. Noble on the subject of a conversation held between him and Mr. Edwards, relative to the authorship of the A. B. publications? if so, please to state what that conversation was.

A. I will relate the circumstances under which such conversations were held. Shortly after the communication of the addresses of Governor Edwards, I read, with two members of the Kentucky delegation, a letter printed in the Richmond Enquirer, in which Governor E. is said to have declared to Mr. Noble that he was not the author of those publications signed A. B., and that, in consequence of such disavowal, Mr. Noble had voted to confirm his appointment in the Senate. I felt anxious to know whether such disavowal had been made for such a purpose. Under the influence of that anxiety, I met with General Noble in this Capitol, and heard him say that such was not the fact; that Governor E. had disavowed the authorship of those publications; that it had no connexion with his vote, as he was his friend, and should have voted for the confirmation of his appointment in any event.

Q. Did General Noble say, at that time, that he did not believe that disavowal was intended to have any effect upon the nomination of Governor Edwards?

A. All that I know of it is embodied in my answer to the first interrogatory.

Q. Have you had any conversation with Mr. Elkins on the same subject? if so, please state what it was, and when?

A. I think at some period of time, shortly after the address of Governor Edwards was presented to the House, and after the publication in the Enquirer, to which I have alluded, Mr. Elkins informed me in a conversation, sought by myself, that he had heard Governor E. incidentally remark, upon reading this article in the Enquirer, in which he is spoken of as "Ninian Edwards of A. B. plot memory," that he was no more the author of that plot than the Editor of the Enquirer—I speak with more preciseness of the conversation with Mr. Elkins than of that with General Noble.

JNO. S. BARBOUR.

Thomas H. Benton, of the Senate, sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Were you not well acquainted with the connexion of Mr. Edwards with the Edwardsville Bank?

Answer. From general report only. I never did any business with him in that character.

Q. Do you know that he has made efforts, from the establishment of the institution till its failure, to keep up its credit with the public?

A. What I know personally is the publication in the St. Louis Enquirer, of which I was an editor.

Q. Do you know whether the statements in that publication are correct.

[To this question Mr. Cook objected. The Committee decided that it might be put.]

A. I very well remember my opinion at the time the publication was made. It was, that the publication would give a credit to the bank, to which it was not entitled. In conformity with that opinion, and from no other motive than to countervail the effect of that publication, I wrote an article, which was published either in the same paper, or in one next succeeding, (but I think the same,) in which I gave some of the reasons which induced me to believe that the bank was not entitled to the credit which Mr. E. gave to it in his publication. I have not seen that article since, but the facts and circumstances rest upon my mind, and I am still of the opinion that I then was.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

Q. What were the facts on which this opinion was formed.

A. The first was one leading fact, which I had from general report, that a majority of the stock was held by two or three stockholders who were persons of little or no property. The stockholders to whom I allude were Mr. Robert Latham and General Payne, the latter of whom was reputed to cover stock for the Messrs. Johnson, of Kentucky. Mr. Latham was generally reported to be the insolvent partner of a firm in Kentucky—I think either Latham & Broadhead, or Latham & Morehead; and that he was insolvent I am certain, having been employed as a lawyer to collect debts from him. The Messrs. Johnson were generally reputed to be in bad pecuniary circumstances. The stockholders having a majority of the stock, could change the Directors at any election. This circumstance deprived the bank of credit in my eyes. Another circumstance which made me believe that the publication of Mr. Edwards would give the bank a credit which was not due to it, was its silence upon points necessary to be known, such as the pecuniary stability of several of the Directors. Mr. Smith, one of the Directors, of whom a high character is given in that publication, was generally reputed to be without property, or very recently insolvent. Dr. Joseph Bowers, of whom a high character is also given, was a speculator lately arrived in the country, claiming and talking of much property, but, as was believed, without solid foundation. The other directors, with the exception of two or three, were generally reputed to own but little property, and to hold a minority of the stock. Another circumstance to the prejudice of the bank, was my belief that it could not do a business which would defray its expenses and support it, owing to the little commerce existing in the place where it was established.

Question by Mr. Cook. You state that Mr. Edwards made his publication in the St. Louis Enquirer of 1819; was Mr. Crawford on the list of those to whom that paper was stately sent?

A. Yes.

Q. At the time you spoke of the character of the Bank of Edwardsville, and its claims to public credit, did you know any thing of its actual condition?

A. I had no personal knowledge of its affairs; my opinions were bottomed on general current report.

Q. Did you not, about the same time, write to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating strong objections to the claims of this bank upon his confidence, and that of the public?

A. I did so, some time before, soon after the bank went into operation.

Q. Did you receive any reply from the Secretary on that subject, by which you ascertained that he had received your letter?

A. I did; and he stated that, availing himself of the permission expressed in my letter to show it to whomsoever it concerned, he had shown it to Mr. Edwards and Colonel Johnson.

Q. Were you at that time a Director of the Bank of Missouri?

A. I was not till, long after, say two years or more.

Q. About this time, however, did you not make communications in your paper to the public, strongly supporting the claims of the Bank of Missouri to the public confidence?

A. I made very few, if any; I do not now remember one.

Q. Was it not your opinion, that that bank was entitled to confidence?

A. It was, most decisively. After my first arrival at Washington City, in 1820, I had spoken to Mr. Crawford in favor of the Bank of Missouri. After that bank had stopped payment, and resolutions had been submitted in the House of Representatives, upon the subject of its failure, and of the public deposit in it, myself and Mr. Scott, representative from Missouri, went to Mr. Crawford, and offered to give him, in writing, the previous statements which we had made, verbally, in favor of the bank. Mr. Crawford declined receiving any statement from us. His precise words I do not remember, but he declined taking from us any thing like vouchers to shield him from responsibility, stating, I think, that the correspondence would show that every thing was fair, and that he had proceeded on sufficient grounds.

Q. Which bank first failed to pay specie for its notes, the Bank of Missouri or the Bank of Edwardsville?

A. The Bank of Missouri. But I have been informed and believe, that the Bank of Missouri had assets at the time of its stopping specie payment, to an amount beyond the claims upon it; that it has settled all these claims, either by paying them or securing them to be paid, while the Bank of Edwardsville has neither paid or secured its debt to the United States.

Q. At what time were you employed to collect debts against Mr. Latham?

A. Some time before I came to Congress, in 1820.

Q. Do you, or do you not, know that General Payne is reputed to be, and do you not believe him to be, amongst the wealthiest men in Kentucky?

A. I have always understood that he was a man of large property; but the general report was, that the shares in his name were really the property of the Messrs. Johnsons.

Q. Do you, or do you not, know or believe that the Messrs. Johnsons were at that time also considered among the wealthiest men in Kentucky?

A. All the information which I had upon the subject, represented them to be engaged in large and critical moneyed enterprises, and that their pecuniary credit was most uncertain.

Q. Do you not know that Robert Pogue, another Director in the Bank of Edwardsville, was at that time engaged in large mercantile concerns, and of unsuspected credit?

A. I knew Mr. Pogue as a merchant, and his credit and standing were very good.

Q. William Kinney, Joseph Conway, and Abraham Prickett, were also Directors. Were not these gentleman all at that time of high respectability, and of considerable unencumbered property, so far as your knowledge extends?

Case of Ninian Edwards.

A. I knew them all personally. Mr. Kinney was always represented to me as a person of considerable property. I never heard the others so spoken of. I know nothing about the encumbrances on any of their estates. They were all respectable.

Q. Dr. Joseph Bowers, another Director, is spoken of by Mr. Edwards as a gentleman of respectability. Was not that his general character at that period?

A. It was. But, my objection to Governor Edwards's publication was, its omitting to speak of the pecuniary circumstances of the directors and stockholders.

Q. Were the directors and stockholders liable beyond the amount of the stock paid in?

A. The Bank of Edwardsville was an incorporated bank, and I suppose, of course, they were not.

Q. What was the conversation you had with General Noble, which induced you to write the letter in the Richmond "Enquirer," in relation to that conversation?

A. I had two conversations with Mr. Noble, upon the subject of his conversation with Mr. Edwards. The first, soon after the appearance of Mr. Edwards's address. It occurred accidentally, while passing each other in the large circular room, in the centre of the Capitol. It was very short. I was going in haste into the Senate Chamber. Either replying to a question from me, or from some other person, for there were several passing at the same time, Mr. Noble said that Mr. Edwards had declared that he was not the author of the A. B. publications, and that he had supported him in the Senate. In repeating that conversation, I reported it, and in writing to the Editor of the Richmond "Enquirer" the letter in question, I represented it as if Mr. Noble had voted for Mr. E. in consequence of that disavowal. It was the construction which I put upon the support which he had given. I was not in the Senate during the time that Mr. E.'s nomination was pending. A week or two afterwards, and when there occurred some leisure in the Senate, and in consequence of suggestions that Mr. Edwards had only denied the authorship of the A. B. publications by way of avoiding an improper curiosity, I asked Mr. Noble whether he had made inquiries of Mr. Edwards which led to the disavowal? Mr. Noble then stated to me particularly his conversation with Mr. Edwards. He said that the disavowal was wholly voluntary on the part of Mr. Edwards; that he had pledged his honor that he was not the author of the A. B. publications, but Mr. Noble had intended to vote for him before he heard this disavowal; that he had, before hearing it, made a motion in the Senate to take up his nomination; that Mr. Edwards, in that same conversation, spoke honorably of Mr. Crawford; spoke well of his management of the finances, and of his relief to the Western debtors. The second and full conversation was the same as has been detailed before the committee by Mr. Noble in his testimony. The first was short and imperfect, and so slight, that Mr. Noble with difficulty could recollect it when I have since mentioned it to him.

Q. Do you not know, that the representations which you have stated were made by you to the Secretary of the Treasury, against the Bank of Edwardsville, were contradicted by those of Mr. Edwards and Colonel Johnson?

A. I do not know that they were.

THOMAS H. BENTON.

Abraham Bradley, junior, sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Q. by Mr. Forsyth. In October, 1819, what was the shortest time in which a letter could come by the mail from Edwardsville to Washington?

I have examined the contracts, and am unable to state.

Q. Could a letter have come, at that time, in less than twenty days?

A. It is difficult to answer with certainty; but, according to my best information, I should say it could not.

Q. Have you made out a list of the arrivals and departures of the mail between this city and Edwardsville? Is the paper now shown to you such a list? and is it made out according to the best information you possess?

A. It is. I have made it out from the contracts, in all its items, saving one, and that I have stated from the advertisement of the Post Office Department, for a contract which is the route from Wheeling to Louisville. The mail takes a longer time to come from Edwardsville than to go there.

Q. Do the dates on the bills of the mails sent, which appear in the quarterly returns, ascertain the time of the departure of the mails?

A. They always ought to do so.

S. BURCH,

Ch. Clk. House of Representatives.

JUNE 16, 1824.

George Sweeney sworn, on the part of Mr. Crawford.

Q. Are you a clerk in the City Post Office?

A. I am.

Q. Look at the post-mark on this letter. What is the date there marked?

[Here the witness was shown the letter from Mr. Crawford to the Cashier of the Bank of Edwardsville, dated 1st November, 1819.]

A. The day appears to be the 3d; but of what month cannot be discovered.

GEORGE SWEENEY.

WASHINGTON, July 15, 1819.

DEAR COLONEL: Yours of the 28th ultimo came to hand this morning.

The circumstances connected with the Bank of Edwardsville, as developed in the two letters of Governor Edwards, submitted by you to my perusal, will receive due consideration.

I am much surprised at the contents of his first letter to you. I am gratified with the explanation you have given him upon that subject. With Governor Edwards I had no personal acquaintance before last Winter. The opinion which I had formed of his talents and integrity, from the official correspondence which had been carried on between us both in the War and Treasury Departments, has been confirmed by personal acquaintance.

The different subjects upon which he had occasion to ask my opinion or decision, during the last session of Congress, were fairly and candidly stated; his comments upon them were judicious, and it afforded me great pleasure to be able, after due examination and reflection, generally to coincide in opinion with him.

The gentleman who has stated that I was unfriendly to Governor Edwards, has entirely mistaken my feelings and motives of action. Certainly every thing which occurred between the Governor and myself was decidedly calculated to inspire feelings of a very different character. I had every reason to be satisfied with him, and hope that nothing occurred on my part to produce dissatisfaction with him with any part of my conduct. I believe the only difference of opinion that occurred between us was in relation to the eligibility to office of a minor. In that case, it would have afforded me great pleasure to have thought with him, inasmuch as it would have enabled me to have aided in doing an act highly acceptable to my friend Colonel McKee. My inability to concur with him in opinion was cause of regret, and not of complaint. I had, therefore, no possible cause of hostility with the Governor, and assure you that I never felt any thing like hostility to him.

I remain, with sentiments of the highest respect, your friend and most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Colonel RICHARD M. JOHNSON.

P. S. I return you Governor Edwards's first letter.

Eliza Queen sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Edwards. I wish you to state what you know concerning my sickness at your house after my removal into the room in the back building which opens on the balcony?

A. I know that you were very sick while you lodged in that room, so ill that a servant was obliged to sit up with you every night.

Q. How long do you think that I continued in that situation? do you suppose it was two weeks?

A. I do not recollect the exact time—I should think two weeks, but cannot be certain.

Q. Do you recollect how long it was after General Noble came to lodge at your house that I became so sick as to be confined to my room?

A. I am not certain—but think it was two days or three—it was on a Tuesday or Wednesday.

Q. Do you recollect that I breakfasted or dined at the table with the other boarders after breakfast on the Monday next after General Noble came to your house?

A. I do not recollect that you did.

Q. Was it not in consequence of my indisposition that I did not?

A. I supposed that it was.

Q. Was not my room, in which I was sick, one of the remotest back rooms on the second floor of the back building, and was not Mr. Noble's the front room on the first floor of the front building?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect my being very lame after I began to recover?

A. I remember your wearing socks and complaining of pain.

Q. Do you think I could have walked from my room to the front part of the house within a week after my being taken so ill?

A. I do not recollect seeing you do so.

Q. Was not your room adjoining mine; and would I not have had to pass by your room to get to the front of the house?

A. Yes.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. You have answered that you do not recollect that Mr. Edwards dined with the other boarders after breakfast on the Monday next after General Noble came to board at your house: do you recollect that he did not come to the table?

A. I do not recollect seeing him at table after that time, at breakfast or tea; I do not go to the table at dinner, but I do at breakfast and tea.

Q. When did Mr. Noble come to lodge at your house?

A. On Saturday the 21st of February.

Q. And you think it was on the Tuesday or Wednesday following that Governor Edwards was taken so sick?

A. Yes.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Where was Governor Edwards's room when Mr. Noble first came to lodge at your house?

A. It was the front room on the first floor, the same room which General Noble afterwards occupied.

Q. When did Governor Edwards remove to the back building?

A. On Sunday; the next day after General Noble came.

ELIZA QUEEN.

Adelaide Lindsley sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Did you not board at Mrs. Queen's during the whole of the last Winter?

A. Yes.

Q. What do you know concerning my being sick there after I removed into the back building?

A. You were taken sick about the middle of the week, and continued confined to your room I should think about a fortnight.

Q. Was I not sick previous to my being taken so very ill in that room?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect my eating at table with the other boarders after the Monday which succeeded General Noble's coming to Mrs. Queen's to lodge, until I got well?

A. I do not recollect that you did.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Do you recollect that he did not?

Answer. I was never at table saving at breakfast and tea.

Q. Do you recollect that he did not come to table?

A. I don't know.

ADELAIDE LINDSLEY.

William B. Hodgson sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Please to state what you know about my being sick after my removal to the room in the back building at Mrs. Queen's.

A. I recollect finding you frequently very ill in that room, when I visited you there, so much so as to be confined to bed.

Q. How soon was this after my nomination?

A. I think it was the week after I understood the nomination to have been made, and I believe on Tuesday.

Q. Do you not recollect calling on that day and telling me that you understood my nomination had not on that day been taken up in the Senate?

A. If I did not say so on that day, I recollect to have made the observation frequently at other times when I visited you.

Q. Do you recollect that I told you that Mr. Francis Key had been to see me on the day before you visited me?

Case of Nintan Edwards.

A. I think you did.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Are you employed in the office of the Secretary of State?

A. I have been occasionally employed in that office to translate foreign languages; but I am not a stated clerk. I have only been employed there within six or seven weeks past.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Did you visit Governor Edwards before he removed into the back room?

Answer. Yes.

Q. At what time?

A. On the same week on which I understood the nomination to have been made.

Q. Had you in these visits any conversation with Governor Edwards on the subject of the nomination?

A. Yes.

Q. Did he speak, in these conversations, of an opposition which he expected to his nomination, and of the grounds on which he expected it would be made?

A. The opposition was casually spoken of; but I do not recollect that any special grounds for it were stated by Governor Edwards.

Q. Did he say any thing about the A. B. plot or A. B. publications.

A. If he did not, I mentioned it.

Q. Please to state what passed between you on that subject.

A. I had seen it mentioned in a New York paper that Governor E. was supposed to be the author of these A. B. publications; this I mentioned to him. At that time nothing positive was said by the Governor as to the authorship; but, at a subsequent visit, knowing that there were doubts entertained of his having been the author, to satisfy myself I asked him if he did write them. He replied, "I neither confess nor deny."

Q. What was the reason of your frequent intercourse with Governor Edwards on this subject?

A. Motives of friendship and interest.

Q. Has there been a former connexion or acquaintance between you and Governor Edwards?

A. Not before my first visits to him at Mrs. Queen's. I was an applicant to be appointed his private secretary.

Q. Were you so appointed?

A. Yes.

Q. Are you to go to Mexico with Governor Edwards?

A. I am not; I have procured other employment.

WILLIAM B. HODGSON.

Jeremiah Nelson, of the House of Representatives sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Please to state what you recollect of my being sick, at Mrs. Queen's, after Mr. Noble came to lodge there.

Answer. I then lodged at Mrs. Queen's, and understood, from several members of the family, that Governor Edwards was very sick. I should think it was more than a week after Mr. Noble's coming there, that I visited Governor Edwards, in his room. He was then very much indisposed; but I do not know whether he had or had not been out of his room since his being taken sick.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. When you visited him, was he, in your opinion, well enough to go from one room of the house to another?

A. I cannot tell. He often went out when I thought that a person so sick as he ought not to have done so.

Q. Have you not known him to be out, night or day, when he was apparently more indisposed, than he appeared to you to be at the time?

A. I have not.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Do you recollect seeing me out of my room for a fortnight after Mr. Noble's coming there?

A. I cannot recollect whether you were or were not.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. Do you recollect whether Mr. Edwards had any medical attendance at that time?

A. I cannot tell whether he had or had not.

JEREMIAH NELSON.

Asa E. Hough sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Do you recollect to have seen me at Mrs. Queen's after I occupied the back room?

Answer. I do.

Q. What was my situation at that time?

A. You were sick in bed.

Q. Do you recollect at what time this was?

A. I cannot remember the precise day. It was some time towards the latter end of February. I recollect that you were so much indisposed that I did not communicate the business for which I had come. I called again, some time afterwards, but learning that you were still confined to your room, I did not go in.

A. E. HOUGH.

Henry Washington Queen sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Did you lodge in the same house with me, during the last session of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Q. Please to state what you know about my being confined to my room, after General Noble came there to lodge.

A. You were not, during your illness, at that time; out of your room, to my knowledge, after Wednesday, while General Noble remained there. I am under the impression that you became confined to your room after Tuesday. I remember your being at breakfast on the Monday morning previous. I do not recollect your being out of your room after Thursday, until you recovered.

Question by Mr. Forsyth. What enables you to fix, with so much certainty, on Monday and Tuesday?

A. General Noble came on Saturday: was not at breakfast on Sunday, and came to breakfast, for the first time, on Monday, in company with Governor Edwards.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

Q. Were you much in Governor Edwards's room during his confinement?

A. I was several times there.

Q. Do you know how long he was confined to bed, after his first being taken so ill,

A. I do not.

H. W. QUEEN.

John C. Rives sworn, at the request of Mr. Edwards.

Question by Mr. Edwards. Please to state what you know of my indisposition, while I was in the back room, at Mrs. Queen's.

Answer. I know that you were sick while there, but I cannot say, exactly, at what time. I visited you between the beginning and middle of March. You told me that you were then unwell, and had had, on the day before, a very severe ague. I think it was two or three days after Mr. Hubbard, (Lieutenant Governor of Illinois,) was in this city.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Aug. 6, 1819.

SIR: Observing, by your monthly return, ending on the 30th of June, that there remained in your hands a considerable sum of the public moneys, I wish to be informed why the same was not deposited in bank, in conformity with the instructions from this Department. Heretofore, when there was no bank in your vicinity, all reasonable allowance was made, on account of the difficulties to which you were subjected in making your deposits; but now, that a bank has been established in your place of residence, there can be no longer any excuse whatsoever for retaining the public money.

I am, very respectfully, sir, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

BENJAMIN STEPHENSON, Esq.

Receiver of Public Moneys, Edwardsville.

State of Illinois, Madison County, ss.

On the 13th day of May, 1824, personally appeared before the undersigned, Justice of the Peace in and for the county aforesaid, Thomas Lippincott, who, being duly affirmed, according to law, deposes that the above is a correct copy of a letter found by the deponent, on the files of official letters in the Receiver's Office, Edwardsville; that the said letter appears to be in the hand-writing of a clerk, but with the proper signature of the Hon. William H. Crawford, as the deponent believes, from a comparison with other letters received from the Treasury Department.

THOS. LIPPINCOTT.

Affirmed and subscribed before me.

HAIL MASON, J. P.

RECEIVER'S OFFICE,

Edwardsville, Ill., October 12, 1819.

SIR: My absence from this place on a necessary and indispensable visit to Kentucky, has put it out of my power, by an earlier opportunity than the ensuing mail, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th of August last, in which you express a wish to be informed why the public money in my hands has not been deposited in the bank of this place, in conformity with your instructions.

I should certainly have continued to make the deposits in the bank, had it not been for your letter of the 9th April, in which you requested me to pay certain bills which you expected to be drawn on me by the Indian Agents of Chicago, Green Bay, Michilimackinac, Fort Wayne, and Piquis; at the same time apprising me that the sum which would be required at the close of each quarter was estimated at eleven thousand dollars.

Knowing that if I deposited the money in the bank, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, I could not, without special authority, draw it out, I conceived I was fulfilling your wishes by retaining the money in my own hands, for the purpose of paying, when presented, the drafts mentioned in your letter of the 9th April. And I presume that the same construction has been given by the Receiver of Public Moneys at Kaskaskia, to a similar letter, which I have been informed he received from you, as he also, for a considerable time past, has made no deposits in the bank.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

As your letter of the 6th August makes no reference to that of the 9th of April preceding, I should, at all events, feel somewhat at a loss how to act; but I believe I should make the deposites were it not for other considerations, which I feel it my duty previously to communicate to you.

You are doubtless apprized of the hostility of the Bank of Missouri and citizens of St. Louis towards the bank of this place, supposed to be produced in consequence of certain deposites being withheld from that bank and placed in this. It seems to be believed, with what justice I do not pretend to say, that their object is to destroy this bank, with a view to coerce the regaining of the deposites in that. And under the impression that they employ the public funds for the purpose of accomplishing that object, stockholders in, and several directors of, this bank, have, in disgust, either withdrawn, or declared their intention to withdraw from any further concern in the bank. Some of them seem even willing that the Bank of Missouri should regain the deposites, professing to believe it would be the readiest means of causing the State pride, and public feeling of this and some of the neighboring States to react upon that institution with the more effect.

In this state of things, the principal part of the stockholders have declined paying the instalments that otherwise were expected to be paid upon their stock. Two of the directors have already resigned, others talk of doing so, and the publication of Governor Edwards, herewith transmitted, shows the course he is disposed to pursue.

Though these measures, adopted probably with too much irritation, may not produce any serious evils to the bank, and I hope they will not, yet I feel that they impose a greater responsibility upon me than I am willing to take upon myself, without the full disclosure of the whole circumstances to you, and such instructions as you may think fit to give thereupon.

The situation of the bank at present I consider as favorable as could either be expected or desired. And under the control of the directors who have hitherto had the management of it, I should apprehend no kind of danger to the public, or to individuals: but I know not who may succeed those that have resigned, and intend to resign, nor who may be elected at the next annual election, on the first of January next. It is true that I have no reason to apprehend, nor do I anticipate, any unfavorable change in the directory; but, under all the circumstances of the case, I would not wish to risk the responsibility of making the deposites in the bank, till after the first of January next, without your instructions, given upon a knowledge of the facts above disclosed.

I am the more averse to doing so, from the difficulty that the bank must constantly encounter in converting Land Office notes into specie, so as to be prepared at all times to meet your drafts; and from the fear that those drafts may fall into the hands of persons who, under the influence of St. Louis, would be disposed to insist upon specie, when notes would answer their purposes equally well, merely for the purpose of harassing and distressing the bank.

In fact, while such a variety of notes are receivable for public lands, and specie so much in demand, I do not consider it any advantage to the bank to receive the deposites on terms that subject it to the payment of cash as often as you find it necessary to draw for it, unless the times of payment could be fixed upon at certain regular periods, that would afford ample opportunity for the necessary preparation. The land offices now receive but little money of any kind. This consists of notes on such a variety of banks, so remotely situated from each other, that it must be a considerable time before the notes upon any bank would accumulate sufficiently to bear the expense of sending for the money, and, in most cases, there is no opportunity of converting these notes into specie, owing particularly to the locality of the banks from which they issue.

To make the deposites to any advantage, the time of payment ought to be fixed as above suggested, or the drafts made payable in such notes as should be land office money at the time of presenting those drafts; or, partly the one and partly the other. To continue to convert all the notes receivable in this office into specie, and concentrate it at a single spot, must be utterly impracticable, and if practicable would be attended with great expense.

I beg leave to add, that the Bank of Edwardsville has received foreign gold under the expectation that it would be taken by the Government even after the 1st November next, and it is now held ready to be paid in consequence of notice from you of an intended draft for $30,000. It is to be hoped that no difficulty upon the subject will arise, if the expected draft should not be presented till after the 1st November.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your very humble servant.

State of Illinois, Madison County, &c.

On the 13th day of May, 1824, personally appeared before the undersigned Justice of the Peace in and for the county aforesaid, Thomas Lippincott, who, being duly affirmed according to law, deposes that the foregoing is a true copy of a paper which was found by the deponent on the files of official letters appertaining to, and now in the Receiver's Office at Edwardsville, and endorsed or filed in the hand-writing of the late Benjamin Stephenson, Esq., Receiver of Public Moneys, as follows, to wit: "Copy to the Treasury Department, October, 1819."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 1, 1819.

SIR: Upon referring to your monthly accounts, it appears that you have retained all the money which has been received by you since the month of August last.

As it is presumed that this has been the result of my letter of the 9th April last, I request that you will, immediately after the receipt of this letter, deposit in the Bank of Edwardsville the whole of the money in your possession on the 30th instant.

You will consider the letter of the 9th of April as authorizing the purchase of bills in the manner therein directed, when you have funds, but not as authorizing the retention of the public money in your hands at the end of each month for that purpose.

It is presumed that, if any draft should be presented, when you have not money in your hands, that there will be no difficulty in having the draft taken up by the Bank of Edwardsville, on its own account, or to be repaid by you, as soon as you have funds sufficient for that purpose. I remain, with respect, your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

State of Illinois, Madison County, ss.

On the 13th day of May, 1824, personally appeared before the undersigned Justice of the Peace in and for the county aforesaid, Thomas Lippincott, of said county, who, being duly affirmed according to law, deposes that the within is a true copy of an original letter on the files of official letters in the office of the Receiver of Public Moneys at Edwardsville; that the deponent has been employed in the Receiver's office the greater part of the time since the Winter of 1821-2, and has had access to the files and papers thereof, and that the letter of which the within is a copy, appears, from a comparison with the signature, and with the signature of other letters and papers received from the Treasury Department into the said office, evidently to be the hand-writing of the Honorable

William H. Crawford. And further the deponent saith not.

THOMAS LIPPINCOTT.

Affirmed and subscribed before me,
HAIL MASON,
Justice of the Peace.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 1, 1819.

SIR: The letter, of which the enclosed is a copy, was addressed to the Receivers of Public Money at Kaskaskia and Edwardsville.

From the returns of those officers, it appears that the whole of the public money received by them since the month of August last, has been retained, as it is presumed, for the purpose of meeting the drafts which might be drawn in pursuance of that letter. From the same returns it appears that no such drafts have been presented.

To prevent the inconvenience and risk which may result from the accumulation of such large sums in the hands of those officers, I have the day directed them to deposit in the bank the sums which may be in their possession on the 30th instant, and to deposit, monthly, the money which may be received during each month. Should any bill be presented to the Receiver of Public Money at Edwardsville, or Kaskaskia, when they have not funds to meet it, I presume the bank will have no difficulty in making the advance, which will be refunded by the Receiver, when funds to that amount shall be received by him; or the amount will be remitted to the bank by the draft of the Treasurer on the bank itself. Either course will be acceptable to the Department. Payments made in this manner will be found to be the most convenient mode of meeting the demands of the Treasury upon the bank, on account of the public money deposited in it.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

CASHIER of the Bank of Edwardsville.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 1, 1819.

SIR: Upon referring to your monthly accounts, it appears that you have retained all the money which has been received by you since the month of August last.

As it is presumed that this has been the result of my letter of the 9th of April last, I request that you will immediately deposit in the Bank of Edwardsville whatever sum may be in your hands on the 30th instant.

You will consider the letter of the 9th April as authority to purchase bills therein described when presented, if you have funds sufficient for that purpose, but not as authority to retain in your hands, at the end of each month, any part of the public money received in the course of the month.

You will, after the deposit herein directed, make your deposits in the Bank of Missouri, until otherwise directed. I am, &c.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 12, 1824.

In compliance with a request of the committee on the Address of Ninian Edwards, communic-

Case of Ninian Edwards.

ed through Mr. Forsyth, the Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to transmit the accompanying statements (No. 1, 2, and 3) from the Treasurer, showing—

1st. The balance of public moneys in the Bank of Steubenville, at the end of every quarter, from the commencement of March, 1817, to the 31st of March, 1824, and continued to 7th June, 1824.

2d. The same, in relation to the Bank of Tombigbee, from the commencement of March, 1819.

3d. The aggregate of moneys deposited to the credit of the Treasurer, and the balance remaining at his credit on the 7th June, 1824, in each of the following banks: Steubenville, Chillicothe, Mississippi, Tombigbee, Missouri, Vincennes, Edwardsville, Illinois, Franklin Bank of Columbus, Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Indiana, Branch Bank of Kentucky at Louisville, Planters and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville, and Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati.

The Secretary has the honor to state that no payments have been made directly by the Bank of Missouri since its failure. It is known, that, previously to the 23d of November last, $781 43 had been paid in specie by some of the parties whose debts had been assigned by it to the Treasury; and it is understood from the President of the bank that other sums have been paid in like manner; but the Receiver at St. Louis, who is employed by the Treasury as its agent in collecting the debt of that bank, has not yet reported them to the Secretary. Among the debts assigned to the Treasury was one of $10,030; and it appears that, for the reasons and under the circumstances stated in the accompanying papers, (marked *A and B,) the agent entered into our arrangement, by which $8,000 in notes of the treasury of the State of Missouri (commonly called loan office paper) were taken, at the rate of seventy-five cents to the dollar, in part payment of this debt; and these notes the Secretary directed to be specially deposited in the Branch Bank of the United States at Louisville, to the credit of the Treasurer. It also appears, by the same papers, that there were, among the securities assigned by the bank for the payment of its debt to the Treasury, $15,006 in paper of this description; of this sum, together with another of $50, which he appears to have since received,) the agent at St. Louis, on his own judgment, subject to the approval of the Secretary, exchanged $4,539 64, for certificates of the Auditor of Missouri, and $5,000 for notes of the State Bank of Illinois, all which, with the advance of the loan office paper, have been placed to the credit of the Treasurer, as a special deposit in the Branch Bank of the United States at Louisville. The exchange is represented as advantageous to the United States, but has not been sanctioned by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. Chairman of the Committee on the
Address of Ninian Edwards.

TREASURY OF THE U. STATES; June 11, 1824.

[a] Extracts of a letter from George F. Strother to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated

"St. Louis, April 27, 1823.

"SIR: Amongst the debts transferred to the United States by the Missouri Bank, was one of $10,000 upon Wilson P. Hunt. This debt was secured by mortgage, but the land pledged to secure the payment had been previously mortgaged to Mr. Astor, of New York, for $10,000, upon which was due eight or nine years' interest. When this note was proposed to be transferred, the debt was desperate, as the land would not bring more than $10,000, and the debt was considered nominal until Mr. Hunt stated that, by mortgaging the land to a friend, if relieved from the bank encumbrance, he could procure $5,000, with which he could purchase a sufficient sum of money to purchase the amount of the bank debt in loan office paper. Upon reflection, it was determined to receive loan office paper in payment of his debt, in loan office paper, at 25 per cent. discount. Mr. Hunt, on that day, and frequently, expressed to me a great desire to discharge this debt, and expressed a wish that, if I should see any for sale, to send it to him. In February last, he paid Mr. Barton $1,800.

"Considering the debt in some peril, my wish was to have it placed upon a sure footing. Three or four weeks since, a gentleman applied to me to procure a loan of money. I informed him that I had none, but that if he would give ample security to return the loan office paper when wanted, I would put him upon the plan to secure it; that Mr. Hunt wished to discharge a debt due the Government, in loan office paper, and if he would give his note, with sufficient security, to pay the United States $6,000 in loan office paper, with 6 per cent. interest, upon demand, that Mr. Hunt would give him in money the selling price, amounting to $2,250. My object was to accommodate two deserving meritorious men, and serve the Government, by placing the debt upon a sure footing. The whole arrangement I communicated to Mr. Hunt, and told him I should communicate the transaction to you. He considered it a fair and advantageous arrangement for the Government."

[b] Extract of a letter from Thomas Sloo to the Secretary of the Treasury.

St. Louis, Nov. 23, 1823.

SIR: Agreeably to your request of the 24th August last, I called on George F. Strother, Esq. on the 19th instant, to exhibit to me the evidences of transfer received by him from the Bank of Missouri as collateral security for the public money in its possession at the time of its failure. Not having received the list mentioned in your letter, I requested Colonel Strother to furnish me with one, a copy of which is herewith transmitted, and with which the evidences of debt generally agree. In some cases, however, they exceed, and in others they fall short of, the amount stated in the list. The former is owing to credits which the parties are entitled to, that have not been entered on their notes; the latter arises from interest due on stock notes, accounts of which were to have been furnished by the bank, as appears from a memorandum of the President, in the hands of Mr. Strother, and which, he informs me, has been repeatedly called for without effect. Amount received by Mr. Strother, as will appear from notes of payment on the list, is $781 43 in specie, and $50 in loan office money. The only case in which the evidence of debt has been at all changed, is that of Wilson P. Hunt, who appears to have owed at the time of transfer $10,030, secured by mortgage on a tract of land in the neighborhood of St. Louis, that had been previously mortgaged to John Jacob Astor, of New York, for $10,000. Such was the uncertainty of this claim, that the bank agreed to receive the amount in loan office paper, when it was worth only twenty-five cents in the dollar, as I am informed by Mr. Strother. At present the debt of Hunt appears to stand thus:

Debt transferred	- - -	$10,030 00
Offset claimed	- - -	$108 00
Amount received by Joshua Barton, Esq., as per his receipt in the hands of Mr Strother, in loan office money	- - -	1,866 67

veyance of the Missouri be paid in loan office money, at any time the Government may require it, with 6 per cent. interest - - - 6,000 00

From every information which I have been able to obtain in relation to this debt, I believe the change to have been a favorable one, inasmuch as I deem the security for the payment of the $6,000 as amply sufficient, and you now hold for the payment of the balance due by Hunt, the same security which was held for the payment of the whole debt transferred.

From Franklin Bank - - - $8,000
From Branch - - - 6,956
From P. Detchemendy - - - 50
15,006,00

I have received this paper from Mr. Strother, considering it equal to the whole amount in loan office money. The loan office paper bears an interest of 3 per cent. per annum, the auditor's warrants an interest of 6 per cent. per annum, and the Illinois paper 2 per cent., and as to the warrants, no difficulty can arise in regard to the constitutionality of the issue. Mr. Strother informs me that it was his wish to have exchanged the whole amount of loan office money for auditor's warrants, by which arrangement the interest would have been increased 3 per cent. and the debt rendered eventually more certain. Should this transaction not be considered as entirely satisfactory, Mr. Strother has assured me that he will make good the amount in loan office money, by redeeming the auditor's warrants and Illinois paper.
The amount received I shall deposit as directed in the branch of the United States Bank at Louisville, Kentucky, in the early part of next month.

You will herewith receive the act of the State of Missouri, establishing loan offices—I thought it necessary to incur the expense of obtaining an exemplification from the office of the Secretary of State, presuming that you wished it for your own satisfaction, and not to exhibit in a court of justice.

Mr. Strother informed me that he had brought all the suits, commenced on the debts transferred by the Bank of Missouri in the State courts, in consequence of doubts having arisen of the bank's being chartered, for want of the signature of the Governor. The Supreme Court of the State, however, pronounced it chartered.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 15, 1824.

SIR: Your letter of the 14th instant is received, enclosing a note of the honorable Mr. Forsyth, expressive of his wish to have "a copy of Mr.
Edwards's letter to the War Department, remonstrating against, or complaining of an order which prevented the receiving of the Edwardsville Bank notes in payment to the troops of the United States, written in or after 1819, and any other letters on the subject of the Bank of Edwardsville from Mr. Edwards;" and, in answer thereto, I have the honor to transmit a copy of a letter from Mr.
Edwards to this Department, dated 11th June, 1819, which the clerk charged with the files of letters received by the Department, states to be the only letter from Mr. Edwards on the files of the Department in relation to that subject.

In addition to my own files, I directed the files of the Paymaster General's Office to be examined, and herewith transmit a copy of a report from that office containing a copy of a letter from Mr.
Edwards to the Paymaster General, of the same tenor and date as the one addressed by him to this office, which it will be seen by the report from that office, is the only letter in relation to the subject on its files.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

HON. EDWARD LIVINGSTON, of the Committee of Investigation, &c.

EDWARDSVILLE, ILLINOIS,
June 11, 1819.

DEAR SIR: I beg to inform you that the paymaster of the United States' troops, (Major Hall, now at St. Louis) is, by an order, (to which I hardly think you have ever given your approbation,) required to pay those troops in specie, United States Bank notes, or notes of the Bank of Missouri, in which latter, it is understood, those troops are generally, if not exclusively paid.

I am sure I need not remark to you, that such a preference of a little, petty bank of a Territory, over all the respectable banks of the Western States, enabling it exclusively to circulate its notes, at the distant points to which the troops are destined, cannot fail to be very objectionable to those States, even if such a distinction were not unjust in itself.

I have the honor to be, &c.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
City of Washington, June 15, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose, in obedience to your directions, a copy of a letter from the honorable Ninian Edwards to the Paymaster General, dated "Edwardsville, Illinois, June 11, 1819," in relation to payments said to have been made, by order of the Paymaster General, to the troops in that part of the country, "in specie, United States Bank notes, or notes of the Bank of Missouri," &c., being the only letter found on the files of this office upon that subject.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

NATH'L FRYE, JR.,
Chief Clerk.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN,
Secretary of War.

EDWARDSVILLE, ILLINOIS,
June 11, 1819.

DEAR SIR: I think it my duty to apprise you that Major Hall, the Paymaster of the United States troops is, and has been for some time past, acting under an order (which I am convinced you never authorized,) requiring him to pay those troops in specie, United States Bank notes, or notes of the Bank of Missouri, in which latter it is understood that they are generally, if not exclusively paid.

Considering the remote points at which those troops are destined to be stationed, the advantages which the present arrangement must afford to the Bank of Missouri, by enabling it to issue and circulate a great amount of its notes without danger of their returning upon it for payment, are not less obvious than such a preference of a little petty bank of a Territory, over all the respectable banks of the Western States would be odious to those States. More, I am sure, it cannot be necessary to say on the subject.

I have the honor to be, &c.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

THO. T. TUCKER,
Treasurer of the United States.

TREASURY UNITED STATES, June 11, 1824.

