THE
MILLER
AND
HIS GOLDEN DREAM.

“ With moderate blessings be content,
Nor idly grasp at every shade;
Peace, competence, a life well spent,
Are treasures that can never fade:
And he who weakly sighs for more—
—Augments his misery, not his store.”

IN the construction of the following little Poem, the Author has declined the aids of Genii, &c.—the powerful auxiliaries of her two former works,—on the belief that a moral truth requires little of artificial embellishment to render it attractive. She presents therefore a simple unadorned tale to her young readers, as an experiment; not without hope that their reception and approval of it may be such, as to sanction future efforts, and to confirm her in the propriety of her present opinion.

MILLER.

IF, 'mid the passions of the breast,
There be one deadlier than the rest,
Whose poisonous influence would control
The generous purpose of the soul,
A cruel selfishness impart,
And harden, and contract the heart;
If such a passion be, the vice
Is unrelenting Avarice.
And would my youthful readers know
The features of this mortal foe,
The lineaments will hardly fail
To strike them in the following tale.

In England—but it matters not
 That I precisely name the spot—
 A Miller liv'd, and humble fame
 Had grac'd with rustic praise his name.
 For many a year his village neighbours
 Felt and confess'd his useful labours;
 Swift flew his hours, on busy wing
 Revolving in their rosy ring:
 His life, alternate toil and rest,
 Nor cares annoy'd, nor want oppress'd.

Whang's mill, beside a sparkling brook,
 Stood shelter'd in a wooded nook:
 The stream, the willow's whispering trees,
 The humming of the housing bees,
 Swell'd with soft sounds the summer breeze;
 Those simple sounds, that to the heart
 A soothing influence impart,
 And full on every sense convey
 Th' impression of a summer's day.

A cot, with clustering ivy crown'd,
 Smil'd from a gently sloping mound,
 Whose sunny banks, profusely gay,
 Gave to the view, in proud display,
 The many colour'd buds of May;
 Flowers, that spontaneous fringe the brink
 Of sinuous Tame, and bend to drink.
 My native River! at thy name
 What mix'd emotions thrill my frame!
 Through the dim vista of past years,
 How shadowy soft thy scene appears!
 With earliest recollections twin'd,
 To thee still fondly turns my mind;
 While Memory paints with faithful force
 The grace of thy meandering course
 'Neath bending boughs, whose mingling shade
 Now hid, and now thy stream betray'd.—
 Bright—though long distant from my view—
 Rise all thy magic charms anew;

And on thy calm and shallowy shore
 Again, in Fancy's eye, I pore,
 The steps retrace, our infant feet
 So buoyant trod, and once more meet
 Each object in my wandering gaze
 'That form'd the joys of "other days."
 All, all return, and with them bring
 The "life of life," its vivid spring.
 The sun is bright, the flowers re-bloom,
 Cold friends are kind, kind e'en the tomb:
 For one brief moment 'tis forgot
 There once were those, who now are not.
 Eyes beam, and hearts as fondly beat,
 Voices their wonted tones repeat—
 But 'tis ~~on~~ Fancy's ear alone—
 I wake, alas! and all are gone!

Yet, Tame, the theme of childish praise,
 For thee were fram'd my earliest lays;

Thy banks of all were deem'd the pride,
 Thy flowers, by none to be outvied.
 Those days are past—and sad I view
 The time I bade thee, Tame, adieu :
 Those days are gone, and I have seen
 Full many a river's margent green ;
 Full many a bursting bud display
 The rich luxuriance of May—
 But loveliest still thy flowers I deem,
 And dearest thou, my native stream !

Thus clings around our early joys
 A mystic charm no time destroys,
 Endearing recollections more,
 When all of real joy is o'er.

Forgive, Whang, this digressive strain ;
 The journey done, I'm yours again.
 If for a simile I sought
 Back through the distant tracks of thought,

The flowers I gather'd by the way
 Upon your fabled banks I lay ;
 Where primrose groups were yearly seen
 Peeping beneath their curtain green,
 With aromatic mint beside,
 And violets in purple pride.
 In gay festoons, o'er hazles thrown,
 Hung many a woodbine's floral crown ;
 The brier-rose too, that woos the bee,
 And thyme, that sighs its odours free.
 The lark, the blackbird, and the thrush,
 Hymn'd happiness from every bush :
 The Eden to their lot assign'd
 Fill'd with content the feather'd kind ;
 Example worthy him, I ween,
 Who reign'd sole monarch of the scene—
 The Miller.—“ What ! ” you will enquire,
 “ Possess'd he not his soul's desire ?
 Ah ! could his wishes soar above
 The calm of this untroubled grove ? ”

Alas! his frailty must be told—
 Whang entertain'd a love for gold :
 And none, whatever their demerit,
 That did of wealth a store inherit,
 But gain'd (so strong the dire dominion)
 Whang's reverence, and his best opinion.
 "Gold, my dear spouse," would cry his wife,
 "Is call'd an evil of our life."
 "True," Whang rejoin'd, "the only evil
 Whose visits I consider civil ;
 But 'tis, alack !—the thought is grievous—
The evil most in haste to leave us."

