7. So the Sorbonicall schooles, the mothers of all errours, have taken from us the justification of faith which is the summe of all godlinesse. They grant verily in word, that man is justified by formed faith: but this they afterward expound, because good works have of faith this, that they availe to righteousnesse: that they seeme in a manner to name faith in mockage, such without great enviousnesse it could not be passed over in silence, seeing it is so oft repeated of the Scripture. And not yet contented, they doe in the praise of good works privily steale from God somewhat to give away to man. Because they see that good works little availe to advance man, and that they cannot be properly called Merits, if they be accounted the fruits of the grace of God: they picke them out of the strength of free will, oyle forsooth out of a stone. And they denie not in deed that the principall cause of them is in grace: but they affirme: that thereby is not excluded free will, by which is all merit. And this not onely the latter Sophisters doe teach, but also their Pythagoras, Lombard: whom if you compare with these men, you may say to be found witted and sober. It was truly a point of marvellous blindness, that when they had Augustine to oft in their mouth, they saw not with how great carefulnesse that man provided, that no piece of the glorie of good works were it never so little, should be conveyed to men. Heere before where he entreated of freewill, we recited certaine testimonies of his to his purpose, of which sort there are oftentimes found many like in his writings, as when hee forbiddeth us that wee should no where boast of our merits, because even they also are the gifts of God: And when he writeth that all our merit is onely of grace, that it is not gotten by our sufficiencie, but is all made by grace, &c. It is no marvell that Lombard was blinde at the light of the Scripture, in which it appeareth that he was not so well practised. Yet nothing could be desired more plaine against him and his disciples, than this word of the Apostle. For when hee forbiddeth Christians all glorying, hee adjoyneth a reason why it is not lawfull to glory: because we are that handworke of God; created to all good workes, that wee should walke in them. Sith therefore there commeth but of us no good thing, but in so much as we be regenerate: and our regeneration is wholly of God without exception: there is no right why we should claime to our selves one ounce in good workes. Finally whereas they continually call upon good workes, in the meane time they so instruct consciences, that they never dare have affiance, that they have God well pleased and favourable to their workes. But contrariwise we without making mention of any Merit, doe yet by our doctrine raise up the courages of the faithfull with singular comfort, when wee teach them that in their workes they please God, and are undoubtedly accepted unto him. Yea and also here we require that no man attempt or goe about any worke without faith, that is to say, unlesse we doe first with assured confidence of minde determine that he shall please God.

8. Wherefore let us not suffer our selves to be led so much as one haire bredth away from this onely foundation; which being laid, wise builders doe afterward well and orderly build upon it. For if there be need of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in minde, that the Sonne of God hath appeared to this end, that hee might destroy the workes of the devill: that they should not finne which are of God, that the time past is enough for the fulfilling of the desires of the Gentiles: that the elect of God are vessels of mercy chosen out unto honour, which ought to be made cleine from all filthinesse. But all is spoken at once, when it is shewed that Christ will have such disciples, which forsaking themselves, and taking up their crosse, doe follow him. Hee that hath forsaken himselfe, hath cut off the roote of all evils, that he may no more seeke those things that are his owne. Hee that hath taken up his crosse, hath framed himselfe to all patience and mildenesse. But the example of Christ containeth both these and all other duties of godlinesse and holinesse. He shewed himselfe obedient to his father, even to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the workes of God: he with his whole hart breathed out the glory of his father: he gave his soule for his brethren: hee both did good and wished good to his enemies. If there bee need of comfort, these will bring marvellous comfort, that we be in affliction, but we are not made carefull: that wee labour, but we are not forsaken : we are brought low, but we are not confounded : wee are throwne downe, but we doe not perish : alway bearing about with us in our bodie the mortifying of Jesus Christ, that the life of Jesus may bee manifestly shewed in us, that if we be dead with him, we shall also live together with him : if we suffer with him we shall also raigne together with him : that wee be fashioned like to his sufferings, till we attaine to the likenesse of his resurrection : For as much as the Father hath predestinate these to be fashioned like the image of his Sonne, whom, in him he hath chosen, that hee may be the first begotten among all his brethren : and therefore that neither death, nor present things, nor things to come, shall sever us from the love of God which is in Christ : but rather all things shall turne to us to good and to salvation. Lo, we doe not justifie a man by works before God : but wee say, that all they that are of God, are regenerate and made a new creature, that they may passe out of the kingdome of sinne into the kingdome of righteousnesse, and that by this testimonte they make their calling certaine, and are judged as trees by the fruits.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

A confutation of the slanders, whereby the Papists goe about to bring this doctrine in hatred.

The doctrine of justification by Christ without works falsely accused as a meane to make men slacke and carelesse to doe well.

1 Cor. 1. 30.

WITH this one word may the shamelesse of certaine ungodly men bee confuted, which slander vs with saying that we destroy good works, and doe draw men away from the following of them, when we say that they are not justified by works : nor doe deserve salvation : and againe, that we make too easie a way to righteousnesse, when we teach that it lieth in the free forgiveness of sinnes, and that we doe by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much enclined thereto alreadye. These slanders (I say) are with that one word sufficiently confuted : yet I will briefly answer to them both. They allege that by the justification of faith, good workes are destroyed. I leave unspoken, what manner of men bee these zealous lovers of good workes which doe so backebite us. Let them have licence as freely to raile as they doe licentiously infect the whole world with the filthinesse of their life. They faigne that they bee grieved, that when Faith is so gloriously advanced, workes are driven downe out of their place. What if they bee more raised up, and stablished ? For neither doe wee dreame of a faith void of good workes, nor a justification, that is without them. This onely is the difference, that when wee confesse that faith and good workes doe necessarily hang together, yet wee set justification in faith, not in workes. For what reason wee doe so, wee have in readinesse easily to declare, if we doe but turne to Christ unto whom our faith is directed, and from whom it receiveth her whole strength. Why therefore are we justified by faith ? because by faith we take hold of the righteousnesse of Christ, by which alone we are reconciled to God. But this thou canst not take hold of, but that thou must also therewithall take hold of sanctification. For hee was given to us, for righteousnesse, wildome, sanctification, and redemption. Therefore Christ justifieth none whom he doth not also sanctifie. For these benefits are coupled together with a perpetuall and unseparable knot, that whom he enlightneth with his wildome, them he redeemeth : whom he redeemeth he justifieth : whom hee justifieth he sanctifieth. But for as much as our question is onely of righteousnesse and sanctifying, let us stay upon these. Wee may put difference betweene them, yet Christ containeth them both unseparably in himselfe. Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteousnesse in Christ ? Thou must first possesse Christ : and thou canst not possesse him, but that thou must bee made partaker of his sanctification : because he cannot be torne in peeces. Sith therefore the Lord doth grant us these benefits to be enjoyed none otherwise, than in giving himselfe, he giveth them both together, the one never without the other. So appeareth how true it is, that we are justified not without workes, and yet not by workes : because in the partaking of Christ, whereby we are justified, is no lesse contained sanctification than righteousnesse.

2. That also is most tallie, that the mindes of men are withdrawne from the affection of wolding, when we take from them the opinion of meriting. Here by the way the readers must be warned, that they foolishly reason from reward to merit, as I shall afterward more plainly declare: namely, because they know not this principle, that God is no lesse liberall when he assigneth reward to workes, than when he giveth power to doe well. But this I had rather deferre to the place fit for it. Now it shall be enough to touch how weak their objection is: which shall be done two waies. For first whereas they say that there shall be no care of well framing of life, but when hope of reward is set before them: they erre quite from the truth. For if this onely be intended when men serve God, that they looke to reward or let out to hire or sell their labours to him, they little prevaile: for God will be freely worshipped, freely loved: he (I say) alloweth that worshipper, which when all hope of receiving reward is cut off, yet ceaseth not to worship him. Moreover, if men be to be pricked forward, no man can put sharper spurres unto them, than those that are taken of the end of our redemption and calling: such as the word of God spurreth men withall, when it teacheth, that it is too wicked unthankfulnesse, not mutually to love him againe which first loved us: that by the blood of Christ our consciences are clesed from dead workes to serve the living God: that it is a hainous sacrilege, if being once clesed, we defile our selves with new filthinesse, and prophane that holy blood: that wee are delivered from the hands of our enemies, that wee may without feare serve him in holinesse and righteousnesse before him all the daies of our life: that we are made free from sinne, that we may with a free spirit follow righteousnesse: that our old man is crucified, that wee may rise againe into newnesse of life: againe, that if we be dead with Christ (as becommeth his members) we must seeke those things that are above, and must in the world bee waifaring men from home, that we may long toward heaven where is our treasure: that the grace of God hath appeared to this end, that forsaking all ungodlinesse and worldly desires, we may live soberly, holily, and godlily in this world, looking for the blessed hope and the appearing of the glorie of the great God and Saviour: therefore that we are not appointed that we should stirre up wrath to our selves, but that we may obtaine salvation by Christ: that we are the temples of the holy Ghost, which is not lawfull to be defiled: that we are not darknesse, but light in the Lord, which must walke as children of light, that we are not called to uncleannesse, but to holinesse: because this is the will of God, our sanctification, that we abstaine from unlawfull desires: that our calling is holie, that the same is not fulfilled but with purenesse of life: that wee are for this purpose delivered from sinne, that we should obey to righteousnesse. Can we bee pricked forward to charitie with any more lively argument than that of John, that we should mutually love one another as God hath loved us? that herein his children doe differ from the children of the divell, the children of light from the children of darknesse, because they abide in love? Againe with that argument of Paul, that wee if wee cleave to Christ, are the members of one body, which is meet to bee holpen one of another with mutuall duties? Can wee bee more strongly provoked to holinesse than when we heare againe of John, that all they that have this hope, do sanctifie themselves, because their God is holy? Againe of the mouth of Paul: that having the promise of adoption, we should clesse our selves from all the defiling of the flesh and spirit? then when we heare Christ setting forth himselfe for an example unto us that wee should follow his steps.

3. * And these few thing I have set forth for a taste: For if I should intend to goe through all, I should be driven to make a long volume. The Apostles are all full of encouragements, exhortations and rebukings, whereby they may instruct the man of God to everie good worke, and that without any mention of merit. But rather they fetch their chiefe exhortations from this, that our salvation standeth upon the onely mercy of God and upon no merit of ours. As Paul, after that hee hath in a whole Epistle discouried that there is no hope of life for us but in the righteousnesse of Christ, when he commeth downe to morall exhortations, hee beseecheth them by that mercie of God which hee hath vouchsafed to extend to us. And truly this one cause ought to have bene sufficient, that God may be glorified in us. But if any bee not so

Neither is the affection of wolding hereby cooled in men who are taught that the good which they do, meriteth not the reward which they shall receive for doing: the scripture hath aliter motions than this when it provoketh unto good workes.

Iustification by

vehemently moved with the glory of God, yet the remembrance of his benefits ought to have beene most sufficient to stirre up such men to doe well. But these men, which do peradventure with thrusting in of merits, beat out some servile and constrained obediences of the law, doe fallily say that we have nothing whereby we may exhort men to good workes, because we goe not the same way to worke. As though God were much delighted with such obediences which protesteth that he loveth a cheerefull giver, and forbiddeh any thing to bee given as it were of heaviness or of necessity. Neither doe I speake this for that I doe either refuse or despise that kinde of exhortation, which the Scripture oftentimes useth, that it may leave no meane unattempted every way to stir up our mindes. For it rehearseth the reward which God will render to every man according to his works. But I deny that this is the onely thing, yea or the chiefe among many. And then I grant not that wee ought to take beginning therat. Moreover I affirme that it maketh nothing to the setting up of such merits as these men boast of, as we shall hereafter see. Last of all I say that it is to no profitable use, unlesse this doctrine have first taken place, that wee are justified by the onely merit of Christ, which is conceived by faith but by no merits of our workes, because none can be fit to the endeavour of holiness, unlesse they have first digested this doctrine. Which thing also the Prophet very well signifieth, when he thus speaketh to God: With thee is mercy that thou maist be feared. For he sheweth that there is no worshipping of God, but when his mercy is acknowledged, vpon which alone it is both founded and established. Which is very worthy to be noted, that we may know not onely that the beginning of worshipping God aright is the affiance of his mercy, but also that the feare of God (which the Papists will have to be meritorious) cannot have the name of merit, because it is grounded vpon the pardon and forgiveness of sinnes.

4. But it is a most vaine slander, that men are allured to sinne, when wee affirme the free forgiveness of sins, in which we say that righteousness consisteth. For, we say that it is of so great value, that it can with no good of ours be recompensed, and that therefore it should never be obtained, unlesse it were freely given. Moreover, that it is to us indeed frely given, but not so to Christ which bought it so deereley, namely with his owne most holy blood, beside which, there was no price of valew enough that might be paid to the judgement of God. When men are taught these things, they are put in minde that it is no thanke to them that the same most holy blood is never shed off as with their sin. Furthermore we learne, that our filthinesse is such as is never washed away but with the fountaine of this most pure blood. Ought not they that heare these things, to conceive a greater horror of sin, than if it were said that it is wiped away with the sprinkling of good workes? And if they have any thing of God, how can they but dread being once cleansed, to wallow themselves againe in the mire, as much as in them lyeth to trouble and infect the purenesse of this fountaine? I have washed my feete, (saith the faithfull soule in Salomon) how shall I againe defile them? Now it is evident, whether sort doe both more abate the forgiveness of sinnes, and doe more make vile the dignity of righteousness. They babble that God is appeased with their owne trifling satisfaction, that is, their dung: We affirme that the guiltinesse of sinne is more grievous than can be Parged with so light trifles: that the displeasure of God is more heavy then can be released with these satisfactions of no value, and that therefore this is the prerogative of the only blood of Christ. They say that righteousness (if it faile at any time) is restored and repaired by satisfactory workes: we thinke it more precious than that it can be matched with any recompence of workes, and that therefore for the restoring thereof wee must flie to the onely mercy of God. As for the rest of those things that pertaine to the forgiveness of sinnes, let them be sought out of the next Chapter.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

The agreement of the promises of the Law and the Gospell.

Now let us also goe through the other arguments wherewith Sathan by the foul-diers of his guard, goeth about either to overthrow or batter the justification of faith. This I thinke wee have already wrung from the slanderers, that they can no more charge us as enemies of good works. For, justification is taken away, from good works, not that no good works should be done, or that those which bee done should be denied to be good, but that we should not put affiance in them, nor glory in them, nor ascribe salvation unto them. For this is our affiance, this is our glory, and the only author of our salvation, that Christ the Sonne of God is ours, and we likewise are in him the sonnes of God, and heires of the heavenly kingdome, being called by the goodnesse of God, not by our owne worthinesse into the hope of eternall blessednesse. But because they doe beside these aslaile us, as we have said, with other engines, goe to, let us goe forward in beating away these also. First they come backe to the promises of the law, which the Lord did set forth to the keepers of his law: and they aske whether we will have them to be utterly void or effectuell. Because it were an absurditie and to be scorned to say that they are void, they take it for confessed that they are of some effectualnesse. Hereupon they reason that wee are not justified by onely Faith. For thus saith the Lord: and it shall be, if thou shalt heare these commandements and judgements, and shalt keepe them and doe them, the Lord also shall keepe with thee his covenant and mercy: which he hath sworne to thy fathers, he shall love thee and multiply thee, and blesse thee, &c. Again, if yee shall well direct your waies and your endeavours, if yee walke: not after strange Gods, if yee do judgement betweene man and man, and goe not backe into malice, I will walke in the midst of you. I will not recite a thousand peeces of it he came forth, which sith they nothing differ in sense, shall bee declared by the solution of these. In summe, Moses testifieth that in the law is set forth blessing and curse, death and life. Thus therefore they reason, that either this blessing is made idle and fruitlesse, or that justification is not of Faith alone. We have already before shewed, how if we tieke fast in the law, over us being destitute of all blessing, hangeth onely curse which is threatened to all transgressors. For the Lord promiseth nothing but to the perfect keepers of his law, such as there is none found. This therefore remaineth, that all mankind is by the law accused, and subject to curse and the wrath of God: from which that they may bee loosed, they must needs goe out of the power of the law, and be as it were brought into liberty from the bondage thereof: not that carnall libertie which should withdraw us from the keeping of the law, should allure us to thinke all things lawfull and to suffer our lust, as it were the staires being broken and with loose reines, to runne at riot: but the spirituall libertie, which may comfort and raise up a dismayed and overthrowne conscience, shewing it to be free from the curse and damnation wherewith the Law held it downe bound and fastid. This deliverance from the subjection of the Law, and Manumission (as I may call it) wee obtaine when by Faith wee take hold of the mercy of God in Christ, whereby wee are certified and assured of the righteousnesse of finnes, with the feeling whereof the law did pricke and bite us.

2. By this reason even the promises that were offered us in the law should bee all uneffectuell and void, unlesse the goodnesse of God by the Gospell did helpe. For, this condition that we keepe the whole law, upon which the promises hang, and whereby alone they are to be performed, shall never be fulfilled. And the Lord so helpeth, not by leaving part of righteousnesse in our workes, and supplying part by his mercifull bearing with us, but when he setteth onely Christ for the fulfilling of righteousnesse. For the Apostle, when he had before said that hee and other Jewes beleevied in Jesus Christ, knowing that man is not justified by the workes of the law, addeth a reason: not that they should bee holpen to fulnesse of righteousnesse by the faith of Christ, but by it should bee justified not by the workes of the law. If the faithfull remove from the Law into faith, that they may in Faith finde righteousnesse which they see to be absent from the law: truly they forsake the righteousnesse of the law. Therefore now let him that list, amplifie the rewardings which are said to be prepared for the keeper of the law, so that hee therewithall consider that it cometh to passe by our perversnesse, that wee seele no fruit thereof till wee have obtained another righteousnesse of Faith. So David when hee made mention of the rewarding which the Lord had prepared for his servants, by and by descendeth to the reknowledging of finnes, whereby that same rewarding is made void. Also in the xix. Psalm, hee gloriously

The promises offered in the law should be unlesse the goodnesse of God by the Gospell did helpe. For, this condition that we keepe the whole law, upon which the promises hang, and whereby alone they are to be performed, shall never be fulfilled. setteth forth the benefits of the law, but hee by and by crieth out: Who shall understand his faults? Lord cleanse me from my secret faults? This place altogether agreeth with the place before, where when he had said that all the waies of the Lord are goodnesse and truth to them that feare him, he addeth: For thy names sake Lord, thou shalt be mercifull to my perversnesse, for it is much. So ought we also to acknowledge, that there is indeede the good will of God set forth unto us in the law, if we might deserve it by workes, but that the same never commeth to us by the deserving of workes.

3 How then? are they given that they should vanish away without fruit? I have even now already protested that the same is not my meaning, I say verily that they utter not their effectualnes towards us, so long as they have respect to the merit of workes, and that therefore if they be considered in themselves, they be after a certaine manner abolished. If the Apostle teacheth that this noble promise: I have given you commandements, which who so shall doe shall live in them, is of no vales if we stand still in it, and shall never a whit more profit than if it had not beene given at all: because it belongeth not even to the most holy servants of God, which are all far from the fulfilling of the law, but are compassed about with many transgressions. But when the promises of the Gospell are put in place of them, which doe offer free forgiveness of sinnes, they bring to passe that not onely wee our selves be acceptable to God, but that our workes also have their thanke: and not this onely that the Lord accepteth them, but also extendeth to them the blessings which were by covenant due to the keeping of the law. I grant therefore, that those things which the Lord hath promised in his law to the followers of righteousness and holinesse, are rendered to the workes of the faithfull: but in this rendering the cause is alwaies to be considered that powreth grace to workes. Now causes we see that there be three. The first is, that God turning away his sight from the workes of his servants, which alway deserve rather reproch than praise, embraceth them in Christ, and by the onely meane of Faith reconcileth them to himselfe without the meane of workes. The second, that of his fatherly kindnesse and tender mercifulnesse, he lieth up works to so great honour, not weighing the worthinesse of them, that he accounteth them of some value. The third, that he receiveth the very same workes with pardon, not imputing the imperfection, where-with they all being defiled should otherwise be rather reckoned among sins than vertues. And hereby appeareth how much the Sophisters have beene deceived, which thought they had gaily escaped all absurdities, when they said that workes doe not of their owne inward goodnesse avails to deserve salvation, but by forme of the covenant, because the Lord hath of his liberality so much esteemed them. But in the meane time they considered not, how far those works which they would have to be meritorious, were from the condition of the promises, unlesse there went before both justification grounded upon onely faith, and the forgiveness of sins, by which even the good workes themselves have neede to be wiped from spots. Therefore of three causes of Gods liberality, by which it is brought to passe that the workes of the faithfull are acceptable, they noted but one, and suppressed two, yea and those the principall.

4 These alledge the saying of Peter, which Luke rehearseth in the Actes: I finde in truth that God is not an acceptor of persons: but in every nation hee that doth righteousness is acceptable to him. And hereupon they gather that which seemeth to be undoubted, that if a man doth by right endeavours get himselfe the favour of God, it is not the beneficiall gift of God alone that he obtaineth salvation: yea that God doth so of his mercy helps a sinner, that he is by workes bowed to mercy. But you can in no wise make the Scriptures agree together, unlesse you note a double accepting of man with God. For, such as man is by nature, God findeth nothing in him whereby hee may be inclined to mercy, but onely misery. If therefore it be certaine that man is naked and needy of all goodnesse, and on the other full stuffed and loaden with all kindes of evils, when God first receiveth them: for what quality, I pray you, shall wee say that hee is worthy of the heavenly calling? Away therefore with the vaine imagining of merits, where God so evidently setteth out his free mercifulnesse. For, that which in the same place is said by the voice of the Angels to Cornelius, that his prayers and almes had ascended into the sight of God, is by these men most lewdly wrested that man by by endeavour of good workes is prepared to receive the grace of God. For it must needs bee that Cornelius was already enlightned with the spirit of wisdom, such hee was endued with true wisdom, namely with the feare of God: that he was sanctified with the same spirit, such hee was a follower of righteousness, which the Apostle teacheth to be a most certaine fruit thereof. All these things therefore which are said to have pleased God in him, he hath of his grace, so farre is it off that he did by his owne endeavour prepare himselfe to receive it. Truly there cannot one sillable of the scripture bee brought forth, that agreeth not with this doctrine, that there is none other cause for God to accept man unto him, but because he seeth that man should be every way lost, if he be left to himselfe: but because he will not have him lost, he useth his owne mercy in delivering him. Now we see how this accepting hath not regard to the righteousness of man, but is a meere token of the goodnesse of God toward man being miserable and most unworthie of so great a benefit.

The Testimonie of Peter and example of Cornelius peruersly alleaged to prove that the mercy of God towards men is procured by some worthines of their owne.
A& 10. 34.

5 But after that the Lord hath brought man out of the bottomlesse depth of destruction, and severed him to himselfe by grace of adoption: because he hath new begotten him & newly formed him into a new life, he now embraceth him, as a new creature with the gifts of his spirit. This is that accepting whereof Peter maketh mention, by which the faithfull are after their vocation allured of God even in respect also of works: for the Lord cannot but love and kisse those good things which he worketh in them by his spirit. But this is alway to be remembered, that they are none otherwise acceptable to God in respect of works, but in as much as for their cause & for their sakes, whatsoever good workes hee hath given them in increasing of his liberality, hee also vouchsafeth to accept. For whence have they good workes, but because the Lord, as hee hath chosen them for vessels unto honour, so will garnish them with true godlinesse? Whereby also are they accounted good, as though there were nothing wanting in them, but because the kinde Father tenderly granteth pardon to those deformities and spots that cleave to them? Summarily, he signifieth nothing else in this place, but that to God his children are acceptable and lovely, in whom he seeth the markes and features of his owne face. For wee have in another place taught that regeneration is a repairing of the image of God in us. For as much as therefore wherefoever the Lord beholdeth his owne face, hee both worthily loveth it and hath it in honour: it is not without cause said, that the life of the faithfull being framed to holinesse and righteousness pleaseth him, but because the godly being clothed with mortall flesh, are yet sinners, and their good workes are but begun and favouring of the faultinesse of the flesh: he cannot bee favourable neither to those nor to these: unlesse he more embrace them in Christ than in themselves. After this manner are those places to be taken, which testify that God is kinde and mercifull to the followers of righteousness. Moses said to the Israelites. The Lord thy God keepeth covenant, to a thousand generations: which sentence was afterward used of the people for a common manner of speech. So Salomon in his solemne prayer, saith, Lord God of Israel, which keepeth covenant and mercy to thy servants which walke before thee in their whole heart. The same words are also repeated of Nehemias. For, as in all the covenants of his mercy, the Lord likewise on their behalves requirerth of his servants uprightnesse and holinesse of life, that his goodnesse should not be made a mockerie, and that no man swelling with vaine rejoicing by reason thereof should blesse his owne soule, walking in the meane time in the perverseness of his owne heart: so his will is by this way to keepe in their duty them that are admitted into the communion of the covenant: yet neverthelesse the covenant it selfe is both made at the beginning free, and perpetually remaineth such. After this manner, David when he glorieth that here was rendered to him reward of the cleanness of his hands, yet omittech not that fountaine which I have spoken of, that hee was drawne out of the wombe, because God loved him: where he setteth out the goodnesse of his cause, that he abateth nothing from the free mercy which goeth before all gifts, whereof it is the beginning.

6 And here by the way it shall bee profitable to touch what these formes of speaking doe differ from the promises of the law. I call promises of the law, not those which are each where commonly written in the bookes of Moses: (forasmuch as

Gal. 5.

The good workes of faithfull men acceptable unto God howbeit not because they are worthy to be accepted, but for that the mercie of God loving these persons embraceth their workes, their unworthinesse notwithstanding.

The promises of faithfull men are assurances of their rewards, and tokens that in them also are found many promises of the Gospell) but those which properly belong to the ministerie of the law. Such promises, by what name soever you list to call them, doe declare that there is reward ready vpon condition if thou doe that which is commanded thee. But when it is said, that the Lord keepeth the covenant of mercy to them which love him, therein is rather shewed what manner of men be his servants which have faithfully received covenant, than the cause is expressed why the Lord should doe good to them. Now this is the manner of shewing it. As the Lord vouchsafeth to grant us the grace of eternal life, to this end that he should be loved, feared, and honored of us: so whatsoever promises there are of his mercie in the Scriptures, they are rightfully directed to this end that we should reverence and worship the Author of the benefices. So oft therefore as we heare that he doth good to them that keepe his law, let us remember that the children of God are there signified by the dutie which ought to be continuall in them: that we are for this cause adopted, that we should honor him for our father. Therefore least we should disherit our selves from the right adoption, we must alway indevour to this whereunto our calling tendeth. But let us againe keepe this in minde, that the accomplishment of the mercie of God hangeth not upon the workes of the faithfull: but that he therefore fulfilleth the promise of salvation to them which answer to their calling in uprightnesse of life, because in them he acknowledgeth the naturall tokens of his children which are ruled with his Spirit unto good. Hereunto let that be referred which is in the xv. Psalme spoken of the Citizens of the Church, Lord who shall dwell in thy tabernacle, and who shall rest in thy holy hill? The innocent in hands and of a cleane heart, &c. Againe in Esay, who shall dwell with deuouring fire? He that doth righteoufnesse, he that speaketh right things, &c. For, there is not described the stay whereupon the faithfull may stand before the Lord, but the manner wherewith the most mercifull Father bringeth them into his fellowship, and therein defendeth and strengthneth them. For because hee abhorreth sinne, he loueth righteoufnesse, whom he ioyneth to himselfe, them he denfeth with his spirit, that he may make them of like fashion to himselfe and his kingdome. Therefore if the question be of the first cause, whereby the entry is made open to the holy ones into the kingdome of God, from whence they haue that they may stand fast and abide in it, we haue this answer readie, because the Lord by his mercie both hath once adopted them, and perpetually defendeth them. But if the question be of the manner, then we must come downe to regeneration and the fruites thereof, which are rehearsed in that Psalme

Esay 33. 14.

In what sense the commandements of God
are called righteoufnesse.

Deut. 6. 25.

Deut. 2. 4. 13.
Psal. 106. 30.

7 But there seemeth to be much more hardnesse in these places, which doe both garnish good works with the title of righteoufnesse, and affirmeth that man is iustified by them. Of the first sort there be very many places where the observing of the commandements are called iustifications or righteoufnesse; of the other sorte, that is an example which is in Moser. This shall be our righteoufnesse, if we keepe all these commandements. And if thou take exception, and say that this is a promise of the law which being knit to a condition impossible, proueth nothing. There be other of which you cannot make the same answer, as this: And that shall be to thee for righteoufnesse before the Lord to redeliuer to the poore man his pledge. Againe, that which the Prophet saith, that that zeale in revenging the shame of Israel, was imputed to Phines for righteoufnesse. Therefore the Pharisees of our time thinke that heretie haue a large matter to triumph upon. For when we say, that when the righteoufnesse of Faith is set up, the iustification of workes giveth place, by the same right they make this argument: if righteoufnesse be of workes, then it is false that we are justified by Faith onely. Though I grant that the commandements of the law are called righteoufnesse: it is no maruell: for they are so indeede. Howbeit wee must warne the Readers that the Grecians haue not fitly translated the Hebrue word Hucmi, Deksimus, righteoufnesse for commandements. But for the word, I willingly release my quarell. For neither doe wee deny this to the Law of God, that it containeth perfect righteoufnesse. For although, because wee are debtors of all the things that it commandeth, therefore even when wee have performed full obedience thereof, we are unprofitable servants: yet because the Lord vouchsafed to grant it the honour of righteoufnesse, we take not away that which hee hath given. Therefore we willingly confesse, that the full obedience of the law is righteousness, that the keeping of every commande ment is a part of righteousness, it so bee that the whole summe of righteousness were hee in the other parts also. But wee deny that there is any where any such forme of righteousness. And therefore wee take away the righteousness of the law, not for that it is mained and imperfect of it selfe, but for that by reason of the weakenesse of our flesh it is no where seene. But the Scripture not onely calleth simply the commandements of the Lords righteousness: but it also giveth this name to the workes of the holy ones: As when it reporteth that Zachary and his wife walked in the righteousness of the Lord: truly when it so speaketh it weigheth workes rather by the nature of the law, than by their owne proper state. Howbeit here againe is that to be noted, which I even now said, that of the negligence of the Greeke translator is not a law to be made. But forasmuch as Luke would alter nothing in the received translation, I will also not strive about it. For God hath commanded these things that are in the law to men for righteousness: but this righteousness we performe not but in keeping the whole law: for by every transgression it is broken. Whereas therefore the law doth nothing but prescribe righteousness: if we have respect to it, all the severall commandements thereof are righteousness: if wee have respect to men of whom they are done, they doe not obtaine the praise of righteousness by one worke, being trespassers in many, and by that same worke which is ever partly faulty by reason of imperfections.

§ But now I come to the second kinde, in which is the chiefe hardnesse. Paul hath nothing more strong to prove the righteousness of faith: than that which is written of Abraham, that his faith was imputed to him for righteousness. Sith therefore it is said that the act done by Phimes was imputed to him for righteousness: what Paul affirmeth of faith, the same may we also conclude of workes. Whereupon our adversaries, as though they had won the victory, determine that wee are indeed not justified without faith, but that we are also not justified by it alone, and that workes accomplish our righteousness. Therefore here I beseech the godly, that if they know that the true rule of righteousness is to be taken out of the Scripture onely, they will religiously and earnestly weigh with me, how the Scripture may without cavillation bee rightly made to agree with it selfe. Forasmuch as Paul knew that the iustification of faith is the refuge for them that are destitute of their owne righteousness, he doth boldly conclude that all they that are justified by faith, are excluded from the righteousness of workes. But sith it is certaine that the justification of faith is common to all the faithfull, he doth thereof with like boldnesse conclude that no man is justified by workes, but rather contrariwise that men are justified without any helpe of workes. But it is one thing to dispute of what value workes are by themselves, and another thing what account is to be made of them after the stablishing of the righteousness of faith. If wee should see a price upon workes according to their worthinesse, we say that they are unworthy to come into the sight of God: and therefore that man hath no workes whereof he may glory before God: then, that being spoiled of all helpe of workes, he is justified by onely faith. Now we define righteousness thus, that a sinner being received into the communion of Christ, is by his grace reconciled to God, when being cleansed with his blood he obtayneth forgiveness of sinnes, and being clothed with his righteousness as with his owne, hee standeth assured before the heavenly judgement seat. When the forgiveness of sinnes is set before, the good workes which follow have now another valuation then after their owne deserving: because whatsoever is in them imperfect, is covered with the perfection of Christ: whatsoever spots or filthinesse there is, it is wiped away with his cleanness, that it may not come into the examination of the judgement of God. Therefore when the guiltinesse of all trespasses is blotted out, whereby men are hindered that they can bring forth nothing acceptable to God, and when the fault of imperfection is buried, which is wont also to defile good workes: the good workes which the faithfull doe, are counted righteous, or (which is all one) are imputed for righteousness.

9 Now if any man object this against me to assayle the righteousness of faith, first

It commeth of
the righteousnes which is by faith without workes that the workes of faithfull men are accounted righteous.
Job. 4. 18.

I will aske whether a man be counted righteous for one or two holy workes, being in the rest of the workes of his life a trespasser of the law. This is more than an absurdity. Then I will aske if he be counted righteous for many good workes, if he be in any part found guilty. This also he shall not bee so bold to affirme, when the penall ordinance of the law crieth out against it, and proclaimeth all them accursed which have not fulfilled all the commandments of the law to the uttermost. Moreover, I will goe further and aske, whether there be any worke that deserveth to bee accused of no uncleannesse or imperfection. And how could there be any such before those eyes, to whom even the very starres are not cleane enough, nor the Angels righteous enough? So shall he be compelled to grant that their is no good worke which is not so defiled with transgressions adjoynd with it, and with the corruptnesse of it selfe, that it cannot have the honour of righteousnesse. Now if it bee certain that it proceedeth from the righteousnesse of faith, that workes which are otherwise impure, uncleane, and but halfe workes, not worthy of the sight of God, much lesse of his love, are imputed to righteousnesse, why doe they with boasting of the righteousnesse of workes destroy the iustification of faith, whereas if this iustification were not, they should in vaine boast of that righteousnesse? Will they make a vipers birth: For thereto tend the saying of the ungodly men. They cannot deny that the iustification of faith is the beginning, foundation, cause, matter, and substance of the righteousnesse of workes: yet they conclude that man is not iustified by faith, because good workes also are accounted for righteousnesse. Therefore let us passe these follies and confesse as the truth is, that if the righteousnesse of workes of what sort soever it be accounted, hangeth upon the iustification of faith, it is by this not onely nothing diminished but also confirmed, namely, whereby the strength thereof appeareth more mighty. Neither yet let us thinke that workes are so commended after free justification, that they also afterward come into the place of justifying a man, or doe part the office betweene them and faith. For unlesse the justification remaine alway whole, the uncleannesse of workes shall be uncovered. And it is no absurdity, that a man is so justified by faith, that not onely hee himselfe is righteous, but also his workes are esteemed righteous, above their worthinesse.

Not onely we but our workes also justified by faith in Christ: and therefore the righteousnesse of workes a thing to be under and after the right-
eousnesse of faith.

10. After this manner wee will grant in workes not onely a righteousnesse in part (as our adversaries would have) but also that it is allowed of God, as if it were a perfect and full righteousnesse. But if we remember upon what foundation it is upholden, all the difficulcy shall be dissolved. For then and not till then it beginneth to be an acceptable worke, when it is received with pardon. Now whence commeth pardon, but because God beholdeth both us and all our things in Christ? Therefore as wee, when we are grafted into Christ, doe therefore appeare righteous before God, because our wickedneses are covered with his innocency, so our workes are and be taken for righteous, because whatsoever faultinesse is otherwise in them, being buried in the cleannesse of Christ, it is not imputed. So wee may rightfully say, that by onely Faith, not onely we, but also our workes are justified. Now if this righteousnesse of workes of what sort soever it be, hangeth upon Faith and free justification, and is made of it: it ought to bee included under it, and to bee set under it as the effect under the cause thereof, as I may so call it: so farre is it off that it ought to be raised up either to destroy or darken it. So Paul to drive men to confesse that our blessednesse consisteth of the mercy of God, not of workes, chiefly enforceth that saying of David. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is he to whom the Lord hath not imputed sinne. If any man doe thrust into the contrary innumerable sayings wherein blessednesse seemeth to bee given to workes, as are these: Blessed is the man which feareth the Lord, which hath pity on the poore, which hath not walked in the counsell of the wicked, which beareth temptation: Blessed are they which keepe judgement, the undefiled, the poore in Spirit, the meeke, the mercifull, &c. They shall not make but that it shall be true which Paul saith: For because those things that are there commended are never so in man, that he is therefore allowed of God, it followeth that man is alway miserable, unlesse he be delivered from misery by forgiveness of finnes. For asmuch as therefore all the kindes of blessednesse which are extolled extolled in the Scriptures, doe fall downe void, so that man receiveth fruit of none of them, till he have obtained blessednesse by forgiveness of sinnes, which may afterward make place for them: it followeth that this is not only the highest and the chiefe, but also the onely blessednesse: unlesse peradventure you will have that it be weakened of those which consist in it alone. Now there is much lesse reason why the calling of men righteous should trouble us, which is commonly given to the faithfull. I grant verily that they are called righteous of the holinesse of life: but forasmuch as they rather endeavour to the following of righteousness, than doe fulfill righteousness itselfe, it is meete that this righteousnesse such as it is, give place to the justification of Faith, from whence it hath that which it is.

11 But they say that wee have yet more businesse with Iames, namely which with open voice fighteth against us. For hee teacheth both that Abraham was justified by workes, and also that all wee are justified by workes, not by faith onely, what then? will they draw Paul to fight with Iames? If they hold Iames for a minister of Christ, his saying must bee so taken that it disagree not from Christ speaking by the mouth of Paul: The holy Ghost affirmeth by the mouth of Paul, that Abraham obtained righteousnesse by Faith not by workes: and wee also doe teach that all are justified by Faith without the workes of the law. The same holy Ghost teacheth by Iames that both Abrahams righteousnesse and ours consisteth of workes, not of onely Faith. It is certaine that the holy Ghost fighteth not with himselfe. What agreement shall there be therefore of these two? It is enough for the adversaries, if they plucke the righteousnesse of Faith which we would have to be fastened with most deepe rootes: but to render to consciences their quietnesse, they have no great care. Whereby verily you may see that they gnaw the justification of faith, but in the meane time do appoint no marke of righteousnesse where consciences may stay. Therefore let them triumph as they list, so that they may boast of no other victory than that they have taken away all certainty of righteousnesse. And this wretched victory they shall obtaine, where the light of truth being quenched, the Lord shall suffer them to overspread the darkenesse of lies. But wheretoever the truth of God shall stand, they shall nothing prevaile. I deny therefore that the saying of Iames which they still continually hold up against us as it were the shield of Achilles, doth any thing at all make for them. That this may be made plaine, first wee must looke at the marke that the Apostle shooteth at: and then wee must note where they be deceived. Because there were then many (which mischiefe is wont to be continuall in the Church) which openly bewrayed their infidelity, in neglecting and omitting all the proper workes of the faithfull, and yet ceased not to boast of the false name of faith: Iames doth here mocke the foolish boldnesse of such men. Therefore it is not his purpose in any point to diminish the force of true faith, but to shew how fondly those triflers did challenge so much the vaine image of it, that being contented herewith, they carelesly ranne dissolutely abroad into all licentiousnesse of vices. This ground being conceived, it shall bee ealie to perceive where our adversaries doe misse. For they fall into two deceits in the word, the one in the name of faith, the other in the word of justifying. Whereas the Apostle nameth faith a vaine opinion far distant from the truth of faith, it is spoken by way of granting, which is no derogation to the matter: which he sheweth at the beginning in these words. What profiteth it, my brethren, if any man say that he hath faith, and hath no workes? Hee doth not say, if any have faith without workes, but if any man boast. More plainly as also he speaketh a litle after, where he in mockery maketh it worse than the devils knowledge: last of all, when he calleth it dead. But by the definition you may sufficiently perceive what hee meaneth. Thou beleevest (saith he) that there is a God. Truly if nothing be contained in this faith but to beleeve that there is a God, it is now no marvell if it doe not justifie. And when this is taken from it, let us not thinke that anything is abated from the christian faith, the nature whereof is far otherwise. For after what manner doth true faith justifie us, but when it conjoyneth us with Christ, that being made one with him we may enjoy the partaking of his righteousnesse? It doth not therefore justifie us by this, that it conceiveth a knowledge of the being of God, but by this, that it resteth upon the assurednes of the mercy of God.

S. Iames maketh nothing against justification by faith alone without workes. For he speaketh not of such a faith as is meant by S. Paul in delivering this doctrine.

Neither doth S. James use the word Justification, as S. Paul doth, but in a meaning far different: S. Paul meaning thereby the imputation of righteousness, and S. James the declaration of that righteousness by works, which without works was imputed.

That the doers of the law are justified and not the bare hearers helpeth not, to the overthrow of justification by faith alone.
ROMA. 23.

12. We have not yet the worke, unlesse wee examine also the other deceit in the word, forasmuch as James setteth part of justification in works. If you will make James agreeing both with the rest of the Scriptures, and with himselfe, you must of necessitie take the word of justifying in another signification than it is taken in Paul. For Paul saith that we are justified, when the remembrance of our unrighteousnesse being blot- ted out, we are accounted righteous. If James had meant of that taking, he had wrong- fully alleged that out of Moses: Abraham beleevd God, &c. For hee thus framed it together. Abraham by works obtained righteousness, because hee sticked not at the commandement of God to offer up his sonne. And so the scripture was fulfilled, which saith, that he beleevd God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness. If it be an absurditie, that the effect is before his cause, either Moses doth in that place falsely testifie, that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness: or he deserved not right- eousnesse by that obedience which he shewed in offering up of Isaac. Abraham was justified by his faith, When Ismael was not yet conceived, which was now growne past childhood before that Isaac was borne. How therefore shall we say, that he got to himselfe righteousness by obedience which followed long afterward? Wherefore ei- ther James did wrongfully misurne the order (which it is a wickednesse to thinke) or he meant not to say that he was justified, as though he deserved to bee accounted right- eous. How then? Truly it appeareth that hee speaketh of the declaration of right- eousnesse and not the imputation: as if he had said: Who so are righteous by true faith they doe prove their righteousness with obedience and good works, not with a bare and image-like visor of faith. In summe, he disputeth not by what meane wee are justi- fied, but he requireth of the faithfull a working righteousness. And as Paul affirmeth that men be justified without the helpe of works: so James doth here suffer them to be accounted righteous which want good works. The considering of this end, shall deli- ver us out of all doubt. For our adversaries are hereby chiefly deceived, that they think that James defineth the maner of justifying, whereas he travelleth about nothing but to overthrow their perverse carelesnesse, which did vainely pretend faith to excuse their despising of good works. Therefore into how many waies soever they wrest the words of James, they shall wring out nothing but two sentences: that a vaine bodilesse shew of faith doth not justifie, and that a faithfull man not contented with such an imagina- tive shew, doth declare his righteousness by good works.

13. As for that which they allege out of Paul, the same meaning, that the doers of the law, not the hearers, are justified, it nothing helpeth them. I will not escape away with the solution of Ambrose, that, that is therefore spoken because the fulfilling of the law is faith in Christ. For I see that it is but a meere starting hole, which nothing needeth where there is a broad way open. There the Apostle throweth downe the Jewes from foolish confidence, which boasted themselves of the onely knowledge of the law, when in the meane time they were the greatest despisers of it. Therefore that they should not stand so much in their owne conceit for the bare knowledge of the law, he warneth them, that if righteousnes be sought out of the law, not the knowledge but the observing of it is required. We verily make no doubt of this that the righteous- nes of the law standeth in works: nor yet of this also, that the righteousness consisteth in the worthinesse and merits of works. But it is not yet proved, that we are justified by works, unlesse they bring forth some man that hath fulfilled the law. And that Paul meant none otherwise, the hanging together of the text shall bee a sufficient testi- monie. After that he had generally condemned the Gentiles and the Jewes of unrighte- ousnes, then he descended to the particular shewing of it, and saith, that they which sinned without the Law, doe perish without the law: which is spoken of the Gentiles, but they which have sinned in the law, are iudged by the law: which pertaineth to the Jewes. Now because they winking at their owne trespassings proudly gloried of the onely law: hee adjoyneth that which most fitly agreed, that the law was not there- fore made, that men should bee made righteous by onely hearing of the voice there- of: but then and not till then when they obeyed, as if he should say: Seekest thou righte- ousnesse in the law: allege not the hearing of it, which of it selfe is of small impor- tance, but bring works, by which thou maist declare that the law was not set for thee in

vaine. Of these workes becauſe they were all deſtitute, it followed that they were ſpoiled of the glorying of the law. Therefore we muſt of the meaning of Paul rather frame a contrary argument. The righteouſneſſe of the law conſiſteth in the perfection of workes. No man can boaſt that he hath by workes ſatiſfied the law. Therefore there is no righteouſneſſe by the law.

14. Now they alledge alſo theſe places, wherein the faithfull do boldly offer their righteouſneſſe to the judgement of God to be examined, and require that ſentence be given of them according to it. Of which ſort are theſe: Judge me O Lord according to my righteouſneſſe, and according to my innocency, which are in me. Againe, heare my righteouſneſſe, O God: Thou haſt proved my heart, and haſt viſited it in the night, and there was no wickedneſſe found in me. Againe, the Lord ſhall render to me according to my righteouſneſſe, and hee ſhall recompence me according to the cleannesse of my hands. Becauſe I have kept the waies of the Lord, and have not wickedly departed from my God. And I ſhall bee unſpotted, and ſhall keepe mee from my iniquity. Againe, Judge me, Lord, becauſe I have walked in mine innocency. I have not ſit with lying men: I will not enter in with them that doe wicked things. Destroy not my ſoule with the ungodly, my life with men of blood in whoſe hands are iniquities: whoſe right hand is filled with gifts. But I have walked innocently. I have above ſpoken of the aſſurance which the holy ones doe ſeeme ſimply to take to themſelves of workes. As for theſe teſtimonies that wee have here alleaged, they ſhall not much accompany us if they bee underſtood according to their compaſſe, or (as they commonly call it) their circumſtance. Now the ſure is double. For neither would they have them to be wholly examined that they ſhould bee either condemned or acquitted according to the continuall courſe of their whole life: But they bring into judgement a ſpeciall cauſe to be debated. Neither doe they claime to themſelves righteouſneſſe in reſpect of the perfection of God, but by compariſon of naughty and wicked men. Firſt when the juſtifying of man is intreated of, it is not onely required that hee have a good cauſe in ſome particular matter, but a certaine perpetuall agreement of righteouſneſſe in his whole life. But the holy ones, when they call upon the judgement of God to approve their innocency, doe not offer themſelves free from all guiltineſſe and in every behalfe faultleſſe: but verily when they have ſaſtened their aſſurance of ſalvation in his goodneſſe onely, yet truſting hee is the revenger of the poore afflicted againſt right and equity, they commend to him the cauſe wherein the innocent are oppreſſed. But when they let their adverſaries with them before the judgement ſeat of God, they boaſt not of ſuch an innocency as ſhall answer to the pureneſſe of God if it be ſeverely ſearched, but becauſe in compariſon of the malice, obſtinacy, ſubtlety, and wickedneſſe of their adverſaries, they know that their plainneſſe, righteouſneſſe, ſimplicity, and cleannesse is knowne and pleaſing to God: they feare not to call upon him to bee judge betweene themſelves and them. So when David ſaid to Saul: The Lord render to every man according to his righteouſneſſe and truth: he meant not that the Lord ſhould examine by himſelfe and reward every man according to his deſervings, but hee tooke the Lord to witneſſe, how great his innocency was in compariſon of the wickedneſſe of Saul. And Paul himſelfe, when hee boaſteth with his glorying that hee hath a good witneſſe of conſcience, that hee hath travelled with ſimplicity and uprightneſſe in the Church of God, meaneth not that hee ſtandeth upon ſuch glorying before God, but being compelled with the ſlanders of the wicked, hee defendeth his faithfull and honeſt dealings, which hee knew to be pleaſing to the mercifull kindeſſe of God, againſt all evil ſpeaking of men whatſoever it be. For we ſee what hee ſaith in another place, that he knoweth no evil by himſelfe, but that he is not thereby juſtified, namely, becauſe hee knew that the judgement of God ſurrendereth the beare-eyed ſight of men. Howſoever therefore the Godly doe defend their innocency againſt the hypocriſie of the ungodly, by the witneſſing and judgement of God: yet when they have to doe with God alone, they all cry out with one mouth: If thou marke iniquity, Lord, Lord, who ſhall abide it? Enter not into judgement with thy ſervants: becauſe every one that liveth ſhall not be juſtified in thy ſight: and diſtruſting their owne workes, they gladly ſing, Thy goodneſſe is better than life.

The proteſtations which faithfull men doe make of their innocency in the ſight of God are no arguments that they ſuppoſed themſelves thereby juſtified.

15 There are also other places not unlike to these before, in which a man may yet tar-
ry. Salomon saith, that hee which walketh upin his uprightnesse, is righteous. Again, That in the path of righteousnesse is life, and that in the same is not death. After which manner Ezechiel reporteth that hee shall live that doth judgement and righteousnesse. None of these doe we either deny or darken. But let there come forth one of the sonnes of Adam with such an uprightnesse. If there be none, either they must perish at the sight of God, or flee to the sanctuary of mercy. Neither doe wee in the meane time deny but that to the faithfull their uprightnesse, though it be but halfe and unperfect, is a step to ward immortality. But whence cometh that but because whom the Lord hath taken in- to the covenant of grace, he searcheth not their workes according to their deservings, but kisseeth them with fatherly kindenesse? Whereby wee doe not onely understand that which the schoolemen doe teach, that workes have their value of the accepting grace. For they meane that workes which are otherwise insufficient to purchase righteousnesse by the covenant of the law, are by the accepting of God advanced to the value of equality. But I say that they being defiled both with other trespassings and with their owne spots, are of no other valew at all, than in so much as the Lord tenderly granteth pardon to both: that is to say, giveth free righteousnesse to man. Neither are here those prai- ers of the Apostle seasonably thrust in place, where he wisheth to great perfection to the faithfull, that they may be faultlesse and unblameable in the day of the Lord: These words indeed the Celestines did in old time turmoile, to affirme a perfection of righte- ousnesse in this life. But which wee thinke to be sufficient, we answer briefly after Aug- stine, that all the godly ought indeed to endeavour toward this marke, that they may one day appeare spotlesse and faultlesse before the face of God: but because the best and most excellent manner of this life is nothing but a going forward, we shall then and not till then attaine to this marke, when being unclothed of this flesh of sinne, we shall fully cleave to the Lord. Yet will I not stiffely strive with him which will give the title of perfection to the holy ones, so that hee also limit the same with the words of Augustine himselfe. When (saith he) we will call the vertue of the holy ones, perfect: to the same perfection also belongeth the acknowledging of imperfection both in truth & humility.

That of the reward, the righteousnesse of workes is ill gathered.

When rewards are promised unto men according to their workes, it shoud
so shew that good workes are the cause be the way to salvation.

NOW let us passe over those sayings which affirme, that God will render to every man according to his workes: of which sort are these. Every man shall beare away that which hee hath done in the body, either good or evil. Glory and honour to him that worketh good: trouble and distresse upon every soule of him that worketh evil. And they which have done good things, shall goe into the resurrection of life: they which have done evil, into the resurrection of judgement. Come ye blessed of my fa- ther: I have hungered and ye gave me meat: I have thirsted, and ye gave me drinke, &c. And with them let us also joyne these sayings, which call eternall life the reward of workes. Of which sort are these. The rendering of the hands of a man shall be restored to him. Hee that feareth the commandement shall be rewarded. Be glad and rejoyce behold your reward is plentiful in heaven. Every man shall receive reward according to his labour. Where it is said that God shall render to every man according to his workes, the same is easily assoyled. For that manner of speaking doth rather shew the order of following, than the cause. But it is out of doubt, that the Lord doth accom- plish our salvation by these degrees of his mercy, when those whom he hath chosen he calleth to him: those whom he hath called hee justifieth: those whom hee hath justified, he glorifieth. Although therefore he doe by his onely mercy receive them that be his into life, yet because hee bringeth them into the possession thereof by the race of good workes, that he may fulfill his worke in them by such order as hee hath appointed: it is no marvell if it be said that they be crowned according to their workes, by which with- out doubt they are prepared to receive the crowne of immortality. Yea, and after this manner it is fitly said that they worke their owne saluation, when in applying themselves to good workes, they practise themselves to ward eternall life: namely as in another place they are commanded to worke the meat which perisheth not, when by believing in Christ they get to themselves life: and yet it is by and by afterward added: Which the sonne of man shall give you. Whereby appeareth that the word of Working is not set as contrary to grace, but it is referred to endeavour: and therefore it followeth not, that either the faithfull are themselves authours of their owne saluation or that the same proceedeth from their works. How then? So soone as they are taken into the fellowship of Christ, by knowledge of the Gospell, and the enlightening of the holy Ghost, eternall life is begun in them. Now the same good worke which God hath begun in them, must also bee made perfect until the day of the Lord Jesu. And it is made perfect, when resembling the heavenly father in righteousnesse and holinesse, they prove themselves to be his children not swarved out of kinde.

2. There is no cause why wee should of the name of reward gather an argument that our workes are the cause of saluation, First let this bee determined in our hearts, that the kingdome of heaven is not a reward of servants, but an inheritance of children, which they onely shall enjoy, that are adopted of the Lord to bee his children: and for no other cause, but for this adoption. For, the sonne of the bond-woman shall not bee heire, but the sonne of the free-woman. And in the very same places, in which the holy Ghost promiseth to workes eternall glorie for reward, in expressing the inheritance by name, hee sheweth that it commeth from elsewhere. So Christ rehearseth workes, which he recompenseth with the rewarding of heaven, when he collecth the elect to the possession thereof: but he therewithall adjoyneth that it must bee possessed by right of inheritance. So Paul biddeth servants, which doe their dutie faithfully, to hope for reward of the Lord: but he addeth of inheritance. We see how they doe as it were by expresse words provide that we impute not eternall blessednesse to workes, but to the adoption of God. Why therefore doe they therewithall together make mention of workes? This question shall be made plaine with one example of Scripture. Before the birth of Iaac, there was promised to Abraham a seed in which all the nations of the earth should be blessed: and a multiplying of his seed, which should match the starrs of the skie, and the sands of the sea, and other like. In many yeeres afterward, Abraham, as he was commanded by the oracle, prepared himselfe to offer up his sonne in sacrifice. When hee had performed this obedience, hee received a promise. I have twome by my selfe (saith the Lord) because thou hast done this thing, and hast not spared thine owne onely begotten sonne, I will blesse thee, and multiply thy seed as the starrs of the skie, and the sands of the sea: thy seed shall possess the gates of their enemies, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in thy seed, because thou hast obeyed my voyce. What heare wee? Hath Abraham by his obedience deserved the blessing, the promise whereof hee had received before that the commandment was given? Heere verily wee have it without circumstances shewed, that the Lord rewardeth the workes of the faithfull with those benefits which he had alreadie given them before that the workes were thought of, having yet no cause why he should doe good to them but his owne mercie.

3. Yet doth the Lord not deceive nor mocke us when he saith, that hee sendeth for reward to workes the same thing which he had before works freely given. For, because he will have us to be exercised with good workes, to thinke upon the delivery or enjoying (as I may so call it) of these things which hee hath promised, and to runne through them to the blessed hope set before us in heaven, the fruit of the promises is also rightly assigned to them, to the ripenesse whereof they doe not bring us. The Apostle very fitly expressed both these points, when hee said that the Colossians apply themselves to the duties of charity, for the hope which is laid up for them in heaven, of which they had before heard by the word of the true speaking Gospell. For when hee saith that they knew by the Gospell, that there was hope laid up for them in heaven, hee declareth that the same is by Christ onely, not underpropped with any workes. Wherewith accordeth that saying of Peter, that the godly are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto the saluation which is readie to bee manifestly shewed

John 6. 27.

The rewarding of workes with saluation doth not argue those workes to be the cause of that saluation: wherewith they are rewarded, more than Abrahams obedience in offering his son a cause of that blessing whereof he had the promise before he obeyed.

at the time appointed for it. When he saith that they labour for it, he signifieth that the faithfull must run all the time of their life, that they may attaine to it. But lest we should thinke that the reward which the Lord promiseth us, is reduced to the measure of merit, hee did put forth a parable, in which hee made himselfe a housholder, which sent all them that he met, to the trimming of his Vineyard, some at the first houre of the day, some at the second, some at the third, yea and some at the 11. At evening hee paid to every one equall wages. The exposition of which parable, that same old writer whatsoever he was, whose booke is carried abroad under the name of Ambrose of the calling of the Gentiles, hath briefly and truly set out. I will use rather his words than mine owne. The Lord (saith he) by the rule of this comparison hath stablished the diversitie of manifold calling, belonging to one grace: where without doubt they which being let into the vineyard at their 1. houre, are made equal with them that had wrought the whole day, doe represent the estate of them, whom for the advancing of the excellencie of grace, the tender kindnesse of the Lord hath rewarded at the waining of the day, and at the ending of their life: not paying wages for their labour, but pouring out the riches of his goodnesse upon them whom hee hath chosen without workes, that even they also which have sweated in great labour, and have received no more than the last, may understand that they have received a gift of grace not a reward of workes. Last of all, this also is worthe to be noted in these places, where eternall life is called the reward of workes, that is not simply taken for the communicating which wee have with God to blessed immortalitie, when hee embraceth with fatherly good will in Christ: but for the possessing or enjoying (as they call it) of blessednesse, as also the verie words of Christ doe sound, In time to come life everlasting. And in another place, Come and possesse the kingdom, &c. After this manner Paul calleth adoption, the revealing of the adoption which shall be made in the resurrection: and afterward expoundeth it the redemption of our bodie. Otherwise as estranging from God is eternall death, so when man is received of God into favour, that hee may enjoy the communicating of him and be made one with him, he is received from death to life: which is done by the beneficiall meane of adoption onely. And if, as they are wont, they stifie enforce the reward of workes, wee may turne against them that saying of Peter that eternall life is the reward of faith.

4. Therefore let us not thinke, that the holy Ghost doth with such promise set forth the worthinesse of our workes, as if they deserved such reward. For the Scripture leaveth nothing to us, whereof wee may be advanced in the sight of God. But rather it wholly endeavoureth to beate downe our arrogancie, to humble us, to throw us downe, and altogether to breake us in peeces. But our weaknesse is so succoured, which otherwise would by and by slip and fall downe, unlesse it did sustaine it selfe with this expectation, and mitigate her tedious griefes with comfort. First how hard it is for a man to forsake and denie not onely all his things, but also himselfe, let every man consider for himselfe. And yet with this introduction Christ traineth his scholars, that is, all the godly. Then throughout all their life he so instructeth them under the discipline of the crosse, that they may not set their heart either to the desire or confidence of present good things. Briefely hee so handleth them for the most part that which way soever they turne their eyes throughout the whole widenesse of the world, they have on every side nothing but desperation present before them: so that Paul saith, that we are more miserable than all men if our hope be onely in this world. That they should not faint in these so great distresses, the Lord is present with them, which putteth them in mind to lift up their head higher, to cast their eyes further, that they finde with him the blessednesse which they see not in the world. This blessednesse he calleth, reward, wages, recompence, not weighing the merit of workes, but signifying that it is a recompensing to their troubles, sufferings, slanders, &c. Wherefore nothing withstandeth, but that wee may after the example of the Scripture, call eternall life a rewarding, because in it the Lord receiveth his from labours into rest, from affliction into prosperous and happie state, from sorrow into gladnesse, from povercie into flowing wealth, from shame into glorie, and changeth all the evils which they have suffered for greater good things. So it shall also be no inconvenience, if wee thinke

holinesse of lite to be a way, nor which openeth an entry into the glory of the heavenly kingdome, but whereby the elect are led of their God into the disclosing of it: for as much as this is his good will to glorifie them whom he hath sanctified. Onely let us not imagine a correlation of merit and reward, wherein the Sophisters do fondly sticke fast, because they consider not this end which wee set forth. But how unorderly is it, when the Lord calleth us to one end, for us to looke to another? Nothing is more evident, than that reward is promised to good workes, to releve the weakenesse of our flesh with some comfort, not to puffed up our mindes with glorie. Whosoever therefore doth thereby gather the merit of workes, or doth in oae balance weigh worke with reward, he erreth farre from the right marke of God.

5. Wherefore when the Scripture saith that God the just Judge will one day render to his a crowne of righteousnesse, I doe not onely take exception with Augustine, and say: To whom should hee being a just judge, render a crowne, if hee had not being a mercifull father given grace? and how should there bee righteousnesse, unlesse grace went before which iustificth the unrighteous? How should these due things bee rendered, unlesse these undue things were first given? But also I adde another thing. How should he impute righteousnesse to our workes, unlesse his tender mercifullnesse, did hide the unrighteousnesse that is in them? How should hee judge them worthe of reward, unlesse hee did by immeasurable bountifullnesse take away that which is worthe of punishment? For hee is wont to call eternall life, grace: because it is rendered to the free gifts of God when it is repaid to workes. But the Scripture doth further humble us, and therewithall raise us up. For besides this that it forbiddeth us to glorie in workes, because they are the free gifts of God, it therewithall teacheth that they are alwaies defiled with some dregs, that they cannot satisfie God, if they bee examined by the rule of his judgement: but least our courage should faint, it teacheth that they please by onely pardon. But although Augustine speaketh somewhat ocherwise than we doe: yet that he doth not so disagree in the matter, shall appeare by his words in his third booke to Emiliae. Where when he had compared two men together, the one of a life even miraculously holie and perfect, the other honest in deed and of uncorrect manners, but not so perfect but that much wanteth in him: at the last hee concludeth thus. Even this man which in manners seemeth much inferiour, by reason of the true faith in God whereof hee liveth and according to which hee accuseth himselfe in all his offences, in all his good workes praiseth God, giving to himselfe the shame, and to him glorie, and taking from himselfe both the pardon of sinne, and the love of welldoings, when he is to bee delivered out of this life, hee passeth into the fellowship of Christ. Wherefore, but because of faith? Which although it save no man without workes, (for it is it, which worketh by love, not a reprobate faith) yet by it also finnes are released, because the righteous man liveth of faith: but without it even the same which seeme good workes are turned into finnes. Heere verily he doth plainly confesse that which we so much travell to prove, that the righteousnesse of good workes hangeth hereupon that they are by pardon allowed of God.

6. A very neere sense to the places above recited, have these: Make to your selves friends of the Mammon of wickednesse, that when you shall falle, they may receive you into everlasting tabernacles. Command the rich men of this world not to bee proudly minded, nor to trust in uncertaine riches but in the living God, to doe well, to become rich in good workes, to lay up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may obtaine eternall life. For good workes are compared to the riches, which wee may enjoy in the blessednesse of eternall life. I answer, that we shall never come to the true understanding of them, unlesse we turne our eyes to the marke whereunto the holy Ghost directeth his words. If it bee true which Christ saith that our mind abideth there where our treasure is, as the children of the world are wont to bee earnestly bent to the getting of those things which serve for the delights of this present life: so the faithfull must looke sith they have learned that this life shall by and by vanish away like a dreame, that they send those things which they would enjoy thither where they shall have perfect life. We must therefore do as they do which purpose to remove into any place, where they have chosen to rest their whole life.

They send their goods before, and doe not discontentedly want them for a time: because they thinke themselves so much more happie, how much more goods they have, where they shall carrie long. If we beleve that heaven is our countrey, it behooveth us rather to send away our riches thither, than to keepe them heere where wee must use them with sudden removing. But how shall we send them thither? If we communicate to the necessities of the poore: to whom whatsoever is given, the Lord accounteth it given to himselfe. Whereup on cometh that notable promise, He that giveth to the poore, lendeth for gaine to the Lord. Again, he that liberally soweth, shall liberally reape. For those things are delivered into the hand of the Lord to keepe, which are bestowed upon our brethren by the dutie of charitie. He, as he is a faithfull keeper of that which is delivered to him, will one day restore it with plentifull gaine. Are then our dutifull doings of so great value with God, that they be as riches laid up in store for us in his hand? Who shall feare so to say, when the Scripture doth so oft and plainly witness it? But if any man will leape from the mere goodnesse of God to the worthinesse of works, he shall be nothing holpen by these testimonies to the stablishing of his error. For you can gather nothing rightly thereof but the mere inclination of Gods tenderneesse toward us: For as much as to encourage us to well doing although the services which we doe to him are not worthie of so much as his only looking upon them, yet he suffereth none of them to be lost.

7. But they more enforce the words of the Apostle, which when hee comforteth the Thessalonians in troubles, teacheth that the same are sent to them, that they may be accounted worlilie of the kingdome of God, for which they suffer. For (saith hee) it is righteous with God, to render trouble to them that trouble you: but to you, rest with us when the Lord Jesus shall be shewed from heaven. But the authour of the Epistle to the Hebrewes saith, God is not unrighteous, that hee should forget your worke, and the love which you have shewed in his name, for that you have ministered to the Saints. To the first place I answer, that there is no worthinesse of merits spoken of: but because God the Father willeth that we whom he hath chosen to bee his children, should be made like to Christ his first begotten Sonne: as it behooveth that hee should first suffer, and then enter into the glorie appointed for him: so must wee also by many tribulations enter into the kingdome of heaven. Therefore when wee suffer tribulations for the name of Christ, there are as yet certaine markes printed upon us, wherewith God useth to marke the sheepe of his flocke. After this manner therefore wee are accounted worthie of the kingdome of God, because wee beare in our body the markes of our Lord and master which are the signes of the children of God. To this purpose make these sayings: That we beare about in our body the mortification of Jesus Christ that his life may be shewed in us: That wee be fashioned like to his sufferings, that wee may come to the likenesse of his resurrection from the dead. The reason which is adjoynd serveth not to proove any worthinesse, but to confirme the hope of the kingdome of God: as it hee had said, As it agreeth with the just judgement of God to take vengeance of your enemies for the vexations that they have done you: so agreeth it also to give to you release and rest from vexations. The other place, which teacheth that it so becommeth the righteousnesse of God not to forget the obedience of them that be his, that it declareth it to be in a manner unrighteous if he should forget them, hath this meaning: God to quicken our thankfulness, hath given us assurance that the labour shall not be in vaine which we shall take for his glory. Let us alway remember that this promise, as all other should bring us no profit, unlesse the free covenant of mercy went before, whereupon the whole assurednesse of our salvation should rest. But standing upon that covenant, wee ought assuredly to trust, there shall also not want reward of the liberalitie of God to our works howsoever they be unworthie. The Apostle to confirme us in that expectation, affirmeth that God is not unrighteous, but will stand to his promise once made. Therefore this righteousnesse is rather referred to the truth of Gods promise, than to his justice of rendering due. According to which meaning there is a notable saying of Augustine, which as the holy man sticketh not to rehearse often as notable, so I thinke it not unworthie that wee should continually remember it. The Lord (saith hee) is faithfull, which hath made him selfe debtor to us, not by receiving any thing of us, but by promising all things to us.

8. There are also alleaged these sayings of Paul, If I have all faith, so that I remove mountaines out of their place, but have not charity, I am nothing. Againe, Now there remaine hope, faith, and charitie, but the greatest among these is charitie. Againe, Above all things have charitie, which is the bond of perfection. By the first two places our Pharisees affirme that wee are rather justified by charity than by faith, namely by the cheifer vertue as they say. But this fond argument is easily wiped away. For wee have in another place already declared, that those things which are spoken in the first place pertaine nothing to true faith. The other place wee also expound of true faith, than which he saith that charitie is greater: not that it is more meritorious, but because it is more fruitful, because it extendeth further, because it serveth mee, because it remaineth alway in force, whereas the use of faith continueth but for a time. If we have regard to excellencie, the love of God should worthily have the chiefe place, of which Paul here speaketh not. For hee enforceeth this thing onely that we should with mutuall charitie edifie one another in the Lord, but let us imagine that charitie doth every where excell faith: yet what man of sound judgement, yea, or of sound braine, will gather hereof that it doth more justify? The power of justifying which faith hath, consisteth not in the worthinesse of the worke. Our justification standeth upon the onely mercy of God and the deserving of Christ, which justification when faith raketh hold of it, is said to justify. Now if you aske your adversaries in what sense they assigne justification to charitie, they will answer that because it is a dutifull doing acceptable to God, therefore by the deserving thereof righteousnesse is imputed to us by the acceptation of the goodnesse of God. Here you see how well the argument proceedeth. We say that faith justifieth, not because by the worthinesse of it selfe it deserveth righteousnesse to us, but because it is an instrument by which we freely obtaine the righteousnesse of Christ. These men, omitting the mercy of God, and passing over Christ (where the sum of righteousnesse standeth) do affirme that we are justified by the benefit of charitie because it excelleth above faith: even as if a man should reason that a king is fitter to make a shooe than is a shoemaker, because he is an infinite way more excellent. This onely argument is a plaine example that all the Sorbonicall schooles doe not so much as take with the uttermost part of their lips what the justification of faith is. But if any wrangler do yet carp and aske, why in so small distance of place wee take the name of faith in Paul so diversely: I have a weighty cause of this exposition. For sith those gifts which Paul rehearseth are after a certaine manner under faith and hope, because they pertaine to the knowledge of God, he comprehendeth them all by way of recapitulation under the name of faith and hope: as if hee should say, both prophetic, and tongues, and the grace and knowledge of interpretation tend to this marke to leade us to the knowledge of God. And wee know God in this life none otherwise but by hope and faith. Therefore when I name faith & hope, I comprehend all these things together. And so there remaine these three, Hope, Faith, Charitie: that is to say, how great diversitie of gifts soever there be, they are all referred to these. Among these the chiefe is Charitie, &c. Out of the third place they gather, If Charitie bee the bond of perfection, then it is also the bond of righteousnesse, which is nothing else but perfection. First, to speake nothing how Paul there calleth perfection, when the members of the Church well set in order doe cleave together, and to grant that wee are by charitie made perfect before God: yet what new thing bring they forth? For I will alway on the contrary side take exception and say that wee never come to this perfection unlesse we fulfill all the parts of charitie, and thereupon I will gather, that sith all men are most far from the fulfilling of charitie, therefore all hope of perfection is cut off from them.

9. I will not goe through all the testimonies which at this day the too list Sorbonicalls rashly snatch out of the Scriptures, as they first come to hand, and doe throw them against us. For, some of them are so worthy to be laughed at, that I my selfe also cannot rehearse them, unlesse I would worthily be counted fond. Therefore I will make an end, when I shall have declared the saying of Christ, wherewith they marvellously please themselves. For, to the Lawyer which asked him what was necessarie to salvation, hee answered : if thou wilt enter into life keepe the commandements. What would we more (say they) when we are commanded by the Authour of grace himselfe to get the kingdome of God by the keeping of his commandements? As though, forsooth it were not certaine, that Christ tempered his answers to them with whom hee saw that he had to doe. Here a doctor of the Law asketh of the meane to obtaine blessednesse, and not that only, but with doing of what thing men may attain unto it. Both the person of him that spake and the question it selfe led the Lord so to answer. The Lawyer being filled with the perswasion of the righteousnes of the Law, was blinde in confidence of workes. Againe, he fought nothing else but what were the workes of righteousnesse, by which salvation is gotten. Therefore he is worthily sent to the law, in which there is a perfect mirrour of righteousnesse. We also do with a loud voice pronounce that the commandements must be kept, if life be sought in workes. And this doctrine is necessarie to bee knowne of Christians. For how should they flee to Christ if they did not acknowledge that they are fallen from the way of life into the headlong downe-fall of death? But how should they understand how fare they have straid from the way of life, unlesse they first understand what is that way of life? For then they are taught that the sanctuarie to recover salvation is in Christ, when they see how great difference there is between their life and the righteousnes of God, which is contained in the keeping of the Law. The summe is this, that if salvation be sought in workes, we must keepe the commandements by which we are instructed to perfect righteousnes. But we must not sticke fast here, unlesse we will faint in our midde course : for none of us is able to keepe the commandements. Sith therefore we are excluded from the righteousnesse of the law, we must of necessitie resort to another helpe, namely to the faith of Christ. Wherefore as here the Lord calleth backe the doctor of the law, whom he knew to swel with vaine confidence of workes, to the law, wherby he may learne that he is a sinner subject to dreadfull judgement of eternall death : so in other places without making mention of the law, he comforteth other that are already humbled with such knowledge, with promise of grace, as, Come to mee all yee that labour and are loaden, and I will refresh you, and yee shall finde rest for your soules.

Mat. 11. 29.

shinesse, of force to make us righteous, nor good works to justifie because evill are

Job. 6. 29.*

10. At the last when they are weary of wresting the Scripture, they fall to subtleties and Sophistical arguments. They cavill upon this that faith is in some places called a worke, and thereupon they gather that we doe wrongfully set Faith as contrarie to workes. As though forsooth Faith in that it is an obeying of the will of God, doth with her owne deservings procure unto us righteousnesse, and not rather because by imbracing the mercy of God, it sealeth in our hearts the righteousnesse of Christ offered to us of it in the preaching of the Gospell. The readers shall pardon me if I doe not tarry upon confuting of such follies, for they themselves without any assault of other, are sufficiently overthrowne with their owne feeblenesse. But I will by the way confute one objection which seemeth to have some shew of reason, left it should trouble some that are not so well practised. Such common reason teacheth that of contraries is all one rule, and all particular finnes are imputed to us for unrighteousnesse, they say it is meete that to all particular good workes be given the praise of righteousnesse. They doe not satisfie me which answer, that the damnation of men properly proceedeth from onely unbeleefe, not from particular finnes. I doe indeed agree to them, that unbeleefe is the fountaine and roote of all evils. For it is the first departing from God, after which doe follow the particular trespassings against the law. But whereas they seeme to set one selfe-same reason of good and evill workes in weighing of righteousnes or unrighteousnesse, therein I am compelled to disagree from them. For the righteousnesse of workes is the perfect obedience of the law. Therefore thou canst not bee righteous by workes, unlesse thou doe follow it as a streight line in the whole continuall course of thy life. From it so soone as thou hast swarved thou art fallen into unrighteousnesse. Hereby appeareth that righteousnesse commeth not of one or a few workes, but of an unswerving and unwearied observing of the will of God. But the rule of judging unrighteousnesse is most contrarie. For he that hath committed fornication, or hath stollen, is by one offence guiltie of death, because hee hath offended against the majestie of God. Therefore these our subtle arguers doe stumble, for that they marke not this saying of.

James, that he which sinneth in one, is made guiltie of all, because hee that hath forbidden to kill, hath also forbidden to steale, &c. Therefore it ought to seeme no absurditie, when we say that death is the just reward of every sinne, because they are everie one worthy of the just displeasure and vengeance of God. But thou shalt reason foolishly, if on the contrary side thou gather that by one good work, man may be reconciled to God, which with many sinnes deserveth his wrath.

Jam. 2.10.

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER.

NOW we must entreat of Christian libertie: the declaration whereof hee must not omit, whose purpose is to comprehend in an abridgement the summe of the doctrine of the Gospel. For it is a thing principally necessarie, and without the knowledge whereof consciences dare in a manner enterprize nothing without doubting they stumble and start backe in many things, they alway stagger and tremble: but especially it is an appendant of justification, and availeth not a litle to the understanding of the strength thereof. Yea they that earnestly feare God, shall heereby receive an incomparable fruit of that doctrine which the wicked and Lucinianicall men doe pleasantly taunt with their scoffes, because in the spirituall darknesse wherewith they bee taken, every wanton railing is lawfull for them. Wherefore it shall now come forth in fit season: and it was profitable to deferre to this place the plainer discoursing of it (for wee have already in divers places lightly touched it) because so soone as mention is brought in of Christian libertie, then either filthie lusts doe boile, or madde motions do rise, unlesse these wanton wits be timely met withall, which doe other wise most naughtily corrupt the best things. For, some men by pretence of this libertie, shake off all obedience of God, and breake forth into an unbrideled licentiousness: and some men disdain it, thinking that by it all moderation, order and choise of things is taken away. What should we here doe, being compassed in such narrow straites? Shall we bid Christian libertie farewell, and to cut off all fit occasion for such perils? But, as we have said, unlesse that bee fast holden, neither Christ, nor the truth of the Gospell, nor the inward peace of the soule is rightly knowne: Rather we must endeavour that so necessarie a part of doctrine be not suppressed, and yet that in the meane time those fond objections may be met withall which are wont to rise thereupon.

2. Christian libertie (as I thinke) consisteth in three parts. The first, that the consciences of the faithfull, when the assistance of their justification before God is to be sought, may raise and advance themselves above the law, and forget the whole righteousness of the law. For sith the law (as we have already in another place declared) leaveth no man righteous; either we are excluded from all hope of justification, or we must be loosed from the law, and so that there be no regard at all had of workes. For who so thinketh that he must bring somewhat, bee it never so litle of good workes, to obtaine righteousness, hee cannot appoint any end or measure of them, but maketh himselfe debtor to the law. Therefore taking away all mention of the Law, and laying aside all thinking upon workes, we must embrace the onely mercie of God, when we intreat of justification: and turning away our sight from our selves, wee must behold Christ alone. For there the question is not how wee be righteous: but how although we be unrighteous and unworthy, we bee taken for worthy. Of which thing if consciences will attaine any certaintie, they must give no place to the law. Neither can any man hereby gather that the Law is superfluous to the faithfull, whom it doth not therefore cease to teach, and exhort, and pricke forward to goodnesse, although before the judgement seat of God it hath no place in their consciences. For these two things as they are most divers, so must they bee well and diligently distinguished of us. The whole life of Christians ought to bee a certaine meditation of godlinesse, because they are called into sanctification. Heerein standeth the office of the Law, that by putting them in minde of their dutie, it should stirre them up to the endeavour of holinesse and innocencie. But when consciences are carefull how they may have God mercifull, what they shall answer, and upon what assistance they shall stand if they be called called to his judgement, there is not to be reckoned what the law requireth, but onely Christ must be set forth for righteousness, which passeth all perfection of the law.

3. Upon this point hangeth almost all the argument of the Epistle to the Galatians. For, that they be fond expositors which teach that Paul there contendeth onely for the libertie of ceremonies, may be proved by the places of the arguments. Of which sort are these. That Christ was made a curse for us, that he might redeeme us from the curse of the law. Again, Stand fast in the libertie wherewith Christ hath made you free, and be not againe entangled with the yoke of bondage. Behold, I Paul say, if yee be circumcised, Christ shall nothing profit you. And hee which is circumcised is debtor of the whole law. Christ is made idle to you whosoever yee be that are justified by the law: yee are fallen away from grace. Wherein truly is contained some higher thing than the libertie of ceremonies. I grant indeed that Paul there entreateth of ceremonies, because he contendeth with the false Apostles, which went about to bring againe into the Christian Church the old shadows of the law which were abolished by the coming of Christ. But for the discussing of this question, there were higher places to bee disputed, in which the whole controversie stood. First because by those Jewish shadows the brightnesse of the Gospell was darkened, he sheweth that wee have in Christ a full giving indeed of all those things which were shadowed by the ceremonies of Moses. Secondly, because these deceivers filled the people with a most naughty opinion, namely that this obedience availed to deserve the favour of God: Here he standeth much upon this point, that the faithfull should not thinke that they can by any workes of the law, much lesse by those little principles, obtaine righteousness before God. And therewithall he teacheth, that they are by the crosse of Christ free from the damnation of the law, which otherwise hangeth over all men, that they should with full assurednesse rest in Christ alone. Which place properly pertaineth to this purpose. Last of all he maintaineth to the consciences of the faithfull their libertie, that they should not be bound with any religion in things not necessarie.

4. The second part, which hangeth upon that former part, is that consciences obey the law, nor as compelled by the necessitie of the law: but being free from the yoke of the law it selfe, of their owne accord they obey the will of God. For because they abide in perpetual terrors, so long as they be under the dominion of the law, they shall never be with cheerefull readinesse framed to the obedience of God, unlesse they first have this libertie given them. By an example wee shall both more briefly, and more plainly perceive what these things meane. The commandment of the law is, that we love our God with all our heart, with all our soule, and with all our strengths. That this may be done, our soule must first be made void of all other sense and thought, our heart must be clenfed of all desires, all our strengths must bee gathered up and drawne together to this only purpose. They which have gone most far before other in the way of the Lord, are yet very far from this marke. For though they love God with their mind, and with sincere affection of heart, yet they have still a great part of their heart and soule possessed with the desires of the flesh, by which they are drawne backe and staided from going forward with hastie course to God. They doe indeed travell forward with great endeavour: but the flesh partly feebleth their strengths, and partly draweth them to it selfe. What shall they here doe, when they feele that they doe nothing lesse than performe the law? They will, they covet, they endeavour, but nothing with such perfection as ought to be. If thou looke upon the law, they see that whatsoever worke they attempt or purpose, is accursed. Neither is there any cause why any man should deceive himselfe with gathering that the work is therefore not altogether evill, because it is imperfect: and therefore that God doth never thelesse accept that good which is in it. For, the law requiring perfect love, condemneth all imperfection, unlesse the rigour of it be mitigated. Therefore his workes should fall to nought which he would have of seeme partly good: and he shall finde that it is a transgression of the law, even in this because it is imperfect.

5. Loe, how all our works are subject to the curse of the law, if they bee measured by the rule of the law. But how should then unhappie soules cheerefully apply themselves to worke, for which they might not trust that they could get any thing but curse?

On

On the other side, if being delivered from this severe exacting of the law, or rather from the whole rigour of the law, they heare that they be called of God with fatherly gentleness: they will merrily and with great cheerefulness answer his calling and follow his guiding. In a summe, they which are bound to the yoke of the law, are like to bond-servants, to whom are appointed by their lords certaine tasks of worke for every day. These servants thinke that they have done nothing, nor dare come in the sight of their Lords, unless they have performed that full task of their workes. But children, which are more liberally and more freeman-like handeled of their fathers, sticke not to present to them their begun and halfe imperfect workes, yea and those having some fault, trusting that they will accept their obedience and willingness of minde, although they have not exactly done so much as their good will was to doe. So must we be, as we may have sure affiance, that our obediences shall be allowed of our most kind father, how little soever, and how rude and halfe imperfect soever they be. As also he assureth to us by the Prophet: I will spare them (saith he) as the father is wont to spare his son that serveth him. Where this word Spare, is set for to beare withall, or gently to winke at faults, for as much as he also maketh mention of service. And this affiance is not a little necessarie for us, without which we shall goe about all things in vaine. For God accounteth himselfe to be worshipped with no worke of ours but which is truly done of us for the worshipping of him. But how can that be done among these terrors, where it is doubted whether God be offended or worshipped without our worke?

6. And that is the cause why the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, referreth all the good workes which are read of in the holy fathers, to faith, and weigheth them only by faith. Touching this liberty there is a plaçe in the Epistle to the Romanes, where Paul reasoneth that sinne ought not to have dominion over us, because we are not under the law, but under grace. For when hee had exhorted the faithfull that sin should not reigne in their mortall bodies, and that they should not give their members to be weapons of wickednesse to sinne, but should dedicate themselves to God, as they that are alive from the dead, and their members, weapons of righteousness to God: and whereas they might on the other side object that they do yet carry with them the flesh full of luts, and that sinne dwelleth in them, hee adjoyneth that comfort by the liberty of the law, as if he should say. Though they doe not yet throughly keele sinne destroyed and that righteousness yet liveth not in them, yet there is no cause why they should feare and be discouraged as though hee had bene alway displeas'd with them for the remnants of sinne, forasmuch as they are by grace made free from the law, that their workes should not be examined by the rules of the law. As for them that gather that we may sin because we are not under the law, let them know that this liberty pertaineth nothing to them, the end whereof is to encourage us to good.

7. The third part is, that we be bound with no conscience before God of outward things which are by themselves indifferent, but that we may indifferently sometime use them, and sometime leave them unused. And the knowledge of this liberty also is very necessary for us, for if it shall be absent, there shall be no quiet to our consciences, no end of superstitions. Many at this day doe thinke us fond to move disputation about the free eating of flesh, about the free use of daies, and garments, and such other small trifles as they indeed thinke them: but there is more weight in them than is commonly thought. For when consciences have once cast themselves into the snare, they enter into a long and cumbersome way, from whence they can afterward finde no ealie way to get out. If a man begin to doubt whether hee may occupie linnen in sheets, shirts, handkerchiefs, and napkins, neither will he be out of doubt whether hee may use hempe, and at the last he will also fall in doubt of matters, for he will weigh with himselfe whether he cannot sup without napkins, whether he may not be without handkerchiefs. If any man thinke dainty meat to be unlawfull, at length he shall not with quietnesse before the Lord eate either brown-bread or common meats, when hee remembereth that he may yet sustaine his body with baser food. If he doubt of pleasant wine, afterward he will not drinke dead wine with good peace of conscience, last of all he will not be so bold to touch sweeter and cleanner water than other. Finally, at the length he will come to this point, to thinke it unlawfull (as the common saying is) to tread upon a straw lying a crosse For here is began no light strife, but this is in question, whether God will have us to use these or those things, whose will ought to guide all our counsels and doings. Heereby some must needs be carried with desperation into a confuse devouring pit: some must, despising God, and casting away his feare, make themselves away through destruction when they have no ready way: For whosoever are entangled with such doubting, which way soever they turne themselves, they see every where present offence of conscience.

We cannot with thankfulness unto God enjoy the use of outward things, unlessse the knowledge of our libertie remove all scruple of conscience and trouble of mind from us. Rom. 14. 14.

8. I know (saith Paul) that nothing is common (meaning by common, unholy) but who so thinketh any thing common, to him it is common. In which words he maketh all outward things subject to our libertie, provided alway that our minds have the assurance of the libertie before God. But if any superstitious opinion cast into us any doubt, those things which of their owne nature were cleane, are defiled to us. Wherefore he addeth: blessed is he that judgeth not himselfe in that which he alloweth. But he that judgeth, if he eat, is condemned, because he eateth not of faith. And that which is not of faith, is sinne. Among such narrow straits, who so nevertheless with carelesly venturing on all things (shew themselves bolder, doe they not as much turne themselves away from God? But they which are throughly peirced with some feare of God, when they themselves also are compelled to doe many things against their conscience, are discouraged and doe fall downe with feare. All that are such, doe receive none of the gifts of God with thanksgiving, by which alone yet Paul testifieth that they all are sanctified to our use: I meane the thanksgiving that proceedeth from a heart that acknowledgeth the liberalitie and goodnesse of God in his gifts. For many of them indeed doe understand that those are the benefits of God which they use, and they praise God in his workes: but sith they are not perswaded that they are given to themselves, how should they thanke God as the giver of them? Thus in a summe we see, whereto this libertie tendeth, namely that we should use the gifts of God to such use as he hath given them unto us, without any scruple of conscience, without any trouble of minde, by which confidence our soules may both have peace with him, and acknowledge his liberalitie toward us. For heere are comprehended all ceremonies that are at libertie to be observed, that our consciences should not be bound with any necessitie to keepe them, but should remember that the use of them is by Gods benefic subject to themselves unto edification.

The use and abuse of the doctrine whidi concerneth Christian liberty.

9. But it is diligently to be noted, that Christian libertie is in all the parts of it a spirituall thing, the whole strength whereof consisteth in appeasing fearefull consciences before God, if either they be unquieted, or carefull for the forgiveness of finnes, or if they be pensive, whether our imperfect workes and defiled with the faults of our flesh doe please God, or if they be troubled about the use of indifferent things. Wherefore they doe wrongfully expound it, which either doe make it a cloake for their owne desires, that they may abuse the gifts of God to their owne lust, or which doe thinke that there is no liberty but that which is used before men, and therefore in using it have no regard of the weake brethren. In the first kinde, men doe at this day much offend. There is almost no man which may by his ability of wealth be sumptuous, which delighteth not in excessive gorgiounesse, in furniture of bankets, in apparell of body, in building of houses, which hath not a will to excell other in all kind of stateliness: which doth not marvellously flatter himselfe in his fineness. And all these things are defended under the pretence of Christian liberty. They say that they are things indifferent, I grant, so that a man indifferently use them. But when they are too greedily coveted, when they are proudly boasted, when they are wastfully spent, it is certain that those things which other wise were of themselves lawful, are by these faults defiled. This saying of Paul, doth very well put difference betweene things indifferent. All things are cleane to the cleane: but to the defiled and unbelieving nothing is cleane, because their minde and conscience is defiled. For why are accursed the rich men, they which have their comfort, which are satisfied with meat, which doe now laugh, which sleepe in beds of Ivory, which joyne land to land, whose bankets have Lute, Harpe, Taber, and Wine? Verily both Ivory, and Gold, and riches are the good creatures of God, permitted yea and appointed by the providence of God for men to use. Neither is it any where forbidden either to laugh, or to be satisfied with meat, or to joyne new possessions to their owne old possessions or of their ancestors, or to be delighted with musickall melody, or to drinke wine. This is true indeed. But when they have plenty of things, to wallow in delights, to glut themselves, to make their wit and minde drunke with present pleasures and alway to gape for new, these doings are most farre from the lawfull use of the gifts of God. Therefore let them take away immeasurable desire, let them take away immeasurable wasting, let them take away vanitie and arrogance, that they may with a pure conscience purely use the gifts of God. When the minde shall be framed to this sobriety, they shall have a rule of the lawfull use. On the other side let this moderation be wanting, even base and common delicates are too much. For this is truly said, that oftentimes in freese and course cloth dwelleth a purple heart, and sometime under silke and purple, lieth simple humility. Let every man in his degree so live either poorly, or meanelly, or plentifully, that they all remember that they are fed of God to live, not to be riotous: and let them thinke, that this is the law of Christian liberty: if they have learned with Paul to bee contented with those things which they presently have: if they can skill both to bee humble and to excell: if they bee taught in all places and in all things to bee both full and hungry, to have plenty and to suffer want.

13. Herein also many men doe erre, because as though their liberty should not bee sound and safe unlesse it had men witnesses of it, they doe indiscreetly and unwisely use it. By which unseasonable using they many times offend the weak brethren. You may see at this day some, which thinke that their liberty cannot stand, unlesse they take possession of it by eating of flesh on Friday. I blame not that they eat: but this false opinion must be driven out of their mindes. For they ought to thinke that by their liberty they obtaine no new thing in the sight of men but before GOD, and that it standeth as well in abtaining as in using. If they understand that it maketh no matter before GOD, whether they eat flesh or egges, whether they weare red or blacke garments, that is enough. The conscience is now free, to which the benefit of such liberty was due. Therefore although they doe afterward abstaine all their life long from flesh and weare alway but one colour, yet they are no lesse free. Yea therefore because they are free, they doe with a free conscience abstaine. But they doe most hurtfully offend because they nothing regard the weakenesse of their brethren, which wee ought so to beare with, that we rashly commit nothing with offence of them. But sometime also it behooveth that our liberty bee set forth before men. And this I grant. But there is a measure most heedfully to be kept, that we cast not away the care of the weak of whom the Lord hath so earnestly given us charge.

11. I will in this place therefore speake somewhat of offences, in what difference they are to be taken, which are to be avoided, and which to be neglected: whereupon we may afterward determine what place there is for our libertie among men. I like well that common division, which teacheth that there is of offences one sort given, another taken: forasmuch as it both hath a plaine testimony of the Scripture, and doth not unjustly expresse that which it meaneth. If thou doe any thing by unseasonable lightnesse, or wantonnesse, or rashnesse, not in order, not in fit place, whereby the ignorant and weak are offended, that same may be called an offence given by thee: because it came to passe by thy fault that such offence was stirred up. And it is alway called an offence given in any thing, the fault whereof came from the doer of the thing it selfe. It is called an offence taken, when a thing which is otherwise not evilly done nor out of time is by evil will or by some wrongfull maliciousnesse of minde drawne to occasion of offence. For in this case was not offence given, but these wrongfull construers doe without cause take one. With that first kind of offence none are offended but the weak: but with this second kinde foure natures and Pharisaicall scornewall heads are offended. Wherefore wee shall call the one the offence of the weak: the other of the Pharisees: and we shall temper the use of our liberty, that it ought to give place to the ignorance of the weak brethren, but in no wise to the rigorousnesse of the Pharisees. For what is to be yielded to weakenesse, Paul sheweth in very many places. Beare (saith he) with the weak in Faith. Again, Let us not hereafter judge one another, but this rather, rather let there not be laid before our brother any offence or occasion of falling : and many other sayings to the same intent, which are more fit to be read in the place it selfe, than to be here rehearsed. The summe is, that we which are strong should beare with the weaknesse of our brethren, and not please our selves, but everie one of us please his neighbour unto good for edifying. In another place, But see that your libertie bee not in any wise an offence to them that are weake, Againe, Eate ye all things that are sold in the shambles, asking no question for conscience : of your conscience (I say) not another mans. Finally bee yee such, that yee give no offence, neither to the Jewes nor to the Greekes, nor to the Church of God. Also in another place. Yee are called, brethren, into libertie : onely give not your libertie to be an occasion to the flesh, but by charity serve ye one another. Thus it is. Our libertie is not given toward our weake neighbours, whose servants charity maketh us in all things : but rather, that having peace with God in our mindes, wee may also live peaceably among men. As for the offence of the Pharisees, how much it is to be regarded, wee learne by the words of the Lord, whereby hee biddeth them to bee let alone, because they are blinde, and guides of the blinde. The disciples had warned him, that the Pharisees, were offended with his sayings : he answered that they were to be neglected, and the offending of them not to be cared for.

12. But yet still the matter hangeth doubtfull, unlesse we know who are to bee taken for weake, and who for Pharisees : which difference being taken away, I see not among offences what use at all of libertie remaineth, which might never be used without great danger. But it seemeth to mee that Paul hath most plainly declared both by doctrine and by examples, how far our libertie is either to be tempered or to be defended though with offences. When he tooke Timothy into his companie, hee circumcised him : but he could not be brought to circumcise Titus. Here were divers doings, and no change of purpose or of mind : namely in circumcising Timothy, when hee was free from all men, he made himselfe a servant to all men : and he was made to the Jewes, as a Jew, that he might winne the Jewes : to them that were under the law, as if hee himselfe were under the law, that hee might win them which were under law : all things to all men, that he might save many, as he writeth in another place. Thus we have a right moderation of liberty, if it may be indifferently restrained with some profit. What hee had respect unto, when he stoutly refused to circumcise Titus, hee himselfe testifieth, writing thus : But neither was Titus, which was with me, although hee was a Grecian, compelled to be circumcised, because of the false brethren which were come in by the way, which had privily crept in, to espy our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage, to whom we gave not place by subjection so much as for a time, that the truth of the Gospell might continue with you. There is also a time when we must of necessity defend our liberty, if the same bee in weake consciences endangered by the unjust exactings of false Apostles. Wee must in every thing study to preserve charity, and have regard to the edifying of our neighbour. All things (saith he) are lawfull for me, but not all things are expedient : all things are lawful for me, but all things doe not edifie. Let no man seeke that which is his owne, but that which is anothers. There is nothing now plainer by this rule, than that wee must use our liberty, if it may turne to the edifying of our neighbour : but if it be not so expedient for our neighbour, then we must forbear it. There bee some which counterfeit the wisdom of Paul in forbearing of liberty, while they doe nothing lesse than apply the same to the duties of charity. For so that they may provide for their owne quietnesse, they wish all mention of liberty to be buried, whereas it is no lesse behovefull for our neighbours, sometime to use libertie for their benefit and edification, than in fit place to restraine it for their commodity. But it is the part of a godly man to thinke, that free power in outward things is therefore granted him, that he may be the freer to all duties of charity.

13. But whatsoever I have spoken of avoiding of offences, my meaning is that it be referred to meane and indifferent things. For those things that are necessary to be done, are not to be left undone for feare of any offence. For as our liberty is to be submitted to charity, so charity it selfe likewise ought to be under the purenesse of faith.

Verily

Intolerable but being covered with presence of not offending the weake.

Verily heere also ought to bee had regard of charitie, but so farre as to the altars, that is that for our neighbours sake we offend not God. Their intemperance is not to bee allowed, which doe nothing but with troublesome turmoiling, and which had rather rashly to read all things, than leisurely to rip them. Neither yet are they to be harkened to, which when they be leaders of men into a thousand sorts of ungodlinesse, yet doe feigne that they must behave themselves so that they bee none offence to their neighbours. As though they doe not in the meane edifie the consciences of their neighbours to evill, specially whereas they sicke fast in the same mire without any hope of getting out. And the pleasant meane for sooth, whether their neighbour bee to bee instructed with doctrine or example of life, say that hee must be fed with milke, whom they fill with most evill and poysonous opinions. Paul reporteth that hee fed the Corinthians with drinking of milke: but if Popish Masse had then bene among them, would he have sacrificed to give them the drinke of milke? No: For milke is not poyson. Therefore they lie in saying that they feed them whom under a shew of flattering allurements they cruelly kill. But, granting that such dissembling is for a time to be allowed, how long yet will they feed their children with milke? For if they never grow bigger, that they may at the least be able to beare some light meate, it is certaine that they were never brought up with milke. There are two reasons that moove mee why I doe not now more sharply contend with them: first, because their follies are scarcely worthe to be confuted, sith they worthily seeme filthy in the sight of all men that have their sound wit: secondly, because I have sufficiently done it in peculiar booke, I will not now doe a thing already done. Only let the readers remember this, that with whatsoever offences Satan and the world goe about to turne us away from the ordinances of God, or to stay us from following that which he appointeth, yet we must nevertheless goe earnestly forward: and then, that whatsoever dangers hang upon it, yet is it not at our libertie to swarve one hairebreadth from the commandement of the same God, neither is it lawful by any pretence to attempt any thing but that which he giveth us leave.

14. Now therefore sith faithfull consciences, having received such prerogative of libertie as we have above set forth, have by the benefit of Christ obtained this that they be not entangled with any snares of observations in those things in which the Lord willed that they should be at libertie: wee conclude that they are exempt from all power of men. For it is unmeet, that either Christ should lose the thanks of his so great liberalitie, or consciences their profit. Neither ought wee to thinke it a slight matter, which we see to have cost Christ so deere: namely which hee valued not with gold or silver, but with his owne blood: so that Paul sticketh not to say, that his death is made void, if we yeeld our soules into subjection to men. For he travelleth about nothing else in certaine Chapters of the Epistle to the Galathians, but to shew that Christ is darkned or rather destroyed to us, unless our consciences stand fast in their libertie, which verily they have lost if they may at the will of men be snared with the bonds of lawes and ordinances. But as it is a thing most worthe to be knowne, so it needeth a longer and plainer declaration. For so soone as any word is spoken of the abrogating of the ordinances of men, by and by great troubles are raised up partly by seditious men, partly by slanderers, as though the whole obedience of men were at once taken away and overthrowne.

15. Therefore that none of us may stumble at this stone, first let us consider, that there are two sorts of government in man: the one spirituall, whereby the conscience is framed to godlinesse and to the worship of God: the other civill, whereby man is trained to the duties of humanitie and civility which are to be kept among men. They are commonly by not unfit names called the Spirituall and Temporall jurisdiction, whereby is signified, that the first of the two formes of government pertaineth to the life of the Soule, and the latter is occupied in the things of this present life: not only in feeding and clothing, but in setting forth of lawes whereby a man may spend his life among men holily, honestly, and soberly. For, that first kinde hath place in the inward minde, this latter kinde ordereth onely the outward behaviours. The one wee may call the spirituall kingdome, the other the civill kingdome. But these two, as wee have divided them, must be either of them alway severally considered by themselves, and when the one is in considering, wee must withdraw and turne away our mindes from the thinking upon the other. For there are in man as it were two worlds, which both divers Kings and divers Lawes may governe. By this putting of difference shall come to passe, that that which the Gospell teacheth of the spirituall liberty, we shall not wrongfully draw to the civill order, as though Christians were according to the outward government lesse subiect to the lawes of men, because their consciences are at liberty before God : as though they were therefore exempt from all bondage of the flesh, because they are free according to the spirit. Againe, because even in those ordinances which seeme to pertaine to the spirituall kingdome, there may be some error; we must also put difference betweene these, which are to be taken for lawfull as agreeable to the word of God, and on the other side which ought not to have place among the godly. Of the Civill government there shall bee elsewhere place to speake. Also of the Ecclesiasticall lawes I omit to speake at this time, because a more full entreating of it shall bee fit for the fourth booke, where we shall speake of the power of the Church. But of this discourse, let this be the conclusion, The question being (as I have said) of it selfe not very darke or entangled, doth for this cause accumber many, because they doe not subtilly enough put difference betweene the outward court as they call it, and the court of conscience. Moreouer this encreaseth the difficultie, that Paul teacheth, that the magistrate ought to be obeyed, not onely for feare of punishment, but for conscience. Whereupon followeth that consciences are also bound by the civill lawes. If it were so, all should come to naught which wee both have spoken and shall speake of the spirituall governement. For the loosing of this knot, first it is good to know what is conscience. And the definition thereof is to bee fetched from the derivation of the word. For, as when men doe with minde and understanding conceive the knowledge of things, they are thereby said (Scire) to know, whereupon also is derived the name of Science : Knowledge : so when they have a feeling of the judgement of God, as a witness joyned with them, which doth not suffer them to hide their sinnes but that they be drawne accused to the judgement seate of God, that same feeling is called Conscience. For it is a certaine mean betweene God and man, because it suffereth not man to suppress in himselfe that which hee knoweth but pursueth him so fir till it bring him to guiltinesse This is it which Paul meaneth, where he saith that conscience doth together witness with men, when their thoughts doe accuse or acquit them in the judgement of God. A simple knowledge might remaine as enclosed within man. Therefore this feeling which presenteth man to the judgement of God, is as it were a keeper joyned to man, to mark and espie all his secrets, that nothing may remaine buried in darkenesse. Whereupon also commeth that old Proverbe, Conscience is a thousand witnesses. And for the same reason Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience for the quietnesse of minde, when being perswaded of the grace of Christ, wee doe without feare present our selves before God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, setteth to have no more conscience of sinne, instead of, to be delivered or acquitted that sinne may no more accuse us.

16. Therefore as worke, have respect to men, so conscience is referred to God, so that a good conscience is no thing else but the inward pureness of the heart. In which sense Paul writeth that charity is the fulfilling of the law out of a pure conscience and faith not fained. Afterward also in the same chapter he sheweth how much it differeth from understanding, saying that some had suffered shipwracke from the faith, because they had forsaken a good Conscience. For in these words he signifieth it is a lively affection to worship God, and a sincere endeavour to live holily and godly. Sometime indeed it extendeth also to men, as in Luke where the same Paul protesteth that he endeavoured himselfe to walke with a good conscience toward God and men. But this was therefore said, because the fruits of a good conscience doe flow and come even to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God onely, as I have already said. Hereby it commeth to passe that the law is said to binde the conscience, which simply bindeth a man without respect of men, or without having any consideration of them. As for example : God commandeth not onely to keepe the minde chaste and pure from all lust, but also forbiddeth all manner of filthinesse of words and outward wantonnesse whatsoeuer it be. To the keeping of this law my conscience is subject although there lived no one man in the world, So hee that believeth himselfe intemperately, not only sinneth in this that he giveth an evill example to the brethren, but also hath his conscience bound with guiltinesse before God. In things that are of themselves meane, there is another consideration. For we ought to abstaine from them if they breed any offence, but the conscience still being free. So Paul speaketh of flesh consecrate to Idols. If any (saith he) moove any doubt, touch it not for conscience sake: I say for conscience, not thine but the others. A faithfull man should sinne, which being first warned should nevertheless eate such flesh. But howsoever in respect of his brother, it is necessarie for him to abstaine as it is prescribed of God, yet hee cease not to keepe still the libertie of conscience. Thus wee see how this law binding the outward worke, leaveth the conscience unbound.

THE TWENTIETH CHAPTER:

Of Prayer, which is the chiefe exercise of faith, and whereby we daily receive the benefits of God.

OF these things that have bene hitherto spoken, wee plainly perceive how needy and void man is of all good things, and how hee wanteth all helps of salvation. Wherefore if hee seeke for releefe, whereby he may succour his needinesse, hee must goe out of himselfe and get them else where. This is afterward declared unto us, that the Lord doth of his own free will and liberality give himselfe to us in his Christ, in whom he offereth us in stead of our miserie, all felicitie, in stead of our need, wealthinesse, in whom hee openeth to us the heavenly treasures: that our whole faith should behold his beloved Sonne, that upon him our whole expectation should hang, in him our whole hope should sticke and rest. This verily is the secret and hidden Philosophie, which cannot be wrung out with Logicall arguments: but they learne it whose eyes God hath opened that they may see light in his light. But since that wee are taught by faith to acknowledge that whatsoever wee have need of, whatsoever wanteth in us, the same is in God and in our Lord Jesus Christ, namely in whom the Lord willed the whole fulnesse of his largesse to rest, that from thence wee should all draw as out of a most plentifull fountaine: now it remaineth that wee seeke in him, and with prayer crave of him that which we have learned to be in him. Otherwise to know God to be the Lord and giver of all good things, which allureth us to pray to him, and not to goe to him and pray to him: should so nothing profit us, that it should be all one as if a man should neglect a treasure shewed him buried and digged in the ground. Therefore the Apostle to shew that true faith cannot be idle from calling upon God, hath set this order: that as of the Gospell springeth faith, so by it our hearts are framed to call upon the name of God. And this is the same thing which he had a little before said, that the spirit of adoption, which sealeth in our hearts the witnesse of the Gospell, raiseth up our spirits that they dare shew forth their desires to God, stirre up unspeakable groanings, and cry with confidence Abba Father. It is meete therefore that this last point, because it was before but onely spoken of by the way and as it were lightly touched, should now be more largely intreated of.

2. This therefore we get by the benefit of prayer, that wee attaine to those riches which are laid up for us with the heavenly father. For there is a certaine communicating of men with God, whereby they entering into the sanctuary of heaven, doe in his owne presence call to him touching his promises: that the same thing which they beleevd him affirming onely in word not to be vaine, they may when need so requireth finde in experience. Therefore wee see that there is nothing set forth to us to be looked for at the hand of the Lord, which wee are not also commanded to crave with prayers: so true it is that by prayers are digged up the treasures, which our faith hath looked upon being shewed to it by the Gospell of the Lord. Now how necessarie and how many waies profitable this exercise of prayer is, it can by no words be sufficiently declared. And undoubtedly it is not without cause that the heavenly father testified, that the onely fortresse of salvation is in the calling upon his name, namely

1 Cor. 10. 28.

Our owne emptinesse and the fulnesse of all riches laid up in Christ should allure us unto prayer.

Rom. 8. 26.

By prayer we are both enriched with grace, and in distresses quieted.

whereby we call to us the presence both of his providence, by which hee watcheth to take care of our matters: and of his power, by which hee sustaineth us being weake and in a manner fainting: and of his goodnesse, by which hee receiveth us into favour being miserably loaden with finnes: finally whereby wee call him all whole, to give himselfe present to us. Hereby groweth singular rest and quietnesse to our consciences. For when wee have disclosed to the Lord the necesserie which distressed us, wee largely rest though it were but in this onely that none of our evils is hidden from him, whom we are perswaded both to be most well willing toward us, and most able to provide well for us.

3. But (will some man say) did not he know without any to put him in minde of it, both in what part we be distressed, and what is expedient for us: so that it may seeme after a certaine manner superfluous, that he should bee troubled with our prayers, as though he winked or slept, untill he were awaked with our voyce? But they which so reason, marke not to what end the Lord hath instructed them that bee his to pray: for he ordeined it not so much for his owne cause as rather for ours. Hee willeth in deed as right it is, that his due be rendred to him, when they acknowledge to come from him whatsoever men require or doe perceive to make for their profit, and doe testifie the same with wishings. But the profit also of this sacrifice wherewith he is worshipped, commeth to us. Therefore how much more boldly the holy fathers gloriously talked both to themselves and others of the benefites of God, so much the more sharply they were pricked forward to pray. The onely example of Elias shall be enough for us, which being sure of the counsell of God, after that hee not rashly had promised raine to Achab, yet busily prayeth betwene his knees, and sendeth his servant severen times to espie it: not for that hee did discredit the oracle of God, but because he knew that it was his dutie, least his faith should wax drowsie and sluggish, to lay up his desires with God. Wherefore although while we lie senselesse and so dull that we perceive not our owne miseries, he waketh and watcheth for us, and sometime also helpeth us undesired, yet it much behoveth us, that he be continually called upon of us, that our heart may bee enflamed with earnest and fervent desire to seeke, love, and worship him, while we accustome our selves in every necessitie to flee to him as to our shoote-anchor. Again, that no desire and no wish at all may enter into our minde, whereof we should be ashamed to make him witnesse, while wee learne to present our wishes, yea and to poure out our whole heart before his eyes. Then that wee may bee framed to receive all his benefites with true thankfulness of minde, yea and with outward thanksgiving, of which wee are put in minde by our prayer that they come to us from his hand. Moreover, that when we have obtained that which wee desired, being perswaded that hee hath answered to our prayers, wee may bee thereby the more fervently caried to thinke upon his kindnesse, and therewithall embrace with greater pleasure those things which we acknowledge to have been obtained by prayer. Last of all, that very use and experience may according to the measure of our weaknesse, assure our minds of his providence when wee understand that he not onely promiseth that he will never faile us, and that he doth of his owne accord open us the entrie to call to him in the very point of necessity, but also hath his hand alway stretched out to help them that be his, and that he doth not feed them with words, but defendeth them with present help. For these causes, the most kind Father, although hee never sleepeth or is sluggish, yet oftentimes maketh a shew as though hee slept and were sluggish, that so he may exercise us, which are otherwise slothfull and sluggish to come to him, to aske of him, to require him to our owne great benefit. Therefore they doe too foolishly, which to call away the mindes of men from prayer, babble that the providence of God, which maketh for the safe keeping of all things, is in vaine wearied without callings upon him: Whereas the Lord contrariwise not in vaine testifieth that he is nigh to all them that call upon his name in the truth. And of none other sort is that which other doe triflingly say, that it is superfluous to aske those things which the Lord is of his owne will readie to give: whereas even the very same things which flow to us from his owne free liberalitie, hee will have us acknowledge to bee granted to our prayers. Which thing that notable sentence of the Psalme doth testifie,

It is not a needlesse thing to prayer even for those things which before we pray, we know that God is pur-posed to bestow.

1 King. 18.43.

Psal. 145. 18.

wherewith many like sayings doe accord. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his cares unto their prayers. Which saying so setteth out the providence of God, bent of his owne accord to provide for the safety of the godly, that yet he omittech not the exercise of faith, whereby slothfulnesse is wiped from the minds of men. The eyes of God therefore doe wake, that he may succour the necessity of the blinde: but he will againe on our behalves heare our groanings, that hee may the better prove his love toward us. And so both are true, that the watchmen of Israel sleepech nor, nor slumbereth, and yet that he sitteth still as having forgotten us when he seeth us dull and dumbe.

4. Now to frame prayer rightly and well, let this be the first rule, that wee be no otherwise framed in minde and heart, than becommeth them that enter in to talke with God. Which verily we shall attaine as touching the minde, if the same being free from fleshly cares and thoughts, wherewith it may be called away or withdrawne from the right and well beholding of God, doe not onely bend it selfe wholly to prayer, but also so much as is possible be lifted up and carried above it selfe. Neither doe I here require a minde so at liberty, that it be pricked and nipped with no care, whereas contrariwise the ferventnesse of prayer must by such carefulnesse be kindled in us (as we see that the holy servants of God doe sometime declare great torments, much more carefulnesse, when they say they utter to the Lord a bewailing voice out of the deepe depth, and out of the middelt of the jawes of death.) But I say that all strange and forren cares must be driven away, wherewith the minde it selfe wandring hither and thither, is carried about, and being drawne out of heaven, is pressed downe to the earth. I meane by this that it must be lifted up above it selfe, that it may not bring into the sight of God any of these things which our blinde and foolish reason is wont to imagine, nor may hold it selfe bound within the compasse of her owne vanity, but rise up to purenesse worthy for God.

5. Both these things are specially worthy to be noted, that whosoever prepareth himselfe to pray, should thereto apply all his senses and endeavours, and not (as men are wont) be diversly drawne with wandering thoughts: because there is nothing more contrary to the reverence of God, than such lightnesse which is a witness of too wanton licentiousnesse, and loose from all feare. In which thing we must so much more earnestly labour as we finde it more hard. For no man can be bent so to pray, but that he shall feele many by thoughts to creepe upon him, either to breake off, or by some bowing and swarving to hinder the course of his prayer. But here let us call to minde, how great an unworthinesse it is, when God receiveth us unto familiar talke with him, to abuse his so great gentlenesse, with mingling holy and prophane things together, when the reverence of him holdeth not our minds fast bound unto him: but as if wee talked with some meane man, we doe in the middelt of our prayer, forsaking him, leape hither and thither. Let us therefore know that none doe rightly and well prepare themselves to prayer, but they whom the Majestie of God piercech, that they come to it uncumbred of earthly cares and affections. And that is meant by the ceremony of lifting up of hands, that men should remember that they be farre distant from God, unlesse they lift up their senses on high. As also it is said in the Psalme. To thee have I lifted up my soule. And the Scripture oftentimes useth this manner of speech, to lift up prayer: that they which desire to be heard of God, should not sit still in their dreges. Let this bee the summe: that how much more liberally God dealeth with us, gently alluring us to unload our cares into his bosome, so much lesse excusable are we, unlesse his so excellent and incomparable benefit doe with us over-weigh all other things, and draw us unto it selfe, that we may earnestly apply our endeavours and senses to pray: which cannot bee done unlesse: our minde by stroag wrastring with the hindrances doe rise up above them. Another point wee have set forth, that wee aske no more than God giveth leave. For though he biddeth us to powre out our hearts, yet he doth indifferently give loose reines to foolish and froward affections: and when he promiseth that he will doe according to the will of the godly, he proceedeth not to so tender bearing with them, that he submittech himselfe to their will. But in both these points men doe commonly much offend. For not only the most part of men

presume without shame, without reverence, to speake to God for their follies, and shamelesly to present to his throne whatsoever liked them in their dreame: but also to great foolishnesse or senselesse dulnesse possesseth them, that they dare thrust into the hearing of God, even all their most filthy desires, whereof they would bee greatly ashamed to make men privie. Some prophane men have laughed to scorne, yea and detested this boldnesse, yet the vice it selte hath alwayes reigned. And hereby it came to passe that ambitious men have chosen Jupiter to bee their Patron: covetous men, Mercury: the desirous of learning, Appollo and Minerva: warriors, Mars: and lecherous people, Venus. Like as at this day (as I have even now touched) men doe in prayers grant more licence to their unlawfull desires, than when they sportingly talke with their egals. But God suffereth not his gentlenesse to bee so mocked: but claiming to himselfe his right, maketh our prayers subject to his authority, and restraineth them with a bridle. Therefore we must keepe fast this saying of John; This is our affiance, that if we aske any thing according to his will, he heareth us. But for as much as our abilities are farre from being sufficient to performe so great perfection, we must seeke a remedy to helpe us. As we ought to bend the sight of our minde to God, to the affection of the heart ought also to follow to the same end. But both dese stay farre beneath it, yea rather doe faint and faile, or be carried a contrary way. Wherefore God to succour this weaknesse, in our prayers giveth the spirit to bee our Schoolemaster, to instruct us what is right, and to governe our affections. For, because we know not what we ought to pray as we ought, the spirit commeth to our succour, and maketh intercession for us with unspeakable groanes, not that it indeede either prayeth or groaneth, but stirreth up in us affiance, desires, and sighings, which the strength of nature were not able to conceive. And not without cause Paul calleth them unspeakable groanings which so the faithfull send forth by the guiding of the spirit, because they which are truly exercised in prayers, are not ignorant that they be so holden in perplexity with blinde cares, that they scarcely finde what is profitable for them to speake: yea, while they goe about to utter stammering words they sticke fast incumbred. Whereupon it followeth, that the gift of praying rightly is a singular gift. These things are not spoken to this purpose, that we favouring our owne slothfulnesse, should give over the charge of praying to the spirit of God, and lie dull in that carelesnesse, to which we are too much inclined (as there are heard the wicked sayings of some, that we must lie negligently gaping to wait untill hee prevent our mindes occupied elsewhere) but rather that we loathing our owne slothfulnesse and sluggishnesse, should crave such helpe of the Spirit. Neither doth Paul, when he biddeth us to pray in spirit, therefore cease to exhort us to wakefulnesse: meaning that the instinct of the spirit so useth his force to frame our prayers, that it nothing hindereth or slacketh our owne endeavour: because God will in this behalfe prove how effectuall faith moveth our hearts.

1 Joh. 5.14.

Rom. 8.16.

2 Cor. 14.26.

A second rule for direction of prayer is the sense and feeling of our owne wants.

6. Let also another law be, that in praying we alway feele our owne want, and that earnestly thinking how we stand in need of those things that we aske, we joyne with our prayer an earnest yea fervent affection to obtaine. For many doe slightly for manner sake receite prayers after a prescribed forme, as though they rendred certaine taske to God: and although they confesse that this is a necessary remedie for their evils, because it is to their destruction to be without the helpe of God which they crave: yet it appeareth that they doe this duty for custome, forasmuch as in the meane time their minds are cold, and doe not weigh what they aske. The generall and confuse feeling indeede of their necessitie leadeth them hereunto: but it doth not stirre them as it were in a present case to aske reliefe of their need. Now what thinke we to be more hatefull and more detestable to God than this fainting, when a man asketh forgiveness of sinnes, in the meane time either thinking that he is not a sinner, or not thinking upon this, that he is a sinner, even wherewith God himselfe is plainly mocked? But of such perversnesse (as I have said) mankind is full, that for manners sake they many times aske many things of God, which they certainly judge that without his liberalitie to come unto them from some other where, or that they have them already remaining with them. The fault of some other seemeth to bee lighter, and yet not tolerable, that they which have onely conceived this principle, that we must sacrifice to God with prayers, doe mumble up prayers without any minding of minde upon them. But the godly must principally take heed, that they never come into the sight of God to aske any thing, but because they doe both boile with earnest affection of heart, and doe therewithall desire to obtaine it of him. Ye 3, and also though in those things which we aske onely to the glory of God, we seeme not at the first light to provide for her owne necessitie, yet the same ought to be asked with no lesse ferventnesse and vehementnesse of desire. As, when we pray that his name be hallowed, we must (as I may so speake) fervently hunger and thirst for that hallowing.

7. If any men object, that we are not alway driven with the like necessity to pray, I grant the same indeed: and this difference is profitably taught us of James: Is any man heaue among you? Let him pray. Who so is merry, let him sing. Therefore even common feeling teacheth us, that because we are too fleshfull, therefore as the matter requireth, we are the more sharply pricked forward of God to pray earnestly. And this David calleth the fit time, because (as he teacheth in many other places) how much more hardly troubles, discommodities, heares, and other kinde of tentations doe presse us, so much freer access is open for us, as though God did call us unto him. But yet no lesse true is that saying of Paul, that we must at all times: because howsoever things prosperously flow according to our hearts desire, and matter of mirth doth compass us on every side, yet there is no minute of time wherein our need doth not exhort us to pray. If a man hath abundance of wine and wheat; yet si he cannot enjoy one morsell of bread, but by the continuall grace of God, whole Cellers and Barnes full shall be no let why he should not crave daily bread. Now if we call to minde how many dangers doe every moment hang over us, the very feare it selfe will teach us that wee have no time free from prayer. But this we may better perceive in spirituall things. For when shall so many times, whereof we know our selves guilty, suffer us to sit still without care, and not in humblewise crave pardon both of the faults and of the paine? When doe tentations grant us truce, so that wee need not to haite unto helpe? Moreover the desire of the Kingdome and glory of God ought so to plucke us to it selfe, not by fits, but continually, that it should alway be fit time for us. Therefore not without cause we are so often commanded to pray continually. I doe not yet speake of perseverance in prayer, whereof mention shall be made hereafter: but when the Scripture warneth us that we ought to pray continually, it accuseth our slothfulnesse, because we doe not perceive how necessary this care and diligence is for us. By this rule all hypocrisie and craftinesse of lying to God is debarred, yea, driven farre away from prayer. God promisseth that he will be neare to all them that call upon him in truth, and hee pronounceth that they shall finde him which seeke him with their whole heart. But they aspire not thither which please themselves in their owne filthinesse. Therefore a right prayer requireth repentance. Whereupon this is commonly said in Scriptures, that God heareth not wicked doers, and that their prayers are a curse. I, like as their sacrifices also be: because it is rightfull that they finde the eares of God shut, which doe locke up their owne hearts, and that they should not finde God easie to bow, which doe with their owne hardnesse provoke his stiffenesse. In Esay he threatneth after this manner. When ye shall multiply your prayers, I will not heare you: for your hands are full of blood. Againe in Jeremie: I have cried, and they have refused to heare: they shall likewise cry, and I will not heare: because he taketh it for a most high dishonour, that wicked men should boast of his covenant, which do in all their life defile his holy name. Wherefore in Esay he complaineth, that when the Jewes come neare to him with their lips, their heart is farre from him. He speaketh not this of onely prayer, but affirmeth that he abhorreth feigning in all the parts of worshipping him. To which purpose maketh that saying of James. Ye aske, and receive not: because ye aske ill, that wee may spend it up in your pleasures. It is true indeed (as we shall againe shew a little hereafter) that the prayers of the godly, which they powre out, doe not rest upon their owne worthinesse: yet is not that admonition of John superfluous, if we aske any thing, we shall receive it of him, because we keepe his commandements: forasmuch as an evill conscience shutteth the gate against us. Whereupon followeth that note doe rightly pray, nor are heard, but the pure worshippers of God. Therefore whosoever prepareth

Altho, there be no time where in prayer needeth not, yet at some times we see speciall necessity thereof, but we see no benefit thereby at any time without a loosning of our owne slothnesse which cannot be attained by repentance.

himselfe to pray, let him be loathfull to himselfe in his owne evils, and (which cannot be done without repentance) let him put on the person and minde of a begger.

8. Hereunto let the third rule be joynd, that whosoever presenteth himselfe before God to pray, should forsake all thinking of his owne glory, put off all opinion of worthinesse, and finally give over all trust of himselfe, giving, in the abasing of himselfe, the glory wholly to God: lest if we take any thing, be it never so little, to our selves, we doe with our owne swelling fall away from his face. Of this submission which throweth downe all height, we have often examples in the servants of God: among whom the holier that every one is, so much the more he is throwne downe when he cometh into the sight of the Lord. So Daniel, whom the Lord himselfe commended with so great title of praise, said: We powre not out our prayers before thee in our righteousnesse, but in thy great mercy. Heare us Lord, Lord be mercifull to us: Heare us, and doe these things that we aske, for thine owne sake: because thy name is called upon over the people, and over thy holy place. Neither doth he by a crooked figure (as men sometime speake) mingle himselfe with the multitude as one of the people, but rather severally confesseth his owne guiltinesse, and humbly fleeth to the sanctuary of forgiveness, as he expressly saith: When I confessed my sinnes, and the sinnes of the people. And this humblenesse David also setteth out with his owne example, when he saith, Enter not into judgement with thy servant, because in thy sight every one that liveth shall not be justified. In such manner Esay prayeth: Loe thou art angry because we have sinned, the world is founded in thy wayes, therefore we shall be saved: And we have bene all tilled with uncleannesse, and all our righteousnesse as a defiled cloth: And we have all withered away as a lease, and our iniquities doe scatter us abroad as the winde: and there is none that calleth upon thy name, that raiseth up himselfe to take hold of thee: because thou hast hid thy face from us, and hast made us to pine away in the hand of our wickednesse. Now therefore O Lord, thou art our father, we are clay, thou art our fashioner, and we are the worke of thy hand. Bee not angry O Lord, neither remember wickednesse for ever. Behold, looke upon us, we are all thy people. Loe, how they stand upon no affiance at all, but upon this onely, that thinking upon this, that they be gods, they despair not that he will have care of them. Likewise Jeremie; If our iniquities answer against us, deale thou for thy names sake. For it is both most truly and most holily written, of whomsoever it be, which being written by an unknowne author, is fathered upon the Prophet Barnub: A soule heavic and desolate for the greauesse of evil, crooked and weake, a hungry soule, and fainting eyes, give glory to thee O Lord. Not according to the righteousnesse of our fathers doe we powre our prayers in thy sight, and aske mercy before thy face O Lord our God: but because thou art mercifull, have mercy upon us, because we have sinned before thee.

9. Finally the beginning, and also the preparing of praying rightly, is craving of pardon, with an humble and plaine confession of fault. For neither is it to be hoped, that even the holiest man may obtaine any thing of God, untill he be freely reconciled to him: neither is it possible that God may be favourable to any but them whom he pardoneth. Wherefore it is no marvell if the faithfull doe with this key open to themselves the doore to pray. Which we learne out of many places of the Psalmes. For David when he asked another thing, saith: Remember not the sinnes of my youth, remember me according to thy mercy, for thy goodnesse sake O Lord. Againe, looke upon my affliction and my labour, and forgive all my sinnes. Where we also see that it is not enough, if we every severall day doe call our selves to account for our new sinnes, if we doe not also remember those sins which might seeme to have bene long agoe forgotten. For the same Prophet in another place, having confessed one heinous offence by this occasion, returneth even to his mothers wombe wherein he had gathered the infection: not to make the fault seeme lesse by the corruption of nature, but that heaping together the sinnes of his whole life, how much more rigorous he is in condemning himselfe, so much more easie he may finde God to intreat. But although the holy ones doe not alway in expresse words aske forgiveness of sinne, yet if we diligently weigh their prayers which the Scripture rehearseth, we shall easily finde that which I say, that they gathered a minde to pray, of the onely mercy of God, and so alway tooke their

beginning at appealing him: because if everie man examine his owne conscience, so far is he from being bolde to open his eares familiarlie with God, that he trembleth at every comming toward him, except that he standeth upon trust of mercie and pardon. There is also another speciall confession, where they aske release of paines, that they also pray to have their sinnes forgiven: because it were an absurditie to will that the effect be taken away while the cause abideth. For we must beware that God be favourable unto us, before that he restitu his favour with outward signes: because both he himselfe will keepe this order, and it should little profit us to have him beneficiall, unlesse our conscience feeling him appeased should thoroughly make him lovely unto us. Which we are also taught by the answer of Christ, For when hee had decreed to heale the man sicke of the Palsey, he said, Thy sins are forgiven thee: lifting up our mindes thereby to that which is chiefly to bee wished, that God doth first receive us into favour, and then shew forth the fruit of reconciliation in helping us. But beside that speciall confession of present guiltinesse, whereby the faithfull make supplication to obtaine pardon of every speciall fault and paine, that generall preface, which procureth favour to prayers, is never to be omitted, unlesse they be grounded upon the free mercie of God, they shall never obtaine any thing of God. Whereunto may be referred that saying of Job: If we confesse our sinnes, hee is faithfull and righteous to forgive us and cleanse us from all iniquitie. For which cause it behooved prayers in the time of the law to bee hallowed with expiation of blood, that they might be acceptable, and that so the people should be put in minde that they are unworthie of so great a prerogative of honour, till being cleansed from their delings they should of the onely mercie of God conceive affiance to pray.

10. But whereas the holy ones seeme sometime for the entreating of God to alleage the helpe of their owne righteousness (as when David saith: ) Keepe my soule, because I am good. Againe Ezechias: Remember Lord I beseech thee, that I have walked before thee in truth, and have done good in thine eies, by such formes of speaking they meane nothing else than by their verie regeneration to restitu themselves to bee the servants and children of God, to whom he himselfe pronounceth that hee will bee mercifull. He teacheth by the Prophet (as we have already seene) that his eies are upon the righteous, and his eares unto their prayers. Againe by the Apostle, that wee shall obtaine whatsoever we aske, if wee keepe his commandements. In which sayings hee doth not value prayer by the worthinesse of workes: but his will is so to stablsh their affiance, whose owne conscience well assurth them of an unfained uprightnesse and innocencie, such as all the faithfull ought to be. For the same is taken out of the very truth of God, which the blinde man that had his sight restored, saith in John, that God heareth not sinners: if wee understand sinners after the common use of the Scripture, for such as without all desire of righteousnesse doe altogether sleepe and rest upon their sinnes: forasmuch as no heart can ever breake forth into unfained calling upon God which doth not also aspire to godlinesse. Therefore with such promises accord the prayers of the holy ones, wherein they make mention of their owne purenesse or innocency that they may feele that to bee given them, which is to be looked for of all the servants of God. Againe it is then commonly found that they use this kind of prair, when they doe in the presence of the Lord compare themselves with their enemies, from whose unjust dealing they wished themselves to bee delivered by his hand. In this comparison it is no marvell if they brought forth their righteousnesse, and simplicity of heart to move him the rather by the rightfulnessse of their cause to helpe them. This therefore we take not away from the godly heart of a good man, but that he may use the purenesse of his conscience before the Lord, to strengthen himselfe in the promises wherewith the Lord comforteth and upholdeth his true worshippers: but our meaning is, that the trust of obtaining stand upon the onely mercy of God, laying away all thinking of their owne deserving.

11. The fourth rule is, that being so throwne downe and subdued with true humility, wee should nevertheless with certaine hope of obtaining be encouraged to pray. These bee things indeed contrary is shew to joyne with the feeling of the just vengeance of Gods sure affiance of favour: which things doe yet very well agree together,

1 John 1.9.

Prayer is fruitlesse where there is not an unfa-ined desiring unto godliness such as David and Eze- chias mention of their praying as warranted thereby that they could not pray in vaine: Psal. 85. 2 Reg. 20. 3. Psal. 34. 16. 1 Joh. 2. 3. Joh. 9. 21.

**The fourth rule of prayer is courage grounded upon certaine hope and trust to obtaine the thing we pray for.*

Psal. 5. 8.

if the onely goodnesse of God raise us up being oppressed with our owne evils. For as we have before taught that repentance and faith are knit as companions together with an unseparable bond : of which yet the one afraiech us, the other cheareth us : so in praier they must mutually meete together: And this agreement David expresseth in few words : I (saith he) will in the multitude of thy goodnesse enter into thy house : I will worship in the Temple of thy holinesse with feare. Under the goodnesse of God he comprehendeth faith, in the meane time not excluding feare : because not onely his majesty driveth us to reverence, but also our owne unworthinesse holdeth us in feare forgetting all pride and assurednesse. But I meane not such affiance, which should stroke the minde losed from all feeling of carefulnesse with a sweet and full quietnesse. For, to rest so peaceably is the doing of them which having all things flowing as they would wish it, are touched with no care, are kindled with no desire, doe swell with no feare. And it is a very good spurre to the holy ones to call upon God, when being distressed with their owne necessity, they are vexed with most great inquietnesse, and are almost dismayd in themselves, till faith come in fit time to their succours, because in such distresses the goodnesse of God so shineth to them, that they doe indeed grone being wearied with weight of present evils, they are also in paine and grieved with feare of greater : yet being so upholden by it, they both relieve and comfort the hardnesse of bearing them, and doe hope for escape and deliverance. Therefore the praier of a godly man must arise out of both affections, must also containe and shew both : namely to grone for present evils, and to be carefully afraid of new, and yet therewithall to flie to God, not doubting that he is ready to reach his helping hand. For God is marvellously provoked to wrath by our distrustfulnesse, if wee aske of him the benefits which we hope not to obtaine. Therefore there is nothing more agreeable with the nature of praier, than that this law be prescribed and appointed to them, that they breake not forth rashly, but follow faith going before them. To this principle Christ calleth us all with this saying: I say unto you, whatsoever things ye require, beleeveth that ye shall receive them, and they shall happen to you. The same also he confirmeth in another place. Whatsoever ye aske in praier beleeving, ye shall receive. Wherewith agreeth Iames, saying, If any need wisdom, let him aske it of him which giveth to all men freely, and upbraidech not : but let him aske in faith not doubting. Wherein setting doubting as contrarie to faith, he doth most sily expresse the nature of it. And no lesse is that to be noted which he addeth, that they obtaine nothing which call upon God in wavering and doubt, and doe not determine in their hearts whether they shall be heard or no. Whom hee also compareth to waves which are diversly tossed and driven about of the winde. Wherupon in another place he calleth a right praier, the prayer of faith. Againe when God so oft affirmeth that he will give to every one according to his faith, he signifyeth that we obtaine nothing without faith. Finally it is faith that obtaineth whatsoever is granted by praier. This is meant by that notable saying of Paul, which the foolish men doe take no heed unto. How shall any man call upon him, in whom hee hath not beleevd? But who shall beleve, unlesse he have heard? But faith commeth of hearing, and hearing of the word of God. For conveyng by degrees the beginning of praier from faith, he plainly affirmeth that God cannot be sincerely called upon of any other, than them to whom by the preaching of the Gospell his mercifulnesse and gentlenesse hath bene made knowne, and familiarly declared.

Rom. 10. 14.

12. This necessity our adversaries doe not thinke upon. Therefore when wee bid the faithfull to hold with assured confidence of minde that God is favourable and beareth good will to them, they thinke that we speake a most great absurditie. But if they had any use of true praier, they would truly understand that God cannot be rightly called upon without that stedfast feeling of Gods good will. Sith no man can well perceive the force of faith, but he which by experience feeleth it in his heart : what may a man profit by disputing with such men which doe openly shew, that they never had anything but a vaine imagination? For of what force, and how necessarie is that assurednesse which we require, is chiefly learned by invocation. Which who so seeth not, he bewraiech that he hath a very dull conscience. Let us therefore, leaving this kinde of blinde men, sticke fast in that saying of Paul, that God cannot be called upon of any other other, but them that know his mercie by the Gospell, and are surely perswaded that it is ready for them. For what manner of saying should this be? O Lord, I am verily in doubt whether thou wilt heare me: but because I am distressed with carefulnesse, I flee to thee, that thou maist helpe me if I be worthy. This was not the wonted manner of all the holy ones, whose prayers we read in the Scriptures. Neither hath the holy Ghost thus taught us by the Apostle, which biddeth us to goe to the heavenlie throne with confidence, that we may obtaine grace, and when in another place he teacheth that wee have boldnesse and access to confidence by the faith of Christ. Wee must therefore hold fast with both hands this assurednesse to obtaine what we aske (such both the Lord with his owne voice so commandeth us, and all the holy ones teach it by their example) if we will pray with fruit. For, that onely prayer is pleasing to God which springeth out of such a presumption of faith (as I may so call it) and is grounded upon a dreadlesse certaintie of faith. He might have been content with the bare name of faith, but hee not onely added confidence, but also furnished the same with libertie or boldnesse, by this marke to put difference betweene us and unbelievers, which doe indeed alwaies pray to God as we doe, but at adventure. For which reason the whole Church praieih in the Psalme: Let thy mercie be upon us, as we put our trust in thee. The same condition is also spoken of in another place by the Prophet: In what day I shall cry, this I know that God is with me. Againe, In the morning I will direct my selfe to thee, and I will watch. For of these words we gather, that prayers are in vaine cast into the aire, unlesse hope be adjoynd, from whence as out of a watch tower we may quietly waite for the Lord. Wherewith agreeth the order of Pauls exhortation. For before that hee move the faithfull to pray in spirit at all times with wakefulnesse and diligence, hee first of all biddeth them to take the shield of Faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. Now let the Readers here call to remembrance that which I have before said, that faith is not overthrowen where it is joynd with acknowledging of our miserie, needinesse, and filthinesse. For with how heaive weight Giever of evill doings the faithfull feele themselves to be overloaden or grieved, and that they bee not onely void of all things which may procure favour with God, but also that they bee burdened with many offences which may wortheilie make him dreadfull to them: yet they cease not to present themselves, neither doth this feeling make them so afraid but that they still resort to him, forasmuch as there is no other way to come to him. For prayer was not ordained, whereby we should arrogantly advance our selves before God, or esteeme at great value anything of our owne, but whereby confessing our guiltinesse, wee would bewaile our miseries to him, as children doe familiarly open their complaints to their parents. But rather the unmeasurable heape of our evils ought to be full of spurres or prickings to pricke us forward to pray. As also the Prophet teacheth us by his example, saying: Heale my soule, because I have sinned against thee, I grant indeed that in such sayings should be deadly prickings unlesse God did helpe: but the most good father of his incomparable tender kindnesse hath brought remedie in fit season, whereby appealing all trouble, asswaging all cares, wiping away feares, he might gently allure us to him, yea, and taking away all doubts (much more all itops) he might make us an easie way.

13. And first when he commandeth us to pray, hee doth by the very same commandement accuse us of wicked obstinacie, unlesse wee obey him. Nothing could bee more precisely commanded, than that which is in the Psalme: Call upon me in the day of trouble. But forasmuch as among all the duties of godlinesse, the Scripture commendeth none more often, I need not to tarric longer upon this point. Aske (saith our master) and ye shall receive, knocke, it shall be opened to you. Howbeit heere is also with the commandement joynd a promise as it is necessary. For though all men confesse that the commandement ought to be obeyed, yet the most part would flee from God, when he calleth, unlesse he promised that he would be easie to be intreated, yea and would offer himselfe. These two things being established, it is certaine that whosoever make delays that they come not straight to God, are not onely rebellious and disobedient, but also are proved guiltie of dishonestie, because they distrust the promises. Which is so much more to be noted, because hypocrites under the colour of humilitie and modestie doe as well proudly despise the commandement of God, as discredit his gentle calling, yea and defraud him of the chiefe part of his worship. For after that he hath refused sacrifices, in which all that times holiness seemed to stand, he declareth that this is the chiefe thing and most precious to him above all other, to be called upon in the day of need. Therefore where hee requireth his owne, and encourageth us to cheerefulnesse of obeying, there are none so gay colours of doubting that may excuse us. Wherefore how many testimonies are commonly found in the Scriptures whereby we are commanded to call upon God, so many standards are set up before our eyes to put assistance into us. It were rashnesse to rush into the sight of God, unlesse hee did prevent us with calling us. Therefore he openeth us the way with his owne voice saying: I will say to them, Yee are my people: and they shall say to me, thou art our God. We see how he preventeth them that worship him, and willet them to follow him, and therefore it is not to be feared that this should not be a very sweet melodie which hee tuneth. Specially let this notable title of God come in our minde, whereupon if we stay we shall easily passe over all stops. Thou God that hearest prayer, even to thee shall all flesh come. For what is more lovely or more alluring, than that God be garnished with this title, which may ascertain us that nothing is more proper to his nature, than to grant the desire of humble suiters? Hereby the Prophet gathereth that the gate standeth open not onely to a few, but to all men: because he speaketh even to all in this saying: Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorifie me. According to this rule David laith for himselfe that a promise was given him, that he may obtaine what he asketh: Thou Lord hast revealed into the eare of thy servant: therefore thy servant hath found his heart to pray. Whereupon we gather that he was fearefull, saving in so much as the promise had encouraged him. So in another place hee armeth himselfe with this generall doctrine. He will doe the will of them that feare him. Yea and this we may note in the Psalmes, that as it were breaking his course of praying, he passeth over sometime to the power of God, sometime to his goodnesse, sometime to the truth of his promises. It might seeme that David by unseasonable thrusting in of these sentences made mangled praiers: but the faithfull know by use and experience that ferventnesse fainteth, unlesse they put new nourishments unto it, and therefore in praying, the meditation both of the nature of God, and of his word is not superfluous. And so by the example of David: let it not grieue us to thrust in such things as may refresh fainting hearts with new lively strength.

14. And it is wonderfull that with so great sweetnesse of promises we are either but coldly or almost not at all moved, that a great part of men wandering about by compasses had rather leaving the fountaine of living waters, to dig for themselves drie pits, than to embrace the liberality of God freely offered. An invincible tower is the name of the Lord (saith Salomon) to it the righteous man shall flee, and he shall be saved. And Isaiah, after that hee had prophesied of that horrible destruction which was at hand, addeth this notable sentence. Whosoever calleth upon the name of the Lord, shall be safe: which sentence we know to pertaine properly to the course of the Gospel. Scarcely every hundredth man is moved to goe forward to meete God. Hee himselfe crieth by Esay: Yee shall call upon me, and I will heare you, yea, before that yee crie, I will answer you. And the same honour also in another place he vouchsafeth to give in common to the whole Church, as it belongeth to all the members of Christ. He hath cried to me, I will heare him, I am in trouble with him, that I may deliver him. Neither yet (as I have already said) it is my purpose to reckon up all the places, but to choose out the chiefe, by which wee may take a taste how kindly God allureth us unto him, and with how strait bonds our unthankfulnesse is bound, when among so sharpe prickings our sluggishnesse still maketh delay. Wherefore also let these sayings also sound in our eares: The Lord is nigh to all them that call upon him, that call upon him in truth: also these sayings which we have alleaged out of Esay and Isaiah, by which God affirmeth that he is heedfull to heare prayers, yea and is delighted as with a sacrifice of sweet favour, when we cast our cares upon him. This singular fruit wee receive of the promises of God, when wee make our prayers not doubtingly and fearefully: but trusting upon his word, whose majestie would otherwise make us afraid, wee dare call call upon him by the name of Father, for as much as he vouchsafeth to put this most sweete name into our mouthes. It remaineth that we having such allurements should know that we have thereby matter enough to obtaine our prayers: for as much as our prayers stand upon no merit of our owne, but all their worthinesse and hope of obtaining are grounded upon the promises of God, and hang upon them: so that it needeth none other underpropping, nor looketh upward hither or thither. Therefore we must determine in our mindes, that although we excell not in like holinesse as is prayed in the holie Fathers, Prophets, and Apostles, yet because the commandment of prayer is common to us, and faith is also common, if we rest upon the word of God, in this right we are fellowes with them. For God (as we have before shewed) promising that he will be gentle, and mercifull to all, giveth cause of hope to all, even the most miserable, that they shall obtaine what they aske. And therefore the generall formes are to be noted, from which no man (as they say) from the first to the last is excluded: onely let there be present a purenesse of heart, misliking of our selves, humilitie, and faith: let not our hypocrisie unholie abuse the name of God with deceitfull calling upon it: the most good father will not put backe them, whom he not only exhorteth to come to him, but also moveth them by all the meanes that he can. Hereupon commeth the manner of praying of David which I have even now rehearsed. Loe thou hast promised, Lord, to thy servant: for this cause thy servant at this day gathereth courage, and hath found what prayer he might make before thee. Now therefore O Lord God, thou art God, and thy words shall be true. Thou hast spoken to thy servant of these benefits: begin therefore, and doe them. As also in another place, Performe to thy servant according to thy word. And all the Israelites together, so oft as they arme themselves with remembrance of the covenant, doe sufficiently declare that we should not pray fearefully, whereas the Lord so appointeth. And herein they followed the examples of the Fathers, specially of Jacob, which after that he had confessed that he was unworthy of so many mercies which he had received at the hand of God, yet he saith that he is encouraged to require greater things, because God had promised that he would doe them. But whatsoever colours the unbelievers doe pretend, when they flee not to God so oft as necessitie presseth them, when they seeke not him nor crave his help, they doe as much defraud him of his due honour, as if they madeto themselves new gods and idols: for by this meane they denie that he is to them the author of all good things. On the other side, there is nothing stronger to deliver the godly from all doubt, than to be armed with this thought, that no stop ought to stay them while they obey the commandment of God, which pronounceth that nothing is more pleasing to him than obedience. Heere againe that which I said before more clearly appeareth, that a dreadlesse spirit to pray agreeth well with feare, reverence, and carefulnesse: and that it is no absurditie to say that God raiseth up the overthrowne. After this manner those formes of speech agree well together which in seeming are contrarie. Jeremie and Daniel say that they throw downe prayers before God. In another place Jeremie saith: Let our prayer fall downe in the sight of God, that he may have mercie on the remnant of his people. On the other side, the faithfull are oftentimes said to lift up prayer. So speaketh Ezechias, requiring the Prophet to make intercession for him. And David desireth that his prayer may ascend as incense. For although they being perswaded of the fatherly love of God, cheerefully commit themselves into his faithfull keeping, and doubt not to crave the helpe which he freely promiseth: yet doth not an idle carelesnesse lift them up, as though they had cast away shame, but they ascend so upward by degrees of promises, that they still remaine humble suppliants in the abasement of themselves.

15. Here are questions objected more than one. For the Scripture reporteth that the Lord granted certaine desires which yet brake forth, of a minda not quiet nor well framed. Verily for a just cause: Jarham had avowed the inhabitants of Sichem, to the destruction which afterward came upon them: but yet God kindled with ferventnesse of anger and vengeance following his execration, seemeth to allow will tempered violent passions. Such hear also carried Sampson when he said, Strengthen me O God, that I may take vengeance of the uncircumcised. For though there were some peece of good zeale mingled with it : yet a hote, and therefore faultie greedinesse of vengeance did beare rule therein. God granted it. Whereupon it seemeth that it may be gathered, that although the prayers be not framed according to the prescribed rule of the word, yet they obtaine their effect. I answered first that a generall law is not taken away by singular examples : againe, that sometime speciall motions have bene put into a few men, whereby it came to passe that there was another consideration of them than of the common people. For the answer of Christ is to be noted, when the Disciples did undiscrētly desire to counterfeit the example of Elias, that they knew not with what Spirit they were endued. But we must goe yet further, and say that the prayers doe not alway please God which he graunteth : but that, so much as serveth for example that is by cleare praise made plaine which the Scripture teacheth, namely that he succoureth the miserable, heareth the groanings of them which being unjustly troubled doe crave his helpe : that therefore hee executeth his judgements, when the complaints of the poore rise up to him, although they be unworthie to obtaine any thing be it never so little. For how oft hath he taken vengeance of the cruelties, robberies, violence, filthy lustes, and other wicked doings of the ungodly, subduing their boldnesse and rage, and also overthrowing their tyrannous power, testified that he helpeth the unworthily oppressed, which yet did beate the aire with praying to an uncertaine Godhead? And one Psalm plainely teacheth that the prayers want not effect, which yet doe not pearce into heaven by faith. For he gathereth together those prayers which necessitie wringeth no lesse out of the unbelievers than out of the godly by the verie feeling of nature : to which yet he proveth by the effect, that God is favourable. Is it because he doth with such gentleness testifie that they be pleasing to him? No. But to enlarge or to set out his mercie by this circumstance, for that even to unbelievers their prayers are not denied : and then the more to pricke forward his true worshippers to pray, when they see that prophane wallings sometime want not their effect. Yet there is no cause why the faithfull should swarve from the law laid upon them by God, or should envie the unbelievers, as though they had gotten some great gaine, when they obtained their desire. After this manner wee have said, that the Lord was bowed with the Repentance of Achab, that he might shew by this example how easie he is to entreat toward his elect, when true turning is brought to appease him. Therefore in the Psalm he blameth the Jewes, that they having by experience proved him so easie to grant their prayers, yet within a little after returned to the stubbornnesse of their nature. Which also plainely appeareth by the historie of the Judges : namely that so oft as they wept, although their teares were deceitfull, yet they were delivered out of the hands of their enemies. As therefore the Lord indifferently bringeth forth his Sunne upon the good and the evill: so doth he also not despise their weepings, whose cause is righteous and their miseries worthie of helpe. In the meane time he no more heareth these to salvation, than heerein ministrerh foode to the despisers of his goodness. The question seemeth to be somewhat harder of Abraham and Samuel: of whom the one being warranted by no word of God, prayed for the Sodomites: the other against a manifest forbidding prayed for Saul. Likewise is it of Jeremie which praied that the Citie might not be destroyed. For though their requestes were denied, yet it seemeth hard to take faith from them. But this solution shall (as I trust) satisfie sober readers : that they being instructed with the generall principles, whereby God commandeth them to be mercifull even also to the unworthie, were not altogether without faith, although in a speciall case their opinion deceived them. Augustine writeth wisely in a certaine place. How (saith he) doe the holy ones pray by faith, to aske of God contrarie to that which he hath decreed? Even because they pray according to his will : not that hidden and unchangeable will, but the will which he inspireth into them, that he may heare them after another manner: as he wisely maketh difference. This is well said: because after his incomprehensible counsell he so tempereth the successes of things, that the prayers of the holy ones be not voide which are wrapped both with faith and error together. Neither yet ought this more to avale to be an example to follow, than it excuseth the holy ones themselves, whom I denie not to have passed measure. Wherefore where appeareth no certaine promise, we must aske of God with a condition adjoynd.