Replication to Mr. Crawford's communication to the Committee.

In replying to Mr. Crawford's communication to the committee on the 8th ultimo, the subject that seems first to demand notice, in the order in which he has presented it, is, his attempt to free himself from the imputation of having taken advantage "of the moment of my departure, to arraign the testimony which had been given by me before a former select committee of the House." In this, however, he does not pretend to deny any of the facts upon which that imputation was predicated, and, consequently, may be fairly considered as admitting them. For, seeing how ready he has been to advert to, and dilate upon other minute and unimportant particulars, he would hardly have been silent in regard to the circumstances which I had relied on to prove that he must have been apprized of my intended departure, had he not been conscious of their truth.

Laboring, as he has done in his communication, to prove that no such letter as I swore I saw the Receiver at Edwardsville write, could have been written, and that no such directions to continue the deposits, as those mentioned in my testimony, had ever been given, it can no longer be doubted by any one that the object of his report was to impeach my credibility.

As nothing could justify so serious an insinuation upon light and frivolous grounds, he ought not to have made it without the most thorough conviction that it was well founded; and, being so convinced, if he felt it his duty to allege it at all, it should have been done in distinct, unambiguous, and intelligible terms. Making it in a doubtful and equivocal manner, shows a disposition to inflict the injury, and, at the same time, to secure a retreat from a just responsibility for it. His delay would, under any circumstances, render his motives suspicious. Under the particular circumstances of this case, it affords the strongest presumption that he intended to take advantage of my absence. The facts which he now affects to question, I had asserted to himself two years, and, with his knowledge, had sworn to them more than one year, before he thought proper to indicate the slightest doubt of their truth. How, then, is his silence on the subject, during the whole of this period, to be accounted for? Can any one, who knows his disposition towards me, believe that he would have delayed this imputation a moment if he had believed he could have sustained it in a fair and honorable contest? His having so long forbore to make it, when he knew I could have had an opportunity to defend myself, affords reasonable ground to believe that he would not have made it at all if he had not supposed I had actually lost that opportunity by having taken my departure for a foreign country. Why did he not question any of the facts to which I had deposed, in his letter of February, 1823, which he addressed to the chairman of the select committee alluded to, eleven days after my examination? Had he really believed that I had not sworn truly, there was then a most suitable occasion for making his present statement, and his conduct being then under investigation, there would have been every motive for making, and none for withholding, it.

But, this was not the only opportunity he let pass by unimproved. On the 27th of February, 1823, he made a partial report to the House, in obedience to the very resolution of the 8th May, 1822, of which he availed himself to make his recent attack upon me. This he might with as much propriety have done on the former as on the latter occasion. According to his own view of the subject, the letter in question, being from a Receiver of Public Money, was not embraced by "a call only for the correspondence between certain banks and the Treasury," and, of course, if "no such letter was called for," his official duty did not require him to make any reference whatever to it. His communication on that subject was therefore, wholly gratuitous, and might just as well have been made without any resolution of the House as under one that had no relation to it. But, even supposing it to be otherwise, it is certainly a poor excuse for his not having transmitted the information called for on the 8th May, 1822, before the 22d March, 1824, that he could not get the correspondence copied sooner, when, from the swarm of applicants for employment, competent to this business, with which the city constantly abounds, it cannot be doubted that he might at any time, have had the whole of the correspondence copied in less than one month. From the very nature of it, many hands might have been employed on it at the same time; and with a call so imperative, and his own plighted word afterwards, that he would have the correspondence "prepared and transmitted to the House at the commencement of the late session of Congress," he should not have felt himself at liberty to have made a profitable job of this business in favor of any individual, so as to have delayed it till the 22d March last.

But I shall not conclude this replication, without exhibiting still greater difficulties to overcome, before he can successfully exempt himself from the suspicion of having contemplated some advantages, by postponing his attack to "the moment of my departure." At present, I will proceed to a brief examination of some of the new grounds, and arguments thereupon, by which he has elaborately endeavored to prove me guilty of perjury.

In meeting him upon this accusation, I must protest against the dexterous use he makes of the same facts to establish directly opposite conclusions in his favor. I am perfectly willing to yield him one side of the argument, and have no right to object to his taking choice, but more than this it would be unreasonable in him to ask, and imprudent in me to concede.

He attempts to infer, that "my publication, announcing my intention of withdrawing from the directorship of the Bank of Edwardsville," as mentioned in my "oath," could not have been communicated to him by the Receiver at Edwardsville, and even that it could not have existed; because it was not referred to in the letter of the Receiver at Kaskaskia, of the 18th of September, 1819, who, if it had existed, was bound by the Secretary's instructions to communicate it," as "a circumstance affecting the character of the Bank of Edwardsville." And yet he contends, "that, even if both the communications (my publication and the letter in question) alleged had actually been made, there was nothing in the act for the Secretary to conceal. Mr. Edwards has stated on oath his opinion that in the Fall of 1819 the Bank of Edwardsville was in as good a condition as any bank in which the public moneys were deposited; and, if so, what necessity was there for the Secretary to discontinue the deposits?"

Now, if the latter be true, there was surely "nothing in the fact" of my publication having been made which the Receiver at Kaskaskia was bound by the Secretary's instructions to communicate." On the other hand, if there was any thing "in the fact" which the Receiver was bound to communicate, according to those instructions, it must have been something indicative of danger in continuing the deposits. It must be evident, therefore, either that the silence of this Receiver as to my publication is no evidence against its existence, or that it contained something "to conceal," or at least to render the propriety of continuing the deposits somewhat questionable.

The truth however is, that I have nowhere contended that the Receiver's letter rendered it Mr. Crawford's duty to discontinue the deposits; and the avowal of such an opinion is most erroneously imputed to me, in direct opposition to the explanations I have given, and my declared objects in referring to that letter. Neither in my publication of 1819, avowing my intention of retiring from the bank; nor in my correspondence with him in February, 1822; nor in my oath before the Committee in February, 1823; nor in my late communication to the House of Representatives, of the 6th April last,—is any such idea suggested. In fact, owing to the responsibility which I thought I had imposed upon myself, by recommending the bank as a depository of public money, I did not think myself at liberty to retire from it until I had seen it through all the difficulties and embarrassments with which I found it struggling on my return from Congress, shortly after it had been authorized to receive the public money. These difficulties having been overcome, and the time arrived when I thought I could with propriety announce my intention of resigning, I made the publication which has been submitted to the Committee; in which, after explicitly stating that "I was convinced it [the bank] could have nothing to fear from a comparison of its situation [as to solvency] with that of any other bank in the United States," I add, "notwithstanding I do verily believe that neither the Government nor any individual is in danger of being intentionally imposed upon by the bank, so long as it continues under the control of its present directors. Yet, intending to be absent from the State; and considering the disastrous pressure of the present times; the hostility which the bank has to encounter; and particularly the opposition of gentlemen in this State, high in office, who have been extremely anxious to get other banks into operation, with the aid of "foreign capital," as it is termed,—I have determined to resign my seat in the directory, and to withdraw from all future responsibility, of any kind whatever, in relation to this or any other bank, without making any further unsupported effort to retain any portion of the public deposits in this State; leaving it to the directors to maintain their credit by their own good conduct, and to the Secretary of the Treasury to judge for himself, upon the returns he requires, how far it may be prudent to trust them."

Although I believed at the time that one of the papers in which my publication appeared was regularly sent to Mr. Crawford, yet I enclosed to him a paper containing it; and that he might have as perfect control over the subject as possible, I prevailed upon Colonel Benjamin Stephen-on, the Receiver, and the President of the Bank, who apprehended that ill consequences would result from my withdrawing from it, to write to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, and to enclose to him one of my publications also; and I advised him (the Receiver) in the mean time to withhold the deposits until he should receive further orders from the Secretary.

In my correspondence with Mr. Crawford, in February, 1822, which is exhibited by himself, referring to my publication, and the situation of the bank at that time, I say, in one of my letters, "This publication was contained in the St. Louis Enquirer, which I supposed you took at the time; it was also contained in a paper which I forwarded to you myself; and it was enclosed, referred to, and commented upon, in a letter of the President of the Bank to you." In the other letter say, "that I was the cause of the deposits being made there, in the first instance, I freely admit; but that I unequivocally declared that I would not be held responsible for that or any other bank, in any way whatever, after the Fall of 1819; that you were notified thereof in due time; that the deposits have not been continued there, in consequence of my recommendation, since that period; and that the bank was in a good condition, I may think, according to my present impressions, fairly insist on."

In my oath before the select committee, on the 3th February, 1823, which Mr. Crawford has bought proper to impeach, after having testified Colonel Stephenson's having written the letter in question, and enclosed my publication, &c., I add, "The bank continued to pay specie, notwithstanding the pressure, and in the Fall of that year, I expect, was in as good a situation as any bank in which the public money was then deposited."

In my late communication to the House of Representatives of the 6th April last, I not only reassert the same facts, substantially, in regard to the situation of the bank, but, by its monthly return for November, 1819, have, unquestionably, proved them true to the fullest extent. And I expressly state, in that communication, that, even at the time of its failure, its resources were, I am well satisfied, more than amply sufficient to have secured its debt to the Government."

It is, therefore, inconceivable to me, upon what ground it has been assumed that, in referring to the Receiver's letter, my object was "to charge the Secretary with continuing the deposits after he ought to have been alarmed for their safety," especially, while it is admitted that I spoke "in the most decided terms of the solvency and safety of the bank," at the time the letter was written.

It is true, I cannot consider it very prudent management in Mr. Crawford to have continued it a repository of public money, after he had, as he says himself, "reason to apprehend a want of punctuality, or good faith on its part," especially without enforcing a compliance with its stipulation to make those returns, which he considered necessary to insure the fidelity of all the banks that were made depositories of the public money. The former is acknowledged in his communication to the committee, (page 18;) the latter appears by his letter to the President of the Bank of Edwardsville, of the 10th November, 1821; in which he states that "no statement of the account between the Bank of Edwardsville and the Treasurer of the United States, has been rendered to this Department, since that of the 31st January last." [See Document 140, part 2, page 439.]

But, whatever may be my opinion of his subsequent careless management in regard to this as well as other Western banks, I certainly never intended to refer to the letter in question for the purpose of showing that there existed, at that time, any such state of things as rendered it necessary to withdraw the deposits from that bank. But, as my having been a director thereof, at the time it was authorized to receive the public money, might have had its influence with Mr. Crawford in selecting it for that purpose, I deemed it important to give him timely notice of my intention to resign, and to afford him a fair opportunity of adopting such a course as he might think expedient under the circumstances of the case. The Receiver, who was also President of the bank, and who was more afraid of jeopardizing the former, than anxious to retain the latter office, (for which he was not then allowed a cent of compensation,) fearing that the credit of the bank might be impaired, and that other ill consequences might result from my withdrawing from it, and being, also, bound by the Secretary's instructions "to communicate any circumstance affecting the character of the bank," was very easily prevailed on to write the letter in question, to enclose my publication, and to withhold the deposits, for the purpose of lessening the additional weight of responsibility which he thought—and truly thought—the circumstances mentioned in his letter had devolved upon him.

My objects in referring to my publication and to this letter were twofold.

1. To show the course of conduct I had pursued in relation to my withdrawal from the bank.

2. To show that Mr. Crawford was well informed, and duly notified thereof. Both were rendered necessary by the ungenerous and disingenuous attempts to subject me to unjust censure, which are adverted to in my correspondence with him, in February, 1822.

It is remarkable that, with a pertinacity the most extraordinary, he still perseveres in his efforts to implicate me in the transactions of that bank, well knowing that my connexion with it has long since ceased. And hence is his labored effort, in his late communication to the committee, to prove that I continued to be a director thereof, after the Fall of 1819. In doing this, he must have attempted to impose upon others what he himself could not have believed. With all the information which he must have had at the time of writing his late communication, what could be less justifiable than the implications to which he has thus so recently endeavored to subject me? Whatever else he may think of me, you cannot believe that he thinks me so great a fool as to have so repeatedly and publicly asserted, and finally sworn to, the fact of my having withdrawn from the directorship of that bank, if it had not been true; since, in that case, it would have been so easy to have convicted me of falsehood and perjury. What, then, can be thought of his candor in insisting, even at this late period, that I continued to be a director of that bank, after the Fall of 1819.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

Let us, however, see how he endeavors to establish this fact.

Referring to that part of my oath before the Committee, in February, 1823, in which I had sworn that though I had once been elected a Director, since the Fall of 1819, I had refused to accept the appointment, and had had nothing to do with the management of the bank, since that time. "Yet," says he, "in the following Winter, Mr. Edwards is found presenting himself to the Secretary, not only in the character of a Director of the Bank, but of a Director specially delegated and authorized by the Bank to conclude an important arrangement with the Secretary, in respect to the terms on which the bank was to continue a depository of public money. By the printed papers accompanying the Secretary's report to the House, of the 27th April, 1822, it appears that, on the 16th February, 1820, Mr. Edwards, then in Washington, transmitted to the Secretary a letter from the bank to the Secretary, signed by this very Receiver, as President of the bank, containing a list of directors for the year 1820, in which Mr. Edwards's name is included; that, at the same time, he also transmitted to the Secretary a letter from the bank, signed by the same Mr. Stephenson, informing the Secretary that Mr. Edwards, "one of the directors of the institution," is authorized to suggest certain modifications of the contract between the Secretary and the bank, and to conclude such arrangements as he may deem acceptable, which will be considered obligatory;" and he likewise transmitted, at the same time, a letter from the bank, addressed to himself, signed also by Mr. Stephenson, stating to him, at large, the changes desired by the bank, and the reasons therefor."

Contrasting all this parade of circumstances, with all that I did, in regard to the authority thus conferred upon me, "to suggest certain modifications of the contract;" and to my "special delegation to conclude the important arrangement," it would seem that Mr. Crawford could not have desired a stronger confirmation of the truth of the very statement which he now affects to question. What did I do? Nothing more than write to him a short note, in the following words, viz: "I have the honor, herewith, to transmit to you certain communications, which I have recently received from the Bank of Edwardsville, the object of which is fully explained by the communications themselves." Is it presumable that any member of the Senate, (not excepting my colleague, who was opposed to the bank,) would not, under similar circumstances, have done this much? Could I, with any kind of decent respect for a portion of the people I represented, have done less?

Without otherwise saying any thing to him on the subject, I simply left the papers to speak for themselves. At this time he and myself were on terms of intimacy, and, as I thought, cordiality and friendship. Had I not been determined not to interfere further in the business, I should certainly have spoken to him about it. Had he not perfectly understood, from my publication, &c., the reasons of my silence, he would, doubtless, have mentioned the subject to me. But no conversation having taken place between us, in regard to this matter, confirms my statement, and affords a very strong presumption that he had received all the information before referred to.

His attempt to produce an impression unfavorable to me, from the circumstance of my name's appearing on the list of Directors, is the more extraordinary, since he himself has prefaced his remarks on that subject, with an extract from my oath, from which it appears, "that, though I had been once elected to that station since 1819, I had refused to accept it." He well knows that to constitute a Director, requires the concurring wills of the electors, and the person elected; and, knowing I had "refused to accept the appointment," nothing can be more disingenuous than to pretend to recognise me in that character. If he had entertained the least suspicion that I had not sworn truly on the subject, his whole conduct towards me can leave no doubt that he would have spared no pains to have been prepared to prove the fact. It being, therefore, obvious that he must have believed my statement, in this particular at least, what can be thought of his effort to mislead others in regard to it? More frankness and candor surely were due to the exalted station he occupies.

My name's appearing in the list of Directors, was produced by the following circumstances. The election took place on the 1st January, 1820, while I was attending to my public duties in this place, as a Senator of the United States, and, though I had positively declared that I would not serve, I was elected by the influence of General Payne, of Kentucky, who held nearly half the stock of the bank, and hoped that he could prevail upon me to change my determination, which he in vain attempted to accomplish; all of which, I have no doubt, Mr. Crawford well understood. It was probably owing to this gentleman's influence, and that of his powerful connexions in Kentucky, that this bank continued so long a depository of public money.

From Mr. Crawford's present attempt, under all these circumstances, still to implicate me in the transactions of that bank, it may well be supposed that his first efforts for that purpose, in 1822, which have been systematically and pertinaciously persevered in, to the immediate cause of the present controversy, have not left me without just cause of complaint.

My conduct, in regard to that bank, has been fairly stated. It was the result of a justifiable desire to protect my own character against casualties that might have injured it; and not with a view to injure or give dissatisfaction to any human being. Nor did I imagine that it could have pro-used any motive, or furnished any ground, for accusation against me. Finding, however, contrary to every reasonable expectation, that "partial information from the Treasury Department," concerning my agency in bringing that bank into connexion with the Treasury, was extensively sed, with no little success, for the purpose of producing injurious implications against me; and thinking that I had just reason to apprehend they were about to be presented in a more imposing form, I felt myself called upon to address to Mr. Crawford my letter of the 9th February, 1822, in which, from a desire that my conduct should be fairly understood, and with no intention or expectation of giving offence, I referred to and asserted the facts, substantially, in relation to my publication of 1819, and the Receiver's letter, which are contained in my oath before the select committee, 1 February, 1823.

Nothing could have been more preposterous than my assertion of these facts, and the request with which it was accompanied, if I had not supposed that all these documents were in Mr. Crawford's possession. Nor can any thing be more reasonable than to suppose that, if they had not been received by him, he would then have said so.

He, however, alleges, that "his not having replied to this, or any other matters contained in those letters, resulted from his having declined my correspondence with Mr. Edwards on the subjects to which they referred, in consequence of a menace which the first of them contained." But let us inquire what that menace was?

Having stated, in my letter above referred to, circumstances which induced me to suppose, as well they might, that he intended to make some use of my name, in a report he was about to make to the House of Representatives, on the subject of the Bank of Edwardsville, I say, "I beg leave, most respectfully, to suggest that it would be but an act of justice to me, to present my publication of 1819, in which I declared I would be no longer responsible for that or any other bank, in any way whatever;" declaring in the same letter, that the object of it was to manifest my disposition or willingness to avoid the necessity, on my part, of calling for any information upon the subject, or referring to other matters.

It is this declaration, candidly made with a view to avoid any measure that might be construed into evidence of hostility, that he is pleased to consider "the menace which my first letter contained." As, however, my real object was what I had declared it to be, I had no hesitation in saying, in my second letter, that "I owe it to myself, unhesitatingly and promptly, to disavow any intention of offering personal disrespect to you, or the station you occupy." The menace, then, if any had been made, was withdrawn. Still, however, he did not think proper to deny that the communications alluded to were in his possession, which no doubt he would gladly have done, if such had been the fact.

But he did not, in fact, "decline any correspondence with me on the subjects to which my letters referred;" for, in his answer to my first one, among other observations which he made in relation to those "subjects," he says: "I assure you, sir, it will afford me great pleasure to communicate to Congress all the information in the possession of the Department, concerning that bank, your agency in bringing it into connexion with the Treasury, and the representations which were made against," &c.; thereby manifesting a disposition rather to show that he had no desire to conceal and withhold the documents alluded to, than to deny their existence.

Under these, and other circumstances mentioned in my communication to the House of Representatives, it would be extraordinary, on the supposition that my publication and the Receiver's letter had not been received, even if he had declined replying to my letter of February, 1822, that their existence should have remained for a period of more than two years unquestioned; and that even a doubt upon the subject should have been for the first time suggested "at the moment of my departure for a foreign country."

But Mr. Crawford has, in his communication, attempted to avail himself of an additional ground to convict me of false swearing, in what he is pleased to call my "alleged expectation" that the letters referred to in my testimony as having passed between himself and Colonel Stephenson, would have been communicated to the House, under one or other of the resolutions of February, 1822.

"As the resolutions," says he, "under which it is alleged these letters should have been communicated, call only for the correspondence between certain banks and the Secretary, it is unnecessary to explain why, among the letters which were communicated, any correspondence between a Receiver and the Secretary was not to be found. Nor is it easy to imagine how any one, informed of the tenor of those resolutions, should have entertained the expectation of seeing the letters in question among the papers which were transmitted."

In order to a correct understanding of this part of the subject, it may be useful to advert to my testimony before the committee. In this, after stating that I had prevailed upon "Colonel Benjamin Stephenson, the Receiver, and the President of the Bank at Edwardsville, to write to the Secretary," &c., I say: "I was much surprised at not seeing this correspondence in the report, as well as one or more letters, which, I confidently believe, were written to the Secretary of the Treasury, 1819, for the purpose of apprising him of the situation of the bank, at that time, and inducing him to forbear to draw upon it, until it could relieve itself from the pressure it was then encountering." Now, as from my whole statement, in regard to this matter, it is evident that the subject-matter of the letter referred to in my testimony, related much more to the affairs of the bank than to the ordinary duties of the Receiver, it surely is not more extraordinary that I should have expected to have seen this letter, or so much of it at least as related to the affairs of the bank, "among the papers which were transmitted," than that Mr. Crawford himself should have transmitted a variety of letters from this same Receiver, under the resolutions referred to. But he has, in other instances, acted upon the very consideration which induced the "expectation," on my part, to which he now expects; or why did he transmit his letter to the Receiver at St. Louis, of 19th January, 1822, (see document No. 119,) and state, in the report which it accompanied, that he had transmitted "all the additional returns and correspondence required by the resolution, except two letters from the Receiver at St. Louis, which were of a confidential nature?" Nothing could have rendered it necessary to have communicated the first, or to have apologized for not transmitting the other, but the circumstance of their relating, as the letter of Colonel Stephenson did, to the affairs of the bank.

Having thus disposed of the amplifications which he has given to his original charge, as contained in the report in question, I now return to the letter, which is as follows:

"The Hon. Mr. Edwards, late a Senator from Illinois, having stated, on his examination before a committee of the House, on the 13th February, 1823, that the late Receiver of Public Moneys at Edwardsville had, on his advice and in his presence, written a letter to the Secretary, enclosing a copy of a publication which Mr. Edwards represents himself to have made, some time in the year 1819, announcing his intention of retiring from the directorship of the Bank of Edwardsville, and that he had advised the Receiver to withhold his deposits from the bank until he could receive further orders from the Secretary; and that the Receiver afterwards informed him that he had received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits; the Secretary deems it proper to state, that no such letter from the Receiver is to be found on the files of the Department; that the officers employed in it have no recollection of the receipt of such a letter; and that, on an examination of the records of the Department, it appears that no answer to any such letter, directing the Receiver to continue the deposits, was ever written to him by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Whatever different interpretations, ingenious and forced constructions might have given to this report, Mr. Crawford's elaborate commentary upon it must now carry conviction to every mind, that its real object was, at least, to create a suspicion of the truth of my statement, both in regard to the Receiver's having written the letter mentioned in my testimony, and of his having "afterwards informed me that he had received a letter from the Secretary directing him to continue the deposits." The report itself, as well as the commentary, alleges circumstances which are intended to invalidate the former, and he has impeached the latter by denying that he ever gave such instructions to the Receiver.

The facts, then, fairly at issue between us, are:

1st. Whether the Receiver did write the letter alluded to?

2d. Whether he "afterwards informed me, that he had received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits?"

As to the first:—It appears, that on the 6th of August, 1819, Mr. Crawford addressed a letter to the Receiver, most emphatically requiring him to state, why he had not then "deposited the public moneys in his hands in the bank, in conformity with the instructions from the Department," and alleging that there could be no longer any excuse whatever for retaining the public money. (See No. 1.)

It is difficult to believe, either that the Receiver would have neglected to answer this peremptory letter, or that Mr. Crawford would have tolerated such a disrespectful omission. The latter, however, has stated additional circumstances which render it wholly improbable that any such neglect should have occurred. He represents the Receiver as having been guilty of great remissness in regard to making his deposits for months before, and says that he, (the Receiver,) "must have discovered that the Secretary was dissatisfied with him for retaining the public money in his hands. He must have been aware that every subsequent return which he transmitted to the Treasury, as it exhibited an increasing balance, and as it showed that he made no deposits in bank, would aggravate the Secretary's dissatisfaction." Mr. Crawford, however, relies upon these circumstances to prove, that if the Receiver had answered this letter, he would, in his subsequent correspondence, consisting of two short notes, have made "some allusion to the communication which explained the reason of his apparent disobedience, and to the instructions which he expected in answer, for the government of his conduct in that important particular;" but would it not, let me ask, have been much more extraordinary and unaccountable, that he should not have answered the letter at all, than that he should have failed, in one or two short subsequent communications, to have alluded to this answer?

The letter, in fact, was fully answered on the 12th October, 1819. No other answer was ever given by the Receiver. And this is the very letter in question, which, after accounting for its delay, assigns as a reason for not having theretofore made the deposits, a difficulty that might thereby have been created, of complying with previous instructions: presents an account of the then situation of the bank; intimates apprehensions as to its future prospects; declares an unwillingness to make further deposits, without such instructions as the Secretary might think fit to give, "on a full disclosure of the whole circumstances of the case;" and, among other things, expressly states, that "the publication of Governor Edwards, herewith transmitted, shows the course he is disposed to pursue." All of which, I am happy to say, can be established by the original draught of the letter itself, on file in the office of Samuel D. Lockwood, Esq., Receiver of the Public Moneys, at Edwardsville, with an endorsement thereon in the hand-writing of the late Receiver, (who has been dead about eighteen months,) purporting that the letter was sent to Mr. Crawford in October,

Case of Nisian Edwards.

519, (of which an attested copy is hereto annexed, see No. 2.)

On the 22d October, 1819, ten days after the date of the letter last referred to, the Receiver again writes to Mr. Crawford, and states, that twelve thousand five hundred dollars of the capital stock of the Bank of Edwardsville, having been paid into the bank since the date of my last letter, I feel it my duty to inform you of the circumstances, in consequence of some of the suggestions made in that letter. (See No. 3.) The first fact in issue between Mr. Crawford and myself, is therefore established.

As to the 2d, viz: "That the Receiver informed me he had received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits," must be admitted that my statement does not render me at all responsible for the truth of this information; and, that it might have been given to me, even if it had not been true. But as this circumstance would have weakened, so the fact of Mr. Crawford's having actually written a letter to the Receiver in November, 1819, expressly saying "I request that you will, immediately after the receipt of this letter, deposit in the Bank of Edwardsville the whole of the money in your possession on the 30th instant," must sufficiently corroborate my testimony.

This letter, it is true, does not profess to be an answer to the letter of the Receiver of the 12th of October, 1819, nor have I imposed upon myself an obligation to prove it to be so. But there are certainly strong circumstances to show,

1st. That it was written in consequence of the Receiver's letter;

2d. That it could not have been written on the grounds upon which it professes to have been written.

As to the first. It is worthy of remark that, in noticing "the difficulty" suggested by the Receiver as an excuse for not having made the deposits, Mr. Crawford is so particular in pointing out the means of obviating that difficulty, that it is almost impossible to resist the belief that he had been received the letter in question.

This belief, however, acquires great additional, if not irresistible strength, from another document which Mr. Crawford enclosed in his letter to the Receiver, of the 1st November, 1819. It will be perceived that, among the strongest reasons urged by the Receiver for declining to make his deposits, in the Bank of Edwardsville, without further instructions from the Secretary, were his apprehensions of danger to it from "the hostility of the Bank of Missouri, and citizens of St. Louis," and his apprehensions that the drafts of the Secretary might fall into their hands, or those of "persons who, under their influence would be disposed to insist upon specie, when notes would answer them equally well, merely for the purpose of harassing and distressing the bank." It is presumed that it was to allay these apprehensions that Mr. Crawford (who had checked the Bank of Missouri for its conduct towards other banks) transmitted in his letter to the Receiver, who was also the President of the Bank of Edwardsville, the document alluded to, which is headed "A list of bank notes which would be received by the Bank of Missouri, according to the letter of the President of that bank, dated 9th August, 1819." (See No. 5.) For what other possible purpose could this "list" have been intended? And what else could have induced him to send it to the Receiver at Edwardsville?

Further corroboration of his having received the letter in question, is furnished by the circumstances of his having, on the same day that he wrote to the Receiver at Edwardsville, written on the same subject to both the Receiver at Kaskaskia, and the Cashier of the Bank of Edwardsville, giving to the former particular instructions about making his deposits; and enclosing to the latter a copy of a letter that he represents himself to have written to both these Receivers, from which it appears that he ordered them to deposit all the public moneys which they should receive after the last day of the month in which he wrote—not in the Bank of Edwardsville, but in the Bank of Missouri, until otherwise directed. (See No. 6.)

Considering the circumstances disclosed by Mr. Crawford, in regard to the withholding of the deposits by those two Receivers, it is not to be presumed that either of them would have been guilty of any unnecessary delay in making the deposits after the receipt of his letters to them of the 1st November, 1819; and, if these letters, which purport to have been written at that time, were promptly transmitted by mail, according to their respective destinations, it is inexplicable that the Receiver at Edwardsville, who resided within about two hundred yards of the bank, of which he was also the President, should not have deposited "the whole of the money in his possession on the 30th November," before the 31st December; and, that the Receiver at Kaskaskia should not have made his deposits till 3d January following. Mr. Crawford admits that the former did not receive his letter till some time in the month of December, but at what time in that month is not stated, nor how the fact was ascertained, or is ascertainable, (see his communication, page 6.) Such delays as must have intervened between the date and receipt of those letters, at a season of the year when the mail is liable to so little obstruction, affords matter of speculation, in which, for the present, I forbear to indulge.

But I would ask what, but the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville of the 12th October, could have startled Mr. Crawford into all this hurry of writing, and sudden change of the place of deposit; and, at the same time, account for the subsequent hesitation that seems to be fairly inferrible from those otherwise unaccountable delays? As that letter was well calculated to produce such results, and nothing else appears to account for them, it cannot be unreasonable to refer them to that cause.

He attempts to avoid the inference of his having received this letter, and my publication, by stating "that if they had been known to him, they would naturally have been alluded to on such an occasion" as that of writing to those Receivers; in other words, that the receipt of them would have been acknowledged by him. But he admits the receipt of the letters of Mrs. Stephenson, and the Receiver at Kaskaskia of the 18th September, 1819, and attaches much importance to them in his communication; yet, though it would have been just as "natural" that he should have alluded to them, as to the letter of the Receiver of the 12th October, he is as silent as to either of them, as he is to the latter, or as he was to that part of the letter of the President of the Bank of Missouri, of the 9th August, 1819, which gives such an alarming account of the Bank of Edwardsville. His not having noticed the letter in question, in any of his subsequent communications, therefore, furnishes no evidence to rebut the strong presumption, that I have relied upon, to prove that he must have received it.

Let us then briefly inquire, whether his letter of the 1st November could have been written on the grounds upon which it professes to have been written.

He professes to have been induced to write it, from an inspection and examination of the monthly accounts of those Receivers, and commences it in the following words, viz: "Upon referring to your monthly accounts, it appears that you have retained all the money which has been received by you since the month of August last." Now, a moment's reflection is all that can be necessary to convince you that there could not have been, at Washington, on the 1st November, more than one monthly account of moneys received after the month of August preceding. And, if he had referred to their monthly accounts, he would have perceived that the Receiver at Kaskaskia had retained in his hands, all the money received by him after the 18th May, and the Receiver at Edwardsville had made no deposits since the 1st day of the preceding July—circumstances, which it is extremely improbable he would have overlooked, or neglected to advert to in his letter, unless, indeed, there was some peculiarity in these cases that defies all skill in guessing, which rendered it more excusable in these officers to have retained one part of the public money than another.

But, if something more than meets the eye was not intended, why was his letter to the Bank of Edwardsville, of 1st November, 1819, together with its enclosure on the subject of those very deposits, suppressed? Their omission concealed a fact which affords a very strong presumption that he had received the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville of the 12th October; and it is rendered less probable that they were withheld through inadvertence or forgetfulness, from the circumstance of my having called his attention to the subject by my correspondence with him in February, 1822, just about the time he made the report that ought to have contained them.

This letter, though at last brought out upon the third call upon Mr. Crawford for his correspondence with the banks, and accompanying the report that was intended to affect me so injuriously, is still given in such a manner, as not only to conceal the true state of the case, but to produce an impression directly contrary to the fact, by omitting to communicate its enclosure, which is so referred to as necessarily to make it a part of the letter; and this impression would probably never have been questioned, but for the present contest, in which the report has involved me.

The letter commences by saying, "The letter, of which the enclosed is a copy, was addressed to the Receivers of public money at Kaskaskia and Edwardsville * * * * *". To prevent the inconvenience and risk which may result from the accumulation of such large sums in the hands of those officers, I have this day directed them to deposit in the bank the sums which may be in their possession on the 30th instant, and to deposit monthly, the money which may be received during each month."

Now, in what bank would any one suppose these monthly deposits were to be made? Certainly in the Bank of Edwardsville, to which the letter was addressed. But, palpable as this conclusion may appear, the fact is directly otherwise, and the enclosure will prove it. By the latter Mr. Crawford says, "I request that you will immediately deposit in the Bank of Edwardsville whatever sums may be in your hands on the 30th instant, (November, 1819.) * * * * *". You will, after the deposits herein directed, make your deposits in the Bank of Missouri, until otherwise directed." Who, let me ask, could have inferred, from the letter above, that these directions had been given to those Receivers, or to either of them? And can it be denied that this enclosure ought to have been communicated, for the sake of truth if nothing more?

But let us see how this case stands in other respects. If he did not send such a letter, and give such instructions to those Receivers, he made a direct and positive misrepresentation to the bank, for which no adequate motive can be perceived. But if, as he himself asserts, he did give such instructions, it shows most clearly that he did intend to suspend the making of deposits in that bank, and accounts much more satisfactorily than he has done in his communication to you for his letter of the 20th April, 1820, which directs the deposits to be continued with a degree of particularity that would scarcely have been thought necessary, if there had been no reason to suppose it had been his intention to discontinue them.

But he has appealed to the want of any assignable motive for the concealment of any of the foregoing facts, as proof that none was intended. I take no issue with him upon his motives or intentions. I may, however, be permitted to say, that the pertinacity with which, in opposition to all the proofs I have exhibited, he still endeavors to hold me responsible for the Bank of Edwardsville, after the Fall of 1819, renders it probable that he might not have been willing to let me escape from responsibility at that time. Overwhelmed, as he was, with representations against the bank, my withdrawal from it may have confirmed his fears, and rendered him reluctant to disclose any circumstance that was callated to devolve upon him an increased responsibility for events then apprehended, and since realized.

Having received a communication through the committee, that contains a reference to a conversation that I am represented to have had with Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, on the day of my departure from the city, in March last, I feel myself authorized to give the following explanations:

In travelling through Kentucky last Summer, received, at Russellville, in that State, a confidential communication from Virginia, warning me that I was to be attacked at the then succeeding session of Congress, and that Governor Coles, of Illinois, was expected to co-operate in it, and advising me strongly to come on to Washington a week or two before the meeting of Congress, or the purpose of preparing for a defence. These intimations coming from a source that I knew to be entitled to the highest respect, I did not think prudent to disregard them; and, not expecting to return to Illinois for some time thereafter, I wrote to the honorable Daniel P. Cook on the subject, in consequence of which, a correspondence took place between him and Governor Coles, in which, I believe, the latter disavowed the correctness of the information as it related to him. I refer to this correspondence with the less reluctance, because Governor Coles, whose character is well known here, can establish it.

Being thus warned, I endeavored to prepare for the threatened attack, and came on to Congress with a determination to do nothing unnecessarily to provoke it, but to meet it, whatever it might be, with firmness, whenever it should be made. I however, never once suspected any thing like the insinuation contained in Mr. Crawford's report, and though I may have written as much, or even more than has been supposed, preparatory for an anticipated attack, yet it is most certain that not one word of it related to the subject of the report. This I had neither anticipated, heard of, or seen, till about one hour before my intended departure, on the day after it was communicated to the House. It then took me by such perfect surprise, that I neither knew, nor could decide, what was best to be done with it, and I left the city without ever having mentioned the subject, as well as I can recollect, to any person or persons, except three members of the House of Representatives, of whom Mr. Campbell of Ohio, was one.

I met with him on the morning I left the city, and my impression is, that he introduced the subject, and seemed to have no doubt that the report was intended as an attack upon me. In the course of the conversation with him, I alluded to the confidential information above referred to, probably spoke of what I had prepared and intended to have done, in any event that might have rendered it necessary to have defended myself, at an earlier period, and regretted that I could not have been permitted to get off in peace. It is idle to insinuate that my answer to the report could have been written before my departure from this place. The latter could not be answered till it existed, and, after it was known to me, I did not remain here long enough for any such purpose. Besides, a letter which I wrote to Mr. Campbell, on my journey, (towards whom I had no motive for concealment, will show that my communication was then not only not written, but that I did not expect to employ more than three hours in replying to the report. One thing is certain, that no man could have been less disposed than myself to be the aggressor, in any controversy whatever, at that time; and, if I had not considered the report as intended and calculated to fix an indelible blot upon my reputation, which I knew I did not deserve, nothing would have been heard from me, in regard to Mr. Crawford.

The anxiety which the Committee manifest, and must so naturally feel, to get through with this investigation, and my continued indisposition rendering it impossible to proceed with my replication to Mr. Crawford's communication, as I had intended, so as to finish it within the time which I could reasonably hope to prevail upon the Committee to wait, I feel myself compelled to postpone, to a future occasion, which will not be neglected, a full answer to all his remarks, and, at present, to content myself with a few observations upon those of them which are most prominent, and seem to demand the most immediate attention.

Commencing his justification for receiving so much uncurrent paper, some of which was greatly below par, from certain local banks, with a history of the commencement of the direct connexion of the Bank of Missouri with the Treasury Department, on the 1st August, 1818, he says: "Before this time the bank had acted as the agent of the Bank of the United States. It had fulfilled its engagements with that institution with good faith, &c. * * * * The large amount of money to be received from the sale of public lands in that quarter, rendered a connexion with such a bank not only convenient, but necessary. * * * * The Receivers were instructed to receive the notes of such banks as paid specie on demand for their notes, and no other, and to deposit them in the bank, to the credit of the Treasurer." But (says he) in this arrangement with the bank, "there was no stipulation as to what kinds of money it should receive or pay for the Treasury." These, therefore, must have been general deposits, and having been made at the solicitation of the bank, without any special agreement, it thereby imposed upon itself the highest obligation in regard to them, that the acceptance of an unconditional general deposit could create upon any bank whatever.

But besides this general principle, there was a contract that excludes every construction which could have imposed upon him any obligation, moral or legal, to have taken from the bank any paper that was not of as much value as the deposit, at the time it was made.

This bank was continued a depository of the public money on the same terms on which it had been employed as the agent of the Bank of the United States, except that, instead of the deposits being subject to the drafts of the Cashier of the Case of Nimian Edwards.

Bank of the United States, they were, on this second arrangement, to be drawn out, "from time to time, by Treasury drafts."

In both cases they were to be drawn for as occasion might require, subject to the following conditions, viz :

1. If in favor of individuals, to be paid at sight.

2. If in favor of the Bank of the United States, payable in sixty days.

It appears, from Mr. Crawford's own reports, "that, in 1817, an arrangement was made between himself and the Bank of the United States, by which the public funds were to be deposited in the branches of that institution, in all places where such branches existed; and, where there was no such branches, the bank was to designate certain State banks, for which it would be responsible, and in which such public moneys should be deposited." &c.

In conformity with this arrangement, the Bank of the United States, having selected and employed the Bank of Missouri as a depository of the public money, became responsible to the Treasury Department to pay cash for all moneys therein deposited. This it could have had no motive for doing, without a correspondent obligation on the part of the Bank of Missouri. Who could be better judges of what would create such an obligation, than the enlightened President and Directors of the Bank of the United States? Their disinterested opinion on the subject is practically demonstrated by the adoption of measures which they must have considered fully adequate to secure their own interest, and impose upon the Bank of Missouri the correspondent obligation above referred to. Their, therefore, not requiring "a stipulation as to what kind of money the Bank of Missouri should pay," is the best proof that they did not consider any stipulation in addition to those expressed or implied by the contract, as necessary to impose upon that bank the obligation to pay cash.

If, then, notwithstanding the want of such a stipulation, the Bank of Missouri was answerable to the Bank of the United States for the public deposits as cash, by what kind of argument can it be demonstrated that the absence of such a stipulation exempted it from a similar obligation in its subsequent engagements with the Treasury Department?