"Twere proper that my readers knew,
 That, by degrees, this passion grew ;
 Not always was the silly elf
 So craving, coveting of pelf,
 Though he was ever prone to hold
 In high esteem pound-notes and gold :

And CIRCUMSTANCES sometimes root
Firm in the mind the feeblest shoot ;
A truth, erewhile, this man of meal
By his example will reveal.

“ True,” would he say, “ I am not poor :
What then? may I not wish for more?
This paltry mill provides me food,
Keeps dame and I from famine—good!
Yet, mark the labour I endure,
A meagre living to secure.
’Tis lucky that I have my health,
Since this poor mill is all my wealth ;
Though irksome, I confess, to toil
To catch Dame Fortune’s niggard smile,
When she so prodigal can be
To men of less desert than me,
Throwing her bounties in their lap,
Almost without their asking—slap!

'Tis lucky that I have my health,
Since this poor mill is all my wealth;

'Twas but to-day that I was told,
 With truth I'll vouch, a pan of gold
 Seen by a neighbour in a dream—
 —Thrice dreamt on, though, as it should seem—
 My neighbour dug for, as directed—
 (Shame had such warning been neglected!)—
 Dug for, and, better still, he found
 A treasure hidden under ground,
 In the same spot, or thereabout,
 His happy dream had pointed out.
 Such riches now his coffers fill,
 No more he labours, let who will.
 I wish with all my heart," he cried,
 "I wish such luck may me betide!"
 So saying, from the bags he started,
 While through his brain vague fancies darted,
 And with a brisker air and gait
 He left the mill to seek his Kate,
 The golden vision to relate.

At eve, before the cottage-door,
 They talk'd the wondrous story o'er;
 And every time it was repeated,
 With warmer hope Whang's brain was heated.
 Complacent to his bed he hies,
 Certain, when sleep should close his eyes,
 Like him to dream who gain'd the prize: }
 And doubtless might have dream'd the same;
 But neither sleep nor vision came.
 He toss'd and turn'd him all night long,
 Tried all manœuvres—all were wrong.
 " Had never known the like before,
 Was us'd to sleep quite sound, and snore;
 But now, when he desir'd it most,
 The art to sleep seem'd wholly lost."

When Hope (t' indulge a short digression)
 Gains of weak minds complete possession,
 She buoys them up, like cork and sail,
 'Gainst Disappointment's heavy gale.

At eve, before the cottage-door,
They talk'd the wondrous story o'er;

Page 14.

So Whang, with undishearten'd mind,
Trusting the future would be kind,
Rose from his dreamless bed next morn
Neither discourag'd nor forlorn:
With one idea fill'd, he sought
His mill, but little there he wrought.
Week follow'd week, and months the same,
Whang slept indeed, but could not dream;
Yet, prescient still of his success,
His industry grew less and less.
He thought it wrong in him to labour,
Who, by and by, might, like his neighbour,
Receive the happy wish'd-for warning,
And wake to thousands in the morning!
It was amusing to observe
His solemn pomp, his proud reserve,
His sad exchange of glee, for state,
That ill-beseem'd his rustic gait.
His temper open, far from vicious,
Chang'd too—for he was grown ambitious.

He, that so early erst was seen
With active step to cross the green,
Now slept, supinely slept away
The prime, the golden hours of day.
The sun shot down his highest beam
Upon th' unprofitable stream;
Whang's duty bade him sleep and dream.
I will not say but Whang was born
With sense enough to grind his corn,
Or on a market-day to tell
Whether 'twere good to buy or sell;
But since the store his neighbour found,
I dare not say his wits were sound.
In sad neglect the mill-wheel stood
That long supplied his daily food;
And marvelling neighbours shook the head,
Amaz'd the Miller's glee was fled.
Some thought his conscience overcast
Was but a judgment for the past.

Old Robin with a wink could tell
 That " Whang had manag'd matters well ;
 He shrewdly guess'd how things would end,
 For gain, ill-gotten, would not spend."
 And Gammer Gabble now could prate
 That her " last sack had wanted weight."
She " knew the Miller long ago,
 And wonder'd others did not know."
 So all most prudently prepare
 To trust their grain to better care.
 Thus, by degrees the stores declin'd,
 Till Whang had scarce a batch to grind.
 No matter ! Hope still talk'd the more
 About his unfound hidden store :
 But inauspicious yet appear'd
 His wish ; no warning voice was heard.
 Now Mistress Whang, of nature humble,
 Had smil'd to hear her husband grumble,
 And would admonish him, 'tis said,
 To chase vain phantoms from his head.