To which purpose serveth that saying of David. Watch to the judgement which thou hast commanded: because he telleth that he was warranted by a speciall oracle to aske a temporall benefit.

16 This also it is profitable to note, that those things which I have spoken of the former rules of right prayer, are not so exactly required with extreame rigour, that God refuseth the prayers in which he shall not finde either perfect faith or perfect repentance together with a ferventnesse of zeale and well ordered requestes. We have said that although prayer be a familiar talke of the godly with God, yet wee must keepe a reverence and modestie, that we give not loose reines to all requestes whatsoever they be, and that we desire no more, than God giveth leave: and then, least the majestie of God should grow in contempt with us, that wee must lift up our mindes upward to a pure and undefiled worshipping of him. This no man hath ever performed with such purenesse as it ought to be. For (to speake nothing of the common sort) how many complaintes of David doe favour of untemperance: not that hee meant of purpose to quarrell with God, or carpe against his judgements: but because hee fainting for weaknesse, found no other better comfort, than to cast his sorrowes into his bosome. Yea and God beareth with our childish speech and pardoneth our ignorance, so oft as any thing unadvisedly escapeth us: as truly without this tender bearing, there should be no libertie of praying. But although David's minde was to submit himselfe wholly to the will of God, and he prayed with no lesse patience than desire to obtaine: yet there arise yea boile out sometimes troublous affections, which are much disagreeing from the first rule that wee have set. Specially wee may perceive by the conclusion of the xxxix. Psalm, with how great vehemencie of sorrow that holy man was carried away, that he could not keepe measure. Caste (saith he) from me, till I goe away and be not. A man would say that he like a desperate man desireth nothing else but that the hand of God ceasing, he might rot in his evils. Hee saith it not for that he with an avowed minde runneth into such outrage, or (as the reprobate are wont) would have God to depart from him: but onely he complaineth that the wrath of GOD is too heaive for him to beare. In these tentations also there fall out oftentimes requestes not well framed according to the rule of the word of God, and in which the holie Ones doe not sufficiently weigh what is lawfull and expedient. Whatsoever prayers are sported with these faults, they deserve to be refused: yet if the holie Ones doe bewaile, correct themselves, and by and by come to themselves againe, God pardoneth them. So they offend also in the second rule, because they are oftentimes driven to wrastle with their owne coldnesse, and their peede and miserie doth not sharply enough pricke them to pray earnestly. And oftentimes it happeneth that their mindes doe slip aside, and in a manner wander away into vanitie. Therefore in this behalfe also there is neede of pardon, lest our faint, or unperfect, or broken and wandering prayers have a deniall. This God hath naturally planted in the mindes of men, that prayers are not perfect but with mindes lifted upward. Hereupon came the ceremonie of lifting up of hands, as we have before said, which hath been used in all ages and nations, as yet it is in use. But how many a one is there, which when he listeth up his hands doth not in his owne conscience finde himselfe dull, because his heart resteth upon the ground? As touching the asking of forgivenesse of finnes, although none of the faithfull doe overpasse it, yet they which are truly exercised in prayers doe feele that they bring scarcely the tenth part of that sacrifice, of which David speaketh. An acceptable sacrifice to God is a troubled Spirit: a broken and humble heart O God thou wilt not despise. So there is alway a double pardon to be asked, both because they know themselves guiltie in consciences of many faultes, with feeling whereof they are not yet touched, that they mislike themselves so much as they ought: and also that, so much as it is given them to profit in repentance and in the feare of God, they being thrown downe with just sorrow for their offences, should pray to escape the punishment of the Judge. Chiefly the feeblenes or imperfection of faith corrupteth the prayers of the faithfull, unless the tender mercy of God did helpe them. But it is no marvel that God pardoneth this default, which doth oftentimes exercise them that be his with sharp instructions, as if he should of purpose quench their faith. This is a most hard tentation, when the faithfull are compelled to cry: How long wilt thou be angry upon the praier of thy servant? as though the very praiers made God more angry. So when Jeremy saith: The Lord hath shut out my praier, it is no doubt that he was shaken with a violent pang of trouble. Innumerable such examples are commonly found in the Scriptures, by which appeareth that the Faith of the holy Ones was oftentimes mingled and tossed with doubtings, that in beleeving and hoping they bewraied yet some unfaithfulness: but because they come not so far as it is to be wished, they ought to indeavour so much the more that their faults being amended, they may daily come neerer to the perfect rule of praying, and in the meane time to feele in how great a depth of evils they be drowned, which even in the very remedies doe get to themselves new diseases: sith there is no praier, which the Lord doth not worthily loath, unlesse he winke at the spots wherewith they are all besprinkled. I rehearse not these things to this end that the Faithfull should carelessly pardon themselves any thing, but that in sharply chastising themselves they should travell to overcome these stops, and although Satan labour to stop up all the waies, that he may keepe them from praying, yet neverthelesse they should breake through, being certainly perswaded, that although they be not uncombred of all hinderances, yet their indeouours doe please God, and their praiers are allowed of him, so that they travaile and bend themselves thitherward, whither they doe not by and by attaine.

That the confidence of our own imbecillitie discourage us not too much, we are to releeve our selves in praier with the mediation of Christ Iesus besides whose name no other by way of intercession should be mentioned in our prayers.

17. But for asmuch as there is no man worthy to present himselfe to God, and to come into his sight: the heavenly Father himselfe to deliver us both from shame and feare which should have throwne downe all our courages, hath given to us his Sonne Iesus Christ our Lord, to be an Advocate and Mediatour with him for us, by whose leading we may boldly come to him, trusting that we have such an intercessor, nothing shall be denied us which we aske in his name, as nothing can be denied him of the Father. And heereunto must be all referred whatsoever we have heretofore taught concerning Faith: because as the promise setteth out unto us Christ for our Mediatour, so unlesse our hope of obtaining it lay upon him, it taketh from it selfe the benefit of praying. For so soone as the terrible majestie of God commeth in our minde it is impossible but that we should tremble for feare, and the acknowledging of our owne unworthinesse should drive us far away, till Christ come meane betweene us and him, which may change the throne and dreadfull glory into the throne of grace: as also the Apostle teacheth that we may be bold to appeare with all confidence which shall obtaine mercy and finde grace in helpe comming in fit season. And as there is a law set that we should call upon God like as there is a promise given, that they shall be heard which call upon him: so are we peculiarly commanded to call upon him in the name of Christ, and we have a promise set forth, that we shall obtaine that which we shall aske in his name. Hitherto (saith he) ye have not asked any thing in my name: aske and ye shall receive. In that day ye shall aske in my name, and whatsoever ye aske, I will doe that the father may be glorified in the son. Hereby it is plaine without controversie, that they which call upon God in any other name than of Christ, do stubbornly breake his commandments, and regard his will as nothing, and that they have no promise to obtaine any thing. For (as Paul saith) all the promises of God are in Christ, yea and Amen, that is to say, they are confirmed and fulfilled.

18. And the circumstance of the time is diligently to be marked, where Christ commandeth his disciples to see to intercession to him after that he is gone up into heaven. In that hower (saith he) ye shall aske in my name. It is certaine that even from the beginning none were heard that praied, but by meane of the Mediatour. For this reason the Lord had ordained in the law, that the Priest alone entering into the Sanctuary, should beare upon his shoulders the names of the tribes of Israel, and as many precious stones before his breast: but the people should stand a far off in the porch, and from thence should joyne their praiers with the Priest. Yea and the sacrifice availed hereto, that the praiers should be made sure and of force. Therefore that shadow with ceremony of the law taught that wee are all shut out from the face of God, and that therefore wee neede a Mediatour, which may appeare in our name, and may beare us upon his shoulders, and hold us fast bound to his breast, that wee may be heard in his person:

person: then that by sprinkling of blood our prayers are cleansed, which (as wee have already said) are never void of filthinesse. And we see that the holie ones, when they desired to obtaine anything, grounded their hope upon sacrifices, because they knew them to bee the stablishings of all requests. Let him remember thy offering (saith David) and make thy burnt offering fatte. Heereupon is gathered that God hath benee from the beginning appeased by the intercession of Christ, to receive the prayers of the godly. Why then doth Christ appoint a new heire, when his Disciples shall beginne to pray in his name, but because this grace, as it is at this day more glorious, so deserueth more commendation with us. And in this same sense hee had said a little before. Hitherto yee have not asked any thing in my name, now aske. Not that they understood nothing at all of the office of the Mediatour (whereas all the Jewes were instructed in the principles) but because they had not yet clearly knowne that Christ by his ascending into heaven should be a surer patron of the Church than he was before. Therefore to comfort their griefe of his absence without some speciall fruit, he claimeth to himselfe the office of an advocate, and teacheth that they have hitherto wanted the chiefest benefite, which it shall bee granted them to enjoy, when being aided by his mediation, they shall more freely call upon GOD: As the Apostle saith that his new way is dedicate in his blood. And so much lesse excusable is our frowardnesse, unlesse wee doe with both armes (as the saying is) embrace so inestimable benefite, which is properly appointed for us.

19. Now whereas he is the onely way, and the onely entrie by which it is granted us to come in unto God: who so doe swarve from this way and for sake this entrie, for them there remaineth no way nor entrie to God: there is nothing left in his throne but wrath, judgement, and terrour. Finally sith the Father hath marked him for our head, and guide, they which doe in any wise swarve or goe away from him, doe labour as much as in them lieth to race out and disfigure the marke which God hath imprinzed. So Christ is set to be the onely Mediator, by whose intercession the Father may be made to us favourable and easie to be entreated. Howbeit in the meane time the holy ones have their intercessions left to them, whereby they doe mutually commend the safetie one of another to God, of which the Apostle maketh mention: but those bee such as hang upon that one onely intercession: so far is it off, that they minish any thing of it. For as they spring out of the affection of love, wherewith wee embrace one another, as the members of one bodie: so they are also referred to the unitie of the head. Sith therefore they also are made in the name of Christ, what doe they else but testifye that no man can be holpen by any prayers at all, but with the intercession of Christ? And as Christ with his intercession wishstandeth not, but that in the Church we may with prayers be advocates one for another: so let this remaine certaine, that all the intercessors of the whole church ought to be directed to that onely one. Yea and for this cause we ought speciallie to beware of unthankfulnesse, because God pardoning our unworthinesse, doth not onely give leave to every one of us to pray for himselfe, but also admitteth us to be entreaters one for another. For, where God appointeth advocates for his Church which deserve worthily to be rejected if they pray privately every one for himselfe: what a pride were it to abuse this libertie to darken the honour of Christ.

20. Now it is a meere trifling, which the Sophisters babble, that Christ is the Mediator of redemption, but the faithful are Mediators of intercession. As though Christ having performed a Mediation for a time, hath given to his servants that eternall Mediatourship which shall never die. Full curteously forsooth they handle him, that cut away so little a portion of honour from him. But the Scripture saith farre oherwise, with the simplicitie whereof a good man ought to be contented, leaving these deceivers. For where John saith, that if any doe sinne, we have an advocate with the Father Christ Jesus: doth he meane that he was once in olde time a patron for us, and not rather assigned to him an everlasting intercession? How say wee to this that Paul also affirmeth, that hee sitteth at the right hand of God the father and maketh intercession for us? And when in another place hee calleth him the onely Mediatour of God and men: meaneth hee not of prayers, of which hee had a little before made mention? For when he had before said that intercession must bee made for all men: for proofof of that ſaying, he by and by addeth, that of all men there is one God and one Mediator. And none other wiſe doth Auguſtine expound it, when he ſaith thus: Chriſtian men do mutually commend themſelves in their prayers. But hee for whom none maketh interceſſion, but hee for all, he is the true and onely Mediatour. Paul the Apoſtle, though he were a principall member under the head (yet becauſe he was a member of the body of Chriſt, and knew that the greateſt and trueſt Prieſt of the Church entred, not by a figure, into the inward places of the vaile, to the holy of holy places, but by expreſſe and ſtedfaſt truth into the innermoſt places of heaven, to a holineſſe not ſhadowiſh but eternall) commendeth himſelfe alſo to the prayers of the faithfull. Neither doth hee make himſelfe a Mediatour between the people and God, but prayeth that all the members of the body of Chriſt ſhould mutually pray for him: becauſe the members are carefull one for another: and if one member ſuffer, the other ſuffer with it. And that ſo the mutuall prayers one for another of all the members yet travelling in earth may aſcend to the head which is gone before into heaven, in whom is appeaſement for our finnes. For if Paul were a Mediatour, the other Apoſtles ſhould alſo bee Mediatours: and if there were many Mediatours, then neither ſhould Pauls owne reaſon ſtand faſt, in which he had ſaid, For there is one God, one Mediatour of one God and men, the man Chriſt, in whom wee alſo are one if wee keepe the unite of faith in the bond of peace. Again in another place. But if thou ſeeke for a Prieſt, hee is above the heavens, where he maketh interceſſion for thee, which in earth died for thee. Yet doe wee not dreame that he falleth downe at the Fathers knees and in humble wiſe entreareth for us: but we underſtand with the Apoſtle, that he ſo appeareth before the face of God, that the vertue of his death avaieth to be a perpetuall interceſſion for us: yet ſo that being entred into the ſanctuary of heaven, unto the end of the ages of the world, he alone carrieth to God the prayers of the people abiding a far off in the porch.

21. As touching the Saints, which being dead in the fleſh doe live in Chriſt, if wee give any prayer at all to them, let us not dreame that they themſelves have any other way of aſking than Chriſt, which onely is the way, or that their prayers bee acceptable to God in any other name. Therefore ſith the Scripture calleth us backe from all to Chriſt onely: ſith the heavenly fathers Will is to gather together all in him: it was a point of too much dulneſſe, I will not ſay madneſſe, ſo to deſire to make for our ſelves an entry by them, that wee ſhould bee led away from him without whom even they themſelves have no entry open. But, that this hath bene uſually done in certaine ages paſt, and that it is at this day done whereſoever Papiſtry reigneth, who can deny? Their merits are from time thruſt in, to obtaine the good will of God: and for the moſt part, Chriſt being paſſed over, God is prayed to by their names. Is not this, I beſeech you, to convey away to them the office of that onely interceſſion, which we have affirmed to belong to Chriſt alone? Again, what Angell or Devill ever revealed to any man any one ſyllable of this their interceſſion which theſe men ſaine? For in the Scripture is nothing of it. What is the reaſon therefore of inventing it? Truly when the wit of man ſo ſeeketh for it ſelfe ſuccours, wherewith we are not certified by the word of God, it plainly bewraieih his owne diſtruſtfulneſſe. If wee appeale to all their conſciences that are delighted with the interceſſion of Saints, wee ſhall finde that the ſame cometh from no other ground, but becauſe they are grieved with carefullneſſe, as though Chriſt were in this behalfe either too weake or too rigorous. By which doubtfulneſſe firſt they diſhonour Chriſt, and rob him of the title of onely Mediatour, which as it is given him of the Father for a ſingular prerogative, ſo ought not alſo to be conveyed away to any other. And in this very doing they darken the glory of his birth, they make void his croſſe, finally whatſoever he hath done or ſuffered they ſpoile and defraud of the due praife thereof: for all tend to this end that hee may bee indeed and be accounted the onely Mediator. And therewith they caſt away the goodneſſe of God, which gave himſelfe to be their Father. For he is not their father, unleſſe they acknowledge Chriſt to be their brother. Which they utterly deny, unleſſe they thinke that hee beareth a brotherly affection toward them, than which there can nothing bee more kinde or tender. Wherefore the Scripture offereth onely him to us, ſendeth us to him, and ſtaieih us in him. Hee (ſaith Ambroſe) is our mouth, by which we speake to the Father : our eye, by which wee see the Father : our right hand, by which we offer us to the Father, otherwise than by whose intercession neither wee nor all the Saints have any thing with God. If they answer that the common prayers which they make in Churches, are ended with this conclusion adjoynd, Through Christ our Lord : this is a trifling shift : because the intercession of Christ is no lesse profaned when it is mingled with the prayers and merits of dead men, than if it were utterly omitted and only dead men were in our mouth. Againe, in all their Letanies, Hymnes, and Profes, where no honour is left ungiven to dead Saints, there is no mention of Christ.

22. But their foolish dulnesse proceeded so farre, that here wee have the nature of superstition expressed, which when it hath once shaken off the bridle, is wont to make no end of running astray. For after that men once begun to looke to their intercession of Saints, by little and little there was given to every one his special doing, that according to the diversitie of businesse, sometime one and sometime another should be called upon to be intercessor : then they tooke to themselves every one his peculiar Saint, into whose faith they committed themselves as it were to the keeping of safeguarding gods. And not only (where with the Prophet in the old time reproched Israel) gods were set up according to the number of Cities, but even to the number of persons. But sith the Saints referre their desires to the only will of God, and behold it and rest upon it : he thinketh foolishly, and fleshly, yea and slanderously of them, which assigneth to them any other prayer, than whereby they pray for the comming of the kingdome of God : from which that is most farre distant which they faigne to them, that every one is with private affection more partially bent to his owne worshippers. At length many abstained not from horrible sacriledge, in calling now upon them not as helpers but as principall ralers of their salvation. Loe whereunto foolish men doe fall when they wander out of their true standing, that is, the word of God. If speake not of the grosser monstrousnesses of ungodlinesse, wherein although they bee abhominable to God, Angels, and men, they are not yet ashamed nor wearie of them, They falling downe before the image or picture of Barbara Catherine, and such other, doe mumble Pater noster, Our father. This madnesse the Pastors doe so not care to heale or restraîne, that being allured with the sweet favour of gaine they allow it with rejoycing at it. But although they turne from themselves the blame of so heinous an offence, yet by what colour will they defend this that Loy or Medard are prayed unto, to looke downe upon and helpe their servants from heaven? that the holy Virgin is prayed unto, to command her sonne to doe that which they aske? In the old time it was forbidden in the Councell at Carthage, that at the altar no direct prayer should be made to Saints. And it is likely that when the holy men could not altogether suppress the force of the naughty custome, yet they added at least this restraint that the publike prayers should not be corrupted with this forme : Saint Peter pray for us. But how much further hath their devilish importunacie ranged, which sticke not to give away to dead men that which properly belongeth onely to God and Christ?

23. But whereas they travell to bring to passe that such intercession may seeme to be grounded upon the authority of Scripture, therein they labour in vaine. We reade oftentimes (say they) of the prayers of Angels : and not that onely ! but it is said that the prayers of the faithfull are by their hands carried into the sight of God. But if they list to compare holy men departed out of this present life, to Angels : they should prove that they are ministring spirits, to whom is committed the ministrerie to looke to our safetie, to whom the charge is given to keepe us in all our waies, to goe about us, to admonish and counsell us, to watch for us : all which things are given to Angels, but not to them. How wrongfully they wrap up dead holy men with Angels, appeareth largely by to many divers offices, whereby the Scripture putteth difference betweene some and other some. No man dare execute the office of an advocate before an earthly judge, unlesse he be admitted; from whence then have wormes so great libertie, to thrust unto God those for patrons, to whom it is not read that the office is eniyned? Gods will wasto appoint the Angels to looke unto our safetie, wherefore they doe both frequent holy assemblies, and the Church is a stage to them, wherein they wonder at the diverse and manifold wisdom of God. Who so convey away to other that which is peculiar to them, verily they confound and pervert the order set by God, which ought to have beene inviolable. With like handfomenesse they proceede in alleading other testimonies. God said to Ieremy: If Moses and Samuel should stand before mee, my soule is not to this people. How (say they) could he have spoken thus of dead men, unless he knew that they made intercession for the living? But I on the contrary side gather thus, that sith thereby appeareth that neither Moses nor Samuel made intercession of the people of Israel, there was then no intercession at all of dead men. For which of the Saints is to bee thought to be carefull for the safety of the people, when Moses ceaseth, which in this behalfe farre surpassed all other when he lived. But if they follow such sleight subtilities, to say that the dead make intercession for the living, because the Lord said, if they should make intercession: I will much more colourably reason in this manner: In the extreme necessity of the people Moses made not intercession, of whom it is said, if hee shall make intercession. Therefore it is likely that none other maketh intercession, sith they are all so farre from the gentlenesse, goodnesse, and fatherly carefulnesse of Moses. This forsooth they get with cavilling, that they be wounded with the same weapons, wherewith they thought themselves gaily fenced. But it is very fond that a simple sentence should bee wrested, because the Lord pronounce th onely that he will not spare the offences of the people, although they had seene Moses to be their patron, or Samuel, to whose prayers hee had shewed himselfe so tender. Which sense is most cleerely gathered out of a like place of Ezechiel. If (saith the Lord) these three men were in the city, Noe, Daniel, and Iob, they shall not deliver their sons and daughters in their righteousnesse: but they shall deliver onely there owne soules. Where it is no doubt that he meant if two of them should happen to revive againe, for the third was then alive, namely Daniel, who (as it is knowne) did in the first flourishing of his youth shew an incomparable example of godlinesse: let us then leave them whom the Scripture plainly sheweth to have ended their course. Therefore Paul, when he speaketh of David, teacheth not that hee doth with prayers helpe his posterity, but onely that he served his owne time.

Ezec. 14. 14.

Act. 13. 36.

A third argument for intercession of Saints answered.

21. They answer againe: shall we then take from them all prayer of charity, which in the whole course of their life breathed nothing but charity and mercy? Verily as I will not curiously search what they doe, or what they muse upon: so it is not likely that they are carried about hither and thither with divers and particular requests: but rather that they doe with a staied and unmoved Will, long for the kingdom of God, which standeth no lesse in the destruction of the wicked, than in the salvation of the godly. If this bee true, it is no doubt that their charity is contained in the communion of the body of Christ, and extendeth no further, than the nature of that communion beareth. but now though I grant they pray in this manner for us, yet they doe not therefore depart from their owne quietnesse, to be diversly drawne into earthly cares: and much lesse must wne therefore by and by call upon them. Neither doth it thereby follow that they must so doe, because men which live in earth may commend one another in their prayer. For this doing deserveth for nourishing of charity among them, when they doe as it were part and mutually take upon them their necessities among themselves. And this they doe by the commandement of the Lord, and are not without a promise, which twofoldings, have alway the chiefe place in prayer. All such considerations are farre from the dead, whom when the Lord hath conveyed from our company, hee hath left to us no interchange of doings with them, nor to them with us, so farre as we may gather by conjectures. But if any man alleadge, that it is impossible but that they must keepe the same charity toward us, as they bee joyned in one faith with us: yet who hath revealed that they have so long eares to reach to our voices? and so peering eyes to watch our necessities? They prate in their shadowes I wot not what of the brightnesse of the countenance of God extending his beames upon them, in which as in a mirror they may from on high behold the matters of men beneath. But to affirme that, especially with such boldnesse as they dare, what is it else but to go about by the drunken dreames of our owne braine, without his word to pearce and breake into the hidden judgements of God, and to tread the Scripture under feet

which so oft pronounceth that the wisdom of the flesh is enemy to the wisdom of God, which wholly condemneth the vanitie of our naturall wit, which willett all our reason to be throwne downe, and the onely will of God to be looked unto of us.

25 The other testimonies of Scripture which they bring to defend this their lie, they most naughtily wrest. But Jacob (said they) prayeth that his name and the name of his Fathers Abraham and Isaac be called upon over his posteritie. First let us see what forme of calling upon this is among the Israelites. For they call not upon their Fathers to help them: but they beseech God to remember his servants Abraham, Isaac & Jacob. Therefore their example maketh nothing for them that speake to the Saints themselves. But because those blocks (such is their dullnesse) neither understand what it is to call upon the name of Jacob, nor why it is to be called upon, it is no marvell if in the very forme also they so childishly stumble. This manner of speech is not feldome found in the Scriptures. For Espy saith that the name of the men is called upon over the women, when they have them as their husbands under whose charge and defence they live. Therefore the calling upon of the name of Abraham upon the Israelites, standeth in this when they convey their pedigree from him, and do with solemne memorie honor him for their author and parent. Neither doth Jacob this because he is carefull for the enlarging of the renowne of his name: but for as much as he knew that the whole blessednesse of his posteritie consisted in the inheritance of the covenant which God had made with him: he wished that that which he seeth should be the chiefe of all good things to them, that they be accounted in his kinred: For, that is nothing els but to convey to them the succession of the covenant. They againe when they bring such remembrance into their prayers, doe not flee to the intercessions of dead men: but doe put the Lord in mind of his covenant, whereby the most kind father hath promised that he will be favorable and beneficiall to them for Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob's sake. How little the holie Ones did otherwise leane upon the merits of their father, the common saying of the Church in the Prophet testifieth, Thou art our Father, and Abraham knew us not, and Israel was ignorant of us. Thou Lord art our Father, and our redeemer. And when they say thus, they adde therewithall, Returne O Lord for thy servants sakes: yet thinking upon no intercession, but bending their mind to the benefit of the covenant. But now lieth we have the Lord Jesus, in whose hand the eternal covenant of mercie is not onlie made; but also confirmed to us: whose name should we rather use in our prayers? And because these good matters will have the Patriarches to be by these words made intercessours, I would faine know of them why in so great a rout Abraham the Father of the Church hath no place at all among them. Out of what sinke they fetch their advocates, it is not unknowne. Let them answer me, how fit it is that Abraham, whom God preferred above all other, and whom he advanced to the highest degree of honour, should be neglected and suppressed. Verily when it was evident that such use was unknowne to the old Church, they thought good for hiding of the newnesse to speake nothing of the old Fathers: as though the diversitie of names excused the new and forged manner. But whereas some object that God is prayed unto, to have mercie on the people for David's sake, it doth so nothing at all make for defence of their error, that it is a most strong prooffe for the confutation thereof. For if we consider what person David did beare: he is severed from all the assembly of the Saints, that God should stablish the covenant which he hath made in his hand. So both the covenant is rather considered than the man and under a figure the onely intercession of Christ is affirmed. For it is certaine that that which belonged only to David, in so much as he was the image of Christ, accordeth not with any other.

26 But this forsooth moveth some, that it is oftentimes read that the prayers of Saints have bene heard. Why so? Even because they prayed. They trilled in thee (saith the Prophet) and they were saved: they cried, and they were not confounded. Therefore let us also pray as they did, that we may be heard as they were. But these men, other wise than they ought, doe wrongfullie reason, that none shall be heard but they that have once bene heard. How much better doth James say? Elias (saith he) was a man like to us: and he prayed with prayer that it should not raine, and it rained not upon the earth in three yeeres and sixe months. Againe he prayed, and the heaven gave raine, and the earth gave her fruite. What? doth he gather any singular prerogative of Eliaz, to which we ought to flee? No. But he teacheth what is the continual strength of godly and pure prayer, to exhort us likewise to pray. For we doe niggardlie construe the readinesse and gentleness of God in hearing them, unlessse we be by such experiences confirmed into a more sure affiance of his promises, in which he promiseth that his care shall be inclined not to one, or two, nor yet to a few, but to all that call upon his name. And so much lesse excusable is this foolishnesse, because they seeme as it were of set purpose to despise so many admonitions of Scripture. David was oft delivered by the power of God. Was it that he should draw that power to himselfe, that we should be delivered by his helpe? He himselfe affirmeth farre otherwise: The righteous looke for me, till thou render to me. Againe, The righteous shall see, and they shall rejoyce, and trust in the Lord. Behold, this poore man hath cried to God, and he hath answered him: There be in the Psalmes many such prayers, in which to crave that which he requireth, he moveth God by this manner, that the righteous be not made ashamed, but many by his example be raised up to hope well. Let us now be contented with this one example. Therefore every holie one shall pray to thee in fit time. Which place I have so much the more willingly rehearsed, because the lewd babblers which doe let out to hire the service of their waged tongue have not bene ashamed to alleage it to prove the intercession of the dead. As though David meant any thing else, than to shew the fruite that shall come of the mercifulnesse and gentleness of God, when he shall be heard. And in this kind we must learne, that the experience of the grace of God, as well toward our selves as other, is no slender help to confirm the credit of his promises. I have unrehearsed many places, where David testeth before himselfe the benefits of God for matter of confidence, because the readers of the Psalmes shall commonly finde them without seeking. This selfe something had Jacob before taught by his owne example: I am unworthie of all thy mercies, and of the truth which thou hast performed to thy servant. I with my staffe have passed over this Jordani, and now I come forth with two bands. He alleageth indeed the promise, but not alone: but he also joyneth the effect, that he may the more courageously in time to come trust that God will be the same toward him. For he is not like to mortall men, which are weary of their liberalitie, or whose abilitie is wasted: but he is to be weighed by his owne nature, as David wisely doth, where he saith, Thou hast redeemed me, O God that speakest truth. After that he hath given to God the praises of his salvation, he addeth that he is a true speaker: because unlessse he were continually like himselfe, there could not be gathered of his benefits a sufficiently strong reason of affiance and calling upon him. But when we know that so oft as he helpeth us, he sheweth an example and proofe of his goodnesse, we neede not to feare that our hope shall be put to shame or disappoint us.

27 Let this be the summe. Whereas the Scripture setteth out this unto us for the cheefe point in the worshipping of God, (as refusing all sacrifices, he requireth of us this dutie of godlinesse) prayer is not without manifest sacriledge directed to other. Wherefore also it is said in the Psalme, If we stretch forth our hands to a strange God, shall not God require these things? Againe, whereas God will not be called upon but of Faith, and expressly commandeth prayers to be framed according to the rule of his word: finally whereas Faith founded upon the word is the mother of right prayer: so soone as we swaue from the word, our prayer must needs be corrupted. But it is already shewed, that if the whole Scripture be sought, this honour is therein challenged to God only. As touching the office of intercession, we have also shewed that it is peculiar to Christ, and that there is no prayer acceptable to God, but which that Mediator halloweth. And though the faithfull doe one for another offer prayers to God for their brethren, we have shewed that this abateth nothing from the only intercession of Christ: because they altogether standing upon it doe commend both themselves and other to God. Moreover we have taught that this is unjustly drawne to dead men, to whom we never read that it hath been commanded that they should pray for us. The Scripture doth oftentimes exhort us to mutuall doings of his duty one for another: but of dead men there is not so much as one syllable: yea and Jones joyning these two things together, together, that we should confesse our selves, among our selves, and mutually pray one for another, doth secretly exclude dead men. Therefore to condemne this error, this one reason sufficeth, that the beginning of praying rightly, springeth out of faith, and that faith commeth of the hearing of the word of God, where is no mention of the sainted intercession, because superstition hath rashly gotten to it selfe patrones which were not given them of God. For whereas the Scripture is full of many formes of prayer, there is no example found of this patronship, without which in the Papacy they beleewe that there is no prayer. Moreover it is certaine that this superstition hath growne of distrustfulnesse either because they were not content with Christ to be their intercessor, or have altogether robbed him of his praise. And this latter point is easily prooved by their shamelesnesse: because they have no other stronger argument to proove that we have neede of the intercession of Saints, than when they object that we are unworthy of familiar access to God. Which we indeed grant to be most true: but thereupon we gather, that they leave nothing to Christ, which esteeme his intercession nothing worth, unlesse there be adjoynd Gorge, Hippolite, or such other visors.

28 But although prayer properly signifieth onely wishes and petitions: yet there is so great affinitie betweene petition and thanksgiving, that they may be fitly comprehended both under one name. For, these speciall sorts which Paul rehearseth, fall under the first part of this division. With asking and craving we powre forth our desires before God, requiring as well those things that seeme to spread abroad his glory and set forth his name, as the benefits that are profitable to our use. With giving of thanks, we doe with due praise magnifie his good doings toward us, acknowledging to be received of his liberalitie whatsoever good things doe come to us. Therefore David comprehended these two parts together, saying: Call upon me in the day of necessitie: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorifie me. The Scripture not in vaine commandeth us to use both. For we have said in another place, that our needinesse is so great, and the experience it selfe crieth out that we are on every side pinched and pressed with so many and so great distresses, that all have cause enough why they should both sigh to God, and in humble wise call upon him. For though they be free from adversities, yet the guiltinesse of their wicked doings, and their innumerable assaults of tentations ought to prick forward the most holy to aske remedy. But in the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving there can be no interruption without hainous sinne, forasmuch as God ceaseth not to heap upon diverse men diverse benefits to drive us though we be slacke and slow, to thankfulness. Finally so great and so plenteous largesse of his benefits doth in a manner overwhelm us: there are so many and so great miracles of his seene on every side which way soever thou tume thee, that we never want ground and matter of praise and thanksgiving. And that these things may be somewhat plainelie declared sith all our hopes and wealth stand in God (which we have before sufficiently proved) that neither we nor all our things can be in prosperitie but by his blessing: we must continually commit our selves and all our things to him. Then whatsoever we purpose, speake, or doe, let us purpose, speake, and doe under his hand and will, finally under the hope of his helpe. For, all are pronounced accursed of God, which devise or determine any purposes upon trust of themselves or of any other, which without his will, and without calling upon him doe enter prise or attempt to begin any thing. And whereas we have diverse times already said, that he is duely honoured when he is acknowledged the author of all good things: thereupon followeth that all those things are so to be received at his hand, that we yeeld continuall thanks for them: and that there is no other right way for us to use his benefits, which flow and proceed from his liberalitie to no other end, but that we should be continually busied in confessing his praise and giving of thanks. For Paul, when he testifieth that they are sanctified by the word and prayer, doth therewithall signifie that they are not holy and cleane to us without the word and prayer, understanding by the Word, faith by figure. Therefore David saith very well, when having received the liberalitie of the Lord, he declareth that there is given him into his mouth a new song: whereby verily he signifieth that it is a malicious silence, if we passe over any of his benefits without praise: sith he so oft giveth us matter to say good of him, as he doth good to us. As also Esai setting out the singular gular grace of God, exhorteth the faithfull to a new and uns wonted song. In which sense David saith in another place, Lord open thou my lips; and my mouth shall shew forth thy praise. Likewise Ezekias and Jonas testify that this shall be to them the end of their deliverance, to celebrate the goodnesse of God with songs in the temple. The same law David prescribeth to all the godly: What shall I repay to the Lord (saith he) for all the things that he hath bestowed upon me? I will take the cup of salvation, and will call upon the name of the Lord. And the same law the Church followeth in another Psalme; Save us our God, that wee may confesse to thy name, and glorie in thy praise. Again, he hath looked unto the praiser of the solitary, and he hath not despised their prayers. This shall be written to the generation that shall follow, and the people created shall praise the Lord, that they may declare his name in him, and his praise in Hierusalem. Yea so oft as the faithfull beseech God to doe for his names sake: as they profess themselves unworthy to obtaine any thing in their owne name, so they binde themselves to give thanks, and they promise that this shall be to them the right use of the bountifullnesse of God, that they shall be publishers of it. So Osée speaking of the redemption to come of the Church, saith: Take away iniquitie O God, and lift up good: a id we will pay the calves of our lips. And the benefits of God doe not onely claime to themselves the praise of the tongue, but also doe naturally procure love. I have loved (saith David) because the Lord hath heard the voice of my praiser. Again, in another place, rehearsing the helpes which he had felt, he saith: I will love thee O God my strength: Neither shall the praises ever please God, which shall not flow out of this sweetnesse of love. Yea and also we must hold fast this saying of Paul, that all prayers are wrongfull and faulty to which is not adjoynd giving of thanks. For thus he saith, in all prayer and beseeching with thanksgiving let your petitions be known with God. For sith testinesse, tediousnesse, impatience, bitterness of griefe, and feare doe move many in praying to murmure, hee commandeth that our affections be so tempered, that the faithfull ere they have obtained that which they desire, should neverthelesse cheerefully blese God. If this knot ought to have place in things in a manner contrary, with so much more holy a band doth God binde us to sing his praises, so oft as he maketh us to enjoy our requests. But as we have taught that our prayers are hallowed by the intercession of Christ, which otherwise should be uncleane: so the Apostle, where he commandeth us to offer a sacrifice of praise by Christ, putting in minde that we have not a mouth cleane enough to praise the name of God, unlesse the Priesthood of Christ becomé the meane. Whereupon we gather, that men have bene monstrously bewitched in the papacy, where the greater part marvelleth that Christ is called an Advocate. This is the cause why Paul commandeth both to pray and to give thanks without ceasing: namely for that he willett that with so great continuing as may be; at every time in every place, in all matters and businesses, the prayers of all men should be lifted up to God, which may both looke for all things at his hand, and yeeld to him the praise of all things, as he offereth us continuall matter to praise and pray.

Mat. 6. 7.

29 But this continuall diligence of praying, although it specially concerne the proper and private prayers of every man, yet somewhat also pertaineth to the publick prayers of the Church. But those can neither be continuall, nor ought otherwise to be done than according to the politike order that shall by common consent be agreed upon among all. I graunt the same in deede. For therefore certaine houres are set and appointed, as indifferent with God, so necessarie for the uses of men, that the commoditie of all men may be provided for, and all things (according to the saying of Paul) may be comely and orderly done in the Church. But this maketh nothing to the contrary, but that every Church ought both from time to time to stirre up it selfe to often use of prayers, and when it is admonished by any great necessity, to be fervent with most earnest endeavour. As for perseverance which hath a great affinity with continuall diligence, there shall bee a fit place to speake of it about the end. Now these make nothing for the much babbling which Christ willed that we should be forbidden. For he forbiddeth not to continue long, nor oft, nor with much affection in prayers, but that we should not trust that we may wring any thing out of God, by dulling his cares with much babbling talke, as if he were to be perswaded after the manner of men. For wee know that Hypocrites, because they doe not consider that they have to doe with God, doe no lesse make a pompous shew in their prayers than in triumph. For, the Pharisee which thanked God that hee was not like to other men, without doubt rejoiced at himselfe in the eyes of men, as if he would by prayer seeke to get a fame of holinesse. Hereupon came that much babbling, which at this day upon a like cause is used in the Papacy: while some doe vainely spend the time in repeating the same prayers, and other some doe set out themselves among the people with a long heape of words. Such this babling childishly mocketh God, it is no marvell that it is forbidden out of the Church, to the end that nothing should there bee used but earnest and proceeding from the bottome of the heart. Of a neerer kinde and like to this corruption is there another, which Christ condemneth with this, namely that hypocrites for boasting sake doe seeke to have many witneses, and doe rather occupie the market place to pray in, than their prayers should want the praise of the world. But whereas wee have already shewed that this is the marke that prayer shooteth at, that our mides may bee carryed upward to God, both to confession of prayse, and to craving of helpe: thereby wee may understand that the chiefe duties thereof doe stand in the minde and the heart, or rather that prayer it selfe is properly an affection of the inward heart, which is powred forth and laid open before God the searcher of hearts. Wherefore (as it is already said) the heavenly Schoolemaster, when he minded to set out the best rule of praying, commanded us to goe into the chamber, and there the doore being shut to pray to our Father which is in secret, that our Father which is in secret may heare us. For when he hath drawne them away from the example of hypocrites, which with ambitious boasting shew of prayers sought the favour of men, hee therewithall addeth what is better, namely, to enter into our chamber, and there to pray the doore being shut. In which words (as I expound them) he willed us to seeke solitary being which may helpe us to descend and to enter throughly with our whole thought in our heart, promising to the affections of our heart that God shall be neere us, whose temples our bodies ought to bee. For he meant not to deny but that it is expedient also to pray in other places: but hee sheweth that prayer is a certaine secret thing, which both is chiefly placed in the soule, and requireth the quiet thereof farre from all troubles of cares. Not without cause therefore the Lord himselfe also, when hee was disposed to apply himselfe more earnestly to prayer conveyed himselfe into some solitary place farre from the troublesome company of men: but to teach us by his example that these helps are not to be despised, by which our minde being too slipperie of it selfe is more bent to earnest applying of prayer. But in the meane time even as he in the midst of the multitude of men abstained not from praying, if occasion at any time so served: so should wee in all places where need shall be, lift up our hands. Finally, thus it is to be holden, that whosoever refuseth to pray in the holy assembly of the godly, he knoweth not what it is to pray a part; or in solitarinesse, or at home. Again, that hee that neglecteth to pray alone or privately how diligently soever he haunt publike assemblies, doth there make but vaine prayers: because hee giveth more to the opinion of men than to the secret judgement of God, in the meane time, that the common prayers of the Church should not grow into the contempt, God in old time garnished them with glorious titles, specially where hee called the temple: the house of prayer. For, by this saying hee both taught that the chiefe part of the worshipping of him is the duty of prayer: and that to the end that the faithfull should with one consent exercise themselves in it, the temple was set up as a standard for them. There was also added a notable promise: There abideth for thee, O God, praise in Sion: and to thee the vow shall bee paid. By which words the prophet telleth us, that the prayers of the Church are never void: because the Lord alway ministrereth to his people matter to sing upon with joy. But although the shadows of the law are ceased: yet because the Lords will was by this ceremony to nourish among us also the unity of faith, it is no doubt that the same promise belongeth to us, which both Christ hath established with his owne mouth, and Paul teacheth that it is of force for ever.

34 Now as the Lord by his word commanded the faithfull to use common prayer: so there must be common temples appointed for the using of them: where who so refuse to communicate their prayer with the people of God, there is no cause why they should abuse this pretence, that they enter into their chamber that they may obey the commandement of the Lord. For hee that promiseth that hee will doe whatsoever two or three shall aske being gathered together in his name, testifieth that he despiseth not prayers openly made: so that boasting and seeking of Glory of men be absent, so that unfained and true affection bee present which dwelleth in the secret of the heart. If this be the right use of temples (as truly it is) wee must againe beware that neither (as they have begun in certaine ages past to be accounted) we take them for the proper dwelling places of God from whence he may more neerely bend his eare unto us: nor saine to them I wot not what secret holynesse, which may make our prayer more holy before God. For sith wee our selves bee the true temples of God, we must pray in our selves if we will call upon God in his owne holy temple. As for that grossenesse, let us which have a commandement to call upon the Lord in spirit and truth without difference of place, leave it to the Iewes or the Gentiles. There was indeed a Temple in old time by the commandement of God for offering of prayers and sacrifices, but that was at such time as the truth lay hid figured under such shadows, which being now lively expressed unto us doth not suffer us to sticke in any materiall temple. Neither was the temple given to the Iewes themselves with this condition, that they should inclose the presence of God, within the wals thereof, but whereby they might be exercised to behold the image of the true temple. Therefore they, which in any part thought that God dwelled in temples made with hands, were sharply rebuked of Esay and Stephen.

31 Here moreover it is more than evident, that neither voice nor song, if they be used in prayer, have any force, or doe any whit profit before God, unless they proceed from the deepe affection of the heart. But rather they provoke his wrath against us, if they come onely from the lips and out of the throate: forasmuch as that is to abuse his holy name, and to make a mockery of his majesty: as wee gather out of the words of Esay, which although they extend further, yet pertaine also to reprove this fault. This people (saith he) commeth neere to me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips: but their heart is farre from me: and they have feared me with the commandement and doctrine of men. Therefore behold I will make in this people a miracle great and to bee wondered at. For, wisdom shall perish from their wise men, and the prudence of the Elders shall vanish away. Neither yet doe we here condemne voice or singing, but rather doe highly commend them, so that they accompany the affection of the minde. For so they exercise the minde and hold it intentive in thinking upon God, which as it is slippery and rolling, easily slacketh and is diversly drawne unless it be stayed with divers helpes. Moreover whereas the glory of God ought after a certaine manner to shine in all the parts of the body, it specially behooveth that the tongue be applyed and avowed to this service both in singing and in speaking, which is properly created to shew forth and display the praise of God: But the chiefe use of the tongue is in publike prayers, which are made in the assembly of the godly: which tend to this end, that wee may all with one common voice, and as it were with one mouth together glorifie God whom we worship with one spirit and one faith: and that openly, that all men mutually, every one of his brother, may receive the confession of Faith, to the example whereof they may be both allured and stirred.

32 As for the use of singing in Churches (that I may touch this also by the way) it is certaine that it is not onely most ancient: but that it was also in use among the Apostles, we may gather by these words of Paul. I will sing in Spirit, I will sing also in minde. Againe to the Colossians: Teaching and admonishing you, mutually in Hymnes Psalmes and spirituall songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord. For in the first place he teacheth that we should sing with voice and heart: in the other he commandeth spirituall songs, wherewith the godly doe mutually edifie themselves. Yet that it was not univerfall, Augustine testifieth, which reporteth that in the time of Ambrose the Church of Millan first began to sing, when while Iustina the mother of Valentinian, cruelly cruelly rag'd against the true faith, the people more used watching than they were wont: and that afterward the other western Churches followed. For hee had a little before said, that this manner came from the Easterne Churches. He telleth also in his second booke of Retractions that it was in his time received in Africa. One Hilarid (saith he) a ruler did in every place where soever he could, with malicious blaming rail'd at the manner which then began to bee at Carthage, that the Hymnes at the altar should be pronounced out of the booke of Psalmes, either before the oblation, or when that which had bene offered was distributed to the people. Him I answered at the commandement of my brethren. And truly if songs be tempered to that gravity which becometh the presence of God and Angels, it both procureth dignity and grace to the holy actions, and much availeth to stirre up the mindes to true affection and ferventnesse of praying. But wee must diligently beware that our eares be not more heedfully bent to the note, than our mindes to the spiritual sense of the words. With which perill Augustine in a certaine place saith that hee was so moved, that he sometime wished that in the manner which Athanasius kept should bee established, which commanded that the Reader should sound his words with so small a bowing of his voice, that it should be liker to one that readeth than to one that singeth. But when he remembered how much profit hee himselfe had received by singing, he inclined to the other side. Therefore using this moderation, there is no doubt that it is a most holy and profitable ordinance. As on the other side what songs soever are framed onely to sweetnesse and delight of the eares, they both become not the majesty of the Church, and cannot but highly displeas God.

33 Whereby it also plainly appeareth that common prayers are to be spoken not in Greeke among Latine men, not in Latine among Frenchmen or Englishmen (as it hath heretofore bene each where commonly done) but in the peoples mother tongue, which commonly may bee understood of the whole assembly: forasmuch as it ought to bee done to the edifying of the whole Church, which receive no fruit at all of a sound not understood. But they which have no regard neither of charity nor of humanity, should at least have bene somewhat moved with the authority of Paul, whose words are nothing doubtfull. If thou blesse (saith hee) in spirit, how shall hee that filleth the place of an unlearned man answer Amen to thy blessing, sith he knoweth not what thou sayest? For thou indeed givest thanks, but the others not edified. Who therefore can sufficiently wonder at the unbridled licentiousnesse of the Papiists, which the Apostle so openly crying out against it, seare not to roare out in a strange tongue most babling prayers, in which they themselves sometime understand not one syllable, nor would have other folkes to understand it? But Paul teacheth that we ought to doe otherwise. How then: I will pray (saith he) with spirit, I will pray also with minde: I will sing with spirit: I will sing also with minde: signifying by the name of spirit, the singular gifts of tongues which many being endued with, abused it, when they severed it from the minde, that is from moderating. But this we must altogether thinke, that it is by no means possible neither in publike nor in private prayer, but that the tongue without the heart must highly displeas God. Moreover we must thinke that the minde ought to be kindled with ferventnesse of thought, that it may farre surmount all that the tongue may expresse with utterance. Finally that the tongue is not necessary at all for private prayer, but so far as the inward feeling either is not able to suffice to inkindle it selfe, or the vehemencie of inkindling violently carrieth the worke of the tongue along with it. For though very good prayers sometime be without voice, yet oftentimes betide that when the affection of the minde is fervent, both the tongue breaketh forth into voice, and the other members into gesturing without excessive (w. Here upon came the muttering of Hanna, and such a like thing all the holy ones alway feele in themselves, when they burst out into broken and unperfect voyces. As for the gestures of the body which are wont to be used in prayer (as kneeling and uncovering of the head) they are exercises by which we endeavour to rise up to a greater reverencing of God.

34 Now we must learne not onely a more certaine rule, but also the very forme of praying: namely the sume, which the heavenly father hath taught us by his beloved sonne: wherein we may acknowledge his unmeasurable goodnesse and kindenesse. For beside this hee warneth and exhorteth us to seeke him in all our necessity (as children are wont to flie to their fathers defence; so oft as they be troubled with any distresse) because hee saw that we did not sufficiently perceive this, how slender our poverty was, what were meete to be asked, and what were for our profit: hee provided also for this our ignorance, and what our capacity wanted, hee supplied and furnished of his owne. For he hath prescribed to us a forme wherein he hath as in a Table set out whatsoever we may desire of him, whatsoever availeth for our profit, and whatsoever is necessary to aske. Of which his gentleness wee receive a great fruit of comfort that we understand that wee aske no inconvenient thing, no unseeming or unfit thing, finally nothing that is not acceptable to him, sith wee aske in a manner after his owne mouth. When Plato saw the folly of men in making requests to God, which being granted, it many times befell much to their owne hurt: he pronounced that this is the best manner of praying taken out of the old Poet, King Jupiter give unto us the best things both when we aske them, and when wee doe not aske them, but command evill things to be away from us even when we aske them. And verily the heathen man is wise in this, that hee judgeth how perillous it is to aske of the Lord that which our owne desire moveth us to: and therewithall he bewrayeth our unhappy case, that we cannot once open our mouthes before God without danger, unlessse the spirit doe instruct us to a right rule of praying. And in so much greater estimation this priviledge is worthy to be had of us, sith the onely begotten Sonne of God ministrerth words into our mouth which may deliver our minde from all doubtings.

35 This whether you call it forme or rule of praying is made of sixe petitions. For, the cause why I agree not to them that divide it into seven parts, is this, that by putting in this adversitive word (But) it seemeth that the Evangelist meant to joyne these two peeces together, as if hee had said: Suffer us not to be oppressed with temptation, but rather helpe our weaknesse, and deliver us, that we faint not. The old writers also thinke on our side, so that now that which is in Matthew added in the seventh place, is by way of declaration to be joynd to the sixth petition. But although the whole prayer is such that in every part of it regard is specially to be had of the glory of God, yet the three first petitions are peculiarly appointed to Gods Glory, which alone wee ought in them to looke unto without any respect (as they say) of our owne profit. The other three have care of us, and are properly assigned to aske those things that are for our profit. And when wee pray that the name of God be hallowed: because God will prove whether hee be loved and honoured of us freely or for hope of reward, we must then thinke nothing of our owne commodity, but his glory must be set before us, which alone wee must behold with fixed eyes: and no otherwise ought wee to be minded in the other prayers of this sort. And even this turneth to our great profit that when it is sanctified as we pray, it is also likewise made our sanctification. But our eyes (as it is said) must winke and after a certaine manner be blinde at such profit, so as they may not once looke at it: that if all hope of our private benefit were cut off, yet wee should not cease to wish and pray for this sanctification and other things which pertaine to the glory of God. As it is seene in the examples of Moses and Paul, to whom it was not grievous to turne away their mindes and eyes from themselves, and with vehemement and inflamed zeale to wish their owne destruction, that though it were with their owne losse they might advance the glory and kingdome of God. On the other side when we pray that our daily bread be given us: although we wish that which is for our owne commodity, yet here also we ought chiefly to seeke the glory of God, so that we should not aske it unlessse it might turne to his glory. Now let us come to the declaring of the Prayer it selfe.

36 First in the very entry we meete with this which we said before, that all prayer ought none otherwise to be offered of us to God in the name of Christ, as it can by no other name be made acceptable unto him. For since we call him Father, truly we alleadged for us the name of Christ. For by what boldnesse might any man call God Father:

Father? who should burit forth into so great rashnesse, to take to himselfe the honour of the Sonne of God, unlesse we were adopted the children of grace in Christ? Which being the true Sonne, is given of him to us to be our brother: that that which he hath proper by nature, may by the benefit of adoption bee made ours, if we doe with sure Faith embrace so great bountifullnesse. As Iohn saith, that power is given to them which beleeve in the name of the onely begotten Sonne of God, that they also may bee made the children of God. Therefore he both calleth himselfe our Father, and will be so called of us, by this sweetnesse of name delivering us from all distrust, sith there can no where be found any greater affection of love than in a Father. Therefore hee could by no surer example testify his unmeasurable deare love towards us than by this that wee are named the Sonnes of God. But his love is so much greater and more excellent toward us than all love of our parents, as hee passeth all men in goodnesse and mercy: that if all the Fathers that are in the earth, having shaken off all feeling of Fatherly naturallnesse, would forsake their children, yet he will never faile us, because he cannot deny himselfe. For we have his promise, if you being evill can give good gifts to your children, how much more can your Father which is in heaven? Again in the Prophet, Can a mother forget her children? Though she forget them, yet I will not forget thee. If we be his children: then as a childe cannot give himselfe into the tuition of a stranger and forraine man, unlesse he complaine either of the cruelty or poverty of his Father? so wee cannot seeke succours from elsewhere than from him alone, unlesse we reproach him with poverty and want of ability, or with cruell or too extreame rigoroussnesse.

37 Neither let us alleadge that we are worthily made fearefull with conscience, of sinnes, which may make a Father be he never so mercitull and kinde, daily to be displeas'd. For if among men the sonne can with no better Advocate plead his cause to his Father, and by no better meane get and recover his favour being lost, than if hee himselfe humbly and lowly, acknowledging his fault, doe beseech his fathers mercy (for then the fatherly bowels cannot hide themselves but must be moved at such prayers) what shall that father of mercy doe, and the God of all comfort? shall not hee rather heare the teares and groanings of his children intreating for themselves (specially sith he doth call and exhort us to doe so) than any other intercessions whatsoever they be to the succour whereof they do so fearefully flee, nor without some shew of despaire, because they distrust of the kindnesse and mercifullnesse of their father? This overflowing plenty of fatherly kindnesse hee depainteth and setteth out unto vs in the parable, where the Father lovingly embraceth the sonne that had estranged himselfe from him, that had riotously wasted his substance, that had every way grievously offended against him, and hee tarrich not till he doe with words crave pardon, but hee himselfe preventeth him, knoweth him a farre off returning, of his owne will goeth to meete him, comforteth him and receiveth him into favour. For, setting out in a man this example of so great gentlenesse, he minded to teach us how much more plentifull kindnesse we ought to looke for at his hand, who is not onely a Father, but also the best and most mercifull of all fathers, howsoever wee bee unkinde, rebellious and naughty children so that yet wee call our selves upon his mercy. And that he might make it to be more assuredly beleeved, that he is such a Father to us, if we be Christians: he willed not onely to be called Father, but also by expresse name Our Father: as if wee might thus talke with, O Father which hast so great naturall kindnesse toward thy children, so great easinesse to pardon, wee thy children call to thee and pray to thee, being assured and fully perswaded, that thou bearest no other affection to us than fatherly howsoever wee bee unworthy of such a father. But because the small capacities of our heart conceive not so great unmeasurablenesse of favour, not onely Chrill is to us a pledge and earnest of our adoption, but also he giveth us the spirit for witness of the same adoption, through whom we may with a free and lowd voice crie Abba, Father. so oft therefore as any delay shall withstand us, let us remember to aske of him, that correcting our fearefullnesse he will set before us that spite of couragiousnesse to be our guide to pray boldly.

38 Whereas wee are not so taught that every one should severally call him his owne father, but rather that we should all in common together call him Our Father: thereby we are put in minde, how great affection of brotherly love ought to be among us, which are altogether by one same right of mercy and liberality, the children of such a father. For wee have one common Father, from whom cometh whatsoever good thing may betide unto us, there ought to be nothing severall among us, which we are not ready with great cheerefulness of minde to communicate one to another, so much as need requireth. Now if wee bee so desirous, as we ought to be, to reach our hand and helpe one to another, there is nothing wherein wee may more profit our brethren, then to commend them to the care and providence of the most good father, who being well pleased and favouring, nothing at all can be wanted. And verily even this same we owe to our father. For as hee that truly and heartily loveth any father of household, doth also embrace his whole household, with love and good will: likewise what love and affection we beare to this heavenly Father, we must shew toward his people, his household and his inheritance, which he hath so honoured, that he hath called it the fulnesse of his onely begotten Sonne. Let a Christian man therefore frame his prayers by this rule, that they be common, and may comprehend all them that be brethren in Christ with him: and not onely those whom hee presently seeth and knoweth to be such, but all men that live upon earth: of whom, what God hath determined, it is out of our knowledge: saying that it is no lesse godly than naturall to wish the best to them, and hope the best of them. Howbeit we ought with a certaine singular affection to beare a speciall inclination to them of the household of Faith, whom the Apostle hath in every thing peculiarly commended unto us. In a summe, All our prayers ought to be so made, that they have respect to that community which our Lord hath stablished in his kingdom and his house.

39 Yet this withstandeth not, but that wee may specially pray both for our selves and for certaine other: so that yet our minde depart not from having an eye to this community, nor once swarve from it, but apply all things unto it. For though they be singularly spoken in forme, yet because they are directed to that marke, they cease not to be common. All this may easily be understood by a like example. The commandment of God is general, to relieve the neede of all poore: and yet they obey this commandment which to this end doe helpe their poverty, whom they know or see to be in neede, although they passe over many whom they see to be pressed with no lesse necessity: either because they cannot know all, or be not able to helpe all. After this manner they also doe not against the will of God, which having regard unto, and thinking upon this common fellowship of the Church, doe make such particular prayers, by which they doe with a common minde in particular words, commend to God themselves or other, whose necessity God willed to be more neerely knowne to them. Howbeit all things are not like in prayer and in bestowing of goods. For, the liberality of giving cannot be used but toward them whose neede wee have perceived: but with prayer wee may helpe even them that are most strange and most unknowne to vs, by how great a space of ground soever they be distant from us. This is done by the general forme of prayer, wherein all the children of God are contained, among whom they also are. Hereto we may apply that which Paul exhorteth the faithfull of his time, that they lift up every where pure hands, without strife: because when hee warneth them that strife shutteth the gate against prayers, he willeth them with one minde to lay their petitions in common together.

40 It is added, that he is in heaven. Whereupon it is not by and by to be gathered that he is bound fast inclosed and compassed with the circle of heaven, as within certaine barres. For Salomon also confesseth that the heaven of heavens cannot containe him. And hee himselfe saith by the prophet, that heaven is his seat, and the earth his footstool. Whereby verily hee signifieth that hee is not limited in any certaine coast, but is spread abroad throughout all things. But because our minde (such is the grosse-ness of it,) could not otherwise conceive his unspeakable glory, it is signified to us by the heaven, than which there can nothing come under our sight more ample or fuller of majesty. Sith therefore wheresoever our senses comprehend any thing, there they use to fasten it: God is set out of all place, that when we will seeke him, we should be raised up above all sense both of body and soule. Again by this manner of speaking he is lifted above all chance of corruption and change: finally it is signified that he comprehendeth and containeth the whole world and governeth it with his power. Wherefore this is all one as if he had bene called of infinite greatnesse or height, of incomprehensible substance, of unmeasurable power, of everlasting immortality. But while we have this, we must lift up our minde higher when God is spoken of, that we dreame not any earthly or fleshly thing of him, that wee measure him not by our small proportions, nor draw his will to the rule of affections. And therewithall is to be raised up our affiance in him, by whose providence and power we understand heaven and earth to be governed. Let this be the summe, that under the name of Father is set before us that God which hath in his owne image appeared to us, that he may be called upon with assured Faith: and that the familiar name of Father is not onely applied to stablish affiance, but also availeth to hold fast our mindes that they bee not drawne to doubtfull or feigned Gods, but should from the enely begotten some climbe up to the onely Father of Angels & of the Church: then, that because his seat is placed in heaven, we are by the governance of the world put in minde that not without cause wee come to him, which with present care commeth of his owne will to meete us. Who so come to God (saith the Apostle) they must first beleive that there is a God, then that he is a rewarder to all them that seeke him. Both these things Christ affirmed to be proper to his father, that our faith may be stayed in him: then, that we may bee certainly perswaded that hee is not carelesse of our safety: because he vouchsafeth even to us to extend his providence: with which introductions Paul prepareth us to pray rightly. For before that he biddeth our petitions to be opened before God, he saith thus, Be ye carefull for nothing: the Lord is at hand. Whereby appeareth that they doubtfully and with perplexity tosse their prayers in their minde which have not this well settled in them, that the eye of God is upon the righteous.

Phil 4. 6.

41 The first petition is, That the name of God bee hallowed, the neede whereof is joynd with our great shame. For what is more shamefull than that the glory of God should be partly by our unthankfullnesse, partly by our maliciousnesse darkened: and (so much as in it lyeth) by our boldnesse and furious stubbornnesse, utterly blotted out. Though all the wicked would burst themselves with their wilfulnesse full of sacriledge, yet the holinesse of the name of God gloriously shieth. And not without cause the Prophet crieth out, As thy name O God, so is thy praise into all the ends of the earth. For wheresoever the name of God is knowne, it cannot bee but that his strength, power, goodnesse, wisdom, righteousnesse, mercy, and truth must shew forth themselves, which may draw us into admiration of him, and stirre us up to publish his praise. Such therefore the holinesse of God is so shamefully taken from him in earth, if we be not able to rescue it, we be at the least commanded to take care of it in our prayers. The summe is, that we wish the honour to be given to God, which he is worthy to have, that men never speake or thinke of him without most high reverence: whereunto is contrary the unholy abusing, which hath alway bene too common in the world, as at this day also it rangeth abroad. And hereupon cometh the necessity of this petition, which if there lived in us any godlinesse, though it were but a little, ought to have bene superfluous. But if the name of God have his holinesse safe, when being severed from all other, it breatheth out nothing but glorie, here we are commanded not onely to pray that God will deliver that holy name from all contempt and dishonour, but also that he will subdue all mankind to the reverence of it. Now whereas God disciplines himselfe to us, partly by doctrine, and partly by workes, hee is no otherwise sanctified of us, than if wee give to him in both behaltes that which is his, and so embrace whatsoever shall come from him: and that his severity have no lesse praise among us than his mercitulnesse, for as much as he hath in the manifold diversity of his workes imprinted markes of his glory, which may worthily draw out of all tongues a confession of his praise. So shall it come to passe that the Scripture shall have full authority with us, and that no good successe shall hinder the blessing which God deserveth in the whole course of the governing of the world. Again, the petition also tendereth to this purpose, that all ungodlinesse which defileth this holy name, may be destroyed and taken away: that

The following of the name of God which is the first petition hath in it that which be teacheth and that which be to be marketh, earnestly to be sought for and raised in prayer. Psal. 13. 18. Psal. 48. 11.

whatsoever things doe darken and diminish this sanctifying, as well slunders as mockings, may be driven away: and when God subdueth all sacriledges, his glory may thereby more and more shine abroad.

42. The second petition is, that the kingdome of God may come: which although it containe no new thing, yet not without cause severed from the first: because if we consider our owne drowynesse in a thing greatest of all other, it is profitable that the thing which ought of it selfe to have bene most well knowne, be with many wordes oft beaten into us. Therefore after that wee have bene commanded to pray to God to bring into subjection, and at length utterly to destroy whatsoever spotteth his holy name: now is added a like and in a manner the same request, that his kingdome come. But although wee have already set forth the definition of his kingdome, yet I now briefly rehearse, that God reigneth when men as well with forsaking of themselves, as with despising of the world and of the earthly life, doe so yeeld themselves to his righteousness, that they aspire to the heavenly life. Therefore there are two parts of this kingdome: the one that God correct with the power of his Spirit all corrupt desires of the flesh, which doe by multitudes make warre against him: the other that he frame all our senses to the obedience of his government, Therefore none doe keepe right order in this prayer, but they which begin at themselves, that is to say, that they be cleansed from all corruptions which trouble the quiet state of the kingdome of God, and infect the purenesse thereof. Now because the word of God is like a kingly scepter, wee are here commanded to pray he will subdue the mindes and hearts of all men to willing obedience of it. Which is done, when with the secret instinct of his Spirit he uttereth the effectuall force of his word, that it may bee advanced in such degree as it is worthy. Afterward wee must come downe to the wicked which doe obstinately and with desperate rage resist his authority. God therefore setteth up his kingdome by humbling the whole world: but that in diverse manners: because he tames the wantonnesse of some, and of other some he breaketh the untamed pride. This is daily to be wished that it be done, that it may please God to gather to himselfe Churches out of all the coastes of the world: to enlarge and increase them in number, to enrich them with his gifts, to stablish right order in them: on the other side to overthrow all the enemies of pure doctrine and religion, to scatter abroad their counsels, to cast downe their enterprises. Whereby appeareth that the endeavour of daily proceeding is not in vaine commanded us: because the matters of men, are never in so good case, that filthinesse being shaken away and cleaned, full purenesse flourisheth and is in lively force. But the fullnesse of it is deferred unto the last coming of Christ, when Paul teacheth that God shall be all in all. And so this prayer ought to withdraw us from all the corruptions of the world, which doe sever us from God that his kingdome should not flourish in us, and also to kindle our endeavour to mortifie the flesh, finally to instruct us to the bearing of the crosse: forasmuch as God will in this wise have his kingdome spread abroad. Neither ought we to take it discontentedly, that the outward man be destroyed, so that the inward man be renewed. For this is the nature of the kingdome of God, when wee submit our selves to the righteousness thereof, to make us partakers of his glory. This is done when brightly setting forth his light and truth with alway new increases, whereby the darkenesse and lies of Satan and his kingdome may vanish away, bee destroyed and perish, hee defendeth them that bee his, with the helpe of his Spirit, directeth them to uprightnesse, and strengtheneth them to continuance: but overthroweth the wicked conspiracies of his enemies, shaketh abroad their treasons and deceits, preventeth their malice, and beatech downe their stubbornnesse, till at length hee kill Antichrist with the Spirit of his mouth and destroy all ungodlinesse with the brightnesse of his coming.

43 The third petition is, That the will of God bee done in earth, as it is in heaven. Which although it hangeth upon his kingdome, and cannot bee severed from it, is not in vaine added severally, for our grossenes, which doth not easily or by and by conceive what it is that God raigne in the world. It shall therefore be no absurdity if this be taken by way of plainer exposition: that God shall then be king in the world when all things shall submit themselves to his will. Now here is not meant of his secret will the third petition that the will of God may be obeyed is a renouncing of our owne carnall wills and

whereby hee governeth all things and directeth them to their end. For though Satan and men are troubleſomely carryed againſt him, yet hee can by his incomprehenſible counſell not onely turne aſide their violent motions, but alſo drive them into order that he may doe by them that which he hath purpoſed. But here is ſpoken of another will of God, namely that, whereunto anſwereth willing obedience: and therefore the heaven is by name compared with the earth: becauſe the Angels, as it is ſaid in the Pſalme, doe willingly obey God and are diligently bent to doe his commandements. Wee are therefore commanded to wiſh that as in heaven nothing is done but by the becke of God, and the Angels are quietly framed to all uprightneſſe: ſo the earth, all ſtubborneſſe and perverſeneſſe being quenched, may be ſubject to ſuch government. And when we require this, we renounce the deſires of our owne fleſh: becauſe whoſoever doth not reſigne and yeeld his affections to God, he doth as much as in him lieth ſet himſelfe againſt him, forasmuch as nothing commeth out of us but faulty. And wee are againe by this prayer framed to the forſaking of our ſelves, that God may governe us after his will: and not that onely, but that hee may alſo create in us new mindes, and new hearts, our old being brought to nought: that wee may feele in our ſelves none other motion of deſire than a meere conſent with his will: ſummarily that wee may will nothing of our ſelves, but that his Spirit may governe our hearts, by whom inwardly teaching us wee may learne to love thoſe things that pleaſe him, and to hate thoſe things that diſpleaſe him. Whereupon this alſo followeth, that whatſoever affections fight againſt his will, hee make them vaine and void. Loe here bee the firſt three chiefe points of this prayer, in asking whereof wee ought to have the onely glory of God before our eyes, leaving this reſpect of our ſelves, and having no regard to any of our owne profits, which although it come hereof largely unto us, yet we ought not here to ſeeke it. But albeit all theſe things, though we never thinke of them, nor wiſh them, nor aſke them, muſt nevertheleſſe come to paſſe in their due time, yet wee muſt wiſh them and require them. And thic to doe is no ſmall profit for our travaile, that we may ſo teſtifie and profeſſe our ſelves to bee the ſervants and children of God, as much as in us lieth endeavouring and being truly and thoroughly given to ſet forth his honour, which is due to him being both a Lord and a Father. Who ſo therefore doe not with affection and zeale of advancing the glory of God, pray that the name of God be hallowed, that his kingdome come, that his will be done: they are not to bee accounted among the children and ſervants of God: and as all theſe things ſhall be done againſt their wils, ſo they ſhall turne to their confuſion and deſtruction.

44 Now followeth the ſecond part of the prayer, in which we come downe to our owne commodities: not that bidding farewell to the Glory of God ( which as Paul wimneſſeth, is to bee regarded even in meat and drinke ) we ſhould ſeeke onely what is profitable for our ſelves: but we have already given warning that there is this difference, that God peculiarly claiming three petitions to himſelfe, doth draw us to himſelfe wholly, thathce may in this wiſe prove our godlineſſe. I hea hee granteth us alſo to have an eye to our owne commodities, but with this condition, that wee aſke nothing for our ſelves but to this end that whatſoever benefits hee beſtoweth upon us, they may ſet forth his glory: forasmuch as nothing is more rightfull than that we live and dye to him. But in this petition we aſke of God generally all things which the uſe of the body needeth under the elements of this world, not onely wherewith wee may be fed and clothed, but alſo whatſoever hee foreſeeth to be profitable for us, that we may eate our bread in peace. By which prayer we briefly yeeld our ſelves unto his care, and commit us to his providence, that hee may feed, cheeriſh, and preſerve us. For the moſt good Father ſiddaineth not to receive alſo our body into his faithfull ſafeguard and keeping, to exerciſe our faith in theſe ſmall things, when wee looke for all things at his hands, even to a crumme of bread and a droppe of water. For whereas it is come to paſſe I wote not how by our iniquity, that wee bee mooved and vexed with greater care of the fleſh than of the ſoule; many which dare truſt to God for their ſoule, are yet carefull for their fleſh, are yet in doubt what they ſhall eate, and wherewith they ſhall bee clothed: and if they have not plentie of wine, wheate, and oyle a forehand, they tremble for feare. So much more doe wee eſteeme the ſhadow of

this life which lasteth but a moment, than that everlasting immortality. But who so trusting to God have once cast away that carefulnesse for the provision of the flesh, doe also by and by looke for salvation and everlasting life at his hand, which are greater things. It is therefore no small exercise of faith, to hope for those things of God which otherwise doe so much hold us in care: and wee have not finally profited, when wee have put off this unbelievingnesse which sticketh fast within the bones almost of all men. As for that which some doe here teach of transubstantiall bread, it seemeth but finally to agree with the meaning of Christ: yea, but if we did not even in this fraile life give to God the office of a nourishing Father, our prayer should be imperfect. The reason which they bring is too much prophane: that it is not meete that the children of God, which ought to bee spirituall, should not onely cast their minde to earthly cares, but also wrap God therein with them. As though his blessing and fatherly favour doth not also appeare in the sustentance of our life, or as though it were written in vaine that godlinesse hath promised not onely of the life to come; but also of this present life. But although the forgiveness of sinnes is of much greater value than the sustentances of the body, yet Christ hath set the inferiour thing in the first place, to the intent to lift us up by degrees to the other two petitions which doe properly belong to the heavenly life, wherein he had regard to our grossenesse. We are commanded to aske Our bread, that we should be content with the quantity which our heavenly father vouchsafeth to give to us, and should not seeke for gaine by unlawfull crafty meanes. In the meane time wee must learne that it is made Ours by Title of gift, because neither our diligence, nor our travaile, nor our hands (as it is said in Moser) doe by themselves get us any thing, unlesse the blessing of God bee present: yea the plenty of the bread should nothing at all profit us, unlesse it were by God turned into nourishment. And therefore this liberality of God is no lesse necessary for the rich than for the poore: because having their cellers and their barnes full, they should yet faint for drienesse and emptinesse, unlesse they did by his grace enjoy their bread. The word This Day, or every day as it is in the other Evangelist, and also the adjective Daily, doe bridle the too much greedinesse of fraile things, wherewith wee are wont to burne out of measure, and wherunto are joynd other evils: such if we have plentifull abundance, we doe gloriously power it out upon pleasure, delights, boasting, and other kinds of riotous excess. Therefore we are commanded to aske onely so much as is enough for our necessity, and as it were from day to day, with this affiance, that when our heavenly Father hath fed us this day, he will also not faile us to morrow. Therefore how great a plenty of things soever doe flow unto us, yea when our barnes be stuffed and our cellars full: yet we ought alway to aske our daily bread: because wee must certainly beleve that all substance is nothing, but inso much as the Lord doth by powring out of his blessing with continuall encrease make it fruitfull: and that the very same substance that is in our hand, is not our owne, but inso much as hee doth every honre give us a portion and grant us the use of it. This whereas the pride of men doth most hardly suffer it selfe to be perswaded: the Lord testifieth that hee hath shewed a singular example thereof for all ages, when he fed his people with Manna in the wilderness, to teach us that man liveth not by bread onely, but rather in the word that commeth out of his mouth. Wherby is declared, that it is his power alone by which our life and strengthes are sustained, although he doth minister it unto us under bodily instruments. As he is wont also to teach us by the contrary example, when hee so oft as hee will, breaketh the strength and (as he calleth it) the itaffe of bread, that men eating may pine with hunger, and drinking may be dried up with thirst. But who so not being contented with daily bread, but with unbridled greedinesse are gaping for endlesse store, or who so being full with their abundance, and carelesse by reason of the heape of their riches, doe nevertheless sue to God with this prayer; they doe nothing else but mocke him. For, the first sort of such men aske that which they would not obtaine, yea that which they most of all abhor, that is, to have onely daily bread, and so much as in them lyeth they dissemblingly hide from God the affection of their covetousnesse: whereas true prayer ought to poute out before him the very whole minde it selfe, and whatsoever inwardly lyeth hidden. But the other sort doe aske that which they looke not for at his hand, namely that which they thinke that they have with themselves. In this that it is called Ours, the bountifullnesse of God (as we have said) so much more appeareth, which maketh I that ours, that is by no right due to us. Yet that exposition is not to be rejected which I have also touched, that by our bread is meant that which is earned with rightfull and harmelesse travell, and not gotten with deceits and extortious: because that is alway other mens which we get to our selves with any ill doing. Whereas wee pray that it be given us, thereby it signified that it is the onely and free gift of God, from whence soever it come to us, yea when it shall most of all seeme to be gotten by our owne policy and travaile, and earned with our owne hands: forasmuch as it commeth to passe by his onely blessing that our labours prosper well.

Now followeth. Forgive us our debts: in which petition and the next following, Christ hath briefly contained whatsoever maketh for the heavenly life: as in these two parts standeth the spirituall covenant which God hath made for the salvation of his Church, I will write my lawes in their hearts, and I will be mercifull to their iniquity. Here Christ begetteth the forgiveness of finnes: after this; he will by and by adjoyne the second grace, that God defend us with the power of his Spirit, and sustaine us with his helpe, that we may stand unovercome against all tentations. And finnes hee calleth debts, because we are debt-bound to pay the penalty of them, and were by no meanes able to satisfie it, unlesse we are acquitted by this forgiveness. Which pardon is of his free mercy, when hee himselfe liberally wipeth out these debts, taking no payment of us, but with his owne mercy satisfiing himselfe in Christ, which hath once given himselfe for recompence. Therefore who so trust that God shall bee satisfied by their owne or other mens merits, and that with such satisfactions the forgiveness of finnes is recompenced and redeemed, they have no part of communicating of this free forgiveness: and when they call upon God in this manner, they doe nothing but subscribe to their owne accusation, yea and seale their owne condemnation with their owne witness. For they confesse themselves debtors, unlesse they be acquitted by the benefit of forgiveness, which yet they doe not receive, but rather refuse, when they thrust unto God their owne merits and satisfactions. For, so they doe not beseech his mercy but do appeale to his judgement. As for them that dreaume of a perfection in themselves, which taketh away need, to crave pardon, let them have such disciples who the itching of their eares driveth to errours, so that it be certaine that so many disciples as they get, are taken away from Christ for as much as he instructing also to confesse their guiltinesse, receiveth none but sinners: not for that hee cherisheth finnes with flatterings, but because he knew that the faithfull are never thoroughly unloshed of the vices of their flesh, but that they alway remaine subiect to the judgement of God. It is indeed to be wished, yea and to be earnestly endeavoured, that wee having performed all the parts of our duty, may truly rejoyce before God that wee are cleane from all spot: but for as much as it pleaseth God by little and little to make againe his image in us, that there alway remaineth some infection in our flesh, the remedy ought not to have beene despised. If Christ by the authority given to him of his Father, commandeth us throughout the whole course of our life, to flee to craving of pardon of our guiltinesse: who shall be able to suffer these new masters, which goe about with this imagined ghost of perfect innocency to dazle the eies of the simple, to make them to trust that they may be made free from all fault? Which, as Iohn witnesseth, is nothing else but to make God a lyer. And with all one worke these lewd men by cancelling one article do reare in sunder and by that meane doe weaken from the very foundation the whole covenant of God, wherein we have shewed that our salvation is contained: so as they be not onely robbers of God, because they sever those things so conjoynd, but also wicked and cruell because they overwhelm poore soules with dispaire and traitours to themselves and other, that be like them, because they bring themselves into bothfullnesse directly contrary to the mercy of God. But whereas some object, that in wishing the commanding of the kingdom of God, wee doe also aske the putting away of sinne: that is too childishly, because in the first table of this prayer is set forth unto us most high perfection, but in this part is set forth our weaknesse. So these two things doe sely agree together, that in a spring toward the marke we despise not the remedies which our necessities requireth. Finally, we pray that we may be forgiven as we our selves doe forgive our debtors, that is, as we doe forgive and pardon all of whomsoever we have beene in any thing offended, either unjustly handled in deed, or reprochfully used in word. Not that it lyeth in us to pardon the guiltinesse of the fault and offence which pertaineth to God alone: but this is our forgiving, of our owne willingnesse to lay away out of our minde wrath, hatred, and desire of revengement, and with voluntary forgetfullnesse to tread under foote the remembrance of injuries. Wherefore wee may not aske forgiveness of finnes at the hand of God, if wee doe not also forgive their offences toward us which either doe or have done us wrong. But if wee keepe any hatreds in our hearts, and purpose any revengements, and imagine by what occasion we may not hurt, yea, and if wee doe not endeavour to come into favour againe with our enemies, and doe deserve well of them with all kinde of friendly doings, and to win them unto us: we doe by this prayer beseech God that hee doe not forgive us. For we require that he grant to us the same forgiveness which wee grant to other. But this is to pray that hee grant it not to us, unless wee grant it to them. Who so therefore bee such, what doe they obtaine by their prayer but a more grievous judgement? Last of all it is to be noted, that this condition that 'hee forgive us as we forgive our debtors, is not therefore added for that we deserve his forgiveness by the forgiveness which wee grant to other, as if that cause of forgiveness to us were there expressed: but by this word partly the Lords will was to comfort the weakenesse of our Faith, for hee added this as a signe whereby we may bee assured that hee hath as surely granted to us forgiveness of our finnes, as wee surely know in our conscience that wee have granted the same to other, if our minde bee void and cleansed of all hatred, envy, and revengement, and partly by this as it were by a marke, hee wipeth them out of the number of his children that they may not bee bold to call upon him as their Father, which being headlong hasty to revenge, and hardly enreated to pardon, doe use stiffely continuing enmities, and doe cheerish in themselves the same displeasure toward other which they pray to be turned from themselves. Which is also in Luke expressly spoken in the words of Christ.

46 The sixt petition (as we have said) answereth to the promise of ingravating the law of God in our hearts. But because we doe not without continuall ware fare and hard and great strivings to obey God, we doe here pray to be furnished with such weapons and defended with such succour, that wee may bee able to get the victory: whereby wee are warned that we stand in neede not only of the grace of the spirit, which may soften, bow, and direct our heart to the obedience of God, but also of his helpe, whereby hee may make us invincible against both all the traitorous entrappings and violent conflicts of Satan, But now oftentimes there are many and divers sorts. For, both the perverse thoughts of minde provoking us to trespassing against the law, which either our owne lust doth minister unto us, or the devill stirreth up, are tentations: and all those things which of their owne nature are not evil, yet by the craft of the devill are made tentations, when they are so set before our eyes, that by the occasion of them wee bee drawne away or doe swarve from God. And these tentations are either on the right hand or on the left. On the right hand, as riches, power, honours, which commonly doe with their glistering and shew of good, so dazle the sight of men; and catch them with the baited hooke of their flatterings, that being intrapped with such deceits, or drunke with such sweetnesse, they may forget their God. On the left hand as poverty, reproches, despisings, troubles, and such other: that they being grieved with the bitterness and hardnesse thereof may be utterly discouraged, cast away Faith and hope, and finally be altogether estranged from God. To these tentations of both sorts, which fight witrus either being kindled in us by our owne lust, or being set against us by the craft of Satan, we pray to our heavenly Father that hee suffer us not to yeeld: but rather that hee uphold us and raise us up with his hand, that being strong by his strength wee may stand fast against all the assaults of the malicious enemy, whatsoever thoughts hee put into our minde: then, that whatsoever is set before us on either side, wee may turne it to good, that we neither bee puffed up with prosperity, nor throwne downe with adversity. Neither yet doe wee here require that that we may feele no tentations at all, with which we have great need to be stirred up, pricked, and pinched, leaft by too much rest we grow dull. For not in vaine did Dauid wish to be tempted: and not without cause, the Lord daily tempteth his elect, chastising them by thame, poverty, trouble, and other kindes of Crosse. But God tempteth after one manner, and Satan after another: Satan, to destroy, damne, confound, and throw downe headlong: but God, that by proving them that be his, he may have a triall of their unsainednesse, and by exercising them may confirme their strength, to mortifie, purge by fire, and feare their flesh, which unlesse it were in this wise restrained, would wax wanton, and would wildly outrage above measure. Moreover Satan assaileth men unarmed and unready, that he may oppresse them unware: God even with tempting worketh the effect, that they which be his may patiently beare whatsoever he sendeth upon them. By the name of the Evill, whether we understand the Devill or Sinne, it maketh little matter. Satan indeed himselfe is the enemy that lieth in waite for our life: but with Sinne he is armed to destroy us. This therefore is our request, that we may not be overcome or overwhelmed with any tentations, but may by the power of the Lord stand strong against all contrary powers wherewith we are assailed: which is, not to yeeld us vanquished to tentations, that being received into his keeping and charge, and being safe by his protection: we may endure overcome over Sinne, death, the gates of hell, and the whole kingdome of the devill: which is to be delivered from evill. Where it is also to be diligently marked, that it is above our strength to match with the divell so great a warrior, and to beare his force and violence. Otherwise we should but vainly, or as it were in mockage aske that which we had already in our selves. Surely, they which prepare them to such a battell with trust of themselves, doe not sufficiently understand with how fierce and well armed an enemy they have to doe. Now we pray to be delivered from his power, as out of the mouth of a mad and raging lion, whereas we should be torne in peeces with his teeth and pawes, and swallowed with his choate, unlesse the Lord doe deliver us out of the midst of death: yet therewithall knowing this, that if the Lord shall stand by us, and fight for us when we are overthrowne, we shall in his strength shew strength. Let other trust as they list to their owne abilities & strengths of free will, which they thinke that they have of themselves: but let it suffice us that we stand and are strong by the onely strength of God. But this praier containeth more than at the first sight it beareth in shew. For if the Spirit of God be our strength to fight out our combate with Satan, we shall not be able to get the victorie untill we being filled with that Spirit shall have put off all the weaknesse of our flesh. When therefore wee pray to be delivered from Satan and the Divell, we pray to be from time to time enriched with new encreases of the grace of God, till being fully stiffeed with them, we may triumph over all evill. It seemeth hard and rough to some, that we crave of God that he leade us not into tentation, for as much as it is contrary to his nature to tempe, as James witnesseth. But this question is already partly assailed, where wee said that our owne lust is properly the cause of all the tentations wherewith we are overcome, and therefore worthily beareth the blame thereof. Neither doth James meane any thing else, but that the faultes are without cause and wrongfully laid upon God, which we are driven to impute to our selves, because we know our selves in our conscience guilty of them. But this withstandeth nor, but that God may when it pleaseth him, make us bond to stand, cast us away into a reprobate sence, and to filthy lulls, and so lead us into tentation by his judgement which is righteous indeed but yet oftentimes secret: for as much as the cause of it is often hid from men, which is yet certainly knowne with him. Whereupon is gathered that this is no unfit manner of speaking, if we be persuaded that hee doth not without cause so oft threaten, that when the reprobate shall be stricken with blindness and hardnesse of heart, these shall be sure tokens of his vengeance.

47 These three petitions, wherewith we do peculiarly commend us and our things to God, doe evidently shew this which we have before said, that the praiers of Christians ought to be common and to tend to the common edifying of the church, and to the encrease of the communion of the faithfull. For there doth not every man pray to have any thing privately given, but all in common together doe pray for Our bread, for forgiveness of finnes, that we may not be led into temptation, that we may be delivered from evill. There is furthermore adjoynd a cause why we have both so great boldnesse to aske, and so great trust to obtaine: which although it be not in the Latin copies, yet it agreeth more fitly in this place than that it should seeme worthy to be omitted, namely that this is the kingdome, and the power, and the glory for ever. This is the perfect and quiet rest of our soule. For if our prayers were to be commended to God by their owne worthinesse, who should be so bold, as once to open his mouth before him? Now howsoever wee be most miserable, howsoever most unworthy of all men, howsoever voide of all commendation: yet we shall never want cause to pray, and never be destitute of confidence: forasmuch as our Father cannot have his kingdome, power and glory taken away from him. At the end is added Amen, whereby is expressed our ferventnesse of desire to obtaine those things that we have asked of God, and our hope is confirmed that all such things are already obtained and shall surely be given us because they are promised by God, which cannot deceive. And this agreeth with that manner of prayer which we have here before rehearsed, Doe it Lord for thy names sake, not for our sakes or our righteousness: whereby the holy ones doe not onely expresse the end of their prayers, but also confesse that they are unworthy to obtaine unlesse God fetch the cause from himselfe, and that their trust to speed commeth of the only nature of God.

Proba.

48 Thus have wee whatsoever wee ought yea or in any wise may aske of God, set forth in this forme, and as it were a rule of praying taught by the best Scholler-master Christ, whom the Lord hath set over us to be our teacher, and whom alone hee hath willed to be harkened unto. For hee both alway hath bene his eternal Kingdome, and being made man, is given to men the Angell of great counsell. And this praier is in all points, so fully perfect, that whatsoever forreine or strange thing is added which cannot be referred to it, it is ungodly and unworthy to be allowed of God. For in this summe hee hath set forth, what is meeete for him, what is pleasing to him, what is necessary for us: finally what hee will grant. Wherefore who so dare goe further, and to aske any thing of God beside these, first they will adde of their owne to the wisdom of God (which cannot be done without made blasphemy) then they hold not themselves under the will of God, but despising it doe with greedinesse wander further: finally they shall never obtaine any thing, forasmuch as they praie without faith. And there is no doubt that all such prayers are made without faith, because here wanteth the word of God, upon which unlesse faith be grounded, can in no wise stand. But they which forsaking the masters rule, doe follow their owne desires, are not onely without the word of God, but also so much as they are able with their whole endeavour are against it. Therefore Tertullian no lesse fitly than truly hath called this a lawfull praier, secretly signifying that all other are lawlesse and unlawful.

those things
which are con-

the compasse of the Lords praier.

49 We would not have these things so taken as though wee were so bound with this forme of praier, that we may not change a word or a syllable. For there are each where read many prayers in the Scripture, farre differing from this in words, yet written by the same Spirit, and which are at this day profitable to be used of us. Many are continually put into the mouthes of the faithfull by the same Spirit, which in likenesse of words doe not so much agree. This onely is our meaning in so teaching, that no man should seeke, looke for, or aske any other thing at all than that which is summarily comprehended in this praier, and which though it most differ in words, yet differeth not in sense. Like as it is certaine that all the prayers which are found in the Scriptures, and which doe come out of godly hearts, are applied to this, so verily none can any where be found, which may match, much lesse passe, the perfectnesse of this praier. Heere is nothing left out, that might be thought upon to the praises of God, nothing that ought to come into the minde of man for his owne profits: and the same so fully that all hope is worthily taken away from all men to attempt to make any better. In summe, let us remember that this is the doctrine of the wisdom of God, which hath taught what he willed, and willed what was needfull.

50 But although we have above said, that we ought alway to breath upward with mindes lifted upto God, and to pray without ceasing: yet forasmuch as such is our weaknesse, as needeth to be upholden with many helpes: such is our dulcnesse, as needeth to be pricked forward with many spurs: it is good that everle one of us appoint to himselfe privately certaine houres which may not passe away without praier, and which may have the whole affections of our minde thoroughly busied to that purpose: as, when we rise in the morning, before that we go to our daies worke, when we sit downe to meate, when we have beene fed by the blessing of God, when we take us to rest. Only lett it not be a superstitious observing of houres, by which, as praying a taske to God, we may thinke our selves discharged for the other houres: but a training of our weaknesse, whereby it may so be exercised and from time to time stirred up. Specially we ought carefully to looke that so oft as either we our selves are in distresse, or we see other to be in distresse with any hardnesse of adversitie, we run straight way to him, not with feere but with hart: then, that we suffer not any prosperitie of our owne or other mens, to passe but that we testifie that we acknowledge it to be his with praise and thanksgiving. Finally, this is diligently to be observed in all praier, that we goe not about to binde God to certaine circumstances, nor to appoint to him, what he shall doe, at what time, in what place, and in what manner: as by this praier we are taught to make to him no law, nor to appoint to him any condition, but to leave to his will that those things which he will doe, he may doe in what manner, at what time, and in what place it pleaseth him. Wherefore ere we make any praier for our selves, we first pray that his will be done: where we do already submit our will to his: with which when it is restrained as with a bridle put upon it, it may not presume to bring God into rule, but make him the judge and governour of all her desires.

51 If we doe with mindes framed to this obedience, suffer our selves to bee ruled with the lawes of Gods providence, we shall easily learne to continue in prayer, and with longing desires patiently to waice for the Lord: being assured that although hee appeare not, yet he is alway present with us, and will when he seeth his time declare how not deaf eares he gave to the prayer, which in the eyes of men seemed to bee despised. And this shall be a most present comfort, that wee faint not and fall downe by despaire, if at any time God doe not answer at our first requestes. Like as they are wont to doe, which while they are carried with their sudden heate, doe so call upon God, that if he come not to them at their first brunts and bring them present helpe, they by and by imagine him to be angrie and hatefully bent against them, and casting away all hope of obtaining, doe cease to call upon him. But rather deferring our hope with a well tempered evennesse of minde, let us goe forward in that perseverance which is so much commended to us in the Scriptures. For in the Psalmes wee may oftentimes see how David and other faithfull men, when they seeme in a manner wearied with praying, did beate the aire because they threw away their words to God that heard them not, and yet they cease not from praying: because the word of God hath not his full authoritie maintained, unless the credit thereof be set above all successes of things. Moreover let us not tempe God and provoke him against us being wearied with our importunacie, which many use to doe, which doe nothing but indent with God upon a certaine condition, and binde him to the lawes of their covenanting, as though he were servant to their desires: which if he doe not presently obey, they disdain, they chafe, they carpe against him, they murmore, they tumult. Therefore to such oftentimes in his furor he being angrie granted that, which to other in his mercie he being favourable denieth. An example hereof are the children of Israel, for whom it had beene better not to have beene heard of the Lord, than with flesh to eate up his wrath.

52 But if yet at length after long looking for it, our sense doe not perceive what we have prevailed with praying, and seeleth no fruit thereof: yet our faith shall assure us of that, which cannot be perceived by sense, namely that we have obtained that which was expedient for us, for as much as the Lord doth so oft and so certainly take upon him that he will have care of our grieves, after that they have beene once laid in his bosome. And so he will make us to possesse abundance in povertie, comfort in affliction.

1 John 5. 15.

For howsoever all other things doe faile us, yet God will never faile us, which suffereth the waiting and patience of them that be his to be disappointed. He alone shall suffice us instead of all things, for as much as he containeth in himselfe all good things, which he shall one day disclose unto us at the day of judgement when he shall plainly shew forth his kingdome. Beside this although God grant to us, yet he doth not alway answer according to the expresse forme of our request, but holding us after outward seeming in suspence; yet by a meane unknowne he sheweth that our prayers were not vaine. This is meant by the words of Jobn, If we know that hee heareth us when we aske any thing of him, we know that we have the petitions which we aske of him. This seemeth a weake superfluousnesse of words: but it is a singularly profitable declaration, namely that God even when he doth not follow our desires, is yet gentle and favourable to our prayers, that the hope which resteth upon his word may never disappoint us. But with this patience the faithfull doe so farre neede to be sustained, that they should not long stand unlesse they did stay upon it. For the Lord doth by no light trials prove them that be his, and not tenderly doth exercise them: but oftentimes driveth them into the greatest extremities, and then they are driven thither he suffereth them long to stick fast in the mire, ere he gave them any taste of his sweetnesse: and, as Hanna saith, he slaieth, and quickeneth: he leadeth downe to the hels, and bringeth backe againe. What could they here doe but be discouraged, and fall headlong into dispaire: unlesse when they are in distresse and desolate and already halfe dead, this thought did raise them up, that God doth looke upo them, and that there shall be at hand an end of their evils. But howsoever they stand fast upon the assurednesse of that hope, they cease not in the meane time to pray: because if there be not in prayer a stedfastnesse of continuance, we nothing prevaile with praying.

THE XXJ. CHAPTER.

Of the eternall Election, whereby God hath predestinate some to salvation, and other some to destruction.

The necessitie of knowing the truth in the question of predestination that God may be glorified, our minds both humbled and confirmed, and the danger of curious wading therein beyond the bounds of Scripture.

BUT now whereas the covenant of life is not equally preached to all men, and with them to whom it is preached it doth not either equally or continually abide like place: in this diversitie the wonderous depth of the judgement of God appeareth. For neither is it any doubt but that this diversitie also serveth the free choise of Gods eternall election. If it be evident that it is wrought by the will of God that salvation is freely offered to some, and other some are debarred from comming to it: here by and by arise great and hard questions which cannot otherwise be discussed, than if the godly mindes have that certainly stablished which they ought to hold concerning election and Predestination. This is (as many thinke) a comber some question: because they thinke nothing to be lesse reasonable than of the common multitude of men some before ordained to salvation, other some to destruction. But how they wrongfully encomber themselves, shall afterward be evident by the framing of the matter together. Beside that in the very same darknesse which maketh men afraid, not onely the profitableness of this doctrine, but also the most sweet fruit sheweth forth it selfe. We shall never be cleerely perswaded as we ought to be, that our salvation floweth out of the fountaine of the free mercy of God, till his eternall election bee knowne to us, which by this comparison brightly setteth forth the grace of God, that he doth not without difference adopt all into the hope of salvation, but giveth to some that which he denieth to other. How much the ignorance of this principle diminisheth of the glory of God, how much it withdraweth from the true humilitie, it is plaine to see. But Paul denieth that, that which is so necessary to bee knowne, is possible to bee knowne, unlesse God leaving altogether the respect of works doe chuse them whom hee hath determined with himselfe. In this time (saith hee) the remnants were saved according to the free election, If by grace, then not of workes: forasmuch as grace should then not be grace. If of workes, then not of grace: for as much as worke should should now not be worke. If we must be brought backe to the beginning of election, that it may be certain that saluation cometh to us from no other where than from the mereliberality of God: they which will have this principle quenched, doe niggardly so much as in them lieth darken that which ought gloriously and with full mouth to have bene published, and they plucke up the very roote of humilitie. Paul, where the saluation of the remnant of the people is ascribed to free election, cleerely testifieth that onely then it is knowne that God doth by his meeet good pleasure save whom he will, and not render reward which cannot be done. They which shute the gates, that none may be bold to come to the tasting of this doctrine, doe no lesse wrong to men than to God: because neither shall any other thing suffice to humble us as we ought to be, neither shall we otherwise feele from our heart how much we are bound to God. Neither yet is there any other where the upholding stay of sound assurance: as Christ himselfe teacheth, which to deliver us from all feare, and to make us unvanquishable among so many dangers, ambushes, and deadly batels, promiseth that whatsoever he hath received of his Father to keepe, shall be safe. Wherefore we gather that they shall with continuall trembling be miserable, whosever they be that know not themselves to be the proper possession of God: and therefore that they doe very ill provide both for themselves and for all the faithfull, which being blind at these three profits which we have touched, would with the whole foundation of our saluation to be quite taken from among us. Moreover, heereby the Church appeareth unto us, which otherwise (as Bernard tightly teacheth) were not possible to be found, nor to be knowne among creatures: because both waies in marvellous wise it lieth hidden within the bosome of blessed predestination and within the Masse of miserable damnation. But ere I enter into the matter it selfe, I must beforehand in two sortes speake to two sortes of men. That the intreating of predestination, whereas of it selfe it is somewhat cumbersome, is made very doubtfull ye and dangerous, the curiosnesse of men is the cause: which can by no stop be retrained from wandering into forbidden compasses, and climbing up on high: which, if it may, will leave to God no secret which it will not search and turne over. Into this boldnesse and importunacy, forasmuch as we commonly see many to run headlong, and among those some that are otherwise not evil men: heere is fit occasion to warne them what is in this behalfe the due measure of their dutie. First therefore let them remember, that when they enquire upon Predestination, they peare into the secret closets of the wisdom of God: whereinto if any man doe carelesly and boldly breake in, he shall both not attaine wherewith to satisfie his curiosnesse, and he shall enter into a maze whereof he shall finde no way to get out againe. For neither is it meete that man should freely search those things which God hath willed to be hidden in himselfe, and to turne over from very eternity the height of wisdom, which he willed to be honoured and not be conceived, that by it also he might be marvellous untous. Those secrets of his will which he hath determined to be opened unto us, he hath disclosed in his word: and he hath determined, so far as he foresaw to pertaine to us and to be profitable for us.

Ser. in Cant. 78.

2 We are come (saith Augustine) into the way of Faith, let us steadfastly hold it. It bringeth into the Kings chamber, in which all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom are hidden. For, the Lord himselfe Christ did not envy his excellent and most chofendisciples, when he said, I have many things to be said to you, but yee cannot beare them now. We must walke, we must profite, we must encrease, that our hearts may be able to conceive those things which now we cannot conceive. If the last day find us profiting, there we shall learne that which here we could not. If this thought be of force with us, that the word of the Lord is the onely way, that may lead us to search whatsoever is lawfull to be learned of him, that it is the onely light, which may give us light to see whatsoever we ought to see of him: it shall easily hold backe and restraine us from all rashnesse. For we shall know that so soone as we be gone out of the bounds of the world we run out of the way, and in darknesse, in which race we must needs oftentimes straine, slip, and stumble. First therefore let this be before our eyes, that to covet any other knowledge of Predestination than that which is set forth by the word of God, is a point of no lesse madnesse than if a man have a will to goe by an unpassible way, or to see in darknesse: Neither let us be ashamed, to be ignorant of somewhat in it wherein there is some learned ignorance. But rather let us willingly abstaine from the searching of that knowledge, whereof the excessive coveting is both foolish and perilous, yea and deadly. But if the wantonnesse of wit provoke us, it shall be profitable alway to set this against it, whereby it may be beaten backe, that as too much of honie is not good, so the searching of glorie doth not turne unto glorie to the curious. For there is good cause why we should be frayed away from that boldnes, which can do nothing but throw us downe headlong into ruine.

Pro. 25. 27.

The doctrine of predestination
not utterly to be frowned and buried in silence.

3 There be other which when they have a will to remedie this evil, do command all mention of Predestination to be in a manner buried, at the least they teach men to flee from every manner of questioning thereof as from a rocke. Although the moderation of these men be heerein worthily to be praised, that they judge, that mysteries should be tasted of with such sobrietie: yet because they descend too much beneath the meane: they little prevaile with the wit of man, which doth not lightlie suffer it selfe to be restrained. Therefore, that in this behalfe also we may keepe a right end, we must returne to the word of the Lord, in which we have a sure rule of understanding. For the Scripture is the schoole of the holy Ghost, in which as nothing is left out which is both necessarie and profitable to be knowne, so nothing is taught but that which is behoovefull to learne. Whatsoever therefore is uttered in the Scripture concerning predestination, we must beware that we debar not the faithfull from it, least we should seeme either enviously to defraude them of the benefit of their God, or to blame and accuse the holy Ghost, who hath published those things which it is in any wise profitable to be suppressed. Let us (I say) give leave to a christian man, to open his minde and his eares to all the sayings of God which are directed to him; so that it be done with this temperance, that so soone as the Lord hath closed his holie mouth, he may also foreclose to himselfe all the way to enquire further. This shall be the best bond of sobrietie, if not onely in learning wee may follow the Lord going before us, but also when he maketh an end of teaching, we cease to will to learne. Neither is the danger which they feare of so great importance, that wee ought therefore to turne away our mindes from the oracles of God. Notable is the saying of Salomon, that the glorie of God is to conceale a word. But sith both godlinesse and common reason teacheth that this is not generally meane of everie thing, we must seeke a difference, least brutish ignorance should please us under colour of modestie and sobrietie. That difference is in few words plainly set out by Moses, To the Lord our God (saith he) belong his secrets: but to us and to our children he hath disclosed these things. For we see how he commendeth to the people the studie of the doctrine of the law, only by reason of the decree of God, because it pleased God to publish it: and how he withholdeth the people within those bounds, by this onely reason, because it is not lawfull for mortall men to thrust themselves into the secrets of God.

Deut. 29. 26.

Predestination
not therefore to be concealed because prophans men carpe, or barke, or scoffe at it, as they doe also at other parts of christian doctrine which are not for that past.

4 Prophane men (I grant) doe in the matter of Predestination suddenly catch hold of somewhat which they may carpe, or cavill, or barke, or scoffe at. But if their waywardnesse doe fray us a way from it, the chiefe articles of the faith must be kept secret, of which there is almost none which they or such as they be doe leave untouched with blasphemie. A froward wit will no lesse proudly outrage when he heareth that in the essence of God there are three persons, than if he heare that God foresaw what should become of man when he created him. Neither will they abstaine from laughing, when they shall understand that there is little more than five thousand yeares passed since the creation of the world: for they will aske why the power of God was so long idle and asleep. Finally there can be nothing brought forth, which they will not scoffe at. For the restraining of these sacriledges, must we hold our peace of the Godhead of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost? or must we passe over in silence the creation of the world? Yea but the truth of God is both in this behalfe and every where mightier than that it need to feare the evil speaking of the wicked: as Augustine strongly maintaineth in his worke of the good of Perseverance. For we see that the false Apostles could not by defaming and slandering the true doctrine of Paul, make him to be ashamed of it. But whereas they say that this whole disputation is perilous also for godly mindes, because

it maketh against exhortations, because it shaketh faith, because it troubleth the hart it selfe: this is vaine. Augustine sticketh not to confesse that for these causes he was wroth to be blamed, for that he did too freely preach Predestination: but, as he had in readinesse where withall, he largely confuteth them. But we, because many and diuers absurdities are thrust into this place, had rather to reserue every one to be wiped away in place fit for it. Only this I desire generally to obtaine of them, that those things which the Lord hath laid up in secret, we may not search: those things which he hath brought openly abroad, we may not neglect: I like either on the one part we be condemned of vaine curiositie, or on the other part, of unthankfulness. For, this also is very well said of Augustine, that we may safely follow the scripture, which as with a motherly pace goeth stoupingly, lest it should forsake our weaknesse. But who so are so wearie and so fearefull that they would have Predestination to be buried, lest it should trouble weak souls: with what colour, I beseech you, will they cover their arrogancie, when they indirectly accuse God of foolish unadvisednesse, as though he foresaw not the danger, which they thinke themselves to have wisely mixt with? Whosoever therefore travelleth to bring the doctrine of Predestination into mistaking, he openly faith will of God: as though somewhat had unadvisedly slipped from him which is hurtfull to the Church.

5 Predestination whereby God adopreth some into the hope of life, and judgeth some to eternall death, no man that would be accomped godly dare simply denie. But they wrap it up with many cavillations, specially they which make foreknowledge the cause of it. We indeede do say that they be both in God, but we say that the one is wrongfully made subject to the other. When we give foreknowledge to God, we meane that all things alway have bene and perpetually decernaine under his eyes, so that to his knowledge there is nothing to come or past, but all things are present, and so present that he doth not imagine onely by conceived formes (as those things are present to us, whereof our mind holdeth fast the remembrance) but he truly beholdereth and seeth them as if before him. And this foreknowledge extendeth to the whole compassse of the world and to all creatures. Predestination we call the eternall decree of God, whereby he had it determined with himselfe what he willed to become of every man. For all are not created to like estate: but to some eternall life, and to some eternall damnation is fore-appointed. Therefore as every man is created to the one or other end, so we say that he is predestinate either to life or to death. But this Predestination God hath not onely testified in every severall person, but hath shewed in example the eod in the whole issue of Abraham, whereby might plainly appeare that it lyceth in his will what shall be the estate of every nation. When the Highest divided the nations, and severed the children of Adam, his part was the people of Israell, the cord of his inheritance. The separation is before the eyes of all men: in the person of Abraham as in a drielooke one people is peculiarly chosen, all other being refused: but the cause appeareth not, saying that Moses, to cut off all occasion of glorying from posteritie, teacheth that they excellonely by the free love of God. For he assigneth this to be the cause of their deliverance, for that God loved the Fathers, and chooseth their seed after them. More plainly in another Chapter: He was pleased to you to choose you, not because you passed other nations in number, but because he loved you. The same admonition is often repeated with him, Behold, to the Lord thy God belongeth the heaven, the earth, and whatsoever things are in it: and he hath pleased himselfe onely in your Fathers, and hath loved them, and hath chosen you their seed. Again in another place sanctification is commanded them, because they are chosen to be a peculiar people. And againe in another place, Love is affirmed to be the cause of protection. Which also the Faithfull doe declare with one voyce, saying: He hath chosen for us our inheritance, the glory of Jacob, whom he hath loved. For they do all impute to free love all the gifts wherewith they were garnished of God: not onely because they knew that they themselves had obtained them by no deserving, but also that even the holy Patriarch was not endued with such vertue, that he could purchase to himselfe and his posteritie so great a prerogative of honour. And, the more strongly to tread downe all pride, he upbraided them that they have deserved no such thing, forasmuch as they are a stubborn and hard-necked people. And oftentimes the Prophets doe hatefully and as by way of reproch cast the Jewes in the teeth with this election, because they had fowly departed from it. Whatsoever it be, now let them come forth which will binde the election of God either to the worthinesse of men, or to the merits of workes. When they see one nation to be preferred before all other, and when they heare that God was led with no respect to be more favourably bent to a few and unmovable, yea and forward and disobedient men: will they quarrell with him, because his will was to shew such an example of mercie? But they shall neither with their prating voices hinder his worke, nor with throwing stones of taunts into heaven shall hit or hurt his righteousnesse, but rather they fall backe upon their owne heads. Moreover the Israelites are called backe to this principle of the free covenant, when either thanks are to be given to God, or their hopes to be raised up against the time to come. He made us, and not we our selves, (saith the Prophet) his people and the sheepe of his pasture. The negative is not superfluous, which is added to exclude us, that they may know that of all the good things wherewith they excell, God is not only the author, but fetched the cause thereof from himselfe, because there was nothing in them worthy of so great honour. Also he biddeth them to be contented with the meere good pleasure of God, in these words. The seede of Abraham are his servants: the children of Jacob his elect. And after that he hath rehearsed the continuall benefits of God as fruites of the election, at length he concluded, that he dealt so liberally because he remembered his covenant. With which doctrine agreeth the song of the whole Church, Thy right hand and the light of thy countenance gave the land to our Fathers, because thou wast pleased in them. But it is to be noted, that where mention is made of the land, it is a visible signe of the secret serving wherein the adoption is contained. To the same thankfulness David in another place exhorteth the people, saying: Blessed is the nation whose God the Lord is, the people which he hath chosen for an inheritance to himselfe.

Likewit David when his faith is assailed, armeth himselfe to fight, saying: Blessed is he whom thou hast chosen, he shall dwell in thy courts. But for as much as the election hidde in God was stablished as well by the first deliverance as by the second, and other meane benefits: in Esay the word of Electing is transferred to this, God shall have mercie on Jacob, and he shall yet choose out of Israel: because he signifying the time to come, saith that the gathering together of the remnant of the people which be seemed to have forsaken, shall be a signe of the stable and steadfast election, which once seemed to have beene fallen away. When also it is said in another place, I have chosen thee and have not cast thee away: he setteth out the continuall course of the notable liberality of his fatherly good will. And yet more plainly the Angell saith in Zacharie, God shall yet choose Jerusalem: as though in hardly chastising it, he had rejected it: or as though the exile were an interrupting of the election: which yet remaineth inviolable, although the signes thereof doe not alway appeare.

Of election and
both generall & speciall.

Psal. 78. 69.

6 There is to be added a second degree more narrowly restrained, or in which was scene a more speciall grace of God: when of the same kindred of Abraham God refused some, and other some by nourishing them in the church he shewed that he retained among his children. Ismael had at the beginning obtained equall degree with his brother Isaac, because the spirituall covenant had beene no lesse sealed in him by the signe of Circumcision. He is cut off, and then Esau: at the last an innumerable multitude and almost Israel. In Isaac was the seede called: the same calling endured in Jacob. A like example God shewed in rejecting Saul: which thing is also gloriously set forth in the Psalmes. He hath put backe the tribe of Joseph, and the tribe of Ephraim he hath not chosen, but he hath chosen the tribe of Juda. Which the holy historie divers times repeateth, that the wonderfull secret of the grace may the better appeare in this change. Ismael, Esau, and such other, (I graunt) fell from the adoption by their owne fault and guiltinesse: because there was a condition adjoynd, that they should faithfully keep the covenant of God, which they falsely brake. But this was yet a singular benefit of God, that hee vouchsafed to prefer them above the other Gentiles: as it is said in the Psalmes, Psalme, He hath not done to other nations, nor hath opened his iudgements to them. But heere I have not without cause said that there be two degrees to be noted: because now in the choosing of the whole nation God shewed that he is in his owne meere liberalitie bound to no lawes: but he is free, so that equall portion of grace is not to be required at his hand: the unequalitie whereof sheweth that it is truly of free gift. Therefore Malachie amplifieth the unthankfulness of Israel, because they being not onely chosen one of all mankind, but also severed out of a holie house to be a peculiar people, doe unthankfully and wickedly despise God so beneficiall a Father. Was not Esaie the brother of Jacob? (saith he) and yet Jacob I loved, but Esaie I hated. For, God taketh it for confessed, that when either of them was borne of a holie Father, and succeeded out of the covenant, finally a branch of the holie roote: now the children of Jacob were more than commonly bound, which were taken into that dignitie. But when Esaie the first begotten being refused, their Father which was by nature interior was made the heire, he proveth them doubly unthankfull, and complained that they were not holden with that double bond.

7 Although it be already sufficiently evident, that God doth by his secret counsell freely chose whom he will, rejecting other, yet his free election is hitherto but halfe shewed, till we come to all particular persons, to whom God not onely offereth Salvation, but so assigneth it, that the certaintie of the effect thereof is not in suspense or doubtfull. For, these are accounted in that onely seede, whereof Paul maketh mention. For although the adoption was left in the hand of Abraham, yet because many of his posteritie were cut off as rotten members: that the election may be effectuall and truly steadfast, we must needs ascend to the head, in whom the heavenly Father hath bound together his elect one with another, and hath knit them to himselfe with a knot impossible to be loosed. So in the adoption of the kindred of Abraham, shined the liberall favour of God, which he denied to other men: yet in the members of Christ appeareth, a much more excellent strength of grace, because they being grafted into their head doe never fall away from salvation. Therefore Paul doeth slyly reason out of the place of Malachie which I even now alleaged: that where God with making a covenant of eternall life calleth any people to himselfe, there is in part a speciall manner of election, that he doth not chose all effectually with common grace. Whereas it is said, I have loved Jacob, this pertaineth to the whole issue of the Patriarch, which the Prophet there setteth in comparison against the posteritie of Esaie. Yet this wickendeth not but that in the person of one man was set forth to us an example of the election, which cannot slip away, but must come to the marke that it tendeth to. These Paul doth not vainly note to be called remnants: because experience teacheth that of a great multitude many slide and vanish awy, so that oftentimes there remaineth but a small portion. But why the generall election of a people is not alway firme and steadfast, there is a reason offering it selfe in readinesse: because with whom God covenanteth he doth not by and by give to them the spirit of regeneration, by the power whereof they may continue in the covenant to the end: but the outward changing without the inward effectualnesse of grace, which might be of force to hold them in, is a certaine meane thing betwene the forsaking of whole mankind, and the election of a small number of the godly. The whole people of Israel was called the inheritance of God, of whom yet there were many strangers. But because God had not for nothing made covenant with them that he would be their Father and Redeemer, he rather hath respect to his owne free favour than to the unfaithfull falling away of many: by whom also his truth was not abolished: because where he reserved any remnant, it appeared that his calling was without Repentance. For whereas God did from time to time chose unto himselfe a Church rather out of the children of Abraham, than out of the prophane nations, he had regard to his covenant, which being broken of the whole multitude he restrained to a few, that it should not utterly fall away. Finally the common adoption of the seede of Abraham was a certaine visible image of a greater benefite, which God hath vouchsafed to graunt to a few out of many. This is the reason why Paul so diligently putteth difference betwene the children of Abraham according to the flesh, and his spirituall children which were called after the example of

Isaac. Not that it was a vaine and unfruitfull thing simply to be the child of Abraham, (which might not be said without dishonor of the covenant) but because the unchangeable counsell of God, whereby he hath predestinate whom he would, is by it selfe effectually onely to this latter sort unto salvation. But I warne the readers that they bring not a foreconceived judgement on either side, till it appeare by the places of Scripture brought forth what is to be thought. That therefore which the Scripture cleereley sheweth, we say that God by eternall and unchangeable counsell hath once appointed whom in time to come he would take to salvation, and on the other side whom he would condemne to destruction. This course as touching the elect, we say to be grounded upon his free mercie without any respect of the worthinesse of man, but whom he appointeth to damnation, to them by his just indeed and irreprehensible, but also incomprehensible judgement, the entry of life is foreclosed. Now in the elect we set vocation to be the testimonie of election: and then justification to be another signe of the manifest shewing of it, till they come to glory wherein is the fulfilling of it. But as by vocation and election God maketh his elect: so by shutting out the reprobate either from the knowledge of his name or from the sanctification of his spirit, he doth as it were by these marks open what judgement abideth for them. I will heere passe over many fained inventions, which foolish men have forged to overthrow predestination. For they neede no confutation, which so soone as they are brought forth, doe largely bewray their owne falsenesse. I will tary only upon those, which either are in controverfie among the learned, or which may bring any hardnesse to the simple, or which ungodlinesse with faire seeming shew pretendeth, to scosse at the righteounesse of God.

THE XXIj. CHAPTER.

A confirmation of this doctrine by testimonies of the Scripture.

God was not moved with the foresight of mans merits to predestinate, neither is to be judged of for reserving some, and passing by others, whom particularly and freely he hath chosen.

AL these things which we have set are not without controverfie among many, specially the free election of the faithfull: which yet cannot be weakened. For the common sort doe thinke that God, as he foreseeth that every mans deserving shall be, so maketh difference betweene men: that therefore whom he foreknoweth that they shall be not unworthy of his grace, them he adopteth into place of children: and whose natures hee spieeth that they will be bent to wickednesse and ungodnesse, them he appointeth to the damnation of death. So by cloaking it with the veile of foreknowledge they doe not onely darken election, but faine that it hath beginning from elsewhere. And this opinion received of the common sort is not the opinion of the common sort alone: for in all ages it hath had great maintainers. Which I doe plainly confesse, to the intent that no man should trust that it shall much hurt our cause, if their names be objected against us. For, the truth of God herein is more certaine, than that it may be shaken: more cleare, than that it may be darkened with the authority of men. But some other neither exercised in the Scripture, nor worthe of any voice, doe raile at this doctrine with greater maliciousnesse, than that their forward pride ought to be suffered. Because God choosing some after his owne will, leaveth other some, that they picke a quarrell against him. But if the thing it selfe be knowne for true, what shall they prevaile with brawling against God? We teach nothing but that which is approved by experience, that it was alway at libertie for God, to bestow his grace to whom he will. I will not enquire whereby the posteritie of Abraham excelled other, but by that vouchsafing, whereof there is found no cause elsewhere than in God. Let them answer why they be men rather then oxen or asses. When it was in the hand of God to make them dogs, he fashioned them after his owne image. Will they give leave to brute beasts to quarrell with God for their estate, as though the difference were unrighteous? Truly it is no more righteous, that they should enjoy the prerogative which they have obtained by no deservings, than for God diversly to deale abroad his benefits according to the measure of his owne judgement. If they skip over to persons, where the inequality is more hatefull to them, at the left at the example of Christ, they ought to be afraid to prate so bodily of so high a mysterie. He is conceived of the seed of David, a mortall man: by what vertues will they say that he deserved to be in the verie wombe made the head of Angels, the onely begotten sonne of God, the image and glorie of the Father, the light, righteousnesse, and salvation of the world? This thing Augustine wisely noted, that in the verie head of the Church is a most cleere mirror of free election, least it should trouble us in the members: and that he was not by righteously living made the sonne of God, but that hee had to great honour freely given him, that he might afterward make other partakers of his gifts. Heere if any man aske why other were not the same that he was, or why all wee are so tarre distant from him, why all we be corrupt and hee purenesse: such a man shall bewray not onely his madnesse, but therewithall also his shamelesse. But if they goe forward to labour to take from God the free power to chuse and refuse, let them also take away that which is given to Christ. Now it is worth the travaile to consider what the Scripture pronounceth of everie one. Paul verily, when hee teacheth that we were chosen in Christ, taketh away all respect of our owne worthinesse. For it is all one as if hee had said: because in the whole seede of Adam the heavenly father found nothing worthy of his election, hee turned his eyes unto his Christ, to chose as it were members out of his bodie; them, whom he would take into the fellowship of life. Let this reason then be of force among the faithfull, that we were therefore adopted in Christ to the heavenly inheritance, because in our selves we are not able to receive so great excellencie. Which also he touched in another place, when he exhorteth the Colossians to giving of thanks, for this that they were by God made fit to be partakers of the estate of the holie. If election goe before this grace of God that wee be made fit to obtaine the glorie of the life to come: what shall God himselfe now finde in us whereby hee may be moved to elect us? My meaning shall yet be more openly expressed by another saying of his. He hath chosen (saith he) ere the foundations of the world were laid, according to the good pleasure of his will, that we might be holie, and unspotted, and unproveable in his sight: where he setteth the good pleasure of God against all our deservings whatsoever they be.

That the prooffe may be more strong, it is worth the labour to note all the parts of that place, which being coupled together doe leave no doubt. Where he nameth the elect, it is no doubt that he speaketh to the faithfull, as he also by and by afterward affirmeth. Wherefore they doe with too foule a glose abuse that name, which writt it to the age wherein the Gospell was first published. Where he saith that they were elect before the beginning of the world, he taketh away all respect of worthinesse. For what reason of difference is there betwene them which yet were not, and those which afterward should in Adam be equall? Now if they be elect in Christ, it followeth that not onely every man is severed without himselfe, but also one of them from another, forasmuch as we see that not all are the members of Christ. That which is added, that they were elect that they might be holie, plainly confuteth the error which deriveth election from foreknowledge, forasmuch as Paul crieth out against it and saith that whatsoever vertue appeared in men, it is the effect of election. Now if a higher cause be sought, Paul answereth that God hath so predestinate, yea and that according to the good pleasure of his will. In which words hee overthroweth whatsoever meanes of their election men doe imagine in themselves. For he also teacheth that whatsoever things God giveth toward spirituall life, they flow out of this one fountaine, because God hath chosen whom he would, and ere they were borne he had severally laid up for them the grace which he vouchsafed to give them.

But wheresoever this pleasure of God reigneth, there no works come to be considered. He doth not heere indeede pursue the comparison of contraries, but it is to be understood such as he himselfe declareth. He hath called us (saith he) with a holie calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose and the grace which is given of Christ before the times of the world. And wee have already shewed that all doubt is taken away in this which followeth, that we might be holie and unspotted. For if thou say, because hee foresaw that we should be holie, therefore hee chose us, thou shalt pervert the order of Paul. Thus therefore thou maist safely goe on. If hee chose us that we might be holie: then hee chose us, not because he foresaw that we would be such. For these two things are contrarie the one to the other: that the have it of election that they be holie, and that they come to it by meane of workes. Neither is their cavillation heere any thing worth to which they commonly flee, that the Lord doth not render the grace of election to any works going before, but yet granteth it to works to come. For when it is said that the faithfull were chosen, that they might be holie: therewithall is signified that the holinesse which was to come in them tooke beginning at election. And how shall this saying agree together, that those things which are derived from election gave cause to election? The same thing which he said he seemeth after ward to confirme more strongly, where he saith: According to the purpose of his will which hee had purposed in himselfe. For, to say that God purposed in himselfe, is as much in effect as if it had been said, that without himselfe hee considered nothing whereof he had any regard in decreeing. Therefore hee by and by addeth, that the whole summe of our election tendeth to this end, that we should be to the prayse of the grace of God. Truly the grace of God deserveth not to be prayed alone in our election, unlesse our election be free. But free it shall not be, if God in electing his, doe consider what shall be the works of every one. Therefore we find that that which Christ said to his disciples, hath place universally among all the faithfull, Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you. Where he not onely excludeth deservings past, but also signifieth that they had nothing in themselves why they should be chosen, if he had not prevented them with his mercie. Like as this saying of Paul is also to be understood: Who first gave to him, and shall receive recompence? For hee meaneth to shew that the goodnesse of God so preventeth men, that it findeth nothing in them neither past nor to come, whereby he may be wonne to be favourable to them.

out of S. Paul
to the Romanes.
Rom. 9.6.

4 Now to the Rommes, where he fetcheth this question further off, and followeth it more largely, he denieth that all they are Israelites, which are issued of Israel: because although by right of inheritance they were all blessed, yet the succession did not legally passe to them all. The beginning of this disputation proceeded of the pride and deceitfull glorying of the Jewish people. For when they claimed to themselves the name of the Church, they would have the credit of the Gospell to hang upon their will: as the Papists at this day would gladly with this fained colour thrust themselves into the place of God. Paul, although he grant that the offspring of Abraham is holie by reason of the covenant, yet affirmeth that the most part of them are strangers in it: and that not onely because they swarve out of kinde, so that of lawfull children they become bastards, but because the especiall election of God standeth above and reigneth in the highest top, which alone maketh the adoption thereof sure. If their owne godlinesse stablished some in the hope of salvation, and their owne falling away alone disherited other some: Paul verily should both fondly and unconveniendly list up the readers even to the secreet election. Now if the will of God (the cause whereof neither appeareth nor is to be sought, without himselfe) maketh the one sort differing from the other, so that not all the children of Israell be true Israelites, it is vainly fained that every mans estate hath beginning in himselfe. Then he further followeth the matter under the example of Jacob and Esau. For when they both were the sonnes of Abraham, both together enclosed in one mothers wombe, it was a monsterlike change that the honour of first birth was removed to Jacob, by which change Paul affirmeth that there was testified the election of the one, and the reprobation of the other. The originall and cause of it is enquired, which the teachers of foreknowledge will have to be set out in the vertues, and vices of men. For this is an easy short way with them, that God shewed in the person of Jacob, that hee choseth the worthy of his grace: and in the person of Esau, he refuseth them whom he foreseeth to be unworthy. Thus they say boldly. But what saith Paul? when they were not yet borne, and had not done any good or evill, that according to election, the purpose of God might abide, not of works, but of him that calleth, it is said: The elder shall serve the yonger: as it is written, Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated. If foreknowledge were of any force in this difference of the brethren, then verily mention were unblie made of the time. Let us graunt that Jacob was chosen, because he had worthinesse gotten by works to come: to what purpose should Paul say that he was not yet borne: And this now

Rom. 9.11.

should be unadvisedly added, that hee had yet done no good: because this shall be a readie answer, that nothing is hidden from God, and that for the godlinesse of Jacob was present before him. If works doe win grace, they should then worthily have had their price before that Jacob was borne, as if hee had bene growne to full age. But the Apostle goeth forward in undoing this knor, and teacheth that the adoption of Jacob was not made of works, but of the calling of God. In works hee enterlatheth not the time to come or time past: and then hee directly setteth them against the calling of God, meaning by stablishing of the one exprelly to overthrow the other: as if hee had said, that it is to be considered what hath pleased God, not what men have brought of themselves. Last of all it is certaine that by the words of election and Purpose, all causes whatsoever men are wont to faime elsewhere than in the secret counsell of God, are quite removed from this matter.

5 What colour will they bring to darken these things, who in election assigne some place to works either past or to come? For this is utterlie to mocke out that which the Apostle affirmeth, that the difference of the brethren hangeth not upon any consideration of works, but vpon the meere calling of God, because it was put betweene them when they were not yet borne. Neither had hee bene ignorant of this their subtiltie, if it had had any soundnesse in it: but because he very well knew, that God can foresee no goodnesse in man, but that which hee hath first determined by the benefic of his election to give him: hee fleeth not to that unorderlie order, to set good works before the cause of themselves. Thus have we by the words of the Apostle, that the salvation of the faithfull is founded upon the will of the onely election of God: and that the same favour is not gotten by works, but cometh of free calling. We have also as it were an image of that thing set before us. Esau and Jacob are brethren, issuing both of the same parents, enclosed yet both in one wombe, not yet brought out into the world. In them all things are equall, yet of them the judgement of God is divers. For hee taketh the one and forsaketh the other. There was nothing but the onely first birth, by right whereof the one excelled the other. But this also being passed over, that thing is given to the younger which is denied in the elder. Yea, and in other also God seemeth alway as of set purpose to have despised first birth, to cut off from the flesh all matter of glorying, Refusing Ismael, he cast his mind to Isaac. Plucking backe Manasse, he more honoured Ephraim.

6 If any man interrupt me with saying, that we must not by these inferiour and small benefits determine of the summe of the life to come, that he which hath bin advanced to the honour of the first birth, should therefore be reckoned to be adopted into the inheritance of heaven: (for there be some which spare not Paul himselfe, as though in alleaging these testimonies he had wrested the Scripture to a strange sense:) I answer as I have done here before, that the Apostle neither slipped by unadvisednesse, nor wilfully abused the testimonies of the Scripture. But he saw (which they cannot abide to consider) that God minded by an earthly signe to declare the spirituall election of Jacob, which otherwise was hidden in his inaccessible throne. For unless wee referre the first birth granted to him unto the world to come, it should be a vaine and fond forme of blessing whereby hee obtained nothing but manifold miseries, discommodities, griefefull banishment, and many bitternesse of sorrow and cares. Therefore when Paul saw without doubting, that God by outward blessing testified the blessing which hee had in his kingdome prepared spirituall and never decaying for his servant: hee doubted not for proove of this spirituall blessing, to fetch an argument from that outward blessing. This also wee must remember that to the land of Canaan was adjoynd the pledge of the heavenly dwelling: so that it ought not at all to be doubted that Jacob was graced with the Angels into the bodie of Christ, that hee might be partaker of the same life. Jacob therefore is chosen, when Esau is rejected: and by the predestination of God is made different from him, from whom hee differed not in any deservings. If you aske a cause, the Apostle rendreth this, because it is said to Miser, I will have mercie upon whom I will have mercie, and I will vouchsafe to grant mercie to whomsoever I will vouchsafe to grant mercie. And what I beseech you meaneth this? Verily, the Lord himselfe most plainly pronounceth that men have in themselves no cause why he should doe good to them, but he fetcheth the cause from his owne mercy onely: and therefore that the salvation of his, is his owne worke. When God setteth thy salvation in himselfe alone, why wilt thou descend to thy selfe? When he appointeth to thee his mercie alone, why wilt thou run to thine owne deservings? When he holdeth thy thought wholly in his mercifullnesse alone, why wilt thou turne part to the beholding of thine owne works? Therefore we must needs come to that lesser people, which Paul in another place said to have beene foreknowne to God: not in such sort as these men imagine, to foreknow out of an idle watch-toure the things that hee worketh not: but in such sense as it is oft read. For truly when Peter saith in Luke, that Christ was by the determinate counsell and foreknowledge of God appointed to death: hee doth not bring God as a looker on, but the author of our salvation. So the same Peter also, where he saith that the faithfull to whom he wrot were chosen according to the foreknowledge of God, properly expresseth that secret predestination whereby God hath marked for his children whom he would. And the word Purpose, which he joyneth for a divers word, expressing all one thing, for as much as it doth every where signifie a stedfast determination as they commonly call it, undoubtedly teacheth that God when he is author of our salvation goeth not out of himselfe. In which sense hee saith in the same Chapter that Christ was the lambe foreknowne before the creation of the world. For what is more fond or trifling, than to say that God from on high did stand looking whence salvation should come to mankind? Therefore in Paul the foreknowing people is as much as a small portion mingled with the multitude which falsely pretendeth name of God. In another place also Paul to beate downe their boasting which being but covered with a visor, doe take upon themselves the chiefe preheminance among the godly before the world, saith that God knoweth who be his: Finally, by that saying, Paul pointeth unto us two sorts of people: the one, of the whole kindred of Abraham: the other, severally chosen out of it, and which being laid up under the eyes of God, is hidden from the sight of men. And it is no doubt that hee tooketh this out of Moses, which affirmeth that God will be mercifull to whom hee will. (although he there speake of the elect people, whose estate in outward seeming was equal) as if he should have said, that in the common adoption is included with him a speciall grace toward some, as it were a more holy treasure: and that the common covenant withstandeth not but that the same small number may be exempt in degree: and hee willing to make himselfe the free disposer and ruler of this thing, precisely denieth that he will be mercifull to one rather than to another, for any other reason, but for that it so pleaseth him: because when mercy cometh to him that seeketh it, though he indeed suffer not a deniall, yet he either preventeth or partly getteth to himselfe the favour whereof God claimeth to himselfe the praise.

7 Now let the soveraigne Judge and master pronounce of the whole matter. When he saw so great hardnesse in his hearers, that he did in a manner wast his words without fruit among the multitude: to remedy this offence, he crieth out, Whatsoever my Father giveth me, it shall come to me. For this is the will of my Father, that whatsoever my Father hath given me, I shall not loose any thing of it. Note that the beginning is taken at the Fathers gift, that we may be delivered into the faithfull keeping and defence of Christ. Here some man peradventure will turne a circle about, and will take exception, saying that they onely are accounted in the proper possession of the Father, whose yielding hath beene voluntary by faith. But Christ standeth onely upon that point, that although the fallings away of great multitudes doe shake the whole world, yet the counsell of God shall be stedfast and stand faster than the heavens themselves, that his election may never faile. They are said to have beene the elect of the Father, before that he gave to them his onely begotten Sonne. They aske whether it were by nature: yea rather, them which were strangers he made his owne by drawing them to him. There is a greater cleerenesse in the words of Christ than can be shifting be covered with any darknesse. No man (saith he) can come to me, unlesse my Father draw him. But who so hath heard and learned of my Father, he cometh to me. If all generally without difference should bow their knee before Christ, that the election were common: but now in the fewnesse of the beleevers appeareth a manifest diversitie: Therefore

Therefore after that Christ had affirmed that the disciples which were given him, were the peculiar possession of God the Father, within a little after he added, I pray not for the world, but for those whom thou hast given me, because they are thine. Whereby is proved that the whole world belongeth not to the Creator of it, saving that grace delivereth a few from the wrath of God, and from eternall death, which otherwise should have perished: but the world it selfe is left in his owne destruction to which it was appointed. In the meane time although Christ put himselfe meane betweene, yet he claimeth to himselfe the power of choosing in common with the Father. I speake not (saith he) of all: I know whom I have chosen. If any man aske from whence hee hath chosen them, he answereth in another place, Out of the world, which he excludeth out of his prayers when hee commendeth his disciples to his Father. This is to be holden, that when hee affirmeth that he knoweth whom he hath chosen, there is signified some speciall sort in the generall kind of men: then, that the same speciall sort is made to differ not by the qualitie of their owne vertues, but by the heavenly decree. Whereupon followeth that many excell by their owne force or diligence, when Christ maketh himselfe the authour of election. For when in another place he reckoneth Judas among the elect, whereas he was a devill, this is referred only to the office of Apostleship, which although it be a cleere mirror of the favour of God (as Paul so oftentimes acknowledgeth in his owne person,) yet it containeth not in it selfe the hope of eternall salvation. Judas therefore, when hee did unfaithfully beare the office of an Apostle, might be worse than the devill: but of those whom Christ hath once grased into his bodie, hee will suffer none to perish: because in preserving their salvation he will performe that which he hath promised, that is, he will stretch forth the power of God which is greater than all. For whereas hee saith in another place, Father, of those whom thou hast given mee, I have lost none but the sonne of perdition: although it be an abusive speech by figure, yet it hath no doubtfull meaning. The summe is, that God maketh them his children by free adoption whom hee will have to be his children: and that the inward cause thereof is in himselfe: because hee is content with his owne secret good pleasure.

8 But Ambrose, Origene, and Hierome thought that God distributeth his grace among men, as he foreseeth that every man will use it well: Yea and Augustine was once in the same opinion. But when he had better profited in knowledge of the Scripture, hee not onely revoked it as evidently false, but also strongly confuted it: yea and after his revoking of it, in reproving the Pelagians for that they continued in the same error, saith: who cannot marvell that the Apostle knew not this most subtile sense? For when he had set out a thing to be wondred at of these brethren, while they were not yet borne, and afterward objected a question against himselfe, saying: what then? Is there unjustice with God? Heere was fit place for him to answer, that God foresew the merits of them both: yet he saith not this, but flieth to the judgements and mercy of God. And in another place, when hee had taken away all merits before election, Heere (saith hee) is confuted their vaine reasoning which defend the foreknowledge of God against the grace of God, and therefore say that we are chosen before the making of the world, because God foreknew that we would be good, not that hee himselfe would make us good. He saith not this, which saith: Yee have not chosen me, but I have chosen you. For if he had therefore chosen us, because hee foreknew that we would be good: he should therewithall also have foreknowne that we would chose him: and so forth as followeth to that effect. Let the testimonie of Augustine be of force among them that willingly rest in the authoritie of the Fathers. Howbeit Augustine suffreth not himselfe to be severed from the rest: but by cleere testimonies sheweth that this disagreement is false with the malice wherof the Pelagians burdened him. For in the xix. Chapter of his booke of the predestination of Saints, hee allegeth out of Ambrose, Christ calleth whom hee hath mercy on. Againe, if he had willed, of the undevout hee might have made devout. But God calleth whom hee vouchsafeth, and whom hee will he maketh religious. If I listed to knit together a whole volume out of Augustine, I could readily shew to the readers that I neede no other words but his: But I will not load them with tediousnesse. But go to, let us imagine that they speake not at all : but let us give heed to the matter it selfe. A hard question was moved, whether God did righteously in this that hee vouchsafed to grant his grace but to some : Of which question Paul might have uncombed himselfe with one word if hee had alleaged the respect of works. Why therefore doth hee it not, but rather continueth on a discourse which abideth in the same hardnesse? Why, but because hee ought not? For the Holy Ghost which spake by his mouth, had not the dislike of forgetfulnesse. Therefore without any circumstances hee answereth, that God therefore favoureth his elect, because hee will : therefore hath mercy, because he will. For this Oracle of God, I will have mercie upon whom I will have mercie, and I will shew mercie to whom I will shew mercie, is as much in effect as if it had bene said, that God is moved to mercy by no other reason, but because hee will have mercie. Therefore this saying of Augustine remaineth true, that the grace of God doth not find men fit to be chosen, but maketh them.

9 Neither doe we any thing passe upon the subtiltie of Thomas, that the foreknowing of deservings, is not indeede the cause of Predestination on the behalfe of the act of him that doth predestinate, but on our behalfe it may after a certaine manner be so called, that is, according to the particular weighing of Predestination : as when it is said that God predestineth glorie to man by deservings, because hee hath decreed to give to him grace by which he may deserve glorie. For sith the Lord will in election have us to looke unto nothing but his meere goodnesse, if any man shall cover here to see any more, it shall be a wrongfull greedinesse. If we lusted to strive in subtiltie, we want not wherewith to beate backe this silly subtiltie of Thomas. Hee affirmeth that to the elect, glorie is after a certaine manner predestinate by deservings, because the Lord doth after a certaine manner predestinate to them the grace, by which they may deserve glorie. What if I answer on the contrarie side and say that predestination unto grace, serveth election unto life, and is as it were a waiting made after it? that grace is predestinate to them, to whom the possession of glorie hath bene long agoe appointed : because it pleaseth the Lord to bring his children from election into justification? For thereupon it shall follow that the predestination of glorie was rather the cause of the predestination of grace, than contrariwise. But away with these strivings as things superfluous for such as shall thinke that there is wisdom enough for them in the word of God. For this was in old time truly written of an Ecclesiasticall writer, that they which assigne the election of God to merits are more wise than they ought to be.

10 Some doe object that God should be contrarie to himselfe if he should universally call all men to him, and receive but a few elect. So by their opinion the universallnesse of the promise taketh away the difference of speciall grace. And thus certaine sober men speake, not so much to oppresse the truth, as to debarre crabbed questions, and to bridle the curiositie of many. Their will is praise-worthie, but their counsell is not to be allowed : because dallying by shifts is never excusable. But their objecting of it which doe more railinglie inveigh against it, is verily too fond a cavillation, or too shamefull an error. How the Scripture maketh these two to agree together, that by outward preaching all men are called to repentance and faith, and yet not to all men is given the Spirit of repentance and faith, I have in another place already declared, and by and by somewhat of it must be repeated againe. Now that which they require I denie to them, sith it is two waies false. For, he that threatneth that while it raineth upon one citie, there shall be drought upon another : Hee that pronounceth that there shall in another place be famine of doctrine, bindeth not himselfe with a certaine law to callall men legallie. And he which forbidding Paul to speake in Asi, and turning him from Bithinia, draweth him into Macedonia, sheweth, that it is in his owne power to distribute this treasure to whomsoever it shall please him. Yet more plainly he sheweth by Ej, how hee peculiarly directeth to the elect the promises of salvation : for hee saith of them onely, and not of all mankind indifferently, that they shall be his Disciples. Whereby it is certaine that the doctrine of salvation is wrongfully set open in common to all men to profit effectually, which is said to be severally laid up onely for the children of the Church. Let this suffice at this present, that that altho' igh the voice of the Gospel spake generally to all, yet the gift of faith is rare. Esay asseureth the cause, for that the arme of the Lord is not open to all men. If he had said that the Gospell is maliciously and forwardly despised, because many doe stubbornly refuse to heare: peradventure this colour touching uniuersall calling should preuaile. Neither is it the purpose of the Prophet to diminish the fault of men, when he teacheth that the fountaine of blindness is, that God vouchsafeth not to open his arme to them: onely he giveth warning, that because faith is a singular gift, the eares are beaten in vaine with outward doctrine. But I would faine know of these doctors, whether onely preaching, or faith, make the children of God. Certainly when it is said in the first Chapter of John, Who soeuer beleue in the onely begotten Sonne of God, are themselves also made the children of God, there is not in that place a confused heape jumbled up together: but a speciall order is given to the faithfull, which are borne of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. But (say they) there is a mutuall consent of faith with the word, namely, wheresoever is faith. But it is no new thing that seed fall among thornes or in stony places: not onely because the greater part appeareth indeed obstinate against God, but also because not all men have eies and eares. How then shall it agree that God calleth to him them whom hee knoweth will not come? Let Augustine answer for mee. Wilt thou d' spee with mee? Marvell with mee, and crye out, O depth, Let us both agree in feare, lest wee perish in errour. Moreover if election (as Paul witnesseth) be the mother of faith, I turne backe the argument upon their owne head, that faith is therefore not generall, because election is speciall. For by the orderly hanging together of causes and effects, it is easily gathered, that where Paul saith, that we are full of all spirituall blessing, as God had chosen us before the creation of the world: therefore these riches are not common to all, because God hath chosen onely whom he would. This is the reason why in another place he commended the faith of the elect, lest it should be thought that any man doth by his owne motion get faith to himselfe: but that this glory may remaine with God, that they are freely enlightened of him, whom he had chosen before. For Bernard saith rightly, Friends doe severally heare, to whom he also saith, Feare not thou small flocke: for to you it is given to know the mysterie of the kingdome of heaven. Who be these? even they whom he hath foreknowne and predestinate to be fashioned like to the image of his Sonne. A great and secreet counsell is made knowne. The Lord knew who be his: but that which was knowne to God is made manifest to men: neither doth he vouchsafe to make any other partakers of so great a mysterie, but those selfe same men whom he hath foreknowne and predestinate to be his. A little after hee concludeth: The mercy of God is from eternity even to eternity upon them that feare him: from eternity, by reason of predestination: to eternitie, by reason of blessed making: the one without beginning, the other without ending. But what neede I to cite Bernard for witness, when we heare of the masters owne mouth, that none doe see but they which are of God? By which words he signifieth, that all they which are not begotten againe of God, doe dazell at the brightnesse of his countenance. And to election faith indeed is fitly joynd, so that it keepe the second degree. Which order the words of Christ doe cleerely expresse in another place, This is the will of my Father, that I lose not that which he hath given. For this is his will, that whosoever beleue in the Sonne, shall not perish. If he would have all saved, he would appoint over them his Sonne to be their keeper, and would graffe them all into his body with the holy bond of faith. Now it is certaine that faith is a singular pledge of his fatherly love, laid up for his children whom he hath adopted. Therefore Christ in another place saith, that the sheepe follow the shepheard, because they know his voice: but they follow not a stranger, because they know not the voice of strangers. Whence cometh this difference, but because their eares are boated by God? For no man maketh himselfe a sheepe: but hee is made one by the heavenly grace. For which cause also the Lord teacheth that our safetie shall alway bee certaint and free from danger, because it is kept by the invincible power of God. Wherefore hee concludeth that the unbelievers are not of his sheepe: namely because they are not of the number of them, whom God hath promised by Esay that they shall be his disciples. Now because in the testimonies which I have alleged is expressed perseverance, they doe therewithall testify the unmovable stedfastnesse of election.

¶ I I Now let us speake of the reprobate, whom the Apostle joyneth there together. For as Jacob, having yet with good works deserved nothing, is taken into grace: so Esan, being yet defiled with no wicked doing, is hated. If we turne our eyes to works, we doe wrong to the Apostle, as though he sawe not the same thing which we cleerely see. It is proved that he sawe it not, forasmuch as hee expressly enforceth this point, that when they had not yet done any good or evil, the one was chosen, and the other refused, to prove that the foundation of the predestination of God is not in works. Againe when hee moved the objection, whether God be unrighteous, he alleageth not that which had been the most certaine and plaine defence of his righteousness, namely, that God reduced to Esan according to his evillnesse: but he was content with another solution, that the reprobate are stured up to this end, that the glorie of God may be set forth by them. Last of all he adjoyneth a concluding sentence, that God hath mercie upon whom he will, and hardeneth whom he will. See you not how hee imputeth both to the onely will of God? Therefore if wee cannot declare a reason why hee vouchsafeth to grant mercie to them that be his, but because it so pleaseth him: neither also shall we have any other cause in rejecting of other, than his owne will. For when it is said that God hardeneth, or sheweth mercie to whom he will, men are thereby warned to seeke no cause else where than in his wil.

THE XXIIJ. CHAPTER.

A confutation of the standers wherewith this doctrine hath alway beeene wrongfully bin denied.

BUt when the wit of man heareth these things, the frowardnesse thereof cannot be restrained, but that by and by as at the bloudie blast of a trumpet sounding to battell, it diversly & excessively turmoileth. And many indeed, as though they would drive away the malice from God, doe so grant election, that they denie that any man is reprobate: but they doe too ignorantly and childishly: for as much as election it selfe could not stand unless it were set contrarie to reprobation: God is said to sever them whom he adopreth unto salvation: it should be more than foolishly said that other doe either by chance or by their owne endeavour obaine that which onely election giveth to a fewe. Therefore whom God passeth over, hee rejecteth: and for none other cause, but for that he will exclude them from the inheritance which he doth predestinate to his children. Neither is the waywardnesse of men tolerable, if it suffer not it selfe to be bridled with the word of God, where the incomprehensible counsell of God is intreated of, which the Angels themselves doe worship. But we have already heard, that hardening is no lesse in the hand and will of God than mercie. Neither doth Paul (as these men doe that I have spoken of) busily labour to excuse God with a lying defence: but onely he teacheth that it is not lawfull for the thing formed to quarrell with him that formed it. Now who so doe not admit that any are rejected of God, how will they uncomber themselves from that saying of Christ: Every tree which my father hath not planted, shall be plucked up by the roote? They plainly heare that all they are adjudged and avowed to destruction, whom the heavenly Father hath not vouchsafed to plant as holie trees in his ground. If they denie this to be a signe of reprobation, then is there nothing so cleere that it may be proved to them. But if they cease not to wrangle, let the sobriety of faith be contented with this admonition of Paul, that there is no cause to quarrell with God, if he willing on the one side to shew his wrath and to make his power knowne, doe with dum sufferance and lenitie beare with the vessels of wrath prepared to destruction: and on the other side he make knowne the riches of his glorie toward the vessels of mercie which he hath prepared to glorie. Let the Readers marke, how Paul to cut off occasion from whisperings and backbitings, giveth the chiefe rule to the wrath and power of God: because it is unjust that those deepe judgements which swallow up all our senses, should be made subject to our determination. Our adversaries answer is very crilling, that God doth not utterly reject them whom he suffereth in lenitie, but abideth with a minde hanging in suspence toward them, if peradventure they may repent. As though Paul giveth to God a patience, to looke for their turning, whom he saith to be made to destruction. For Augustine saith rightly where he expoundeth this place, where power is joynted to sufferance, God doth not suffer, but governe with his power. They further say also that it is not for nothing sauld, that the vessels of wrath are prepared to destruction: but, that God hath prepared the vessels of mercie: because by this meane he ascribeth and challengeth the praise of salvation to God, but the blame of destruction to be casteth upon them which by their owne will doe bring it upon themselves. But although I graunt to them that Paul by the divers manner of speaking did soften the roughnesse of the first part of the sentence, yet is it not meete to assigne the preparing unto destruction to any other thing than to the secret counsell of God: which also is affirmed a litle before in the rest of the text. That God stirred up Pharao: Then that he hardneth whom he will. Whereupon followeth that the hidden counsell of God is the cause of hardening. This at the least I get which Augustine saith, that when God of wolves maketh sheepe, he doth with a mightier grace reforme them, that their hardnesse may be tamed: and therefore God for this cause doth not convert the obstinate, because he doth not shew forth in them the mightier grace, which he wanteth no. if he would shew it forth.