By the contract, there were but two ways by which the Secretary could claim the right to demand, or the bank the right to make, payment. The one by drafts in favor of individuals, payable at sight. The other by drafts in favor of the Bank of the United States, payable in sixty days. There was, therefore, no obligation on Mr. Crawford to receive one cent himself, nor to enter into an arrangement with other banks to receive any part of the deposits from the Bank of Missouri. How, then, was he "bound" to accept the uncurrent money which he received from that bank? By the contract he could have lawfully required it to pay the whole amount of deposits, either on drafts in favor of individuals, or of the Bank of the United States, subject to the conditions that apply to each. Had he drawn for the whole amount of the deposits, according to the contract, his drafts could not have been discharged, without the consent of the holders thereof, in any thing but legal money, and a protest of the drafts would unquestionably have furnished good cause of action against the bank.

But it is manifest, from other considerations, that it could not have been the intention of the parties that the deposits were not to be considered as a cash demand upon the bank. Both parties knew, at the time of the contract, that the Bank of the United States would not receive, in payment, any thing but cash, or its equivalent; a contract, therefore, on the part of the Bank of Missouri, to pay, if required, the whole amount of the deposits to the Bank of the United States, must have been understood as an obligation to pay it in legal money, or such other funds as that bank would consent to receive.

If the construction now contended for by Mr. Crawford be correct; it equally applies to all the other banks which he employed, whose connexion with the Bank of the United States ceased on the 30th June, 1819, and a more injudicious arrangement, nor one better calculated to perpetuate "the evils of special deposits," could not well have been made. They were not bound to receive any notes which at the time of deposit were not equal to cash; and if they might thereafter discharge the obligations created by those deposits in depreciated paper, there could not be worse management than permitting the deposits to accumulate, as he says they did in the Bank of Missouri, in rather less than one year, to the amount of upwards of $640,000, composed principally of notes most liable, from the very nature of the times, to depreciate.

Under such circumstances, however solvent the Bank of Missouri might be, such an amount of notes could not be kept on hand so long, without danger of great loss to the Treasury, and therefore it must have been bad management not to have found some means of exchanging them for cash, or applying them to the public service.

It is, however, but a waste of time to dwell upon a point which the testimony of some of the best informed and most distinguished gentlemen of which this country can boast, taken in this case, proves to be so incompatible with the general usage and practice of banks in such cases.

I will, therefore, notice this part of Mr. Crawford's communication no farther than to make a single remark upon the evidence, by which he endeavors to prove that he was "bound" to have taken even more uncurrent notes than he did receive from the Bank of Missouri. "This evidence (says he) is statement E, prepared at the Bank of Missouri, and laid before the Missouri Legislature, by a committee which was appointed to examine the report of the bank, and which committee represents itself to have had before it, and carefully examined, the books, notes, and such other papers of the bank, as were necessary. The statement is 'of moneys on hand, September 6, 1819, received from the several Receivers of Public Moneys, being such as they were authorized to receive by the Hon. William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury.' It purports, he adds, to have been taken from a register kept by the Cashier of the bank from the 8th of August, 1818, to the 15th of September, 1819, which period includes only twenty-seven days not embraced by the first arrangement under which the bank was accountable only in kind. By this statement it appears that the bank had then on hand notes taken from Receivers, of a description not receivable by it on general deposit as cash, amounting to $569,064, of which $283,757 were of the kinds transferred by it to the Treasury."

In stopping so short, however, with his quotation from this document, he has omitted a most material part of it, which overthrows his whole conclusions; for, in reference to those very notes, he document states that though they had been received as above stated, "the bank did, at its own expense and risk, convert the same into specie." If, then, this document is good for anything, it leaves him wholly destitute of any apology whatever for receiving uncurrent notes from that bank.

But waiving all question of his obligation to receive uncurrent notes from this bank, I return to, and insist upon, a specific statement contained in my communication to the House, which I think he has but poorly evaded.

It is this: "That being called on by a resolution of the House of Representatives to state the amount of uncurrent notes which he received from these banks, he has misstated it, making it less than it really was."

To decide this matter, it is necessary to see both what he has said and what he has done in regard to it.

In his report of the 14th February, 1822, page 3, in replying to the call that had been made upon him for the amount of uncurrent paper which he had received from certain banks, he says as follows, viz :

"From the Bank of Tombigbee there have been received $15,311, in the notes of the State Bank of North Carolina.

"From the Bank of Missouri there have been received the following sums, viz :

In notes of the State Bank of North Carolina -	$42,000 of the Bank of Nashville -	29,844
of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati -	11,845 of the Miami Exporting Company -	8,661 of the Bank of Cincinnati -	3,846
of the Bank of Muskingum -	291
of the Farmers, Mechanics, & Manufacturers' Bank of Chillicothe -	350

"And, from the Bank of Edwardsville, there have been received $18,562, in notes of the Bank of Kentucky and its branches.

"In the two first cases, the notes were received in the month of March, 1820, and in the third, in October, 1821. All these notes, above described, were uncurrent at the time they were received from the banks. * * * * In no other case have uncurrent bank notes been received from any bank in which the public money has been deposited."

These are the assertions of Mr. Crawford, about which there can be no dispute. If, then, I can show another case, or other cases, in which uncurrent bank notes have been as clearly received from the Bank of Missouri, as in the cases he has mentioned, I make good my statement. This being all that I desire, I shall content myself with but a single case at present.

In his letter I. No 9, of the 2d March, 1820, to the President of the Bank of Missouri, he acknowledges that, "in consideration of a proposition made by Colonel Riddick, as agent of the Bank of Missouri, he had agreed to take a draft "in favor of the Bank of the State of Tennessee, payable at Louisville, for $40,156, in notes of that bank and its branches." (See document 66.)

His letter B. No. 25, to the President of the Bank of Missouri, of the 14th November, 1820, and the President's answer, B. No. 26, of the 12th December, 1820, (see document 119,) show, that the said 40,156, in notes of the Bank of Tennessee and its branches, were transmitted to the Branch Bank of the United States, at Louisville, on the 21st May, 1820, according to his orders, where they were received by him.

The Hon. Hugh L. White's testimony shows that these notes were mostly on the Branches of the State Bank of Tennessee, and that these Branches had suspended specie payments some time in the Summer of the previous year.

These notes, it will be seen, are not included among the uncurrent notes which Mr. Crawford acknowledges to have received, though they were equally entitled to that denomination. I therefore submit the naked fact to the Committee, that he did receive uncurrent notes, to a considerable amount, in another case, besides those specified in his report on that subject.

Without positively denying this statement, Mr. Crawford would seem to impugn it, by alleging that those notes were immediately placed to the credit of the Treasurer, as cash, by the Bank of Tennessee. This, if ever so correct, cannot disprove the fact I have alleged. The notes in the hands of the Treasurer were as much a cash demand upon the bank, as any entry it could make on its books upon their alleged transfer. But, had they been paid the next day, it would not prove that they were not uncurrent when received. They, however, remained at Louisville, from the 21st of May, 1820, till January, 1822, and have only been discharged by payments in depreciated paper, to pensioners, and, possibly, a few other public creditors; so that, if the Treasury has escaped a loss, it has fallen upon those who were entitled to the gratitude and justice of their country. But I have not pretended to allege any thing more upon this subject than the mere fact that more uncurrent notes were received than has been stated by Mr. Crawford; and therefore it is not incumbent upon me to show, that the Treasury has sustained any loss, or that the Bank of Missouri has gained an advantage at the expense of the poor pensioners on the Government. I have not represented these "as notes of insolvent banks," like those on some of the Banks of Ohio actually were. But, I have no doubt, that as much might have been said in favor of the receipt of some of the other Tennessee notes, which Mr. Crawford acknowledges were uncurrent, as of those on the Branches of the Bank of Tennessee. If, however, I am bound to pursue the subject further, for my own justification, then certainly I have a right to call for, and should wish to see, the proof on which Mr. Crawford has predicated the statements which he has made to the Committee on this subject.

The next subject to which I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee, is, to my fifth statement, in the following words, viz :

"That he has in his report to the House, misrepresented the obligations of those banks, or some one of them, at least, and predicated thereon an indefensible excuse for his conduct in receiving those uncurrent notes."

It is evident that I have been misapprehended in regard to this statement. I certainly never intended to be understood as alleging that Mr. Crawford had misrepresented the contracts which were submitted with his report; for I myself relied upon these contracts, and the fact that no public money had been received by the Banks of Edwardsville and Tombigbee, before the date of their respective contracts to pay cash for the deposits, for proof of my allegation.

The Committee justly consider this statement as the recapitulation of a charge previously made; and it will be seen that, for a specification thereof, I referred to a preceding part of the communication that contained it. This is expressed in the following words, viz :

"Being called on by a resolution of the House of Representatives to state the amount of uncurrent paper which he received from the local banks that had been made the depositories of the public money received from the sale of the public lands, he admits the receipt of a large amount from the Banks of Edwardsville, Missouri, and Tombigbee. But, as an excuse for his conduct, he represents those notes to have been deposited in these banks 'before the date of their contracts, under which they agreed to account for the public deposits as specie.'"

My opinion certainly is, that any statement which either adds to or diminishes the real obligations of those banks, must be a misrepresentation of their obligations; and, taking Mr. Crawford's statement to be correct, it implies the existence of obligations different from those contained in "the contracts submitted with his report;" for the deposits could not have been made "before" the date of those contracts, without an expressed or implied contract thereupon, which was not communicated, but which, from his statement, must be understood as giving to those banks a right to tender the money which he received from them.

My object, however, was to show that he had misstated the fact "in saying that the uncurrent notes which he had received from the Banks of Edwardsville and Tombigbee," had been deposited in these banks before the date of their contracts, under which, they agreed to account for the public deposits as specie." And this statement I now beg leave to submit to the decision of the committee, holding myself ready, if the committee have any doubts on the subject, to show that those deposits were made in the bank after and not before the date of their contracts to pay cash for them.

Mr. Crawford has labored to show that the interest of the Western country required the employment of the local banks as depositories of public money. I am not disposed to contest this point, nor to deny that a judicious employment of solvent and prudent local banks for this purpose, might have afforded some relief, though the principal object which he seems to have had in view was to relieve the Bank of the United States from the odium of collecting the public revenue, and converting it into available funds, by substituting the local banks for that purpose. According to his arrangement, as he himself has developed it, his intention was to render the public money, by whomsoever collected, available wherever the public service might require it. Of course, whether collected by the local banks or the Bank of the United States, it was intended that all of it which could not be appropriated to the public service in the Western should be transferred to the Atlantic States. The drain of specie, or its equivalent, therefore, from the West, with the exception of the permanent deposits, was intended to be the same in either case, and it is doubtful, at least, whether the ephemeral relief thus afforded to the Western community, has not been more than overbalanced by the evils which finally resulted from the injudicious execution and suicidal extension of this plan. Certainly great losses have resulted from it, as the events of almost every day exhibit, and if they have not fallen upon the Treasury, the people cannot have escaped them.

The principal ground of my objections to Mr. Crawford's conduct in this respect, has been exhibited to the House in the following words, viz :

"The most objectionable parts of his conduct, in regard to these matters, are, his mismanagement of those banks, and his continuing to employ them after he himself had become sensible of the danger of doing so."

To establish this statement, I rely upon his communication to the committee to show that he continued the Bank of Edwardsville a depository of public money, after he was so convinced of its want of good faith, as to act, in other respects, upon that opinion.

I rely upon his correspondence with the Banks of Tombigbee, Huntsville, Steubenville, and Vincennes, and Governor Jennings' testimony in regard to the latter, to show that he was apprized that there was danger in continuing the deposits in the three first, and that he continued the latter a depository of public money after it had forfeited all claim to his confidence, and proved, to his own satisfaction, that it could not safely be trusted.

I rely upon the testimony that has been taken before the committee, to prove, 1, That he has acted illegally in making deposits of public money in local banks in the District of Columbia, and even in this city, without making report thereof to Congress, according to law. 2. That he has, in a variety of instances, abused his power to make deposits of the public money by actually making pure gratuitous loans of them; and 3. That of the loans which he thus made, in 1819, a part thereof has not been repaid, and is in danger of being lost.

By the document 66, A. No. 10, it appears that, notwithstanding he had made loans to certain local banks in the District of Columbia, which were so crippled as not to be able to continue their operations without the assistance he afforded them from the Treasury, and particularly the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, whose situation he well knew, and to which he had made five several loans of public money, to enable it as the witnesses say, to wind up its affairs, and which loans, or the major part thereof, remained unpaid, he did, on the 1st of August, 1820, the year after these loans were made, direct the Receivers of Public Moneys in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Michigan, to receive the notes of those banks in payment for public lands.

By document No. 66, it appears that the Farmers and Mechanics' bank of Cincinnati, into which he directed the public deposits to be made, in 1819, besides its other debts, owed to the Bank of the United States $220,000; had issued its own notes to the amount of $77,550, and had of specie only $19,430; and that he was twice offered any additional security for the fulfilment of its engagements, which he might require, but which he declined taking.

By the same document it appears that he declined the offer to pay interest by the Bank of Huntsville, which the Treasury was justly entitled to receive from that bank.

By his report in the case of Mr. Brahan, Receiver of Public Moneys at Huntsville, it appears that that officer, had appropriated a very large amount of the public money to his own use; that he was continued in office an improper length of time after his misconduct was known to Mr. Crawford; that, finally, in settling with him, a large amount that was justly due to the United States, as interest upon the money which he had misapplied, was relinquished; and that the indulgence he received, as to the time of repayment, was more than he deserved.

By Mr. Crawford's own communication to the committee, he himself has shown a case of a Receiver, which would have rendered it improper to continue any man in such an office, under the circumstances which he has stated.

There must also have been some bad management in his permitting the deposits in the Bank of Missouri to accumulate to the amount of $726,000, when the transfer of any part thereof to the Branch Bank of the United States at Louisville, was so practicable by the facilities constantly afforded by steamboat navigation between St. Louis and that place; in his permitting the Bank of Missouri to delay the payment he required for it in June, 1819, for about five months; in his withdrawal, in March, 1820, of his previous drafts upon it, and then agreeing to take a much less sum, and a great portion of it in uncurrent notes, with an intimation to the President of the bank, of ten months additional indulgence, (see his letter I, No. 9, 66;) and this, too, at a time when the bank must have had in its vaults, besides its other good funds, about $221,599 40, in specie, which it was permitted to retain and use, and which was $43,424 40, more than the whole amount of the payments stipulated for by Colonel Riddick, as the agent of the bank. (See bank return, February, 1820.)

Admitting that Mr. Crawford was right in receiving so much uncurrent money from this bank, I submit it to the committee whether he was not wrong in permitting the bank, at that time, still to retain such a large amount of public money in its possession; and for a more detailed illustration of this subject, I beg leave to invite the attention of the committee to the last document attached to my communication to the House, and to a comparison of the statements therein contained, with the public documents to which they refer.

I greatly regret that the want of time will not permit the committee to allow me the benefit of testimony that I otherwise could produce, in relation to the management of the Banks of Tombigbee and Steubenville. I beg leave, however, to refer you to a table, herewith transmitted, which shows the amount of continued deposits in those banks, for years in succession, above the permanent deposits allowed to them, respectively, and to submit to you, whether these deposits, thus continued, can be considered in a less objectionable light than loans without interest.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

JUNE 11, 1824.

ARGUMENT.

To the Hon. JOHN FLOYD, Chairman, &c.

Deeply impressed with the importance of the present investigation to myself, personally, I beg leave, with unfeigned deference and respect, to submit to the consideration of the committee the following remarks:

Sensible I am, that the statements of my address to the House, to use the language of the committee, are such as should not be "lightly made," and resolved I am, that, if they are "superficially examined," it shall be in spite of my utmost exertions.

It is obvious to the common sense of mankind, and apparent from the reasoning of the committee, that, from the active nature of responsibility, both moral and official, in this country, upon him who undertakes to arraign the conduct of an important functionary, must the weight of his charges recoil, if he fail to establish them. This consideration, while it furnishes a motive for zeal and perseverance on my part, is calculated to oppress me with mortification, at finding that the committee have given this decided and injurious direction to the statements which they think fit to denominate charges, contained in my address, after they had commanded, and before they could procure, my appearance for the purpose of explaining and enforcing those statements.

This having been done, I trust I shall be pardoned for endeavoring to show, to the satisfaction of the committee, that the course of reasoning, by which it was effected, is not authorized either by the facts admitted by themselves, or by the evidence which was presented to them.

To relieve this subject, as far as may be, from the complexity of words and inferences in which it is involved, I must be permitted to define, beyond the power of misinterpretation, the character and import of the statements which I made, and to claim, if I show that they are sustained, by the facts and evidence offered to the committee, relief from the culpable responsibility with which their report has a tendency to burden me, and from the onerous task of investigating motives, which my address does not assign, or of abiding, in the accountable position indicated by the committee, the result of a moral inquiry, which, however it may comport with the partiality of Mr. Crawford's friends, is certainly excursive and gratuitous in reference to the statements which I had the honor to advance. These the committee, not adverting to the document by which they were occasioned, have denominated charges, and, as such, they are fairly and conveniently susceptible of a division into two general heads, each of which may be supported by maintaining the specifications upon which they depend.

According to this arrangement, the first is to this effect, viz: That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. Wm. H. Crawford, has mismanaged the national funds; and the second amounts to this: that the Secretary of the Treasury has been guilty of neglect of official duty.

In order to sustain these charges, I shall follow the example of the committee, and shall, in the first place, recite the resolution of Congress of 30th April, 1816, which declares "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing, or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid, in legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing, or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received, otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable, and paid, on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States."

By the terms of this resolution, it is not only plain to the understanding of every man, but expressly declared by the committee, it was made

"obviously imperative" on the Secretary of the Treasury, after the 20th February, 1817, "to allow nothing to be received for debts due to the United States, but the legal currency of the United States, Treasury notes, notes of the Bank of the United States, or of those of State Banks, the notes of which were payable, and paid, on demand, in cash."

In conformity with the injunctions of this resolution, and with the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, an arrangement, (agreement,) it is affirmed by the committee, was concluded, in the early part of 1817, between the Secretary of the Treasury and that institution, by which it was stipulated that the public funds were to be deposited in the Branches of the Bank of the United States, in all places where such branches existed; and, in others, that bank was to select and designate certain State Banks, for which it was to be responsible, and in which such public moneys were to be deposited; and notes of all banks, whose paper the Bank of the United States would receive, in deposit, as cash, and none other, were to be received on sales of the public lands. On the 30th June, 1818, this agreement, it is stated by the committee, terminated, at the instance of the Bank of the United States; and, under the circumstances attending this fact, the Secretary entered into agreements with certain State Banks, by which they were employed as points of deposit and instruments of transfer for the public money, in the course of its collection and disbursement. Engagements, of this description, were effected by the Secretary with the Bank of Missouri, on the 1st of August, 1818, with the Bank of Edwardsville, on the 1st of February, 1819, and with those of Illinois, Huntsville, and Tombigbee, about the same time. Soon, however, it is declared by the committee, this connexion between the State Banks and the Secretary of the Treasury was extended in its application, and varied in its obligations. A greater number of banks were embraced by it, and more favorable conditions were allowed them. It was agreed that, as an equivalent for the risk and expense of deposit and transfer, the use of a stipulated sum should be permitted them, as a permanent deposit, which was not to be withdrawn, except in a certain specified case.

The substance of this agreement between the Treasury and these State banks, is expressed by the committee in the following words:

1. "That the bank should receive in deposit, to the credit of the Treasury, as cash, from the Receivers of Public Moneys, all the current notes of such banks as maintain cash payments; with power, however, to discontinue to receive the notes of any particular bank, on giving reasonable notice of such intention to the Receiver.

2. "That the bank should pay, at sight, all drafts from the Treasury; and should also transfer, on request, all sums on hand beyond the amount of the stipulated permanent deposit, to the Bank of the United States, or certain enumerated Branches of that Bank, and that a fixed sum should remain in the bank, as before mentioned, as a permanent deposit, to be transferred, however, to the Bank of the United States, in six months after the termination of the agreement.

3. "That, if the money were wanted for disbursement in the neighborhood of the banks, it might be drawn for at sight, notwithstanding such drafts might reduce the permanent deposit below the stipulated sum.

"The amount of this permanent deposit was to be increased, if it should appear that the bank should receive and transfer such large sums as that the expense thereof should not be considered as compensated by the benefit of the deposit which had been stipulated. It was also prescribed that the bank should render to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the Treasurer, duplicate monthly returns of its accounts with the Treasurer; and to the Secretary, confidential monthly returns of the state of its own affairs, showing, also, the credits of all public officers, in the bank; and also, quarterly lists or returns of all its debtors, to the end that the Secretary of the Treasury might determine on the propriety of continuing the public deposit in such bank."

The effect of this arrangement is thus summed up by the committee.

"The following table shows the amount of the permanent deposit allowed to each bank, respectively, as the equivalent for the services rendered, or expected to be rendered, by it to the Treasury:

Bank of Steubenville - - -	$50,000
Bank of Chillicothe - - -	100,000
Franklin Bank of Columbus - -	20,000
Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Indiana - - -	40,000
Bank of Illinois at Shawneetown -	50,000
Branch Bank of Kentucky at Louisville - - -	100,000
Bank of Tombigbee at St. Stephen's Planters and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville - - -	75,000
Bank of Missouri - - -	150,000
Bank of Vincennes - - -	75,000
Bank of Edwardsville - - -	40,000
Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati - - -	100,000

"The amount of these permanent deposits is nine hundred thousand dollars; the interest, on which sum, at six per cent., would be fifty four thousand dollars." And I allege, in support of my first charge, that, by means of it, the Treasury of the United States was made to pay to the State banks enumerated, the sum of $54,000, annually, for receiving and transferring the public money: service which the Bank of the United States was bound, by the provisions of its charter, as well as by the agreement of the early part of 1817, to perform, without compensation.

This allegation the Committee declare to be unfounded. They consider that the Bank of the United States was bound to transfer no other description of public funds, than cash funds; and in order to sustain their declaration, they affirm that the Bank of the United States was not bound to receive in deposit "as cash, the bills of any banks but its own." In this affirmation there appears to me to be something of a fallacy, the detection of which may, perhaps, induce the Committee to doubt the correctness of their construction of this obligation of the Bank of the United States. By the circular of the Treasury to the State banks, under date of the 1st of July, 1818, announcing the termination of the agreement between the former and the Bank of the United States, and expressing conditions, upon the acceptance of which the advantage of deposit and the services of transfer between the former and the Bank of the United States were extended to these banks, they are instructed, in relation to all sums deposited subsequently to the 30th June, 1818—the period at which the agreement with the Bank of the United States expired—"to enter them, as heretofore, to the credit of the Bank of the United States, for the use of the United States." And in his letter to this institution, of the 30th June, the Secretary maintains, earnestly and successfully, the existence of a complete right in the Treasury to hold the Bank of the United States responsible for whatever "moneys were deposited to its credit in the State banks;" and, after remarking that "an examination of the returns made by the bank to the Treasury, of the public money in its possession, for which the Treasurer [of the United States] is credited, supports this position," he alleges, in illustration of it, "for whatever the bank has charged itself, in its account with the Treasury, except for the special deposits, it is, I presume, in point of law and common sense, responsible. The special deposits were entered to the credit of the Treasury, upon the express stipulation that the bank should not be accountable until they were converted into specie, or into bills admitted by the bank to be equal to specie." He adds, below, "I am persuaded that the facts, and inferences drawn from them, in the preceding pages, will be sufficient to show that the responsibility, deemed so extraordinary by the Directors, has been assumed from the date of the arrangement, and continues to the present moment unimpaired."

These extracts establish the following conclusions, viz: That, up to the moment when the Secretary permitted the obligation of the Bank of the United States to expire (as he says in his circular of the 1st of July following) "by agreement," that institution was responsible in cash for all the public funds received by it on deposit, except such in regard to which the contrary was expressly stipulated, and that, consequently, it was bound to transfer them at the will of the Secretary of the Treasury, free of expense and without compensation. This, it is admitted by the Committee, it was bound to do, in reference to "cash funds"—a description from which it will be difficult to exclude all sums, not held as special deposits; for all other funds were entered by the bank, as the Secretary declares, and as the returns of the bank prove, to the credit of the United States; and of course represented such an amount of ready money, or pecuniary force, at the disposal of the Secretary, on the books of the bank. Cash funds is a phrase not restricted to coin, or the precious metals; for no one will deny that ready money is cash, and that $1,000 in United States' Bank notes is $1,000 cash.

These extracts further exhibit the proper and admitted distinction between general and special deposits. They show, as would appear, ex vi termini, that all sums not received expressly as special deposits, were considered as general deposits, were credited to the United States as cash, and under that description were embraced by the obligation of the bank to transfer the cash funds of the United States, at the request or order of the Secretary of the Treasury. It follows, then, that, according to the Secretary's own showing, the Bank of the United States was under an obligation to the United States to transfer all public funds, other than special deposits, received by it or its branches, or by the State banks it had designated, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, free of all expense, and without compensation; and it can hardly be denied that, when the Secretary of the Treasury, "by agreement," as he declares, permitted the bank to withdraw from this obligation, and agreed to allow certain State banks $54,000 annually, (a fact which is not disputed,) for performing the very same services, he voluntarily increased the annual expenditure of the Treasury by that amount; relinquished, "by agreement," a right which, by the charter of the Bank of the United States, and its own engagement with him, he held in the fiscal services of that institution, and then gave to the State banks $54,000 annually, for a right to command the same fiscal services from them.

This new agreement, injudiciously extended and carelessly executed, I have ventured to denominate, in what the committee consider my first charge, "mismanaging the public funds," nor am I now able to devise a more appropriate expression. The committee would, probably, have come to the same conclusion in regard to this subject, but for what I suppose to be the fallacy, which, as already intimated, they admitted into their reasoning, of restraining the import of the word cash to the synonyme of coin; and of considering the public funds as consisting of other than such as were cash, or equivalent to coin, and such as were not; a mode of classification which implies, obviously, that the parts are greater than the whole.

Under their favorable, but, as I conceive, erroneous view of this part of the Secretary's conduct, which, in a private individual, would be considered highly indiscreet, the committee justify it as conformable "to usage for many years," and to the practice of different officers at the head of the Treasury, of assuming that it was their duty "to manage the public funds in a manner similar to the case here investigated." But this reference to antecedent usage, is not likely to strengthen the position it was intended to support. The duty of Mr. Crawford, and the usage of the Treasury, were necessarily repugnant; for the resolution of 1816, and the law incorporating the Bank of the United States, were adopted for the express purpose of correcting the evil of usage, which, according to the admission of the committee, was evidently in disregard of law." Therefore, when they prove, as they do prove, that the management of Mr. Crawford was in conformity to usage, and the practice of his predecessors, they prove it was "evidently in disregard of law;" was contrary to the resolution of 1816, which thus themselves declare "made it the duty of the Secretary to correct this departure from law;" and thus demonstrate not only that he mismanaged the public funds, but that he violated, at the same time, both his duty and the law.

If these permanent deposits, and the accumulated sums which were patiently permitted to remain in some of those banks, are not to be considered gratuitous loans, and an illegal employment of the public money, the loans which, it is now in proof before the committee, the Secretary had made to various banks of this District, cannot fail to satisfy the committee that the charge of mismanaging the national funds has been clearly established.

The corruption of the British Parliament, and the illegal conduct of the British Ministry, are subjects of frequent and just reprobation, as the purity of our Legislature, and the exact subservience of every branch of our Executive to the laws of the land, are deemed causes of satisfaction and sources of pride. When Mr. Pitt, whose influence in Parliament was as transcendent as his fame, undertook, at a period of great commercial pressure, and at a calamitous season of war, to make a loan of £40,000 to the house of Boyd & Benfield, the subject was brought before Parliament, and as the loan, though not gratuitous, was found to be "no legal employment of public funds," and, although the opposition admitted there was no ground to impute improper motives to the Premier, it was declared by the House of Commons, an act of dangerous usurpation; and to prevent its being assumed as a precedent, or extended into usage, as well as to acquit this powerful and celebrated minister of moral or official liability, on account of it, a bill of indemnity was introduced by one of his friends, and passed into a law.

Here it is to be observed, that the loan of Mr. Pitt was advanced (even as Mr. Whitbread confessed,) on unquestionable securities. Those of Mr. Crawford do not appear to have been so safely provided for. On Mr. Pitt's loan no loss occurred. A considerable part of Mr. Crawford's loans is yet endangered, and probably will be lost. Mr. Pitt's loan carried interest. Mr. Crawford's were made without any such stipulation. If Mr. Pitt's conduct could be excused only by an act of Parliament, can Mr. Crawford's be justified in the teeth of an act of Congress? In this case, let me ask, would not the vital principle of our Government be lost sight of? This is a Government of laws. Responsibility is the soul of the Republic, and is intended, like gravitation in the material world, to hold every orb and every atom, every officer and every citizen, in their legal position. It was intended to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from committing any act which could be justly called "no legal employment of the public funds;" and will hardly be satisfied by the declaration, that any officer of the Government, but especially the head of the Treasury, can employ the national funds in disregard of law, and yet not mismanage them. Surely there is something less secured in the public treasure of the United States than in that of England.

Having proved, clearly, by the declarations of the Secretary, and the expressions of the committee, that the former relinquished, "by agreement," on the 30th June, 1818, the right of the United States to the fiscal instrumentality of the Bank of the United States, in the collection and disbursement of the national funds, and employed, by conditions offered to them, on the 1st July following, the instrumentality of certain State banks, for the same purpose; and having shown that, when, shortly after the latter date, an extended agreement was entered into on conditions more favorable to these banks, allowing them, as an equivalent, or rather as pay, for similar instrumentality; $54,000, annually, by way of interest on permanent deposits; and having also shown that the Secretary has made various loans of the public money, I shall proceed to a subject connected with my second charge.

This imputes to the Secretary of the Treasury, without any investigation of his motives, neglect of duty. In relation to it, the committee admit that the act of Congress incorporating the Bank of the United States, makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to employ the offices of that institution as places of deposit for the public funds, in preference to all other banks, unless, for special reasons, he should think fit to use other banks for the purpose; and, in that case, the special reasons are to be communicated to Congress by the Secretary, at its then, or its next session. This communication the committee pronounce, and the Secretary confesses, he failed to make. I may safely rest the truth of my second charge on this admission, since a failure in an officer of the United States, from any cause, to comply with the directions of a law prescribing his duties, is, to all intents and purposes, a neglect of duty. The Secretary, however, accounts for it, and the committee justify it upon the ground of inadvertence.

The admission of inadvertence, in this case, is a concession of neglect of duty so complex, that it may fairly be denominated a violation of duty; for, as the object of the law, in requiring the prompt communication of these special reasons, was not only to know that they existed, but also to know that they were sufficient, a failure to make the communication, if justified by inadvertence, is justified only as to the existence of the special reasons, and leaves the Secretary more directly obnoxious to the charge of having proceeded in the business upon reasons that were insufficient, a charge which, if substantiated by inquiry, could not, from its nature, be justified by inadvertence, but would infallibly discredit either the judgment or the integrity of the presiding officer of the Treasury.

After recapitulating my statements in regard to the intercourse between the Secretary and the Bank of Missouri, the committee remark upon that which (they say) declares that this bank was unworthy of credit at the time the public money was suffered to accumulate in it to a large and improper amount; they admit that, at one time, this accumulation amounted to $726,000, and then affirm that the propriety of permitting this state of things is a question of prudence, depending on the solidity of the institution. I endeavor to show, in my address to the House, that, in reference to this enormous accumulation, the limited capital, and excessive issues of the Bank of Missouri, left nothing like a substantial or reasonable security to the United States. But the committee, not denying the justness of this inference, seem to avoid it by affirming that my estimate of the capital of this bank is incorrect, inasmuch as it does not comprehend the amount of permanent deposits as part of its capital, and, as raising the latter to such a proportion to the amount of its issues of paper, as would give it, in relation to the whole sum of public money confided to it, the character of solidity. The reasoning involved in this affirmation cannot be maintained. If the bank had lost its solvency from the excess of its issues above the amount of its capital, a common creditor would hardly be persuaded, in order to secure a debt of $576,000, due to him from the bank, to lend it $150,000 more, to add to its capital, and restore its proper proportion to the issues of the institution. This step might be beneficial to the other creditors, and friendly in regard to the stockholders and officers, but, except in this benevolent light, would certainly be considered folly on the part of the creditor. The proportion, then, between the capital and the circulation of this bank, upon the fitness of which the committee declare the prudence of accumulating $726,000 of public money in it, depended, is not as $360,000 is to $430,000, but as $210,000 is to $430,000; and the amount hazarded in deposit, by the Secretary of the Treasury, stands related to the capital of the bank to which it was confided, not in the proportion of $526,000 to $360,000, but in that of $726,000 to $210,000; and this $210,000, endangered by its disadvantageous and inadequate proportion to an admitted excessive amount of issues. Besides, this nominal capital of $210,000 was subjected to the pressure of other exhausting operations. The discounts to the stockholders and directors were made on a pledge of their stock, so that, to this extent, that species of financial capacity, which $100 of capital may represent, and authorize $150, in issues, was destroyed.

As this proposition of the committee cannot be sustained, the force of my statement, which it was intended to obviate, still bears upon the conduct of the Secretary, and demonstrates that, in his intercourse with the Bank of Missouri; he not only was guilty of neglecting his duty, but of mismanaging the public funds.

In my address to the House, it was alleged that the Secretary had neglected to exact monthly returns, and quarterly lists of its debtors, from this bank, and thus disregarded the means in his power of understanding the condition of the bank, and of providing against any loss which might occur to the United States from the embarrassment or insolvency of this institution. This fact is admitted by the committee to its full extent, but is not viewed by them as evincing neglect of duty, or censurable inattention to the interests of the United States, although, in the Secretary's contract with this bank, (as represented by the committee,) these returns, &c., are carefully insisted on, in order "solely to aid the Secretary in determining the propriety of continuing or discontinuing the arrangement with the bank."

Case of Ninian Edwards.

In considering my statement, which falls under both charges, and imports that the Secretary received a large amount of uncurrent paper from the Bank of Missouri, the Committee declare this institution was not bound by the condition proposed to it by the Secretary, previously to the 9th August, 1819, to receive as cash, on account of the United States, such sums as the Receivers should deposit in it, but was responsible for the same only in kind. But this, if correct, does not diminish, but only removes, to an earlier point, the mismanagement of the Secretary. It appears to place him in a dilemma. If his contract with the Bank of Missouri did not, as is stated, secure to him the right of general deposit and transfer, to the same extent, that, by the charter of the Bank of the United States, and his contract with that bank, he possessed that right, it follows that he was indiscreet in permitting the Bank of the United States to withdraw from this obligation, before he could impose it on another bank. And if, as may be inferred from the observations of the Committee, it was proper that the Secretary should receive, in kind, notes which, under the contract with the Bank of Missouri had been for months deposited to the credit of the United States, because, at the time they were deposited they were good, it would seem that a custom-house bond might be discharged, when it became due, in notes, however depreciated, provided they had been good at the date of the bond.

To justify this unwise and irregular proceeding upon the ground that, from the conjectures of the Secretary, no ultimate loss will be sustained by the United States on the uncurrent paper received, would be to proceed upon a principle which would allow of every species of speculation, on his part, with the public funds—a principle at war with integrity and prudence in fiscal operations, and with the practice and regulations of this and other countries.

In the British House of Commons, the first charge brought against Lord Melville, was, not for the loss or waste of the public funds, but for permitting their mismanagement by a subordinate officer, who had deposited them in private banks, in a manner similar in all respects to the operations of the American Secretary of the Treasury, with this only difference, that the British Government sustained no loss by this malversation of Mr. Trotter. It was the practice, and not the event, which was denounced before the House of Commons. "I am appalled (said Mr. Whitbread) at the reflection of no less than thirty-four millions of the public property having passed through Lord Melville's paymaster's hands. Why, sir, the report states explicitly that upwards of eight millions had been in the hands of his private bankers, and nearly seven millions more are allowed to have passed through the same channel. I cannot but think that this negligent criminality is deserving the severest reprehension."

Mr. Pitt, the warm and powerful advocate of Lord Melville, was forced by a sense of truth to confess that this permitted misapplication of the public money contrary to law, though "without actual loss to the State," was not to be justified; was constrained to advise the erasure of his friend's name from the list of Privy Councillors; and thus expressed to his admiring country the conflict between the tenderness of his friendship and the sublimity of his patriotism. "I am not (said that magnanimous man) ashamed to confess that I have not given this advice without a bitter pang. I will not erase from my bosom the feelings of private friendship."

When the report of the Committee was framed, the only evidence which was known to exist that I gave the advice represented in my Address, to the Receiver at Edwardsville, was my own solemn declaration to that effect, and my publication of 1819, announcing my intention of withdrawing from the directorship of the Bank of Edwardsville. Upon this evidence the Committee thought fit to admit, "that there was no doubt Mr. Edwards gave such advice as he represents to the Receiver;" and at the same time, and against the same evidence, they deny "that the Receiver wrote on the subject of this advice to the Secretary." For this discrepancy, there is no apparent reason. The second fact is as credible at least as the first; indeed the admission of the first seems to establish the probability of the second—a probability not weakened by the remark of the Committee, that, inasmuch as the same person was the Receiver of Public Money and President of the Bank, "it is hardly probable that as Receiver he would advise the Secretary that he could not repose confidence in the Bank of which he was President. Even if in this double relation he might not have dissuaded excessive confidence, it is yet very clear that, as his interest in the former capacity greatly exceeded that which he held in the latter, he was under the operation of a direct motive to give such information as he did communicate. And upon this motive, which the Committee declare could not exist, the Secretary actually relied, as insuring the faithful communication of all such information. These remarks apply with equal force to the declaration by which the Committee would seem to accuse me of swearing falsely, "that there is no evidence that the Receiver wrote on the subject of this advice to the Secretary. I asserted, upon oath, "that I saw the Receiver write to the Secretary, and enclose my publication;" and I confess that I feel no inconsiderable distress at the reflection that my oath is falsified by the Committee, in regard to a fact probable in itself, and at least as credible as one which my oath is suffered to establish.

Case of Ninian Edwards.

As to the famous letter from the Receiver, there can now be no doubt that it was written and despatched to the Secretary; or, if from technical objections to the testimony, the committee should not be disposed to act upon it, enough may be seen to show the propriety of allowing further time for producing, in due form, testimony enough to establish the fact; and this I ask the committee to do, if they are not satisfied of the fact. It must be admitted, that, as I had no power to summon witnesses after I myself was summoned, I could do no more than obtain voluntary affidavits, and that I had but little time for doing this much. The question of this letter having been received by the Secretary, appearing to depend on a comparative estimate of the opposing weights of the probabilities of the fact on which I have relied, and of the Secretary's denial, it is proper to examine, minutely, the character of that denial. This will be found to be very equivocal. I assert, that such a letter was written, and that I believe, as is now evident, it was transmitted, and, of course, received. The Secretary does not deny that it was received, but declares it is not on file, and is not recollected by the officers employed in the Department to have been received, of whom, however, it now appears, by their own testimony, (with the exception of Mr. Dickins,) that neither himself nor any one else made any inquiry in regard to that matter.

When I state my belief that the letter was received, I obviously mean by the Secretary; and it is an infirm, and fallacious answer to reply, not that the Secretary did not receive it, but that it is now not on file, and is not recollected by the officers employed in the Department (whose credit is rather liberally pledged,) to have been received, both which declarations may be true, and yet the letter be in the Secretary's pocket. Again, I stated that the Receiver told me he had, after transmitting this letter to the Secretary, received a letter from him directing him, the Receiver, to continue the deposits. This, also, the Secretary denies in his report, and in the same indirect and evasive manner. He does not say that no such letter was written, but, that no letter, to this effect, was written in answer to the one which he had laboriously asserted was never received—has strenuously argued was never written! Now, it is very clear that, if the letter from the Receiver was never written, or even never was received, no answer of any sort could have been returned to it; and yet the letter, directing a continuance of the deposits, may have been written. These careful ambiguities in the report, do not seem calculated to make the defensive declarations of the Secretary outweigh the strong improbability, that a public despatch, deposited in the post office, should have miscarried in a mail to which no casualty or interruption is known to have occurred; and at a season of the year, too, when the mail is least liable to any difficulties in its transportation.