She, more incredulous, insisted
 His visions ought to be resisted ;
 Thought they had chang'd his very nature,
 And sourly curl'd each homely feature :
 She felt full dearly they bestood
 Sad substitutes for wholesome food.

At issue long, as oft the case,
 The war of words to peace gave place.
 In truth the visionary Whang
 Ceas'd now entirely to harangue
 On this dear theme:—he hated doubt,
 And Kate had many, staunch and stout :
 And in a hostile muster, they
 Gave her the better of the fray.
 Though silent on his favourite theme,
 He did resolve, when he should dream,
 And find th' anticipated pelf,
 To keep the secret to himself ;

My pretty Window: that commands
Those meadows green and wooded lands.

For he averr'd it "quite vexatious
His wife should be so pertinacious."
No passions vain her heart misled:
The path of humble peace to tread
Was her sole aim; of this secure,
She felt content, nor sigh'd for more.
She griev'd to find her counsels failing,
They were sincere, though unavailing;
And oft midst wishes, fears, and sighs,
'Twas thus she would soliloquise:—
"My pretty window! that commands
Those meadows green, and wooded lands,
So sunny, that the latest ray
Its panes receive of parting day.
O! with what joy, when near it plac'd,
I've watch'd my husband homeward haste!
Or heard, from fair returning late,
The welcome sounds of 'Holla, Kate!'
Through it I trace on every hand
Beauties, would grace a fairy-land,

And think that, like a grateful eye,
 It smiles on all beneath the sky.
 There, too, my sweet geranium blows,
 And mignonette, and crimson rose,
 When all without is clad in snows.

}

I doubt me, if a princess feels
 More joy than that which o'er me steals,
 When light and morn my slumbers break,
 And to this blissful scene I wake.
 I cannot form a wish beside
 What Heaven's bounty has supplied,
 Save that to Whang I could impart
 The same content that fills my heart;
 Yield him that thankful state of rest,
 Or teach to prize the good possess'd."

Good fortune seldom comes too late;
 For lo! at last indulgent Fate
 Smil'd on the importunate swain,
 And eas'd at length his anxious pain.

Dreams—one,—two,—three,—th' important number,

Omen'd him hence to quit his slumber,
With spade and mattock arm'd, to delve
Six feet—nay, I believe 'twas twelve,

Close by the long-forsaken mill—

He flies, the mission to fulfil!

The mattock rings, the spade descends,

The sturdy arm its vigour lends;

At such light labour who could sleep?

Whang is already three feet deep!

Upon the spade observe him smile:

What sees he?—what?—a broken tile;

The very tile his dream foretold,

A landmark to his pan of gold!

Upturns one token more—a bone!

And now, behold the broad flat stone!

A moment on its ample size

He gaz'd with wide distended eyes—

“Beneath that is the pan!” he cries.

}

“ ’Twas under such a stone as this
That neighbour Drowsypate found his.
So then, at last, my hopes are crown’d!
Come, then, let’s raise thee from the ground.”
But, ere to lift the stone he tries,
He shook his head, not over wise,
And, with a self-approving glance,
One foot a little in advance,
With nose and lip contemptuous curl’d,
That said, “ A fig for all the world !”
He cried, “ My wife, she, silly trot !
Shall never know the wealth I’ve got :
To punish her I made a vow ;
The time is come, I’ll keep it now.
She could not dream, poor fool ! not she ;
Some trite old tale of ‘ busy bee,’
Of saving pins, and pence, and groats,
For ever occupied her thoughts.
Besides, the hussey laugh’d outright
Whene’er I pass’d a dreamless night.

One foot a little in advance.
With nose and lip contemptuous curl'd,
That said, "A fig for all the world!"

Yes, yes, I will requite her scorn ;
 She'll rue it, sure as she is born !"—
 Ah, bootless boast ! the stone so great
 Exceeds by far his strength in weight.
 In vain he digs and delves the ground,
 And clears away the rubbish round,
 And gathering strength with his vexation,
 Widens the fearful excavation.
 He cannot move the stone for life ;
 So forc'd at last, he calls his wife,
 Imparts the fact so long repress'd,
 And glads, reluctantly, her breast.
 The news he stated wak'd her fear ;
 What gave delight at first to hear,
 One apprehension turn'd to pain—
 She trembled for her husband's brain.
 " Can it be true ? " cried she, misdeeming ;
 " Dear Whang, too surely thou art dreaming :
 Try, recollect thyself, good man—"
 " Tut, hussey ! why, I'll shew the pan :