2 These sayings indeede should be sufficient for the godly and sober, and them which remember themselves to be men. But for as much as these venemous dogs doe cast up not onely on: sort of venom against God, we will as the matter shall serve answer to everie one particularly. Foolish men doe divers waies quarrell with God, as though they had him subject to their accusations. First therefore they aske, by what right the Lord is angry with his creatures, of whom he hath not beene first provoked by any offence: first to condemne to destruction whom he will, agreeeth rather with the wilfulness of a tyrant, than the lawfull sentence of a Judge. Therefore they say that there is cause why men should charge God, if by his bare will, without their owne deserving, they be predestinate to eternall death. If such thoughts doe at any time come into the minde of the godly, to breake their violent assaults which they shall be sufficiently armed with this, although they had no more, if they consider how great wickednesse it is: even so much as to inquire of the causes of the will of God: first of all things that are, it is the cause, and worthily so ought to be. For if it have any cause, then some what must goe before it, whereto it must be as it were bound: which it is unlawfull one to imagine. For, the will of God is the highest rule of righteousnesse, that what ever he willeth, even for this that he willeth it, it ought to be taken for righteous. When therefore it is asked, why the Lord did it: it is to be answered, because he willed it. But if thou go further in asking why he willed it, thou askest some greater and higher thing than the will of God: which cannot be found. Let therefore the rashnesse of man rest in it selfe, and not seeke that which is not, least peradventure it may not finde that which is. With this bridle (I say) he shall be well withholden whosoever hee be that will dispute of the secrets of God without reverence. As for the boldnesse of the wicked, which dread not openly to speake evill of God: against it the Lord with his owne righteousnesse, without any our defence shall sufficiently defend himselfe, when he shall take all shaming from their consciences, and hold them fast convicted, and condemn them. Neither doe we yet thrust in the fained device of absolute power, which as it is prophane, so worthily ought to be abhorred of us. We faine not God lawlesse, who is a law to himselfe: because (as Plato saith) men stand in neede of lawes, who are troubled with unlawfull lusts: but the will of God is not onely pure from all fault, but also is the highest rule of perfection, yea and the law of all lawes. But we denie that he is subject to yeld account. We denie also that we are meete judges, which would pronounce of this cause after our own sense. Wherefore if we attempt further than we lawfully may, let that threatning of the Psalme bring us in feare, that God shall overcome so oft as he is judged of any mortall man.

3 So can God in keeping silence, put his enemies to silence. But, that we may not suffer them freely to scorne his holic name, he delivereth to us out of his word wea-pons against them. Wherefore if any man assaile us with such words: why God hath from the beginning predestinate some to death, which when they were not, could not yet deserve the judgement of death: wee in stead of answer may againe on our side aske of them, what they thinke that God oweth to man, if he will judge him by his owne nature. In such sort as we be all corrupted with sin, we cannot but be haerfull to God: and that not by tyrannous crueltie, but by most upright reason of justice. If all they whom the Lord doth predestinate to death, are by the estate of nature subject to the judgement of death: of what injustice against themselves, I beseech you, may they complain? Let all the sonnes of Adam come: Let them strive and dispute with their creator, for that by his eternall providence they were before their generation condemned to everlasting miserie. What shall they be able once to mutter against this defence, when God on the other side shall call them to reknowledging of themselves? If they be all taken out of a corrupt masse, it is no marvell if they be subject to damnation. Let them not therefore accuse God of injustice, if by his eternall judgement they be appointed to death, to which they themselves doe feele whether they will or no, that they are willingly led of their owne nature. Whereby appeareth how wrongfull is the desire of their murmuring, because they doe of set purpose hide the cause of damnation which they are compelled to acknowledge in themselves, that the laying of the blame up on God may acquite them. But though I doe a hundred times confesse, as it is most true that God is the author of it, yet doe they not by and by wipe away the guiltinesse which, being engraven in their consciences from time to time with oft recourse, presenteth it selfe to their eyes.

4. Againe they except and say: were they not before predestinate by the ordinance of God to the same corruption which is now alleadged for the cause of damnation? When therefore they perish in their corruption, they doe nothing but suffer the punishment of that miserie into which by his predestination Adam fell and drew his posteritie headlong with him. Is not he therefore unjust, which doth so cruelly mocke his creatures? I grant indeede that all the children of Adam fell by the will of God into that miserie of state wherein they be now bound: and this is it that I said at the beginning, that at length we must alway returne to the determination of the will of God, the cause whereof is hidden in himselfe. But it followeth not by and by that God is subject to this slander. For wee will with Paul answer them in this manner, O man, what art thou that contendest with God? doth the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou formed me so? Hath not the potter power to make of the same lump one vessell to honour, and another to dishonour? They will say that the righteousnesse of God is not so truly defended, but that we may seeke a shift, such as they are wont to have that want a just excuse. For what else seemeth here to be said, than that God hath a power which cannot be hindered from doing any thing whatsoever it be as he will himselfe? But it is far otherwise. For, what stronger reason can be brought than when we are commanded to thinke what a one God is? For how should he commit any injustice, which is judge of the world? If it properly pertaine to the nature of God to doe judgement, then he naturally loveth righteousnesse, and abhorreth unrighteousnesse. Wherefore the Apostle did not, as though he were overtaken, looke about for holes to hide him: but shewed that the reason of the righteousnesse of God is higher than that either it is to be measured by the measure of man, or may be comprehended by the slender capacitie of the wit of man. The Apostle indeed confesseth that there is such depth in the judgements of God, wherewith the mindes of men should be swallowed, if they endeavoured to pearse into it. But he teacheth also how hainous wrong it is, to binde the workes of God to such a law, that so soone as we understand not the reason of them, we may be bold to disallow them. It is a knowne saying of Salomon (which yet few doe rightly understand) The great creator of all rendereth reward to the foole, and reward to transgressors. For he crieth out concerning the greatnesse of God: in whose will it is to punish fooles and transgressors, although he doe not vouchsafe to let them have his spirit. And monstrous is the madnesse of men, when they so covet to make that which is unmeasurable, subject to the small measure of their reason. The Angels which stood still in their uprightnesse, Paul calleth elest. If their stedfastnesse was grounded upon the good pleasure of God, the falling away of the other proveth that they were forsaken: Of which thing there can no other cause be alleged than reprobation, which is hid in the secret counsell of God.

5 Goe to: let there now be present some Manichee, or Celestine, a slanderer of the providence of God: I say with Paul that there ought no reason to be rendered hereof: because with the greatnesse of it, it farre surmounteth our understanding. What marvelle? or what absurditie is it? Would hee have the power of God so limited, that it might be able to worke no more, than his minde is able to conceive? I say with Augustine; that they are created of the Lord, whom he without doubting foreknew that they should goe into destruction: and that it was so done because he so willed: but why hee willed, it is not our part to aske a reason of it, who cannot comprehend it: neither is it meet that the will of God should come downe into controversie among us, of which so oft as mention is made, under the name of it is named the highest rule of righteousnes. Why therefore is any question moved of unrighteousnesse where righteousnesse clearly appeareth? Neither let us be ashamed, after the example of Paul, so to stop the moulles of the wicked, and from time to time so oft as they shall be bold to barke against it, to repeat this, Who be yee miserable men, that lay in accusation to Gods charge and doe therefore lay it to his charge, because hee doth not temper the greatnesse of his works to your dulnesse? As though they were therefore wrongfull, because they are hidden from flesh. The unmeasurablenesse of the judgements of God is by cleere experiences knowne unto you. Yee know that they are called the deepe bottomlesse depth. Now aske of the narrow capacities of your wit, whether they comprehend that which God hath decreed with himselfe. What good doth it you therefore with mad searching to plunge your selves into the bottomlesse depth, which reason it selfe teacheth you that it shall be to your destruction? Why are yee not at the least restrained with some feare, of the which both that history of Job and the bookes of the Prophet doe report of the incomprehensible wisdom, and terrible power of God? If thy minde be unquieted, let it not grieve thee to embrace the counsell of Augustine. Thou being a man lookelt for an answer at my hand: and I also am a man. Therefore let us both heere him that saith: O man, what art thou? Better is a faithfull ignorance than rash knowledg. Seeke merits: thou shalt finde nothing but paine. O depth, Peter denieth: The Thiefe beleeveth. O depth: Seekst thou a reason? I will tremble at the depth. Reason thou, I will wonder, dispute thou, I will believe: I see depth, but I reach not the bottom. Paul tested, because he found wondering. He calleth the judgements of God unsearchable: and art thou come to search them? Hee saith that his waies are impossible to be traced out: and dost thou trace them? with proceeding further we shall nothing profit: For neither we shall satisfie their wayward wanton curiosities, neither doth the Lord need any other defence, than which hee hath used by his spirit, which spake by the mouth of Paul: and we forget to speake well, when we cease to speake with God.

6 Their other objection also ariseth out of ungodlinesse, which yet tendeth not so directly to the accusing of God as to the excusing of the sinner. Howbeit the sinner which is condemned of God cannot be justified without dishonour of the judge. Thus therefore prophane tongues doe barke against God, saying: why should God impute those things for sinne to men, whereof he hath by his predestination laid necessitie upon men? For, what should they doe? Should they wrastle with his decrees? But so should they doe it in vaine, sith they cannot doe it at all. Therefore they are not rightfully punished for those things, whereof the chiefe cause is in Gods predestination. Heere I will abstaine from that defence, whereunto the Ecclesiasticall writers doe commonly see, namely that the foreknowledge of God withstandeth not but that man may be accounted the sinner: because God foreseeeth the evils of man, not his owne. For so the cavillation would not stay here, but will rather presse us further with saying that God might if he had would, have provided remedie for those evils which he foresaw: and that sith he hath not so done, hee hath of determined purpose created men to that end that hee should so behave himselfe in earth: and if by the providence of God, man was created to this condition, that hee should doe all those things that he doth: then he is not to be blamed for that which hee cannot avoide, and which he enterprised by the will of God. Therefore let us see how this knot ought to be well loosed. First of all this ought to be holden certaine among all men which Salomon saith, that God hath created all things, for himselfe, and the wicked man to an evil day. Behold, when the disposing of all things is in the hand of God, when in his power remaineth the rule of safetie and death: hee so ordereth them by his counsell and becke, that among men there are borne some adjudged even from their mothers wombe to death, which with their destruction may glorifie his name. If any man answer, that there is no necessitie laid upon them by the providence of God, but rather that hee created them in such estate, because he foresaw their perversness: to come: he neither saith nothing at all, nor altogether. The old writers are wont indeed sometimes to use this solution: but as it were doubtfully. But the Schoolemen rest upon it, as though nothing could be objected against it. Indeed I will willingly grant, that foreknowledge alone bringeth no necessitie to creatures, although all men doe not so agree: for there be some that will have it also to be the cause of things. But it seemeth to me that Villa, a man otherwise not much praised in holy writings, saw both more deeply and more wisely, which shewed that this contention is superfluous: because both life and death are rather the doings of Gods will than of his foreknowledge. If God did but foresee the successes of men, and did not also dispose and order them by his will, then this question should not without cause be moved, whether his foreseeing any thing availed to the necessitie of them. But sith he doth none other wise foresee the things that shall come to passe, than because he hath decreed that they should so come to passe: it is vaine to move controvercie about foreknowledge, where it is certaine that all things doe happen rather by ordinance and commandement.

God did not only foresee, but dispose the fall of man, and in him the ruine of his posteritie.

7 They say that this is not written in expresse words, that it was decreed of God, that Adam should perish by his falling away. As though the same God, whom the Scripture reporteth to doe whatsoever hee will, created the noblest of all his creatures to an uncertaine end. They say hee had freewill, that hee might shape to himselfe his owne fortune: and that God decreed nothing, but to handle him according to his deservings. If so cold a devise be received, where shall bee that almightinesse of God, whereby hee governeth all things according to his secret counsell, which hangeth upon none other thing than it selfe? But Predestination, whether they will or no, sheweth himselfe in Adams posteritie. For it came not to passe naturally that all men should loose salvation by the fault of one Parent. What hindreth them to confesse of one man, that which against their wills they confesse of all mankind? For why should they loose their labour with dallying shifts? The Scripture crieth out that all men were in the person of one man made bound to eternall death. Sith this cannot be imputed to nature, it is plaine that it proceeded from the wondrous counsell of God. But it is too much absurditie that these good Patrones of the righteoufnesse of God doe so stumble at a straw, and leape over great beames. Againe I aske: how came it to passe, that the fall of Adam did wrap up in eternall death so many nations with their children being infants without remedie, but because it so pleased God? Here their tongues which are otherwise so prating, must of necessitie be dumbe. It is a terrible decree, I grant: yet no man shall be able to denie, but that God foreknew what end man should have, ere hee created him, and therefore foreknew it because hee had so ordained by his decree. If any man here inveigh against the foreknowledge of God, hee rashly and indiscreetly stumbleth. For, what matter is there, I beseech you, why the heavenly judge should be accused for that hee was not ignorant of that which was to come? Therefore if there be any either just or colourable complaint, it toucheth predestination. Neither ought it to seeme an absurditie which I say, that God foresaw not onely the fall of the first man, and in him the ruine of his posteritie, but also disposed it after his owne will. For as it belongeth to his wisdom, to foreknow all things that shall be: so it belongeth to his power, to rule and governe all things with his hand. And this question Augustine very well discusseth, as he doth other, saying: We most wholesomely confesse that which we most rightly beleeve, that the God and Lord of all things things, which created all things very good, and foreknew that evill things should spring out of good, and knew that it more pertained to his almighty goodnesse even of evill things to do well, than not to suffer them to be evill: that he so ordered the life of Angels and men, that in it he might first shew what free will could doe, and then what the benefit of his grace and judgement of justice could doe.

8 Here they run to the distinction of will and permission, by which they will have it granted that the wicked doe perish, God onely permitting but not willing it. But why should we say that he permitted it, but because he so willeth? Howbeit it is not likely that man by himselfe, by the onely permission of God, without any his ordinance, brought destruction to himselfe: as though God appointed not, of what condition hee would have the chiefe of his creatures to be. I therefore will not doubt to confesse simply with Augustine, that the will of God is a necessitie of things, and that what he willeth, it must of necessitie come to passe: as those things shall truly come to passe which hee hath foreseene. Now if for excuse of themselves and of the ungodlie, either the Pelagians, or Manichæes, or Anabaptists, or Epicurians (for with these fower sects wee have to doe in this question) shall object against us necessitie where-with they be bound by the predestination of God: they bring nothing fit to the purpose. For if predestination be nothing else but a despenation of righteousnesse of God, which is hidden indeed, but yet without fault: Forasmuch as it is certaine that they were not unworthy to be predestinate to that estate, it is also as certaine that the destruction is most righteous which they enter into by predestination. Moreover their destruction so hangeth upon the predestination of God, that both cause and matter thereof is found in themselves. For the first man fell, because the Lord so judged it to be expedient: why he so judged, is unknowne to us: yet it is certaine that he so judged for no other reason but because he saw that thereby the glory of his name should be worthily set forth. When thou hearest mention of the glory of God, there thinke of his righteousnesse: for it must be righteous that deserveth praise. Man therefore falleth, the providence of God so ordaining it: but he filleth by his owne fault. The Lord had a little before pronounced, that all the things which hee had made were very good. Whence therefore cometh that perversnesse to man, to fall away from his God? Least it should be thought to bee of creation, the Lord with his commendation allowed that which came from himselfe. Therefore by his owne evillnesse he corrupted the nature which he had received pure of the Lord, and by his fall he drew his whole posteritie with him into destruction. Wherefore let us rather behold an evident cause of damnation in the corrupted nature of mankinde, which is neerer to us, than search for a hidden and utterly incomprehensible cause thereof in the predestination of GOD. Neither let it grieve us so far to submit our wit to the unmeasurable wisdom of God, that it may yeeld in many secrets of his. For, of those things which it is neither granted nor lawfull to know, the ignorance is well learned: the coveting of knowledge is a kinde of madnesse.

9 Some man perhaps will say, that I have not yet brought enough to subdue that wicked excuse. But I verily confesse that it can never be brought to passe, but that ungodlinesse will alway grudge and murmure against it: yet I thinke that I have spoken so much as might suffice to take away not onely all reason but also all colour of gaine-saying. The reprobate would be thought excusable in sinning, because they cannot escape the necessitie of sinning: specially sith such necessitie is cast upon them by the ordinance of God. But we denie that they are thereby well excused, because the ordinance of God, by which they complaine that they are destinate to destruction, hath his righteousnesse, unknowne indeed to us, but yet most certaine. Whereupon wee conclude, that they beare no evill which is not laid upon them by the most righteous judgement of God. Then, wee teach that they doe overthwartly, which to seeke out the beginning of their damnation, doe beare their eyes to the secret closets of the counsell of God, and winke at the corruption of nature, from whence their damnation springeth. And this withstandeth that they cannot impute it to God, for that he willeth of his owne creation. For although man is create by the eternall providence of God to that calamitie, whereunto he is subject: yet the matter thereof hee rooke of himselfe, not of God, forasmuch as hee is by no other meane so lost, but because hee went out of kinde from the pure creation of God into a corrupt and unpure perversnesse.

10 Now the adversaries of Gods Predestination doe slander it also with a third absurditie. For when wee impute it to nothing else but to the choise of the will of God, that they are made free from the universall destruction, whom he maketh heires of his kingdome, thereby they gather that there is with him accepting of persons, which the Scripture every where denieth: and therefore, that either the Scripture disagreeeth with it selfe, or that in the election of God there is respect of deserving. First, the Scripture in another sense denieth, that God is an accepter of persons, than as they judge it. For by the name of person, it signifieth not a man, but those things which being seene with eies in man are wont to procure either favour, grace, and dignitie, or hatred, contempt, and shame: as riches, wealth, power, nobility, office, countrey, excellency of beauty, and such other: on the other side, poverty, need, basenesse, vilenesse, contempt and such other. So Peter and Paul doe teach that the Lord is not an accepter of persons, because he putteth not difference betweene the Jew and the Grecian; to refuse the one and embrace the other for onely respect of nation. So James useth the same words when hee mindeth to affirme, that God in his judgement nothing regardeth riches. But Paul in another place speaketh thus of God, that in judging he hath no consideration of freedom or bondage. Wherefore there shall be no contrariety if we shall say that God, according to the will of his good pleasure without any deserving, choseth to his Sonnes whom he will, rejecting and refusing other. But the matter may thus be opened, that men may be more fully satisfied. They aske how it commeth to passe, that of two betweene whom no deserving putteth any difference, God in his electing passeth over the one and taketh the other. I on the other side doe aske them, whether they thinke that in him that is taken, there is any thing that may make the minde of God to incline toward him. If they confesse (as they needs must) that there is nothing, it shall follow that God looketh not upon man, but from his owne goodnesse fetcheth a cause why to doe good to him. Whereas therefore God choseth one man, refusing another, this commeth not of respect of man, but of his mercy alone, which ought to have liberty to shew forth and utter it selfe where and when it pleaseth him. For we have in another place also shewed, that there were not from the beginning many called noble, or wise, or honourable, that God might humble the pride of flesh: so far is it off, that his favour was bound to persons.

11 Wherefore many doe falsely and wickedly accuse God of partiall unrighteousnesse, for that hee doth not in his Predestination keepe one selfe-course toward all men. If (saith they) hee finde all guilty, let him equally punish all: if he finde them unguilty, let him withhold the rigour of his judgement from all. But so they deale with him, as if either mercy were forbidden him, or when we would have mercy, he be compelled altogether to give over his judgement. What is it that they require? if all be guilty, that all may together suffer all one paine. We grant the guiltinesse to be common, but we say that the mercy of God helpeth some. Let it helpe all, say they. But we answer, that it is rightfull that he should also in punishing shew himselfe a rightfull judge. When they suffer not this: what doe they else but either goe about to spoile God of his power to have mercy, or at least to grant it him upon this condition, that he utterly give over his judgement. Wherefore these sayings of Augustine doe very well agree together. Sith in the first man the whole masse of mankinde fell into condemnation, these vessels that are made of it to honour, are not the vessels of their owne righteousnesse, but of the mercy of God: and whereas other are made to dishonour, the same is not to be imputed to unrighteousnesse but to judgement, &c. That to those whom he refuseth, God rendreth due paine: to those whom he calleth, he giveth undeserved grace: that they are delivered from all accusation, after the manner of a creditour, in whose power it is to forgive to the one, and aske of the other. Therefore the Lord also may give grace to whom hee will, because he is mercifull: and give it not to all, because he is a just judge. Hee may by giving to some that which they doe not deserve, shew his free grace: and by not giving to all, declare what all deserve. For whereas Paul writeth that God enclosed all under sinne, that he might have mercy upon all, it is there withall to be added that he is debter to no man : because no man first gave to him, that he may require like of him.

12 This also they often say, to overthrow predestination, that while it standeth, all carefulnesse and endeavour of well doing falleth away. For who (say they) shall heare that either life or death is certainly appointed for him by the eternall decree of God, But that it will by and by come into his minde that it maketh no matter how he behaveth himselfe, sith the predestination of God can by his worke be nothing hindered or furthered ? So shall all men dissolutely throw forth themselves, and after a desperate manner runne headlong whither their lust shall carry them. And verily they say not altogether falsely, for there bee many swine, which with filthy blasphemies despise the doctrine of predestination : and by this pretence also doe mocke out all admonishments and rebukings, saying ; God knoweth what he hath once determined to doe with us : if he have decreed our salvation, he will bring us to it at the time appointed : if he have predestinate our death, we should travell in vaine to the contrary. But the Scripture when it teacheth with how much greater reverence and religiousnesse wee ought to thinke of so great a mystery, doth both instruct the godly to feare other pecc, and well confutes these mens outrage. For it doth not speake of predestination to this end, that we should be encouraged to boldnesse, and with unlawfull rashnesse attempt to search the unattained secrets of God ? but rather that being humbled and abased wee should learne to tremble at his judgement, and reverently to looke up to his mercie. To this marke the faithfull will levell themselves. As for that filthy groining of swine, it is well confuted of Paul. They say that they goe carelesly forward in vices: because if they be of the number of the elect, their vices shall nothing hinder them, but that they shall at length be brought to life. But Paul telleth that we be to this end, that we should lead a holy and faultlesse life. If the marke that election is directed unto, be holinesse of life, it ought more to awake and stirre us up cheerefully to practise that holinesse, than to serve for a cloaking of slothfullnesse. For how greatly doe these things differ the one from the other? to cease from well doing, because election sufficeth to salvation : and that the appointed end of election is that we should apply our selves to the endeavour of good doings. Away therefore with such sacriledges which doe wrongfully misurne the whole order of election. Where they stretch their blasphemies further, when they say that he which is reprobate of God, shall lose his labour if hee goe about to make himselfe allowable to him with innocency and honesty of life : therein they are taken with a most shamelesse lye. For, whence could such endeavour come but of election ? For whosoever be of the number of the reprobate, as they are vessels made to dishonour, so they cease not with continuall wicked doings to provoke the wrath of God against themselves, and by evident tokens to confirme the judgement of God which is already pronounced upon them; so far be they from striving with him in vaine.

13 But other doe maliciously and shamefully slander this doctrine, as though it did overthrow all exhortations to godly living, For which matter in old time Augustine was burdened with a great malice. Which hee wiped away with his booke of correction and grace written to Valentine, the reading whereof will appease all godly and tractable men : yet I will touch a few things, which (as I trust) shall satisfie them that bee honest and not contentious. Wee have already scene how open and lowd a preacher of the free election Paul was : was hee therefore cold in admonishing and exhorting ? Let these good zealous men compare their earnestnesse with his, and it shall be found in them yee in comparison of his incredible heat. And truly this principle taketh away all doubts, that wee are not called to uncleannesse, but that every man should possesse his vessel in honour, &c. Again, that we are the handy worke of God created to good workes, which he hath prepared that wee should walke in them. Summarily, they that are even but meanelly exercised in Paul, shall without long declaration easily perceive how sily hee maketh these things to agree, which they saigne to disagree. Christ commandeth that men beleve in him : Yet is his definitive sentence neither false nor contrary to his commandement, where hee saith: No man can come to me, but he to whom it is given of my father. Let preaching therefore have his course, which may bring men to faith, and with continuall profiting hold them fast in perseverance. Neither yet let the knowledge of predestination bee hindered, that they which obey may not be proud as of their owne, but may glory in the Lord. Christ nor for nothing saith: Who so hath eares of hearing, let them heare. Therefore when we exhort and preach, they that have eares doe willingly obey: but who so lacke eares, in them is fulfilled that which is written, That hearing they heare not. But why (saith Augustine) should some have, and other some not have? Who hath knowee the minde of the Lord? Must that therefore bee denied which is open, because that cannot bee comprehended which is hidden: These sayings I have faithfully reported out of Augustine: but because peradventure his words shall have more authority than mine, goeto, let us bring forth the very words that are reade in himselfe. If when this is heard, many are turned into dulnesse and sluggishnesse, and being inclined from labour to lust doe goe after their desires: ought that therefore to bee accompted false which is spoken of the foreknowledge of God? If God have foreknowne that they shall bee good, shall they not be good, in how great evillnesse soever they now live? and if we have foreknowne that they will be evill, shall they not be evill in how great goodnesse soever they be now seene? shall therefore those things which are truly spoken of the fore knowledge of God, bee for such causes either to be denied or to be left unspoken of? namely then when if they be not spoken of, men goe into errors? The rule (saith he) to keepe truth unspoken of, is one thing, and the necessitie to speake truth is another. As for the causes of leaving truth unspoken, it were long to search them out all: of which yet thisis one, that they be not made worse which understand it not, while wee meane to make them more learned that understand it, who when wee speake any such thing are indeede not made more learned, nor yet are made worse. But when a true thing is in such a case, that when wee speake it, hee is made worse that cannot conceive it: and when wee speake it not, hee is made worse that can conceive it: what thinke wee now to bee done? Is not the truth rather to bee spoken that he may conceive it, than can conceive it: than to keepe it unspoken, that not onely neither of them may conceive it, but also hee that more understandeth may bee the worse? whereas if hee did heare and conceive it, by him also many should learne. And we will not say that which, as the Scripture witnesseth, wee lawfully might have spoken. For wee feare forsooth least when wee speake, hee bee offended that cannot conceive it: but wee feare not least while we holde our peace, he that can conceive truth be deceived with falshood. Which sentence hee at the last shortly knitting up, more plainly also confirmed. Wherefore if the Apostles, and they which followed them the doctors of the Church did both, namely both godlyly preach of the eternal election of God, and hold the faithfull in awe under the discipline of godly life: why doe these our adversaries being confuted with invincible violence of truth, thinke that they say well in saying, that that which is spoken of predestination is not to bee preached to the people although it be true? Yea it must in any wise be preached, that hee which hath eares to heare may heare. But who hath eares if hee hath not received them from him that promiseth that he will give them: Truly let him that receiveth not, refuse it: so that yet he which receiveth it, doe take and drinke, doe drinke and live. For as godnesse is to be preached, that God may be rightly worshipped: so is also predestination, that hee which hath eares to heare of the grace of God, may glory in God and not in himselfe.

14 And yet that holy man, as hee had a singular desire to edifie, so tempereth the manner of teaching the truth, that offence bee wisely avoyded so farre as it lawfully may be. For hee sheweth that those things which are truly said, may also be conveniently said. If any man doe thus preach to the people. If yee beleeye not, the cause is for that yee are already predestinate of God to destruction: such a man doth not only cherish slothfullnesse, but also maintaine wickednesse. If any man also stretch his saying to the time to come, and say that they which heare shall not beleeye, because they are reprobate: this shall bee rather a cursing than a teaching. Such therefore Augustine not unworthily biddeth to depart from the Church, as foolish teachers, and unlucky and ill prophesying Prophets. In another place he truly affirmeth that it is to be holden that a man then profiteth with rebuking, when hee hath mercy and helpeth which maketh to profit whom he will, even without rebuking. But why some thus and some otherwise? God forbid that, that wee should say the power of Judging belongeth rather to the clay than to the Potter. Againe afterward. When men by rebuking either come or returne into the way of righteousnesse, who worketh salvation in their hearts, but hee, which when any whosoever he bee planteth and watereth giveth the increase, whom when he will save, no freewill of man resisteth? It is therefore not to be doubted that the wils of men cannot resist the will of God (which both in heaven and earth hath done whatsoever he would, and which hath also done those things that are to come) but that he may doe what he will, forasmuch as even of the very wils of men he doth what he will. Againe, when he will leade men to him, doth he binde them with corporall bonds? He inwardly worketh, inwardly holdeth harts, inwardly moveth harts, and draweth them with their wils which he himselfe hath made in them. But, that which he by and by addeh ought in no wise to be omitted: that because we know not who belongeth or not belongeth to the number of the predestinate, we ought so to be affectioned that we would all men to be saved. So shall it come to passe, that whomsoever we finde, we shall travell to make him partaker of peace. But our peace shall rest upon the children of peace, therefore for our part, we must apply wholesome and sharpe rebuking to all men like a medicine, that they perith not, nor destroy other, but it shall be the worke of God to make it profitable to them whom he hath foreknowne and predestinate.

THE xxiiij. CHAPTER.

That election is established by the calling of God, but that the reprobate do bring upon themselves the just destruction whereunto they are appointed.

BV T, that the matter may more plainly appeare, wee must intreate both of the calling of the elect, and of the blinding and hardening of the wicked. Of the first of these I have already spoken somewhat, when I confuted their error, which thinke that the generallnesse of the promises extendeth equally to all mankind. But this election which otherwise God hath hidden with himselfe hee doth not without choise at length disclose by his calling, which a man may therefore call the testifying of it. For, whom he hath foreknowne, them he hath also fore appointed to be fashioned like the image of his sonne: whom he hath fore appointed, them he hath also called: whom he hath called, them hee hath also justified, that in time to come hee may glorifie them. When the Lord hath by electing already adopted his into the number of his children: yet wee see how they enter not into possession of so great a benefit, but when they be called: on the other side, how being called they doe now enjoy a certaine communicating of his election. For which reason Paul calleth the spirit which they receive, both the spirit of adoption, and the seale, and earnest of the inheritance to come: namely because it doth with the testimony thereof stablish and seale to their hearts the assurednesse of the adoption to come. For though the preaching of the Gospell spring out of the fountaine of election: yet because it is also common to the reprobate, therefore it could not by it selfe be a sure prooffe thereof. But God effectually teacheth his elect, that hee may bring them to faith: as wee have before alleadged out of the words of Christ, Who so is of God, hee and none other seeth the Father. Againe, I have shewed thy name to the men whom thou hast given me: Whereas hee saith in another place, no man can come to mee, unless my Father draw him. Which place Augustine wisely weigheth, whose words are these. If (as Truth saith every one that hath learned, commeth: whosoever commeth not, certainly neither hath he learned. It doth not therefore follow that he which can come, also commeth, unless hee have both willed and done it. But every one that hath learned of the Father, not onely can come, but also commeth, when now there is present both the profit of coming, and the affection of willing, and the effect of doing. place more plainly. What is this else, every one that hath heard of the father, and hath learned, commeth to mee, but there is none that heareth and learneth of the father and commeth not to mee? For if every one which hath heard of the father and learned, commeth: truly every one that commeth not, hath not heard of the father, nor learned: for if hee had heard and learned, he would come. This schoole is farre from the senses of the flesh, in which schoole the father is heard and teacheth, that men may come to the sonne. And a little after. This grace which is secretly given to the hearts of men, is received of no hard heart: for it is therefore given, that the hardnesse of the heart may first be taken away. When therefore the Father is heard within, hee taketh away the stony heart, and giveth a fleshy heart. For so hee maketh the children of promise and vessels of mercy, which hee hath prepared to glory. Why therefore doth hee not teach all, that they may come to Christ, but because all whom he teacheth, by mercy hee hath mercy upon whom he will, and hardeneth whom hee will. Therefore God assigneth them for children to himselfe, and appointeth himselfe father to them, whom he hath chosen. Now by calling hee bringeth them into the household, and uniteth himselfe to them, that they may bee one together. But, when calling is joynted to election, in that manner the Scripture sufficiently signifieth that in it nothing is to be required but the mercy of God. For if we aske, whom he calleth and for what reason: he answereth, whom he had elected. But when wee come once to election, there the onely mercy of God appeareth on every side. And here that saying of Paul truly hath place, It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Neither yet that same so, as they commonly take it, which part is betweene the grace of God, and the willing and running of man. For they expound it, that the desire and indeavour of man hath indeed no force of themselves, unlesse they be prospered by the grace of God: but when they are holpen by his blessing, then they affirme that they have also their parts in obtaining salvation. Whose cavillation I had rather confute with Augustines words than mine owne: If the Apostle meant nothing else but that it is not of him only that willeth or runneth, unlesse the Lord be there present mercifull: wee may contrariwise turne it against them and say that it is not of onely mercy, unlesse there be present willing and running. But if this be openly wicked, let us not doubt that the Apostle giveth all to the mercy of the Lord, and leaveth nothing to our wils or indeavours. To this effect speaketh that holy man. And I set not a straw by that nice subtilty, that they say that Paul would not have so said unlesse there had beene some indeavour and some will in us. For he did not consider what was in man: but when hee saw that some did assigne part of salvation to the endeavour of men, hee simply condemned their error in the first part of the sentence, and in the second hee challenged the whole summe of salvation of the mercy of God. And what other things doe the Prophets travell about but continually to preach the free calling of God?

2 Moreover the very nature also and dispensation of calling doth cleerely shew it, which consisteth not in the onely preaching of the word, but also in the enlightening of the Spirit. To whom God offereth his word, is shewed us in the Prophet: I am found of them that sought mee not: I have openly appeared to them that did not aske for mee. To a people which hath not called upon my name I have said, Loe I am present. And least the Iewes should thiake that this kindnesse belonged onely to the Gentiles, he doth also put them in remembrance from whence he tooke their father Abraham, when hee vouchsafed to joyne him to himselfe, namely from meere idolatry, in which hee was drowned with all his. When hee first shineth with the light of his Word to men not deserving it, hee therein sheweth an example plaine enough of his free goodnesse: Here therefore the unmeasurable goodnesse of God sheweth forth it selfe, but now unto salvation to all: because for the reprobate there abideth a more grievous judgement, for that they refuse the testimony of the will of God. And God also, to set forth his glory, withdraweth from them the effectual force of his Spirit. Therefore this inward calling is a pledge of salvation, which cannot deceive us. For which purpose maketh that saying of John. Thereby wee

know that wee are his children, by the spirit which hee hath given us. And least these should glory, that it did at the least answer to him when hee called and of his owne will offered himselfe, hee affirmeth that it hath no eares to heare, no eyes to see but which hee hath made: and that hee maketh them, not according to every mans thankfullnesse, but according to his owne election. Of which thing you have a notable example in Luke, where both Iewes and Gentiles in common together, heard the preaching of Paul and Basabas. Whereas they were at that time all taught with one selfesame word, it is said that they beleevd which were ordained to everlasting life. With what face may we deny that the calling is free, in which even to the very last part election raigneth alone?

3 But here wee must beware of two errors, because many make man a worker together with God, that he by his consent may make the election to bee of force: so by their opinion, the will of man is above the counsell of God. As though the Scripture did teach, that it is onely given us that wee may beleeve, and not rather saith it selfe. Othersome, although they doe not so weaken the grace of the holy Ghost: yet being led by I wot not what reason, hang election upon faith as though it were doubtful, yea and uneffectuall untill it bee confirmed by faith. It is indeed certaine that it is confirmed, as toward us: and we have already shewed that the secret counsell of God beginneth to shine out, which was before hidden: so that by this word you understand nothing else, then that it is approved which was unknowne, and is as it were sealed with a seale. But it is falsely said, that the election is then and not till then effectuall, when we have embraced the Gospell, and that thereof it taketh lively strength. We must indeed from thence fetch the certainty of it: Because if wee attempt to reach unto the eternall ordinance of God, that deepe bottomelesse depth will swallow us up. But when God hath opened it unto us, wee must climbe up higher, lest the effect should drowne the cause. For what greater absurdity or shamefull injustice is there, than that when the Scripture teacheth that wee are enlightened as God hath chosen us, our eyes should bee so dazeled with this light, that they should refuse to looke upon election? Yet in the meane time I deny not, that to the end wee may be certaine of our salvation, wee must begin at the word, and that our affiance ought therewith to be contented, that we may call upon God by the name of Father. For some quite contrary to right order, that they may be certified of the counsell of God (which is neere untous, in our mouth and in our heart) doe covet to flie above the clouds. Therefore that rashnesse is to be restrained with sobriety of faith, that it may suffice us that God in his outward word is a witness of his hidden grace: so that the conduit pipe out of which there floweth water largely for us to drinke, doe not hinder but that the spring-head may have due his honour.

4 Therefore as they doe wrongfully, which hang the strength of election upon the faith of the Gospell, by which faith we feele that election pertaineth to us: so we shall keepe the best order, if in seeking the certainty of our election, wee sticke fall in these latter signes, which are sure witnessings of it: Satan doth with no tentation either more grievously, or more dangerously astonish the faithfull, than when disquieting them with doubt of their election, hee doth also move them with a perverted desire to seeke it out of the way. I call it seeking out of the way, when a wretched man enterpriseth to breake into the hidden secrets of the wisdom of God, and to peerce even to the highest eternitie, to understand what is determined of himselfe at the judgement seat of God. For then hee throweth himselfe headlong to bee swallowed up into the depth of the unsearchable devouring pit: then hee wrappeth himselfe with innumerable snares and such as hee cannot winde out of: then hee overwhelmeth himselfe with the bottomelesse depth of blinde darkenesse. For so it is rightfull that the foolishnesse of the wit of man bee punished with so horrible ruine, when he attempteth of his owne force to rise up to the height of the wisdom of God. And so much more deadly is this tentation, as there is none to which wee are commonly all more bent. For there is mozt rarely any man to be found, whose mind is not sometime stricken with this thought. Whence hast thou salvation, but of the election of God? And of Election what revelation hast thou? which thought, if it have once taken place: in any man, either perpetually vexeth the miserable man with terrible torments, or utterly dismayeth him. Truly I would have no surer argument than this experience to prove how wrongfully such men imagine of predestination. For the minde can be infected with no error more pestilent, than that which plucketh downe, and thrusteth the conscience from her peace and quietnesse toward God. Therefore if we feare shipwracke, we must diligently beware of this rocke, which is never stricken upon without destruction. And though the disputing of predestination bee esteemed like a dangerous sea, yet in passing through it there is found a safe and quiet yea and pleasant sayling, unless a man doe wilfully covet to bee in danger. For as they doe drowne themselves in the deadly bottomelesse depth, which to be certified of their election doe enquire of the secret Councell of God without his word: so they which doe rightly and orderly search it in such sort as it is contained in the word, receive thereof a singular fruit of comfort. Let this therefore bee our way to search it, that wee begin at the calling of God, and end in the same. Howbeit this withstandeth not, but that the faithfull may thinke that the benefits which they daily receive at the hand of GOD, doe descend from that secret adoption as they say in Esfy, Thou hast done marvels, thy thoughts are old, true, and faithfull: forasmuch as by that adoption as by a token, the Lords will is to confirme so much as is lawfull to bee knowne of his counsell. But least any man should thinke this a weak testimony, let us consider how much both clearenesse, and certainty it bringeth us. Of which thing Bernard speaketh sily. For after that hee had spoken of the reprobate, hee saith: The purpose of God standeth. the sentence of peace standeth upon them that feare him, both covering their evils, and rewarding their good things: so as to them after a marvellous manner not onely good things but also evil doe worke together unto good. Who shall accuse the elect of God? It sufficeth mee to all righteoufnesse, to have him alone mercifull, to whom alone I have sinned. All that he hath decreed not to impute to me, is so as if it never had bene. And a litle after: O place of true rest, and to which not unworthily I may give the name of a bedchamber, in which God is seene not as troubled with wrath, nor as withholden with care: but his will is proved in him good, and well pleasing, and perfect. This sight doth not make afraid, but calmerh: doth not stirre up unquiet curiousnesse, but appeaseth it: doth not weary the senses, but quieteth them: Here is quiet truly taken, God being appeased, appeaseth all things: and to behold him quiet, is to be quiet.

5 First, if wee seeke a fatherly kindnesse, and favourable minde of God, wee must turne our eyes to Christ, in whom alone the soule of the father resteth. If wee seeke salvation, life, and the immortality of the heavenly kingdome, wee must then also see to no other: forasmuch as hee alone is both the fountaine of life, and Authour of salvation, and heire of the kingdome of Heaven. Now whereto serveth election, but that being adopted of the heavenly Father into the degree of children, we may by his favour obtaine salvation and immortality? Howsoever in seeking thou to see it and shake it, yet thou shalt finde that the uttermost marke of it extendeth no further. Therefore whom God hath taken to his children, it is not said that hee hath chosen them in themselves, but in his Christ? because hee could not love them but in him, nor give them the honour of the inheritance of his kingdome, unless they had first bene made partakers of him. If we be chosen in him, we shall not finde in our selves that certainty of our election: no, nor yet in God the Father, if we imagine him naked without the Sonne. Christ therefore is the mirror, in whom wee both must, and without deceit may behold our election. For sith it is hee into whose body the Father hath appointed to graft all them whom from eternity hee hath willed to bee his, that hee may take for his children so many as hee reknowledgeth among his members: wee have a witness plaine and sure enough, that wee are written in the booke of life, if wee communicate with Christ. And that sure communion of himselfe hee gave us, when by preaching of the Gospell he testified that he was given to us of the Father, that hee wchall his good things should bee ours. Wee are said to put on him, and to grow together into him, that we may live: because hee liveth. So oft is this doctrine repeated, The Father spared not his onely begotten Sonne, that of whosover beleeveth in him, may not

Rom. 8. 31.

Jerish. But hee that believeth in him, is said to have passed from death into life, In which sense hee calleth himselfe the Bread of life, which who so eateth, hee shall not die for ever. He (I say) hath bene a witnessse to us, that they shall bee received of the heavenly Father in place of his children, of whom hee hath bene received by Faith. If wee cover any more than to bee accounted among the children and heires of God, then wee may climbe above Christ. If this bee our uttermost marke: how much bee wee mad in seeking without him that which wee have already obtained in him, and which may be found in him alone? Moreover, sith hee is the eternall wisdom, the unchangeable truth, and fast settled counsell of the Father: it is not to bee feared least that which he declareth to us in his word, should vary anything bee it never so little from that will of the Father which we seeke: but rather hee faithfully openeth it unto us, such as it was from the beginning, and ever shall be. The practise of this doctrine ought also to bee in use in prayers. For though the faith of election doth encourage us to call upon God: yet when we make our prayers, it were unordered done to thrust it into the presence of God, or to covenant with this condition. Lord, if I be elected, heare me: forasmuch as hee willett us to bee content with his promises, and no where els to seeke whether hee will bee intreatable to us or no. This wisdom shall deliver us from many snares, if we can skill to apply that, to a right use which hath bene rightly written: but let us not undiscreeuly draw hither and thither that which ought to have bene restrained.

6 There is also for stablishing of our affiance another stay of election, which wee have said to bee joyned with our calling. For, whom Christ taketh being enlightened with the knowledge of his name into the bosome of his Church, them he is said to receive into his faith and protection. And whomsoever hee receiveth, they are said to bee committed to him of the Father, and deliver to his trust, that they may bee kept into eternall life. What meane we? Christ cryeth out with a lowd voyce, that so many as the Father willett to bee saved, hee hath delivered them into his protection. Therefore if wee list to know whether God hath care of our safety, let us seeke whether hee hath committed us to Christ, whom hee hath made the onely Saviour of all his. Now if we doubt whether we be received of Christ into his faith and keeping, hee preventeth our doubting, when hee voluntarily offereth himselfe to be our shepheard, and pronounceth that we shall be in the number of his sheepe if we heare his voice. Let us therefore imbrace Christ, being liberally set open for us, and comming to meete us, he shall number us in his stocke, and shall keepe us inclosed within his fold. But there entreth into us a carefulnesse of our state to come. For as Paul teacheth that they are called, which were before chosen, so Christ sheweth that many are called, but few are chosen. Yea and also Paul himselfe in another place dishorteth us from carefulnesse: Let him that standeth (saith he) looke that he fall not. Againe, Art thou grafed into the people of God? Be not proud, but feare: for God is able to cut thee off againe that he may graffe other. Finally, wee are sufficiently taught by experience it selfe, that calling and faith are of small value, unless there bee adjoynd continuance which happeneth not to all men. But Christ hath delivered us from this care: for verilie these promises have respect to the time to come. All that my father giveth me shall come to me: and him that shall come to me, I will not cast him out of doores. Againe, this is the will of him that sent me, the Father, that I loose nothing of all things that hee hath given mee, but may raise them up againe in the last day. Againe, My sheepe heare my voice, and they follow mee: I know them, and I give them eternall life, and they shall not perish for ever, neither shall any man take them out of my hand. The father which gave them to mee, is greater than all: and no man can take them out of the hand of my father. Now when hee pronounceth, Every tree which my father hath not planted, shall bee plucked up by the roote: hee signifieth on the contrary side, that they can never bee plucked from salvation, which have roote in God. Wherewith agreeth that saying of Iohn, If they had bene of us, they had not at all gone out from us. Hereupon also commeth that noble glorying of Paul against life and death, present things and things to come: which glorying must needs bee grounded upon the gift of continuance. Neither is it any doubt that hee directeth this saying to all the faithfull. In another place the same Paul saith, He that hath begun in you a good worke, shall end it even untill the day of Christ. As also David when his faith fainted, leaned upon this day: Thou shalt not forsake the worke of thy hands. And now neither is this doubtfull, that Christ when he prayeth for all the faithfull, asketh the same thing for them which he asked for Peter, that their faith may never faile. Whereby we gather, that they are out of danger of falling away, because the Sonne of God, asking stedfast continuance for their godlinesse, suffered no deniall. What would Christ have us to learne hereby, but that wee should trust that we shall perpetually be safe, because we are once made his.

7 But it daily happeneth, that they which seemed to bee Christs, doe againe revolt from him and fall. Yea and in the very same place where hee affirmeth that none had perished of them which were given him of the Father, yet he excepteth the sonne of perdition. That is true indeed: but this is also ascertaine, that such did never cleave to Christ with that affiance of heart with which I say that the assurednesse of our election is established. They went out from us (saith Iohn) but they were not of us. For if they had bene of us, they had still tarried with us. Neither doe I deny that they have like signes of calling as the elect have: but I doe not grant that they have that sure stablishment of election which I bid the faithfull to fetch out of the word of the Gospell. Wherefore let not such examples move us, but that we quietly rest upon the promise of the Lord, where he pronounceth, that all they are given to him of the Father, which receive him with true faith, of whom sith hee is their keeper and Pastor, none shall perish. Of Judas wee shall speake hereafter. Paul doth not counsell Christians from assurednesse altogether, but from carelesse and loose assurednesse of the flesh, which draweth with it pride, presumption, and disdaine of other, and quencheth humility and the reverence of God, and bringeth forgetfulness of grace received. For he speaketh to the Gentiles, whom hee teacheth, that they ought not proudly and ungenerously to reproch the Jewes for this, that the Jewes being disherited, they were set in their stead. Feare also he requireth not where with they should bee dismayed and stagger, but with framing us to the receiving of the grace of God, should abate nothing of the affiance thereof, as wee have said in another place. Beside that hee doth not there speake to every man particularly, but to the sects themselves generally. For when the Church was divided into two parts, and envy bred dissention, Paul putteth the Gentiles in minde that they being supplied into the place of the peculiar and holy people ought to be to them a cause of feare and modesty. And among them there were many puffed up with glory, whose vaine boasting it was profitable to beate downe. But wee have in another place shewed, that our hope is extended to the time to come even beyond death, and that nothing is more contrary to the nature of it, than to doubt what shall become of us.

8 That saying of Christ, of many being called but few chosen, is very ill taken after that manner. There shall bee nothing doubtfull if wee hold fast that which ought to be cleare by the things above spoken, that there are two sorts of calling. For there is an universall calling whereby through the outward preaching of the word, God calleth altogether to him, even them also to whom hee setteth it forth unto the favour of death, and unto matter of more grievous condemnation. The other is a speciall calling which for the most part hee vouchsafeth to give onely to the faithfull, when by the inward enlightning of his spirit hee maketh that the word preached is settled in their hearts. Yet sometime hee maketh them also partakers of it whom hee calighteth but for a time, and afterward by the deserving of their unthankfullnesse forsaketh them, and striketh them with greater blindnesse. Now when the Lord saw the Gospell to be published farre and wide, and to be despised of many, but to bee had in due price of few: hee describeth to us God under the person of a King, which preparing a solemne feast sendeth his messengers round about to bid a great multitude to bee his guests, and yet can get but a few, because every one alleageth lets for his excuse, so that at length hee is compelled upon their refusall, to call out of the high waies every one that hee meeteth. Hither to every man seeth that the parable must bee understood of the outward calling. Hee addeth afterward that God doth like a good maker of a feast, which goeth about the tables, to cheare his guests. If he finde any not clothed with a wedding garment, hee will not suffer him with his uncleannesse to dishonour the solemnity of the feast. This part of the parable, I grant, is to bee understood of them which enter into the Church by the profession of faith, but are not clothed with the sanctification of Christ. Such dishonours and as it were Botches of his Church, the Lord will not suffer for ever, but, as their filchinesse deserveth, he will cast them out. Therefore few are chosen out of a great number of them that are called, but yet not with that calling by which we say that the faithfull ought to judge their election. For, that generall calling is also common to the wicked: but this speciall calling bringeth with it the spirit of regeneration, which is the earnest and seale of the Inheritance to come, wherewith our hearts are sealed up against the day of the Lord. In a summe, such hypocrites boast of godlinesse as well as the true worshippers of God, Christ pronounceth that at length they shall be cast out of the place which they wrongfully possesse: as it is said in the Psalme, Lord, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle? The innocent in hands, and a man of a pure heart. Againe, in another place. This is the generation of them that seeke God, of them that seeke the face of the God of Israhel. And so doth the Spirit exhorte the faithfull to sufferance, that they take it not grievously that the Israellites bee mingled with them in the Church: for at length their vizor shall bee plucked from them and they shall be cast out with shame.

9 The same reason is of the exception even now alleaged, where Christ saith, that none perished but the sonne of perdition. It is indeed an unproper speech, but yet not darke. For he was not accounted among the sheepe of Christ, for that hee was one indeed, but because hee kept the place of one. And wherein another place the Lord affirmeth that hee was chosen with the Apostles, that is spoken onely in respect of the mynistry. Twelve (saith hee) have I chosen, and one of them is a Devill: that is, hee had chosen him to the office of an Apostle. But when hee speaketh of choosing to salvation, hee driveth him farre away from the number of the chosen, saying: I speake not of all: I know whom I have chosen. If a man doe in both places confound the word of choosing, hee shall miserably entangle himselfe: if hee make difference, nothing is more plaine. Therefore Gregory teacheth very ill and pestilently when hee saith that wee know onely our calling, but are uncertaine of our election: whereby he moveth all men to feare and trembling: using also this reason, but because wee know what wee bee to day, but what we shall be, we know not. But in that place hee sufficiently declareth, how hee stumbleth at this blocke. For, because hee hangd election upon the merits of workes, hee had matter enough, and more to discourge the mindes of men: but hee could not strengthen them, which did not remove them from themselves to the affiance of the goodnesse of God. Hereof the faithfull have some taste of that which wee have determined at the beginning, that predestination if it bee rightly thought upon, bringeth not shaking of faith, but rather the best strengthening of it. And yet I deny not, that the holy Ghost framed his talke to the small measure of our sense. As when hee saith, In the secret of my people they shall not be, and in the roule of my servants they shall not be written. As though God did begin to write in the booke of life, them whom hee reckoneth in the number of his: whereas yet we know, even by the witnesse of Christ, that the names of the children of God are from the beginning written in the booke of life. But in these words onely is expressed the casting away of them which seemed the chiefe among the elect: as it is said in the Psalme. Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and let them not be written with the righteous.

to But the elect are neither immediately from the wombe, nor all at one time, by calling gathered together into the flocke of Christ, but as it pleaseth God to distribute his grace to them. But ere they bee gathered together to that chiefe shepheard they are scattered abroad and stray in the common desert, and differ nothing from other, saving that they be defended by the singular mercy of God, from falling into the extreme headlong downe-fall of death. Therefore if you looke upon themselves, you shall see the off-spring of Adam, which savoureth of the common corruption of the whole masse. That they bee not carryed into extreme and despaird ungodlinesse godlinesse; this commeth not to passe by any goodnesse naturally planted in them, but because the eye of God watcheth, and his hand is stretched out to their salvation. For they that dreame that from their very nativity there is planted in their hearts I wote not what seed of election, by the vertue whereof they are alway inclined to godlinesse and to the feare of God, they both are not holpen to prove it by the authority of Scripture, and also are confuted by experience it selfe. They doe indeede bring forth a few examples to proove that the elect even before their enlightning, were not utterly strangers from religion: that Paul in his being a Pharisee lived unreprovable; that Cornelius was by almes and prayers accepted of God: and such other. Of Paul, wee grant to them: of Cornelius, we say, that they are deceived. For it appeareth that hee was then already enlightned and regenerate, so that hee wanted nothing but the cleare revealing of the Gospell. But what will they bring out by these few examples? that all the elect are alway indued with the Spirit of godlinesse? No more than if a man by shewing the uprightnesse of Aristides, Socrates, Zenocrates, Scipio, Curia Camillus, an other, should thereof gather, that all they that are left in blindness of idolatry, were desirous followers of holinesse and honesty. Yea and the Scripture in more places than one, openly cryed out against them. For, the state which Paul describeth of the Ephesians before their regeneration, sheweth not one graine of this seed. Ye were (saith he) dead with defaults and sinnes, in which ye walked according to the time of this world, according to the prince of the aire, which now worketh in the obstinate children: among whom wee all also were sometime conversant in the lusts of our flesh, doing those things that liked our flesh and minde. And we were by nature the children of wrath, as other also were. Againe, remember that yee were sometime without hope, and lacked God in the world. Againe, Yee were sometime darkenesse: but now yee are light in the Lord, walke as the children of light. But peradventure they will have these things to be referred to the ignorance of the true God, wherewith they deny not that the elect are holden, before that they be called: Albeit this were a shamelesse cavilling, sith he therof concludeth, that they ought now no more either to lie or to steale: yet what will they answer to other places? as is that place to the Corinthians; where when hee had pronounced that neither whooremongers, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor weakelings, nor buggerers, nor thieves; nor covetous men, shall bee heires of the kingdome of God: he by and by addeth that they were wrapped in the same hainous offences before that they knew Christ: but now that they are both washed by his blood and made free by his spirit. Againe another place to the Romans: As yee have given your members servants to uncleannesse, and to iniquity to commit iniquity, now yeeld them in bondage to righteousnesse. For what fruit had you of these things in which ye are now worthily ashamed, &c.

11 What manner of seed of election, I pray you, did then bud in them, which being manifoldly desiled in all their life, as it were with desperate wickednesse, wallowed in the most abhominable and accursed sinne of all? If he would have spoken after their opinion, he should have shewed how much they were bound to the bountifullnesse of God, by which they had bene preserved from sliding into so great filthinesse. So Peter also should have exhorted his to thankfulness for the perpetuall seede of election. But hee contrariwise putteth them in minde that the time past sufficed to make an end of the lusts of the Gentiles. What if wee come to examples? what bud of righteousnesse was there in Rahab the harlot before faith? in Mansseer, when Hiernsalem was dipped and in a manner drowned in the blood of the Prophets? in the Theefe, which among his last gaspings beganne to thinke of repentance? Away therefore with these arguments, which silly curious men doe rashly devise to the themselves without the Scripture. But let that abide certain with us; which the Scripture hath, that all have straid like lost sheepe, every one hath swarved into his owne way, that is perdition. Out of this gulf of perdition; whom the Lord hath determined once to plucke forth, them hee deferrereth till his fit time: onely he preserveth them, that they fall not unto unpardonable blasphemy.

fect the saluation, whereunto he had by eternall counsell appoynted them : so hee hath his iudgements against the reprobate, whereby hee executeth his counsell of them. Whom therefore hee hath created into the shame of life, and destruction of death, that they should be instruments of his wrath, and examples of his severity : from them, that they may come to their end, sometime he taketh away the power to heare his word, and sometime by the preaching of it hee more blindeth and amazeth them. Of the first manner, whereas there be innumerable examples, let us chuse out one more cleere and notable than all the rest. There passed away about foure thousand yeares before Christ, in which hee hid from all the Gentiles the light of his health bringing doctrine. If any man answer that hee therefore made them not to enjoy so great a benefite because hee deemed them unworthy, they which come after shall not bee proved any more worthy. Of which thing, beside the experience, Melchior is a sobstantiall witness, which reproving infidelity mingled with grosse blasphemies, yet declareth that there shall come a Redeemer. Why therefore is he rather given to these than to those? Hee shall trouble himselfe in vaine, that shall here search for a cause higher than the secret and unsearchable counsell of God. Neither is it to be feared least any scholler of Porphyrie, should freely gnaw at the righteousness of God while we answer nothing in defence of it. For when we say that none perish undeserving, and that it is of the free bountifullnesse of God that some be delivered, there is largely enough said for the setting forth of his glory, so that it needeth not our hitting. The soveraigne judge therefore maketh a way for his predestination, when whom hee hath once rejected, then being deprived of the communicating of his light hee leaveth in blindness. Of the other manner there are both daily examples, and also many contained in the Scripture. One selfesame preaching is commonly made to a hundred, twenty receive it with ready obedience : of such : the rest doe either let naught by it, or scorne it, or hille it out, or abhorre it. If any man answer that this diversity proceedeth of their malice and perversenesse, hee shall not yet satisfie us : because the others wile also should bee possessed with the same malice, unless God did amend it with his goodness. Therefore wee shall still be encumbered, unless wee call to minde that which Paul saith, Who maketh thee to differ? Whereby hee signifieth that some excell other some, not by their owne vertue, but by the only grace of God.

13 Why therefore doth he in granting grace to those passe over these? Of those Luke theweth a cause, because they are ordained to life. Of these, what shall wee thinke, but because they are the vessels of wrath unto dishonour? Wherefore let it not grieve us to say with Augustine. God (saith he) might turne the will of the evil into good, because he is almighty. He might indeed. Why therefore doth he not? because he would not. Why hee would not, is in himselfe. For wee ought to be no more wise than we ought to be. And that is much better, than to chiffe with Christians, and say that hee draweth him that is willing and reacheth his hand, that the difference may not seeme to stand in the judgement of God, but in the owne will of men. Truly it so standeth not in proper motion of man, that even the godly and they that feare God have neede of a singular instruction of the spirit. Lidia the Purple seller feared God, and yet it behooved that her heart should be opened, that she might hearken to the doctrine of Paul, and profit in it. This is spoken of one woman alone, but that wee should know that the profiting of every man in godlinesse is the secret worke of the spirit. This verily cannot be brought in question, that the Lord sendeth his word to many, whose blindness he will have to be more inforce. For, to what purpose doth hee bid so many commandements to be carryed to Pharisee? was it because hee hoped that with othen repeated messages he would be appealed? No, but before hee began, hee foreknew and foretold the end. Goe (saith hee to Moses) and declare to him my will : but I will harden his heart, that hee obey not. So when hee turneth up Ezechiell : hee warneth him aforehand that hee sendeth them to a rebellious and stubborn people : to the end that he should not be a fraid if he perceive himselfe to sing to deafe men. So hee foretellet to Jeremy, that his doctrine should become a fire, to destroy and waite the people like stubble. But the prophecy of Isay yet more enforceth it. For he is thus sent of the Lord: Goe and say to the children of Israel: With hearing ye heare, and understand not: With seeing ye see, and know not. Make obstinate the heart of this people and make heaue their eares, and over plaister their eyes, least peradventure they may see with their eyes, and heare with their eares, and understand with their heart, that being turned they may be healed. Behold, hee directeth his voyce to them, but that they wax more deafe: he lightheth a light, but that they may be made more blinde: hee sheweth forth doctrine, but that they may be made more dull: hee layeth to them a remedy, but not that they may be healed. And Iohn alleading this propheticie, affirmeth that the Iewes could not beleue the doctrine of Christ, because this curse of God lay upon them. Neither can this also bee in controversie, that whom God will not have to be enlightened, to them hee delivered his doctrine wrapped up in darke speeches, that they may nothing profit thereby but to be thrust into greater dullnesse. Christ also testifieth, that he doth therefore expound onely to the Apostles the parables in which he had spoken to the multitude, because to them it was given to know the mysteries of the kingdome of God, but to the common people not so. What meaneth the Lord (wilt thou say) in teaching them, of whom he provideth that he may not be understood? Consider whence is the fault, and thou wilt cease to aske. For in the word how great darkenesse soever there be, yet there is alway light enough to convince the conscience of the wicked.

14. Now remaineth for us to see, why the Lord doth that, which it is plaine that he doth. If it be answered that it is so done because men have so deserved by their ungodlinesse, wickednesse, and unthankfullnesse: the same shall indeed be well and truly said: But because there appeareth not yet the reason of this diversity, why then some are bowed to obedience, other some continue hardened, in searching it, we must needs goe to that which Paul hath noted out of Moses, namely that God hath raised them up from the beginning, that hee might shew his name in the whole earth. Whereas therefore the reprobate doe not obey the word of God opened unto them, that shall be well imputed to the malice and perversenesse of their heart, so that this be therewithall added; that they are therefore given into this perversenesse, because by the righteous, but yet unsearchable judgement of God they are raised up to set forth his glory with their damnation. Likewise when it is said of the sons of Hely, that they harkened not to wholesome warnings, because the Lord willed to kill them: it is not denied that their stubbornnesse proceeded of their owne naughtinesse: but it is therewithall touched why they were left in stubbornnesse, when the Lord might have softened their hearts, namely because his unchangeable decree had once appointed them to destruction. To the same purpose serveth that saying of Iohn, When hee had done so great signes, no man beleved in him: that the word of Ezsay might be fulfilled, Lord, who hath beleved our saying? For though hee doe not excuse the stiffnecked from blame, yet hee is content with that reason, that the grace of God is unfavoury to men, till the holy Ghost bring taste. And Christ alleading the propheticie of Ezsay: They shall all be taught of God, tendeth to no other end but to prove that the Iewes are reprobate and strangers from the Church, because they are unapt to learne: and hee bringeth no other cause thereof, but for that the promise of God doth not pertaine to them. Which thing this saying of Paul confirmeth, that Christ which to the Jewes is an offence, and to the Gentiles foolishnesse, is to the Called the strength and wisdom of God. For when hee hath told what commonly happeneth so oft as the Gospell is preached, namely that some it maketh more obstinate, and of some it is despised, hee saith that it is had in price of them onely which are called. Hee had indeed a little before named them belevers, but he meant not to take away the due degree from the grace of God which goeth before faith, but rather hee addeth this second saying by way of correction, that they which had embraced the Gospell should give the praise of their faith to the calling of God: As also a little after hee teacheth that they are chosen of God. When the ungodly heare these things, they cry out that God with inordinate power abuseth his poore creatures for a sport to his cruelty. But wee which know that all men are so many waies endangered to the judgement seate of God, that being asked of a thousand things they can not satisfie in one, doe confesse that the reprobate suffer nothing which agreeth not with the most just judgement of God. Whereas we doe not clearly attaine the reason thereof, let us not be discontent to be ignorant of somewhat, where the wisdom of God listeth up it selfe into so great height.

15 But for asmuch as there are a few places of Scripture wont to be objected, in which God seemeth to denie that it is done by his ordinance that the wicked doe perish, but by this that, he crying out against it, they willfully bring death upon themselves: let us briefly declaring these places, shew that they make nothing against the sentence above set. There is brought forth a place of Ezechie, that God will not the death of a sinner, but rather that hee may be turned and live. If they will extend this to all mankind: why doth hee not move many to Repentance, whose mindes are more pliable to obedience, than theirs which at his dayly allurements waxe harder and harder? With the Sodomites (as Christ witnesseth) the preaching of the Gospell and Miracles would have brought forth more fruite than in Iurie. How cometh it to passe therefore, if God will all to be saved, that hee openeth not the gate of Repentance to those miserable men that would have beene more readie to receive grace? Hereby wee see that the place is violently wrested, if the will of God, whereof the Prophet maketh mention, be set against his eternall counsell, whereby hee hath severed the elect from the reprobate. Now if we seeke for the true naturall meaning of the Prophet: his purpose is to bring hope of pardon to the penitent. And this is the summe, that it is not to be doubted but that God is readie to forgive so soone as the sinner turneth. Therefore he willeth not his death, in so much as he willeth his repentance. But experience teacheth that hee so willeth them to repent whom hee generally calleth to him, that yet he toucheth not all their harts. Yet is it not therefore to be said that hee dealeth deceitfully, because although the outward voyce doe but make them unexcusable which heare and doe not obey it, yet it is truly accounted the testimonie of the grace of God, by which testimonie hee reconcileth men to himselfe. Therefore let us hold this for the meaning of the Prophet, that the death of a sinner pleaseth not God: that the godly may have affiance, that so soone as they shall be touched with Repentance, there is pardon readie for them with God, and the wicked may feele that their fault is doubled, because they answer not to so great mercifull kindnesse and gentlenesse of God. The mercie of God therefore will alway meete Repentance, but to whom Repentance is given, both all the Prophets, and Apostles, and Ezechie himselfe doe plainly teach. Secondly, there is alleadged a place of Paul, where he saith, that God willeth all men to be saved, which although it have a divers meaning from the other, yet in some thing they agree together. I answer, first, that by the rest of the text it is made plaine how hee willeth. For Paul coupleth together, that hee willeth them to be saved, and to come to the acknowledging of the truth. If they will have this to be determined, by the eternall counsell of God that they receive the doctrine of salvation, what meaneth that saying of Moses, What nation is so noble, that God cometh neere to it as hee doeth to thee? How came it to passe that God restrained from many peoples the light of the Gospell, which other enjoyed? How came it to passe that the pure knowledge of godlinesse never came to some, and some scarcely tasted so much as any darke principles of it? Hereof it shall now be easie to gather, whereto Paul tendeth. He had commanded Timothie to make solemne prayers in the Church for Kings and Princes. But when it seemed somewhat an absurditie that prayers should be made to God for a kinde of men in a manner desperate (because they were not onely strangers from the bodie of Christ, but also endeavoured with all their forces to oppresse his kingdome) he added, that the same is acceptable to God, which willeth all men to be saved. Whereby verily hee signifieth nothing else but that he hath stopped up the way to salvation to no degree of men: but rather that hee hath so powred out his mercie that hee willeth no man to be voide of it. The other sentences doe not declare what God hath by his secret judgement determined of all men: but doe shew that there is pardon readie for all sinners which doe onely turne themselves to require it. For if they more stiffely stand upon this, that it is said that hee will have mercie upon all, I will on the contrarie side answer them with that which is written in another place. That our God is in heaven where he doth whatsoever he will. This word therefore must so be expounded that it may agree with the other, I will have mercie upon whom I will have mercie, and I will shew mercie to whom I will shew mercie. Hee that choseth out them whom he will have mercy on, doth not give it to all. But sith it clearly appeareth that in that place is spoken not of all particular men. but of degrees of men, we will make no longer disputing about it. Howbeit it is also to be noted, that Paul doth not affirme what God doth alway and every where and in all men: but leaveth it to him at his liberty at length to make kings and magistrates partakers of the heavenly doctrine, although by reason of there blindness they doe now rage against it. They seeme to presse us more strongly with objecting the place of Peter, that God willeth none to perish, but receiveth all to repentance. But the undoing of this knot doth by and by offer it selfe in the second word, because the will to receive cannot be understood to be any other than that which is every where taught. Truly the turning is in the hand of God: whether he wilt turne all or no, let himselfe be asked, when hee promiseth that he will give to a certaine few men a fleshly heart, leaving to other some a stony heart. It is true indeed, that unlesse he were ready to receive them which call upon his mercie, this saying should be false. Turne to me, and I will turne to you. But I say that none of all mortall men doth come to God but he that is prevented of God: And if repentance were in the will of man, Paul would not say, If peradventure he give them repentance. Yea unlesse the same God which with word exhorteth all men to repentance, did with secret moving of his spirit bring the chosen to it: Jeremy would not say, Turne me, Lord, and I shall be turned: for when thou hast turned me, I have repeated.

16 But (thou wilt say) if it be so, there shall be small truth in the promises of the Gospel, which when they testifie of the will of God, affirme that he willeth that which is against his inviolable decree. Nor so. For howsoever the promises of salvation be universall, yet they nothing disagree with the predestination of the reprobate, so that wee direct our mindes to the effect of them. We know that then and not till then the promises are effectually to us, when we receive them by Faith, on the other side when Faith is made voide, the promise is therewithall abolished. If this be the nature of them, let us then see whether these things disagree together: that it is said that God hath from eternitie ordained whom he will embrace with love, and upon whom he will exercise wrath: and that he promiseth salvation to all without difference. Truly I say that they agree verie well. For in so promising he meaneth nothing else than that his mercie is set open for all which doe covet and crave it: which thing none doe but they whom hee hath enlightened. And then hee enlighteneth, whom he hath predestinate to salvation. They (I say) have the truth of the promises sure and unshaken, so as it cannot be said that there is any disagreement betweene the eternall election of God, and the testimonie of his grace which hee offereth to the Faithfull. But why nameth he all verily that the consciences of the godly may the more safely rest, when they understand that there is no difference of sinners, so that Faith be present: and that the wicked may not cavill for their excuse, that they want a sanctuarie whereunto they may withdraw themselves from the bondage of sinne, when with their owne unthankfulness they refuse it being offered them. Therefore when the mercy of God is by the Gospell offered to both sorts, it is Faith, that it is to say, the enlightning of God, which maketh difference betweene the godly and ungodly, so as the one sort feelth the effectualnesse of the Gospell, and the other sort obtaine no fruit thereof. The enlightning it selfe also hath the eternall election of God for the rule thereof. The complaint of Christ, which they alleadge, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft have I willed to gather together their chickens, but thou wouldest not? maketh nothing for them. I grant that Christ there speaketh not onely in the person of man, but also reprocheth them that in all ages they have refused his grace. But we must define that will of God which is entreated of. For neither is it unknowne, how diligently God endeavoured to keepe still that people, and with how great stiffnesse they even from the first to the last being given to their wandring desires refused to be gathered together: but it followeth not thereof that the counsell of God was made void by the malice of men

They answer and say that nothing lesse agreeth with the nature of God than to have a double will in him. Which I grant to them, so that they sely expound it. But why doe they not consider so many testimonies, where God putting upon him the affections of man, descendeth beneath his owne majestie? He saith that he hath with stretched out armes called the rebellious people, that he hath early and late travailed to bring them backe to him. If they will apply all these things to God, and not consider the figure, there shall arise many superfluous contentions, which this one solution bringeth to agreement, that the property of man is figuratively applied to God. How be it the solution which we have brought in another place largely sufficeth, that although the will of God be, as to our sense manifold: yet he doth not in himselfe diversly will this and that, but according to this wisdom, which is diversly manifold (as Paul calleth it) he amafeth our senses, till it shall be given us to know that he marvelously willeth that which now seemeth to be against his will. They also mocke with cavillations, that sith God is the Father of all, it is unrighteous that he should disherit any that hath not before with his owne fault deserved this punishment. As though the liberality of God stretcheth not even to hogges and dogges. But if they speake onely of mankind, let them answer why God bound himselfe to one people, to be the Father thereof: and why also out of the same people he picked a small number as it were a floure. But their owne lust of evill speaking hindereth these railers that they consider not that God so bringeth forth his Sunne to shine upon the good and evill, that the inheritance is laid up for a few, to whom it shall one day be said: Come ye blessed of my Father, possesse the kingdom, &c. They object also that God hateth none of these things that he hath made. Which although I grant them; yet this remaineth safe which I teach, that the reprobate are hatefull to God, and that very rightfully, because they being destitute of his Spirit can bring forth nothing but cause of curse. They say further, that there is no difference of the Jew and the Gentile, and therefore that the grace of God is without difference set before all men: namely, if they grant (as Paul determineth) that God calleth as well out of the Jewes as out of the Gentiles, according to his good pleasure, so that he is bound to no man. After this manner also is that wiped away which they object in another place, that God hath enclosed all things under sinne, that hee may have mercy upon all: namely because he will that the salvation of all them that are saved be ascribed to his mercy, although this benefit be not common to all. Now when many things are alleaged on both parts, let this be our conclusion, to tremble with Paul at to great depth, and if wanton tongues shall be busie, that we be not ashamed of this his crying out: O man, what art thou that strivest with God? For Augustine truly affirmeth that they doe perversly which measure the righteousness of God by the measure of the righteousness of man.

THE XXV. CHAPTER.

Of the last Resurrection.

Although Christ the sonne of righteousness, having overcome death, shining by the Gospell, giveth us the light of life (as Paul witnesseth) whereby also it is said that by beleeving wee have passed from death into life, being now not for reiners and strangers, but citizens with the saints, and of the household of God, which hath made us to sit with the onely begotten sonne himselfe in heavenly places, that nothing may be wanting to perfect felicitie: yet least it should be grievous unto us to be exercised under this hard warfare, as though we had no fruit of the victory which Christ hath gotten, we must hold fast that which is in another place taught of the nature of hope. For, because we hope for those things which appeare not, and (as it is said in another place) faith is a demonstration of things invisible: so long as wee are enclosed in the prison of the flesh, wee are wayfaring from the Lord. For which reason the same Paul saith in another place that wee are dead, and that our life is hidden with Christ in God, and that when hee which is our life, shall appeare, then shall we also appeare with him in glory. This therefore is our condition, that with living soberly and justly and godly in this world, wee looke for the blessed hope, and the comming of the glory of the great God, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Here we neede a singular patience, that we be not wearied and either turne backe our course or forsake our standing. Therefore whatsoever hath bene hitherto set out concerning our saluation, requireth mindes lifted up to heaven, that we may love Christ whom we have not seene and believing in him may rejoyce with unspeakable and glorious joyfulness: till we receive the end of our faith, as Peter telleth us. After which manner, Paul saith that the faith and charitie of the godly hath respect to the hope which is laid up in heaven. When wee thus with our eyes fastned upon Christ doe hang of heaven, and nothing withhold them in earth from carrying us to the promised blessednesse: then is that truly fulfilled, Our heart is where our treasure is. Hereupon commeth, that faith is so rare in the world, because nothing is more hard to our dulnesse than through innumerable steps to climbe up above them with endeavouring forward to the price of our heavenly calling. To the great heape of miseries wherewith wee be almost overwhelmed, are added the mockings of ungodly men, wherewith our simplicitie is rayled at, when voluntarily forsaking the allurements of present good things, wee seeme to follow the blessednesse hidden from us, as it were a fleeing shadow. Finally above and beneath us, before us and behinde us, violent tentations bessege us, to the sustaining of the feare whereof our courages should be firme too weake, unlesse being uncombred of earthly things they were fast bound to the heavenly life, which in seeming is farre from us. Wherefore onely hee hath soundly profited in the Gospell, which is enured to a continuall meditation of the blessed resurrection.

2 Of the soveraigne end of good things, the Philosophers have in old time curiously disputed, and also strived among themselves: yet none except Plato acknowledged the soveraigne good of man to be his conjoyning with God. But what manner of conjoyning that was, he could not perceive so much as with any small taste, and no marvell, sith he had never learned of the holy bond thereof. To us the onely and perfect felicitie is knowne even in this earthly waifaring: but, such as daily more and more enkindleth our hearts with desire of it, till the full enjoying may quisit us. Therefore I said that none receive fruit of the benefits of Christ, but they that lift up their mindes to the resurrection. For, Paul setteth up this marke to the faithfull, toward which he saith that he endeouret, and forgetteth all things till he come to it. And so much the more cheerefully ought we to travell toward it, least if this world withhold us, we suffer grievous punishment for our slothfulness. Wherefore in another place hee marketh the faithfull with this marke, that their conversion is in heaven, from whence also they looke for their Saviour. And that their courages should not faint in this race, hee joyneth all creatures companions with them. For, because every where are seene deformed ruines, hee saith that all things in heaven and earth doe endeavour to the renewing. For sith Adam by his fall dissolved the perfect order of nature to the creatures, their bondage is painfull and grievous, wherunto they are subject by reason of the sinne of man, not for that they are indued with any feeling, but for that they naturally covet the perfect estate from which they are fallen. Therefore Paul saith that they grone, and are as in paine of child bearing, that we to whom are given the first fruits of the spirit, may be ashamed to pine away in our corruption, and not at the least to follow the dead elements, which beare paine of anothers sinne. And the more to pricke us forward, hee calleth the last comming of Christ our redemption. It is true indeed that all the parts of our redemption are already fulfilled: But because Christ hath once bene offered for finnes, hee shall bee seene againe without sinne unto saluation. With what miseries soever we be pressed, let this redemption sustaine us even untill the performance of it.

3 The very weight of the thing it selfe shall whet our endeavour. For neither doth Paul without cause affirme that the holy Gospell is void and deceitfull, unlesse the dead doe rise againe: because our state should be more miserable than the state of all men, namely sith wee lying open to the harreds and reproches of many: are every houre in danger, yea and are as sheepe appointed to the slaughter: and therefore the authoritie thereof should fall away not onely in one part, but also in the whole sum which

& heavie to

which both our adoption and the effect of our saluation containeth. And so let us be heedfully bent to the most earnest thing of all, that no continuance of time may make us wearie. For which purpose I have deferred to this place that which I had breifly to intreate of it, that the Readers may learne, when they have received Christ the author of his saluation, to rise up higher, and may know that he is clothed with heavenly immortalitie and glorie, that the whole body may be made like fashioned to the head, as also the holy Ghost oftentimes setteth forth in his person an example of the resurrection. It is a thing hard to be beleaved, that bodies when they have bene consumed with rottenesse, shall at their appointed time rise up againe. Therefore where many of the Philosophers have affirmed soules to be immortal, the resurrection of the flesh hath bene allowed of few: wherein although there was no excuse, yet we are thereby put in minde, that it is too hard a thing to draw mans senses to beleve it. That faith may overcome so great a stop, the Scripture ministreth two helps: the one is in the likenesse of Christ, the other is the almightinesse of God. Now so oft as the resurrection is thought of, let the image of Christ come into our mindes: which in the nature that hee tooke of us, so ranne out the race of mortall life, that now having obtained immortalitie, hee is to us a pledge of the resurrection to come. For in the miseries wherewith wee are besieged, wee carrie about his mortifying in our flesh, that his life may be openly shewed in us. And wee may not sever him from us, neither can wee possibly, but that hee must be torne in sunder. Whereupon commeth that argument of Paul, If the dead doe not rise againe, then neither is Christ risen againe, because verily hee taketh that principle for confessed, that Christ was not made subject to death, nor obtained victorie of death by rising againe, privately for himselfe: but, that that was begun in the head which must needs be fulfilled in all the members, according to the degree and order of every one. For it were not right that they should in all points be made equall with him. It is said in the Psalme. Thou shalt not suffer thy meeke one to see corruption: although a portion of this trust pertaine to us according to the measure of gift, yet the full effect hath not appeared but in Christ, which being free from all rotting, hath received againe his bodie whole. Now lest the fellowship of blessed resurrection with Christ should be doubtfull to us, that wee may be contented with this pledge, Paul expressly affirmeth that hee therefore sitteth in heaven, and shall come at the last day a Judge, that hee may make our base and vile bodie like fashioned to the glorious bodie. In another place also hee teacheth, that God raised not up his Sonne from death to the intent to shew a token of his power: but to stretch out the same effectuall force of the spirit toward us which are faithfull: whom hee theretore calleth life, while hee liveth in us, because hee was given to this end that he should make alive that which is mortall in us. I knit up in a brieve abridgement those things which might both be more largely handled, and are worthe to be more gorgeously set out: and yet I trust that the godly readers shall in few words finde matter enough which may suffice to edifie their faith. Christ therefore is risen againe, that hee might have us companions of the life to come. Hee was raised up of the Father, in so much as hee was the head of the Church, from which hee doth in no wise suffer himselfe to be plucked away. Hee was raised up by the power of the Spirit, which is common to us unto the office of quickening. Finally hee was raised up, that hee should be resurrection and life. But as wee have said that in this mirrour, there is to be seene of us a lively image of the resurrection, so let it be to us a sure substance to stay our minde, so that yet we be not lothfull or wearie of long tarrying: because it is not our part to measure the seasons of times by our will, but patiently to rest, till God at his owne fit time repaire his kingdom. To which purpose seemeth that exhortation of Paul: The first fruits is Christ: and then they that are Christs, every one in his order. But that no question should be moved of the resurrection of Christ, upon which the resurrection of us all is founded, we see by how many and how diverse meanes he hath made it approved by witnesse to us. Fine nosed men will laugh at the historie which the Evangelists rehearse, as at a childish mockery. being in a manner astonished? Why did not Christ rather set up the triumphing signes of his victorie in the midst of the temple and the market place? Why came hee not forth terrible into the sight of Pilate? Why doth he not also prove himselfe to the Priests, and to whole Jerusalem that hee is risen up alive againe? As for the witnesses which hee chose, prophane men will scarcely grant them to be sufficient. I answer, that although in these beginnings the weaknesse thereof was contemptible, yet all this was governed by the wonderfull providence of God: that partly the love of Christ and zeale of godlinesse, and partly their owne hardnesse of beliefe should carrie them in hast to the sepulchre which had lately beene dismaied for feare, that they might not onely be seeing witnesses of the thing, but also should heare of the Angels that which they saw with their eyes. How shall we suspect their credit, who thought it to be a fable which they had heard of the women, till they were brought to the present sight of the thing it selfe? As for all the people and the Ruler himselfe, after that they had been largely convinced, it is no marvell if as well the sight of Christ, as other signes was not granted them. The sepulchre was sealed up, the watchmen watched it, the third day the bodie was not found. The souldiers corrupted with money scattered a rumor that his disciples had stolen him away: As though they had had power to gather a band together, or had armour, or were practised men to enterprise any such feare. If the souldiers had not courage enough to drive them away, why did they not pursue them, that with the help of the people they might have taken some of them? Pilate therefore with his ring truly sealed the resurrection of Christ: and the watchmen which were set at the sepulchre both in their holding their peace and in their lying, were made publishers of the same resurrection. In the meane time the voyce of Angels sounded, He is risen, hee is not heere. The heavenly glistering plainly shewed that they were not men but Angels. Afterward, if there remained any doubting, Christ himselfe tooke it away. The disciples saw him oftner than once, and also felt his feet and his hands, that their hardnesse of beleeving not a litle profited to the strengthening of our faith. Hee disputeth among them of the mysteries of the kingdom of God, and at the last in their sighs beholding him, he ascended into heaven. And not onely this sight was shewed to the xj. Apostles, but also he was seene at once of moe than five hundred brethren. Now when he sent the holy Ghost, hee shewed a sure prooffe not onely of life, but also of the soveraigne power: as he had said before, It is profitable for you that I goe: otherwise the holy Ghost shall not come. But now Paul was overthrowne by the way, not by the strength of a dead man, but he felt him whom he persecuted to have most high power. To Stephen hee appeared for another end, namely, that with assurednesse of life hee might overcome the feare of death. To discredit so many authentike witnesses, is not onely a part of distrustfulnesse, but also of froward and furious stubbornnesse.

4 This which we have said, that in proving the resurrection our senses must be directed to the infinite power of God, Paul briefly teacheth, that he may make (saith he) our vile bodie like fashioned to the bodie of his brightnesse, according to the working of his power, by which hee may subdue all things to himselfe. Wherefore nothing is more unmeete, than heere to have respect what may naturally be done, where an inestimable miracle is set before us, which with the greatnesse thereof swalloweth up our senses. Yea, Paul by setting forth an example of nature, reproveth their dulnesse which denie the resurrection. Thou foole (saith hee) that which thou slowest is not quickened unlesse it first dye, &c. Hee saith that in seed is seene a forme of the resurrection, because our of rottennesse groweth corne. Neither were it so hard a thing to beleve, if wee were as heedfull as wee ought to be to the miracles which throughout all the coasts of the world doe offer themselves to our eyes. But let us remember that none is truly perswaded of the resurrection to come; but hee which being ravished into admiration, giveth to the power of God his glorie. Esay lifted up with this affiance, crieth out, Thy dead shall live, my carcase shall rise againe. Awake ye, and praise, ye dwellers of the dust. In despaired case hee lifeth up himselfe to God the author of life, in whose hand are the ends of death, as it is said in the Psalm. Job also being liker to a carrion than to a man, trusting upon the power of God, sticketh not as though though hee were whole and found to lift up himselfe to that day, saying, I know that my redeemer liveth: and in the last day hee shall rise upon the dust (namely to shew forth his power therein) and I shall againe be compassed with my skin, and in my flesh I shall see God, I shall see him, and none other. For albeit that some doe subtly wrest these places, as though they ought not to be understood of the resurrection, yet they strengthen that which they covet to overthrow: because the holy men in their evils seeke comfort from no where else than from the likenesse of the resurrection. Which better appeareth by the place of Ezechiel. For when the Jewes beleaved not the promise of their returne, and objected that it was no more likely that a way should be made open for them, than that dead men should come out of their grave: there was a vision shewed to the Prophet, a field full of drie bones: those the Lord commanded to take againe flesh and sinewes. Although under that figure hee raiseth up the people to hope of returne: yet the matter of hoping hee gathereth of the resurrection: as it is to us an exemplar of the deliverances which the faithfull doe feele in this world. So Christ when he had taught that the voice of the Gospell giveth life: because the Jewes received not this, he by and by said further: Marvell not at this, because the houre cometh in which all that are in the graves shall heare the voice of the sonne of God, and shall come forth. Therefore after this example of Paul, let us already cheerefully triumph in the midst of battels, because he which hath promised life to come, is mightie to keepe that which is left with him: and so let us glorie that a crowne of righteousness is laid up for us, which the just judge shall deliver us. So shall it come to passe, that whatsoever griefes we suffer, they shall be to us a shewing of the life to come, because it agreeth with the nature of God to render affliction to the wicked which afflict us: but to us which are unjustly afflicted, rest at the appearing of Christ with the Angels of his power, in a flame of fire. But that is to beholden which hee addeth by and by afterward, that hee shall come that hee may be glorified in his Saints, and be made wonderfull in all them that have beleaved, because the Gospell hath bene beleaved.

5 But although the mindes of men ought to have bene continually occupied in this studie: yet as though they would of set purpose destroy all remembrance of the resurrection, they have called death the uttermost bond of all things, and the destruction of man. For verily Salomon speaketh of the common and received opinion, when hee saith that a living dog is better than a dead Lion. And in another place: Who knoweth whether the soule of a man goe upward, and the soule of a beast downward? But in all ages this brutish senseles error hath been common in the world, yea and hath broken into the Church it selfe: for the Sadduces have presumed to professe openly that there is no resurrection, yea and that soules are mortall. But that this grosse ignorance should not helpe to excuse any man, the infidels even by very instinct of nature have alway had an image of the resurrection before their eyes. For to what purpose served that holy and inviolable manner of burying, but to be an earnest of new life? Neither may it be answered that this spring of error: because the religiousnesse of buriall was alway in use among the holy Fathers, and God willed the same manner to remaine among the Gentiles, than an image of the resurrection set before them might awake their drowsinesse. But although that ceremonie wanted his use of profiting, yet it is profitable for us if we wisely marke the end of it, because it is no slender confutation of unbelieve, that altogether professed that which no man beleaved. But Satan hath not onely astonished the senses of men, so that they have buried with the bodies the remembrance of the resurrection, but also hath practised to corrupt this part of doctrine with divers fained inventions, that at length it might utterly die. I passe over, how in Pauls time Satan began to pinch at it: but in a little after there followed the Millenarics, which limited the raigne of Christ to a thousand yeares. This error is childish, that it needeth nor is not worthy of any confutation. Neither doth the Revelation make on their side, by which it is certaine that they coloured their error: for as much as in the place where he mentioneth the number of a thousand, he treateth not of the eternall blessednesse of the Church, but onely of the divers troubles which were to come upon the Church while it yet travelled in earth. But the whole Scripture crieth out that there shall be no end of the blessednesse of the elect, nor of the punishment of the reprobate. Now of all things which both are hidden from our sight and doe far passe the capacie of our minde, either we must fetch the credit out of the certaine oracles of God, or we must utterly cast it away. They which assigne to the children of God a thousand yeares to enjoy the inheritance of the life to come, doe not marke how great a dishonour they doe both to Christ and his kingdome. For if they shall not be clothed with immortalitie: then neither is Christ himselfe, to whose glory they shall be newly fashioned, received into the immortall glorie. If their blessednesse shall have any end: then the kingdome of Christ, upon the steadfastnesse whereof it standeth, endureth but for a time. Finally, either they are most unskillfull of all matter concerning God, or they goe about with crooked malicionnesse to overthrow the whole grace of God, and power of Christ, the fulfilling whereof is no otherwise perfect, but when sinne being blotted out and death swallowed up, eternall life is fully restored. But very blind men may see how fondly they play the fooles: which feare that they should ascribe to God too great cruelty if the reprobate be condemned to everlasting paines. The Lord forsooth shall doe wrong, if he denie his kingdome to them which have by their unthankfulnesse made themselves unworthy of it. But (say they) their finnes endure but for a time. I grant: but the majestie, yea and the righteousnesse of God which they have offended by sinning, is eternall. Worthily therefore the remembrance of iniquitie dieth not: But so the paine exceedeth the measure of the fault. This is a blasphemie not to be suffered, when the majestie of God is so little set by, when the despising thereof is esteemed at no greater value than the destruction of one soule. But let us leave these trifles, least contrary to that which wee have before said, we may seeme to judge their dotages worthy of confusion.

6 Beside these, there have bene two other doting errors brought in by men perversly curious. The one sort thought, as though the whole man died, that the soules shall rise againe with the bodies. The other forasmuch as they grant that the soules be immortall spirits, say that they shall be clothed with new bodies: whereby they denie the resurrection of the flesh. Of the first sort, because I have touched somewhat in speaking of the creation of man, it shall be enough for me to warne the readers againe, how heahtly an error it is to make of a spirit fashioned after the image of God, a vanishing blast which doth nothing but quicke the bodie in this fraile life, and to bring the temple of the holy Ghost to nothing. Finally, to spoile that part of us wherein divinenesse chiefly shineth and marks of immortalitie appeare, to spoile it (I say) of this gift: so that the estate of the bodie should be better and more excellent than the estate of the soule. The scripture teacheth far other wise, which compareth the body to a cottage, out of which it saith that we remove when we die, because it esteemeth us by that part which maketh us differing from brut beasts. So Peter being nigh to death, saith that the time is come, when hee must lay away his tent. And Paul speaking of the faithfull, after that he hath said: That when our earthly house shall be dissolved, there is a building for us in heaven, adjoyneth that we are wayfaring from the Lord so long as we abide in the bodie, but doe desire the presence of God in the absence of the bodie. If the soules doe not overlive the bodies, what is it that hath God present, when it is severed from the bodie? But the Apostle taketh away all doubting, when he reacheth that wee are joynd in fellowship to the spirits of the righteous. By which words hee sheweth, that we are joynd in fellowship to the holie fathers, which even being dead doe keepe the same godlinesse with us, so that wee cannot be the members of Christ unless wee grow together with them. Unless also the soules being unclotted of the bodies, did keepe still their substance and were able to receive blessed glorie, Christ would not have said to the theefe: This day thou shalt bee with mee in Paradise. Having so cleare testimonies, let us not doubt after the example of Christ when wee are dying, to commend our soules to God, or after the example of Stephen to commit them to Christ to keepe, which not unworthily is called a faithfull shepheard and Bishop of them. To enquire of their meane state, is neither lawfull nor expedient. Many doe much comber themselves with disputing what place they keepe, and whether they doe now enjoy the heavenly glorie or no. But it is folly and rashnes, to search deeplier of unknowne things, than God doth give us leave to know.

Act. 7. 59.

When the Scripture hath said that Christ is present with them, and receiveth them into Paradise that they may enjoy comfort, on the other side that the soules of the reprobate doe suffer such paines as they have deserved: it goeth no further. What teacher or Master shall now open to us that which God hath hidden? Of the place, the question is no lesse fond and vaine: forasmuch as wee know that there is not the same dimension of the Soule which is of the bodie. Whereas the blessed gathering together of holie Spirits is called the bosome of Abraham, it is enough for us after this wayfaring to be received of the common father of the Faithfull, that he may communicate with us the fruit of his Faith. In the meane time such the Scripture every where biddeth us to hang upon the expectation of Christs coming, and desereth the crowne of glory till then: let us be content with these bonds appointed us of God: namely, that the Soules of the godly having ended the labour of their warfare doe goe into a blessed rest, where with happie joyfulness they looke for the enjoying of the promised glory: and that so all things are holden in suspense till Christ the redeemer appeare. As for the reprobate, it is no doubt that they have the same estate which Jude assigneth to the devils, to be holden bound with chaines, till they be drawne to the punishment whereunto they are condemned.

7 No lesse monstrous is their error which imagine that Soules shall not receive againe the same bodies where with they are now clothed, but shall have new and other bodies. And the reason of the Moniches was very trifling, that is; that it is not meete that flesh which is uncleane should rise againe. As though there were no uncleanness of Soules, which yet they debarred not from the hope of everlasting life. It was therefore all one as if they should say, that that which is infected with the filth of sinne cannot be cleansed by God. For I now passe over that dotage, that flesh was naturally uncleane, because it was create of the Divell: Onely I shew that whatsoever is now in us unworthy of heaven, it hindereth not the resurrection. And first whereas Paul biddeth the Faithfull to cleanse themselves from all defiling of the flesh and of the Spirit, thereupon followeth the judgement which he in another place pronounceth, that every man shall receive by his bodie either good or evill. Wherewith agreeth that which he writeth to the Corinthians, That the life of Jesus Christ may be openly shewed in our mortall flesh. For which reason in another place hee doth no lesse pray that God preserve the bodies whole unto the day of Christ, than the Soules and Spirits. And no morevill, because it were a most great absurditie that the bodies which God hath dedicate to be temples to himselfe, should fall away into rottenness without hope of rising againe. What say wee to this, that they are also the members of Christ? that God commandeth all the parts of them to be sanctified to himselfe? that he willeth his name to be praised with tongues, pure hands to be lifted up to him, sacrifices to be offered? What madness is it therefore, that that part to which the heavenly Judge hath vouchsafed to grant so great honor, should be brought from a mortall man into dust without any hope of restoring? Likewise when Paul exhorteth us to suffer with the Lord as well in bodie as in Soule, because both belong to God, verily he suffereth not that which he challengeth to God as holy, to be adjudged to eternal rottenness. Neither is there a plainer determination of the Scripture for anything, than for the rising againe of this flesh which we beare. This corruptible (saith Paul) must put on uncorruption, and this mortall must put on immortalitie. If God did make new bodies, where is this changing of qualitie? If it had beene said that we must be renewed, the doubtfull speech peradventure might have given occasion to their cavillation. But now when pointing with his finger to the bodies where with wee are clothed, he promiseth to them uncorruption, he plainly enough denieth any new bodies to be made. Yea he could not (saith Tertullian) speake more plainly, unless he had holden his owne skin in his hand. And they can by no cavillation escape from this, that where in another place he saith that Christ shall be the judge of the world, hee alleadgeth this testimonie of Esay, I live (saith the Lord) every knee shall bow to me: for as much as he plainly pronounceth that they to whom he speaketh shall be subject to yeeld an account of their life, which could not agree, if new bodies should be brought before the judgement seate. Now in the words of Daniel there is no doubtfulness: And many of them that sleepe in the earth of dust, shall awake, awake, some to eternall life, and some to reproches and to everlasting contempt: sith hee fetcheth not new matter out of the foure elements to make men, but calleth dead men out of their graves. And this very plaine reason teacheth. For if mortalitie which tooke beginning at the fall of man, be accidentall: then the repairing which Christ brought, pertaineth to the same bodie which began to be mortall. And truly, whereas the Athenians laughed when Paul affirmed the resurrection, thereupon we may gather what manner of resurrection he preached: and that same laughing not smally availeth to strengthen our faith. The saying of Christ also is worthie to be noted. Feare them not which kill the bodie, and cannot kill the soule: but feare him which can throw both the soule and the body into hell fire. For there is no cause to feare, unless the body which we now beare be subject to punishment. And no lesse plaine is another saying of the same Christ. The houre cometh, when all they that are in graves, shall heare the voyce of the Sonne of God, and shall come forth: they that have done good, into the resurrection of life: but they that have done evil, into the resurrection of judgement. Shall wee say that soules rest in the graves, that they lying there may heare Christ? and not rather that at his commandement the bodies shall returne into the liveliness which they had lost? Moreover, if we shall have new bodies given us, where is the like fashioning of the head & the members? Christ rose againe: was it with forging to himselfe a new body? No, but as he had said before, Destroy this temple, and in three dayes I will build it up: he tooke againe the same body which he had before borne mortall. For he had not much profited us, if a new body being put in place, the old body had bene destroyed which was offred up for a sacrifice of satisfactorie cleansing. Wee must also hold fast that fellowship which the Apostle preacheth. That we rise againe, because Christ hath risen againe: for nothing is lesse probable then that our flesh in which we beare about the mortifying of Christ, should be deprived of the resurrection of Christ. Which verily appeared by a notable example, when at the rising againe of Christ many bodies of the Saints came out of the graves. For it cannot be denied that this was a foreshewing, or rather an earnest of the last resurrection which we hope for: such as was before in Enoch and Eliar, whom Tertullian calleth New possessors of the resurrection: because they being in bodie and soule delivered from corruption, were received into the keeping of God.

8 I am ashamed in so cleere a matter to spend so many words: but the readers shall contentedly beare this trouble with me, that no hole may be open for froward and bold wits to deceive the simple. The fleeing spirits with whom I now dispute, bring forth a faigned invention of their owne braine that at the resurrection there shall be a creation of new bodies. What reason moveth them to thinke so, but because it seemeth to them incredible, that a carrion consumed with so long rottemesse should returne into his aunient state? Therefore onely unbelieve is the mother of this opinion. But us on the other side the Spirit of God ech where in the Scripture exhorteth to hope for the resurrection of the flesh. For this reason baptisme (as Paul witnesseth) is to us a seale of the resurrection to come: and likewise the holie Supper allureth us to the trust thereof, when we receive with our mouth the signes of spirittuall grace. And truly the whole exhortation of Paul, that we give our members to be weapons unto the obedience of righteousness, should be cold unless that were joynd which he addeth afterward. Hee that hath raised up Christ from the dead, shall quicken also your mortall bodies. For, what should it profit to applie our feet, hands, eyes, and tongues, unto the service of God, unless they were partakers of the fruite and reward? Which thing Paul plainly confirmeth with his owne words, saying: The body not to fornication, but to the Lord: and the Lord to the body. And he that hath raised up Christ, shall also raise us up by his power. More plaine are those words which follow: That our bodies are the temples of the holie Ghost and the members of Christ. In the meane time wee see how hee joyneth the resurrection with chastitie and holinesse, as a little after hee saith that the price of redemption pertaineth also to the bodies. Now it were not reasonable that the bodie of Paul, in which hee hath borne the prints of Christ, and in which hee honourable glorified Christ, should loose the reward of the crowne. Whereupon also came that glorying. Wee looke for the Redeemer from heaven, which which shall make our vile bodie like fashioned to the bodie of his brightnesse. And if this be true, that we must by many afflictions enter into the kingdome of God, no reason suffereth to debar the bodies from this entrie which God both exerciseth under the stander of the crosse, and honoreth with the praise of victorie. Therefore of this matter there arose among the Saints no doubting, but that they hoped to be companions of Christ, which removeth into his owne person all the afflictions wherewith we are proved, to teach that they bring life. Yea and under the law he exercised the holy fathers in this faith with an outward ceremonie. For to what purpose served the usage of burying; as we have already shewed, but that they should know that there is new life prepared for the bodies that are laid up? Heereunto also tended the spices and other signes of immortalitie, wherewith under the law the darknesse of faith was holpen even as it was by the sacrifices. Neither was that manner bred by superstition, forasmuch as we see that the spirit doth no lesse diligently rehearse burials than the chiefe mysteries of faith. And Christ commendeth that worke as a special worke, truly for none other reason but because it lifeth up our eies from beholding of the grave which corrupteth and destroyeth all, to the sight of the renewing. Moreover the so diligent observing of the ceremonie which is praised in the fathers, sufficiently proveth that it was to them a rare and pretious helpe of faith. For neither would Abraham have so carefully provided for the burying place of his wife, unless there had bene set before his eies a religion and a profit higher than the world, namely that garnishing the dead bodie of his wife with the signes of the resurrection he might confirme both his owne faith and the faith of his household. But a clearer proove of this thing appeareth in the example of Jacob, which to testifie to his posteritie, that the hope of the promised land was not even by death fallen out of his minde, commanded his bones to be carried thither. I beseech you, if he was not to be clothed with a new bodie, should he not have given a fond commandement concerning dust that should be brought to nothing? Wherefore if the authoritie of the Scripture be of any force with us, there can be required of no doctrine either a more cleare or more certaine proove. For this even children underst and by the words of resurrection, and raising up againe. For neither can we call it the resurrection of that which is now first created, neither should that saying of Christ stand fast, Whatsoever the Father hath given me, it shall not perish but I will raise it up in the last day. To the same purpose serveth the word of Sleeping, which pertaineth onely to the bodies. Whereupon also burying places were called Cemeteria, Sleeping places. Now it remaineth that I speake somewhat of the manner of the resurrection. I use this word, because Paul calling it a mysterie, exhorteth us to sobriety, and bridleth the libertie to dispute like Philosophers freely and subdely of it. First we must hold, as we have said, that we shall rise againe in the same flesh which we beare, as touching the substance, but the qualitie shall be other. As when the same flesh of Christ which had bene offered for sacrifice, was raised up againe, yet it excelled in other qualities as if it had bene altogether another flesh. Which thing Paul declareth by familiar examples. For as there is all one substance of the flesh of a man, and of a beast, but not all one qualitie: as all stars have like matter, but not like brightnesse: so he teacheth that though we shall keepe still the substance of our bodie, yet there shall be a change, that the state of it may be much more excellent. The bodie therefore, that we may be raised up againe, shall not perish nor vanish away: but putting off corruption, it shall put on incorruption. But for as much as God hath all the elements ready at his becke, no hardnesse shall hinder him, but that he may command both the earth and waters and fire, to render that which seemeth to be consumed by them. Which also Esay testifieth though not without a figure, where he saith, Behold, the Lord shall goe forth of his place, that he may visit the iniquitie of the earth: and the earth shall discover her blood, and shall no more hide her dead. But there is to be noted a difference betweene them that have bene dead long before, and those whom that day shall finde alive. For we shall not all sleepe (as Paul saith) but we shall all be changed: that is to say, it shall not be of necessitie that there be a distance of time betweene death and the beginning of the second life: because in a moment of time, and in the twinkling of an eie the sound of the trumpet shall pearce, to raise up the dead uncorruptible, and with a sudden change to fashion again the living into the same glorie. So in another place hee comforteth the faithfull which must die: because they which shall then remaine alive shall not goe before the dead, but rather they shall first rise againe which have slept in Christ. If any object that saying of the Apostle, that it is appointed to all mortall men once to die, it is easie to answer it, with saying that when the state of nature is changed, it is a kinde of death, and is fitly so called. And therefore these things agree well together, th<sup>e</sup> shall be renewed by death when they shall put off their mortall bodie: and yet that it is not necessar<sup>y</sup> that there be a severing of the bodie and the soule where there shall bee a sudden changing.

9 But here ariseth a harder question: by what right the resurrection which is the singular benefit of Christ is common also to the wicked and the accursed of God. We know that all were in Adam condemned to the death. Christ came the resurrection and life. Came he to give life to all mankind universally without choise? But what is more against reason than that, that they should by their obstinate blindness obtaine that which the godly worshippers of God doe obtaine onely by faith? Yet this remaineth certaine, that there shall be one resurrection of judgement, and another resurrection of life, and that Christ shall come to sever the Lambes from the goates. I answer, that this ought not to seeme strange, the likeness whereof we see in daily experience. We see that in Adam we were deprived of the inheritance of the whole world, & that we are by no lesse just reason debarred from common food, than from the eating of the tree of life. Whence then cometh it to passe, that God doth not onely make his sunne to rise upon the good and evill, but also as touching the uses of this present life, his inestimable liberalitie continually floweth forth to them with large plentifulnesse? Hereby verily we know that those things which properly belong to Christ and his members, doe also overflow to the wicked, not that it is their rightfull possession, but that they may be made the more inexcusable. So the wicked doe oftentimes finde God beneficiall, by more than meane proofes, yea such as sometime doe darken all the blessings of the godly, but yet doe turne to their greater damnation. If any man object, that the resurrection is not fitly compared to fading and earthly benefit: here also I answer that so soone as they were estranged from God the fountaine of life, they deserved the death of the Divell, whereby they should be utterly destroyed. Yer by the marvellous counsell of God there was found a meane state that out of life they might live in death. No more absurditie ought it to seeme, if the resurrection happen to the wicked, which draweth them against their wils to the judgement seat of Christ, whom now they refuse to heare for their master and teacher. For it were a small paine to be consumed a way with death, if they were not to suffer punishment for their obstinacie, brought before the Judge, whose vengeance they have without end, and measure provoked against themselves. But although we must hold that which we have said, and which that notable confession of Paul before Felix containeth, that hee looketh for the resurrection of the righteous, and wicked: yet the Scripture oftentimes setteth forth election together with the heavenlie glorie to the onely children of God: Because Christ properly came not to the destruction, but to the salvation of the world. Therefore in the Creede there is made mention of the blessed life onely.

10 But for as much as the prophetic of death swallowed up by victorie, shall then and not till then be fulfilled: let us alway have in minde the eternall felicitie, the end of the resurrection: of the excellencie whereof, if all things were spoken which the tongues of men were able to speake, yet scarcely the smallest parcell thereof should be expressed. For howsoever we truly heare that the kingdome of God shall bee stuffed full with brightnesse, joy, felicitie, and glorie: yet those things that are spoken of are most far removed from our sense, and remaine as it were wrapped in darke speeches, untill that day come when he himselfe shall give to us his glory to be seene face to face. We know (saith John) that we are the children of God, but it hath not yet appeared. But when we shall be like to him, then we shall see him such as hee is. Wherefore the Prophets, because they could by no words expresse the spirituall blessednesse in it selfe, did in a manner grossely portray it out under bodily things. But for as much as the ferventnesse of desire must with some taste of that sweetnesse kindled in us, let us chiefly continue in this thought, that if God doe as a certaine fountaine which cannot be drawen dry, containe in him the fulnesse of all good things, nothing is beyo id him to be coveted of them that tend toward the soveraigne good and the full perfection of felicity : as wee are taught in many places. Abraham, I am thy exceeding great reward. With which saying accordeth David. The Lord is my portion, the lot hath very well fallen to me. Againe in another place, I shall bee satisfied with thy countenance, but Peter pronounceth that the faithfull are called to this end, that they may be made partakers of the nature of God. How so? because he shall be glorified in all his Saints, and shall bee made wonderfull in them that have beleevd. If the Lord will impart his glory power, and righteousnesse with his elect, yea and will give himselfe to them to bee enjoyed, and (which is better) will after a certaine manner grow into one with them : let us remember that under this benefit is contained all kinde of felicity. And when we have much profited in this meditation, let us reknowlege that wee yet stay beneath at the bottome of the roores, if the conceiving of our minde bee compared with the highnesse of this mystery. Wherefore in this behalfe wee must keepe sobriety, least with how much greater bouldnes wee shall fly upon high being unmindfull of our owne small measure, so much more the brightnesse of the heavenly glory overwhelme us. We feele also how the unmeasurable greedinesse to know more than is lawfull, tickleth us : from whence both trifling and hurtfull questions doe spring from time to time : trifling I call those of which there can no profit be gathered, but this second kinde is worse, because they which give themselves to them doe entangle themselves with pernicious speculations, and therefore I call them hurtfull. That which the Scriptures doe teach, ought to bee out of all doubt with us : namely that as God diversly distributing his gifts to the Saints in this world, doth unequally enlighten them, so the measure of glory shall not be equall in heaven where God shall crowne his gifts. For neither doth this belong indifferently to all which Paul saith : Yee are my glory and crowne in the day of Christ : nor also that saying of Christ to the Apostles : Yee shall sit judging the twelve tribes of Israel. But Paul (which knew that as God enricheth the holy ones with spirituall gifts in earth, so hee beautifieth them with glory in heaven) doubteth not that there is a peculiar crowne laid up for him according to the rate of his labours. And Christ to set forth to the Apostles the dignitie of the office which they did beare, telleth them that the fruit thereof is laid up for them in heaven. So Daniel also saith, but the wise shall shine as the brightnesse of the firmament, and they which justifie many, as Starres to the worlds end and for ever. And if a man heedfully consider the Scriptures they doe not onely promise eternall life to the faithfull, but also speciall reward to every one. Whereupon commeth that saying of Paul, The Lord render to him in that day. Which the promise of Christ confirmeth, Yee shall receive a hundred in the eternall life. Finally, as Christ beginneth in this world the glory of his body with manifold diversity of gift, and encreaseth it by degrees : so he shall also make it perfect in heaven.

II But as all the godly will receive this with one consent, because it is sufficiently testified by the word of God : so on the other side leaving crabbed questions, which they shall know to bee a hinderance to them, they will not passe their appointed bounds. As for my part, I doe not onely privately forbear superfluous searching of unprofitable things, but I also thinke that I ought to beware that I doe not with answering nowrith the lightnesse of other. Men hungry of vaine knowledge doe aske how great shall bee the distance betweene the Prophets and the Apostles, and againe betweene the Apostles and the Martyrs : how many degrees Virgins differ from married folkes : Finally, they leave no corner of heaven unsearched. Then it commeth to their mindes to enquire to what purpose serveth the repairing of the world, sith the children of God shall neede nothing of all this so great and incomparable plenty : but shall bee like to the Angels, whose not eating is a signe of the eternall blessednesse. but I answer, that in the very sight there shall bee so great pleasantnesse, so great sweetnesse in the onely knowledge without any use, that this felicity shall farre passe all the helps wherewith wee bee now holpen. Let us imagine our selves to be set in the most wealthy coast of the world, and where wee shall want no pleasure : yet who is there whom his sickeneſſe doe not ſometime hinder, and not ſuffer to uſe the benefits of God? who is there whoſe courſe his owne intemperance doth not oft breake in ſunder? Whereupon followeth that a cleere injoying and pure from all fault, although there bee no uſe of corruptible life, is the perfection of felicity. Some goe further and aſke whether droſſe and other corruptions in metalls, bee not farre from reſtoring and are contrary to it. Which though in ſome reſpects I grant, yet I looke with Paul for are repairing of theſe faults which tooke their beginning at ſinne, toward which repairing they grone and are in travell. Yet they proceede further, and aſke what better eſtate is prepared for man, ſith the bleſſing of iſſue ſhall then be at an end. This knot is alſo eaſie to bee looſed. Whereat the Scripture ſo honourably ſetteth out that kinde of bleſſing, that is referred to the increaſes wherewith God continually draweth forward the order of nature to her marke: but in the perfection it is knowne that there is another manner. But ſith the unware are eaſily taken with allurements, and then the maze draweth them in deeplier, and at length when every mans devices pleaſe himſelfe there is no end of ſtriving: therefore let this bee a ſhort way for us, to be contented with the glaſſe and darke ſpeech untill we ſhall ſee face to face. For few of a great multitude care in which way they may goe to heaven: but all doe before their time covet to know what is done their. All being commonly ſluggiſh and ſlow to enter into battailes, doe already paint out to themſelves imagined triumphes.

12 Now becauſe no diſcription can match the grievouſneſſe of the vengeance of God upon the reprobate, their torments and paines are figured to us by bodily things, namely, by darkeneſſe, weeping, gnawing of teeth, unquenchable fire, and a worme endleſſely gnawing the heart. For by ſuch manners of ſpeech it is certaine that the holy Ghoſt meant to trouble all our ſenſes with horreur? as when it is ſaid that there is prepared from eternity a deepe Hell, that the nourishments thereof are fire and much wood: that the blaſt of the Lord, as a ſtreame of brimeſtone, doth ſet it on fire. As by ſuch things we muſt the holpen after a certaine manner to conceive the miſerable ſtate of the wicked, ſo we ought chiefly to faſten our thought upon this, how wretched a thing it is to bee eſtranged from the fellowſhip of God: and not that onely, but alſo to feele the Majeſty of God ſo bent againſt thee, that thou canſt not eſcape but bee faſt ſtrained of it. For firſt his diſpleaſure is like a moſt violent fire, with touching whereof all things are devoured and ſwallowed up. Then, all creatures ſo ſerve him to execute his judgement, that they to whom the Lord ſhall ſo ſhew his wrath, ſhall feele the heaven, earth, ſea, and beaſts, as it were with cruell indignation enflamed againſt them, and armed to their deſtruction. Wherefore it is no ſmall thing that the Apoſtle pronounceth, when he ſaith, that the unbelieving ſhall ſuffer eternall puniſhment by dying from the face of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. And ſo oft as the Prophets doe caſt us in feare with bodily figures, although they ſpeake nothing exceſſively for our dulneſſe, yet they adde foreſe the wings of the judgement to come, in the Sunne and Moone, and the whole frame of the world. Wherefore the unhappy conſciences do finde no reſt, from being vexed and toſſed with a terrible whirlewinde, from feeling themſelves to be torne in peeces by God being angerly bent againſt them, from being pierced and launced with deadly ſtings, from trembling at the lightning of God, and being bruised with the weight of his hand: ſo that it is much more eaſe to enter into all bottomeleſſe depths and devouring pits, than to ſtand one moment in thoſe terrors. What and how great then is this, to be preſſed with everlaſting and never ceaſing ſiege of him? Of which thing the 90. Pſalme containeth a notable ſentence: that although with onely ſight hee ſcatter abroad all mortall men and bring them to naught, yet his worſhippers; how much more fearefull they are in the world, ſo much more hee inforceth them and pricketh them forward loaden with the croſſe, untill he be all in all.

THE FIRST CHAPTER.

Of the true Church with which we ought to keepe unity, because it is the mother of all the godly.

HAT by Faith of the Gospell, Christ is become ours, and we be made partakers of the salvation brought by him, and of eternall blessednesse, is already declared in the last booke. But because our rudenesse and slothfulnesse, yea and vanity of wit, doe need outward helps whereby Faith in us may both be ingendred, and grow and increas: in proceeding toward the marke whereunto it tendeth: God hath also added them thereby to provide for our weakenesse. And that the Preaching of the Gospell might flourish, he hath left this treasure with the church. Hee hath appointed Pastors and Teachers, by whose mouth hee might teach them that bee his: hee hath furnished them with authority, finally, hee hath left nothing undone that might avale to the holy consent of Faith, and right order. First of all he hath ordained Sacraments, which we feele by experience to be more than profitable helps to nourish and confirme Faith. For because being inclosed in the prison of our flesh, we doe not yet attaine to the degree of Angels, God applying himselfe to our capacity according to his wonderfull providence, hath appointed a meane whereby wee being farre distant from him might come unto him. Wherefore the order of teaching requireth that now wee intreat of the church, and of the government, orders and power of it, and then of the Sacraments, and lastly of the civill order: and therewith all that we call away the godly readers from those corruptions wherewith Satan and the Papacy hath depraved all things that God hath appointed for our salvation. I will begin at the church, into whose bosome God will have his children to bee gathered together, not onely that they should by her helpe and ministry bee nourished while they are infants and young children, but also be ruled by her motherly care till they grow to riper age, and at length come to the marke of faith.

Mat. 10 9.
Gal. 3. 26.

The Church invisible wh. ch in the Creede wee professe that we believe.

For it is not lawfull that those things bee severed which God hath conjoynd, that to whom hee is a Father, the Church bee also their Mother: and that not onely under the Law, but also since the comming of Christ, as Paul witnesseth, which teacheth that we are the children of the new and heavenly Hierusalem.

2 In the Creede, where we professe that wee belevee the Church, that is not spoken onely of the visible Church whereof we nowintreate, but of all the elect of God, in whose number they are also comprehended that are departed by death. And therefore this word Belevee is there set, because oftentimes there can no other difference bee noted betwene the children of God, and the ungodly, betwene his peculiar flocke, and savage beasts. For whereas many doe interlace this word, In, that is without probable reason. I grant indecide that it is the more commonly used, and also wanteth not the consenting testimony of antiquity, forasmuch as even the Nicen Creede, as it is reported in the Ecclesiasticall history, addeth the preposition, In; But therewithall wee may marke by the writings of the ancient Fathers, that it was received without controversie to say, that they beleved the Church and not in the Church. For Augustine, and that ancient writer whatsoever hee was, whose worke remaineth under the name of Cyprian concerning the exposition of the Creede, do not onely so speake themselves, but also doe expressly note that it should be an unproper manner of speaking if the preposition were adjoynd, and they confirme their opinion with no trifling reason. For wee therefore testifie that we belevee in God, because upon him as a true speaker our minde reposeth it selfe, and in him our confidence resteth, which could not so conveniently bee spoken to say in the Church no more than it could bee said, I belevee in the forgiveness of sinnes, or in the resurrection of the flesh. Therefore although I would not strive about words, yet I had rather follow the propriety of speaking that should bee fittest to expresse the matter, than curiously to seeke for formes of speech whereby the matter may without cause bee darkened. But the end is, that we should know that although the devil attempt all meanes to overthrow the grace of Christ, and though the enemies of God bee carryed with violent rage to the same intent: yet it cannot be extinguished, nor the blood of Christ be made barren, but that it will bring forth some fruit. And so is both the secret election of God and his inward calling to be considered: because hee alone knoweth who be his, and holdeth them inclosed under a seale as Paul termeth it: saying that they beare his tokens whereby they may bee severally knowne from the reprobate. But because a small and contemptible number lieth hid under a huge multitude, and a few graines of wheate are covered with a heape of Chaffe, to God onely is to be left the knowledge of his Church, the foundation whereof is his secret election. But it is not sufficient to conceive in thought and minde the multitude of the elect, unlesse we thinke upon such an unity of the Church into which we be truly perswaded that we our selves be ingrafted. For unlesse we be under our head Christ united together with all the rest of his members, there abideth for us no hope of the inheritance to come. It is therefore called Catholike or universall because we cannot finde two or three churches but that Christ must be torne in sunder, which cannot bee done. But all the elect of God are so knit together in Christ, that as they hang upon one head, so they may grow together as it were into one body: cleaving together with such a compacting of joynts as the members of one selfe body: being truly made one, which with one hope, Faith, Charity, with one selfe spirit of God doe live together, being called not onely into one inheritance of eternall life, but also into one partaking of one God and Christ. Wherefore although the sorrowfull desolation that on each side presenteth it selfe in sight, cryeth out that there is nothing left of the church, yet let us know that Christs death is fruitfull, and that God marvelously as it were in secret corners preserveth his church. As it was said to Eli, I have kept to my selfe seven thousand men that have not bowed their knee before Baal.

I Reg. 19. 18.

The article of the Creed touching the Church, con-cerneth of-

communion of Saints. Which parcell, although commonly the old writers doe leave it out, yet is it not to bee neglected: because it very well expresth the quality of the church: as if it had bene said that the Saints are gathered together into the fellowship of Christ with this condition, that whatsoever benefits God bestoweth upon them, they should continually communicate them one to another. Whereby yet the diversity of graces is not taken away. As we know that the gifts of the holy Ghost are diversly distributed, neither is the order of civill government disturbed, by which it is lawfull for every man privately to enjoy his owne possessions, as it is necessarie, that for preservation of peace among men, they should have among themselves peculiar and divided properties of things. But there is a community affirmed, such as Luke describeth, that of the multitude of the beleivers there was one hart and one soule: and Paul, when hee exhorteth the Ephesians to be one body, one spirit as they be called in one hope. For it is not possible, if they be truly perswaded that God is the common father, and the common head to them all, but that being conjoynd among themselves with brotherly love, they should continually communicate those things that they have. Now it much behooveth us to know what profit thereupon returneth unto us. For wee beleve the church to this end, that we may be certainly perswaded that we are the members of it. For by this meane, our salvation resteth upon sure found staves, that it, although the whole frame of the world be shaken, cannot come to ruine and fall downe. First it standeth with Gods election, neither can it vary or faile but together with his eternall providence. Then, it is after a certaine manner joynd with the stedfastnesse of Christ, which will no more suffer his faithfull to be plucked from him, than his owne members to be rent and torne in peeces. Beside that, we are assured that truth shall alway abide with us, so long as we are holden in the bosome of the church. Last of all, that wee feele that these promises belong to us, there shall bee salvation in Sion, God shall for ever abide in Hierusalem, that it may not at any time be moved. So much can the partaking of the Church doe, that it holdeth us in the fellowship of God. Also in the very word Communion is much comfort: because while it remaineth certaine, that whatsoever the Lord giveth to his and our members, belongeth to us, our hope is by all their good things confirmed. But in such sort to embrace the unity of the church, it is not needfull (as we have already said) to see the Church it selfe with our eyes, or feele it with our hands: but rather by this that it consisteth in Faith, we are admonished that we ought no less to thinke it to be, when it passeth our understanding, than if it openly appeared. Neither is our Faith therefore the worse, because it conceiveth it unknowne: forasmuch as wee are not herein commanded to discern the reprobate from the elect (which is the office of God onely, and not ours) (but to determine assuredly in our mindes, that all they that by the mercifull kindenesse of God the Father through the effectuall working of the holy Ghost, are come into the partaking of Christ, are severed into the peculiar right and proper possession of Christ: and that, for as much as we bee in the number of those, wee are partakers of so great a grace.

4 But such it is now our purpose to intreate of the visible Church, let us learne even by this one title of Mother, how much the knowledge thereof is profitable, yea necessary for us: forasmuch as there is no other entrie into life, unlesse she conceive us in her wombe, unlesse shee bring us forth, unlesse shee feede us with her breasts, finally, unlesse shee keepe us under her custody and governance, untill such time as being unclothed of mortall flesh we shall be like unto Angels. For our weaknesse suffereth us not to be dismissed from schoole, till wee have bene schollers throughout the whole course of our life. Beside that out of her bosome there is no forgiveness of sinnes, and no salvation to be hoped for, as witnesseth Esay and Joel, with whom agreeth Ezechiel when hee declareth that they shall not be in the number of Gods people whom hee putteth away from the heavenly life. As on the contrary side, they are said to write their names among the Citizens of Hierusalem, that turne themselves to the following of true godlinesse. After which manner it is also said in another Psalm: Remember mee Lord in the good will of thy people: visit mee in thy salvation that I may see the benefits of thy elect, that I may bee merry in the mirth of thy people, that I may rejoyce with thy thy inheritance. In which words the fatherly favour of God, and the peculiar testimony of the Spirit all life is restrained to his flocke, so that the departing from the church is alway damnable.

5 But let us proceede to prosecute that which properly belongeth to this place. Paul writeth that Christ, that hee might fulfill all things, gave some Apostles, some Prophets, some Evangelists, and some Pastors and Teachers, to the restoring of the holy ones, into the worke of the ministry, unto the edification of the body of Christ untill wee all come into the unity of Faith, and of the acknowledging of the Sonne of God, unto a perfect man, and to the measure of the full growne age of Christ. We see how God, which was able to make them that bee his perfect in a moment, yet will not have them grow into manly age but by the bringing up the Church. Wee see the meane expressed, for that unto the Pastors is enjoyed the preaching of the heavenly doctrine. Wee see how all, not one excepted, are brought into one rule, that they should with milde Spirit and willing to learne, yeeld themselves to the teachers appointed for that use. And by this marke Esay had long before set out the Kingdome of Christ, where hee saith : My spirit which is in thee, and the words that I have put in thy mouth shall never depart, neither out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed and thy childrens children. Whereupon followeth that they are worthy to perish with famine and pining hunger, whosoever they bee that refuse the Spirituall meate of the Soule reached unto them of God by the hands of the Church. GOD doth breath Faith into us; but by the instrument of his Gospell, as Paul saith that faith is by hearing. As also with God remaineth his power to save, but (as the same Paul witnesseth) hee uttereth and displaieth the same in the preaching of the Gospell. For this reason in old time hee willed that there should bee made holy assemblies to the sanctuary, that doctrine uttered by the mouth of the Priest should nourish the consent of Faith. And to no other end those glorious titles have respect, where the temple is called the rest of God, and the sanctuary his house, where hee is said to sit betwene the Cherubines : but to bring estimation, love, reverence and dignity to the ministry of the heavenly doctrine, which otherwise the sight of a mortall and despised man would not a little diminish. Therefore that wee should know, that out of earthen vessels is brought forth unto us ineffimable treasure, God himselfe commeth forth, and in as much as hee is the author of this degree, so hee will have himselfe to bee acknowledged present in his institution. Therefore after that he hath forbidden his to give themselves to judgement by flying of birds, to south-sayings, magicall arts, necromancy and other superstitions, hee immediately addeth that hee will give them that which ought to suffice instead of all, that is to say, that they shall never be destitute of Prophets. But like as hee sent not the old people to Angels, but raised up teachers out of the earth, which might truly performe the office of Angels : so at this day also his will is to teach us by men. And as in the old time hee was not content with the onely law, but added Priests for expositors, at whose lips the people should enquire for the true meaning thereof : so at this day hee not onely willeth us to be heedefully bent to reading, but also appointeth masters over us, by whose travell wee may bee holpen : whereof commeth double profit. For on the one part by a very good triall it proveth our obedience, when wee here his ministers speaking even as it were himselfe. On the other side it also provideth for our weaknesse, while after the manner of men hee had rather speake unto us by interpreters to allure us unto him, than with thundring drive us away from him. And truly how expedient this familiar manner of teaching is for us, all the godly doe feele by the feare wherewith the majesty of God doth worthily astonish them. But they that thinke that the authority of the doctrine is abased by the contempt of the men that are called to teach, doe bewray their unthankfulnesse, because among so many excellent gifts wherewith God hath garnished mankind : this is a singular prerogative, that he vouchsafeth to consecrate the moutnes and tongues of men to himselfe, that his owne voice should sound in them. Wherefore on our behalves let us not bee grieved obediently to embrace the doctrine of salvation set forth by his commandement and by his owne mouth : because although the power of God is not bound to outward meanes, yet he hath bound us to the ordinary manner of teaching: which while phrenrike men refuse to keepe, they wrap themselves in many deadly snares. Either pride, or disdainefulnesse, or envy moveth many to perswade themselves that they can sufficiently profit by their owne private reading and study, and so to despise publike assemblies, and to account preaching superfluous. But sith they doe as much as in them is, looke or breake in sunder the holy bond of unity, no man escapeth the due punishment of this divorce, but he bewitcheth himselfe with pestilent errors and most wicked dogges. Wherefore, that the pure simplicitie of faith may flourish among us, let us not bee grieved to use this exercise of godlinesse, which God by his institution hath shewed to be necessary for us and so earnestly commendeth. But there was never yet found any even of the most wanton dogges which would say that we ought to stop our eares against God: But in all ages the Prophets and godly teachers have had a hard strife against the wicked, whose stubbornesse can never come under this yoke, to be taught by the mouth of the ministry of men. Which is as much as to blot out the face of God which shineth to us in doctrine. For in oldtime the faithfull were commanded to seeke the face of God in the sanctuary, and the same is so oft repeated in the law for no other cause; but for that the doctrine of the law and the exhortations of the Prophets were to them a lively image of God: as Paul affirmeth that in his preaching shineth the glory of God in the face of Christ. How much the more detestable are the Apostates, which greedily seeke to divide Churches, as though they did drive sheepe from their folds and cast them into the mouthes of wolves. But wee must hold that which hee hath alleaged out of Paul, that the Church is no otherwise builded but by outward preaching, and that the holy ones are holden together with no other bond but when with learning and profiting with one content they keepe the order appointed by God to the Church. To this end principally, as I have said, the faithfull in oldtime under the law were commanded to resort to the Sanctuary. Because when Moses speaketh of the dwelling place of God, hee doth therewithall call it the place of name, where God hath set the memory of his name. Whereby hee plainly teacheth that without the doctrine of godlinesse there is no use thereof. And it is not doubtfull but that for the same reason David with great bitterness of Spirit complaineth that hee is by the tyrannous cruelty of his enemies kept from entering into the Tabernacle. It seemeth commonly to many a childish lamentation, because it should be but a very small losse, and also no great pleasure should be foregone thereby, to want the entry of the temple, so that there were enough of other delightfull things. But hee bewaileth that with this one griefe, anguish and sorrow, he is vexed and fretted and in a manner wasted. For nothing is of greater estimation with the faithfull, than this helpe whereby God by degrees lifteth up his on high. For this is also to be noted, that God in the mirror of his doctrine alway so shewed himselfe to the holy Fathers, that the knowledge was spirituall. Wherefore the temple is called not onely his face, but also (to take away all superstition) his foote-stoole. And this is that happy meeting into unity of faith, while from the highest even to the lowest all doe aspire to the head. All the temples that ever the Gentiles upon any other purpose builded to God, were but a meere prophaning of his worship: whereunto though not with like grossefnesse, yet somewhat the Iewes fell. Whereof Stephen out of the mouth of Esay reprocheth them where he saith, that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, &c. Because onely God doth by his word sanctifie to himselfe temples to the lawfull use. And if wee rashly attempt any thing without his commandment, by and by to an evill beginning doe cleave new devises by which the evill is spread abroad without measure. Yet Xerxes, when by the counsell of the Magicians he burned up or plucked downe all the temples of Greece, indiscreetely said, that the Gods to whom all things ought to bee freely open, were inclosed within wallies and tiles. As though it were not in the power of God, to the intent hee might be nere us, after a certaine manner to descend unto us, and yet neither to change place, nor to fasten us to earthly meanes: but rather by certaine chariots to carrie us up to his heavenly glory, which with the immeasurable greatnesse thereof filleth all things, yea and in height firmountheth the heavens.

6. Now forasmuch as at this time there hath beene great strife about the effectualnesse of the ministry, while some excessively amplyfie the dignity thereof: and some other affirme that that which is properly belonging to the holy Ghost is wrongfully given away to mortall man, if wee thinke that ministers and teachers do pearce to the minds and hearts, to amend as well the blindnesse of the mindes as the hardnesse of hearts: it is meete that we give a right determination of this controversie. All that they contend on both parts shall easily bee accorded by expressly noting the places where God the author of preaching joyning his spirit with it promiseth fruit thereof: or againe when severing himselfe from outward helpe hee challengeth to himselfe alone as well the beginning of falth as the whole course thereof. It was the office of the second Elias (as Malachie witnesseth) to enlighten the mindes and to turne the hearts of Fathers to the children, and unbelievers to the wisdom of the righteous. Christ pronounceth that hee sendeth the Apostles, that they should bring fruit of their labour. But what that fruit is Peter shortly describeth, saying that wee be regenerate with incorruptible seede. And therefore Paul gloryeth that hee by the Gospell begate the Corinthians, and that they were the seale of his Apostleship: yea that hee was not a littell Minister: such as did onely beate the eares with sound of voice, but that there was given him an effectualnesse of Spirit, that his doctrine should not bee unprofitable. In which meaning also in another place hee saith, that his Gospell was not in word onely, but in power. Hee affirmeth also that the Galatians by hearing received the Spirit of Faith. Finally in many places hee maketh himselfe not onely a worker together with GOD, but also assigneth to himselfe the office of giving salvation. Truly hee never brought forth all these things to this intent to give unto himselfe any thing wee in never so little severally from God: as in another place he shortly declareth, saying, our labour was not unprofitable in the Lord, according to his power mightily working in mee. Againe in another place, hee that was mighty in Peter toward the circumcision; was also mighty in mee toward the Gentiles. But how hee leaveth nothing severally to the ministers, appeareth by other places. as: hee that planteth is nothing, and he that watereth is nothing, but GOD that giveth the encrease. Againe: I have laboured more than all: not I, but the grace of God that was with mee. And truly wee must hold fast those sayings, where God ascribing to himselfe the enlightning of the minde, and the renewing of the heart teacheth that it is a robbery of GOD if man take upon himselfe any part of either of them. In the meane time if any man offer himselfe to the ministers whom GOD ordeineth, willing to learne, hee shall know by the fruit, that this manner of teaching not in vaine pleased God, and that this yoke of modesty was not in vaine laid upon the faithfull.

7 But as for the Church visible and which is within the compasse of our knowledge, what judgement is meete to be given thereof, I thinke it already appeareth evidently by that which wee have before said. For wee have said, that the holy Scripture speaketh of the Church after two sorts. Sometime, when it nameth the Church, it meaneth that Church which is indeede before God, into which none are received but they that are both by grace of adoption the children of God, and by sanctification of the Spirit the true members of Christ. And then truly it comprehendeth not onely the holy ones that dwell in earth, but also all the elect that have beene since the beginning of the world. But oftentimes under the name of the Church it signifieth the universall multitude of men scattered abroad in the world, which professe that they worship one God and Christ, by baptisme enter into his faith, by partaking of the supper testifie their unity in true doctrine and charity, have an agreement in the word of the Lord, and for the preaching thereof doe keepe the ministry ordained by Christ. In this church there bee mingled many hypocrites which have nothing of Christ but the name and outward shew: there bee many ambitious, covetous, envious, evill speakers, some of uncleane life: which be suffered for a tyme, either because they cannot by lawfull order of judgement be convinced, or because there is not alway in ure that severity of discipline that ought to be. Therefore as we must needs beleve that the church which is inviſible to ns, is to be ſeene with the eyes of God onely fo are we commanded to regard the church which is called a church in respect of men, and to keepe the communion of it.

8 Therefore so much as behooveth us to know it, the Lord hath set it out by certaine markes and as it were signes unto us. This is indeede the singular prerogative of God himselfe, to know who bee his, as we have already alleaged out of Paul. And truly that the rashnesse of men should not creepe so far, it is provided by the very successe of things daily putting us in minde, how farre his secret judgements doe surmount our understanding. For even they that seemed most desperate, and accounted utterly past hope, are by his goodnesse called backe into the way : and they that seemed to stand fast in comparisón of other, do oftentimes fall. Therefore according to the secret predestination of God (as Augustine saith) there bee many sheepe without, and many wolves within. For he knoweth them, and hath them marked that know neither him nor themselves. But of those that openly beare his badge, his onely eies doe see who bee both holy without feigning, and who will continue even to the end, which is the very chiefe point of salvation. Yet on the other side, for as much as he foresaw it to bee some deale expedient, that we should know who were to be accounted his children, hee hath in this part applied himselfe to our capacity. And because the certainty of faith was not necessary, hee hath put in place thereof a certaine judgement of charity : whereby wee should acknowledge for members of the church those that both with confession of faith and with example of life, and with partaking of Sacraments, doe profess the same God and Christ with us. But as for the knowledge of the body thereof, how much more that he knew it to be necessary for our salvation, with so much the more certaine markes he hath set it out.

9 Loe hereupon groweth and ariseth unto us, a face of the church visible to our eies. For wheresoever wee see the word of God to bee purely preached and heard, and the sacraments to bee ministred according to the institution of Christ, there it is in no wise to be doubted that there is some church of God : forasmuch as his promise cannot deceive. Wherefoever two or three be gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them. But that wee may evidently understand the summe of this matter, wee must proceede by these as it were by degrees : that is to say, that the universall church is a multitude gathered together out of all nations whatsoever they bee, which being sundered and severally scattered by distances of places; yet doth agree in one truth of godly doctrine, and is bound together with the bond of one selfe religion. And that so under this are comprehended all particular churches, which are in all townes and streetes according to the order of mens necessitie, so that every one of them may rightfully have the name and authority of a church: And that all particular men which by profession of godlinesse are reckoned among such churches, although they bee indeed strangers from the church, yet doe after a certaine manner belong unto it, till by publike judgement they bee vanished out of it. Howbeit there is somewhat a divers manner in judging of private men and of churches: For it may fall in experience, that such men as we shall thinke not to bee altogether worthy of the company of the godly, yet wee must use like brethren and account them among the faithfull, for the common consent of the church, whereby they are suffered and borne with all the body of Christ. We doe not by our testimonie allow such to bee members of the church: but wee leave them the place that they have among the people of God, till it be by orderly right of law taken away from them. But of the very multitude we must other wise thinke: which if it hath and honoreth the ministry of the word, and the administration of Sacraments, it deservert without doubt to be esteemed and judged a church: because it is certaine that those things are not without fruit. So we doe also preserve to the universall church her unity, which devillish spirits have alway travelled to cut in sunder: neither doe we defraud of their authority those lawfull assemblies which are disposed according to the finesse of places.

10 Wee have set for signes to discern the church by, the preaching of the word and the observing of the Sacraments. For those can bee no where but they must bring forth fruit, and bee prospered with the blessing of God. I doe not say, that wherefoever the word is preached, there by and by springeth up fruit: but I say that no where it is received and hath a stayed seate, but that it bringeth forth the effectualnesse thereof. Where the preaching of the Gospell is reverently heard, and the Sacraments are not neglected, howsoever it be, therefore that time appeareth, not a deceitfull and doubtful face of the church, whereof no man may unpunished either dispise the authority, or refuse the admonitions, or resist the counsels, or mocke at the corrections: much lesse to depart from it, and to breake in sunder the unity of it. For the Lord so highly esteemeth the Communion of his Church, that hee counteth him for a traiterous run-away and forsaker of Religion, whosoever shall stubbornly estrange himselfe from any Christian fellowship, so that it be such a one as hath a true ministry of the Word and Sacraments. He so commendeth the churches authority, that when it is violatèd, he judgeth his owne diminished. Neither is it of small importance, that the church is called the pillar and strong stay of truth and the house of God. By which words Paul signifieth, that to the end the truth of God should not decay in the world, the church is a faithfull keeper thereof: because Gods will was to have the preaching of his word kept pure, and to shew himselfe unto us a father of household by her ministry and labour, while she feedeth us with spirituall nourishments, and procureth all things that make for our salvation. It is also no slender praise, that it is said, that shee is chosen and severed by Christ to bee his spouse, that should be without wrinkle and spot, the body and fulnesse of him. Whereupon followeth, that departing from the church is a denying of God and of Christ. Therefore so much the more wee must beware of so wicked disagreement. For while we goe about, so much as in us lyeth, to procure the ruine of Gods truth, we are worthy that he should send downe his lightning with the whole violent force of his wrath to destroy us. Neither can there be imagined any fault more hainous, than with wicked breach of faith to defile the marriage that the onely begotten sonne of God hath vouchsafed to contract with us.

II Wherefore let us diligently keepe these markes imprinted in our mindes, and let us esteeme them according to the Lords will. For there is nothing that Satan more endeavoureth, than to take away, and abolish the one of these, or both sometime, that when these marks are rased and blotted out, he may take away the true and naturall distinction of the church: sometime that when they are brought in contempt, hee may with open falling away plucke us from the church. By this craft it is brought about that in certaine ages past, the pure preaching of the word hath vanished away: and now he doth with as great importunity travell to overthrow the ministry, which yet Christ hath so stablished in the church, that when it is taken away, the edification of the church perisheth. But now, how dangerous, yea how deadly a temptation is it when it doth but come in our mindes to depart from that congregation wherein are seene the signes and tokens by which the Lord thought his church sufficiently described? We see how great heed is to be taken on both sides. For, that we should not be deceived under the title of the church, every congregation that pretendeth the name of the church must be examined by that manner of tryall, as by a touchstone. If it have in the word and Sacraments the order appointed by the Lord, it will not deceive us: let us boldly yeeld unto it the honour due to churches. But contrariwise if it boast it selfe without the word and Sacraments, we must no lesse with fearefull conscience beware of such deceits, than on the other side we must flee rashnesse and pride.

12 Whereas wee say that the pure ministry of the word and pure usage in celebrating the Sacraments, is a sufficient pledge and earnest, so that we may safely embrace as the church any fellowship wherein both these shall bee: this extendeth so far, that it is never to be cast off, so long as it shall continue in those although it swarme full of many other faults. Yea and there may some faultinesse creepe into it, in the administration either of doctrine, or of the Sacraments, which ought not to estrange us from the communion of it. For all the articles of true doctrine be not of one sort. Some bee so necessary to be knowne, that they ought to be certaine and undoubted to all men, as the proper principles of religion: of which sort are, That there is one God, That Christ is God, and the sonne of God. That our salvation consisteth in the mercy of God: and such like. There bee other that being in controversie betweene churches, yet doe not breake the unity of faith. For those churches that disagree about this one point, if without lust of contention, without stubbornesse of affirming, the one thinke that soules when they depart from the bodies doe flee up into heaven, and the other Church dare determine nothing of the place, but yet certainly holdeth that they live to the Lord: the words of the Apostle are: Let all us that bee perfect thinke all one thing: but if yee thinke any thing otherwise, this the Lord shall also reveale unto you. Doth he not sufficiently shew that diversity of opinion about these matters, that be not so necessary, ought to bee no ground of disagreement among Christians: It is indeed a principall point, that wee agree in all things. But for as much as there is no man that is not wrapped with some little cloud of ignorance, either wee must leave no Church at all, or wee must pardon a being deceived in such things as may bee unknowne without violating the summe of religion, and without losse of salvation. But I meane not here to defend any errors be they never so little, so as I would thinke that they should bee cherished with flattering and winking at them: but I say that wee ought not rashly for every light dissention forsake the Church, in which at least that Doctrine is retained safe and uncorrupted, wherein standeth the safety of godlinesse, and the use of Sacraments is kept as it was instituted by the Lord. In the meane time if wee endeavour to amend that which displeaseth us, wee doe therein according to our duty. And hereunto belongeth that saying of Paul: If any thing better bee revealed to him that siteth, let the first hold his peace. Whereby it is evident, that all the members of the Church are every one charged with endeavour to publicke edification, according to the measure of his grace, so that it be done comely and according to order: that is, that we neither doe forlike the communion of the Church, nor abiding in it, doe trouble the peace and well ordered discipline thereof.

13 But in bearing with the imperfection of life, our gentle tenderesse ought to goe much further. For herein is a very slippery easinesse to fall: and herein with no small devises doth Satan lay waite for us. For there have beene alway some, which filled with false persuasion of perfect holinesse asthough they were already made certaine airy spirits, despised the company of all men, in whom they saw remaining any thing of the nature of man. Such in old time were the Cathary, and they that were as mad as they, the Donatists. Such at this day are some of the Anabaptists, which would seeme to have profied above the rest. Some there be that offend more by an undi- creet zeale of frighteousnesse, than by that mad pride. For when they see among them to whom the Gospell is preached, the fruit of life not agreeably answering to the doctrine thereof, they by and by judge that there is no Church. It is indeed a most just displeasure, and such a one whereunto in this most miserable age of the world, we give too much occasion. Neither may wee excuse our accursed storkfulness, which the Lord will not suffer unpunished: as even already he beginneth with grievous scourges to chastise it. Woe therefore to us, which with so dissolute licentiousnesse of wicked doings, make that weake consciences be wounded by reason of us. But in this againe they offend whom I have spoken of, because they cannot measure their being displeased. For where the Lord requireth clemencie, they leaving it, doe give themselves wholly to immeasurable rigorosnesse. For, because they thinke that there is no Church where there is no sound purenesse and uprightnesse of life, for hatred of sinnes they depart from the lawfull church, while they thinke that they swarve from a company of wicked men. They alleadge that the Church of Christ is holie. But that they may also understand that it is mingled of good and evil men, let them heare this parable out of the mouth of Christ, wherein it is compared to a net, in which fishes of all kindes are gathered together: and are not chofen out till they be laid abroad upon the shoare. Let them heare that it is like unto a corne-field, which being sowed with good graine, is by the enemies fraud scattered with tares, of which it is not cleansed untill the crop be brought into the barne floore. Finally, let them heare that it is like unto a floore, wherein the wheat is so gathered together, that it lieth hidden under the chaffe, till being clen- sed with fan and syeve, it bee at length laid up in the garner. If the Lord pronounce that the Church shall even to the day of judgement be troubled with this evill, to bee burdened with mingling of evill men: they doe in vaine seeke for a Church sprinkled with no spot.

1 Cor. 5. 2.

1 Cor. II. 18.

1 Cor. II. 29.

14 For they cry out that it is an intolerable thing, that the pestilence of vices should rungeeth abroad. What if the saying of the Apostle doe here also answer them? Among the Corinthians not onely a few had gone out of the way, but the infection had in a manner possessed the whole body: There was not onely one kinde of sinne, but many: neither were they light offences, but certaine horrible outrageous doings: it was not onely corruption of manners, but also of doctrine. What in this case saith the holy Apostle, that is to say, the instrument of the holy Ghost, by whose testimony the church standeth and falleth? Doth he require a division from them? Doth hee banish them out of the kingdom of Christ? Doth hee strike them with the extreamest thunderbolt of curse; Hee not onely doth none of all these things: but he both acknowledgeth and reporteth it a church of Christ and fellowship of Saints. If there remaine a church among the Corinthians, where contentions, sects, and envious partakings doe broile: where quarrells and brawlings be in ure, with a greedinesse of having, where that wicked doing is openly allowed, which were abominable among the very Gentiles: where Pauls name is unjustly railed at, whom they ought to have honoured as their Father: where some scorn at the resurrection of the dead, with raine whereof the whole Gospell falleth: where the gracious gifts of God serve to ambition and not to charity: where many things are uncomely and disorderly done: and if therefore there still remaine a church because the ministry of the word and of the Sacraments is there not refused, who dare take away the name of the church from them that cannot be charged with the tenth part of these faults? They that with so great precisenesse deale so cruelly against the churches of this present time: what (I pray you) would they have done to the Galathians, which were almost utter forsakers of the Gospell, among whom yet the same Apostle found churches.

15 They object also, how that Paul grievously rebuketh the Corinthians for suffering in their company a man that was a hainous sinner, and then hee setteth a generall sentence wherein hee pronounceth, that it is unlawfull even to eat bread with a man of reprochfull life. Here they cry out: If it be not lawfull even to eat common bread, how may it be lawfull to eat with them the bread of the Lord? I confesse indeed that it is a great dishonour, if hogges and dogges have place among the children of God: it is also a much more dishonour if the holy body of Christ be given forth to them. And truly if they be well ordered churches, they will not suffer wicked men in their bosome, and will not without choise admit both worthy and unworthy together, to that holy banquet. But forasmuch as the Pastors doe not alway so diligently watch, yea and sometime are more tender in bearing with men than they ought to be, or are hindered so that they cannot use that severity that they would: it cometh to passe that even they that are openly evill, are not alway thrust out of the company of the holy ones. This I grant to be a fault: neither will I diminish it, for Paul doth so sharply rebuke it in the Corinthians. But although the church be slacke in her duety, it shall not be therefore immediately in the power of every private man, to take upon himselfe the judgement to sever him. I doe indeed not deny that it is the doing of a godly man, to withdraw himselfe from all private company of evill men, to intangle himselfe in no willing familiarity with them. But it is one thing to flee the company of evil men, and another thing for hatred of them to forsake the communion of the church. But whereas they thinke it sacriledge to be partakers of the Lords bread with them, they are therein much more rigorous than Paul is. For where he exhortheth us to a holy and pure partaking, he requireth not that one should examine an other, or every man the whole church, but that they should each one prove himselfe. If it were unlawfull to communicate with an unworthy man, then truly Paul would bid us to looke circumspectly, whether they were any in the multitude, by whose uncleannesse we might be defiled. Now when he requireth onely of every man the proove of themselves, he sheweth that it nothing hurteth us if any unworthy doe thrust themselves in among us. And nothing else is meant by this which he saith afterward. Hee that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgement to himselfe. He doth not say, to other, but to himselfe. And rightfully. For it ought not to stand in the choise of every particular man, who be to be received, and who to be rejected. The knowledge thereof belongeth to the whole Church, which knowledge cannot be had without lawfull order, as hereafter shall be said more at large. Therefore it should be unrighteous, that any private man should be defiled with the unworthinesse of another, whom he neither can, nor ought to keepe backe from comming to it.