In addition to his neglect of duty in his transactions with this bank, as suggested in my address to the House, and in my replication to his communication to the committee, they might have adverted, in support of the same charge, to the case of the Bank of Vincennes; where, also, the Receiver was President of the bank, where the United States lost $168,000; on which bank the Secretary drew, successively, from October, 1819, to March, 1820, four drafts, together amounting to 165,000, suffered as many continuous protests, and after neglecting, as usual, all measures of precaution, took no measure of redress until July, 1820.

A course of didactic admonition, in the form of four official letters, is then pronounced to this delinquent institution, the initial gravity of which is compensated by its final lenity. (See documents.) He recapitulates the acts of ill faith which he had patiently endured, mentions the protests of his drafts for $165,000, warns the directors that, unless they reform their demeanor, and pay the drafts, it will be proper for him to proceed with rigor; but concludes, with proposing a relaxation of that meditated rigor, provided they will agree to honor the drafts within forty days, and even promises to pay for this tardy and extorted justice (out of his never failing fund,) by continuing the course of deposits in a bank, thus attempted to be bribed and threatened into common honesty by himself! To this persuasive proposal, the bank, increasing in audacity, and sagacious of the character of its customer, did not condescend to reply for nine months; at the expiration of which pregnant period, the President was delivered of the abortive fact of the corporation's insolvency. In this feeble and exhausted state, it asks further indulgence, and concludes its appeal to its munificent benefactor, with the most eloquent encomiums upon his liberality. This letter reflects, in interesting colors, the substance and complexion of the intercourse between the Treasury of the United States and the banks of the West; and, whatever may be said of its prudence, must certainly be commended (by a hunter of motives, at least,) for its candor. As the presentation of a moral scene, it is delightful to contemplate the sordid gratitude of the delinquent corporation, glowing under the injudicious, if not illicit, favors of this liberal minister of finance. "Your friendly disposition towards the West, in times peculiarly difficult, and the interest you have evinced for this remote section of our common country, leads to a hope, that the hand that has hitherto protected us, will not be withdrawn." This friendly hand was not withdrawn for at least twenty-one months; when measures of recovery were commenced, in a manner evincing such interest for this remote section of our common country, that the bank was allowed three years more to pay the debt; a period extending beyond the present important year, and upon conditions of collateral security, imposed with such "a friendly hand," that the security was defeated by private creditors, in this remote section of our common country; and, in consequence of the friendly dispositions of the Secretary, for the West, the loss falls upon the United States.

As both my charges have now been established, and, of course, the specifications upon which they depend, by the confessions of the Secretary, and the admissions of the committee, I shall not press the distinction which it seems escaped the committee, when comparing the amount of money lost by Mr. Crawford's mismanagement, (about half a million,) with the amount collected, (twenty-one millions,) they contrast favorably to the Secretary this proportion, with that which obtains in the ordinary collections of private, or mercantile debts. They appear to forget, besides the superior regularity, vigilance, and power, at the disposal of the nation, and the difference between the profits and loss of trade, and the even exaction of the revenue; that the loss incurred by the Secretary was not of debts outstanding, but of funds collected, and collected, too, by salaried officers, at an enormous expense.

Upon one point, however, which has already been considered, I shall add some remarks. The committee have admitted, distinctly, and in correspondence with my statements, that Mr. Crawford did, on some occasions, neglect to make such communications to Congress, as by law it was his duty to do, and that on others, he failed to report such facts and documents, as, by a resolution of the House of Representatives, he was required to do; yet, as they very naturally cannot detect the motives of this misconduct, (which God alone can do,) they acquit him of all blame or responsibility. In this they appear to lose sight of the distinction which has hitherto obtained between private and official rectitude; and of the well established fact, that bad motives in the man, are not necessary to constitute misconduct in the minister. When Burke brought Hastings to the bar of the House of Lords, and, in strains of portentous eloquence, invoked upon the head of the Indian Viceroy the vengeance of humanity, the power of justice, and the imprecated terrors of the English law, in portraying to this august tribunal a course and torrent of plunder and desolation which had overrun regions that the arms of Alexander could not reach; in charging him with the pillage of towns, the ruin of districts, the sacking of cities, the plunder of principedoms, the devastation of provinces, the waste of empires, he did not fail also to accuse him, with intense and awful formality, of having neglected to communicate to the Government the documents which were called for by the proper authority. (Burke's works, vol. 12, p. 454.) "That, in defiance of the said orders, and in breach of the above recited act of Parliament, the said Warren Hastings has, in sundry instances, concealed from his counsel the correspondence carried on between him and the princes or country powers in India; and neglected to communicate the advices and intelligence he from time to time received," &c.

This great statesman, this political philosopher, this experienced orator, did not appear to consider, that the illegal conduct of a minister could be justified by an alleged absence of improper personal motives, nor that a duty, upon the punctual performance of which the whole fabrication of legislation rests, should be repeatedly violated, and with perfect impunity.

I will not complain of any thing that has happened to myself in this business; of the liberality with which bad motives have been imputed to me; of that impatient justice, which, on this floor, condemned me for defending myself, and argumentatively accusing a responsible officer, upon statements, which are now established, but which were not then examined. But, I beg leave to ask, whether treatment like this can be just in itself, or is likely to sharpen that inspection, which it is the right of every citizen to apply to the conduct of the high officers of this Government, and which cannot be repressed without great danger to the liberties of the people?

The disadvantages under which I have labored in this investigation, must be obvious to the committee. While I have been informed by them that no charges against me have been submitted to them, the trial, if such it may be called, has assumed much more the appearance of an investigation of my conduct, than that of Mr. Crawford. Called upon as a witness, against my own consent, not being willing to rest any of my charges against the Secretary, or my own defence, upon my own oath, I have been required to swear to facts that I consider wholly immaterial, as it relates to his conduct, at least, the avowed object of the inquiry; and the occasion has been embraced of requiring me to defend, not only my general character for veracity, but to maintain it in particular, and special cases, by which I have been perfectly surprised, and for which no adequate time is allowed me.

In my address to the House, I have made certain statements against Mr. Crawford, which the committee are pleased to denominate charges. For specifications of some of these statements, I have referred to certain publications under the signature of A. B., of which I acknowledged myself to be the author, thereby making myself responsible, from that moment, for the charges they contain. When I wrote them, or whether I actually wrote them at all, neither could add to, nor diminish, the responsibility I had taken upon myself, by exhibiting them as charges to the House; and it might, with as much propriety, have been asked of me to swear that I wrote my address, as that I wrote the publications which, by the reference made to them, became a part of that address. How they originated, or what was their object, before they were offered to the consideration of the House, does not appear to me to be either material, in an inquiry into Mr. Crawford's conduct, nor to have been within the intention of the reference to the committee, especially "if no charge against me has been submitted to them."

The only inquiries that appear to me material, in regard to those publications, are, whether the facts they allege are true or false, and, if true, whether they amount to proof of any thing on the part of the Secretary, worthy of reprehension. If the charges against him are well founded, no motive for making them can justify or excuse him.

If I am to be convicted of having made them unjustifiably, and criminally, not barely by an acquittal of him, but by a positive judgment against myself, distinct allegations ought to have been made against me, and a fair opportunity of defence should have been allowed me. Such a trial I should be very willing to meet, but against any collateral and indirect operation for that purpose, and, particularly, where technicality has not been overlooked, I solemnly protest.

I have been required to swear that I wrote these publications more than two years ago, and this has afforded the ground for attacking my veracity, in the special cases alluded to, without my being allowed the necessary time to disprove, invalidate, or explain, the allegations that have been made against me.

With regard to my having denied the authorship of those publications, I have no hesitation in admitting that I have frequently and truly denied that I wrote all that appeared under that signature, during the time referred to by the testimony in this case; that is to say, the period that includes the first and the last of those publications.

I have, also, constantly denied that there was any A. B. plot, or conspiracy, in the case; and have, at all times, treated such suggestions with the contempt they deserved. Not only has the existence of such a "plot," or "conspiracy," been affirmed in several of the most distinguished newspapers of the Union, but the committee have recently heard it boldly asserted on the floor of the House of Representatives. This I have denied, and still do deny, so far as it is intended to implicate me. No man, but myself, is, or ought to be, responsible for any thing I have written, on the subjects embraced by those publications, and one man cannot make a conspiracy. For whatever purpose the assertion of a "plot, or conspiracy," has been made, it has, I know, been more correctly denied than affirmed.

I am, also, equally free to admit, that though my general course was neither to deny nor acknowledge that I was the author of these publications, yet, I may have repeatedly spoken in regard to that matter, as any man has a right to speak in regard to an anonymous publication which he may have written, but which he does not choose, and is under no kind of obligation to avow. But, that I ever said any thing that could be considered as equivalent to a denial of my authorship of these publications, for the purpose of avoiding any kind of responsibility, or to gain any point whatever, I do most positively deny. In fact, no man who did not choose to give his name to the public, on such an occasion, could have taken less pains to conceal it than I have uniformly done in this case; and hence, there is reason to believe that nine-tenths of Congress, and almost every one else who read these publications, and knew the general circumstances of the case, considered me as the author of them. In one of them I offered to avow my real name, provided the House of Representatives, then seeming to threaten to do so, would adopt any measure to operate directly upon me in consequence thereof. And it must be known to several of my friends, that I intended to avow myself the author of such of those publications as I had then written, if the question had been put to me (as was expected) by the committee before whom I was examined in February, 1823, and that I had prepared the preface for my deposition, which is designated No. 3, in the documents accompanying my address to the House, for that and other like objects.

That I had justifiable cause, as well from private, as public considerations, for writing these publications, I shall always be able to prove whenever it may become necessary. At present, I will barely ask, whether the public attempt that was made in several respectable newspapers, and even on the floor of the House of Representatives, to implicate me in the suppression, alluded to in the first of those publications, did not justify me in endeavoring to show that such a charge was ridiculous and absurd? This is fully shown in the subsequent publications; and, containing nothing but the truth, expressed in decent and respectful terms, what could there be in them to be ashamed of? No attempt, that I have ever seen, has been made to prove, that they contained even an indecorous expression, in regard to the Secretary, or that the facts they allege were not true.

As to a suggestion which has been made, that, if they contained any thing which, in my opinion, was wrong in the conduct of the Secretary, it was my duty, as a Senator of the United States, to have noticed it in a different way, I have only to remark, that it may be seen that they treated of "suppressed documents," and it will, I think, hardly be contended by any reflecting and well informed man, that it was my duty, as a Senator of the United States, to have noticed, officially, a contempt offered to the House of Representatives by the suppression of information called for by that House; the more especially as the House itself had taken the subject under its own consideration.

That I denied my authorship of those publications for the purpose of obtaining a confirmation of my appointment as Minister to Mexico, is certainly but poorly supported by proof, (if admitted to its fullest extent,) that such denial was made or known to one Senator only, who had previously taken an active part in my favor; and who swears that he was wholly uninfluenced by that consideration. Considering the time and circumstances when, and under which, this controversy commenced, and that all the Senators were then present, it is hardly to be presumed that, if such an attempt had been made by me, or such a denial had been known to any other Senator, further proof could not, and would not, have been produced.

If, however, the committee should suppose there is proof enough before them to support this imputation, I ask it of their justice to afford me a fair opportunity of producing testimony to the contrary, which I only want time to do. This being granted me, if it shall appear, or there shall be the least reason to believe, that I obtained a confirmation of my nomination by such means, I pledge myself instantly to surrender my appointment.

Case of Nisyan Edwards.

The committee having requested me, since the foregoing was written, to reduce to writing my motion to have Mr. Crawford examined as a witness, that there may be no misunderstanding on the subject, I proceed to comply with their request, and to explain the grounds of this application.

I deduce my right to claim the benefit of his testimony from the precedent that has been established by the committee in my own case. Legal principles have been pretty rigidly insisted on, in some instances, in the course of the present investigation; and, although I am not able to point out the legal principle or usage that justifies this precedent, I presume it will be sufficient to entitle me to the benefit of it, to show a strict analogy between the case to which it has been applied, and the one to which I now respectfully propose to apply it.

I am considered by the committee as Mr. Crawford's accuser. I might rely upon his report and his subsequent communication to the committee to show that he has made himself mine. But I also wish to prove that such was his intention. If, under these circumstances, either he himself, or the committee, have a right to make me a witness against my own consent, in order to inquire into my motives, and a variety of other matters not included in either of my six charges against him, or in any of their specifications, justice must accord to me the same privilege, in regard to his implications against me. I claim the same right to examine him, and with equal latitude, in regard to all matters contained in his report, and subsequent communication, which implicate me, that has been demanded of me in relation to all the matters contained in my address to the House.

It is true that I myself consider such a course, either in his or my own case, as equally contrary to all former usage, and inconsistent with well established and incontestable legal principles. But, if I have been mistaken, or a new rule is to be adopted, all I ask is, that, while it is applied against me in one instance, I may not be denied the benefit of it in a similar one.

I had supposed that neither of us could, either as accuser or accused, be required, contrary to our consents, to become a witness, and to testify for or against ourselves. The rights of a prosecutor and a defendant, in this respect, are the same in any form of trial that has been adopted in this enlightened country. Either has a right to decide for himself upon how much, or how little testimony he may choose to submit his case, and neither can be compelled to strengthen or weaken it by his own oath.

I invite the committee to review all the facts that have been required to be proved by myself, and that have been admitted to be proved by others in regard to my conduct, and to contrast them with your own decisions, to confine the present investigation of Mr. Crawford's conduct to the charges which I have alleged against him. It will be perceived, from the whole of the testimony in this case, that I have been put upon my trial for a malicious prosecution, in the most injurious possible form, requiring me to convict myself by my own oath, before it is decided whether the charges I have alleged against the Secretary are true or false.

If those charges are true, as I alleged them to the House, I would ask what have the committee to do with my motives for making them, and upon what legal principles could I be arraigned, even in due form, for a malicious prosecution?

If, on the other hand, these charges are not true, (there being "no charge against me submitted to the committee,") it may not only justify the acquittal of Mr. Crawford, but may furnish ground of future trial of myself for having maliciously and falsely made them. It cannot, however, authorize any distinct judgment against me, till I shall be put upon my trial, and have a fair opportunity of defending myself. This I am ready to meet, but I cannot consent to the blending of both trials together.

If you should think such a charge against me sustainable, I would rejoice to have an opportunity to meet it fairly before the House of Representatives, or the Senate of the United States; and for this purpose, I beg leave, earnestly, to request the committee, in case that should be their opinion, to state, distinctly, which of the six charges I have alleged against Mr. Crawford are false, and in what respect they are so, that I may know how to prepare for my defence. In this, I ask no more than any subaltern in your Army is entitled to, in cases of infinitely less importance. I presume, and hope, therefore, it will not be denied me.

In the mode of trial of myself, that has been adopted, (as appears by the testimony,) by which I have only known against what I should have to defend myself from the mouths of the witnesses, the common sense of all mankind must perceive that I cannot have had any reasonable opportunity of defence. If, therefore, the committee think themselves authorized to inquire, for any purpose, whether I denied my authorship of the writings signed A. B. at all, or that such denial was made with a view to obtain the confirmation of my nomination as Minister to Mexico, by the Senate, I claim additional time to rebut the testimony that has been given, and to summon every Senator, if less will not satisfy you, to prove that no member of the Senate either voted for me or forbore to vote against me, on account of any such supposed denial, and thereby to demonstrate the utter improbability of any such intention on my part.

I have not made myself Mr. Crawford's prosecutor, and am not willing to be so considered. With his immense advantages over me, I have not the hardihood to be willing to take issue with him upon his intentions. My object has been, and is still, to defend myself in the most effectual manner in my power, against his attack upon me. This being accomplished, I care not what disposition is made of his part of the case. I had a right to urge the facts I have alleged, in my own defence; and none can admit their truth, and deny the justice of the arguments I have deduced from them.

In doing all this, I have imposed upon myself the obligation to show my own innocence of his imputation against me, and to prove the six specific statements I alleged against him to be true, without reference to his intentions. This is the extent of my responsibility; the public regard it in that point of view, and I protest against any further responsibility, and all collateral and indirect trials of myself; being, however, perfectly willing to meet any charge in due form.

These statements against Mr. Crawford, I have, I think, completely established. If the committee think otherwise, and will specify wherein I have failed, I will still redeem the pledge I have given to the public, in the proper place.

P. S. All the witnesses, except one, who have testified on the subject of the A. B. publications, say they considered them, and the A. B. plot; as one and the same thing. It will be perceived, however, that, in my address to the House, I made a material distinction between them, before I could have anticipated any contest on the subject; for, while in that address, I spurn the insinuation of "a plot." I acknowledge myself the author of the publications themselves.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

I submit to the committee the testimony herewith transmitted, with a statement of the points to which it is intended to apply.

Thomas F. Riddick states, in his affidavit, annexed to the report of the committee, as follows, viz:

"That the Bank of Missouri did transfer, in Eastern funds, to the Bank of the United States, and its Branches, near $450,000, which funds were worth four per cent. to the Bank."

I refer to the "list of drafts drawn by the Treasurer of the United States on the Bank of Missouri, since 1st July, 1818," [see document 9,] to show that the whole amount of transfer to different banks, was - - - - $481,943 60

By the said Riddick's affidavit, it also appears that he, himself, gives an account of funds, of a very inferior kind, transferred - - - - $138,179 00

By letter B, No. 16, document No. 119, it appears that there was transferred to the Branch, at Louisville, of Kentucky notes - 67,731 00

By the enclosure of letter I, No. 16, document 66, page 104, it appears there had been transferred to Louisville, of Georgetown, and Kentucky notes - - - - 6,000 00

211,910 00

Leaving only, that could have been transferred, - - - - $270,033 60

I have not had time to examine further into this statement.

I refer to a statement of the Treasurer of the United States, dated 11th June, 1824, headed "A statement showing the aggregate of moneys deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in the following banks," &c., [see document 83,] to show the proportion of loss to the amount deposited in certain banks that were depositories of public money, received from the sale of public lands, and which have failed to fulfil their engagements with the Treasury."

I refer to the enclosure of letter I, No. 16, document 66, p. 104, to show that more uncurrent notes were received by Mr. Crawford than I have alleged in my address to the House, viz: Georgetown and Kentucky notes, $6,000, which appear to have been received between the 20th May, 1820, and the 30th June, 1821. Or, if they were not received, this document, furnished by Mr. Crawford himself, must afford a very sufficient apology for thinking so.

I refer to an "extract of a letter from Thomas Sloo to the Secretary of the Treasury," furnished by the Treasury Department, see [b] and to the letter of George F. Strother, see [a] to show that the prospects of collecting the debt of the Bank of Missouri to the United States are not as good as they have been represented to the committee to be, &c.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

To the Hon. JOHN FLOYD, Chairman, &c.

The committee having again repeated to me, on last evening, that there are no charges against me submitted to them; that their investigations will be confined to the six specific statements which I have alleged against Mr. Crawford in my address to the House; and that, if I wished to produce further testimony, I must state in writing the names of the witnesses whom I wish to have summoned, and the points I expect to prove by them; I cannot consent to take upon myself the responsibility which may be imposed upon me by subjecting the Government to a great expense, and many gentlemen to much personal inconvenience, without explaining the causes and reasons, which, in my opinion, impose upon me the necessity to do so.

I need not enlarge upon the reasons, heretofore given, why I think I have been unnecessarily called upon, against my own consent, to give testimony in this case. That measure has been adopted; its effect has been to bring on a trial of myself upon collateral points, in the most injurious form, surprising me by accusations and impeachments of my character, of which I could have had no previous notice.

Having been made a witness, I might have had less ground of complaint if I had only been required to defend my general character for veracity; but as the thing now stands I am compelled to defend it against particular allegations, the first notice of which has been from the mouths of the witnesses summoned against me. This, I think, was not demanded by any material fact in this case, and it surely can derive no justification from the rules of common law. If I mistake not, it is a sound legal principle that a witness shall neither be compelled to discredit himself, nor shall an adverse party be permitted to ask him a question with a view to discredit him.

Why I was forced to become a witness, I neither knew, nor could conjecture, until the committee did me the honor, on last evening, to state to me that it was in consequence of my having charged Mr. Crawford, in one of my six specific statements, with having suppressed the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville, mentioned in my examination before the select committee of February, 1823, and with a view to ascertain what I knew upon that subject.

This, I must insist upon, is a very great misapprehension on the part of the committee, and a most injurious one to me if it shall be persevered in.

I do most positively disclaim ever having had, or now having, any intention to include that letter in the charge of suppressions submitted to the investigation of the committee by the House of Representatives.

It is not reasonable to suppose that I could have intended to impose upon myself an obligation to produce proof of the suppression of a particular letter, which the whole scope of my address, and every fair inference from it, showed I considered it as my misfortune not to be able to produce.

But it is not a fair inference from any thing expressed in my address, that I intended to include this letter in the charge of suppressions.

In page 13 of that address, I say, "it could have been no object with me to have established an additional suppression upon him, for, if time do not fail me, it will be seen, before I am done with this subject, that I had in my possession proof, whose credibility could not be questioned, of his having suppressed, in a variety of other instances, letters enough, of a much more important character and delicate bearing, for any purpose that the utmost malignity could have contemplated, as possible to be effected by such means."

Here, then, is a clear indication that, in what I should thereafter say, I did not intend to rely upon that letter, but others much more important, and whose credibility could not be questioned, evidently meaning those that could be established by the documents furnished by himself.

Turning to the charge itself, (see address, page 25,) it is found to be expressed in the following words, viz: "That he has, in several instances, withheld information and letters, called for by the House, and which it was his duty to have communicated."

The specifications of this charge, after referring to a particular case only, commence in the following words, viz:

"But it also appears that he and his officers of the Treasury Department have not been able to find a great number of other letters, and even some of his own official ones, when required by other calls of the House; or, if they could be found, they were suppressed. Of this the documents furnished by himself afford both abundant and conclusive proof. Many instances might be stated; for the sake of brevity, I will allude to a few of them only."

Here, then, is the practical exposition of the intention indicated in the 13th page of my address, in regard to the suppressions on which I intended to rely. The suppressions referred to in the last above recited paragraph, are expressly confined to those which could be proved by the documents furnished by himself, and of these a few only are specifically designated, and being all that I exhibited against the Secretary, must be all that I am bound to prove. They were deemed enough for my purpose, and more, therefore, were not intended to be included.

The publications under the signature of A. B., transmitted with my address, are also referred to for specifications, but these contain no reference to any suppressions but those which the documents establish.

Besides the suppression of the Receiver's letter, according to the decision of the committee, which I am not disposed to contest, was a fact wholly immaterial, since the description which I gave of it in my examination in February, 1823, and the copy I produced to the committee, both prove that it was not one of those letters which the committee suppose was embraced by the call of the House upon Mr. Crawford.

For these, and the reasons I have heretofore had the honor to submit to the committee, I not only think the testimony I am about to ask for, ought not to be considered necessary in the present investigation, but, that my own testimony, and all that which has already been taken in regard to the publications of A. B. ought to be rejected. Understanding, however, that the committee intend to publish all the testimony that has been taken against me, and believing that its publication, under the sanction of the committee, will be calculated to do me essential injury, and great injustice, without further testimony on my part, I feel compelled to ask that Samuel D. Lockwood, Esq., Receiver at Edwardsville, and Thomas Lippincott, Esq., of the same place, and all the Senators of the United States, may be summoned; the two former to support my testimony, and the latter to give testimony to oppose that which has been given against me, in relation to an alleged denial of my authorship of the A. B. publications, and I renew my application for the examination of Mr. Crawford.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

Remarks submitted by Mr. Forsyth.

When, on the 16th June, a question was proposed to Colonel Benton, touching the general character of Ninian Edwards, with a view to show him unworthy of belief, the committee said, that if that question was pressed, and the opposite party asked for a delay to enable him to procure testimony to defend his character, it would be ranted; and, as Mr. Cook, acting for Mr. Edwards, distinctly stated that he should want testimony from the Western country, to avoid further delay the question was waived. The committee now say, that certain papers brought from Edwardsville, to be used as evidence by Ninian Edwards, are not duly authenticated; and, as they are deemed by him important, unless they are admitted as evidence, time will be allowed to enable him to procure a proper authentication of them. With the same motive that prevented the question proposed to Colonel Benton from being pressed, a consent is now given that these papers should be received. But it is proper that the character of these papers, the motives for producing them, and all the testimony relating to them, should be examined.

The papers to which this consent applies, are five in number; to each of which is attached an affidavit of Thomas Lippincott, taken before a Justice of the peace, viz., a copy of a letter from Mr. Crawford to the Receiver of Edwardsville, of the 6th of August, 1819. 2d. A copy of a letter from Mr. Crawford, of the 1st of November, 1819, to the Receiver. 3d. A copy of a paper which was folded in the letter of the 1st of November. 4th. A copy of a paper dated the 12th of October, 1819, neither directed nor signed, but led away, and endorsed with these words: "copy to the Treasury Department, October, 1819." 5th. A copy of a letter of 22d October, 1819, signed by the Receiver of Edwardsville, and directed to the Secretary of the Treasury. The first and second of these papers were communicated to the committee by the Secretary; the others are not officially certified by the officer whose business and duty it is to authenticate copies of the papers which belong to his office. The affidavit of Lippincott has been preferred by Mr. Edwards to the official certificate; and he, it is presumed, was perfectly aware that such an affidavit was insufficient to make the copy to which it might be attached evidence. The testimony of Lippincott as preferred also to that of a person (Oswald Gunn) who preceded Mr. Edwards to Washington, and who might have testified, after examining the copies and originals, that the copies produced were copies of papers in the office of the Receiver of Edwardsville. This preference was obviously given, that the affidavits might show in whose handwriting the papers in the office were written. The handwriting of each is shown by Lippincott, except the paper with the date of October 12, 1819. By the testimony of Ninian Edwards, given most reluctantly, it is now known that that paper is his own work, a fact obviously intended to be concealed, and to which concealment Lippincott lent himself, if he was, as it is resumed he was, acquainted with Mr. Edwards's handwriting. Even were he not acquainted with it, it will be seen by the affidavits that this paper is the only one the handwriting of the original of which the affidavit attached to it does not go to ascertain. The original letter of the 1st of November is said to be in the handwriting of Mr. Crawford; that of the 6th of August, of a clerk, and signed by Mr. Crawford; the paper folded in the letter of the 1st of November, in the same handwriting as the letter of Mr. Crawford of the 6th of August; the letter signed by Mr. Stephenson, of the 22d of October, in the handwriting of Mr. Stephenson. The explanation of this difference in the affidavit, is found in the fact disclosed by Mr. Edwards, that the paper from which that now offered was copied, was the work of his own hand. The affidavit of Lippincott, that the copy offered is a true copy of that paper now on file, is contradicted by the testimony of Mr. Edwards. There is an underscoring in the copy, and in the original none. Mr. Edwards, although he never remembers to have seen the underscoring until he saw it before the committee, states, that before the affidavit was affixed, he or Lippincott must have underscored a particular part of it; which underscoring, making emphatic a particular sentence, brought the copy somewhat nearer than the original to the description given by Mr. Edwards, in his affidavit of 1820, of the letter of Mr. Stephenson. The oath of Mr. Edwards was, that the purpose of Mr. Stephenson, in writing the letter, was to enclose the publication of Mr. Edwards of the 13th of September, 1819, and that he (Mr. E.) prevailed on him to write it. The letter produced, refers to the publication as enclosed, but does it incidentally, as a circumstance of no particular importance; and the agency Mr. Edwards alleged he had in procuring it to be written, is not stated; nor is there any allusion to the advice he declares he gave to Mr. Stephenson to withhold all further deposits until he received the order of the Secretary. Mr. Edwards now states that this advice was given to prevent, not immediate, but future remote danger, while the paper produced by him, as the copy of that letter written by himself states, as from the Receiver, that "he would not wish to risk the responsibility of making the deposits in the bank until after the first of January next, 1820, without your instructions, given upon a knowledge of the facts above disclosed;" of which facts the course Mr. Edwards was disposed to pursue, was one the least important in its character.

The peculiar manner in which the affidavit is drawn, deserves notice. The paper now produced is intended to prove that Mr. Stephenson wrote the letter in 1819, described by Mr. Edwards, and that he gave the advice he stated he gave to Mr. Stephenson, and, as presumptive evidence that his publication, and this letter, were sent to the Secretary of the Treasury. For these purposes it is necessary that it should appear that the original, from which it is copied, should have been always in the office of the Receiver since 1819, and was obviously preserved as an official document. While the others are in ordinary form, the affidavit of Lippincott, on this paper, is of studied and singular phraseology: "that the original was found by him on the files of official letters, appertaining to, and now in, the Receiver's office at Edwardsville;" a phraseology which implies that the deponent knew that the files of official letters in which he found the original paper, although belonging to, had been out of, the Receiver's office; a fact totally destructive of all the presumptions arising from the finding of the paper on the files of the official letters in the office. This paper of the 12th of October, it is shown by Mr. Edwards, is not on the letter-book of 1819, in which it would have been the duty of Mr. Stephenson to have recorded it, had it been sent to the Secretary of the Treasury. But there is something written upon it by the Receiver. The affidavit is on this point, also, equivocal. The paper was found by the deponent on the files of official letters appertaining to, and now in, the Receiver's office at Edwardsville, and endorsed or filed in the handwriting of the Receiver of Public Moneys, as follows: "Copy to the Treasury Department, October 1819." No punishment could be inflicted for this statement as false, if the paper is not endorsed, provided the alternative that it is filed is true. It is filed if the paper was enclosed in a separate envelope, with the words upon it in the Receiver's handwriting; but, if the Receiver's handwriting is not on the paper itself, the only presumption in its favor arises from its being found among papers appertaining to, and now in, the office.

It is not necessary to pursue this inquiry further. The Secretary of the Treasury could have no knowledge of the conversation or the acts of Mr. Edwards and Mr. Stephenson in Edwardsville in 1819, nor has he expressed either belief or opinion respecting them. What was officially known to him he has communicated. For the correctness of that knowledge only is he solicitous. Nor would this scrutiny into the circumstances of the paper dated 12th of October, 1819, be made, if Mr. Edwards had contented himself with the production of it in explanation of his oath of 1823, and his justification of that part of it which depended upon his own knowledge. It is, however, now produced as presumptive evidence that the copy of it was received by the Secretary; and Mr. Edwards sought for the answer in the office of the Receiver, and has now sworn that he believes the letter of the Secretary, of the 1st of November, 1816, is the letter written after the reception of that of the 12th of October, to direct the Receiver to continue the deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville. The letter of the 1st of November makes no allusion to such letter; it is not a direction to continue the deposits; it is the determination of the Secretary that the course alleged in the letter of Lucy Stephenson of the 18th of September, which letter it now appears was also the work of Mr. Edwards, for the detention of the public moneys in the hands of the Receiver, did not authorize that detention.

Since Mr. Edwards has produced the paper purporting to be dated on the 12th October, 1819, it has been shown that it was impossible that the letter of the 1st November should have been the answer to it, or written in consequence of it. By the mail arrangements of 1819, prevailing until the 16th November of that year, as shown by the testimony of Mr. Bradley before the Committee, it required twenty days to transmit a letter from Washington to Edwardsville, and a longer time to transmit a letter from Edwardsville to Washington. The original accounts of the Postmaster of Edwardsville, taken from the Comptroller's office, and of which an extract is before the Committee, show that no mail left Edwardsville for Washington from the 9th October until the 16th of that month. More than twenty days from the 16th of October reaches beyond the 4th November. The letter of the 1st November was therefore written before it was possible for the letter of the 12th October, 1819, (if such had been written at Edwardsville,) to reach Washington. Admitting the impossibility that this should be otherwise, Mr. Edwards seeks to avoid the effect of this admission, by declaring on oath his belief that the letter of the 1st November was not written or sent before that of the 12th October was received. Either, therefore, the letter was fraudulently antedated or retained until the arrival of that document. To find a colorable pretext for this belief, Mr. Edwards (as the Committee will recollect) turned to the original letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 1st of November, to the Cashier of the Bank of Edwardsville, brought by Mr. Edwards from that place, which enclosed a copy of the letter of the same date to the Receiver, in order to ascertain the postmark upon it; and succeeded in persuading himself that there was the figure 8 in the postmark. A clerk of the post office (Mr. Sweeny) was sent for by one of the Committee, (Mr. Taylor,) but Mr. Edwards declined examining him. Mr. Sweeny, however, was examined; and the postmark was ascertained to be the 3d of a month which could not be distinguished. This postmark, if of November, was on the original letter before the letter of the 12th October could have reached Washington. On the 19th June, after a deliberation of three days, Mr. Edwards amended his own testimony, and then declared that it was possible the letter of the 12th October might have arrived here in time to be answered by one of the 1st November, because it might have been carried by a private conveyance to Louisville, from whence it could have been brought by mail within the required time. In making this amendment to his former answer, Mr. Edwards appears to have forgotten how much he had previously said of the safety of the mail, and the improbability that any thing committed to it should have miscarried; and that Mr. Stephenson could not have felt so much anxiety to despatch a paper which it had required Mr. Edwards's influence to prevail on him to write, as to seek unusual means of hurrying it on by a mode of conveyance never before or after used by him for the conveyance of his official letters to the Department.

Mr. Edwards, however, has asserted that Mr. Crawford's letter of the 20th of April, 1820, was possibly the answer to the one of the 12th of October, 1819. In making this assertion, on oath, Mr. Edwards has not recollected the stress he lays upon the circumstance of the deposits having been withheld till the 31st of December, 1819, as proof that he had advised the Receiver to with-old the deposits; as evidence that the Receiver did write to Mr. Crawford the letter of the 12th October, and that that letter was answered; that, in consequence of that answer, the large sum of $8,191 was paid into the bank. In laying this tress upon the withholding of the deposits, as evidence that Mr. Stephenson was acting by his device, he had forgotten that he knew (having written Lucy Stephenson's letter of the 18th September, 1819) that the deposits had been withheld for months before he gave the advice, of the giving of which, that withholding is afterwards considered as satisfactory proof. Without weighing the ingenious suppositions made under oath, founded upon a paper not proved to have been seen by the Receiver, differing from his official directions and yet probably influencing him to do what he did not do—withhold the deposits—it will be sufficiently apparent that a letter of the 6th April, 1820, could not be the cause of deposits made in December, 1819, and January and February, 1820; in all which months, notwithstanding the advice Mr. Edwards has sworn he gave the Receiver, deposits were made by that officer, as appears by his accounts in the hands of the Committee, among the documents accompanying the Secretary's communication. The letter of the 20th of April is written, as appears on the face of it, in consequence of the deposits of public money having been partially made. In the Receiver's office at Edwardsville, has been found a letter answering the description of Mr. Edwards, in his testimony in 1823, or which could have been an answer to the paper of which the copy is now produced. Mr. Edwards has stated that he searched the office with the special object of discovering such a document, and that, except what he has produced, none such is to be found.

It is therefore respectfully submitted—
That the paper in the handwriting of Mr. Edwards found on the files of official letters appertaining to and now in the Receiver's office, is evidence only that Mr. Edwards wrote such a letter: That it is not official, although filed in the handwriting of the Receiver; as it is not in his handwriting, nor in that of any person employed in his office, and is not recorded in his letter-book:

That there is no evidence that the Receiver ever carried or sent a copy of it from his office:

That such letter never has been received at the Treasury Department; that no answer is in the Treasury Department, or Receiver's office at Edwardsville, or was ever written to such letter.

Mr. Edwards having declared, in his last address to the committee, delivered on the 19th of June, that he had made no charge against the Secretary, of suppressing the alleged correspondence with Mr. Stephenson, to which his oath of 823 refers, it might appear superfluous to trouble the committee with these remarks. But, on the very day that Mr. Edwards presented this disclaimer, the alteration in his testimony, heretofore mentioned, was made; and made, too, after the disclaimer was prepared and delivered. The conclusion, therefore, is, that Mr. Edwards seeks to have the stain of this charge on the Secretary, while he intends to avoid, if he can, the responsibility of having made it, and seeks to procure for his own testimony, which is the only testimony in support of it, a degree of respect to which it is not entitled. With this view of his intention, it will not be deemed improper to examine what has been said and attempted by Mr. Edwards on the subject.

In 1823, Mr. Edwards declared, on oath, to the committee of Congress, that he was very much surprised that this correspondence (meaning the alleged letter of Mr. Stephenson, of 12th October, and the alleged answer,) was not communicated by the Secretary, under resolutions of the House of Representatives, of the 9th January and 12th March, 1822, calling for certain correspondence between the Treasury Department and sundry banks.

In his address to the House, on the 6th of April last, he says: "Believing, as I call my God to witness I sincerely and confidently do, that Mr. Crawford did receive the letter mentioned in the above report, and that it is now in his possession, or has been purposely destroyed—" In the same address, he infers that, if this letter was not answered, Mr. Crawford being for some cause or other unwilling to acknowledge the receipt of it, "contrived to give the directions (to continue the deposits) under some other form or pretext than that of a direct answer to it."

In his replication, presented to the committee since the adjournment of Congress, whole pages are occupied by an argument to show that the alleged letter of the 12th October was sent, was received, and was answered. All the officers in the Secretary's office were called, as witnesses, to prove that the letter had been received in 1819, or had been found since the Secretary's report, of 22d March, 1824; and that the Secretary had purposely delayed making that report until Mr. Edwards was about to leave Washington. In all of which, the testimony adduced was conclusive, that neither the charge itself, nor either of the incidents alleged in aggravation of it by Mr. Edwards, was true.

Mr. Edwards argues, too, in his replication, that the Edwardsville Receiver's letter ought, according to Mr. Crawford's own view of the subject, to have been communicated to the House of Representatives, under the beforementioned resolutions, because one other Receiver's letter (the Receiver at St. Louis) had been communicated with his report of the ———, omitting to remember that this was communicated under a call requiring all the correspondence in relation to the Bank of Missouri, which made it his duty to transmit all letters respecting that bank, from whomsoever received.

In his testimony, now taken before the committee, Mr. Edwards declares he believes that, in 1819, the Secretary might have conceived the idea of concealing the letter of Mr. Stephenson, if it had been received, to screen himself from responsibility, if the Bank of Edwardsville afterwards failed, an event which, although he did not anticipate, he might have apprehended. In the same testimony, when compelled to admit that a letter could not have arrived, by mail, from the 16th of October to the 1st of November, 1819, he added, to that admission, an insinuation, on oath, that the letter of the Secretary was antedated, or retained, until the arrival of the alleged letter of the 12th October, 1819. After the testimony of Mr. Sweeny was given, instead of disavowing this insinuation, he was silent, and, three days afterwards, adds to that part of his testimony that from which it might be inferred that the letter of the 12th of October was sent, by private conveyance, to Louisville, and thence, by mail, to Washington.

All these declarations, and the publication of Mr. Edwards, at Louisville, in which he asserts that he has the most irresistible proof that the Receiver at Edwardsville did write the letter mentioned in his examination, and that Mr. Crawford did write a letter to the Receiver, directing him to continue the deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, make it necessary that it should be distinctly brought before the committee. That Mr. Edwards, in different parts of his testimony, contradicts himself; that his testimony of 1823 does not agree with the testimony taken before the present committee; that his statements, in his addresses to the committee, are contradictory to each other; that his statements, now given on oath, show that the impressions which his addresses were intended to make, were as he knew, unfounded; that he voluntarily declared, in the most emphatic manner, to different persons, that he was not the author of various publications against the Secretary, which he now acknowledges to have written; and finally, that he was, as admitted by himself, a party to a material alteration in a paper, produced by himself, purporting to be a copy of a paper appertaining to, and now in the Receiver's Office, at Edwardsville; an alteration, the obvious effect of which was to deceive the committee and the public, as to the character of the original, from which the copy was taken.

It is, therefore, respectfully submitted, that nothing, affecting the Secretary, and depending upon the oath of Mr. Edwards, can be taken as proved.

Hon. JOHN FLOYD, Chairman, &c.