Only a minute's help I ask,
 And thou shalt see't—a trifling task
 Just to remove, I know not what,
 A stone, it may be, from the spot.
 Come, come, thy hand." They gain the door,
 When, turning, Kate asks, "Are you sure?"
 "Sure? yes," vociferates her spouse.
 This said, they issue from the house—
 "I'm certain, as to all I've told,
 As if e'en now I touch'd the gold:
Sure as that I no more will bear
 This russet doublet now to wear:—
 That I no more will condescend
 To own Ralph Roughspeech for my friend,
 Nor tolerate the pert monition
 Of neighbours, in my chang'd condition:
Sure—but, ye Powers! what do I see?—
 The mill! the mill!—Oh! woe is me!
 My only stay, my certain aid,
 All level with the earth is laid!—

— ye powers! what do I see? —

Presumptuous! I have scorn'd my fate,
 And wrought this mischief: all too late
 The error of my life I see,
 And misery my portion be.
 Time, that no more I may recal,
 By wise men priz'd, and dear to all,
 How have I squander'd! how abus'd!
 My friends, my neighbours, basely us'd!
 How shall I bear, acquaintance meeting,
 Scorn to behold where once was greeting?
 Now comes their turn to treat the fool
 With jeers, contempt, and ridicule.
 Laugh'd at on all sides—and to know
 And feel I have deserv'd the blow!
 Undone by mine own discontent!—
 But ah! too late I do repent.
 Forc'd now in poverty to roam,
 I soon must quit this quiet home;
 And where with thee, poor Kate! to fly?—
 Oh! I could lay me down and die!

Wretch that I am! Kate, Kate, forgive!"

"My pardon, dearest Whang, receive:

But 'twas not I who gave thee health,
Strength, talent to improve thy wealth;

Who cast thy lot in such fair land,
Or bless'd thee with such liberal hand.

O! turn to Him with thankful prayer
Who deigns e'en yet thy life to spare;

Implore His pardon—kneel with me;
This ruin might have cover'd thee.

But thou art spar'd, and yet remain
The means our livelihood to gain:

A heartfelt willing perseverance
Will mend our lot before a year hence.

Thou knowest well that neighbour Ralph
Each morn will spare an hour or half

To help us to repair the mill."

"Doest think," Whang blushing ask'd, "he will?"

"Yes, yes, I do believe so too,

He was a neighbour kind and true;

And if his counsels gave offence,
The fault was in my want of sense.
Yet, idiot! I"—"Enough!" cried Kate,
Exulting in her alter'd mate;
"To see our faults in their just light,
Is next akin to acting right.
But time no longer let us waste;
I'll to friend Roughspeech quickly haste:
Own thou, meanwhile," she smiling cried,
"To have a help-mate in thy bride
Is treasure perhaps of equal worth
With aught conceal'd beneath the earth."
With look of conscious proud delight,
She caught the sound of, "Kate, thou'rt right;"
While a "small voice" responsive join'd
Applausive music in her mind.

Then turn'd she from the yawning ground,
And, eying Whang with thought profound,

Saw in his look, on her that bent,
A meaning most intelligent.
A wish defin'd she saw, and knelt;
Beside her soon his form she felt:
Then, with join'd hands uplift in air,
Burst from their lips the ardent prayer.
With brighter hopes from earth they rose,
Nor long (—for so the story goes)
In idle wailings spent the day:
Just then a neighbour pass'd that way.—
Whang turn'd his head; a crimson streak
Rush'd hastily across his cheek,
And Cath'rine's palpitating breast
A momentary shame confess'd:
For well they knew, Old Robin's tale
Soon through the village would prevail,
And bring a host about their ears,
With pity some, and some with jeers.
But guilt and folly must endure
The caustics that effect a cure.

Whang therefore strove, with patient heart,
 To bear th' anticipated smart;
 Nor vainly strove: the threaten'd ill
 Fell, he with patience met it still.
 Few in the morning of his grief
 Or gave, or proffer'd him relief.
 Those who had counsell'd heretofore,
 Excus'd themselves from doing more,
 " Presuming nothing they could offer
 Would meet acceptance from the scoffer."
 Others, meanwhile, of nature good,
 Assisted, comforted, withstood
 With honest scorn the worldling's cant,
 Nor shunn'd a neighbour, though in want.
 To all, Whang bore an humble mien,
 By all, his contrite spirit's seen;
 Till even they who smil'd at first,
 When o'er his head the tempest burst,
 Were forc'd, in justice, to declare
 His penitence appear'd sincere.

“ They trusted, nay, almost believ'd
 His loss of character retriev'd :”
 And, soften'd by his chang'd address,
 “ Good fortune wish'd, and happiness.”

And he was happy—“ he was bless'd
 Beyond desert,” he oft confess'd,
 By friends, by all the good caress'd. }
 A smiling garden, rescu'd mill,
 His dear old cottage on the hill,
 A faithful wife, a conscience clear,
 Shed brightness on each coming year.

The church-yard stone, that bears his name,
 Records his failing and his fame ;
 And, in his life and death, conveys
 A moral truth to future days.