16 But although by this undiscreeete zeale of righteousness this temptation doth sometime also enter into good men: yet this we shall find that too much precisenesse, groweth rather of pride, disdainfulnesse, and false opinion of holinesse, than of true holinesse and true zeale thereof. Therefore they that are bolder than other, and as it were stander bearers to make any departing from the Church, for the most part doe it upon no other cause, but in despising of all men to boast themselves to be better than other. Therefore Augustine saith well and wisely: When godly order and manner of Ecclesiasticall discipline ought principally to have regard unto the unity of Spirit in the bond of peace: which the Apostle commanded to be kept by bearing one with another: and which being not kept, the medicine of revenge is proved to be not onely superfluous, but also pernicious, and therefore now to be no medicine at all: those evil children, which not for hatred of other mens iniquities, but for affection of their owne contentions doe greedily labour either wholly to draw or at least to divide the weake common people intangled with the boasting of their name, swelling with pride, mad with stubbornnesse, traitorous with slanders, troublesome with seditious, least they should seeme to want the light of truth, doe pretend a shadow of rigorous severity: and those things that are in the holy Scriptures commanded to be done with a gentler kinde of healing, saving the sinceritie of love, and keeping the unitie of peace, to correct the faults of brethren, they abuse it to sacriledge of schisme, and to occasion of cutting off. But to godly and quiet men hee giveth this counsell, that they mercifully correct that which they can, and that which they cannot, patiently beare, and grone and mourne with love, untill God either amend and correct them, or at the harvest roote up the teares, and sanne out the chaffe. Let the godly travaile to fortifie themselves with these armours, least while they seeme to themselves strong and couragious revengers of righteousness, they depart from the kingdom of heaven, which is the onely kingdom of righteousness. For such it is Gods will to have the communion of his Church to be kept in this outward fellowship: hee that for hatred of evill men doth breake the token of that fellowship, entereth into a way whereby is a slippery falling from the communion of Saints. Let them thinke that in a great multitude there be many truly holy and innocent before the eyes of the Lord, whom they see not. Let them thinke that even of them that be diseased there be many that doe not please or flatter themselves in their faults, but being now and then awaked with earnest feare of God doe aspire to a greater uprightnesse. Let them thinke that judgement ought not to be given of a man by one deede: forasmuch as the holiest doe sometime fall away with a most grievous fall. Let them thinke that to gather a Church there levethe more weight both in the ministry of the word and in the partaking of the holy mysteries, than that all that force should vanish away by the fault of some wicked men. Last of all let them consider, that in judging the Church, the judgement of God is of greater value than the judgement of man.

17 Where also they pretend that the Church is not without cause called holy, it is meet to weigh with what holinesse it excelleth: least if we will admit no church but such a one as is in all points perfect, we leave no Church at all: It is true indeed which Paul saith, that Christ gave himselfe for the Church to sanctifie it: that hee clesned it with the laver of water with the word of life, to make her unto himselfe glorious spouse having no spot, or wrinkle, &c. Yet this is also nothing lesse true, that the Lord daily worketh in smoothing her wrinkles and wiping away her spots. Whereupon followeth that her holinesse is not yet fully finished. Therefore the Church is so holy, that it daily profiteth and is not yet perfect: daily proceedeth, and is not yet come to the marke of holines: as also in another place shall be more largely declared. Whereas therefore the Prophets propheticie that there shall be a holy Hierusalem, through which strangers shall not passe: and a holy temple wherinto uncleane men shall not enter: let us not so take it, as if there were no spot in the members of the church: but for that with their whole endeavour to aspire to holinesse and sound purenesse, by the goodnesse of God cleannesse is ascribed unto them, which they have not yet fully obtained. And although oftentimes there be but rare tokens of such sanctification among men: yet we must determine that there hath beene no time since the creation of the world wherein the Lord hath not had his church, and that there shall also bee no time to the very end of the world, wherein hee shall not have it. For albeit immediately from the beginning, the whole kinde of men is corrupted and defiled by the sinne of Adam: yet out of this, as it were a polluted masse, God alway sanctifieth some vessels unto honour, that there should be no age without feeling of his mercie. Which he hath testified by certaine promises, as these: I have ordained a testament to my elect: I have sworne to David my servant, I will for ever continue thy seed: I will build thy seate in generation and generation. Againe, the Lord hath chosen Sion, he hath chosen it for a dwelling to himselfe: This is my rest for ever, &c. Againe, these things saith the Lord which giveth the Sunne for the light of the day, the Moone and stars for the light of the night. If these lawes shall faile before me, then the seed of Israel shall also faile.

18 Hereof Christ himselfe, the Apostles, and in a manner all the Prophets have given us example. Horrible are those descriptions wherein Eisy, Hiermie, Jool, Abacuc, and the other doe lament the sicknesses of the church of Hierusalem. In the common people, in the magistrats, in the Priests all things were so corrupt, that Eisy doubteth not to match Hierusalem with Sodom and Gomorrab. Religion was partly despised, partly defiled: in their manners, are commonly reported thestes, extortions, breaches of faith, murders and like mischiefes. Yet therefore the Prophets did neither erect to themselves new churches, nor build up new altars on which they might have severall sacrifices: but of whatsoever manner of men they were, yet because they considered, that God had left his word with them, and ordained ceremonies whereby hee was there worshipped, in the midst of the assemblie of the wicked they held up pure hands unto him. Truly if they had thought that they did gather any infection thereby, they would rather have died a hundred times than have suffered themselves to be drawne thereunto. Therefore nothing withheld them from departing, but desire to the keeping of unitie. But if the Prophets thought it against conscience, to estrange themselves from the church for many and great wicked doings, not of one or two men, but in a manner of the whole people: then we take too much upon us, if we dare by and by depart from the communion of that church, where not all mens manners doe satisfie either our judgement, yea or the Christian profession.

19 Now what manner of world was there in the time of Christ and the Apostles? And yet that desperate ungodlinesse of the Pharisees, and the dissolute licentiousnesse of living, which then each where reigned, could not hinder, but that they used the same ceremonies with the people, and assembled with the rest into one temple to the publike exercises of religion. Whereof came that, but because they knew that the fellowship of evil men did not defile them, which with a pure conscience did communicate at the same ceremonies? If any man bee little moved with the Prophets and Apostles, let him yet obey the authoritie of Christ. Therefore Cyprian well saith, though there be seene tares or uncleane vessels in the church, yet there is no cause why wee should depart from the church: wee must onely labour that we may be wheate: wee must use diligence and endeavour as much as wee may that we may be a golden or silver vessel. But to breake the earthen vessels, is the onely worke of the Lord, to whom also is given an iron rod. And let no man chaleage to himselfe that which is properly belonging to the Sonne onely, to bee able alone to fanne the floore, and cleanse the chaffe, and sever all the tares by mans judgement. This is a proud obstinacie, and presumption full of sacriledge, which a perverse furie taketh to it selfe, &c. Therefore let both these things remaine certainly fixed. First hee that hath no excuse, that of his owne will forsaketh the outward communion of the church. Where the word of God is preached and the Sacraments ministred: then that the faultes of a few or of many are no hinderance, but that we may therein rightly professe our faith by the ceremonies instituted by God: because a godly conscience is not hurt by the unworthines of any other either pastor or private man, and the mysteries are to a holy and upright man nevertheless pure & wholsom because they are altogether handled of unclean men.

20 Their preciseness and disdainfulness proceedeth yet further: because they acknowledge no Church but such a one as is pure from all spots: be they never so small: yea they are angry with good teachers, for that in exhorting the faithful to go forward, they teach them all their life long to grone under the burden of vices, and to flee unto pardon. For they prate that by this meane men be led from perfection. I grant indeed, that in earnest calling upon perfection we ought not slowly or coldly to travell, much lesse to be idle, but to fill our mindes with confidence thereof while we be yet in our courte, I say, it is a divelish invention. Therefore in the Creede the forgiveness of sins is aptly joyned next after the Church. For none doe attaine it, but onely they that are citizens and of the household of the Church as it is read in the Prophet. Therefore the building of the heavenly Hiernsalem ought to goe before, wherein afterward this mercifulnesse of God may have place, that whatsoever come unto it, there iniquitie may be taken away. I say that it ought first to be builded, not for that there can be any Church without the forgiveness of finnes, but because the Lord hath not promised his mercie but in the communion of Saints. Therefore the first entry for us into the Church and kingdome of God, is the forgiveness of finnes, without which we have no covenant or conjoyning with God. For thus he saith by the Prophet, In that day I will strike you a covenant with the beast of the field, with the fowle of the aire, and with the vermine of the earth. I will breake the sword of warre from out of the earth, and I will make men to sleepe without feare. I will espouse you unto me for ever. I will espouse you (I say) in righteousnesse, in judgement, in mercie, and in compassions. We see how by his mercie the Lord reconcileth us to himselfe. And so in another place, when he foresaith that the people shall be gathered together againe, whom he had scattered abroad in his wrath, hee saith, I will cleanse them from all wickednesse wherewith they have sinned against me. Wherefore by the signe of washing wee enter into the fellowship of the Church, whereby we may be taught that there is no entry open for us into the household of God, unlesse our filthinesse be first wiped away with his goodnesse.

21 But by the forgiveness of finnes the Lord doth not onely receive and adopt us once into the Church, but by the same he also preserveth and maintaine thus still in it. For to what purpose were it, to have such a pardon granted us, as should serve for no use? But every one of the godly is a witness to himselfe that the mercie of God should be vaine and mocking, if it should be granted onely but once: because there is none that is not in his owne conscience privie throughout his whole life of many weaknesses, which neede the mercie of God. And truly not in vaine God promiseth this grace peculiarly to them of his owne household: and not in vaine he commandeth the same message of reconciliation to be daily offered unto them. Therefore as throughout all our life we carry about us the remnants of sinne, unlesse we be sustained with the continuall grace of the Lord in forgiving our finnes, wee shall scarcely abide one moment in the Church. But the Lord hath called his unto eternal salvation. Therefore they ought to thinke that there is pardon alwaies ready for their finnes. Wherefore we ought to hold assuredly, that by the liberalitie of God by meane of Christs deserving through the sanctification of the Spirit, finnes have bene and are daily pardoned to us which be called and graffed into the bodie of the Church.

22 To deale this benefit unto us, the keys were given to the Church. For when Christ gave the Apostles commandement, and delivered them power to forgive finnes, he meant not this onely, that they should loofe them from finnes that were from ungodlinesse converted to the faith of Christ: but rather that they should continually execute this office among the faithfull. Which thing Paul teacheth, when he writeth that the embassage of reconciliation was left with the ministers of the Church, whereby they should oftentimes in Christs name exhort the people to reconcile themselves to God. Therefore in the communion of Saints, by the ministerie of the Church it selfe, finnes are continually forgiven us, when the Priests or Bishops, to whom that office is committed, doe with the promises of the Gospell confirme godly consciences in hope of pardon and forgiveness: and that as well publicly as privately, according as necessitie requireth. For there bee very many, which for their weaknesse doe neede a singular atonement. And Paul reporteth that not onely in common preaching, but also in houses he had testified the Faith in Christ, and severally admonished every one of the doctrine of salvation. Therefore we have heere three things to be noted. First, that with how great holinesse soever the children of God doe excell, yet they be alway in this estate, so long as they dwell in a mortall body, that without forgiveness of sins they cannot stand before God. Secondly, that this benefit is so proper to the Church, that we cannot other wise enjoy it, but if we abide in the Communion thereof. Thirdly, that it is distributed unto us by the ministers and Pastors, either by preaching of the Gospell, or by ministring of the Sacraments: and that in this behalfe principally appeareth the power of the keyes, which the Lord hath given to the fellowship of the faithfull. Wherefore let every one of us thinke this to be his duty, no where else to seeke forgiveness of finnes, than where the Lord hath set it. Of publike reconciliation which belongeth to discipline we shall speake in place fit for it.

Mat. 6. 12.

23 But for as much as those phrantike spirits that I have spoken of, doe goe about to plucke a way from the Church this only anchor of salvation, consciences are the more strongly to be confirmed against so pestilent an opinion. The Novatians in old time troubled the church with this doctrine: but not much unlike to the Novatians our age also hath with many of the Anabaptists which fall to the same dotages. For they saigne that the people of God are in baptism regenerate into a pure and Angelike life, that is corrupted with no filthinesse of the flesh. But if any man offend after baptism, they leave unto him nothing but the unappeaseable judgement of God. Briefely they grant no hope of pardon to a sinner fallen after grace received: because they acknowledge no other forgiveness of finnes but that whereby we be first regenerate. But although there be no lie more cleerely confuted by the Scriptures: yet because these men finde some whom they may deceive (as also in old time Novatus had many followers) let us shortly shew how mad they bee to their owne and others destruction. First, whereas by the commandment of the Lord, the holy ones doe daily repeat this prayer, forgive us our debts: truly they doe confesse themselves debtors. Neither doe they crave it in vaine, because the Lord hath alway appointed no other thing to be asked, than that which he himselfe would give. Yea, whereas he hath testified that the whole prayer shall be heard of his father, yet he hath also sealed this absolution with a peculiar promise. What will wee more? The Lord requireth of the holy ones all their life long a confession of finnes, yea and that continuall, and promiseth pardon. What boldnesse is it, either to exempt them from sinne, or if they have stumbled, utterly to exclude them from grace? Now whom doth he will us to forgive severie times seven times? not to our brethren? To what end did he command it, but that we should follow his clemencie? He forgiveth therefore, not once or twice: but as often as being stricken downe with the acknowledging of sins they sigh unto him.

24 But (that we may begin in a manner at the very swadling clouts of the church) the Patriarches were circumcised, being allured into partaking of the covenant, having undoubtedly by their fathers diligence beene taught righteousnesse and imocencie, when they conspired to murder their brother: this was a mischeevous act, to be abhorred even of the most desperate theeves. At the last being meekned with the monitions of Judas, they sold him: this was also an intollerable hainousnesse. Simon and Levi with wicked revenge, and such as was also condemned by their owne fathers judgement, used crueltie against the Sichemites. Ruben with most uncleane lust defiled his fathers bed. Judas when he would give himselfe to fornication against the law of nature, went to his sonnes wife. And yet so far are they from being wiped out of the chosen people, that they be rather raised up to be heads of it. But what did David? when he was a governour of justice, with how great wickednesse did hee by shedding of innocent blood open the way to his blinde lust? Hee was already regenerate and among the regenerate garnished with notable praises of the Lord: neverthelesse hee committed that hainous offence, which is horrible even among the Gentiles: and yet hee obtained pardon. And (that wee may not carrie upon single examples) how many promises there are in the Law and the Prophets of Gods mercie toward the Israellites, so oft it is proved that the Lord sheweth himselfe appeaseable to the the offences of his people. For what doth Moses promise to come to passe, when the people being fallen into Apostasie shall returne unto the Lord? Hee shall bring thee backe out of captiuitie, and shall haue mercie on thee, and shall gather thee together out of the peoples to whom thou hast bene disperfed. If thou be scattered euen to the borders of the heauen, I will from thence againe gather thee together,

25. But I will not begin a recitall that should neuer be ended. For the Prophets are full of such promises, which doe yet offer mercie to the people covered with infinite wicked doings. What offence is there more hainous than rebellion? for it is called a diuorce betweene God and the Church. But this is overcome by the goodnes of God. What man is there (saith he by Ieremie) that if his wife give forth her bodie in common to the adulterers, can abide to returne into fauour with her? but with thy fornication all thy waies are polluted, O Iuda, the earth hath bene filled with thy filthy loves. But returne unto mee, and I will receive thee. Returne thou, turne away, I will not turne away my face from thee: because I am holy, and am not angry for ever. And truly hee can be no otherwise misad, which affirmeth that hee willett not the death of a sinner, but rather that hee should be conuered and liue. Therefore when Salomon did dedicate the temple, he appointed it also to this use, that the prayers made for obtaining pardon of finnes should be heard from thence. If (said he) thy sonnes shall sinne (for there is no man that sinneth not) and thou being angry shalt deliver them to their enemies, and they shall repent in their heart, and being turned shall entreat thee in their captiuitie, saying, we haue sinned, we haue done wickedly, and shall pray toward the land which thou hast given to their fathers, and toward this holy temple: thou shalt heare their prayers in heauen, and shalt be made mercifull to thy people that hath sinned against thee, and to all their wickednesses wherewith they haue offended thee. And not vaine-ly the Lord ordained in the law daily sacrifices for finnes. For if the Lord had not fore-seene that his people should be troubled with continuall diseases of sins, he would neuer haue appointed these remedies for them.

26. Was this benefit taken away from the faithfull, by the coming of Christ, wherein the fulnesse of grace was shewed forth, so that they daie not now pray for pardon of sins? that if they offend the Lord they may not obtaine any mercie? What shall this be else, but to say that Christ came to the destruction of them that be his, and not to their saluation, if that mercifulnesse of God in pardoning finnes which in the old testament was continually readie for the holy ones, be now said to be utterly taken away? But if we beleeue the Scriptures which expressly cry out, that in Christ onely the grace and kindnesse of the Lord fully appeared, that the plentifulnesse of mercie was powred out, that the reconciliation of God and men was fulfilled: let us not doubt that there floweth unto us a more bountifull mercifulnesse of the heavenly father, than that is cut off or shorned. And hereof there want not examples, Peter which had heard that hee should be denied before the Angels of God that confessed not the name of Christ before men, denied him thrise in one night, and that not without execration: yet he was not put away from pardon. They that liued inordinately among the Thes-salonians are so chastised, that yet they be gently called to repentance. Euen Simon the Magician himselfe is not cast in desperation, but he is rather commanded to hope well, when Peter counselleth him to flee to prayer.

27. Yea, most hainous finnes haue sometime possessed whole Churches, out of which Paul rather gently unwrapped them, than pronounced them accursed. The falling away of the Galathians was no meane offence. The Corinthians were so much lesse excusable than they, as they abounded in moe and those nothing lighter sins: yet neither of them are excluded from the mercie of God. Yea even they that had sinned above the rest in uncleannesse, fornication and unchastitie, are namely called to repentance. For the covenant of the Lord remaineth, and shall remaine for ever irrevocable, which he solemnly made with Christ the true Salomon and his members, in these words: If his sons shall forsake my law, and shall not walke in my iudgements, if they shall defile my righteousnesse, and not keepe my commandments, I will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their finnes with stripes: But my mercie I will not take away from him. Finally by the very order of the Creed we be taught, that there remaineth in the Church of Christ continuall pardon of sins : For that when the church is as it were stablished, yet forgiveness of sins is adjoynd.

28 Some that be somewhat wiser, when they see the doctrine of Novatus to be confuted with so great plainnesse of Scripture, make not every sin unpardonable, but wilfull transgressing of the Law, into which a man wittingly and willingly falleth. Now they that say so, doe vouchsafe to grant pardon to no sinne, but where a man hath erred by ignorance. But whereas the Lord in the law commandeth one sort of Sacrifices to be offered for cleansing of the wilfull finnes of the faithfull, and other to redeme their ignorances : how great lewdnesse shall it be to grant no cleansing to wilfull sinner? I say that there is nothing plainer, than that the onely sacrifice of Christ availeth to forgive the wilfull sins of the holy ones : forasmuch as the Lord hath testified the same by carnall Sacrifices as by signes. Againe who can excuse David by ignorance, whom it is evident to have bene so well instructed in the Law? Did David not know how great was the fault of adultery and manslaughter, which daily punished the same in other? Did brother-slaughter seeme to the Patriarkes a lawfull thing? Had the Corinthians so ill profited that they thought that wantonnesse, uncleannesse, whoredome, hatreds, and contentions pleased God? Did Peter being so diligently admonished not know how great a matter it was to forswear his master? Therefore let us not with our owne enviousnesse stop up the way against the mercy of God that so gently uttereth it selfe.

29 Truly I am not ignorant that the old writers expound those finnes that are daily forgiven to the faithfull, to be the light offences that creepe in by weaknesse of the flesh : and that they thought that the solemane repentance which was then required for hainous misdeeds might no more be iterate than Baptisme. Which saying is not so to be taken, as though they would either throw them down headlong into desperation, that after their first Repentance had fallen againe, or extenuate those other finnes as though they were small in the sight of God. For they knew that the holy ones doe oftentimes stagger by infidelitie, that superfluous othes doe sometimes fall from them, they now and then are chased unto anger, yea that they breake out even into manifest railings, and beside these be troubled with other evils which the Lord not slenderly abhorreth : but they so called them, to put a difference between them and publike crimes that with great offence came to the knowledge of the Church. But whereas they did so hardly pardon them that had committed any thing worthy of Ecclesiasticall correction, they did not this therefore, because they thought that such should hardly have pardon with the Lord : but by this severity they meant to make other afraid that they should not rashly run into wicked doings, by the deservit whereof they might be estranged from the Communion of the Church : howbeit truly the word of the Lord which herein ought to be the onely rule unto us, appointeth a greater moderation. For it teacheth that the rigour of discipline is so far to be extended, that he that ought chiefly to be provided for, be not swallowed up with heaviness : as we have before declared more at large.

THE SECOND CHAPTER.

A comparison of the false Church with the true Church.

OF how great value the ministry of the word and Sacraments ought to be with us and how far the reverence of it ought to proceed, that it be unto us a perpetuall token whereby to discern the Church, it hath bene already declared. That is to say, where soever the ministerie abideth whole and uncorrupted, there the faults or diseases of manners are no impediment : but that it may beare the name of a Church. Then, that the very ministerie it selfe is by small errors not so corrupted, but that it may be esteemed lawfull. Moreover wee have shewed that the errours that ought so to be pardoned are those whereby the principall doctrine of religion is not hurt, whereby those chiefe points of religion that ought to be agreeably holden among the Faithfull are not destroyed, and in the Sacrament, those that doe not abolish nor impair the lawfull institution of him that ordained them. But so soone as lying is broken into

Sin after baptism not one's through ignorance but willingly committed, yet pardonable. Leviti. 4.

In what sense the fathers doe sometimes teach that repentance is no more iterable than baptism.

Some faults doe corrupt and some destroy the Church.

the chiefe tower of religion, so soone as the summe of necessarie doctrine is perverted, and the use of the Sacraments faileth: truly the destruction of the Church followeth: like as a mans life is at an end, when his throate is thrust thorough his hart deadly wounded. And this is clearely proved by the words of Paul, when he teacheth, that the foundation of the Church is laid upon the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophets, Christ himselfe being the head corner stone. If the foundation of the Church be the doctrine of the Prophets and Apostles, by which the Faithfull are commanded to repose their saluation onely in Christ: then take away that doctrine, and how shall the building stand any longer? Therefore the Church must needs fall downe where that summe of religion falleth which is onely able to uphold it. Againe, if the true Church be the pillar and stay of the truth, it is certaine, that there is no Church, where lying and falshood have usurped the dominion.

2 Sith it is in such case under the Papistrie, we may understand how much of the Church is there remaining. In stead of the ministerie of the word, there reigneth a perverse government and made of lies mingled together; which partly quencheth and partly choaketh the pure light: Into the place of the Lords Supper is entred a most filthy sacrifice: the forme of worshipping God is deformed with a manifold and intollerable heape of superstitions: the doctrine, without which Christianitie cannot stand, is altogether buried and driven out: the publike assemblies are the schooles of idolatrie and ungodlinesse. Therefore there is no perill least in departing from a damnable paraking of so many mischiefs, wee be plucked from the Church of Christ. The communion of the Church was not ordained to this end that it should be a bond whereby we should be intangled with idolatrie, ungodlinesse, ignorance of God, and other kinds of evils: but rather whereby we should be fast holden in the feare of God and obedience of truth. They doe indeed gloriously set out their Church unto us, that there should seeme to be no other Church in the world: and afterward, as though the victorie were gotten, they decree that all be Schismatikes that dare withdraw themselves from the obedience of that Church that they paint out: and that all be heretikes that dare once mutter against the doctrine thereof. But by what proofes doe they confirme that they have the true Church? They alleage out of the ancient Chronicles, what in old time was in Italie, in France, in Spainie. They say that they fetch their beginning from those holie men that with sound doctrine, founded and raised up Churches, and established the same doctrine and edifying of the Church with their blood. And that so the Church hath bene among them so consecrate both with spiritual gifts, and with the blood of Martyrs, and preserved with continuall succession of Bishops, that it might not fall away. They rehearse how much Irenem, Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, and other esteemed this succession. But how trifling these things be, and how they be but very mockeries, I will make them very easie to understand that will be content a little to weigh them with me. Truly I would also exhort themselves earnestly to take heed hereunto, if I did trust that I might any thing prevaile with them by teaching. But for as much as they, leaving all regard of truth, doe bend themselves to this onely purpose, by all the waies that they can, to defend their owne cause, I will onely speake a few things whereby good men and those that love the truth, may winde themselves out of their subtle cavillations. First I aske of them, why they do not alleage Africke, and Egypt, and all Asia? Even because in all those countries this holie succession of Bishops hath ceased, by meane whereof they boast that they have preserved Churches. They come therefore to this point to say, that they therefore have a true Church, because since it first began to be, it hath not been destitute of Bishops: for in perpetuall course they have succeeded one another. But what if I cast Greece in their way? Therefore I aske againe of them, why they say that the Church is lost among the Grecians, among whom that succession of Bishops was never interrupted, which in their opinion is the onely keeper and preserver of the Church. They make the Grecians Schismatikes, and by what right? because in departing from the Apostolike sea, they have lost their priviledge. What? Doe not they much more desire to loose it that depart from Christ himselfe? It followeth therefore, that the pretence of succession is but vaine, unlesse the posteritie doe keepe fast and abide in the truth of Christ,

which they have received of their fathers from hand to hand.

3 Therefore the Romanists at this day doe alleage nothing else but that which it appeareth that the Jewes in old time alleaged, when they were by the Prophets of the Lord reproved of blindnesse, ungodlienesse, and idolatrie. For they gloriously boasted of the Temple, Ceremonies and Priesthoods, by which things, by great reason as they thinke they measured the Church. So in stead of the Church, they shew certaine outward visors, that oftentimes are far from the Church, and without which the Church may very well stand. Therefore wee neede to confute them with no other argument, then that wherewith Hieremie fought against the foolish presumptuousnesse of the Jewes: that is; that they should not boast in lying words, saying: The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, it is the temple of the Lord. For asmuch as the Lord doeth no where acknowledge any thing for his, but where his word is heard, and reverently observed. So when the glorie of God did sit betwene the Cherubins in the Sanctuarie, and he had promised them that that should be his steadfast seat: yet when the Priests once corrupted the worshipping of him with perverse superstitions, he removed else where; and left the place without any holinesse. If the same temple which seemed to be holily appointed to the perpetuall dwelling of God, might be forsaken of God and become unholy: there is no cause why these men should faine to us that God is so bound to persons or places, and so fast tied to outward observations, that he must needs abide with them that have onely the title and shew of the Church. And this is it about which Paul contendeth in the Epistle to the Romanes, from the ninth Chapter to the twelfth. For this did sore trouble weake consciences, that the Jewes when they seemed to be the people of God, did not onely refuse the doctrine of the Gospell; but also persecuted it. Therefore after that he hath set out the doctrine, he removeth this doubt, and denieth that those Jewes being enemies of the truth are the Church, howsoever they wanted nothing; that otherwise might be required to the outward forme of the Church. And therefore hee denieth it, because they embrace not Christ. But somewhat more expressly in the Epistle to the Galathians: wherein comparing Ismael with Isaac, he saith that many hold place in the Church, to whom the inheritance belongeth not, because they are not begotten of the free Mother. From whence also he descendeth to the comparison of two *Hierusalem*s. Because as the Law was given in the mount Sina, but the Gospell came out of Hierusalem: So many being fervently borne and brought up doe without doubting boast themselves to be the children of God and of the Church, yea they proudly despise the naturall children of God, when themselves be but bastards. On the other side also, when wee heare that it was once pronounced from heaven: Cast out the bond woman and her sonne, let us, standing upon this inviolable decree, boldly despise their unfavorable boastings. For if they be proud by reason of outward profession, Ismael was also circumsised: if they contend by antiquitie, he was the first begotten, and yet wee see that he is put away. If the cause be demanded, Paul assigneth it, for that none are accounted children, but they that are begotten of the pure lawfull seed of doctrine. According to this reason God denieth that he is bound to wicked Priests by this that he covenanteth with their Father Levi that hee should be his Angell or interpreter: yea, he turneth against themselves their false boasting, wherewith they were wont to rise up against the Prophets, that the dignitie of Priesthood was to be had in singular estimation. This he willingly admitteth, and with the same condition hee debateth with them, because he is readie to keepe his covenant, but when they doe not mutually performe their parte to him, they deserve to be rejected. Loe what succession availeth, unlesse therewithall be also joynd an imitation and evenly continuing course: even to this effect, that the successors, so soone as they be proved to have swarved from their original, be deprived of all honour. Unlesse perhaps because Caiphus succeeded many godly Bishops (yea there was even from Aaron to him a continuall unbroken course of succession) therefore that same mischievous assembly was worthie the name of the Church. But this were not tolerable even in earthly dominions, that the tyrannie of Caligula, Nero, Helioabalus, and such other, should be called a true state of Commonweale, for that they succeeded the Brutes, Scipios, and Camilles. But specially in the government of the Church there is nothing more fond, than leaving the Doctrine to set the succession in the Persons onely. But neither did the holie Doctōrs whom they falsly thrust in unto us, meane any thing lesse, than to prove that precisely as it were by right of inheritance Churches be there, where Bishops are successively placed one after another. But where as it was then out of controversie, that from the very beginning to that age nothing was changed in Doctrine, they alleaged that which might suffice to make an end of all new errors, that is, that by those was that doctrine oppugned, which had beene even from the Apostles constantly and with one agreeing consent retained. There is therefore no cause, why they should any longer goe forward to deceive by pretending a false colour under the name of the Church, which we doe reverently esteeme as becommeth us: but when they come to the definition of it, not only water (as the common saying is) cleaveth unto them, but they sicke fast in their owne myre because they put a stinking harlot in place of the holie spouse of Christ. That this putting in of a changeling should not deceive us, beside other admonitions, let us remember this also of Augustine. For speaking of the Church, he sayeth: It is it that is sometime darkned and covered with multitude of offences as with a cloud: sometime in calmnesse of time appeareth quiet and free: sometime is hidden and troubled with waves of tribulations and temptations. Hee bringeth forth examples, that oftentimes the strongest pillars either valiantly suffered banishment for the faith, or were hidden in the whole world.

4 In like manner the Romanists doe vex us, and make afraid the ignorant with the name of the Church, whereas they be the deadly enemies of Christ. Therefore although they pretend the Temple, the Priesthood, and other such outward shewes, this vaine glittering wherewith the eyes of the simple be dazeled ought nothing to move us to grant that there is a Church where the Word of God doth not appeare. For this is the perpetuall marke wherewith God hath marked them that be his. He that is of the truth (saith he) heareth my voice. Againe, I am that good shepheard, and I know my sheep, and am knowne of them. My sheep heare my voice, and I know them, and they follow me. And a little before he had said, that the sheepe follow their shepheard, because they knew his voice: but they follow not a stranger, but run away from him because they knew not the voice of strangers. Why are wee therefore wilfully mad in judging the Church, whereas Christ hath marked it with an undoubtfull signe, which where-soever it is seene cannot deceive, but that it certainly sheweth the Church to be there: but where it is not, there remaineth nothing that can give a true signification of the Church. For Paul rehearseth that the Church was builded, not upon the judgements of men, nor upon Priesthoods, but upon the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophets. But rather Hierusalem is to be severally knowne from Babylon, and the Church of Christ from the conspiracie of Satan, by that difference wherewith Christ hath made them different one from the other. Hee that is of God (saith he) heareth the words of God: Ye therefore heare not, because ye are not of God. In a summe, forasmuch as the Church is the kingdome of Christ, and he reigneth not but by his word, can it be now doubtfull to any man, but that those be the words of lying, by which Christs kingdome is faigned to be without his Scepter, that is to say without his holie Word?

5 But now whereas they accuse us of Schisme and heresie, because we both preach a contrary doctrine to them, and obey not their lawes, and have our assemblies to prayers, to baptisme, to the ministration of the Supper, and other holy doings, severally from them: it is indeed a very sore accusation, but such as needeth not a long or laborious defence. They are called heretikes and scismatickes, which making a division, doe breake in sunder the communion of the Church. And this communion is holden together with true bounds, that is to say, the agreement of true doctrine, and brotherly charitie. Whereupon Augustine putteth this difference betweene heretikes and scismatickes, that heretikes indeed doe with false doctrine corrupt the purenesse of faith, but the scismatickes sometime even where there is like faith, doe breake the bond of fellowship. But this is also to be noted, that this conjoyning of charitie do hangeth upon the unitie of Faith, that faith ought to be the beginning thereof, the end, and finally the only rule. Let us therefore remember that so oft as the unitie of the Church is commended unto us, this is required, that while our mindes agree in Christ, our wils also may be joined together with mutuall well willing in Christ. Therefore Paul when hee exhorteth us to that well willing, taketh for his foundation that there is one God, one Faith, and one Baptisme. Yea whereforever hee teacheth us to be of one minde, and of one will, hee by and by addeth in Christ, or according to Christ: meaning, that it is a fictitious companie of the wicked, and not agreement of the faithfull which is without the word of the Lord.

The Church and the desolation of the Church of Israel.

What was remaining of the Church in Iuda and Israel when they were fallen to idolatrie.

6 Cyprian also following Paul deriveth the whole fountaine of the agreement of the Church, from the onely Bishoprick of Christ. He afterward addeth the Church is but one, which spreadeth abroad more largely into a multitude with increase of fruitfulness: like as there be many sunne beames, but one light: and many branches of a tree, but one body grounded upon a fast roote: And when many streames doe flowe from one fountaine, although the number seeme to be scattered abroad by largeness of overflowing plentie, yet the unitie abideth in the originall. Take away a beame of the sunne from the body, the unitie can suffer no division. Breake a branch from the tree; the broken branch cannot spring. Cut off the streame from the spring head, being cut off it drieth up. So also the Church being overspred with the light of the Lord, is extended over the whole world: yet there is but one light that is spred every where. Nothing could be said more fitly to expresse that undividable knitting together, which all the members of Christ have one with another. We see how he continually calleth us backe to the very head. Whereupon hee pronounceth that heresies and schismes doe arise hereof, that men doe not returne to the originall of truth, nor doe seeke that head, nor keepe the doctrine of the heavenly Master. Now let them go and cry that wee be heretikes that have departed from their church: sith there hath beene no cause of our estranging from them but this one, that they can in no wise abide the pure professing of the truth: but I tell not how they have driven us out with cursings and cruell execrations. Which very selfe doing doth abundantly enough acquite us, unlesse they will also condemne the Apostles for schismatikes, with whom we have all one cause. Christ (I say) did foresay to his Apostles, that the time should come when they should be cast out of the Synagogues for his name sake. And those Synagogues of which he speaketh, were then accounted lawfull Churches. Sith therefore it is evident that wee be cast out, and we be readie to shew that the same is done for the names sake of Christ, truly the cause ought first to be inquired of, before that any thing be determined upon us, either one way or other. Howbeit, if they will, I am content to discharge them of this point. For it is enough for me, that it behoved that we should depart from them, that we might come to Christ.

7 But it shall appeare yet more certainly in what estimation wee ought to have all the Churches, whom the tyrannie of that Romish idoll hath possessed, if it be compared with the old church of the Israelites, as it is described in the Prophets. There was then a true Church among the Jewes and Israelites, when they continued in the lawes of the covenant, for they obtained those things by the benefit of God, whereupon the Church consisteth. They had the truth of doctrine in the law: the ministerie thereof was among the Priests and Prophets: with the signe of circumcision they entered into religion: by other Sacraments they were exercised to the confirmation of Faith. It is no doubt that those titles wherewith the Lord hath honored his Church, fitly pertained to their fellowship. After that, forsaking the law of the Lord they went out of kind to idolatrie and superstition, they partly lost that prerogative. For who dare take away the name of the Church from them, with whom God hath left the preaching of his word and observation of his mysteries? Again, who dare call that the Church without any exception, where the word of the Lord is openly and freely troden under foote? where the ministerie thereof, the chiefe sinew, yea the very soule of the Church is destroyed?

8 What then? will some man say: was there therefore no parcell of a Church remaining among the Jewes after that they fell away to idolatry? The answer is easie. First I say that in the very falling away there were certaine degrees. For we will not say that there was all one fall of Juda, and Israel, at such time as they both first swarved from the pure worshipping of God. When Jerobam first made calves, against the open prohibition of God, and did dedicate an unlawfull place for worshipping, he did utterly corrupt religion. The Jewes did first defile themselves with wicked and superstitious manners before that they wrongfully changed the order in the outward forme of religion. For although under Rehabeam they had already gotten them many perverse ceremonies: yet because there tarried at Hierusalem both the Doctrine of the Law, and the Priesthood, and the ceremonious usages in such sort as God had ordained them, the godly had there a tolerable state of church. Among the Israelites unto the raigne of Achab, there was no amendment of things, and from thence forth they fell from worse to worse. They that succeed afterward, to the very destruction of the kingdome, partly were like unto him, and partly (when they minded to be somewhat better than he) they followed the example of Jeroboam: but they all every one were wicked and idolaters. In Jewry there were now and then diverse changes, while some kings perverted the worshipping of God with false and forged superstition, some other restored religion that was decayed: untill the verie priests themselves defiled the Temple of God with prophane and abominable usages.

9 Now let the Papiſts if they can how much soever they extenuate their owne faults, denie that among them the state of religion is as corrupt & defiled as it was in the kingdome of Israel under Jeroboam. But they have a grosser Idolatrie: and in doctrine they are not one drop purer: unlesse peradventure even in it also they be more unpure. God, yea all men that are ended but with a meane judgement, shall be witnesses with me, and the thing it selfe also declareth, how herein I tell nothing more than truth. Now when they will drive us to the communion of the Church, they require two things of us: first, that we should communicate with all their praiers, sacraments, and Ceremonies: then that whatsoever honour, power and Jurisdiction Christ giveth to his Church we should give the same to their Church. As to the first point, I grant that all the Prophets that were at Hierusalem, when things were there very much corrupted, did neither severally sacrifice, nor had assemblies to pray severall from other men. For they had a commandment of God, whereby they were commanded to come together into Salmons temple: they knew that the Leviticall Priests, howsoever they were unworthy of that honour, yet because they were ordained by the Lord ministers of the holy ceremonies, and were not as then deposed, did yet still rightfully possesse that place. But (which is the chiefe point of this question) they were compelled to no superstitious worshipping, yea they tooke in hand to doe nothing but that which was ordained by God. But among these men, I meane the Papiſts, what like thing is there? For we can scarcely have any meeting together with them, wherein wee shall not defile our selves with open idolatrie. Truly the principall bond of their communion is in the Masse, which wee abhorre as the greatest sacrifice. And whether wee doe this rightfully or wrongfully, shall be seene in another place. At this present it is enough to shew that in this behalfe wee are in other case than the Prophets were, which although they were present at the ceremonies of the wicked, were not compelled to behold or use any ceremonies but such as were instituted by God. And, if they will needs have an example altogether like, let us take it out of the kingdome of Israel. After the ordinance of Jeroboam Circumcision remained, the sacrifices were offered, the Law was accounted holy, the same God was called upon whom they had received of their fathers: but for the forged and forbidden formes of worshipping, God disallowed and condemned all that was there done. Shew me one Prophet, or any one godly man that once worshipped or sacrificed in Bethell. For they knew they could not doe it, but that they should defile themselves with some sacrifice. Wee have then thus much, that the communion of the Church ought not so farre to be of force with the godly, that if it should degenerate to prophane and filthy usages, they should forthwith of necessitie follow it.

10 But about the other point wee contend yet more earnestly. For if the Church be so considered to be such, whose judgement we ought to reverence, whose authority to regard, whose monitions to obey, with whose chastisements to be moved, whose communion in all things wee ought religiously to observe: then we cannot grant them a Church, but that we must of necessitie be bound to subjection and obedience unto it.

Yet wee will willingly grant them that which the Prophets granted to the Jewes and Israelites of their time : when things were there in as good, yea or better state. But we see how each where they cry out, that their assemblies are unholly, to which it is no more lawfull to consent than it is to denie God. And truly if those were Churches, it followeth therefore that in Israel Heliar, Michess, and such other : In Iurie, Esfay, Jeremy, Osee, and such other of that sort, whom the Prophets, Priests, and people of that time hated and detested worse than any uncircumcised men, were strangers from the Church of God. If those were Churches, than the Church was not the pillar of truth, but the stay of lying : not the tabernacle of the living God, but the receptacle of idols. Therefore it was needfull for them to depart from the consent of those assemblies, which was nothing else but a wicked conspiracie against God. In like manner if any man acknowledge the assemblies at these daies being defiled with idolatrie, superstition, and wicked doctrine, to be such in whose full communion a Christian man ought to continue even to the consent of Doctrine, he shall greatly erre. For if they be churches, then they have the power of the keyes. But the keyes are unseparably knit with the word, which is from thence quite driven away. Again, if they be churches, then the promise of Christ is of force among them, whatsoever ye binde, &c. But they contrariwise doe banish from their communion all such as doe professe themselves not fainedly the servants of Christ. Therefore either the promise of Christ is vaine, or at least in this respect they are not churches. Finally, in stead of the ministry of the word they have schooles of ungodlinesse, and a sinke of all kinds of errors. Therefore either in this respect they are not churches, or there shall remaine no token whereby the lawfull assemblies of the faithfull may be severally knowne from the meeting of Turkes.

11 But as in the old time there yet remained among the Jewes certaine peculiar prerogatives of the church, so at this day also we take not from the Papiests such steps as it pleased the Lord to have remaining among them after the dissolution of the church. The Lord had once made his covenant with the Jewes. That same rather being upholden by the stedfastnesse of it selfe did continue with striving against their ungodlinesse, than was preserved by them. Therefore (such was the assurednesse and constancie of Gods goodnesse) there remained the covenant of the Lord, neither could his faithfulness be blotted out by their unfaithfulness : neither could Circumcision be so prophaned with their uncleane hands, but that it still was the signe and sacrament of that covenant. Whereupon the children that were borne of them, the Lord called his owne, which unlesse it were by speciall blessing, belonged nothing to him. So when hee hath left his covenant in France, Italie, Germanie, Spaine, England : since those provinces have beene oppressed with the tyrannie of Antichrist, yet thachis covenant might remaine inviolable, first hee there preserved baptism, the testimonie of his covenant, which being consecrate by his owne mouth retaineth her owne force notwithstanding the ungodlinesse of man : then, with his providence he hath wrought that there should remaine other remnants, lest the church should be utterly destroyed. And as oftentimes buildings are so pulled downe, that the foundations and ruines remaine : so hee hath not suffered his church either to be overthrowne by Antichrist from the very foundation, or to be laid even with the ground (howsoever to punish the unthankfulness of men that had despised his word, he suffereth horrible shaking and dissolution to chance) but even after the very wasting hee willed that the building halfe pulled downe should yet remaine.

12 Whereas therefore wee will not simply grant to the Papiests the title of the church, we doe not therefore denie that there be churches among them : but only we contend of the true and lawfull ordering of the church : which is required in the communion both of the Sacraments which are the signes of profession, and also specially of doctrine. Daniel and Paul foretold that Antichrist should sit in the temple of God. With us wee account the Bishop of Rome the Captaine and Standard-bearer of that wicked and abominable kingdome. Whereas his seate is placed in the temple of God, thereby is meant that his kingdome shall be such as cannot abolish the name of Christ nor of his Church. Heereby therefore appeareth, that wee doe not denie but that even under his tyrannie remaine churches, but such as hee hath prophaned with with ungodlinesse full of sacriledge, such as he hath afflicted with our iugious dominion, such as hee hath corrupted and in manner killed with evill and damnable doctrines, as with poysoned drinks: such wherein Christ lyeth halfe buryed, the Gospell overwhelmed, godlinesse banished, the worshipping of God in a manner abolished: such finally wherein all things are so troubled, that therein rather appeareth the face of Babilon than of the holy city of God. In summe, I say that they bee Churches, in respect that the Lord there marvellously preserveth the remnants of his people howsoever they were dispersed and scattered abroad, in respect that there remaine some tokens of the church, especially these tokens, the effectuallnesse whereof neither the craft of the devill, nor the maliciousnesse of man can destroy. But on the other side because these markes are blotted out, which in this discourse wee ought principally to have respect unto, I say, that every one of their assemblies and the whole body wanteth the lawfull forme of a Church.

THE THIRD CHAPTER.

Of the Teachers and Ministers of the Church, and of their election and office.

NOW it is meet that we speake of the order, by which it was the Lords will to have this Church governed. For although in his Church he onely must rule and raigne, yea and beare prehemianence or excell in it, and this government to be used or executed by his onely word: yet because hee dwelleth not among us in visible presence, so that he can presently with his owne mouth declare his will unto us, we have said that in this he useth the ministry of men, and as it were the travell of deputies, not in transferring his right and honour unto them, but onely that by their mouth he might doe his owne worke, like as a workeman to doe his worke useth his instrument. I am compelled to reapeate againe those things that I have already declared. He might indeede doe it either by himselfe without any other helpe or instrument, or also by meane of Angels: but there are many causes why he had rather doe it by men. For by this meane first hee declareth his good will toward us, when he taketh out of men them that shall do his message in the world, that shall be the interpreters of his secret will, finally that shall represent his owne person. And so by experience hee proveth that it is not vaine that commonly he calleth us his temples, when out of the mouthes of men, as out of his sanctuary, hee giveth answers to men. Secondly, this is the best and most profitable exercise to humility, when hee accustometh us to obey his word, howsoever it be preached by men like unto us, yea sometime our inferiors in dignity. If hee himselfe speake from heaven, it were no marvell if his holy Oracles were without delay reverently received with the eares and minde of all men. For who would not dread his power being in presence? Who would not bee throwne downe at the first sight of so great Majesty? Who would not bee confounded with that infinite brightnesse? But when some silly man risen out of the dust speaketh in the name of God, here with very good testimony wee declare our godlinesse and reverent obedience toward God himselfe, if to his minister we yeeld our selves willing to learne, which yet in nothing excelleth us. Therefore for this cause also hee hath hidden the treasure of his heavenly wisdom in bricke and earthen vessels, that hee might have the certaine prooffe how much he is esteemed of us. Moreover there was nothing fitter for the cherishing of mutuall charity, than that men should be bound together one to another with this bond, when one is made a Pastor to teach the rest, and they that are commanded to be schollers receive all one doctrine at one mouth. For if every man were able enough to serve himselfe, and needed not the helpe of another: such is the pride of mans nature, that every one would despise other, and should againe bee despised of them. Therefore the Lord hath bound his Church with that knot, which he foresaw to be the strongest knot to hold unity together, when he hath left with men the doctrine of salvation, and of eternall life, that by their hands hee might communicate it to the rest. Hereunto Paul had respect when hee wrote to the Ephesians; One body, one spirit, as also ye be called in one hope of your calling.

Mat. 26. 11.*

doct. Christ.*

Eph. 4. 4.

One Lord, one Faith, one Baptisme: One God, and the Father of all, which is above all, and by all, and in us all. But unto every one of us grace is given according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Wherefore he saith: When he was gone up on high, he led captivity captive, he gave gifts to men. Hee that went downe, is the selfsame hee, that went up, that hee might fulfill all things. And the same hath given some to be Apostles, and some Prophets, and some Evangelists, and other some Pastors and teachers, unto the restoring of the holy ones, to the worke of ministracion, to the edifying of the body of Christ, untill we come all into the unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Sonne of God into a perfect man, into the measure of full growne age: that we may be no more children that may be carried about with every winde of doctrine: but following truth in charity, let us in all things grow into him that is the head, even Christ, in whom the whole body conjoynd and compacted together by all the joynt of subministracion, according to the working in measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of it selfe by charity.

2 By these words hee sheweth, that that ministry of men, which God useth in governing his church is the chiefe sinew, whereby the faithfull cleave together in one body: and also hee sheweth that the church cannot otherwise bee preserved safe, but it it bee upholden by these staves, in which it pleased the Lord to repose the salvation of it. Christ (saith he) is gone up on high, that he might fulfill all things. This is the manner of fulfilling, that by his ministers, to whom he hath committed that office, and hath given the grace to execute that worke, hee disposeth and distributeth his gifts to the church, yea and after a certaine manner giveth himselfe present, with extending the power of his spirit in this institution, that it should not bee vaine or idle. So is the restoring of the holy ones performed: so is the body of Christ edified, so doe we by all things grow into him that is the head, and doe grow together among our selves: so are wee all brought into the unity of Christ, if prophetic flourish among us, if wee receive the Apostles, if wee refuse not the doctrine ministred unto us. Therefore he goeth about the dispersion, or rather the ruine and destruction of the church, whosoever hee be, that either endeavoureth to abolish this order of whom we speake, and this kind of government, or miniseth the estimation of it as a thing not so necessary. For neither the light and heate of the sunne, nor meat and drinke are so necessary to nourish and sustaine this present life, as the office of the Apostles and Pastors is necessary to preserve the Church in earth.

3 Therefore I have above admonished, that God hath oftentimes with such titles as hee could, commended the dignity thereof unto us, that wee should have it in most high honour and price, as the most excellent thing of all. Hee testifieth that hee giveth to men singular benefit, in raising them up teachers, where he commandeth the Prophet to cry out, that faire are the feete, and blessed is the coming of them that bring tydings of peace: and when hee calleth the Apostles the light of the world, and salt of the earth. Neither could this office bee more honourably advanced, than it was when hee said: Hee that heareth you, heareth me: Hee that despiseth you, despiseth me. But there is no place more plaine, than in Paul in his second Epistle to the Corinthians, where hee as it were of purpose intreateth of this matter. Hee affirmeth therefore, that there is nothing in the church more excellent or glorious than the Ministry of the Gospel, so much as it is the administration of the Spirit, and of righteousnesse, and eternall life. These and like sayings serve to this purpose, that that order of governing and preserving the Church by Ministers, which the Lord hath established for ever, should not grow out of estimation among us, and so at length by very contempt grow out of use. And how great is the necessity thereof, hee hath declared not onely by words, but also by examples. When his will was to shew more fully to Cornelius with the light of his truth, hee sent an Angell from heaven to send Peter unto him. When his will was to call Paul to the knowledge of himselfe, and to engrasse him into the Church, hee spake not to him with his owne voyce, but sent him to a man, of whom hee should receive both the doctrine of salvation, and the sanctification of baptisme. If it be not done without cause, that an Angell which is the interpreter of God, doe himselfe abstaine from declaring the will of God, but commandeth that a man be sent for, to declare it: and not without cause that Christ the only Schoolmaster of the Faithfull committeth Paul to the schooling of a man, yea even that same Paul whom he had determined to take up into the third heaven, and to vouchsafe to grant him miraculose revelation of things unspeakable: who is there now that dare despise that ministerie, or passe it over as a thing superfluous; the use whereof it hath pleased God to make approved by such examples?

4 They that have rule of the government of the Church according to the institution of Christ, are named of Paul first Apostles, then Prophets, thirdly Evangelists, fourthly Pastors, last of all Teachers. Of which, the two last alone have ordinarie office in the Church: the other three the Lord raised up at the beginning of his kingdome, and sometime yet also raiseth up, as the necessitie of times requireth. What the Apostles office is, appeareth by that commandement: goe, preach the Gospell to every creature. There are not certaine boundes appointed unto them: but the whole world is assigned them, to be brought into the obedience of Christ: that in spreading the Gospell among all nations wheresoever they shall be able, they may each where raise up his Kingdome. Therefore Paul, when hee went about to prove his Apostleship, rehearseth that hee hath gotten to Christ not some one Citie, but hath far and wide spread abroad the Gospell: and that he hath not laid his hands to another mans foundation, but planted Churches where the name of the Lord had never beene heard of. Therefore the Apostles were sent to bring backe the world from falling away, unto true obedience of GOD, and each where to stablish his kingdome by preaching of the Gospell: or (if you like that better) as the first builders of the Church, to lay the foundations thereof in all the world. Prophets hee calleth, not all expositors of Gods will whatsoever they be, but those that by singular revelation excelled, such as at this time either bee none, or are lesse notable. By Evangelists I understand those, which when in dignitie they were lesse than the Apostles, yet in office were next unto them, yea and occupied their roomes. Such were Luke, Timothie, Titus, and other like: and peradventure also the severantie Disciples, whom Christ appointed in the second place after the Apostles. According to this exposition (which seemeth to me agreeable both with the words and meaning of Paul) those three offices were not ordained in the Church to this end that they should bee perpetuall, but onely to serve for that time wherein Churches were to bee erected, where were none before, or at least to bee removed from Moses to Christ. Albeit I denie not, but that afterward also the Lord hath sometime raised up Apostles, or at least in their places Evangelists, as it hath beene done in our time. For it was needfull to have such, to bring backe the Church from the falling away of Antichrist. Yet the office it selfe I doe neverthelesse call extraordinarie, because it hath no place in the Churches already well set in order. Next after these are Pastors and Teachers, whom the Church may never lacke: betweene whom I thinke that there is this difference, that the teachers are not appointed to beare rule of discipline, nor for the ministration of Sacraments, nor admonishments or exhortations, but onely to expound the Scripture, that pure and sound doctrine may be kept among the faithfull. But the office of Pastor containeth all these things within it.

5 Now we have, which were those ministeries in the Church that continued but for a time, and which were those that were ordained to endure perpetuall. If wee joyne the Evangelists with the Apostles, wee shall have remaining two couples after a certaine manner answering the one to the other. For as our teachers are like to the old Prophets, in such sort are our Pastors like to the Apostles. The office of Prophets was more excellent, by reason of the singular gift that they had of revelation: but the office of teachers hath in a manner like order, and altogether the same end. So those twelve whom the Lord did choise, that they should publish abroad to the world the new preaching of the Gospell, in degree and dignitie went before the rest. For although by the meaning and proprietie of the world, all the ministers of the Church may bee rightly called Apostles; because they are sent of the Lord: and are his messengers: yet because it was much becomfult, that there should bee a certaine knowledge had of the sending of them that should bring a thing new and unheard of, it was necessary that those twelve ( to whose number Paul was afterward added ) should be garnished with some peculiar title above the rest. Paul himselfe indeede in one place giveth this name to Andronicus and Timias, whom hee saith to have bene notable among the Apostles : but when he meaneth to speake properly hee referreth it to none other but to that principall degree. And this is the common use of the Scripture. Yet the Pastors ( saying that each of them doe governe severall Churches appointed to them ) have all one charge with the Apostles. Now what manner of thing this is, let us heare it more plainly.

6 The Lord when hee sent the Apostles, gave them commandment (as wee said even now) to preach the Gospell, and to baptise them that beleeveth unto forgiveness of finnes. He had before commanded, that they should distribute the holy signes of his bodie and bloud, as he had done. Loe heere is a holy, inviolable, and perpetual law laid upon them that succeed in the Apostles place, whereby they receive commandment to preach the Gospell, and minister the Sacraments. Whereupon wee gather, that they which neglect both these things, doe falsly say that they beare the person of the Apostles. But what of the Pastors? Paul speaking not of himselfe onely, but of them all, when he saith: Let a man so esteeme us as the ministers of Christ, and distributors of the mysteries of God. Againe in another place, A Bishop must be a fust holder of that faithfull word which is according to doctrine: that he may be able to exhort by sound doctrine, and to convince the gainefayers. Out of those and like places, which are each where to be found, we may gather, that also in the office of the Apostles, these be the two principall parts, to preach the Gospell, and to minister the Sacraments. As for the order of teaching, it consisteth not onely in publike sermons, but belongeth also to private admonitions. So Paul calleth the Ephesians to witnesse that hee hath not fled from doing of any of those things that were for their profit, but that hee preached and taught them both openly and in every house, testifying both to the Jewes and Grecians, repentance and faith in Christ. Againe a little after: that hee hath not ceased with teares to admonish every one of them. Neither yet belongeth it to my purpose at this present to expresse all the qualities of a good Pastor, but onely to point out what they profess that call themselves pastors: that is, that they are: so made rulers of the Church, not that they should have an idle dignitie, but that they should with the doctrine of Christ instruct the people to true godlinesse, minister the holy mysteries, and preserve and exercise upright discipline. For whosoever be set to be watchmen in the Church, the Lord declareth unto them, that if any by their negligence perish through ignorance, hee will require the bloud at their hands. That also pertaineth to them all, which Paul saith of himselfe: Woe to mee unless I preach the Gospell, forasmuch as the distributing thereof is committed to me. Finally, what the Apostles performed to the whole world, the same ought every Pastor to performe to his flocke, to which he is appointed.

7. Albeit when wee assigne to every one their severall Churches, yet in the meane while wee doe not denie but that hee which is bound to one Church may helpe other Churches, if any troublesome thing doe happen that requireth his presence, or if hee be asked counsell of any darke matter. But forasmuch as for the keeping of the peace of the Church, this policie is necessarie, that there be set forth to every man what hee should doe, least all be confusedly disordered, run about without calling, or rashly run altogether into one place, and least such as are more carefull for their owne commoditie than for the edification of the Church, should at their owne will leave their Churches vacant: this ordering ought commonly to be kept so neere as may be, that every man contented with his owne bounds, should not breake into another mans charge. And this is no invention of man, but the ordinance of GOD himselfe. For wee reade that Paul and Barnabas created Priests in all the severall Churches of Lystra, Antioch, Iconium: and Paul himselfe commandeth Titus that hee should appoint Priests in every towne. So in one place hee speaketh of the Bishops of Philippes, and in another place of Archippus Bishop of the Colossians. And there remaineth a notable Sermon of his in Luke, to the Priests of the Church of Ephesus. Whosoever therefore shall take upon him the government and charge of the Church, let him know that he is bound to this law of Gods calling : not that as bound to the soyle (as the Lawyers terme it) that is, made bound and fastened unto it, he may not once move his foote from thence, if the common profit doe so require, so that it be done well and orderly : but he that is called into one place ought not himselfe to thinke of removing, nor seeke to be delivered, as hee shall thinke to be good for his commoditie. Then if it be expedient that any be removed to another place, yet he ought not to attempt it of his owne private advise, but to tary for publike authoritie.

8 But whereas I have without difference called them Bishops, and Priests, and Pastors, and Ministers, that rule Churches : I did that according to the usage of the Scripture, which indifferently useth these words. For whosoever do execute the Ministerie of the word, to them he giveth the title of Bishops. So by Paul, where Titus is commanded to appoint Priests in every towne, it is immediately added. For a Bishop must bee unproveable, &c. So in another place hee salutech many Bishops in one Church. And in the Acts it is reherfed, that he called together the Priests of Ephesus, whom he himselfe in his own sermon calleth Bishops. Heere now it is to be noted, that hitherto we have recited none but those offices that stand in the Ministerie of the word: either doth Paul make mention of any other in that fourth Chapter which wee have alleaged. But in the Epistle to the Romanes, and in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, he reckoneth up other offices, as powers, the gift of healing, interpretation, government, caring for the poore. Of the which I omitted those that endured but for a time, because it is to no profitable purpose to tary upon them. But there are two that doe perpetually abide, that is to say, government, and care of the poore. Governours I thinke were the Elders chosen out of the people, that should together with the Bishops have rule of the judgement of manners, and the using of discipline. For a man cannot otherwise exponnd that which hee saith : Let him that ruleth doe it with carefullnesse. Therefore at the beginning every Church had their Senate, gathered of godly, grave, and holie men: which had that same jurisdiction in correcting of vices, whereof wee shall speake hereafter. And that this was the order of more than one age, experience it selfe declareth. Therefore this office of government is also necesserie for allages.

9 The care of the poore was committed to the Deacons. Howbeit to the Romanes there are set two kinds. Let him that giveth (saith Paul in that place) doe it in simplicitie : let him that hath mercie, doe it in cheerefullnesse. For as much as it is certaine that he speaketh of the publike offices of the Church, it must needs be that there were two severall degrees. Unlessse my judgement deceive me, in the first point hee meaneth Deacons, that distributed the almes : in the other he speaketh of them that had given themselves to looking to the poore and sicke : of which sort were the widowes of whom hee maketh mention to Timothie. For women could execute no other publike office, but to give themselves to the service of the poore. If we grant this, (as we must needs grant it) then there shall be two sorts of Deacons : of which, one sort shall serve in distributing the things of the poore, the other in looking to the poore of the church themselves. But although the very word Disconia, Deaconrie extendeth further : yet the Scripture specially calleth them Deacons, to whom the Church hath given the charge to distribute the almes, and to take care of the poore, and hath appointed them as it were stewards of the common treasure of the poore : whose beginning, institution, and office, is described of Luke in the Acts. For when a murmuring was raised by the Grecians : for that in the ministerie of the poore their widowes were neglected, the Apostles excusing themselves with saying that they could not serve both offices, both the preaching of the word and the ministring at tables, required of the multitude, that there might be chosen seven honest men, to whom they might commit that doing. Loe what manner of Deacons the Apostolike Church had, and what Deacons it were meete for us to have according to their example.

10 Now whereas in the holie assemblie all things are to be done in order and comely, there is nothing whereto that ought to be more diligently observed, than in stablishing the order of government : because there is no where greater perill if any thing be done disorderly. Therefore to the end that unquiet and troublesome men (which otherwise would happen) should rashly thrust in themselves to teach or to rule, it is expressely provided, that no man should without calling take upon him a publicke office in the Church. Therefore that a man may be judged a true minister of the Church, first he must be orderly called, then he must answere his vocation, that is to say, take upon him and execute the duties enjoyned him. This we may oftentimes marke in Paul: which when hee meaneth to approve his Apostleship, in a manner alway with his faithfulness in executing his office hee alleadgeth his calling. If so great a minister of Christ dare not take upon himselfe the authoritie, that hee should be heard in the Church, but because hee both is appointed thereunto by the commandement of the Lord, and also faithfully performeth that which is committed unto him: how great shamefulness shall it be, if any man wanting both or either of these, shall challenge such honor to himselfe? But because we have above touched the necessitie of executing the office, now let us entreat onely of the calling.

11 The discourse thereof standeth in fower points: that we should know, what manner of ministers, how, and by whom, ministers ought to be instituted, and with what usage or what ceremonie they are to be admitted. I speake of the outward and solemne calling, which belongeth to publike order of the Church: as for that secret calling, whereof every minister is privie in his owne conscience before God, and hath not the Church witness of it, I omit it. It is a good witness of our heart, that not by any ambition, nor covetousnesse, nor any other greedie desire, but with pure feare of God and zeale to edifie the Church, wee receive the office offered unto us. That indeed is (as I have said) necessarie for every one of us, if wee will approve our ministerie allowable before God. Neverthelesse he is rightly called in presence of the Church, that cometh unto it with an evill conscience, so that his wickednesse be not open. They are wont also to say that even private men are called to the ministerie, whom they see to be meete and able to execute it: because verily learning joyned with godlinesse and with the other qualities of a good Pastour, is a certaine preparation to the very office. For whom the Lord hath appointed to so great an office, he first furnisheth them with those armours that are required to fulfill it, that they should not come emptie and unprepared unto it. Whereupon Paul also to the Corinthians, when he meant to dispute of the very offices, first rehearsed the gifts which they ought to have that execute the offices. But because this is the first sort of those fower points that I have propounded, let us now goe forward unto it.

12 What manner of Bishops it is meete to choose, Paul doth largely declare in two places, but the summe cometh to this effect, that none are to be chosen, but they that are of so sound doctrine, and of holy life, and not notable in any vice, which might both take away credit from them, and procure slander to the ministerie. Of Deacons and Elders there is altogether like consideration. It is alway to be looked unto, that they be not unable or unfit to beare the burden that is laid upon them, that is to say, that they may be furnished with those powers that are necessarie to the fulfilling of their office. So when Christ was about to send his Apostles, he garnished them with those weapons and instruments which they could not want. And Paul when he had painted out the image of a good and true Bishop, warneth Timothie, that he would not defile himselfe with choosing any man that differeth from it. I refer this word How, not to the Ceremonie of choosing, but to the reverent feare that is to be kept in the choosing. Hereupon come the sayings and prayers, which Luke reciteth that the faithful used when they made Priests. For whereas they understood that they medled with a most earnest matter, they durst attempt nothing, but with great reverence and carefulnesse. But they chiefly applied themselves to prayers, whereby they might crave of God the spirit of counsell and discretion.

13 The third thing that we have set in our division was, by whom ministers are to be chosen. Of this thing no certaine rule can be gathered out of the institution of Apostles, which had some difference from the common calling of the rest. For because it was an extraordinary ministerie, that it might be made discernible by some more notable marke, it behooved that they which should execute it, should be called and appointed by the Lords owne mouth. They therefore tooke in hand their doing, being furnished by no mans election, but by the only commandement of God and of Christ.

Hereupon

Apostles elected of God himselfe.

Hereupon cometh that when the Apostles would put another in the place of Judas, they durst not certainly name any one man, but they brought forth two, that the Lord should declare by lot, whether of them he would have to succeed. After this manner also it is meete to take this, that Paul denieth that he was create Apostle of men or by man, but by Christ and God the Father. That first point, that is to say of men, hee had common with all the godly ministers of the word. For no man could rightly take upon him that execution, but hee that were called of God. But the other point was proper and singular to himselfe. Therefore when he glorieth of this, he doth not only boast that he hath that which belongeth to a true and lawfull Pastour, but also bringeth forth the signes of his Apostleship. For when there were some among the Galathians, which travelling to diminish his authoritie, made him some meane disciple, put in office under them by the principall Apostles: hee, to defend in safetie the dignitie of his preaching, which hee knew to be shot at by those subtille devises, needed to shew himselfe in all points nothing inferior to the other Apostles. Therefore hee affirmeth that hee was chosen, not by the judgement of men, like some common Bishop, but by the mouth and manifest Oracle of the Lord himselfe.

14 But no man that is sober will denie, that it is according to the order of lawfull calling, that Bishops should be appointed by men: forasmuch as there are so many testimonies of th: Scripture for prooffe thereof. Nei her doth that saying of Paul make to the contrary, as it is said, that hee was not sent of men, nor by men: forasmuch as he speaketh not there of the ordinary choosing of Ministers, but chalengeth to himselfe that which was speciall to the Apostles. Howbeit God also appointed Paul by himselfe by singular prerogative, that in the meane time he used the discipline of Ecclesiasticall calling. For Luke reporteth it thus, when the Apostles were sitting and praying, the Holy Ghost said: Separate unto me Paul and Barnabas to the worke to which I have severally chosen them. To what purpose served that separation and putting on of hands, sith the holy Ghost hath testified his owne election, but that the discipline of the Church in appointing ministers by men, might be preserved? Therefore the Lord could by no plainer example approve such order, than he did when having first declared that he had ordained Paul an Apostle for the Gentiles, yet he willeth him to be appointed by the Church. Which thing wee may see in the choosing of Mabius. For because the office of Apostleship was of so great importance, that they durst not by their owne judgement choose any one man into that degree, they did set two men in the midst, upon the one of whom the lot should fall: that so both the election might have an open testimonie from heaven; and yet the policy of the Church should not be passed over.

15 Now it is demanded whether the minister ought to bee chosen of the whole Church, or onely of the other of the same office, and of the Elders that have the rule of discipline, or whether hee may be made by the authoritie of one man. They that give this authoritie to one man, alleadge that which Paul saith to Titus: Therefore I have left thee in Creta, that thou shouldest appoint in every towne Priests. Againe to Timothie: laie not hands quickly upon any man. But they are deceived if they thinke that either Timothie at Ephesus, or Titus in Creta, used a kingly power, that either of them should dispose all things at his owne will. For they were above the rest, onely to goe before the people with good and wholesome counsels: not that they onely, excluding all other, should doe what they listed. And that I may not seeme to saine any thing, I will make it plaine by a like example. For Luke rehearseth that Paul and Barnabas appointed Priests in divers Churches: but hee also expresth the order or manner how, when hee saith that it was done by voices ordaining Priests (saith he) by lifting up of hands in every Church. Therefore they two did create them: but the whole multitude, as the Grecians manner was in elections, did by holding up their hands, declare whom they would have. Even in like manner the Roman histories doe oftentimes say that the Counsell which kept the assemblies, created new officers, for none other cause but for that he received the voices and governed the people in the election. Truly it is not likely that Paul granted more to Timothy and Titus than he tooke to himselfe. But we see that he was wont to create Bishops by voices of the people. Therefore the places above are so to be understood, that they minish nothing of the common right and liberty of the Church. Therefore Cyprian saith well, when he affirmeth that it cometh from the authority of God, that the Priest should bee chosen in presence of the people before the eyes of all men, and should by publike judgement and testimony bee allowed for worthy and meet. For wee see that this was by the commandement of the Lord observed in the Leviticall Priests, that before their consecration they should be brought into the sight of the people. And no otherwise is Muthias added to the fellowship of the Apostles: and no otherwise the seven Deacons were created: but the people seeing and allowing of it. These examples (saith Cyprian) doe shew, that the ordering of a Priest ought not to be done, but in the knowledge of the people standing by: that the ordering may be just and lawfull, which hath bene examined by the witness of all. We are therefore come thus far, that this is by the word of God a lawfull calling of a minister, when they that seeme meet are created by the consent and allowance of the people and that other pastors ought to beare rule of the election, that nothing be done amisse of the multitude, either by lightnesse, or by evill affections, or by disorder.

16 Now remaineth the forme of ordering, to which wee assigned the last place in the calling. It is evident that the Apostles used no other ceremony when they admitted any man to the ministry, but the laying on of hands. And I thinke that this usage came from the manner of the Hebrewes, which did as it were present unto God by laying on of hands that which they would have blessed and hallowed. So when Jacob was about to blesse Ephraim and Manasse, hee laid his hands upon their heads. Which thing our Lord followed, when he praied over the infants. In the same meaning (as I thinke) the Jewes by the ordinance of the law, laid hands upon the Sacrifices. Wherefore the Apostles by laying on of hands did signifie that they offered him to God, whom they admitted into the ministry. Albeit they used it also upon them to whom they applied the visible graces of the spirit. Howsoever it be, this was the solemaie usage, so oft as they called any man to the ministerie of the Church. So they consecrated Pastors and teachers, and so also Deacons. But although there be no certaine commandement concerning the laying on of hands, yet because we see that it was continually used among the Apostles, their so diligent observing of it ought to bee to us instead of a commandement. And truly it is profitable, that by such a signe, both the dignity of the ministry should be commended to the people, and also that he which is ordained should be admonished, that he is not now at his owne liberty, but made bound to God and that Church. Moreover it shall not be a vaine signe, if it be restored to the naturall beginning of it. For if the Spirit of God, hath ordained nothing in the Church in vaine, wee must thinke that this ceremonie, sith it proceeded from him, is not unprofitable, so that it be not turned into a superstitious abuse. Last of all this is to be holden, that not the whole multitude did laie their hands upon the ministers, but the Pastors onely. Howbeit it was uncertaine whether many did alway lay on their hands or no. But it is evident that that was done in the Deacons, in Paul and Barnabas, and a few other. But Paul himselte in another place reporteth, that he, and not many other, did lay his hands upon Timothee. I admonish thee (saith he) that thou raise up the grace which is in thee by laying on of my hands. For, as for that which in the other Epistle is spoken of the laying on of the hands of the degree of Priests, I doe not so take it, as though Paul did speake of the company of the Elders, but I understand by that word the verie ordinance it selfe: as if hee had said: Make that the Grace, which thou hast received by laying on of hands when I did create thee a Priest, may not be voide.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER.

Of the state of the old Church, and of the manner of governing that was in use before the Papacie.

Hitherto we have intreated of the order of governing the Church, as it hath bene delivered us out of the pure word of God, and of the ministeries, as they were instituted by Christ. Now that all these things may be more clearly and familiarly opened, opened, and also be better fastened in our mindes: it shall bee profitable in these things to consider the forme of the old Church. which shall represent to our eyes a certaine image of Gods institution. For although the Bishops of those times did set forth many Canons, wherein they seemed to expresse more than was expressed in the holy Scripture: yet they with such heedfulnesse framed all their order after the onely rule of Gods word, that a man may easily see that in this behalfe they had in a manner nothing disagreeing from the word of God. But although there might be somewhat wanting in their ordinances, yet because they with sincere zeale endeavoured to preserve Gods institution, and they swarved not much from it, it shall bee very profitable here shortly to gather what manner of observation they had. As we have declared that there are three sorts of Ministers commended unto us in the Scripture: so all the Ministers that the old Church had, it divided into three Orders. For out of the order of Elders were partly chosen Pastors and teachers: the rest of them had the rule of the judgement and correction of manners. To the Deacons was committed the care of the poore, and the distributing of the almes. As for the Readers and Acoluthes, they were not names of certaine offices: but those whom they called Clerkes, they trained from their youth upward in certaine exercises to serve the Church, that they might the better understand to what purpose they were appointed, and might in time come the better prepared to their office: as I shall by and by shew more at large. Therefore Hierom, when hee had appointed five Orders of the Church, reckoneth up Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Beleevers, and Catechumeni, to the rest of the Clergie and Monkes hee giveth no proper place.

2. Therefore to whom the office of teaching was injoynd, all them they named Priests in every Citie they chose out of their owne number one man, to whom they specially gave the title of Bishop; that dissensions should not grow of equalitie, as it is wont to come to passe. Yet the Bishop was not so above the rest in honor and dignity that he had a dominion over his fellowes. But what office the consull had in the Senate, to propound of matters, to ask opinions, to go before the other with counselling, admonishing, and exhorting, to governe the whole action with his authoritie, and to put in execution that which is decreed by common counsell; the same office had the Bishop in the assembly of the Priests. And the old writers themselves confesse, that the same was by mens consent brought in for the necessitie of the times. Therefore Hierom: upon the Epistle to Titus saith. The same was a Priest which was a Bishop. And before that by the instigation of the Divell, there were dissensions in religion, and it was said among the people, I am of Paul, I am of Cephas: Churches were governd by common counsell of Elders. Afterward, that the seeds of dissensions might be plucked up, all the care was committed to one man. As therefore the Priests doe know, that by custome of the Church they are subject to him that is set over them: so let the Bishops know, that they are above the Priests, rather by custome, than by the truth of the Lords disposing, and that they ought to governe the Church in common together. But in another place he teacheth, how ancient an institution it was. For he saith that at Alexandria, from Marke the Evangelist even to Heracles and Dionysius, the Priests did alway choose out one of themselves, and set him in a higher degree, whom they named a Bishop. Therefore evere Citie had a company of Priests which were Pastors, and Teachers. For they all did execute among the people that office of teaching, exhorting and correcting, which Paul appointeth to the Bishops: and that they might leave seed after them, they travailed in teaching the younger men, that had professed themselves souldiers in the holy warfare. To every Citie there was appointed a certaine Country, that should take their Priests from thence, and bee accounted as it were into the body of that Church. Every company (as I have before said) onely for preservation of policie and peace were under one Bishop: which was so above the rest in dignity, that he was subject to the assemblie of his brethren. If the compasse of ground that was under his Bishoprick were so great, that he could not suffice to serve all the offices of a Bishop in every place of it, in the country it selfe there were in certaine places appointed Priests which in small matters should execute his authority: Them they called country Bishops, because in the country they represented the Bishop.

Priests or Priests and Deacons out of the order of Priests Pastors and teachers chosen.

In Euseb. 6.

Act. 20. 16

For preserving of discipline in Bishops & Patriarches: ordained by them who never want to forge another forme of ruling the Church, than God hath appointed in his word.

The office of Deacons, the same under the Apostles, and in the primitive Church: the occasion of making Subdeacons and Archdeacons.

Cap. 35.

3 But, so much as belongeth to the office, whereof we now speake, as well the Bishops as the Priests were bound to applie the distributing of the word and Sacraments. For it was ordained onely at Alexandria, (because Arrius had there troubled the Church) that the Priest should not preach to the people, as Socrates saith in the 9. booke of the Tripartite Historie. Which yet Hierom confesseth that hee mistaketh not. Truly it should be counted monstrous, if any man had given out himselfe for a Bishop, that had not also in verie deed shewed himselfe a true Bishop. Therefore such was the severitie of those times, that all Ministers were driven to the fulfilling of such office, as the Lord requireth of them. Neither doe I heare the manner of one age alone. For even in Gregories time, when the Church was now almost decayed (certainly it was much degenerat from the ancient purenesse) it had not been tolerable that any Bishop should abstaine from preaching. The Priest (saith he in one place) dieth if there bee no sound heard of him: because hee asketh against himselfe the wrath of the secret Judge, if hee goe without sound of preaching. And in another place: When Paul testifieth that hee is cleane from the blood of all: in this saying we be convinced, we be bound, wee be shewed to be guiltie, which are called Priests, which beside the evils that we have of our owne, adde also the deaths of other: because we kill so many as we, being luke-warme and silent, doe daily see to goe to death. He calleth himselfe and other silent because they were lesse diligent in their worke than they ought to be. When he spareth not them, that did halfe performe their duty: what thinke you he would have done, if a man had altogether sit idle? Therefore this was a great while holden in the Church, that the chiefe dutie of the Bishop was to feed Gods people with the word, or both publikely and privately to edifie the Church with sound doctrine.

4 But whereas every Province had among their Bishops one Archbishop: also where in the Nicene Synod there were ordained Patriarches, which should in degree and dignitie be above the Archbishops, that pertained to the preserving of discipline. Howbeit in this discourse, that which was most rarely used may not bee omitted. For this cause therefore chiefly these degrees were ordained, that if any thing happened in any Church, that could not well be ended by a few, might be referred to a provinciall Synod. If the greatnesse or difficultie of the matter required a greater discussing, the Patriarches were also called to it with the Synods, from whom there might be no appeale but to a generall Councell. The government so ordered many called a Hierarchie, by a name (as I thinke) unproper, and truly unused in the Scriptures. For the holy Ghost willed to provide, that no man should dreame of a principalltie or dominion when the government of the Church is spoken of. But, if leaving the word we looke upon the thing, we shall finde that the old Bishops meant to forge no forme of ruling the Church, differing from that which the Lord appointed by his word.

5 Neither was the order of the Deacons at that time any other than it was under the Apostles. For they received the daily offerings of the Faithfull, and the yearly revenues of the Church, to bestow them upon true uses, that is to say, to distribute them to feede partly the ministers, and partly the poore: but by the appointment of the Bishop, to whom also they yearly rendered accounts of their distribution. For whereas the Canons doe every where make the Bishop distributer of all the goods of the Church, it is not so to be understood, as though he did by himselfe discharge that care: but because it was his part to appoint to the Deacon, who should be received into the common almes of the Church, and of that which remained; to whom it should be given, and how much to every one: because he had an overseeing whether the Deacon did faithfully execute that which belonged to his office. For thus it is read in the Canons which they ascribe to the Apostles: Wee command that the Bishop have the goods of the Church in his owne power. For if hee be put in trust with the Soules of men, which are more precious, much more it is meete that he have charge of money: so that by his power all things may be distributed to the poore, by the Elders and Deacons: that they may be all ministered with feare and carefulnesse. And in the Councell of Antioche it is decreed, that the Bishops should be restrained that meddle with the goods of the Church, without the knowledge of the Elders and Deacons. But of that point we neede to make no longer discourtation, sith it is evident by many Epistles of Gregory, that even at that time, when otherwise the ordinances of the church were much corrupted, yet this observation continued, that the Deacons should under the Bishop be the stewards for the poore. As for Subdeacons, it is likely that at the beginning they were joynted to the Deacons, that they should use their service about the poore: but that difference was by little and little confounded. But Archdeacons began then to be created, when the plenty of the goods, required a new and more exact manner of disposing them: Albeit Hierome doth say, that it was even in his age. In their charge was the summe of their revenues, possessions, and store, and the collection of the daily offerings. Whereupon Gregory declareth to the Archdeacon Salon, that hee should be holden guilty if any of the goods of the church, perished either by his fraud or negligence. But whereas it was given to them to read the Gospell to the people, and to exhort them to pray: and whereas they were admitted to deliver the Cup in the holy Supper, that was rather done to garnish their office, that they should execute it with the more reverence, when by such signes they were admonished that it was no prophane Bayliwike that they exercised, but a spirituall function, and dedicate to God.

Epi ad Nep.
Epi. c. li. f.

6 Here also wee may judge what use there was, and what manner of distribution of the church goods. Each were both in the decrees of Synods, and among the old writers it is to be found, that whatsoever the Church possesseth either in lands or in money, is the patrimony of the poore. Therefore oftentimes there, this song is sung to the Bishops and Deacons, that they should remember, that they meddle not with their owne goods, but the goods appointed to the necessity of the poore: which if they unfaithfully suppress or wast, they shall be guilty of Blood. Whereby they are admonished, with great feare and reverence, as in the sight of God, without respect of persons, to distribute them to whom they bee due. Hereupon also come those grave protestations in Chrysostome, Ambrose, Augustine, and otherlike Bishops, whereby they affirme their owne uprightnesse to the people. But such it is equity, and established by the Law of the Lord, that they which employ their service to the Church, should be fed with the common charges of the Church, and also many Priests in that age, consecrating their patrimonies to God, were willingly made poore: the distributing was such, that neither the Ministers wanted sustenance, nor the poore were neglected. But yet in the meane time it was provided, that the ministers themselves, which ought to give example of honest sparing to other should not have so much, whereby they might abuse it to riotous excesse or deliciouseesse, but onely wherewith to sustaine their owne need. For those of the Clergy (saith Hierome) which are able to live of the goods of their Parents, if they take that which is the poores, doe commit sacriledge, and by such abuse they eat and drinke to themselves damnation.

The bestowing of Church goods.

7 First the ministracion was free and voluntary, whereas the Bishops and Deacons were of their owne will lawfull, and uprightnesse of conscience and innocency of life were to them instead of the Lawes. Afterward when evill examples grew of the greedinesse or perverse affections of some, to correct those faults, the Canons were made, which divided the revenues of the church into foure parts: of which they assigned one part to them of the Clergy, the second to the poore, the third to the maintaineance and reparacion of churches, and other holy buildings; the fourth to the poore as well strangers as of their owne countrey. For whereas the other Canons give this last part to the Bishop, that varieth nothing from my above said division. For they meane not that that part should be his owne, that either hee himselfe alone should devoure it, or power it out, upon whom or what he list, but that it should suffice to maintaine the Hospitality which Paul requirerh of that order. And so doe Gelasius and Gregorie expound it. For Gelasius bringerh no other reason why the Bishop should challenge any thing to himselfe, but that he might give it prisoners and strangers. And Gregory speaketh yet more plainly. It is the manner (saith he) of the sea Apostolike, to give commandement to the Bishop when he is ordered, that of all the revenue that ariseth, there be made foure portions: that is to say, the one to the Bishop and his Family for Hospitality, and entertainment: the second to the Clergy: the third to the poore: the fourth to the repairing of churches. Therefore it was lawfull for the Bishop to take

Church goods divided into foure parts: one assigned to the maintaineance of the Clergie, the rest to other uses.

nothing to his owne use, but so much as were enough for moderate and meane foode and clothing. If any began to exceede either in riorous expence, or in ostentation and pompe, hee was by and by repressed by his fellowes, and if he obeyed not, he was put from his dignity.

8 As for that which they bestowed upon garnishing of holythings, at the first it was very little. Afterward when the Church became somewhat richer, yet in that behalfe they still kept a meane. And yett all the mony that was bestowed thereupon remained safe for the poore, if any great necessity happened. So when famine possessed the province of Hierusalem, and the need could not otherwise be relieved, Cyillus sold the vessels and garments and spent them upon sustenance of the poore, Likewise Acazius Bishop of Amida, when a great multitude of the Persians, in a manner starved for hunger, called together the Clergie, and when he had made that notable oration, Our God needeth neither dishes nor cups, because he neither eateth nor drinketh, hee moltt the vessels, to make thereof both meate and ransome for men in misery. Hierome also, when he inveigheth against the too much gorgeoussesse of temples, doth with honour make mention of Exieperius Bishop of Tiblosa in his time, which carried the Lords body in a wicker basket, and his blood in glasse, but suffereth no poore man to be hungry. That which I even now said of Acazius, Ambrose reherseth of himselfe. For when the Arriani charged him, for that hee had broken the holy vessels to ransom prisoners, hee used this most godly excuse: Hee that sent the Apostles without gold, gathered Churches together without gold. The Church hath gold not to keep it, but to bestow it, and give releife in necessities. What neede is to keep that which helpeth not? Doe wee not know, how much gold and silver the Assyrians tooke out of the temple of the Lord? Doth not the Priestt better to melt them for the sustenance of the poore, if other releifes doe faile, than an enemye, a robber of God to beare them away? Will not the Lord say: Why hast thou suffered so many needy to die for hunger? and verily thou hadst gold whereof thou mightest have ministred them sustenance. Why were so many led away captive, and not ransomed? why were so many slaine by the enemye? It had bene better that thou shouldest save the vessels of living men, than of metalls. To these things that thou shalt not be able to answer. For what wouldst thou say? I feared least Gods temple should want garnishing. He would answer, Sacraments require not gold: neither doe those things please with gold that are not bought with gold. The ransoming of prisoners is a garnishing of Sacraments. In summe wee see, that it is most true which the same man saith in another place, that whatsoever the Church then possessed was the store of the needy. Againe: that a Bishop hath nothing that is not the poores.

9 These that wee have reherseed were the ministeries of the old Church. For the other of which the Ecclesiasticall writers make mention, were rather certaine exercises and preparations, then appointed offices. For those holy men, that they might leave a store for the church after them, received into their charge, governance and discipline, young men which with the consent and authority of their parents, professed themselves souldiers of the spirituall warfare: and they so framed them from their tender age, that they should not come unskillfull and raw to the executing of their office. But all they that were instructed with such beginnings, were called clarks, I would indeed that some other more proper name had rather bene given them: For this name grew in of error, or of corrupt affection: forasmuch as Peter calleth the whole church the Clergie, that is to say, the Lords inheritance. But the institution it selfe was very holy and profitable; that they which would consecrate themselves and their service to the Church, should be so brought up under the keeping of the bishop, that none should minister to the Church, but he that were well informed aforehand, and that had from his very youth both sucked holy doctrine, and by severe discipline put in a certaine continuing quality of gravity and holy life, and were estranged from worldly cares and were accustomed to spirituall cares and studies. But as young souldiers are by certaine counterfeit skirmishes instructed to learne true and earnest fight, so there were also certaine rudiments, whereby they were exercised while they were Clerkes, before that they were promoted to the very offices. Therefore: first they committed to the Clerkes the charge to open and shut the Church, and they named them Ostiaſij, doore-keepers. Afterward they called them Acoluthi, followers, which waited upon the Bishop in his household services, and did continually accompanie him, first for honours sake, and then that no suspicion should arise of them. Moreover that by little and little they might become knowne to the people, and get to themselves commendation: also that they might learne to abide the sight of all men, and to speake before all men: that being made Priests, when they come forth to teach, they should not be abashed with shame: therefore place was appointed them to read in the Pulpit. After this manner they were promoted by degrees, to shew prooffe every one of their diligence in all their severall exercises, till they were made Subdeacons. This only is my meaning, that those were rather grosse beginnings, than such offices as were accounted among the true ministers of the Church.

10 Whereas we said that the first and second point in the calling of ministers, are, what manner of men they ought to choose, and how great a religious carefulnesse they ought to use in that matter: therein the old church hath followed the prescribed order of Paul, and the examples of the Apostles. For they were wont to come together to choose the pastors with most great reverence, and carefull calling upon the name of God. Beside this they had a forme of examination, whereby they tried the life and doctrine of them that were to be chosen by the rule of Paul. Ouelly they somewhat offended herein with too great severitie: because they would require more in a Bishop than Paul required, and specially in proceſſe of time they required unmarried life. But in the other points their observation was agreeing with Pauls description. But in this which wee made the third point, that is to say, who ought to institute ministers, they kept not alway one order. In old time, none was received into the company of Clerks without the consent of all the people: insomuch that Cyprian laboureth earnestly to excuse that hee appointed on Avelius to be a Reader without asking advise of the Church, because that was done beside the custome, though not without reason. For this hee saith before: In ordering of Clerkes, deere brethren, we are wont first to aske your advise, and by common counsell to weigh the manners and deservings of every one. But because in these lesser exercises, there was not much perill: because they were chosen to a long prooffe, and not to a great office, therefore the consent of the people therein ceased to be asked. Afterward in the other degrees also, except the Bishopricke, the people commonly left the judgement and choise of them to the Bishop and the Priests, that they should examine who were meete and worthie: saving peradventure when new Priests were appointed for Parishes: for then it behooved that the multitude of that place namely should consent. Neither is it any marvell, that the people in this behalfe was little carefull in keeping their owne right. For no man was made a Subdeacon, that had not shewed a long prooffe of himselfe in his being a Clerke, under that severitie of discipline, which then was used. After that hee had bene tried in that degree, he was made a Deacon. From thence he came to the honour of Priesthood if he had behaved himselfe faithfully. So no man was promoted, of whom there had not bene indeed a triall had many yeares before the eyes of the people. And there were many Canons to punish their faults: so that the Church could not be troubled with evill Priests or Deacons, unlesse it neglected the remedies. Howbeit in the Priests also there was alway required the consent of them of the same citie: which the very first Canon testifieth in the 67. distinction, which is fathered upon Annacletus. Finally, all the admissions into orders were therefore done at certaine appointed times of the yeare, that no man should privily creepe in without the consent of the faithfull, or should with too much easinesse be promoted without witnesses.

11 In choosing of Bishops the people had the libertie long preserved, that none should be thrust in, that were not accepted of all. This therefore was forbidden in the counsell at Antioch, that none should be thrust into them against their will. Which thing also Leo the first doth diligently confirme. Heereupon came these sayings: Let him be chosen, whom the Cleargy, and the people, or the greater number shall require. Againe: Let him that shall beare rule over all be chosen of all. For it must needs be, that he that is made a ruler being unknowne and not examined, is thrust in by violence. Againe, Let him be chosen, that is both chosen by the Clerks, and desired by the people: and let him be consecrate by them of that Province, with the judgement of the Metropolitan. The holie Father tooke so great heed that this libertie of the people should by no meane be diminished, that when the generall Synod gathered together at Constantinople did order Nectarius, they would not doe it without the allowance of the Clergy and people, as they testified by their Epistle to the Synod of Rome. Therefore when any Bishop did appoint a successor to himselfe, it was not otherwise stablished unlesse the whole people did confirme it. Whereof you have not onely an example, but also the very forme in Augustine in the naming of Erasmus. And Theodorice, when he rehearseth that Peter was named by Athanasius to bee his successor, by and by addeth, that the order of Priests confirmed it, and the Magistrate, and Nobilitie, and the people approved it with their allowing shewt.

12 I grant indeed that this also was by very good reason stablished in the Council at Laodicia; that the Election should not be left to multitudes. For it scarcely happeneth at any time, that so many heads should well order any thing with one meaning: and commonly this is true, that the uncertaine communitie is divided into contrarie affections. But for this perill there was used a very good remedie. For first the Clerks onely did choose: whom they had chosen they presented to the Magistrate, or to the Senate and chiefe men of the people. They, after consultation had, if they thought the election good, confirmed it: if not, they did choose another, whom they did rather allow. Then the matter was moved to the multitude, which although they were not bound to those fore-judgements, yet thereby they could the lesse be disordered. Or if they began at the multitude: that was done onely to learne whom they did chiefly desire. When the desires of the people were heard, then they of the Cleargy did choose him. So neither was it lawfull for the Cleargy to appoint whom they listed, neither were they bound to obey the foolish desires of the people. Leo appointeth this order in another place, when he saith: There are to be looked for, both the desires of the citizens, the peoples testimonies, the judgement of the honourable, and the election of the clerks. Againe, Let there be holden the testimonie of the honourable, the subscription of the clerks, the consent of the order and communitie. No reason (sayth he) suffreth it to be otherwise done. And nothing else meaneth that decree of the Synod at Laodicia, but that the Clergy and chiefe of the people, should not suffer themselves to be carried away by the undiscreeet multitude: but rather that with their wisdom and gravitie they should repress the peoples foolish affections, if at any time neede should so require.

13 This order of choosing was yet in force in the time of Gregory: and it is likely that it endured long after. There remaine many Epistles of his, that give evident testimonie of this matter. For so oft as he hath to doe with the creating of any new Bishop, hee useth to write to the cleargy, to the order, and to the people, and sometime also to the ruler, according as the government of the cite is appointed. But if by reason of the disordered state of the Church, hee committeth to any Bishop adjoining the charge of overseeing in the election, yet he alway requireth a solemne decree strengthened with the subscriptions of all. Yea and when there was one Constantius create Bishop at Millane, and that many of the Millanis were by reason of the invasion of the barbarous nations fled to Genoa: hee thought that the election could not otherwise be lawfull, unlesse they also were called together and gave their assent. Yea there are not yet five hundred yeares past, since Pope Nicholas decreed thus of the election of the Bishop of Rome: that the Cardinal Bishops should begin, then that they should joyne to them the rest of the cleargy, last of all that the election should be confirmed by the consent of the people. And in the end, hee reciteth that decree of Leo, which I even now alleaged, and commandeth it from thence forth to be in force. But if the malice of wicked men shall so prevaille; that the clerks to make a true election be compelled to depart out of the city: yet hee commandeth that some of the people be present with them. As for the Emperours consent, so far as I can perceive, was required onely in two Churches, that is, Rome and Constantinople: because there were the two seates of the Empire. For whereas Ambrose was sent to Millane with a power from Valentinian to governe the election of the new Bishop: that was extraordinarily done, by reason of grievous factions wherewith the citizens then boyled among themselves. But at Rome in old time the Emperours authoritie was of so great force in creating of the Bishop: that Gregorie saith, that hee was set by his commandement in the government of the Church: when yet by solemne usage he was desired by the people. This was the manner, that when the cleargy and the people had appointed any Bishop, the cleargy should forthwith move it to the Emperour, that hee should either by his allowance confirme the election, or by disallowance undoe it. Neither are the decrees that Gratian gathereth together, repugnant to this custome: wherein is nothing else said, but that it is in no wise to bee suffered, that taking away the canonically election, a King should appoint a Bishop after his owne lust: and that the Metropolitan should consecrate none that were so promoted by violent powers. For it is one thing to spoile the Church of her right, that all should be transferred to the lust of one man: and another thing to grant this honour to a King or an Emperour, that by his authoritie hee may confirme a lawfull election.

14 Now it followeth, that wee entreate with what forme the Ministers of the Church were admitted into their office after election: this the Latines called Ordination or Consecration: the Greekes have called it Cheirotonia, lifting up of hands, and sometime also Cheirothesia, laying on of hands. Howbeit Cheirotonia is properly called that kind of election, where mens consents are declared by holding up of their hands. There remaineth of the Nicen Councell, that the Metropolitan should meete together with all the Bishops of the province to order him which is chosen. But if some of them be hindered either by length of the way, or by sicknesse, or by any necessitie, that yet three at the least should meete: and that they that are absent should by letters testify their consent. And this Canon, when with discontinuance it grew out of use, was afterward renewed with many Synodes. But all, or at least so many as had no excuse, were therefore commanded to be present, that they might have the gravetrial of the learning and manners of him that was to be ordered: for the matter was not done without trial. And it appeareth by Cyprians words, that in the old time they were wont not to be called after the election, but to be present at the election: and to this end that they should be as it were Governours, that nothing should be troublesomely done in the multitude. For where he said, that the people have power either to choose worthy Priests, or to refuse unworthy, within a little after he addeth: Wherefore according to the tradition of God and of the Apostles, it is to bee diligently kept and holden (which is yet holden with us also, and in a manner throughout all Provinces) that for the right celebration of orderings, all the Bishops adjoining of the same Province, should come together to the people for which a Governour is ordered, and that the Bishop be chosen in presence of the people. But when they were sometime slowly gathered together, and there was perill lest some would abuse that delay to occasion of ambitious suing: it was thought that it should be enough if after the election made, they should meete and after allowance upon lawfull examination consecrate him.

15 When this was each where done without exception, by little and little a divers manner grew in use, that they which were chosen should resort to the Metropolitan Citie to fetch their ordering. Which came to passe rather by ambition, and by deprivation of the first institution, than by any good reason. And not long after, when the authoritie of the sea of Rome was now increased, there came in place yet a worse custome, that the Bishops almost of all Italie should fetch their consecration from thence. Which we may note out of the Epistles of Gregorie. Onely a few Cities, which did not so easily give place, had their ancient right preserved: as there is an example had of Millane. Peradventure the onely Metropolitan Cities kept their priviledge. For all the Bishops of the Province were wont to come together to the chiefe Citie to consecrate the Archbishop. But the Ceremonie was laying on of hands. For I read of no other ceremonies used: saving that in the solemne assemblie the Bishops had a certaine apparell whereby they might be distinctly knowne from other Priests. They ordered also Priests and Deacons with onely laying on of hands. But every Bishop with the company of Priests ordained his owne Priest. But although they did all the same thing: yet because the Bishop went before, and it was all done as it were by his guiding, therefore the ordering was called his. Whereupon the old writers have oft this saying: that a Priest differeth from a Bishop in no other thing; but because he hath not the power of ordering.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER.

That the old forme of government is utterly overthrowne, by the tyrannie of the Papacy.

The corruption of the church of Rome in choosing Bishops without regard of manners, learning, or as much as yeeres of discretion.

NOW it is good to set before mens eyes the order of governing the Church, that the sea of Rome and all the champions thereof doe keepe at this day, and the whole image of that Hierarchie which they continually have in their mouth, and to compare it with that order of the first and old Church which wee have described: that by the comparison it may appeare what manner of Church they have, which use this onely title to charge or rather to overwhelm us. But it is best to begin at Calling, that we see both how, and what manner of men, and by what order they be called to this ministry. And then afterward we shall consider how faithfully they execute their office. We will give the first place to Bishops: to whom I would to God this might be an honour, to have the first place in this discourse. But the matter it selfe doth not suffer me, once to touch this thing be it never so lightly, without their great shame. And yet I will remember, in what kinde of writing I am now occupied: and will not suffer my talke, which ought to be framed only to simple doctrine, to flow abroad beyond due bounds. But let some one of them that have not utterly lost all shame, answer mee, what manner of Bishops are at this day commonly chosen. Truly it is now growne too much out of use, to have any examination had of their learning: but if there be had any respect of learning, they choose some Lawyer that can rather brawle in a court, than preach in a Church. This is certaine, that these hundred yeeres there hath scarcely beene every hundredth man chosen that understood any thing of holy doctrine. I doe not therefore spare the former ages, for that they were much better, but because we have now onely the present Church in question. If judgement be had of their manners, we shall finde that there have beene few or almost none, whom the old Canons would not have judged unworthy. Hee that was not a drunkard, was a whore-monger: hee that was also cleane from this wickednesse, was either a dyer, or a haunter, or dissolute in some part of his life. For there be lighter faults, which by the old Canons doe exclude a man from being a Bishop. But this is a most great absurditie, that very children scarcely ten yeeres old, are by the Popes grant made Bishops. They are growne to such shamelesnesse and senseles dulnesse, that they dreaded not that extreme, yea and monstrous wicked doing, which is utterly abhorring from the very sense of nature. Heereby appeareth how religious their elections were, where the negligence was so carelesse.

2 Now in election, all that right of the people is taken away. Their desirings, their assentings, their subscribings, and all such things are vanished: the whole power is transferred to the Canons onely. They bestow the Bishopricke upon whom they will, and afterward bring him forth into the sight of the people, but to be worshipped, not to be examined. But Leo cryeth on the other side, that no reason suffereth it, and he pronounceth that it is a violent imposition. Cyprian, when hee testifieth that it proceedeth from the law of God that it should not be done but by the consent of the people, sheweth that the contrary manner is repugnant to the word of God. The decrees of so many Synodes doe most severely forbid it to be otherwise done: and if it be done, they command it to be void. If these things be true, there now remaineth in the Papacy no Canonically election, neither by Gods law nor by the Ecclesiasticall law. But although there were no other evill, yet how shall they be able to excuse this that they have so spoiled the Church of her right? But (say they) the corruption of times so required, that because in appointing of Bishops, hatreds and affectiōs more prevaile prevailed with the people and the Magistrates, than right and sound judgement, therefore the rule thereof should be given to a few. Admit verily that this were the extreme remedie of a mischief in despaired case. But sith the medicine it selfe hath appeared more hurtfull than the very disease, why is not this new evill also remedied? But (say they) it is exactly prescribed to the Canons, what they ought to follow in the election. But doe we doubt, but that people in old time did understand that they were bound to most holy lawes, when they saw that they had a rule-see them by the word of God, when they came together to choose a Bishop? For that only voice of God, whereby he describeth the true image of a Bishop, ought worthily to be of more value than infinite thousands of Canons. But neverthelesse the people, corrupted with a most evill affection, had no regard of the law or of equitie. So at this day though there be verie good lawes written, yet they remaine buried in papers. Yet for the most part it is used in mens manners, yea and allowed as though it were done by good reason; that drunkards, whoremongers, dicers, are commonly promoted to this honour: (It is but litle that I say) that bishopricks are the rewards of adulteries and bawderies. For when they are given but to hunters and faulconers, it is to be thought to be gaily well bestowed. Any way to excuse so heinous indignitie, it is too much wicked. The people (say I) had in old time a very good Canon to whom Gods word prescribed, that a Bishop ought to be unprovable, a teacher, no fighter, &c. Why therefore is the charge of choosing removed from the people to these men? Because forsooth the word of God was not heard among the tumults and seditious partakings of the people. And why should it not at this day be removed againe from these men, which not onely doe breake al lawes, but casting away all shame, do wantonly, covetously, ambitiously mingle and confound Gods and mens matters together?

3 But they lie, when they say, that this was devised for a remedie. Wee often read that in old time churches were in tumults at the choosing of Bishops: yet never any man durst thinke of taking away the authoritie from the people. For they had other waies whereby they might either prevent these faults, or amend them if they were already committed. But I will tell what it is. When the people began to be negligent in making the elections, and did cast that care upon the Priests as little belonging to them, they abused this occasion to usurpe a tyrannie to themselves, which afterward they stablished by new canons set forth. As for their ordering, it is nothing else but a mere mockage. For the few of examination that they there set out is so vaine and hungrie, that it wanteth even all colour. Therefore wheras in some places Priests have by covenant obtained of the bishops of Rome, that they themselves might name Bishops, therein the Church suffered no new losse: because the election was taken away, onely from the Canons, which had by no right violently taken it, or verily stolen it. Truly this is a most foule example, that out of the court are sent bishops to possesse churches: and it should be the worke of godly Princes to abstaine from such corruption. For it is a wicked spoiling of the Church, when there is thrust unto any people a bishop, whom they have not desired, or at least with free voice allowed. But that unorderly manner which hath long agoe bene in the Churches, gave occasion to Princes to take the presentation of bishops into their owne hands. For they had rather that it should be their gift, than those mens, to whom it nothing more belonged, and which did no lesse wrongfully abuse it?

4 Loe here is a noble calling, by reason whereof the bishops boast themselves to be the successours of the Apostles. But they say that the authoritie to create Priests belongeth to them onely. But in this they most lewdly corrupt the old institution: because they doe not by their ordering create Priests to rule and feede the people, but Sacrificers to Sacrifice. Likewise when they consecrate Deacons, they doe nothing of their true and proper office, but they ordaine them onely to certaine Ceremonies about the chalice and the paten. But in the Synode at Chalcedon, it is contrariwise decreed, that the orderings should not be absolutely given, that is to say, but that a place should be therewithall assigned to them that are ordered, where they shall exercise their office. This decree is for two causes verie profitable. First, that the Church should not be burdened with superfluous charges, nor that that should bee spent upon idle men which should be given to the poore: Secondly, that they which be ordered, should thinke that they be not promoted to an honour, but that there is an office committed unto them, to the execution wherof they are bound by solemne protestation. But the Romisli masters (which thinke that there is nothing in religion to be cared for, but their bellie) first doe expound title to be the revenue that may suffice to sustaine them, whether it be by their owne lively hood or by benefice. Therefore when they order a Deacon or a Priest, without taking care where they ought to minister, they give them the order, if they be rich enough to find themselves. But what man can admit this, that the title which the decree of the Councell requireth, should bee the yeerelie revenue for their sustenance? But now because the later Canons condemned the Bishops with penaltie to finde them whom they had ordered without sufficient title, by this meane to restraine their too much easie admitting: there hath been also a subletie devised to mock out this penaltie. For he that is ordered, naming any title whatsoever it be, promiseth that hee will be content therewith: by this shift hee is driven from his action for his finding. I passe over a thousand fraudes that are herein used: that when some doe falsly name vaine titles of benefices, whercupon they cannot make five shillings by yeere: other some under secret covenant doe borrow benefices, which they promise that they will by and by restore againe, but sometime they restore not at all. And such other mysteries.

The disguis'd ceremonies
which the Church of Rome
useth in making her Priests.

5 But although these grosser abuses were taken away, is not this alway an absurditie, to appoint a Priest to whom you assigne no place? Also they order no man but to sacrifice. But the true ordinance of a Priest is, to be called to the government of the Church: and a Deacon to be called to the gathering of the almes: they doe indeede with many pomps shadow their doing, that in the very shew it may have a reverence among the simple. But among men that have their sound wit, what can these disguisings avails, if there bee no sound stuffe or truth underneath them? For they use ceremonies about it, either fetched out of Jewishnesse, or fained of themselves, which it were better to forbear. But of true examination, (for I nothing passe upon, that shadow which they retaine) of the peoples consent, and of other things necessarie, they make no mention. I call a shadow their foolish gesturings meet to be laughed at, framed to a fond and cold counterfetting of antiquitie. The Bishops have their deputies which before the ordering may enquire of their learning. But what? whether they can read their masses, whether they can decline a common noun, that they shall light upon in reading, conjugate a verbe, or doe know the signification of one word, for it is not necessarie that they be cunning enough to construe a verse. And yet they be not put backe from Priesthood which faile even in the childish rudiments, so that they bring any money or commendation of favour. Of like sort it is, that when they are brought to the altar to be ordered, it is asked thrice in a tongue not understood, whether they be worthy of that honour. One answereth which never saw them: (but because nothing should want of the forme, he hath part in the plaie). They are worthy. What may a man blame in these reverend fathers, but that which mocking in so open sacrileges, they doe without shame laugh to scorne both God and men? But because they are in long possession thereof, they thinke that now it is lawfull for them. For whosoever dare once open his mouth against these so evident and so hainous wicked doings, he is forthwith haled by them to punishment of death, as though it were one that had in old time disclosed abroad the holie mysteries of Ceres. Would they doe this if they thought that there were any God?

Corruption in bestowing be-nefices.

6 Now how much doe they behave themselves better in bestowing of benefices: which thing was once joined with the ordering, but now it is altogether separate? There is among them a diverse manner. For the Bishops onely doe not confer benefices: and in those wherof they are said to have the conferring, they have not the full right, but other have the presentation, and they retaine onely the title of collation for honours sake. There are also nominations out of schooles, and resignations, either simple, or made for cause of exchange, commendatorie writings, preventions, and whatsoever is of that sort. But they also behave themselves that none of them can reproach another with anything. So I affirme, that scarcely everie hundred benefice is bestowed at this day in the papacie without Simonie, as the old writers detested Simonie, I doe not say, that they all buie them with readie money: but shew me one of twentie that cometh to a benefice without some by commendation, some either kindred or alliance promoteth, and some the authoritie of their parents: some by doing of pleasures doe get themselves favour. Finally benefices are given to this end, not to provide for the Churches, but for them that receive them. Therefore they call them benefices, by which words they doe sufficiently declare, that they make no other account of them, but as the beneficiall gifts of Princes, whereby they either get the favour of their soldiers or reward their services. I omit how these rewards are bestowed upon Barbers, Cooks, Mile-keepers, and such dreggish men. And now judiciall courts do ring of no matters more, than about benefices: so that a man may say that they are nothing else but a pray cast after dogs to hunt after. Is this tolerable even to be heard of, that they should be called Pastors, which have broken into the possession of a Church as into a farme of their enemy? that have gotten it by brawling in the law? that have bought it for money? That have deserved it by filthy services: which being childrea yet scanty able to speake, have received it, as by inheritance from their Uncles and kinsmen, and some bastards from their fathers?

7 Would ever the licentiousnes of the people, though they had bin never so corrupt and lawlesse, have gone so farre? But this is also more monstrous, that one man, (I will not say what manner of man, but truly such a one as cannot governe himselfe) is set to governe five or six Churches. A man may see in these daies in Princes courts, yong men that have three Abbacies, two Bishopricks, one Archbishoprick. But there be commonly Canons with five, six or seven benefices, whereof they have no care at all, but in receiving the revenues. I will not object, that it is eche where cried out against by the word of God, which hath long agoe ceased to be of any estimation at all among them. I will not object, that there have been many most severe penall ordinances in many Councils made against this wickednesse: for those also they boldly despise as off as they list. But I say that both are monstrous wicked doings, which are utterly against God and nature and the government of the Church, that one robber shall oppresse many Churches at once, and that he should be called a Pastor, which cannot be present with his flock though he would: and yet (such is their shamefulnesse) they cover such abominable filthinesse with the name of the Church to deliver themselves from all blame. But also (and God will) in these lewdnesses is contained that holie succession, by the merit whereof they boast that it is wrought that the Church may not perish.

8 Now (which is the second marke in judging a lawfull Pastor) let us see how faithfully they exercise their office. Of the Priests that be there created, some be Monkes, some be (as they call them) Secular. The first of these two companies was unknowne to the old Church: and it is so against the profession of Monkes, to have such a place in the Church, that in old time when they were chosen out of Monasteries into the Clergie, they ceased to be Monks. And Gregorie, whose time had much dregs, yet suffered not this confusion to be made. For he willeth that they be put out of the Clergie that be made Abbots, for that no man can rightly be together both a Monk and a Clark: sith the one is a hinderance to the other. Now if I aske, how he well fulfilleth his office, whom the Canons declare to be unmeet, what I pray you, will they answer? they will forthwith alleage unto me those untimely borne decrees of Innocent and Boniface, whereby Monks are so received into the honour and power of Priesthood, that they might still abide in their Monasteries. But what reason is this, that every unlearned Ass, so soone as he hath once possessed the sea of Rome, may with one word overthrow all antiquitie? But of this matter wee shall speake hereafter. Let this suffice for this time, that in the purer church it was holden for a great absurditie, if a Monk did execute the office of Priesthood. For Hierome saith that hee doth not execute the office of a Priest, while hee is conversant among Monks: and maketh himselfe one of the common people to be ruled by the Priests. But, although we grant them this, what doe they of their dutie? Of the Mendicants some doe preach, all the other Monks either sing or mumble up Masses in their dennes. As though either Christ willed, or the nature of the office suffereth Priests to be made to this purpose. Whereas the Scripture plainly testifieth, that it is the Priests office to rule his owne Church, is it not a wicked prophanation, to turne another way, yea utterly to change the holie institution of God? For when they are ordered, they are expressly forbidden to doe the things that God commandeth all Priests. For this song is sung to them: Let a Monke be content with his cloister, not presume to minister the Sacraments, not to execute any thing belonging to publike office. Let them denie, if they can, that it is an open mockerie of God, that any Priest should be made to this purpose, to abstaine from his true and naturall office: and that he which hath the name may not have the thing.

9 I come to the secular Priests: which are partly beneficed men, (as they call them) that is to say, have benefices whereupon to live: and partly doe let out their daily labour to hire, in massing, or singing, and live as it were of a stipend gathered thereupon. Benefices have either care of soules, as Bishopricks and cure of Paroches: or they be the stipends of daintie men, that get their living with singing, as Prebends, Canonships, Parsonages, and dignities, Chaplainships, and such other. Howbeit, since things are now turned upside downe, Abbaies and Priories are given to very boies, by privilege, that is to say by common and usuall custome. As concerning the hirelings, that get their living from day to day, what should they doe otherwise than they doe? that is in servile and shamefull manner to give out themselves for gaine, specially such there is so great a multitude as now the world swarmeth with. Therefore when they dare not beg openly, or for as much as they thinke they should but little profit that way, they goe about like hungrie dogs, and with their importunacie, as with barking, they enforce out of men against their wils somewhat to thrust into their belly. Heere if I would goe about to expresse in words, how great a dishonour it is to the Church, that the honour and office of Priesthood is come to this point, I should have no end. Therefore it is not meete that the Readers should looke for at my hand such a long declaration as may be proportionall to so hainous indignitie. Briefly I say, if it be the office of Priesthood, (as the word of God prescribeth, and the ancient Canons require) to feede the Church, and to governe the spirituall kingdome of Christ: all such sacrificers as have none other worke or wages, but in making a market of Masses, are not onely idle in their office, but also have no office at all to exercise. For there is no place assigned them to teach: they have no flocke to governe: Finally, there is nothing left to them, but the Altar, whereupon to sacrifice Christ: which is not to offer to God, but to divels, as we shall see in another place.

10 I doe not here touch the outward faults, but onely the inward evill, which sticketh fast by the roote in their institution. I will adde a saying, which will sound ill in their eares: but because it is true, I must speake it: that in the same degree are to be accounted Canons, Deanes, Chaplaines, Provoists, and all they that are fed with idle benefices. For what service can they doe to the Church? For they have put from themselves the preaching of the word, the care of discipline, and ministration of Sacraments, as too much troublesome burdens. What then have they remaining, whereby they may boast themselves to bee true Priests? Singing forsooth, and a pompe of ceremonies. But what is that to the purpose? If they alleadge custome, if use, if prescription of long time: I againe on the other side doe lay unto them the definition of Christ, whereby hee hath expessed unto us both true Priests, and what they ought to have that will bee accounted such. But if they cannot beare so hard a law, to submit themselves to Christs rule: at the least let them suffer this matter to be determined by the authority of the Primitive church. But their case shall bee never the better, if their state be judged by the old Canons. They that have degenerate into Canons should have bene Priests, as they were in old time, that should rule the church in common with the Bishop, and be as it were his companions in the office of Pastor. Those Chapter dignities as they call them, doe nothing at all belong to the governing of the church: much lesse Chaplainships, and the other dregs of like names. What account then shall wee make of them all? Truly both the word of Christ, and the usage of the Church excludeth them from the honour of Priesthood. Yet they stiffely hold that they bee Priests: but we must plucke off their visour: so shall we finde that their whole profession is most strange and far removed from that office of Priests, both which the Apostles describe unto us, and which was required in the primitive Church. Therefore all such orders, with what titles soever they be notified, sith they be new, being verily neither upholden by the institution of God, nor by the ancient usage of the Church, ought to have no place in the description of the spirituall government, which the Church hath received consecrate with the Lords owne mouth. Or (if they will rather have me to speake more simply and grossely) for as much as Chaplaines, Canons, Deacons, Provosts, and other idle bellies of the same sort; doe not so much as with their little finger touch any small parcell of that office, which is necessarily required in Priests. It is not to be suffered, that in wrongfully taking a false honour upon themselves, they should breake the holy institution of Christ.

11 There remaine Bishops, and Parsons of Paroches: who I would to God they did strive to retaine their office. For we would willingly grant unto them, that they have a godly and excellent office, if they did execute it. But when they will be accounted Pastors, while they forsake the Churches committed to them, and cast the care of them upon other, they doe, as if it were the Pastors office to doe nothing. If an usurer that never stirred his foote out of the Citie, would professe himselfe a plowman, or a keeper of a vineyard: if a souldier that had bene continually in the battell and in the campe, and had never seene judiciall court or bookes, would boast himselfe for a Lawyer, who could abide such stinking follies? But these men doe somewhat more absurdly, that will seeme and be called lawfull Pastors of the Church, and yet will not be so. For how many a one is there, that doth so much, as in shew, exercise the government of his Church? Many doe all their life long devour the revenues of Churches, to which they never come so much as to looke upon them. Some other doe once by yeere either come themselves, or send their steward, that nothing should be lost in the letting to farme. When this corruption first crept in, they that would enjoy this kinde of vacation, exempted themselves by priviledges: a bare example to have one resident in his owne Church. For they esteeme them none otherwise than farmes over which they set their Vicars as bailiffs or farmers. But this very naturall reason rejecteth, that he should be Pastor of a flocke, that never saw one sheepe thereof.

12 It appeareth that even in the time of Gregorie, there were certaine seedes to this mischief, that the rulers of Churches, began to be negligent in teaching: for he doth in one place grievously complaine of it. The world (saith he) is full of Priests, but yet in the harvest there are seldome workemen found: because indeed wee take upon us the office of Priest, but wee fulfill not the worke of the office. Againe, because they have not the bowels of charitie, they will seeme Lords: they acknowledge not themselves to be Fathers. They change the place of humilitie into the advancing of Lordlinesse. Againe, but what doe we, O Pastors which receive the reward, and are no workmen? We are fallen to outward businesse, and we take in hand one thing, and performe another. We leave the ministerie of preaching: and to our punishment, as I see, we are called Bishops, that keepe the name of honour and not of vertue. Sith he useth so great sharpnesse of words against them, which were but lesse continuing, and lesse diligent in their office: What I pray you, would he say, if he saw of the Bishops almost none, or truly very few, and of the rest scarcely every hundreth man once in all his life to goe up into a pulpit? For men be come to such madnesse, that it is commonly counted a thing too base for the dignitie of a Bishop, to make a sermon to the people. In the time of Bernard, things were somewhat more decayed: but wee see also wih how sharpe chidings hee inveigheth against the whole order: which yet it is likely to have bene then much purer than it is now.

13 * But if a man doe well weigh and examine this outward forme of Ecclesiasticall government that is at this day under the Papacie, hee shall finde that there is no theevish corner wherein robbers doe more licentiouslly range without law and measure. Truly all things are there so unlike the institution of Christ, yea so contrarie to it, they are so degenerate from the ancient ordinances and manners of the Church, they are so repugnant to nature and reason, that there can be no greater injurie done to Christ, than when they pretend his name to the defence of so disordered government. We (say they) they) are the pillars of the Church, the chiefe Bishops of religion, the vicars of Christ, the heads of the faithfull: because the power of the Apostles is by succession come unto us. They are alway bragging of these follies, as though they talked unto stockes. But so oft as they shall boast of this, I will aske of them again, what they have common with the Apostles. For we speake not of any inheritably descending honour that may be given to men even while they lie sleeping: but of the office of preaching, which they so much flee from. Likewise when we affirme that their kingdome is the tyrannie of Antichrist, by and by they answer, that it is that reverend Hierarchie, so oft praised of notable and holy men. As though the holy fathers, when they commended the Ecclesiasticall Hierarchie or spirituall government, as it was delivered them from hand to hand from the Apostles, did dreame of this mishapen and wast disordered heape, where the Bishops are for the most part either rude asses, which know not the very first and common principles of faith, or sometime children yet new come from the nurse: and if any be learner (which yet is a rare example) they thinke a Bishopricke to be nothing else but a title of gloriousnesse and magnificence: where the parsons of Churches thinke no more of feeding the flocke, than a shoemaker doth of plowing: where all things are confounded with more than Babylonicall dispersing, that there remaineth no more any one signe whole of that ordinance of the fathers.

The manners of Romaine Priests.
Mat 5. 14.

14 What if we descend to their manners? where shall be that light of the world, which Christ requireth? where is the salt of the earth? where is that holinesse, which may be as a perpetuall rule to judge by? There is no degree of men at this day more ill spoken of, for riot, wantonnesse, daintinesse, finally all kinde of lusts. There are of no degree of men either fitter, or cunninger masters of all deceit, fraud, treason, and breach of faith: there is no where so great cunning or boldnesse to doe hurt. I passe over their disdainefulnesse, pride, extortion, crueltie. I passe over the dissolute licentiousnesse in all the parts of their life. In suffering whereof the world is so wearied, that it is not to be feared, that I should seeme to enforce any thing too much. This one thing I say, which they themselves shall not bee able to denie: that of Bishops there is almost none, of the Parsons of Parishes not the hundredth man: but if judgement should be given of his manners according to the old Canons, hee should be either to be excommunicate: or at least to be put from his office. I seeme to say somewhat incredible: so farre is that ancient discipline growne out of use, that commanded an exact triall to be had of the manners of the Clergie: but the truth is so. Now let them goe, that fight under the standerd and guiding of the sea of Rome, and let them boast among themselves of the order of Priesthood. As for the order that they have, truly it is evident, that it is neither of Christ, nor of his Apostles, nor of the Fathers, nor of the old Church.

What Deacons
doe in the church of Rome.

15 Now let the Deacons come forth, and that most holy distributing that they have of the goods of the Church. Howbeit they doe not now create their Deacons to that purpose, for they enjoyne them nothing else but to minister at the altar, to read and sing the Gospell, and doe I wote not what trifles. Nothing of the almes, nothing of the care of the poore, nothing of all that function which they in old time executed. I speake of the very institution. For if we have respect what they doe, indeed it is not to them an office, but onely a step toward Priesthood. In one thing, they that keepe the Deacons place at the masse, doe represent a voide image of antiquitie. For they receive the offerings before the consecration. This was the ancient manner, that before the communion of the Supper, the faithfull did kisse one another, and offer their almes at the altar: so first by a signe, and afterward by very liberalitie they shewed their charitie. The Deacon, that was the poore mens steward, received that which was given, to distribute it. Now of those almes, there commeth no more to the poore, than if they were throwne into the sea. Therefore they mocke the Church with this lying Deaconrie. Truly therein they have nothing like, neither to the institution of the Apostles, nor to the ancient usage. But the very distribution of the goods they have conveyed another way: and have so framed it, that nothing can be devised more unorderedly. For as thieves, when they have cut mens throates, doe divide the prey among them: so these, after the quenching of the light of Gods word, as

hough the Church were flaine, doe thinke that whatsoever was dedicate to holy uses is lūd for prey and spoile. Therefore making a division, every one hath snatched to himselfe as much as he could.

16 Heere all these old orders, that we have declared, are not onely troubled, but utterly wiped out and rased. The Bishops and Priests of Cities, which being made rich by this prey, were turned into Canons, have made havocke of the chiefe part among them. But it appeareth that the partition was unorderly, because to this day they strive about the bounds. What soever it be, by this provision it is provided, that not one halfe-penny of the goods of the Church should come to the poore, whose had bene the halfe part at least. For the Canons doe give them the fourth part by name: and the other fourth part they doe therefore appoint to the Bishops, that they should bestow it upon hospitalitie, and other duties of Charitie, I speake not what the Clearkes ought to doe with their portion, and to what use they ought to bestow it. For we have sufficiently declared, that the rest which is appointed for temples, buildings and other expenses, ought to be open for the poore in necessitie. I pray you, if they had one sparke of the feare of God in their heart would they abide this burden of conscience, that all that they eat, and where with they be clothed, commeth of theft, yea of sacriledge? But sith they are litle moved with the judgement of God, they should at least thinke; that those be men endued with wit and reason, to whom they would perswade, that they have so goodly and well framed orders in their Church, as they are wont to boast. Let them answer me shortly, whether Deaconry be a licence to steale and rob. If they deny this, they shall also be compelled to confesse, that they have no Deaconry left, forasmuch as among them all the disposition of the goods of the Church is openly turned into a spoiling full of sacriledge.

17 But heere they use a very faire colour. For they say, that the dignitie of the Church is by that magnificence not uncomlyly upholden. And they have of their sect some so shamelesse, that they dare openly boast; that so onely are fulfilled those prophecies, whereby the old Prophets describe the gloriousnesse of the kingdome of Christ, when that kingly gorgeousnesse is seene in the priestly order. Not in vaine (say they) God hath promised these things to his Church. Kings shall come, they shall worship in thy sight, they shall bring thee gifts. Arise, arise, cloath thee with thy strength. O Syon: cloth thee with the garments of thy glory; O Hierusalem: All shall come from Saba, bringing gold and incense, and speaking praise to the Lord. All the cattel of Cedar shall bee gathered together to thee. If I should tarry long upon confuting this lewdnesse, I feare least I should seeme fond. Therefore I will not loose words in vaine. But I aske: if any Jew would abuse these testimonies, what solution would they give? Verily they would reprehend his dulnesse, for that he transferred those things to the flesh and the world, that are spirituallly spoken of the spirituall kingdome of Christ. For wee know, that the Prophets, under the image of earthly things, did paint out unto us the heavenly glorie of God, that ought to shine in the Church. For the Church had never lesse aboundance of these blessings, which their words expresse, than in the time of the Apostles: and yet all confesse, that the force of the kingdome of Christ then chiefly flourished abroad. What then meane these sayings? Whatsoever is any where precious, high, excellent, it ought to be made subiect to the Lord. Whereas it is namely spoken of Kings, that they shall submit their scepters to Christ, that they shall throw downe their Crownes before his feete, that they shall dedicate their goods to the Church: when (will they say) was it better and more fully performed, than when Theodosius, casting away his purple robe, leaving the ornaments of the Empire, as some one of the common people: submitted himselfe before God and the Church, to solemne penance? then when he, and other like godly Princes bestowed their endeavours and their cares to preserve pure doctrine in the Church, and to cherish and defend sound teachers? But how Priests at that time exceeded not in superfluous riches, that onely sentence of the Synode at Aquileia, where Ambrose was chiefe, sufficiently declareth: Glorious is povertie in the Priests of the Lord. Truly the Bishops had at that time some riches, wherewith they might have set out the Churches honor, if they had thought those to be the true ornaments of the Church. But when they knew that there was nothing more against the office of Pastours, than to glister and shew themselves proudly with daintinesse of fare, with gorgiousnesse of garments, with great traine of servants, with stately Palaces, they followed and kept the humblenesse and modestie, yea the very povertie which Christ holily appointed among his Ministers.

18 But that wee may not be too long in this point, let us againe gather into a short summe, how far that dispensation or distipation of the goods of the Church, that is now used, differeth from the true Deaconrie, which both the word of God commendeth unto us, and the ancient Church observed. As for that which is bestowed upon the garnishing of Temples, I say it is ill bestowed, if that measure be not used, which both the very nature of holy things appointeth, that the Apostles and other holy Fathers have prescribed both by doctrine and examples. But what like thing is there seene at this day in the Temples? whatsoever is framed, I will not say after that ancient sparing, but to any honest meane it is rejected. Nothing at all pleaseth, but that which favoureth of riot and the corruption of times. In the meane time they are so far from having due care of the lively Temples, that they would rather suffer many thousands of the poore to perish for hunger, than they would breake the least chalice or cruet, to relieve their neede. And that I may not pronounce of my selfe any thing more grievously against them, this onely I would have the godly Readers to thinke upon: if it should happen that same Exuperius Bishop of Tbolosa, whom we even now rehearsed, or Acatius, or Ambrose, or any such to be raised from death, what would they say? Truly they would not allow that in so great necessitie of the poore, riches in a manner superfluous should be turned another way. Admit I speake nothing how these uses upon which they be bestowed, (although there were no poore) are many waies hurtfull, but in no behalfe profitable. But I leave to speake of men. These goods are dedicate to Christ: therefore they are to be disposed after his will. But they shall in vaine say, that this part is bestowed upon Christ, which they have wasted otherwise than he commanded. Howbeit, to confesse the truth, there is not much of the ordinarie revenue of the Church abated for these expenses. For there are no Bishopricks so wealthy, no Abbacies so fat, finally neither so many, nor so large benefices that may serve to fill the gluttonie of Priests. But while they seeke to spare themselves, they perswade the people by superstition, to turne that which should be bestowed upon the poore, to build Temples, to set up Images, to buy Jewels, to get costly garments. So with this gulfe are the daily almes consumed.

19 Of the revenue, that they receive of their lands and possessions, what else shall I say, but that which I have already said, and which is before all mens eies? We see with what faithfulness they which are called Bishops and Abbots do dispose the greatest part. What madnesse is it, to seeke heere for an ecclesiasticall order? Was it meete that they, whose life ought to have beene a singular example of frugalitie, modestie, continence, and humilitie, should contend with the royaltie of Princes in number of goods, in gorgiousnesse of houses, in daintinesse of apparell and fare? And how much was this contrarie to their office, that they, whom the eternall and inviolable commandment of God forbiddeth to be desirous of filthy gaine, and biddeth to be content with simple living, should not onely lay hands upon townes und castles, but also violently enter upon the greatest Lordships, finally possesse forceably very Empires? If they despise the word of God: what will they answer to those ancient decrees of the Synods: whereby it is decreed that the Bishop should have a small lodging not far from the Church, meane fare and household stufte? what will they say to that praise of the Synod at Aquileia: where povertie is reported glorious in the Priests of the Lord? For perhaps they will utterly refuse as too much rigorous, that which Hierom adviseth Nepotianus, that poore men and strangers: and among them Christ as a guest, may know his table. But that which he by and by addeth, they will be ashamed to denie that it is the glorie of a Bishop to provide for the good of the poore: that it is the shame of all Priests to studie for their owne riches. But they cannot receive this, but they must all condemne themselves of shame. But it is not needfull in this place to speake more hardly against them, sith my meaning was nothing else, but to shew, that among them the lawfull order of Deaconrie is long agoe taken away : that they may no more glorie of this title to the commendation of their Church : which I thinke I have already sufficiently shewed.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER.

Of the Supremacie of the Sea of Rome.

Hitherto we have rehearsed those orders of the church, which were in the government of the old church : but afterward corrupted in times, and from thence forth more and more abused, doe now in the Popish Church retain onely their name, and indeed are nothing else but visours : that by comparison the godly reader might judge what manner of Church the Romanists have, for whose sake they make us schismatikes, because we have departed from it. But as for the head and top of the whole order, that is to say, the Supremacie of the Sea of Rome, whereby they travell to prove that they onely have the Catholike Church, we have not yet touched it : because it tooke beginning neither from the institution of Christ, nor from the use of the old Church, as those former parts did : which wee have shewed to have so proceeded from antiquitie, that by wickednesse of times they are utterly degenerate, and have put on altogether a new forme. And yet they goe about to perswade the world, that this is the chiefe and in a manner onely bond of the unitie of the church, if we cleave to the Sea of Rome, and continue in the obedience thereof. They rest (I say) principally upon this stay, when they will take away the Church from us, and claime it to themselves, for that they keepe the head, upon which the unitie of the Church hangeth, and without which the Church must needs fall asunder and be broken in peeces. For thus they thinke that the Church is as it were a maimed and headlesse bodie, unlesse it be subject to the Sea of Rome, as to her head. Therefore when they talke of their Hierarchie, they alway take their beginning at this principle : that the Bishop of Rome (that this is the chiefe, which is the head of the Church) is in his stead President of the universall Church : and that otherwise the Church is not well ordered, unlesse that Sea doe hold the Supremacie above all other. Therefore this also is to be examined of what fort it is : that we may omit nothing that pertaineth to a just government of the Church.

2 Let this therefore be the principall point of the question : Whether it be necessarie for the true forme of Hierarchie (as they call it) or Ecclesiasticall order, that one Sea should be above the rest both in dignitie and in power, that it may be the head of the whole body. But wee make the Church subject to too unjust lawes, if we lay this necessitie upon it, without the word of God. Therefore if the adversaries will prove that which they require, they must first shew that this disposition was ordained by Christ. For this purpose they alleage out of the Law the high Priesthood, also the high judgement, which God did institute at Hierusalem. But it is easie to give a solution, and that many waies, if one way doe not satisfie them. First no reason compelleth to extend that to the whole world, which was profitable in one nation : yea rather, the order of one nation and of the whole world shall be farre different. Because the Jewes were on each side compassed with Idolaters : that they should not be diversly drawne with varietie of religions, God appointed the place of worshipping him in the midst part of the land : there hee ordained over them one head Bishop, whom they should have all regard unto, that they might be the better kept together in unitie. Now when religion is spread abroad into the whole world, who doth not see that it is altogether an absurditie, that the government of the East and West be given to one man ? For it is in effect as much as if a man should affirme that the whole world ought to be governed by one Ruler, because one peece of land hath no more rulers but one. But there is yet another reason, why that ought not to be made an example to be followed. No man is ignorant that the high Bishop was a figure of Christ. Now, since the Priesthood is removed, that right must also be removed. But to whom is it removed ? Truly not to the Pope (as he himselfe is so bold shamelesly to boast) when he draweth this title to himselfe : but to Christ, which as hee alone sustaineth this office, without any Vicar or Successor, so hee resigneth the honour to none other. For the Priesthood consisteth not in doctrine onely; but in the appeasing of God, which Christ hath fully wrought by his death, and in that intercession which he now useth with his Father.

3 There is therefore no cause why they should binde us by this example, as by a perpetuall rule, which wee have seene to be enduring but for a time. Out of the new Testament they have nothing to bring forth for proofe of their opinion, but that it was said to one: Thou art Peter, and upon this stone I will build my Church. Againe, Peter, Lovest thou me? Feede my sheepe. But admitting that these be strong proofes, they must first shew, that he which is commanded to feede the flocke of Christ; hath power committed to him over all Churches: and that to binde and to loose is nothing else but to be ruler of all the world. But as Peter had received the commandement of the Lord, so he exhortheth all other Priests to feede the Church. Heereby we may gather, that by this saying of Christ, there was either nothing given to Peter more than to the rest, or that Peter did equally communicate with other the power that he had received. But, that we strive not vainely, we have in another place a cleare exposition out of the mouth of Christ, what is to binde and loose: that is to say, to retaine and to forgive sinnes. But the manner of binding and loosing; both the whole Scripture each where sheweth, and Paul very well declareth, when he saith that the ministers of the Gospell have commandement to reconcile men to God, and also have power, to punish them that refuse this benefit.

4 How shamefully they wrest those places, that make mention of binding and loosing, I both have already shortly touched, and a little after I shall have occasion to declare more at large. Now it is good to see onely, what they gather of that famous answer of Christ to Peter. Hee promised him the keyes of the kingdome of heaven: hee said that whatsoever hee bound in earth, should be bound in heaven. If we agree upon the word Keyes, and the manner of binding, all contention shall by and by cease. For the Pope himselfe will gladly give over the charge enjoyned to the Apostles, which beeing full of travell and griete, should shake from him his pleasures; without gaine. For as much as the heavens are opened unto us by the doctrine of the Gospell; it is with a very fit Metaphor expressed by the name of Keyes. NOW men are bound and loosed in no otherwise, but when faith reconcileth some to God, and their owne unbelieve bindeth other some. If the Pope did take this onely upon him: I thinke there will bee no man that would either envie it or strive about it. But because this succession, being travel some and nothing gainefull, pleaseth not the Pope, hereupon groweth the beginning of the contention, what Christ promised to Peter. Therefore I gather by the very matter it selfe, that there is nothing meant, but the dignitie of the office of an Apostle, which cannot be severed from the charge. For if that definition which I have rehearsed, be received (which cannot but shamelesly be rejected) here is nothing given to Peter, that was not also common to his other fellowes: because otherwise there should not onely wrong be done to the persons, but the very maiestie of doctrine should halt. They cry out on the other side: what availeth it, I pray you, to runne upon this rocke? For they shall not prove, but as the preaching of one same Gospell was enjoyned to all the Apostles, so they were also all alike furnished with power to binde and loose. Christ (say they) appointed Peter prince of the whole Church; when hee promised that he would give him the keyes. But that which he then promised to one, in another place hee gave it also to all the rest; and delivered it as it were into their hands. If the same power were granted to all; which was promised to one; wherein shall hee be above his fellowes? Herein (say they) he excelleth, because he received it both in common together with them; and severally by himselfe; which was not given to the other, but in common. What if I answer with Cyprian and Augustine, that Christ did it not for this purpose, to preferre one man before other, but to set out the unitie of the Church. For thus saith Cyprian; that God in the person of one, gave the keyes to all, to signifie the unitie of all: and that the rest were the same thing that Peter was, endued with like partaking both of honor and power: but that the beginning is taken at unitie, that the church of Christ may be shewed to be one. Augustine saith: If there were not in Peter a mysterie of the church, the Lord would not say to him, I will give thee the keyes. For if this was said to Peter, the church hath them not:

but if the Church have them, then Peter, when hee received the keyes, betokened the whole Church. And in another place. When they were all asked, onely Peter answered, thou art Christ: and it is said to him, I will give thee the keyes, as though he alone had received the power of binding and loosing: whereas both he being one, said that one for all, and he received the other with all, as bearing the person of unitie. Therefore one for all, because there is unitie in all.

5 But this, Thou art Peter, and upon this rocke I will build my Church, is no where read or spoken to any other. As though Christ spake there any other thing of Peter, than that which Paul and Peter himselfe speaketh of all Christians. For Paul maketh Christ the chiefe and corner stone, upon which they are builded together, that grow into a holie temple to the Lord. And Peter biddeth us to be lively stones which being founded upon that chosen and pretious stone, doe by this joynt and coupling together with our God, cleave also together among our selves. He (say they) above the rest: because he hath the name peculiarly. Indeed I doe willingly grant this honour to Peter, that in the building of the Church he be placed among the first, or (if they will have this also) the first of all the faithfull: but I will not suffer them to gather thereupon, that he should have a Supremacie over the rest. For what manner of gathering is this? He excelleth other in ferventnesse of zeale, in learning, and courage: therefore he hath power over them. As though we might not with better colour gather, that Andrew is in degree before Peter, because he went before him in time, and brought him to Christ. But I passe over this. Let Peter truly have the first place, yet there is great difference betweene the honour of degree and power. We see that the Apostles commonly granted this to Peter, that he should speake in assemblies, and after a certaine manner goe before them with propounding, exhorting, and admonishing: but of his power we read nothing at all.

6 Howbeit wee be not yet come to dispute of that point: onely at this present I would prove, that they doe too fondly reason, when by the onely name of Peter, they would build an Empire over the whole Church. For those old follies wherewith they went about to deceive at the beginning, are not worthe to be rehearsed, much lesse to be confuted, that the Church was builded upon Peter, because it was said, upon this rock, &c. But some of the Fathers have fo expounded it. But when the whole Scripture crieth out to the contrary, to what purpose is their authoritie alleged against God? Yea; why doe we strive about the meaning of these words, as though it were darke or doubtfull; when nothing can bee more plainly nor more certainly spoken? Peter had confessed in his owne and his brethrens name that Christ is the Sonne of God. Upon this rocke Christ buildeth his Church: because it is (as Paul saith) the onely foundation, beside which there can be laid none other. Neither doe I heere therefore refuse the authoritie of the Fathers, because I want their testimonies, if I list to alleage them: but (as I have said) I will not with contending about so cleere a matter trouble the Readers in vaine, specially sith this point hath been long agoe diligently enough handled and declared by men of our side.

7 And yet indeed no man can better assoyle this question, than the Scripture it selfe, if we compare all the places, where it teacheth, what office and power Peter had among the Apostles, how he behaved himselfe, and how hee was accepted of them. Runne over all that remaineth written, you shall find nothing elsse; but that he was one of the twelve, equall with the rest and their fellow, but not their Lord. He doth indeed propound to the Councell, if any thing be to be done, and giveth warning what is meete to be done: but therewithall he heareth other, and doth not onely grant them place to speake their minde, but leaveth the judgement to them: when they had determined, he followed and obeyed. When he writeth to the Pastors, he doth not command them by authoritie; as Superiour: but hee maketh them his companions, and gently exhorteth them, as equals are wont to doe. When he was accused for that hee had gone into the Gentiles; although it were without cause, yet he answered and purged himselfe. When he was commanded by his fellowes, to goe with John into Samaria, hee refused not. Whereas the Apostle did send him, they did thereby declare that they held him not for their Superiour. Whereas hee obeyed and tooke upon him the Embassage committed to him, hee did thereby confesse that he had a fellowship with them, and not an authoritie over them. If none of these things were, yet the only Epistle to the Galathians may easily take all doubting from us: where almost in two Chapters together, Paul travelleth to prove nothing else, but that hee himselfe was equall to Peter in honour of Apostleship. Then hee rehearseth that hee came to Peter, not to proteste subjection, but onely to make their consent of doctrine approved by testimonie to all men: and that Peter himselfe required no such thing, but gave him his right hand of fellowship, to worke in common together in the Lords Vineyard: and that there was no lesser grace given to him among the Gentiles, than to Peter among the Jewes: Finally, that when Peter dealt not very faithfully, hee was corrected by him, and obeyed his reproving. All these things doe make plaine, either that there was an equalitie betweene Paul and Peter, or at least that Peter had no more power over the rest, than they had over him. And (as I have already said) Paul of purpose laboureth about this, that none should preferre before him in the Apostleship either Peter, or John, which were fellowes, not Lords.

8 But, to grant them that which they require concerning Peter, that is, that he was the Prince of the Apostles, and excelled the rest in dignitie: yet there is no cause why they should of a singular example make an universall rule, and drawe to perpetuities that which hath beene once done: sith there is a firme differing reason. One was chiefe among the Apostles: forsooth; because they were few in number. If one were the chiefe of twelve men, shall it therefore follow that one ought to be made ruler of a hundred thousand men? It is no marvell that twelve had one among them that should rule them all. For nature beareth this, and the wit of men requireth this, that in every assembly, although they be all equal in power, yet there be one as a governour, whom the rest may have regard unto. There is no Court without a Counsell, no Session of Judges without a Pretor, or Propounder, no companie without a Ruler, no fellowship without a Master. So should it be no absurditie, if we confessed that the Apostles gave to Peter such a supremacie. But that which is of force among few, is not by and by to be drawne to the whole world, to the ruling whereof no one man is sufficient. But (say they) this hath place no lesse in the whole universalitie of nature, than in all the parts, that there be one soveraigne head of all. And hereof (and God will) they fetch a proove from Cranes and Bees, which alway choose to themselves one guide, not many. I allow indeede the examples which they bring forth: but doe Bees resort together out of all the world to choose them one king? every severall king is content with his owne hyve. So among Cranes, every heard hath their owne king. What else shall they prove hereby, but that every Church ought to have their owne severall bishop appointed them? Then they call us to civill examples. They alleadge that saying of Homer, It is not good to have many governours: and such things as in like sense are read in prophane writers to the commendation of Monarchie. The answer is easie. For Monarchie is not praised of Vlysses in Homer, or of any other, in this meaning, as though one ought to be Emperour of the whole world: but they meane to shew that one kingdome cannot hold two kings: and that power (as he calleth it) can abide no companion.

9 But let it be as they will, that it is good and profitable that the whole world be holden under Monarchie, which yet is a very great absurditie: but let it be so: yet I will not therefore grant that the same should take place in the government of the Church. For the Church hath Christ her onely head; under whose dominion wee all cleave together, according to that order and that forme of policie which he hath prescribed. Therefore they doe a great wrong to Christ, when by that pretence they will have one man to be ruler of the universall Church, because it cannot be without a head. For Christ is the head of whom the whole body coupled and knit together in every joynt, wherewith one member to another, according to the working of every member in the measure thereof, maketh increase of the bodie. See you not, how hee fettereth all men without exception in the body, and leaveth the honour and name of head to Christ alone? See you not how he giveth to every member a certaine measure, and a determined, and limited function: whereby both the perfection of the grace and the soveraigne power of governance may remaine with Christ onely? Neither am I ignorant what they are wont to cavill, when this is objected against them: they say that Christ is properly called the onely head, because he alone reigneth by his owne authoritie and in his owne name: but that this nothing withstandeth, but that there may be under him another ministeriall head (as they terme it) that may be his vicegerent in earth. But by this cavillation they prevaile nothing, unlesse they first shew that this ministry was ordained by Christ. For the Apostle teacheth, that the whole ministraction is dispersed through the members, and that the power floweth from the one heavenly head. Or if they will have it any plainer spoken, sith the Scripture testifieth that Christ is the head, and claimeth that honour to him alone, it ought not to be transferred to any other, but whom Christ himselfe hath made his vicar. But that is not onely no where read, but also may be largely confuted by many places.

10 Paul sometimes depainteth unto us a lively image of the church. Of one head hee maketh there no mention. But rather by his description we may gather, that it is disagreeing from the institution of Christ. Christ at his ascending tooke from us the visible presence of himselfe: yet he went up to fulfill all things. Now therefore the church hath him yet present, and alway shall have. When Paul goeth about to shew the meane wherby he presenteth himselfe, he calleth us backe to the ministeries which he useth. The Lord (saith he) is in us all, according to the measure of grace that hee hath given to every member. Therefore hee hath appointed some Apostles, some Pastors, some Evangelists, other some Teachers, &c. Why doth hee not say, that hee hath set one over all, to be his vicegerent? For the place required that principally, and it could by no meanes have bene omitted, if it had bene true. Christ (saith hee) is with us. How? by the ministry of men, whom hee hath appointed to governe the Church. Why not rather by the mysteriall head, to whom he hath committed his steed? Hee nameth unitie: but in God, and in the faith of Christ. Hee assigneth to men nothing but common ministerie, and to every one a particular measure. In that commendation of unitie, after that he had said that there is but one body, one spirit, one hope of calling, one God, one Faith, one baptism, why hath he not also immediately added one chiefe bishop, that may hold the church together in unitie? For nothing could have bene more sily spoken, if it had bene true. Let that place be diligently weighed. It is no doubt but that hee meant there altogether to represent the holy and spiritual government of the church, which they that came after called Hierarchie. As for Monarchie among ministers, he not onely nameth none, but also sheweth that there is none. It is also no doubt but that he meant to expresse the manner of conjoining, whereby the faithfull cleave together with Christ their head. There he not onely speaketh of no ministeriall head, but appointeth to every of the members a particular working according to the measure of grace distributed to every one. Neither is there any reason why they should subtely dispute of the comparison of the heavenly and earthly Hierarchie. For it is not safe to know beyond measure of it. And in framing this government we must follow no other figure, than the Lord himselfe hath painted out in his word.

11 Now although I grant them another thing, which they shall never winne by prooffe before sober men, that the supremacie of the church was so established in Peter, that it should alway remaine by perpetuall succession: yet how will they prove, that his seat was so placed at Rome; that whosoever is bishop of that church, should be set over the whole world? By what right doe they binde this dignitie to the place, which is given without mention of place? Peter (say they) lived and died at Rome. What did Christ himselfe? Did not he, while he lived, exercise his bishopricke, and in dying fulfill the office of Priesthood, at Hierusalem? The Prince of Pastors, the soveraigne bishop, the head of the church, could not purchase honour to the place: and could Peter, that was farre inferior to him? Are not these follies more than childish? Christ gave the honour of supremacie to Peter: Peter sat at Rome, therefore he there placed the seat of supremacie. By this reason the Israelites in old time might have set the seat of supremacie in the desert, where Moses the chiefe Teacher and Prince of Prophets executed his ministerie and died.

12 Let us see how trimly they reason. Peter (say they) had the Supremacie among the the Apostles: therefore the Church where he late ought to have that privilege. But where saie he first? At Antioch, say they. Therefore the Church of Antioch doth rightly claime to it selfe the Supremacie. They confesse that it was in old time the first: but they say, that in removing thence hee removed to Rome, the honour that he brought with him. For there is an Epistle under the name of Pope Murcellus to the Bishops of Antioch, where he sayeth thus: Peters seate was at the beginning with you, which afterward by the Lords commendment was removed hither. So the Church of Antioch, which was once the chiefe, hath given place to the See of Rome. But by what Oracle had that good man learned, that the Lord so commanded? For if this cause be to be determined by the Law, it is necessarie that they answer, whether they will have this privilege to be personall, or reall, or mixt. For it must be one of these three. If they say that it is personall, then it belongeth nothing to the place. If they say that it is reall, then when it is once given to the place, it is not taken away by reason either of the death or departure of the person. It remaineth therefore that they must say it is mixt: but then that place shall be not simply to be considered, unless the person doe also agree. Let them choose which soever they will, I will by and by inferre and easily prove, that Rome can by no meane take the Supremacie upon it selfe.