Unprepared, at present, to defend myself against the testimony of the Hon. Mr. Noble, by which I have been perfectly surprised, I have been compelled to look to a future period for that purpose. Lest, however, some erroneous inferences to my prejudice may be drawn from the want of a formal defence on this subject before the Committee, I do most solemnly declare before God and my country, that, in the conversation which Mr. Noble states to have passed between him and myself, whensoever or wheresoever any part of it may have happened, he must, at least, have greatly misunderstood me, both in regard to the A. B. publications, and to Mr. Crawford; and that, if the conversation alluded to, or any part of it, happened, as he says it did, in his own room, it must have been after my nomination was confirmed by the Senate.

It will be recollected that Mr. Noble, disclaiming all party considerations, had professed to be my friend, and had taken "an active part" in favor of the confirmation of my nomination; of which, he proves, I was well apprized. It would, therefore, have been most extraordinary, that I should have thought it necessary to have made such statements to him, by which nothing was to be gained, and that I should have totally forborne to make them to any other Senator.

Nor can it be considered less strange, if those statements were made to him during the pendency of my nomination, that he, with all his zeal in my favor, and acting in direct opposition to the wishes of his political friends, should never, either with a view to aid me, or to justify himself, have given the slightest intimation of such conversation as he represents to have passed between us, to any one of those gentlemen whom it was calculated to conciliate, and from whom opposition was expected.

As to the conversation he mentions in regard to Mr. Crawford, it alludes to some facts which happened before I became a member of Congress, and of which I had no knowledge until since the commencement of the present controversy.

The very professions of gratitude which he says I made to him, would apply with much more force and propriety to a period after, than before, the confirmation of my nomination; and, from the nature of the case, they would seem to have been predicated upon a disinterestedness on his part, which was the more highly appreciated, because it overlooked the circumstances of his friendship and my hostility to Mr. Crawford, which is at war with the whole statement he has made, concerning my opinion of the conduct of that gentleman.

That Mr. Noble may have misunderstood me, I will not attempt to gainsay. But, as I hope for future happiness, I never did intend to have expressed myself to him, or any other person, so as to have conveyed the opinion and sentiments which he has imputed to me; nor can I account, by any thing within my own knowledge, for such great misapprehensions.

My object, however, is not now to present an argument upon the case, but simply to request the committee to accept of this as my denial of Mr. Noble's testimony, and to have it printed with my other communications to the committee.

"The Greeks have an agent in this Peninsula Luriottis. He was here a fortnight, asking aid of money, which he did not receive. Indeed, he left this, disgusted with the coldness with which he was treated by San Miguel. He has gone to Lisbon, with sanguine hopes of meeting, if not aid, at least kinder treatment. I enclose to you copies Nos. 1 and 2 of an official statement, made for him in April last by his Government, of the state of their affairs, and of his letter to the Spanish Government. We have favorable news from the Greeks, from various sources. The Albanians are now their allies; they have again been successful, by sea, against the Turks, and the best hopes of their ultimate and complete triumph are entertained.

The most cruel of tyrannies, of exactions without number, induced the Greeks to a just revolt. Their first operations were attended with some successes, which were of very little consequence, owing to the want of union among themselves. Some particular governments were established, but they did not answer the purpose which was intended. Then the deputies of the nation were called together at Epidamus, for the purpose of establishing an Organic law. This assembly, of which Prince Mavrocordato was President, after a month of deliberations, fixed the mode of a provisional government, the duration of which was to be one year.

After the dissolution of this assembly, the Government which had been formed in it was proclaimed, and recognised in the Islands, the Peloponnesus, and the Continent. The people being satisfied, submitted with joy to its decisions, and order and justice succeeded to violence and anarchy.

The authority of this Government acquires, every day, new strength, and it may be hoped that, soon, Greece, regenerated by the benefits of a wise and paternal administration, will show herself worthy of its independence.

By the efforts of its defenders, the Peloponnesus will be no more polluted by the presence of its oppressors. Four fortresses, Patras, Coron, Modon, Napoli de Romani, only remain in the power of the Turks; and the hour of their fall approaches. Napoli de Romani is about to follow the example of Corinth, which surrendered at discretion, and the other places are about to be entirely deprived of provisions and munitions, by the flight of the Turkish fleet. This fleet having left the Dardanelles, in the month of February, was favored by the winds, which prevented their passage of the Archipelago from being disputed. But at Navarino the Greeks, seconded by the ability of General Lenormand, and by the courage of some European officers, who were shut up there, rendered the projects upon that place abortive; this, doubtless, compelled it to go against Patras, and there effect the landing of the troops, which it had on board. It was after this operation that it was encountered by the naval forces of the Greeks. The Turkish fleet, beaten, pursued, and entirely dispersed, was obliged to seek refuge towards the coast of Egypt, where it was surprised by a tempest, in which it lost four frigates and two brigs. All the crews of these ships, and the commander of the squadron, Ismael Gibraltar, were drowned. It was also obliged to abandon, on our coasts, several transports loaded with provisions, destined for the army which came to be landed.

This army, composed of four thousand men, weakened every day by the diseases and dissensions which have sway in it, takes refuge under the cannon of the fortress of Patras, into which entrance has been refused it. There, blockaded on one side by a Greek squadron, and on the other harassed, night and day, by the troops of General Colocotroni, it will prove, by its total annihilation, that every effort will always be vain, against a people which wishes for its liberty, cost what it will.

In Attica, the fortress of Athens alone is in the power of the Turks, and the bombardment of it, to which a fortunate issue is expected, commenced several days ago.

Bœotia, Phœcis, and Locris, have driven out the enemies of their beautiful provinces. The Government is very seriously occupied with the means of possessing itself of Zitouny, where there is still a body of the Turkish army, in order to enable it to cause the troops in Thessaly to advance simultaneously with the general movement of the inhabitants of Mount Olympus, a bold and warlike people, and render the position of the enemy more critical.

The defiles of Pindus being in our possession, all communication between the rest of Turkey and Thessaly, and all retreat for the enemy's army, that shall then be in this province, will be immediately, from that time, impossible. All Etolia, Epirus, and almost all Arcaïa, are in the power of the Government, with the exception of some places which are under a rigorous blockade.

I have now to speak of Albania. What will be its relations with us? The future alone can resolve this important question; and the well known character of this people does not permit the calculation of events from probabilities; sometimes neuter and sometimes partisans, by turns our allies and enemies, which they have practised to the present time, passing in appearance from one party to another, without really serving the interests of that which they had adopted. The death of Ali Pacha has produced little effect. The Turks, proud of this success, which they owe only to the treachery of the very soldiers of this Pacha, have appeared to take courage; but, being repulsed at Wonizza, they appeared to have almost abandoned their attempts. Such is the situation of affairs in the Peloponnesus and on the continent.

Almost all the Islands being free, have submitted to the Government, and cause the Greek flag to be respected in the Archipelago. At Chios, six thousand Samiotes have landed, to favor the independence of that island, and have shut up the Turks in the fortress. Mitylene in a short time will have shaken off its yoke, and Candia still combats, with advantage, against superior forces; but the known valor of its inhabitants, and the justice of their cause, will make up for number.

At the moment I am writing, the news of the victory obtained over the Turks at Rignassa, comes, to be communicated to the Government; four hundred of the enemy remain upon the field of battle, and the rest of their army has been put to flight. The Suliotes, by their accustomed bravery, have covered themselves with glory.

More recent news come to inform us of more new successes; Colonel Ulysses, with fifteen hundred men, landed on the 1st of April at Heliss; after an obstinate battle against forces superior in number, he became master of the village, as also of the port of St. Marine, pursued the enemy to Zitouni, killed three hundred men, and made some prisoners. General Niketa, commander of the Peloponnesian troops, joined his operations to those of Colonel Ulysses, and, from every thing, it is believed they have already entered Zitouni. Colonels Mitzi, Kondojanni and Skalzodiani advanced upon Patradjik, and have gained some advantages. Of the body of the Greek army, composed of ten thousand men, who act from this side to the centre, commanded by Colonel Parvurja, supported by Miezatis, the right wing is formed by the troops of General Eritika and of Colonel Ulysses, and its left wing by those of Colonels Kondojanni and Skalzodiani.

A new fleet is just gone from Constantinople; it is composed of vessels of different sizes; it has attempted a landing on the island of Chios, but, repulsed with loss at that point, it has retired.

[TRANSLATION.]

ote of Mr. Luriotis, Agent of the Greeks, at Madrid, to his Excellency Evaristo San Miguelo, Secretary of the Despatch of State of His Catholic Majesty.

I lay it please your Excellency :

If there is a time when the principles ought to be revived, which an unfortunate, but very celebrated philosopher of France, published in 1793, That the men of all countries are brothers, and the different nations ought mutually to assist each other according to their power, as citizens of the same State :

“ That those who make war on a people for the purpose of arresting the progress of liberty, and destroying the rights of man, ought to be everywhere pursued, not as ordinary enemies, but as assassins and rebellious robbers :

“ That tyrants, whoever they may be, are slaves revolted against mankind, the sovereign of the earth, and against nature, the legislator of the universe :”

And if there is a nation, in whose favor these principles ought to be applied, it is, doubtless, Greece, at the present time. It is not intended, here, to press the rights which the Greeks have, the being recognised by the civilized nations of Europe, for the lights which their ancestors have given them in liberal sciences, arts, legislations, and in true models of men, illustrious for their love of country; and still less the most evident rights which they will now have to shake off the Mussulman yoke, with which any of the despotisms, against which the other nations of Europe contend, could not be compared. It will be sufficient only to remark, that Greece, victorious and free, is the most certain security of the liberties of the Spanish peninsula :

Because, from the certain liberty in Greece, necessarily flows that of Italy, which is enslaved, if it may be allowed the expression, between the Peninsula and the new Grecian States :

Because, the establishment of a free State, raised in Greece, upon the ruins of the legitimate Ottoman power, at the time when open war has been declared between the people and the despots, as between the principles of light and the principles of darkness, ought to result in the annihilation of his Empire of the Crescent, and, consequently, that of its accessories, Tunis, Tripoli and Algiers; and, the Greeks being once masters of the Egean Sea, these three pirates will be no more able to recruit their bands of assassins in Albania, at Smyrna, and at Constantinople; and they will here lose their forces, which have been always restless, and even now, Spain, and the increase of his moral fire, which the legitimates call pest, which ought to deliver Germany from despotism, and encourage the French to resume their ancient post in the career of liberty; and because, in fine, this will only be after the accomplishment of these prophecies, that this peninsula will be left sufficiently tranquil at home and abroad to be able to reckon upon its consolidation of its liberty, which has cost, and does every day cost, it so many sacrifices of every kind.

Spain has no real need of succor from any other nation for maintaining itself a State free and independent.

The courage, the heroism of her children, are, in every respect, a proof; but the despotism, to succeed in its liberticidal projects, does not always please to excite, to irritate this valor. It is sure of its triumph, provided that it should succeed in keeping alive the fire of civil discord. Even the most courageous people feel themselves fatigued of so trifling, yet continued a war, and often, after the torments of despotism, they have recourse to this as to a guardian angel; preferring the future, but little felt evil, to the present; and tranquillity, although cadaverous, to a struggle which leaves them no repose—at this very moment, Spain makes trial of a part of this sad truth. The insulating, therefore, of a nation which wishes to be free, is, in the times where we live, the most impolitic measure which she can adopt.

Despotism has formed and published its alliance; and has, if I may be allowed the expression, hurled a formal defiance at the nations that wish to maintain or to recover their liberties. It insults them all, because it is conscious of its power to vanquish them, either by the force of hiring bayonets, with which it inundates them, or by the silent-maœuvres which organize civil war, the division and quarrels of parties with which it harasses them. It is, therefore, necessary to oppose to this alliance of tyrants, that of the nations who have achieved their liberty.

If, for a nation to be free, the will of being so were sufficient; if, what gives the disposition, insured equally success; if, in fine, the valor of a people were a sure guarantee of success, Greece and the Greeks would not this day doubt of their triumph. The modern Greeks have already, in more than one engagement with the Turks, shown themselves worthy successors of the Greeks of Marathon, of Thermopylae, of Salamis, of Strimon, of Onidas, &c., but they want men, for frightful despotism capriciously destroyed them, and of it population has never been an accompaniment. They want money, because it would have been the price of their head to have been rich. They want arms, powder, lead; because no despotic government leaves these at the mercy of slaves; and because the struggle which the Greeks have so long maintained, has consumed the provisions which their bravery and the small succors brought by the forsigner had procured them. Yet, they still continue, in more than one place, to fight, and defend themselves against the Turks, with inferior weapons.

They have abundance of lands and national property: for three-fifths of the territory belonged to the Mussulmans, as the price of confiscations made after cutting off the heads of opulent Greeks; but these lands, this property, are nothing at the present moment, when the Greeks ought to handle the musket instead of the plough, when money is wanting, and when the public credit is not yet established.

The Greeks will never return under the Ottoman yoke. But, in continuing a struggle so unequal, without other support, without other succor, they will all perish. What is the use of liberty in the tomb? What the advantages which Spain, Italy, and Europe, panting after liberty, can expect from a triumph over the Greeks?

The United States of America, after having sustained, with equal courage, and at equal sacrifices, their cause of Independence, against a despotism much less dreadful, owed their triumph to the protection of a European Power. Why should not Greece rely upon some protector among the free States of that same part of the world to which she belongs? By what fatality is she persecuted by the Government of England, which ought to be the father of free nations, and forgotten by those Governments which profess the same principles which she has just proclaimed?

The Greeks have till now been flattered by a number of private associations who came to their aid, but no Government has as yet partaken of this generous enthusiasm; and yet the succors, as well moral as physical, which are necessary for them, cannot be afforded them but by Governments.

There is some reason to believe that the Government of Corinth has opened some negotiation with the said United States of America. May these States pay, in favor of Greece, the tribute of recognition which they owe to Europe for the liberty which they know so well how to enjoy.

The same Government, which leaves nothing untried which may conduce to the triumph of the holy cause which it directs, cannot forget to address itself to magnanimous Spain, to a nation which, more than every other, shows to the universe that she feels all the value of liberty and independence, to a Government which, each day, ought to be more persuaded that the allied despotism aims, and will aim, more or less, openly, but always obstinately enough, at the consolidation of its present system. As to politics, the before cited Wicqueford says that the infallible means of vanquishing one's rivals in diplomacy, is to be frank, because he is sure of not meeting them in his way.

If, then, Spain can believe it to be to her advantage to recognise, and to protect, and to succor the Government of Corinth, what measure, what conduct, has she to pursue towards the other Governments, which have never openly pronounced against the Hellenic revolution?

The undersigned is not authorized to speak upon this article. He is only commissioned, in general, to solicit every species of succor which the Spaniards can send to the Greeks, either in money, or arms, powder, lead, men, ships, frigates, brigs, &c., of war.

But he knows how far, among the generous succors, the article of a like moral aid would preponderate. Interested for his country, he confines himself to the making the rough draught, and to offer up prayers that the Spanish Government would be pleased to send some one to Greece, to treat upon this important subject, and upon all the others which might be necessary, and of great utility to Spain.

In the meantime, upon the point of physical succor, the undersigned has the honor to observe to your Excellency, that the question is not respecting a donation, but only respecting a loan, and that the responsibility of a free Government in Greece is beyond all the wants and those which it will have to fulfil to arrive at its consolidation.

That small succors are also useful to the Greeks in their present situation, because every little thing becomes a great deal to one who is pressed by want.

That the manner of carrying them into Greece, and securing the reimbursement, is left to the will of the Spanish Government.

That the greatest secrecy ought to be observed in all that Spain wishes to do, as a Government, in favor of the Greeks, in order that the diplomatic spies may not try to perplex it, and may not succeed in rendering it abortive.

That, finally, in the absence of the persons to whom the undersigned had letters to deliver here at Madrid, on the part of Prince Mavroordato, of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Negri, and of the Bishop Ignatius of Pisa, that they would be pleased to support their requests as well before the Government as before the brave Spanish patriots, it was, doubtless, a happiness for the undersigned to have met here a Minister so eminently well affected, and a Minister of Foreign Relations so liberal as your Excellency, to whom he can directly address himself in the two-fold aim mentioned, and in the accomplishment of his mission.

Your Excellency's most obedient and most humble servant,

LURIOTTIS.

MADRID, November 21, 1822.

Extract of a Letter from Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams, dated

LONDON, February 24, 1823.

"I received, the day before yesterday, a paper, of which a copy is enclosed, addressed to you, by Andreas Luriottis, an agent or deputy from Corinth, on behalf of the cause of the Greeks."

It will be perceived that, after describing the general nature of the revolution now going on in Greece, the object of the paper is to solicit aid of the United States, and the establishment of diplomatic connexions with them.

This gentleman, who has recently arrived in London, brought me a letter of introduction from General Dearborn, at Lisbon, and I received him in a manner due to the interesting character which he bears. I assured him that the fortunes of his country were dear to the people of the Unind States, who, cherishing the freedom which they themselves inherited and enjoyed, looked with the warmest sympathy upon the struggle of the Greeks for their national liberties; and that the Government of the United States participated in this feeling. Of the latter, I considered the late mention of the subject by the President, in his message to Congress, at the opening of the session, as the authentic proof.

To the inquiries of Mr. Luriottis, whether my Government would open political or diplomatic relations with his, at the present day, I replied, that this formed a point on which I was wholly uninformed, and could not undertake to give my opinion. That it involved considerations of expediency, as applicable to the United States, as well as of advantage, or otherwise, as applicable to the Greek cause itself, that would be maturely weighed at Washington, before any decision could be pronounced. All that I could say, was, to reiterate the assurance of the friendly interest that was felt amongst us, for the success of the cause in which his country was embarked; and I adhered to the part which my Government had acted, in relation to the South American struggle—a part so much in advance of that of any other Government—as a sure indication that it could feel no backwardness in welcoming, when the proper day arrived, the new-born freedom of Greece, into the family of nations. In the end, I informed him that I would gladly become the organ of transmitting to my Government whatever distinctive overtures or communication he might determine to make to it—a request which, in the course of our conversation, he had himself made of me. These overtures he has set forth in the paper enclosed.

Mr. Luriottis dwelt with confidence upon the advances which his country has made in the career of her independence—advances the more solid and encouraging, as they have been won amidst formidable difficulties, by the mere unassisted efforts of her own valor and constancy. Since the capture of Napoli de Romania, the strongest fortress which the Turks had in the Morea, he seemed to consider that the cause of independence was placed upon a sure basis. The Greeks, since this event, have removed the seat of their Government from Corinth, where it was fixed at first, to Napoli.”

Andreas Luriottis, Envoy of the Provisional Government of Greece, to the Honorable John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State to the United States of America.

SIR: I feel no slight emotion, while, in behalf of Greece, my country, struggling for independence and liberty, I address myself to the United States of America.

The independence for which we combat, you have achieved. The liberty to which we look, with anxious solicitude, you have obtained, and consolidated in peace and in glory.

Yet Greece, old Greece, the seat of early civilization and freedom, stretches out her hands imploringly to a land which sprung into being, as it were, ages after her own lustre had been extinguished, and ventures to hope that the youngest and most vigorous sons of liberty will regard with no common sympathy the efforts of the descendants of the heir and the elder born, whose precepts and whose examples have served, though insufficient hitherto for our complete regeneration, to regenerate half a world.

I know, sir, that the sympathies of the generous people of the United States have been extensively directed towards us; and since I have reached this country, an interview with their Minister, Mr. Rush, has served to convince me more strongly how great their claim is on our gratitude and our affection. May I hope that some means may be found to communicate these our feelings, of which I am so proud to be the organ? We still venture to rely on their friendship; we would look to their individual, if not to their national co-operation. Every, the slightest assistance, under present circumstances, will aid the progress of the great work of liberty; and if, standing as we have stood, alone and unsupported, with every thing opposed to us, and nothing to encourage us but patriotism, enthusiasm, and, sometimes, even despair; if thus we have gone forward liberating our provinces, one after another, and subduing every force which has been directed against us, what may we not do with the assistance for which we venture to appeal to the generous and the free?

Precipitated by circumstances into that struggle for independence which, ever since the domination of our cruel and reckless tyrants, had never ceased to be the object of our vows and prayers, we have, by the blessing of God, freed a considerable part of Greece from the ruthless invaders. The Peloponnesus, Etolia, Carmania, Attica, Phocida, Bceotia, and the islands of the Archipelago, and Candia, are nearly free. The armies and the fleets which have been sent against us have been subdued by the valor of our troops and our marine. Meanwhile, we have organized a Government founded upon popular suffrages, and you will probably have seen how closely our organic law assimilates to that Constitution under which your nation so happily and so securely lives.

I have been sent hither by the Government of Greece to obtain assistance in our determined enterprise, on which we, like you, have staked our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor; and I believe my journey has not been wholly without success. I should have been wanting to my duty had I not addressed you, supplicating the earliest display of your amicable purposes; entreating that diplomatic relations may be established between us; communicating the most earnest desire of my Government that we may be allowed to call you allies as well as friends; and stating that we shall rejoice to enter upon discussions which may lead to immediate and advantageous treaties, and to receive as to expedite diplomatic agents without delay. Both at Madrid and at Lisbon I have been received with great kindness by the American representative, and am pleased to record the expression of my gratitude.

Condition and Prospects of the Greeks.

Though, fortunately, you are so far removed, and raised so much above the narrow politics of Europe as to be little influenced by its vicissitudes; I venture to believe that Mr. Rush will explain to you the changes that have taken place, and are still in action around us in our favor; and I conclude, rejoicing in the hope that North America and Greece may be united in the bonds of long-enduring and unbroken concord, and have the honor to be,

With every sentiment of respect, &c.,
AND. LURIOTTIS.
LONDON, February 20, 1823.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 18, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, an answer to the letter from Mr. Luriottis, the agent of the Greeks, addressed to me, and a copy of which was transmitted with your despatch, No. 295.

If, upon the receipt of this letter, Mr. Luriottis should still be in London, it will be desirable that you should deliver it to him in person, accompanied with such remarks and explanations as may satisfy him, and those whom he represents, that, in declining the proposal of giving active aid to the cause of Grecian emancipation, the Executive Government of the United States has been governed, not by its inclinations, or a sentiment of indifference to the cause, but, by its constitutional duties, clear and unequivocal.

The United States could give assistance to the Greeks only by the application of some portion of their public force or of their public revenue in their favor, and it would constitute them in a state of war with the Ottoman Porte, and perhaps with all the Barbary Powers. To make this disposal either of force or of treasure, you are aware, is, by our Constitution, not within the competency of the Executive. It could be determined only by an act of Congress, which would assuredly not be adopted, should it even be recommended by the Executive.

The policy of the United States with reference to foreign nations has always been founded upon the moral principle of natural law—peace with both belligerents. From whatever cause war between other nations, whether foreign or domestic, has arisen, the unvarying law of the United States has been peace with both belligerents. From the first war of the French revolution to the recent invasion of Spain, there has been a succession of wars, national and civil, in almost every one of which one of the parties was contending for liberty or independence. To the first revolutionary war, a strong impulse of feeling urged the people of the United States to take side with the party which, at its commencement, was contending, apparently, at least, for both. Had the policy of the United States not been essentially pacific, a stronger case to claim their interference could scarcely have been presented. They nevertheless declared themselves neutral, and the principle then deliberately settled has been invariably adhered to ever since.

With regard to the recognition of sovereign States, and the establishment with them of a diplomatic intercourse, the experience of the last thirty years has served also to ascertain the limits proper for the application of principles, in which every nation must exercise some latitude of discretion. Precluded, by their neutral position, from interfering in the question of right, the United States have recognised the fact of foreign sovereignty, only when it was undisputed, or disputed without any rational prospect of success. In this manner, the successive changes of Government in many of the European States, and the revolutionary Governments of South America, have been acknowledged. The condition of the Greeks is not yet such as will admit of the recognition upon these principles.

Yet, as we cherish the most friendly feelings towards them, and are sincerely disposed to render them any service, which may be compatible with our neutrality, it will give us pleasure to learn, from time to time, the actual state of their cause, political and military. Should Mr. Luriottis be enabled and disposed to furnish this information, it may always be communicated through you, and will be received with satisfaction here. The public accounts from that quarter have been, of late, very scanty, and we shall be glad to obtain any authentic particulars which may come to your knowledge, from this, or through any other channel.

I am, with great respect, &c.,
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.
RICHARD RUSH, Envoy, &c., at London.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Luriottis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 18, 1823.

SIR: A copy of the letter which you did me the honor of addressing to me, on the 20th of February last, has been transmitted to me by the Minister of the United States at London, and has received the deliberate consideration of the President of the United States.

The sentiments with which he has witnessed the struggle of your countrymen for their national emancipation and independence, had been made manifest to the world in the public Message to the Congress of the United States. They are cordially felt by the people of this Union; who, sympathizing with the cause of freedom and independence, wherever its standard is unfurled, behold with peculiar interest the display of Grecian energy in defence of Grecian liberties, and the association of heroic exertions, at the present time, with the proudest glories of former ages, in the land of Epaminondas and of Philopœmon.

But, while cheering with their best wishes the cause of the Greeks, the United States are forbidden, by the duties of their situation, from taking part in the war, to which their relation is that of neutrality. At peace themselves with all the world, their established policy, and the obligations f the laws of nations, preclude them from becoming voluntary auxiliaries to a cause which would involve them in war.

If, in the progress of events, the Greeks should be enabled to establish and organize themselves as an independent nation, the United States will be among the first to welcome them, in that capacity, into the general family; to establish diplomatic and commercial relations with them, suited to the mutual interests of the two countries, and to recognise, with special satisfaction, their constituted state in the character of a sister Republic. I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

ANDREAS LURIOTTIS,
Envoy of the Provisional Government of the Greeks, London.

Extract of a letter to the Secretary of State, dated Marsailles, August 6, 1823.

"I have endeavored to obtain accurate information relative to the actual state of the struggle between the Greeks and the Ottomans. The following particulars, I think, may be relied on. The Porte is making great preparations by land to bring the war to a successful conclusion. The Turkish fleet has succeeded in provisioning, for a year, the garrisons of Carysto, in Negropont, Janée, the capital of Candia, (or Crete,) and also Coron, Modon, Patras, and Corinth, in the Morea. The two last places have been repeatedly and incorrectly represented, in the American newspapers, as having long since surrendered. The Porte has offered the Greeks, through the mediation of Lord Strangford, to place the Morea on the same footing as the provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia; i. e. to place it under the government of a Greek Prince, who should have the entire administration of the affairs of the province, and who would annually pay a certain portion of its revenues into the treasury of the Porte. The British Ambassador, in order to induce the Greeks to accept these terms, has dispersed among them a declaration, that they are not to expect aid from any of the European Sovereigns. On the other hand, the Greeks do not seem as yet disposed to peace, but are making preparations to resist, as they say, the forces which are approaching them on all sides. Such was the state of things by the latest advices."

Extract of a letter to the Secretary of State, dated

"MARSEILLES, Aug. 27, 1823.

"There is no certain intelligence from Greece other than that contained in a letter I had the honor to forward to you a fortnight since. The Turkish Admiral was, fifteen days ago, in the neighborhood of Patras, where he had landed five thousand men. The Smyrna Gazette reports, that the main Turkish army, 60,000 strong, had obtained, after some hard fighting, possession of the defiles of Thermopylae, but this as yet is not confirmed."

STATISTICAL TABLE of Greece, according to the work of MR. POUQUEVILLE. Original received from Mr. Middleton, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at St. Petersburg.

[N. B. * This mark indicates the cities and provinces freed since 1821, and at present in submission to the National Congress of Corinth.

† Indicates the countries in insurrection.

‡ Indicates the cities and forts besieged by the Turks.]

Greece may be apportioned into three grand divisions—continental Greece,† the isthmus of Peloponnesus,* and the islands.

Continental Greece.—It contains seven provinces, which are—Epirus,† Macedonia,† Thessaly,† Acarnania,* Etolia,* Locris,* Phocis,* comprehending Livadia.†

Epirus† has an extent of 1,100 square leagues of 2,500 toises. The population is estimated at 373,000 souls. Its principal cities are Janina, Zagori, Conitza, Prémithy, Cleissoura, Condessi, Canina, Tebelen, Aulone, (a port,) Bérat, (a fortress,) Elbassan, Durazzo, (a fort,) Argyro-Castrou, Liboro, Delvino, (fortified,) Conispolis, Paramythia, Gomenitza, (a port,) Margariti, Parga, (a fort,) Regniassa, (a fort,)* Preresia, (a port and fort,) Souli, (a fort,)* Arta, (a fort and seaport,) Calarites,* Metzowo,* Syraco, &c.

The rivers which pass through Epirus in different ways, are the Voïoussa or Aous, the Calamas or Thyamis, the Glykys or Acheron.

The country generally is mountainous, intersected with large valleys; its aspect is various, and may be said to present an abridgment of all the climates; it abounds in cattle, and in rich pastures. The articles of exportation consist of grain, of sheep and goats, of building timber, cotton, wool, pitch, wax, tobacco; and some mountains of Epirus contain mines, which the Government neglect to explore, and which the Christian inhabitants dare not discover, fearful of being themselves buried in these mines, to gratify the cupidity of their masters.

The principal seaports of Epirus are—L'Arta, Aulone, Prevesa, Vonitza, Port Palarme, Porto Raguzo, Gomenitza, Durazzo. The value of wares and foreign productions imported by these ports was, in the year 1812, 6,590,902 piastres; the exportation, during the same year, was 7,804,063 piastres. The Epirotes are, in general, warlike, and of a robust constitution, impatient of the yoke, and proud, in spite of the dependence in which they live; shepherds rather than agriculturists, they almost all carry arms, and prefer to inhabit the mountains, and the situations most difficult of access. Divided into colonies, and long governed by the feudal administration of the Beys, they have seen, too late, all these partial tyrannies united into one only, and the most monstrous of all, that of Ali Pacha of Jannina. In the midst of the chaos of the administration of this Vizier, it may be calculated that Epirus paid annually to the Grand Signor a tribute of two millions of piastres, and that Ali received for himself ten other millions, without including the revenues of his sons, the advances and spoiliations of every kind to which this province was exposed.

Macedonia,† divided into Hlyrian and Cisaxian, has an extent of 1,692 square leagues. Its population may approximate to 436,000 inhabitants. Its most remarkable cities and towns are—Bitolia or Monastir, Prilipé, Cojani, Delvendos, Flourina, Cailary, Castoria, Greveno, Lepsiní, Bichlistas, Croupitcha, Piassa, Gheortelia, Staria, Prespa, Critchowa, Ochrida, Chatista, Veria,* or Karaveria, Jenidjé, Salonica.

The rivers which water Macedonia are the Vardar or Axios, and the Bichlista or Haliæmon. This province abounds in small cattle, corn, wines, cotton, and tobacco.

The Macedonians are agriculturists and merchants. The merchants of Bitolia, of Castoria, of Chatista, and of Salonica, have frequent correspondence with the commercial places of Europe; they send caravans to Bosnia and Hungary. The Macedonians, as well as the other nations of Greece, partake of their Hellenic origin; they are brave and considerate. Numerous Bulgarian and Albanian colonies are established in this province, actually divided into cantons, and subject to the destructive administration of the Pachas of Romelia and their subordinates.

Thessaly† contains, within an extent of 516 square leagues, 275,000 inhabitants; there are reckoned 962 villages, and the following cities: Tricala, (the chief place, and residence of a Pacha,) Klinoro, Stagous, Pharsalia, Larissa, Alasson, Rapchana, Tournovo, Platamon, (a fort,) Caterin, Agia, Velestina, Dechani, Volo, (a port,) Amyros, Thaumaco. Thessaly, watered by the Peneus, and by several other rivers, tributaries of that river, is one of the most fertile countries of European Turkey: it produces corn, silk, cotton, tobacco, and, until the year 1810, the manufactories of Tournovo, of Ambelakia, and of Agia, sent abroad dyed cottons, stuffs, and woollens, to the amount of several millions; the Greek merchants of these cities had factories in Germany. The seaport of Volo, situated on the gulf of the same name, favored the exportation of the grain which the sailors of Idra, and of other islands, came there to load. The natives of Thessaly vary in their character, and their occupations, according to the places which they inhabit; industrious and submissive in the cities, laborious and peaceful husbandmen in the country, intrepid sailors in the cantons situated near the sea, they are bold and independent in the mountainous regions. Numerous bands of these mountaineers go from Olympus, from Ossa, and from Mount Pelion, and having at their heads enterprising chiefs, sometimes contend with the forces of the Pacha of Epirus, and of Romelia; They have even possessed themselves of several cities of Thessaly, and defended them for years. Worn out with efforts, disappointed in their hopes, and deprived of their brave chiefs, they retired to their mountains, where they still form a population warlike and independent.

Acarmania* has an extent of 92 square leagues and 8,635 inhabitants; the remains of a population formerly flourishing. There are still reckoned there sixteen cities and villages, the most remarkable of which are, Vonitza, Catona, Dragomestre, and Catochi, (a seaport.) This province, which made a part of the Government of Ali Pacha, and which has undergone all the torments of his administration, presents only ruins and solitude. It, nevertheless, carries on a feeble commerce with the Ionian Islands and the Ambracia or Artan Gulf; its inhabitants keep up the fisheries in the same gulf, as well as on the numerous lakes in the interior of the country.

In this province, as in all the continent of Greece, there are found, in the declivities of mountains, hamlets and villages inhabited by men, who, flying from oppression, and striving to insulate themselves wherever they find a savage nature. Masters of the defiles which form the passage between Epirus and the southern provinces of Greece, the mountaineers of Acarnania can interrupt the communication between these two provinces, and oppose, with success, the movements of an army which might try to advance from this side towards Etolia and the Morea. Some cantons of this province are, at this day, entirely uncultivated and depeopled; others are covered with forests and barren grounds, which only want strength to be converted into productive lands.

Etolia,* separated from Acarnania by the river Aspropotamos or Achelous, contains, in its present subdivisions, four cantons, and 83,455 inhabitants, distributed among 236 towns and villages, the principal of which are: Vrachori, Carpenitze, Agrapha, Missolonghi, (a port,) Lepante, or Napatæ, (a fort, and residence of a Pacha.) This province produces grain, rice, oil, silk, and wine. These productions, added to the revenue of the fisheries and customs, give an annual produce of 3,293,700 piastres.

The cantons of Etolia, annexed, according to the register of the Ottoman Government to the Pachaik of Negroptot, had been successively seized upon by Ali Pacha, who intrusted the administration of them to his lieutenants. The pure blood of the ancient Etolians, their carelessness, their contempt of death, is still found among the colonies of Agrapha and of Carpenitze. Animated with the energy which the vital air of the mountains of these cantons gives them, they are always induced to repel the attacks of the tyranny. In this part of Etolia, the league of the armatolis was formed. These bands, reinforced by all the discontented of Greece, have sometimes opposed force to force, fanaticism to fanaticism, and have caused the satraps of Thessaly and Epirus to make satisfaction for the unjust enterprises formed against their liberty.

The country comprehending Locris,* Phocis,* Livadia,† and Attica, contains, by an approximating calculation, 450 square leagues, and a population of about 140,000 souls. Salone, Thebes, Livadia, and Athens,‡ are the principal cities of this country; the face and resources of which are, with some variations, nearly the same as in the ountries which have been just above delineated in the table. It may be affirmed, that, in all these provinces, forming continental Greece, the number of Christian inhabitants is, to that of Mahometans, in the proportion of five to one; which would give to all this region a total of 1,316,080 inhabitants, of which there are more than a million of Christians, dispersed over an extent of country which could abundantly contain and support upwards of thrice that population.

PELOPONNESUS.

Peloponnesus,* or the Morea, has a surface of 40 square leagues. Its population is 240,000 Christian inhabitants, distributed in 1,421 villages, towns, and cities, the principal of which are: Corinth, (a fort,) Argos, Naupli, (a fort and port,)† St. Pierre, Mistra, or Sparta, Monembossie, (a fort,) Calamaté, Androussa, Coron, (a fort and road for shipping,)‡ Modon, (a fort and road,)‡ Lavarin, (a fort and port,) Arcadia, Gastouni, Lala, Patras, (a fort and port,)‡ Vostitza, Calaryta, Tripolitza, (a fort,) Cariténe, Leondari.

Its rivers are the Rofia or the Alpheus, the Tossili-Potamos, or the Eurotas, and several others of a shorter course. The mountains of Arcadia, those of Lala or the ancient Pholœ, Mount Menos, and the Taygete, connect the country in different ways. Notwithstanding the catastrophes which the Peloponnesus has experienced, and notwithstanding the ruinous administration of the Pashas, this province still preserves immense resources, owing to its fertility as well as to its topographical situation. Its agricultural productions are numerous and various; and, according to a calculation made upon the places, the different cantons of the Peloponnesus produce, one year with another, 820,000 kilos. of corn, (wheat,) which fetches 6,560,000 piastres, reckoning the kilo. at eight piastres, the selling price upon the places; 169,000 kilos. of maize, barley, and dry vegetables, making 7,402,000 piastres, according to the ordinary sale price; 53,000 barrels of oil, making 790,200 piastres, reckoning the barrel at from 10 to 45 piastres; 227,550 pounds of silk, making 738,500 piastres; 278,000 quintals of cotton and raw wool, making 1,388,900 piastres. The other revenues of agriculture and of industry—such as wine, cheese, butter, cattle, currants, honey, cotton thread, and stuffs of wool—produce annually in cash the sum of 8,818,500 piastres, which gives a total of 30,698,000. The different imposts and ground rents of the Province amounted, in the year 814, to 12,816,241 piastres, which left in favor of the managers a difference of 17,881,759 piastres. With this excess, of which the seventeenth went to the treasuries of the Beys, the Agas, and the great proprietors, the inhabitants pay their individual expenses, and the cantons buy in the markets of the province the provisions of the first necessity which they do not grow, and the articles coming from abroad.

In the above extract of revenues and of ground rents of the Peninsula, the country of Magna* or ancient Laconia, is not included. This canton, placed upon the declivities of Mount Taygete, from the city of Calamatá to Cape Matapan, is divided into twelve captaincies, and forms a particular species of government, subject to the authority of a native Bey or Prince, held of the Grand Admiral of the Porte. The Magnates (poor, and naturally ferocious) know no other business than that of arms and piracy. In 1813, there were reckoned 10,000 men capable of bearing arms, in a population of 30,000 inhabitants, (Christians and aborigines,) who depended only nominally on the Ottoman Porte.

ISLANDS OF GREECE.(1)

The islands of Greece, according to their geographical order, from south to north, and from west to east, are:

Candia† or Crete. It is sixty leagues long, and twenty broad. The ports are, the city of Candia,‡ Rethymo,* Canca,‡ Kissamos. Its population is two hundred and forty thousand inhabitants.

Milo* or Melos, twelve leagues in circuit, and seven thousand inhabitants.

Santorio,* nine leagues in circuit; twelve thousand inhabitants.

Siphanto or Syphnos,* nine leagues long, and two broad; seven thousand inhabitants.

Nio or Ios,* twelve leagues in circuit; two thousand seven hundred inhabitants. It has a good harbor.

Amargos,* twelve leagues in circuit; six thousand inhabitants, and a good harbor.

Paros,* four leagues long, and three broad; two thousand inhabitants.

Naxos,* thirty leagues in circuit; ten thousand inhabitants.

Serpho,* four leagues long, and two broad, with a good harbor, and two thousand inhabitants.

Thermia or Cythnos* five leagues long, and two broad, with a good harbor, and four thousand inhabitants.

Engia or Egyne,* near the Morea, five leagues long, and three broad; five thousand inhabitants.

Coloury or Salamine,* twenty leagues in circuit, with a good harbor, and eight thousand inhabitants.

Zea or Ceos,* six leagues long, and three broad; six thousand inhabitants.

Syra or Syros,* fifteen leagues in circuit, with a harbor, and five thousand inhabitants.

Dili or Delos,* not inhabited.

Myconi,* twelve leagues in circuit, with a good harbor, and four thousand inhabitants.

Tine or Tenos,* seven leagues long, and three broad, and nine thousand inhabitants.

Andros,* thirty leagues in circuit; a harbor, and twelve thousand inhabitants.

Negropont or Eubœa,† four leagues long, and ten broad; twenty-five thousand inhabitants.

Skiros, six leagues long, and three broad; six thousand inhabitants.

Scopelos, eight leagues long, and four broad; seven thousand inhabitants.

Thassos, thirty leagues in circuit, with a good harbor, and eight thousand inhabitants.

Samandray or Samothrace, eight leagues in circuit, and two thousand inhabitants.