13 But be it, that (as they triflingly say) the supremacie was removed from Antioch to Rome: yet why did not Antioch keepe the second place? For if Rome have therefore the first place, because Peter saie there to the end of his life: to whom shall the second place rather be granted, than where he had his first seate? How came it to passe then, that Alexandria went before Antioch? How agreeth it, that the Church of one disciple should be above the seate of Peter? If honour be due to every church, according to the worthinesse of the founder, what shall we say also of the other churches? Paul nameth three, that seemed to be pillars, James, Peter, and John. If the first place were given to the see of Rome in the honour of Peter: doe not the sees of Ephesus and Ierusalem, where John and James saie, deserve the second and third place? But among the Patriarches Ierusalem had the last place: Ephesus could not sit so much as in the uttermost corner. And other churches were left out, both all those that Paul founded, and those that the other Apostles were rulers of. The seate of Marke, which was but one of their disciples, obtained the honour. Therefore they must either confesse that that was a preposterous order, or they must grant us that this is not a perpetuall rule, that there be due to every church the same degree of honour which the founder had.

14 Howbeit, as for that which they report of Peters sitting in the Church of Rome, I see not what credit it ought to have. Truly that which is in Eusebius, that he ruled there five and twenty yeeres, is very easily confuted. For it is evident by the first and second Chapter to the Galathians, that about twentie yeeres after the death of Christ, he was at Ierusalem, and that then he went to Antioch: where how long he was, is uncertaine. Gregorie reckoneth seven yeeres, and Eusebius twentie and five. But from the death of Christ, to the end of Nerves Empire, (in whose time they say that he was slaine) there shall be found but thirtie and seven yeeres. For the Lord suffered under Tiberius, the eighteenth yeere of his Empire. If you rebate twenty yeeres; during the which Paul is witness that Peter dwelt at Ierusalem, there will remaine but severenteen yeeres at the most, which must now be divided betweene two Bishops-ricks. If he taried long at Antioch, he could not sit at Rome but a very little while. Which thing we may yet also more plainly prove. Paul wrote to the Romanes, when he was in his journey going to Ierusalem, where he was taken and from thence brought to Rome. It is not likely that this Epistle was written foure yeeres before that he came to Rome. Therein is yet no mention of Peter, which should not have beene left out, if Peter had ruled that Church. Yea and in the end also, when he rehearseth a great number of the godly, whom he biddeth to be saluted, where verily he gathereth together all those that he knew, he yet saith utterly nothing of Peter. Neither is it needfull heere to make a long or curious demonstration to men of sound judgement: for the matter it selfe, and the whole argument of the Epistle crieth out, that he should not have overpassed Peter, if he had bene at Rome.

15. Then Paul was brought prisoner to Rome. Luke reporteth that he was received of the brethren, of Peter he saith nothing. He wrote from thence to many Churches: and in some places also hee writeth salutations in the names of certaine: but hee doth not in one word shew that Peter was there at that time; Who, I pray you shall thinke it likely, that he could have passed him over with silence, if he had bene present? Yea to the Philippians, where he said that he had none that so faithfully looked unto the worke of the Lord, as Timothee; hee complained, that they did all seeke their owne. And to the same Timothee he maketh a more grievous complaint, that none was with him at his first defence, but all forsooke him: where therefore was Peter then? For if they say that hee was then at Rome, how great a shame doth Paul charge him with, that hee was a forsaker of the Gospel? For hee speaketh of the beleivers: because he addeth, God impute it not unto them. How long therefore, and in what time did Peter keepe that seate? But it is a constant opinion of writers, that hee governed that Church even to his death. But among the writers themselves it is not certaine who was his successor, because some say Linus, and other some say Clement. And they tell many fond fables; of the disputation had betweene him and Simon the Magician. And Augustine slieth not to confesse, when hee entreateth of superstitions, that by reason of an opinion rashly conceived, there was a custome growne in use at Rome, that they should not fast that day that Peter got the victorie of Simon the Magician. Finally the doings of that time are so entangled with diversitie of opinions, that we ought not rashly to beleve where we finde any thing written. And yet by reason of this content of writers, I strive not against this, that hee died there: but yet that hee was bishop there, and specially a long time, I cannot be persuaded, neither doe I much passe upon that also: for as much as Paul testifieth that Peters Apostleship did peculiarly belong to the Jewes, and his owne to us. Therefore that that fellowship which they covenanted betweene themselves, may be confirmed with us, or rather that the ordinance of the holy Ghost may stand in force among us, wee ought to have respect rather to the Apostleship of Paul and Peter. For the holy Ghost so devided the provinces betweene them that hee appointed Peter to the Jewes, and Paul to us. Now therefore let the Romanists goe and seeke their supremacie else where than in the word of God, where it is found not to be grounded.

16. Now let us come to the old Church, that it may also bee made to appeare plainly that our adversaries doe no lesse causelessly and falsely boast of the consent thereof, than they doe of the witness of the word of God. When therefore they bragge of that principle of theirs, that the unitie of the Church cannot otherwise be kept together, but if there bee one supream head in earth, to whom all the members may obey, and that therefore the Lord gave the supremacie to Peter, and from thence forth to the sea of Rome by right of succession, that the same should remaine in it to the end: they affirme, that this hath bene alway observed from the beginning. But forasmuch as they wrongfully wrest many testimonies, I will first say this aforehand, that I denie not but that the writers doe each where give great honour to the Church of Rome, and doe speake reverently of it. Which I thinke to be done specially for three causes. For that same opinion, which I wor not how was growne in force, that it was founded and ordained by the ministerie of Peter; much availed to procure favour and estimation unto it. Therefore in the East parts it was for honours sake called the sea Apostolike. Secondly, when the head of the Empire was there, and that therefore it was likely, that in that place were men more excellent both in learning and wisdom, and skill, and experience of many things, than any where else: there was worthily consideration had thereof, that both the honour of the Citie, and also the other more excellent gifts of God should not seeme to be despised. There was beside these also a third thing, that when the Churches of the East, and of Greece, yea and of Affrica, were in tumults among themselves with disagreement of opinions, the Church of Rome was quieter and lesse full of troubles than the rest. So came it to passe, that the godly and holy Bishops, being driven out of their seates, did oftentimes flee thither as into a sanctuarie or certaine haven. For as the Westerne men are of lesse sharpnesse and swiftnesse of wit, than the Asians or Africans be, so much are they lesse desirous of

As Peters governing the Church of Rome is hardly proved, so his successor in government is not agreed upon: his deeds and death at Rome uncertaine: his being Bishop of Rome and that so long, most improbable.

Three causes why the fathers did attribute supremacy to the Church of Rome.

alterations. This therefore added much authoritie to the Church of Rome, that in those doubtfull times it was not so troubled as the rest, and did hold the doctrine once delivered them, faster than all the rest as we shall by and by better declare. For these three causes (I say) it was had in no small honour, and commended with many notable testimonies of the old writers.

17 But when our adversarities will thereupon gather that it hath a supremacie and soveraigne power over other Churches, they doe too much amisse, as I have already said, And that the same may the better appeare, I will first briefly shew what the old Fathers thought of this unitie which they enforce so earnestly. Hierom writing to Neptianus, after that he had received many examples of unitie, at the last descended to the Hierarchie of the Church. Each Bishop of every severall Church, each Archprieft, each Archdeacon, and all the Ecclesiasticall order, doe rest upon their owne rulers. Heere a Romaine Priest speaketh, hee commendeth union in the Ecclesiasticall order, why doth he not rehearse that all Churches are knit together with one head as with one bond? Nothing could have more fitly served the matter that he had in hand: and it cannot bee said that it was for forgetfulness, that he omitted it: for he would have done nothing more willingly if the matter had suffered him. He saw therefore without doubt, that that is the true reason of unitie which Cyprian excellently well describeth in these words: The Bishoprick is one, wherof each hath a part wholly: and the church is one, which is with increase of fruitfulness more largely extended into a multitude. Like as there are many sun-beames and one light: and many branches of a tree, but one bodie grounded on a fast holding roote: and like as from one fountaine flow many streames, and though the multitude seeme to be diversly spread abroad with largeness of overflowing plentie, yet the unitie is kept whole in the originall: so the church also being overspread with the light of the Lord, extendeth her beames abroad throughout the whole world, yet it is but one that is each where powred forth, and the unitie of the bodie is not severed: she spreadeth her branches over the whole world, she sendeth out her overflowing streames: yet is there but one head and one beginning, &c. Afterward: The spouse of Christ cannot be an adulteresse: she knoweth one onely house, she keepeth the holiness of one onely chamber with chaste shamefastnesse. You see how he maketh the universall Bishoprick to be Christs onely, which comprehendeth the whole Church under him: and saith that all they that execute the office of Bishop under this head, have their parts thereof wholly. Where is the supremacie of the sea of Rome, if the whole Bishoprick remaine with Christ onely, and each Bishop hath his part thereof wholly? These things therefore make to this purpose, that the Reader may understand by the way, that the old Fathers were utterly ignorant of that principle, which the Romanists doe take for confessed and undoubted, concerning the unitie of an earthly head in the Hierarchie of the Church.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Of the beginning and encreasing of the Papacie of Rome, until advanced it selfe to this height, whereby both the libertie of the Church hath bene oppressed, and all the right government thereof overturned.

Sundry ancient Councils where in the Bishop of Rome had not the chiefest place.

AS concerning the ancientnesse of the supremacie of the sea of Rome, there is nothing had of more antiquitie to stablish it, than the decree of the Nycene Synod, wherein the Bishop of Rome both hath the first place among the Patriarches given unto him, and is commanded to looke unto the Churches adjoining to the Citie. When the Councell maketh such division betweene him and the other Patriarches, that it assigneth to every one their bounds: truly, it doth not appoint him the head of all, but maketh him one of the chiefe. There were present Vitus and Vincentius in the name of Julius, which then governed the Church of Rome: to them was given the fourth place. I beseech you, if Julius were acknowledged the head of the Church, should his Legates be thrust into the fourth seate? Should Athanasius bee chiefe in the Councell, where principally the image of the Hierarchicall order ought to be seene? In the Synod at Ephesus it appeareth, that Celestinus which was then Bishop of Rome, used a crooked subtle meane to provide for the dignitie of his seate. For when he sent his deputies thither, hee committed his steede to Cyrius of Alexandria, which should notwithstanding other wise have bene the chiefe. To what purpose was that same committing, but that his name might by what meane soever abide in the first place? For his Legates sate in a lower place, and were asked their opinion among the rest, and subscribed in their order: in the meane time the Patriarch of Alexandria, joynted Celestines name with his owne. What shall I say of the second Councell at Ephesus: where when Leos Legates were present, yet Dioscorus Patriarch of Alexandria sate the chiefe as by his owne right? They will take exception that it was no upright Councell, by which both the holy man Flavianus was condemned, and Eutyches acquitted, and his ungodlinesse allowed. But when the Synod was gathered, when the Bishops tooke their places in order, verily the Legates of the Bishop of Rome sate there among the rest none other wise than in a holy and lawfull Councell. Yet they strived not for the first place, but yielded it to another: which they would never have done, if they had thought it to be theirs of right. For the Bishops of Rome were never ashamed to enter into the greatest contentions for their honors: and for this onely cause oftentimes to vex and trouble the Church with many and hurtfull strifes. But because Leo saw that it should be a too much unreasonable request, if he should seeke to get the chiefe place for his Legates, therefore he surceased it.

2 Then followed the Councell of Chalcedon, in which by the grant of the Emperour the Legates of the Church of Rome sate in the chiefe place. But Leo himselfe confessed that this was an extraordinary priviledge. For when he made petition for it to the Emperour Marcianus, and Pulcheria the Empreffe, he did not affirme that it was due to him, but onely pretended, that the Easterne Bishops, which sate as chiefe in the Councell at Ephesus, troubled all things and ill abused their power. Whereas therefore it was needfull to have a grave governour, and it was not likely that they should be meete for it, which had once bene so light and disordered: therefore he praied, that by reason of the default and unfitnesse of other, the office of governing might be removed to him. Truly that which is gotten by singular priviledge and beside order, is not by common law. Where this onely is pretended, that there needeth some new governour, because the former governours had behaved themselves ill, it is evident that it neither was so before, nor ought to continue so for ever, but is done onely in respect of present danger. The Bishop of Rome therefore had the first place in the Councell of Chalcedon: not because it was due to his see, but because the Synode was at that time destitute of a grave and fit governour, while they that ought to have bene the chiefe, did through their owne intemperance and corrupt affection, thrust themselves out of place. And this that I say, Leos successor did indeed prove. For when he sent his Legates to the fifth Synode at Constantinople, which was holden long time after, he brauled not for the first seate, but easily suffered Menna the Patriarch of Constantinople to sit as chiefe. So in the Councell of Carthage, at which Augustine was present, we see that not the Legates of the see of Rome, but Aurelius Archbishop of that place sat as chiefe: when yet the contention was about the authoritie of the Bishop of Rome. Yea there was also a generall Councell holden in Italy it selfe, at which the Bishop of Rome was not present. Ambrose was chiefe there, which was in very great authoritie with the Emperour, there was no mention made of the Bishop of Rome. Therefore at that time it came to passe by the dignitie of Ambrose, that the see of Millane was more noble than the see of Rome.

3 As concerning the title of Supremacie, and other titles of pride, whereupon it now marvellously boasteth it selfe, it is not hard to judge, when and in what sort they crept in, Cyprian oftentimes maketh mention of Cornelius. He setteth him out with no other name, but by the name of brother, or fellow Bishop, or fellow in office. But when he writeth to Stephen the successor of Cornelius, he doth not only make him equall with himselfe and the rest, but also speaketh more hardly to him, charging him sometime with arrogance, sometime with ignorance. Since Cyprian we have with all the Church of Africa judged of that matter. The Councell at Carthage did forbid that any should be called Prince of Priests or chiefe Bishop, but onely bishop of the chiefe see. But if a man turne over the ancienter monuments, hee shall finde that the Bishop of Rome at that time was content with the common name of Brother. Certainly so long as the face of the Church continued true and pure, all these names of pride, wherewith since that time the sea of Rome hath begun to waxe outrageous, were utterly unheard of: it was not knowne, who was the highest Bishop and the onely head of the Church in earth. But if the Bishop of Rome had bene so bold to have taken such a thing upon him, there were stout and wise men that would have by and by repressed his folly. Hieron forasmuch as hee was a Priest at Rome; was nor ill willing to set out the dignitie of his owne Church; so much as the matter and state of his time suffered: yet we see how he also bringeth it downe into fellowship with the rest. If authoritie (saith he) be sought for, the world is greater than a Citie. Why dost thou alleadge to me the custome of one Citie? Why dost thou defend (smallness of number, out of which hath growne pride, against the lawes of the Church? Wheresoever there be a Bishop, either at Rome, or at Engubium, or at Constantinople, or at Rhegium, he is of the same merit and of the same Priesthood. The power of riches, or baseness of povertie maketh not a Bishop higher or lower.

The chiefe place in the Councell of Chalcedon granted by the Emperour, as a request upon speciall occasion for that time to the Bishop of Rome, who by place in Synodes afterwards should outstrip Bishops hard as before.

4 About the title of universall Bishop the contention first began in the time of Gregorie, which was occasioned by the ambition of John Bishop of Constantinople. For he (which thing never any man before had attempted) would have made himselfe universall Bishop. In that contention Gregorie doth not alleadge that the right is taken away which was due to himselfe: but stoutly crieth out against it, that it is a prophane name, yea full of sacriledge, yea the forewarner of Antichrist. The whole Church (saith he) falleth downe from her state, if he fall which is called universall. In another place: It is very sorrowfull; to suffer patiently, that our brother and fellow Bishop, despising all other, should onely be named Bishop. But in this his pride what else is betokened but the times of Antichrist neere at hand? because verily hee followeth him, that despising the fellowship of Angels, went about to climbe up to the top of singularity. In another place hee writeth to Enolius of Alexandria and Anastasius of Antioch. None of my predecessours at any time would use that prophane word: for if one be called universall Patriarch, the name of Patriarches is abated from all the rest. But farre may this be from a Christian minde, that any should have a will to take that upon him, wherby hee may in any part, be it never so little, diminish the honour of his bretheren. To consent in this wicked word is nothing else but to loose the faith. It is one thing (saith he) that we owe to the preserving of the unitie of faith, and another thing that we owe to the keeping downe of pride. But I say it boldly, because whosoever calleth himselfe, or desireth to be called universall Bishop, hee doth in his proud advancing run before Antichrist, because hee doth with shewing himselfe proud prefer himselfe above the rest. Againe to Anastius Bishop of Alexandria: I have said that hee cannot have peace with us; unless he amended the advancing of the superstitious and proud word, which the first Apostle hath invented. And (to speake nothing of the wrong done to your honour) if one be called universall Bishop, the universall Church falleth when that universall one falleth. But whereas hee writeth, that this honour was offered to Leo in the Synod at Chalcedon, it hath no colour of truth. For neither is there any such thing read in the actes of that Synod. And Leo himselfe; which with many Epistles impugneth the decree there made in honour of the sea of Constantinople, without doubt would not have passed over this argument, which had bene most to be liked of all other; if it had bene true, that hee refused that which was given him: and being a man otherwise too much desirous of honour; he would not have omitted that which made for his praise. Therefore Gregorie was deceived in this; that hee though that title was offered to the sea of Rome by the Synod of Chalcedon: to speake nothing, how fond it is; that he both testifieth it to have proceeded from the holy Synod, and also at the same time called it wicked, prophane, abominable, proud, and full of sacriledge, yea devised by the Divell, and published by the crier of Antichrist. And yet he addeth that his predecessor refused it, least all Priests should be deprived of their due honour, when any thing were privately given to one. In another place: no man at any time hath willed to be called by that word. No man hath taken to himselfe that prosumptuous name: least if he should in the degree of Bishopricke take to himselfe a glorie of singularitie, he should seeme to have denied the same to all his brethren.

5 Now I come to the jurisdiction, which the bishop of Rome affirmeth that he hath over all Churches. I know how great contentions have beene in old time about this matter: For there hath beene no time wherein the sea of Rome hath not coveted to get an Empire over other Churches. And in this place I shall not be out of season, to search by what meanes it grew then by little and little to some power. I doe not yet speake of that infinite Empire, which it hath not so long ago taken by force to it selfe: for we will deferre that to a place convenient. But heere it is good to shew briefly, how in old time and by what meanes it hath advanced it selfe, to take to it selfe any power over other Churches. When the Churches of the East were divided and troubled with the factions of the Arrians under the Emperours Constantius, and Constans the sonnes of Constantine the Great, and Abbasius the chiefe defender there of the true faith was driven out of his sea: such calamitie compelled him to come to Rome, that with the authoritie of the sea of Rome, he might both after a sort repress the rage of his enemies, and confirme the godly that were in distresse. He was honorably received of Julius then Bishop, and obtained that the Bishops of the West tooke upon them the defence of his cause. Therefore when the godly stood in great need of forraign aid, and saw that there was very good succour for them in the Church of Rome, they willingly gave unto it the most authoritie that they could. But all that was nothing else, but that the communion thereof should be highly esteemed, and it should be counted a great shame to be excommunicate of it. Afterward evill and wicked men also added much unto it. For, to escape lawfull judgements, they fled to this sanctuarie. Therefore if any Priest were condemned by his Bishop, or any Bishop by the Synode of his Province, they by and by appealed to Rome. And the bishops of Rome received such appellations more greedily than was meete: Because it seemed to be a forme of extraordinary power, so to entermeddle with matters farre and wide about them. So when Eutyches was condemned by Flavianus bishop of Constantinople, hee complained to Leo that he had wrong done unto him. Leo without delay, no lesse indiscreetly than suddenly, tooke in hand the defence of an evill cause, hee grievously inveyed against Flavianus, as though he had, without hearing the cause, condemned an innocent: and by this his ambition he caused that the ungodlinesse of Eutyches was for a certaine space of time strengthened. In Africa it is evident that this oftentimes chanced. For so soone as any lewd man had taken a foyle in ordinary judgement, he by and by flew to Rome, and charged his countriemen with many slunderous reports: and the sea of Rome was alway ready to entermeddle. Which lewdnesse compelled the bishops of Africa to make a law, that none under paine of excommunication should appeale beyond the sea.

6 But whatsoever it were, let us see what authoritie or power the sea of Rome then had. Ecclesiasticall power is contained in these fower points; ordering of Bishops, summoning of Councils, hearing of appeales or jurisdiction, chastising, admonitions or censures. All the old Synods command bishops to be consecrate by their owne Metropolitans: and they never bid the bishop of Rome to be called unto it, but in his owne Patriarchie. But by little and little it grew in use, that all the bishops of Italie came to Rome to fetch their consecration, except the Metropolitans, which suffered not themselves to be brought into such bondage: but when any Metropolitan was to be consecrate, the bishop of Rome sent thither one of his Priests, which should onely be present, but not president. Of which thing there is an example in Gregorie: at the consecration of Constantius bishop of Millane after the death of Lusence. Howbeit I doe not thinke that that was a very ancient institution: but when at the beginning for honour and good wils sake they sent one to another their Legates, to be witnesses of the consecration, and to testify their communion with them, after ward that which was voluntarie, began to be holden for necessarie. Howsoever it be, it is evident that in old time the bishop of Rome had not the power of consecrating, but in the province of his owne Patriarchie, that is to say, in the Churches adjoining to the citie, as the Canon of the Nicene Synode saith. To the consecration was annexed the sending of a Synodical Epistle, in which he was nothing above the rest. For the

The ground whereupon the sovereignty of the Bishop of Rome did first take roote was his intermeddling in those causes, and his readinesse to aide those persons, which being had were readie any where to seeke maintenance.

In consecrating of Bishops, the power of the Bishop of Rome was not but the same which in other places others had. Lib. 2. Epist. 68. & 70.

Patriarches were wont immediately after their consecration, by solemne writing to declare their faith, whereby they professed that they subscribed to the holy and Catholike Councils: So rendering an account of their faith, they did approve themselves one to another. If the Bishop of Rome had received of other, and not himselfe given this confession, he had thereby beene acknowledged superior, but when he was no lesse bound to give it, than to require it of other, and to be subject to the common law: truly that was a token of fellowship, not of dominion. Of this thing there is an example in Gregorius Epistle to Anastasius and to Cyriacus of Constantinople, and in other places to all the Patriarches together.

7 Then follow admonitions or censures: which as in old time the Bishops of Rome used toward other, so they did againe suffer them of other. Irenaeus grievously reproved Victor, because he indiscreetly for a thing of no value, troubled the Church with a pernicious dissention. Victor obeyed, and spurned not against it. Such a libertie was then in ure among the holy Bishops, that they used a brotherly authoritie toward the Bishop of Rome, in admonishing and chastising him if he at any time offended. He againe, when occasion required did admonish other of their dute: and if there were any fault, rebuked it. For Cyprian, when he exhortheth Stephen to admonish the Bishops of France, fetcheth not his argument from the greater power, but from the common right that Priests have among themselves. I beseech you, if Stephen had then beene ruler over France, would not Cyprian have said: Restraine them, because they be thine? but he saith farre otherwise. This (saith he) the brotherly fellowship, wherwith we be bound one to another requireth that we should admonish one another. And we see also with how great sharpnesse of words he being otherwise a man of a milde nature inveieth against Stephen himselfe, when he thinketh him to be too insolent. Therefore in this behalfe also there appeareth not yet, that the Bishop of Rome had any jurisdiction over them that were not of his owne province.

8 As concerning the calling together of Synodes, this was the office of every Metropolitan, at certaine appointed times to assemble a provinciall Synode. There the Bishop of Rome had no authoritie. But a generall Councell the Emperour onely might summon. For if any of the Bishops had attempted it, not onely they that were out of his province, would not have obeyed his calling, but also there would by and by have risen an uprore. Therefore the Emperour indifferently warned them all to be present. Socrates indeed reporteth, that Julius did expostulate with the Bishops of the East, because they called him not to the Synod of Antioch, whereas it was forbidden by the Canons, that any thing should be decreed without the knowledge of the Bishop of Rome. But who doth not see that this is to be understood of such decrees as binde the whole universall Church? Now it is no marvell, if thus much be granted both to the antiquitie and honour of the citie, and to the dignitie of the see, that there should be no generall decree made of religion, in the absence of the bishop of Rome, if he refuse not to be present. But what is this to the dominion over the whole Church? For we denie not that he was one of the chiefe: but we will not grant, that which the Romanists now affirme, that he had a dominion over all.

9 Now remaineth the fourth kinde of power, which standeth in appeales. It is evident that hee hath the chiefe power, to whose judgement seate appellation is made. Many oftentimes appealed to the Bishop of Rome, and hee himselfe also went about to draw the hearing of causes to himselfe: but he was alway laughed to scorne, when he passed his owne bounds. I will speake nothing of the East and of Greece: but it is certain that the bishops of France stoutly withstood him, when he seemed to take to himselfe an Empire over them. In Africa there was long debate about that matter. For where at the Millevitane Councell, at which Augustine was present, they were excommunicate that appealed beyond the sea, the bishop of Rome travailed to bring to passe, that that decree might be amended. Hee sent his Legates to shew that that priviledge was given to him by the Nicene Councell. The Legates brought forth the actes of the Nicene Councell, which they had fetched out of the storehouse of their owne Church. The Affricans withstood it, and denied that the bishops of Rome ought to be credited in their owne cause: and said that therefore they would send to Constantinople, and into other cities of Greece, where coppies were to be had that were lesse suspicious. It was found, that therein was no such thing written, as the Romans had pretended. So was that decree confirmed, which tooke the chiefe hearing of causes from the bishop of Rome: In which doing the lewd shamelesse of the bishop of Rome appeared. For when he guilefully did thrust in the Synode at Sardos in steed of the Nicene Synode, he was shamefully taken in a manifest falsehood. But yet greater and more shamelesse was their wickednesse, that added a forged Epistle to the Councell, wherein I wot not what bishop of Carthage, condemning the arrogance of Aurelius his predeceffour, for that hee was so bold to withdraw himselfe from the obedience of the sea Apostolike, and yeelding himselfe and his Church, humbly craveth pardon. These be the goodly monuments of antiquitie, wherupon the majestie of the sea of Rome is founded, while they so childishly lie, under the pretence of antiquitie, that very blinde men may finde it out by groping. Aurelius (saith he) puffed up with divelish boldnesse and stubbornnesse, rebelled against Christ, and saint Peter, and therefore to be condemned with curse. What said Augustine? But what said to many fathers that were present at the Millivintane Councell? But what need is it to spend many words in confuting that foolish writing, which the Romanists themselves, if they have any face left, cannot looke upon without great shame? So Gratian, I cannot tell whether of malice or of ignorance, where he rehearset that decree that they should be excommunicate that appeale beyond the sea, addeth an exception: Unless peradventure they appeale to the sea of Rome. What may a man doe to these beasts, which are so voide of common reason, that they except that onely thing out of the law, for whose cause every man seeth that the law was made? For the Councell when it condemneth appeales beyond the sea, forbiddeth onely this, that none should appeale to Rome. Here the good expostour excepteth Rome out of the common law.

10 But (to determine this question at once) one historie shall make plaine what manner of jurisdiction the bishop of Rome had in old time. Donate of the black-houses had accused Cecilian bishop of Carthage: The man accused was condemned, his cause not heard. For when he knew that the bishops had conspired against him, hee would not appeare. Then the matter came to the Emperor Constantine. He for as much as hee would to have the matter ended by ecclesiasticall judgement, committed the hearing of it to Melchades bishop of Rome. To whom he adjoined fellow commissioners, many bishops of Italie, France and Spainie. If that belonged to the ordinary jurisdiction of the sea of Rome, to heare an appeale in an Ecclesiasticall cause: why doth hee suffer other to be joined with him at the will of the Emperour? Yea why did he himselfe take the judgement upon him rather by the Emperours commandement, than by his owne office? But let us heare what hapned afterward. There Cecilian got the victorie. Donate of the black-houses was condemned for slander: hee appealed: Constantine committed the judgement of the appeale to the bishop of Orleance. He sate as judge, to pronounce what he thought, after the bishop of Rome. If the sea of Rome hath the chiefe power without appellation: why doth Melchades suffer himselfe to receive so great a shame, that the bishop of Orleance should bee preferred above him? And what Emperour doth this? even Constantine of whom they boast that hee employed nor onely all his endeavour, but in a manner all the riches of the Empire to increase the dignity of their sea. We see therefore now, how farre the bishop of Rome was at that time by all meanes from the supreme dominion, which he affirmeth to be given unto him by Christ over all the churches, and which he lyingly saith that hee hath in all ages possessed by the consent of the whole world.

11 * I know how many Epistles there be, how many writings and decrees, wherein the bishops doe give much, and boldly chalenge much unto it. But this also all men that have a very litle wit and learning doe know, that the most part of those are so unfavorable, that by the first taste of them a man may soone finde out of what shop they came. For what man of found wit and sober, will thinke that that goodly interpretation is Anactus his owne, which is in Gratian reported under the name of Anactus: that is, that Cephas is a head? The Romanists doe at this day abuse for defence of their sea, many such trifles, which Gratian hath parched together without judgement:

and yet still in so great light they will sell such smokes, wherewith in old time they were wont to mocke out the ignorant in darkenesse. But I will not bestow much labour in confuting those things, which doe openly confute themselves by reason of their unfavōrie follie. I grant that there remaine also true Epistles of the old bishops, wherein they set forth the honour of their see with glorious titles, of which sort are some Epistles of Leo. For that man, as hee was learned and eloquent; so was hee also above measure desirous of glorie and dominion: but whether the Churches then believed his testimonie when hee so advanced himselfe, that indeed is it that is in controversy. But it appeareth that many offended with his ambition, did also withstand his greedy desire. Sometimes hee appointed in his steed the bishop of Tbessalonica throughout Grecia and other countries adjoyning, sometime he appointed the bishop of Orleanz, or some other throughout France. So he appointed Hormisdas bishop of Hispalis to be his vicar in Spain; but every where he excepteth, that he giveth out such appointments upon this condition, that the Metropolitanes may have their ancient priviledges remaining safe and whole. But Leo himselfe declareth, that this is one of their priviledges, that if any doubt happen about any matter, the Metropolitan should first be asked his advise. Therefore those appointments of vicars in his steed were upon this condition, that neither any bishop should be letted in his ordinarie jurisdiction, nor any Metropolitan in being judge of appeales, nor any provincial Councill in ordering of their Churches. What was this else but to abstaine from all jurisdiction: but to intermeddle to the appeasing of discordes, onely so farre as the law and nature of the communion of the Church suffereth?

12 In Gregories time that ancient order was already much changed. For when the Empire was shaken, and torne in peeces, when France and Spaine were afflicted with many overthrowes received, Slavonia wasted, Italy vexed, and Affrica in a manner destroyed with continuall calamities, that in so great a shaking of civill affaires, at least the integritie of Faith might remaine, or yet not utterly perish, all the bishops from each part did the rather joyne themselves to the bishops of Rome. Thereby it came to passe, that not onely the dignitie, but also the power of that Sea greatly increased. Howbeit I doe not so much passe by what meanes it was brought about. Truly it appeareth that it was then greater than in the ages before. And yet it then greatly differed from being an unbrided dominion, that one man might beare rule over other after his owne will. But the Sea of Rome had this reverence; that it might with her authoritie subdue and repress, the lewde and obstinate that could not by the other bishops be kept within their dutie. For Gregorie doth oftentimes diligently testify this, that hee doth no lesse faithfully preserve to other men their rights, than hee requireth his owne of them. Neither doe I (saith he) prick on by ambition, plucke from any man that which is his right: but I desire in all things to honor my brethren. There is no saying in his writings wherein he doth more proudly boast of the largenesse of his Supremacie, than this: I know not what bishop is not subject to the Sea Apostolike when he is found in fault. But he by and by adjoyneth. Where fault requireth, not all according to the order of humilitie are equall. He giveth to himselfe power to correct them that have offended: if all doe their dutie; he maketh himselfe equall with the rest. But he himselfe giveth himselfe this power: and they assented to it that would: and other that liked it not, might freely gaine say it, which it is well knowne that the most part of them did. Beside that hee speaketh there of the Primate of Constantinople: which when he was condemned by the principall Synode, refused the whole judgement. His fellow bishops informed the Emperor of this stubbornnesse of him. The Emperor willed Gregorie to be Judge of the cause. We see therefore that he both attempteth nothing, whereby he may breake the ordinarie jurisdiction, and the same thing that he doth for the helping of other, he doth not but by the Commandement of the Emperour.

13 This therefore was then all the power of the bishop of Rome, to set himselfe against obstinate and untamed heads, when there needed any extraordinarie remedie: and that to helpe and not to hinder other bishops. Therefore he raketh no more to himselfe over all other, than in another place hee granteth to all other over himselfe, when when he confesseth that hee is readie to be corrected of all, to be amended of all. So in another place hee doth indeed command the bishop of Aquileia to come to Rome, to pleade his cause in a controversie of Faith that was risen betweene him and other: but he doth not command him of his owne power, but because the Emperor had so commanded. Neither doth hee give warning that hee alone shall be Judge, but promised that hee will assemble a Synod by whom the whole matter may be judged. But although there was yet such moderation, that the power of the Sea of Rome had her certaine bounds, which it might not passe, and the bishop of Rome himselfe was no more above than under other: yet it appeareth how much Gregorie disliked such state. For hee now and then complaineth, that under colour of bishoprike hee was brought backe to the world: and that he was more entangled with earthly cares, than ever hee had bene while hee was a lay man: that hee was in that honor oppressed with tumult of worldly affaires. In another place: so great burdens (such he) of businesse doe hold me downe, that my minde can nothing at all be raised up to things above. I am shaken with many waves of causes: and after those leasures of rest I am tossed with tempests of troublesome life, so that I may rightly say, I am come into the depth of the sea, and the tempest hath drowned me. Hereby gather, what hee would have said, if he had happened to be in these times. Although hee fulfilled not the office of a Pastor, yet he was doing it. Hee abstained from the government of the civill Empire, and confessed himselfe to be subject to the Emperor as other were. He did not thrust himselfe into the cure of other Churches, but being compelled by necessitie. And yet hee thinketh himselfe to be in a maze, because he cannot apply himselfe altogether onely to the office of a bishop.

14 At that time the Bishop of Constantinople strived with the bishop of Rome for the Supremacie, as it is already said. For after that the seate of the Empire was stablished at Constantinople, the majestie of the Empire seemed to require that that Church also should have the second place of honour after the Church of Rome. And truly at the beginning, nothing more availed to cause the Supremacie to be given to Rome, but because the head of the Empire was there at that time. There is in Gratian's writing under the name of Pope Lucinus, where he saith, that Cities were no otherwise divided; where Metropolitans and Primates ought to sit, than by the reason of the civill government that was before. There is also another under the name of Pope Clement, where he saith, the Patriarches were ordained in those Cities that had had the chiefe Flamines in them. Which, although it be false, yet it is taken out of a truth. For it is certaine, that to the end there should be made as little change as might be, the Provinces were divided according to the state of things that then were: and that Primates & Metropolitans were set in those Cities that excelled the other in honors and power. Therefore in the Councell at Taurinum it was decreed, that those Cities which in the civill government were the chiefe Cities of every Province, should be the chiefe Seas of Bishops. And if it happened the honor of the civill government to be removed from one Citie to another, that then the right of the Metropolitan citie should therewithall bee removed thither. But Innocentius bishop of Rome, when he saw the ancient dignitie of his citie to grow in decay, after that the seate of the Empire was removed to Constantinople, fearing the abacement of his Sea, made a contrarie law: wherein he denieth it to be necessarie that the Ecclesiasticall mother cities should be changed as the Imperiaall mother cities change. But the authoritie of a Synod ought of right to be preferred above one mans sentence. Also we ought to suspect Innocentius himselfe in his owne cause. Howsoever it be, yet by his owne proviso he sheweth, that from the beginning it was so ordered, that the Metropolitan cities should be disposed according to the outward order of the Empire.

15 According to this ancient ordinance, it was decreed in the first Councell at Constantinople, that the bishop of the citie should have the priviledges of honor next after the bishop of Rome, because it was a new Rome. But a long time after, when a like decree was made at Chalcedon, Leo stoutly cryed out against it. And he not onely gave himselfe leave to esteeme as nothing that which sixe hundred bishops or moe had decreed: but also bitterly taunted them, for that they tooke from other Seas that honour which they were so bold to give to the Church of Constantinople. I beseech you, what other thing could move a man to trouble the world for so small a matter, but meere ambition? He sayeth that, that ought to be inviolable, which the Nicene Synod hath once decreed. As though forsooth the Christian faith were endangered, if one Church bee preferred before an other: or as though Patriarchiees were there divided to any other end, but for policies. But we know that policie receiveth, yea requireth divers changes, according to the diversitie of times. Therefore it is fond that Leo pretendeth, that the honour, which by the authoritie of the Nicene Synod was given to the sea of Alexandria, ought not to be given to the sea of Constantinople. For common reason telleth this, that it was such a decree, as might be taken away according to the respect of times. Yea none of the Bishops of the East withstood it, whom that thing most of all concerned. Truly Proterius was present, whom they had made Bishop of Alexandria in the place of Dioscorus. There were present other Patriarches, whose honour was diminished. It was their part to withstand it, not Leo which remained safe in his owne place. But when all they hold their peace, yea assent unto it, and onely the Bishop of Rome resisteth: it is easie to iudge, what mooveth him: that is hee foresaw that which not long after happened, that it would come to passe, that, the glory of old Rome decaying, Constantinople not contented with the second place, would strive with Rome for the Supremacy. And yet with his crying out hee did not so much prevaile, but that the decree of the councill was confirmed. Therefore his successors, when they saw themselves overcome, quietly gave over that stiffnesse: for they suffere that he should be accounted the second patriarch.

The pride of the Bishop of Constantinople, seeking to equal his Bishopricke with the bounds of the Empire constantly resisted by Gregory.
Lib. 7. cpi. 30.

16. But within a little after, Iohn which in Gregories time ruled the Church of Constantinople, brake forth so farre that he called himselfe the universall patriarch. Heere Gregorie, least hee should in a verie good cause faile to defend his owne sea, did constantly set himselfe against him. And truly both the pride and madnesse of Iohn was intollerable, which desired to make the bounds of his Bishopricke equal with the bounds of the Empire. And yet Gregorie doth not claime to himselfe, that which hee denieth to an other: but abhorreth that name as wicked, and ungodly, and abhominable, whosoever take it upon him. Yea and also in one place he is angry with Eulolius Bishop of Alexandria, which had honoured him with such a title. Behold (saith he) in the Preface of the Epistle which ye directed to my selfe that have forbidden it, ye have cared to imprint the word of proud calling, in naming mee universall Pope, which I pray that your Holinesse will no more doe, because that is withdrawne from you, which is given to another more than reason requireth. I count it no honour, wherein I see the honour of my brethren to be diminished. For my honour is the honour of the universall Church, and the sound strength of my brethrea. But if your holinesse call me the universall Pope, it denyeth it selfe to be that which it confesseth me to be wholly. Truly Gregory stood in a good and honest cause. But Iohn holpen by the favour of Maurice the Emperour, could never be removed from his purpose. Cyriacus also his successor never suffered himselfe to be intreated in that behalfe.

The headship of the Church granted by Phocas to the bishop of Rome and the Churches of France by Pipin made subject to his authority.

17. At the last Phocas, which when Maurice was slaine, was set in his place (I wot not for what cause being more friendly to the Romans, but because he was there crowned without strife) granted to Boniface the third, that which Gregory never required, that Rome should bee the head of all Churches. After this manner was the controversie ended. And yet this benefit of the Emperour, could not so much have profited the Sea of Rome, unlesse other things also had afterward happened. For Grecia and all Asia were within a little after cut off from the communion of Rome. France so much revered him, that it obeyed no further than it listed. But it was then first brought into bondage when Pipin usurped the kingdome. For when Zachary Bishop of Rome had bene his helper to the breach of his faith, and to robbery, that thrusting out the lawfull King, he might violently enter upon the kingdome as laid open for a prey: hee received this reward that the sea of Rome should have iurisdiction over the Churches of France: As robbers are wonted in parting to divide the common spoile: so these good men ordered the matter betweene themselves, that Pipin should have the earthly and civill dominion, spoyling the true king: and Zachary should bee made made head of all bishops and have the spirittall power : which, when at the beginning it was weake : (as it is wont to be in new things) was afterward confirmed by the authoritie of Charles. in manner for a like cause. For he was also indebted to the bishop of Rome, for that by his endeavour he had attained to the honour of the Empire. But although it be credible, that churches each where were before that time much deformed, yet it is certaine that the old forme of the Church was then first utterly defaced in France and Germany. There remaine yet in the records of the Court of Paris, briefe notes of these times, which, where they intreat of the matters of the Church, make mention of the covenant both of Pipine and of Charles with the bishop of Rome. Thereby we may gather that then there was an alteration made of the old state.

18 Since that time, when things did each where daily fall from worse to worse, the tyrannie of the sea of Rome was now and then also stablished and increased, and that partly by the ignorance, and partly by the slothfulness of the bishops. For when one man tooke all things upon him, and without measure proceeded more and more to advance himselfe against law and right : the bishops did not with such zeale as they ought, endeavour themselves to restraints his lust, and though they wanted not courage, yet they were destitute of true learning, and knowledge : so that they were nothing fit to attempt so great a matter. Therefore we see what and how monstrous an unholy defiling of all holy things, and a scattering abroad of the whole order of the Church, was in Bernards time. Hee complaineth that there resort by heapes to Rome out of all the world, ambitious men, covetous, Simonians, robbers of God, keepers of concubines, committers of incest, and all such monsters, to obtaine, or retaine ecclesiasticall honors by the Apostolike authoritie : and that fraud and undermining, and violence were growne in force. He saith that that manner of judging which then was used, was abhominable, and unseemely, not onely for the Church, but also for a judiciall contr. Hee crieth out that the Church is full of ambitious men : and that there is that more dreadeth to commit mischievous acts, than robbers doe in their cause, when they divide the spoiles of waifaring men. Few (saith he) doe looke unto the mouth of the Law-giver, but unto his hands. But not without cause. For those hands doe all the Popes businesse. What a thing is this, that they are bought of the spoiles of Churches, that say to thee, oh well done, well done ! The life of the poore is sowne in the streets of the rich : silver glistereth in the mire : men runne to it from all places : nor the poore, but the stranger taketh it up, or hee peradventure that runneth fastest before. But this manner, or rather this death, came not of thee, I would to God it might end in thee. Among these things thou a Pastor goest forward, compassed with much and precious array. If I durst say it, these are rather the Pastors of divels, than of sheepe. Forsooth Peter did thus, Paul plaid thus. Thy court is more accustomed to receive men good, than to make men good. For the ill doe not there profit, but the good doe decay. Now as for the abuses of appeales that hee rehearseth, no godly man can read them without great horror. At the last hee thus concludeth of this unbrideled greedinesse of the Sea of Rome, in the usurping of jurisdiction : I speake the murmur and common complaint of the Churches. They cry out that they be mangled and dismembred. There are either none or few, that doe not either bewaile, or feare this plague. Askest thou what plague ? The Abbots are plucked from the bishops, the bishops from the Archbishops, &c. It is marvellous if this may be excused. In so doing, ye prove that yee have fulnesse of power, but not of righteousnesse. Yee doe this because ye can doe it : but whether ye also ought to doe it, is a question. Ye are set to preserve, not to envie to every man his honour and his owne degree. These few things of many I listed to rehearse, partly that the Readers may see, how fore the Church was then decayed, and partly that they may know in how great sorrow and mourning this calamitie held all the godly.

19 But now, albeit that we graunt to the bishop of Rome at this day the preeminence and largenesse of jurisdiction, which that Sea had in the meane times, as in the times of Leo and of Gregorie : what is that to the present state of the Papacie ? I doe not yet speake of the earthly dominion, nor of the civill power thereof, which we will afterward consider in place fit for it : but the very spirittall government that they boast of,

The state of the Church of Rome in Bernards time.

Li. 1 de cons. ad Evag.

Lib. 3.

The usurped power ecclesiasticall which the Bishop of Rome holdeth and doth exercise at this day.

what hath it like to the state of those times? For they define the Pope none other wise than the Supreme head of the Church in earth, and the universall bishop of the whole world. And the bishops themselves, when they speake of their owne authoritie, doe with great stoutnesse of countenance; pronounce that to them belongeth the power to command, and other are bound to the necessitie to obey, that so all their decrees are to be holden as confirmed with the divine voice of Peter, that the provincial Synods are without force, because they want the presence of the Pope: that they may order clerks of any Church that they will: and may call them to their Sea that have been ordered else where. Innumerable of that sort are in Gravian packe, which I doe not now rehearse, least I should be too tedious to the Readers. But this is the summe of them, that onely the bishop of Rome hath the supreme hearing and determining of all Ecclesiasticall causes, whether it be in judging and defining of doctrines, or in making of lawes, or in stablishing of discipline, or in executing of judgements: It were also long and superfluous to rehearse the priviledges that they take to themselves in reservations, as they call them. But (which is most intollerable of all other) they leave no judgement in earth to restraine and bridle their outragions lust, if they abuse so immeasurable power. It is lawfull for no man (say they) to revoke the judgements of that Sea, because of the Supremacie of the Church of Rome. Againe, The judge shall bee judged neither by the Emperor, nor by Kings, nor by all the Clergie, nor of the people. That is indeed too imperiously done that one man maketh himselfe judge of all men, and suffereth himselfe to obey the judgement of no man. But what if he use tyrannie over the people of God? if he scatter abroad and waste the kingdome of Christ? if hee trouble the whole Church? if he turne the office of Pastor into roberie? Yea though he be never so mischievous, he saith, that hee is not bound to yeeld account. For these be the sayings of the bishops: Gods will was to determine the causes of other men by men, but he hath without question reserved the bishop of this Sea to his owne judgement. Againe, The doings of subjects are judged of us, but ours of God onely.

20 And that such decrees might have the more weight, they have falsely thrust in the names of the old bishops, as though things had beene so ordained from the beginning: whereas it is most certaine, that it is new and lately forged whatsoever the bishop of Rome giveth to himselfe more than wee have rehearsed to be given him by the ancient Councils. Yea, they are come to so great shamelesnesse, that they have set forth a writing under the name of Anastasis Patriarch of Constantinople, wherein he testifieth that it was decreed by the old rulers, that nothing should be done even in the furthest provinces, that were not first moved to the Sea of Rome. Beside this, that it is certaine that is most vaine, what man shall thinke it likely, that such a commendation of the Sea of Rome proceeded from the adversarie and envier of honour and dignitie thereof? But verily it behooved that these Antichrists should be carried on to so great madnesse and blindness, that their lewdnesse might be plaine for all men to see, at least so many as will open their eyes. But the decretall Epistles heaped together by Gregory the ninth, againe the Clementines, and Extravagants of Martin, doe yet more openly and with fuller mouth each where breath forth their outragious fiercenesse, and as it were the tyrannie of barbarous kings. But these be the oracles, by which the Romanists will have their Papacie to be weighed. Hereupon arose those notable principles, which at this day have every where in the Papacie the force of oracles: that the Pope cannot erre: that the Pope is above the Councils: that the Pope is the universall bishop of all bishops, and the supreme head of the Church in earth: I passe over the much absurdur follies, which the foolish Canonists babble in their Schooles, to which yet the Romish divines doe not onely assent, but doe also clap their hands at them, to flatter their idoll.

21 I will not deale with them by extremitie of right. Some other man would against this their so great insolencie set the saying of Cyprian, which hee used among the bishops, at whose Councell he sat as chiefe. None of us calleth himselfe bishop of bishops, or with tyrannous feare compelleth his fellow bishops to necessitie to obey. He would object that, which a little after was decreed at Carthage. That none should bee called Prince, Priest, or chiefe Bishop. Hee would gather many testimonies out of Histories, stories, Canons out of Synods, and many sentences out of the bookes of old writers by which the bishop of Rome should bee brought downe into the fellowship of the rest. But I passe over all these, least I should seeme too precisely to presse them. But least the best Patrones of the Sea of Rome answer me, with what face they dare defend the title of universall bishop, which they see so oft to be condemned with curse by Gregorie. If Gregories testimonie ought to be of force, they doe thereby declare that Antichrist is there bishop, because they make him universall. The name also of head was no more usuall. For thus hee saith in one place : Peter is the chiefe member in the bodie, John; Andrew, and James the heads of particular peoples : yet they all are members of the Church under one head : yea the holie ones before the law, the holie ones under the law, and the holie ones under grace, are set among members, altogether making up the bodie of the Lord : and no man ever willed to have himselfe called universall. But whereas the bishop of Rome taketh upon himselfe the power of commanding, that thing finally agreeth with that which Gregorie saith in another place. For whereas Eulolius bishop of Alexandria, had said that he was commanded by him, he answered in this wise, I pray yee, take away this word of commanding from my hearing. For I know what I am, and what ye be. In place, ye be to me brethren, in manners ye be to me Fathers. Therefore I commanded not, but I cared to tell you those things that I thought profitable. Whereas he so extendeth his iurisdiction without end, he doth therein great and hainous wrong, not onely to the other bishops, but also to all particular Churches, which he so teareth and plucketh in peeces, that he may build his seate of their ruines. But whereas he exempreth himselfe from all judgements, and will so raigne after the manner of Tyrants, that hee accounteth his owne onely lust for law, that verily is so hainous, and so farre from Ecclesiasticall order, that it may in no wise be borne : for it utterly abhorreth not only from all feeling of godlinesse, but also from all humanitie.

Lib. 4. Ep. 92.

Lib. 7. Epi. 28.

22 But that I be not compelled to goe through and examine all things particularly, I doe againe appeale to them, that will at this day be accompted the best and most faithfull Patrones of the Sea of Rome; whether they be not ashamed to defend the present state of the Papacie : which it is certaine to be a hundred times more corrupt, than it was in the time of Gregorie and Bernard : which state yet did then so much displease those holy men. Gregorie each where complaineth, that he is too much diversly drawne away with forraine businesse : that hee is under the colour of bishopricke brought backe to the world : wherein he serveth so many cares of the world as he never remembreth that he served when he was a Lay man : that he is pressed downe with tumult of wordly affaires, that his minde is nothing raised up to things above, that he is shaken with many waves of causes; and tossed with tempests of troublesome life : so that hee may worthily say, I am come into the depth of the sea. Truly among those earthly businesse, hee might yet teach the people with Sermons, privately admonish and correct such as it behoved; order the Church, give counsell to his fellow bishops and exhort them to their dutie : beside these things there remained some time to write : and yet hee lamenteth his calamitie, that hee is drowned in the deepest sea. If the government of that time was a sea : what is to be said of the Papacie at this time ? For what likenesse have they together ? Here bee no preachings, no care of discipline; no zeale to the Churches, no spirituall doing; finally nothing but the world. Yet this maze is praised, as though there could nothing be found more orderly and better framed. But what complaints doth Bernard poure out, what groanes doth he utter, when he looketh upon the faultes of his age : What then would he doe if he beheld this our age of iron, and worse if any be worse than iron ? What obstinate wickednesse is this, not onely stiffely to defend as holy and divine, that which all the holy men have with one mouth condemned : but also to abuse their testimonie to the defence of the Papacie ; which it is certaine that they never knew of ? Howbeit of Bernards time I confesse, that then the corruption of all things was so great, that it was not much unlike our time. But they are without all shame, that fetch any pretence for it, out of that meane age, that is the time of Leo, Gregorie, and such other. For they doe like as if one, should establish the Monarchie of Emperors, would praise the old state of the Empire of Rome : that is, would borrow the praises of libertie, to set forth the honor of Tyrannie.

23 Finally, although all these things were granted them: yet there ariseth offresh a new strife for them, when we denie that there is a Church at Rome, in which such benefits may be resident: when we denie that there is a bishop, which may beare these privileged of dignitie. Admit therefore all those things to be true, (which yet we have already wrong from them) that Peter was by the mouth of Christ appointed head of the universall Church: and that hee left the honor that was given him in the Sea of Rome: that the same was stablished by the authoritie of the ancient Church, and confirmed with long continuance: that the Supreme power hath beene alway by one consent given of all men to the bishop of Rome, that hee hath beene the Judge of all both causes and men, and himselfe subject to the judgement of none: let them have also more, if they will: yet I answer in one word, that none of these things availe, unless there be at Rome a Church and a bishop. This they must needs grant me, that it cannot be the mother of Churches, which is not it selfe a Church: that he cannot be chiefe of bishops, which is not himselfe a bishop. Will they therefore have the See Apostolike at Rome? Then let them shew me a true and lawfull Apostleship. Will they have the chiefe bishop? Then let them shew me a bishop. But what? where will they shew us any face of a Church? They name one indeed, and have it oft in their mouth. Truly the Church is knowne by her certaine marks: and bishoprike is a name of office. I speake not here of the people: but of the government it selfe, which ought continually to shine in the Church. Where is the ministerie in their Church, such as Christs institution requireth? Let us call to remembrance that which hath before beene spoken of the office of Priests and of a bishop. If we shall bring the office of Cardinals to be tried by that rule, wee shall confesse that they are nothing lesse than Priests. As for the chiefe bishop himselfe, I would faine know what one thing at all he hath bishoplike. First it is the principall point in the office of a bishop, to reach the people with the word of God: another and the next point to that is, to minister the Sacraments: the third is to admonish and exhort, yea and to correct them that offend, and to hold the people together in holy discipline. What of these things doth he? yea, what doth he feigne himselfe to doe? Let them tell therefore, by what meane they would have him to be counted a bishop, that doth not with his little finger, no not once so much as in outward shew, touch any part of a bishops office.

In the Bishop of Rome all things contrarie unto that which should be in a Bishop.

24 It is not so of a bishop as it is of a King. For a King although hee doe not execute that which belongeth to a King, doth neverthelesse retainethe the honor and title. But in judging of a bishop, respect is had to Christs commandement, which alway ought to be of force in the Church. Therefore let the Romanists loose me this knot. I denie that there high bishop is the chiefe of bishops, forasmuch as he is no bishop. They must needs prove this last point to be false, if they will have the victorie in the first. But how say they to this, that he not onely hath no proprietie of a bishop, but rather all things contrarie? But here, O God, whereat shall I begin? at his learning, or at his manners? What shall I say, or what shall I leave unsaid? where shall I make an end? This I say: that whereas the world is at this day stuffed with so many perverse and wicked doctrines, full of so many kindes of superstitions, blinded with so many errors, drowned in so great idolatrie: there is none of these any where, that hath not either flowed from thence: or at least beene there confirmed: Neither is there any other cause, why the bishops are carried with so great rage against the doctrine of the Gospell newly springing up againe, why they bend all their strengthes to oppresse it, why they kindle up Kings and Princes to crueltie; but because they see that their whole kingdome decayeth and falleth downe, so soone as the Gospell of Christ cometh in place. Leo was cruell: Clement was bloodie: Paul is a fierce murderer. But nature hath not so much moved them to fight against the truth; as for that this was their onely meane to maintaine their power. Therefore sith they cannot be wise, till they have driven away Christ, they travell in this cause; as if they did fight for their religion and countries, and for their owne lives. What then? Shall that be to us the Sea Apostolike, where wee see nothing but horrible Apostasie? Shall hee be Christs vicar which by persecuting the Gospell with furious enterprises, doth openly professe himselfe himselfe to be Antichrist? Shall he be Peters successor, that rangeth with sword and fire, to destroy all that ever Peter hath builded? Shall he be head of the Church that cutting off, and dismembred the Church from Christ the onely true head thereof, doth in it selfe plucke and teare it in peices, Admit verily that in the old time Rome was the mother of all churches: yet since it hath begun to be the seat of Antichrist, it hath ceased to be that which it was.

25 We seeme to be too much evill speakers and railers, when we call the Bishop of Rome Antichrist. But they that so thinke, doe not understand that they accule Paul of immodesty, after whom we so speake, yea out of whose mouth wee so speake. And lest any man object, that we doe wrongfully wrest against the Bishop of Rome these words of Paul that are spoken to another intent, I will briefly shew, that they cannot be otherwise understood, but of the Papacy. Paul writeth, that Antichrist shall sit in the Temple of God, In another place also the holy Ghost describing his image in the person of Antiochus, sheweth that his kingdome shall consist in haughtinesse of speech, and blasphemings of God. Hereupon wee gather, that it is rather a Tyranny over soules, than over bodies, that it is raised up against the spirituall kingdome of Christ. Then, that it is such, as doth not abolish the name of Christ and the church: but rather should abuse the pretence of Christ, and lurcke under the title of the church, as under a disguised visage. But although all the hereses and sects that have bene from the beginning, belong to the kingdome of Antichrist: yet whereas Paul prophecieth, that there shall come a departing, by this description he signifieth, that that seate of abomination shall then be raised up, when a certaine univerfall departing shall possess the church: howsoever many members of the church here and there continue in the true unity of faith. But where he addeth, that in his time he began in a mystery to set up the worke of iniquity, which he would afterward shew openly: thereby wee understand, that this calamity was neither to be brought in by one man, nor to be ended in one man. Now whereas he doth set out Antichrist by this marke, that hee should plucke away from God his due honour, to take it to himselfe: this is the chiefe token that wee ought to follow in seeking out of Antichrist, specially where such pride proceedeth even to the publike dissipation of the church. Sith therefore it is certaine that the Bishop of Rome hath shamelesly conveyed away to himselfe that which was the chiefe proper thing to God alone and Christ, it is not to be doubted that hee is the captaine and Standard-bearer of the wicked and abominable kingdome.

26 Now let the Romanists goe and object antiquity against us: As if in so great alteration of all things, the honour of the sea might stand where there is no sea. Eusebius telleth, how God, that there might be place for his vengeance, removed the church that was at Hierusalem to Pella. That which we heare to have been once done, might be offer done. Therefore so to binde the honour of supremacy to a place, that he which is indeed the most hatefull enemy of Christ, the highest adversary of the Gospel, the greatest waster and destroyer of the church, the most cruel slaughterman and butcher of the Saints, should never the lesse bee accounted the vicar of Christ, the successor of Peter, the chiefe Bishop of the church, only because he occupieth the Sea that was once the chiefe of all: that verily is too much to bee scorned and foolish. I speake not, how great difference there is betweene the Popes chancery, and a well framed order of the Church. Howbeit this one thing may well take away all doubt of this question. For no man that hath his right wit, will thinke the Bishoppricke enclosed in lead and buls: much lesse in that schole of fraud and deceits, in which things the Popes spirituall government consisteth. Therefore it was very well said by a certaine man, that church of Rome which is boasted of, is long agoe turned into a court, which onely is now seene at Rome. Neither doe I here accule the faults of men: but I shew that the Papacy it selfe is directly contrary to the true order of the church.

27 But if we come to the persons of men, it is well enough knowne what manner of Vicars of Christ we shall finde. Iulius forsooth, and Leo, and Clement, and Paul, shall bee pillars of the christian faith, and the chiefe expositors of religion, which never knew any other thing of Christ, than that which they had learned in Lucians schoole. But why doe I reckon up three or foure Popes? as though it were doubtful, what manner of of forme of religion the Popes with their whole Colledge of Cardinals have since long agoe professed, and at this day doe professe. For first this is the principle article of that secret Divinitie that reigneth among them, That there is no God: the second, That all things that are written and taught concerning Christ, are lies and deceits: the third, That the doctrine of the life to come, and of the last resurrection are meere fables. They doe not all thinke so: and few of them speake so. I grant. But this hath long agoe begun to be the ordinarie religion of Popes. Whereas this is very well knowne to all that know Rome, yet the Romish Divines cease not to boast, that by Christs priviledge it is provided, that the Pope cannot erre, because it was said to Peter: I have praied for thee, that thy faith should not faint. Whar, I pray you, winne they by mocking so shamelesly, but that the whole world may understand, that they are come to that extremities of wickednesse, that they neither feare God, nor stand in awe of men.

The fall of Iohn the xxii.

28 But let us imagine, that the ungodlinesse of those Popes whom I have spoken of, is hidden, because they have neither published it by preaching, nor by writings: but onely have bewraied it at their table, and in their chamber, or at least within walles of houses. But if they will have this priviledge to be of force, which they pretend, they must needs wipe John the xxii. out of the number of Popes, who openly affirmed that soules are mortall, and that they die together with the bodies untill the day of resurrection. And that you may perceive that the whole sea with her principall staves was then wholly fallen, none of all the Cardinals withstood so great a madnesse, but the Schoole of Parise moved the King of France to compell him to recant it. The King forbad his subjects to communicate with him, unlesse he did out of hand repent: and the same, as the manner is, he proclaimed by a Herald. The Pope compelled by this necessitie, abjured his error. This example maketh that I neede not to dispute any more with my adversaries about this that they say, that the sea of Rome and the Bishops thereof, cannot erre in the faith, because it was said to Peter, I have praied for thee, that thy faith may not faint. Truly, hee fell with so foule a kinde of fall from the right faith, that he is a notable example to them that come after, that they are not all Peters which succede after Peter in the Bishoprike. Howbeit this is also of it selfe so childish, that it succederh no answer. For if they will draw to Peters successors whatsoeuer was spoken to Peter, it shall follow that they are all Satans, for as much as the Lord said this also to Peter: Goe behind, thou Satan, because thou art an offence to me. For it shall be as easie for us to turne backe this latter saying against them, as it shall be for them to object the other against us.

Geison which lived then.

Luke 22.32.

The uncleane manners of the Romane Bishops.

29 But I list not to strive with them in playing the foole. Therefore I returne thither from whence I made digression. So to binde the place, and Christ, and the holy Ghost, and the Church together, that whosoever sit in that place, although hee be the Devill, yet he must be judged the Vicar of Christ and the head of the Church, because it was once the seate of Peter: I say this is not onely wicked and slanderous to Christ, but also too great an absurditie, and against common reason. It is alreadie long agoe since the Bishops of Rome are either without all religion, or the greatest enemies of Religion. Therefore they are no more made the Vicars of Christ, by reason of the seate which they occupie, than an Idol, when it is set in the Temple of God, is to be taken for God. Now if their manners be to be judged upon, let the Popes themselves answer for themselves: what one thing at all there is in them, wherein they may be knowne for bishops? First whereas there is such life at Rome, they not onely winking at it, but also as it were with secret countenance allowing it, this is utterly unmeet for bishops, whose dutie is with severitie of discipline to restrain the licentiousnesse of the people. But I will not be so rigorous against them, to charge them with other mens faults. But whereas they themselves, with their owne household, with almost the whole Colledge of Cardinals, with the whole flocke of their Cleargie, are so given forth to all wickednesse, filthinesse, uncleannesse, to all kinds of lewd and mischievous doings; that they resemble rather monsters than men: therein truly they bewray themselves to be nothing lesse than Bishops. And yet they neede not feare least I should further disclose their filthinesse. For both I am wearie to have to doe in so stinking mire, and I must favour chaste eares; and I thinke that I have already enough and more proved that that which I went about : that is, that although Rome had in old time beene the head of Churches, yet at this day she is not worthy to be judged one of the smallest toes of the Churches feete.

30. As concerning the Cardinals, (as they call them) I cannot tell how it is come to passe, that they be so suddenly risen up to so great dignitie. This name in Gregories time belonged to bishops onely. For so oft as hee maketh mention of Cardinals, hee meaneth it not of them of the Church of Rome, but of any other : so that briefly, a Cardinall Priest is nothing else but a Bishop. In the writers before that age I finde not this name at all: But I see that they were then lesse than Bishops, whom they be now farre above. This saying of Augustine is well knowne : Although according to the names of honour, which the use of the Church hath already obtained, Bishoprike is greater than Priesthood, yet in many things Augustine is lesse than Hierome. Here indeed hee maketh difference betwene a Priest of the Church of Rome and other : but he indifferently setteth them all behinde the Bishops. And that was so long observed, that in the Councell of Carthage, when there were present two Legates of the sea of Rome, the one a bishop, the other a Priest, the Priest was thrust backe into the last place. But not to follow too old examples, there remaineth a Councell holden under Gregorie at Rome, at which the Priests sate in the lowest place, and subscribed severally by themselves : as for the Deacons, they had no place at all in subscribing. And truly they had then no office, but to be present and under the bishop at ministring of doctrine and of the Sacraments. Now the case is so changed, that they are become the cousins of Kings and Emperors. And it is no doubt but that they grew up by little and little together with their head, till they were advanced to this high top of dignitie. But this also I thought good to touch shortly by the way that the Readers might the better understand, that the sea of Rome, such as it is at this day, doth much differ from that ancient one, under pretence whereof, it doth now maintaine and defend it selfe. But of what sort soever they were in old time, forasmuch as they have now nothing of the true and lawfull office in the Church, they retainen onely a deceitfull colour and vaine visage : yea forasmuch as they have all things utterly contrarie, it was necessary that that should happen to them, which Gregorie writeth so oft. I say it (saith he) weeping: I give warning of it, groning : that sith the order of Priesthood is fallen within, it shall also not be able to stand long without. But rather it behooved that this should, be fulfilled in them which Malachie saith of such : Yee have gone backe out of the way, and have made many to stumble in the law. Therefore yee have made voide the covenant of Levi, saith the Lord. Therefore behold, I have given you out of estimation, and vile to all the people. Now I leave it to all the godly to thinke of what sort is that supreme height of the Hierarchie of Rome, whereunto the Papists with abhominable shamelesnesse sticke not to make subject the very word of God, which ought to have beene honorable and holy both to heaven, and earth, men and Angels.

THE EIGHT CHAPTER.

Of the power of the Church as touching the articles of faith : and with how unbridled licentiousness, it hath in the Papacie bene wrested to corrupt all pureness of doctrine.

NOW followeth the third place of the power of the Church, which partly consisteth in all the bishops, and partly in the Councels, and those either provincially or generall. I speake onely of the spirituall power, which is proper to the Church. That consisteth either in doctrine, or in jurisdiction, or in making of Lawes. Doctrine hath two parts, the authoritie to teach articles of Doctrine, and the expounding of them. Before that we begin to discourse of every one of these in specialtie, wee will that the godly Readers bee warned, that whatsoever is taught concerning the power of the church, they must remember to apply it to that end, whereunto (as Paul testifieth) it was given : that is, to edification, and not to destruction : which who so lawfully use, they thinke themselves no more than the ministers of Christ, and therewithall the ministers of the people in Christ. Now of the edifying of the Church, this is the onely way, if the Minister himselfe endeavour to preserve to Christ his authoritie, which cannot otherwise be safe unlesse that be lett unto him, which he received of his Father: that is, that hee be the onely Schoolemaster of the Church. For it is written, not of any other but of him alone, Hearc him. The power of the Church therefore is not to be sparingly set forth; but yet to be enclosed within certaine bounds, that it be not drawne higher and thither asker the lust of men. Hereunto it shall be much profitable to note, how it is described of the Prophets and Apostles. For if wee simply grant unto men such power as they list to take upon them; it is plaine to all men, what a slipperie readinesse there is to fall into tyrannie, which ought to be farre from the Church of Christ.

A caution touching things spoken of the Church.

2. Therefore here it must be remembered, that whatsoever authoritie or dignitie the holie Ghost in the Scripture giveth either to the Priests or to the Prophets, or to the Apostles, or to the successors of the Apostles, all that same is given, not properly to the men themselves; but to the ministerie over which they are appointed, or (to speake it more plainely in one word) whereof the ministerie is committed to them. For if wee goe through them all in order, we shall not finde that they had any authoritie to teach or to answer, but in the name and word of the Lord. For when they are called to the office, it is also enjoyned them, that they should bring nothing of themselves, but speake out of the mouth of the Lord. And he himselfe doth not bring them forth to be heard of the people, before that he have given them instructions what they ought to speake, to the intent that they should speake nothing beside his word. Moses himselfe, the prince of all the Prophets, was to be heard above the rest: but hee was first instructed with his cominements, that hee might not declare any thing at all, but from the Lord. Therefore it is said, that the people when they embraced his doctrine, beleevcd in God; and in his servant Moses. Also that the authoritie of the Priests should not grow in contempt, it was stablished with most grievous penalties. But therewithall the Lord sheweth upon what condition they were to be heard, when hee saith, that he hath made his covenant with Levi, that the law of the truth should be in his mouth. And a little after he addeth: The lips of the priest shall keepe knowledge, and they shall require the law at his mouth: because he is the Angell of the God of hosts. Therefore if the priest will be heard, let him shew himselfe the messenger of God: that is, let him faithfully report the commandments that hee received of his author. And where it is specially entreated of the hearing of them, this is expressly set, That they may answer according to the law of God.

3. What manner of power the Prophets generally had, is very well described in Ezekiel: Thou sonne of man (saith the Lord) I have given thee to be a watchman to the house of Israel. Therefore thou shalt heare the word out of my mouth, and thou shalt declare it to them from me. He that is commanded to heare out of the mouth of the Lord, is he not forbidden to invent any thing of himselfe? But what is to declare from the Lord, but so to speake as he may boldly boast, that it is not his owne, but the Lords word that he hath brought? The selfe same thing is in Jeremie, in other words. Let the prophet (saith he) with whom is a dreame, tell a dreame: and let him that hath my word speake my word true. Certainly he appointeth a law to them all. And that is such, that he permitterh not any to teach more than he is commanded. And after he calleth it chaffe, all that is not from himselfe onely. Therefore none of the Prophets themselves opened his mouth, but as the Lord told him the words before. Whereupon these sayings are so oft sound among them: the word of the Lord, the burden of the Lord, so saith the Lord, the mouth of the Lord hath spoken. And worthily. For Esay cried out that hee had defiled lips. Jeremie confessed that he could not speake, because he was a childe: What could proceede from the defiled mouth of the one, and the foolish mouth of the other, but uncleane and unwise, if they had spoken their own speech? But his lips were holie and pure, when they began to be the instruments of the holie Ghost. When the Prophets are bound with this religion, that they deliver nothing, but that which they have received, then they be garished with notable power and excellent titles. For when the Lord testifieth, that hee hath set them over nations and kingdomes, to pluck up and to roote out, to destroy and pluck downe, to build and to plant, he by and by adjoyneth the cause: because he hath put his words in their month.

4 Now if you looke to the Apostles: they are indeed commended with many and notable titles, that they are the light of the world, and the salt of the earth, that they are to be heard in stead of Christ, that whatsoever they bind or loose in earth, shall bee bound or loosed in heaven. But in their very name they shew how much is permitted them in their office: that is, if they be Apostles, that they should not prate whatsoever they list: but should faithfully report his commandements from whom they are sent. And the words of Christ are plaine enough, in which he hath determined their embassage: when he commanded them to go and teach all nations, all those things that he had commanded. Yea, and he himselfe also received this Law, and laid it upon himselfe, that it should be lawfull for no man to refuse it. My doctrine (such he) is not mine, but his that sent mee, my Fathers. Hee that was alway the onely and eternal counsellor of the Father, and he that was appointed by the Father the Lord and school-master of all men, yet because he executed the ministerie of teaching, prescribed by his owne example to all ministers, what rule they ought to follow in teaching. Therefore the power of the Church is not infinite, but subject to the word of the Lord, and as it were enclosed in it.

5 But sith this hath from the beginning beene of force in the Church, and at this day ought to be in force, that the servants of God should teach nothing which they have not learned of him: yet according to the diversitie of times they have divers orders of learning. But that order which is now, much differeth from those that were before. First if it be true which Christ saith, that none hath seene the Father, but the Sonne, and he to whom it hath pleased the Sonne to shew him, it behooved verily that they should be alway directed by the eternal wisdom of the Father, which would come to the knowledge of God. For how should they either have comprehended in minde, or uttered the mysteries of God, but by his teaching to whom alone the secrets of the Father are open? Therefore the holy Fathers in old time knew God no other wise but beholding him in the Sonne as in a glasse. When I say this, I meane that God did never by any other meane disclose himselfe to men but by the Sonne, that is, his onely wisdom, light and truth. Out of this fountaine did Adam, Noe, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the other draw all the knowledge that they had of heavenly doctrine. Out of the same fountaine have also all the Prophets themselves drawne all the heavenly Oracles that they uttered. For verily this wisdom hath alway disclosed it selfe by moe waies than one. To the Patriarches hee used secret revelations: but therewithall to confirme their mindes, hee adjoyneth such signes, that it could not be doubtfull to them, that it was God that spake. The Patriarches conveyed over from hand to hand to posteritie, that which they had received. For the Lord left it with them to this intent, that they should so spread it abroad. But the children and childrens children, by God secretly informing them, did know that that which they heard was from heaven, and not from the earth.

6 But when it pleased God, to raise a more apparant forme of a Church hee willed to have his word put in writing and noted, that the Priests should fetch from thence whart they might deliver to the people, and that all the doctrine that should be taught should be tried by that rule. Therefore after the publishing of the law, when the Priests are commanded to teach out of the mouth of the Lord, the meaning is, that they should teach nothing strange or differing from that kinde of learning, which the Lord comprehended in the law: and to adde and to diminish was unlawfull for them. Then followed the Prophets, by whom indeed the Lord published new Oracles to be added to the law: but yet not so new, but that they came out of the Law, and had respect unto it: For, as touching doctrine, they were onely expofitors of the Law, and added nothing unto it, but Prophecies of things to come. Those excepted, they uttered nothing else but a pure exposition of the Law. Because it pleased the Lord that there should be a plainer and larger doctrine, that weak consciences might be the better satisfied: hee commanded that the Prophecies also should be put in writing, and accounted part of his word. And hereunto were added the histories which are also the works of the Prophets, but made by the enditing of the holy Ghost. I reckon the Psalmes among the Prophecies, because that which we attribute to the Prophecies is also common to the Psalmes. Theretore that whole bodie compacted of the Law, Prophecies, Psalmes and Histories, was the word of the Lord to the old people, by the rule whereof the Priests and Teachers even unto Christs time were bound to examine their doctrine: neither was it lawfull for them to swarve either to the right hand or to the left: because all their office was inclosed within these bounds, that they should answer the people out of the mouth of God. Which is gathered of a notable place of Malachie, where he biddeth them to be mindfull of the law, and to give heede to it, even to the preaching of the Gospell. For thereby hee forbiddeth them all new found doctrines, and granteth them no leave to swarve never so little out of the way which Moses had faithfully shewed them. And this is the reason why David so honorably fettech out the excellencie of the law, and rehearseth so many praises of it: that is, that the Jewes should covet no forren thing without it, sith within it was all perfection inclosed.

7 But when at last the wisdom of God was openly shewed in the flesh, that same wisdom with full mouth declared unto us all that ever can with mans wit bee comprehended, or ought to be thought concerning the heavenly Father. Now therefore, since Christ the Son of righteousnes hath shined, we have a perfect brightnesse of the truth of God, such as the clearnesse is wont to be at mid-day, when the light was before but dim. For verily the Prophet meant not to speake of any meane thing, when he wrote that God in old time spake diversly and many waies to the Fathers by the Prophets: but that in these last daies hee began to speake to us by his beloved Sonne. For he signifieth, yea he openly declareth, that God will not hereafter, as he did before, speake sometime by some, and sometime by other, nor will adde Prophecies to Prophecies, or revelations to revelations: but that he hath so fulfilled all the parts of teaching in the Sonne, that they must have this of him for the last and eternall testimonie. After which sort all this time of the new Testament wherein Christ hath appeared to us with the preaching of his Gospell even to the day of judgement, is expressed by the last houre, the last times, the last daies: to the end verily that conteaured with the perfection of the doctrine of Christ, we should learne neither, to faigne us any new beside it, or receive it faigned of other. Therefore not without cause the Father hath by singular prerogative ordained the Sonne to bee our teacher: commanding him, and not anyman, to be heard. He did indeed in few words set out his schoole-mastership unto us, when he said, Hearre him: but in which there is more weight and force than men commonly thinke. For it is as much in effect, as if leading us away from all doctrines of men, he should bring us to him onely; and command us to looke for all the doctrine of salvation at him alone, to hang upon him alone, to cleave to him alone: finally (as the very words doe found) to hearken to the voice of him alone. And truly what ought there now to be either looked for or desired at the hand of man, when the very word of life hath familiarly and openly disclosed himselfe unto us? Yea but it is meete that the mouthes of all men be shut, after that hee, in whom the heavenly Father willed to have all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom to be hidden, hath once spoken, and so spoken as became both the wisdom of God (which is in no part unperfect) and Messias at whose hand the revelation of all things is hoped for: that is to say, that he left nothing afterward for other to be spoken.

8 Let this therefore be a steadfast principle: that there is to be had no other word of God, whereunto place should be given in the Church, than that which is contained first in the Law and the Prophets, and then in the writings of the Apostles: and that there is no other manner of teaching rightly, but according to the prescription and rule of that word. Hereupon also we gather, that there was no other thing granted to the Apostles, but that which the Prophets had had in old time: that is, that they should expound the old Scripture, and shew that those things that are therein taught are fulfilled in Christ: and yet that they should not doe the same but of the Lord, that is to say, the spirit of Christ going before them, and after a certaine manner enditing words unto them. For Christ limited their embassage with this condition when he commanded them to goe and teach, not such things as they themselves had rashly forged, but all those things that hee had commanded them, and nothing could be more plainly spoken, than that which he saith in another place: but be not ye called masters, for onely one is your master, Christ. Then, to imprint this more deepe-ly in their minde, he repeateth it twice in the same place. And because their rudeness was such, that they could not conceive those things that they had heard and learned of the mouth of their master, therefore the spirit of truth is promised them by whom they should be directed to the true understanding of all things. For that same restraining is to be diligently noted, where this office is assigned to the holy Ghost, to put them in minde of all those things that he before taught them by mouth.

9 Therefore Peter who was vey well taught how much he might lawfully doe, leaveth nothing either to himselfe or other, but to distribute the doctrine delivered of God. Let him that speaketh (saith hee) speake as the words of God, that is to say, not doubtingly, as they are wont to tremble whose owne conscience misgiveth them, but with sure confidence, which becommeth the servant of God furnished with assured instructions. What other thing is this, but to forbid all invention of mans minde, from what head soever they have proceeded, that the pure word of God may be heard and learned in the Church of the faithfull? to take away the ordinances or rather the fained devises of all men, of what degree soever they be, that the decrees of God onely may remaine in force? These bee those spirituall armours, mightie through God to cast downe holds: by which the faithfull servants of God may throw downe counsels, and all height that advanceth it selfe against the knowledge of God, and may lead all knowledge captive to obey Christ. Loe this is the soveraigne power, wherewith it behooveth the Pastors of the Church to be endued, by what name soever they bee called, that is, that by the word of God they may with confidence bee hold to doe all things: may compell all the strength, glorie, wisdom and height of the world to yeeld and obey to his majestie: being upholden by his power, may command, all even from the highest to the lowest: may build up the house of Christ and pull downe the house of Satan: may feede the sheepe and drive away the wolves: may instruct and exhort the willing to learne: may reprove, rebuke and subdue the rebellious and stubborne: may binde and loose: finally may thunder and lighten, if need be: but all things in the word of God. Howbeit there is, as I have said, this difference betweene the Apostles and their successors, that the Apostles were the certayne and authentike secretaries of the holy Ghost, and therefore their writings are to be esteemed for the oracles of God: but the other have none other office, but to teach that which is set forth and written in the holy Scriptures. We determine therefore, that this is not now left to faithfull ministers, that they may coine any new doctrine, but that they ought simply to cleave to the doctrine, wherunto the Lord hath made all men with out exception subject. When I say this, my meaning is not onely to shew what is lawfull for all particular men, but also what is lawfull for the whole universall Church. Now as touching all particular men: Paul verily was ordained by the Lord Apostle to the Corinthians: but he denieth that hee hath dominion over their faith. Who now dare take a dominion upon himselfe, which Paul testifieth that it belonged not to him? If hee had acknowledged himselfe to have this liberie of teaching, that whatsoever the Pastor teacheth he may therein of right require to be beleevd: he would never have taught the Corinthians this discipline, that while two or three Prophets speake, the rest should judge, and if it were revealed to any that fate, the first should hold his peace. For so hee spared none, whose authority he made not subject to the judgement of the word of God. But, will some man say, of the universall church the case is otherwise. I answere that in another place Paul meeteth with this doubt also, where he saith, that faith is by hearing, & hearing by the word of God. Truly, if faith hang of the word of God onely, if it hath respect unto & resteth upon it alone, what place is there now left to the word of the whole world? For herein no man may doubt that hath well knowne what faith is. For Faith ought to bee stayed upon such assurednesse, whereby it may stand invincible against Satan, and all the engines of the hels, and against the whole world. This assurednesse we shall no where finde but in the onely word of God. Again, it is a generall rule which wee heere ought to have respect unto: that God doth therefore take from men the power to set forth a new doctrine, that hee ouely may bee our schoolemaster in heavenly learning, as hee onely is true which can neither lie nor deceive. This rule belongeth no lesse to the whole Church than to every one of the faithfull.

10 But if this power of the Church, which we have spoken of, be compared with that power, whereof the spirituall tyrants, that have falsely called themselves Bishops and Prelates of Religion, have in certaine ages past boasted themselves among the people of God, the agreement shall be no better than Christ hath with Belial. Yet it is not in this place my purpose to declare in what sort and with how wicked meanes they have exercised their tyrannie: I will but rehearse the doctrine, which at this day they defend, first with writings, and then with sword and fire. Because they take it for a thing confessed, that a generall Councell is the true image of the church, when they have taken this principle; they doe without doubt determine, that such Councels are immediately governed of the holy Ghost, and that therefore they cannot erre. But whereas they themselves doe rule the Councels, yea and make them, they doe indeed challenge to themselves whatsoever they affirme to be due to the Councels, Therefore they will have our faith to stand and fall at their will that whatsoever they shall determine on the one side, or the other, may be stablished and certaine to our mindes: so that if they allow any thing we must allow the same without doubting: if they condemne any thing we must also hold it for condemned. In the meane time after their owne lust, and despising the word of God, they coine doctrines, to which after ward they require by this rule to have faith given. For they also say, that he is no Christian, that doth not certainly consent to all their doctrine as well affirmative as negative: if not with expressed yet with unexpressed faith: because it is in the power of the Church to make new articles of the Faith.

11 First let us heare, by what arguments they prove that this authority is given to the church: and then we shall see how much that maketh for them which they alleadge of the church. The church (say they) hath notable promises, that it shall never be forsaken of Christ her spouse, but that it shall be guided by his spirit into all truth. But of the promises which they are wont to alleadge, many are given no lesse to every one of the faithfull particularly, than to the whole church universally. For though the Lord spake to the twelve Apostles, when he said: Behold, I am with you even to the end of the world: Again: I will aske my father, and hee shall give you another comforter, namely the Spirit of truth: yet hee made the promise not only to the whole number of the twelve, but also to every one of them: yea to the other disciples likewise, either those that hee had already received, or those that should afterward be added to them. But when they expound such promises full of singular comfort, as though they were given to none of the Christians, but to the whole church together: what do they else, but take away from all Christians that confidence which they all ought to receive thereby to encourage them? Yet I doe not here denie, but that the whole fellowship of the faithfull furnished with manifold diversitie of gifts, is endued with much larger and more plentifull treasure of the heavenly wisdom, than each one severally: neither is it my meaning, that this is spoken in common to the faithfull, as though they were all alike endued with the spirit of understanding and doctrine: but because it is not to be granted to the adversaries of Christ, that they should for the defence of an evill cause wrest the Scripture to a wrong sense. But, omitting this, I simply confesse that which is true, that the Lord is perpetually present with his, and ruleth them with his Spirit. And that this spirit is not the spirit of error, ignorance, lying or darknesse: but of sure revelation, wisdom, truth, and light, of whom they not deceitfully may learne those things that are given them, that is to say, what is the hope of their calling, and what be the riches of the glorie of the inheritance of God in the Saints. But whereas the faithfull, even they that are endued with more excellent gifts above the rest, doe in this flesh receive onely the first fruits and a certaine taste of that Spirit: there remaineth nothing better to them than knowing their owne weaknesse, to hold themselves carefully within the boundes of the word of God: least, if they wander farre after their owne sense, they by and by stray out of the right way, inasmuch as they be yet voide of that Spirit, by whose only reaching truth is discerned from falshood. For all men doe confesse with Paul, that they have not yet attained

12 But they will take exception, and say that whatsoever is particularly attributed to every one of the holie ones, the same doth throughly and fully belong to the churchic selfe. Although this hath some seeming of truth, yet I denie it to be true. God doth indeed so distribute to every one of the members the gift of his spirit by measure, that the whole body wanteth nothing necessarie, when the gifts are given in common. But the riches of the Church are alway such, that there ever wanteth much of that highest perfection, which our adversaries doe boast of. Yet the Church is not therefore so left destitute in any behalfe, but that the alway hath so much as is enough. For the Lord knoweth what her necessitie requireth. But, to hold her under humility and godly modestie, he giveth her no more than he knoweth to be expedient. I know what here also they are wont to object, that is, that the church is cled with the washing of water in the word of life, that it might be without wrinkle and spot, and that therefore in another place it is called the pillar and stay of truth. But in the first of these two places is rather taught, what Christ dayly worketh in it, than what hee hath already done. For if he daily sanctifieth, purgeth, polisheth, wipeth from spots all them: that be his: truly it is certaine that they are yet besprinkled with some spots and wrinkles, and that there wanteth somewhat of their sanctification. But how vaine and fabulous is it, to judge the Church already in every part holy and spotles, whereof all the members are spotty and very unclean? It is true therefore that the church is sanctified of Christ. But onely the beginning of that sanctifying is heere scene: but the end and full accomplishment shall be, when Christ the holiest of holy ones shall truly and fully fill it with his holinesse. It is true also that the spots and wrinkles of it are wipe away: but so that they be daily in wiping away, untill Christ with his coming doe utterly take away all that remaineth. For unlesse wee grant this, we must of necessity affirme with the Pelagians, that the righteousnesse of the Faithfull is perfect in this life: and with the Catharic and Donatists we must suffer no infirmitie in the Church. The other place, as we have else where scene, hath a sense utterly differing from that which they pretend. For when Paul hath instructed Timothy, and framed him to the true office of a Bishop, he saith that hee did it to this purpose, that hee should know how he ought to behave himselfe in the Church. And that he should with the greater religiousnesse and endeavour bend himselfe thereunto, he addeth that the church is the very pillar and stay of truth. For what else doe these words meane, but that the truth of God is preserved in the church, namely by the ministry of preaching? As in another place hee teacheth, that Christ gave Apostles, Pastors, and Teachers, that wee should no more be carried about with every winde of doctrine, or be mocked of men: but that being enlightened with the true knowledge of the Sonne of God, we should altogether meete in unitie of Faith. Whereas therefore the truth is not extinguished in the world, but remaineth safe, that same cometh to passe because it hath the Church a faithfull keeper of it, by whose helpe and ministry it is sustained. But if his keeping standeth in the Ministry of the Prophets and Apostles, it followeth that it hangeth wholly hereupon, if the word of the Lord be faithfully preserved and doe keepe his purity.

13 But that the readers may better understand, upon what point this question chiefly standeth, I will in few words declare what our adversaries require, and wherein we stand against them. Where they say that the Church cannot erre, it teacheth hereunto, and thus they expound it, that forasmuch as it is governed by the Spirit of God, it may goe safely without the word: that whether soever it goeth, it cannot thinke nor speake any thing but truth: that therefore if it determine any thing without or beside Gods word, the time is no otherwise to be esteemed than as a certaine Oracle of God. If we grant that first point, that the church cannot erre in things necessary to salvation, this is our meaning, that this is therefore because for saking all her owne wisdom, she suffereth herselfe to be taught of the Holy Ghost by the word of God. This therefore is the difference. They set the authority of the church without the word of God, but wee will that it be annexed to the word, and suffer it not to be severed from it. And what marvell is it, if the spouse and scholler of Christ bee subject to her husband and schoolemaster, that she continually and earnestly hangeth of his mouth? For this is the order of a well governed house, that the wife should obey the authoritie of the husband: and this is the rule of a well ordered schoole, that the teaching of the scoolemaster alone should there bee heard. Wherefore let the Church not be wife of her selfe, nor thinke any thing of her selfe: but determine the end of her wisdom where he hath made an end of speaking. After this manner she shall also distrust all the inventions of her owne reason: but in those things wherein it standeth upon the word of God, she shall waver with no distrustfulnesse or doubting, but shall rest with great assurednesse and stedfast constancie. So also trusting upon the largenesse of those promises that she hath, she shall have whereupon abundantly to sustaine her faith: that she may nothing doubt that the best guide of the right way, the holie spirit, is alway present with her: but therewithall she shall keepe in memorie what use the Lord would have us to receive of his holie spirit. The spirit (saith he) which I will send from my father shall lead you into all truth. But how? because (saith he) hee shall put you in mind of all those things that I have told you. Therefore he giveth warning that there is nothing more to be looked for of his spirit, but that he should enlighten our minds to perceive the truth of his doctrine. Therefore Chrysostome saith excellently well. Many (saith he) doe boast of the holie spirit: but they which speake their owne doe falsly pretend that they have him. As Christ testified that hee spake not of himselfe: because he spake out of the law and the Prophets: so if any thing beside the Gospell be thrust in under the title of the spirit, let us not beleve it, because as Christ is the fulfilling of the law and the Prophets: so is the spirit of the Gospell. These be his words. Now it is easie to gather how wrongfully our adversaries doe, which boast of the holy Ghost to no other end but to set forth under his name strange and forraine doctrines from the word of God, whereas he will with unspeakable knot be conjoined with the word of God, and the same doth Christ professe of him when hee promisseth him to his Church. So is it truly. What sobrietie the Lord hath once prescribed to his Church, the same he will have to be perpetually kept. But he hath forbidden her, that she should not adde any thing to his word, nor take any thing from it. This is the inviolable decree of God and of the holy Ghost, which our adversaries goe about to abrogate, when they saigne that the church is ruled of the spirit without the word.

14 Here againe they murmure against us, and say that it behooved that the church should adde some things to the writings of the Apostles, or that they themselves should afterward with lively voyce supply many things which they had not clearly enough taught, namely sith Christ said unto them. I have many things to be said to you, which you cannot now beare, and that these be the ordinances, which without the scripture have beene received onely in use and manner. But what shamelesnesse is this? I grant the disciples were yet rude, and in a manner unapt to learne, when the Lord said this unto them. But were they then also holden with such dulnesse, when they did put their doctrine in writing, that they afterward needed to supply with lively voyce that which they had by fault of ignorance omitted in their writings. But if they were already led by the spirit of truth into all truth when they did set forth their writings: what hindered that they have not therein contained, and left written a perfect knowledge of the doctrine of the Gospell? But go to: let us grant them that which they require. Only let them point out what be those things that it behooved to be revealed without writing. If they dare enterprise that, I will assaile them with Augustines words: that is, When the Lord had said nothing of them, which of us dare say, these they be, or those they be? or if any dare say so, whereby doth hee prove it? But why doe I strive about a superfluous matter? For a very child doth know; that in the writings of the Apostles, which these men doe make in a manner lame and but halfe perfect, there is the fruite of that revelation which the Lord did then promise them.

15 What? say they, did not Christ put out of controversie whatsoever the church teacheth and decreeth, when hee commandeth him to be taken for a heathen man and a Publicane that dare say against her? First in that place is no mention made of doctrine, but onely the authoritie of the censures is established for correcting of vices, that they which have beene admonished or rebuked should not resist her judgement. But omitting this, it is much marvell, that those Iosefs have so little shame, that they care be proud of that place. For what shall they get thereby, but that the consent of the church is never to be despised, which never consenteth but unto the truth of the word of God? The church is to be heard, say they. Who denieth it? forasmuch as it pronounceth nothing but out of the word of the Lord. If they require any more let them know that these words of Christ doe nothing take their part therein. Neither ought I to be thought too much contentions because I stand so earnestly upon this point, That it is not lawfull for the church to make any new doctrine, that is, to teach and deliver for an Oracle any more than that which the Lord hath revealed by his word. For men of sound wit doe see how great a danger there is, if so great authoritie be once granted to men. They see also how wide a window is opened to the mockings and cavillations of the wicked, if we say that that which men have judged is to be taken for an Oracle among Christians. Beside that, Christ speaking according to the consideration of his owne time, giveth this name to the Synagogue, that his Disciples should afterward learne to reverence holie assemblies of the church. So should it come to passe that every citie and village should have equall authoritie in coyning of doctrines.

16 The examples which they use, doe nothing helpe them. They say that the Bapting of Infants, proceeded not so much from the expresse commandement of the Scripture as from the decree of the church. But it were a very miserabell succour, if we were compelled to flee to the bare authoritie of the church for defence of the Bapting of Infants: but it shall in another place sufficiently appeare that it is farre otherwise. Likewise whereas they object that that is no where found in the Scripture, which was pronounced in the Nicene Synod, that the Sonne is consubstantiall with the Father: therein they doe great wrong to the Fathers, as though they had rashly condemned Arius, because hee would not sweare to their words, when he professed all that doctrine which is comprehended in the writings of the Prophets, and Apostles. This word, I grant, is not in the Scripture: but when therein is so oft affirmed, that there is but one God: againe, Christ is so oft called the true and eternal God, one with the Father: what other thing doe the Fathers of the Nicene Councell when they declare that he is of one substance, but simply set out the naturall sense of the Scripture? But Theodorite reporteth that Constantine used this preface in their assemblee, In disputations (saith hee) of Divine matters, there is a prescribed doctrine of the holie Ghost: the Bookes of the Gospels and of the Apostles, with the Oracles of the Prophets; doe fully shew us the meaning of God. Therefore laying away discord, let us take the discussings of questions out of the words of the Spirit. There was at that timenoman that spake against these holy moitions. No man tooke exception, that the church might adde somewhat of her owne: that the Spirit revealed not all things to the Apostles, or at least uttered them not to those that came after: or any such thing. If it be true which our adversaries would have: first, Constantine did evill, that tooke from the Church her authoritie: then, whereas none of the Bishops at that time rose up to defend it, this was not without breach of their Faith? for so they were betrayers of the right of the Church. But sith Theodorite rehearseth that they willingly embraced that which the Emperor said, it is certaine that this new doctrine was then utterly unknowne.

THE NINTH CHAPTER.

Of Councils and of their authoritie.

Now, although I grant them all things concerning the Church: yet they shall thereby not much prevaile for their intent. For whatsoever is said of the Church, the same they by and by give to the Councils, forasmuch as in their opinion those represent the Church. Yea, where they so stiffly contend for the power of the Church, they doe it of no other purpose, but to give all that they can get to the Bishop of Rome and his guard. But ere I beginne to discuss this question, I must needs here make protestation

concerning the estimation of

testation of two things aforehand. First, that where I shall in this point be somewhat rough, it is not because I lesse esteeme the old Councils than I ought to doe. For I reverence them from my heart, and wish them to be had in their due honour with all men. But herein is some meane, that is, that there be nothing withdrawne from Christ. Now this is the right of Christ, to be the head in all Councils, and to have no man fellow with him in this dignitie. But I say that then onely he is the head, when he governeth the whole assembly with his word and spirit. Secondly, whereas I give lesse to Councils than the adversaries require: I doe it not for this cause that I am afraid of the Councils, as though they did make for their side, and were against ours. For as we are abundantly furnished with the word of the Lord to the full proofe of our doctrine, and to the overthrow of the whole Papisitie that wee neede not much to desire any other thing beside it: so if the matter require, the old Councils doe for a great part minister unto us so much as may suffice for both.

2 Now let us speake of the thing it selfe. If it be sought of the Scriptures, what is the authoritie of Councils: there is no plainer promise than in this saying of Christ: Where two or three shall bee gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them. But that doth no lesse belong to every particular assembly than to a generall Council. But the doubt of the question standeth not therein: but because there is a condition added, that God will so onely be in the midst of the Council, if it be gathered together in his name. Therefore although our adversaries doe a thousand times name Councils of Bishops, they shall little prevaile: neither shall they make us to beleve that which they asseme, that is, that they be governed of the holy Ghost, untill they have proved that they are gathered together in the name of Christ. For it is as possible that wicked and evill Bishops may conspire against Christ, as good and honest Bishops may come together in his name. For a very cleare proofe hereof are many decrees that have proceeded from such Councils. But this shall be seene hereafter. Now I doe but answer in one word that Christ promiseth nothing, but to them that are gathered together in his name. Let us therefore define what that is. I denie that they bee gathered together in the name of Christ, which casting away the commandement of God, wherein he forbiddeth any thing to be added to his word, or taken from it, doe decree every thing after their owne will: which being not contented with the Oracles of the Scripture, that is to say the onely rule of perfect wisdom, doe imagine some new thing of their owne head. Surely, such Christ hath not promised that he will be present at all Councils, but hath adjoynd a peculiar marke, whereby to make true and lawfull Councils different from other: it is meeete that wee should not neglect this difference. This is the covenant, which in old time God made with the Leviticall Priests, that they should teach out of his mouth. This he alway required of the Prophets: this law also wee see to have bene laid upon the Apostles. Who so breake this covenant, God doth not vouchsafe, to let them have the honour of priethood, nor any authoritie. Let the adversaries undoe me this knot, if they will make my faith bound to the decrees of men beside the word of God.

3 For whereas they thinke not that that remaineth in the Church unless it bee among the Pastors: and that the church it selfe standeth not, unless it appeare in generall Councils: that is farre from having bene alway true, it the Prophets have left unto us true testimonies of their owne times. There was in the time of Esay a church at Hierusalem, which God had not yet forsaken. But of the Pastors he saith thus: The watchmen are they able to barme. They lie along and sleepe, and love sleepe: and the Pastors themselves know nothing, nor doe understand: and they doe altogether looke backe unto their owne waies. After the same manner Osee saith: The watchman of Ephraim with God, the snare of the fowler, hared in the house of God. Where joyning them with God by way of mockage, he teacheth that their pretence of the Priethood is vaine. The Church also endured unto the time of Heremite. Let us heare what hee saith of the Pastors. From the Prophet even to the Priest, every one followeth lying. Again: The Prophets doe propheticie a lie in my name, when I have not sent them nor commanded them. And least we should be too long in reciting his words, let those things be read that hee hath written in the whole xxiiij. and xl. Chapters. At that time on the other side Ezechiel did no more gently invey against the same men. The conspiracy (saith he) of the Prophets in the mids of hir as a roaring Lion, & that violently takerh his prey. Hir Priests have broken my law, and have defiled my holy things, and have made no difference betweene holy and prophane: and the rest that he adjoyneth to the same effect. Like complaints are every where in the prophets, so that nothing is offer found in them.

4 But perhaps it might be that it was so among the Jewes: but our age is free from to great an evill. I would to God indeed it were so: but the holy Ghost hath given warning that it shall be farre other wise. The words of Peter are plaine. As (saith he) there were in the old people false Prophets, so shall there also be among you false Teachers sily bringing in sects of perdition, see you not how he saith, that there is danger to come, not by men of the common people, but by them that shall boast themselves with the title of Teachers and Pastors? Moreover how often hath it been forespoken by Christ and his Apostles, that there should very great dangers hang over the Church by the Pastors? Yea, Paul plainly sheweth, that Antichrist shall sit in no other place than in the Temple of God. Whereby hee signifieth, that the horrible calamitie of which hee there speaketh, shall come from no where else but from them that shall sit in steed of Pastors in the Church. And in another place hee sheweth, that the beginnings of to great a mischief are even already neere at hand. For when he speaketh to the Bishop of Ephesus, I know (saith he) that after my departure there shall enter into you ravening wolves not sparing the flocke. And they shall be of your owne selves, that shall speake perverse things, to lead away disciples after them. How much corruption might a long course of yeeres bring among Pastors, when they could so far goe out of kind in so small a space of time? And, not to fill much paper with rehearsing them by name: wee are admonished by the examples in a manner, of all ages, that neither the truth is alway nourished in the bosome of the Pastors, nor the safety of the church doth hang upon their state. They ought indeed to have bene the governors and keepers of the peace and safety of the church, for preservation whereof, they are ordained: but it is one thing for a man to performe that which he ought, and another thing to owe that which he performeth not.

5 Yet let no man take these our words in such part, as though I would every where and rashly without any choise diminish the authority of Pastors. I doe but onely admonish that even among Pastors themselves there is a choise to be had, that wee should not immediately thinke them to be Pastors: that are so called. But the Pope withall his flocke of Bishops, upon none other reason, but because they are called Pastors, shaking away the obedience of the word of God, do tumble and tosse all things after their owne lust: and in the meane time they travaile to perswade, that they cannot be destitute of the light of truth, that the spirit of God perpetually abideth in them, that the Church consisteth in them and dieth with them. As though there be now no Judgements of the Lord, whereby he may punish the world at this day with the same kinde of punishment wherewith sometime he tooke vengeance of the unthankfulness of the old people, that is, to strike the pastors with blindness and amazed dulnesse. Neither doe they, most foolish men understand, that they sing the same song, which those in old time did sing, that warred against the word of God. For the enemies of Hieremie did thus prepare themselves against the truth: Come, and wee will imagine imaginations against Hieremie: forasmuch as the law shall not perish from the Priest, nor Counsell from the wise man, nor the word from the Prophet.

6 Hereby it is easie to answer to that other objection concerning generall Councils. It can not be denied but that the Jewes had a true Church in the time of the Prophets. But if there had then bene a generall Council gathered together of the Priests, what manner face of the Church had there appeared? We heare what God saith, not to one or two of them but to the whole order: The Priests shall be astonished, and the Prophets shall bee made afraid. Againe, the law shall perish from the Priest, and counsell from the Elders. Againe, Night shall be to you in steed of a vision, and darkness in steed of prophecying: and the sun shall fall downe upon the prophets and be darkened.

upon these daies &c. Well: if all such had then beene gathered together in one, what Spirit should have governed in that assembly? Of that thing we have a notable example in that Counsell which Achab called together. There were present foure hundred Prophets. But because they were come together of no other minde but to flatter the wicked King: therefore Satan was sent of the Lord to be a lying spirit in the mouth of them all. There, by all their voices the truth was condemned. Michea was condemned for an heretike, stricken and cast in prison: So was done to Hieremy, so to the other Prophets.

Pharisees assembled together against Christ in Ierusalem.
Job. 11. 47.

7 But let one example suffice for all, which is more notable than the rest. In that Counsell which the Bishops and Pharisees gathered at Hierusalem against Christ, what can a man say that there wanted, in so much as pertained to the outward shew? For if there had not then beene a Church at Hierusalem, Christ would never have communi- cate with their sacrifices and other ceremonies. There was made a solemne summoning of them together: the high Bishop sat as chiefe: the whole order of Priests sate by him: yet Christ was there condemned, and his doctrine driven away. This doing is a prooffe that the church was not enclosed in that Counsell. But there is no perill that any such thing should happen to us. Who hath given us assurance thereof? For it is not without fault of sluggishnesse, to be too careles in so great a matter. But where the holy Ghost doth with expresse words prophecy by the mouth of Paul, that there shall come a departing (which cannot come but that the Pastors must be the first that shall forsake God) why are we herein willfully blinde to our owne destruction? Wherefore it is in no wise to be granted, that the Church consisteth in the company of Pastors, for whom the Lord hath no where undertaken that they shall perpetually be good, but hee hath pronounced that they shall sometime be evil. But when he warneth us of the danger, he doth it to this intent to make us the wayer.

How far Coun-cels to be received.

8 What then? wilt thou say: Shall the Councils have no authority in determining? Yes forsooth. For neither doe I here argue that all Councils are to be condemned, or all their actes to be repelled, or (as the saying is) to be defaced with one blot. But (thou wilt say to me) thou bringest them all into subjection, that it may be free for every man to receive or refuse that which the Councils have determined. Not so. But so oft as the decree of any Council is brought forth, I would have it first to be diligently weighed, at what time it was holden, for what cause it was holden, what manner of men were present: and then the very thing that is intreated of, to be examined by the rule of the Scripture: and that in such sort as the determination of the Council may have his force, and be as a forejudged sentence, and yet not hinder the aforesaid examination. I would to God all men did keepe that moderation which Augustine prescribeth in the third booke against Maximinus. For when hee minded briefly to put to silence this heretike contending about the Decrees of Councils: Neither (saith he) ought I to object against thee the Synode of Nice, nor thou against me the Synode of Ariminum, as to the entent to conclude one another by forejudged sentence, neither am I bound by the authority of the one, nor thou of the other. By authorities of Scriptures, not such as are proper to either one, but such as are common to both, let there strive matter with matter, cause with cause, reason with reason. So should it come to passe, that Councils should have the majesty that they ought: but in the meane season the Scripture should be alone in the higher place that there might be nothing that should not be subject to the rule thereof. So these old Synodes, as of Nice, of Constantinople, the first of Ephesus, of Chalcedon, and such other, which were holden for confuting of errors, we willingly embrace and reverence as holy, so much as belongeth to the doctrines of faith: for they containe nothing but the pure and naturall exposition of Scripture, which the holy Fathers with spirituall wisdome applied to the subduing of the enemies of Religion that then rose up. In some of the latter Councils also, we see to appeare a true zeale of godlinesse, and plaine tokens of wit, learning, and wisdome. But as things are wont commonly to grow to worse, wee may see by the later Councils, how much the Church hath now and then degenerate from the purenesse of that golden age. And I doubt not but that in these corrupter ages also, Councils have had some Bishops of the better sort. But in these the same happened which the Senators

themselves complained to be not well done in making of ordnances of the senate of Rome. For while the sentences are numbred, not weighed, it is of necessitie that oftentimes the better part is overcome of the greater. Truly they brought forth many wicked sentences. Neither is it here needfull to gather the speciall examples, either because it should be too long, or because other have done it so diligently, that there cannot much be added.

9 Now, what neede I to rehearse, Councils disagreeing with Councils? And it is no cause that any should murmur against me, and say, that of those Councils that disagree the one is not lawfull. For, how shall we judge that? By this, if I be not deceived, that we shall judge by the Scriptures, that the decrees thereof are not agreeable with true doctrine. For this is the onely certaine law to discern them by. It is now about nine hundred yeeres agoe, since the Synode of Constantinople gathered together under Leo the Emperor, judged that images set up in Churches should be overthrowne, and broken in peeces. A litle afterward, the Council of Nice, which Irene the Emperesse assembled in spite of him, decreed that they should be restored. Whether of these two shall wee acknowledge for a lawfull Council? The latter which gave images a place in Churches, hath prevailed among the people. But Augustine saith that that cannot be done without most present perill of idolatrie. Epiphanius which was before in time, speaketh much more sharply: for hee saith that it is wickednesse and abomination to have images seene in a Church of Christians. Would they that so speake allow that Council, if they were alive at this day? But if both the Historians tell truth, and the very actes be believed, not onely images themselves, but also the whipping of them was there received. But it is evident that such a decree came from Satan. How say you to this, that in depraving and tearing the Scripture, they shew that they made a mocking stocke of it? Which thing I have before sufficiently made open. Howsoever it be, we shall no other wise be able to discern betweene contrary and disagreeing Synodes, which were many, unlesse we trie them all by that balance of all men and Angels, that is, by the word of the Lord. So we embrace the Synode of Chalcedon, refusing the second Synode of Ephesus, because in this latter one the wickednesse of Eutiches was confirmed, which the other former condemned. This thing holy men have judged none other wise but by the scripture: whom we so follow in judging, that the word of God which gave light to them doth also now give light to us. Now let the Romanists goe and boast, as they are wont, that the Holy Ghost is fastned and bound to their Councils.

10 Howbeit there is also somewhat which a man may well thinke to be wanting in those ancient and purer Councils: either because they that then were at them, being otherwise learned and wise men, wholly bent to the businesse then in hand, did not foresee many other things, or for that many things of lighter importance escaped them being busied with weightier and more earnest matters: or for that simply, as being men they might be deceived with unskilfulnesse: or for that they were sometime carried headlong with too much affection. Of this last point (which seemeth the hardest of all) there was a plaine example in the Nicene Synode, the dignitie whereof hath by consent of all men, as it was worthy, bene received with most high reverence. For when the principall article of our faith was there in danger, Arrius the enimie was present in readinesse, with whom they must fight hand to hand, and the chiefe importance lay in the agreement of them that came prepared to fight against the error of Arrius; this notwithstanding, they carelesse of so great dangers, yea, as it were having forgotten gravity, modesty & all humanity, leaving the battell that they had in hand, as if they had come thither of purpose to doe Arrius a pleasure, began to wound themselves with inward dissensions, and to turne against themselves the stile that should have been bent against Arrius. There were heard foule objectings of crimes, there were scattered bookes of accusations, and there would have bene no end made of contentions, untill they had with mutuell wounds one destroyed another, unlesse the Emperour Constantine had prevented it; which professing that the examining of their life was a matter above his knowledge, and chastised such intemperance rather with praise than with rebuking. How many waies is it credible that the other Councils also failed, which followed afterward? Neither doth this matter neede long proofe. For if a man read over the actes of the Councils, hee shall note therein many infirmities: though I speake of nothing more grievous.

The disagreement betweene the Council of Constantinople and Nice, of Chalcedon and Ephesus.

11 And Leo Bishop of Rome sticketh not to charge with ambition and unadvised rashnesse, the Synode of Chalcedon, which yet he confesseth to be found in doctrines. Hee doth indeed not denie that it was a lawfull Synode: but he openly affirmeth, that it might erre. Some man peradventure will thinke me fond, for that I busie my selfe in shewing such errors: for as much as our adversaries doe confesse, that Councils may erre in those things that are not necessary to salvation. But this labour is not yet superfluous. For although because they are compelled, they doe indeed confesse it in word: yet when they thrust unto us the determination of all Councils in every matter whatsoever it be, for an Oracle of the holy Ghost, they do therein require more than they tooke at the beginning. In so doing what doe they affirme, but that Councils cannot erre: or if they erre, yet it is not lawfull for us to see the truth, or not to sooth their errors? And I intend nothing else, but that it may thereby be gathered that the holy Ghost, so governed the godly and holy Synodes, that in the meane time hee suffered somewhat to happen to them by the nature of men, least we should too much trust to men. This is a much better sentence, than that of Gregory Nazianzene that he never saw a good end of any Council. For hee that affirmeth that all without exception ended ill doth not leave them much authority. It is now nothing needfull to make mention severally of provincially Councils: forasmuch as it is easie to judge by the generall, how much authority they ought to have to make new articles of faith and to receive what kinde of doctrine soever it pleaseth them.

12 But our Romanists, when they see that in defence of their cause all helpe of reason doth faile them, doe resort to that extreame and miserable shift: that although the men themselves be blockish in wit and Counsell, and most wicked in minde and will, yet the word of God remaineth, which commandeth to obey Rulers. Is it so? what if I denie that they be Rulers that are such? For they ought to take upon themselves no more than Joshua had, which was both a Prophet of the Lord, and an excellent Pastor. But let us heare with what words he is set by the Lord into his office. Let not (saith he) the volumn of his law depart from thy mouth: but thou shalt studie upon it daies and nights. Thou shalt neither bow to the right hand nor to the left: then shalt thou direct thy way and understand it. They therefore shall be to us spirituall Rulers which shall not bow from the law of the Lord, neither to the one side nor to the other. But if the doctrine of all Pastors whatsoever they be, is to be received without any doubting, to what purpose was it that we should so oft and so earnestly be admonished not to harken to the speech of false Prophets. Heare not (saith he by Hieremy) the words of the Prophets that Prophecie unto you. For they reach you vanitie, and not out of the mouth of the Lord. Againe, Beware you of false Prophets, that come unto you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves. And Jobn should in vaine exhort us, that we should prove the spirits, whether they be of God. From which judgement the very Angels are not exempted, much lesse Satan with all his lies. What is to be said of this laying: if the blinde leade the blinde they shall both fall into the ditch? Doth it not sufficiently declare, that it is of great importance what manner of Prophets be hard, and that not all are rashly to be heard. Wherefore there is no reason that they should make us afraid with their titles, thereby to draw us into partaking of their blindness: forasmuch as we see on the other side, that the Lord had a singular care to fray us away from suffering our selves to be led with other mens error, under what visor of name soever it lurketh. For if the answer of Christ be true, then all blinde guides, whether they be called Fathers of the Church, or Prelates, or Bishops, can doe nothing but draw their partners into the same headlong downefall. Wherefore let no names of Councils, Pastors, Bishops (which may as well be falsely pretended as truly used) hinder us, but that being taught by lessons both of words and examples, we may examine all spirits of all men by the rule of the word of God, that we may prove whether they be of God or no.

13 For as much as wee have proved that there is not given to the Church a power to set up a new doctrine, now let us speake of the power which they attribute unto it in expounding of Scripture. Truly wee doe willingly graunt, that if there happen debate about any doctrine, there is no better, nor surer remedie than if a Synod of true bishops assemble together, where the doctrine in controversie may be discussed. For such a determination, whereunto the Pastors of Churches shall agree in common together, calling upon the spirit of Christ, shall have much greater force, than if every one severally should conceive it at home, and so teach it to the people, or if a few private men should make it. Again, when bishops are gathered in one, they doe the more commodiously take advice in common, what and in what forme they ought to teach, least diversity should breed offence. Thirdly Paul prescribeth this order in discerning of doctrines. For whereas hee giveth to every severall Church a power to discern, hee sheweth what is the order of doing in weightier causes, that is, that the Churches should take upon them a common triall of the matter together. And so doth the very feeling of godliness instruct us, that if any man trouble the Church with an unwonted doctrine, and the matter proceed so far that there be perill of greater dissention, the Churches should first meete together, and examine the question propounded: at last, after inst discussing had, bring forth a determination taken out of the Scriptures, such as may both take away doubting out of the people, and stop the mouths of wicked and greedy men, that they may not bee so hardy to proceed any further: So when Arius was risen, the Nicene Synod was gathered together, which with the authority thereof both did breake the wicked endeavours of the ungodly man, and restored peace to the Churches which hee had vexed, and defended the eternall godhead of Christ, against his blasphemous doctrine. When afterward Eunomius and Macedonius stirred up new troubles, their madnesse was resisted with like remedy by the Synod of Constantinople. In the Conncell at Ephesus the wickednesse of Nestorius was banished. Finally this hath bene from the beginning the ordinary meane in the Church to preserve unities, so oft as satan began to worke any thing. But let us remember, that not in all ages or in all places are found Athanasius, Basilis, Cyrillus, and such defenders of true doctrine whom the Lord then raised up. But let us thinke what hapned at Ephesus in the second Synode, where the heresie of Eutiches prevailed, the man of holy memory Flavianus was banished with certaine other godly men, and many such mischiefs committed: even because Dioscorus a seditious man and of a very naughty nature, was there the chiefe, and nor the spirit of the Lord. But there was not the Church. I grant. For this I determine utterly that the truth doth not therefore die in the Church, although it bee oppressed of one Council: but that the Lord marvellously preserveth it, that it may againe in due time rise up, and get the overhand. But I denie that this is perpetuall, that that is a true and certaine exposition of Scripture which hath bene received by consents of a Council.

14 But the Romanists shoot at another marke, when they teach that the power to expound the Scripture belongeth to the Councils, yea and that without appellation from them. For they abuse this colour, to call it an exposition of the Scripture whatsoever is decreed in the Councils. Of purgatory, of the intercession of Saints, of auricular confession, and such other there cannot bee found one syllable in the Scriptures. But because all these things have bene established by the authoritie of the Church, that is to say (to speake truly) received in opinion and use, therefore every one of them must bee taken for an exposition of Scripture. And not that onely: But if a Council decree any thing, though Scripture cry out against it, yet it shall beare the name of an exposition thereof. Christ commandeth all to drinke of the cup, which hee reacheth in the Supper. The Council of Constance forbid that it should bee given to the lay people, but willed that the Priest onely should drinke of it. That which so directly fighteth against the institution of Christ, they will have to be taken for an exposition of it. Paul calleth the forbidding of marriage, the hypocrisie of devils: And the holy Ghost in another place pronounceth that marriage is in all men holy and honorable. Whereas they have afterward forbidden Priests to marrie, they require to have that taken for the true and naturall exposition of the Scripture, when nothing can bee imagined more against it. If any dare once open his mouth to the contrary, he shall be judged an heretike : because the determination of the Church is without appellation : and to doubt of her exposition, that it is not true, is a heinous offence. Why should I inveigh against so great shamelesnesse? For the very shewing of it is an overcoming of it. As for that which they teach of the power to allow the Scripture, I wittingly passe it over. For in such sort to make the Oracles of God subject to the judgement of men; that they should therefore bee of force because they have pleased men; is a blasphemie unworthie to be rehearsed : and I have before touched the same matter already. Yet I will aske them one thing : If the authoritie of the Scripture bee founded upon the allowance of the Church, what Councils decree will they alleadge of that matter? I thinke they have none. Why then did Arius suffer himselfe to be overcome at Nice with testimonies brought out of the Gospell of John? For after these mens saying; it was free for him to have refused them, for as much as there had no allowance of a generall Councell gone before. They alleadge the old roll, which is called the Canon, which they say to have proceeded from the judgement of the Church. But I aske them againe, in what Councell that Canon was set forth. Here they must needs bee dumbe. Howbeit I desire further to know, what manner of Canon they thinke that was. For I see that the same was not very certainly agreed among the old writers. And if that which Hierom saith ought to bee of force; the bookes of Machabees, Tobie, Ecclesiasticus and such other shall bee thrust among the Apochrypha; which those Canons doe in no wise suffer to be done.

Math. 23. 6.

NOW followeth the second part, which they will have to consist in making of Lawes, out of which spring have flowed innumerable traditions of men, even so many snares to strangle poore soules. For they have had no more conscience, than had the Scribes and Pharisees to lay burdeus upon other mens shoulders, which they themselves would not touch with one finger. I have in another place taught how cruell a butcherie is that which they command concerning artificiall confession. In other lawes there appeareth not so great violence : but those which seeme the most tolerable of all, doe tyrannously oppresse consciences. I leave unspoken how they corrupt the worship of God, and doe spoile God himselfe of his right, which is the onely Law-maker. This power is now to be intreated of, whether the Church may binde consciences with her lawes. In which discourse the order of policie is not touched, but this onely is intended, that God be rightly worshipped according to the rule which himselfe hath prescribed, and that the spirituall libertie, which hath regard unto God, may remaine safe unto us. Use hath made that all those decrees be called traditions of men, whatsoever they bee that have concerning the worshipping of God proceeded from men beside his word. Against these doe we strive, not against the holy and profitable ordinances of the Church which make for the preservation either of discipline, or honestie, or peace. But the end of our striving is, that the immeasurable and barbarous Empire may be restrained, which they usurpe upon soules, that would be counted Pastors of the Church, but in very deed are most cruell butchers. For they say that the lawes which they make are spirituall; and pertaining to the soule, and they affirme them to be necessarie to eternall life. But so (as I have even now touched) the kingdome of Christ is invaded, so the libertie by him given to the consciences of the faithful is utterly oppressed and throwne downe. I speake not now with how great ungodlinesse they stablish the observing of their lawes, while out of it they teach men to seeke both forgiveness of sins, and righteousnes and salvation, while they set in it the whole summe of religion and godlines. This one thing I earnestly hold that there ought no necessitie to bee laid upon consciences in those things wherein they are made free by Christ, and unlesse they be made free, as we have before taught, they cannot rest with God. They must acknowledge one onely king Christ their deliverer, and bee governed by one law of libertie, even the holy word of the Gospell, if they they will (still keepe the grace which they have once obtained in Christ : they must bee bolden with no bondage, and bound with no bonds.

2 These Sokms doe indeede saine that their constitutions are lawes of libertie, a sweete yoke, a light burden : but who cannot see that they be meere lies? They themselves indeede doe feele no heavinesse of their owne lawes, which casting away the feare of God, doe carelesly and stoutly neglect both their owne and Gods lawes. But they that are touched with any care of their salvation, are farre from thinking themselves free so long as they be entangled with these snares. We see with how great warinesse Paul did deale in this behalfe, that he durst not so much as in any one thing lay upon men any snare at all, and that not without cause. Truly hee foresaw with how great a wound consciences would be stricken, if they should be charged with a necessity of those things whereof the Lord had left them libertie. On the other side the constitutions are almost innumerable, which these men have most grievously stablished with threatning of eternall death, which they most severely require as necessary to salvation. And among those there are many most hard to bee kept, but all of them (if the whole multitude of them bee laid together) are impossible : so great is the heape. How then shall it bee possible, that they upon whom so great a weight of difficultie lieth, should not be vexed in perplexitie with extreme anguish and terrour? Therefore my purpose is here to impute such constitutions, as tend to this end, inwardly to bind soules before God, and charge them with a religion, as though they taught them of things necessarie to salvation.

3 This question doth therefore incumber the most part of men, because they doe not sublely enough put difference betweene the outward court (as they call it) and the court of conscience. Moreoyer this increaseth the difficultie, that Paul teacheth that the magistrate ought to bee obeyed not onely for feare of punishment, but for conscience sake. Whereupon followeth, that consciences are also bound with the politike lawes. But if it were so, then all should fall that wee have spoken in the last Chapter, and intend now to speake concerning the spirituall government. For the loosing of this knot, first it is good to learne what is conscience. The definiuion is to be gathered of the proper derivation of the word. For as when men doe with minde and understanding conceive the knowledge of things, they are thereby said scire, to know, whereupon is derived the name of conscience Knowledge : so when they have a feeling of Gods judgements as a witness, adjoynt with them which doth not suffer them to hide their finnes, but that they be brought accused to the judgement seat of God, that same feeling is called conscience. For it is a certaine meane betweene God and man : because it suffereth not man to suppress that which hee knoweth, but pursueth him so farre till it bring him to guiltinesse. This is it that Paul meaneth when he teacheth that conscience doth together witness with men, when their thoughts doe accuse or acquite them in the judgement of God. A simple knowledge might remaine in man as inclosed. Therefore this feeling which presenteth man to the judgement of GOD, is as it were a keeper joynt to man, to marke and watch all his secrets, that nothing should remaine buried in darkenesse. Whereupon also cometh that old proverbe, conscience is a thousand witnesses. For the same reason also Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience, for quietnesse of minde, when wee being perswaded of the grace of Christ, doe without feare, present our selves to God. And the authour of the Epistle to the Hebrewes useth these words, to have no more conscience of sinne, in steed of, to be delivered or acquitted, that sinne may no more accuse us.

4 Therefore as workes have respect to men, so the conscience is referred to God : so that conscience is nothing else but the inward purenesse of the heart. In which sense Paul writeth that charitie is the fulfilling of the law, out of a pure conscience, and faith not fained. Afterward also in the same Chapter hee sheweth how much it differeth from understanding, saying that some had suffered shipwrack from the faith, because they had forsaken a good conscience. For in these words he signifieth, that it is a lively affection to worship God, and a sincere desire to live godly & holily. Sometime indeede it is referred also to men, as in Luke, when the same Paul testifieth, that hee indeuoured himselfe that hee might walke with a good conscience toward God and men. But this was therefore said, because the fruites of good conscience doe flow and come even to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God onely, as I have already said. Hereupon cometh that a law is said to binde conscience, which simply bindeth a man, without regard of men, or not having any consideration of them. As for example, God commaunded not onely to keepe the minde chaste and pure from all lusts, but also forbiddeth all manner of filthinesse of words and outward wantonnesse whatsoever it be. To the keeping of this law my conscience is subject, although there lived not one man in the world. So hee that behaveth himselfe intemperately, doth not onely sinne in this that he giveth evill example to his brethren, but he hath his conscience bound with guiltinesse before God. In things that are of themselves meane, there is another consideration. For wee ought to abstaine from them, if they breed any offence: but the conscience still being free. So Paul speaketh of flesh consecrate to idols. If any (saith hee) make doubt, touch it not, for consciences sake. I say for conscience, not thine own, but the others. A faithfull man should sinne, which being first warned, should neverthelesse eate of such flesh. But howsoever in respect of his brother, it bee necessarie for him to abstaine, as it is prescribed of God, yet he ceaseth not to keepe still the libertie of conscience. Wee see how this law binding the outward worke, leaveth the conscience unbound.

1 Cor. 10. 28.

How men for conscience sake are bound to
of men.

Now let us returne to the lawes of men. If they be made to this end, to charge us with a religion, as though the observing of them were of it selfe necessarie, then we say that that is laid upon conscience which was not lawfull to be laid upon it. For our consciences have not to doe with men, but with God onely: whereunto pertaineth that common difference betweene the earthly court and the court of conscience. When the whole world was wrapped in a most thicke mist of ignorance, yet this small sparkle of light remained, that they acknowledged a mans conscience to be above all judgements of men. Howbeit the same thing that they did with one word confesse, they did afterward indeed overthrow: yet it was Gods will that there should then also remaine some testimonie of Christian libertie, which might deliver consciences from the tyrannie of men. But that difficultie is not yet dissolved, which ariseth out of the words of Paul. For if we must obey Princes not onely for penalties sake, but also for conscience, it seemeth thereupon to follow that Princes lawes have also dominion over conscience. If this be true, then the same also ought to bee said of the lawes of the Church: I answer, that first heere wee must put a difference betweene the generallie and specialtie. For though all speciall lawes do not touch the conscience, yet wee are bound by the generall commandement of God, which commendeth unto us the authoritie of Magistrates. And upon this point standeth the disputation of Paul, that Magistrates are to bee honored because they are ordained of God. In the meane time hee teacheth not that those lawes that are prescribed by them, doe belong to the inward government of the soule: whereas he each where extolleth both the worshipping of God, and the spirituall rule of living righteously; above all the ordinances of men whatsoever they be. Another thing also is worthe to be noted, (which yet hangeth upon the former) that the lawes of men, whether they be made by the magistrate or by the Church, although they bee necessarie to be kept, (I speake of the good and righteous lawes) yet therefore doe not by themselves binde conscience, because the whole necessitie of keeping them is referred to the generall end; but consisteth not in the things commanded. From this sort doe farre differ both those that prescribe a new forme of the worshipping of God, and those that appoint necessitie in things that be at libertie.

But such are those that at this day bee called Ecclesiasticall constitutions in the Papacie, which are thrust in, in steede of the true and necessarie worshipping of God. And as they bee innumerable: so are there infinite bonds to catch and snare soules. But although in the declaration of the law we have somewhat touched them: yet because this place was fitter to intreate fully of them, I will now travell to gather together the whole summe in the best order that I can. And because wee have already discoursed so much as seemed to be sufficient, concerning the tyrannie which the false Bishops doe take upon themselves, in libertie to teach whatsoever they list. I will now omit all that part: and I will here tarrie onely upon declaring the power, which they say they have, to make lawes. Our false Bishops therefore doe burden consciences with new lawes, under this pretence, that they are ordained of the Lord spirituall law-makers, since the government of the Church is committed unto them. Therefore they affirme that whatsoever they command and prescribe, ought necessarily to be observed of the Christian people: and that hee that breaketh it, is guiltie of double disobedience, for that hee is rebellious both to God and to the Church. Certainly, if they were true Bishops, I would in this behalfe grant to them some authority, not so much as they require, but so much as is requisite to the well ordering of the policie of the Church. Now sith they are nothing lesse than that which they would bee accounted, they cannot take any thing to them, be it never so little, but that they shall take too much. But because this hath bene elsewhere considered, let us grant them at this present, that whatsoever power true Bishops have, the same rightly belongeth to them also: yet I denie that they be therefore appointed law-makers over the faithfull, that may of themselves prescribe a rule to live by, or compell to their ordinances the people committed unto them. When I say this, I meane, that it is not lawfull for them, to deliver to the Church to be observed of necessitie, that which they have devised of themselves without the word of God. For as much as that authoritie both was unknowne to the Apostles, & so oft taken away from the ministers of the church by the Lords owne mouth: I marvell who have bene so bold to take it upon them, and at this day are so bold to defend it, beside the example of the Apostles, and against the manifest prohibition of God.

7 As touching that, that pertaineth to the perfect rule of well living, the Lord hath contained all that in his law, that he hath left nothing for men that they might adde to that summe. And this he did sith for this purpose, that because the whole uprightnesse of living standeth in this point, if all workes be governed by his will as by a rule, hee should be holden of us the onely matter and director of life: then, to declare that he requireth of us nothing more than obedience. For this reason James saith: he that judgeth his brother judgeth the law: he that judgeth the law, is not an observer of the law, but a judge. But there is one onely law-maker, that can both save and destroy. We heare that God doth claime this one thing as proper to himselfe, to rule us with the government and lawes of his word. And the same thing was spoken before of Esay, although somewhat more darkly: the Lord is our King, the Lord is our Law-maker, the Lord is our judge, he shall save us. Truly in both these places is shewed, that he that hath power over the soule, hath the judgement of life and death. Yea James pronounceth this plainly: Now, no man can take that upon him, Therefore God must be acknowledged to be the onely king of soules, to whom alone belongeth the power to save and destroy, as those words of Esay expresse, and to be the king, and judge, and law-maker and Saviour. Therefore Peter, when he admonisheth the Pastors of their dutie, exhorteth them so to feede the flocke, not as using a Lordship over the Clergie, by which word Clergie hee signifieth the inheritance of God, that is to say, the faithfull people. That if we rightly weigh, that it is not lawfull, that that should be transferred to man, which God maketh his owne onely: wee shall understand that so all the power is cut off whatsoever it bee, that they challenge, which advance themselves to command any thing in the Church without the word of God.

8 Now, for as much as the whole cause hangeth thereupon, that if God bee the onely law-maker, it is not lawfull for men to take that honour to themselves: it is meete also therewithall to keepe in minde those two reasons which we have spoken, why the Lord claimeth that to himselfe alone. The first is that his will may be to us a perfect rule of all righteoufnesse and holinesse: and that so in the knowing of him may bee the perfect knowledge to live well. The other is, that (when the manner is sought how to worship him rightly and well) he onely may have authoritie over our soules, whom we ought to obey, and upon whose becke we ought to hang. These two reasons being well marked, it shall be easie to judge, what ordinances of men are contrarie to the word of God. Of that sort be all those which are fained to belong to the true worshipping of God, and to the observing whereof consciences are bound, as though they were necessary to be observed. Let us therefore remember that all lawes of men ought to be weighed with this balancé, if wee will have a sure trial that may never suffer us to erre. The first of these reasons Paul in the Epistle to the Colossians useth in contending against the false Apostles that attempted to oppresse the churches with new burthens. The second reason hee more useth with the Galathians in the like case. This therefore hee travelleth to prove in the Epistle to the Colossians, that the doctrine concerning the true worshipping of God is not to be sought at mens hands: because the Lord hath faithfully, and fully instructed us how he ought to be worshipped. To prove the same in the first Chapter, hee saith that in the Gospell is contained all wisdome, whereby the man of God may be made perfect in Christ. In the beginning of the second Chapter he saith, that all the treasures of wisdome and understanding are hidden in Christ. Thereupon hee afterward concludeth, let the faithfull beware that they be not by vaine Philosophie led from the flocke of Christ, according to the constitutions of men. But in the end of the Chapter, hee doth yet with greater boldnesse condemne all Eshelohieskias, that is to say, all fained worshippings, which men devise to themselves, or receive of other, and whatsoever precepts they dare of themselves give concerning the worshipping of God. Wee have therefore, that all those ordinances are wicked, in observing whereof the worshipping of God is fained to be. As for the places in the Galathians wherewith hee earnestly affirmeth that consciences, which ought to be ruled of God only, ought not to be intangled with snares, they are open enough, specially in the fifth Chapter. Therefore let it be sufficient to have but noted them.

The cause why the Ecclesiasticall constitutions of the Pope as well concerning ceremonies as discipline are impugned.

Gal. 5. 1.

9 But because the whole matter shall better be made open by examples, before that wee goe any further, it is good also to apply this doctrine to our owne times. We say that the constitutions which they call Ecclesiasticall, wherewith the Pope and his doe burden the Church; are pernicious and wicked: our adversaries defend that they be holy and available to salvation. There be two kinds of them: for some concerne Ceremonies and rites, other some pertaine more to discipline. Is there then a just cause to move us to impugne them both? Truly a juster than we would. First doe not the authors themselves cleerly define, that the very worshipping of God is contained in them? To what purpose doe they apply their ceremonies, but that God should be worshipped by them? And that commeth to passe not by the only error of the ignorant multitude, but by their allowancé that have the place of teaching. I doe not touch the grosse abominations, wherewith they have gone about to overthrow all godlinesse. But it should not be imagined among them to be so hainous an offence, to have failed in any of the least perty traditions; unlesse they did make the worshipping of God subject to their fained devises. What doe we then offend, if at this day we cannot beare that which Paul taught to be intollerable, that the lawfull order of the worshipping of God should be reduced to the will of men: specially when they command men to worship according to the elements of the world, which Paul testifieth to be against Christ? Again, it is not unknowne, with how precise necessitie they bind consciences to keepe whatsoever they command. Here when we crie out to the contrarie, we have all one cause with Paul, which in no wise suffereth faithfull consciences to be brought into bondage of men.

A lesse fault in the Papacie to transgresse the law of God than to misse in the keeping of humane constitutions.

10 Moreover this work of all is added, that when religion hath once begun to be defiled with such vaine inventions, there ever followeth after that pervernesse, another abominable frowardnesse, whereof Christ reproched the Pharisees that the commandement of God is made voide for the traditions of men. I will not use mine own words in fighting against our law-makers at these daies. Let them have the victorie, if they can by any meane purge themselves from this accusation of Christ. But how should they excuse them, when among them it is thought infinitely more hainous, to have omitted auricular confession when the time of yeere cometh about, than to have continued a most wicked life a whole yeere together? to have infected their tongue with a little tasting of flesh on a Friday, than to have defiled their body with whoredome all the daies of the weeke? to have put their hand to an honest work upon upon a day consecrate to I wor. not what petty Saints, than to have continually exercised their members in most wicked offences? for a Priest to be coupled with one lawfull marriage, than to be entangled with a thousand adulteries? not to have performed a vowed pilgrimage, than to breake faith in all promises? not to have waited somewhat upon monstrous and no lesse superfluous, and unprofitable excessive gorgeousnesse of Temples, than to have failed to helpe the extreme necessities of the poore? to have passed by an Idoll without honour, than to have despitfully intreated all kinds of men? not to have mumbled up at certaine howres a great number of words without understanding, than never to have conceived a true prayer in their heart? What is to make void the commandement of God for the traditions of men, if this bee not: when commending the keeping of Gods commandements, but coldly and as it werelighly by the way, they doe no lesse earnestly and busily exact the obeying of their owne, than if they contained in them the whole pith of godlinesse? when revenging the transgressing of Gods law, with light penalties of satisfactions, they punish the very least offence of one of their owne decrees with no lesse paine than with prisonment, banishment, fire or sword? Being not so sharpe and hard to entreat against the despisers of God, they persecute the despisers of themselves with unappeasable hatred to the extremitie, and doe so instruct all those, whose simplicity they hold captive, that they would with more contented mind see the whole law of God overthrowne, then one small tittle (as they call it) in the commandements of the Church to bee broken. First in this point is grievous offence committed, that for small matters, and such as (if it should be tried by Gods judgement) are at liberty, one man despiseth, judgeth and casteth away another. But now as though that were not evil enough, those trifling elements of the world (as Paul calleth them in writing to the Galathians) are weighed of more value than the oracles of God: And hee that is in a manner acquitted in adulterie, is judged in meat: hee that hath leave to use a harlot, is forbidden to have a wife. This profit verily is gotten by that transgressing obedience, which is so much turned from God as it declineth to men.

11 There bee also other two not slender faults, which wee disallow in the same ordinances. First, because they prescribe for the most part unprofitable, and sometime also fond observations: then, because godly consciences are oppressed with the infinite multitude of them; and being rowled backe into a certaine Jewishnesse, they so cleave to shadowes, that they cannot attaine to Christ. Whereas I call them fond and unprofitable, I know that that will not seeme credible to the wisdom of the flesh, which so well liketh them, that it thinketh the Church to be utterly deformed when they be taken away. But this is it, that Paul writeth of, to have a resemblance of wisdom in counterfet worshipping, in humility, and in this: that they thinke that with their sharpnesse they bee able to tame their flesh. This is truly a most wholesome admonition, such as ought never to slip away from us. Mens traditions (saith he) doe deceive under the shew of wisdom, whence have they this colour? because they are fained of men: therefore the wit of man doth therein acknow his owne, and acknowledging it doth more; gladly embrace it, than any thing were it never so good, that lesse agreed with his vanity. Again they have hereby another commendation, because they seeme to be fit introductions to humility, for that with their yoke they hold the minds of men pressed downe to the ground. Last of all, because they seeme to tend to this end to restraine the daintinesse of the flesh, and to subdne it with rigor of abstinence, therefore they are thought to be wisely devised. But what saith Paul to these things? doth he not shake off those visors: lest the simple should be deceived with false pretense? Because hee judged this enough for confutation of them, that hee had said that they were the inventions of men, he passeth over all these things without confutation, as though hee esteemed them for nothing: Yea, because hee knew that all fained worshippings in the Church were condemned, and are so much more suspicious to the faithfull as they more delight the wit of man: because he knew that the fained image of outward humility doth so much differ from true humility, as it might easily be discerned: finally because hee knew that that childish introduction was no more esteemed than an exercise of the body: therefore hee willed that the very same things should be to the faithfull in stead

Gal. 3.

Humane ordinances though unprofitable in respect of their quality, and for their number varden some, yet embraced by man because they are most agreeable to his vanity, because they seeme introductions to humility, and because they make a shew of restraining fleshly daintinesse.

Col. 2. 3.

12 So at this day not onely the unlearned common people, but every man as hee is most puffed up with worldly wisdom, so is hee most marvellously delighted with beholding of ceremonies. But hypocrites and foolish women thinke that there can be nothing devised more glorious nor better. But they which doe more deeply search, and more truly weigh according to the rule of godlinesse, of what value so many and such ceremonies are, doe understand first that they are trifles, because they have no profit: then, that they are deceits, because they doe with vaine pompe beguile the eyes of the beholders. I speake of those ceremonies, under which the Romish masters will that there be great mysteries: but wee find them by experience to be nothing else but meere mockeries. And it is no marvell that the Authors of them have fallen so far as to mocke both themselves and other with trifling follies: because they partly tooke their examplar out of the dotages of the Gentiles, and partly after the manner of apes did undiscreefly counterfet the old usages of the law of Moses, which no more pertained to us than the sacrifices of beasts and such other things. Truly although there were none other argument, yet no man that hath his sound wit will looke for any goodnes of a heape so ill patched together. And the thing it selfe plainly sheweth that many ceremonies have no other use but to amaze the people rather than to teach them. So in these new found Canons, that doe rather pervert than preserve discipline, the hypocrites repose great importance: but if a man doe better looke into them hee shall find that they are nothing else but a shadowish and vanishing shew of discipline.

13 But now (to come to the other point) who doth not see that traditions with heaping one upon another, are overgrown into so great a number, that the Christian Church may in no wise beare them. Hereby it is come to passe, that in ceremonies there appeareth I wot not what Iewishnesse, and the other observations bring a grievous butchery to Christian soules. Augustine complained that in his time, the commandements of God neglected, all things were full of so many presumptions, that hee was more grievously rebuked that in his Oratives had touched the ground with bare foot, than hee that had buried his wit with drunkennesse. Hee complaineth that the Church, which the mercy of God willed to be free, was so burdened, that the state of the Iewes was much more tolerable. If that holy man had hapned to live in our age; with what complaints would hee have bewailed the bondage that now is? For both the number is ten times greater, and every small tittle is a hundred times more rigorously looked unto, than at that time. So is wont to be done: when these perverse law-makers have gotten the dominion, they make no end of bidding and forbidding, till they come to extreme peevishnesse. Which thing Paul hath also very well declared in these words: If ye be dead to the world, why are ye holden as though ye were living with traditions, as eat not, tast not, handle not? For whereas the Greek word apostasia, signifieth both to eat and to touch, doubles in this place it is taken in the first of these two significations, least there should be a superfluous repetition. Therefore hee doth here excellently well describe the proceedings of the false Apostles. They begin at superstition, so that they doe not onely forbid to eat, but also even slenderly to chaw: when they have obtained this, they then also forbid to tast. When this is also granted them, they reckon it not lawfull so much as to touch with a finger.

14 This tyranny in the ordinances of men we doe at this day worthily blame, by which it is come to passe that poore consciences are marvellously tormented with innumerable decrees and immeasurable exacting of keeping of them. Of Canons pertaining to discipline wee have spoken in another place. Of the ceremonies what shall I say, by which it is brought about that Christ being halfe buried, we are turned to Iewish figures? Our Lord Christ (saith Augustine) hath bound together the fellowship of the new people, with Sacraments very few in number, most excellent in signification, most easie in observing. How far the multitude and diversitie of usages wherewith at this day wee see the Church to be intangled, doth differ from this simplicitie, it cannot be sufficiently declared. I know with what crafty thife some subtle men doe excuse this perversnesse. They say that among us there are many as rude as they were in the people

ple of Israell : that such introduction was ordained for their sakes, which although the stronger may well want, yet they ought not to neglect it, for as much as they see it to be profitable for the weak brethren. In answer, that we are not ignorant, what we owe to the weaknesse of our brethren : but on the other side we take exception and say, that this is not the way whereby the weak may be provided for, that they should be overwhelmed with great heapes of ceremonies. The Lord did not in vaine put this difference betweene us and the old people, that his will was to instruct them like children with signes and figures, but us more simply without such outward furniture. As (saith Paul) a child is ruled of his schoolemaster, and kept under custody, according to the capacity of his age : so the Jewes are kept under the law. But wee are like unto full grown men, which being set at liberty from tutorage and government, have no more need of childish introductions. Truly the Lord did foresee what manner of common people there should be in his Church, and how they should be ruled. Yet he did in this manner as wee have said, make difference betweene us and the Jewes. Therefore it is a foolish way, if we will provide for the ignorant, in raising up Jewishnesse which is abrogate by Christ : Christ also touched in his owne words this difference of the old and new people, when hee said to the woman of Samaria, that the time was come, wherein the true worshippers should worship God in spirit and truth. This verily had alway been done : but the new worshippers differed from the old in this point, that under Moses the spirituall worshipping of God was shadowed and in a manner intangled with many ceremonies, which being abolished, he is now more simply worshipped. Therefore they that confound this difference, doe overthrow the order instituted and established by Christ. Shall there then (wilt thou say) no ceremonies bee given to the ruler, sort to help their unskillfulnesse ? I say not so : for I verily thinke that this kind of helpe is profitable for them. I doe here travell only that such a meane may be used, as may brightly set out Christ and not darken him. Therefore there are given us of God few ceremonies, and those not laboursome, that they should shew Christ being present. The Jewes had moe given them, that they should be images of him being absent. After I say he was, not in power, but in manner of signifying. Therefore, that meane may be kept, it is necessary to keepe that fewnesse in number, easinesse in observing, and dignity in signifying, which also consisteth in clearnesse. What need I to say, that this hath not been done ? For the thing it selfe is in all mens eyes.

15. Here I omit with how pernicious opinions mens mindes are filled in thinking that they bee sacrifices wherewith oblation is rightly made to God, whereby sinnes are cleared, whereby righteousnesse and salvation is obtained. They will denie that good things are corrupted with such forraine errors : forasmuch as in this behalfe a man may no lesse offend in the very works also commanded of God. But this hath hainousnesse, that so much honor is given to works rashly fained by the will of man, that they are thought to be things deserving eternall life. For the workes commanded of God have reward therefore, because the law-maker himselfe in respect of obedience accepteth them. Therefore they receive not their value of their owne worthinesse, or of their owne deserving, but because God so much esteemeth our obedience toward him. I speake here of the perfection of workes which is commanded of God, and is not performed of men. For therefore the very workes of the law which we doe, have no thanks but of the free goodnesse of God, because in them our obedience is weak and lame. But because wee doe not here dispute, of what value workes are without Christ, therefore let us passe over that question. I come backe againe to that which properly belongeth to this present argument, that whatsoever commendation workes have in them, they have it in respect of the obedience, which only the Lord doth looke upon, as hee testifieth by the Prophet : I gave not commandment of sacrifices and burnt offerings, but onely that ye should with hearing heare my voice. But of fained workes he speaketh in another place, saying ? Ye weigh you silver and not in bread. Againe, They worship me in vaine with the precepts of men. This therefore they can by no waies excuse, that they suffer the silly people to seeke in those outward trifles the righteousnesse, whereby they may stand against God and uphold themselves before the heavenly judgement seat. Moreover, is not this a fault worthy to be inveiled against, that they shew forth ceremonies not understood, as it were a stage play, or a magicall enchantment? For it is certaine that all ceremonies are corrupt and hurtfull, unlesse men be by them directed to Christ. But the ceremonies that are used under the Papacie, are severed from doctrine, that they may the more hold men in signes without all signification: Finally (such a cunning craftsman is the belly) it appeareth that many of them have been invented by covetous sacrificing Priests, to bee snares to catch money. But what beginning soever they have, they are all so given forth in common for filthy gaine, that wee must needs cut off a great part of them, if wee will bring to passe that there be not a prophane marker, and full of sacriledge used in the Church.

16 Although I seeme not to teach a continuall doctrine concerning the ordinances of men, because this speaking is altogether applied to our owne time: yet there is nothing spoken that shall not be profitable for all times. For so oft as this superstition creepeth in, that men will worship God with their owne fained devises, whatsoever the lawes be that are made to that purpose, they doe by and by degenerate to those grosse abuses. For the Lord threateth not this curse to one or two ages, but to all ages of the world, that hee will strike them with blindness and amazed dullnesse, that worship him with the doctrines of men. This blinding continually maketh that they sile from no kind of absurdity, which despising so many warnings of God, doe willfully wrap themselves in those deadly snares. But if, setting aside circumstances, you will have simply shewed what be the mens traditions of all ages, which it is meet to be rejected of the Church, and to be disallowed of all the godly, that same shall be a sure and plaine definition which we have above set: that all lawes without the word of God are made by men to this end, either to prescribe a manner of worshipping God, or to bind consciences with religion, as though they gave commandement of things necessary to salvation. If to the one or both of these there bee adjoined other faults: as, that with the multitude they darken the brightnesse of the Gospell: that they nothing edifie, but be rather unprofitable and trifling occupations than true exercises of godlinesse: that they bee laid abroad to filthinesse and unhoneest gaine: that they bee too hard to be kept: that they be defiled with evill superstitions: these shall be helps that we may the more easily find how much evill is in them.

17 I heare what they answer for themselves, that their traditions are not of themselves, but of God. For, they say that the Church is governed of the holy Ghost, that it cannot erre: and that the authority thereof remaineth with them. When this is obtained, it therewithall followeth, that their traditions are the revelations of the holy Ghost, which cannot be despised but wickedly and with the contempt of God. And that they should not seeme to have attempted any thing without great authority, they will have it believed that a great part of their observations came from the Apostles: and they affirme that by one example is sufficiently declared what the Apostles did in other things, when being assembled in one Councell, they did by the decree of the Councell command the Gentiles to abstaine from things offered to idols, from blood and strangled. Wee have already in another place declared, how fallily for boasting of themselves they lyingly usurpe the title of the Church. So much as concerning this present cause: if, plucking away visors, and deceitfull colours, we truly looke upon that which we ought principally to care for, and which chiefly is for our behoofe, that is, what manner of Church Christ will have, that we may fashion and frame our selves to the rule thereof: it shall easily bee evident unto us, that it is not the Church, which passing the bounds of the word of God, doth outrage and runne at riot in making of new lawes. For doth not that law which was once prescribed to the Church, remaine eternal? What I command thee, that thou shalt keepe that thou maist doe it. Thou shalt not adde any thing nor take any thing from it. And in another place: Adde not to the word of the Lord, nor minish any thing: lest he peradventure reprove thee, and thou be found a lyer. Sith they cannot denie that this was spoken to the Church, what doe they else but report the stubbornnesse of that Church, which they boast to have been so bold as after such prohibitions neverthelesse to adde and mingle of her owne with the doctrine of God? But God forbid that we should assent to their lies, whereby they burden the Church with so great a slander: but let us understand, that the name of the Church is fallly pretended, so oft as this lust of mens rathnesse is spoken of, which cannot hold it selfe within the prescribed bounds of God, but that it wildly rangeth and runneth out into her own inventions? There is nothing intangled, nothing darke, nothing doubtfull in these words, in which the whole Church is forbidden to adde to the word of God, or to take any thing from it, when the worshipping of God, and precepts concerning salvation, are intreated of. But this (say they) was spoken of the law only, after which followed the prophecies and the whole ministration of the Gospell. I grant indeed: and I adde also, which are rather fulfillings of the law, than additions or diminishings. But if the Lord suffered nothing to be added to, or taken from the ministry of Moses, which was (as I may so terme it) darke by reason of many doubtfull inwrappings, till by his servants, the Prophets, and at length by his beloved sonne, hee ministred a cleerer doctrine: why should wee not thinke it much more severely forbidden us, that wee should adde nothing to the law, the Prophets, and the Psalmes, and the Gospell? The Lord is not gone out of kind from himselfe, which hath long agoe declared, that hee is with nothing so highly offended, as when hee is worshipped with the inventions of men. Whereof came those notable sayings in the Prophets, which ought to have continually sounded in our eares: I spake no words to your fathers, in the day that I brought them out of Egypt, concerning sacrifice and burnt offering. But this word I commanded them, saying: With hearing heare my voice: And I will be your God, and you shall be my people, and you shall walke in all the way that I shall command you. Againe, I have with protesting protested unto your fathers, Heare my voice. And other like sayings: but this is notable above the rest. Will God have burnt offerings and sacrifices, and not rather that his voice be obeyed? For obedience is better than sacrifice, and to hearken is better than to offer the fat of Rams. For, to resist is as the sinne of soothsaying: and not to obey is as the wickednesse of idolatry. Therefore whatsoever inventions of men are in this behalfe defended with the authority of the Church, so far as the same cannot be excused from the crime of ungodlines, it is easie to prove that it is fallly imputed to the Church.

18 After this sort wee freely inveigh against this tyrannie of mens traditions, which is proudly thrust in among us, under the title of the Church. For neither doe we scorne the Church (as our adversaries, to bring us in hatred, doe unjustly lie upon us) but we give unto her the praise of obedience, than which she knoweth no greater praise. They rather are very fore wrong doers to the Church, which make her obstinate against her Lord, while they saine that she hath proceeded further than the lawfully might doe by the word of God: though I speake nothing how it is a notable shamelesse joined with as great malice, continually to cry out of the authority of the Church, and in the meane time dissemblingly to hide both what is commanded by the Lord, and what obedience she oweth to the commandement of the Lord. But if we have a mind, as it is meet we should have, to agree with the Church, this pertaineth rather to the purpose, to have an eye unto, and remember what is commanded by the Lord both to us and the Church, that we should with one agreement obey him. For there is no doubt but we shall very well agree with the Church, if we doe in all things shew our selves obedient to the Lord. But now to Father upon the Apostles, the originall of the traditions wherewith the Church hath been hitherto oppressed, was a point of meere deceit: for as much as the doctrine of the Apostles travelleth wholly to this end, that consciences should not be burdened with new observations, nor the worshipping of God be defiled with our inventions. Moreover, if there be any faithfulness in histories and ancient monuments, the Apostles not only never knew, but also never heard of this that they attribute unto them. Neither let them prate, that the most part of their decrees were received in use and in mens behaviours, which never were put in writing: even those things forsooth, which, while Christ was yet living, they could not understand, after his ascending they learned by the revelation of the holy Ghost. Of the exposition of that place wee have elsewhere already seene. So much as is sufficient for this present cause: truly they make themselves worthy to be laughed at, while they saine that those great mysteries, which to long time were unknowne to the Apostles, were partly observations either Jewish or Gentile (of which all the one sort had been long before published.

published among the Jewes, and all the other sort among the Gentiles, and partly foolish gesturings and vaine petty ceremonies, which foolish sacrificing Priests that can neither skill of swimming nor of letters, use to doe very trimly: yea such as children and fooles doe so aptly counterfeit that it may seeme that there bee no fiter ministers of such holy mysteries. If there were no histories at all: yet men that have their sound wit might consider by the thing it selfe, that so great a heape of ceremonies and observations did not suddenly burst into the Church, but by little and little crept in. For when those holier bishops, which were next in time to the Apostles, had ordained some things that belonged to order and discipline, afterward there followed men, some after other, not discreet enough, and too curious and greedy, of which the later that every one was, so hee more strived with his predecessors in foolish envious counterfeiting, not to give place in inventing of new things. And because there was perill lest their devises would shortly grow out of use, by which they coveted to get praise among their posteritie, they were much more rigorous in exact calling upon the keeping of them. This wrongfull zeale hath bred us a great part of these ceremonies which they set out unto us for Apostolike. And this also the histories doe testifie.

19 Least in making a register of them we should be too tedious: we will be content with one example. In the ministring of the Lords Supper, there was in the Apostles time great simplicitie. The next successors, to garnish the dignitie of the mystery, added somewhat that was not to bee disallowed. But afterward there came those foolish counterfeiters, which with now and then patching of peeces together, have made us this apparrell of the Priests which we see in the Masse, those ornaments of the altar, those gesturings, and the whole furniture of unprofitable things. But they object, that this in old time was the persuasion, that those things which were with one consent done in the universall Church, came from the Apostles themselves, whereof they cite Augustine for witness. But I will bring a solution from no other where than out of the words of Augustine himselfe. Those things (saith he) that are kept in the whole world, wee may understand to have been ordained either of the Apostles themselves, or of the generall Councils, whose autoritie is most healthfull in the Church: as, that the Lords passion, and resurrection, and his ascending into heaven, and the coming of the holy Ghost, are celebrate with yeerly solemnity: and whatsoever like thing bee found, that is kept of the whole Church, which way soever it be spread abroad. When hee reckoneth up so few examples, who doth not see that hee meant to impute to authors worthy of credit and reverence, the observations that then were used, even none but those simple, rare, and sober ones, with which it was profitable that the order of the Church should bee kept together? But how far doth this differ from that which the Romish masters would enforce men to grant, that there is no petty ceremony among them that ought not to be judged Apostolike.

20 That I be not too long, I will bring forth only one example. If any man aske them, whence they have their holy water: they by and by answer, from the Apostles. As though the histories doe not attribute this invention to I wot not what Bishop of Rome, which truly, if he had called the Apostles to councill, would never have desired baptism with a strange and unfit signe. Albeit I doe not thinke it like to be true, that the beginning of that hallowing is so old as it is there written. For, that which Augustine saith, that certaine Churches in his time did shun that solemne following of Christs example in washing of feete, lest that usage should seeme to pertaine to baptism, secretly sheweth that there was then no kind of washing that had any likeness with baptism. Whatsoever it bee, I will not grant that this proceeded from an Apostolike spirit, that baptism, when it is with a daily signe brought into remembrance, should after a certaine manner be repeated. And I passe not upon this, that the selfe same Augustine in another place ascribeth other things also to the Apostles. For sith hee hath nothing but conjectures, judgement ought not upon them to be given of so great a matter. Finally, admit that wee grant them also, that those things which hee rehearseth came from the time of the Apostles: Yet there is great difference betweene instituting some exercise of godlinesse, which the faithfull with a free conscience may use; or if the use of it shall not bee profitable for them, they may forbear.

forbare it : and making a law that may snare consciences with bondage. But now, from what without soever they proceeded, sith wee see that they are slidden into so great abuse, nothing withstandeth, but that wee may without offence of him abolish them : forasmuch as they were never so commended, that they must be perpetually immovable.

21 Neither doth it much helpe them, that to excuse their tyranny they pretend the example of the Apostles. The Apostles (say they) and the Elders of the first Church, made a decree beside the commandement of Christ, wherein they commanded all the Gentiles to abstaine from things offered to idols, from strangled, and from blood. If that was lawfull for them, why is it not also lawfull for their successors, to follow the same so oft as occasion so requireth? I would to God, they did both in all other things and in this thing follow them. For I denie that the Apostles did there institute or decree any new thing, which is easie to be proved by a strong reason. For whereas Peter in that Councell pronounceth that God is tempted, if a yoke be laid upon the neckes of the Disciples : hee doth himselfe overthrow his owne sentence, if hee afterward consent to have any yoke laid upon them. But there is a yoke laid, if the Apostles doe decree of their owne authoritie that the Gentiles should be forbidden, that they should not touch things offered to idols, blood, and strangled. Indeede there yet remaineth a doubt, for that they doe neverthelesse seeme to forbid. But this doubt shall easily be dissolved, if a man doe more neerely consider the meaning of the decree it selfe : in the order and effect whereof the chiefe point is, that to the Gentiles there liberty is to be left, and that they ought not to be troubled, nor accombered about the observations of the law. Hitherto it very well maketh of our side. But the exception that immediately followeth, neither is any new law made by the Apostles, but the divine and eternall commandement of God that charity ought not to be broken, nor doth diminish one tittle of that liberty : but onely admonish the Gentiles, how they should temper themselves to their brethren, that they abuse not their liberty to the offence of them. Let this therefore be the second point, that the Gentiles should use a harmelesse liberty, and without offence of their brethren. But yet they prescribe some certaine thing : that is, they teach and appoint, so far as was expedient for the time, by what things they might run into the offence of their brethren, that they might beware of those things : but they adde no new thing of their owne to the eternall law of God, which forbiddeth the offending of brethren.

22 Like as if the faithfull Pastors which governe the Churches not yet well reformed, should command all their people, that till the weake with whom they live doe grow stronger, they should not openly eat flesh on Friday, or openly labour upon holy daies, or any such thing. For although these things setting superstition aside, are by themselves indifferent : yet when there is added offence of brethren, they cannot be done without a fault. But the times are such, that the faithfull cannot shew such a fight to the weake brethren, but that they shall sore wound their consciences. Who, but a caviller, will say that so they make a new law, whereas, it is certaine that they doe onely prevent offences, which are expressly enough forbidden of the Lord : And no more can it be said of the Apostles, whose purpose was nothing else, but in taking away the matter of offences, to call upon the law of God concerning the avoiding of offence : as if they had said : It is the Lords commandement that yee offend not a weake brother. Yee cannot eat things offered to images, strangled and blood, but that the weake brethren shall be offended. Therefore we command you in the word of the Lord, that yee eat not with offence. And that the Apostles had respect to the same thing, Paul himselfe is a very good witness, which writeth thus, verily none otherwise than according to the meaning of the Councell : Concerning meats that are offered to idols, wee know that the idoll is nothing. But some with conscience of the Idoll, doe eat it as offered to idols, and their conscience, forasmuch as it is weake, is defiled. See that your liberty be not made an offence to the weake. Hee that shall have well weighed these things, shall not afterward be deceived with such a false colour as they make, that pretend the Apostles for defence of their tyranny, as though the Apostles had begun with their decree to breake the liberty of the Church. But, that they may not be able to escape, but be driven even with their owne confession to allow this solution, let them answer me, by what right they were so bold to abrogate the same decree. Because there was no more perill of those offences and dissensions: which the Apostles meant to provide for, and they know that the law was to be weighed by the end thereof. Forasmuch as therefore this law was made in respect of charitie, there is nothing prescribed in it, but so much as pertaineth to charitie. When they confesse that the transgressing of this law is nothing but a breaking of charitie, doe they not therewithall acknowledge, that it is not a forged addition to the law of God, but a naturall and simple appliance to the times and manners whereunto it was directed?

The Apostles in their constitution about the Gentiles, made no new law of their owne, but applied to the times a law which God had made before.

1 Cor. 9.4.

The commandment of God strictly to be observed in things appertaining to his honour and service.

23. But although such lawes bee a hundred times unjust and injurious unto us, yet they affirme that they must be heard without exception: for they say that this is not here intended, that we should consent to errors, but onely that being subjects we should beare the hard commandments of our governours, which it is not our parts to refuse. But here also the Lord very well resisteth them with the truth of his word, and delivereth us out of such bondage into the liberty, which hee hath purchased for us with his holy blood, the benefite whereof hee hath more than once confirmed with his word. For that it is not here onely intended (as they maliciously saigne) that wee should suffer some grievous oppression in our body, but that our consciences being spoiled of their libertie that is of the benefite of the blood of Christ, should be still wilfully tormented. Howbeit let us passe over this also, as though it made little to the matter. But of how great importance doe wee thinke it is, that the Lords kingdom is taken away from him, which hee claimeth to himselfe with so great severity? But it is taken away so oft as he is worshipped with the lawes of mens inventions, whereas hee will be holden for the onely Law-maker of his owne worship. And least any man should thinke it to be a matter of nothing, let us heare how much the Lord esteemeth it? Because (saith hee) this people hath feared me with the commandment and doctrine of men: behold I will astonish them with a great and wonderous miracle. For wisdom shall perish from the wisemen thereof, and understanding shall depart from the elders. In another place, They worship me in vaine, teaching doctrines, the commandments of men. And truly whereas the children of Israel defiled themselves with many idolatries, the cause of all that evill is ascribed to this unclean mixture, that transgressing the commandments of God, they have forged new worshippings. And therefore the holy History rehearseth that the new strangers that had beene transplanted by the King of Babylon to inhabite Samaris, were torne in peeces and consumed of wilde beasts, because they knew not the judgements or statutes of the God of that land. Although they had nothing offended in the Ceremonies, yet God would not have allowed a vaine pompe: but in the meane time hee ceased not to take vengeance of the defiling of his worship, for that men did thrust in devises strange from his word. Whereupon it is afterward said, that they being made afraid with that punishment, received the Ceremonies prescribed in the law: but because they did not yet purely worship the true God, it is twice repeated that they did feare him and did not feare him. Whereupon we gather, that the part of reverence which is given to him, consisteth in this, while in worshipping him we simply follow what he commandeth with mingling none of our inventions. And therefore the godly Kings are oftentimes praised, because they did according to all the commandments, and declined not to the right hand nor to the left. I goe yet further: although in some fained worshipping there doe not openly appeare ungodlineffe, yet it is severely condemned of the holy Ghost, so soone as men depart from the commandment of God. The Altar of Achaz, the paterne whereof was brought out of Samaris, might have seemed to increase the garnishment of the Temple, whereas his devise was to offer Sacrifices thereupon to God onely, which he should doe more honourably than upon the first and old Altar; yet wee see how the spirit detesteth that boldnesse, for no other cause but for that the inventions of men in the worshipping of God are unclean conceptions. And how much more cleerely the will of God is opened unto us, so much the lesse excusable is our forwardnes to attempt any thing. And therefore worthily with this circumstance

the crime of Manasses is enforced, for that he builded a new Altar in Jerusalem, of which God had pronounced, I will there set my name, because the authority of God is now as it were of set purpose refused.

24 Many doe marvell why God so sharply threatneth that hee will doe things to be wondered at to the people, of whom he was worshipped with the commandemens of men, and pronounceth that hee is worshipped in vaine with the precepts of men. But if they considered, what it is in the cause of religion, that is to say of heavenly wisdom, to hang upon the onely mouth of God, they would therewithall see, that it is no slender reason why God so abhorreth such perverse services, that are done to him according to the lust of mans wit. For although they that obey such lawes for the worshipping of God, have a certaine shew of humilitie in this their obedience, yet they are not humble before God, to whom they prescribe the same lawes which they themselves doe keepe. This is the reason why Paul willett us so diligently to be ware, that we be not deceived by the traditions of men, and that which he calleth Ethelobreskian, that is, Will-worship invented of men beside the doctrine of God. This is verily true, both our owne wisdom, and all mens wisdom must be foolish unto us, that we may suffer him alone to be wise. Which way they keepe not which doe study with petty observations framed by the will of men to commend themselves unto him, and doe thrust unto him as it were against his will a transgressing obedience toward him, which is indeed given to men. As it hath bene done both in many ages heretofore, and in the time within our owne remembrance, and is also at this day done in those places where the authoritie of the creature is more esteemed than of the Creator: where religion (if yet the same be worthy to bee called religion) is defiled with more and more unfavoury superstitions, than ever was any Paynim wickednesse: For what could the wit of men breed but all things carnall and foolish and such as truly resemble their authors?

25 Whereas also the Patrons of superstitions alleadge, that Samuel sacrificed in Ramatha, and although the same was done beside the law, yet it pleased God: the solution is easie, that it was not a certaine second Altar to set against the one onely Altar: but because the place was not yet appointed for the Arke of the covenant, hee appointed the towne where he dwelled for sacrifices, as the most convenient place. Truly the minde of the holy Prophet was not to make any innovation in holy things, whereas God had so straitly forbidden any thing to be added or minished. As for the example of Manoab, I say that it was an extraordinary and singular case. He being a private man offered sacrifice to God and not without the allowance of God: verily because he enterprised it not of a rash motion of his owne minde, but by a heavenly instinct. But how much the Lord abhorreth those things that men devise of themselves to worship him withall, another not inferior to Manoab Gideon is a notable example, whose Ephod turned to distraction not onely to him and his family, but to the whole people. Finally, every new fond invention, wherewith men cover to worship God, is nothing else but a defiling of true holinesse.

26 Why then (say they) did Christ will that those intollerable burdons should be borne, which the Scribes and Pharisees bound upon men? But why in another place did the same Christ will that men should beware of the leaven of the Pharisees: calling leaven (as Matthew the Evangelist expoundeth it) all their owne doctrine that they mingled with the purenesse of the word of God? What would we have more plaine, than that wee be commanded to flee and beware of all their doctrine? Whereby it is made most certaine unto us, that in the other place also the Lord willed not, that the consciences of his, should be vexed with the Pharisees owne traditions. And the very words, if they bee not wretted, sound of no such thing. For the Lord purposing there to inveigh sharply against the manners of the Pharisees, did first simply instruct them that heard him, that although they saw nothing in their life meete for them to follow, yet they should not cease to doe those things which they taught in words, while they sat in the chaire of Moses, that is, to declare the law. Therefore hee meant nothing else but to provide that the common people should not with the evill examples of the teachers be brought to dispise the doctrine. But for as much as many are nothing at all moved with reasons; but alway require authority; I will alleadge Augustinus words, in which the very same thing is spoken. The Lords sheepefold hath governours, some faithfull, and some hirelings. The governours that are faithfull, are true Pastors: but heare ye, that the hirelings also are necessary: for many in the Church following earthly profits, doe preach Christ; and by them the voice of Christ is heard: and the sheepe doe follow, not a hireling, but a Pastor by the meanes of a hireling. Heare ye that hirelings are shewed by the Lord himselfe. The Scribes (saith he) and the Pharisees sit in the chaire of Moses. Doe ye see those things that they say, but doe not those things that they doe. What other thing said hee, but heare the voice of the Pastor by the hirelings? For in sitting in the chaire they teach the law of God: therefore God reacheth by them. But if they will teach their owne, heare it not, doe it not. This saith Augustine.

27 But whereas many unskillfull men, when they heare that consciences are wickedly bound and God worshipped in vaine with the traditions of men, doe at once blot out altogether all lawes whereby the order of the Church is set in frame: therefore it is convenient also to meete with their error. Verily in this point it is easie to be deceived, because at the first sight it doth not by and by appeare what difference is betweene the one sort and the other. But I will so plainly in few words set out the whole matter, that the likenesse may deceive no man. First let us hold this, that if we see in every fellowship of men some policy to be necessary, that may serve to nourish common peace, and to retaine concord; if we see that in the doing of things there is alway some orderly forme, which is behoovefull for publike honesty, and for very humanity, not to be refused, the same ought chiefly to be observed in Churches, which are both best maintained by a well framed disposition of all things, and without agreement are no Churches at all. Therefore if we will have the safety of the Church well provided for, we must altogether diligently procure that which Paul commandeth, that all things be done comely and according to order. But forasmuch as there is so great diversity in the manners of men, so great variety in mindes; so great disagreement in judgments and wits: neither is there any policy itediall enough, unlesse it be established by certaine lawes, nor any orderly usage can be observed without a certaine appointed forme: Therefore we are so farre off from condemning the lawes that are profitable to this purpose, that we affirme that when those be taken away, Churches are dissolved from their finewes, and utterly deformed and scattered abroad. For this which Paul requireth, that all things be done decently and in order; cannot be had; unlesse the order it selfe and comeliness be established, with observations asjoyned as with certaine bonds. But this onely thing is alway to be excepted in those observations, that they be not either beleevved to be necessary to salvation, and so binde consciences with religion, or be applied to the worshipping of God, and so godlinesse be reposed in them.

28 Wee have therefore a very good and most faithfull marke, which putteth difference betweene those wicked ordinances, by which we have said that true religion is darkened and consciences subverted, and the lawfull observations of the Church: if we remember that the lawfull observations tend alway to one of these two things or to both together, that in the holy assembly of the faithfull all things be done comely and with such dignitie as becometh: and that the very common fellowship of men should be kept in order as it were by certaine bonds of humanitie and moderation. For when it is once understood that the Law is made for publike honesties sake, the superstition is now taken away, into which they fall, that measure the worshipping of God by the inventions of men. Againe, when it is knowne that it pertaieth to common use, then that false opinion of bond and necessity is overthrowne, which did strike a great terrour into consciences, when traditions were thought necessary to salvation. For herein is nothing required but that charitie should with common dutifull doing be nourished among us. But it is good yet to define more plainly, what is comprehended under that comeliness which Paul commendeth, and also what under order. The end of comeliness is, partly that when such Ceremonies are used as may procure a reverence to holy things, wee may by such helpes be stirred up to godlinesse: partly also that the modestie and gravitie which ought to be seene in all honest doings may therein principally appeare. In order this is the first point, that they which governe may know the rule and law to rule well: and the people which are goverued may be accustomed to obeying of God, and to right discipline: Then, that the state of the Church being well framed, peace and quietnesse may be provided for.

29 Therefore wee shall not say that comelinesse is, wherein shall be nothing but vaine delectation: such as wee see in that player-like apparell, which the Papists use in their ceremonies, where appeareth nothing else, but an unprofitable vifor of gaynesse, and excesse without fruit. But wee shall account that to be comelinesse which shall so bee meete for the reverence of holy mysteries, that it be a fit exercise to godlinesse, or at the least such as shall serve to convenient garnishing for the celebrating thereof: and the same not without fruit, but that it may put the faithfull in minde with how great modestie, religiousnesse and reverence, they ought to handle holy things. Now, that ceremonies may bee exercises of godlinesse, it is necessarie that they lead us the straight way to Christ. Likewise wee may not say that order consisteth in those trifling pompes that have nothing else than a vanishing gaynesse: but that it standeth in such an orderly framing as may take away all confusion, barbarousnesse, obstinacie, and all strifes and dissentions. Of the first sort are these examples in Paul: that prophane bankettings should not be mingled with the holy Supper of the Lord: that women should not come abroad, but covered: and many other which wee have in common use: as this, that wee pray kneeling and bare headed: that wee minister the Lords Sacraments not uncleanly, but with some dignitie: that in the baryng of the dead we use some honest shew: and other things that are of the same sort. Of the other kinde are the hoares appointed for publike prayers, Sermons, and celebrations of mysteries: at Sermons, quietnesse and silence, places appointed, singing together of Hymnes, daies prefixed for celebrating of the Lords Supper, that Paul forbidde that women should teach in the Church, and such like. But specially those things that concerne discipline, as the teaching of the Catechisme, the censures of the Church, excommunication, fastings, and such as may be reckoned in the same number. So all the constitutions of the Church, which we receive for holy and wholesome, wee may referre to two chiefe titles: for some pertaine to rites, and ceremonies, and the other to discipline and peace.

30 But because here is perill, least on the one side the false Bishops should thereby catch a pretence to excuse their wicked and tyrannous lawes, and least on the other side there be some men too fearefull, which admonished with the foresaid evils doe leave no place to lawes be they never so holie: here it is good to protest, that I allow onely those ordinances of men which be both grounded upon the autoritie of God, and taken out of the Scripture, yea and altogether Gods owne. Let us take for an example the kneeling which is used in time of common prayer. It is demanded, whether it be a tradition of man, which every man may lawfully refuse or neglect, I say that it is so of men, that it is also of God. It is of God, in respect that it is a part of that comelinesse, the care and keeping whereof is commended unto us by the Apostle: it is of men, in respect that it specially betokeneth that which had in generaltie rather benee pointed to, than declared. By this one example we may judge, what is to be thought of that whole kinde: verily because the Lord hath in his holy Oracles both faithfully contained and clearly set forth both the whole summe, of true righteousnesse, and all the parts of the worshipping of his divine Majestie, and whatsoever was necessarie to salvation: therefore in these things hee is onely to be heard as our Schoolemaster. But because in outward discipline and Ceremonies his will was not to prescribe each thing particularly what we ought to follow (because he foresaw this to hang upon the state of times, and did not thinke one forme to bee fit for all ages) herein wee must see to those generall rules which he hath given, that thereby all those things should be tried which the necessitie of the Church shall require to bee commanded for order and comelinesse. Finally, forasmuch as hee hath therefore taught nothing expressly, because these things both are not necessarie to salvation, and according to the the manners of every nation and age ought diversly to be applied to the edifying of the Church : therefore as the profit of the Church shall require, it shall be convenient as well to change and abrogate those that be used, as to institute new. I grant indeed, that wee ought not rashly, nor oft., nor for light causes to runne to innovation. But what may hurt or edifie, charitie shall best iudge : which if we will suffer to be the governesse, all shall be safe.

The obedience required unto lawfull ordinances of the Church.

Now it is the dutie of Christian people, to keepe such things as have bene ordained according to this rule, with a free conscience and without any superstition, but yet with a godly and easie readinesse to obey, not to despise them, nor to passe them over with carelesse negligence : so farre is it off, that they ought by pride and obstinacie openly to breake them. What manner of libertie of conscience (wilt thou say) may there bee in so great observation and warinesse? Yea, it shall stand excellently well when wee shall consider, that they are not stedfast and perpetuall stayed-lawes, whereunto wee be bound, but outward rudiments for the weaknesse of men : which although we doe not all neede, yet we doe all use them, because wee are mutuallie one bound to another, to nourish charitie among us. This wee may reknowlege in the exampls above rehearsed. What? Doth religion stand in a womans vaine, that it is not lawfull to goe out of doores with her head uncovered? Is that holy decree of his concerning silence, such as cannot be broken without most hainous offence? Is there any mystrie in kneeling, or in burying of a dead carcase, that may not bee omitted without sinne? No, For if a woman neede, for the helping of her neighbour, to make such hast as may not suffer her to cover her head, she offendeth not if she runne thither with her head uncovered. And it may sometime hold that it may be no lesse convenient for her to speake, than at another time to hold her peace. And there is no cause to the contrarie, but that hee which by reason of disease cannot bow his knees may pray standing. Finally, it is better to burie a dead man speedily in time, than when they lacke a winding sheete, or when there be not men present to convey him, or carrie till he be rotunburied. But neverthelesse in these things there is somewhat which the manner and ordinances of the country, and finally very naturall honestie, and the rule of modestie appointeth to bee done or avoided : wherein if a man swarve any thing from them, by unwarinesse, or forgetfulnesse, there is no crime committed : but if upon contempt, such stubbornnesse is to be disallowed. Likewise the daies themselves, which they be, and the houres, and how the places be builded, and what Psalmes be song upon which day, it maketh no matter. But it is meete that there be both certaine daies, and appointed houres, and a place fit to receive all, if there be regard had of the preservation of peace. For how great an occasion of brawlings should the confusion of these things be, if it were lawfull for every man as he list, to change those things that belong to common state : forasmuch as it will never come to passe that one same thing shall please all men, if things be left as it were in the middelt to the choise of every man? If any man doe carpe against us, and will herein be more wise than he ought, let him see himselfe by what reason he can defend his owne precisenesse to the Lord. As for us, this saying of Paul ought to sicisie us, that we have not an use to contend, nor the Churches of God.

I Cor. II. 16.

Cautions touching Church ordinances.

Moreover it is with great diligence to bee endeavoured, that no error creepe in, that may corrupt or obscure this pure use. Which shall be obtained, if all observations, whatsoever they shall be, shall have a shew of manifest profit, and if very few be received : but principally if there be adjoynd a faithfull doctrine of the Pastor, that may stop up the way to perverse opinions. This knowledge maketh that in all these things every man may have his owne libertie preserved, and neverthelesse shall willingly chage his owne libertie with a certaine necessitie, so farre as either this comelinesse that we have spoken of, or the order of charitie shall require. Secondly that both we our selves should without any superstition be busied in the observing of those things, and should not too precisely require them of other, so as wee should thinke the worshipping of God to bee the better for the multitude of ceremonies that setting herein no perpetuall law to our selves, wee should referre the whole use and end of observations observations to the edification of the Church, that when it requireth we may without any offence suffer not only somewhat to be changed, but all the observations that were before in use among us, to be altered. For this age is a present experience, that certaine rites, which otherwise are not ungodly nor uncomely, may according to the fit occasion of the matter, be conveniently abrogate. For (such hath beene the blindness and ignorance of the former times) Churches have heretofore, with so corrupt opinion and with so stiff affection, stuck in ceremonies, that they can scarcely be sufficiently purged from monstrous superstitions, but that many ceremonies must be taken away, which in old time were peradventure ordained not without cause, and of themselves have no notable ungodlinesse in them.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

Of the jurisdiction of the Church, and the abuse thereof, such as is scene in the Papacie.

NOW remaineth the third part of the power of the Church, yea and the chiefe part in a well ordered state, which wee have said to consist in iurisdiction. The whole iurisdiction of the Church pertaineth to the discipline of manners, of which we shall in-treat by and by. For as much as no Citie nor towne can stand without magistrate and policie: so the Church of God (as I have already taught, but now I am compelled to repeat it againe) needeth her certaine spirituall policie: but such as is utterly severed from the civill policie, and doth so nothing hinder or minish it, that it rather doth much helpe and further it. Therefore this power of iurisdiction shall in summe be nothing else but an order framed for the preservation of spirituall policie. To this end from the beginning were ordained iudiciall orders in Churches, which might use examination of manners, correct vices and exercise the office of the keyes. This order Paul speaketh of in the Epistle to the Corinthians, when he nameth governments. Againe, to the Romans, when he saith: let him that ruleth, rule in carefulnesse. For he speaketh not to the magistrates, (for at that time there were no Christian magistrates) but to them that were ioyned with the Pastors for the spirituall government of the Church. Also in the Epistle to Timothy, hee maketh two sorts of Elders: some, that labour in the word: other some, that doe not use the preaching of the word, and yet doe rule well. By this latter sort it is no doubt that he meaneth them that were appointed to looke unto manners, and to the whole use of the keyes. For this power, of which we now speake, hangeth wholly upon the keyes which Christ gave to the Church, in the xvij. Chapter of Matthew: where hee commandeth, that they should be sharplie admonished in the name of the whole Church, that have despised private monitions: but if they goe forward in their obstinacy, he teacheth that they should be put out of the fellowship of the faithfull. But these monitions and corrections cannot be without knowledge of the cause: therefore there needeth both some iudgement and order. Wherefore unlesse we will make voide the promise of the keyes, and take utterly away excommunication, solemne motions and all such things whatsoever they be: we must needs give to the Church some iurisdiction. Let the readers marke that that place increaseth not of the generall authority of doctrine as in the xvj. Chapter of Matthew, and the xxj. of John: but that the power of the Synagogue is for the time to come transferred to the flocke of Christ. Untill that day the Jewes had their order of governing, which Christ stablisheth in his Church; and that with great penalty, so much as concerneth the pure institution of it: For so it behooved, forasmuch as otherwise the iudgement of an un-noble and unregarded congregation might be despised of rash and proud men. And that it should not encomber the readers, that Christ doth in the same words expresse things somewhat differing one from the other, it shall be profitable to dissolve this doubt. There be therefore two places, that speake of binding and loosing. The one is in the xvj. Chapter of Matthew, where Christ, after that he had promised that he would give to Peter the keyes of the kingdome of heaven, immediately addeth, that whatsoever he shall binde or loose in earth, shall be confirmed in heaven. In which words he meaneth none other thing, than he doth by other words in John, when sending his Disciples to preach preach, after that he had breathed upon them hee said: whose finnes yee forgive, they shall bee forgiven: and whose yee retaine they shall be retained in heaven. I will bring an exposition not suttle, not enforced, not wrested: but naturall, flowing, and offering it selfe. This commandement of forgiving and retaining finnes, and that promise of binding and loosing made to Peter, ought to be referred to no other thing but to the ministrie of the word: which when the Lord committed to the Apostles, hee did therewith also arme them with this office of binding and loosing. For what is the summe of the Gospell, but that we all being bond servants of sinne and of death, are loosed and made free by the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: and that they which doe not receive nor acknowledge Christ their deliverer and redeemer, are damned and adjudged to everlasting bonds? When the Lord delivered this message to his Apostles, to be carried into all Nations: to approve that it was his owne and proceeding from himselfe, he honoured it with this noble testimony: and that to the singular strengthening both of the Apostles themselves, and of all those to whom it should come. It behooved that the Apostles should have a steadfast and found certainty of their preaching, which they should not onely execute with infinite labours, cares, troubles and dangers, but also at the last, seale it with their blood. That they might (I say) know the same to be not vaine nor voide, but full of power and force: it behooved that in so great carefulnesse, in so great hardnesse of things, and in so great dangers, they should be perswaded that they did the businesse of God: that when all the world withstood them, and sought against them they should know that God stood on their side: that having not Christ the authour of their doctrine present by sight in earth, yet they should understand him to be in heaven to confirme the truth of the doctrine which hee had delivered them. It behooved againe that it should also bee most certainly proved by testimony to the hearers, that that doctrine of the Gospell was not the word of the Apostles, but of God himselfe: not a voice bread in earth, but come downe from heaven. For these things, the forgiveness of finnes, the promise of everlasting life, the message of salvation, cannot be in the power of man. Therefore Christ hath testified, that in the preaching of the Gospell there is nothing of the Apostles, but the onely Ministry: that it was hee himselfe that spake and promised all things by their mowthes as by instruments: and therefore that the forgiveness of finnes which they preached, was the true promise of God: and the damnation which they pronounced, was the certaine judgement of God. But this testifying is given to all ages, and remaineth in force, to certifie and assure all men, that the word of the Gospell; by what man soever it bee preached, is the very sentence of God, published at the soveraigne judgement seat, written in the booke of life, ratified, firme and fixed in heaven. This we see that in those places the power of the keyes is nothing but the preaching of the Gospell: and that it is not so much a power as a Ministry, if wee have respect to men. For Christ hath not given this power properly to men, but to his owne word, whereof he hath made men Ministers.

binding, and loosing by discipline committed to the
Mat. 18. 17.

2 The other place which wee have said to be concerning the power of binding and loosing, is in the xviii. chapter of Matthew, where Christ saith: If any brother heare not the Church, let him bee to thee as a Heathen man or Publican. Verily I say unto you: whatsoever yee binde upon earth, shall be bound also in heaven: whatsoever yee loose shall be loosed. This place is not altogether like the first, but is a litle otherwise to be understood. But I doe not so make them diverse, that they have not great affinity together. This first point is like in both, that either of them is a generall sentence, that in both, there is alway all one power of binding and loosing, namely by the word of God, all one commandement, all one promise. But herein they differ, that the first place peculiarly belongeth to preaching, which the ministers of the word doe execute: this latter place to the discipline of Excommunication; which is committed to the Church. The Church bindeth, whom the excommunicateth, not that shee throweth him into perpetuall ruine and desperation, but because shee condemneth his life and manners, and unlesse he repent, doth already warne him of his damnation. Shee looseth whom she receiveth into communion: because she doth make him as it were partaker of the unity which shee hath in Christ Jesus. Therefore that no man should obstinately dispute the judgement judgement of the Church, or little regard that hee is condemned by the consenting voyces of the faithfull: the Lord testifieth that, such judgement of the faithfull is nothing else but a publishing of his owne sentence: and that whatsoever they doe in earth is confirmed in heaven. For they have the word of God, whereby they may condemne the perverse: they have the word, whereby they may receive the repentant into grace. And they cannot erre, nor dissent from the judgement of God: because they judge not but after the law of God, which is not an uncertaine or earthly opinion, but the holy will of God, and a heavenly Oracle. Out of these two places, which I thinke I have both briefly, familiarly, and truly expounded, those furious men without difference as they be carried with their owne giddinesse, goe about to stablish sometime confession, sometime excommunication, sometime jurisdiction, sometime the power to make lawes, sometime pardons. But the first place they alledge the supremacie of the Sea of Rome: they can so well skill to fit their keies to all locks and doores, that a man may say they have practised Smithes-craft: all their life.

3 For whereas many thinke that those things endured but for a time, when the Magistrates were yet strangers from the profession of our religion: they are deceived in this, that they consider not, how great difference and what manner of unlikenesse there is of the Ecclesiasticall and civill power. For the Church hath not the power of the sword to punish or restraîne, no Empire to command, no prison, no other paines which the Magistrate is wont to lay upon men. Againe, it tendeth not to this end, that hee that hath sinned should bee punished against his will, but should with willing chastisement professe his repentance. Therefore there is a farre diverse order because neither doth the Church take to it selfe any thing which properly belongeth to the Magistrate, nor the Magistrate can execute that which the Church doth. This shall be made plainer by an example. Is any man drunke? In a well ordered Citie, prison shall be his punishment. Hath he committed fornication? He shall have like or rather greater punishment. So shall both the lawes, and the Magistrate, and outward judgement be satisfied: But it may be that hee shall give no signification of repentance, but rather murmur and grudge against it. Shall the Church in this case doe nothing? But such cannot bee received to the Supper, without doing wrong both to Christ and his holy institution. And reason requireth this, that he which offendeth the Church with an evill example, should with solemne declaration of repentance take away the offence which he hath raised. The reason which they bring that are of contrarie opinion, is too cold: Christ say they committed these doings to the Church, when there was no Magistrate to execute them. But it happeneth oftentimes that the Magistrate is more negligent, yea sometime peradventure that himselfe is to be chastised, which happened to the Emperour Theodosius. There may befall this as much be said of the ministerie of the word. Now therefore after their sentence, let Pastors cease to blame manifest wicked doings, let them cease to chide, to reprove, to rebuke, for there be Christian Magistrates; which ought to correct these things with the law and with the sword. But as the Magistrate ought by punishing, and by restraining with force, to purge the Church of offences: so likewise the Minister of the word for his part ought to helpe the Magistrate that there may not so many offend. So ought their workings to be conjoyned that the one may be a helpe, not a hinderance to the other.

4 And truly if a man more nearely weigh the words of Christ, he shall easily perceive that in these places, is described a stayed state, and a perpetuall order of the Church, not such as endureth but for a time. For it is not meete that wee should accuse them to the Magistrate, that will not obey our monitions: which yet should be necessarie if the Magistrate succeeded into the office of the Church. What is this promise? Shall wee say that it is a promise of one or a few yeares? Verily verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye binde on earth, &c. Moreover Christ did here institute no new thing, but followed the custome alway observed in the ancient Church of his owne nation: whereby he signified that the Church cannot want the spirituall jurisdiction, which had bene from the beginning. And this hath beene confirmed by the consent of all times. For when Emperours and Magistrates began to professe Christ, the spirituall jurisdiction was not by and by abolished: but only so ordered, that it should diminish nothing of the civill jurisdiction, or be confounded wth it. And rightfully. For the magistrate, if he be godly, will not exempt himselfe from the common subjection of the children of God, wherof it is not the last part to submit himselfe to the Church, judging by the word of God: so far is it off, that he ought to take away that order of judgment. For what is more honorable (saith Ambrose) for the Emperor, than to be called the Son of the Church? For a good Emperor is within the Church, not above the Church. Therefore they, which to honor the Magistrate doe spoile the Church of her power, doe not only wth false exposition corrupt the sentence of Christ, but also doe not slenderly condemne so many holy Bishops which have beene from the time of the Apostles, that they have by false pretence usurped the honor and office of the Magistrate.

The difference betwe the ecclesiasticall judgement and civill, and the necessity as well for the one as the other to continue.

5 But on the other side it is good to see this, what was in old time the true use of the jurisdiction of the Church, and how great abuse is crept in, that we may know what is to be abrogate, and what is to be restored of antiquitie, if we will overthrow the kingdome of Antichrist, and set up the true kingdome of Christagaine. First this is the marke to be shot at, that offences be prevented, and if any offence be risen up, that it may be abolished. In the use two things are to be considered: first, that this spirituall power be altogether severed from the power of the sword: then, that it be not executed by the will of one man, but by a lawfull assembly. Both these things were observed in the purer Church. For the holy Bishops did not exercise their power with fins, or imprisonments, or other civill punishments: but they used the onely word of the Lord, as they ought to doe. For the severest revenge, and as it were the uttermost thunderbolt of the Church is excommunication, which is not used but in necessitie. But this requireth neither force nor strong hand, but is content with the power of the word of God. Finally, the jurisdiction of the old Church was nothing else but a declaration in practise (as I may so call it) of that which Paul teacheth concerning the spirituall power of Pastors. There is (saith he) power given to us, whereby wee may throw downe strong holdes, whereby wee may make low all height that listeth up it selfe against the knowledge of God, whereby wee may subdue all thought, and may lead it captive into the obedience of Christ, and wee have in readinesse a revenge against all disobedience. As this is done by the preaching of the doctrine of Christ: so least the doctrine should be scorned, according to that which is taught ought they to be judged which professe themselves of the household of faith. But that cannot bee done, unlesse there be ioyned with the ministerie a power to call them that are to be privately admonished; or to bee more sharply corrected, and also a power to exclude them from the communion of the Supper, which cannot bee received without prophaning of so great a mysterie. Therefore when in another place hee saith, that it belongeth not to us to judge strangers, hee maketh the children subject to the censures of the Church, which may chastise their fautes, and hee secretly signifieth that there were then judicall orders in force from which none of the faithfull were free.

6 But such authoritie (as wee have declared) was not in the power of one man, to doe every thing according to his owne will: but in the power of the assembly of the Elders, which was the same thing in the Church that a Senate is in a Citie. Cyprian, when hee maketh mention by whom it was exercised in his time, useth to joyne the whole Cleargie with the Bishop. But in another place also he sheweth, that the very Cleargie so governed, that in the meane time the people was not excluded from the hearing of matters. For thus he writeth: Since the beginning of my Bishoprick I have determined to doe nothing without the counsell of the Cleargie and consent of the people. But this was the common and usuall manner, that the jurisdiction of the Church should be exercised by a Senate of Elders: of whom (as I have said) there were two sorts: For some were ordained to teaching, and other some were onely Judges in manners. By little and little this institution grew out of kinde from the first beginning of it: so that even in the time of Ambrose onely Clearkes were Judges in Ecclesiasticall judgements. Which thing he himselfe complaineth of in these words: The old Synagoge (saith hee) and since that time the Church hath had Elders, without whose counsell nothing was done. Which by what negligence it is growne out of use I know not, unlesse peradventure by the slothfulness or rather the pride of the teachers, while while they alone would bee thought to be somewhat. We see how much the holy man is displeas'd, that any thing of the better state is decayed, when notwithstanding they had yet continuing an order that was at the least tolerable. What then would he doe if hee saw these deformed ruines that shew almost no signe of the old building? What bewailing would hee use? First, against law and right, the bishop hath claimed to himselfe alone, that which was given to the whole Church. For it is like as if the Consull, driving out the Senate, should take the Empire upon himselfe alone. But as he is above the rest in honour, so in the whole assembly in more authoritie than is one man. Therefore it was too wicked a deed, that one man, removing the common power to himselfe, hath both opened an entry to tyrannous lust, and hath taken from the Church that which belonged unto her, and hath suppressed and put away the assembly ordained by the Spirit of Christ.

7. But (as of one evill alway groweth another) Bishops disdain'd it as a thing unworthy of their care, have committed it over to other. Hereupon are created Officials to serve that roome: I doe not yet speake what kinde of men they be, but onely this I say, that they nothing differ from prophane Iudges. And yet they still call it a spirituall jurisdiction, where men contend about nothing, but earthly matters. Although there were no more evill, with what face dare they call a brawling court the judgement of the Church? But there are monitions, there is excommunication. So verily they mocke with God. Doth a poore man owe a little money? he is cited: if he appeare, he is condemned. When hee is condemned, if hee doe not satisfie it, hee is monished: after the second monition they proceed one step toward excommunication: if hee appeare not, hee is monished to come and yeeld himselfe to judgement: if he then make delay, he is monished, and by and by excommunicate. I beseech you, what is there any thing like either to the institution of Christ, or to the ancient manner, or to an Ecclesiasticall order? But there is also correction of vices. But how? verily they not onely suffer but with secret allowance doe after a certaine manner cherish and confirme adulteries, wantonnesse, drunkennesse and such kinde of mischievous doings: and that not onely in the common people, but also in the Cleargie themselves. Of many they call a few before them, either that they should not seeme slothfull in winking at them, or that they may milke out some money. I speake not of the pillages, robberies, briberies, and sacriledges that are gathered thereby, I speake not what manner of men are for the most part chosen to this office. This is enough and too much, that when the Romanists doe boast that there jurisdiction is spirituall; it is easie to shew that there is nothing more contrarie to the order institute by Christ, and that it hath no more likeness to the ancient custome than darknesse hath to light.

8. Although wee have not spoken all things that might bee alleadged for this purpose, and those things that wee have spoken of, are knit up in few words: yet I trust that wee have so sought it out, that there is now no more cause why any man should doubt; that the spirituall power whereof the Pope with all his kingdome proudly glorieth, is wicked against God, and an unjust tyrannie over his people. Under the name of spirituall power I comprehend both boldnesse in framing new doctrines, wherewith they have turned away the silly people from the natural purenesse of the word of God, and the wicked traditions wherewith they have snared them, and also the false Ecclesiasticall jurisdiction which they execute by Suffrages and Officials. For if wee grant unto Christ a kingdome among us, it is not possible but that all this kinde of dominion must immediately bee overthrowne and fall downe. As for the power of the sword, which they also give to themselves, because it is not exercised upon consciences, it pertaineth not to our present purpose to entreat of it. In which behalfe yet it is also to note, that they be alway like themselves, verily nothing lesse than that which they would bee taken for, that is to say, Pastors of the Church. Neither doe I blame the peculiar faults of men; but the common wickednesse of the whole order, yea the very pestilence of the order: forasmuch as it is thought that the same should be maimed, unless it be gloriously set forth with wealth and proud tides. If we require the authoritie of Christ concerning this matter, it is no doubt but that his minde was to debar the ministers of his word from civill dominion and earthly government, when hee said. The Kings of the Gentiles beare rule over them : but you shall not so. For he signifieth not onely that the office of a Pastor is distinct from the office of a Prince, but that they be things so severed, that they cannot meet together in one man. For whereas Moses did beare both the offices together : First that was done by a rare miracle : againe, it was but for a time till things were better set in order. But when a certaine forme was once prescribed of God, the civill government was left unto him, and hee was commanded to resigne the Priesthood to his brother. And worthily. For it is a bove nature, that one man should suffice to beare both burdens. And this hath in all ages bene diligently observed in the Church. And there was never any of the Bishops, so long as the true forme of the Church endured, that once thought of usurping the power of the sword : so that this was a common Proverbe in the time of Ambrose, that Emperors rather coveted the Priesthood, than Priests the Empire. For this which hee afterward saith, was imprinted in the mindes of all men, that Palaces pertained to the Emperor, and Churches to the Priest.

9 But since that a way hath bene devised, whereby Bishops might hold the title, honour and riches of their office without burden or care : least they should be left altogether idle, the power of the sword was given them, or rather they did by usurpation take it upon themselves. By what colour will they defend this shamelesse ? Was this the duty of Bishops to wrap themselves with iudicial hearing of causes, with the governments of Cities and Provinces, and through large circuits to meddle in busines so unpertaining to them : which have so much worke and businesse in their owne office, that if they were wholly and continually occupied in it, and were withdrawne with no callings away from it, yet they were scarcely able to satisfie it ? But (such is their waiwardnesse) they sticke not to boast, that by this meane the Church doth flourish according to her worthinesse, and that they themselves in the meane time are not too much drawne away from the duties of their vocation. As touching the first point : if this be a comely ornament of the holy office, that they be advanced to such height, that the highest Monarches may stand in feare of them : then they have cause to quarrell with Christ, which hath in such sort grievously pinched their honor. For, at least in their opinion what could have bene spoken more dishonorably than those words : The Kings of the Gentiles and Princes beare rule over them, but you shall not so ? And yet he laid no harder Law upon his servants than he first laid and received upon himselfe. Who (saith he) hath made me a Iudge or divider among you ? We see that hee plainly putterh away from himselfe the office of iudging, which he would not doe if it were a thing agreeing with his office : will no: the servants suffer themselves to be brought into that order, whereunto the Lord hath yielded himselfe subiect ? As for the other point, I would to God they could so prove it in experience as it is easie to speake it. But forasmuch as the Apostles thought it not good, to leave the word of God and minister at tables : thereby, because they will not be taught, they are convinced, that it is not all one mans worke to be both a good Bishop and a good Prince. For if they (which according to the largenesse of the gifts wherewith they were endued, were able to satisfie moe and greater cares than any men that have bene borne since them) have yet confessed that they cannot at once apply the ministerie both of the word and of tables, but that they should faint under the burden : how could these that be men of no valour in comparison of the Apostles a hundred fold excell the industrie of the Apostles ? Truly, to attempt it was a point of most shamelesse and too presumptuous boldnesse : yet we see that it hath bene attempted : but with what successse, it is evident. For it could not otherwise come to passe, but that for saking their owne office they should remove into other mens charge.

10 And it is no doubt but that of small beginning they have by little and little growne to so great increases. For it was not possible that they should at the first step climbe up so high. But sometime with subtletie and crooked craftie meanes they privily advanced themselves, so as no man could foresee that it would come to passe till it was done : sometime when occasion served they did by terror and threatnings wring from Princes some augmentation of their power : sometime when they saw Princes not hard laced to give, they abused their fond and unadvised gentleness. In old old time if any controversie hapned, the godly to escape the necessitie of going to law, committed the arbitrement to the Bishop, because they doubted not his uprightnesse. With such arbitrements the old Bishops were oftentimes encombr'd; which indeede greatly displeas'd them (as Augustine in one place testifieth) but least the parties should runne to contentious lawing, they did though against their willes take that encombrance upon them. These men have of voluntarie arbitrements, which were altogether differing from the noise of judiciall courts, made an ordinarie jurisdiction. In a little while after, when cities and countries were troubled with divers hard distresses, they resorted to the protection of Bishops, to be safeguarded by their faithfull succour: the Bishops by marvellous subtilty, of protectors made themselves Lords. Yea, and it cannot be denied that they have gotten the possession of a great part by violent seditious partakings. As for the Princes, that willingly gave jurisdiction to Bishops, they were by divers affections moved thereunto. But admitting that their gentleness had some shew of godlinesse: yet with this their wrongfull liberalitie, they did not very well provide for the profit of the Church, whose ancient and true discipline they have so corrupted, yea (to say truth) have utterly abolished. But those Bishops that have abused such goodnesse of Princes to their owne commoditie, have by the wing of this one example enough and too much testified that they are not Bishops. For if they had had any sparkle of an Apostolike spirit, they would without doubt have answered out of the mouth of Paul: the weapons of our warfare are not carnall, but spirituall. But they being ravished with blinde greedinesse, have destroyed both themselves, their successors, and the Church.

11 At length the Bishop of Rome not contented with meane Lordships, first laid hand upon kingdomes, and afterward upon the very Empire. And that he may with some colour whatsoever it be, retaine the possession gotten by meere robbrie, he sometime boasteth that hee hath it by the law of God, he sometime pretendeth the gift of Constantine, sometime some other title. First I answer with Bernard. Admit that he doe by any other reason whatsoever, claime this unto him, yet he hath it not by apostolike right. For Peter could not give that which he had not: but hee gave to his successors that which hee had, the care of Churches. But when the Lord and master saith, that hee is not appointed iudge betweene two, a servant and scholler ought not to thinke scorn if he be not iudge of all men. But Bernard speaketh of civill iudgements. For he addeth: Therefore your power is in crimes, not in possessions; because for those and not for these yee have received the keyes of the kingdome of heaven. For which seemeth to thee the greater dignitie to forgive sinnes, or to divide lands? There is no comparison. These base and earthly things have Kings and Princes of the earth their iudges. Why doe yee invade the bounds of other? &c. Againe, Thou art made a superiour: (hee speaketh of Pope Eugenius) but whereunto? Not to beare Lordship, I thinke. Therefore how much soever we thinke of our selves, let us remember that there is a ministerie laid upon us, not a Lordship given us. Learne that thou hast need of a weed-hooke, not of a scepter, that thou maist doe the worke of a Prophet. Againe, it is plaine: Lordship is forbidden to the Apostles. Goe thou therefore, and presume to usurpe to thy selfe either being a Lord, an Apostleship: or being an Apostle, a Lordship. And by and by after: the forme of an Apostleship is this, Lordship is forbidden them, ministerie is hidden them. Whereas these things are so spoken by that man, that it is evident to all men that the very truth it selfe speaketh to them, yea whereas the very thing it selfe is manifest without all words: yet the Bishop of Rome was not ashamed in the Councell at Orleans to decree that the supreme power of both the swords belong to him in the law of God.

12 As for the gift of Constantine, they that be but meanelly practised in the histories of those times need not to be taught how much this is not onely fabulous, but also to bee laughed at. Not to passe over histories, Gregory himselfe is both a sufficient and most full witness hereof. For so oft as hee speaketh of the Emperour, he calleth him most noble Lord, & himselfe his unworthy servant. Againe, in another place: But let not our Lord by the earthly power be the sooner angry with the Priests: but with excellent consideration, for his sake whose servants they be, let him fo rule over them, that he also give them due reverence. Wee see how in common subjection hee would be accounted as one of the people. For he there pleadeth not any other mans cause but his owne. In another place, I trust in the almightie God, that he will give a long life to our godly Lords, and will dispose us under your hand according to his mercy. Neither have I therefore alleaged these things, for that it is my purpose thoroughly to discusse this question concerning the gift of Constantine: but onely that the Readers should see by the way how childishly the Romanists doe lie, when they goe about to challenge an earthly Empire to their Bishop. And so much the more foule is the shamelesse of Augustine Stenclus, which in such a despaired cause hath bene so bold to sell his travel and tongue to the Bishop of Rome. Valla (as it was yet heard for a man learned and of a sharpe wit) had strongly confuted that fable. And yet (as a man little exercised in ecclesiasticall matters) hee had not said all that might have made for that purpose. Stenclus burst in; and scattered stinking trifles to overpresse the cleere light. And truly he doth no lesse coldly handle the cause of his master, than if some merrie conceited fellow, faining himselfe to doe the same, would indeed take Vallas part. But verily it is a worthie cause, for which the Pope should hire such patrons for money: and no lesse worthy are those hired losels to be deceived of their hope of gaine, as it hapned to Engubinus.

13 But if any man require to know the time; since his fained Empire began to rise up, there are not yet passed five hundred yeeres, since the Bishops yet remained in subiection of the Princes, neither was the Pope created without authoritie of the Emperour. The Emperour Henry the fourth of that name, a light and rash man, and of no forecast, of great boldnesse and dissolute life, gave first occasion to Gregory the seventh to alter this order. For when he had in his court the Bishopricks of all Germany partly to be sold, and partly laid open for spoile: Hildebrand, which had received displeasure at his hand, caught hold of a goodly colour to revenge himselfe. But because hee seemed to pursue an honest and godly cause, hee was furthered with the favour of many. And Henry was other wise, by reason of his insolent manner of governing, hated of the most part of Princes. At the length Hildebrand, which called himselfe Gregory the seventh, as he was a filthy and naughtie man, bewraied the malice of his heart: which was the cause that hee was forsaken of many that had conspired with him. But he thus much prevailed, that his successors might freely without punishment not onely shake off the yoke, but also bring the Emperours in subiection to them. Hereunto was added that from thence forth there were many Emperours liker to Henry than to Julius Caesar: whom it was no hard thing to subdue, while they sat at home carelesse of all things and slothfull, when they had most need with vertue and lawfull meanes to repress the greedinesse of the Bishops. Thus wee see with what colour that same godly gift of Constantine is shadowed, wherby the Pope faineth that the Empire of the West was delivered unto him.

14 In the meane time the Popes ceased not, sometime with fraud, sometime with treason, and sometime with force to invade other mens dominions: and the very citie it selfe, which before was free, within a hundred and thirtie yeeres, or there about they brought into their subiection, till they grew to the same power which they have at this day: and for the obtaining or encreasing wherof, they have so troubled Christendome by the space of two hundred yeeres, (for they began before that they tooke to them the dominion of the citie) that they have almost destroyed it. In the old time when under Gregorie the keepers of the goods of the Church, did take possession of the lands which they reckoned to belong to the Church, and after the manner, of the leasing to the use of the Prince, did set titles upon them for token of claime. Gregory assembling a Councell of Bishops, inveighing fore against that prophane manner, asked whether they did not judge that Clerke accursed which did of his own will by writing of any title attempt to enter upon any possession. They all pronounced accursed. If to claime a peece of ground by writing of a title be in a Clearke an offence worthise of accursing: when whole two hundred yeeres together Popes doe practise nothing else but battels, shedding of blood, destructions of armies, lackings of some cities, rasing of other; overthrowes of nations, wastings of kingdomes, onely that they might catch hold of other mens possessions : what curfings can bee enough to punish such examples ? Truly it is very plaine that they seeke nothing lesse than the glorie of Christ. For if they of their owne will doe wholly resigne all the secular power that they have, therein is no danger to the glory of God, no danger to found doctrine, no danger to the safetie of the Church : but they are carried blinde and headlong with only greedinesse of dominion : because they thinke nothing safe, unless they may beare rule with rigorousnesse (as the Prophet saith) and with power.

15 To jurisdiction is annexed immunitie, which the Romish Cleargie tooke to themselves. For they thinke it against their dignitie, if they answer in personall causes before a temporall judge : and therein they thinke both the libertie and dignitie of the Church to consist, if they bee exempt from common judgement and lawes. But the old Bishops, which otherwise were most rigorous in defending the right of the Church, judged themselves and their order to be nothing hurt, if they were subject to them. And the godly Emperours, without gaine saying of any man, did alway call Clarke to their judgement seats so oft as neede required. For thus saith Constantine in his Epistle to the Nicomedians : If any of the Bishops shall indiscreetely disorder himselfe, his boldnesse shall be restrained by the execution of the minister of God, that is by my execution. And Valentinian saith : Good Bishops doe not speake against the power of the Emperour, but doe sincerely both keepe the commandments of God their great King, and also obey our lawes. At that time all men were perswaded of this without controversie. But Ecclesiasticall causes were referred to the judgement of the Bishop. As if any Clarke had offended nothing against the lawes, but onely was accused by the Canons : hee was not cited to the common judgement seate, but in that cause had the Bishop for his judge. Likewise if there were a question of Faith in controversie, or such a matter as properly pertained to the Church, the judgement thereof was committed to the Church. So is that to be understood, which Ambrose writeth to Valentinian : Your father of honourable memorie, not onely answered in word, but also decreed by lawes, that in a cause of Faith he ought to be judge that is neither unfit in office nor unlike in right. Again : If we have regard to the Scriptures, or old examples, who is there that can denie that in a cause of Faith, in a cause (I say) of Faith, Bishops are wont to judge of Christian Emperours, and not Emperours of Bishops ? Again : I would have come, O Emperour, to your consistorie, if either the Bishops or the people would have suffered me to goe : saying, that the cause of Faith ought to be debated in the Church before the people. Hee affirmeth verily that a spirituall cause, that is to say, the cause of religion, ought not to be drawne into the temporall court where prophane causes are pleaded : Worthily doe all men praise his constancie in this behalfe. And yet in a good cause hee proceedeth but thus farre, that if it come to violence and strong hand, hee saith that hee will give place. Willingly (saith he) I will not forsake the place committed unto me : but when I am enforced, I know not how to resist : for our armour are prayers and teares. Let us note the singular modestie and wisdom of the holy man, joynd with stoutnesse of courage and boldnesse. Justina the Emperours mother, because she could not drawe him to the Arrians side, practised to drive him from the government of the Church. And so should it have come to passe, if hee had come when hee was called to the palace to pleade his cause. Therefore hee denieth the Emperour to bee a competent judge of so great a controversie. Which manner of doing both the necessitie of that time, and the continuall nature of the matter required. For hee judged that hee ought rather to die, than that such an example should by his consent bee given to posteritie : and yet if violence be offered, hee thinketh not of resistance. For hee denieth it to bee Bishoprike, to defend the Faith and right of the Church with armes. But in other causes he sheweth himselfe readie to doe whatsoever the Emperour shall commaund him. If hee demand tribute (saith he) we denie it not : the lands of the Church doe pay tribute. If hee aske lands hee hath power to claime them, none of us resisteth. After the same manner also speaketh Gregorie : I am not ignorant (saith hee) of the minde of our most noble soveraigne Lord, that hee useth not to intermeddle in causes pertaining to Priests, least he should in any thing bee burdened with our finnes. Hee doth not generally exclude the Emperoure from judging of Priests : but he saith that there be certaine causes, which he ought to leave to the judgement of the Church.

16 And by this very exception the holy men sought nothing else, but that Princes lesse zealous of religion should not with tyrannous violence and willfulnesse interrupt the Church in doing her office. For neither did they disallow, if Princes sometime did use their authoritie in Ecclesiasticall matters, so that it were done to preserve the order of the Church, nor to trouble it, to stablish discipline, nor to dissolve it. For sith the Church hath not the power of compelling, nor ought to require it (I speake of civill constraining:) it is the office of godly Kings and Princes to maintaine religion with laws proclamations, and judiciall proceedings. After this manner, when the Emperour Maurice had commanded certaine Bishops that they should receive their fellow Bishops that were neighbours and driven our of the barbarous nations: Gregorie confirmeth that commandement, and exhorteth them to obey it. And when hee himselfe is admonished by the same Emperour to come to atonement with John the Bishop of Constantinople, he doth indeed render a reason why he ought not to be blamed: yet he doth not boast of immunitie from the secular Court, but rather promiseth that hee will be obedient, so farre as his conscience will give him leave: and therewithall he saith this, that Maurice did as became a godly Prince, when hee gave such commandements to the Priests.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER.

Of the discipline of the Church, whereof the chiefe use is in the censures and excommunication.

THE discipline of the Church, the entreating whereof wee have deferred unto this place, is briefly to be declared, that we may at length passe over to the rest. But that same for the most part hangeth upon the power of the keyes and spirituall jurisdiction. That this may bee the more easily understood, let us divide the Church into two principall degrees, that is to say the Clergie, and the people. Clearkes I call by the usuall name those that execute publike ministerie in the Church. First we will speake of common discipline, to which all ought to bee subject: then we will come to the Clergie, which beside that common discipline, have a severall discipline by themselves. But because many for hatred of discipline doe abhorre the very name thereof, let them heare this: If no fellowship, yea no house, though it have but a small household, can be kept in right state without discipline, the same is much more necessarie in the Church, whose state ought to be most orderly of all. Therefore as the doctrine of Christ which bringeth salvation, is the soule of the Church, so discipline is in steede of sinewes therein: whereby it is brought to passe, that the members of the body hang together every one in his fit place. Wherefore whosoever doe either desire to have discipline taken away, or hinder the restoring thereof, whether they doe it of set purpose or by unadvisednesse, verily they seeke the extreme dissolution of the Church. For what shall be tide, if what is lustfull be lawfull to every man? But so would it be, if there were not with the preaching of doctrine adjoynd private admonishments, corrections, and such other helpes which sustaine doctrine and suffer it not to be idle: discipline therefore is as it were a bridle wherewith they may be holden backe and tamed, which coltishly resist againe Christ: or as it were a pricke, wherewith they that are not willing enough may be stirred up: and sometime, as a fatherly rodde, wherewith they which have more grievously fallen, may be chastised mercifully and according to the mildenesse of the spirit of Christ. Sith therefore wee doe now see at hand certaine beginnings of a horrible wastnesse in the Church, because there is no care nor order to keepe the people in awe, very necessarie crieth out that there is neede of remedie. But this is the onely remedie, which both Christ hath commanded, and hath alway beene used among the godly.

2 The first foundation of discipline is, that private admonitions should have place: that is to say, that if any man of his owne accord doe not his dutie, if he behave himselfe licentiously, or live not honestly, or have committed any thing worthie of blame, blame, hee should suffer himselfe to bee admonished: and that every man should studie to admonish his brother when occasion shall require. But specially let the Pastors and Priests bee watchfull to doe this, whose office is not onely to preach to the people, but in every house to admonish and exhort if at any time they doe not sufficiently prevaile by generall doctrine as Paul teacheth, when he rehearseth that hee taught privately and in houses, and protesteth that he is cleane from the blood of all men, because hee hath not ceased with teares day and night to admonish every one. For doctrine doth then obtaine force and authoritie, when the minister not onely doth declare to all together what their dutie is to Christ, but also hath power and order to require the keeping thereof of them whom hee marketh to be either not obedient to doctrine, or slothfull. If any man doe either stubbornly refuse, or in going forward in his faults, doe despise such admonishments: when hee hath bene the second time admonished with witness called to it, Christ commandeth them to be called to the judgement of the Church, which is the assemblie of Elders: and that there they should be more grievously admonished as it were by publike authority, that if he reverence the Church he may submit himselfe and obey. But if hee be not hereby subdued, but doe continue in his wickednesse, then hee commandeth him, as a despiser of the Church, to be put away from the fellowship of the faithfull.

3 But because hee speaketh here onely of secret faults, we must make this division: that some finnes bee private, and some publike or openly manifest. Of the first sort Christ saith to everie private man, Reprove him betweene thee and him alone. Of manifest finnes, Paul saith to Timothie. Reprove him before all men, that the rest may have feare. For Christ had said before, If thy brother have offended against thee. Which words (against thee) unless thou wilt bee contentious, thou canst not otherwise understand than under thine owne secret knowledge, so that there bee no more privie to it. But the same thing which the Apostle teacheth Timothie concerning the rebuking of them openly that sinne openly, hee himselfe followed in Peter. For when Peter sinned even to publike offence, he did not admonish him apart by himselfe, but brought him forth into the sight of the Church. Therefore this shall be the right order of doing, if in secret faults we goe forward according to those degrees that Christ hath set: but in manifest faults, wee immediately proceed to the Churches solemne rebuking, if the offence be publike.

4 Let this also be another distinction: that of finnes some be defaults, other some be wicked doings, or hainous offences. To the correcting of this latter sort, not onely admonishment or rebuking is to be used, but also a severe remedie: as Paul sheweth which not onely chastised with word the Corinthian that had committed incest, but also punished him with excommunication; so soone as hee was certified of his wicked deed. Now therefore wee begin better to see how the spirituall jurisdiction of the Church: which punisheth finnes according to the word of the Lord, is the best maintenance of health, and foundation of order, and bond of unitie. Therefore when the Church doth banish out of her company manifest adulterers, whoremongers, thieves, robbers, seditious persons, perjured men, false witnesses, and such other, againe, obstinate men, which being orderly admonished even of small faults doe scorne God and his judgement, she taketh nothing upon herselfe without reason, but executeth the jurisdiction given her of the Lord. Moreover, that none should despise such judgement of the Church, or lightly regard that hee is condemned by the consenting voices of the faithfull: the Lord hath testified, that the same is nothing else but a pronouncing of his owne sentence, and that whatsoever they doe in earths confirmed in heaven. For they have the word of the Lord, whereby they may condemne the froward: they have the word, whereby they may receive the repentant into favour. They I say that trust that without this bond of discipline Churches may long stand, are deceived in opinion: unless perhaps wee may want that helpe which the Lord foresaw that it should be necessarie for us. And truly how great is the necessitie thereof, shall bee better perceived by the manifold use of it.

5 There bee three ends which the Church hath respect unto in such corrections and excommunication: The first is, that they should not, to the dishonour of God,

Ecclesiastical

bee named among Christians, that lead a filthy and sinful life, as though his holy Church were a conspiracie of naughty and wicked men. For sith the Church is the body of Christ, it cannot bee defiled with such filthy and rotten members, but that some shame must come to the head. Therefore that there should not bee any such thing in the Church, whereby his holy name may be spotted with any reproach, they are to be driven out of her household, by whose dishonesty any slander might redound to the name of Christians. And herein also is consideration to bee had of the Supper of the Lord, that it be not prophaned with giving it to all without choise. For it is most true, that he to whom the distribution of it is committed, if hee wittingly and willingly admit an unworthy man whom he might lawfully put backe, is as guilty of sacriledge, as if hee did give abroad the Lords body to dogs. Wherefore Chrysofome grievously inveigheth against the Priests, which while they feare the power of great men, dare debar no man. The blood (saith he) shall be required at your hands. If ye feare man, hee shall laugh you to scorne: but if ye feare God, ye shall be revered also among men. Let us not feare maces, nor purple, nor crownes: we have here a great power. I verily will rather deliver mine owne body to death, and suffer my blood to bee shed, than I will bee made partaker of this desling. Therefore lest this most holy myserie bee spotted with slander, in the distributing thereof choise is greatly requisite: which yet cannot be had but by the jurisdiction of the Church. The second end is, lest (as it is wont to come to passe) with the continuall company of the evill, the good should be corrupted. For (such is our ready inclination to goe out of the way) there is nothing easier than for us to be led by evill examples from the right course of life. This use the Apostle touched, when hee commanded the Corinthians to put the incestuous man out of their company. A little leaven (saith he) corrupteth the whole lump of dough. And hee foresaw herein so great danger, that hee forbad him even from all fellowship. If any brother (saith he) among you be named either a whoremonger, or a covetous man, or a worshipper of Idols, or a drunkard, or an evill speaker, with such a one I grant you not leave so much as to eat. The third end is, that they themselves confounded with shame may begin to repent of their filthinesse. So it is profitable for them also to have their owne wickednesse chastised, that with feeling of the rod they may be awaked, which otherwise by tender bearing with them would have become more obstinate. The same thing doth the Apostle meane when hee saith thus: If any doe not obey our doctrine, marke him, and keepe no company with him, that hee may be ashamed. Again in another place, when he writeth that hee hath delivered the Corinthian to satan, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord: that is (as I expound it) that he went into a damnation for a time, that he might be saved for ever. But he therefore saith that hee delivereth him to Satan, because the divell is out of the Church as Christ is in the Church. For whereas some doe refer it to a certaine vexing of the flesh, I thinke that to be very uncertaine.

6 When these ends bee set forth, now it remaineth to see how the Church executeth this part of discipline which consisteth in jurisdiction. First let us keepe the division above set, that of sins some bee publike, and other some be private or more secret. Publike are those that have not onely one or two witnesses, but are committed openly and with the offence of the whole Church. Secret I call those, not which are altogether hidden from men, as are the sinnes of hypocrites; for those come not into the judgement of the Church, but those of the meane kind which are not without witnesses, and yet are not publike. The first kind requireth not those degrees which Christ rehearseth: but when any such thing appeareth, the Church ought to doe her duty in calling the sinner and correcting him according to the proportion of the offence. In the second kind according to the rule of Christ, they come not to the Church till there be also obstinacie added. When it is once come to knowledge, than is that other division to be noted between wicked doings and defaults. For in lighter sinnes there is not to be used so great severity, but chastisement of words sufficeth, and the same gentle and fatherly, which may not harden nor confound the sinner, but bring him home to himselfe, that hee may more rejoyce than bee sory that hee was corrected. But it is meet that hainous offences bee chastised with sharper remedy. For it is not enough, if he

that by doing a wicked deed of evill example hath grievously offended the Church, should be chastised onely with words, but hee ought for a time to bee deprived of the communion of the supper, till hee have given assurance of his repentance. For against the Corinthian Paul useth not onely rebuking of words, but driveth him out of the Church, and blameth the Corinthians that they had so long borne him. The old and better Church kept this order, when rightfull government flourished. For if any man had done any wicked deed wherupon was growne offence, first hee was commended to abstaine from partaking of the holy supper, then both to humble himselfe before God, and to testifie his repentance before the Church. There were also certaine solemne usages, which were enjoined to them that had fallen, to be tokens of their repentance. When they had so done, that the Church was satisfied, then by laying on of hands hee was received into favour. Which receiving is oftentimes called of Cyprian peace, who also briefly describeth this usage. They doe penance (saith he) in a certaine full time: then they come to confession, and by the laying on of hands of the Bishop and his Clergie they receive power to come to the communion. Howbeit the Bishop and his Clergie had so the ruling of reconciliation, that they did therewithall require the consent of the people: as he sheweth in another place.

7 From this discipline there was no man exempted, that even the Princes together with the common people did submit themselves to beare it. And rightfully, sith it was evident that it was the discipline of Christ, to whom it is meet that all keepers and crownes of Kings be submitted. So when Theodosius was deprived by Ambrose of power to come to the communion because of the slaughter committed at Thessalonia, hee threw downe all the roiall ornament wherewith hee was clothed: hee openly in the Church bewailed his sinne, which had crept upon him by fraud of other men: hee craved pardon with groning and teares. For great Kings ought not to thinke this to bee any dishonour to them, if they humbly throw downe themselves before Christ the King of Kings, neither ought it to displeasethem that they bee judged by the Church. For sith in their court they heare nothing else but meere flatteries, it is more then necessary for them to bee rebuked of the Lord by the mouth of the Priests. But rather they ought to wish, that the Priests should not spare them, that the Lord may spare them. In this place I omit to speake by whom this jurisdiction is to be exercised, because it is spoken of in another place. This only I adde that that is the lawfull manner of proceeding in excommunicating a man which Paul sheweth: if the Elders do it not onely by themselves, but with the Church knowing and allowing it: that is, in such sort that the multitude of the people may not governe the doing, but may marke it as a witnesse and a keeper that nothing should bee done of a few by wilfull affection. But the whole manner of doing, beside the calling upon the name of God, ought to have such gravity, as may resemble the presence of Christ, that it may be undoubted that hee there sitteth for ruler of his owne judgement.

8 But this ought not to bee passed over, that such severity becommeth the Church as is joined with the spirit of mildnesse. For wee must alway diligently beware (as Paul teacheth) that hee which is punished bee not swallowed up of sorrow: for so should of a remedy be madea destruction. But out of the end may better bee gathered a rule of moderation. For whereas this is required in excommunication that the sinner should bee brought to repentance, and evill examples taken away, lest either the name of Christ should bee evill spoken of, or other men bee provoked to follow them: if we shall have anie to these things, we shall be able easily to judge how far severity ought to proceed, and where it ought to end. Therefore when the sinner giveth a testimony of his repentance, and doth by his testimony as much as in him lieth, blot out the offence: hee is not to be enforced any further: but if he be enforced, rigoroufnesse doth then exceed measure. In which behalfe the immeasurable severity of the old fathers cannot bee excused, which both disagreed from the prescribed order of the Lord, and also was marvellously dangerous. For when they charged a sinner with solemne penance, and deprivation from the holy communion sometime for seven yeeres, sometime foure yeeres, sometime three yeeres, sometime for their whole life: what other thing could follow thereof, but either great hypocrisie or most great desperation? wife whereas no man that had fallen the second time was admitted to second penance but was cast out of the Church even to the end of his life : that was neither profitable nor agreeing to reason. Therefore whosoever shall weigh the matter with sound judgement, shall herein perceive want of their discretion. Howbeit I doe here rather disallow the publike manner, than accuse all them that used it, whereas it is certaine that many of them misliked it : but they did therefore suffer it, because they could not amend it. Truly, Cyprian declareth, how much beside his owne will he was so rigorous. Our patience (saith he) and easines and gentlenesse is ready to them that come. I wish all to returne into the Church: I wish all our fellow souldiers to be inclosed within the tents of Christ and in the houses of God the Father. I forgive all things, I dissemble many things, for zeale and desire to gather brotherhood together, I examine not with full judgement those things that are committed against God, in pardoning defaultes more than I ought, I am my selfe almost in default, I doe with ready and full love embrace them that returne with repentance, confessing their sinnes with humble and plaine satisfaction. Chrysostome is somewhat harder, and yet he saith thus: If God bee so kind; why will his Priest seeme so rigorous? Moreover wee know what gentlenesse Augustine used toward the Donatists, in somuch that he stucked not to receive into Bishopricke those that had returned from schisme, even immediately after their repentance. But because a contrary order had growne in force, they were compelled to leave their owne judgement to follow it.

9 But as this mildnesse is required in the whole body of the Church, that it should punish them that are fallen, mercifully and not to the extremity of rigour, but rather according to the precept of Paul, should confirme charity toward them; so every private man for himselfe ought to temper himselfe to this mercifulnesse and gentlenesse. Therefore it is not out part to wipe out of the number of the elect such as are driven out of the Church, or to despaire of them as though they were already lost. Wee may indeede judge them strangers from the Church, and therefore strangers from Christ; but that is only during the time that they abide in divorce. But if then also they shew a greater resemblance of stubbornesse than of gentlenesse, yet let us commit them to the judgement of the Lord; hoping better of them in time to come than we see in time present, and let us not therefore cease to pray to God for them, and (to comprehend all in one word) let us not condemne to death the person it selfe, which is in the hand and judgement of God alone, but let us rather weigh by the law of the Lord of what sort every mans works be. Which rule while we follow, we rather stand to the judgement of God than pronounce our owne. Let us not take to our selves more libertie in judging, unlesse we will binde the power of God within bounds, and appoint a law to his mercy, at whose pleasure when he thinketh it good, very evil men are turned into very good, strangers are grafted and forraignes are chosen into the Church. And this the Lord doth, thereby to mocke out the opinion of men, and rebate their rashnesse: which if it be not restrained, presumeth to take to it selfe power of judging more than it ought.

10 For whereas Christ promiseth that that shall be bound in heaven; which they that be his shall bind in earth, he limiteth the power of binding, to the censure of the Church: by which they that are excommunicate, are not throwne into everlasting ruine and damnation: but hearing their lives and manners to be condemned, they are also certified of their owne everlasting condemnation, unlesse they repent. For excommunication herein differeth from accusing, that accusing taking away all pardon doth condemne a man and adjudge him to eternal destruction: excommunication rather revengeth and punisheth manners. And though the same doe also punish the man, yet it doth so punish him, that in forewarning him of his damnation to come, it doth call him backe to salvation. If that be obtained, reconciliation and restoring to the communion is ready. But accusing is either very sildome or never in use. Therefore, although Ecclesiasticall discipline, permitteth not to live familiarly, or to have friendly conversation with them that bee excommunicate: yet we ought to endeavour by such meanes as we may, that returning to amendment, they may returne to the fellowship and unity of the Church: as the Apostle also teacheth. Doe not (saith he) thinke them as enemies, but correct them as brethren. Unlesse this gentleness be kept as well privately as in common, there is danger lest from discipline wee forth with fall to butchery.

11 This also is principally required to the moderation of discipline, which Augustine intreateth of in disputing against the Donatists: that neither private men, if they see faults nor diligently enough corrected by the Councell of Elders, should therefore by and by depart from the Church: nor the Pastors themselves, if they cannot according to their hearts desire purge all things that neede amendment, should therefore throw away the ministry, or with untoward rigorousnesse trouble the whole Church. For it is most true which hee writeth: that he is free and discharged from curse, who-soever hee be that either by rebuking ameadeth what hee can: or what hee cannot amend, excludeth, saving the bond of peace: or what hee cannot exclude, saving the bond of peace, he doth disallow with equity, and beare with steadfastnesse. He rendereth a reason thereof in another place: because all godly order and manner of Ecclesiasticall discipline ought alway to have respect unto the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace: which the Apostle commandeth to be kept by our bearing one with another, and when it is not kept, the medicine of punishment beginneth to be not only superfluous, but also hurtfull, and therefore ceaseth to be a medicine. He that (saith he) doth diligently thinke upon these things doth neither in preserving of unity neglect the severity of discipline, nor doth with immeasurable of correction breake the bond of fellowship. Hee granteth indeed that not only the Pastors ought to travaile to this point, that there may remaine no fault in the Church, but also that every man ought to his power to endeavour thereunto: and hee plainly declareth that hee which neglecteth to monish, rebuke, and correct the evil, although hee doe not favour them, nor sinne with them, yet is guilty before the Lord. But if hee be in such degree, that he may also sever them from the partaking of Sacraments, and doth it not, now hee sinneth not by anothers evil, but by his owne. Only he willet it to be done, with using of discretion, which the Lord also requireth, lest while the tares be in rooting out, the corne be hurt. Hereupon he gathereth out of Cyprian, Let a man therefore mercifully correct what he can: and what hee cannot, let him patiently suffer, and with love grone and lament it.

12 This he saith because of the precisenesse of the Donatists, who when they saw faults in the Churches which the Bishops did indeed rebuke with words, but not punish with excommunication, (because they thought that they could this way nothing prevail) did sharply inveigh against the Bishops as betrayers of discipline, and did with an ungodly schisme divide themselves from the flocke of Christ. As the Anabaptists doe at this day, which when they acknowledge no congregation to be of Christ, unlesse it doe in every point shine with Angellike perfection, doe under pretence of their zeale overthrow all edification. Such (saith Augustine) not for hatred of other mens wickednesses, but for desire to maintaine their owne contentions, doe covet either wholly to draw away, or at lest to divide the weake people snared with the boasting of their name: they swelling with pride, mad with stubbornesse, traitorous with slanders, troublesome with seditions, lest it should openly appeare that they want the light of truth, doe pretend a shadow of rigorous severity: and those things which in Scripture are commanded to be done with moderate healing for correcting of the faults of brethren, preserving the sincerenesse of love, and keeping the unity of peace, they abuse to sacriledge of schisme and occasion of cutting off. So doth Satan transforme himselfe into an Angell of light, when by occasion as it were of just severity hee persuadeth unmercifull cruelty, coveting nothing else but to corrupt and breake the bond of peace and unity: which bond remaining fast among Christians, all his forces are made weake to hurt, his traps of treasons are broken, and his counsels of overthrowing doe vanish away.

13 This one thing hee chiefly commendeth, that if the infection of sinne have entered into the whole multitude, then the severe mercy of lively discipline is necessary. For (saith he) the devises of separation are vaine, and hurtfull and full of sacriledge, because they are ungodly and proud, and doe more trouble the weake good ones, than they they amend the stout evill ones. And that which he there reacheth other, hee himselfe also faithfully followed. For writing to Aurelius Bishop of Cartbage, he complaineth that drunkenesse which is so fore condemned in Scriptures, doth range unpunished in Africa: and he adviseth him, that assembling a Councell of Bishops hee should provide remedy for it. Hee addeth by and by after, These things (as I thinke) are taken away not roughly, but hardly, not after an imperious manner, but more by teaching than by commanding, more by admonishing than by threatening. For so must wee deale with a multitude of sinners, but severity is to be exercised upon the finnes of few. Yet hee doth not meane that Bishops should therefore winke or hold their peace at publike faults, because they cannot severely punish them: as hee himselfe after ward expoundeth it: But hee willeth that the measure of correction bee so tempered, that so far as may be, it may rather bring health than destruction to the body. And therefore at length hee concludeth thus: Wherefore both this commandment of the Apostle is in no wise to be neglected, to sever the evill, when it may be done without perill of breaking of peace: and this is also to be kept, that bearing one with another, we should endeavour to preserve unity of the Spirit, in the bond of peace.

14 The part that remaineth of discipline, which properly is not contained in the power of keyes, standeth in this, that according to the necessity of times the Pastors should exhort the people either to fasting, or to common supplications, or to other exercises of humility, repentance, and faith, of which things there is neither time, nor measure, nor forme prescribed by the word of God, but is left in the judgement of the Church. The observing of this part also, as it is profitable, so hath always been used of the old Church even from the very Apostles. Howbeit the Apostles themselves were not the first authors of them, but they tooke example out of the law and the Prophets. For wee see that there so oft as any waighty businesse hapned, the people were called together, common prayers enjoyed, and fasting commanded. Therefore the Apostles followed that which both was not new to the people of God, and they foresaw that it should be profitable. Likewise is to be thought of other exercises, where with the people may either bee stirred up to their duty, or bee kept in awe and obedience. There are examples each where in holy histories, which we need not to gather together. In summe this is to be holden, that so oft as there hapneth any controversie of religion, which must be determined either by a Synod or by Ecclesiasticall judgement, so oft as they be about choosing of a minister, finally, so oft as any hard matter or of great importance is in doing: againe, when there appeare tokens of the wrath of God, as pestilence, and war, and famine: this is a holy ordinance and profitable for all ages that the Pastors should exhort the people to common fasting, and to extraordinary prayer. If any man doe not allow the testimonies which may be alleaged out of the old Testament, as though they were not meet for the Christian Church, it is certaine that the Apostles also did the same. Howbeit of prayers I thinke there will scarcely any be found that will move any question. Therefore let us say somewhat of fasting: because many when they understand not what profit it hath, doe judge it not so necessary: some also doe utterly refuse it as superstitious: and when the use of it is not well knowne, it is easie to slide into superstition.

15 Holy and true fasting hath three ends. For wee use it, either to make leane and subdue the flesh, that it should not wax wanton, or that we may be better disposed to prayers and holy meditations, or that it should be a testimony of our humbling before God, when wee be willing to confesse our guiltinesse before him. For the first end hath not so often place in common fasting, because all men have not like estate of bodie, nor like health: therefore it rather agreeth with private fasting. The second end is common to both, for as well the whole Church as every one of the faithfull hath need of such preparation to prayer. The third also is likewise common. For it shall sometime befall that God shall strike some nation with war, or pestilence, or with some calamity. In such a common scourge the whole people must accude themselves, and openly confesse their owne guiltinesse. But if the hand of the Lord doe strike any private man, he ought to doe the same, either alone, or with his owne family. That standeth chiefly in the affection of the mind. But when the mind is affected as it ought to be, it is scarcely possible, but that it will breake out into outward testifying: and then chiefly if it turne to common edifying, that altogether in openly confessing their sinne should yeeld praise of righteousness to God, and every one mutually exhort other with their example.

16 Wherefore fasting, as it is a signe of humbling, hath more often use publicly, than among private men, howsoever it be common, as is already said. Therefore as touching the discipline whereof we now intreat: so oft as we must make supplication to God for any great matter, it were expedient to command fasting together with praier. So when the Antiochians laid hands upon Paul and Barnabas, that they might the better commend to God their ministerie which was of so great importance, they joined fasting with praier: So both they afterward, when they made ministers over Churches, were wont to pray with fasting. In this kind of fasting they had regard to none other thing, but that they might be made fresher and more uncombred to pray. Verily this we find by experience, that when the belly is full, the mind is not so lifted up to God, that it can both with hearty and fervent affection bee carried to praier, and continue in it. So is that to be understood which Luke rehearseth of Anna, that shee served the Lord in fastings and prayers. For hee doth not set the worshipping of God in fasting: but signifieth that the holy woman did after that manner exercise her selfe to continuance of prayer. Such was the fasting of Nehemias when he did with earnestly bent zeale pray to God for the deliverance of his people. For this cause Paul saith that the faithfull doe well, if they abstaine for a time from their wedding bed, that they may the more freely apply praier and fasting. Where joining fasting to praier in stead of a helpe, he putteth us in mind that it is of no value but so far as it is referred to this end. Againe, when in the same place hee giveth a rule to married folkes, that they should mutually render good will one to another, it is plaine that he doth not speake of daily prayers, but of such prayers as require a more earnest intentionesse.

17 Againe, if either pestilence, or famine, or war begin to range abroad, or if any calamity otherwise seeme to hang over any country and people: then also it is the duty of Pastors to exhort the Church to fasting, that they may humbly beseech the Lord to turne away his wrath. For hee giveth warning that hee is prepared and in a manner armed to revenge, when he maketh any danger to appeare. Therefore as accused men in time past with long hanging beard, with uncombed haire, with black array, were wont humbly to abase themselves, to procure the mercy of the judge: so when we are accused before the judgement seat of God, it behooveth both for his glory, and for common edification, and also is profitable and healthfull for us, that wee should in piteous array crave to escape his severity. And that this was used among the people of Israell, it is easie to gather by the words of Joel. For when he commandeth a trumpet to be sounded, the congregation to be gathered together, fasting to be appointed, and the rest that follow: he speaketh of things received in common custome. Hee had a litle before said, that examination is appointed of the wicked deeds of the people, and had declared that the day of judgement was now at hand: and had summoned them being accused to plead their cause: then hee crieth out that they should haste to sackcloth and ashes, to weeping and fasting: that is, that they should also with outward testifying throw themselves downe before the Lord. Sackcloth and ashes peradventure did more agree with those times: but there is no doubt that the calling together, and weeping, and fasting and such like doe like wise pertaine also to our age, so oft as the state of our things doth so require. For sith it is a holy exercise, both to humble men, and to confesse humility, why should we lesse use it than the old people did in like necessity? We read that not only the people of Israell, which were informed and instructed by the word of God, but also the Ninivites which had no doctrine, but the preaching of Jonas, fasted in token of sorrow. What cause is there therefore why we should not doe the same? But it is an outward ceremony, which was with the rest ended in Christ. Yea rather even at this day it is, as it alway hath been, a very good helpe to the faithfull, and a profitable admonition, to stir up themselves, that they should not with too great carelesnesse and sluggishnesse more and more provoke God when they

they are chastised with his scourges. Therefore Christ when hee excuseth his Apostle s for that they fast not, doth not say that fasting is abrogate : but hee appointeth it to times of calamity, and joineh it with mourning. The time shall come (saith he) when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them.

18 But that there should be no errour in the name, let us define what fasting is. For wee doe not here understand by it onely abstinence and sparing in meate and drinke, but a certaine other thing. The life of the godly ought indeed to be tempered with honest sparing and sobriety, that so neere as is possible, it may in the whole course thereof beare a certaine resemblance of fasting. But beside this there is another fasting for a time, when wee withdraw any thing of our wonted diet, either for one day or for a certaine time, and doe charge our selves with a straighter and severer abstinence in diet than ordinary. This consisteth in three things, in time, in quality of meats, and in smallnesse of quantity. I meane by time, that wee should use those doings fasting, for which fasting is ordained. As for example, if a man fast for common prayer : that he come empty unto it. Quality standeth in this, that all daintinesse should be absent, and being content with common and baser meats, wee should not stir up appetite with delicacies. The rule of quantity is in this, that we eat more sparingly and lesse than we be wont, only for necessity, and not also for pleasure.

19 But we must alway principally beware, that no superstition creepe upon us, as it hath heretofore hapned to the great hurt of the Church. For it were much better that there were no use at all of fasting than that it should bee diligently kept, and in the meane time be corrupted with false and hurtfull opinions, whereunto the world sometime falleth, unless the Pastors doe with great faithfulness and wisdom prevent it. The first point therefore is, that they should alway enforce that which Joel teacheth, that they should cut their harts and not their garments : that is, that they should admonish the people, that God doth not greatly esteeme fasting of it selfe, unless there be inward affection of the heart, a true misliking of sinne and of himselfe, true humbling, and true sorrow through the feare of God : yea that fasting is profitable for no other cause, but for that it is joined to these as an inferior helpe. For God abhorreth nothing more than when men in setting signes and an outward shew in stead of innocencie of heart, doe labour with false colour to deceive themselves. Therefore Esa most sharply inveigheth against this hypocrisie, that the Jewes thought they had satisfied God, when they had only fasted, howsoever they did nourish ungodlinesse and uncleane thoughts in their heart. Is it (saith he) such a fasting which the Lord requireth ? and so forth as followeth. Therefore the hypocriticall fasting is not only an unprofitable and superfluous wearying, but also a great abomination. Another evill neere unto this is chiefly to be taken heed of, that it bee not taken for a meritorious worke, or a forme of worshipping God. For sith it is a thing of it selfe indifferent, and hath no value but by reason of those ends which it ought to have respect unto, it is a most hurtfull superstition, to confound it with the works commanded of God and necessary of themselves without other respect. Such was in old time the dotage of the Manichees : whom when Augustine confuteth, he doth plainly enough teach, that fasting is to be judged by no other ends than those which I have spoken of, and is no other wise allowed of God, unless it be referred to the same. The third error is indeed not so ungodly, yet it is perillous : to require the keeping of it more precisely and rigorously as it were one of the chiefe duties, and so to advance it with immeasurable praises, that men should thinke they have done some excellent thing when they have fasted. In which behalfe I dare not altogether excuse the old fathers, but that they have sowed some seeds of superstition, and given occasion to the tyranny which hath risen since. There are found indeed sometimes in them sound and wise sentences, of fasting, but afterward we now and then meet with immeasurable praises of fasting which advance it among the chiefe vertues.

20 And at that time the superstitious observing of Lent was each where growne in use : because both the common people thought that they therein did some notable service to God, and the Pastors did commend it for a holy following of Christ : whereas it is plaine, that Christ did not fast to prescribe an example to other, but that in so beginning the preaching of the Gospell, he might in very deede prove that it was not a doctrine of men, but descended from heaven. And it is marvellous; that so grosse an error, which is confuted with so many and so evident reasons; could creepe into men of so sharp judgement. For Christ did not fast oft (which hee must needs have done if hee would have set forth a law of yeerely fasting) but onely once when he prepared himselfe to the publishing of the Gospell. And hee fasted not after the manner of men, as it was meete that hee should have done if he would have provoked men to follow him: but rather he sheweth an example, whereby hee may rather draw men to wonder at him than stirre them up to follow him. Finally there is none other cause of this fasting, than of that which Moses fasted when hee received the law at the hand of the Lord. For sith that miracle was shewed in Moses to stablish the authoritie of the Law, it ought not to have beene omitted in Christ, least the Gospell should seeme to give place to the law. But since that time it never came in any mans miade under colour of following of Moses to require such a forme of fasting in the people of Israel. Neither did any of the holy Prophets and Fathers follow it, when yet they had mind and zeale enough to godly exercises. For, that which is said of Holiss, that he passed forty daies without meate and drinke, tended to no other end but that the people should know that hee was stirred up to bee a restorer of the law from which almost all Israel had departed. Therefore it was a meere wrongfull zeale and full of superstition, that they did set forth fasting with the title and colour of following of Christ. Howbeit in the manner of fasting there was then great diversitie, as Cassiodorus rehearseth out of Socrates in the ninth booke of his historie. For the Romanes (saith he) had but three weekes, but in these three there was a continuall fasting, except on the Sunday, and Saturday. The Slavonians and Grecians had six weekes: other had seven: but their fasting was by divided times. And they disagreed no lesse in difference of meates. Some did eat nothing but bread and water: some added herbes: some did not forbear fish and fowles: some had no difference in meates. Of this diversitie Augustine also maketh mention in the latter Epistle to Immari.

21 Then followed worse times, and to the preposterous zeale of the people was added both ignorance and rudenesse of the Bishops, and a lust to beare rule, and a tyrannous rigour. There were made wicked lawes, which straine consciences with pernicious bonds. The eating of flesh was forbidden, as though it defiled a man. There were added opinions full of sacriledge one upon another, till they came to the bottome of all errors. And that no perversnesse should bee omitted, they began with a most fond pretence of abstinence to mocke wih God. For in the most exquisite daintinesse of fare is sought the praise of fasting: no delicates doe then suffice, there is never greater plentie, or diversitie or sweetnesse of meates. In such and so gorgious preparation they thinke that they serve God rightly. I speake not how they never more foully glut themselves, than when they would bee counted most holie men. Briefely, they count it the greatest worshipping of God to abstaine from flesh, and (these excepted) to flow full of all kinde of dainties. On the other side they thinke this the extremest ungodlinesse, and such as scarcely may bee recompensed wih death, if a man taste never so little a peece of bacon or unfavorie flesh wih browne bread. Hierome telleth, that even in his time were some that wih such follies did mocke wih God: which because they would not eat oyle, caused most daintie meates from every place to bee brought them: yea to oppresse nature by violence, they abtained from drinking of wvater, but caused sweete and costly suppings to be made for them, which they did not drinke out of a cup, but out of a shell. Which fault was then in a few, at this day it is a common fault among all rich men that they fast to no other end but that they may banker more sumptuously and daintily. But I will not waste many words in a matter not doubtfull. Onely this I say, that both in fasting and in all other parts of discipline, the Papists have nothing right, nothing pure, nothing well framed and orderly, whereby they may have any occasion to be proud, as though there were any thing remaining among them worthie of praise.

22 There followeth another part of discipline, which peculiarly belongeth to the Clergie. That is contained in the Canons which the old Bishops have made over themselves and their order. As these bee : that no Clearke should give himselfe to hunting; to dicing, nor to banquetting : that none should occupie usurie, or marchandise : that none should bee present at wanton dancings : and such other ordinances. There were also added penalties whereby the authoritie of the Canons was stablished, that none should breake them unpunished. For this end to every Bishop was committed the government of his owne Cleargie, that they should rule their Clerks according to the Canons, and hold them in their dutie. For this end were ordained yearly overseings and Synods, that if any were negligent in his dutie, hee should bee admonished : if any had offended, hee should bee punished according to the measure of his offence. The Bishops also themselves had yearly their provinciall Synodes, and in the old time yearly two Synodes, by which they were judged if they had done any thing beside their duty. For if any Bishop were too hard or violent against his Cleargie, they might appeale to those Synodes, although there were but one that complained. The severest punishment was that he which had offended should bee removed from his office, and for a time bee deprived of the communion. And because that same was a continuall order, they never used to dismisse any Synode, but that they appointed a place and time for the next Synode. For, to gather a generall Councell, pertained to the Emperour onely, as all the old summonings of Councils do testifie. So long as this severitie flourished, the Clearkes did require in word no more of the people, than themselves did performe in example and deed. Yea they were much more rigorous to themselves than to the people. And verily so it is meet, that the people should bee ruled with a gentler and looser discipline, as I may so terme it : but the Clearkes should use sharper judgements among themselves, and should lesse beare with themselves, than with other men. How all this is growne out of use, it is no need to rehearse, when at this day nothing can bee imagined more unbridled and dissolute than the Cleargie, and they are broken forth to so great licentiousnesse, that the whole world crieth out of it. That all antiquitie should not seeme to be utterly buried among them, I grant indeed that they doe with certaine shadows deceive the eyes of the simple : but those are such as come no neerer to the ancient manners, than the counterfaying of an Ape approacheth to that which men doe by reason and advise. There is a notable place in Xenophon, where hee teacheth how foully the Persians had swarmed from the ordinances of their Elders, and were fallen from the rigorous kinde of life, to softnesse and daintinesse, that yet they covered this shame, saying that they diligently kept the ancient usages. For when in the time of Cyrus, sobrietie and temperance so farre flourished, that men needed not to weepe, yea and it was accounted a shame : with posteritie this continued a religious observation, that no man should draw snout out of his nostrils, but it was lawfull to sucke it up, and feede within even till they had rotten the stinking humours which they had gathered by gluttonous eating. So by the old order it is unlawfull to bring wine-pots to the boord : but to swill in wine that they need to bee carried away drunken is tolerable. It was ordained to eat but once in a day : this these good successours have not abrogate, but they gave leave to continue their surfettings from mid-day to mid-night. The custome was that men should make an end of their daies journey fasting. But it was at libertie and usefully the custome for avoyding of wearinesse, to shorten their journey to two houres. Whensoever the Papists shall pretend their bastard rules, to shew themselves to be like to the holy Fathers : this example shall sufficiently reprove their fond counterfaying, that no Painter can more lively expresse it.

The Cleargie forbidden marriage in the Church of Rome.

23 In nothing they bee too rigorous and unentreatable, that they give not leave to Priests to marrie. But how great libertie there is among them to use whoredome unpunished, is not needfull to bee spoken : and bearing them bold upon their stinking unmarried life, they have hardened themselves to all wicked doings : But this forbidding doth plainly shew, how pestilent all their traditions are, for as much as it hath not onely spoiled the Church of good and fit Pastours, but also hath brought in a horrible sinke of mischiefes, and throwne many soules into the gulfes of desperation. Truly whereas marriage hath beene forbidden to Priests, that same hath beene done by wicked tyrannie, not onely against the word of God, but also against all equitie equitie. First to forbid that which the Lord had left at libertie, was by no means lawfull for men. Againe, that God hath expressly provided by his word that this libertie should not be broken, is so evident that it needeth no long demonstration. I speake not how Paul in many places willetth a Bishop to bee the husband of one wife. But what could bee more vehemently spoken, than where hee pronounceth by the holy Ghost, that there shall be in the last times wicked men that shall forbid marriage: and he calleth them not onely deceivers, but Divels? This therefore is a Prophecie, this is a holy Oracle of the holy Ghost, wherwith he willed to arme the Church aforehand against dangers, that the forbidding of marriage is the doctrine of Divels. But they thinke that they have gaily escaped when they wrest this sentence to Montanus, the Tertians, Encratites, and other old Heretikes. They onely (say they) condemned marriage: but we doe not condemne it, but debarre the Clergie from it, for whom wee thinke it not to bee convenient. As though albeit this Prophecie was first fulfilled in those aforesaid men, it might not also bee applied to these: or as though this childish fond subtiltie were worth the hearing, that they say that they forbid it not, because they forbid it not to all. For it is all one as if a Tyrant would affirme that it is not an unjust law, with unjust whereof one part alone of the Citie is oppressed.

24 They object, that the Priest doth by some marke differ from the people. As though the Lord did not also foresee this, with what ornaments Priests ought to excell. So they accuse the Apostle of troubling the order and confounding the comelineesse of the Church, which when hee portrayed out the absolute forme of a good Bishop durst fet marriage among the other gifts which hee required in him. I know how they expound this, namely that none is to bee chosen that hath had a second wife. And I grant that this is not a new exposition: but that it is a false exposition, appeareth by the text it selfe, because he by and by after setteth out, of what qualities the wives of Bishops and Deacons ought to be. Paul reckoneth marriage among the vertues of a Bishop, these men teach that it is an intollerable fault in the order of the Clergie. And, on Gods name, not contented with this generall dispraise they call it in their Canons, uncleaneesse and defileing of the flesh. Let every man thinke with himselfe out of what worke-shop these things be come: Christ vouchsafeth so to honour marriage that he willetth it to be an image of his holy conjoyning with the Church. What could bee spoken more honorably to set out the dignitie of Marriage? Wich what face therefore shall that be called uncleane or defiled wherein shineth a likenesse of the spirittuall grace of Christ.

25 But now when their forbidding so evidently fighteth with the word of God, yet they finde in the Scriptures wherewith to defend it. The Leviticall Priests were bound to lie asunder from their wives, so oft as it came to their turnes to minister, that they might handle the holy things pure and undefiled. Therefore it were very uncomely, that our holy things, sith they bee both much more noble, and daily, should be handled of married men. As though there were all one person of the Minister of the Gospell, as was of the Leviticall Priesthood. For they, as figures, represented Christ, which being the Mediator of God and men should with most absolute purenesse reconcile the Father unto us. But when sinners could not in every behalfe expresse the figure of his holinesse, yet that they might with certaine grosse draughts yeeld a shadow of him, they were commanded to purifie themselves beyond the manner of men, when they came to the Sanctuarie: namely because they then properly figured Christ, for that as pacifiers to reconcile the people to God they appeared at the Tabernacle, the image of the heavenly judgement seate. Forasmuch as the Pastours of the Church doe not beare this person at this day, therefore they are vainly compared with them. Wherefore the Apostle doth without exception boldly pronounce, that marriage is honourable among all men, but that for whoremongers, and adulterers abideth the judgement of God. And the Apostles themselves did with their owne example approve that marriage is not unmeet for the holinesse of any office be it never so excellent. For Paul witnesseth that they did not onely keepe wives, but also carried them about with them.

26 Againe it was a marvellous shamelesnesse that they durst set out this comeli-

ness of chasticke for a necessarie thing, to the great reproch of the old Church : which when it abounded with singular learning of God, yet excelled more in holinesse. For if they passe not upon the Apostles, (as they are wont sometime stoutly to despise them) what I beseech you will they doe to all the old Fathers, whom it is certaine to have not onely suffered but also allowed marriage in the order of Bishops? They forsooth did nourish a filthy prophaning of holy things, for as much as so the mysteries of the Lord were not rightly revered among them. It was moved indeed in the Nycene Synode to have unmarried life commanded : as there alway wait not some superstitious men, which doe ever invent some new thing, to bring themselves in admiration. But what was decreed? The sentence of Paphnutius was assented to, which pronounced that a mans lying with his owne wife is chasticke. Therefore marriage remained holy among them : neither did it turne them to any shame, nor was thought to spot the ministerie.

27 Then followed times, in which too superstitious observation of single life grew in force. Hereupon came those often and unmeasurable advanced praises of Virginitie, so that scarcely any other vertue was thought among the people to bee compared with it. And although marriage was not condemned for uncleane, yet the dignitie thereof was so diminished, and the holinesse of it obscured, that hee seemed not to aspire with a courage strong enough to perfection, that did not restraints himselfe from it. Hereupon came those Canons whereby it was first forbidden that they which were come to the degree of Priesthood should not contract marriage : then, that none should bee taken into that order but unmarried men, or such as did forsake marriage together with their wives. These things, because they seemed to procure reverence to Priesthood, were (I grant) even from antiquitie received with great well liking. But if the adversaries object antiquitie against me, first I answer that this libertie remained both under the Apostles and in certaine ages after them, that Bishops might bee married : that the Apostles themselves, and other Pastours of great authoritie which succeeded in their places, used the same without sticking at it. The example of that ancient Church ought worthily to bee of great weight with us, than that wee should thinke that to bee either unlawfull or uncomely for us which was then with praise received and used. Secondly I say that that age which for immeasurable affection to Virginitie began to bee partiall against marriage, did not so lay upon Priests the law of unmarried life, as though it were a thing necessarie of it selfe, but because they preferred unmarried men above the married. Finally I answer that they did not so require it that they did with force and necessitie constrain them to continence which were not fit to keepe it. For when they punished whoredomes with most severe lawes, of them that contracted marriage they decreed no more but that they should give over the execution of their office.

28 Therefore whensoever the defenders of this new tyrannie shall seeke the pretence of antiquitie to defend their unmarried life : so oft wee shall answer them with requiring them, that they restore the old chasticke in their Priests : that they remove adulterers and whoremongers : that they suffer not those in whom they suffer not honest and chaste use of marriage bed, to run unpunished into all kinde of lust : that they call againe the discontinued discipline, whereby all wantonneses may be restrained : that they deliver the Church from this so wicked filthinesse, wherewith it hath bene long deformed. When they have granted this, then they must againe bee put in mind that they boast not that thing for necessarie, which being of it selfe at libertie hangeth upon the profit of the Church. Yet I say not this for that I thinke that in any condition place is to be given to those Canons which lay the bond of unmarried life upon the order of Priests : but that the wiser sort may understand with what face our enemies doe slander holy marriage in Priests by objecting the name of antiquitie. As touching the Fathers, whose writings remaine, even they when they speake of their owne judgement, except Hierome, did not with so great spitefulnesse deface the honestie of marriage. We shall be content with one commendation of Chrysostome : because he, such hee was a principall esteemer of Virginitie, cannot be thought to have bene more lavish than other in commendation of marriage. Thus hee saith. The first degree of chastickeis pure virginitie: the second is faithfull marriage. Therefore the second kinde of virginitie is the chaste love of matrimonie.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of Vowes, by rash promising whereof, each man hath miserably entangled himselfe.

[T]is verily a thing to be lamented, that the Church, for whom libertie was purchased with the inestimable price of the blood of Christ, hath bene so oppressed with cruell tyrannie, and almost overwhelmed with a huge heape of traditions: but in the meane time every mans private madnesse sheweth, that not without most just cause there hath bene so much permitted of God to Satan and his ministers. For they thought it not enough, neglecting the commandement of Christ, to beare any burdens whatsoever were laid upon them by false teachers, unless they did also each man procure to himselfe severall burdens of his owne, and so with digging pits for themselves should drowne themselves deeper. This was done while they strived in devising of vowes, by which there might bee added to the common bonds a greater and straighter binding. Sith therefore wee have taught, that by their boldnesse which have borne rule under the title of Pastours in the Church, the worshipping of God hath bene corrupted, when they snared silly consciences with their unjust lawes: here it shall not bee out of season to adjoyne another evill which is neere unto it, that it may appeare that the world according to the perversnesse of his owne disposition, hath alway, with such stops as it could, put away the helps whereby it should have bene brought to God. Now, that it may the better appeare that very grievous hurt hath bene brought in by vowes, let the Readers keepe in minde the principles above set. For first wee have taught, that whatsoever may be required to the framing of life goddily and holily, is comprehended in the law. Again, wee have taught that the Lord, that he taught thereby the better call us away from devising of new works, hath enclosed the whole praise of righteousnesse in the simple obedience of his will. If these things bee true, it is easie to judge that all feigned worshippings, which wee invent to our selves to deserve the favour of God, are not acceptable to him how much soever they please us. And truly the Lord himselfe in many places doth not onely openly refuse them, but also grievously abhorre them. Hereupon ariseth a doubt of those vowes which are made beside the expresse word of God, what account isto be made of them, whether they may rightly bee vowed of Christian men, and how farre they binde them. For the same which among men is called a promise, in respect of God is called a Vow. But to men wee promise those things either which wee thinke will bee pleasant unto them, or which wee owe of durie. Therefore there ought to be a much greater heedfull observation in Vowes which are directed to God himselfe, with whom wee ought to deale more earnestly. In this point superstition hath in all ages marvellously ranged, so that men without judgement, without choise, did by and by vow unto God whatsoever came in their minde, or into their mouth. Hereupon came those follies, yea monstrous absurdities of Vowes among the Heathen, wherewith they did too insolently mocke with their Gods. And I would to God that Christians also had not followed this their boldnesse. It ought not indeed to have been so: but wee see that in certaine ages past nothing hath been more usual than this wickednesse, that the people each where despising the Law of God did wholly burne with made greedinesse to vow whatsoever had pleased them in their dreame. I will not hatefully enforce, nor particularly rehearse how hainously and how many waies herein men have offended: But I thought good to say this by the way, that it may the better appeare that wee do not move question of a needlesse matter, when wee in-treat of Vowes.

2 Now if wee will not erre in judging which Vowes bee lawfull, and which bee wrongfull, it behoveth to weigh three things: that is to say, who it is to whom the Vow is made: who we be that make the Vow: last of all, with what minde we vow. The first point hath respect to this, that wee should thinke that wee have to doe with

John 2. 3.

God, whom our obedience so much delighteth, that he pronounceth all wil-worshipp to be accursed, how gay and glorious soever they be in the eyes of men. If all voluntarie worshipp, which wee our selves devise without commandement, be abominable to God, it followeth that no worshipping can be acceptable to him but that which is allowed by his word. Therefore let us not take so great libertie to our selves that wee dare vow to God that which hath no testimonie how it is esteemed of him. For whereas that which Paul teacheth, that it is sinne whatsoever is done without Faith, extendeth to all doings, then verily it chiefly hath place; when thou directest thy thought the straight way to God. But if wee fall and erre even in the smallest things, (as Paul there disputeth of the difference of meates) where certaintie of faith shineth not before us: how much more modestie is to be used, when wee attempt a thing of greatest weight? For nothing ought to be more earnest unto us than the duties of Religion. Let this therefore be the first consideration in vowes; that wee never come to the vowing of any thing, but that conscience have first certainly determined that it attempteth nothing rashly. But it shall then be free from danger of rashnesse, when it shall have God going before it; and as it were informing it by his word what is good and profitable to be done.

3 In the other thing which wee have said to be here to be considered, this is contained, that wee measure our owne strengthes, that we have an eye to our vocation, that wee neglect not the benefit of libertie which God hath given us. For hee that voweth that which either is not in his power, or disagreeeth with his vocation, is rash: and hee that despiseth the bountifulnesse of God, whereby hee is appointed Lord of all things, is unthankfull. When I say thus, I doe not meane that any thing is so set in our owne hand, that standing upon confidence of our owne strength we may promise the same to God. For it was most truly decreed in the Councell at Arausium, that nothing is rightly vowed to God but that which we have received of his hand, forasmuch as all things that are offered him are his meere gifts. But sith some things are by Gods goodnesse given us, and other some things by his equitie denied us: let every man (as Paul commandeth) have respect to the measure of grace given unto him. Therefore I doe here meane nothing else, but that vowes must be tempered to that measure which the Lord prescribeth there in his giving: least if thou attempt further than hee permiteth, thou throw thy selfe downe headlong with taking too much upon thee. As for example. When those murderers, of whom mention is made in Luke, vowed that they would taste of no meate till Paul were slaine: although the device had not bene wicked, yet the rashnesse it selfe was not to be suffered, that they made the life and death of a man subject to their power. So Jephth suffered punishment for his folly, when with headlong heare hee conceived an unadvised vow. In which kinde unmarried life hath the chiefe place of madde boldnesse. For sacrificing Priests, Monks, and Nunnnes, forgetting their owne weaknesse, thinke themselves able to keepe unmarried life. But by what Oracle are they taught that they shall have chastitie throughout all their life, to the very end whereof they vow it? They heare the word of God concerning the univerrall state of men. It is not good for man to be alone. They understand, and would to God that they did not feele, that sinne remaining in us is not without most sharpe prickes. With what confidence dare they shake off that generall calling for all their life long: whereas the gift of continencie is oftener granted for a certaine time as opportunitie requireth? In such stubbornnesse let them not looke for God to be their helper: but let them rather remember that which is said. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. And this is to tempt God, to endeavour against the nature put in us by him, and to despise his present gifts as though they nothing belonged unto us. Which they not onely doe: but also marriage it selfe, which, God thought it not against his Majestie to institute, which hee hath pronounced honorable in all men, which Christ our Lord hath sanctified with his presence, which hee vouchsafed to honour with his first Miracle, they dare call defiling; onely to advance with marvellous commendations a certaine unmarried life of what sort soever it be. As though they themselves did not shew a cleare example in their life, that unmarried state is one thing, and

virginitie an another : which their life yet they most shamelesly call Angellike; doing herein verily too great injury to the Angels of God, to whom they compare whoremongers, adulterers, and somewhat else much worse and filthier. And truly here need no arguments when they are openly confuted by the thing it selfe. For wee plainly see, with how horrible paines the Lord doth commonly take vengeance of such arrogancie, and contempt of his gifts by too much trust in themselves. I spare for shame to speake of the more secret faults, of which even this that is already perceived is too much. It is out of controversie that we ought to vow nothing, that may hinder us from serving of our vocation. As if a householder should vow, that he will leave his wife and his children and take other charges in hand: or if he that is fit to beare office, when he is chosen, do vow that he will be a private man. But what is meant by this, that we said that our liberty should not be despised, hath some difficulty if it be not declared. Therefore thus in few words I expound it. Sith God hath made us Lords of all things, and hath so made them subject unto us that we should use them all for our commodity: there is no cause why wee should hope that it shall be an acceptable worke to God if we yeeld our selves into bondage to the outward things which ought to be a helpe unto us. I say this for this purpose, because many doe hereby seeke praise of humility, if they snare themselves with many observations, from which God not without cause willed us to be free and discharged. Therefore if wee will escape this danger, let us alway remember that we ought not to depart from that order which the Lord hath ordained in the Christl-an Church.

4 Now I come to that which I did set in the third place: that it is much materiaill with what minde thou makest a vow, if thou wilt have it allowed of God. For sith the Lord regardeth the heart, not the outward shew, it commeth to passe that the selfe same thing, by changing the purpose of the minde, doth sometime please him and is acceptable unto him, and sometime highly displeaseth him. If thou so vow the abstaining from wine, as though there were any holiness in it, thou art superstitious: if thou have respect to any other end which is not evill, no man can disallow it. But in my judgement there be foure ends, to which our vowes shall be rightly directed: of which for teachings sake I refer two to the time past, and the other two to the time to come. To the time past belong those vowes, whereby we doe either testifye our thankfulness to God for benefits received: or to crave the turning away of his wrath, we our selves doe punish our selves for the offences that we have committed. Let us call the first sort, if you will, the exercises of thankfulness, the other of repentance. Of the first kinde we have an example in the tithes which Jacob vowed, if the Lord did bring him home safe out of banishment into his Country, Againe in the old Sacrifices of the peace offerings, which godly Kings and Captaines, when they tooke in hand righteous war, did vow that they would pay if they had obtained the victory, or at least when they were oppressed with any great distresse, if the Lord had delivered them. So are all those places in the Psalmes to bee understood which speake of vowes. Such vowes at this day may also bee in use among us, so oft as the Lord hath delivered us either out of any calamity, or from a hard sickness, or from any other danger. For it is then not against the duty of a godly man, to consecrate to God his vowed oblation, as a solemne token of his recknawledging, lest he should seeme unthankfull toward his goodnesse. Of what sort the second kinde is, it shall suffice to shew with one onely familiar example. If any by the vice of gluttony bee fallen into any offence, nothing withstandeth but that to chastise his intemperance hee may for a time forsake all daintie meares, and may doe the same with a vow adjoynd, that hee may bind himselfe with the stricter bond. Yet I doe not so make a perpetuall law to them that have likewise offended: but I shew what is lawfull for them to doe, which shall thinke such a vow profitable for themselves. I doe therefore so make such a vow lawfull, that in the meane time I leave it at liberty.

5 The vowes that are applyed to the time to come, partly (as we have already said) doe tend to this end that we may be made the warier: and partly that as it were by certaine spurres we may be prickted forward to our duty. Some man seeth himselfe to be so inclined to some certaine vice, that in a thing which otherwise is not evill he cannot temper

The third thing to be respected in a vow, is the minde of the vower which in vowes that have relation to the time past hath two ends to be directed by.

Two other ends of vowes which have relation to the time to come temper himselfe from falling forthwith into an evill : he shall doe nothing inconveniently if he doe for a time by vow cut off from himselfe the use of that thing. As if a man know that this or that apparell of body is perillous unto him, and yet entised with desire he earnestly covets it, what can he doe better, than if in putting a bridle upon himselfe, that is in charging himselfe with necessitie of abstaining from it, he deliver himselfe from all doubting? Likewise if a man be forgetfull or slow to necessary duties of godlinesse, why may hee not by taking a vow upon him both awake his memory and shake off his slothfulnesse? In both I grant that there is a forme of childish schooling: but even in this that they are helpes of weaknesse, they are not without profit used of the raw and unperfect. Therefore we shall say that those vowes are lawfull which have respect to one of these ends, specially in outward things, if they both be upholden with the allowance of God, and doe agree with our vocation, and be measured by the power of grace given us of God.

*How to judge of vowes as well
those which generally all men or particularly some doe make unto God.*

6 Now also it is not hard to gather what is generally to be thought of all vowes. There is one common vow of all the faithfull, which being made in baptisme we doe confirme and as it were stablish by Catechisme and receiving of the Supper. For the Sacraments are as Charters, by which the Lord delivereth to us his mercie and thereby everlasting life, and wee againe on our behalves doe promise him obedience. But this is the forme or verily the summe of the vow, that for saking Satan we yeeld our selves into service to God, to obey his holy commandements, and not to follow the perverse desires of our flesh. It ought not to be doubted but that this vow, sith it hath testimony of the Scripture, yea and is required of all the children of God, is both holy and profitable to salvation. And it maketh not to the contrary, that no man in this life performeth the perfect obedience of the law which God requireth of us. For sith this forme of covenanting is comprised within the covenant of grace, under which is conained both forgiveness of finnes and the Spirit of sanctification: the promise which wee there make is joyned both with beseeching of pardon and with craving of helpe. In judging of particular vowes, it is necessary to keepe in minde the three former rules, whereby we may safely weigh of what sort every vow is. Neither yet thinke, that I so commend the very same vow, which I affirme to bee holy, that I would have them to bee daily. For though I dare teach no certaine rule of the number of time: yet if any man obey my counsell, he shall take upon him none but sober and for a time. For if thou of erretimes breake forth into making of many vowes; all religiousse will with very continuance grow out of estimation with thee, and thou shalt come to a bending readinesse to fall into superstition. If thou bind thy selfe with a perpetuall vow, either for great paine and tediousnesse thou shalt undoe it, or being wearied with long courinace thou shalt at one time or other be bold to breake it.

*Superstitious
vowes of fastings, pilgrimages and such like.*

7 Now also it is plaine with how great superstition in this behalfe the world hath in certaine ages past bene possessed. One man vowed that hee would abstaine from wine: as though abstaining from wine were of it selfe a worship acceptable to God. An other bound himselfe to fasting, another to abstaining from flesh for certaine daies, in which he had with vaine opinion fained to be a singular holinesse above the rest. And some things also were vowed much more childish, although not of children. For this was holden for a great wisdome, to take upon them vowed pilgrimages to holier places, and sometime either to goe all their journey on foot; or with their body halfe naked, that by their wearinesse the more merit might be gotten. These and such other, with incredible zeale where of the world hath a while swelled, if they be examined by those rules, which wee have above set, shall be found not onely vaine and trifling, but full of manifest ungodlinesse. For howsoever the flesh judge, God abhorreth nothing more than fained worshippings. There are beside this those pernicious and damned opinions, that hypocrites when they have such trifles thinke that they have gotten no small righteousnesse: they repose the summe of godlinesse in outward observations, they despise all other that are lesse carefull of such things.

*Monkish vowes and the end
why Monkes were first instituted.*

8 To reckon up all the particular formes is nothing to purpose. But for as much as the Monkish vowes are had in greater reverence, because they seeme allowed by the common judgement of the Church: of those it is good to speake briefly. First least any should by prescription of long time defend Monckery, such as it is at this day, it is to be noted that in old time there was in Mounasteries a far other order of living. Such as were disposed to exercise themselves to greatest severity and patience, went thither. For what manner of discipline they say that the Lacedemonians had under the lawes of Lycurgus, such was at that time among the Monkes, yea and much more rigorous. They slept upon the ground: their drinke was water: their meate was bread, herbs, and roots: their chiefe dainties were in oyle and ciches. They abstained from all delicatedyer and trimming of body. These things might seeme above truth, if they were not written by witness that saw and proved them, as Gregory Nazianzen, Basile, and Chrysostome. But with such introductions they prepared themselves to great offices. For that the Colledges of Monkes were then as it were the seede-plots of the order of Ministers of the Church, both these whom we have now named are a prooffe plaine enough (for they were all brought up in Monasteries and from thence called to the office of Bishops) and also many other singular and excellent men in their time. And Augustin sheweth that this was also used in his time, that Monasteries yeelded Clearkes to the Church. For he speaketh thus to the Monkes of the isle of Capri: But you brethren we exhort in the Lord, that ye keepe your purpose and continue to the end: and if at any time our mother the Church shall require your travaile doe yeneither with greedy pride take it upon you, nor with flattering slothfulnesse refuse it: but with a meeke heart obey to God. Neither prefer ye your owne quiet leisure above the necessities of the Church: to whom if no good men would have ministred in her travaile, you should not have found how you should have bene borne. He speaketh there of the Ministry, by which the faithfull are spirituallly borne againe. Also to Aurelius. There is both occasion of falling given to themselves, and most haynous wrong done to the order of the Clergy, if forsakers of Monasteries be chosen to the soldierhip of the Clergy: when even of those that remaine in the Monastery, wee use to take into the Clergie none but the most approved and best. Valesse perhaps as the common people say, he is an evill piper but a good fidler: so it shall also be jestingly said of us, he is an evill Monke, but a good Clearke. It is too much to be lamented, if we list up Monkes into such a ruinous pride, and thinke the Clearkes worthy of so great reproch, whereas sometime even a good Monke maketh not a good Clearke, if hee have sufficient continence and yet want necessary learning. By these places it appeareth, that godly men were wont with the discipline of Monkes to prepare themselves to the government of the Church, that they might the siter and better instructed, take so great an office upon them. Not that they all attained to this end, or yet tended toward it, when for the most part they were unlearned men, but such were chosen out as were meete for it.

9 But chiefly in two places hee painteth out unto us the forme of the old Monckerie. In the booke of the manners of the Catholike Church, where hee feteth the holinesse of that profession against the Sanders of the Manichees: and in another booke which hee entituled of the worke of Monks, where he inveyeth against certaine degenerate Monks, which began to corrupt that order. I will here so gather a summe of those things which hee saith, that so neere as I may I will use his owne words. Despisng (saith hee) the intisements of this world, gathered into one most chaste and holy life, they spend their time together, living in prayers, readings, and disputations, not swelling with pride, not troublesome with stubbornnesse, not wanne with envionnesse. None possesseth anything of his owne, none is burdensome to any man. They get by working with their hands those things wherewith both their body may be fed, and their minde may not be hindred from God. Their worke they deliver to them whom they call Deanes. Those Deanes disposing all things with great carefulnesse make account thereof to one whom they call Father. These Fathers not onely most holy in manners, but also most excellent in godly doctrine, high in all things, doe with no pride provide for them whom they call children, with great authority of them in commanding, and great willingnesse of the other in obeying: They cometogether at the very last time of the day, every one from his dwelling, while they be yet fasting, to heare that Father, and there meete together to every one of these fathers at the last three thousand men, (he speaketh chiefly of Egypt, and of the East) then they refresh their their body, so much as sufficeth for life and healthfulnesse, every man restraining his desire, not to take largely even of those things that they have present very spare and vile. So they doe not onely abstaine from flesh and wine, so much that they may be able to tame their lusts, but from such things which doe so much more greedily provoke appetite of the belly and throat, how much they seeme toether, to be as it were cleaner, by colour whereof the filthy desire of exquisite meates, which is not in flesh, is wont to be fondly and foully defended. Whatsoever remaineth above necessary foode (as there remaineth oftentimes much of the works of their hands and pinching of their fare) is wth greater care distributed to the poore, than it was gotten by them that distribute it. For they doe in no wise travaile that they may have abundance of these things, but they by all meanes endeavour that that which they have abounding may not remaine with them. Afterward when he hath reheard the hardnesse, whereof he himselfe had seene examples both at Millaine; and else where: among these things (saith hee) no man is enforced to hard things which hee cannot beare: no man is charged wth that which he refuseth: neither is he therefore condemned of the rest, because he confesseth himselfe to want strength in following of them: for they remember how much charity is commended: they remember that all things are cleane to the cleane. Therefore all their diligence watcheth, not to the refusing of kinds of meat as uncleane, but to tame lust, and to retaine the love of brethren. They remember, meat for the belly, and the belly for meates, &c. Yet many strong doe abstaine for the weakes sake. Many of them have no neede to doe thus: but because it pleaseth them to sustaine themselves with baser diet and nothing sumptuous. Therefore they themselves, which being in health doe forbear, if consideration of their health compell, when they are sicke doe take without any feare. Many drinke no wine, and yet they thinke not themselves defiled with it: for they most gently cause it to bee given to the fainter, and to them that cannot get the health of their bodie without it: and some which foolishly refuse it, they doe brotherly admonish that they bee not with vaine superstition sooner made weaker than holier. So they diligently exercise godlinesse: but they know that the exercising of the body pertaineth but to a short time. Charitie is chiefly kept: to charitie the diet, to charitie the speech, to charitie the apparell, to charitie the countenance is fitted. They meet and conspire into one charitie. To offend it, is accounted as hainous as to offend God. If any resist charitie, hee is cast out and flunned. If any offend charity, hee is not suffred to abide one day. For as much as in these wordes, as in a painted table, that holy man seemeth to have set out what manner of life Monkes was in old time, although they were somewhat long, yet I was content to interlace them here: because I saw that I should have bene somewhat longer if I had gathered the same things out of divers, how much soever I studied for brievenesse.

10 But my purpose here is not to goe thorow this whole matter, but only by the way to point out, not onely what manner of Monkes the old Church had, but what manner of thing the profession of Monkes was at that time: so as the found witted readers may judge by the comparison, what face they have which alledge antiquitie to maintaine the present Monkerie. Augustine when hee depainteth unto us a holy and true Monkerie, would have to be absent all rigorous exacting of those things which by the word of the Lord are left us at liberty. But there is nothing that is at this day more severely required. For they count it a mischief that can never be purged, if any doe never so little swarve from the prescribed rule in colour or fashion of garment, in kinde of meate, or in other trifling and cold ceremonies. Augustine stoutly maintaineth, that it is not lawfull for Monkes to live idle upon other men. He denieth that there was ever in his time any such example of a well ordered Monastery. Our men set the chiefe part of their holinesse in idlenesse. For if you take idlenesse from them, where shall be that contemplative life whereby they boast that they excell all other men, and approach neere unto Angels? Finally Augustine requireth such a Monkerie, as should be nothing but an exercise and helpe to the duties of godlinesse which are commended to all Christians. What? when hee maketh charitie the chiefe, yea and almost onely rule thereof doe wee thinke that hee praifeth a conspiring, whereby a few men being bound together, together, are severed from the whole body of the Church? But rather he willeth them with their example to give light to other to keepe the unity of the Church. In both these points there is so much difference of the Monkery at this present, that a man can scarcely finde any thing more unlike, I will not say contrary. For our Monkes not contented with that godlinesse, to the study of which alone, Christ commandeth them that are his, continually to apply, doe imagine I wot not what new godlinesse, by meditation wherof they may be perfecter than other.

18 If they denie this, I would know of them why they vouchsafe to give to their order alone the title of perfection, and take away the same from all the callings of God. Neither am I ignorant of that sophisticall solution, that it is not therefore so called because it doth contain perfection in it, but because it is the best of all other to attaine perfection. When they are disposed to boast themselves before the people, when to share unskillfull and unware young men, when to maintaine their priviledges, when to advance their owne dignitie to the reproach of other, then they boast that they are in the state of perfection. When they are so nigh driven that they cannot defend this vaine arrogancie, then they flee to this starting hole, that they have not yet attained perfection, but that they are in the same state wherein they aspire unto it above other. In the meane time that admiration among the people remaineth, as though the onely Monkish life were Angell-like, perfect, and cleared from all fault. By this pretence they make most gainfull markets, but that same moderation lieth buried in a few bookees. Who doth not see that this is an intollerable mockery? But let us so reason with them, as though they gave no more to their profession than to call it a state of attaining perfection. Verily in giving it this name, they do as by a speciall marke make it differing from other kinds of life. And who can abide this, that so great honour should be given away to an ordinance that is no where by any one syllable allowed: and that by the same all other callings of God, which are by his owne holy mouth not only commanded, but also commended with notable titles of praise, are by the same accounted unworthy? And how great wrong (I beseech you) is done to God, when I wot not what new found thing is preferred above all the kinde of life ordained by himselfe, and praised by his owne testimonie?

12 But goe to, let them say that it is a slander which I have before said, that they are not contented with the rule prescribed of God. Yet though I hold my peace, they themselves doe more than enough accuse themselves? For they openly teach, that they take upon them more burden than Christ laid upon his: because forsooth they promise to keepe the Councils of the Gospell concerning loving their enemies, not covering of revenge, nor swearing, &c. To which things Christians are not generally bound. Herein what antiquitie will they shew forth against us? This never came in any of the old fathers minds. They all crye out with one voice that there was no one little word at all uttered of Christ, which ought not necessarily to bee obeyed. And without any doubting they doe each where teach, that these very same things by name were commandements, which these good expositours triflingly say, that Christ did but counsell. But forasmuch as we have before taught that this is a most pestilent error, let it suffice here to have briefly noted, that the Monkery which is at this day, is grounded upon the same opinion, which all the godly ought worthily to abhor: which is, that there should be imagined some perfecter rule of life, than this common rule which is given of God to the whole Church. Whatsoever is builded upon this foundation, cannot be but abominable.

13 But they bring another prooffe of their perfection, which they thinke to be most strong for them. For the Lord said to the young man that asked him of the perfection of righteousness. If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast and give it to the poore. Whether they doe so or no, I do not yet dispute: but grant them that for this present. Therefore they boast that they be made perfect by forsaking all theirs. If the sum of perfection stand in this, what meaneth Paul when he teacheth that he which hath distributed all his goods to the poore, unlesse hee have charity, is nothing? What manner of perfection is this, which if charity bee absent, is brought with man to nothing? Here they must needs answer, that this is the chiefeft indeed, but not the onely worke worke of perfection. But here also Paul crieth against them, which stick not to make charitie the bond of perfection, without any such forsaking. If it be certaine that betweene the master and the disciple is no disagreement, and the one of them cleerly denieth the perfection of man to consist in this that he should forsake all his goods, and againe affirmeth, that perfection is without it: we must see how that saying of Christ is to be taken, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast. Now, it shall bene darke sense, if we weigh (which we ought alway to marke in all the preachings of Christ) to whom these words bee directed. A young man asketh, by what works hee shall enter into everlasting life. Christ, because hee was asked of works, sencerh him to the law, and rightfully: for it is the way of eternall life, if it be considered in it selfe, and is no otherwise unable to bring salvation unto us but by our owne perversnesse. By this answer Christ declareth, that hee teacheth no other rule to frame life by, than the same that hee had in old time bene taught in the law of the Lord. So did hee both give witness to the law of God, that it was the doctrine of perfect righteousness: and therewithall did meete with slanders, that he should not seeme by a new rule of life to stirre the people to forsaking of the law. The young man being indeede not of an evill mind, but swelling with vaine confidence, answered that he had from his childhood kept all the commandments of the law. It is most certaine that he was an infinite space distant from that to which hee boasteth that he had attained. And if his boasting had bene true, he had wanted nothing to the highest perfection. For we have before shewed, that the law containeth in it selfe perfect righteousness: and the same appeareth hereby that the keeping of it is called the way of eternall salvation. That he might bee taught to know how little he had profited in that righteousness, which he had too boldly answered that hee had fulfilled, it was profitable to shake out a familiar fault of his. When hee aboundeth in riches, hee had his heart fastened upon them. Therefore because he felt not this secret wound, Christ launced him. Goe (saith he) sell all that thou hast. If hee had bene so good a keeper of the law as he thought he was, hee would not have gone away sorrowfull when hee heard this word. For who so loveth God with all his heart, whatsoever disagreech with the love of him, hee not onely taketh it for dung, but abhorreth as bringing destruction. Therefore whereas Christ commandeth the covetous rich man to leave all that he hath, it is all one, as if he should command the ambitious man to forsake all honours, the voluptuous man all delights, and the unchaste man all the instruments of lust. So consciences that are touched with no feeling of generall admonition, must bee called backe to the particular feeling of their owne evill. Therefore they doe in vaine draw this speciall case to generall exposition, as though Christ did set the perfection of a man in forsaking of goods, whereas hee meant nothing else by this saying, than to drive the young man that stood too much in his owne conceit, to feele his owne fore, that he might understand that he was yet a great way distant from perfect obedience of the law, which otherwise he did falsely take upon him. I grant that this place hath bene evill understood of some of the Fathers, and that thereupon grew this covering of willfull povertie, whereby they onely were thought to bee blessed, which forsaking all earthly things, did dedicate themselves naked to Christ. But I trust that all the good and not contentious men will be satisfied with this my exposition, so that they shall no more doubt of the meaning of Christ.

14 Howbeit the Fathers thought nothing lesse, than to stablish such perfection, as hath since been framed by the couled sophisters, thereby to raise up a double Christi-anicie. For that doctrine full of sacriledge was not yet borne, which compareth the profession of monkerie to baptisme, yea and openly affirmeth, that it is a forme of second baptisme. Who can doubt that the Fathers with all their heart abhorred this blasphemie? Now as touching that last thing, which Augustine saith to have been among the old Monks, that is, that they applied themselves wholly to Charitie: what neede I to shew in words that it is most far from this new profession? The thing it selfe speaketh, that all they that goe into Monasteries, depart from the Church. For why? Do not they sever themselves from the lawful fellowship of the faithfull in taking to themselves a peculiar ministerie & private ministracion of Sacraments? What is it to dissolve the communion spect of their very oray and

of the Church, if this bee not it? And that I may follow the comparison which I began to make, and may once conclude it, what have they in this behalfe like to the old Monks? They, although they dwelt severally from other men, yet had not a severall Church: they did partake of the Sacraments together with other: they appeared at solemne assemblies; there they were a part of the people. These men in erecting to themselves a private Altar, what have they else done, but broken the bond of unity? For they have both excommunicate themselves from the whole body of the Church, and have despised the ordinary Ministry, whereby the Lord willed to have peace and charity kept among his. Therefore how many Ministeries there be at this day, I say that there be so many assemblies of schismatics, which troubling the order of the Church, are cut off from the lawfull fellowship of the faithfull. And that this departing should not be secret, they have given to themselves divers names of Sects. Neither were they ashamed to boast of that, which Paul doth so detest, that he cannot sufficiently amplify the hainousnesse of it. Ulesse perhaps wee thinke that Christ was divided of the Corinthians, when one gloried of one teacher, and another of another: and that now it is done without any injury to Christ, that in stead of Christians, wee heare some called Benedictines, some Franciscanes, some Dominicans: and that they are so called, that they themselves when they cover to be severally knowne from the common sort of Christians, doe with great pride take these titles to them, for the possession of their Religion.

15. These differences which I have hitherto rehearsed betweene the old Monks, and the Monks of our age, are not differences in manners, but in the profession it selfe. Therefore let the Readers remember, that I have rather spoken of Monks, than of Monks, and have touched those faults, not which sticke in the life of a few of them, but which cannot be severed from their very order of living it selfe. But what difference is in their manners, what need I particularly to declare? This is certaine, that there is no degree of men more defiled with all filthinesse of vices; no where more are factions, hatreds, affections of parties, ambitions hotter than among them. Indeed in a few Monasteries they live chastly, if it bee to bee called chastity where lust is so farre kept downe, that it be not openly spoken off: yet a man shall scarcely finde every tenth Monastery, which is not rather a Stew, than a holy house of chastity. But what honest sparing is in their diet? Swine bee none other wise fattened in sties. But lest they should complaine that I handle them too ungently, I goe no further. Howbeit in those few things which I have touched, whosoever knoweth the thing it selfe will confesse that there is nothing spoken accuser-like. Augustine, when according to his testimony, Monks excelled in so great chastity, yet complaineth that there were many vagabonds, which with evill crafts and deceits wiped simple men from their money, which with carrying about the reliques of Martyrs, did use filthy merchandizinges, yea, and in stead of the reliques of Martyrs, did shew forth the bones of any other dead men, and which with many such wicked doings slandered the order. As hee reporteth that hee saw no better men than them which have profited in Monasteries, so hee lamenteth that hee had seene no worse men than those that disprofited in Monasteries. What would he say if at this day he saw all Monasteries to swell, and in a manner to burst with so many and so despaired vices? I speake nothing; but that which is well knowne to all men. Yet doth not this dispraise pertaine to all without any exception at all. For as there was never rule and discipline of living so holily established in Monasteries, but that there remained some Drones much unlike the rest; so I doe not say that Monks are at this day so runne out of kinde from that holy antiquity, but that they have yet some good men in their flocke. But they lie hidden, a few, and scattered in that huge multitude of naughty and wicked men; and they are not onely despised, but also lewdly railed at, and sometime cruelly handled of other, which (as the Milesiens proverb is) thinke that there ought to be no place for any honest men among them.

16. *By this comparison of the old and present Monks, I trust I have brought to passe that which I purposed, that it may appeare that our cowed men doe fallily pretend the example of the first Church for defence of their profession; for as much as they no lesse differ from them, than Apes from men. In the meane time I sticke not to declare, that even in which old forme that Augustine commendeth, there is somewhat which little pleaseth mee. I grant that they were not superstitious in exacting the outward exercises of rougher discipline, but I say that there wanted not too much affection and wrongfull zeale. It was a goodly thing, forsaking their goods, to be without all earthly carefulnesse: but God more esteemeth care to rule a household godly, when an holy householder, being loose and free from all coverousnesse, ambition, and other desires of the flesh, travelleth to this purpose to serve God in a certaine vocation. It is a godly thing to play the Philosopher in Wildernesse farre from the company of men: but it agreeth not with Christian gentleness, as it were for hatred of mankinde, to flie into desert and solitarinesse, and therewithall to forsake those duties which the Lord hath chiefly commanded. Although we grant that there was no other evill in that profession, yet this verily was no small evill, that it brought an unprofitable and perilous example into the Church.

A greater difference in the manners of these new, and those ancient Monks.

* Somewhat amisse even in the very profession of Monks which was of old.

17. Now therefore let us see what manner of vowes they be, wherewith Monks at this day are professed into this goodly order. First, because their minde is to institute a new and fained worshipping, to deserve Gods favour: I concluded by the things afore spoken, that whatsoever they vow is abominable before God. Secondly, without any regard of Gods calling, without any his allowance, they invent for them such a kinde of living as pleaseth themselves. I say that it is a rash, and therefore an unlawfull enterprize; because their conscience hath nothing whereupon it may uphold it selfe before God; and whatsoever is not of faith, is sine. Moreover, when they binde themselves to many perverse and wicked worshippings, which the Monkerie at this day containeth in it, I affirme that they bee not consecrate to God, but to the Devill. For why was it not lawfull for the Prophet to say, that the Israelites offered their children to Devils and not to God, onely for this that they had corrupted the true worshipping of God with prophane Ceremonies: and shall it not bee lawfull for us to say the same of Monks, which with their Cowle doe put upon themselves a snare of a thousand wicked superstitions? Now what sorts of vowes are there? They promise to God perpetuall virginity, as though they had bargained with God before, that hee should deliver them from need of marriage. There is no cause why they should alleage, that they doe not make this vow, but trusting upon the grace of God. For such hee pronounceth that he giveth it not to all men, it is not in us to conceive a confidence of a speciall gift. Let them that have it use it. If at any time they feele themselves to be troubled of their flesh, let them flie to this helpe, by whose onely power they may resist. If they prevaile not, let them not despise the remedy that is offered them. For they by the certaine Word of God are called to marriage, to whom power of continence is denied. Continence I call, not whereby the body is onely kept cleane from whoredome, but whereby the minde keepeth chastity undefiled. For Paul commandeth not onely outward wantonnesse, but also the burning of the minde to bee avoided. This (say they) hath from furthest time of memory beene observed, that they which would dedicate themselves wholly to the Lord, should binde themselves to the vow of continence. I grant indeed that this manner hath also beene of ancient time received; but I doe not grant that this age was so free from all fault, that whatsoever was then done must bee taken for a rule. And by little and little this unapeasable severity crept in, that after a vow made there was no roome for repentance. Which is evident by Cyprian. If Virgins have of faith dedicated themselves to God, let them continue shamefully and chastly without any faining. So being strong and steadfast, let them looke for the reward of virginity. But if they will not or cannot continue, it is better that they should marry, than with their delights fall into the fire. What reproaches would they now spare to teare him withall, that would wth such equity temper the vow of continencie? Therefore they are departed farre from that ancient maner, which will not onely admit no moderation or pardon, if any be found unable to performe his vow: but they doe without all shame pronounce that hee sinneth more grievously if he remedie the intemperance of the flesh with taking a wife, than if he defile both his body and soule with whoredome.

18 But they still enforce the matter, and goe about to shew that such a vow was used in the Apostles time : because Paul saith that the widdowes which having bene once received into the publike ministry did marrie, denied their first faith. But I doe not denie to them, that the widdowes, which bound themselves and their services to the Church, did therewithall take upon them the bond of continuall unmarried life ; not because they reposed any religion therein, as it afterward began to be used : but because they could nor beare that office but being at their owne libertie and loose from yoke of marriage. But if, when they had once given their faith, they looked backe to new marriages, what was this else but to shake off the calling of God ? Therefore it is no marvell that with such desires he saith that they waxe wanton against Christ. Afterward to amplify the matter he saith, that they doe so not performe that which they have promised to the Church, that they doe also breake and make void their first faith given in Baptisme : in which this is comprehended, that every man should answer his calling, Unless perhaps you had rather understand it thus, that having as it were lost all shame, they did from thenceforth cast away all care, of honestie, did give forth themselves to all wantonnesse and unchastitie, and did in licentious and disolute life resemble nothing lesse than Christian women : which sense I like very well. Therefore we answer, that those widdowes which were then received to publike ministry, did lay upon themselves a bond to continue unmarried : if they afterward married, we easly perceive that that happened to them which Paul speaketh of, that casting away shame they became more wanton than beflemed Christian women. That so they not onely sinned, in breaking their faith given to the Church, but swared from the common law of godly women. But first I denie that they did professe unmarried life for any other reason, but because marriage agreed not with that ministerie which they tooke in hand : and I denie that they did binde themselves at all to single life, but so farre as the necessity of their vocation did beare. Againe I doe not grant that they were so bound, but that it was then also better for them to marrie, than either to be troubled with the prickings of the flesh, or to fall into any uncleannesse. Thirdly I say that that age is appointed of Paul, which is commonly out of danger : specially sith he commandeth them onely to bee chosen, which contented with one marriage have already shewed a token of their continencie. And we doe for no other reason disallow the vow of unmarried life, but because it is wrongfully taken for a service of God, and it is rashly vowed of them to whom power of continence is not given.

19 For how was it lawfull to draw this place of Paul to Nuns ? For there were created deaconisses, not to delight God with singing and with mumbling nor understoode, and live the rest of their time idle : but that they should execute publike ministracion toward the poore, that they should with all studie, earnestnesse and diligence endeavour themselves with the duties of charitie. They did not vow unmarried life, to yeeld thereby any worship to God, because they abstained from marriage : but onely because they were thereby the more uncombred to execute their office. Finally they did vow it, neither in the beginning of their youth, nor yet in the midst of their flowing age, that they might afterward learne too late by experience in to how great a headlong downefall they had thrown themselves : but when they seemed to have passed all danger, then they vowed a no lesse safe than holy vow. But (not to enforce their first two points) I say it was not lawfull to have women received to vow continencie before the age of threescore yeeres : forasmuch as the Apostle admitteth onely women of fixtie yeeres old, and commandeth the younger to marry and bring forth children. Therefore, neither that release made of twelve yeeres, and then twentie, and afterwards of thirtie yeeres can be any way excused : and much lesse is it tolerable, that silly maides, before that they can by age know themselves, or have any experience of themselves, are not onely trained by fraud, but constrained by force and threatnings to put on those cursed snares. I will not tarie upon confuting the other two vows. Onely this I say : besides this that they be entangled with not a few superstitions, (as the matter is now a daies) they seeme to bee made to this purpose, that they which vow them should mocke both God and men. But least wee should seeme too maliciously to shake up every small parcell, we will be content with that general confutation which is above set.

20 What manner of vowes be lawfull and acceptable to God, I thinke is sufficiently declared. Yet because sometime unskillfull and fearefull consciences, even when they mislike or disallow any vow, doe neverthelesse doubt of the binding, and are greediously tormented, when they both dread to breake their Faith given to God, and on the other side they feare least they should more sinne in keeping it: heere they are to be succoured, that they may winde themselves out of this distresse. But, to take away all doubt at once: I say that all vowes being not lawfull, nor rightly made, as they are nothing worth before God, so ought to be voide to us. For if in contracts of men those promises onely doe bind, in which he with whom we contract, would have us bound: it is an absurditie, that wee should bee driven to the keeping of those things which God doth not require of us: specially sith our workes are no other wise right, but when they please God, and when consciences have this testimonie that they please him. For this remaineth certaine, whatsoever is not of faith is sinne. Whereby Paul meaneth, that the worke which is taken in hand with doubting, is therefore faultie, because Faith is the root of all good workes, by which we are assured that they be acceptable to God. Therefore if it bee lawfull for a Christian man to goe about nothing without this assurednesse: if by fault of ignorance they have taken any thing in hand, why should they not afterward give it over when they be delivered from errors? Sith vowes unadvisedly made are such, they doe not onely nothing bind, but are necessarily to be undone. Yea, if they are not onely nothing esteemed, but also are abominable in the sight of God, as is above shewed? It is needlesse to discourse any longer of a matter not needfull. This one argument seemeth to mee to bee enough to pacifie godly consciences and deliver them from all doubt: that whatsoever works doe not flow out of the pure fountaine and bee not directed to the lawfull end, are refused of God: and so refused that hee do lesse forbidde us to goe forward in them, than to begin them. For hereupon followeth, that those vowes which proceed of error and superstition, are both of no value before God, and to be forsaken of us.