Imbros, ten leagues in circuit, with a fortified harbor, and three thousand inhabitants.

Stalimène or Lemnos,* ten leagues long, and eight broad, with a fortified harbor, and twenty thousand inhabitants.

Tenedos, fifteen leagues in circuit, with a fortified harbor, and five thousand inhabitants.

Mitylene or Lesbos, twenty leagues long and fifteen broad, with a fortified harbor and eighteen thousand inhabitants.

Chio,† fifteen leagues in circuit, [long] and five broad, with a large and good harbor, and sixty thousand inhabitants.

Samos,* twelve leagues long and six broad, with two harbors, and twelve thousand inhabitants.

Nicari, or Icaria,* eight leagues long and three broad; two thousand inhabitants.

Patmos* few inhabitants.

Leros,* with a large harbor and few inhabitants.

Calimne, or Claros,* six leagues in circuit, with a good harbor, and three thousand inhabitants.

Stanco, or Cos,* ten leagues long and four broad, with a fortified harbor, and five thousand inhabitants.

Stimpalie, or Astipaloe,* seven leagues long and three broad, with a good harbor and six thousand inhabitants.

Carpathos,* twelve leagues in circuit, with a harbor and four thousand inhabitants.

Rhodes, twenty-five leagues long and twenty broad; one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants. The city of Rhodes is fortified; it has a large and good harbor.

Cyprus, one hundred and thirty leagues long and sixty at its greatest breadth. Its population is eighty-three thousand. The cities are, Nicosia, Cerina, (a large harbor,) Paphos, Limassal, Famagouste and Lamaca.

The islands of Idra,* Spetzia,* and Ipsara,* very important for their marine, reckon a population of fifty-eight thousand souls, or thereby.

The sum total of the population of the islands of Greece, may be estimated at eight hundred and thirty thousand inhabitants, among which are included about one hundred and sixty thousand Mahometans, and seven hundred and seventy thousand Christians. Add two hundred and seventy thousand for the Morea, and one million for continental Greece, and there is two million and forty thousand for the Greek population of these countries. The Greek inhabitants of Thrace, of Bulgaria, of Constantinople, of Smyrna, and of all Asia Minor, are not included in this number.

According to a detailed table, digested in the year 1813, the Greek marine of the islands and of different ports of Greece, amounted to six hundred and fifteen merchant vessels, five thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight cannons, and seventeen thousand five hundred and twenty-six sailors; of which, two hundred and forty vessels, four thousand three hundred and twenty cannons, and nine thousand nine hundred sailors, belong to the three islands alone, of Idra, Spetzia, and Ipsara.—(Vide Pouqueville, T. 5. page 68.)

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

[Communicated to the House, Feb. 5, 1824.]

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, agreeably to a resolution of that House of the 11th of December last, with the papers which accompanied that report.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2, 1824.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Feb. 2, 1824.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 11th of December last, "requesting the President of the United States to communicate to that House copies of such parts of the correspondence of the late Minister of the United States at the Court of France, with the French Government, and such parts of the correspondence of said Minister with the Secretary of State, relative to claims of citizens of the United States for spoliations upon our lawful commerce, as, in his opinion, may not be inconsistent with the public interest;" has the honor of submitting to the President the papers required by that resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extracts from the general instructions of Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary, and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to France, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 15, 1816.

"It has, at all times, since our Revolution, been the sincere desire of this Government to cultivate a good intelligence with France. The changes which have taken place in her Government have never produced any change in this disposition. The United States have looked to the French nation, and to the existing Government, as its proper organ, deeming it unjustifiable to interfere with its interior concerns. The existing Government has, in consequence, been invariably recognised here, as soon as known. Should you find, that unfounded prejudices are entertained on this subject, which a frank explanation may remove, you are authorized to make it.

"Cherishing these sentiments towards the French nation, under all the Governments which have existed there, it has not been less a cause of surprise, than of regret, that a corresponding disposition has not, at all times, been reciprocated by the French Government towards the United States. The history of the last ten years is replete with wrongs, received from that Government, for which no justifiable pretext can be assigned. The property wrested, in that space of time, from our citizens, is of great value, for which reparation as not been obtained. These injuries were received, under the administration of the late Emperor of France, on whom the demand of indemnity was incessantly made, while he remained in power. Under the sensibility thereby excited, and the failure to obtain justice, the relations of the two countries were much affected. The disorder which has, of late, existed in France, has presented a repetition of this demand; but now, that the Government appears to be settled, it is due to our citizens, who were so unjustly plundered, to resent their claims, anew, to the French Government."

"A gross sum will be received, in satisfaction of the whole claim, if the liquidation and payment of every claim, founded on just principles, can be established; cannot be obtained.

"The management of this important interest is committed to your discretion, as to the moment and manner of bringing it under consideration, in which the prospect of obtaining a satisfactory compensation will, necessarily, have its due weight, you will be furnished with a letter of instruction, authorizing you to provide for it, by convention, should that mode be preferred."

The Secretary of State to Mr. Gallatin.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, May 7, 1816.

SIR: On the presumption that His Most Christian Majesty may be disposed to provide, by special convention, for the just claims of the citizens of the United States against France, as, also, for the like claims of French subjects against the United States—this letter is given to you by direction of the President, as an authority and instruction to negotiate a convention for that purpose, with such person or persons as may have a like authority from His Most Christian Majesty.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter, No. 10, from Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to France, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State dated

PARIS, November 11, 1816.

"I have the honor to enclose the copy of my note, of the 9th instant, to the Duke de Richelieu, on the subject of indemnities due to citizens of the United States, on account of the illegal and irregular sequestrations and condemnations made under the authority of the former Government of France. I had some difficulty in collecting, from scattered documents, the information necessary to present a correct view of the subject, and adapted to existing circumstances."

PARIS, November 9, 1816.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: I had already the honor, in some preliminary conversations, to present to your Excellency a general view of the losses sustained by American citizens, under various illegal acts of the former Government of France; and, for which, the United States claim an indemnity from the justice of His Most Christian Majesty.

The right to an indemnity, being founded on the law of nations, extends to all cases, where there has been an evident infraction of that law, such as it is recognised by civilized nations.

Of the acts of the former French Government, openly violating that law; those issued on the 21st November, 1806, at Berlin, and on the 17th December, 1807, at Milan, were promulgated in the shape of public decrees, applicable, at least nominally, to other nations, as well as the United States. Other acts were, exclusively, directed against America; appearing, also, sometimes under the form of decrees, as that of Bayonne, of the 17th April, 1808, and that of Rambouillet, of the 23d March, 1810; and, at times, being only special orders for seizing or selling certain American vessels and cargoes. To these various acts, must be added, the wanton destruction, at different times, of American vessels on the high seas.

That the Berlin and Milan decrees, so far as they declared liable to capture and condemnation neutral vessels, pursuing an innocent commerce, and contravening no municipal laws, were an evident violation of the law of nations, has not been, and cannot be, denied. The plea of retaliation, grounded on a supposed acquiescence of neutral Powers in certain acts of Great Britain, and urged in justification of those decrees, was unjust in its principle, and altogether inadmissible, when affecting a neutral instead of an enemy. And, even that pretence for plundering a friendly Power was abandoned, when the two belligerent Governments, whilst continuing to capture the vessels of the neutral trading with their respective enemy, permitted a direct commerce, by means of licenses. But that plea was, in point of fact, destitute of foundation with respect to the United States. That they had uniformly opposed the aggressions of Great Britain, on their neutral rights, is notorious. It is not less true, and appears from all their public acts, and from the tenor of their negotiations with both belligerents, that it was solely owing to the acts of France, to the Berlin and Milan decrees, that still more decisive measures of resistance were not early adopted against Great Britain. So long as France and England equally continued to violate the neutral rights of America, she could not have selected either of those nations for an enemy, without tamely submitting to the aggressions of the other, and without deviating from that impartial course which it was her constant endeavor to pursue. And when, at last, the French decrees had been revoked, so far as America was concerned, the perseverance of England in continuing her unlawful orders, and in violating the rights of the United States, produced a declaration of war, on their part, against that country.

Notwithstanding the intrinsic justice of the claim of the United States for losses sustained by their citizens, under the Berlin and Milan decrees, it was intimated by your Excellency that those decrees having been of a general nature, other nations, that had also experienced losses by their operation, would have had an equal right to an indemnity, and that those acts not having been enumerated in the last treaties and conventions between France and the other European Powers, amongst those for which a compensation should be made by France, the United States ought not to expect to be placed on a better footing than other nations.

It would be preposterous to suppose, and it cannot have been intended to suggest, that the United States can in any case be bound by treaties to which they were not parties, and in which no attention whatever could have been paid to their interest. Nor can, by any correct analogy, the principles therein adopted be applied to America.

The allied Powers naturally sought to obtain indemnity in those cases in which they were most interested. Almost all, if not all of them, had been, during the late European wars, either at war, or in alliance with France, whilst the United States had never stood in either of those relations towards her. Hence, it necessarily followed, that the injuries sustained by the subjects of those Powers, differed essentially from those inflicted by France on American citizens. The Berlin and Milan decrees, so far as they extended beyond prohibitory municipal regulations, although nominally general, applied in fact almost exclusively to the United States. If there was any exception, it was in amount too small, and applied to nations whose weight was too inconsiderable to be taken into consideration. Of the other Powers, many had no interest that indemnities should be obtained on that account, whilst several of them, namely, England, Spain, Holland, Denmark, and Naples, had a direct interest that the principle should not be admitted. It will, of course, appear, that, by the Convention between France and Great Britain, compensation is to be made by France for all the property of English subjects confiscated or sequestered, not only during the last war, but also during that which preceded the Treaty of Amiens, and including even the loss arising from the reduction of the public debt of France, to one-third of its nominal amount, with the exception of the seizures and confiscations made in consequence of the laws of war, and of the prohibitory laws. And the exception precisely embraces the principal classes of injuries, for which the United States are entitled to indemnity, since their grounds of complaint against France are the abuse on her part of belligerent rights and the unlawful extension of prohibitory laws beyond their legitimate sphere.

Not only were the Berlin and Milan decrees an evident and acknowledged violation of the law of nations; not only the plea of retaliation against England, and of a presumed acquiescence in her aggressions, was unfounded; with respect to the United States; not only neither the treaties between France and the allied Powers are binding on America, nor the principles adopted in those treaties applicable to the relations in which she stood towards France; but those decrees were also an open infraction of the treaties subsisting between the two countries; namely, of the 12th, 13th, and 14th articles of the Convention of the 30th of September, 1800, which did not expire till the 31st of July, 1809. For, it was therein stipulated, that the citizens of either country might sail with their ships and merchandise (contraband goods excepted) from any port whatever, to any port of the enemy of the other, and from a port of such enemy, either to a neutral port, or to another port of the enemy, unless such port should be actually blockaded; that a vessel sailing for an enemy's port, without knowing that the same was blockaded, should be turned away, but neither be detained, nor her cargo be confiscated; that implements and ammunition of war should alone be considered contraband of war; and that free ships should make free goods, extending that freedom even to an enemy's property, on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either country. The French decrees, in violation of those stipulations, after having declared the British islands and possessions in a state of blockade, although they were not pretended to be actually blockaded, made liable to capture and condemnation all American (as well as other neutral) vessels, sailing on the high seas, from or to any English port, or even which might have been visited by an English vessel, as well as every species of merchandise belonging to English subjects, or of English origin.

It is true that, in answer to the American Minister who had applied for explanations respecting the construction intended to be given to the Berlin decree, assurances were at first given that it would produce no change in the previous regulations respecting neutral navigators, nor in the convention with the United States. This construction, which gave to that decree the character only of a prohibitory municipal law, was adhered to during the ten first months which followed its promulgation; and it was only in September, 1807, that merchandise, found on board of neutral vessels at sea, was declared liable to condemnation, merely on account of its being of British growth or manufacture. This fact is here stated for the purpose of observing, that the assurances which had thus been given, and the practical construction thus first put on the Berlin decree, prevented the early opposition which otherwise the United States would have made to it; and that this supposed acquiescence on their part served as a pretence for the British Orders in Council of November, 1807, which were immediately followed by the French decree of Milan.

The decrees and orders of the French Government, which applied exclusively to the United States, will now be noticed.

Assailed by the simultaneous aggressions of the two belligerent Powers, the first step of the American Government was to withdraw the commerce of the United States from the depredations to which it was every where exposed. An embargo was laid in the latter end of the year 1807, on all their vessels; and notwithstanding the extraordinary privations and the great loss of revenue which were incurred, that measure was persevered in during fifteen months. In the mean while, strong remonstrances were made to the

Negotiations with France—Spoiliations.

French and English Governments, on the subject of their unlawful acts. Not only was the appeal to their justice fruitless, but it appears that, by an order said to have been issued at Bayonne, on the 7th of April, 1808, all American vessels then in the ports of France, or which might thereafter come into them, were directed to be seized, on the pretence that no vessel of the United States could then navigate, without infringing a law of the United States, as if the infraction of a municipal law could be lawfully punished by a foreign Power; as if it had not been notorious that a number of American vessels, which were abroad when the embargo became known to them, remained in foreign seas and countries, in order to avoid the effect of that law.

The pressure of the embargo on the agriculture and commerce of the United States became such, that Congress found it proper to modify that measure. By a law of the 1st March, 1809, the act laying an embargo was repealed with respect to all countries, England and France only excepted, and the vessels and merchandise of both countries were excluded from the United States after the 20th of May following; with the proviso, that, in case either France or Great Britain should so revoke or modify their edicts, as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the commercial intercourse of the United States should be renewed with the nation so doing. This law in its nature was entirely municipal and pacific; and its object was to avoid immediate hostilities and to give further time for negotiations; to withdraw, as far as practicable, the navigation of the United States from the operation of the unlawful acts of both France and England, and to give to both sufficient inducements for repealing their edicts, by the actual privation of the benefits derived from the American commerce, and by the prospect that, in case of such repeal by either nation, she would again enjoy those advantages of which her enemy would continue to be deprived.

The act was officially communicated on the 9th of April, 1809, by the American Minister, to the French Government. It was not at that time treated as hostile; and if it produced no favorable change, no remonstrance was made against it. But, towards the end of the same year, orders were given to seize all the American vessels in France, or in the countries occupied by her arms; and after a great number had been thus seized, principally in Spain and in Holland, an imperial decree was, on the 23d March, 1810, issued at Rambouillet, ordering or rather confirming that seizure, extending it to all American vessels which had entered France or those countries since the 10th May, 1809, and directing that the product of the sales should be deposited in the caisse d'amortissement. The act of Congress of 1st March, 1809, was alleged as the motive for that outrageous measure. In point of fact, it is not believed that any vessel, the property of French subjects, had been forfeited for a violation of that act. At least, it is not recollected that any application was made for the remission of such forfeiture, to the Treasury Department, which, by the law, was authorized to grant such remissions, and would certainly have done it, in any case where the law might not have been within the knowledge of the parties. But it cannot be necessary seriously to discuss a plea which was evidently but a pretence for plunder. It will be sufficient to observe, that the gross injustice of the Rambouillet decree consists in its retrospective operation; and that if the French Government had promulgated an order, excluding American vessels from the ports of France and of the countries occupied by her arms, and pronouncing the penalty of confiscation after due notice of that order, American citizens who might have voluntarily and knowingly violated the provisions of what was only a municipal law, would have been justly liable to its penalties.

The American property seized or captured by virtue either of those four general decrees, or of special orders, which are but partially known to the Government of the United States, may, in reference to its present situation, be classed under two general heads, viz: that which has never been condemned, and that which has been actually confiscated.

The first class embraces the vessels and cargoes burnt at sea, and those which have been sequestered.

It is not necessary to make any observations on the destruction of vessels at sea, your Excellency having already intimated that the Government of France was disposed to make compensation for acts of that nature.

The vessels and cargoes sequestered, and not condemned, consisted principally of those seized at St. Sebastian, and other places, in the latter end of the year 1809, and in the beginning of 1810, and sold by virtue of the decree of Rambouillet. Fourteen vessels which, during that Winter, had been driven into Holland, and which, by a particular agreement between the Government of that country and that of France, bearing date, it is said, the 16th of March, 1810, were put at the disposal of France, are of the same description. And exclusively of other special orders of the same nature, which may not be known to me, the cargoes of seven vessels arrived at Antwerp in the beginning of the year 1807, and which were permitted to be landed there, were also sequestered and finally sold by virtue of an order of Government, dated the 4th of May 1810. In all these cases there has been no condemnation, no final decision. The vessel and cargoes were only seized and sold by order of Government, and the proceeds of sales deposited in the caisse d'amortissement, or in some other public chest.

The right to demand and obtain a decision on all those suspended cases, is undeniable. Either the proceeds of sales will be restored to the lawful owners, by virtue of that decision, or the present Government of France must go beyond what had been done by the former Government, and decree the final confiscation of property, which even that Government had been unwilling to condemn. I will not permit myself for a moment to suppose that there can be any hesitation on that question.

Negotiations with France—Spoliations.

With respect to property actually condemned without intending to impair the indisputable right of the United States to an indemnity for every condemnation made by virtue of decrees, violating the acknowledged law of nations, I will beg leave to add some observations on the manner in which those decrees were executed, for the purpose of showing that an investigation and revision of those condemnations ought to take place, even if it was admitted that France had a right to issue the Berlin and Milan decrees, and to condemn vessels contravening their tenor. The time necessary to obtain information in that respect, has occasioned the delay which has taken place in making this communication, since the last conference I had the honor to hold with your Excellency.

1. These condemnations have, as has already been stated, been made in contravention of an existing treaty; so far at least as relates to property seized or captured prior to the 31st of July, 1809.

2. Several of the condemnations, or rather, acts of confiscation, were made by what has been called "imperial decisions, meaning thereby, not those cases where an appeal may have been made from that Council of Prizes to the Council of State, but those instances where the order of condemnation issued from the Council, or from Napoleon himself, without any previous regular trial and condemnation by the Council of Prizes. Such proceedings must be considered as irregular and arbitrary acts, contravening the usages and law of nations. It is sufficiently hard for the neutral that his property should be tried exclusively by the tribunals of the belligerent, where a natural bias exists in favor of the captors. It is at least necessary that the decisions should be made by a regular and permanent tribunal, acting according to fixed rules, and affording every security of which such an institution is susceptible. But the United States have a right to demand that those imperial decisions should be annulled not only as contravening the usages and law of nations, but as violating, also, an existing treaty. It has been stipulated by the 22d article of the Convention, of the 30th of September, 1800, "that in all cases, the established courts for prize causes, in the country to which the prizes might be conducted, should alone take cognizance of them." Of twenty-seven vessels and cargoes (captured or seized prior to the 1st of November, 1810) which, as appears by a list before me, were condemned by imperial decisions, eighteen had been seized or captured prior to the 31st of July, 1809, the day on which the Convention expired.

3. I have been assured that, upon investigation, it will be found that some of the decisions of the Council of Prizes itself, have taken place without observing the forms prescribed by law; without giving an opportunity to the parties of bringing their proofs; without an examination of the ship-papers, and, in fact, in obedience to an imperial order. A decision of the Council, dated 10th of September, 1811, and by which six ships and cargoes were at once condemned, is particularly mentioned.

4. The retrospective operation of the Rambouillet decree has already been mentioned. It will also be found that, in several instances, the Milan decree has received a similar construction, and that vessels have been condemned for having contravened that decree, which could not have known its existence, having sailed from American ports either before, or a short time after, it had been issued, and the alleged infraction of the decree itself having, at least in one instance, taken place prior to its date.

5. It might have been expected that, when the Berlin and Milan decrees were declared to be revoked from and after the 1st of November, 1810, no further condemnations would take place with respect to cases not yet decided at that time; notwithstanding which, it appears that forty-eight ships and cargoes, previously seized or captured, were condemned subsequent to that day, namely: by the Council of Prizes, eighteen before, and ten after, the 28th of April, 1811; and by imperial decisions, eleven before, and nine after, the last mentioned day. Yet the decree of that day (28th of April, 1811) enacts and declares that the Berlin and Milan decrees are, from and after the 1st November, 1810, definitively considered as if they had not existed (comme non avenues) with respect to American vessels.

6. Several condemnations were made, for frivolous pretences, of vessels captured after the 1st November, 1810, or, in other cases which the general decrees could not reach; such as alleged irregularities in the certificates of origin, or in other ship-papers; presumed navigation under British convoy; mutiny on board; intention to remit the proceeds of sales through England.

It appears, from the preceding statement, that, independent of the illegality of the Berlin and Milan decrees, there is sufficient cause for the revision of the condemnations which have taken place. Nor is there any thing novel in that course. A number of unlawful captures of American vessels having been made by Great Britain during the commencement of her war with France, particularly by virtue of certain British Orders in Council, of the 6th November, 1793, it was agreed, by the 7th article of the treaty of November, 1794, between the United States and England, that full and complete compensation should be made by the British Government for the losses and damage sustained by citizens of the United States, by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from His Britannic Majesty; and a sum exceeding twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling, in specie, was actually paid to American citizens, by the decision of the joint commission appointed in conformity with the said treaty.

From this view of the subject, I have the honor to propose to your Excellency an arrangement, founded on the following basis, in which, without abandoning the just rights of the citizens of the United States, a positive stipulation is avoided, which would, at that time, bind the Government of France to make compensation generally for all the condemnations under the Berlin and Milan decrees.

1st. That the Government of France will engage to make compensation to the citizens of the United States: 1. For all vessels and cargoes captured, seized, or sequestered, which have not been definitively condemned by the Council of Prizes, and the proceeds of which were placed either in the public treasury, in the caisse d'amortissement, or in any other public chest; and also for all vessels and cargoes destroyed at sea, and likewise not condemned by the Council of Prizes: 2. For the losses sustained by reason of such other irregular or unlawful seizures, captures, or condemnations, as will be decreed, by a joint commission, to have been made contrary to public law and justice, or in contravention of existing treaties.

2d. That a joint commission (or commissions) shall be established, with power, 1. To liquidate the amount due for property, either destroyed at sea, or sequestered and not definitively condemned as aforesaid: 2. To decide in what other cases of irregular or unlawful seizures, captures, or condemnations, the Government of France is justly bound to make also compensation, and to what amount.

The manner in which the commission or commissions should be appointed and organized, may, it is presumed, be easily arranged, and every reasonable stipulation will be admitted which may be necessary to limit exclusively the right to compensation to cases of bona fide American property.

I cannot end this communication without saying, that the present situation of France is known and felt by the Government of the United States. It is evidently the interest of America that France should be prosperous and powerful. It is the sincere wish of the Government of America, that the present Government of France may soon be relieved from the difficulties which the lamentable event of March, 1815, has occasioned. It is, therefore, with reluctance, and only in obedience to a sacred duty, that a demand is made, at this time, which may have a tendency to increase those difficulties; and every disposition exists to accede to such time and mode of payment as, without being inconsistent with the just rights of the citizens of the United States, may be least inconvenient to France.

Permit me to request your Excellency to take the subject into early consideration, and to communicate to me, as soon as may be practicable, the determination of His Majesty's Government.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

His Ex'cy the DUKE DE RICHELIEU,
Minister, Sec'y of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs, &c.

Extract of a Letter, No. 19, from Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to France, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, dated
PARIS, January 20, 1817.

"Having received no answer from the Duke de 18th CON. 1st Sess.—93

Richelieu to my letter of the 9th November last, I addressed to him, on the 26th December, a short note, of which, and of his answer, dated the 16th instant, copies are enclosed.

"In the interview which accordingly took place to-day, I requested that he would proceed to state what he had concluded to offer in answer to the basis proposed in my note of the 9th of November last. He said that his offer would fall very short of our demands; that he would not go beyond an indemnity for vessels burnt at sea, and for those, the proceeds of which had been only sequestered and deposited in the caisse d'amortissement. He added, that he would make his proposal in writing, and this would not be attended with much delay. I then said that I could not give any opinion on his proposal, until I had received his note, but that I wished him to understand that, if the Government of the United States thought it proper (which I could not at present promise,) to accept an indemnity for certain classes only of our claims, this never would be purchased by a relinquishment of the other just demands of our citizens."

Mr. Gallatin to the Duke de Richelieu.

PARIS, December 26, 1816.

The undersigned, sensible of the important business which, at the opening of the two Chambers, must have engrossed the attention of His Most Christian Majesty's Government, has heretofore avoided to urge the consideration of the subject-matter of the letter, which he had the honor to address, on the 9th of November last, to His Excellency the Duke de Richelieu. It has, however, become necessary that he should be able to communicate to his own Government, the result of his application. He, therefore, requests an interview, as early as will suit the convenience of the Duke de Richelieu.

The undersigned embraces, with pleasure, this opportunity of presenting to His Excellency the Duke de Richelieu the reiterated assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Duke de Richelieu to Mr. Gallatin.

PARIS, January 16, 1817.

The Duke de Richelieu cannot but deeply regret that his weighty and multiplied avocations have compelled him to put off, until this moment, the time he had promised himself to receive Mr. Gallatin, and now fixes the time for Monday morning, the 20th of the present month, at noon, if that day meets his convenience.

He prays him to accept, meanwhile, the renewed assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

Extract of a letter, No. 27, from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated Paris, 23d April, 1817.

"I had an interview on the 13th instant with the Duke de Richelieu, in which he announced to me, that he had concluded not to give a written answer to my note of the 9th of November last, on the subject of American claims. The claims of the subjects of European Powers which France was, by the Convention of 1815, bound to pay, had been estimated at a sum not exceeding, at most, one hundred and fifty millions of francs (or an annuity of seven and a half millions.) But it was now found that the terms thus imposed were much harsher than the French Government had expected, or than the Allies themselves had intended. The reclamations, under the Convention with Great Britain, did not, indeed, exceed the sum of fifty millions, at which they had been estimated; but those of the subjects of continental Powers, filed with the commission appointed for that purpose, exceeded twelve hundred millions, without including a portion of the Spanish claims, the time for presenting which had not yet expired. Many of those demands would undoubtedly be rejected, or reduced by the commission. Still, the probable amount which might be declared justly due, so far exceeded every previous calculation, and was so much beyond the ability of France to pay, that he (the Duke) was now employed in seeking some means of obtaining modifications which might bring the payments in some measure within the resources of the country. Under such circumstances, and whilst unable to face the engagements which superior force had imposed on them, it was, he said, utterly impossible for his Majesty's Government to contract, voluntarily, new obligations. They were not willing to reject, absolutely and definitively, our reclamations in toto; they could not, at this time, admit them. What he had now verbally communicated, could not, for many reasons, become the ground of an official answer to my note. He had, therefore, concluded that a silent postponement of the subject was the least objectionable course, since, having now made our demand for indemnity in an official manner, the question would be left entire for discussion at some more favorable time, after France was in some degree disentangled from her present difficulties. He added, that, if there was any apparent inconsistency between the language he had formerly held, and what he was now compelled to say, it must be ascribed to the circumstances he had stated, to the extraordinary and frightful amount to which he had lately found other foreign claims to have swelled.

Negotiations with France—Spoliations.

"After some remarks on the disappointment which, after what had passed in our first conversation, this unexpected determination must produce, I repeated, that the payment by France of exaggerated and doubtful claims to the subjects of every other foreign Power, did but increase the injustice of refusing to admit the moderate and unexceptionable demands of the American citizens. The present embarrassments of France, however increased by the magnitude of those foreign private claims, could form no solid objection to the recognition and liquidation, although they might impede the immediate discharge of our reclamations. It was with this view of the subject that I had, from the first outset, expressed the disposition of the Government of the United States to accommodate that of France, as to the time and manner of making compensation to the claimants. I added, that his declining to answer my note in writing, would, exclusively of other objections, leave no trace of the ground on which he placed the postponement of the subject.

"The Duke, without answering my observations in a direct way, gave me to understand, that, after the great sacrifices to which the King's Ministers had been compelled to give reluctant assent, and the magnitude of which would soon be known, they would not dare to take the responsibility of acknowledging a new debt, although made payable at a distant period.

"On my mentioning that His Majesty's Government had voluntarily recognised all the engagements previously contracted with French subjects, and which constituted what was called the arrivés, and suggesting that the sequestrations of American property might be considered as coming under that description, which would prevent the necessity of asking a specific credit for that object from the legislative body; he answered that the law would not justify such a construction.

"Having exhausted every argument which the occasion suggested, I ended the conference, by saying, that, as I could not compel him to give me a written answer, I would reflect on the course which it behooved me to pursue, and that, probably, I would refer the case to my Government. He said that he intended to write to Mr. de Neaville to make to you a communication similar to that which he now had made to me.

"I addressed to him yesterday the letter of which a copy is enclosed. Its principal object, as you will perceive, is to put on record the ground on which he had himself placed the postponement of the subject, and to leave the door open to further representations respecting cases of property not condemned, in case you should think it best not to urge further at present the demand for indemnity in all cases."

Mr. Gallatin to the Duke de Richelieu.

PARIS, April 22, 1817.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: In the interview which I had the honor to have with your Excellency on the 13th instant, you intimated that the increased magnitude of the claims made upon France by subjects of European Powers, under the Conventions of the year 1815, rendered it necessary to postpone, to a more favorable time, the discussion of the American claims which were the subject of my note of the 9th of November last. Without repeating here the unavailing arguments which I urged against this indefinite and unexpected delay, I will only say that I am not authorized to accede to it, and that it cannot be viewed favorably by the Government of the United States, after the assurances which had been given of its disposition to concur in any reasonable arrangement which might be proposed, with respect to the time and manner of making compensation to the claimants.

I presume, however, that the postponement is tended to apply only to those claims, which, though founded on strict justice, were found by His Majesty's Government in a situation that seemed to render a convention necessary for their proper adjustment. The demands for property burnt at sea, or seized and sequestered without having ever been condemned or even brought to a trial before any tribunal whatever, are not of that description. They are, to all intents and purposes, an arriere, or unliquidated debt, for property seized, which, if not condemned, must be paid for, and the settlement of which does not require a specific convention. It cannot be supposed that, after His Majesty's Government has not only agreed to pay various foreign claims, of different nature, but has recognised all those of French subjects arising from the acts of the former Governments of France, the citizens of the United States should alone be excepted from the operation of those measures dictated by justice and sound policy, which, under most arduous circumstances, have so eminently contributed to surmount every difficulty, and to restore the public credit.

If any distinction was indeed attempted to be made, it should be in favor of the citizens of a foreign nation at peace, whose property was forcibly arrested from them, rather than in favor of subjects who voluntarily advanced theirs, and in many instances with a view to an expected profit. But no such distinction is claimed; and I only trust that, whilst the communication made to me compels me to wait for further orders from my Government on the subject of American claims, generally, those of the description last mentioned shall not remain suspended, and that orders shall be given to the proper authorities for their speedy liquidation, and for discharging them in a manner as favorable at least as that which has been provided for the claims of French subjects known by the name of arriere.

I request your Excellency to accept the assurances of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin, No. 37, detailing the substance of a conversation with the Duke de Richelieu, to the Secretary of State, dated—

PARIS, July 12, 1817.

"He (the Duke de Richelieu) then said, that he wished it to be clearly understood that the postponement of our claims for spoiliations was not a rejection; that a portion of them was considered as founded in justice; that he was not authorized to commit His Majesty's Government to any positive promise; but that it was their intention to make an arrangement for the discharge of our just demands, as soon as they were extricated from their present embarrassments. He still persisted, however, in his former ground, that they could not, at present, recognise the debt, or adjust its amount."

Extract of a letter from the same, No. 55, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, January 2, 1818.

"Fifteen millions are spoken of, which, with the five millions already paid, and the three allotted to British subjects, will make an aggregate of four hundred and sixty millions, in five per cent. stock, paid by France for European private claims. Ours, in the meanwhile, remain in the same situation; and I wait for an answer to my despatch, No. 27, (of the 23d of April last,) before I take any new steps on the subject."

Extract of a letter from the same, No. 67, to the same, dated

PARIS, April 27, 1818.

"I had, in my letter of the 2d of January last, mentioned, that I would wait for an answer from your Department to my despatch of the 22d April, 1817, before I took any new steps on the subject of our own claims; and I had no expectation that a new application would, at this moment, prove successful. Yet, it appeared that, to remain altogether silent, at the moment when an arrangement for the claims of the subjects of every other nation was on the eve of being concluded, might, in some degree, be injurious to the rights of our citizens. It was also apprehended, that, in their public communications, the Ministers of the King, wishing to render the new convention as palatable as possible, might announce to the nation, in general terms, that all the foreign claims of individuals were now satisfied. These considerations induced me to address to the Duke de Richelieu the note of the 3d instant, of which I have the honor to enclose a copy, as well as of that by which he acknowledged the receipt of mine. You will perceive that, in his communication to the Chambers, (which has been inserted, correctly, in no other newspaper than the Moniteur,) that he has expressed himself in the following terms: 'France (by this payment) is liberated, both as to principal and interest, from all the debts contracted towards the subjects of the other European Powers, prior to the 20th November, 1815.' The consideration of our claims is not therefore barred by any thing which has taken place; but there is not yet any disposition to take up the subject."

Mr. Gallatin to the Duke de Richelieu.

PARIS, April 3, 1818.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: I have not had the honor to address your Excellency on the subject of American claims, since my letter of the 22d of April last. The disposition of the Government of the United States never to abandon the just rights of her citizens, and, at the same time, to pay every due regard to the unfavorable circumstances under which France has been placed, is sufficiently known to your Excellency. It is, however, notorious, that negotiations are now carried on, for the amicable liquidation of all the private claims of the subjects of European Powers against France; and it is generally believed that the negotiations are on the eve of being terminated, and that the sum to be paid on that account will be definitively settled. The magnitude of those claims, and the uncertain result of the liquidations contemplated by the former conventions with the Allied Powers, had been alleged, in April last, as reasons which rendered it necessary to postpone, at that time, the consideration of American reclamations. It has therefore become my duty to bring these once more to your Excellency's recollection.

It is not my intention to renew, at this moment, the discussion of the justice of our demands. In this stage of the business, I could only refer to the facts and observations, contained in former notes, which still remain unanswered. But I must say, that further delays in the adjustment of American claims, when those of the subjects of other nations are settled, could not be viewed favorably by the Government of the United States; whilst, on the other hand, a simultaneous and definite arrangement of all foreign demands arising from the injustice of the former Government of France, seems most consistent with sound policy, and could not fail to have a beneficial effect on public credit.

Whatever course may be pursued, I feel satisfied that the result of the late negotiations with the European Powers will not be considered or announced by His Majesty's Government as a total liberation of all the foreign claims of individuals; for, however unsuccessful my endeavors may heretofore have been, I have uniformly ascribed that result to the untoward situation of France; and I know that my Government has never ceased to place a firm reliance on the spirit of justice and good faith which animates His Majesty's councils.

I request your Excellency to accept the assurance of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Duke de Richelieu to Mr. Gallatin.

PARIS, April 7, 1818.

SIR: You have done me the honor to address to me, on the 3d of this month, some new observations on the American claims, which I shall take care to lay before His Majesty.

Accept, sir, the assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, your very humble and obedient servant,

RICHELIEU.

Extracts of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Gallatin, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 31, 1818.

"No communication from you, since your return to France, has yet been received; but it is hoped that, since the foreign troops have been withdrawn from that country, and an adjustment has been made by the French Government of the claims of the subjects of European Powers, there will be time and a disposition to make a suitable provision for those of citizens of the United States."

"Meanwhile, you have, herewith enclosed, a copy of a statement made to this Department, of a claim of Archibald Gracie and sons, which appears to stand upon grounds so peculiar and unexceptionable, that we cannot but hope the French Government will give immediate satisfaction upon it, without waiting for the discussion or delay which may be thought necessary for others, and without prejudice or disparagement to them."

Mr. Gallatin to the Marquis Dessolle, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, February 11, 1819.

MONSIEUR LE MARQUIS: I have the honor to transmit to your Excellency a memorial, addressed by Mr. Parish, a citizen of the United States, to his Excellency the Minister of Finance, on the subject of a claim which, it appears, has been laid before that Department.

Having been confined for the last three weeks by indisposition, I have been prevented from asking an interview of your Excellency, with which I was desirous of being favored before I presented to you this memorial, and renewed my application for the settlement of the American claims in general. But, having recently received very special orders from my Government, accompanied by a particular recommendation of Mr. Parish's claim, I am no longer at liberty to defer the discussion of this interesting concern.

I have, therefore, to request your Excellency to have the goodness to examine the official notes which I had the honor to address to the Duke of Richelieu upon the subject of these claims, and to which I have yet received no answer. I shall not now enlarge upon the view presented in my note of the 9th November, 1816. By that of the 22d of April, 1817, it will be seen that the negotiations on that subject were suspended solely in consideration of the trying situation in which France was then placed, and, especially of the embarrassments of the administration by the enormous and unexpected mass of claims brought forward by the subjects of allied Powers. These obstacles are now happily removed; every demand of all the European Powers and their subjects has been amicably adjusted and settled. The rights, so legitimate, of the citizens of the United States, alone remain unsatisfied. My Government, preserving an unshaken confidence in his Majesty, cannot doubt that the time has at length arrived when ample justice will be rendered to its claims.

With respect to that of Mr. Parish, it may be remarked, that it is very simple, and is susceptible of being adjusted without waiting the result of, or in the least interfering with a general settlement. In fact, the cargoes in question, were never condemned, but were only sold for the joint benefit of all, and the proceeds deposited, provisionally, in the Sinking Fund. It is further important to remark, that, by an order of the French Government, permission was granted to the consignees of cargoes sequestered at that period, at Antwerp, to take possession and dispose of them, on their giving an obligation to become responsible for the amount, to the public treasury, in the event of a decision pronouncing their confiscation. The house of Mr. Ridgway, Consul of the United States, together with that of Mr. Parish, refused their assent to a condition which implied an admission of the legality of the seizure. The European consignees, with whom this consideration had no weight, received and sold their goods, and their obligations were subsequently returned to them. Thus, by refunding to the houses of Ridgway and Parish the proceeds of the cargoes consigned to them, the decision which was virtually carried into effect in the case of all others, similarly situated, will only receive its due application as it regards them.

I have to observe, that, although the claims of both these houses are perfectly similar to each other, that of Mr. Parish is the only one which appears to have been taken into consideration by the Department of Finance.

In the hope that my health may soon permit me to confer personally with your Excellency I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, July 3, 1819.

"I transmitted, in my despatch No. 100, the copy of the letter which I had addressed to Marquis Dessolle, on the 11th of February last, on the subject of American claims in general, and more particularly of that of Messrs. Gracie and Parish.

"On the 28d of March, in transmitting to the same Minister a letter from Mr. Hyde de Neuville, in behalf of Mr. Gracie, I reminded him of my preceding note, and requested that a report which the Director General of the Douanes was shortly to make on the claim, might be communicated to me before the Minister of Finances should decide upon it. This was the more important as the director was known to be decidedly hostile to the claim, and to the restitution of any sum which had, in any shape, found its way to the public treasury.

"My request was not complied with; but, Mr. Parish still thought that the affair had taken a favorable turn, and, not expecting an immediate decision, left this city for Antwerp, and went thence on some business to England. From this last country he wrote to me a few days ago, and transmitted the enclosed copy of a letter addressed to him by the Minister of Finances, and by which he is informed that his claim is inadmissible.

"The Minister's letter is not less incorrect as to facts than weak in argument. The order to sell and to pay into the treasury the proceeds of the sales of sequestered property, is not, and was not, by the then existing Government, considered as a condemnation. When the vessels in question arrived at Antwerp, the only penalty to which they were liable for having touched in England was, to be refused admission, and the only question was, whether this exclusion should be enforced, or whether the consignees should be permitted to sell the cargoes. It was not at all, by giving a retrospective effect to the Milan decree, that the cargoes were sold. The sale took place about the same time that the property seized at St. Sebastian was sold. It was done by virtue of an order from Government, distinct from the Rambouillet decree, and for which no motive was assigned. I have requested Mr. Parish's lawyer to procure copies of the order of sale, and of that by which the money was paid into the public treasury, instead of the caisse d'amortissement; for, although the substance of the orders is known, the text has not been communicated.

"But, however easy it might be to answer the Minister's letter, there would be some inconvenience in pursuing that course, or in prosecuting further Mr. Parish's claim, distinct from others of the same nature."

"The decision of the Minister of Finances, founded on the assumed principle that no redress remains when the money has been paid into the treasury, and been expended, would apply with equal force to all the American claims. If it becomes necessary to combat seriously that doctrine, it will be better to do it generally, and in a direct correspondence with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, than by answering a letter which is not addressed to me, and applying my arguments to a single case."

"In the present state of things I will try, until I am positively instructed, to keep the negotiation alive, but without urging a decision, unless I can ascertain that a favorable result will be thus obtained."

The Minister of Finances to Mr. Parish.

PARIS, May 29, 1819.

SIR: You have applied, in behalf of Mr. Archibald Gracie, of New York, for the restitution of the value of the cargoes of three American ships, the Perseverance, the Hiram, and the Mary, sequestered by the Imperial Government in 1807, and the proceeds of which were afterwards confiscated by it.

Having had a detailed statement laid before me, of the circumstances connected with this transaction, the documents exhibited established the following facts:

By a decree, issued at Beflin, 21st November, 1806, the British islands were placed in a state of blockade. By articles 7 and 8 of this decree, every vessel coming directly from England or from the English colonies, or having been there since the publication of the said decree, was refused admission into any port; and every vessel attempting to contravene that clause, by means of a false declaration, was, together with the cargo, subject to seizure and confiscation, as if they were English property. It was while these legislative measures were in force, that the three ships in question arrived at Antwerp, to your address. They had put into England; a circumstance which was, however, not considered by the custom-house as an irremissible cause of confiscation, there being reason to presume that it was through stress of weather.

In the interval of time previous to the decision which was to be made by the chief of the State, a proposal was made to you to dispose, conditionally, of the cargoes of these vessels, on your engaging to refund the proceeds, in the event of their final confiscation. You refused your assent to this offer, and, at a subsequent period, claimed its execution; but things had then changed, the legislative measures having become more rigorous.

By a decree of 23d November, 1807, it was declared:

ART. 1. "That all vessels, which, after touching in England, from any cause whatsoever, shall enter the ports of France, shall be seized and confiscated, together with their cargoes, without exception or distinction of goods and merchandise."

By a retrospective effect, which I am certainly very far from wishing to justify, but to which it is proper to advert, because it forms one of the striking features of the case, this decree of 23d November was enforced as to the three vessels. It was ineffectually that the Director General of the customs represented to the head of the Government, that the English had no interest whatever in these three vessels, and that they were solely and bona fide American property; an immediate sale of their cargoes having been ordered by the supreme authority on the 4th of May, 1810. This order was carried into execution on the 15th of June following, and the proceeds, at first deposited in the sinking fund, were subsequently withdrawn, in conformity, also, with the same superior orders, and placed in the public treasury, as having definitively become the property of the State.

I admit with you, sir, the iniquity of these measures; and with you I deplore their effects; but to repair them is not within the compass of my power. If the cargoes in question still existed in the custom-house store, they should be immediately restored to you; but they were sold, and their proceeds no longer exist. The whole transaction was terminated, irrevocably terminated, four years prior to the restoration, and it is not within the power of His Majesty's Government to revive an obsolete claim, to renew a discussion on rights which are extinct, or to repair individual losses by an augmentation of the public burdens.

With the expression of my regrets, be pleased, sir, to accept the assurance of my perfect consideration.

The Minister of Finance and Secretary of State,
BARON LOUIS.

No 140.

PARIS, March 16, 1820.

SIR: I had, on the 9th of June, 1818, addressed a letter to the Duke de Richelieu, in relation to the American vessels "Dolly" and "Telegraph," burnt at sea by two French frigates, in the latter end of the year 1811. Mr. Lagrange, the lawyer of the owners, communicated to me a short time ago, the decision of the Council of State in that case, copy of which, as well as of my letter to the Duke de Richelieu, is herewith enclosed. You will thereby perceive that the application for indemnity has been rejected, principally on the ground that the French captains must have been ignorant of the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, since the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was not published till the 8th of May, 1812.

It appeared to me essential, not only to remonstrate against this flagrant injustice, but also to refute at large the doctrine thus attempted to be established, in violation of the solemn engagements of the French Government. The effect the decision might have on our claims in general, and the ground which had been uniformly assumed by the Government of the United States, in its discussions with that of Great Britain, and in all the public reports made on that subject, are considerations too obvious to require any comment on my part. I have the honor to enclose a copy of the letter which I have addressed to Mr. Pasquier on the occasion, and am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS,
Secretary of State, Washington.

PARIS, June 9, 1818.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: I had heretofore abstained from addressing your Excellency on the subject of special American claims for spoliations committed on our commerce by the French authorities. A general decision had appeared, and still seems to be, the most eligible mode of coming to a satisfactory arrangement. Being, however, informed, that some cases are still pending before the Council of State, it becomes my duty to depart in these instances from the line of conduct I had adopted.

I have, therefore, the honor to transmit to your Excellency a memoir, addressed to the King in Council, in behalf of the owners of the ships and cargoes of the American vessels Dolly and Telegraph, burnt at sea in November and December, 1811, by the French frigates la Meduse and la Nymphé.

It is certainly preposterous to suppose that His Majesty's Council will, at this time, condemn American vessels for any presumed contravention to the iniquitous decrees of Berlin and Milan. But a discussion of that point is not even necessary in these cases. It is evident that those vessels were destroyed several months, at least, after the solemn revocation of those decrees, so far as respected the United States. It is equally evident that neither the presumed fact that the captors were ignorant of that revocation, nor the omission of formalities, to use no stronger language, on their part, can be plead against the American owners. It seems unnecessary, in a case so plain, to enforce these arguments, or to anticipate objections. In simply recommending it to your Excellency's attention, I feel a perfect confidence that the parties will obtain from his Majesty's Council that decision in their favor, which has been too long protracted, and to which they are so justly entitled.

I pray your Excellency to accept, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

His Ex'cy the Duke de RICHELIEU,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, &c.

COUNCIL OF STATE.

Extract from the Register of deliberations, session 23d December, 1819.

Louis, by the grace of God, King of France and Navarre; upon the report of the Board of Questions:

Having seen the petition presented to us in the name of the proprietors and owners of the American ships the Dolly, and the Telegraph, captured on the 29th November, and 6th December, 1811, by the French frigates the Meduse and the Nymphé, and burnt at sea, by the orders of Mr. Raoul, Captain of the frigate Meduse, and commander of said division, the said petition being registered at the Secretary's General's office of our Council of State, the 11th June, 1818, and that it would be our pleasure,

1st. To declare the said captures null and illegal; 2d. To ordain that the proprietors of said ships, and of their lading, should be indemnified for the losses which the burning them has occasioned;

3d. To remit them to the legal tribunal for the liquidation of said indemnities, under the reservation of all means and exceptions; especially to proceed and conclude, as shall be proper, against the authors or accomplices of the abstractions which they pretend to have been committed on board of the two ships, and generally under all the reservations of right;

Having seen the procès-verbal of the capture, and of the burning of the American ships Dolly and Telegraph, which occurred at sea on the 29th November and 6th December, 1811, signed by the Captain, Lieutenant, Ensigns de Vaisseau, (second Lieutenants,) and Purser, (agent compatible,) composing the crew of the frigate la Meduse:

Having seen the acts of protest and declaration made before the Consul of the United States at L'Orient, to wit: by Mr. Stephen Bayard, Captain of the ship Telegraph, on the 11th January, 1812, and by Mr. William Friat, passenger on board the Dolly, and calling himself proprietor of divers merchandise embarked on board of said vessel, dated the 29th December, 1811:

Having seen the bills of lading and affidavits annexed to these declarations:

Having seen the conclusions, dated 31st October, 1814, of the Attorney General, before the Council of Prizes, to whom these claims had been submitted:

Having seen the decisions made by this council, on the same 31st October, 1814, by which it was ordained that, before a decree, the persons composing the crews of the frigates la Meduse and la Nymphé should be interrogated upon the different circumstances of said captures:

Having seen the procès-verbal of the interrogatories undergone, on the 13 January, 1815, by Mr. Raoul, captain of the frigate la Meduse, and Mr. Crom, at that time boatswain's mate in the same frigate, from which it results, that the captures and burnings took place in consequence of their instructions, which prescribed to them the execution of the Berlin and Milan decrees:

Having seen the decrees, dated that of Berlin on the 21st November, 1806, and that of Milan on the 23d November and 17th December, 1807:

Considering that it is evident that the ship Dolly, laden with merchandise for Havana, sailed from Liverpool, a port of the English dominion, and that the ship the Telegraph, laden with flour at Philadelphia, was destined for Lisbon, at that time occupied by the English troops; and that, since that time, these vessels sailed in contravention of the Berlin and Milan decrees:

Considering that the first public notification which was given of the revocation of said decrees, with respect to the Americans, took place only by the notes inserted in the Moniteur, of the 8th of May, 1812, several months after the capture of said vessels, and that, from that time, the captains of the la Meduse and la Nymphé could not know it; and that it even appears, according to the note dated 12th March, 1812, imputed by the petitioners to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States, that, at that time, this Minister himself did not know it:

Having heard our Council of State, we have ordained and do ordain as follows:

Art. 1. The petition of the proprietors and owners of the ships Telegraph and Dolly is rejected, without prejudging any thing of the reservations inserted in their conclusions.

Art. 2. Our Keeper of the Seals, Minister Secretary of State of the Department of Justice, and our Minister Secretary of State of the Department of the Marine and of the Colonies, are charged, each in what concerns him, with the execution of the present ordinance.

Approved the 29th December, 1819.

LOUIS.

By the King, the Keeper of the Seals, Minister of Justice.

H. DE SERRE.

Copy conform to the minute registered at Paris, the 6th January, 1820, by Billard, who had received 29f. 50c. duty included.

The Secretary General of the Council of State.

HOCHET.

Mr. Gallatin to Baron Pasquier.

PARIS, March 15, 1820.

SIR: The American brig "Dolly," bound from Liverpool to Havana and New Orleans, with a valuable cargo, was captured or burnt at sea, on the 29th of November, 1811, by the French frigates "Meduse" and "Nymphé." On the 6th Deember following, the same frigates also captured and burnt the American ship "Telegraph," bound from New York to Lisbon, with a cargo consisting principally of flour. Mr. Barlow, then Minister of the United States at Paris, addressed, on the 12th of March, 1812, a strong remonstrance on the subject to the Duke of Bassano, then Minister of Exterior Relations. The death of the American Consul, with whom the captains of the vessels destroyed had left their powers, and the interruption of the communications, occasioned by the war which took place in 1812, between the United States and Great Britain, created a delay in the regular application of the parties, and prevented an immediate decision. The affair in the meanwhile took the usual course, and was transferred, in 1815, from the Council of Prizes to a Committee of the Council of State. On the application of the parties, I had the honor, on the 9th of June, 1818, to transmit their memoire to his Excellency the Duke of Richelieu, and added such short observations as the case seemed to require.

Negotiations with France—Spoliations.

It was with equal astonishment and regret, that I received, a few days ago, the information that the application of the parties for indemnity had been rejected by a decision of the Council of State, of the 23d of December, 1819, on the following grounds:

"Considérant qu'il est constant que le navire le Dolly chargé de marchandises à la destination de la Havane, sortoit de Liverpool, port de la domination Anglaise, et que le navire le Telegraphe, chargé de farine à Philadelphie, étoit destiné pour Lisbonne, occupé à cette époque par les troupes Anglaises; et que, dès lors, ces bâtimens naviguoient en contravention aux décrets de Berlin et de Milan:

"Considérant que la première notification publique qui ait été donnée du décret de révocation des dits décrets, à l'égard des Américains, n'a eu lieu que par les notes insérées dans le Moniteur du huit Mai, 1812, plusieurs mois après la prise des dits bâtimens, et que, dès lors, les capitaines de la Méduse et de la Nymphe ne pourroient, en avoir connoissance; et qu'il paroit même, d'après la note en date du 12 Mars, 1812, attribuée par les requérans au Ministre Plenipotentiaire des Etats Unis, qu'il à cette époque lui-même ne la connoissoit pas:

"Notre Conseil d'Etat entendu," &c.

I must in the first place enter my most solemn protest against this decision, so far as it seems to sanction the Berlin and Milan decrees. These acts were in flagrant violation of the law of nations and of common justice. The United States never acquiesced in them, and have never ceased to claim the indemnity justly due to American citizens for the injuries and losses they suffered by reason of those illegal enactments. But it is unnecessary, on this occasion, to discuss that question. The owners of the Dolly and Telegraph claimed indemnity solely on the ground of the previous revocation of the decrees, so far as they applied to the American commerce; and it is to that point alone that I beg leave to call your Excellency's attention.

I am at a loss to understand whether, by the decision of the Council of State, it was intended to assert that the ignorance, on the part of the French captains, of the revocation of the decrees, deprives the parties of their right to an indemnity, or to suggest that the revocation was to take effect only from the date of its publication in the Moniteur. Both positions are equally untenable.

The Council of State seems to have been unacquainted with the circumstances which attended the revocation of the decrees, and to have supposed that that revocation depended only on a decree of the 28th of April, 1811, and to have considered this last decree, not as the result of a solemn engagement, but as a mere municipal law, or, at best, as a gratuitous concession to the United States. It is difficult, even on that supposition, to understand how they could omit altogether to take notice of the clause which gives to the decree a retrospective effect. But it is not on that decree, as an insulated act, that the United States found their demand for indemnity. A recapitulation of the facts connected with the revocation will place the question on its true ground. Permit me first to take notice of an error in the statement of the Council.

This error consists in supposing that the Minister of the United States, when writing his letter of the 12th of March, 1812, to the Duke of Bassano, was not aware of the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees. His ignorance in that respect, had it been real, would not have affected the rights of the claimants; but the supposition, on the part of the Council of State, that he was unacquainted with it, is an evident proof that their own decision is founded in error, and must be solely ascribed to the facts not having been properly laid before them. If, in his letter to the Minister of External Relations, Mr. Barlow did not mention by name the revocation of the illegal decrees, it was because he considered the burning at sea of two American vessels as a wanton outrage, not at all connected with those decrees, which, indeed, did not authorize any such proceeding. It was, perhaps, also because the revocation was so well known, both to him and to the Duke of Bassano, that it had become unnecessary to refer to it on every occasion. That it was thus known, is sufficiently proven by all the correspondence between them, as it stands in the archives of the department over which your Excellency presides. It will be sufficient for me to quote Mr. Barlow's letter to the Duke of Bassano, of the 6th of February, 1812, and written, therefore, about a month prior to the time at which he is supposed to have been ignorant of the revocation. In that letter (of the 6th of February, 1812) Mr. Barlow complains that the brig Belisarius of New York was about to be confiscated as liable to the decree of Milan, and then says: "I know positively that this American vessel left New York the 17th of June, 1811, seven months after the revocation of the decrees of Milan and Berlin!" He concludes by ascribing the decision to an error of date, by which the year 1810 may have been taken for the year 1811, and asking for a revision of the affair.

Negotiations with France—Spoliations.

The Duke of Bassano, in his answer, dated the 3th of March, 1812, informs Mr. Barlow that the difficulty in that case arose from some irregularity in the ship-papers respecting the ownership, which was a formal contravention of the rules of navigation generally adopted and established at all times; that the vessel and the part of the cargo of which the ownership (pour compte) was proven, could be given up, and time allowed to establish the fact that the residue of the cargo was American property, conformably to the ancient rules.

All the facts relative to the revocation of the decrees are, indeed, so perfectly known to the French Department of Foreign Affairs, that I thought it unnecessary, in my letter of the 9th of June, 1813, to his Excellency the Duke de Richelieu, to say any thing more on the subject, but merely to refer to it. I had presumed that every explanation on that point which the Council of State might require, would be of course supplied by that department; and the following statement of facts is intended for that body, and not for the purpose of giving any new information to your Excellency.

It is well known that the Government of the United States attempted, by various successive measures of the most moderate and conciliatory nature, to avert the injuries inflicted on the commerce of their citizens by the unlawful decrees of France and Great Britain, to obtain redress for those injuries, and, above all, to induce both powers to rescind those decrees, and to adopt a course consistent with justice, and with the acknowledged law of nations.

An embargo of fifteen months' duration was decreed by the act of Congress, of the 1st of March, 1809, which prohibited the introduction of British and French merchandise in the United States, and interdicted their ports to vessels of other nations. To this temporary act, which expired on the 1st of May, 1810, another was substituted, of the same date, by which it was enacted, 1st, That the ports of the United States should be interdicted to the armed vessels of France and Great Britain; 2dly, That, if either of those two Powers should, prior to the 3d March, 1811, revoke its unlawful edicts, (which fact the President of the United States should declare by proclamation,) the interdiction thus imposed on armed vessels should cease, in relation to such Power; 3dly, That, if the other nation should not, in that case, revoke her unlawful edicts within three months thereafter, the restrictions imposed by the act of the 1st of March, 1809, that is to say, the prohibition to import merchandise, and the interdiction of all vessels, should, at the expiration of three months after the proclamation aforesaid, be revived, in relation to the nation thus refusing to revoke her edicts.

This last act of Congress, of the 1st May, 1810, having been communicated both to the French and to the British Government, the Duke de Calabre, then Minister of External Relations, addressed, on the 5th of August, 1810, a letter to Mr. Armstrong, then Minister of the United States at Paris, in which, after having commented on the various acts of Congress, he says: "In this new state of things, I am authorized to declare to you, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that, after the first of November, they will cease to have effect; it being understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they have wished to establish, or that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English."

The execution of this revocation depended, then, on the alternative of two conditions, one of which was not under the control of the United States; but the other was only that they should act conformably to what they had already announced to be their determination.

The President of the United States did, accordingly, by his proclamation, of the 2d of November, 1810, declare, that the decrees of France, in question, had been revoked, so as to have ceased to have effect on the 1st of that month, and that all the restrictions imposed by the act of Congress, of the 1st of May, 1810, were henceforth to cease, in relation to France.

On the same day, the 2d of November, 1810, the Secretary of the Treasury Department of the United States transmitted the President's proclamation to the several collectors of customs, and gave them instructions for the immediate admission of French armed vessels in the ports of the United States, and for the exclusion of all British vessels, and the prohibition of all British merchandise, after the 2d of February, 1811, that is to say, three months after the date of the President's proclamation, in case they, the said collectors, should not, before that day, be officially notified, by the Treasury Department, that Great Britain had revoked her unlawful edicts.

Although both those documents were, at the time, officially communicated to the French Government, copies are again herewith enclosed.

Great Britain not having revoked her edicts, the interdiction of her vessels and merchandise took place accordingly, on the 2d of February, 1811. It received an additional sanction by the act of Congress, of the 2d of March following, and continued in force till the month of June, 1812, when, in addition to that measure, Great Britain still persevering in her refusal, the United States found themselves at last obliged to declare war against her.

The United States having thus, with perfect good faith, fulfilled the engagement contracted by their act of the 1st of May, 1810, and on which the execution of the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees was made to depend, it follows, that the right to demand the complete execution of that revocation from the 1st of November, 1810, and an indemnity in every case where injuries were sustained subsequent to that day, by American citizens, under color of those decrees, is fully established as the result of a positive compact, and is altogether independent of any subsequent act of the French Government. That right would remain entire, even if that Government had departed from their engagement, and had attempted to revive the Berlin and Milan decrees with respect to the United States. This, however, was not the case.

On the 25th of December, 1810, two letters were addressed, one by the Duke of Massa, Minister of Justice, to the President of the Council of Prizes, the other by the Duke of Gaete, Minister of Finance, to the Director General of the Customs. Both letters recapitulate the paragraph already quoted, of the Duke of Cadore's letter, of the 5th of August, 1810, to Mr. Armstrong, and the substance of the proclamation of the President of the United States, and of the circular letter of the Secretary of the Treasury Department, of the 2d of November, 1810. The Director General of the Customs is accordingly informed, that the Berlin and Milan decrees must not be applied to any American vessels that have entered French ports since the 1st of November, or may enter in future. By the letter of the Grand Judge, Minister of Justice, it is ordered that, "in consequence of the engagement entered into by the United States, (the President's proclamation, and the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury,) all the causes that may be pending in the Council of Prizes of captures of American vessels, made after the 1st of November, and those that may, in future, be brought before it, shall not be judged according to the principles of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, but they shall remain suspended; the vessels captured or seized, to remain only in a state of sequestration, and the rights of the proprietors being reserved for them, until the 2d of February next, the period at which, the United States having fulfilled the engagement to cause their rights to be respected, the said captures shall be declared null by the Council, and the American vessels restored, together with their cargoes, to their proprietors."

It is not irrelevant to observe, that these two letters were immediately made public in France. They appeared even in a Bordeaux newspaper as early as the 30th of December.

Accordingly, as soon as the restrictions on British vessels and on British merchandise, as announced by the previous acts of the American Government, had actually been carried into effect, on the 2d of February, 1811, and an account of it had been received by the French Government, the American vessels were admitted to entry in the French ports, although they might have been in contravention to the Berlin and Milan decrees; and the vessels which had been captured subsequent to the 1st November, 1810, by virtue of those decrees, were released in all cases where some other objection, unconnected with those decrees, such as the question of ownership in the case of the Belisarius, did not occur.

It was with reference to all these circumstances that his Excellency the Minister of Marine, in a letter of the 30th of November, 1818, to the Council of State, stated that the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decree had been definitively pronounced only on the 2d of February, 1811. His expressions are, "que le Capitaine Raoul, commandant les deux frigates, parti de la rivière de Nantes de 28 Décembre, 1810, n'a pas avoir connoissances de la révocation des décrets de Berlin et de Milan, à l'égard des Américains, révocation qui n'a été définitivement prononcée que le 2 Février suivant." Without admitting the correctness of that statement in all its parts, it is at least evident that the Minister knew, and that the Council of State might have seen, by that letter, that there was some other act besides, and previous to the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, by which the revocation had been already definitively pronounced.

The general admission of American vessels to entry was announced to Mr. Russell, Chargé de Affaires of the United States, by a letter of the Duke of Bassano, of the 4th May, 1811. To prove that no distinction was made with respect to vessels, in contravention to the Berlin and Milan decrees, it will be sufficient, in addition to the case of the Belisarius, to mention that of the New Orleans Packet.

That vessel arrived from Gibraltar, at Bordeaux, the 3d of December, 1810, and had, besides, been boarded by two public British vessels. She was immediately, for these express causes, seized by the Director of Customs, as having violated the Milan decree. On the representation of the American Chargé d'Affaires, and in conformity with the letter of the Minister of Finances, of the 25th of December, 1810, which has already been quoted, the vessel and cargo were restored to the consignees, on giving bond to pay the estimated value, should it definitively be so decided. And, according to orders given to that effect, the bond was cancelled shortly after the date of the Duke of Bassano's letter of the 4th of May, 1811.

With respect to vessels captured subsequent to the 1st of November, 1810, I can appeal to the records of the Court of Prizes for proof, that not a single one was condemned for a contravention to the Berlin and Milan decrees. The archives of this legation, though necessarily defective in that respect, enable me to mention the following vessels, viz: Two Brothers, Good Intest, Star, Nep-tune, and Acastus, all of which, having been captured and brought into port for having contravened those decrees, were acquitted and released, in consequence of their revocation. Whether, besides the Dolly and Telegraph, there might not be some other cases which remained undecided in April, 1814, I cannot positively assert. There is none within my knowledge.

It is material to add, that all the vessels which I have mentioned, were released before the 8th of May, 1812, the day on which the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, is stated, by the Council of State, to have been published in the Moniteur. And your Excellency may have perceived, that, in the preceding statement of facts, I have not alluded to that decree. Indeed, if the Council of State, instead of suggesting that the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees was unknown to the Minister of the United States, at the time when he wrote his letter of the 12th of March, 1812, had only said, that he was unacquainted with the decree of the 28th April, 1811, I would, whilst showing, as I have done, that his ignorance in that respect was irrelevant to the question, have acknowledged the fact to be true. That decree was first communicated to him on the 10th of May, 1812, and did not reach the Government of the United States till the 13th of July following, that is to say, one month after war had been declared against England. It, therefore, had no effect on any of their acts, or any part of their conduct. The compact was complete without it, and rested on the official declarations of the Minister of Foreign Relations, and on the execution of the engagement on the part of the French Government. In that manner what Government chose to announce the revocation to its officers and subjects, was immaterial to the United States. The only point in which they were concerned, was, that that revocation should, according to the engagement, be faithfully carried into effect. And this is the reason why I thought it necessary to show in what manner it was executed in France. Why the publication of the decree of the 28th April, 1811, was delayed, is not known to the United States, and they have no interest in knowing it. The delay cannot affect them, since their rights, founded on compact, are independent of the decree, and would be precisely the same if it had never been enacted.

Had all these facts been brought within the view of the Council of State; had that body been aware that the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees had been the result of an engagement taken by the French Government, on a condition which had been faithfully fulfilled by that of the United States; had they been informed that it was thus considered by the former Government of France, and that every decision which had heretofore taken place in relation to American vessels, was consistent with the principle that those decrees had ceased to have effect with respect to American commerce, from the 1st of November, 1810; it is impossible to suppose that the presumed ignorance of that revocation, on the part of the captains of two French frigates, could have been alleged as a reason why the owners of the Dolly and Telegraph should not be indemnified for the destruction of their vessels and cargoes, more than one year after that date.

That ignorance on the part of the captains may be accepted as a sufficient justification for every part of their conduct, so far as respects their responsibility towards their own Government, if that Government thinks it proper. That is a point in which the United States have no concern. But that circumstance cannot release the Government of France from their engagement with that of America, that the decrees should have no effect after the 1st of November, 1810, nor from the obligation of indemnifying the American citizens who may, in contravention of that engagement, have sustained losses by the erroneous application of those decrees subsequent to that day.

The Government of France, having once entered into that engagement, became responsible for its faithful and complete execution. The solemn promise was made the 5th of August, 1810, and it became irrevocable, provided the condition attached to it was fulfilled. In postponing the execution till the 1st of November, an epoch fixed by the French Government itself, time was taken, sufficient in its own opinion, to give the necessary orders, and to insure the performance of the promise. It became the duty of that Government to give instructions to that effect to their tribunals and officers; and they are bound to indemnify, if, through neglect, or any other cause, some of their naval officers were not duly instructed, and American citizens have suffered any injury on that account. The condition annexed to the revocation, as announced on the 5th of August, 1810, was only that the United States should act in conformity with the act of Congress of the 1st of May preceding. As there was, of course, the strongest probability that that condition would be fulfilled, and that the revocation would, as in fact it did, take effect on the 1st of November following, orders ought to have been immediately issued to prevent, after that day, any act violating the engagement. It may be added, without attaching much importance to the fact, that the President's proclamation and the Treasury circular, of the 2d November, 1810, were communicated by Mr. Russell to the Duke of Cadore, on the 17th of December following; that is to say, eleven days prior to the sailing of the Medusa.

In the case of the Dolly and Telegraph, there are two distinct acts committed by the captains of the French frigates—the capture of the American vessels, and afterwards their destruction. In all cases of capture, the United States have a right to demand a trial by a competent tribunal. According to the present jurisprudence of France, that tribunal appears to be the Committee of the Council of State, known by the name of “Comité du Contentieux.” The first question they had to decide was, whether the capture was legal or not. On that question there could not have been any hesitation. The series of the acts connected with the revocation, the decree itself of the 28th of April, 1811, all the former precedents, all the decisions of the Council of Prizes, left not the smallest doubt that the Berlin and Milan decrees had ceased to have effect, on the 1st of November, 1810, and that any subsequent capture, founded on those decrees, was illegal and null. Indeed, there would have been no difficulty, if the captains of the frigates, ignorant of the revocation, had only captured the Dolly and Telegraph and sent them into port for adjudication. Those two vessels would have been acquitted and restored, as were all the other American vessels that were brought into French ports, under similar circumstances. Instead of pursuing this course, the French captains plundered and burnt the ships. This act renders the restoration impracticable; but, the capture being illegal, it does not, at least, release the French Government from its responsibility.

A belligerent has a right to capture, and, at his discretion, to destroy the vessels of the enemy.

Negotiations with France—Spoiliations.

With respect to neutrals, he can only capture, and send in for adjudication, the vessels pursuing a trade contrary to the duties imposed on neutrals, by the law of nations. It is already sufficiently hard on them that the decision should be made by a tribunal of the belligerent Power. But the benefit of such trial was never denied to them, not even by the Berlin and Milan decrees. Those decrees declared, in violation of the law of nations, neutral vessels liable to capture and condemnation for pursuing a legitimate commerce; but they did not change the course of proceedings with respect to the mode of decision. A trial and condemnation, by a competent tribunal, were still necessary. Navy officers, by the law of nations, never are, and even by those decrees were not, authorized, in any case, to burn at sea the vessels of a nation at peace. Such an act is a wanton outrage, wholly unjustifiable, and for which, if at any time committed, even under a plea of necessity, the nation is always responsible. The most aggravating circumstance of the whole case cannot, in any view of the subject, be adduced as a reason to defeat the right of the parties to an indemnity. That indemnity is equally due by the Government of France; that Government is equally responsible for the outrage committed by the officers of its navy, whether the act be owing to neglect, in not issuing in time the necessary orders, to improper or unauthorized conduct on the part of the officers, or to any other cause.

Having laid before your Excellency what, I trust, will be considered a conclusive statement of facts, it grieves me to be compelled to say, that the decision of the Council of State, of the 19th of December last, is the first positive act by which the Government of France seems to have considered itself as released from the solemn obligation contracted with the United States, "that the Berlin and Milan decrees were to cease to have effect, after the 1st of November, 1810." And it has afforded me great relief to find, on the face of that ordinance, irrefragable proofs that it must be ascribed to an unintentional error, arising from the Council not having been put in possession of all the material facts connected with the case.

I apply, therefore, to your Excellency, with perfect confidence in the justice of His Majesty's Government, and have the honor to request, 1st, that you will be pleased to lay the subject before His Majesty, in order that the ordinance, of the 29d of December last, may be rescinded, and a revision of the affair ordered. 2dly, that when brought again before the Council of State, you will have the goodness to have all the facts relative to the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees fairly laid before that body, in order that the owners of the Dolly and Telegraph may receive the indemnity justly due to them for such a wanton and unjustifiable outrage as the destruction of their vessels and cargoes.

I request your Excellency to accept the assurances, &c.

In duplicate of Mr. Gallatin's, No. 147.

PARIS, May 9, 1820.

SIR: I had the honor, on the 11th of February, 1819, to transmit to his Excellency General Dessolle, a memorial of Mr. David Parish, to his Excellency the Minister of Finances, relative to certain American vessels and cargoes sequestered at Antwerp, in the beginning of the year 1807; and I now beg leave to transmit a new application of that gentleman, addressed to your Excellency. Permit me to add a few observations to those contained in those memorials, and in my letter of the 11th of February, 1819, to General Dessolle.

The only extraordinary French decree in force, when those vessels arrived at Antwerp, was that of Berlin, dated the 21st November, 1806. Some of its enactments were unjust, and contrary to the law of nations; yet it made merchandise liable to confiscation, only in case of its being British property, or of the manufacture or produce of Great Britain or her colonies. With respect to vessels coming from England, it was by that decree only declared that they should not be received in French ports; and such vessels were, with their cargoes, made liable to confiscation only in case they should have contravened that provision by means of a false declaration. It was not until the 17th December, 1807, that, by the still more arbitrary decree of Milan, neutral vessels, which might have been searched by an English ship, or sent to England, were declared to be denationalized, and good prize.

Negotiations with France—Spoliations.

The vessels in question were bound from the United States to France, but had on their passage been sent forcibly to England, and were afterwards released. They do not seem to have come, in any shape, within the purview of the Berlin decree.

But even if considered as coming from England, within the meaning of the act, as they had not concealed the fact by any false declaration, the utmost penalty to which they were liable by that or any other existing decree, was not to be received in a French port. Their being nevertheless admitted and sequestered, instead of being sent off, was the act of the French Government. They were detained, as will immediately be shown, only in order to ascertain whether there was not some other contravention of the decree—whether the cargo, or some part of it, was not British property. Unless this can be established, or that they had made a false declaration, the simple fact of their having arrived at Antwerp from an English port did not make them liable to confiscation.

By an Imperial decision of the 2d July, 1808, the cargoes being of a perishable nature were ordered to be sold, and the proceeds to be placed as a deposit in the caisse d'amortissement; and an inquiry was directed to be made, in order to ascertain whether the property was not English. His Excellency Baron Louis, to whom, as Minister of Finances, the memorial of Mr. Parish above-mentioned had been addressed, wrote to him on the 22d May, 1819, that the proceeds of the sales had been withdrawn, by superior orders from the caisse d'amortissement, and paid into the public treasury; and he adds that they were thereby definitively acquired by the State. He has communicated neither the date nor the tenor of those orders. That he should have considered them as recluding him, on his own authority, and without the sanction of Government, from ordering the money to be repaid to the American owners, may be understood; and it is presumed that this was his meaning. He cannot have intended either to pronounce on the merits of the case, or to maintain the untenable position that the transmission of the money from one public chest to another could have affected the rights of the parties. Its being expended for public purposes, instead of remaining as a deposit, is a proof of the wants of Bonaparte, but it is not a decision on the case. A definitive confiscation, even under the Imperial regime, could only take place with the usual forms, and by virtue of a direct and positive act to that effect. All that was done by that Government with respect to this property was the order of sale, the order to place the proceeds in some public chest, and the inquiry relative to the ownership. No final decision, no condemnation, has ever taken place.

It happens, even that, with the exception of these vessels and of four others consigned to Mr. Ridgeway, the American Consul at Antwerp, all the other cargoes sequestered in that port, under similar circumstances, were delivered to the owners, and that the conditional bonds they had given were returned to them. The principle has thus been decided in favor of the claimants, and nothing remains but to apply it to their special case.

Having received special instructions from my Government in regard to this claim, it is in its name that I beg leave to call your Excellency's attention to Mr. Parish's memorial, and that I ask for that decision which justice requires, and which has been but too long protracted.

Your Excellency will perceive that this decision does not depend on the question of the legality or illegality of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and that I have argued as if those acts had been valid. Although they cannot certainly be admitted as such by the Government of the United States, it is a question unconnected with the present case, and which is reserved for a future discussion.

I request your Excellency to accept the assurances, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

"Mr. Archibald Gracie has again solicited some special interposition of this Government to press that of France for an adjustment of his claim. He considered it as standing upon grounds so clear and incontrovertible, that the French Government cannot ultimately resist the equitable obligation of providing for it.

"The Government of the United States cannot undertake to discriminate between the comparative merits of the claims of their citizens upon the Government of France. It asks justice for them all; it asks no more than justice for any. More than two years since, the claims of Mr. Gracie, and all the Antwerp cases, were recommended to your special attention, in the presumption that, standing on ground peculiarly imposing on the French Government, it would not be able to resist them, and that success in those cases would pave the way for it in all others. It is in this view, that is, by pressing this, and the Antwerp cases generally, the other cases would not only not be injured, but benefited, that your attention to them is suggested. The force of example, added to the other powerful considerations in their favor, might do much. But that is left altogether to your judgment, aided as you are by all the lights belonging to the subject; and, unless you shall be satisfied that the proposed pressure will have the good effect contemplated, it is expected that you will of course decline it."

Mr. Gallatin to Baron Pasquier.

PARIS, October 31, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to your Excellency, under this cover, a memorial addressed to the King, in his Council of State, for Richard Faxon, a citizen of the United States, who complains of a judgment of the Board of Finances, approved by his Excellency the Minister of the same department.

The question is, of a seizure made by the French customs, in 1812, at Santander, in the stores of Joachim Munios, of a quantity of sugars, belonging to said Faxon. The Board of Finances seems to have dismissed his claim, from supposed presumption that he was not the proprietor; and your Excellency, by glancing over the memorial, will be convinced that there can be no doubt in this regard.

But the board has, if I may be allowed the expression, reserved a subsidiary question, that of knowing if a citizen of the United States could pretend to any indemnity for having suffered, in this part of Spain, the application of the laws of France, which then aimed at colonial goods. Ignorant of what laws the board speaks, I can only observe, generally, that none could ever give the right of seizing, without indemnity, upon the known property of a citizen of the United States, deposited, for three years, without having been there molested, in the stores of his correspondent.

As it is, however, possible, that the laws in question may be no other than the Berlin and Milan decrees, and the different imperial or administrative decrees which have been the consequence of them, I pray your Excellency to be pleased to lay before the Council of State the correspondence between the Ministers of the Government, from that time, and those of the United States, as well as the other documents, which prove that these decrees had been repealed, in regard of the United States, long before the seizure of the sugars of Mr. Faxon.

I ought also to remind your Excellency of another affair, more important for the principles which apply to it, but which depends, likewise, upon the date of the repeal of these two celebrated decrees. I had the honor to address to you, under date of 15th March, 1820, a very long note on the subject of the decision of the Council of State, by which the claim of the proprietors of the vessels Dolly and Telegraph, burnt on the open sea by two French frigates, in November and December, 1811, was rejected. This decision could only have taken place because the documents, proving the date of the repeal, had not been laid before the Council; but is supported by considerations which can only produce the most troublesome effects. I can assure your Excellency, that the revision is of high importance, and I hope that you will judge, that a delay, which is already upwards of twenty months, ought to be no farther prolonged.

I pray your Excellency to accept the assurance, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

No. 200.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, January 14, 1822.

"I have the honor to enclose the copy of a note which I wrote on the 10th instant, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the Antwerp claims."

PARIS, January 10, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor on the 9th of May, 1820, to transmit to your Excellency's predecessor, a memorial of Mr. David Parish, relative to the American cargoes sequestered at Antwerp in the beginning of the year 1807, and to add some observations in support of the claim. Twenty months having since elapsed, a time amply sufficient to make every inquiry respecting the merits of the case, I have been instructed by my Government to renew the application, and to call, in the most forcible manner, the earnest attention of His Majesty's Ministers to that subject.

In urging a decision on this reclamation, separately from others, there is not the most distant intention of abandoning the other claims of citizens of the United States for the indemnities so justly due to them. But it is time, after so many delays, to obtain at least a decisive answer, and to ascertain the determination of the Government of France in that respect. And this claim has been selected because it is altogether free of any of the objections, however unfounded these may be, which have been suggested in regard to other cases.

It is not, in the first place, necessary in this instance, to discuss questions connected with the illegality of any of the decrees contravening the law of nations, which were issued by Bonaparte. The vessels in question had not violated any of those decrees; their cargoes were not liable to confiscation by virtue of any provision contained in any edict in force at the time of their seizure.

And, secondly, not only is the case entire; not only has there been no trial or condemnation of the cargoes; but the principle, that they were not liable to confiscation, has been settled, by the decisions of Government in analogous cases, and even with respect to portions of the identical property for which indemnity is now claimed.

I trust that I will be able to establish both these positions, to your Excellency's satisfaction.

The only extraordinary decree of the French Government affecting the navigation of neutral nations, in force at the time of the arrival of the vessels alluded to, in a French port, was that issued at Berlin, the 21st of November, 1806.

It was, by that decree, amongst other provisions, declared, 1st, that merchandise belonging to a British subject, or being the produce or the manufactures of colonies of Great Britain, should be condemned as good prize, (Article 5 and 6;) 2d, that no vessel coming directly from England, or from her colonies, or going there (qui s'y rendra) after the known publication of the decree, should be permitted to enter any French port, (Article 3;) 3d, that every vessel contravening the decree by a false declaration, should be seized, and her cargo confiscated as British property, (Article 9.)