21 Moreover hee that shall know this solution, shall have wherewith hee may defende against the slanders of the wicked, them that depart from Monkerie to some honest kinde of life. They are grievously accused for breach of Faith and perjury, because they have broken (as it is commonly thought) the insoluble bond wherewith they were bound to God and to the Church. But I say that there was no bond where God doth abrogate that which man confirmeth. Moreover, admitting that they were bound, when they were holden entangled with not knowing of God, and with error: now since they are lightened with the knowledge of the truth, I say that they are therewith free by the grace of Christ. For if the crosse of Christ have so great effectuallnesse, that it looseth us from the curse of the law of God, wherewith wee were holden bound, how much more shall it deliver us from forraigne bonds, which are nothing but the snaring nets of Satan? To whomsoever therefore Christ shineth with the light of his Gospell, it is no doubt that he looseth them from all snares which they had put upon themselves by superstition. Howbeit they want not yet another defence, if they were not fit to live unmarried. For if an impossible vow be a sure destruction of the soule, whom the Lord would have saved and not destroyed: it followeth that we ought not to continue therein. But how impossible is the vow of continence to them that are not indued with a singular gift, we have already taught, and experience speaketh it though I hold my peace. For neither is it unknowne with how great filthinesse almost all monasteries doe swarme. And if any of them seeme honest, and more shamefast than the rest, yet they are not therefore chaste because they suppress and keepe in the fault of unchastity. So verily God doth with horrible examples take vengeance on the boldnesse of men, which forgetting their owne weaknesse, doe against nature cover that which is denied them, and despising the remedies which the Lord had given them at hand, doe trust that they can with stubbornnesse and obstinacy overcome the disease of incontinencie. For what else shall we call it but stubbornnesse, when one being warned that he needeth marriage, and that the same is given him of the Lord for a remedy, doth not onely despise it, but also bindeth himselfe with an oath to the despising of it?

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER

Of Sacraments.

BEside the preaching of the Gospell, another helpe of like sort is in the Sacraments: of which to have some certaine doctrine taught, is much behovefull for us, where-by wee may learne both to what end they were ordained, and what is now the use of them. First it is meete to consider what is a Sacrament. It seemeth to me that this shall be a plaine and proper definition, if we say that it is an outward signe, where-with the Lord sealeth to our consciences the promises of his good will toward us, to sustaine the weaknesse of our faith: and we againe on our behalves doe testifie our godlines toward him as well before him and the Angels as before men. Wee may also with more briefenesse define it otherwise: as to call it a testimony of Gods favour toward us confirmed by an outward signe, with a mutuall testifying of our godlinesse toward him. Whether-soever you choose of these definitions, it differeth nothing in sense from that definition of Augustine, which teacheth that a Sacrament is a visible signe of a holy thing, or a visible forme of invisible grace: But it doth better and more certainly expresse the thing it selfe. For whereas in that briefenesse there is some darkenesse, wherein many of the unskillfuller sort are deceived: I thought good in moe words to give a fuller sentence, that there should remaine no doubt.

2 For what reason the old writers used this word in that sense, it is not hard to see. For so oft as the old translator would render in Latine this Greeke word Mysterion mysterie, specially when divine matters were intreated of, hee translated it Sacrament. So to the Ephesians, that he might make knowne unto us the Sacraments of his will. Againe, if yet ye have heard the distribution of the grace of God, which is given to me in you, because according to revelation the Sacrament was made knowne to me. To the Colossians, The mystery which hath bene hidden from ages and generations, but now is manifested to his Saints, to whom the Lord would make knowne the riches of this Sacrament, &c. Againe to Timothy, A great Sacrament of Godlinesse: God is openly shewed in the flesh. He would not say a secret, lest he should seeme to say somewhat under the greatnesse of the things. Therefore hee hath put Sacrament instead of Secret, but of a holy thing. In that signification it is sometime found among the ecclesiasticall writers. And it is well enough knowne, that those which in Latine are called Sacraments, in Greeke are mysteries: which expressing of one thing in two severall words endeth all the contention. And hereby it came to passe that it was drawne to those signes which had a reverend representation of high and spirituall things. Which Augustine also noteth in one place. It were long (saith he) to dispute of the diversity of signes, which when they pertaine to divine things, are called Sacraments.

3 Now of this definition which we have set, we understand that a Sacrament is never without a promise going before it, but rather is adjoynded as a certaine addition hanging to it, to this end that it should confirme and seale the promise it selfe, and make it more approved unto us, yea after a certaine manner ratified. Which meane the Lord foreseeeth to bee needfull first for our ignorance and dulnesse, and then for our weaknesse: and yet (to speake properly) not so much to confirme his holy word, as to stablish us in the faith thereof. For the truth of God is by it selfe soand and certaine enough, and cannot from any other where receive better confirmation than from it selfe: But our faith, as it is small and weake, unlesse it bee staid on every side, and bee by all meanes upholden, is by and by shaken, wavereth, staggereth, yea, and fainteth. And herein verily the mercifull Lord according to his great tender kindnesse tempereth himselfe to our capacity: that, whereas wee bee naturall men, which alway creeping upon the ground, and sticking fast in the flesh, doe not thinke, nor so much as conceive any spirituall thing, hee vouchsafeth even by these earthly elements to guide us unto himselfe, and in the flesh it selfe to set forth a mirror of spirituall good things. For if we were unbodily (as Chrysostome saith) he would have given us the very same things naked and unbodily. Now because we have soules put within bodies, he giveth spirituall things under visible things. Not because there are such gifts planted in the natures of the things which are set forth to us in the Sacraments: but because they were signed by God to this signification.

4 And this is it which they commonly say, that a Sacrament consisteth of the word and the outward signe. For we must understand the word to be, not that which being whispered without meaning and Faith, with onely noise as it were with a magicall enchantment hath power to consecrate the element: but which being preached maketh us to understand what the visible signe meaneth. Therefore that which was usually done under the tyranny of the Pope, was not without a great prophaning of the mysteries. For thy thought it enough, if the Priest, while the People stood amazedly gazing at it without understanding, did mumble up the forme of consecration. Yea, they of set purpose provided this, that no whit of doctrine should thereof come to the people: for they speake all things in Latine before unlearned men. Afterward superstition brake out so farre, that they beleaved that the consecration was not formally made, unlesse it were with a hoarse whispering sound which few might heare. But Augustine teacheth farre otherwise of the Sacramentall word. Let the word (saith he) be added to the element, and there shall be made a Sacrament. For whence cometh this so great strength to the water, to touch the body and wash the soule. but by the word making it? not because it is spoken, but because it is beleaved. For in the very word it selfe the sound which passeth is onething, and the power which abideth is another. This is the word of Faith which wee preach, saith the Apostle. Whereupon in the Acts of the Apostles it is said, by faith cleansing their hearts. And Peter the Apostle said, by faith, So baptisme also saveth us: not the putting away of the filthinesse of the flesh, but the examination of a good conscience, this is the word of faith which we preach: by which without doubt, that it may be able to cleanse, Baptisme is also hallowed. You see how it requireth preaching, whereupon faith may grow. And we neede not to travell much in prose hereof, forasmuch as it is cleare what Christ did, what he commanded us to doe what the Apostles followed, what the purer Church observed. Yea even from the beginning of the world it is knowne, that so oft as God offered any signe to the holy fathers, there was added an unseparable knot of doctrine, without which our senses should be made amazed with bare beholding. Therefore when we heare mention made of the Sacramentall word, let us understand the promise, which being with a loud voyce preached of the minister, may lead the people thither as it were by the hand, whether the signe tendeth and directeth us.

5 Neither are some to bee heard which travell to fight against this, with a double horned argument rather subtle than sound. Either (say they) we know, or we know not, that the word of God which goeth before the Sacrament, is the true will of God. If we know it, then we learne no new thing of the Sacrament which followeth after. If we know it not, then neither will the Sacrament teach it: whose whole force standeth in the word. Whereunto let this briefly be for an answer: that the scales which are hanged at patents and other publike instruments, taken by themselves are nothing, forasmuch as they should be hanged in vaine if the parchment had nothing written, in it: yet they doe not therefore not confirme and seale that which is written, when they be added to writings. Neither can they say that this similitude is lately saicd by us, which Paul himselfe used, calling circumcision a seale, where he purposely travel- lech to prove, that circumcision was not righteousness to Abraham, but a sealing of that covenant, by faith whereof hee had already beene justified before. And what, I beseech you is there that may much offend any man, if we teach that the promise is sealed with Sacraments, when of the promises themselves it is evident that one is confirmed with another? For as every one is manifest, so is it more fit to uphold faith. But the Sacraments do both bring most cleare promises, and have this peculiar more than the word, that they lively represent them to us as it were painted out in a table. Neither ought that distinction any thing to move us, which is wont to bee objected, betweene Sacraments and seales of patents : that whereas both consist of carnall elements of this world, those cannot suffice or be meete to seale the promises of God, which are spirituall and everlasting, as these are wont to be hanged to, for sealing of the grants of Princes concerning fading and fraile things. For a faithfull man, when the Sacraments are present before his eyes, sticketh not in that fleshly sight, but by those degrees of proportion, which I have spoken of, he riseth up with godly consideration to the high misteries which lie hidden in the Sacraments.

6 And sith the Lord calleth his promises, covenants : and his Sacraments seales of covenants : a similitude may well be brought from the covenants of men. What can a sow killed worke, if words were not used, yea unlesse they went before : For sowes are many times killed without any more inward or higher misterie. What can the giving of a mans right hand doe, sith oftentimes hands are matched with enemie? But when words have gone before, by such signes the lawes of leagues are established, although they were first conceived, made, and decreed in words. Therefore Sacraments are exercises which make the credit of the word of God certainer unto us : and because we are carnall, they are delivered under carnall things, that so they should instruct us according to the capacite of our dulnesse, and guide us by the hand as school-masters guide children. For this reason Augustine calleth a Sacrament, a visible word : because it representeth the promises of God : as it were painted in a table, and setteth them before our sight cunningly expressed and as in an image. Other similitudes also may be brought, whereby Sacraments may be more plainly set out, as if we call them pillars of our faith. For a building standeth and resteth upon the foundation : yet by setting under of pillars, it is more surely stablished : so, Faith resteth upon the word of God, as upon a foundation : but when Sacraments are added : it staeth yet more soundly upon them as upon pillars. Or if we call them looking glasses, in which we may behold the riches of the grace of God, which he giveth us. For (as wee have already said) he doth in them manifestly shew himselfe to us, so much as is given to our dulnesse to know, and doth more expressly testifie his good will and love toward us than by his word.

7 Neither doe they reason sily enough to the purpose, when they labour to prove hereby that they are not testimonies of the grace of God, because they are also given to the wicked, which yet doe thereby feele God nothing more favourable to them but rather procure to themselves more grievous damnation. For by the same argument neither should the Gospell, which is heard and despised of many, bee the testimonie of the grace of God : nor yet Christ himselfe, which was sene and knowen of many, of whom very few received him. The like wee may also see in patents. For a great part of the multitude laugheth at and scorneth that authentike seale, howsoever they know that it proceeded from the Prince to seale his will withall : some regard it nor, as a thing not pertaining to them : some also abhor it : so that considering this so equall relation to both, the same similitude which I have above used, ought more and more to be liked. Therefore it is certaine that the Lord doth offer unto us mercie and a pledge of his grace both in his holy word and in the Sacraments : but the same is not received but of them which receive the word and Sacraments with sure faith : like as Christ is offered of the Father unto salvation to all, yet hee is not acknowledged and received of all. Augustine in one place minding to declare the same, said that the effectualnesse of the word is shewed forth in the Sacrament : nor because it is spoken, but because it is beleaved. Therefore Paul, when he speaketh to the faithfull, so intreateth of Sacraments that he includeth the communion of Christ in them, as when he saith : all yee that are Baptised, have put on Christ. Againe, we are all one body and one spirit, which are Baptised in Christ. But when he speaketh of the wrongfull use of the Sacraments, hee giveth no more to it than to cold and void figures. Whereby he signifieth, that howsoever the wicked and hypocrites with their perversenesse doe either oppress or darken or hinder the effect of the grace of God in the Sacraments, yet that withstandeth not but that where and so oft as it pleaseth God, both they may bring a true testimonie of the communicating of Christ, and the Spirit of God himselfe may deliver and performe that

Which they promise. Wee determine therefore that Sacraments are truly called testimonies of the grace of God, and as it were certaine scales of the good will which hee beareth towards us : which by sealing it unto us, doe by this meanes sustaine, nourish, confirme, and increase our faith. As for the reasons which some are wont to object against this sentence, they are too trifling and weake. They say that if our faith be good it cannot be made better : for they say that it is no faith, but which without shaking, stedfastly, and without withdrawing, resteth upon the mercy of God. It had bene better for such to pray with the Apostles that the Lord would increase their faith, than carelessly to pretend such a perfection of faith, which never any of the sonnes of men hath obtained, nor any shall obtaine in this life. Let them answer, what manner of faith they thinke that hee had which said. I beleeve Lord, helpe my unbeluevingnesse. For even that faith, howsoever it was but a begun faith, was a good faith, and might bee made better when unbeluevingnesse were taken away. But they are confuted by no more certaine argument than by their owne conscience. For if they confesse themselves sinners, (which whether they will or no they cannot deny) they must needs impute the same to the imperfection of their faith.

8 But (say they) Philip answered the Eunuch, that he might be baptized if he beleeved with all his heart. What place here hath the confirmation of Baptisme, where faith filleth the whole heart? Again, I aske them whether they doe not feele a good part of their heart void of faith: whether they doe not daily acknowledge new increases. The heathen man gloried that he waxed old with learning. Therefore we Christians bee thrife miserable, if wee wax old with profiting nothing, whose faith ought to goe forward with all degrees of ages, till it grow into a perfect man. Therefore in this place to beleeve with all the heart, is not perfectly to beleeve Christ, but onely from the heart and with a sincere minde to embrace him: not to be full with him, but with fervent affection to hunger, and thirst, and sigh toward him. This is the manner of the Scripture, to say that that is done with the whole heart, which it meaneth to be done sincerely and heartily. Of this sort are these sayings: I have in all my heart sought thee : I will confesse to thee in all my heart, and such other. As on the otherside, where hee rebuketh guilefull and deceitfull men, he useth to reproch them with heart and heart. Then they say further, that if faith be increased by Sacraments, the holy Ghost is given in vaine, whose strength and worke it is to begin, maintaine, and make perfect faith. To whom indeed I grant, that faith is the proper and whole worke of the holy Ghost, by whom being inlightened wee know God and the treasure of his goodnesse, and without whose light our minde is so blinde, that it can see nothing, so senselesse, that it can smell nothing of spirituall things. But for one benefit of God which they set forth, we consider three. For first the Lord teacheth and instructeth us with his word: then he strengtheneth us with Sacraments : Last of all hee shineth into our minds with the light of his holy spirit, and openeth an entry for the word and Sacraments into our hearts, which otherwife should but strike our eares, and be present before our eies, and nothing moove the inward parts.

9 Wherefore as touching the confirmation and increase of faith, I would have the reader warned (which I thinke I have already in plaine words expressed) that I doe so assigne that ministry to the Sacraments, not as though I thought that there is perpetually in them I wot not what secret force, by which they may of themselves be able to further or confirme faith : but because they are ordained of the Lord to this end, that they should serve to the stablishing and increasing of faith. But then only they do truly perform their office, when that inward schoolemaster the spirit is come to them, which whose onely power both the hearts are pearced, and affections are moved, and the entry is streopen for the Sacraments into our soules. It he be absent, Sacraments can doe no more to our mindes, than if either the brightnesse of the sunne should shine upon blind eyes, or a voyce sound to deafe eares. Therefore I to make devision betwene the spirit and Sacraments, that the power of working remaine with the spirit, and to the Sacraments bee left only the ministration, yea and the same void and trifling without the working of the spirit : but of much effectualnesse, when he inwardly worketh and putteth forth his force. Now it is plaine in what sort according to this sentence, a godly

Although we beleeve with all our hearts, and although it be the worke of the holy Ghost to begin, maintaine and make perfect faith, yet are not the Sacraments hereby proved unnecessary to the increase of faith.

How Sacraments are said to confirme faith.

ly mind is confirmed in the faith by Sacraments: that is to say, even as the eyes see by the brightnesse of the Sunne, and the eares heare by the sound of a voice: of which neither the eyes should any whit perceive any light, unlesse they had a sight in themselves that might naturally bee insighned, and the eares should in vaine be knocked at with any crying whatsoever it were, unlesse they were naturally made fit to heare. But if it be true, which ought at once to be determined among us, that what the sight worketh in our eies to seeing of the light, what the hearing worketh in our eares to the perceiving of a voice, the same is the worke of the holy Ghost in our hearts, both to the conceiving, and sustaining, and cherishing and stablishing of faith: then both these things doe likewise follow: that the Sacraments doe nothing at all profic without the power of the holy Ghost: and that nothing withstandeth but that in hearts already taught of that schoolemaster, they may make faith both stronger and more increased. Only this difference there is, that the power of hearing and seeing is naturally set in our eares and eyes: but Christ beside the measure of nature doth by speciall grace worke the same in our mindes.

10 Whereby those objections also, which comber some men, are dissolved: That if we ascribe to creatures either the increase or confirmation of faith, there is wrong done to the spirit of God, whom we ought to acknowledge the onely author thereof. For neither doe we in the meane time take from him either the praise of confirming or increasing it: but rather we affirme, that even this that he encreaseth and confirmeth faith, is nothing else but with his inward enlightning to prepare our minds to receive that confirming which is set forth by the Sacraments. But if it be yet too darkly spoken, it shall bee made very cleere by a similitude which I will bring. If thou purpose with words to perswade a man to doe any thing, thou wilt search out all the reasons, whereby he may be drawn to thy opinion, and may be in a manner subdued to obey thy counsell. But thou hast hitherto nothing prevailed, unlesse hee likewise have a peering and sharpe judgement, whereby he may weigh what pith is in thy reasons, unlesse also he have a tractable wit and ready to hearken to teaching: finally unlesse hee have conceived such an opinion of thy faithfulness and wisdom, as may bee to him like a certaine fore-judgement to cause him to subscribe. For both there are many stubborn heads, which a man can never bow with any reasons: and also where credit is suspected, where authoritie is despised little good is done even with the willing to learne. On the other side let all those things bee present, they will truly bring to passe that the hearer, to whom thou givest counsell, will obey the selfe same counsels which otherwise he would have laughed to scorne. The same worke also the spirit worketh in us. For least the word should beate our eares in vaine, lest the Sacraments should strike our eyes in vaine, hee sheweth us that it is God which speaketh therein, he softneth the stubbornnesse of our heart, and frameth it to the obedience which is due to the word of the Lord. Finally he conveyeth those outward words and Sacraments from the eares into the soule. Therefore both the word and the Sacraments doe confirme our faith, when they set before our eyes the good will of the heavenly Father toward us, by knowledge of whom both the whole stedfastnesse of our faith standeth fast, and the strength of it encreaseth: the spirit confirmeth it, when in engraving the same confirmation in our mindes hee maketh it effectual. In the meane time the father of lights cannot bee forbidden, but as he enlightmeth the bodily eyes with the beames of the Sunne, so he may enlighten our mindes with Sacraments, as with a brightnesse set meane betweene.

11 Which property the Lord taught that there was in his outward word, when in the parable he calleth it seed. For as seed, if it fall upon a desert and untilled piece of ground, will doe nothing but die: but if it be throwen upon arable land well manured and tilled, it will bring forth her fruit with very good increase: so the word of God, if it light upon a stiffe necke, it will grow barren as that which is sown upon sand: but if it light upon a soule manured with the hand of the heavenly spirit, it will bee most fruitful. But if there be like reason of seed and of the word: as we say that out of seed come both springeth and increaseth, and groweth up to ripenesse: why may we not say that faith taketh out of the word of God both beginning, increase, and perfection? very well expresth both these things in sundry places, For when he goeth about to put the Corinthians in remembrance how effectually God used his travaile, he glorifieth that hee hath the ministry of the Spirit, as though the power of the holy Ghost were with an unseparable knot ioyned with his preaching, to enlighten and thoroughly move the mind. But in another place when hee mindeth to admonish them, of what force the word of God is of it selfe being preached by man, hee compareth the ministers themselves to husbandmen, which when they have bestowed their labour and travaile in tilling the earth have no more to doe. But what should tilling, and sowing, and watering profit unlesse that which is sown should receive liveness by heavenly benefit? Therefore hee concludeth, that both hee that planteth and hee that watereth are nothing: but that all things are to be ascribed to God, which alone giveth the increase. Therefore the Apostles doe in their preaching utter the power of the Spirit, so farre as God useth the instruments ordained by himselfe to the setting forth of his spirituall grace. Yet wee must keepe still that distinction, that we remember, what man is able to doe by himselfe, and what is proper to God,

12 Sacraments are so confirmations of our faith, that many times when the Lord meaneth to take away the confidence of the very things that are by him promised in the Sacraments, hee taketh away the Sacraments themselves. When hee spoileth and thrusteth away Adam from the gift of immortalitie, hee saith: Let him not eat of the fruit of life, lest he live for ever. What saith hee? Could that fruit restore to Adam his uncorruption, from which he was now fallen? No. But this is all one as if he had said: Lest he should enjoy a vaine confidence if hee keepe still the signe of my promise, let that bee shaken away from him which might bring him some hope of immortalitie. After this manner when the Apostle exhorteth the Ephesians to remember that they were forraigne guests of the Testaments, strangers from the fellowship of Israel, without God, without Christ, he saith, that they were not partakers of circumcision. Whereby hee doth (by figure of transnomination) signifie that they were excluded from the promise it selfe, which had not received the signe of the promise. To their other objection, that the glory of God is conveyed to creatures, to whom so much power is ascribed, and that thereby it is so farre diminished, we have in readinesse to answer that we set no power in creatures. Only this we say, that God useth meanes and instruments, which hee himselfe seeth to be expedient: that all things may serve his glory, forasmuch as hee is Lord and judge of all. Therefore as by bread and other nourishments he feedeth our body: as by the Sunne hee enlighteneth the world: as by fire he warmeth: yet neither Bread, nor the Sunne, nor fire, are any thing but so far as by those instruments hee doth distribute his blessings unto us: so spiritually hee nourisheth Faith by the Sacraments, whose onely office is to set his promises before our eyes to be looked upon, yea to be pledges unto us of them. And as it is our dutie to fasten none of our affiance in other creatures, which by the liberality and bountifullnesse of God are ordained to our uses, and by the ministry whereof he giveth us his giftes, nor to have them in admiration, and praise them as causes of our good: so neither ought our confidence to stick fast in the Sacraments, nor the glory of God to be removed unto them: but leaving all things, both our faith and confession ought to rise up to him the Author both of the Sacraments and of all things.

13 Whereas some bring an argument out of the very name of a Sacrament, it is nothing strong. A Sacrament (say they) whereas it hath among allowed Authors many significations yet it hath but one which agreeth with the signes: that is, whereby it signifieth that solemne oath which the souldier maketh to his Captaine when he entereth into profession of a souldier. For as by that oath of warfare new souldiers doe bind their faith to the Captaine, and professe to be his souldiers: so by our signes we professe Christ our Captaine, and doe testifie that we serve under his banner. They adde similitudes to make thereby the matter more plaine. As a gowne made the Romans severally knowne from the Greekes which did weare cloakes: as the very degrees of men at Rome were discerned by their severall signes: the degree of Senators from the degree of Knights, by purple coat and picked shooes: againe a Knight from a Commoner.

moner, by a Ring : so wee beare our signes that may make us severally knowne from prophane men. But by the things above said it is evident enough, that the old Writers, which gave to the signes the name of Sacraments, had no regard how this word was used among Latine Writers, but for their owne purpose feigned this signification, whereby they signified only holy signes. But if we will search the matter more deeply, it may seeme that they have with the same relation applied the word to the same signification, wherewith they have removed the name of Faith to that sense wherein it is now used. For whereas Faith is a truth in performing promises ; yet they have called Faith an assurednesse, or sure perswasion which is had of the truth it selfe. Likewise, whereas a Sacrament is the souldiers part whereby hee voweth himselfe to his Captaine ; they have made it the Captaines part, whereby he receiveth souldiers into rooms of service. For by the Sacrament the Lord doth promise that hee will bee our God, and that we shall be his people. But we passe over such subtilties, for as much as I thinke I have proved with arguments plaine enough, that they had respect to nothing else but to signifie that these are signes of holy and spirituall things. We receive indeed the similitudes which they bring of outward tokens ; but we allow not that that which is the last point in the Sacrament, is by them set for the chiefe, yea and onely thing. But this is the first point, that they should serve our faith before God ; the latter point, that they should testifie our confession before men. According to this latter consideration those similitudes have place. But in the meane time let that first part remaine ; because otherwise (as we have already proved) the mysteries should be but cold, unless they were helps to our faith, and additions to doctrine, ordained to the same use and end.

14. Againe, we must be warned, that as these men doe weaken the force, and utterly overthrow the use of Sacraments ; so on the contrary side there be some, which feigne to Sacraments I wot not what secret vertues, which are no where read to be put in them by God. By which error the simple and unskillfull are dangerously deceived, while they are both taught to seeke the gifts of God where they cannot bee found, and are by little and little drawne away from God, to embrace meere vanity in stead of his verity. For the Sophisticall Schooles have taught with great consent, that the Sacraments of the new law, that is to say, those which are now in use in the Christian Church doe justifie and give grace, so that we doe not lay a stop of deadly sinne. It cannot be expressed how pernicious and pestilent this opinion is, and so much the more, because in many ages heretofore, to the great losse of the Church, it hath prevailed in a great part of the world. Truly it is utterly devillish. For when it promiseth righteousness without faith, it driveth soules headlong into destruction ; then because it fetcheth the cause of righteousness from the Sacraments, it bindeth the miserable minds of men, already of their owne accord too much bending to the earth, with this superstition, that they rather rest in the sight of a bodily thing, than of God himselfe. Which two things I would to God we had not so proved in experience, so little need they any long proofe. But what is a Sacrament taken without faith, but the some certaine destruction of the Church ? For whereas nothing is to be looked for thereof without the promise, and the promise doth no lesse threaten wrath to the unfaithfull, than it offereth grace to the faithfull : he is deceived that thinketh that there is any more given to him by the Sacraments, than that which being offered by the Word of God, he receiveth by faith. Whereupon another thing also is gathered, that the assistance of salvation hangeth not upon the partaking of the Sacrament, as though Justification consisted therein, which we know to be reposed in Christ onely, and to be communicated unto us no lesse by the preaching of the Gospell, than by the sealing of the Sacrament ; and that without that it cannot wholly stand. So true is that which Augustine also writeth, that invisible sanctification may be without a visible signe ; and I imagine, that a visible signe may be without true sanctification. For (as hee also writeth in another place) men doe put on Christ sometime untill the receiving of a Sacrament, sometime even untill the sanctification of life. And that first point may be common both to good and to evill ; but this other is proper to the good and goodly.

15. Hereupon commeth that distinction if it bee well understood, which the same same Augustine hath often noted, betweene a Sacrament, and the thing of the Sacrament. For it not onely signifieth, that the figure and truth are there contained, but that they doe not so hang together, but that they may be severed; and that even in the very conjoyning the thing must alway be discerned from the signe, that wee give not to the one that which belongeth to the other. He speaketh of the separation, when he writeth that the Sacraments doe worke in the onely Ele&ct that which they figure. Againe, when he writeth thus of the Jewes: When the Sacraments were common to all, the grace was not common, which is the power of the Sacraments. So now also the washing of regeneration is common to all; but the grace it selfe, whereby the members of Christ are regenerate with their head, is not common to all. Againe, in another place of the Supper of the Lord, wee also at this day receive visible meat. But the Sacrament is one thing, and the power of the Sacrament another thing. What is this, that many receive of the Altar and die, and in receiving doe die? For the Lords morfell was poyson to Judas; not because he received an evill thing, but because he being evill, received a good thing evilly. A litle after: The Sacrament of this thing, that is, of the unity of the body and bloud of Christ, is somewhere prepared on the Lords Table dayly, somewhere by certaine distances of dayes; and thereof is received unto life to some, and unto destruction to some. But the thing it selfe whereof it is a Sacrament, is received unto life to all men, but unto destruction to no man, whosoever is partaker of it. And a litle before he had said; Hee shall not die which eateth: but he which pertaineth to the power of the Sacrament, not to the visible Sacrament: which eateth within, not without: which eateth with heart, not he which prefeth with tooth. Thus you heare every where, that a Sacrament is so severed from his owne truth by the unworthinesse of the receiver, that there remaineth nothing but a vaine and unprofitable figure. But that thou maist have not a signe void of truth, but the thing with the signe, thou must conceive by faith the word which is there enclosed. So how much thou shalt by the Sacraments profit in communicating of Christ, so much profit shalt thou take of them.

16. If this bee somewhat darke because of the shortnesse, I will set it out in moe words. I say that Christ is the matter, (or if thou wilt) the substance of all Sacraments: for as much as in him they have all their perfectnesse, and doe promise nothing without him. So much lesse tolerable is the error of Peter Lombard, which doth expressly make them causes of righteousness and salvation, whereof they bee parts. Therefore bidding all causes farewell which mans wit doth feigne to it selfe, wee ought to stay in this one cause. Therefore how much wee bee by their miserable holpen to the nourishing, confirming, and increasing of the true knowledge of Christ in us, and to the possessing of him more fully, and to the enjoying of his riches, so much effectuallnesse they have with us. But that is done when wee doe with true faith receive that which is there offered. Doe the wicked then (wilt thou say) bring to passe by their unthankfulnesse, that the ordinances of God be void, and turne to nothing? I answer, that that which I have said, is not so to be taken, as though the force and truth of the Sacrament did hang upon the fate or will of him that receiveth it. For that which God hath ordained, remaineth stedfast, and keepeth still his nature, howsoever men doe varie. But sith it is one thing to offer, another to receive, nothing withstandeth, but that the signe hallowed by the Word of God, may be indeede that which it is called, and keep his owne force; and yet that there come thereby no profit to an evill doer, and wicked man. But Augustine doth in few words well affoile this question. If (saith he) thou receivest carnally, it ceaseth not to be spirituall; but it is not to thee. But as Augustine hath in the aforesaid places shewed, that a Sacrament is a thing nothing worth, if it be severed from the truth thereof; so in another place he giveth warning, that even in the very conjoyning needeth a distinction, lest wee sticke too much in the outward signe. As (saith he) to follow the letter, and so take the signes in stead of the things, is a point of servile weaknesse: so to expound the signes unprofitably, is a point of evill wandering error. Hee nameth two faults which are here to be avoided: The one when wee so take the signes, as though they were given in vaine, and when with abusing or diminishing their secret significations by our enviousnesse, wee bring bring to passe that they bring us no profit at all. The other; when in not raising our minds beyond the visible signe, we give away to the Sacraments the praise of all those good things which are not given us but of Christ onely, and that by the holy Ghost, which maketh us partakers of Christ himselfe: and indeed by the helpe of the outward signes: which if they allure us to Christ, when they be wrested another way, the whole profit of them is unworthily overthrowne.

17. Wherefore let this remaine certaine; that there is no other office of the sacraments than of the word of God: which is to offer and set forth Christ unto us, and in him the treasures of heavenly grace: but they availe or profit nothing, but being received by faith: even as wine, or oyle, or any other liquor, though you powre it on largely, yet it will run beside and perish, unless the vessels mouth be open to receive it, and the vessell though it be wet round about on the out side, shall never the less remaine void and empty within. Beside this we must be ware, lest those things which have been written by the old writers somewhat too gloriously to amplify the dignity of sacraments, which lead us away into an error neere to this: namely that we should thinke that there is some secret power knit and fastned to the sacraments, that they may of themselves give us the graces of the holy Ghost, like as wine is given in a cup: whereas onely this office is appointed to them by God, to testify and stablish to us the good will of God toward us, and doe profit no further unless the holy Ghost joyne himselfe to them, which may open our minds and hearts, and make us partakers of this testimony, wherein also doe cleerely appeare divers and severall graces of God. For the Sacraments, as we have above touched, are that thing to us of God, which to men are messengers of joyfull things, or earnest in stablishing of bargaines: which doe not of themselves give any grace, but doe tell and shew us, and (as they be earnest and tokens,) doe ratifie unto us those things that are given us by the liberality of God. The holy Ghost (whom the Sacraments doe not in common without difference bring to all men, but whom the Lord peculiarly giveth to them that be his) is he that bringeth the graces of God with him, which giveth to the Sacraments place in us, which maketh them to bring forth fruit. But although wee doe not denie that God himselfe with the most present power of his Spirit is present with his owne institution, lest the ministration which he hath ordained of the Sacraments should be fruitlesse and vaine: yet we affirme that the inward grace of the Spirit, as it is severed from the outward Ministry, so ought to be severally weighed and considered. God therefore truly performeth indeed whatsoever he promiseth and figureth in signes: neither doe the signes want their effect, that the author of them may bee proved true and faithfull. The question here is onely whether God worketh by his owne and by inward power (as they call it) or doe resigne his office to outward signes. But wee affirme, that whatsoever instruments he use; his original working is nothing hindred thereby. When this is taught concerning the Sacraments, both their dignities is honourably set out, and their use is plainly shewed, and their profitableness is abundantly reported, and the best meane in all these things is retained, that neither any thing be given to them which ought not, nor againe any thing be taken from them which is not convenient to be taken from them. In the meane time that fained devise is taken away, whereby the cause of justification and power of the holy Ghost is inclosed in elements as in vessels or waggons, and that principall force which hath beene omitted of other is expressly set out. Here also it is to be noted, that God inwardly worketh that which the Minister figureth and testifieth by outward doing: lest that be drawne to a mortall man, which God claimeth to himselfe alone. The same thing also doth Augustine wisely touch. How (saith hee) doth both Moses sanctifie, and God? not Moses for God: but Moses with visible Sacraments by his ministry, but God with invisible grace by his holy Spirit: where also is the whole fruit of visible Sacraments. For without this sanctification of invisible grace what doe those visible Sacraments profit?

18 The name of Sacrament, as we have hitherto entreated of the nature of it, doth generally containe all the signes that ever God gave to men, to certifie and assure them of the truth of his promises. Those hee sometime willed to remaine in naturall things, sometime hee delivered them in miracles. Of the first kinde these bee examples as when he gave to Adam and Eve the tree of life for an earnest of immortalitye, that they might assure themselves of it, so long as they did eate of the fruite thereof. And when hee did set the heavenly bowe for a monument to Noe and his posteritie, that he would no more from thenceforth destroy the earth with overflowing of water. These Adam and Noe had for sacraments. Not that the tree did give them immortalitye, which it could not give to it selfe: nor that the Bowe (which is but a striking backe of a sun-beame upon the clouds against it) was of force to hold in the waters: but because they had a marke given in them by the word of God, that they should bee examples and seales of his testaments. And the tree was a tree before, and the bowe a bowe. When they were written upon with the word of God, then a new forme was put into them, that they should begin to be that which they were not before. That no man should thinke these things spoken without cause, the bowe it selfe is at this day also a witness of that covenant which God made with Noe: which bowe so oft as we behold, we reade this promise of God written in it, that the earth shall never be destroyed with overflowing of waters. Therefore if any fond Philosopher, to scorne the simplicitie of our faith, doe affirme that such varietie of colours doth naturally arise of reflected beames and a cloud set against them: let us grant it indeed, but let us laugh to scorne his senselesse follie, which doth not acknowledge God the Lord and governor of nature: which at his owne will useth all the elements to the service of his owne glorie. If he had imprinted such tokens in the sunne, the starres, the earth, stones, and such like, they should all have bene sacraments to us. Why are not uncoined and coined silver both of one value, sith they are both one metall? even because the one hath nothing but nature: when it is striken with a common marke, it is made money, and receiveth a new valuation. And shall not God be able to marke his creatures with his word, that they may be made sacraments, which before were naked elements? Of the second kind these were examples, when hee shewed to Abraham a light in a smoking oven: when he watered the fleece with dewe, the earth remaining drie: againe he watered the earth, the fleece being untouched, to promise victorie to Gidem: when hee drew the shadow of the diall nine lines backward, to promise life to Ezechias. These things, when they were done to relieve and stablish the weaknesse of their faith, were then also sacraments.

Christ set forth as by the words, so by the Sacraments, neither available without faith, so when they are available is them they work not by secret inclosed force, grace cometh with the Sacraments, not from the Sacraments but from God.

19 But our present purpose is, to discourse peculiarly of those sacraments, which the Lord willed to bee ordinarie in his Church, to nourish his worshippers and servants into one faith and the confession of one faith. For (to use the words of Augustine) men can be congealed together into no name of religion either true or false, unlesse they bee bound together with some fellowship of visible signes and sacraments. Sith therefore the most good Father foresaw this necessitie, he did from the beginning ordaine certaine exercises of godlinesse for his servants, which afterward Satan by turning them to wicked and superstitious worshippings, hath many wayes depraved and corrupted. Hereupon came those solemne professions of the Gentiles into their holie orders, and other bastard usages: which although they were full of error and superstition, yet they also were therewith a prooffe that men could not in profession of religion bee without such outward signes. But because they neither were grounded upon the word of God, nor were referred to that truth whereunto all signes ought to bee directed, they are unworthie to bee rehearsed where mention is made of the holle signes which are ordained of God, and have not swarved from their foundation, that is, that they should be helps of true godlinesse. They consist not of bare signes, as were the bowe and the tree, but upon ceremonies: or rather the signes that bee here given are ceremonies. But as it is above said, that they be on the Lords behalfe testimonies of grace and salvation: so they bee againe on our behalfe marks of profession, by which wee openly sweare to the name of God, for our parts binding our faith unto him. Therefore Chrysostome in one place fitly calleth them covenantings whereby God bindeth himselfe in league with us, and wee be bound to purenesse and holinesse of life, because here is made a mutuall forme of covenanting betweene God and us. For as the Lord therein promiseth that hee will cancell and blot out whatsoever guiltinesse and penaltie wee have gathered by offending, and doth reconcile us to him selfe in his onely begotten sonne : so we againe on our behalves doe by this profession binde our selves unto him to the following of godlinesse and innocency : so that a man may rightly say that such Sacraments are ceremonies, by which God will exercise his people first to the nourishing, stirring up, and strengthening of faith inwardly, then to the testifying of religion before men.

20 And even the Sacraments also were divers, after the divers order of time, according to the distribution whereby it pleaseth the Lord to shew himselfe after this or that manner to men. For to Abraham and his posteritie Circumcision was commanded whereunto afterward purifyings and Sacrifices, and other Ceremonies were added out of the law of Moses. These were the Sacraments of the Jewes untill the comming of Christ : at which comming those being abrogate, two Sacraments were ordained, which now the Christian Church useth, Baptisme, and the Supper of the Lord. I speake of those that were ordained for the use of the whole Church. For as for the laying on of hands, whereby the ministers of the Church are entred into their office, as I doe not unwillingly suffer it to be called a Sacrament, so I doe not reckon it among the ordinarie Sacraments. As for the rest which are commonly called Sacraments, what they are to be accounted, we shall see by and by. Howbeit the old Sacraments also had respect to the same marke, wherunto ours do extend, that is, to direct and in a manner lead by the hand to Christ : or rather as Images to represent him, and shew him forth to be knowne. For whereas wee have already taught, that they are certaine seales wherewith the promises of God are sealed : and where it is most certaine, that there was never offered any promise of God to men but in Christ : that they may teach us of some promise of God, they must needs shew Christ. Whereunto pertaineth that heavenly paterne of the Tabernacle and of the worshipping in the law, which was given to Moses in the Mount. One onely difference there is, that those did shadow out Christ being promised, when he was yet looked for : these doe testifie him already given and delivered.

21 When these things shall all bee particularly and each one severally declared, they shall bee made much plainer. Circumcision was to the Jewes a signe, whereby they were put in minde, that whatsoever cometh of the seed of man, that is to say the whole nature of man is corrupt, and hath need of proyning. Moreover it was a teaching, and token of remembrance whereby they should confirme themselves in the promise given to Abraham, concerning that blessed seed in whom all the Nations of the earth were to be blessed, from whom they had their owne blessing to bee looked for. Now that healthfull seed (as wee are taught of Paul) was Christ, in whom alone they hoped that they should recover that which they had lost in Adam. Wherefore Circumcision was to them the same thing which Paul saith that it was to Abraham, namely the seale of the righteousnesse of faith : that is to say, the seale whereby they should be more certainly assured, that their faith wherewith they looked for that seed, should be accounted to them of God for righteousnesse. But we shall upon a better occasion in another place goethrough with the comparison of Circumcision and Baptisme. Baptisings and purifyings did set before their eyes their owne uncleannesse, filthinesse and pollution, wherewith they were defiled in their owne nature : but they promised another washing, whereby all their filthinesse should be wiped and washed away. And this washing was Christ, with whose blood we being washed doe bring his cleannesse into the sight of God, that it may hide all our defilings. Their sacrifices did accuse them of their owne wickednesse, and therewithall did teach, that it was necessary that there should be some satisfaction which should be paid to the judgement of God. That therefore there should bee some one chiefe Bishop, a Mediator betweene God and men, which should sacrifice God by shedding of blood, and by offering of a sacrifice which should suffice for the forgiveness of finnes. This chiefe Priest was Christ : hee himselfe shed his owne blood : he himselfe was the Sacrifice : for hee offered himselfe obedient to his Father unto death : by which obedience hee tooke away the disobedience of man, which had provoked the displeasure of God.

Sacraments before Christ and after, and the scope of both.

What is spoken in Scripture to dimi-

us, as hee was more neerely shewed to men, since hee hath beene truly delivered of his father such as he had beene promised. For Baptisme doth testifie unto us that wee are cleansed and washed, the Supper of thanksgiving testifieth that wee hee redeemed. In water, is figured washing: in blood, satisfaction. These two things are found in Christ, which (as John saith) came in water and blood, that is to say, that hee might cleanse and redeeme. Of which thing the Spirit of God also is a witness. Yea there are three witnesses in one, Water, Blood, and Spirit. In water and blood we have a testimonie of cleansing and redeeming: but the Spirit the principall witness bringeth unto us assured credit of such witnessing. This high mysterie hath notably well beene shewed us in the Crosse of Christ, when water and blood flowed out of his holy side: which side for that cause Augustine rightfully called the fountaine of our Sacraments: of which yet wee must intreat somewhat more at large. There is no doubt but that more plentifull grace also of the Spirit doth here shew forth it selfe if you compare time with time. For that pertaineth to the glory of the kingdome of Christ, as we gather out of many places, but specially out of the seventh Chapter of Iohn. In which sense wee must take that saying of Paul, that under the law were shadows, but in Christ is the body. Neither is it his meaning to spoile of their effect the testimonies of grace, in which Gods will was in the old time to prove himselfe to the Fathers a true speaker, even as at this day hee doth to us in Baptisme and in the holy Supper. But onely his purpose was by way of comparison to magnifie that which was given us, lest any should thinke it marvellous, that the Ceremonies of the law were abolished by the coming of Christ.

23 But that same schoole doctrine (as I may also briefly touch this by the way) is utterly to be hissed out, whereby there is noted so great a difference betwene the Sacraments of the old and new law, as though those did nothing but shadow out the grace of God, and these doe presently give it. For the Apostle speaketh no lesse honorably of those than of these, when he teacheth that the Fathers did eat the same spirituall meat which wee eat, and expoundeth that same meat to be Christ. Who dare make that an emptie signe, which delivered to the Jewes a true communion of Christ? And the ground of the cause which the Apostle there handleth, doth plainly fight on our side. For, that no man trusting upon a cold knowledge of Christ, and emptie title of Christianitie, and outward tokens, should presume to despise the judgement of God: hee sheweth forth examples of Gods severitie to be scene in the Jewes: that wee should know that the same paines which they have suffered, hang over us, if we follow the same faults. Now that the comparison may bee fit, it behoveth that hee should shew that there is no unequalnesse betwene us and them in those good things whereof hee did forbid us to boast falsely. Therefore first hee maketh us equal in the Sacraments, and leaveth to us not so much as any small peece of prerogative, that might encourage us to hope of escaping unpunished. Neither verily is it lawfull to give any more to our Baptisme, than he in another place giveth to Circumcision, when hee calleth it, The seale of the righteousness of faith. Whatsoever therefore is at this day given us in our Sacraments, the same thing the Jewes in the old time received in theirs, that is to say, Christ with his spirituall riches. What power our Sacraments have, the same they also felt in theirs: that is to say, that they were to them seales of Gods good will toward them, into the hope of eternall salvation. If they had bene apt expositors of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, they would not have so bene blinded. But when they reade there, that sinnes were not cleanted by the Ceremonies of the law, yea that the old shadows had no availing force to righteousness: they neglecting the comparison which is there handled, while they tooke hold of this one thing, that the law of it selfe nothing profited the followers of it, thought simply that the figures were void of truth. But the Apostles meaning is to bring the ceremoniall law to nothing, untill it come to Christ, upon whom alone hangeth all the effectualnesse of it.

24 But they will object those things which are read in Paul concerning the Circumcision of the letter, that it is in no estimation with God, that it giveth nothing, that it is vaine. For such sayings seeme to presse it downe farre beneath Baptisme. Not to

For

For the very same might rightfully bee said of Baptisme. Yea and also the same is said, first of Paul himselfe, where he sheweth that God regardeth not the outward washing whereby we enter into profession of religion, unless the minde within be both cleansed and continue in cleanness to the end: againe of Peter, when he testifieth that the truth of Baptisme standeth not in the outward washing, but in a good witnessing of conscience. But he seemeth also in another place utterly to dispise the circumcision made with hands, when he compareth it with the circumcision of Christ. I answer that even in this place nothing is abated of the dignitie of it. Paul there disputeth against them, which required it as necessary when it was now abrogate. Therefore he warneth the faithfull, that leaving the old shadows they should stand fast in the truth. These Masters (saith he) instantly call upon you, that your bodies may bee circumcised. But ye are spiritually circumcised according to the soule and body. Yee have therefore the deliverance of the thing indeed, which is much better than the shadow. A man might take exception to the contrary, and say that the figure is not therefore to be despised because they had the thing indeed? forasmuch as the putting off of the old man, of which he there speaks, was also among the Fathers, to whom yet outward circumcision had not beene superfluous: Hee preventeth this objection, when he by and by addeth, that the Colossians were buried with Christ by Baptisme. Whereby hee signifieth that at this day baptisme is the same to Christians, which circumcision was to the old people: and therefore that circumcision cannot be enjoyned to Christians without wrong done to Christ.

25 But that which followeth, and which I even now alleaged, is harder to assoile, that all the Jewish ceremonies were shadows of things to come, and that in Christ is the body: but most hard of all is that which is intreated in many Chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, that the blood of beasts, attained not to consciences: that the law had a shadow of good things to come, not an image of things that the followers of it obtained, no perfection of the Ceremonies of Moses and such other. I goe backe to that which I have already touched, that Paul doth not therefore make the ceremonies shadowish, because they had no found thing in them: but because the fulfilling of them was after a certaine manner hanged in suspence untill the delivering of Christ. Againe I say that this is to be understood not of the effectualnesse, but rather of the manner of signifying. For till Christ was manifestly shewed in the flesh, all the signes did shadow him out as absent, howsoever hee did inwardly utter to the faithfull the presence of his power and of himselfe. But this we ought chiefly to marke, that in all those places Paul doth not speake simply, but by way of contention. Because hee strived with the false Apostles, which would have godlinesse to consist in the ceremonies onely without any respect of Christ: to confute them it sufficeth oaelly to intreate, of what value ceremonies are by themselves. This marke also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes followed. Let us therefore remember that here is disputed of ceremonies, nor as they be taken in their owne and naturall signification, but as they be wrested to a false and wrongfull exposition: not of the lawfull use of them, but of the abuse of superstition. What marvell is it therefore if ceremonies being severed from Christ, are unclothed of all force? For all signes whatsoever they be, are brought to nought, when the thing signified is taken away: So when Christ had to doe with them which thought that Manna was nothing else, but meate for the belly, he applyeth his speech to their grosse opinion, & saith that he ministrereth better meate, which may feed soules to hope of immortalitie. But if you require a plainer solution, the summe of all tendeth to this: First, that all that furniture of ceremonies, which was in the law of Moses, is a vanishing thing and of no value, unless it be directed to Christ. Secondly, that they so had respect to Christ, that when he at length was manifestly shewed in the flesh, they had their fulfilling. Finally, that it behoved that they should be taken away by his coming, even as a shadow vanisheth away in the cleare light of the Sunne. But because I doe yet defer longer discourse of that matter unto that place where I have purposed to compare baptisme with circumcision, therefore I doe now more sparingly touch it.

writers concerning our signes, deceived those miserable Sophisters. As this of Augustine. That the Sacraments of the old law did onely promise the Saviour; but ours doe give salvation. When they marked not that these and such other formes of speaking were spoken: they also published their excessive doctrines, but in a cleane contrary sense from the writing of the old fathers. For Augustine meant no other thing in that place, than as the same Augustine writeth in another place. That the Sacraments of the law of Moses did foretell of Christ; but ours doe tell of him present. And against Fausstus. That those were promises of things to be fulfilled, these were tokens of things fulfilled: as if he should say, that those figured him when he was looked for, but ours doe as it were shew him present which hath beene already delivered. Moreover he speaketh of the manner of signifying, as also he sheweth in another place. The law (saith hee) and the Prophets had Sacraments, foretelling of a thing to come: but the Sacraments of our time do testifie that that is already come, which those did declare to be to come. But what hee thought of the thing and effectualnesse, he expoundeth in many places: as when hee saith, that the Sacraments of the Jewes were in signes, divers: but in the thing signified, equall with ours: divers in visible forme, but equall in spirituall power. Againe: in divers signes is all one faith: so in divers signes, as in divers words: because words change their sounds by times: and truly words are nothing but signes. The Fathers did drinke the same spirituall drink, for they drunke not the same bodily drink. See ye therefore, faith remaining one, the signes varied. To them the rocke was Christ: to us that is Christ, which is set upon the Altar. And they drinke for a great Sacrament, the water flowing out of the rocke: what we drinke, the faithfull know. If thou consider the visible forme they drunke another thing: if an understandable signification they drunke the same spirituall drink. In another place, in the mystery the same is their meat and drinke which is ours: but the same in signification, not in forme: because the selfe same Christ was figured to them in the rocke, and shewed to us in the flesh. Howbeit in this behalfe also we grant that there is some difference. For both sacraments doe testifie that the fatherly good will of God and the graces of the holy Ghost are offered us in Christ: but our sacraments testifie it more cleerely and brightly. In both is a delivering of Christ: but in these more plenteous and fuller, namely as that difference of the old & new Testament beareth, of which we have intreated before. And this is it that the same Augustine meant (whom we more often alleadge as the best and faithfullest witness of all the old writers) where he teacheth that when Christ was revealed, sacraments were ordained both in number fewer, in signification higher, in force more excellent. Of this thing also it is expedient that the readers briefly be warned, that whatsoever the Sophisters have triflingly taught concerning the worke wrought, is not onely false, but disagreeeth with the nature of the Sacraments, which God hath ordained, that the faithfull being void and needy of all good things should bring nothing thither but beggery. Whereupon followeth that in receiving them, these men doe nothing wherby they may deserve praise: or that in doing (which in this their respect is meere passive) no worke can be ascribed unto them.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of Baptisme.

The first use of Baptisme to be a token of our cleansing, and therefore not a marke of recognizance, and a signe of profession onely as some would have it.

Baptisme is a signe of the entring wherewith wee are received into fellowship of the Church: that being grafted into Christ, wee may be reckoned among the children of God. Now it was given us of God to this end, (which I have taught to be common to all the mysteries) first, that it should serve to our Faith with him, and to our confession before men. We will orderly declare the manner of both purposes. Baptisme bringeth three things to our Faith, which also must be severally entreated of. This is the first which the Lord setteth out unto us, that it should be a token and prooffe of our cleansing: or (to expresse my minde better) it is like to a certaine sealed Charter, whereby hee confirmeth unto us, that all our finnes are so defaced, cancelled, and blotted out, that they may never come in his sight, nor be rehearsed, nor be imputed. For he willeth that all they that beleeve, should be baptised into forgiveness of finnes. Therefore they which thought that Baptisme is nothing else but a marke and token whereby whereby we professe our religion before men, as souldiers beare the cognisance of their Captaine for a marke of their profession, weigh not that which was the chiefe thing in Baptisme. That is this, that wee should receive it with this promise, that whosoever beleewe and are baptised, shall be saved.

2 In this sense is that to bee understood which Paul writeth, that the Church is sanctified of Christ her spouse, and cleansed with washing of water in the word of life. And in another place, that wee are saved according to his mercie by the washing of regeneration and of the renewing of the holy Ghost. And that which Peter writeth that Baptisme saveth us. For Pauls will was not to signifie, that our washing and salvation is perfectly made by water, or that water containeth in it selfe the power to cleanse, regenerate and renew. Neither did Peter meane the cause of salvation, but onely the knowledge and certaintie of such gifts to bee received in this Sacrament: which is evidently enough expressed in the words themselves. For Paul knitte together the word of life, and Baptisme of water: as if he had said, that by the Gospell the message of washing and sanctifying is brought us, that by Baptisme such message is sealed. And Peter immediately adjoyneth, that that Baptisme is not the putting away of the filthinesse of the flesh, but a good conscience before God, which is of faith. Yea Baptisme promiser us no other cleansing, but by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ: which is figured by water, for the likenesse of cleansing and washing. Who therefore can say that wee be cleansed by this water, which certainly testifieth that the blood of Christ is our true and onely washing? So that from no where else can be fetched a surer reason to confute their blind error which referre all things to the power of the water, than from the signification of Baptisme it selfe: which doth withdraw us as well from that visible element which is set before our eyes, as from all other meanes, that it may binde our mindes to Christ alone.

3 Neither is it to be thought that Baptisme is applyed onely to the time past, that for new fallings, into which wee fall backe after Baptisme, wee must seeke new remedies of cleansing, in I wot not what other Sacraments, as though the force of Baptisme were wome out of use. By this error it came to passe in old time, that some would not be baptised but in the nitermost perill of life, and at their last gaspings, that so they might obtaine pardon of their whole life. Against which wayward subtile provision the old Bishops so oft inveigh in their writings. But this we ought to thinke, that at what time soever wee be baptised, we are at once washed and cleansed for all our life. Therefore so oft as wee fall we must goe backe to the remembrance of Baptisme, and therewith we must arme our minde, that it may bee alway certaine and assured of the forgivenesse of finnes. For though when it is once ministred, it seemeth to be past, yet by latter finnes it is not abolished. For the cleanness of Christ is therein offered us that alway flourisheth, is oppressed with no spots, but overwhelmed and wipeth away all our filthinesse: yet ought wee not to take thereof a libertie to sinne in time to come (as verily wee bee not hereby armed to such boldnesse) but this doctrine is given onely to them, which when they have sinned, doe groane wearied and oppressed under their finnes, that they may have wherewith they may raise up and comfort themselves, least they should fall into confusion and desperation. So Paul saith, that Christ was made to us a Propitiator, unto the forgivenesse of faults going before. Wherein he denieth not that therein is obtained perpetuall and continuall forgivenesse of sins even unto death: but he meaneth that it was given of the father, onely to poore sinners, which wounded with the searing iron of conscience, doe sigh to the Phisition. To these the mercie of God is offered. They which by escaping of punishment doe hunt for matter and libertie to sinne, doe nothing but provoke to themselves the wrath and judgement of God.

4 I know indeed that it is commonly thought otherwise: that by the benefit of repentance and of the keyes we doe after Baptisme obtaine forgivenesse, which at our first regeneration is given us onely by Baptisme. But they which devise this doe erre herein that they doe not remember that the power of the keyes, whereof they speake, doth so hang upon Baptisme that it ought in no wise to bee severed. The sinner receiveth forgivenesse by the ministerie of the Church, namely not without the preaching of the Gospell. But what manner of preaching is that? That wee be cleansed from sin by the blood of Christ. But what signe and testimonie is there of that washing, but Baptisme? We see therefore how that absolution is referred to Baptisme. And this error hath bred us the faigned Sacrament of Penance: of which I have touched somewhat before, and the residue I will make an end of in place fit for it. But it is no marvell if men, which according to the grosseness of their wit were immeasurably fastid to outward things, have in this behalfe also bewrayed that fault, that not contented with the pure institution of God, they did thrust in new helps faigned of themselves. As though Baptisme it selfe were not a Sacrament of repentance. But if repentance be commended to us for our whole life, the force also of Baptisme ought to be extended to the same bounds. Wherefore it is also no doubt but that all the godly throughout all their life long, so oft as they be vexed with knowledge in conscience of their owne sinnes, dare call backe themselves to the remembrance of Baptisme, that thereby they may confirme themselves in the assurance of that onely and continuall washing which we have in the blood of Christ.

5 It bringeth also another fruit, because it sheweth us our mortification in Christ, and new life in him. For (as the Apostle saith) we are baptised into his death, being buried together with him into death, that we may walke in newnesse of life. By which words he doth not only exhort us to the following of him (as though he did say, that we are by Baptisme put in minde, that after a certaine example of the death of Christ, wee should die to our lusts: and after the example of his resurrection, wee should be raised up to righteousness,) but hee fetcheth the matter much deeper: that is to say, that by Baptisme Christ hath made us partakers of his death, that we may be grafted into it. And as the graffe receiveth substance and nourishment of the roote into which it is grafted: so they that receive Baptisme with such faith as they ought, do truly feele the effectualnesse of the death of Christ in the mortifying of their flesh: and therewithall also they feele the effect of his resurrection in the quickning of the Spirit. Hereupon hee gathereth matter of exhortation: that if we be Christians, we ought to be dead to sinne, and to live to righteousness. This selfe same argument he useth in another place, that we be circumcised, and have put off the old man, since that we be buried in Christ by Baptisme. And in this sense, in the same place which we have before alleadged, he called it the washing of regeneration and of renewing. Therefore first forgiveness of sinnes and imputation of righteousness is promised us; and then the grace of the holy Ghost, which may reforme us into newnesse of life.

6 Last of all our faith receiveth also this profit of Baptisme, that it certainly testifieth unto us, that we are not onely grafted into the death and life of Christ, but that we are so united to Christ himselfe that wee are partakers of all his good things. For therefore hee hath dedicated and hallowed Baptisme in his owne bodie, that hee might have it common with us, as a most strong bond of the unitie and fellowship which hee vouchsafed to enter into with us: so that Paul proveth thereby that we be the children of God, because we have put on Christ in Baptisme. So we see that the fulfilling of Baptisme is in Christ, whom also for this reason we call the proper object of Baptisme. Therefore it is no marvell if it be reported that the Apostles baptised into his name; which yet were commanded to baptise into the name of the Father also, and of the holy Ghost. For whatsoever gifts of God are set forth in Baptisme, are found in Christ alone. And yet it cannot be, but that hee which baptiseth into Christ, doth therewithall call upon the name of the Father and of the holy Ghost. For wee are therefore blessed with his blood, because the mercifull father according to his incomparable kindnesse, willing to receive us into favour, hath set him a mediatur in the midst to procure to us favour with him. But regeneration we so onely obtaine, by his death and resurrection, if being sanctified by the spirit, wee be endued with a new, and spiritual nature. Wherefore both of our cleansing and regeneration we obtaine and after a certaine manner distinctly perceive the cause in the Father, the matter in the Sonne, and the effect in the holy Ghost. So John first baptised, so afterward the Apostles, with the baptisme of repentance into the forgiveness of sinnes: meaning by this word repentance, such regeneration: and by forgiveness of sinnes, washing.

7 Whereby also it is made most certaine, that the ministerie of Iohn was altogether the same which was afterward committed to the Apostles. For the divers hands where-with it is ministred, make not the baptisime divers: but the same doctrine sheweth it to be the same baptisime. Iohn and the Apostles agreed into one doctrine: both baptisied into repentance, both into the forgiveness of finnes, both into the name of Christ, from whom was both repentance and forgiveness of finnes. Iohn said that hee was the Lambe of God, by whom the finnes of the world should bee taken away: where hee made him the sacrifice acceptable to the Father, the Propitiator of righteousness, the author of salvation. What could the Apostles adde to this confession? Wherefore let it trouble no man, that the old writers labour to sever the one from the other, whose voice wee ought not so much to esteeme that it may shake the certaintie of the Scripture. For who will rather hearken to Chrysostome: denying that forgiveness of finnes was comprehended in the baptisime of Iohn, than to Luke: contrariwise affirming that Iohn preached the baptisime of repentance into the forgiveness of finnes? Neither is that subtlety of Augustine to bee received, that in the baptisime of Iohn finnes were forgiven in hope, but in the baptisime of Christ they are forgiven in deed. For whereas the Evangelist plainly testifieth, that Iohn in his baptisime promised the forgiveness of finnes: what need wee to abate this title of commendation, when no necessitie compelleth us unto it? But if any man seeke for a difference out of the Word of God, he shall finde none other but this, that Iohn baptisied into him that was to come, the Apostles into him that had already presented himselfe.

8 As for this that more abundant graces of the Spirit were powred out since the Resurrection of Christ, it maketh nothing to stablish a diversitie of baptisime. For the baptisime which the Apostles ministred while hee was yet conversant in earth, was called his: yet it had no larger plentifulnesse of the spirit, than the baptisime of Iohn. Yea, even after his Ascension, the Spirit was not given to the Samaritans above the common measure of the faithfull before the Ascension, although they were baptisied into the name of Jesus, till Peter and Iohn were sent unto them to lay their hands upon them. This onely thing, as I thinke, deceived the old writers, that they said that the baptisime of Iohn was but a preparation to the baptisime of Christ, because they read, that they were baptisied againe of Paul, which had once received the baptisime of Iohn. But how much they were herein deceived, shall else where be plainly declared in place fit for it. What is it therefore that Iohn said, that hee baptisied indeed with water, but that Christ should come which should baptise with the holy Ghost, and with fire? This may in few words be asswyled. For hee meant not to put difference betweene the one baptisime and the other, but hee compared his owne person with the person of Christ, saying, that himselfe was a minister of water, but that Christ was the giver of the holy Ghost, and should declare his power by visible miracle the same day that hee should send the holy Ghost to the Apostles under fierie tongues. What could the Apostles boast of more than this? What more could they also that baptise at this day? For they be onely ministers of the outward signe, and Christ is the author of the inward grace: as the same old writers themselves doe every where teach, and specially Augustine, whose principall stay against the Donatists is this, that what a one soever he be that baptiseth, yet onely Christ is ruler of it.

9 These things which wee have spoken both of mortification and of washing, are shadowed out in the people of Israel, whom for the same cause the Apostle saith to have beene baptisied in the cloud and in the sea. Mortifying was figured, when the Lord delivering them out of the hand of Pharao and from cruell bondage, made for them a way through the red sea, and drowned Pharao himselfe, and the Egyptians their enemies, that followed them hard at their backs, and were even in their necks to overtake them. For after the same manner also he promiseth to us in baptisime, and by a signe given sheweth us, that we are by his power brought forth and delivered out of the thraldome of Egypt, that is to say, out of the bondage of sinne: that our Pharao is drowned, that is to say the devil, although even so also he ceaseth not to exercise & wearie us. But as that Egyptian was not throwne downe into the bottome of the sea, but being overthrowne on the shore, did yet with terrible sight make the Israelites afraid, but could not hurt them:

The baptisime of Iohn is the same with that which the Apostles ministred: for the old writers (as Ysaie, and Augustine) see the one from the other. Act 2. 28. John 2. 29. Rom. 11. Ma. 7. 14. Luke 3. 3. Lib. 3. de bapt. contra Donat. cap. 10. Luc. 3. 16. Act. 19. 4.

them: so this our enemy yet indeed threateth, sheweth his weapons, is felt, but cannot overcome. In the cloud was a signe of cleansing. For as then the Lord covered them with a cloud cast over them, and gave them refreshing cold, lest they should faint and pine away with too cruell burning of the Sunne: so in Baptisme we acknowledge our selves covered and defended with the blood of Christ, lest the severitie of God, which is indeed an intolerable flame, should lye upon us. But although this mysterie was then darke and knowne to few: yet because there is none other way to obtaine salvation, but in those two graces, God would not take away the signe of them both from the old Fathers, whom he had adopted to be heires.

10 Now it is cleare, how false that is which some have lately taught, and wherein some yet continue, that by Baptisme we be loosed and delivered from originall sinne, and from the corruption which was from Adam spread abroad into his whole posteritie, and that wee be restored into the same righteousnesse and purenesse of nature, which Adam should have obtained, if hee had stood fast in the same uprightnesse wherein hee was first created. For such kinde of teachers never understood what was originall sinne, nor what was originall righteousnesse, nor what was the grace of Baptisme. But wee have already proved, that originall sinne is the perversnesse and corruption of our nature, which first maketh us guiltie of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth works in us, which the Scripture calleth the works of the flesh. Therefore these two points are severally to be marked, namely that we being in all parts of our nature defiled and corrupted are already for such corruption onely, holden worthily condemned and convicted before God, to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousnesse, innocencie and cleanness. Yea, and very Infants themselves bring their owne damnation with them from their mothers wombe. Who, although they have not yet brought forth the fruits of their iniquitie, yet have the seed thereof inclosed within them. Yea, their whole nature is a certaine seed of sinne, therefore it cannot but be hatefull and abominable to God. The Faithfull are certified by Baptisme that this damnation is taken away, and driven from them: forasmuch (as we have already said) the Lord doth by this signe promise us that full and perfect forgiveness is granted both of the fault which should have beene imputed to us, and of the paine which wee should have suffered for the fault: they take hold also of righteousnesse, but such as the people of God may obtaine in this life, that is to say by imputation onely: because the Lord of his owne mercy taketh them for righteous and innocent.

11 The other point is, that this perversnesse never ceaseth in us, but continually bringeth forth new fruits, namely these works of the flesh which wee have before described: none otherwise than a burning furnace continually bloweth out flame and sparkles, or as a spring infinitely casteth out water. For lust never utterly dyeth and is quenched in men, untill being by death delivered out of the body of death, they have utterly put off themselves. Baptisme indeed promiseth us that our Pharao is drowned, and the mortification of sinne: yet not so that it is no more, or may no more trouble us, but onely that it may not overcome us. For so long as we live enclosed within this prison of our bodie, the remnants of sinne shall dwell in us: but if wee hold fast by Faith the promise given us of God in Baptisme, they shall not bear rule nor raigne. But let no man deceive himselfe: Let no man flatter himselfe in his owne evill, when hee heareth that sinne alway dwelleth in us. These things are not spoken to this end, that they should carelesly sleepe upon their sinnes, which are otherwise too much inclined to sinne: but only, that they should not faint and be discouraged, which are tickled and pricked of their flesh. Let them rather thinke that they are yet in the way, and let them beleve that they have much profited, when they feele that there is daily somewhat minished of their lust, till they have attained thither whether they travaile, namely to the last death of their flesh, which shall be ended in the dying of this mortall life. In the meane time let them not cease both to strive valiantly, and to encourage them to goe forward and to stirre them up to full victorie. For this also ought more to whet on their endeavours, that they see that after that they have long travailed, they have yet no small businesse remayning. This wee ought to hold: we are baptized into the mortifying of our flesh, which is begun by Baptisme in us, which wee dayly follow : but it shall bee made perfect when wee shall remove out of this life to the Lord.

12 Here wee say no other thing, than the Apostle Paul in the seventh Chapter to the Romanes most clearly setteth out. For after that hee had disposed of free righteousness, because some wicked men did thereof gather, that we might live after our owne lust, because we should not be acceptable to God by the deservings of works: he addeth, that all they that are clothed with the righteousness of Christ, are therewith regenerate in Spirit, and that of this regeneration wee have an earnest in baptisme. Hereupon hee exhorteth the faithfull, that they suffer not sinne to have dominion in their members. Now because hee knew that there is alway some weaknesse in the faithfull: that they should not therefore be discouraged, he adjoyneth a comfort, that they are not under the law. Because againe it might seeme, that Christians might grow insolent, because they are not under the yoke of the law, he entreateth what manner of abrogating that is, and therewithall what is the use of the law: which question he had now the second time defined. The summe is, that wee be delivered from the rigor of the law, that we should cleave to Christ: but that the office of the law is, that we being convinced of our perversnesse, should confesse our owne weaknesse and miserie. Now forasmuch as that perversnesse of nature doth not so easily appear in a prophane man, which followeth his owne lust without feare of God: he setteth an example in a man regenerate, namely in himselfe. He saith therefore that he hath a continuall wrastring with the remnants of his flesh, and that hee is holden bound with miserable bondage, that he cannot consecrate himselfe wholly to the obedience of the law of God. Therefore hee is compelled with groning to crie out. Unhappy am I. Who shall deliver me out of this body subject to death? If the children of God be holden captive in prison so long as they live, they must needs be much carefully grieved with thiaking upon their owne perill, unlesse this feare be met withall. Therefore he adjoyneth to this use a comfort, that there is no more damnation to them that are in Christ Jesu. Where he teacheth, that they whom the Lord hath once received into favour, engraffed into the communion of his Christ, he hath by baptisme admitted into the fellowship of his Church, while they continue in the faith of Christ, although they be besieged of sinne, yea and carrie sinne about within them, yet are acquitted from guiltinesse and condemnation. If this be the simple and naturall exposition of Paul, there is no cause why we should seeme to teach any new unwonted thing.

13 But Baptisme so serveth our confession before men. For it is a marke, whereby we openly professe that wee should be accounted among the people of God: whereby we testifie that wee agree with all Christians into the worshipping of one God and into one religion: finally, whereby wee openly affirme our Faith: that not onely our hearts should breath out the praise of God, but also our tongues, and all the members of our body should sound it out with such utterances as they be able. For so, as we ought, all our things are employed to the service of the glorie of God, whereof nothing ought to be void, and other may by our example be stirred up to the same endeavours. Hereunto Paul had respect, when he asked the Corinthians whether they had not bene baptised into the name of Christ: meaning verily, that even in this that they were baptised into his name, they avowed themselves unto him, swore to his name, and bound their Faith to him before men, that they could no more confesse any other, but Christ alone, unlesse they would forsake the confession which they had made in Baptisme.

14 Now sith it is declared what our Lord had regard unto in the institution of Baptisme: it is plaine to judge what is the way for us to use and receive it. For so far as it is given to the raising, nourishing and confirming of our Faith, it is to be taken as from the hand of the Author himselfe: we ought to hold it certaine and fully perswaded, that it is hee which speaketh to us by the signe, that it is hee which cleanseth us, washeth us, and putteth away the remembrance of our sinnes, that it is he which maketh us partakers of his death, which taketh away from Satan his kingdome, which feebleth the forces of our lust, yea which groweth into one with us, that being clothed with him wee may be reckoned the children of God: that these things, I say,

Baptisme according to S. Paul the earnest of our regeneration, the weaknesse of our nature hereunto, and the greatnesse of our comfort notwithstanding this weaknesse.

The Author of Baptisme is also the worker of grace spiritual therein figured not insid.

hee doth inwardly so truly and certainly performe to our Soule, as we certainly see our bodie outwardly to be washed, dipped, and cloathed. For this either relation, or similitude, is the most sure rule of Sacraments: that in bodily things wee should behold spiritual things; as if they were presently set before our eyes, so far as it hath pleased the Lord to represent them by such figures: not for that such graces are bound and enclosed in the Sacrament, that they should bee given us by the force thereof; but onely because the Lord doth by this token testify his will unto us, that is, that hee will give us all these things. Neither doth hee onely feed our eyes with a naked sight, but he bringeth us to the thing present, and together fulfilleth that which it figureth.

15. Hereof let Cornelius the Captaine be an example, which was baptised, having before received forgiveness of finnes, and visible graces of the holy Ghost: seeking not by Baptisme a larger forgiveness, but a more certaine exercising of faith; yea an increase of confidence by a pledge. Peradventure some man will object: why therefore did Ananias say to Paul, that hee should wash away his finnes by Baptisme, if finnes be not washed away by the power of Baptisme it selfe? I answer: Wee are said to receive, to obtaine, to get that which so farre as concerneth the feeling of our faith, is given us of the Lord, whether he doe then first testify it, or being testified doth more and certainer confirm it. This therefore onely was the meaning of Ananias: that thou maist bee assured Paul, that thy finnes are forgiven thee, bee baptised. For the Lord doth in Baptisme promise forgiveness of finnes: receive this, and bee out of care. Howbeit I meane not to diminish the force of Baptisme, but that the thing and the truth is present with the signe, so farre as God worketh by outward meanes. But of this Sacrament, as of all other, wee obtaine nothing but so much as we receive by faith. If we want faith, it shall be for a witness of our unthankfulness, whereby we may be declared guiltie before God, because we have not beleaved the promise there given. But so farre as it is a signe of our confession, wee ought by it to testify that our assurance is in the mercie of God, and our cleanness is in the forgiveness of sins, which is gotten us by Jesus Christ: and that by it wee enter into the Church of Christ, that we may with one consent of faith and charitie live in one mind with all the faithful. This last point did Paul meane, when he saith, that we are all baptised into one Spirit, that we may be one bodie.

16 Now if this be true which wee determine, that a Sacrament is not to be wayed according to his hand of whom it is ministred, but as of the very hand of God, from whom without doubt it proceeded: hereupon wee may gather that nothing is added to it nor taken from it by the worthinesse of him by whose hand it is delivered. And even as among men, if a letter be sent, so that the hand and the seale be well knowne, it maketh no matter who or what manner of man bee the carrier: so it ought to suffice to know the hand and seale of the Lord in his Sacraments, by what carrier soever they be brought. Hereby the error of the Donatists is very well confuted, which measured the force and value of the Sacrament by the worthinesse of the Minister. Such at this day are our Catabaptists, which denie that we be rightly baptised, because we were baptised by wicked men and Idolaters in the Popish kingdom: therefore they furiously call upon us to be baptised againe. Against whose follies wee shall be armed with a reason strong enough, if we thinke that wee were professed by Baptisme not into the name of any man, but into the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, and that therefore it is not the Baptisme of man, but of God, of whomsoever it bee ministred. Although they were never so much ignorant or despisers of God and all godliness, which baptised us, yet they did not baptise us into the fellowship of their owne ignorance or sacrilege, but into the faith of Jesus Christ: because they called not upon their owne name, but the name of God, nor baptised us into any other name. Now if it were the baptisme of God, it hath verily inclosed in it a promise of the forgiveness of finnes, the mortifying of the flesh, the spirituall quickning, and the partaking of Christ. So it nothing hindered the Jewes, to have been circumcised of uncleane Priests and Apostates: neither was the signe therefore void, that it needed to bee done of new: that it was sufficient to returne to the naturall beginning. Where they object that

1 Cor. 12. 13.

No King added unto or taken from Baptisme by their worthinesse or unworthinesse which are ministers of us: and therefore re-baptisation not to be received.

Matt. 28. 19.

Baptisme ought to be celebrate in the assemblies of the godly, that proveth not, that that which is faulty in part, should destroy the whole force thereof. For when wee teach what ought to be done that Baptisme may be pure, and void of all defiling, we doe not abolish the ordinance of God, although idolaters corrupt it. For when in old time Circumcision was corrupted with many superstitions, yet it ceased not to be taken for a signe of grace: neither did Isaac and Ezechias, when they gathered out of all Israel them that had departed from God, call them to a second Circumcision.

17 Now whereas they aske us, what faith of ours hath yet followed Baptisme in certaine yeeres past, that they thereby might prove that the Baptisme is void, when it is not sanctified unto us, but by the word of promise received by faith: to this question we answer that we indeed being blinde and unbeleeving, did in a long time not hold fast the promise given us in Baptisme: yet the promise it selfe, for as much as it was of God, continued alway stedfast, and true. Although all men be liers and faith-breakers, yet God ceaseth not to be true: although all men be lost, yet Christ remaineth salvation. We confesse therefore that Baptisme, for that time profited us nothing at all: for as much as in it the promise offered us, without which baptisme is nothing, lay nothing regarded. Now sith by the grace of God, we have begun to waxe wiser, we accuse our owne blindnesse and hardnesse of heart, which have so long been unthankfull to his so great goodnesse. But we beleeve that the promise it selfe is not vanished away: but rather thus we consider. God by baptisme promiseth the forgiveness of sinnes, and sith he hath promised it, will undoubtedly performe it to all that beleeve it. That promise was offered us in baptisme: by faith therefore let us embrace it. It hath indeed long been buried from us because of infidelity: now therefore let us receive it by faith. Wherefore where the Lord calleth the Iewish people to repentance, he giveth them no commandement of a second circumcision, which being (as we have said) circumcised with a wicked and ungodly hand, lived a certaine time entangled with the same wickednesse. But he earnestly calleth upon the onely turning of the heart. Because, howsoever the covenant was broken of them, yet the signe of the covenant, by the ordinance of the Lord, remaineth alwayes stedfast and inviolable. Therefore with the onely condition of repentance they were restored into the covenant which the Lord had once made with them in circumcision: which yet being received by the hand of the League-breaker priest, so much as in them lay, they had defiled againe, and the effect whereof they had quenched.

18 But they thinke that they shake a fiery dart at us, when they alleadge that Paul, rebaptised them which were once baptised with the baptisme of Iohn. For if by our owne confession, the Baptisme of Iohn was altogether the same that ours is now: even as they having beene before perverfely instructed, when they were taught the true faith, they were againe Baptised into it: so that baptisme, which was without true doctrine, is to be taken for nothing, and we ought to be newly baptised againe into the true religion, wherewith we are now first instructed. Some thinke, that there was some wrongfully affectionated man to Iohn, which had entred them with their first baptisme rather to a vaine superstition. Of which thing they seeme to gather a conjecture here-upon, because they confessed themselves to bee utterly ignorant of the holy Ghost: whereas Iohn verely would never have sent away from himselfe schollers so untaught. But neither is it likely that the Jewes although they had not beene baptised at all, were destitute of all knowledge of the holy Ghost; which is famously spoken of by so many testimonies of the scripture. Whereas therefore they answer that they know not whether there bee a holy Ghost, it is to bee understood as if they had said that they have not yet heard, whether the graces of the Spirit, of which Paul asked them, were given to the Disciples of Christ. But I grant that that was the true baptisme of Iohn, and all one and the selfe same with the Baptisme of Christ: but I deny that they were Baptised againe. What then meane these words, they were baptised in the name of Jesus? Some do expound it, that they were but instructed of Paul with true doctrine. But I had rather understand it more simply, to be the Baptisme of the holy Ghost, that is to say, that the visible graces of the Spirit were given them by the laying on of hands: which to be expressed by the name of Baptisme, is no new thing. As on the day of Pentecost it is said, that the Apostles remembered the words of the Lord, concerning the Baptisme of fire and of the spirit. And Peter saith that the same came to his remembrance, when he saw those graces powred out upon Cornelius, and his household and kindred. Neither is that contrary which is after adjoynd: When hee had laid his hands on them, the Holy Ghost came downe upon them. For Luke doth not tell of two divers things: but followeth the manner of telling commonly used among the Hebrewes, which doe first propound the summe of the matter, and then doe set it out more at large. Which every man may perceive by the very framing together of the words. For hee saith, When they had heard these things, they were Baptised in the name of Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the holy Ghost came downe upon them. In this latter sentence is described, what manner of Baptisme that was. If ignorance doe so corrupt a former baptisme, that it must be amended by with second baptisme: the Apostles should have bene rebaptised first of all, which in whole three yeares after their baptisme had scarcely tasted any small parcell of purer doctrine. And now among us what rivers might suffice to renew so many washings, as there be ignorances by the mercie of the Lord dayly amended in us?

Baptisme nos made void by their remaining a long time in blindnesse that are baptised.

A.C. 17.16.
 Necessary inventions of men added unto Christs institution of Baptisme.

19 The force, dignity, profit, and end of the mystery if I bee not deceived, ought by this time to be plaine enough. So much as concerneth the outward signe, I would to God the naturall institution of Christ had prevailed so much as was meet, to restrain the boldnesse of men. For, as though it were a contemptible thing to be baptised with water according to the precept of Christ, there is invented blessing, or rather enchanting, to defile the true hallowing of the water. Afterward was added a Taper with Chrisme: but the blowing seemeth to open the gate to baptisme. But although I am not ignorant, how ancient is the beginning of this added packe: yet it is lawfull both for mee and all the godly to refuse whatsoever things men have presumed to adde to the ordinance of Christ. When Satan saw that by the foolish light credit of the world at the very beginnings of the Gospell his deceits were easily received, hee brake forth into grosser mockeries. Hereupon spittle, and like trifles, were openly brought in with unbridled liberty to the reproch of Baptisme. By which experiences let us learne that nothing is either holier, or better, or safer, than to bee content with the authority of Christ alone. How much better therefore was it, leaving stagelike pompes, which dazell the eyes of the simple, and dull their mindes, so for as any was to be baptised, that he should bee presented to the assembly of the faithfull, and be offered to God, the whole Church looking on as a witnesse: and praying over him: that the confession of faith should be rehearsed, where with he that is to be catechised should be instructed: that the promises should be declared which are contained in Baptisme: that the instructed should be baptised in the name of the Father, and the Sonne, and the holy Ghost: at length that he be sent away with prayers and thanksgiving. So is nothing omitted that might make to the matter, and that the onely Ceremony which proceeded from God the author thereof, should most clearly shine, being not overwhelmed with any forreine sithinesse. But whether he be wholly dipped which is baptised, and that thrice or once, or whether he bee but sprinkled with water onely powred upon him, it maketh very little matter: but that ought to be at liberty to Churches according to the diversity of Countries. Howbeit the very word of Baptising signifieth to dip, and it is certaine that the manner of dipping was used of the old Church.

Baptism not to be administered by private men.

20 This also pertaineth to the purpose, to know that is done amisse if private men take upon themselves the administration of Baptisme. For as well the distribution of this as of the Supper is a part of the Ecclesiasticall ministry. For Christ did not command women, nor yet every sort of men, that they should baptise: but whom he had ordained his Apostles, to them he gave this commandement. And when hee commanded his Disciples to doe that in the ministracion of the Supper which they had seene him doe, when he executed the office of a right distributor: hee would without doubt, that they should therein follow his example. As for this that in many ages past, yea and in a manner at the very beginning of the Church, it hath bene received in use, that that lay men might baptise in perill of death, if the minister were not present in time. I see not with how strong a reason it may bee defended. The very old fathers themselves, which either held or suffered this manner, were not sure whether it were well done. For Augustine seemeth to have this doubt, when he saith: Although a lay man compelled by necessitie doe give baptisme, I cannot tell whether a man may godlily say that it ought to bee iterate. For if it bee done when no necessitie compelleth, it is the usurping of another mans office: but if necessitie enforceth, it is either none or a veniall sinne. Moreover of women it was decreed without any exception in the Councell at Carthage, that they should not presume to baptize at all. But there is danger, least if hee which is sicke should die without baptisme, hee should be deprived of the grace of regeneration. Not so, God pronounceth that he adopteth our infants to be his owne, before they be borne, when he promiseth that hee will be a God to us and to our seed after us. In this word is contained their salvation. Neither shall any man dare to be so reprochfull against God, to denie that his promise is of it selfe sufficient to worke the effect thereof. How much harme that doctrine being evill expounded, that baptisme is of necessitie to salvation, hath brought in, few doe marke: and therefore they take lesse heed to themselves. For where this opinion is growne in force, that all are lost to whom it hath not happened to bee washed with water, our state is worse than the state of the old people, as though the grace of God were now more narrowly straitened than it was under the law. For Christ shall be thought to be come, not to fulfill the promises, but to abolish them: forasmuch as the promise which then was of it selfe effectually enough to give health before the eight day, now should not be of force without help of the signe.

21 But how the custome was before that Augustine was borne, first is gathered of Tertullian, that it is not permitted to a woman to speake in the Church, nor to teach, nor to baptise, nor to offer, that she should not claime to her selfe the execution of any mans office, much lesse of the Priests. Of the same thing Epiphanius is a substantiall witness, where hee reproceeth Marcion, that he gave women libertie to baptise. Neither am I ignorant of their answer which thinke otherwise, that is, that common use much differeth from extraordinarie remedie, when extreme necessitie enforceth: but when hee pronouncing that it is a mockerie to give women libertie to baptise, excepteth nothing, it sufficiently appeareth that hee condemneth this corruption, so that it is by no colour excusable. Also in the third booke, where teaching that it was not permitted even to the holy mother of Christ, he addeth no restraint.

22 The example of Sephora is unseasonably alledged, For whereas the Angell of God was appealed, after that she taking a stone, circumcised her sonne, thereupon it was wrongfully gathered that her doing was allowed of God. Otherwise it ought to bee said, that the worshipping which the nations that were brought out of Affyria raised up, pleased God. But by other strong reasons it is proved, that that which a foolish woman did, is wrongfully drawne to an example of imitation. If I should say that it is a certaine singular case, which ought not to be made an example, and specially that such it is no where read that in old time there was given to the Priests a speciall commandement to circumcise, the order of Circumcision and Baptisme is unlike: this should be strong enough to confute them. For the words of Christ are plaine: Goe yee, teach all nations, and baptise. When hee ordained the selfe same men publishers of the Gospell, and ministers of Baptisme: and none (as the Apostle witnesseth) doth take honour upon himselfe in the Church, but hee that is called as Aaron: whosoever without lawfull calling baptiseth, hee rusheth into another mans office. Even in the smallest things, as in meat and drinke, whatsoever wee enterprise with a doubtfull conscience, Paul openly cryeth out to bee sinne. Therefore in womens baptising is much more grievously sinne, where it is evident that they brake the rule appointed by Christ, forasmuch as wee know that it is unlawfull to plucke in sunder those things that God conjoyneth. But all this I passe over. Onely I would have the readers to note, that Sephora's purpose was nothing lesse, than to doe any service to God. Seeing her sonne to bee in danger, she grudged, and murmured, and nor without stomacking threw the foreskin upon the ground, she so taunted her husband, that she was also angry with God. Finally it is plaine that all this came of a furiousnesse of minde, because she murmured against God and her husband, for that shee was compelled to shed the blood of her sonne. Moreover if she had in all other things behaved herselfe well, yet herein is an unexcusable rash presumption that shee circumcised her sonne, her husband being present, not any private man, but Moses the principall prophet of God, than whom there never rose any greater in Israhel; which was no more lawfull for her to doe, than at this day it is for women in the sight of the Bishop. But this controversie shall by and by be easily taken away by this principle, that infants are not debarred from the kingdome of heaven whom it happeneth to depart out of this present life before that it be granted them to be dipped in water. But it is already proved that no small wrong is done to the covenant of God, if we doe not rest in it, as though it were weake of it selfe: whereas the effect thereof hangeth neither upon Baptisme, nor upon any additions. There is afterward added to it a Sacrament like a seale, not that it bringeth effectualnesse to the promise of God as a thing weake of it selfe, but onely confirmeth it to us. Whereupon followeth, that the children of the faithfull are not therefore Baptized, that they may then first bee made the children of God, which before were strangers from the Church, but rather that they be therefore received by a solemne signe into the Church, because by the benefit of the promise they did already belong to the body of Christ. Therefore if in omitting the signe, there be neither scornfulnesse, nor contempt, nor negligence, wee are free from all danger. It is therefore much more holy, to give this reverence to the ordinance of God, than wee seeke Sacraments from no where else, than where the Lord hath left them. When wee may not have them of the Church, the grace of God is not so bound to them, but that we may obtaine them by faith out of the word of the Lord.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

That the Baptisme of Infants doth very well agree with the institution of Christ and the nature of the signe.

The Baptising of infants not devised and received onely by the restnes of men without warrant from God himselfe.

BUT forasmuch as in this age, certaine phranticke Spirits have raised up sore troubles in the Church for the Baptisme of infants, and doe not yet cease to turmoile: I cannot choose but I must joyne here an addition to restrain their furiousnesse. If peradventure it shall seeme to some man to be very much too long, let him (I beseech him) weigh with himselfe, that we ought so much to esteeme the purenesse of doctrine in a most great matter, together with the peace of the Church, that nothing ought to be lothsomly received, which may availe to procure them both. Beside that, I so study to frame this discourse, that it shall be of no small importance to the clearer declaration of the mystery of Baptisme. They assaile the Baptisme of infants with an argument indeed favourable in shew, saying that it is grounded upon no institution of Christ, but that it was brought in onely by the boldnesse of men, and perverse curiousnesse, and then afterward with fond easinesse rashly received in use. For a Sacrament, unless it rest upon a certaine foundation of the word of God, hangeth but by a thread. But what if, when the matter is well considered, it shall appeare, that the Lords holy ordinance is falsely and unjustly charged with such a slander? Let us therefore search out the first beginning of it. And if it shall appeare, that it was devised by the onely rashnesse of men, then bidding it farewell, let us measure the true observation of baptisme by the onely will of God. But if it shall be proved that it is not destitute of his certaine authority, we must beware, least in pinching the holy ordinances of God, we be also slanderous against the author himselfe.

2. First it is a doctrine well enough knowne, and confessed among all the godly, that the right consideration of the signes, consisteth not onely in the outward ceremonies: but principally hangeth upon the promise, and upon the spirituall mysteries, for figuring whereof the Lord ordaineth the ceremonies themselves. Therefore he that wil perfectly learne of what valew baptisme is, to what end it tendeth, finally what it is: let him not stay his thought upon the element and bodily sight: but rather let him raise it up to the promises of God, which are therein offered us, and to the inward secrets which are therein presented unto us. Hee that knoweth these things hath attained the sound truth of Baptisme, and the whole substance thereof as I may to call it: and thereby also hee shall bee taught, what is the reason, and what is the use of the outward sprinkling. Again, hee that contemptuously passing over these shall have his minde wholly fastened and bound to the visible ceremonie, shall understand neither the force nor property of Baptisme: nor yet so much as this, what the water meaneth, or what use it hath. Which sentence is proved with so many and so cleare testimonies of Scripture that wee need not at this present to tarry long about it. Therefore it remaineth now that we seeke out of the promises given in Baptisme, what is the force and nature of it. The Scripture sheweth, that the cleansing of finnes, which we obtaine of the blood of Christ, is here first shewed: then the mortifying of the flesh, which standeth upon the partaking of his death, by which the faithfull are regenerate into newnesse of life, yea, and into the fellowship of Christ. To this summe may be referred whatsoever is taught in the Scriptures concerning baptisme: saving that beside this it is a signe to testifie religion before men.

3 But forasmuch as before the institution of baptisme, the people of God had circumcision in stead thereof: let us see what these two signes differ the one from the other, and with what likeness they agree together. Whereupon may appear what is the relation of the one to the other. Where the Lord gave circumcision to Abraham to be kept, he telleth him before, that hee would be God to him and to his seed: adding, that with him is the flowing store and suffisance of all things, that Abraham should account that his hand should be to him a spring of all good things. In which words the promise of eternall life is contained, as Christ expoundeth it, bringing an argumen: from hence to prove the immortality of the faithfull, and the resurrection. For God (saith he) is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Wherefore Paul also shewing to the Ephesians from what destruction the Lord had delivered them, gathereth by this that they had not bene admitted into the covenant of circumcision, that they were without Christ, without God, without hope, strangers from the testaments of the promise: all which things the covenant it selfe contained. But the first access to God, the first entry to immortal life, is the forgiveness of finnes. Whereupon is gathered, that this forgiveness answereth to the promise of Baptisme concerning our cleansing. Afterward the Lord taketh covenant of Abraham that he should walke before him in purenesse and innocency of heart which belongeth to mortifying or regeneration. And that no man should doubt, that circumcision is a signe of mortifying, Moses in another place doth more plainly declare it, when hee exhorteth the people of Israel, to circumcise the uncircumcised skin of the heart, because they were severally chosen to bee the people of God out of all the Nations of the Earth. As God, where hee adopteth the posterity of Abraham to his people, commandeth them to bee circumcised: so Moses pronounceth that the hearts ought to bee circumcised, declaring verily what is the truth of this circumcision. Then that no man should endeavour toward it by his owne strength, hee teacheth that they need the grace of God. All these things are so often repeated of the Prophets, that I need not to heape into this place many testimonies which doe each where offer themselves. We have proved therefore, that in circumcision a spirituall promise was uttered to the fathers, such as in baptisme is given: for asmuch as it figured to them the forgiveness of finnes, and the mortifying of the flesh. Moreover as we have taught that Christ is the foundation of baptisme, in whom both these things remaine: so it is evident that he is also of circumcision. For he is promised to Abraham, and in him the blessing of all Nations. To the sealing of which grace, the signe of circumcision is added.

4 Now we may easily see, what there is like in these two signes, or what there is differing. The promises, whereupon wee have declared that the power of the signes consisteth is all one in both, namely of the fatherly favour of God, of the forgiveness of finnes, of life everlasting. Then, the thing figured also is all one and the same, namely regeneration. The foundation whereupon the fulfilling of these things standeth, is all one in both. Wherefore there is no difference in the inward mystery, whereby the whole force and property of the Sacraments is to bee weighed. The unlikely that remaineth, lieth in the outward ceremonie, which is the smallest portion: whereas the chiefest part hangeth upon the promise and the thing signified. Therefore wee may determine, that whatsoever agreeth with circumcision, doth also belong to baptisme, except the difference of the visible Ceremonie. To this relation and comparison, the Apostles rule leadeth us by the hand, whereby wee are commanded to examine all exposition of Scripture by the proportion of faith. And truly the truth doth in this behalfe almost offer it selfe to bee felt. For as circumcision, because it was a certaine token to the Jewes, whereby they were certified that they were chosen to be the people and household of God, and they againe on their behalves professed that they yielded themselves to God, was their first entry into the Church: so now also we by baptisme enter into profession, of God, that we may bee reckoned among his people, and mutually sweare to his name. Whereby it appeareth out of contrarie, that baptisme is come into the place of circumcision, that it may have the same office with us.

Infants being partakers of the spirituall grace may not be denied the outward signe of baptisme more than Iewish children circumcision.

5 Now if we list to search out, whether Baptisme bee lawfully communicate to infants: shall we not say that hee doth too much play the foole, yea dore, which will rest onely upon the element of water, and the outward observation, but cannot abide to bend his mind to the spirituall mystery? Whereof if there be any consideration had, it shall without doubt certainly appeare that Baptisme is rightfully given to infants, as the thing that is due unto them. For the Lord in old time did not vouchsafe to admit them to circumcision, but that he made them partakers of all those things which were then signified by circumcision. Otherwise he should with meere deceit have mocked his people, if he had sed them with deceitfull signes, which is horrible even to bee heard of. For hee pronounceth expressly, that the circumcision of a litle infant should be in stead of a seale to seale the promise of the covenant. But if the covenant remaine unbroken and stedfast, it doth at this day no lesse belong to the children of Christians than under the old Testament it pertained to the infants of the Jewes. But if they be partakers of the thing signified, why shall they be debarred from the signe? If they have the truth, why shall they be put backe from the figure? Although the outward signe cleavefast together with the Word in the Sacrament, so that they cannot bee plucked in sunder: yet if they bee severally considered, whether of them I pray you shall wee esteeme of more valew? Truly sith we see that the figure serveth the word, wee must say that it is under it, and must see it in the inferiour place. Sith therefore the word of baptisme is extended to infants; why shall the signe, that is to say, the addition hanging to the Word, be debarred from them? This one reason, if there were no more, were abundantly enough to confute all them that will speake to the contrarie. That which is objected, that there was a day certainly set for circumcision, is altogether but a shift. We grant that wee be not now bound to certaine dayes, like the Jewes: but when the Lord howsoever he certainly appointeth no day, yet declareth that hee is pleased that infants should with a solemne for all usage be received into his covenant: what seeke we more?

The children of Christian parents being holy seed as Abrahams were; as necessarily they are bound to be baptized as the other to bee circumcised.

6 Howbeit the Scripture openeth unto us yet a certainer knowledge of the truth. For it is most evident, that the covenant which the Lord once made with Abraham, is at this day no lesse in force to Christians, than it was in old time to the Jewish people; yea and that this word hath no lesse respect to Christians, than it then had respect to the Jewes. Vilese perhaps we thinke, that Christ hath by his coming diminished, or cut short the grace of his Father. Which saying is not without abominable blasphemie; Wherefore as even the children of the Jewes were called a holy seed, because being made heires of the same covenant they were made differing from the children of the ungodly: for the same reason even yet also the children of Christians are accounted holy, yea although they bee the issue but of one parent faithfull: and (as the Apostle witnesseth) they differ from the unclean seed of Idolaters. Now when the Lord immediately after the covenant made with Abraham, commanded the same to be sealed in infants with an outward Sacrament: what cause will Christians alleage, why they should not at this day testify and seale the same in their children? Neither let any man object against me, that the Lord commanded his covenant to bee confirmed with no other signe than of circumcision, which is long ago taken away. For we have in readinesse to answer, that for the time of the old Testament hee ordained circumcision to confirme his covenant: but circumcision being taken away, yet alway remaineth the same manner of confirming which we have common with the Jewes. Wherefore we must alway diligently consider what is common to both, and what they have severall from us. The covenant is common, the cause of confirming it is common. Onely the manner of confirming is diverse, because circumcision, was that to them, in place whereof baptism hath succeeded among us. Otherwise if the testimony whereby the Jewes were assured of the salvation of their seed, be taken away from us, it should bee brought to passe by the coming of Christ, that the grace of God should bee darker and lesse approved by testimonies to us, than it was before to the Jewes. If that cannot bee said without extreame slander of Christ, by whom the infinite goodnesse of the Father hath more clearly and liberally than ever heretofore bene poured forth upon the earth: and declared to men: wee must needs grant, that it is at the least, not more pinchingly to be suppressed, nor to be set forth with lesse testimonies, than it was under the dark shadowes of the Law.

7 Wherefore the Lord Iesus minding to shew a token whereby the world might understand that he was come rather to enlarge than to limit the mercie of God, gently embraced children offered unto him, rebuking the disciples which went about to forbid them to come to him: forasmuch as they did leade those, to whom the kingdome of heaven belongeth, away from him by whom alone the entrie is open into heaven. But (will some man say) what like thing hath baptism with this embracing of Christ? For neither is it reported that he baptized them, but that hee received them, embraced them, and wished them well. Therefore if we list to follow his example, let us helpe infants with prayer, but not baptise them. But let us weigh the doings of Christ somewhat more heedfully, than such kind of men doe. For neither is this to be lightly passed over, that Christ commandeth infants to be brought unto him, adding a reason why, because of such is the kingdome of heaven. And afterward hee witnesseth his will with deede, when embracing them he commended them to his Father with his prayer and blessing. If it meeet that infants be brought to Christ, why is it not also meeet that they be received to baptism, the signe of our communion and fellowship with Christ? If the kingdome of heaven be theirs, why shall the signe be denied them, whereby there is as it were an entry opened into the Church, that being admitted into it they may be adnumbered among the heires of the heavenly kingdome? How unjust shall we be, if we drive away them whom Christ calleth unto him? if we spoile them, whom hee garnisheth with his gifts? if wee shut out them whom hee willingly receiveth? But if wee will examine how much that which Christ there did differeth from baptism, yet of how much greater price shall we have baptism, (whereby wee testifie that infants are contained in the covenant of God) than receiving, embracing, laying on of hands, and prayer, whereby Christ himselfe being present: declareth that they both are his, and are sanctified of him? By the other cavillations, whereby they labour to mocke out this place, they do nothing but bewray their owne ignorance. For they gather an argument of this which Christ saith, Let little ones come to mee, that they were in age good big ones which were already able to goe. But they are called of the Evangelists, Brephē and paidia, by which words the Greekes doe signifie babes yet hanging on the breasts. Therefore this word (to come) is simply set for (to have access.) Loe what snares they are compelled to make, which are growne hard against the truth. Now where they say, that the kingdome of heaven is not given to them, but to such as be like them, because it is said to be of such, not of them: that is no sounder than the rest. For if that bee granted, what manner of reason shall the reason of Christ bee, whereby hee meaneth to shew, that infants in age are not strangers from him? When hee commandeth that infants be suffered to have access unto him, nothing is plainer than that very infancie indeed is there spoken of. And that this should not seeme an absurditie, hee by and by addeith: of such is the kingdome of heaven. But if it must needs be that infants be comprehended herein it must be plaine that by this word (such) are meant very infants themselves, and such as be like them.

Infauns embraced, prayed for, reared the heires of the kingdome of heaven by our Saviour Christ, and therefore not to be excluded from baptism.
Mat. 9. 13.

Though it be not expressly mentioned in Scripture what infants were baptised by the Apostles yet when they are reported to have baptised families we have no reason to thinke that the children in such families were not baptised: no writer so old that maketh not the baptising of Infants as ancient as the Apostles times.

8. Now there is no man that seeth not, that Baptisme of Infants was not framed by man, which is upholden by so great approving of Scripture. Neither doe they colourably enough play the fooles, which object that it is no where found, that any one Infant was baptised by the hands of the Apostles. For although it bee not expressly by name rehearsed of the Evangelists: yet because againe they are not excluded, so oft as mention happeneth to bee made of the baptising of any household: who, unless hee bee mad, can reason thereupon that they were not baptised? If such arguments were of any force, women should bee forbidden to partake of the Lords Supper, whom we read not to have bene received unto it in the time of the Apostles. But here wee bee content with the rule of Faith. For when we consider, what the institution of the Supper requireth, thereby also wee may easily judge to whom the use thereof ought to bee communicated. Which wee observe also in Baptisme. For when wee marke, to what end it was ordained, wee evidently espie, that it belongeth no lesse to Infants, than to elder folkes. Therefore they cannot bee deprived of it, but that the will of the Authour must bee manifestly defrauded. But whereas, they spread abroad among the simple people, that there passed a long row of yeares after the resurrection of Christ, in which the Baptisme of Infants was unknowne: therein they most fowly doe lye. For there is no writer so old, that doth not certainly referre the beginning thereof to the time of the Apostles,

9. Now remaineth that we briefly shew, what fruit cometh of this observation, both to the Faithfull which present their children to the Church to bee baptised, and also to the Infants themselves that be baptised with the holy water: that no man should despise it as unprofitable or idle. But if it come in any mans minde, upon this pretence to mocke at Baptisme of Infants, hee scorneth the commandement of Circumcision given by the Lord. For what will they bring forth to impugne the Baptisme of Infants, which may not also be throwne backe against Circumcision? So the Lord taketh vengeance of their arrogance, which doe by and by and by condemne that which they comprehend not with the sense of their owne flesh. But God furnisheth us with other armors, whereby their foolishnesse may be beaten flat. For neither this his holy institution, by which wee seele our faith to be holpen with singular comfort, deserveth to bee called superfluous. For Gods signe communicated to a childe doth as it were by an imprinted seale confirme the promise given to the godly Parent, and declareth that it is ratified that the Lord will be God, not onely to him but also to his seed, and will continually shew his good will and grace; not to him onely, but also to his posteritie even to the thousand generation. Where when the great kindnesse of God utereth it selfe, first it yeeldeth most largematter to advance his glory, and overspreadeth godly hearts with singular gladnesse, because they are therewithall more earnestly moved to love againe so godly a Father, whom they see to have care of their posterity for their sakes. Neither doe I regard, if any man take exception, and say that the promise ought to suffice to confirme the salvation of our children: forasmuch as it hath pleased God otherwise, who as he knoweth our weaknesse, willed in this behalfe so much to beare tenderly with it. Therefore let them that embrace the promise of Gods mercie to bee extended to their children, thinke that it is their duty to offer them to the Church to bee signed with the signe of mercie, and thereby to encourage themselves to a more assured confidence, because they doe with present eye behold the covenant of the Lord graven in the bodies of their children. Againe, the children receive some commodity of their Baptisme that being engrafted into the body of the Church, they bee somewhat the more commended to the other members. Then when they are grown to riper age, they be thereby not slenderly stirred up to earnest endeavour to worship God, of whom they have bene received into his children by a solemne signe of adoption, before that they could by age acknowledge him for their Father. Finally that same condemnation ought greatly to make us afraid, that God will take vengeance of it, if any man despise to marke his sonne with the signe of the covenant, because by such contempt the grace offered is refused, and as it were foresworne.

10. Now let us examine the arguments, whereby certaine furious beasts doe not cease to assaile this holy institution of God. First because they see that they bee exceedingly dingly neere driven and hard strained with the likenesse of Baptisme and Circumcision, they labour to plucke in sunder these two signes with great difference, that the one should not seeme to have any thing common with the other. For they say that both divers things are signified, and that the covenant is altogether divers, and that the naming of the children is not all one. But while they goe about to prove that first point, they alledge that Circumcision was a figure of mortification and not of Baptisme. Which verily wee doe most willingly grant them. For it maketh very well for our side. Neither doe we use any other proove of our sentence, but that Baptisme and Circumcision are signes of mortification. Hereupon wee determine that Baptisme is set in the place of Circumcision, that it should represent unto us the same thing which in old time it signified to the Jewes. In affirming the difference of the covenant, with how barbarous boldnesse doe they turmoile and corrupt the Scripture, and that not in one place alone, but so as they leave nothing safe or whole? For they depaint unto us the Jewes so to bee carnall that they be liker beasts than men: with whom forsooth the covenant made proceedeth not beyond the temporall life, to whom the promises given doe rest in present and bodily good things. If this doctrine take place, what remaineth but that the nation of the Jewes were for a time filled with the benefits of God, none otherwise than as they saw a head of swine in a stie, that at length they should perish with eternall damnation. For so soone as we alledge Circumcision and the promises annexed unto it, they answer that Circumcision was a litterall signe, and the promises thereof were carnall.

11. Truly if Circumcision was a litterall signe, there is no otherwise to bee thought of Baptisme. For the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Colossians maketh the one no more spirituall than the other. For hee saith that we are circumcised in Christ, with a Circumcision not made with hand, putting away the body of sinne that dwelled in our flesh: which he calleth the Circumcision of Christ. Afterward for declaration of that saying, he adjoyneth, that wee bee buried with Christ by Baptisme. What meaneth hee by these words, but that the fulfilling and truth of Baptisme, is also the truth and fulfilling of Circumcision, because they figure both one thing? For he travaileth to shew that Baptisme is the same to Christians, which circumcison had beene before to the Jewes. But forasmuch as we have now evidently declared, that the promises of both the signes, and the misteries that are presented in them, doe agree together, wee will for this present tary no longer upon them. Onely I will put the faithfull in minde, that though I hold my peace, they should weigh with themselves whether it bee taken for an earthly and litterall signe, under which nothing is contained but spirituall and heavenly. But that they should not sell their smokes to the simple, we will by the way confute one objection wherewith they colour this most shamelesse lie. It is most certaine that the principall promises, wherein was contained the covenant which in the old Testament God stablished with the Israelites, were spirituall and tended to eternall life: and then againe, that they were received of the Father, spirituallly, as it was meete, that they might thereof receive assistance of the life to come, whereunto they longed with the whole affection of their heart. But in the meane time we denie nor, but that he witnessed his good will toward them with earthly and carnall benefits: by which also we say that the same promise of spirituall things was confirmed. As when he promised everlasting blessednesse to his servant Abraham, that hee might set before his eyes a manliest token of his favour, hee addeth another promise concerning the possession of the land of Chanaan. After this manner we ought to understand all the earthly promises that are given to the Jewish nation, that the spirituall promise, as the head, whereunto they are directed, should alway have the chiefe place. But first I have more largely entreated of these things in the difference of the new and old Testament; therefore now I doe the more sleightly knit it up.

12. In the naming of the children they finde this diversity, that in the old Testament they were called the children of Abraham, which issued of his seede: but that now they are called by that name, which follow of his faith: And that therefore that carnall infancy, which was by circumcison grafted into the fellowship of the covenant, figured the infants of the New Testament, which are regenerate by the word of God to immortal life. In which words wee behold indeed a small sparkle of truth : but herein these light spirits grievously offend, that when they catch hold of that which first cometh to their hand, when they should goe further and compare many things together, they stand stiffely upon one word. Whereby it cannot otherwise bee but that they must sometime bee deceived which rest upon the sound knowledge of nothing. Wee grant indeed that the carnall seed of Abraham did for a time hold the place of the spirituall seed which is by faith grafted into him. For wee be called his children howsoever there is no naturall kined betweene him and us. But if they meane, as they plainly shew that they doe, that there was never spirituall blessing promised to the carnall seed of Abraham, herein they are much deceived. Wherefore we must levell to a better marke, whereunto wee are directed by the most certaine guiding of the Scripture. The Lord therefore promised to Abraham, that hee should have a seed, wherein all nations of the earth shall bee blessed: and there withall assureth him, that he would be a God to him and his seed. Whosoever doe by Faith receive Christ the Authour of blessing, are heires of this promise, and therefore are called the children of Abraham.

13 But although since the resurrection of Christ the bounds of the kingdome of God have begun to be farre and wide enlarged into all nations without difference, that according to the saying of Christ, faithfull ones should be gathered from every part to sit downe in the heavenly glorie with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: yet he had many ages before extended that same so great mercie to the Jewes. And because passing over all other, hee had chosen out that onely nation, in which he would restraine his grace for a time, called them his peculiar possession, and his purchased people. For testifying of such liberalitie, Circumcision was given, by the signe whereof the Jewes might bee taught that God is to them the author of salvation: by which knowledge their minds were raised into hope of eternal life. For what shall he want, whom God hath once received into his charge? Wherefore the Apostle meaning to prove that the Gentiles were the children of Abraham as well as the Jewes, speaketh in this manner: Abraham (saith hee) was justified by faith in uncircumcision. Afterward hee received the signe of circumcision, the seale of righteousnesse of faith, that he should bee the Father of all the faithfull, both of uncircumcision and of circumcision, not of them that glorie of onely circumcision, but of them that follow the faith which our Father Abraham had in uncircumcision. Doe not wee see that both sorts are made equall in dignitie? For during the time appointed by the decree of God, he was the Father of circumcision. When, the wall being plucked downe (as the Apostle writeth in another place) by which the Jewes were severed from the Gentiles, the entry was made open to them also into the kingdome of God, he was made their Father, and that without the signe of circumcision, because they have baptisme in stead of circumcision. But where hee expressly by name denieth, that Abraham is Father to them which are of circumcision onely, that same was spoken to abate the pride of certaine, which omitting the care of godlinesse, did boast themselves of onely ceremonies. After which manner at this day also their vanitie may be confuted which seeke in baptisme nothing but water.

14 But another place of the Apostle out of the ninth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romanes shall bee alleaged to the contrary, where he teacheth that they which are of the flesh, are not the children of Abraham: but they onely are counted his seed, which are the children of promise. For hee seemeth to signifie, that the carnall kined of Abraham is nothing, which yet we doe set in some degree. But it is more diligently to be marked, what matter the Apostle there intreateth of. For, meaning to shew to the Jewes how much the goodnesse of God was not bound to the seed of Abraham, yea how it nothing availeth of it selfe, hee bringeth forth Ismael and Esau for example to prove it: whom being refused, as if they were strangers, although they were according to the flesh the naturall off-spring of Abraham, the blessing rested in Isaac and Jacob. Whereupon is gathered that which he afterward affirmeth, that salvation hangeth of the mercie of God, which hee extendeth to whom it pleaseth him: and that there is no cause why the Jewes should stand in their owne conceit, or boast upon the name name of the covenant, unlesse they keepe the law of the covenant, that is to say, doe obey the word. Againe when hee hath throwne them downe from vaine confidence of their kindred, yet became on the other side hee saw, that the covenant which was once made of God with the posterity of Abraham, could in no wise bee made voided; in the eleventh Chapter, he argueth that the carnall kindred is not to be spoiled of his due dignitie: by the beneficiall meane whereof he teacheth that the Iewes are the first and naturall heires of the Gospell, but in respect that by their unthankfulnesse, they were forsaken as unworthy: yet so that the heavenly blessing is not utterly remooved from their nation. For which reason, how much soever they were stubbornne and covenant breakers, nevertheless hee calleth them holy (so much honour hee giveth to the holy generation, with whom God had vouchsafed to make his holy covenant) but calleth us if we be compared with them, as it were asfer borne, yea for the untimely borne children of Abraham, and that by adoption, not by nature: as if a twig broken off from his naturall tree should bee grafted in a strange stocke. Therefore that they should not be defrauded of their prerogative: it behooved that the Gospell should be first preached to them: for they be in the household of God as it were the first begotten children. Wherefore this honour was to be given them, until they refused it being offered them, and by their owne unthankfulnesse brought to passe that it was carried away to the Gentiles. Neither yet, with how great obstinacie soever they continue to make warre against the Gospell, ought they to be despised of us: if we consider that for the promises sake, the blessing of God doth yet still remaine among them: as verily the Apostle testifieth that it shall never utterly depart from thence: because the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

15 Behold of what force is the promise given to the posterity of Abraham, and with what balance it is to be weighed. Wherefore although in discerning the heires of the kingdom from bastards and strangers, we nothing doubt that the onely election of God ruleth with free right of government: yet we also therewithall perceive, that it pleased him peculiarly to embrace the seed of Abraham with his mercie, and that the same mercie might be the more surely witnessed, to seale it with Circumcision. Now altogether like state is there of the Christian Church. For as Paul there reasoneth that the Iewes are sanctified of their parents: so in another place hee teacheth, that the children of Christians receive the same sanctification of their parents: Whereupon is gathered, that they are worthily severed from the rest, which on the other side are condemned of uncleannesse. Now who can doubt, but that it is most false which they doe thereupon conclude, that say that the infants which in old time were circumcised, did onely figure spirituall infancie, which artifice of the regeneration of the word of God. For Paul doth not so subtilly play the Philosopher, where hee writeth that Christ is the minister of Circumcision, to fulfill the promises which had beene made to the Fathers, as if he had said thus: Forasmuch as the covenant made with Abraham hath respect to his seed, Christ, to performe and discharge the promise once made by his Father, came to salvation to the nation of the Iewes. See you not how also after the resurrection of Christ, he judgeth that the promise of the covenant is to bee fulfilled not onely by way of Allegoric, but as the very words do sound to the carnall seed of Abraham. To the same intent serveth that which Peter in the second Chapter to the Actes, declareth to the Iewes, that the benefit of the Gospell is due to them and their seed by right of the covenant, and in the Chapter next following he calleth them the children of the Testament, that is to say heires. From which also not much discordeth the other place of the Apostle above alledged, where hee accounteth and setteth circumcision imprinted in infants, for a testimonie of that communion which they have with Christ. But if we hearken to their trifles, what shall be wrought by that promise, whereby the Lord in the second article of his law undertaketh to his servants, that he will bee favourable to their seed even to the thousand generation? Shall we here flee to Allegories? But that were too trifling a shift. Or shall wee say that this is abolished? But so the law should bee destroyed, which Christ came rather to establish, so farre as it turneth us to good unto life. Let it therefore bee out of controverfie, that God is so good and liberal to his, that for their sakes, hee will save also their children, whom they shall beget, to be adnumbred among his people.

16 Moreover the differences which they goe about to put betweene Baptisme and Circumcision, are not onely worthy to bee laughed at, and void of all colour of reason, but also disagreeing with themselves. For when they have affirmed that baptisme hath relation to the first day of the spirituall battell, but Circumcision to the eight, when mortification is already ended, by and by forgetting the same, they turne their song, and call Circumcision a figure of the flesh to bee mortified, but Baptisme they call buriall, into which none are to be put till they be already dead. What dotages of frantike men, can with so great lightnesse leape into sundry diversities? For in the first sentence, Baptisme must goe before Circumcision: by the other, it is thrust backe into the latter place. Yet is it no new example, that the wits of men be so tossed up and downe, when in stead of the most certaine word of God they worship whatsoever they have dreamed. We therefore say that that former difference is a meere dreame. If they list to expound by way of Allegorie upon the eighth day, yet it agreed not in the manner. It were much fitter, according to the opinion of the old writers, to referre the number of eight to the resurrection which was done on the eighth day, whereupon we know that the newnesse of life hangeth: or to the whole course of this present life, wherein mortification ought alwayes to go forward, till when life is ended, mortification it selfe may also bee ended. Howbeit God may seeme to have minded to provide for the tenderesse of age, in deferring Circumcision to the eighth day, because the wound should have beene more dangerous to the children new borne and yet red from their mother. How much stronger is that, that we being dead before, are buried by Baptisme: when the Scripture expressly crieth to the contrary that we are buried into death to this intent, that we should die, and from thenceforth should endeavour to this mortification? Now, a likewise handling it is, that they cavill that women ought not to bee baptised, if Baptisme must be framed like to Circumcision. For if it be most certaine that the sanctifying of the seed of Israel was testified by the signe of Circumcision: thereby also it is undoubted, that it was given to sanctifie both males and females. But the onely bodies of male children were marked with it, which might by nature be marked: yet so that women were by them after a certaine manner companions and partners of Circumcision. Therefore sending farre away such follies of theirs, let us sticke fast in the likenesse of baptisme and Circumcision, which we most largely see to agree in the inward mysterie, in the promises, in use, in effectualnesse.

17 They thinke also that they bring forth a most strong reason, why children are to be debarred from baptisme, when they alleadge that that they are not yet for age able to understand the mystery there signified. That is spirituall regeneration, which cannot be in the first infancy. Therefore they gather, that they are to be taken for none other than the children of Adam: till they bee growne to age meet for a second birth. But truth of God each where speaketh against all these things. For if they be to be left among the children of Adam, then they are left in death: forasmuch as in Adam we can doe nothing but die. But contrariwise Christ commandeth them to be brought unto him. Why so? because he is life: Therefore that hee may give life to them, he maketh them partakers of himselfe: when in the meane time these fellows driving them far away doe adjudge them to death. For if they say for a shitt that infants do not therefore perish if they be accounted the children of Adam, their error is abundantly confuted by witness of the Scripture. For whereas it pronounceth that all do die in Adam, it followeth that there remaineth no hope of life but in Christ. Therefore that wee may be made heires of life, we must communicate with him. Againe when it is written in another place, that by nature we are subject to the wrath of God: and conceived in sinne, whereunto damnation perpetually cleaveth: we must depart out of our owne nature, before that the entrie bee open to us into the kingdome of God. And what can be more plainely spoken, than that flesh and blood cannot possess the kingdome of God? Therefore let all be done away whatsoever is ours (which shall not be done without regeneration) then we shall see this possession of the kingdome. Finally if Christ say truly, when he reporteth that he is life, it is necessarie that we be grafted unto him, that we may be delivered out of the bondage of death. But (say they) how are infants regenerate, which are not endued with knowledge neither of good nor of evil? But we answer, that the work of God is not yet no worke at all, although it be not subject to our capacity. Moreover it is nothing doubtfull, that the infants which are to be saved (as verily of that age some are saved) are before regenerate of the Lord. For if they bringth them from their mothers womb the corruption naturally planted in them: they must be purged thereof, before that they be admitted into the kingdom of God, whereinto nothing entereth that is defiled or spotted. If they be born sinners, as both David & Paul affirme: either they remaine out of favour & hatefull to God, or they must needs be justified. And what seek we more, when the Judge himselfe openly affirmeth that the entry into heavenly life is open to none but to them that be born again? And to put such carpers to silence, he shewed an example in Toba the Baptist, (whom he sanctified in his mothers womb), what he was able to doe in the rest. Neither doe they any thing prevaile by the shift wherewith they here mocke, that that was but once done: whereupon it doth not by and by follow that the Lord is wont commonly to do so with infants. For neither do we reason after that manner: only our purpose is to shew, that the power of God is by them unjustly & enviously limited within those narrow bound: within which it suffereth not it selfe to be bound, Their other by-shift is even of as great waight. They allege that by the usual manner of the scripture, this word (from the womb) is as much in effect, as if it were said, from chulthood, But we may clearly see, that the angel when he declared the same to Zachary, meant another thing: that is, that it which was not yet born, should be filled with the holy Ghost. Let us not therefore ar:ēpt to appoint a law to God, but that he may sanctify whōit pleaseth him as he sanctified this child, forasmuch as his power is nothing diminished.

18 And truly Christ was therefore sanctified from his first infancie, that he might sanctifie in himself his elect out of every age without difference. For as, to do away the fault of disobedience which had bene committed in our flesh, he hath put on the same flesh upon himselfe, that he might in it for us & in our stead performe perfect obedience: so he was conceived of the holy Ghost, that having the holines therof fully powred into him in the flesh which he had taken upon him, he might powre forth the same into us. If we have in Christ a most perfect paterne of all the graces which God continually sheweth to his children, verily in this behalfe also he shall be a proote unto us, that the age of infancie is not so far unfit for sanctification. But howsoever it be, yet this we hold out of controverſie that none of the elect is called out of this present life, which is not first made holy & regenerate by the spirit of God. Whereas they object to the contrarie, that in the scriptures the spirit acknowlegeth no other regeneration but of incorruptible seed, that is, of the word of God: they do wrongfully expound that saying of Peter, wherein he cōprehendeth only the faithfull which had bene taught by preaching of the Gospell. To such indeed we grant that the word of the Lord is the only seed of spirituall regeneration: but we deny that it ought therupon to be gathered, that infants cannot be regenerate by the power of God, which is to him as easie and ready as to us it is incomprehensible and wonderful. Moreover it should not be safe enough for us to take this away from the Lord, that he may not be able to shew himselfe to be knowne to them by whatsoever way he will.

1 Peter. 2. 3.

19 But faith, say they, is by hearing, wherof they have not yet gotten the use, neither can they be able to know God, whom Moses teacheth to be destitute of the knowledge both of good & evil. But they consider not that the Apostle, when he maketh hearing the beginning of faith, describeth only the ordinarie distribution of the Lord and disposition which he useth to keep in calling them that be his: but appointeth not to him a perpetuall rule, that he may not use any other way. Which way verily he hath used in the calling of many, to whom he hath given the true knowledge of himselfe, by an inward manner by the enlightning of the spirit, without any preaching used for mean therof. But whereas they think it shall be a great absurditie, if any knowledge of God be given to infants, from whom Moses taketh away the understanding of good and evil: I beseech them to answer me what danger is there if they be said to receive some part of that grace, wherof a little after they shall enjoy the full plentifulnesse. For if the falsesse of life standeth in the perfect knowledge of God, when many of them, whom in their very first infancie death by and by taketh away, do passe into eternall life, truly they are received to behold the most present face of God. Whom therefore the Lord will enlighten with the full brightnesse of his light, why may he not presently also, if it so please him, send out to shine upon them some small sparkle thereof: specially if he do not first uncloth them of ignorance, before that he taketh them out of the prison of the flesh? Not that I meane rashly to affirme that they be endued with the same Faith which we feele in our selves, or that they have altogether like knowledge of faith: (which I had rather leave in suspense) but somewhat to restrain their foolish arrogance, which according as their mouth is puffed up with fulnesse, doe boldly deny or affirme they care not what.

20 But that they may yet stand more strongly in this point, they adde that baptisme is a Sacrament of repentance and of Faith, wherfore sith neither of these can befall in tender infancie, we ought to beware lest if they be admitted to the communion of baptisme, the signification of it be made void and vaine. But these darts are throwne rather against God than against us. For it is most evident by many testimonies of Scripture, that circumcision also was a sign of repentance. Moreover it is called of Paul the seale of the righteousnesse of Faith. Let therefore a reason be required of God himselfe why he commanded it to be marked in the bodies of infants. For sith baptisme and circumcision are both in one case, they can give nothing to the one but that they must also therewithall grant the same to the other. If they looke back to their wonted starting hole, that then by the age of infancie were figured spirituall infants, the way is already stopped up against them. We say therefore, sith God hath communicated to infants circumcision a Sacrament of repentance and faith, it seemeth no absurditie if they be made partakers of baptisme: unlesse they list openly to rage against the ordinance of God. But both in all the doings of God, & in this selfe same doing also shineth wisdom and righteousnesse enough, to beat down the backbitings of the wicked. For though infants, at the same instant that they were circumcised, did not comprehend in understanding what that sign meant: yet they were truly circumcised into the mortification of their corrupt & defiled nature, in which mortification they should afterward exercise themselves when they were grown to riper age. Finally it is very easie to afoile this objection, with saying that they be baptised into repentance & faith to come: which although they be not formed in them yet by secret working of the spirit the seed of both lieth hidden in them. With this answer at once is overthrowen whatsoever they wrest against us which they have fetched out of the signification of baptisme. Of which sort is that title wherwith it is commended of Paul, where he calleth it the washing of regeneration & of renewing. Wherupon they gather that it is to be given to none but to such a one as is able to conceive those things. But we on the contrary side may answer, that neither was circumcision which betokened regeneration, to be given to any other than to them that were regenerate. And so also we condemn the ordinance of God. Wherfore (as we have already touched in divers places) what soever arguments do tend to the shaking of circumcision, they have no force in the assailing of baptisme. Neither do they escape, if they say that we ought to take that for determined and certaine, which standeth upon the authoritie of God, although there appeare no reason of it: which reverence is not due to the baptisme of infants, nor to such other things which be not commended unto us by the expresse word of God: sith they are still fast holden with this double argument. For the commandement of God concerning infants to be circumcised, was either lawfull and subject to no cavillations, or worthy to be found fault withall. If there were no inconuenience nor absurditie in the commandement of circumcision, neither can there any absurditie be noted in observing the baptisme of infants.

21 As for the sport of absurdity which in this place they goe about to lay upon it, we thus wipe it away. Whom the Lord hath vouchsafed to elect, if having received the sign of regeneration, they depart out of this present life before that they be come to riper age he reneweth them with the power of his spirit incomprehensible to us, in such maner as he alone foreseeeth to be expedient. If they chance to grow up to age, whereby they may be taught the truth of baptisme, they shall hereby be the more inkiudled to the endevor of renewing, the token wherof they shall learn to have bin given them from their first infancie, that they should exercise themselves in it throughout the whole course of their life. To the same intent ought that to be applied which Paul teacheth in two places, that by baptisme we are buried together with Christ. For he doth not mean thereby, that he which is to be baptised must be already first buried together with Christ: but simply declareth what doctine is contained under baptisme, yea & that to them that be already baptised: so that very mad men would not affirm by this place that it goeth before baptisme. After this manner Moses and the Prophets did put the people in mind what circumcision meant, wherwith yet they had bin marked while they were infants. Of the same effect also is that which he writeth to the Galathians, that they when they were baptised, did put on Christ. To what end? Verily that they should from thenceforth live to Christ, because they had not lived before. And although in the older sort the receiving of the signe ought to follow the understanding of the mysterie: yet it shall be by and by declared that infants ought to be o-therwise esteemed and accounted of. And no otherwise ought we to judge of the place of Peter, in which they think that they have a strong hold: when hee saith that it is not a washing to wipe away the filthiness of the body, but the witness of a good conscience before God, by the resurrection of Christ. They indeede do gather thereby, that nothing is left to the baptisme of infants, but that it should be a vain smoke, namely from which this truth is far distant. But they often offend in this error, that they will have the thing in order of time to goe alway before the signe. For the truth of circumcision also consisted of the same witness of good conscience. If it ought of necessitie to have gone before, infants should never have bin circumcised by the commandement of God. But he shewing that the witness of a good conscience was contained under the truth of circumcision, and yet therewithall also commanding infants to be circumcised, doth in that point sufficiently declare that circumcision is applied to the time to come. Wherefore there is no more present effectualnesse to be required in baptisme of infants, than that it should confirme and stablish the covenant made by the Lord with them. The rest of the signification of that Sacrement shall afterward follow at such time as God himselfe foreseeeth.

22 Now I think there is no man, that doth not cleerly see that all such reasons of theirs are meer misconstruings of Scriptur. As for the rest that be of a neer kind to these, we will lightly run thorow them by the way. They object that baptisme is given unto the forgiveness of sins: which when it is granted, will largely make for defence of our sentence. For sith we be borne sinners, we doe even from our mothers womb need forgiveness and pardon. Now seeing the Lord doth not cut off, but rather assure to that age the hope of mercy: why should we take from them the signe which is much inferior than the thing it selfe? Wherefore that which they goe about to throw against us, we thus throw backe against themselves: infants have remission of sins given them, therefore they ought not to have the sign taken from them. They alleage also this out of the Epistle to the Ephesians: that the Church is clesned of the Lord, with the washing of water in the word of life. Than which there could be nothing alleaged more fit to overthrow this error: for thereupon groweth an easie proof of our side. If the Lord will have that washing, wherwith he clesneth his Church, to be testified by baptisme: it seemeth not rightfull that it should want the testimony of it in infants, which are rightfully accounted part of the Church, so much as they be called heires of the heavenly kingdom. For Paul speaketh of the whole Church, where he saith that it was clesned with the baptisme of water. Likewise of this that in another place he saith, that we be by baptisme grafted into the body of Christ, we gather that infants, whom he reckoneth among his members, ought to be baptised, lest they be plucked away from his body. Behold with what violence as with so many engins they assault the fortresses of our faith.

23 Then they come down to the practise & custom of the time of the Apostles, wherein none is found to have bin admitted to baptisme, but he which hath before professed faith & repentance. For where Peter was asked of them that were minded to repent, what was needfull to be done, he counsell'd them first to repent, & then to be baptised into the forgiveness of sins. Likewise Philip, when the Eynuch required to be baptised, answered that he might be baptised if he believed with all his hart. Hereby they think that they may win, that it is not lawfull that baptisme be grated to any, but where faith & repentence go before. Truly if we yeeld to this reason, the first of these two places where is no mention made of faith, will prove that repentance alone sufficeth: and the other place, wherein repentance is not required will prov that faith only is enough. I think they will answer that the one place is holpen with the other, & therefore must be joynd together. I say also likewise, that other places must be laid together which make somewhat to the undoing of this knot: for a smuch as there be many sentences in scripture, the understanding wherof hangeth upon the cir-stance of the place. As this presently is an example. For they to whom Peter and Philip spake these things were of age sufficient to have practice of repentance and to conceive faith. We earnestly deny that such ought to be baptised, untill after perceiving of their conversion and faith, at least so far as it may be searched out by the judgement of men. But that infants ought to be accounted in another number, it is more than evident enough. For in old time if any man did joine himself into communion of religion with Israel, it behoved that he should first be taught the covenant of the Lord, and instructed in the law, before that he were marked with circumcision, because in birth he was a stranger from the people of Israel, with whom the covenant had beene made with circumcision stablished.

24 As also the Lord, when he adopteth Abraham to himselfe, doth not begin at circumcision, hiding in the mean time what he meaneth by that sign: but first he declareth what covenant he intendeth to make with him, & then after faith given to the promise, he maketh him partaker of the Sacrament. Why doth in Abraham the sacrament follow faith, and in Isaac his son it goeth before all understanding? Because it is meet that he, which being in full grown age is received into fellowship of the covenant, from which he had bin hitherto a stranger, should first learn the conditions thereof: but an infant begotten of him needed not so, which by right of inheritance according to the form of the promise is even from his mothers womb contained in the covenant. Or (that the matter may be more clearly and briefly shewed) if the children of the faithfull, without the help of understanding, are partakers of the covenant, there is no cause why they should be debarred from the sign for this that they cannot swear to the form of the covenant. This verily is the reason, why in some places God affirmeth that the infants which are issued of the Israelites, are begotten and borne to him. For without doubt he esteemeth as his children the children of them to whose seed he promiseth that he will be a Father. But he which is unfaithfull issued of ungodly parents, til he be by faith united to God, is judged a stranger from the communion of the covenant. Therefore it is no marvell if he be not partaker of the sign, the signification wherof should be deceitfull and void in him. To this effect Paul also writeth that the Gentiles so long as they were drowned in their idolatry, were out of the Testament. With this short sum, (as I think) the whole matter may be clearly opened: that they which in grown age, embrace the faith of Christ, forasmuch as they were hitherto strangers from the covenant, are not to be marked with baptism, but whereas faith and repentance come between, which only can open them the entry into the fellowship of the covenant: but the infants that are issued of Christians, as they are received of God into the inheritance of the covenant, so soone as they be borne, so ought to be received to baptism. Hereunto must that be applyed which the Evangelist speaketh of, that they were baptised of John which confessed their sins. Which example at this day also we thinke meet to be kept. For if a Turke offer himselfe to baptism, he should not be rashly baptised of us, namely not till after confession, whereby he may satisfie the Church.

25 Moreover they bring forth the words of Christ, which are rehearsed in the third Chapter of Iohn, whereby they thinke that a present regeneration is required in baptism. Unlesse a man be born againe of water and the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdome of God. Lo (say they) how baptism is by the Lords own mouth called regeneration. Then therefore whom it is more than enough known to be unable to receive regeneration, by what colour do we admit to baptism which cannot be without regeneration? First they are deceived in this that they thinke that in this place mention is made of baptism, because they heare the name of water. For after that Christ had declared to Nicodemus the corruption of nature, and taught him, that men must be borne of new, because Nicodemus dreamed of a bodily new birth, he there shewed the manner how God doth regenerate us, namely by water and the spirit: as though he should say by the spirit which in cleansing and watering faithfull soules doth the office of water. Therefore I take water and the spirit simply for the spirit, which is water. Neither is this a new forme of speech, for it altogether agreeth with the same which is in the third Chapter of Matthew: He that followeth me, it is he that baptiseth in the holy Ghost and fire. Therefore as to baptise in the holy Ghost and fire, is to give the holy Ghost, which hath the office and nature of fire: so to be born againe of water and the spirit, is nothing else but to receive that power of the holy spirit which doth the same thing in the soule that water doth in the body.

dy. I know that other do otherwise expound it: but I am out of doubt that this is the naturall meaning: because the purpose of Christ is none other, but to teach that all they must put off their own nature which aspire to the heavenly kingdom. Howbeit if we list to cavil unfavorably as they do, it were easie for us (when we have granted as they would have it) to infer upon them that baptisme is before faith and repentance: forasmuch as in the words of Christ it goeth before the spirit. It is certaine that this is understood of spirituall gifts: which if it come after baptisme, I have obtained what I require. But leaviag cavillations, we must hold fast the plaine exposition, which I have brought, that no man till he have bin renued with living water, that is, with the spirit, can enter into the kingdome of God.

26 Now hereby also it is evident that their fained invention is to be hissed out, which adjudge all the unbaptised to eternall death. Therefore let us according to their request imagine baptisme to be ministred to none but to them that be growne in age: What will they say, shall become of a child, which is rightly and well instructed with the introductions of godlines, if when the day of baptising is at hand, he happen to be taken away with sudden death beside all mens hope? The Lords promise is cleere, that whosoever hath beleevd in the sonne, shall not see death, nor shall come into judgement, but is already passed from death into life: and it is no where found that he ever damned him that was not yet baptised. Which I would not have so taken of me, as though I meant that baptisme might freely be despised (by which despising I affirme that the Lords covenant is defiled: so much lesse can I abide to excuse it): only it is enough for me to prove, that it is not so necessarrie, that he should be immediately thought to be lost, from whom power is taken away to obtaine it. But if we agree to their fained device, we shall damne all them without exception, whom any chance withholdeth from baptisme, with how great faith soever (by which Christ himselfe is possessed) otherwise they are endued. Moreover they make all infants guilty of eternall death, to whom they denie baptisme, which by their own confession is necessary to salvation. Now let them looke how trimly they agree with the words of Christ, by which the kingdome of heaven is adjudged to that age. But, to grant them every thing so much as pertaineth to the understanding of this place, yet they shall gather nothing thereof unlessse they overthrow the former doctrine which we have established concerning the regeneration of infants.

27 But they glory that they have the strongest hold of all in the very institution of baptisme, which they fetch out of the last Chapter of Matthew: where Christ sending forth his Apostles to all nations, giveth them the first commandment to teach them, and the second to baptise them. Then also out of the last of Mark they adjoyne this, He that beleeveth and is baptised, shall be saved. What seek we further (say they) when the Lords own words doe openly sound, that we must first teach ere we baptise, and do assign to baptisme the second state after faith? Of which order the Lord also shewed an example in himselfe, which would be baptised not till the thirtieth yeere. But here, O good God, how many wayes doe they both entangle themselves, and bewray their owne ignorance? For herein they now more than childishly erre, that they fetch the first institution of Baptisme from thence, which Christ had from the beginning of his preaching given in charge to his Apostles to minister. Therefore there is no cause why they should affirme that the law and rule of Baptisme is to be fetched out of these places, as though they contained the first institution thereof. But to beare with them for this fault yet how strong is this manner of reasoning? Truly if I listed to dally with them, there is not a little lurking hole, but a most wide field offereth it selfe open for us to escape them. For when they stick so fast to the order of words, that they gather that because it was said, Goe preach and baptise. Againe, he that beleeveth and is baptised, therefore they must preach before that they baptise, and beleve before that they require baptisme: why may not we again answer them with saying that we must baptise before that we must teach the keeping of those things that Christ hath commanded, namely such it is said, baptise ye, teaching them to keep whatsoever things I have commanded you? which same things we have noted in that saying of Christ which hath been even now alleaged concerning the regeneration of water and the spirit. For if it be so understood as they would have it, verily in that place baptisme must be before spirituall regeneration, because it is named in the first place, For Christ doth teach that we must be regenerate, not of the spirit and water, but of water and the spirit.

Children no more excluded from baptisme by commandement given that no men should be baptised before they beleve, than from meat by the Apostles injunction that none should eat that laboureth not.

2. Thes. 3. 10.

Luk. 3. 23.

The Scripture sheweth reason why the Lords supper should not be given unto infants, but why Baptisme none.

28 Now this invincible reason wherupon they beare themselves so bold, seemeth to be somewhat shaken; but because truth hath defence enough in simplicity, I will not escape away with such light arguments. Therefore let them take with them a full answer. Christ in this place giveth the chiefe commandement concerning the preaching of the Gospell, whertunto he adjoyneth the ministry of baptisme as an addition hanging upon it. Again he speaketh more otherwise of baptisme, but so farre as the ministracion of it is under the office of teaching. For Christ sendeth the Apostles to publish the Gospell to all the nations of the world, that they should from each where with the doctrine of salvation gather together into his kingdome men that before were lost. But whom, or what manner of men? It is certaine that there is no mention but of them that are able to receive teaching. Afterward he addeth that such, when they are instructed, ought to be baptised, adjoining a promise, that they that beleve and are baptised shall be saved. Is there in all that saying so much as one syllable of infants? What forme therefore of reasoning shall this be wherewith they assaile us: they which are of growne age, must first be instructed, that they may beleve, ere they be baptised: therefore it is unlawfull to make baptisme common to infants? Although they would burst themselves, they shall prove nothing else by this place but that the Gospell must be preached to them that are of capacitie able to heare it, before that they be baptised, forasmuch as he there speaketh of such onely. Let them hereof if they can make a stop to debarre infants from baptisme.

29 But that even blind men also may with groping find out their deceits, I will point them out with a very cleere similitude. If any man cavill that infants ought to have meat taken from them, upon this pretence that the Apostle suffereth none to eat but them that labour, shall he not be worthy that all men should spit at him? Why so? Because he without difference draweth that to all men, which was spoken of one kinde and one certaine age of men. No whit handsomer is their handling in this present cause. For that which every man seeth to belong to one age alone, they draw to infants, that this age also may be subject to the rule which was made for none but them that were more grown in yeeres. As for the example of Christ it nothing upholdeth their side, He was not baptised before that he was thirty yeeres old. That is indeed true: but there is a reason thereof ready to be shewed: because he then purposed by his preaching to lay a sound foundation of baptisme, or rather to stablish the foundation which had bene before laid of Ioban. Therefore when he minded with his doctrine to institute baptisme, to procure the greater authoritie to his institution, he sanctified with his owne body, and that in such times of time as was most convenient, namely when he began his preaching. Finally, they shall gather nothing else hereof, but that baptisme tooke his originall and beginning at the preaching of the Gospell. If they list to appoint the thirtieth yeere, why doe they not keep it, but do receive every one to baptisme as he hath in their judgement sufficiently profited? yea and Servetus one of their masters when he stiffely required this time, yet began at the 21. yeere of his age to boast himself to be a Prophet. As though he were to be suffred that taketh on himselfe the place of a teacher in the Church, before that he be a member of the Church.

30 At the last they object, that there is no greater cause why Baptisme should be given to infants, than the Lords supper, which yet is not granted them. As though the scripture did not every way expresse a large difference. The same was indeed usually done in the old Church, as it appeareth by Cyprian and Augustine: but that manner is worthily grown out of use. For if we consider the nature and property of baptisme, it is truly an entry into the Church, and as it were a forme of admission, whereby we are adnumbred into the people of God, a sign of our spiritual regeneration by which we are born again into the children of God: whereas on the other side the supper is given to them that be more growne in age, which having passed tender infancy, are now able to beare strong meat. Which difference is very evidently shewed in the scripture. For there the Lord so much as pertaineth to baptisme, maketh no choice of ages. But he doth not likewise give the supper to all to take part of it, but only to them which are fit to discern the body and bloud of the Lord, to examine their owne conscience, to declare the Lords death, to waigh the power thereof. Would we have any thing plainer, than that which the Apostle teacheth when he exhorteth that every man should prove and examine himselfe, and then eat of this bread and drink of this cup? Therefore examination must goe before, which should in vaine be looked for of infants. Againe, he that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himselfe, not discerning the Lords body. If none can partake worthily but they that can well discern the holiness of the Lords body, why should we give to our tender children, poison in stead of lively food? What is that commandment of the Lord, ye shall doe it in remembrance of me? what is that other which the Apostle deriveth from the same. So oft as yee shall eat of this bread, ye shall declare the Lords death till he come? What remembrance (I beseech you) shall we require at our infants of the thing which they never attained with understanding, what preaching of the crosse of Christ, the force and benefit whereof they doe not yet comprehend in mind? None of these things is prescribed in Baptisme. Therefore betweene these two signes is great difference: which we note also in like signes in the old testament; Circumcision, which is knowne to answer to our Baptisme, was appointed for infants. But the Pasche into whose place the Supper hath now succeeded, did not receive all manner of guests without difference. But was rightly eaten of them onely that might by age enquire of the signification of it. If these men had remaining one crum of sound braine, would they be blind at a thing so cleere and offering it selfe to sight.

13 Although it grieveth me to load the Readers with a heap of trifles: yet it shall bee worth the travaile briefly to wipe away such gay reasons as Servetus not the least of the Anabaptists, yea the great glory of that company, thought himselfe to bring when he prepared himselfe to conflict. He allegeth that Christs signes as they be perfect, so doe require them that be perfect or able to conceive perfection. But the solution is easie: that the perfection of Baptisme, which extendeth even to death, is wrongfully restrained to one point of time. I say yet further that perfection is foolishly required in man at the first day, wherunto Baptisme allureth us all our life long, by continuall degrees. He objecteth that Christs signes were ordained for remembrance, that every man should remember that he was buried together with Christ. I answer that that which he hath fained of his own head, needeth no confutation: yea that which he draweth to Baptisme, Pauls words shew to be proper to the holy supper, that every man should examine himselfe: but of Baptisme there is no where any such thing. Whereupon we gather that they be rightly Baptised which for their finaltesse of age, are not yet able to receive examination. Whereas he thirdly allegeth, that all they abide in death which beleve not the Son of God, and that the wrath of God abideth upon them: and therefore that infants which cannot beleve lie in their damnation: I answer that Christ there speaketh not of the general guiltinesse wherewith all the posterity of Adam are enwrapped, but only threatneth the despisers of the Gospel, which do proudly & stubbornly refuse the grace offered them. But this nothing pertaineth to infants. Also I set a contrary reason against them: that whomsoever Christ blesteth, he is discharged from the curse of Adam and the wrath of God: Sith therefore it is known that infants are blessed of him, it followeth that they are discharged from death. Then he falsly citeth that which is no where read, that whosoever is borne of the spirit, heareth the voice of the spirit. Which although we grant to be written, yet shall prove nothing else but that the faithfull are framed to obedience, according as the spirit worketh in them. But that which is spoken of a certaine number, it is faulty to draw indifferently to all. Fourthly, he objecteth: because that goeth before which is naturall we must tarry ripe time for Baptisme which is spirituall. But although I grant that all the posterity of Adam begotten of the flesh doe from the very womb bare their owne damnation, yet I deny that that withstandeth but that God may presently bring remedie. For neither shall Servetus prove that there were many yeares appointed by God that the spiritualnesse of life may begin. As Paul testifieth, although they which are borne of the faithfull are by nature damned: yet by supernaturall grace they are saved. Then he bringeth forth an allegory that David going up into the tower of Sion, did lead neither blind men nor lame men with him but strong souldiers. But what if I set a parable against it, wherein God calleth to the heavenly banket blind men and lame men: how will Servetus unwind himselfe out of this knot? I aske also whether lame and maimed men have not first bin souldiers with David. But it is superfluous to tarry longer upon this reason, which the readers shall find by the holy History to be made of meere fallhood. There followeth another allegory, that the Apostles were fishers of men, not of litle children. But I aske, what that saying of Christ meaneth meaneth that into the net of the Gospell are gathered all kinds of fishes. But because I like not to play with allegories, I answer that when the office of teaching was enjoyed to the Apostles, yet they were not forbidden from baptising of infants. Howbeit I would yet know, when the Evangelist nameth them Anthropous, men, (in which words comprehended all mankind without exception) why they should denie infants to be men. Seventhly he alleageth, that sith spirituall things agree with spirituall, infants which are not spirituall, are also not meet for baptisme. But first it is plainly evident how wrongfully they wrest the place of Paul. There is entreated of doctrine: when the Corinthians did too much stand in their own conceit for vaine sharpnesse of wit, Paul rebuketh their sluggishnes, for that they were yet to be instructed in the first introduction of heavenly wisdom. Who can therefore gather that baptisme is to be denied to infants, whom being begotten of the flesh, God doth by free adoption make holy to himselfe? Whereas he saith, that they must be fed with spirituall meat, if they be new men, the solution is easie that by baptisme they are admitted into the flocke of Christ, and that the signe of adoption sufficeth them, till being grown to age they be able to beare strong meat: that therefore the time of examination which God expressly requirerh in the holy Supper, must be carried for. Afterward he objecterh that Christ calleth all his to the holy Supper. But it is certaine enough that he admitteth none, but them that be already prepared to celebrate the remembrance of his death. Whereupon followeth that infants whom he vouchsafed to embrace, doe stay in a severall and proper degree by themselves till they grow to age, and yet are not strangers. Whereas he saith, that it is monstrous that a man after that he is borne, should not eat: I answer that soules are otherwise fed than by the outward eating of the Supper: and that therefore Christ is neverthelesse meet to infants although they abstaine from the signe. But of baptisme the case is otherwise, by which onely the gate into the Church is opened to them. Again he objecterh that a good steward distributerh meat to the household in due time. Which although I willingly grant: yet by what right will he appoint unto us the certaine time of baptisme, that he may prove that it is not given to infants out of time. Moreover he bringerh in that commandment of Christ to the Apostles, that they should make haste into the harvest, while the fields wax white. Verily Christ meaneth this onely, that the Apostles seeing the fruit of their labour present, should the more cheerefully prepare themselves to teach. Who shall therefore gather that the onely time of harvest is the ripe time for baptisme? His eleventh reason is, that in the first Church Christians and disciples were all one: but we see now that he fondly reasonerh from the part to the whole: Disciples are called men of full age, which had bene already throughly taught, and had professed Christ: as it behooved that the Jewes under the law should be the disciples of Moses: yet no man shall thereof rightly gather, that infants were strangers, whom the Lord hath testified to be of his owne household. Besides these he alleageth, that all Christians are brethren, in which number infants are not unto us, so long as we debarre them from the Supper. But I returne to that principle, that none are heires of the kingdom of heaven, but they that are the members of Christ: then, that the embracing of Christ was a true token of the adoption, whereby infants are joynd in common with full grown men, and that the abstaining for a time from the Supper withstanderh not but that they pertain to the body of the Church. Neither did the thiefe that was converted on the crosse, cease to be brother to the godly, although he never came to the Supper. Afterward he addeth that none is made our brother but by the Spirit of adoption, which is given onely by the hearing of faith. I answer, that he still fallerh back into the same deceitfull argument, because he overthwartly drawerh that to infants which was spoken onely of grown men. Paul teacherh there that this is Gods ordinary manner of calling to bring his elect to the faith, when he stirreth up to them faithfull teachers, by whose ministerie and travell he reacherh his hand to them. Who dare therby appoint a law to him, but that he may by some other secret way graffe infants into Christ? Where he objecterh that Cornelius was baptised after he had received the holy Ghost: how wrongfully he doth out of one example gather a generall rule, appeareth by the Eunuch and the Samaritanes, in whom the Lord kept a contrary order, that baptisme went before the gifis of the holy Ghost. The fifteenth reason is more than foolish. He saith that we are by regeneration made gods: and that they be gods to whom the word of God is spoken, which accordeth not to children that be infants.

fant. Whereas he saith a Godhead to the faithfull, that is one of his dotages, which it pertained not to this present place to examine. But to wrest the place of the Psalm to so contrary a sense, is a point of desperate shamelesse. Christ saith, that Kings and Magistrates are called of the Prophet Gods, because they beare an office appointed them of God. But that which concerning the speciall commandement of governance is directed to certaine men, this hand some expositor draweth to the doctrine of the Gospell, that he may banish infants out of the Church. Againe he objecteth, that infants cannot be accounted new men, because they are not begotten by the word. But I doe now againe repeat that which I have often said, that to regenerate us, doctrine is the uncorruptible seed, if we be fit to receive it: but when by reason of age there is not yet in us aptnesse to learne, God keepeth his degrees of regenerating. Afterward he commeth back to his allegories, that in the law a sheep and a goat were not offered in sacrifice so soon as they came out of the womb. If I listed to draw figures to this purpose, I could readily object against them, that all first begotten things were consecrate to God so soon as they have opened the womb: then that a lamb must be killed at a yeeres age. Whereupon followeth that manly strength is not to be tarried for, but rather that the new & yet tender issues are chosen of God for sacrifices. Furthermore he affirmeth that none can come to Christ but they that have bin prepared of Iohn. As though Iohns office were not enduring but for a time. But to omit truly that same preparation was not in the children whom Christ embraced and blessed. Wherefore let him go with his false principle. At length he calleth for patrons Trismegistus and the Sibylles, to prove that holy washings pertaine not but to them that are of grownen age. Lo how honourably he thinketh of the baptisme of Christ, which he reduceth to the ceremonies of the Gentiles, that it may be no otherwise ministred than please Trismegistus. But we more esteeme the authority of God, whom it hath pleased to make infants holy to himselfe, and to admit them with the holy signe, the force whereof they did not yet by age understand. Neither doe we count it lawfull to borrow out of the cleanings of the Gentiles any thing, that may change in our Baptism the everlasting and inviolable law of God, which he hath stablished concerning circumcision. Last of all, he maketh this argument: that if it be lawfull to baptise infants without understanding, that Baptisme may enterlude like and insport be ministred of boyes when they play. But of this matter let him quarell with God by whose commandement circumcision was common to infants before that they have attained understanding. Was it therefore a playing matter, or subject to the follies of children, that they might overthrow the holy ordinance of God? But it is no marvel that these improbate spirits, as though they were vexed with a phrensie, do thrust in all the grossest absurdities for defence of their errors, because God doth with such giddinesse justly take vengeance of their pride and stubbornnesse. Verily I trust I have made plaine with how feeble succours Servetus hath holpen his silly brethren the Anabaptists.