During the first months subsequent to that decree, a number of American vessels arrived in France, coming from the United States, but having on their passage been compelled to stop in England, either by British cruisers or by stress of weather. The question arose, whether it was intended by the 8th article of the decree, to exclude only vessels which had gone voluntarily to an English port, or whether it included even those which had been compelled to do it by what is called relâche forcée. The words used in the article, venant directement, and qui s'y rendra, seemed to favor the first construction; and it was clear that if the last was adopted, British cruisers had nothing to do, but to stop for a few days every neutral vessel bound to France, in order to destroy her external commerce. These, however, were questions for the French authorities exclusively to decide. It was altogether in their power to have decided that the vessels in question were embraced by the decree, and to have refused to admit them in any port. The Minister of Finances, impelled by what was evidently for the interest of the French commerce, allowed the cargoes to be provisionally landed and deposited in the public stores until the decision of Bonaparte on the question was known; and permitted, also, that they should be delivered to the consignees on their giving an obligation to pay to the custom-house the estimated value thereof if so ordered by that decision. It was, therefore, by the act of the French Government, that the vessels landed their cargoes instead of being ordered off. And that provisional construction continued in force till the 4th of September, 1807, when the Director General of the Douanes announced, by a circular, "That the Emperor had decided that the 8th and 9th articles must have their full and entire execution, and that no vessel which had touched in England, or been conducted there, could be admitted." "Thus," added the Director, "the immediate retrogradation of those vessels shall be required, whatever be the alleged causes of superior force, and the documents produced in proof thereof. Those which, by a false declaration, may conceal the fact of having touched in England, and succeed in thus entering our ports, shall be seized, and the vessels and their cargoes shall be proceeded against in the form prescribed by the decree, in relation to English property." In conformity with this decision, several American vessels, bound to Antwerp, were sent away, amongst which may be mentioned, the "Dragon" and the "Two Brothers," and also the Orozimbo, belonging to one of the owners of the cargoes for which indemnity is now claimed, although her cargo had already been actually landed. It would have been fortunate for the owners of the merchandise, which is the object of this reclamation, that this decision should have been made from the first, or that when made, it should have been applied to their property.

Amongst the American vessels arrived from the United States in French ports, in the year 1807, prior to the decision of the 4th of September, and which had been compelled to touch in England, seven came to Antwerp, consigned to two American houses; the Bordeaux Packet, Helena, North America, and Diamond, to that of Mr. Ridgway; and the Perseverance, Hiram, and Mary, to that of Mr. Parish. The consignees declined availing themselves of the option offered by the French authorities to receive the cargoes on giving bond for their value, to abide by the final decision of Bonaparte.* They preferred that the cargoes should remain in the custom-house stores subject to that decision. Their motive was obvious.

* To this there were two exceptions, the consignees having subscribed obligations, 1st, for a small quantity of potash, (about fifteen thousand francs in value,) received and sold by them on the first arrival of the vessels; 2dly, for the value of some of those vessels, in order to enable them to leave the port. The others were permitted to depart without the bond being required.

Negotiations with France—Spoliations.

It was only by the subsequent decree of Milan, of the 23d November, 1807, that it was enacted, "That all vessels which, after having touched in England, might, from any motive whatever, enter the ports of France, should be seized and confiscated, as well as their cargoes, without exception or distinction of produce or merchandise." The only causes of confiscation by the Berlin decree, were, concealment of the fact of having touched in England; and the merchandise being either British property, or the produce of England or of her colonies. It was known to the consignees, had already been acknowledged, and was further substantiated by a subsequent inquiry, that every part of the cargoes, belonged to American citizens, and that no part was the produce of Great Britain, or of her colonies. It was equally known, and has never been denied, that the captains of all the seven vessels had, on their first arrival, made no concealment; that they had all made true declarations of the compulsory touching in England, (relâche forcée). The expected imperial decision could, therefore, only apply to the doubtful question, whether the vessels and cargoes in that predicament embraced, or not, by the article of the decree, which forbade, in general terms, the admission of vessels that had touched in England, whether the cargoes in question should be admitted or sent away. In case the decision should be that the vessels were, notwithstanding, the relâche forcée, included in the article of the decree, and that the cargoes were inadmissible, they might, by remaining in the public stores in their original state be sent out of France, and the decision be strictly complied with. But if, instead of that, those cargoes were sold, (and the consignees could have had no object in receiving them, but that of selling them,) the exportation could not have taken place in conformity with the decision; and the consignees, unable to comply with it, might have been compelled to pay the amount of the bond, which would have been tantamount to a confiscation of their property.

The decision of the 4th of September, 1807, being made only prospective, the consignees at first hoped that the cargoes of the seven vessels previously arrived, would be admitted to be sold for home consumption, and accordingly delivered to them. But when they found themselves disappointed in that respect, adhering to the same line of conduct which they had pursued, not to depart from the enactments of the Berlin decree, they applied, on the 22d of March, 1808, to the Director General of the Douanes, and on the 7th of April ensuing, renewed the application, both to him and to the Minister of Finances, stating that the steps they had taken to obtain the definitive admission of that merchandise having been fruitless, and the goods, especially the potash, rice, brown sugar, and cochineal, becoming gradually damaged in the entrepôt, they now asked the permission to export the merchandise to a foreign country, and that in conformity with the decree of the 21st of November, 1806.

In answer to that petition Bonaparte ordered, by a decision of the 2d of July, 1808, that the cargoes should be sold, and the proceeds deposited in the caisse d'amortissement, and that an inquiry should be made on each of the vessels which had brought in the cargoes, in order to ascertain whether the owners were not British. On this decision, it is only necessary to observe that it corroborates what has already been stated, and was, indeed, evident, that no concealment having been made by the captains of their relâche forcée in England, no other cause or pretence for confiscation could be, or was alleged, than the apprehension that the property was British, or of British origin.

To the sale of the cargoes for the purposes intended, the consignees did of course object; and they succeeded in preventing it for two years. But to that part of the decision which ordered an inquiry, they cheerfully submitted, and communicated all the documents, papers, and letters, connected with the vessels and their cargoes. A severe scrutiny took place, the result of which was altogether favorable, it being proven, in the clearest manner, that the cargoes were exclusively owned by American citizens. Of their origin there does not appear to have ever existed any doubt.

The merchandise, notwithstanding the result of this inquiry, was not restored to the consignees. By a decree dated at Ebersdorf, the 29th of May, 1809, 780 barrels of potash and pearlsh, making part of the cargoes of the Perseverance and Mary, were put at the disposal of the Minister of War, and the estimated value directed to be paid by him in the caisse d'amortissement. That portion of the cargoes was accordingly taken from the entrepôt and delivered to that department having previously been valued at near 450,000 francs, notwithstanding a deduction, made on account of the damages arising from the long detention in the public stores. Finally, the whole residue of the cargoes was sold in June, 1810, by virtue of an imperial decision, of the 4th of May, of that year. It is asserted, that, by virtue of an order subsequent to the sales, which has never been published nor communicated, the proceeds of those sales were ultimately paid in whole, or in part, into the public treasury.

Your Excellency must agree with me, that, from the preceding statements of facts, it evidently follows, 1st, That, as I had stated in the beginning of this letter, there has been, in this case, no violation of any existing decree, that the cargoes were not liable to confiscation by virtue of any provision contained in any edict then in force; 2d, That the consignees uniformly took those decrees as the basis of their conduct, and committed no act which might impair the rights of the owners of the property; 3d, That, by allowing the cargoes to be deposited in the public stores, until the decision of Bonaparte was known, whether the vessels were or were not embraced by the article of the decree which forbade the admission of those which had gone to England, a formal engagement had been contracted on the part of Government, to permit the exportation of the merchandise in conformity with the decree, in case the decision was against its being admitted for home consumption; 4th, That although nothing could be farther from the views of the Minister of Finances, yet it was solely owing to the doubts he entertained respecting the construction of the Berlin decree, that the cargoes fell in the possession of the custom-house; that it was the unforeseen consequence of his act, which was that of the proper French authority in that case, that the above mentioned engagement not having been fulfilled, the owners were, by a flagrant injustice, been to this day deprived of the merchandise and of its proceeds.

The fact that there has been no trial or condemnation of the property is notorious; and I would at once proceed to the decisions made in analogous cases, was it not necessary to take, in the first place, notice of a most extraordinary ungrounded inference, drawn from a fact immaterial to itself, and which, although not officially communicated, has been made known to me by the articles.

Amongst the several applications for indemnity, made at different times, and in various shapes, by the consignees, a memorial had been addressed to the Minister of Finances, by Mr. Parish, which, at his request, I transmitted on the 11th of February, 1819, to Marquis Dessolle. I wrote again to that minister on the same subject, on the 23d of March following, and had requested, that a report intended to be made by the direction of the Douanes to the Minister of Finances, might be communicated to me. This was not done: but H. E. Baron Louis wrote to Mr. Parish on the 22d of May, of the same year, that the proceeds of the sales had been withdrawn, by superior orders, from the caisse d'amortissement, and paid into the public treasury; and he added, that they were thereby definitively acquired by the State. This inference appeared so preposterous, that, when alluding to it in my letter of the 9th of May, 1820, to H. E. Baron Pasquier, I said, that I presumed the meaning of the Minister of Finances to have simply been, that he considered the orders in question as precluding him, on his own authority, and without the sanction of Government, from ordering the money to be repaid to the American owners.

The assertion having, however, been made in that broad way, I am compelled to refute it. But beg your Excellency to be persuaded that I do so only in an hypothetical way, and in the discharge of my responsibility, and that I do not suppose, or mean to insinuate, that it ever has been, or can be, the intention of His Majesty's Ministers, seriously, to resort to such an untenable pretence, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of a 1st debt. I consider the objection as being the work of a subordinate agent, whose duty it may have been to collect whatever might be suggested against claims on the public treasury, and the communication to Mr. Parish, as only intended to afford him the means of knowing and repelling every such suggestion. For that purpose, the following observations will, it is hoped, be deemed conclusive:

1. It was agreed, by the 22d article of the 18th Con. 1st Sess.—94

vention between France and the United States, of the 30th September, 1800,* which was in full force when the vessels in question arrived at Antwerp, that the established courts for prize causes should alone take cognizance of them; that whenever such tribunal, of either of the parties, should pronounce judgment against any vessel, or goods, or property, claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence, or decree, should mention the reasons, or motives, on which the same should have been founded; and that an authenticated copy of the sentence, or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, should, if demanded, be delivered to the commander, or agent, of the said vessel. By the 10th article of the Berlin decree, the Council of Prizes at Paris was, accordingly, charged to decide on all cases arising under the said decree, in the following words: "Notre Conseil des Prises à Paris est chargé de décider de toutes contestations qui pourront s'élever au sujet des prises qui en vertu du présent décret pourront être faites, tant dans notre empire que dans les pays occupés par nos troupes." There having never been any trial, in the cases in question, before the Council of Prizes, there can have been no condemnation of the property, in conformity either with the solemn obligations of the treaty, or with the provisions of the only decree in force at the time, and applicable to those cases.†

2. Independent of any of the considerations drawn from treaty obligations, or from the provisions of the decree itself, it is equally repugnant to the principles of the law of nations, as generally recognised by the civilized world, and to those of the municipal laws of any civilized nation, to consider the order in question as implying the condemnation of the property of the parties, or as, in the smallest degree, affecting their rights. There was not, in this case, even the form of a trial; no hearing of the parties; no notice given to them of any alleged grounds of condemnation, or even of any intention to bring them to a trial. Nor was the order alluded to communicated to them, or made public, either in the bulletin of laws, or in any other manner. On those topics it is unnecessary to dwell—it is sufficient to have stated them. I will only observe, that, without publicity in laws or decrees; there would be no guarantee

* The convention was to be in force for eight years, from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, which took place at Paris on the 31st of July, 1801.

† This provision appears to have been omitted in the Milan decrees of the 23d of November and 17th December, 1807. But even then, condemnations took place only by virtue of special and positive imperial decisions to that effect, and were not inferred from an order to pay in the treasury. Thus, in the case of the Sally, condemned under those decrees, the Minister of Finances wrote on the 6th of November, 1810, to the Director General of the Douanes, "J'ai l'honneur de vous informer que par décision du 30 Octobre dernier, Sa Majesté a ordonné la confiscation du navire Américain la Sally, Capitaine M. Brown, ainsi que de sa cargaison, pour cause de deux relâches en Angleterre."

Negotiations with France—Spoliations.

for the rights of individuals; that publication has, therefore, by the laws of every well-ordered country, of France as well as of every other, always been made a necessary ingredient of any judgment or decree affecting such rights; and that the fact of the order, in this case, not having been published, or at least communicated, is alone a conclusive proof that it was a mere administrative order, binding on the public functionaries to whom it was directed, and in no shape impairing or affecting the ultimate rights of the parties.

3. The official reports and acts of Government, since the restoration, are in direct contradiction with the inference attempted to be drawn, that the payment (versement) into the treasury, or the application to public purposes, of funds before deposited there, is tantamount to a definitive acquisition to the State of such funds, and releases it from the obligation of repaying the same. This will be fully demonstrated by the following quotations from the report of the Minister of Finances (Baron Louis himself) of July, 1814.

[The French is here, as in every other place where it occurs in the document, omitted, when supplied by a translation.]

"The caisses d'amortissement was instituted as a depositary of the funds of securities; the judiciary deposits, and several individual deposits, were intrusted to it on a provision of restitution. All these funds were, for a long time, by the orders of the chief of the Government, employed for the expenses of the State; — The funds deposited in the caisse d'amortissement, are the securities—they amount — to the sum of —, (of which it) has only actually received a sum of —. The surplus has been paid over, and remains in the Treasury, for 88,675,000 francs, &c. The judiciary deposits placed in the caisses d'amortissement, amount to 11,814,000. The other funds in deposit, are — total 7,358,000. The reimbursements on these funds have been continued, &c.

"The funds deposited in the caisses de service, amount — tot. 43,000,000. The reimbursements of the funds deposited have been faithfully continued, although they had been expended, &c.

"The necessity of anticipations introduced them from the commencement of each duty, and they have often been extended to all the funds which this Minister (of Finances) could obtain, and they have devoured the funds deposited, &c. The arrearage of the Minister of Finances on the 1st April, is composed of deposits expended," &c.

I must here beg leave to observe, that I do not mean to say, that H. E. Baron Louis was inconsistent with himself with respect to the question relative to the proceeds of the Antwerp cargoes. The transaction was probably unknown to him, or not attended to at the date of the report alluded to; or he may, at that time, have already been told, that they made no part of those deposits (dépôts consommés) which Government was bound to reimburse. All that concerns me is, to refute the inference, as made in his letter to Mr. Parish, that such deposits were acquired to the State merely because they had, by superior orders, been withdrawn from a certain caisse, and paid (versés) in the Treasury. And it follows, irresistibly, from the quotations I have made, that it was the general habit of the head of the Government, at that time, to apply, to the expenses of the State, whenever exigencies required it, every species of deposited funds, without regard to their origin, or to the particular chest in which they were deposited; that the proceeds of the Antwerp cargoes would not have been any more respected had they been nominally left in the caisse d'amortissement, instead of being transferred (versés) into the treasury; that the funds originally deposited, although withdrawn and expended, (consommés) continued to be faithfully reimbursed by Government, and especially that the payment (versement) in the treasury did not, as is clearly proven in the instance of the cautionnements, operate as a release from the obligation of reimbursing the funds thus diverted and expended. I will add, that, although those cautionnements are not, from their nature, generally considered as a debt, the payment of which may be required, (dette exigible) yet a very considerable portion has actually been reimbursed to the functionaries or persons belonging to territories formerly annexed to France, which make no longer part of it.

4. The Council of State has decided, in an analogous case, that the payment in the treasury was not tantamount to a condemnation. In January, 1810, the American vessel Eagle had been captured within five leagues of the shore, by a French privateer, and conducted to the port of Passage. The captured and captors made a compromise on the subject; but the vessel and cargo were seized, sequestered, sold, and the proceeds paid in the treasury, by virtue of the decrees passed at that time by Bonaparte, under color of reprisals. The case was brought before the Council of State, who, on the 20th. of April, 1820, ratified the compromise above mentioned, notwithstanding the opposition both of the captured and the general direction of the Douanes. The first reason assigned for this decision is in the following words: "Considérant qu'il n'existe dans l'espèce aucun acte qui ait prononcé la confiscation du navire l'Aigle au profit du Gouvernement Français." This case and that of the Antwerp vessels may differ in many other respects; but the Eagle was included in the general, arbitrary, and unjustifiable seizures, known by the name of the St. Sebastian sequestration; and the vessels and cargoes, thus sequestered, are, so far as relates to the particular question now under discussion, precisely in the same predicament as the Antwerp cargoes. They were equally sold, nearly at the same time, and the proceeds were equally, by a similar order, paid in the treasury and applied to public purposes. Indeed, from the comparison of dates, and other information obtained, I may assert that the identical order by which the proceeds of the Antwerp cargoes were directed to be paid in the treasury, included all the others which had been sequestered; and, amongst them, the St. Sebastian and Passage vessels and cargoes, including the Eagle. The fact, at all events, of the proceeds of sales in this last case, having, like those of the Antwerp cargoes, been paid into the treasury, is not only notorious, but was within the full knowledge and view of the Council of State when the above decision was made. For, in the observations laid before it by the direction of the Douanes, in opposition to the claim of the captors, it is expressly stated "que c'est en vertu d'ordres émanés de S. M., et ayant pour base le droit de représailles, que le séquestre avoit été mis, la vente effectuée, et le produit versé au trésor." In declaring, therefore, that there existed no act which had pronounced the confiscation of the vessel Eagle to the profit of the French Government, the Council of State has explicitly and directly decided that an order issued from Bonaparte, directing the sale of a vessel and cargo, and that the proceeds should be paid in the treasury, was not an act pronouncing the confiscation of such vessel and cargo, or of their proceeds.

Your Excellency will probably think that it was superfluous on my part to have accumulated such an overwhelming mass of proofs for the purpose of crushing a mere shadow, which may be dissipated without recurring to any extraneous consideration. In taking for granted the order alluded to by Baron Louis, it must be assumed such as he had stated it, that is to say, as simply directing the withdrawing of the proceeds of sales from a certain chest, and their being paid into the treasury. Indeed, had there been any thing further affecting the question, in that document, he would not have failed to mention it in support of the inference attempted to be drawn. Such a decree, from its nature, must be strictly construed; it cannot be extended beyond what appears on the face of it, beyond its positive enactments, and be made to say what is not contained in it. Had it been intended, not only to make use of the property for immediate exigencies, but to pronounce its definitive condemnation, there could have been no motive, since the decree was not to be published, for not inserting in it a positive clause to that effect, as was done in the other cases where condemnation was the object. But, whatever may have been the intention, the omission of such a clause is of itself, and alone, conclusive against the gratuitous and unjustifiable assertion, that the order is tantamount to a condemnation. The order in question does not confiscate the property, because it contains no clause to that effect.

The acts and the decisions of the Government, directly supporting or recognising the justice of the claim, will now be stated.

All the vessels which arrived, under similar circumstances with those whose cargoes were sequestered at Antwerp, subsequent to the decision of the 4th of September, 1807, and prior to the Milan decree of the 23d of November ensuing, instead of being detained, were refused admittance and sent off. One of them at least, the Orozimbo, was within the power of the Government, and her cargo, which, as has already been stated, was actually landed on account of repairs wanted by the vessel, might certainly have been seized. On the same principle on which she was suffered to depart with that cargo, those of the seven vessels previously detained, should have been allowed to be exported. To admit that she was not liable to seizure, was an acknowledgment that there was no right to sequester and sell those of the other vessels. But there are other cases still more in point.

It was only in the instance of the seven vessels in question that it was agreed that the cargoes should be deposited in the public stores until the final decision respecting the construction of the Berlin decree was known. The consignees of all the other numerous vessels which arrived during the same period, and under the same circumstances, in the other ports of France, preferred to avail themselves of the opinion given by the Minister of Finances, to receive the cargoes, and to give bond for the estimated value thereof. The obligations (soumissions) subscribed by the consignees, were in the following form:

"State of the merchandise brought into this port by the ship —, which we claim from the sequestration of the custom-house, where they are deposited by order." &c.

[Here follows the enumeration and valuation of the merchandise.]

"Which sum of — we submit, with our security for the whole debt —, to represent to the receiver of the customs of —, if the decision of His Imperial Majesty ordain it, on account of the forced visit in England of said ship —, we reserving, in need, recourse to the legal tribunal. Done at —, the —.

"(Signed) The trustees and their security."

The number of cases in which obligations of this kind were given, is known to the French Government, though not to me; but it embraces, as already stated, all the vessels, the seven which came to Antwerp only excepted, which, having been compelled to touch in England, arrived in French ports, from the publication of the Berlin decree in the latter end of the year 1806, until the decision of the 4th of September took place.

In no instance whatever has the payment of any one of these obligations been enforced. In every other instance but that of the Antwerp cargoes, those of vessels precisely in the same predicament, have been sold for the use of the owners, no steps taken to recover the estimated value for which the obligations were given, and, in some instances, at least, those obligations have been positively annulled. Notwithstanding the difficulty of obtaining information on the last point, the parties interested in the Antwerp claim have been able to furnish me with the following extracts of two decisions:

"NAPOLÉON, &c. 20th September, 1809.

"The underwritten recognizance to the custom-house of Marseilles by M. M. Autran Bellier, to answer for the value of the cargo of the American ship Eliza, which was remitted to their disposal, is annulled."

"16th November, 1809.

"The same decrees in favor of M. Hottinguer, for the cargo of the American ship Ann, arrived at Cherbourg."

Whatever may have been the motive of Government for not enforcing the payment of those obligations, the omission of doing it in any case whatever, is an absolute recognition, on its part, that there was no ground for confiscation; and the two instances quoted are sufficient to establish the fact of positive decisions, in cases perfectly similar to that which is the object of the present reclamation.

The same principle has been applied even to a portion of the identical property sequestered at Antwerp, the payment of similar obligations, which, as already stated, had been subscribed, not only for some of the vessels, but also for a small part of the cargo of one of them, having never been enforced.

Finally, indemnity has actually been paid, since the restoration, for a considerable portion of one of the cargoes.

The house of Mr. Parish had, a short time after the arrival of the vessels, sold to Messrs. Fillietaz & Co., of Antwerp, 256 bales of cotton, part of the cargo of the ship Hiram. It being then confidently expected that the merchandise would be delivered to the parties, the sale was absolute, and at the risk of Mr. Fillietaz. He paid the purchase money, received a proper bill of sale, and became thus vested with all the rights of the original shipper, but without recourse against him or the consignees. He was disappointed in his expectation of receiving the merchandise thus purchased. His cotton shared the fate of the rest, and was sold in the same manner, and at the same time, for a sum exceeding 400,000 francs. The proceeds, undistinguished from those of the other cargoes, were, in the same manner, and under the same order, paid in the Treasury. He applied for indemnity, as a subject or resident of Belgium, to the mixed commission, appointed under the treaties and conventions of Paris. His claim was allowed, and placed in the first class, that of cautionnements and deposits;* and he has received, in payment, an inscription of five per cent. consolidated French stock, amounting, in principal, to 495,760 francs, bearing interest from the 22d of March, 1819, together with 10,726 francs in specie, for arrears of interest, after deducting the commission expenses or charges.

It has now been fully demonstrated, not only that the claim is founded in strict justice; not only that the property was never confiscated, and that there never was any decision to that effect, either in that or similar cases; not only that, on the contrary, there have been positive decisions recognising the validity of the claim; but, also, that other foreigners, who had become owners of * Mr. Mertens, of Bruxelles, formerly a partner in the house of Mr. Ridgway, presented a claim to the same commission, for the whole amount which had been consigned to that house. His application was rejected on correct grounds; because, although himself a subject of Belgium, his house was American, and because they were only consignees, and not owners of the cargoes, the right to which, with the exception of the sale to Mr. Fillietaz, has remained the property of American citizens.

part of it, have been indemnified by virtue of the treaties concluded between His Majesty's Government and foreign Powers. Permit me to add, that France has received, and continues to enjoy the benefit of, the money arising from the sales of the cargoes.

That money was paid in the Treasury, and applied towards defraying the public expenses of the State. Had it been restored to the legitimate owners, and not thus applied, those expenses would have been exactly the same. The only difference would have been that the large arrires left unpaid by Bonaparte, would have been still further increased precisely by the sum thus detained from the American citizens. With what good faith the whole of that arriere, without even excepting the expenses of the Hundred Days, has been liquidated and paid by His Majesty's Government, is well known. In fact, unless France sets up two measures, one for her own subjects and all other foreigners, and another for the citizens of the United States, it is impossible that she can refuse discharging this just debt.

I beg leave to apply, not only for that payment, but, also, for a speedy decision. The United States had, from the most friendly motives, yielded to the reluctance to take up the subject of American claims, which was evinced in the year 1817. The objection arising from the state of the finances, and from the enormous amount of the demands pressing, at that time, on the resources of France, has now happily ceased to exist. Time amply sufficient has, in the mean while, been taken for every possible investigation of this claim. The parties have already experienced most grievous losses, from the long detention of so large an amount of property. They should not be tortured by further vexatious delays. Justice, when too tardy, often fails in its object. When it is known, as in this case, that such is the nature of the claim that it will ultimately be paid, intriguing speculators are never wanting, who try to take advantage of the distance and the necessities of the claimants, to purchase their rights at a depreciated rate. Such attempts, which, even when not actually tainted, never can avoid the suspicion of corruption, it has been my duty to repel, and heretofore with success. I have told the parties to listen to no proposals, to reject every indirect interference, that their claim was indisputable, and most necessarily be allowed. We employ, to attain that object, no other but direct means; no weapons but those of argument. I trust they will not have been used in vain, when the appeal is made to your known loyalty, to His Majesty's high sense of justice, to those principles of good faith, in discharging the obligations of the State, which, in every instance but that of the American claims, had uniformly distinguished his Government.

I request your Excellency to accept the reiterated assurances of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

No. 203.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to France, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, January 28, 1822.

"I had yesterday a conference with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the Antwerp claims. In the course of it, I referred him to my letters to one of his predecessors, of the 9th November, 1816, and of the 22d of April, 1817; to the first, in order that he might have a general view of the nature and extent of our claims; to the other, for the purpose of showing both the cause of the delay which had taken place on that subject, and that we had always considered the reclamations for property sequestered and not condemned, to be of such nature that the claims ought to be liquidated and paid in the ordinary course of business, and did not require any diplomatic transaction. I then stated, that although our commercial difficulties might have justly claimed the more immediate attention of the two Governments, yet there was this difference between the two subjects, that the last was only one of mutual convenience, each party being, after all, at liberty, though at the risk of encountering countervailing measures, to regulate his own commerce as he pleased; whilst the question of indemnity, for injuries sustained, was one of right. In this case we demanded justice, and I was sorry to be obliged to say, that, notwithstanding my repeated applications, during a period of near six years, I had not been able to obtain redress in one single instance for my fellow-citizens; an observation, which applied not only to cases which had arisen under the former Government of France, but also to wrongs sustained under that of His Majesty. Such result could not escape the notice of my Government, and had accordingly, been complained of, in the most pointed manner, in the instructions I had from time to time received. There was, indeed, an aggravating and most extraordinary circumstance, with respect to the applications relative to injuries sustained under Bonaparte's Government. Not only had I failed in obtaining redress, but I had not even been honored with an answer. It could not be concealed, that such a course of proceeding, on the part of France, had a tendency to impair the friendly relations between the two countries, and might have an unfavorable effect, even in the discussion of other subjects. I therefore earnestly requested that he would immediately attend to the reclamation now before him, and no longer delay the decision which we had a right to expect."

"Viscount Montmorency at once answered, that he had read the papers relative to the Antwerp sequestrations, and that he was struck with the justice of the claim. He regretted, he added, that the settlement of this reclamation should have fallen on the present Ministry; that a decision had not taken place in the year 1819; that such an objection as that complained of, had, at that time, been raised by the Ministry of Finances.

This candid declaration was made, he said, in full confidence that I would understand it as an opinion formed on a first impression, and as being only his individual opinion; he had not yet conferred on the subject with the Minister of Finances or his other colleagues, which he promised to do without delay, and to lay the subject before the King as soon as possible. Speaking of our claims generally, he alluded to the hardship that the King's Government should be made responsible for all the misdeeds of Bonaparte; an observation, to which I did not think necessary to answer, as he spoke only of the hardship of the case, and did not assert that the obligation did not exist."

No. 208.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Adams.

PARIS, April 23, 1822.

"In several conversations I had with Viscount de Montmorency, on the subject of the Antwerp cases, he always evinced a sense of the justice of the claim, and a disposition that indemnity should be made, but I have not yet been able to obtain an official answer; and finding that objections, which were not distinctly stated, were still made by the Department of Finances, I asked Mr. Montmorency's permission to confer on the subject with Mr. de Villele, in order that I might clearly understand what prospect there was of obtaining justice. This was readily assented to, and I had accordingly an interview yesterday with that Minister.

"I found that Mr. de Villele had only a general knowledge of the subject, and had not read my note of the 10th January last, to which I referred him, and which he promised to peruse with attention. It appeared, however, to me, that, although he was cautious not to commit himself, he was already satisfied, from the inspection of the papers in his Department, and without having seen my argument, that the claim was just, and that the ground assumed by Baron Louis, in his letter to Mr. Parish, was untenable.

"His objections to a payment of the claim at this time, supposing that on a thorough investigation it proved to be just, were the following:

"1st. There were no funds at his disposal, from which the payment could be made; and it was absolutely necessary that an application should be made to the Chambers for that purpose: a demand which would be very ill received, as it had been generally supposed that France was relieved from every foreign claim of that description.

"2d. Such was the amount of wrongs committed by Bonaparte, and the acknowledged impossibility that France could repair them all, that the European Powers, although with arms in their hands, and occupying a part of the country, had consented to receive, as a payment in full, a stipulated sum, which fell very short of the amount of their claims. The payments thus made by France, had therefore been in every instance the result of an agreement, (d'une transaction,) founded on equitable principles, and on an abandonment, on the part of the foreign Powers, of a considerable part of their claims. It appeared to him impossible that an application for funds could be made to the Chambers, for the purpose of satisfying American claims, unless it was also the result of a transaction of a similar nature.

"3d. Even in that case, the engagement to pay any sum at this time, for that object, would for the reasons already stated, and for many others arising from the change of Government, appear extremely hard. The only way to render it palatable was, that it should be accompanied by the grateful information, that our commercial difficulties were arranged in a satisfactory manner. He regretted, therefore, extremely, that the discussion of the two subjects had been separated, one being treated in the United States, and the other here; and he asked, whether it was probable that the result of the negotiation at Washington would be known at Paris before the next session of the Chambers, which is to take place in June next.

"I must say, that these observations did not appear to be made with an intention of throwing new obstacles in the way of an adjustment of our claims, but for the purpose of stating the difficulties which the Government would have to encounter, in any attempt to effect that object. It was not the less necessary to reply to the suggestions thus made: and I observed, with respect to the delays which had taken place, that they were to be ascribed solely to the French Government. It was in consequence of the determination of the Duke of Richelieu, and I referred to my letter to him of the 22d of April, 1817; it was against my opinion, and notwithstanding my strong remonstrances, that the subject had been postponed, and that provision was not made for our claims at the same time as for those of subjects of the European Powers. But I had taken care to remind the Duke of Richelieu, when the communication for the last object was made to the Legislative Body, that the American claims were not included in the settlement; and he had accordingly expressly stated in that communication, that the sum to be voted would discharge France from all demands on the part of the subjects of the European Powers. This was so well understood, that the subsequent grant of seven millions had been voted for the purpose of discharging the Algerine claims. Ours alone remained unsettled; and the Chambers must have expected, and could not therefore be astonished, that an application for that object should also be made to them.

"As to the propriety of a convention, for the general adjustment of the claims of American citizens, I informed Mr. de Villele, that this was precisely what the United States had asked; and I referred him to my note of the 9th November, 1816, which to this day remained unanswered. The extraordinary silence of the French Government, was at least a proof of its reluctance to adopt that mode of settlement, and there was an intrinsic difficulty in what he called a transaction. The United States could have no objection to a partial admission and reimbursement of the claims of their citizens; but they would not, in order to obtain that object, sacrifice other reclamations equally just, and give that general release which France was desirous to obtain, in consideration of that partial payment. Under these circumstances, it was a natural, and perhaps the most practicable, course to press a settlement of those claims, which it might be presumed she intended ultimately to pay. To repel this, on a plea that a convention, embracing the whole, was a preferable mode, was an untenable position, so long as our overture, having the last object in view, remained unanswered.

"After having expressed my sincere wishes, that an arrangement of our commercial difficulties might soon be effected, and having shown, from a recapitulation of what had taken place at the time, that the transfer of the negotiations, for that object, to Washington, was owing to the French Government, I stated that there was no connexion, whatever, between that and the subject of our claims, and that even when discussed at the same place, they had always been treated distinctly. Our reclamations were of much older date, and not to speak of the former Government of this country, they had, since the restoration, been pending near four years, before any discussion of our commercial relations had commenced. I was ready to acknowledge that it would be, at any time, an unpleasant duty for His Majesty's Ministers to be obliged to ask funds for the purpose of repairing the injuries sustained, during a former period, by the citizens of a foreign nation; and I was sensible that the task would be more easy after the settlement than during the existence of other difficulties. But justice, and our perseverance, on which he might rely, required that the duty, however unpleasant, should, at some time, be performed; and I was the less disposed to acquiesce in new and vexatious delays, on the ground alluded to, because the result of the negotiations was very uncertain. The delay, in that respect, was solely due to the French Government; they had thrown great obstacles in the way of an arrangement, by blending other subjects with that immediately to be attended to; afterwards, they became sensible, in the latter end of September last, that it was necessary to send new instructions to Mr. de Neuville. I had, in the month of October, made every representation, and given all the explanations which could be necessary; yet, the instructions to Mr. de Neuville were not, as I understood, sent till late in January, and had not yet, I believed, been received on the 12th of March. The success of the negotiation depended on the nature of those instructions, with which I was not acquainted. If they produced no favorable result, the consequence would only be, that the commerce between the two countries would be lessened, and flow through indirect channels—probably to our mutual loss, and to the profit of the British manufacturers and navigation. But, however this might be lamented, it was only a question of policy—each of the two nations had a right to regulate her commerce, as in her opinion best suited her interest. But, with respect to our claims, it was a question of right, the consideration of which ought not, and could not, be abandoned or postponed, even if the commercial relations should continue to be less extensive and less advantageous than they had formerly been, or might again become, in case a satisfactory arrangement, respecting the discriminating duties, was made; whether the result of the negotiation would be known here in June, it was, of course, impossible for me to say.

“Mr. de Villele, having taken memoranda, and promised to read the notes to which I had alluded, asked me, whether there was any difference between Mr. Parish’s claim (meaning the three vessels consigned to his house) and that for the four other Antwerp ships? to which I answered, most decidedly, in the negative. He then, having the decree of the 22d of July, 1818, before him, inquired in what consisted the difference between the Antwerp claims and those for other property sequestered and embraced by the same decree, viz: the St. Sebastian seizures and the vessels given up by Holland. I answered—none, whatever, in substance, and that the reason why a specific application was made for the Antwerp claims, alone, in my letter of the 10th January last, was that, having already demanded indemnity for all the claims, particularly in my note of 9th November, 1816, the claimants, who relied on the exertions of their Government to obtain redress, had generally thought it unnecessary to make separate applications; Mr. Parish, however, being on the spot, had urged a special decision in his case, and my Government having, for the reasons already stated, acquiesced in that course, the Antwerp claims were, in that manner, first presented to the consideration of that of France. But, I had expressly stated in my note, that this was not, in any way, to be construed as an abandonment of other claims, equally just, although their features might not, in every respect, be precisely the same. Between the Antwerp and the other claims for property sequestered and not condemned, I knew none but merely nominal differences. The St. Sebastian vessels and cargoes had been seized and sold under an untenable and frivolous pretence, that of retaliation, to which a retrospective effect had been given. The Antwerp cargoes had been seized and sold, without any pretence whatever being assigned for it. In neither case had a condemnation taken place. In both cases we had always claimed restitution, or trial, before the ordinary competent tribunal. The right to ask for such trial was, in both cases, derived from the law of nations, and it was, for the Antwerp cargoes, also founded on positive treaty stipulations.”

PARIS, May 13, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose the copy of a letter I wrote, on the 3d instant, to Viscount Montmorency, on the subject of the Antwerp claims. He has promised an answer; but, as he spoke, though in vague terms, of objections, which it would be better to prevent, rather than to answer,

I asked him an interview, which is to take place on Saturday next.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Gallatin to the Viscount Montmorency.

PARIS, May 3, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor, on the 10th of January last, to address to your Excellency a note, relative to the American cargoes sequestered at Antwerp. But, although the conversations I had since the honor to have with your Excellency on that subject, had led me to hope that there was a disposition to render a tardy justice to the claimants, the note still remains unanswered.

It is my duty to remind, also, your Excellency, that all the former notes which I had the honor to address to His Majesty’s Ministers, either with respect to that reclamation, or, generally, on the subject of the American claims, and particularly the note of the 9th of November, 1816, have shared the same fate. That, on a subject so important, no official answer should, for such length of time, have been given to the earnest and repeated applications of a friendly Power; that, where favors are not asked, but justice is demanded, there should have been such a tacit perseverance in avoiding even to discuss the question, must be allowed a most uncommon proceeding in the intercourse between independent nations.

To these considerations I beg leave to add, that two American citizens, with powers from the owners of the greater part of the Antwerp cargoes, have been here for a length of time, one of them for a year, for the sole purpose of pursuing and liquidating that claim; and that they both unite in requesting that they may be no longer detained, and that, at all events, a decision may be made in that case.

Permit me, therefore, most earnestly to request from your Excellency, that no further delays may take place, and to ask that official answer, which I have never doubted, would, when made, prove satisfactory to the just expectation of the parties interested.

I request your Excellency to accept the renewed assurance of the distinguished consideration with which, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, No. 216, dated

PARIS, June 13, 1822.

“The conference I had, on the 18th ultimo, with Viscount de Montmorency, on the subject of the American claims, turned principally on the difficulties which this Government would find in effecting an arrangement with us. The result of a free conversation on what was practicable, seemed to be, that a definitive agreement was preferable to a partial payment, and that the choice must, in that respect, be between the two following modes: either the payment of a stipulated sum, in full discharge of the demands of the United States for spoliations, and to be distributed by their Government; or, the reference of the whole case to a joint commission, which, in case of disagreement, would refer the disputed points to a Sovereign chosen by the two Governments."

Negotiations with France—Spoliations.

"Although Mr. de Montmorency appeared to continue to be personally well disposed, he did not conceal that there were objections in the Council of Ministers; and he stated, a few days after, that they were inclined to postpone the subject, until the result of the negotiation at Washington was ascertained. I concluded, nevertheless, to insist for an answer to my last note, being satisfied that it would not amount to a rejection, which would have committed hereafter this Government, and that there would be some advantage in obtaining, at least, something more than verbal from them. The answer of the 1st instant, was accordingly received, copy of which is herewith enclosed. We had so many accounts of a near prospect of an arrangement being on the eve of being concluded, between you and Mr. de Neuville, that I waited a few days before I made a reply; but, having now heard of the adjournment of Congress, without any convention having been made, I this day have made the answer, of which I have the honor to enclose a copy."

[TRANSLATION.]

Viscount Montmorency to Mr. Gallatin.

PARIS, June 1, 1822.

SIR: I have received the letter which you did me the honor to write me on the 3d of May, relative to the American cargoes sequestered in the port of Anvers, and to the other claims which you have already heretofore laid before the Ministers of the King.

I could have wished, sir, to have been able to answer you sooner, and, especially, to have been able to welcome your demands; but I was under the necessity of first submitting them to the King, who is engaged in Council; His Majesty having nothing more at heart, than to see adjusted, in a proper and satisfactory manner, the affairs of mutual interest for both countries, and thus to multiply between them useful and amicable relations.

The object of your claims is, without doubt, interesting to a great number of individuals; and we have, also, individual claims to make, which are likewise of great interest to the subjects of the King, whom they concern. I would be first to wish that the Government could be engaged with them; but you are not ignorant, sir, that there is, at this moment, at Washington, a negotiation which embraces general interests of the highest importance to the navigation of France and of America.

The King's Council has judged, that it was better to put off the examination of the individual claims, until the negotiation upon the general interests was concluded; and, as soon as that shall take place, I shall hasten, sir, to move, in the King's Council, the examination of the claims which form the object of your letter of the 3d May. I have the honor, &c.

MONTMORENCY.

Mr. Gallatin to the Viscount Montmorency.

PARIS, June 23, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your Excellency's letter of the 1st instant, in answer to mine of the 3d of May, relative to the American reclamations.

It is satisfactory to find that the unfavorable suggestions heretofore made on that subject are no longer alluded to, and that the only reason assigned for its postponement is foreign to the merits of the claim. I had expected no less from the justice of His Majesty's Government. But this new delay is as vexatious as unexpected; and the grounds on which it is placed appear altogether untenable.