32 Now I think it wil be doubtful to no sober man, how rashly they trouble the church of Christ that move brawles and contentions for the Baptisme of infants. But it is profitable to consider, what satan goeth about with this so great subtilty: even to take away from us the singular fruit of affiance and spirituall joy which is to be gathered hereof to diminish as much also the glory of the goodnesse of God. For how sweet is it to godly minds, to be certified not only by word, but also by sight to be seene with eyes, that they obtaine so much favor with the heavenly Father, that he hath also care of their posterity. For here it is to be seene, how he taketh upon him the person of a most provident father of household toward us, which even after our death doth not lay away his carefulnesse of us, but provideth and seeth for our children. Ought we not heere after the example of David with all our heart to leap up unto thanksgiving, that by such shew of his goodnesse, his name may be sanctified? This, verily Satan intendeth, in assailing with so great armies the Baptisme of infants: namely, that this testifying of the grace of God being taken away, the promise which by it is present before our eyes, may at length by little and little vanish away. Whereupon should grow not onely a wicked unthankfulnes toward the mercie of God, but also a certaine slothfulnesse in instructing our children to godlinesse. For by this spur we are not a little pricked forward to bring them up in earnest tear of God and in the keeping of his law, when we consider that even immediately from their birth, he taketh and acknowledgeth them for his children. Wherefore unles we list enviously to darken the bountifulnesse of God, let us offer to him our children, to whom he giveth a place among them that be of his family and household, that is to say, the members of the Church.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of the holy Supper of Christ : and what it availeth us :

After that God hath once received us into his family, and not only to take us as his servants but as his children : that he may fulfill the office of a most good Father, and careful for his issue, he taketh also upon him to nourish us throughout the whole course of our life. And not contented therewith, it pleased him by a pledge given, to assure us of this continuall liberality. To this end therefore he hath given his Church another Sacrament by the hand of his only begotten Sonne, namely a spirituall banquet, wherein Christ testifieth himself to be the quickning bread, wherewith our soules are fed to true and blessed immortality. But forasmuch as the knowledge of so great a mystery is very necessary, and according to the greatnesse thereof, requireth a diligent declaration: and Satan, that he might bereave the Church of this inestimable treasure, hath long ago spread mists, and since that time darkenesse, to obscure the light of it, and then hath stirred strifes and battels that might estrange the mindes of the simple from tasting of this holy food, and hath also in our time attempted the same craft : therefore when I shall have briefly knit up the sum for the capacitie of the unlearned, I will undoe those knots, wherewith Satan hath endeavoured to snare the world. First, bread and wine are signes, which represent unto us the invisible food, which we receive of the flesh and blood of Christ. For as in Baptisme God againe begetting us doth graft us into the fellowship of his Church, and by adoption doth make us his owne : so we have said that he performeth the office of a provident father of household, in this that he continually ministreth us meat, that he sustaينeth and preserveth us in that life whereunto he hath by his word begotten us. Now the onely meat of our soule is Christ, and therefore the heavenly father calleth us to him, that being refreshed with common partaking of him, we may from time to time gather lively force, untill we attaine to heavenly immortality. But forasmuch as this mystery of the secret uniting of Christ with the godly is by nature impossible to be comprehended, he giveth the figure and image thereof in visible signes most fit for our small capacite: yea, as it were by earnest and tokens given, he maketh it so assured unto us as if it were seen with our eyes, because this so familiar a similitude entrencheth even to the grossest minds that soules are so fed with Christ, as bread and wine doe sustaine the bodily life. Now therefore we have it declared, to what end this mysticall blessing tendeth, namely to assure us, that the body of the Lord was so once offered for us, that we now eat it, and in eating it do feele in us the effectuall working of that onely sacrifice, that his blood was so once shed for us, that it is unto us continuall drink. And so found the words of the promise there adjoynded Take, this is my body, which is delivered for you. The body therefore which was once offered up for our salvation, we are commanded to take and eat: that when we see our selves to be made partakers of this, we may certainly determine that the power of his death which bringeth life shall be effectuall in us. Whereupon also he calleth the cnp, the covenant in his blood. For after a certaine manner it reneweth, or rather continueth the covenant which he hath once stablished with his blood, so much as pertaineth to the confirming of our faith, so oft as he reacheth unto us that holy blood to be tasted of.

2 A great fruit verily of affiance and sweetnesse may godly soules gather of this sacrament, because they have a witness, that we are grown together into one body with Christ, so that what so ever is his we may call ours. Herupon followeth that we may boldly promise unto our selves, that everlasting life is ours, whereof he is heire : and that the kingdom of heaven, wherinto he is now entred, can no more fall away from us than from him : againe that we cannot now be condemned by our sins, from the guiltinesse whereof he hath acquitted us, when he willed them to be imputed to himself as if they were his owne. This is the marvellous exchange, which of his immeasurable bountifulnes he hath made with us : that he being made with us the sonne of man, hath made us with him the sons of God : that by his coming downe into earth, he hath made us a way to go up into heaven: that putting upon him our mortality, he hath given us his immortality: that taking on him our weaknesse, he hath strengthened us with his power: that taking our poverrie to himselfe, he hath conveyed his riches to us: that taking to him the waight of our unrighteousnesse, wherewith we were oppressed, he hath clothed us with his righteousnesse.

3 Of all these things we have so full a witnessing in this Sacrament, that we must certainly determine, that Christ is truly given us, as if Christ himselfe were set present before our eyes, and handled with our hands. For this world can neither lie to us, nor mock us: Take, eat, drinke: This is my body, which is delivered for you: this is the blood, which is shed into the forgiveness of sinnes. Whereas he commandeth to take, he signifieth that it is ours. Whereas he commandeth to eat, he signifieth that that is made one substance with us: Whereas he saith of the body that it is delivered for us: of the blood, that it is shed for us: therein he teacheth that both are not so much his as ours: because he took and laid away both, not for his commodity, but to our salvation. And truly it is to be diligently marked, that the chiefe, and in a manner whole pith of the Sacrament standeth in these words. Which is delivered for you, which is shed for you. For otherwise it should not much profit us, that the body and blood of our Lord are now distributed, unless they had bene once given forth for our redemption and salvation. Therefore they are represented under bread and wine, that we should learne that they are not only ours, but also ordained for the nourishment of spirituall life. This is it that we before said, that from the corporall things which are shewed forth in the Sacraments, we are by a certain proportionall relation guided to spirituall things. So when bread is given us for a sign of the bodie of Christ, we ought by and by to conceive this similitude: As bread nourisheth, sustaineth, & maintaineth the life of our body: so the body of Christ is the only meat to quicken and give life to our soule. When we see wine set forth for a sign of his blood: we must call to mind what uses wine bringeth to the body, that we may consider that the same are brought to us spirituallly by the blood of Christ: those uses be to cherish, to refresh to strengthen, to make merry. For if we sufficiently weigh, what the delivering of this holy body what the shedding of this holy blood hath profited us: we shall plainly perceive that these things which are spoken of bread & wine, according to such proportionall relation doe very well accord with them toward us when they are communicated unto us.

4 Therefore the chiefe parts of the Sacrament are not simply and without higher consideration to reach to us the body of Christ: but rather that same promise, whereby he testifieth, that his flesh is verily meat, and his blood is drink, with which we are fed unto eternal life: wherby he affirmeth himselfe to be the bread of life, of which who so eateth he shall live for ever: to seale (I say) and confirme that promise: and for bringing the same to passe, to send us to the crosse of Christ, where that promise hath been truly performed, and in all points fulfilled. For we doe not well and healthfully eat Christ but crucified when we doe with lively feeling conceive the effectualnesse of his death. For whereas he calleth himselfe the bread of life, he did not borrow that name of the Sacrament, as some doe wrongfully expound it: but because he was given us such of the Father, and performed himselfe such, when being made partaker of our human mortality he made us partners of his divine immortalitie: when offering himselfe for sacrifice, hee tooke our accursednesse upon himselfe, that he might fill us with blessing: when with his death hee devoured and swallowed death: when in his resurrection he raised up this our corruptible flesh which he had put on, to glory and incorruption.

5 It remaineth that by applyance all the same may come to us. That is done, both by the Gospell, and more cleerely by the holie Supper, where both he offereth himselfe to us with all his good things, and we receive him by faith. Wherefore the Sacrament maketh not that Christ first beginneth to be the bread of life: but when it bringeth into remembrance that he was made the bread of life: which we continually eat, and when it giveth unto us the taste and favour of that bread, then it maketh us to feele the strength of that bread. For it promiseth us, that whatsoever Christ did or suffered the same was done to give life to us. Then, that this giving of life is everlasting, by which we may without end be nourished, sustained, and preserved in life. For as Christ should not have been to us the bread of life, unless he had bin born and had died for for us, unlesse he had risen again for us: so now he should not be the same unles the effectualnes and fruit of his birth, death and resurrection, were an everlasting and immortal thing: All which Christ hath very well expressed in these words. The bread which I will give, is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. By w<sup>ch</sup> words without doubt he signifieth, that his body should therefore be to us for bread, to the spirituall life of the soule, because it should be given forth to death for our salvation: & that it is delivered to us to eat of it, when by faith he maketh us partakers of it. Once therefore he gave it, that he might be made bread, when he gave forth himselfe to be crucified for the redemption of the world: daily he giveth it, when by the word of the Gospell he offereth it unto us to be received, so far as it was crucified: where he sealeth that deliverance with the holy mystery of the Supper: where he inwardly fulfilleth that w<sup>ch</sup> he outwardly betokeneth. Now herein we must beware of two faults, that neither doing too much in abusing the signs, we seem to pluck them from their mysteries to which they are in a manner knit fast: nor that being immeasurable in advancing the same, we seem in the meane time somewhat to darken the mysteries themselves. That Christ is the bread of life, wherewith the faithful are nourished into eternal salvation, there is no man but he granteth, unles he be altogether without religion. But this point is not likewise agreed upon among all men, what is the manner of partaking of him. For there be that in one word define, that to eat the flesh of Christ and to drinke his blood, is nothing else but to beleeve in Christ himselfe. But I think that Christ meant some certainer and higher thing, in that notable sermon where he commendeth to us the eating of his flesh, namely, that we are quickned by the true partaking of him: w<sup>ch</sup> also he therefore expressed by the words of eating and drinking, lest any man should think, that the life which we receive of him is conceived by bare knowledge only. For as not the sight, but the eating of bread sufficeth the body for nourishment: so it behoveth that the soule be truly and thoroughly made partaker of Christ, that by the power of him it may be quickned into a spirituall life. But in the meane time we confesse that there is no other eating, but of faith: as there can no other be imagined. But this is the difference between my words and theirs, that with them to eat is onely to beleeve: but I say that the flesh of Christ is eaten with beleeving, because by faith he is made ours, and I say that eating is the fruit and effect of faith. Or, if you will have it plainer, w<sup>ch</sup> them eating is faith and I think it rather to follow of faith. In words verily the difference is but small: but in the thing it selfe, not small. For though the Apostle teacheth that Christ dwelleth in our hearts by faith: yet no man will expound this dwelling to be faith: but all men do perceive that there is expressed a singular effect of faith, for that by it the faithfull do obtaine to have Christ dwelling in them. After this manner the Lord meant, in calling himselfe the bread of life, not only to teach that in the faith of his death and resurrection, salvation is reposed for us: but also that by true partaking of himselfe it is brought to passe, that his life passeth into us and becommeth ours: like as bread, when it is taken for food, ministereth liveliness to the body.

Christ truly given and made ours in this sacrament the whole pith wherof in a manner standeth therein, but for us the body and blood of Christ were offered which we receive represented under bread and wine to teach that they are to the soule the same which these visible creatures to the bodie.

6 Neither did Augustine, whom they bring in for their patron in any other meaning write, that we eat by beleeving, than to shew that this eating is of faith, not of the mouth. Which I also deny not: but yet therewithall I adde, that we do by faith embrace Christ, not appearing a far off, but making himselfe one with us that he may be our head, and we his members. Yet doe not I utterly disallow that manner of speaking: but only I deny it to be a full declaration, if they mean to define what it is to eat the flesh of Christ. Otherwise I see that Augustine hath oft used this forme of speech: as when he saith in the third book of Christian doctrine, unlesse ye eat the flesh of the Sonne of man: this is a figure teaching that we must communicate with the passion of the Lord, and must sweetly and profitably lay up in remembrance that for us his flesh was crucified and wounded. Again when he saith that the three thousand men which were converted at Peters sermon, did drinke the blood of Christ by beleeving, which they had shed by cruell dealing. But in many other places he honourably setteth out that benefit of faith, that by it our soules are no lesse refreshed with the communicating of the flesh of Christ, than our bodies are with the bread which they eat. And the same is it which in a certaine place Chrysostome writeth, that Christ doth not onely by faith, but also indeed make us his body. For he meaneth not that we doe from any other where than from faith, obtaine such a benefit: but this onely

he meaneth to exclude that none when he heareth faith to be named, should conceive a naked imagination. As for them that will have the Supper to be onely a marke of outward profession, I doe now passe them over: because I thinke that I have sufficiently confuted their error, when I entreated of Sacraments generally. Onely this thing let the Readers marke, that when the cup is called the covenant in the bloud, there is a promise expressed that may be of force to confirme faith. Whereupon followeth, that unlesse we have respect to God, and embrace that which he offereth, we doe not rightly use the holy Supper.

7 Moreover they also doe not satisfie me, which acknowledging that we have some communion with Christ, when they meane to expresse it, do make us partakers onely of the spirit, without making any mention of flesh and bloud. As though all those things were spoken of nothing, that his flesh is verily meat, that his bloud is verily drinke: that none hath life, but he that eateth that flesh, & drinketh that bloud: and such other sayings that belong to the same end. Wherefore if it be certain that the full communicating of Christ proceedeth beyond their description, as it is too narrowly framed: I will now goe about to knit up in few words, how large it is, and how farre it extendeth it selfe, before that I speake of the contrary fault of excesse. For I shall have a longer disputation with the excessive teachers, which, when according to their owne grossenes they frame a manner of eating & drinking full of absurditie, do also transfigure Christ stripped out of this flesh into a fantasie: if yet a man may with any words comprehend so great a mysterie, which I see that I can not sufficiently comprehend with mind: and therefore I do willingly confesse it, that no man should measure the highnesse thereof by the small proportion of my childhinesse. But rather I exhort the readers, that they doe not restrain the sense of their minds within these two narrow bounds: but endeavour to rise up much higher, than they can by my guiding. For I my selfe, so oft as I speake of this thing when I have travelled to say all, thinke that I have yet said but little in respect of the worthines thereof. And although the mind can doe more in thinking than the tongue in expressing: yet with greatnesse of the thing, the mind also is surmounted and overwhelmed. Finally therefore nothing remaineth, but that I must breake forth into admiration of that mysterie, which neither the mind can suffice to thinke of, nor the tongue to declare. Yet after such a manner as I can, I will set forth the summe of my sentence: which as I nothing doubt to be true, so I trust that it will not be disallowed of godly hearts.

8 First of all, we are taught out of the Scripture, that Christ was from the beginning that life bringing word of the Father, the fountaine and originall of life, from whence all things ever received their having of life. Wherefore Iohn sometime calleth him the word of life, and sometime writeth that life was in him: meaning that he even then flowing into all creatures, powred into them the power of breathing and living. Yet the same Iohn addeth afterward, that the life was then & not till then openly shewed, when the Sonne of God taking upon him our flesh, gave himselfe to be seen with eyes & felt with hands. For though he did before also spread abroad his power into the creatures: yet because man, being by sinne estranged from God, having lost the communion of life, saw on every side death hanging over him: that he might recover hope of immortalitie, it behoved that hee should be received into the communion of that word. For how small a confidence maist thou conceive thereof, if thou heare that the word of God indeed, from which thou art most farre removed, containeth in it selfe the fulnesse of life, but in thy selfe and round about thee nothing offereth it selfe and is present before thine eyes but death? But since that fountain of life began to dwell in our flesh, now it lyeth not a far off hidden from us, but presently delivereth it selfe to be partaken of us. Yea and it maketh the very flesh, wherein it resteth, to be of power to bring life to us, that by partaking thereof we may be fedde to immortalitie. I am (saith he) the bread of life, that am come downe from heaven. And the bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. In which words he teacheth not onely that he is life, in respect that he is the eternall word of God which came downe to us from heaven, but that in comming downe hee powred the same power into the flesh which he did put on, that from thence the communicating of life might flow forth unto us. Hereupon also these things now follow, that his flesh is verily meat, and his bloud is verily drinke, with which sustentances the faithfull are fostered unto eternall life. Herein therefore consisteth singular comfort to the godly, that now they finde, life in their owne flesh. For so they doe not onely with easie passage attaine unto it, but have it of it selfe laid abroad for them and offering it selfe unto them. Ooely let them hold open the bosome of their heart that they may embrace it being present, and they shall obtaine it.

9 But although the flesh of Christ have not so great power of it selfe, that it can give life to us, which both in the owne first estate of it was subject to mortalitie, and now being endued with immortalitie, liveth not by it selfe: yet it is rightfully called life-bringing, which is filled with fulnesse of life to powre it into us. In which meaning I do with Cyril expound that saying of Christ: as the Father hath life in himselfe, so he hath also given to the Sonne to have life in himselfe. For there he properly speaketh of his gifts, not which he from the beginning possessed with the Father, but with which he was garnished in the same flesh in which he appeared. Therefore he sheweth that in his manhood also dwelleth the fulnesse of life, that whosoever partaketh of his flesh and blood, may therewithall also enjoy the partaking of life. Of what sort that is, we may declare by a familiar example. For as out of a fountaine water is sometime drunke, sometime is drawne, sometime by furrowes is conveighed to the watering of grounds, which yet of it selfe doth not overflow into so many uses, but from the very spring it selfe which with everlasting flowing yeeldeth and ministreth unto it from time to time new abundance: so the flesh of Christ is like a rich and unwafted fountaine which powreth into us the life, springing from the Godhead into it selfe. Now who seeth not that the communion of the flesh and blood of Christ is necessarie to all that aspire to heavenly life? Hereunto tendeth that saying of the Apostle, that the Church is the bodie of Christ and the fulfilling of it: and that hee is the head out of which the whole body coupled and knit together by joints maketh increase of the body: that our bodies are the members of Christ. All which things we understand to be impossible to be brought to passe, but that he must wholly cleave to us in spirit and body. But that most neere fellowship whereby wee are coupled with his flesh, he hath yet set out with a more glorious title, when he said that we are members of his bodie, and are of his bones and of his flesh. At the last, to declare it to be a matter greater than all words, he concludeth his saying with an exclamation. This is (saith he) a great secret; Therefore it should be a point of extreme madnesse to acknowledge no communion of the faithfull when the flesh and blood of the Lord, which the Apostle declareth to be so great, that he had rather wonder at it than expresse it.

10 Let the summe be, that our soules are so fed with the flesh and blood of Christ, as bread and wine doe maintaine and sustaine the bodily life. For other wise the proportionall relation of the signe should not agree, unlesse soules did finde their food in Christ. Which cannot be done, unlesse Christ doe truly grow into one with us, and refresh us with the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood. But although it seeme incredible, that in so great distance of places the flesh of Christ reacheth to us that it may be meare to us: let us remember how much the secret power of the Spirit surmounteth above all our senses, and how foolish it is to goe about to measure his unmeasurablenesse by our measure. That therefore which our minde comprehendeth not, let our faith conceive, that the Spirit truly knitte in one those things that are severed in places. Now that same holy communicating of his bodie and blood, whereby Christ powreth his life into us, even as if he had pearced it into our bones and marrowes, he in the Supper also testifieth and sealeth: and that not with setting before us a vaine or void signe. but bringing forth there the effectuall working of his Spirit whereby hee fulfilleth that which he promiseth. And verily he there offereth and delivereth the thing signified to all them that sit at that spirituall banquet: although it be received with fruite of the faithfull onely, which receive so great bountifulnesse with true faith and thankfulness of minde. After which manner the Apostle said, that the bread which wee breake is the communion of the bodie of Christ: and that the cup which we ballow with the word and prayers to that purpose, is the communion of his blood. Neither is there any cause why any man should object, that it is a figurative speech, by which the name of the thing signified is given to the signe. I grant verily that the breaking of the bread

The flesh of Christ being (though not of it selfe) an unwafted fountaine from whence life floweth, he that will live must of necessity be partaker thereof, and have fellowship with it.

The bodie and blood of Christ truly given us, and not bare & naked figures thereof in this Sacrament.

1 Cor. 10. 16.

is a signe, not the thing it selfe. But this being admitted, yet we shall rightly gather of the deliverance of the signe, that the thing it selfe is delivered. For unlesse a man will call God a deceiver, he can never be so bold to say that he setteth before us an empty signe. Therefore if by the breaking of bread the Lord doth truly represent the partaking of his body, it ought to be our of doubt that hee truly performeth and delivereth it. And this rule, is alway to be holden of the Godly, that so oft as they see the signes ordained of the Lord, they certainly thinke and perswade themselves that the truth of the thing signified is there present. For to what purpose should the Lord deliver to thee into thy hand the signe of his body, but to assure thee of the true partaking of it? If it be true, that a visible signe is given us, to seale the gift of an invisible thing: when we receive the signe of the body, let us no lesse certainly beleeve that the body it selfe also is given us.

11 I say therefore (which both hath been alway received in the Church, and all they teach at this day that thinke right) that the holy mystery of the Supper consisteth of two things: that is to say of the bodily signes, which being set before our eyes do represent unto us invisible things: according to the capacity of our weaknes: and of spirituall truth, which is by those signes both figured & delivered. Of what sort that is, when I meane to shew it familiarly, I use to set three things: the signification, the matter which hangeth of the signification, the vertue or effect which followeth of both. The signification consisteth in the promises, which are after a certaine manner wrapped together with the signe. The matter of substance I call Christ with his death and resurrection: By effect I understand the redemption, righteousnes, sanctification & eternall life, & whatsoever other benefites Christ bringeth us. Now although all these things have respect to Faith: yet I leave no place to this cavillation: as though when I say that Christ is received by Faith, I would have him conceived with understanding only and imagination. For the promises offer him, not that we should sticke fast in the sight alone and in bare knowledge: but that we should enjoy the true communicating of him. And truly I see not how any man may have confidence that he hath redemption & righteousnes in the crosse of Christ, & life in his death, but principally standing upon the true communion of Christ himselfe. For those good things should not come to us unlesse Christ first made himselfe ours. I say therefore, that in the mystery of the Supper, by the signes of bread and wine Christ is truly delivered to us, yea and his body and blood, in which he hath fulfilled all obedience for purchasing of righteousnes to us: namely that first wee should grow together into one body with him: and then being made partakers of his substance, we may also feele his power in the communicating of all his good things.

12 Now I come downe to the excessive mixtures, which superstition hath brought in. For herein Satan hath played with marvellous subtiltie, that withdrawing the minds of men from heaven, he might fill them with perverse error, as though Christ were fastned to the element of bread. And first we must not dreame such a presence of Christ in the Sacrament, as the craftsmen of the Court of Rome have faigned: as though the body of Christ were made present with presence of place, to be handled with hands, to be broosed with teeth, and swallowed with mouth. For this forme of reantation Pope Nicholas eridited to Berengarius, to be a witnesse of his repentance: namely with words so far monstrous, that the Author of the Glosse cryeth out that there is danger, if the readers doe not wisely take heed to themselves, lest they sucke out of them an heresie worse than was that of Berengarius. In the second distinction, in the Chapter beginning thus, Ego Berengarius. But Peter Lombarde, although he travell much in excusing the absurditie, yet more inclineth to the contrary sentence. For as we nothing doubt that it hath limits according to the perpetuall nature of the body of men, and is holden in heaven, into which it was once received, untill he returne to judgement: so to draw it backe under these corruptible elements or to imagine it present every where, we account it to be utterly unlawful. Neither verily is it so needfull to this that we may enjoy the partaking of it: for as much as the Lord giveth us this benefite by his Spirit that wee bee made one with him in body, spirit, and soule. The bond therefore of this conjoyning is the spirit of Christ, by the knitting wher of we be coupled together, and as it were a certaine conduit, by which whatsoever Christ himselfe both is and hath, is conveyed to us. For if we behold the sunne shining forth with his beames upon the earth after a certain manner to cast forth his substance unto it to engender, nourish, and quicken the fruits thereof: why should the extending of beames of the spirit of Christ be inferior to conveigh the communion of his flesh and blood into us? Wherefore the Scripture, when it speaketh of our partaking with Christ, referreth the whole force thereof to the spirit. Yet instead of many one place shall be sufficient. For Paul in the eighth chapter to the Romans, saith that Christ dwelleth in us none otherwise than by his spirit: whereby yet he taketh not away that communion of his flesh and blood of which wee now speake, but teacheth that the Spirit alone worketh that we possess whole Christ and have him dwelling in us.

13 The Schoolmen thought more shame fastly which were with holden with horror of so barbarous ungodlinesse. Yet they also themselves doe nothing but mocke with subtiller deceits. They grant that Christ is not contained there by way of circumscription, not after a bodily manner: but afterward they invent a way, which neither themselves doe understand, nor they can declare to other: yet it is such as falleth to this point that Christ must be sought in the forme of bread as they call it. For what is it? When they say that the substance of bread is turned into Christ, doe they not fasten him to the whitenesse which they there leave? But (say they) he is so contained in the Sacrament, that he abideth in heaven: and wee determine no other presence but of habitude. But whatsoever words they bring in, to cloake it with a deceitfull colour, this is the end of all that that is by consecration made Christ, which before was bread: that from thenceforth Christ lyeth hid under that colour of bread. Which also they are not ashamed in plaine words to expresse. For these be the words of Lambard: that the body of Christ, which in it selfe is visible, when the consecration is ended, lyeth hidden and is covered under the forme of bread. So the forme of that bread is nothing else but a visor, that taketh away the sight of the flesh from the eyes. Neither need we in any conjectures to finde what snares they minded to lay with these words: sith the thing it selfe plainly speaketh it. For it is to be seene with how great superstition in certaiue ages past, not only the common sort of men, but also the very chiefe of them have bene holden, and at this day be holden in Popish Churches. For having little care of true faith (by which alone we both come into the fellowship of Christ, and doe cleave together with him) so that they have a carnall presence of him, which they have framed beside the word, they thinke that they have him present enough. Therefore in a summe, we see that this hath bene gotten by this witty subtilty that bread was taken of God.

14 From hence proceeded that same fained transubstantiation, for which at this day they fight more earnestly than for all the other articles of their faith. For the first builders of that locall presence could not unwind themselves from this doubt, how the body of Christ should bee mingled with the substance of bread, but that by and by many absurdities did thrust themselves in place. Therefore they were driven of necessitie to flee to this invention, that there is made a turning of bread into the body: not that the body is properly made of the bread, but because Christ that he might hide himselfe under the forme, bringeth the substance to nothing. But it is marvelous, that they fell to so great ignorance; yea senselesse dulnesse, that not onely that Scripture but also the consent of the old Church fighting against it, they brought abroad that monster. I grant indeed that some of the old writers sometime used the name of turning: not for that they would destroy the substance in the outward signes, but that they might teach that the bread dedicate to the mystery differeth far from common bread and is now other. But each where they all plainly declare, that the holy Supper consisteth of two parts, an earthly part, and a heavenly: and the earthly part they doe without controversie expound to bee bread and wine. Truly whatsoever they bable, it is plaine that in confirming of this doctrine they want the defence of antiquitie, which they oftentimes presume to set against the evident word of God. For it is not so long agoe since it was invented; it was verily unknowne not onely to those better ages, in which the purer doctrine of religion yet flourished, but also even when that same purenesse was much defiled. There is none of the old writers that doth not in expresse words confesse that the holy signes in the Supper are bread and wine. Although, as wee have said, they sometime set it out with divers titles, to advance the dignitie of the Mysterie. For whereas they say that in the consecration

cracion is made of a secret turning, that now it is another thing than bread and wine : I have even now gives warning that they doe not thereby meane that the things themselves, are brought to nought, but that they are now to bee otherwise esteemed than common meats, which are appointed onely to feed the belly : for as much as in them is delivered to us the spirituall meat and drinke of the Soule. This we also denie not. If (say these men) there be a turning, it must needs be that there is of one thing made another thing. If they meane that there is some thing made which before was not, I agree with them. If they will draw it to that their owne imagination, let them answer me what change they thinke to be made in baptisme. For herein the Fathers also doe determine a marvellous turning, when they say that of a corruptible element is made a spirituall washing of the soule, yet none of them denyeth that water remaineth. But (say they) there is no such thing in baptisme, as is that in the Supper. This is my body. As though the question were of those words, which have a meaning plaine enough : and not rather of that word of turning, which ought to signifie no more in the Supper than in baptisme. Therefore farewell they with these snares of syllables, whereby they doe nothing else but bewray their owne hungrienesse. For otherwise the signification would not agree together unlesse the truth which is there figured, had a lively image in outward signe. Christs will was by the outward signe to testifie that his flesh is meat. If hee did set before us only an empty imaginative forme of bread not true bread, where were the correlation or similitude which should lead us from the visible thing to the invisible? For, that all things may agree together, the signification shall extend no further, but that we be fed with the forme of the flesh of Christ. As, if in baptisme the forme of water should deceive our eyes, it should not be to us a certaine pledge of our washing: yea by that deceitfull shew there should be given us an occasion of wavering. Therefore the nature of the Sacrament is overthrowne, unlesse in the manner of signifying the earthly signe answer to the heavenly thing. And therefore wee loose the truth of this mysterie, unlesse true bread represent to us the true body of Christ. I repeat it againe : Sith the Supper is nothing else, than a visible testifying of that promise which is in the sixth Chapter of John, namely that Christ is the bread of life, which came downe from heaven : there must be visible bread used for a meane whereby that same spirituall bread may be figured : unlesse wee will that wee loose all the fruit which in this behalfe God tenderly granteth to sustaine our weaknesse. Now by what reason should Paul gather, that all wee are one body and one bread, which doe together partake of one bread, if there remained onely an imaginative forme and not rather a naturall truth of bread?

15 But they could never have beene so sowlly beguiled with the deceits of Satan, but because they were already bewitched with this errour, that the body of Christ inclosed under bread was by the bodily mouth sent downe into the belly. The cause of so brutish imagination was, that consecration signified as much among them as a magicall enchantment. But this principle was drawne to them, that bread is a Sacrament to none but to men, to whom the word is directed : like as the water of baptisme is not changed in it selfe, but so soone as the promise is adjoynd, it beginneith to be that to us which it before was not. This shall better appeare by example of a like Sacrament. The water springing out of the rocke in the desert was to the fathers a token and signe of the same thing, which the wine doth figure to us in the Supper. For Paul teacheth that they drunke the same spirituall drinke. But it was a common watering for the beasts and cattell of the people. Whereupon it is easily gathered, that in earthly elements, when they are applied to a spirituall use, there is made no other turning but in respect of men, inasmuch as they are to them seales of the promises. Moreover sith Gods purpose is (as I often repeat) as it were by handsome chariots to lift us up to himselfe, they doe by their waywardnesse wickedly disappoint the same, which doe indeed call us to Christ, but lurking invisibly under bread. For it is not possible that the mind of men, uncombring it selfe from the immeasurableness of places, should attaine to Christ even above the heavens. That which nature denied them, they attempted to amend with a more hurtfull remedie : that abiding in earth, wee should neede no heavenly neereneſſe of Chriſt. Loe, this is the neceſſitie, that compelled them to tranſfigure the body of Chriſt. In Bernards time, although a harder manner of ſpeaking was growne in uſe, yet tranſubſtantiation was not then knowne. And in all ages before that, this ſimilitude did flie about in everie mans mouth, that there is with bread and wine a ſpiritual thing joyned in this myſtery. Of the words they answer as they thinke, wittily : but bringing in nothing fit for this preſent cauſe. The rodde of Mofes (ſay they) being turned into a ſerpent, although it did get the name of a ſerpent, yet keepeth ſtill the old name, and is called a rodde. So in their opinion it is as probable, that although the bread paſſe into a new ſubſtance, it may bee abulively and yet not unaply called that which it appeareth to the eyes. But what likelihood or neereneſſe find they betweene a cleere miracle, and their ſaid illuſion; of which no eye in earth is witneſſe? The magicians had a trickd with deceit, ſo that the Egyptians were perſwaded, that they excelled in divine power to charge creatures above the order of nature. Mofes came forth, and driving away all their deceits, ſhewed that the invincible power of God was on his ſide, becauſe his owne rod conſumed all the reſt. But for as much as that was a turning diſcernable with eyes, therefore as wee have ſaid, it pertaineth nothing to this preſent cauſe: and a little time after, the rodde viſibly returned into his owne forme. Beſide that it is not knowne, whether that ſudden turning was of ſubſtance or no. Alſo the illuſion of the rodde of the magicians is to be conſidered, which the Prophet therefore would not call ſerpents, leſt he ſhould ſeeme to ſignifie a turning where none was: becauſe thoſe deceivers had done nothing but caſt a miſt before the eyes of the beholders. What likeneſſe herewith have theſe formes of ſpeech. The bread which we breake, So of as yee ſhall eat this bread. They communicated in breaking of bread, and ſuch other? It is certaine that their eyes were only deceived with the enchantment of the magicians. As concerning Mofes, the matter is more doubtfull, by whose hand it was no more hard for God to make of a rod a ſerpent, and againe of a ſerpent to make a rod, than to clothe Angels with fleſhly bodies, and by and by after to uncloth them. If the nature of this myſtery were the ſame or like, there were ſome colour for their ſolution. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that it is not truly nor ſtrictly promiſed us that in the Supper the fleſh of Chriſt is truly to us for meat, unleſſe the true ſubſtance of the outward ſigne agree with it. And (as one error groweth of another) the place of Jeremias ſo too liſhly wreſted to prove tranſubſtantiation, that it irketh me to rehearſe it. The Prophet complaineth that wood is put in his bread: meane ſay that by the envidy of his enemies, his bread was infeſted with bitterneſſe. As David with a like figure bewaileth that his meat was corrupted with gill, and his drinke with vinegar. Theſe men will have it that the body of Chriſt was by way of allegorie ſiſtred to the croſſe. But ſome of the old Fathers thought ſo. As though wee ought not rather to pardon their ignorance, and to bury their ſhame, than to adde ſhameleſſeſſe to compell them yet ſtill to fight like enemies with the naturall meaning of the Prophet.

16 Other, which ſee that the proportionall relation of the ſigne and the thing ſignified, cannot bee overthrowne, but that the truth of the myſtery muſt fall, doe confeſſe that the bread of the Supper is verily a ſubſtance of an earthly and corruptible element, and ſuffereth no change in it ſelfe, but hath under it ſelfe the body of Chriſt incloſed. If they did ſo declare their meaning, that when the bread is delivered in the myſtery, there is adjoynded the delivering of the body, becauſe the truth is unfeverable from the ſigne: I would not much ſtrive with them. But becauſe they placing the body in the bread, doe ſaine to it a being every where contrary to the nature thereof, and in adding under the bread, they will have it lye there hidden: it is neceſſary a little while to draw ſuch ſubtilties out of their dennes. For my mind is not as of ſet purpoſe to goe through with all this point: but only that I may lay the foundations of the diſputation which ſhall by and by follow in place fit for it. They will therefore have the body of Chriſt to be inviſible and immeaſurable, that it may be hid under the bread: becauſe they thinke they doe not otherwiſe communicate with him than if hee be ſtied into the bread: but they comprehend not the manner of deſcending, whereby hee litch teth us upward to himselfe. They lay up in it all the colours that they can : but when they have said all, it sufficiently appeareth, that they stay upon the locall presence of Christ. Whence cometh that ? even because they can abide to conceive no other partaking of the flesh and blood, but which consisteth either of joyning and touching of place, or of some grosse enclosing.

17 And, that they may obstinately defend the error once rashly conceived, some of them sticke not to say, that the flesh of Christ had never any other measurings, but so farre and wide as heaven and earth is broad. Whereas hee was borne a child out of the wombe, whereas he grew, whereas hee was spread abroad on the crosse, whereas hee was inclosed in the sepulchre, the same was done by a certaine dispensation, that he might be borne and die, and performe the other duties of man. Whereas after his resurrection hee was seene in his wonted forme of body, whereas he was taken up to heaven, whereas last of all also after his ascension hee was seene of Stephen and Paul : it was done by the same dispensation, that it might appeare to the sight of men that hee was made a king in heaven. What is this else, but to raise up Marcion out of hell. For no man can doubt that the body of Christ was a fantasie or a phantasticall thing, if hee was of such state. Some slip away somewhat more subtilly, with saying that this body which is given in the Sacrament is glorious and immortall : and that therefore it is no absurditie, if it be contained in many places, if in no place, if with no forme, under the Sacrament. But I aske what manner of body Christ gave to the disciples, the day before that hee suffered ? doe not the words sound that hee gave the same mortall body, which was within a litle after to be delivered ? Hee had already before (say they) shewed his glory to be seene to three of the disciples. That is true indeed, but his will was by that brightnesse to give them a taste of immortality for an hower. In the meane time they shall not there find a double body, but that one body which Christ did beare, garnished with new glory. But when hee distributed his body at his first Supper, the time was now at hand, when hee being stricken of God, and humbled should lye without glorie as a leprous man : so farre is it off that hee then would shew forth the glory of his resurrection. And how great a window is here opened to Marcion, if the body of Christ was seene in one place mortall and base, and in another place was holden immortall and glorious ? Howbeit if their opinion take place, the same hapneth daily : because they are compelled to confesse that the body of Christ being visible in it selfe, lyeth hid invisibly under the signe of bread. And yet they that vomit out such monstruities are so not ashamed of their own shame, that they doe unprovoked, haionously raile at us, because we doe not subscribe to them.

18 Now if they list to fasten the body and blood of the Lord to bread and wine : the one shall of necessity be plucked in sunder from the other. For as the bread is delivered severally from the cup, so the body united to the bread must needs be divided from the blood inclosed in the cup. For when they affirme that the body is in the bread and the blood in the cup : and the bread and wine are by spaces of place distant the one from the other : they can by no shift escape, but that the body must be severed from the blood. But whereas they are wont to alleadge, that by accompanying (as they saine) in the body is the blood, and likewise in the blood is the body, that verily is too trifling : for as much as the signes in which they are enclosed, are so severed. But if we be lifted up with our eyes and minds to heaven, that we seeke Christ there in the glory of his kingdome : as the signes doe allure us to him whole, so under the signe of bread, wee shall be fed with his body, under the signe of wine wee shall severally drinke his blood, that at length wee may enjoy him whole. For although he hath taken away his flesh from us, and in his body is ascended up into heaven, yet hee sitteth at the right hand of the Father, that is to say he reigneth in the power, and majesty, and glory of the Father. This kingdome is neither bounded with any spaces of place, nor compassed about with any measurings, but that Christ may shew forth his might wheresoever it pleaseth him both in heaven and in earth : but that he may shew himselfe present with power and strength : but that he may alway be at hand with them that be his, breathing his life into them, may live in them, strengthen them, quicken them, preserve them safe even as if he were present in body : finally, but that he may feed them with his own body the communion whereof hee doth by the power of his spirit powre into them. After this manner the body and blood of Christ is delivered to us in the Sacrament.

19 But we must appoint such a presence of Christ in the Supper, as may neither fasten him to the element of bread, nor shut him up in the bread, nor by any meanes compass him in, (for it is plaine that all these things abate his heavenly glory) finally such as may neither take from him his owne measure, nor diversly draw him in many places at once, nor faine to him such an unmeasurable greatnes as is spread abroad throughout heaven and earth, for these things are plainly against the truth of the nature of manhood. Let us (I say) never suffer these two exceptions to be taken away from us. The one, that nothing be abated from the glory of Christ, which is done, when hee is brought under the corruptible elements of this world, or is bound to any earthly creatures. The other, that nothing be by faining, applyed to his body, that agreeth not with the nature of man: which is done, when it is either said to be infinite, or is set in many places at once. But these absurdities being taken away, I willingly receive whatsoever may avails to expresse the true and substantiall communicating of the body and blood of the Lord, which communicating is delivered to the faithfull under the holy signes of the Supper: and so that they may be thought not to receive it by imagination only or understanding of mind, but to enjoy it indeed to the foode of eternall life. Why this sentence is so hatefull to the world, and all defence taken away from it by the unjust judgements of many, there is no cause at all, but for that the divell hath with horrible bewitching madded their minds. Truly that which we teach, doth in all points very well agree with the Scriptures: it containeth neither any absurdity, nor darknesse, nor doubtfulness: it is not against true godlinesse and sound edification: finally, it hath nothing in it, that may offend, saving that in certaine ages past, when that ignorance and barbarousnesse of Sophisters reigned in the Church, so cleere light and open truth hath been unworthily oppressed. Yet because Satan at this day also travaileth by troublesome spirits to spot it with all the slanders and reproches that he can, and bendeth himselfe to no other thing with greater endeavour: it is profitable the more diligently to defend and rescue it.

20 Now before that we goe any further, we must entreat of the selfe institution of Christ: specially because this is the most glorious objection that our adversaries have, that we depart from the words of Christ. Therefore, that we may be discharged of the false cause of malice wherewith they burden us, our fittest beginning shall be at the exposition of the words. Three Evangelists and Paul rehearse, that Christ tooke bread: when hee had given thanks he brake it, gave it to his disciples and said, Take, eat, this is my body which is delivered, or broken for you. Of the cup Matthew and Marke say thus: This cup is the blood of the new Testament, which shall be shed for many unto forgiveness of finnes. But Paul and Luke say thus: This cup is the new Testament in my blood. The patrones of transubstantiation will have by the pronounce (this) the forme of bread to be signified, because the consecration is made in the whole content of the sentence, and there is no substance that can be shewed. But if they be holden with religious care of the words, because Christ testified, that that which he reached into the disciples hands, was his body: truly this their devite, that that which was bread is now the body, is most far from the proper meaning of them. That which Christ tooke into his hands and gave the Apostles, hee affirmeth to be his body: but hee tooke bread: who therefore cannot understand that bread is yet shewed? and therefore there is no greater absurditie, than to remove that to the forme, which is spoken of the bread. Other, when they expound this word (is) for (to be transubstantiate,) doe flee to a more enforced and violently wrested glosse. Therefore there is no cause why they should pretend that they be moved with reverence of words. For this was unheard of among all nations and languages, that the word (is) should be taken in this sense, namely for to be turned into another thing. As for them that leave bread in the Supper, and affirme that there is the body of Christ, they much differ among themselves. They which speake more modestly, although they precisely exact the letter. This is my body, yet afterward swarve from their precisenesse, and say that it is as much in effect as that the body of Christ is with bread, in bread, and under bread. Of the matter it selfe which they affirme, wee have already touched somewhat, and wee shall by and by have occasion yet to speake more. Now I dispute only of the words, by which they say they are restrained that they cannot admit bread to be called the body, because it is a signe of the body. But if they thin all figures, why doe they leape away from the plaine shewing of Christ, to their owne manners of speaking farre differing from it? For there is great difference betweene this that bread is the body, and this that the body is with bread. But because they saw it to be impossible, that this simple proposition might stand, that bread is the body: they have attempted to scape away by those formes of speech, as it were by crooked turnings. Some more bold sticke not to affirme that even in proper speaking, bread is the body, and by this meane they truly prove themselves to be littell men. If it be objected, that therefore the bread is Christ, and is God: this verily they will denie, because it is not expressed in the words of Christ. But they shall nothing prevaile by denying it: for as much as all doe agree that whole Christ is offered us in the Supper. But it is an intollerable bluphemy, that it be without figure spoken of a fraile and corruptible element, that it is Christ. Now I aske of them, whether these two propositions be both of one effect, Christ is the Sonne of God, and bread is the body of Christ. If they grant that they are diverse, (which wee will enforce them to grant whether they will or no) then let them answer whence cometh the difference. I thinke they will bring none other but that the bread is after the sacramentall manner called the body. Wherenpon followeth, that Christs words are not subject to the common rule, nor ought to be tried by Grammar. Also I aske of the precise and stiffe requirers of the letter, where Luke and Paul doe call the cup the Testament in the blood, whether they doe not expresse the same thing which they did in the first part, wherethey call bread the body. Truly the same religion was in the one part of the mystery that was in the other: and because shortnesse is darke, longer speech doth better open the meaning. So oft therefore as they shall affirme by one word, that the bread is the body: I will out of moe words bring a more expozition, that it is the Testament in the body. For why? Shall we need to seeke a more faithfull or surer expozitor than Paul and Luke? Neither yet doe I tend hereunto, to diminish any thing of that communicating of the body of Christ which I have confessed: onely my purpose is to confute that foolish waiwardnesse, whereby they doe so hatefully braule about words. I understand, by the authority of Paul and Luke, that the bread is the body of Christ, because it is the covenant in the body. If they fight against this, they have warre not with me, but with the spirit of God. Howsoever they cry out that they be touched with reverence of the words of Christ, whereby they doe not figuratively understand those things that are plainely spoken: yet this is not a pretence rightfull enough, why they should so refuse all the reasons which we object to the contrarie. In the meane time, as I have already given warning, it is convenient to learne, what manner of thing this is. The testament in the body and blood of Christ: because the covenant established with the sacrifice of death, should otherwise not proficue, unlesse there were adjoynd that secret communicating whereby wee growe into one with Christ.

21 It remaineth therefore that for the assinitie which the things signified have with their signes, we confesse that the selfe name of the thing was given to the signe: figuratively indeed, but not without a most fit proportionall agreement. I leave allegories and parables, least any man should quarrell that I seeke starting holes, and wander out of the present purpose. I say that this is a speech by figure of transnominatation, which is commonly used in the Scripture, when myteries are increased of. For neither can you otherwise understand that which is said: that circumcision is a covenant: that the lambe is the passeover: that the Sacrifices of the law are expiations: finally that the rocke, out of which water flowed in the desert, was Christ, unlesse you take it to be spoken by way of transferring of names. Neither are names transferred onely from the higher name, to the lower? but contrariwise the name of the visible signe is also given to the thing signified: as when it is said that God appeared to Moses in the bush: when the Arke of the covenant is called God, and the face of God: and the dove is called the holy Ghost. For though the signe differ in substance from the thing signihied : because this is spirituall and heavenly, and that is corporall and visible : yet because it doth not onely figure the thing which it is holily appointed to represent, as a railed and empty token, but doth also truly deliver it indeed : why may not the name of the thing rightly accord with it ? If signes devised by men, which are rather images of things absent, than marks of things present, which selfe absent things, they doe oftentimes deceitfully shadow, are yet sometime garnished with the titles of the things : then those things that are ordained of God, doe by much greater reason borrow the name of those things, of which they alway both beare a sure and not deceitfull signification, and have the truth adjoynd with them. There is therefore so great likenesse and neerenesse of the one to the other, that it is easie to draw their names to and fro. Therefore let our adversaries cease to heape unfavourie scoffings against us, in calling us Tropists, because wee expound the sacramentall manner of speaking after the common use of the Scripture. For whereas the Sacraments agree together in many things : in this transferring of names, they have all a certaine communitie together. As therefore the Apostle teacheth, that the stone out of which spirituall drinke did spring to the Israelites, was Christ, because it was a visible signe, under which that spirituall drinke was truly indeed (but not discernably to the eye) perceived : so bread is at this day called the bodie of Christ, for as much as it is a signe whereby the Lord offereth to us the true eating of his body. Neither did Augustine otherwise thinke or speake least any man should despise this as a new invention. If (saith he) the sacraments had not a certaine likenesse of those things whereof they are sacraments, they should not be sacraments at all. And of this likenesse oftentimes they take the names of the things themselves. As therefore after a certaine manner the Sacrament of the body of Christ, is the body of Christ : the Sacrament of the blood of Christ, is the blood of Christ : so the Sacrament of faith is faith. There bee in him many like places, which it were superfluous to heape together, such that one sufficeth : saving that the readers must be warned that the holie man teacheth the same thing in the Epistle to Euodius. But it is a trifling shift to say, that where Augustine teacheth, that when transferring is often and commonly used in mysteries, hee maketh no mention of the Supper : because if this shift were received, we might not reason from the generalitie to the specialtie, neither were this a good argument : Every feeling creature hath power of moving, therefore an ox and an horse have power of moving. Howbeit long disputation hereof is in another place ended by the words of the same holie man, where he saith, that Christ ticked not to call it his body, when hee gave the signe of his body. Against Adimantus the Manichean, in the twelfth chapter. And in another place, upon the third Psalme. Marvellous (saith he) is the patience of Christ, that hee received Indu to the banket, wherein hee committed and delivered to his Disciples the figure of his body and blood.

22 But if some precise man, being blind at all the rest, doe stand onely upon this word (this is) as though it severed this mysterie from all other, the solution is easie. They say that the vehemence of the substantive verbe (is) is so great that it admitted no figure. Which if wee grant to them : even in the words of Paul is read the substantive verbe, where hee calleth bread the communicating of the body of Christ. But the communicating is another thing than the body it selfe. Yea commonly where Sacraments are intreated of, wee finde the same word used. As : this shall be to you a covenant with me. This Lambe shall be to you a passover. To rehearse no more : when Paul saith that the rocke was Christ, why doe they take the substantive verbe in that place to bee of lesse vehemence than in the speech of Christ ? Let them also answer, where John saith, the holy Ghost was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified, of what force the substantive verbe is in that place. For if they abide fastened to their rule, the eternal essence of the holy Ghost shall be destroyed, as though it tooke beginning at the Ascension of Christ. Finally let them answer, what meaneth that saying of Paul, that Baptisme is the washing of regeneration and renewing, which it is evident to be unprofitable to many. But nothing is stronger to confute them, than that saying of Paul, that the Church is Christ. For bringing a similitude of the body of man, he addeth, So is Christ : in which place hee understandeth the onely begotten sonne of God, not in himselfe, but in his members. Hereby I thinke I have obtained that to sound witted and uncorrupted men the slanders of our enemies, are lothsome, when they spread abroade, that we withdraw credit from the words of Christ: which we doe no lesse obediently embrace than they, and doe weigh them with more godly reverence. Yea their negligent carelesnesse sheweth that they doe not greatly care what Christ meant, so that it give them a buckler to defend their obstinacie: like as our earnest searching ought to bee a witnessse, how much wee esteeme the authoritie of Christ. They odiously spread abroade, that naturall sense of man withholdeth us from beleeving that which Christ hath uttered with his owne holie mouth: but how maliciously they burden us with this slander, I have a great part already made plaine, and hereafter it shall more cleerely appeare. Therefore, nothing withholdeth us from beleeving Christ when hee speaketh, nor from obeying, so soone as he doth but with hecke will this or that. Onely this is the question, whether it be unlawfull to inquire of the naturall meaning.

23 These good masters, that they may seeme well lettered, doe forbid men to depart be it never so little from the letter. But I on the other side, when the Scripture nameth God a warlike man, because I see that without figurative translation it is too rough a manner of speaking, doe not doubt that it is a comparison taken from men. And truly upon none other pretence in the oldtime the Anthropomorphites troubled the true teaching fathers, but that catching fast hold of these sayings. The eyes of God doe see, It went up to his eares, His hand stretched out. The earth his footstool, they cryed out that God had his body taken from him, which the Scripture assigneth unto him. If this law bee received, outrageous barbarousnesse shall overwhelm the whole light of faith. For what monsters of absurdities may not phranticke men picke out, if it be granted them to alleadge every small title to stablish their opinions? That which they object, that it is not likely, that when Christ prepared for his Apostles a singular comfort in adversities, hee did then speake in a riddle or darkely, maketh of our side. For if it had not come in the minds of the Apostles that bread was figuratively called the body, because it was the signe of the body, they had without doubt been troubled with so monstrous a thing. Almost at the same moment Johr reporteth that they did sticke in perplexitie at every of the least difficulcies. They which strive among themselves, how Christ will goe to the father: and do move question, how he will goe out of the world: they which understand nothing of those things that are spoken concerning the heavenly father, till they see him: how would they have bene so easie to beleeve that which all reason refuseth, that Christ sitteth at the boord in their sight, and is inclosed invisible under bread? Whereas therefore they in eating the bread without doubting, testified their consent, hereby appeareth that they tooke Christs words in the same sense that wee doe, because they remembered that which ought not to seeme strange in mysteries, that the name of the thing signified is transferred to the signe. Therefore it was to the disciples, as it is to us, a certaine and cleere comfort, entangled with no riddle. Neither is there any other cause why some should depart from our exposition, but because the enchantment of the divell hath blinded them, namely that they should faine darknes to themselves, where the exposition of an apt figure offereth it selfe. Moreover if wee precisely stand upon the words, Christ should wrongfully have spoken in one place severally another thing concerning the bread than he speaketh of the cup. He calleth the bread his bodie, he calleth the wine his blood: either it shall bee a confused vaine repetition, or it shall bee such a partition as shall divide the body from the blood. Yea it shall as truly be said of the cup, This is my body, as of the bread it selfe, and it may likewise interchangeably be said, that the bread is the blood, If they answer that we must consider to what end or use the signes were ordained: I grant it indeed: but in the meane time they shall not unwind themselves, but that their error must draw this absurditie with it, that the bread is the blood, and the wine is the body. Now I wot not what this meaneth, when they grant the bread and the body to bee divers things, yet to affirme that the one is spoken of the other properly and without any figure, as, if a man should say that a garment is indeed a thing differing from a man, and yet that it is properly called a man. meane while as though their victorie consisted in obstinacie and railing, they say that Christ is accused of lying, if an exposition be sought of the words. Now it shall be easie for us to shew to the Readers how unjust wrong these catchers of syllables doe to us, when they fill the simple with this opinion, that we withdraw credit from the words of Christ, which wee have proved to be furiously perverted and confounded by them, but to be faithfully and rightly expounded by us.

24 But the slander of this lie cannot be utterly purged, till another crime be wiped away. For they spread abroad, that we be so addicted to naturall reason, that wee give no more to the power of God, than the order of nature suffereth and common sense teacheth. From so malicious slanders I appeale to the very doctrine itselfe which I have declared: which doth clearly enough shew, that I doe not measure this mystery by the proportion of mans reason, nor doe make it subject to the lawes of nature. I beseech you, have we learned out of naturall Phylosophie, that Christ doth so from heaven feede our Soules and bodies with his flesh, as our bodies are nourished with bread and wine? Whence commeth this power to flesh, that it may give life? All men will say that it is not done naturally. It will no more please mans reason, that the flesh of Christ reacheth to us, that it may be food unto us. Finally whosoever hath tasted of our doctrine, shall be ravished into admiration of the secret power of God. But these good men that be so zealous of it, forge to themselves a miracle, which being taken away, God himselfe vanisheth with his power. I desire to have the Readers once againe warned, that they diligently weigh what our doctrine bringeth, whether it hang upon common sense, or with the wings of Faith, surmounting the world, climbeth up beyond it into the heavens. We say that Christ as well with the outward signe as with his spirit, descendeth to us, that hee may truly quicken our soules with the substance of his flesh and of his blood. In these few words he that perceiveth not to bee contained many miracles, is more than senselesse: forasmuch as there is nothing more beside nature, than that Soules should borrow spirituall and heavenly life, of the flesh which tooke her beginning of the earth, and which was subject to death. Nothing is more incredible, than that things distant and a sunder by the whole space of heaven and earth, should in so great distance of places not onely be conjoynded, but also united, that Soules may receive food of the flesh of Christ. Therefore let wayward men cease to procure hatred to us, by a filthy slander, as though wee did enviouly restraîne any thing of the immeasurable power of God. For they doe either too foolishly erre, or too maliciously lye. For it is not here in question what God could, but what he would. We affirme that to be done which pleased him. But it pleased him, that Christ should be made like to his brethren in all things, except sinne. What manner of thing is our flesh? Is it not such as consisteth of the certaine measure of it, as is contained in place, as is touched, as is seene? And why (say they) may not God make, that one selfe same flesh may occupie many and divers places, may bee contained in one place, may bee without measure and forme? Thou mad man, why requirest thou of the power of God to make flesh at one selfe time to bee and not to be flesh? Like as if thou shouldest instantly require him to make at one selfe time the light to be both light and darknesse. But he willeth light to be light, darknesse to bee darknesse, flesh to be flesh. He shall indeed when it pleaseth him, turne darknesse into light, and light into darknesse, but when thou requirest that light and darknesse may not differ, what dost thou else but pervert the order of the wisdom of God? Therefore flesh must bee flesh: and Spirit Spirit, every thing in such law and condition as God hath created it. But such is the condition of flesh, that it must be in one yea and that a certaine place, and consist of her measure and of her forme. With this condition Christ tooke flesh upon him, to which (as Augustine witnesseth) hee hath given indeed incorruption and glory, but he hath not taken from it nature and truth.

25 They answer, that they have the word, wherby the will of God is made plaine: namely if it be granted them to banish out of the Church the gift of exposition, which may bring light to the word, I grant that they have the word: but such as in old time the Anthropomorphites had, when they made God having a body: such as Marcion and the Manichees had, when they fained the body of Christ to be either heavenly heavenly or phantasticall. For they alleadged for testimonies. The first Adam was of the earth earthly, the second Adam is of heaven, heavenly: Again, Christ abased himselfe, taking upon him the forme of a servant, and was found in likeness as a man. But the grosse eaters thinke that there is no power of God, unless: with the monster forged in their braines, the whole order of nature be overthrowne: which is rather to limit God, when we covet with our fained inventions to prove what hee can doe: For out of what word have they taken that the body of Christ is visible in heaven, but lurketh invisible in earth under innumerable little peeces of bread? They will say that necessity requireth this that the body of Christ should bee given in the Supper. Verily because it pleased them to gather a fleshly eating out of the words of Christ: they being carried away by their owne forejudgement, were driven of necessity to coine this subtilty, which the whole Scripture cryeth out against. But that any thing is by us diminished of the power of God, is so false that by our doctrine the praise of it is very honorably set out. But forasmuch as they alway accuse us, that wee defraud God of his honor, when wee refuse that which according to common sense is hard to be beleaved, although it have beene promised by the mouth of Christ: I make againe the same answer that I made even now, that in the mysteries of Faith we do not aske counsell of common sense, but with quiet willingness to learne, and with the spirit of meeknesse, which James commendeth, we receive the doctrine come from heaven. But in that when they perniciously erre, I denie not that we follow a profitable moderation. They hearing the words of Christ, This is my bodie, imagine a miracle most far from his minde. But when out of this fained invention arise fowle absurdities, because they have already with headlong hast put snares upon themselves, they plunge themselves into the bottomelesse depth of the almightinesse of God, that by this meane they may quench the light of truth. Hereupon commeth that proud precisenesse: We will not know how Christ lyeth hid under the bread; holding our selves contented with this saying of his, This is my bodie. But we, as we doe in the whole Scripture, doe with no lesse obedience than care, studie to obtaine a sound understanding of this place: neither doe we with preposterous heate rashly and without choice catch hold of that which first thrusteth it selfe into our mindes: but using diligent musing upon it, we embrace the meaning which the spirit of God ministreth: and standing thereupon wee doe from aloft despise whatsoever earthly wisdom is set against it. Yea we hold our mindes captive that they may not be bold so much as with one little word to carpe against it: and doe humble them, that they may not dare to rise up against it. Hereupon sprung up the exposition of the words of Christ, which to be by the continuall usage of the Scripture common to all Sacraments, all they that have beene thought but meanely exercised therein, doe know. Neither doe we, after the example of the holy Virgin, thinke it lawfull for us, in a hard matter to enquire how it may be done.

They that make Christ to lurke invisible under bread, are neither therein to be led by the words

26 But because nothing shall more availe to confirme the Faith of the Godly, than when they have learned that the doctrine which wee have taught is taken out of the word of God, and standeth upon the authoritie thereof: I will make this also evident with as great briefenesse as I can. The bodie of Christ; since the time that it rose againe, not Aristotle but the holy Ghost teacheth to bee limited, and that it is comprehended in heaven untill the last day. Neither am I ignorant that they boldly mocke out those places that are alleadged for this purpose. So oft as Christ saith that hee will depart, leaving the world, they answer that that departing is nothing else but a changing of mortall estate. But after this manner, Christ should not see the Holy Ghost in this place to supply (as they call it) the want of his absence: forasmuch as hee doth not succede into this place, nor Christ himselfe doth descend againe out of the heavenly glorie to take upon him the state of mortall life. Truly the coming of the holy Ghost, and the ascending of Christ are things set as contrarie: therefore, it cannot be that Christ should according to the flesh dwell with us after the same manner that hee sendeth his Spirit. Moreover hee in plaine words expresth, that he will not be alway with his Disciples in the world. This saying also they thinke that they doe gaily wipe away, as though Christ said that hee will not alway bee poore and miserable or subject to the necessities of this fraile life. the place cryeth plainly to the contrarie, because there is not entreated of povertie and neede, or of the miserable estate of earthly life, but of worship and honour. The anointing pleased not the Disciples, because they thought it to be a superfluous and unprofitable cost, and neere unto riotous excesse; therefore they had rather that the price thereof which they thought to be ill wasted, had been bestowed upon the poore. Christ answered that hee shall not alwaie bee present that he may bee worshipped with such honour. And none otherwise did Augustine expound it, whose words bee these which are nothing doubtfull. When Christ said, Yee shall not alway have mee, hee spake of the presence of his bodie. For according to his majestie, according to his providence, according to his unspeakable and invisible grace, this was fulfilled which he said, behold, I am with you even to the ending of the world. But according to the flesh which the Word tooke unto him, according to this that hee was borne of the Virgin, according to this that hee was taken of the Jewes, that hee was fastned to the tree, that he was taken downe from the Crosse, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, that he was laid in the grave, that hee was manifestly shewed in the resurrection, this was fulfilled, Yee shall not alway have mee with you. Why so? Because hee was conversant according to the presence of his bodie forty dayes with his disciples, and while they accompanied him in seeing, not in following, he ascended. Hee is not here: for hee sitteth there at the right hand of the Father. And yet hee is here: because hee is not gone away in presence of Majestie. Otherwise according to the presence of Majestie wee have Christ alway: and according to the presence of the flesh it is rightly said, But me ye shall not alway have. For according to the presence of the flesh, the Church had him a few dayes: now shee holdeth him by Faith, but seeth him not with eyes. Where (that I may note this also briefly) hee maketh them present to us three wayes, by majestie, providence, and unspeakable grace, under which I comprehend this marvellous communion of his body and blood: if so that wee understand it to be done by the power of the holy Ghost, nor by that feigned enclosing of his bodie under the element. For our Lord hath testified, that hee hath flesh and bones which may be felt and seene. And to goe away and Ascend doe not signifie to make a shew of one ascending and going away, but to doe indeed that which the words sound. Shall we then (will some man say) assigne to Christ some certaine coait of heaven? But I answer with Augustine that this is a most curious and superfluous question, if so that yet we beleave that he is in heaven.

27 But what doth the name of ascending so oft repeated? doth it not signifie a removing from one place to another? They denie it: because after their opinion, by height is onely signified Majestie of Empire. But what meaneth the very manner of ascending? was he not in sight of his Disciples looking on, lifted up on high? Doe not the Evangelists plainly declare that he was taken up into the heavens? These witty Sophisters doe answer that with a cloud set betweene him and them hee was conveyed out of their sight, that the faithfull might learne that from thence forth he should not be visibly in the world. As though, to make credit of his invisible presence, he ought not rather to vanish away in a moment, or as though the cloud ought not rather to compasse him before that he stirred his foote. But when he is carried upon high into the aire, and with a cloud cast underneath him, reacheth that hee is no more to be sought in the earth: we safely gather, that now he hath his dwelling place in the heavens: as Paul also affirmeth, and from thence he biddeth us to looke for him. After this manner the Angels warned the Disciples, that they in vaine gazed up into heaven: because Jesus which is taken up into heaven, shall so come as they have seene him goe up. Heere also the adversaries of sound doctrine start away with a pleasant shift as they thinke, saying that hee shall then come visible, which never went out of the earth but that hee abideth invisible with them that bee his. As though the Angels did there signifie a double presence, and doe not simply make the Disciples witnesses of his going up seeing it with their eyes, that no doubting might remaine: even as if they had said: hee in your sight beholding it, being taken up into heaven, hath claimed to himselfe the heavenly Empire: it remaineth that yee patiently abide in expectation, till he come againe the Judge of the world: because he is now entered into heaven, heaven, nor that he may alone possess it, but that he may gather together with him you and all the godly.

28 But forasmuch as the defenders of this bastard doctrine are not ashamed to garnish it with the consenting voices of the old writers, and specially Augustine: I will in few words declare how perversly they goe about it. For whereas their testimonies have beene gathered together of learned and godly men, I will not doe a thing already done: let him that will, seeke them out of their works. I will not heape together, neither out of Augustine himselfe, all that might make to the purpose: but will bee content to shew by a few that hee is without controversie whole on our side. As for this that our adversaries, to writh him from us, doe alleadge that it is commonly read in his bookes, that the flesh and blood of Christ is distributed in the Supper, namely the sacrifice once offered in the crosse: it is but trifling: sith he also calleth it either thanksgiving, or the Sacrament of the body. But in what sense hee useth the words of flesh and blood, we need not to seeke with long compassing about: for asmuch as he declareth himselfe, saying that Sacraments take their names of the likenesse of the things which they signifie: and that therefore after a certaine manner the Sacrament of the bodie is the bodie. Wherewith accordeth another place which is well enough knowne, The Lord sticke not to say, This is my bodie, when he gave the signe of it. Againe they object, that Augustine writeth expressly, that the body of Christ falleth to the ground, and entrench into the mouth: even in the same sense, that he affirmeth it to be consumed, because he joyneth them both together. Neither doth that make to the contrarie, which he saith, that when the mysterie is ended, the bread is consumed: because he had a litle before said: sith these things are knowne to men, forasmuch as they are done by men, they may have honour as things: but as marvellous things, they may not. And to no other end tendeth that which our adversaries doe too unadvisedly draw, to themselves: that Christ did (after a certaine manner) beare himselfe in his owne hands, when he reacheth the mysticall bread to the Disciples. For by entrelacing this adverb of likenesse (after a certaine manner) he sufficiently declareth, that he was not truly or really inclosed under the bread. And no marvell: sith in another place hee plainly affirmeth that bodies, if spaces of places bee taken from them, shall bee no where: and because they shall bee no where, they shall not bee at all. It is an hungry cavillation, to say that in that place is not entreated of the Supper, in which God uttereth speciall power: because the question was moved concerning the flesh of Christ, and the holy man of set purpose answering, saith: Christ gave immortality to his flesh, but tooke not nature from it. After this forme it is not to be thought that he is each where spread abroad: for wee must beware that wee doe not so affirme the Godhead of the man, that we take away the truth of the bodie. And it followeth nor, that that which is in God must bee each where as GOD is. There is a reason by and by added: for one person is God and man, and both are one Christ: each where, by this that hee is God: in heaven, by this that hee is man. What a negligence had it beene, not to except the mytery of the Supper, being a thing so earnest and waighty, if there had beene in it any thing against the doctrine which hee entreated of. And yet if a man doe heedfully reade that which followeth within a litle after, he shall find that under that generall doctrine, the Supper is also comprehended, that Christ the onely begotten Sonne of God and the same the Sonne of man is each where whole present as God: that he is in the Temple of God (that is in the Church) God as it were theredwelling, and in some certaine place of heaven by reason of the measure of his true bodie. Wee see how, to the uniting of Christ with the Church, he doth not draw his bodie out of Heaven: which surely he would have done, if the body of Christ were not truly meat to us unlesse it were enclosed under bread. In another place defining how the faithfull doe now possess Christ. Thou hast him (saith hee) by the signe of the Crosse, by the Sacrament of Baptisme by the meate and drinke of the Altar. How rightly hee reckoneth a superstitious usage among the signes of the presence of Christ, I doe not now dispute: but hee that compareth the presence of the flesh to the signe of the Crosse, sufficiently sheweth that he saith not a two bodied Christ, that the same hee, may lurke hidden under the bread, which sitteth visible in heaven. If this need plainer declaration, it is by and by after added in the same place, that according to the presence of majesty, we always have Christ: that according to the presence of the flesh, it is rightly said, Mee yee shall not alway have. They answer, that this is also added, that according to an unspeakable and invisible grace, it is fulfilled which is said of him, I am with you, even unto the ending of the world. But that is nothing for their advantage: because this is at length restrained to his majesty, which is ever in comparison set against the body, and his flesh by expresse name is made different from his grace and power. As in another place the same comparison of contraries is read in him, that Christ by bodily presence left the Disciples, that by spirituall presence he may be still with them: where it is plaine that the substance of the flesh is distinguished from the power of the spirit, which conjoyneth us with Christ, though we be otherwise farre severed by distance of places. The same manner of speaking he oftentimes useth, as when he saith: He is to come againe to the quick and the dead with bodily presence, according to the rule of Faith and sound doctrine. For with spirituall presence he was also to come to them and to abide with the whole Church in the world untill the ending of the world. Therefore this speech is directed to the beleivers whom he had already begun to save with bodily presence, and whom he was to leave with bodily absence: that he might with his Father save them with spirituall presence. To take bodily for visible is but trifling: sith he setteth also the body in comparison against the divine power: and adding (to save with the Father) he clearly expresth that he doth powre abroad his grace from heaven to us by his Spirit.

The body of Christ by glory not made invisible, which saunt concerning Christ hath no manner of ground in Scripture.

Act. 3. 21.

29 And sith they put so much confidence in this lurking hole of invisible presence, goe too let us see how well they hide themselves in it. First they shall not bring foorth one syllable out of the Scriptures, whereby they may prove that Christ is invisible: but that they take that for confessed which no man that hath his sound wit will grant them, that the body of Christ cannot otherwise be given in the Supper but being covered with the visour of bread. And this is the very point about which they strive with us, so farre is it off from having the place of a principle. And when they so babble, they are compelled to make a double body of Christ: because after their opinion it is in it selfe visible in heaven, but invisible in the Supper after a speciall manner of dispensation. But how trimly this agreeth, it is easie to judge both by other places of Scripture, and by the witness of Peter. Peter saith that Christ must be holden or contained in heaven, till he come againe. These men teach that hee is every where, but without forme. They take exception and say that it is unjust dealing, to make the nature of a glorified body subject to the lawes of common nature. But this answer draweth with it that doing error of Servetus, (which is worthily to be abhorred of all the godly) that the body was swallowed up of the Godhead. I do not say that they thinke so. But if this be reckoned among the qualities of a glorified bodie, to fill all things after an invisible manner, it is evident, that the bodily substance is destroyed, and that there is left no difference of the Godhead and the nature of man. Againe If the body of Christ be of so many fashions and divers, that it is seene in one place, and is invisible in another: where is the very nature of a bodie which consisteth of his measured proportions? and where is unity? Much more rightly doth Tertullian say, which affirmeth that the body of Christ was a true and naturall body, because in the misterie of the Supper the figure of it is set before us for a pledge and assurance of the spirituall life. And verily Christ said of his glorified body, see and feele, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones. Loe by Christs owne mouth the truth of the flesh is proved, because it can be felt and seene: Take away these things, then it shall cease to be flesh. They still flee to their denne of dispensation which they have framed to themselves. But it is our part so to embrace that which Christ absolutely pronounceth, that that which he meaneth to affirme may be of force with us without exception. He prooveth himselfe to be no Ghost, because he is visible in his flesh. Let that be taken away which he claimeth as proper to the nature of his bodie: must they not then be faine to coine a new definition of a bodie? Now whither soever they turne themselves about, their fained dispensation hath no place in that place of Paul where hee saith, that wee looke for a Saviour from heaven which shall fashion our base body like to his glorious body. For we may not hope for a like fashioning in those qualities which they feigne to Christ, that every one should have an invisible and unmeasurable body. Neither shall there be found any man so dill-witted whom they may make to believe so great an absurditie. Let them not therefore ascribe this gift to Christs glorified body, to be at once in many places, and to be contained in no space. Finally let them either openly denie the resurrection of the flesh, or let them graunt that Christ being clothed with heavenly glory, did not put off his flesh, who shall make us in our flesh fellowes and parteners of the same glorie, when wee shall have the resurrection common with him. For what doth the Scripture teach more plainely, than that as Christ did put on our true flesh when he was borne of the Virgin, and suffered in our true flesh when he satisfied for us: so hee received againe also the same true flesh rising againe, and carried it up to heaven? For this is to us the hope of our resurrection and ascending into heaven, that Christ is risen againe and ascended: and (as Tertullian saith) hee carryed the earnest of our resurrection into the heavens with him. Now how weake and fraile should that hope be, unlesse this our selfe flesh had bene raised up with Christ, and entered into the kingdome of heaven? But this is the proper truth of a body, to be contained in space, to consist of his measured proportions, to have his forme. Therefore away with this foolish device, which doth fasten both the minds of men and Christ to the bread. For to what purpose serveth the secret presence under bread, but that they which covet to have Christ joyned with them, may rest in that signe? But the Lord himselfe willed us to withdraw not onely our eyes but all our senses from the earth, forbidding himselfe to be touched of the women untill hee had gone up to his Father. When hee seeth Marie with godly zeale of reverence to make haste to kisse his feet, there is no cause why hee should disallow and forbid this touching till hee have bene taken up into heaven, but because hee will be sought no where else. Whereas they object, that hee was after ward seene of Stephen, the solution is easie. For neither was it therefore necessarie that Christ should change place, which could give to the eyes of his servant such sharpnesse of sight as might pearce through the heavens. The same also is to be said of Paul. Whereas they object that Christ came out of the Sepulchre being shut: and entered in among the disciples, the doores being shut: that maketh never a whit more for maintenance of their errour. For as the water like a fast pavement made a way to Christ walking upon the lake: so it is no marvell, if at his comming the hardnesse of the stone yielded it selfe. Howbeit it is more proveable, that by his commandement the stone was removed, and by and by after passage given him returned into his place. And to enter the doores being shut, is not as much in effect as to pearce through the whole substance, but by divine power to open an entrie for himselfe, that hee suddenly stood among the Disciples, verily after a marvellous manner, when the doores were fast locked. That which they alleage out of Luke, that Christ suddenly vanished away from the eyes of the disciples with whom hee went to Emau, profiteth them nothing, and maketh for us. For, that hee might take away the sight of himselfe from them, he was not made invisible, but onely went out of sight. As when hee went in journey together with them (as the same Luke witnesseth) hee did not put on a new face, that hee might not be knowne, but held their eyes. But these fellowes doe not onely transforme Christ, that he may be conversant in earth, but in divers places they make him divers and unlike himselfe. Finally, in so trifling they doe not by one word indeed, but by a circumstance, make of the flesh of Christ a spirit: and not contented therewith, they put upon it altogether contrarie qualities. Whereupon of necessitie followeth that it is double.

30 Now although wee graunt them that which they prate of the invisible presence, the unmeasurableness shall not be yet proved, without which they shall in vaine attempt to enclose Christ under bread. Unlesse the bodie of Christ may be everie where at once, without any compasse of place, it shall not be likely that he lyeth hidden under bread in the Supper. By which necessitie they brought in the monstrous being every where. But it is shewed by strong and plaine witness of Scripture, that it was limited about by the measure of the body of a man : and then that by his ascending he hath made it plaine that he is not in all places, but that when he passeth into one place, he leaveth the other that he was in before. Neither is the promise which they alleadge, to be drawne to the bodie, I am with you even to the ending of the world. First the continuall conjoyning cannot stand, unlesse Christ dwell in us corporally without the use of the Supper. Therefore there is no just cause why they should so sharply brawle about the words of Christ, that they may in the Supper enclose Christ under bread. Again the text it selfe proveth, that Christ speaketh nothing lesse than of his flesh, but promiseth to his Disciples invincible help, whereby hee may defend and sustaine them against all the assaults of Satan and the world. For when he enjoyned them a hard charge : least they should doubt to take it in hand, or should fearefully execute it, he strengtheneth them with affiance of his presence : as if he had said, that his succour shall not faile them, which shall be impossible to be overcome. Unlesse they listed to confound all things, ought they not to have made distinction of the manner of presence. And verily some had rather with great shame to utter their ignorance, than to yeeld never so litle of their error. I speake not of the Papists : whose doctrine is more tolerable, or at the least more shamefull. But contentiousnesse so carrieth some away, that they say that by reason of the natures united in Christ, wheresoever the Godhead of Christ is, there is also his flesh, which cannot bee severed from his Godhead. As though that same uniting have compounded of those two natures I wot not what meane thing which was neither God nor man. So indeed did Eutiches, and after him Servetus. But it is plainly gathered out of the Scripture, that the onely one person of Christ doth so consist of two natures, that either of them hath still her owne proprietie remaining safe. And that Eutiches was rightfully condemned, they will be ashamed to denie : it is marvell that they marke not the cause of his condemning, that taking away the difference betweene the natures, enforcing the unitie of person, he made of God man, and of man God. What madnesse therefore is it, rather to mingle heaven and earth together, than not to draw the body of Christ out of the heavenly sanctuary ? For whereas they bring for themselves these testimonies, None is gone up to heaven but hee that is come downe the sonne of man which is in heaven. Again, The sonne which is in the bosome of the Father, he shall declare them : it is a point of like senselesse dulnesse, to despise the communicating of properties which was in old time not without cause invented of the holy Fathers. Truly, when the Lord of glorie is said to be crucified, Paul doth not meane that he suffered any thing in his Godhead : but because the same Christ which being an abject and despised in the flesh did suffer, was both God and Lord of glorie. After this manner also the Sonne of man was in heaven : because the selfe same Christ, which according to the flesh did dwell in the Sonne of man in earth, was God in heaven. In which sort he is said to have descended from the said place according to his Godhead : not that the Godhead did forsake heaven to hide it selfe in the prison of the body : but because, although it filled all things, yet in the very manhood of Christ it dwelled corporally, that is to say naturally and after a certaine unspeakable manner. It is a common distinction in schooles, which I am not ashamed to rehearse : that although whole Christ be every where, yet not the whole that is in him is every where. And I would to God the schoolemen themselves had well weighed the pitch of this saying : for so should the unfavorable invention of the fleshly presence of Christ have bene met withall. Therefore our mediator, such he is whole every where, is alway at hand with his, & in the Supper after a speciall manner giveth himselfe present : but yet so, that whole he is present, not the whole that he is : because, as it is said, in his flesh he is contained in heaven till he appears to judgement.

31 But they are far deceived, which conceive no presence of the flesh of Christ in the Supper, unlesse it be made present in bread. For so they leave nothing to the secret working of the Spirit, which uniteth Christ himselfe unto us. They thinke not Christ present, unlesse hee come downe to us. As though if hee did lift us up to him, we should not as well enjoy his presence. Therefore the question is onely of the manner : because they place Christ in the bread, but we thinke it not lawfull for us to plucke him out of Heaven.

Heaven. Let the readers judge whether is the righter. Onely let this cavillation be driven away, that Christ is taken away from his Supper, unless he be hidden under the cover of bread. For such this mysterie is heavenly, it is no need to draw Christ into the earth, that he may be joynd to us.

32 Now if any man doe aske me of the manner, I will not be ashamed to confesse, that it is a higher secret than that it can be either comprehended with my wit, or uttered with my words: and, to speake it more plainly, I rather feele it, than I can understand it. Therefore I doe herein without controversie embrace the truth of God, in which I may safely rest. Hee pronounceth that his flesh is the meate of my soule, and his blood is the drinke. With such foode I offer my soule to him to be fed. In his holy Supper he commandeth me under the signes of bread and wine to take, eat, and drinke his bodie and blood. I nothing doubt that both hee doth truly deliver them, and I doe receive them. Onely I refuse the absurdities, which appeare to be either unworthie of the heavenly majestie of Christ, or disagreeing from the truth of his nature of manhood: for as much as they must also fight with the word of God, which also teacheth that Christ was so taken up into the glory of the heavenly kingdome that it listeth him up above all estate of the world, and no lesse diligently setteth forth in his nature of man, those things that are properly belonging to his true manhood. Neither ought this to seeme incredible, or not consonant to reason, because as the whole kingdome of Christ is spirituall, so whatsoever he doth with his Church, ought not to be reduced to the reason of this world. Or, that I may use the words of Augustine, this mysterie, as other are, is done by men, but from God: in earth, but from heaven. Such (I say) is the presence of the body, as the nature of the Sacrament requireth: which wee say here to excell with so great force, and great effectualnesse, that it not onely bringeth to our minds undoubted trust of eternall life, but also assureth us of the immortalitie of our flesh. For it is now quickned of his immortall flesh, and after a certaine manner communicateth of his immortalitie. They which are carried above this with their excessive speeches, doe nothing but with such entanglements darken the simple and plaine truth. If any be not yet satisfied, I would have him here a while to consider with me, that we now speake of a Sacrament, all the parts whereof ought to be referred to faith. But we doe no lesse daintily and plentifully feede faith with this partaking of the body which we have declared, than they that plucke Christ himselfe out of heaven. In the meane time I plainly confesse, that I refuse that mixture of the flesh of Christ with our soule, or the pouring out of it such as they teach: because it sufficeth us, that Christ doth out of the substance of his flesh breath life into our soules, yea doth powre into us his owne life, although the very flesh of Christ doth not enter into us. Moreover it is no doubt that the proportion of faith, whereby Paul willeth us to examine all exposition of Scripture, doth in this behalfe very well agree with me. As for them that speake against to evident a truth, let them looke after what rule of faith they fashion themselves. He that doth not confesse that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God. These men, although they cloke it, or marke it not, doe spoile him of his flesh.

33 Of communicating is to be likewise thought, which they acknowledge none, unless they devoure the flesh of Christ under bread. But there is no small wrong done to the holy Ghost, unless wee beleve that it is brought to passe by his incomprehensible power, that wee communicate with the flesh and blood of Christ. Yea if the force of the mysterie, such as it is taught of us, and as it was knowne to the old Church from sower hundred yeeres agoe, were weighed according to the worthinesse of it, there was enough and more whereupon we might be satisfied: the gate had bene shut against many foule errors, out of which have bene kindled many horrible dissensions wherewith both in old time and in our age the Church hath bene miserably vexed, while curious men doe enforce an excessive manner of presence, which the Scripture never sheweth. And they turmoile about a thing fondly and rashly conceived, as if the enclosing of Christ under bread were (as the proverbe is) the prow and poupe of godlinesse. It principally behoved to know, how the body of Christ, as it was once delivered for us, is made ours: how we are made partakers of his blood that was shed: because this is to possesse whole Christ crucified, that we may enjoy all his good things. Now these things, in which was so great importance, being omitted, yea neglected, and in a manner buried, this onely crabbed question pleaseth them, how the body of Christ lyeth hid under bread or under the forme of bread. They falsly spread abroad that whatsoever wee teach concerning spirituall eating, is contrarie to the true and reall eating, as they call it: because we have respect to nothing but to the manner, which among them is carnall, while they enclose Christ in bread: but to us it is spirituall, because the secret power of the spirit is the bond of our conjoyning with Christ. No ruier is that other objection, that we touch onely the fruit or effect which the faithfull take of the eating of the flesh of Christ. For wee have said before, that Christ himselfe is the substance of the Supper: and that thereupon followeth the effect, that by the sacrifice of his death we are cleansed from sinnes, by his blood wee are washed, by his resurreccion wee are raised up into hope of the heavenly life. But the foolish imagination, whereof Lombard was the author, hath perverted their minds, while they thinke that the eating of the flesh of Christ is the Sacrament. For this saith he: The Sacrament and not the thing are the formes of bread and wine: the Sacrament and the thing, are the flesh and blood of Christ: the thing and not the Sacrament, is the mysticall flesh. Againe within a little after. The thing signified and contained, is the proper flesh of Christ: the thing signified and not contained, is his mysticall body. Whereas hee maketh difference betwene the flesh of Christ, and the effectuall power of nourishing, wherewith it is endued, I agree: but whereas he saigneth it to be a Sacrament, yea and contained under bread, it is an error not to be suffered. Hereupon hath growne the false exposition of sacramentall eating, because they have thought that wicked men also and evill doers doe eat the flesh of Christ, how much soever they be strangers from him. But the flesh of Christ, it selfe in the mysterie of the Supper is no lesse a spirituall thing, than eternall salvation. Whereupon we gather, that whosoever are void of the spirit of Christ, can no more eat the flesh of Christ, than they can drinke wine wherewith is joynd no taste. Truly Christ is too hainouly torne in sunder, when that dead body, and which hath no lively strength, is given forth in common to unbelievers: and his expresse words are directly against it. Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him. They answer that in that place is not intreated of the sacramentall eating: which I grant, so that they will not now and then stumble against the same stone, saying that the flesh it selfe is eaten without fruit. But I would know of them, how long they hold it when they have eaten it. Here, in my judgement, they shall have no way to get out. But they object, that nothing can bee withdrawne or faile of the promises of God by the unthankfulnesse of men. I grant indeed, and I say that the force of the mysterie remaineth whole, howsoever wicked men doe, as much as in them lyeth, endeavour to make it void. Yet it is one thing to bee offered, and another thing to bee received. Christ reacheth this spirituall meat, and offereth this spirituall drinke to all men, some doe greedily eat of it, some doe lothingly refuse it: shall these men refusing make the meat and the drinke to lose their nature? They will say that their opinion is helpen by this similitude, namely, that the flesh of Christ, thought it be unfavorie, is neverthelesse his flesh. But I denie that it can be eaten without the taste of faith: or (if wee list rather to speake as Augustine doth) I say that men beare away no more of this Sacrament, than they gather with the vessell of faith. So nothing is abated from the Sacrament, yea the truth and effectualnesse thereof remaineth unminished, although the wicked depart emptie from the outward partaking of it. If they againe object that this word, this is my bodie, is diminished, if the wicked receive corruptible bread and nothing else, wee have a solution readie, that God will not bee acknowne true in the receiving it selfe, but in the stedfastnesse of his owne goodnesse, when hee is readie to give, yea liberally offereth to the unworthie that which they refuse. And this is the fulnesse of the Sacrament, which the whole world cannot breake, that the flesh and blood of Christ is no lesse given to the unworthie, than to the chosen faithfull ones of God: but therewithall it is true, that as water lighting upon a hard stone, falleth away, because there is no entrie open into the stone: so the wicked doe with their hardnesse drive backe the grace of God that it cannot pierce into them. Moreover, that Christ should be received with our faith, is no more agreeing with reason, than seed to bud in the fire. Whereas they aske, how Christ is come to damnation to some, unless they receive him unworthily, it is a very cold question: forasmuch as we no where read, that men doe procure death to themselves by unworthy receiving Christ, but rather by refusing him. Neither doth Christs parable helpe them, where he saith that seed groweth up among thornes, and afterward being choaked is marred: because he there entreateth, of what value the faith is which endureth but for a time, which they doe not thinke to be necessary to the eating of Christs flesh and drinking of his blood, that in this behalfe doe make Iudas equally fellow with Peter. But rather by the same parable their error is confuted, where Christ saith that some seed falleth in the high-way, other some upon stones, and neither of them taketh roote. Whereupon followeth that to the unbelievers their owne hardnesse is a let that Christ attaineth not to them. Whosoever desireth to have our salvation holpen by this mystery, shall find nothing siter, than that the faithfull being led to the very fountaine, should draw life out of the Sonne of God. But the dignitie of it is honourably enough set out, when we keep in mind that it is a helpe whereby wee be grafted into the body of Christ, or being grafted doe more and more grow together, till he doe fully make himselfe one with us in the heavenly life. They object that Paul ought not to have made them guilty of the body and blood of Christ, unless they were partakers of them. But I answer that they are not therefore condemned because they have eaten them, but onely because they have prophaned the mystery, in treading vnder feet the pledge of the holy conjoyning with God, which they ought reverently to receive.

34 Now because Augustine among the old writers chiefly hath affirmed that article of doctrine, that nothing is abated from the Sacraments, nor the grace which they figure is made voide by the infidelity or naughtinesse of men: it shall be profitable to prove clearly by his owne words, how unfitly and perversly they doe draw that to this present cause, which cast the body of Christ to dogsto eat. The Sacramentall eating, after their opinion, is whereby the wicked receive the body and blood of Christ without the power of the Spirit, or any effect of grace. Augustine contrariwise weying wisely those words. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, shall not die for ever, saith: Namely the power of the sacrament, not onely the visible sacrament: and verily within, not without: he that eateth it with hart, not he that presseth it with tooth. Whereupon at length he concludeth that the sacrament of this thing, that is to say, of the unity of the body and blood of Christ, is set before men in the supper of the Lord, to some unto life, to some unto destruction: but the thing it selfe whereof it is a sacrament to all men unto life, to none unto destruction, whosoever be partakers of it. That none should here cavill, that the thing is called not the body, but the grace of the spirit which may be severed from the body, the contrary comparisons betweene these two words of addition Visible and Invisible driveth away all those mists: for under the first of them cannot be comprehended the body of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the unbelievers doe communicate only of the visible signe. And that all doubting may be better taken away, after that he had said that this bread requireth the hunger of the inward man, he addeth: Moses and Aaron and Phinees, and many other that did eat, Manna, pleased God. Why so? because the spirituall meat they spirituallly understood, spirituallly hungred, spirituallly tasted, that they might be spirituallly filled. For we also at this day have received spirituallly meat: but the Sacrament is one thing, and the power of the Sacrament is another. A little after: and by this he that abideth not in Christ, and in whom Christ abideth not, without doubt neither eateth spirituallly his flesh, nor drinketh his blood, though carnally and visibly he presseth with teeth the signe of the body and blood. We heare againe that the visible signe is set in comparison as a contrarie to spirituall eating. Whereby that error is confuted, that the body of Christ invisible is in deed eaten sacramentally, though not spirituallly. We heare also that nothing is granted to prophane and uncleane men beside the visible receiving of the signe. Hereupon commeth his famous saying, that the other disciples did eat the bread the Lord: but Iudas did eat the bread of the Lord: wherein he plainly excludeth the unbelievers from from the partaking of the body and blood. Neither tendeth it to any other end which he saith in another place : What marvellest thou, if to Iudas was given the bread of Christ, by which he might be made bound to the devill: when thou seeest on the contrarie side that to Paul was given the angell of the devill, by whom he might be made perfect in Christ? he saith verily in another place, that the bread of the Supper was the body of Christ to them to whom Paul said, He that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgement to himselfe : and that they have not therefore nothing, because they have received naughtily. But in what sense, he declareth more fully in another place, For taking in hand purposely to define how the wicked and evill doers, which professe the Christian faith with mouth but with deedes doe denie it, doe eat the body of Christ, (and that against the opinion of some which thought that they did not eat in sacrament onely but in very deed.) But neither (saith he) ought it to be said that they eare the body of Christ, because they are not to be reckoned among the members of Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) they cannot together be the members of Christ, and the members of a harlot. Finally where himselfe saith, He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him, he sheweth that it is not sacramentally but in very deed to eat the body of Christ. For this is to abide in Christ, that Christ may abide in him. For he so said this as though hee had said, he that abideth not in me, and in whom I abide not, let him not say or thinke that hee doth eat my body or drinke my blood. Let the readers weigh the things set as contraries in the comparison to eat, sacramentally, and in very deed: and there shall remaine no doubt. He confirmeth the same, no lesse plainly in these words : Prepare not your jawes, but your heart. Hereupon is this Supper commended. Loe we beleeve in Christ, when we receive by faith : in receiving we know what to thinke. We receive a litle and are fatted in heart. Therefore not that which is seene, but that which is beleeved, doth feed. Here also that which the wicked receive, he restraineth to the visible signe : and teacheth that Christ is none otherwise received than by faith. So also in another place, pronouncing expressly that the good and the evill doe communicate together in the signes he excludeth the evill from the true eating of the flesh of Christ. For if they received the thing it selfe, he would not utterly have left that unpoken which was more fit for his matter. Also in another place, entreating of the eating and the fruit thereof, he concludeth thus : then shall the body and blood of Christ bee life to every man, if that which in the sacrament is visibly received, be in the truth it selfe spiritually eaten, spiritually drunke. Therefore who so make unbelievers partakers of the flesh and blood of Christ, that they may agree with Augustine, let them shew us the visible bodie of Christ forasmuch as by his judgement, the whole truth is spirituall. And it is certainly gathered out of his words, that the sacramentall eating, when unbelievee closeth up the entry to truth, is as much in effect as visible or outward eating. If the body of Christ might be eaten truly and yet not spiritually, what should that meane which he saith in another place? Yee shall not eat this body which yee see, and drinke the blood which they shall shed that shall crucifie me. I have commanded a certaine sacrament unto you being spiritually understood it shall quicken you. Verily hee would not deny but that the same body which Christ offered for sacrifice, is delivered in the Supper: but he did set out the manner of eating: namely that being received into heavenly glory, by the secret power of the spirit, it breatheth life into us. I grant indeed that there is oftentimes found in him this manner of speaking, that the body of Christ is eaten of the unbelievers: but he expoundeth himselfe, adding, In Sacrament. And in another place he describeth spirituall eating, in which our bitings consume not grace. And least mine adversaries should say, that I fight with them with a heape of places, I would know of them how they can unwind themselves from one saying of his, where he saith that Sacraments doe worke in the onely elect that which they figure. Truly they dare not deny but that the bread in the supper figureth the body of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the reprobate are debarred from the partaking of it. That Cyrill also thought none otherwise, these words doe declare, as if a man upon molten wax doe powre other wax, he wholly tempereth the one wax with the other : so it is necessary if any man receive the flesh and blood of the Lord that he be joynd with him that Christ may be found in him and he in Christ. By these words, I thinke it is evident, that they are bereaved of the true and reall eating, that doe but sacramentally eat the bodie of Christ, which cannot be severed from his power: and that therefore faileth not the faith of the promises of God, which ceaseth not to raine from heaven, although the stones and rockes conceive not the liquor of the raine.

35 This knowledge shall also easily draw us away from the carnall worshipping, which some have with perverse rashnesse erected in the sacrament: because they made account with themselves in this manner: If it be the body, then both the soule and the Godhead are together with the body, which now cannot be severed: therefore Christ is there to bee worshipped. First if their accompaning which they pretend bee denied them, what will they doe? For how much soever they cry out upon an absurdity, if the body bee severed from the soule and the Godhead: yet what sound witted and sober man can perswade himselfe that the body of Christ is Christ: They thinke themselves indeede gaily to prove it with their logicall arguments. But sith Christ speaketh distinctly of his body and bloud, but describeth not the manner of presence: how will they of a doubtfull thing gather certainly that which they would? What then? If their consciences chance to be exercised with any more grievous feeling, shall not they by and by with their logicall arguments bee dissolved and melt? namely when they shall see themselves destitute of the certaine word of God, upon which alone our soules doe stand fast, when they are called to account, and without which they faint at every first moment: when they shall call to minde that the doctrine and examples of the Apostles are against them, and that themselves alone are to themselves the authors of it. To such motions shall be added other not small prickinhs. What? Shall it be a matter of no importance, to worship God in this forme, where nothing was prescribed unto us? When it concerned the true worship of God, ought they with so great lightnesse to have attemped that of which there is no where read any one word? But if they had, with such humblenesse as they ought, holden all their thoughts under the word of God, they would truly have harkened to that which he said, Take, eat, drinke, and would have obeyed this commandement, wherein he biddeth the Sacrament to be received, not to be worshipped. But they which, as it is commanded of God, doe receive it without worshipping, are assured that they doe not swarve from Gods commandement: than which assurednesse there is nothing better when wee take any worke in hand. They have the example of the Apostles, whom wee reade not to have fallen downe flat and worshipped it, but even as they were sitting to have received it and eaten it. They have the use of the Apostolike Church, wherein Luke reporteth that the faithfull did communicate not in worshipping but in the breaking of bread. They have the Apostles doctrine, wherewith Paul instructed the Church of the Corinthians, professing that hee had received of the Lord that which he delivered.

36 And these things verily tend to this end, that the godly reader should weigh how perillous it is in so high matters to wander from the simple word of God to the dreames of our owne braine. But those things that are above said, ought to deliver us from all doubt in this behalfe. For that godly soules may therein rightly take hold of Christ they must needs be lifted up to heaven. If this be the office of a Sacrament, to helpe the minde of man which otherwise is weake, that it may rise upward to reach the height of spirituall mysteries: then they which are holden downe in the outward signe doe stray from the right way of seeking Christ. What then? Shall we deny that it is a superstitious worshipping, when men doe throw themselves downe before bread to worship Christ therein? Doubtlesse the Nicene Synode meant to meet with this mischief, when it forbade us to be humbly intentive to the signes set before us. And for none other cause was it in old time ordained, that before the consecration the people should with a loud voice be put in mind to have their hearts lifted upward. The Scripture it selfe also, beside that it diligently declareth unto us the ascension of Christ, whereby hee conveyed away the presence of his body from our sight and conversation: to shake away from us all carnall thinking of him, so oft as it maketh mention of him, commandeth us to be in mindes raised upward, and to seeke him in heaven sitting at the right hand of the father. According to this rule he was rather to be spirituall worshipping ped in heavenly glory, than this so perillous a kind of worshipping to be devised, full of carnall and grosse opinion of God. Wherefore they that have invented the worshipping of the Sacrament, have not only dreamed it of themselves beside the Scripture, in which no mention of it can be shewed (which yet should not have bene overpassed if it had bene acceptable to God : ) But also all the Scripture crying out against it, they have framed to themselves a God after the will of their owne luit, leaving the living God. For what is Idolary, if this be not, to worship the gifts instead of the giver himselfe? Wherein they have doubly offended : For both the honor taken from God was conveyed to a creature : and hee himselfe also dishonored in the defiling and prophaning of his benefit, when of his holy Sacrament is made a cursed idole. But let us contrariwise least wee fall into the same pit, thoroughly settle our eares, eyes, hearts, mindes, and tongues in the holy doctrine of God. For that is the schoole of the holy Ghost, the best Schoole-master, in which such profit is attained, that nothing neede more to be gotten from any where else, but we willingly bought to be ignorant of whatsoever is not taught in it.

Christ in the Sacrament offered and given by promise unto them not which behold and adore, but which eat and give thanks: this Sacrament being instituted for the participation of Christ by faith and the profession of our greatfull remembrance as in Ios. 11. 15.

37 But now (as superstition, when it hath once passed the right bounds, maketh no end of sinning) they tell a great way further. For they have devised Ceremonies altogether strange from the institution of the Supper, to this end only that they might give divine honours to the signe. Wee yeeld (say they) this worship to Christ. First, if this were done in the Supper, I would say that that worshipping onely is lawfull, which respecteth not in the signe, but is directed to Christ sitting in heaven. But now by what pretense doe they boast that they worship Christ in that bread : when they have no promise thereof? They consecrate an host, as they call it, which they may carry about in pompe, which they may shew forth in a common gazing to be looked upon, worshipped, and called upon. I aske by what power they thinke it to be rightly consecrate. Verily they will bring forth those words, This is my body. But I will object to the contrary, that it was therewithall said, Take and eat. Neither will doe that of nothing. For when a promise is knit to a commandment, I say that the promise is so contained under the commandment, that being severed it is made no promise at all. This shall be made plainer by a like example. God gave a commandment, when hee said. Call upon me : Hee added a promise, I will heare thee. If any man calling upon Peter and Paul, doe glory upon this promise, will not all men crye out that he doth wrongfully? And what other thing I pray, doe they which leaving the commandment concerning eating, doe catch hold of a maimed promise, this is my body, to abuse it to strange Ceremonies from the institution of Christ? Let us therefore remember that this promise is given to them which keepe the commandment joyned with it : but that they be destitute of all the word, which remove the Sacrament to any other way. We have heretofore entreated how the mystery of the holy Supper serveth our Faith before God. But for as much as the Lord doth here not onely bring into our remembrance so great largenes of his bounty, as we have before shewed, but doth as it were from hand to hand bring it forth, and stirreth us to acknowledge it : he doth therewithall warne us that wee be not unthankfull to so plentifull liberalitie : but rather that wee would publish it with such praises as it is meet; and advance it with thanksgiving. Therefore when hee delivered the institution of the Sacrament it selfe to the Apostles, hee taught them, that they should doe it in remembrance of him. Which Paul expounded, to declare the Lords death. That is, publickly and altogether with one mouth openly to confesse, that all our affiance of life and salvation is reposed in the death of the Lord : that wee may glorifie him with our confession, and may by our example exhort others to give glory to him. Here againe it appeareth whereunto the marke of this Sacrament is directed, namely to exercise us in the remembrance of the death of Christ. For, this that wee are commanded to declare the Lords death till he come to judge, is nothing else but that wee should publish that with confession of mouth, which our faith hath acknowledged in the Sacrament, that is, that the death of Christ is our life. This is the second use of the Sacrament, which pertaineth to outward confession.

38 Thirdly, the Lord also willed it to be to us inteed of an exhortation, than which

Luk. 22. 19.

which none other can more vehemently encourage and enflame us both to purenesse and holinesse of life, and also to charity, peace and agreement. For the Lord doth therein so communicate his body to us, that hee is made throughly one with us, and we with him. Now sith hee hath but one body, whereof hee maketh us all partakers, it is necessary that all wee also bee by such partaking made one body. Which unity the bread which is delivered in the Sacrament, representeth : which as it is made of many graines in such sort mingled together that one cannot bee discerned from another : after the same manner wee also ought to bee conjoynd and knit together with so great agreement of minds, that no disagreement or division come betwene us. This I had rather to be exprest with Pauls words. The cup of blessing (saith he) which we blesse is the communicating of the blood of Christ : and the bread of blessing which wee breake, is the partaking of the body of Christ, therefore wee all are one body that partake of one bread. Wee shall have very well profited in the Sacrament, if this thought so shall be imprinted and ingraven in our minds, that none of the brethren can be hurt, despised, refused, abused, or any wise bee offended of us, but that therewithall we doe in so doing hurt, despise, and abuse Christ with our injurious dealings : that we cannot disagree with our brethren but that we must therewithall disagree with Christ : that Christ cannot be loved of us, but that hee must be loved in our brethren : that what care we have of our own body, such also we ought to have of our brethren which are members of our body : as no part of our body is touched with any feeling of griefe, which is not spread abroad into all the other parts, so wee must not suffer our brother to bee grieved with any evill whereof we should not also be touched with compassion. Therefore Augustine not without cause so oft calleth this Sacrament that bond of charity. For what sharper spur could be put to us, to stir up mutuall charitie among us, than when Christ giving himselfe to us, doth not only allure us with his owne example, that we should mutually dedicate and deliver our selves one to another : but in so much as hee maketh himselfe common to all, hee maketh all us also one in himselfe ?

39 But hereby is that very well confirmed which I have said in another place, that the true ministration of the Sacrament standeth not without the word. For whatsoever profit cometh to us of the Supper, requireth the word : whether we be to be confirmed in faith, or to be exercised in confession, or to be stirred up to duty, prayer is needfull. Therefore nothing can be more disorderly done in the Supper, than if it be turned to a dumbe action : it hath been done under the tyrannie of the Pope. For they would have the whole force of consecration to hang upon the intent of the Priest, as though this nothing pertained to the people, to whom it most of all behooved that the mystery should be declared. But thereupon hath growne this error, that they marked not that those promises wherewith the consecration is made, are directed not to the elements themselves, but to them that receive them. But Christ speaketh not to the bread, that it may be made his body, but commandeth his Disciples to eat, and promiseth to them the communicating of his body and blood. And none other order doth Paul teach than that together with the bread and the cup, the promises should be offered to the faithfull. Thus it is truly. Wee ought not to imagine any magicall enchantment, that it bee sufficient to have mumbled up the words, as though the elements did heare them : but let us understand that those words are a lively preaching, which may edifie the hearers, which may inwardly pearce into their minds, which may be imprinted and setled in their hearts, which may shew forth effectualnesse in the fulfilling of that which it promiseth : by these reasons it cleerly appeareth that the laying up of the Sacrament, which many doe earnestly require, that it may be extraordinarily distributed to the sicke, is unprofitable : For either they shall receive it without rehearsing of the institution of Christ, or the minister shall together with the signe joyne the true declaration of the mystery. In silence is abuse and fault. If the promises be rehearsed, and the mystery declared, that they which shall receive it may receive it with fruit, there is no cause why we should doubt that this is the true consecration. To what end then will that other consecration come, the force whereof cometh not so far as to the sicke men ? But they that doe so, have the example of the old Church. I grant : but in so great a matter, and in which we erre not without great danger, nothing is safer than to follow the truth it selfe.

40. Now as wee see that this holy bread of the Supper of the Lord is spirituall meat, no lesse sweet and delicate than healthfull to the godly worshippers of God, by the taste whereof they feele that Christ is their life, whom it raiseth up to thanksgiving, to whom it is an exhortation to mutuall charity among themselves : so on the other side it is turned into a most noisome poison to all them whose faith it doth not nourish and confirme, and whom it doth not stir up to confession of praise and to charity. For as bodily meat, when it findeth a stomacke possessed with evill humors, being it selfe also thereby made evill and corrupted doth rather hurt than nourish : so this spirituall meat, if it light upon a soule defiled with malice and naughtinesse, throweth it downe headlong with greater fall : verily not by the fault of the meat it selfe, but because to defiled and unbelieving men nothing is cleane, though otherwise it bee never so much sanctified by the blessing of the Lord. For (as Paul saith) they that eat and drinke unworthily are guilty of the body and bloud of the Lord, and doe eat and drinke judgement to themselves, not discerning the body of the Lord. For such kinde of men as without any sparkle of Faith, without any zeale of charitie, doe thrust themselves forth like swine to take the Supper of the Lord, doe not discern the body of the Lord. For in so much as they doe not belevee that that body is their life, they doe as much as in them lyeth dishonour it, spoiling it of all the dignity thereof, and finally in so receiving it they prophane and defile it. But in so much as being estranged and disagreeing from their brethren, they dare mingle the holy signe of the body of Christ with their disagreements, it is no thanke to them that the body of Christ is not rent in sunder, and limbe meale torne in pieces. And so not unworthily they are guilty of the body and bloud of the Lord, which they doe with ungodlinesse full of sacriledge so fowly defile. Therefore by this unworthy eating, they take to themselves damnation. For whereas they have no faith reposed in Christ, yet receiving the Sacrament they professe that there is salvation for them no where else than in him, and doe forswear all other assistance. Wherefore they themselves are accusers to themselves, they themselves pronounce witness against themselves, and they themselves seale their owne damnation. Againe when they being with hatred and evill will divided and drawn in sunder from their brethren, that is from the members of Christ have no part in Christ : yet they doe testifie that this is the onely salvation to communicate with Christ, and to bee made one with him. For this cause Paul commandeth, that a man prove himselfe, before that hee eat of this bread or drinke of this cup. Whereby (as I expound it) he meant that every man should descend into himselfe, and weigh with himselfe, whether he doe with inward assistance of heart rest upon the salvation which Christ hath purchased : whether hee acknowledge it with confession of mouth : then whether hee doe with desirous endeavour of innocencie and holinesse aspire to the following of Christ : whether after his example hee be ready to give himselfe to his brethren, and to communicate himselfe to them with whom hee hath Christ common to him : whether, as hee himselfe is accomped of Christ, he doe likewise on his behalfe rake all his brethren for members of his owne body : whether he covet to cherish, defend and helpe them as his owne members. Nor for that these duties both of faith and charitie can now be perfect in us : but because we ought to endeavour this, and with all our desires to long toward it, that we may daily more and more encrease our faith begun.

41. Commonly when they goe about to prepare men to such worthinesse of eating, they have in cruell wise tormented and vexed poore consciences : and yet they brought never a whit of all those things that might serve to the purpose. They said that those did eat worthily which were in state of grace. To bee in state of grace they expounded to bee pure and clenfed from all sinne. By which doctrine all the men that ever have at any time bene, or now bee in earth, were debarrd from the use of this Sacrament. For if we goe about this, to fetch our worthinesse from our selves, wee are utterly undone : only despaire and damnable ruine abideth for us. Though we endeavour with our whole strengths, we shall nothing more prevaile, but that then at last wee shall be most unworthy, when we have most of all travelled about seeking of worthinesse. To silve this fore, they have devised a way to attaine worthinesse: that, as much as in us lyeth, making examination, and requiring of our selves accompt of all our doings, wee should with contrition, confession, and satisfaction cleanse our unworthinesse, which way of cleansing, what manner of thing it is, we have already shewed there where was more convenient place to speake of it. So much as serveth for our present purpose, I say that these be two hungry and vanishing comforts, too dismayed and discouraged consciences, and such as are stricken with horror of their sinne. For if the Lord by speciall forbidding admitteth none to the partaking of the Supper but the righteous and innocent: there needeth no small heed that may make a man assured of his owne righteounesse which he heareth to be required of God. But whereby is this assurednesse confirmed unto us, that they are discharged afore God, which have done so much as in them lay? But although it were so, yet when shall it be that a man may be bold to assure himselfe that he hath done as much as in him lay? So when there is made no certaine assurance of our worthinesse, the entry shall alway remaine shut by this horrible forbidding, whereby is pronounced that they eat and drinke judgement to themselves, which eat and drinke unworthily.

42 Now it is easie to judge what manner of doctrine this is which reigneth in the Papacy, and from what Authour it hath proceeded, which with the outragious rigor thereof, bereaveth and spoyleth, miserable sinners and such as bee tormented with feare and sorrow, of the comfort of this Sacrament in which yet all the sweet delicacies of the Gospell were set before them. Surely the devill could by no readier way destroy men, than by so making them senselesse, that they could not perceive the tast and flavor of such food, where with it was the will of the most good heavenly Father to feed them. Least therefore wee run into such headlong downefall, let us remember that this holy banquet is medicine to the sicke, comfort to sinners, liberall gift to the poore: which bring no profit to the healthy, righteous, and rich, if any such could be found. For whereas in it Christ is given us for meat: wee understand that without him we pine, starve, and faint, like as famine destroyeth the lively strength of the body: Againe, whereas hee is given us for life: wee understand that without him wee are in our selves utterly dead. Wherefore this is the worthinesse both the onely and best that wee can bring to God, if wee offer to him our owne vilenesse and (as I may so call it) unworthinesse, that of his mercy hee may make us worthy of him: if wee despair in our selves, that wee may be comforted in him: if wee humble our selves, that wee may be raised up of him: if wee accuse our selves, that wee may be justified of him: moreover if wee aspire to that unitie which he commendeth to us in his Supper: and as hee maketh us all one in himselfe, so if we with to us all altogether one soule, one heart, one tongue. If we have these things thoroughly well weighed and considered, such thoughts although they shake us yet shall never overthrow us. As how should we being needy and naked of all good things, we defiled with filthinesse of finnes, we halfe dead, eat the body of the Lord worthily? We will rather thinke that wee being poore come to the liberall giver, we sicke to the Physitian, we sinners to the authour of righteounesse, finally, we dead men to him that giveth life: that that worthinesse which is commanded of God, consisteth chiefly of Faith, which repositeth all things in Christ and nothing in us: and next of charitie, and the selfe same charitie which it is enough to offer unperfect to God, that hee may increase it to better, forasmuch as it cannot be given perfect. Some other agreeing with us in this, that the worthinesse it selfe consisteth in Faith and Charity: yet in the measure of worthinesse have gone farre out of the way, requiring a perfection of Faith, whereunto nothing may be added, and a charity equall with that which Christ hath shewed toward us. But hereby they doe none otherwise than those other before, drive all men away from coming to this holy Supper. For if their sentence should take place, no man should receive but unworthily, for as much as all without exception should be holden guilty and convict of their unperfectnesse. And truly it were a point of too much amazed dulnesse, I will not say foolishnesse, to require such perfection in the Sacrament, as may make the Sacrament voide and superfluous: which was not ordained for the perfect, but for the weak and feeble to a weake, to stir up, to pricke forward and exercise the affection of Faith and Charity, and to correct the default of either of them.

43 But so much as concerneth the outward forme of doing, whether faithfull receive it in their hand or no, whether they divide it, or every one eat that which is given him: whether they put againe the cup in the hand of the Deacon, or deliver it to the next: whether the bread be leavened, or unleavened: whether the wine be red or white: it maketh no matter. These things be indifferent and left in the liberty of the Church. Howbeit it is certaine, that the usage of the old Church was, that every one should take it into his hand. And Christ said, Divide it among you. The Histories report that it was leavened and common bread before the time of Alexander Bishop of Rome, which first delighted in unleavened bread: But for what reason I see not, unless it were with a new sight to draw the eyes of the common people to wondering at it, rather than to instruct their minds with good religion, I adjure all them that are touched with any thought but light zeale of godlinesse, to tell whether they doe not evidently see, both how much more brightly the glory of God shineth herein, and how much more abundant sweetnesse of spirituall comfort commeth to the faithfull, than in these cold and player-like trifles, which bring none other use but to deceive the sense of the amazed people. This they call the holding of the people in religion, when being made foolish and senselesse with superstition it is drawne whether they list. If any man will defend such inventions by antiquity, I my selfe also am not ignorant how ancient is the use of chrisme, and blowing in Baptisme: How nigh to the age of the Apostles the Supper of the Lord was infected with rustinesse: but this verily is the waywardnesse of maas boldnesse, which cannot with hold it selfe but that it must alway play and be wanton in the mysteries of God. But let us remember that God doth so highly esteeme the obedience of his word, that hee willet us in it to judge both his Angels and the whole world. Now, bidding fare well to so great a heape of ceremonies: it might thus have been most comelily ministred, if it were oft and at lest every weeke set before the church but that first they should begin with publike prayers: then a sermon should be made; then the minister having bread and wine set upon the boord, should rehearse the institution of the Supper: and then should declare the promises that are in it left unto us? and therewithall should excommunicate all them that by the Lords forbidding are debarred from it, afterward they should pray that with what liberality the Lord hath given us this holy foode, hee would instruct and frame us also with the same faith, and thankfulness of minde to receive it, and that forasmuch as we are not of our selves, he would of his mercy make us worthy of such a banquet: that then either Psalmes should be sung, or somewhat read, and the faithfull should in seemely order communicate of the holy banquet, the Ministers breaking the bread and giving it to the people: that when the Supper is ended, exhortation should be made to pure faith and confession of faith, to charity, and to manners meete for Christians: last of all that giving of thanks should be rehearsed, and praises be sung to God: which being ended the congregation should be let goe in peace.

44 These things that wee have hitherto spoken of this Sacrament, doe largely shew, that it was not therefore ordayned, that it should be received yeerely once, and that slightly for manners sake (as now commonly the custome is) but that it should be in often use to all Christians that with often remembrance they should repeate the passion of Christ: by which remembrance they might sustaine and strengthen their faith, and exhort themselves to sing confession of praise to God, and to publish his goodnesse: finally by which they might nourish mutuall charity, and testifie it among themselves, whereof they saw the knot in the unitie of the body of Christ. For so oft as wee communicate of the signe of the body of the Lord, wee doe as by a token given and received, interchangeably binde our selves one to another unto all duties of love, that none of us doe any thing whereby hee may offend his brother, nor leave any thing undone whereby hee may helpe him, when need requireth and ability sufficeth. That such was the use of the Apostolike Church, Luke rehearseth in the Acts, when hee saith that the faithfull were continuing in the doctrine of the Apostles, in communicating, in breaking of bread, and in prayers. So was it altogether meete to be done, that there should bee no assemblie of the Church without the word, prayers, partaking of the Supper and almes. That this order was also institute among the Corinthians wee may also sufficiently gather of Paul, and it is certaine that in many ages afterward it was in use. For thereupon came those old Canons, which they father upon Anacletus and Calixtus, that when the consecration is done, all should communicate, that will not bee without the doores of the Church. And it is read in those old Canons, which they call the Canons of the Apostles: that they which continue not unto the end, and doe not receive the holie Communion, must be corrected as men that move unquietnesse to the Church. Also in the Councell at Aniack, it was decreed that they which enter into the Church, and heare the Scriptures, and doe abstaine from the Communion, should be removed from the Church, till they have amended this fault. Which although in the first Councell at Toletum it was either somewhat qualified, or at least set forth in milder words, yet is there also decreed, that they, which when they have heard the Sermon, are found never to communicate, should be warned: if after warning they abstaine, they should be debarred from it.

45 Verily by these ordinances the holie men meant to retaine and maintaine the often use of the Communion, which often use they had received from the Apostles themselves, which they saw to bee most wholesome for the faithfull, and by little and little by the negligence of the common people to grow out of use, Augustine testifieth of his owne time: The Sacrament (saith he) of this thing, of the unicie of the Lords body, is somewhere daily, somewhere by certaine distances of the daies, prepared unto the Lords table, and is there received at the table, to some unto life, to other some unto destruction. And in the first Epistle to Januaris: some doe daily communicate of the body and bloud of the Lord: some receive it at certaine daies: in some places there is no day let passe wherein it is not offered: in some other places onely upon the Saturday and the Sunday, and in some other places never but on the Sunday. But so much as the common people was (as wee have said) somewhat sick, the holie men did call earnestly upon them with sharp rebukings, least they should seeme to winke at such slothfulness. Such an example is in Chrysostome upon the Epistle to the Ephe-sians. It is not said unto him that dishonoured the banquet: wherefore didst thou sit downe? but wherefore diddest thou come in? Whosoever is not partaker of the mysteries, hee is wicked and shamelesse for that hee standeth here present. I beseech you if any be called to a banquet, watheth his hands, sitteth downe, seemeth to prepare himselfe to eat, and then doth taste of nothing: shall hee not shame both the banquet, and the maker of the banquet? So thou standing among them that with prayer doe prepare themselves to receive the holie meat, hast even in this that thou hast not gone away, confessed that thou are one of the number of them, at the last thou dost not partake: had it not been better that thou hadst not beene present? Thou wilt say, I am unworthy. Therefore neither wast thou worthy of the communion of prayer, which is a preparing to the receiving of the holy mysterie.

46 And truly this custome, which commandeth to communicate yeerely once, is a most certaine invention of the divell, by whose ministerie soever it was brought in. They say that Zepherinus was authour of that decree, which it is not likely to have beene such as wee now have it. For hee by his ordinance did peradventure not after the worst manner provide for the Church, as the times then were. For it is no doubt but that then the holy Supper was set before the faithfull so oft as they came together in assemblie, neither is it any doubt but that a good part of them did communicate. But when it scarcely at any time happened that all did communicate together, and whereas it was necessarie that they which were mingled with prophane men and idolaters, should by some outward signe testifie their faith: the holy man for order and policies sake, appointed that day, wherein the whole people of Christians should by partaking of the Lords Supper utter a confession of their faith. The ordinance of Zepherinus being otherwise good hath beene evill wrested of them that came after, when a certaine law was made of one communicating yeerely: whereby it is come to passe, that almost all men when they have once communicate, as though they had gaily discharged themselves for all the rest of the yeere, sleepe soundly on both eares.

The first beginnings of slacknesse to communicate.

In 6 cap. Johan. tract. 26.

In cap. r. Hom. 16. 12.

The custome of yeerely once receivinge perverse.

It ought to have bene farre otherwise done. Every weeke at the left, the Lords table should bee set before the assemblie of the Christians : the promises should be declared, which might feed us spiritually at it : none should indeed be compelled by necessitie, but all should bee exhorted and pricked forward : the sluggishness also of the slothfull should be rebuked. All should by heapes, as hungrie men, come together to such dainties. Not without rightfull cause therefore at the beginning I complained, that by the craft of the devill this custome was thrust in, which when it appointeth one certaine day of the yeere, maketh men slothfull for all the rest of the yeere. We see indeed that this perverse abuse was crept in even in the time of Chryostome : but wee may also therewithall see how much it displeated him. For hee complaineth with grievous words in the same place which I even now alleadged, that there is so great inequality of this matter, that often in some times of the yeere they came not even when they were cleane, but at Easter they came even when they were uncleane. Then he cryeth out : O custome, O presumption. Then in vaine is the daily offering used : in vaine we stand at the Altar : there is none that partaketh together with us. So farre is it off that he allowed it by his authoritie adjoyned to it.

An ordinance to take away halfe this Sacrament from the people.

47 Out of the same shop proceeded also another ordinance, which hath stolen away or violently taken away the halfe of the Supper from the better number of the people of God, namely the signe of the bloud, which being denied to lay and profane men (for with such titles forsooth they set out Gods inheritance) became a peculiar possession to shaven and annointed men. It is the commandement of the eternall God, that all should drinke : which commandement man dare discontinue and repell with a new and contrary law, commanding that not all should drinke. And that these law-makers should not seeme to fight without reason against their God, they pretend perils that might happen if this holie cup were commonly given to all : as though those dangers had not bene foreseene and marked of the eternall wisedome of God. And then subtilly forsooth they reason, that the one is enough for both. For if (say they) it be the body, it is whole Christ, which cannot now be severed from his body. Therefore by accompanying the bodie containeth the bloud. Loe how our wit agreeeth with God, when it hath never so little begun with loose raines to be wanton and wilde. The Lord shewing bread saith that it is his body : when he sheweth the cup, hee calleth it his bloud. The boldnesse of mans reason cryeth out contrariwise, that the bread is the bloud, and the wine is the body : as though the Lord had for no cause severed his body from his bloud both in words and in signes : or as though it had ever been heard spoken that the body or bloud of Christ is called God and Man. Verily if hee had meant to signifie whole himselfe, hee might have said it is I : as he is wont to speake in the Scriptures, and not, this is my body, this is my bloud. But hee willing to help our weakenesse, did set the cup severally from the bread, to teach that he sufficeth no lesse for drinke than for meat. Now let one part be taken away, then we shall finde but the one halfe of the nourishments in him. Therefore, although it be true which they pretend, that the bloud is in the bread by way of accompanying, and againe, the body in the cup, yet they defraud godly soules of the confirmation of Faith which Christ delivereth us as necessary. Therefore bidding their subtilities farewell, we must hold fast the profit which is by the ordinance of Christ in the two earnestes.

Cavillous allegations (or defense) of the halfe communion.

48 I know indeed that the ministers of Satan doe here cavill, as it is an ordinarie thing with them to make mockery of the Scriptures. First they alleadged that of one bare doing ought not to bee gathered a rule whereby the Church should be bound to perpetuall observing. But they lye when they say that it was but a bare doing : for Christ did not onely deliver the cup, but also did institute that his Apostles should in time to come doe the same. For they are the words of a commander, Drink ye all of this cup. And Paul so rehearseth that it was a deede, that he also commendeth it for a certaine rule. Another starting hole is, that the Apostles alone were received of Christ to the partaking of this Supper whom hee had already chosen and taken into the order of the sacrificing Priests. But I would have them answer me to five questions, from which they shall not bee able to escape, but that they shall be easily convinced with their lyes. First, by what oracle have they this solution revealed, being so strange from the word of God? The Scripture reckoneth twelve that fare with Jesus : but it doth not so obscure the dignitie of Christ that it calleth them sacrificing Priests, of which name we will speake hereafter in place fit for it. Though he gave it then to the twelve, yet hee commanded that they should doe the same, namely, that they should so distribute it among them. Secondly, why in that better age, from the Apostles almost a thousand yeeres, were all without exception made partakers of both the signes? was the old Church ignorant what guests Christ had received to the Supper? It were a point of most desperate shamelesnesse, here to stick and dally in granting it to be true. There remaine the Ecclesiasticall histories, there remaine the bookes of the old writers, which minister evident testimonies of this matter. The flesh (saith Tertullian) is fed with the body and bloud of Christ, that the soule may be fattened with feeding upon God. How (saith Ambrose to Theodosius) wilt thou receive with such hands the holie body of the Lord? With what boldnesse wilt thou with thy mouth partake of the cup of the precious bloud? And Hierome saith. The Priests which make the Thanksgiving, and doe distribute the bloud of the Lord to the people. Crysostome. Not as in the old law the Priest did eat part, and the people part: but one body is set before all, and one cup. Those things that pertaine to the Thanksgiving are all common betwene the Priest and the people. The selfe same thing doth Augustine testifie in many places.

49 But why dispute I about a thing most knowne? Let all the Greeke and Latine writers bee read over: such testimonies shall each where offer themselves. Neither was this custome growne out of use, while there remained one drop of purenesse in the Church. Gregory, whom you may rightly say to have beene the last Bishop of Rome, teacheth, that it was kept in his time. What is the bloud of the Lambe, yee have now learned, not by hearing, but by drinking. His bloud is poured into the mouthes of the faithfull. Yea it yet endured foure hundred yeeres after his death, when all things were growne out of kinde. For neither was that taken onely for an usage, but also for an inviolable law. For then was in force the reverence of Gods institution; & they doubted not that it was sacriledge, to sever those things which the Lord had conjoynd. For thus saith Gelsus. We have found, that some receiving onely the portion of the holy body, doe abstaine from the cup. Let them without doubt, because they seeme to be bound with I wot not what superstition, either receive the Sacraments whole, or be debarred from them whole. For the dividing of this mylerie is not committed without great sacriledge. Those reasons of Cyprian were heard, which truly ought to move a Christian minde. How (saith he) doe we teach or provoke them to shed their bloud in the confessing of Christ, if we denie his bloud to them that shall fight? Or how doe wee make them fit for the cup of Martyrdome: if we doe not first in the Church by the right of communion admit them to drinke the cup of the Lord? Whereas the Canonists doe restraine that decree of Gelsus to the Priests, that is so childish a cavill that it neede not be confuted.

50 Thirdly, why did hee simply say of the bread, that they should eat: but of the cup, that they should all drinke? even as if hee had meant of set purpose to meete with the craft of Satan. Fourthly, if (as they would have it) the Lord vouchsafed to admit to his Supper onely sacrificing Priests, what man ever durst call to the partaking of it, strangers whom the Lord had excluded? yea and to bee partaking of that gift, the power whereof was not in their hands, without any commandement of him which onely could give it. Yea upon confidence of what warrant doe they use at this day to distribute to the common people the signe of the body of Christ, if they have neither commandement nor example of the Lord? Fifthly, did Paul yee, when he said to the Corinthians, that he had received of the Lord that which hee had delivered to them? For after ward hee declareth the thing that hee delivered, that all without difference should communicate of both the signes. If Paul received of the Lord, that all should bee admitted without difference: let them looke of whom they have received which doe drive away almost all the people of God: because they cannot now pretend God to bee the Authour of it, with whom there is nor yea and nay. And yet still for cloking of such abominations they dare pretend the name of the Church, and with such pretence defend it. As though either these Antichrists were the Church, which so easily tread under foote, scatter abroad, and destroy the doctrine and institution of Christ: or the Apostolike Church were not the Church, in which the whole force of religion flourished.

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

Of the Popish Masse, by which sacriledge the Supper of Christ hath not onely bene prophaned, but also brought to nought.

The sacrifice of the Masse being said to be a sacrificis propitiatorie, is nothing but a veere prophanation of the Supper of the Lord.

With these and like inventions Satan hath travelled, as by overspreading of darkenesse to obscure and defile the holy Supper of Christ, that at least the purenesse of it should not be kept still in the Church. But the head of horrible abomination was when hee advanced a signe, by which it might not onely be darkened and perverted, but being utterly blotted and abolished should vanish and fall out of the remembrance of men: namely when he blinded almost the whole world with a most pestilent error that they should beleeve that the Masse is a sacrifice and oblation to obtaine the forgiveness of sinnes. How at the beginning the soulder sort of the schoolemen tooke this doctrine, I nothing regard: farewell they with their crabbed subtleties: which howsoever they may be defended with cavilling, yet are therefore to be refused of all good men, because they doe nothing else but spread much darkenesse over the brightnesse of the Supper. Therefore bidding them farewell, let the readers understand that I here match in sight with that opinion, wherewith the Romish Antichrist and his Prophets have infected the whole world, namely that the Masse is a worke wherby the sacrificing Priest which offereth up Christ, and the other that doe partake at the same oblation, doe deserve the favour of God: or that it is a cleansing sacrifice, whereby they reconcile God to themselves. Neither hath this bene received onely in common opinion of the people, but the very doing it selfe is so framed, that it is a kind of pacifying wherewith satisfaction is made to God for the purging of the quick and dead. The words also which they use, doe expresse the same: and no other thing may we gather of the daily use of it. I know how deepe rootes this pestilence hath taken, under how great seeming of goodnes it lurketh, how it beareth in shew the name of Christ, how in the one name of Masse many beleeve that they comprehend the whole summe of faith. But when it shall be by the word of God most cleerely proved, that this Masse, how much soever it must be coloured and glorious, yet shamefully dishonoureth Christ, burieth and oppresseth his crosse, putteth his death in forgetfulnesse, taketh away the fruit that commeth thereof unto us, doth weaken and destroy the Sacrament wherein was left the memorie of his death: shall there then bee any so deepe rootes, which this most strong axe, I meane the word of God, shall not cut downe and overthrow? Is there any face so beautifull, that this light cannot bewray the evill which lurketh under it?

2 Let us therefore shew that which hath bene set in the first place, that in it is intolerable blasphemie and dishonour done to Christ. For he was consecrate of his Father a Priest and bishop, not for a time as we read that they were ordained in the old testament, whose life being mortall their Priesthood also could not bee immortal: for which cause also there needed successours that should from time to time bee put in the place of them that died. But in place of Christ, which is immortal, there needeth no vicar to be set after him. Therefore he was ordained of the Father a Priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedech, that he should execute an everlasting Priesthood. This mystery had bene long before figured in Melchisedech, whom when the Scripture had once brought in for the Priest of the living God, it never afterward made mention of him, as though he had had no end of his life. After this point of likeness, Christ was called a Priest according to his order. Now they that doe daily sacrifice, must needs appoint Priests to make the oblations whom they must appoint as it were successours and vicars in stead of Christ. By which putting in stead of him, they doe not onely spoile Christ of his honour, and plucke from him the prerogative of eternall Priesthood, but also travell to thrust him downe from the right hand of his Father, on which hee cannot sit immortal, but that hee must therewithall remaine the eternall Priest.

Neither let them say for themselves that their petty sacrificers are not put in place of Christ as if he were dead, but onely are helpers of his eternall Priesthood, which ceaseth not therefore to continue. For they are more strongly holden fast with the words of the Apostle, than that they may escape : namely, that there were many other Priests made, because they were by death letted to continue. Therefore there is but one that is not letted by death, and he needeth no companions. Yet, such is their forwardnesse, they armethemselfes with the example of Melchisedech to defend their wickednesse. For, because it is said that hee offered bread and wine, they gather that he was a foreshewing of their Masse : as though the likenesse betweene him and Christ were in the offering of bread and wine. Which is so emprie and trilling that it needeth no confutation. Melchisedech gave bread and wine to Abraham and his companions, to refresh them being wearie after their journey and battle. What is this to a sacrifice? Moses praisth the gentlenesse of the holy King : these fellowes unreasonably coynce a mysterie whereof no mention is made. Yet they deceitfully paint their error with another colour, because it followeth by and by after. And he was the priest of the highest God. I answer, that they wrongfully draw to the bread and wine that which the Apostle referreth to the blessing. Therefore when hee was the Priest of God hee blessed Abraham. Whereupon the same Apostle (than whom wee need to seeke no better expositor) gathereth his excellencie, because the lesser is blessed of the greater. But if the oblation of Melchisedech were a figure of the sacrifice of the Masse, would the Apostle, I pray you, which searcheth out all euen the least things, have forgotten so earnest and weighty a thing? Now (howsoever they trifle) they shall in vaine goe about to overthrow the reason which the Apostle himselfe bringeth, that the right and honour of sacrificing Priesthood ceaseth among mortall men, because Christ which is immortall, is the onely and perpetuall sacrificing Priest.

3 Another vertue of the Masse was, that it oppresseth and burieth the crosse and passion of Christ. This verily is most certaine, that the Crosse of Christ is overthrowen so soone as the Altar is set up. For if hee offered himselfe for a sacrifice upon the Crosse, that hee might sanctifie us for ever, and purchase to us eternall redemption : undoubtedly the force and effectualnes of that sacrifice continueth without any end. Otherwise wee should thinke nothing more honourably of Christ, than of oxen and calves which were sacrificed under the law : the offerings whereof are proved uneffectuall and weake by this that they were oft renewed. Wherefore either we must confesse, that the sacrifice of Christ, which hee fulfilled upon the Crosse, wanted the force of eternall cleansing; or that Christ hath made an end of all with one sacrifice once for ever. This is it that the Apostle saith, that this chiefe Bishop Christ once appeared by offering up of himselfe before the ending of the world, to the driving away of sinne. Againe, that we are sanctified by the will of God, by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once. Againe, That Christ with one oblation for ever hath made perfect them that are sanctified : whereunto hee adjoyneth a notable sentence, that forgiveness of sins being once purchased, there remaineth no more any oblation. This also Christ signified by his last saying and uttered among his last gaspings, when hee said, it is ended. Wee are wont to note the last sayings of men when they are dying, for oracles. Christ dying, testified that by his owne sacrifice is perfired and fulfilled whatsoever was for our salvation. Shall it be lawfull for us daily to patch innumerable sacrifices to such a sacrifice, (the perfection whereof hee hath so shiningly set forth) as though it were imperfect? When the holy word of God not only affirmeth, but also cryeth out; and protesteth, that this sacrifice was once fully done that the force thereof remaineth everlasting : who so require another sacrifice, doe they not accuse this of imperfection and weaknesse? But as for the Masse, which hath beene delivered in such sort that there may every day bee made a hundred thousand sacrifices, to what end tendeth it; but that the passion of Christ whereby hee offered him an onely sacrificed oblation to the Father, should lye buried and drowned? Who, unlesse he be blind, cannot see that it was the boldnesse of Satan, which wrestled against so open and cleare truth? Neither am I ignorant with what deceits that Father of lying useth to colour this his fraude, saying that there are not sundry nor divers sacrifices, but that one selfe same sacrifice crifice is repeated. But such smokes are easily blowne away. For in the whole discourse the Apostle travelleth to prove : not onely that there are no other sacrifices, but that that one sacrifice was once offered up, and shall no more be repeated. The subtiller men doe yet slip out at a narrower hole, saying, that it is not a repeating but an applying. But this Sophisticall argument also is no lesse easily confuted. For neither did Christ once offer up himselfe with this condition : that his sacrifice should be daily confirmed with new oblations : but that by the preaching of the Gospell, and ministring of the holy Supper, the fruit thereof should be communicated unto us. So Paul saith that Christ our Paschever was offered up, and biddeth us to eate of him. This (I say) is the meane whereby the Sacrifice of the Crosse is rightly applied to us, when it is communicated to us to take the use of it, and we with true faith receive it.

4 But it is worth the labour to heare, with what other foundation beside these they uphold the sacrifice of the Masse. For they draw to this purpose the Prophecie of Malachie, whereby the Lord promisseth that the time shall come when throughout the whole world there shall bee offered to his name incense and a cleane sacrifice. As though it were a new or unwonted thing among the Prophets, when they speake of the calling of the Gentiles to expresse by the outward ceremonie of the law the spirittuall worshipping of God, to which they exhort them, that they might the more familiarly declare to the men of their age, that the Gentiles should be called into the true fellowship of religion. Like as also they are wont altogether to describe by figures of their law, the truth that was delivered by the Gospell. So they set for turning to the Lord, ascending into Jerusalem : for the worshipping of God, the offering of all kindes of gifts : for larger knowledge of him which was to be given to the faithfull in the kingdome of Christ, dreames and visions. That therefore which they alleadge, is like unto another Prophecie of Esay, where the Prophet foretelleth of three Altars to be set up in Assyria, Ægypt, and Iurie. For first I aske, whether they doe not grant that the fulfilling of this Prophecie is in the kingdome of Christ. Secondly, where be these Altars, or when were they ever set up. Thirdly whether they thinke that to every severall kingdome is appointed a severall Temple, such as was that at Jerusalem. These things if they weigh, I thinke they will confesse, that the Prophet under figures agreeable with his time, prophecieth of the spirituall worship of God to be spread abroad into the whole world. Which we give to them for a solution. But of this thing such there doe every where examples commonly offer themselves, I will not buse my selfe in longer rehearfall of them. Howbeit herein also they are miserably deceived, that they acknowledge no sacrifice but of the Masse, whereas indeed the faithfull doe now sacrifice to the Lord, and doe offer a cleane offering, of which shall be spoken by and by.

5 Now I come downe to the third office of the Masse, where I must declare how it blotteth out the true and onely death of Christ, and shaketh it out of the remembrance of men. For as among men the strength of a Testament hangeth upon the death of the Testatour : so also our Lord hath with his death confirmed the Testament whereby hee hath given us forgiveness of finnes and eternall righteousness. They that dare varie or make new any thing in this Testament, doe denie his death, and hold it as it were of no force. But what is the Masse, but a new and another divers Testament? For why? Doth not every severall Masse promise new forgiveness of finnes, new purchasing of righteousness : so that now there be so many Testaments, as there be Masses? Let Christ therefore come againe, and with another death confirme this Testament, or rather with infinite deaths confirme innumerable Testaments of Masses. Have not I therefore said true at the beginning, that the onely and true death of Christ is blotted out by Masses? Yea what shall wee say of this that the Masse directly tendeth to this end, that if it be possible, Christ should be slaine againe? For where is a Testament (saith the Apostle) there of necessitie must be the death of the Testatour. The Masse sheweth it selfe to be a new Testament of Christ : therefore it requireth his death. Moreover the hoste which is offered, must necessarily be slaine and sacrificed. If Christ in every severall Masse be sacrificed, then hee must at every moment be in a thousand places cruelly slaine. This is not mine but the Apostles files argument. If he had needed to offer himselfe oft, hee must oft have died since the beginning of the world. I know that they have an answer in readinesse, whereby also they charge us with slander. For they say that that is objected against them which they never thought, nor yet can. And wee know, that the death and life of Christ is not in their hand. We looke not whether they goe about to kill him: onely our purpose is to shew, what manner of absurditie followeth of their ungodly and wicked doctrine. Which selfe thing I prove by the Apostles owne mouth. Though they cry out to the contrarie a hundred times, that this sacrifice is unbloudie: I will denie that it hangeth upon the will of men, that sacrifices should change their nature, for by this meane the holy and inviolable ordinance of God should faile. Whereupon followeth that this is a sure principle of the Apostle, that there is required shedding of blood, that washing may not be wanting.

6 Now is the fourth office of the Masse to be entreated of, namely to take away from us the fruit that came to us of the death of Christ, while it maketh us not to acknowledge it and thinke upon it. For who can call to minde that hee is redeemed by the death of Christ, when hee seeth a new redemption in the Masse? Who can trust that finnes are forgiven him: when he seeth a new forgivenesse? Neither shall he escape that shall say, that wee doe for no other cause obtaine forgivenesse of finnes in the Masse, but because it is already purchased by the death of Christ. For he bringeth nothing else than as if he should boast, that Christ hath redeemed us with this condition, that wee should redeeme our selves. For such doctrine hath bene spread by the ministers of Satan, and such at this day they maintaine with cryings out with sword and fire, that we when in the Masse we offer up Christ to his Father, by this worke of offering doe obtaine forgivenesse of finnes, and are made partakers of the passion of Christ. What now remaineth to the passion of Christ, but to be an example of redemption, whereby wee may learne to be our owne redeemer? Christ himselfe, when in the Supper hee sealeth the confidence of pardon, doth not bid his Disciples to sticke in that doing, but sendeth them away to the sacrifice of his death: signifying that the Supper is a monument or memoriall (as the common speech is) whereby they may learne that the satisfactorie cleansing sacrifice, by which the Father was to be appeased, must have bene offered but once. For neither is it enough to know that Christ is the onely sacrifice, unlesse the onely sacrificing be joynd with it, that our faith may be fastned to his croffe.

7 Now I come to the conclusion, namely that the holy Supper, in which the Lord had left the remembrance of his passion graven and expressed, is by the setting up of the Masse, taken away, defaced, and destroyed. For the Supper it selfe is the gift of God, which was to be received with thanksgiving. The sacrifice of the Masse is faigned to pay a price to God, which he may receive for satisfaction. How much difference there is betwene to give and to receive, so much doth the sacrifice differ from the Sacrament of the Supper. And this truly is the most wretched unthankfulnesse of man, that where the largenesse of Gods bountie ought to have bene acknowledged, and thanks to be given, therein he maketh God his debtor. The Sacrament promised, that by the death of Christ wee are not onely once restored into life, but are continually quickned, because then all the parts of our salvation were fulfilled. The sacrifice of the Masse singeth a farre other song, that Christ must bee daily sacrificed, that hee may somewhat profit us. The Supper should have bene distributed in the common assemblie of the Church, that it might informe us of the communion whereby wee all cleave together in Christ Jesus. The sacrifice of the Masse dissolveth and plucketh in sunder this communitie. For after that the errour grew in force, that there must be sacrificers that should sacrifice for the people, the Supper of the Lord as though it were posted over to them, ceased to bee communicated to the congregation of the faithfull, according to the commandement of the Lord. An entrie was made open to private Masses, which might rather resemble a certaine excommunication, than that same communitie ordained of the Lord, when that pettie sacrificer willing severally by himselfe to devour his sacrifice, doth sever himselfe from the whole people of the faithfull. I call private Masse (least any man be deceived) wheresoever there is no partaking of the Lords Supper among the faithfull, although otherwise a great multitude of men be present.

The death of Christ made unfruitfull by the sacrifice of the Masse.

The Sacrament of that holy Supper thereby defaced and destroyed.

8 And whence the very name of Masse first sprung, I could never certainly judge: saving that it seemeth to me likely that it was taken of the offerings that were given. Whereupon the old writers use it commonly in the plural number. But to leave striving about the name, I say that private Masses are directly against the ordinance of Christ, and therefore they are a wicked prophaning of the holy Supper. For what hath the Lord commanded us? not to take, and divide it among us? What manner of observing of the commandment doth Paul teach? not the breaking of bread, which is the communion of the bodie and blood? Therefore when one taketh it without distributing, what likenesse is there? But that same one man doth it in the name of the whole Church. By what commandment? Is not this openly to mocke God, when one man privately taketh to himselfe that which ought not to have bene done but among many? But because the words of Christ and Paul are plaine enough, we may briefly conclude, that wheresoever is not breaking of bread to the communion of the faithfull, there is not the Supper of the Lord, but a false and wrongfull counterfeiting of the Supper. But a false counterfeiting is a corrupting. Now the corrupting of so great a mysterie is not without wickednesse. Therefore in private Masses is a wicked abuse. And (as one fault in religion from time to time breedeth another) after that that manner of offering without communion was once crept in, by little and little they began in every corner of Churches to make innumerable Masses, and diversly to draw the people hither and thither, which should have come together into one assemblie, that they might reknowlege the mysterie of their owne unitie. Now let them goe and denie it to be idolatrie, that in their Masses they shew forth bread to be worshipped in stead of Christ. For in vaine they boast of those promises of the presence of Christ, which howsoever they be understood, verily were not given to this purpose, that wicked and prophane men so oft as they will, and to whatsoever abuse they list, may make the bodie of Christ: but that the faithfull, when with religious observation they doe in celebrating of the Supper follow the commandment of Christ, may enjoy the true partaking of him.

9 Beside that, this perversnesse was unknowne to the purer Church. For howsoever the more shamelesse sort among our adversaries doe here goe about to disguise the matter with false colours, yet it is most sure that all antiquitie is against them, as we have afore proved in other things, and it may more certainly be judged by the continuall reading of old writers. But ere I make an end of speaking of it, I aske our Massing doctors, such they know that obedience is more esteemed of God than oblations, and that hee more requireth that his voice bee harkened to, than that sacrifices bee offered: how they beleve that this manner of sacrificing is acceptable to God, whereof they have no certaine commandment, and which they see not to be allowed by any one syllable of the Scripture. Moreover when they heare the Apostle say, that no man taketh to himselfe the name and honour of sacrificing priesthood, but hee that is called as Aaron was: yea and that Christ himselfe did not thrust in himselfe, but obeyed the calling of his Father: either they must bring forth God the Authour and ordainer of their sacrificing Priesthood, or they must confesse that the honour is not of God, into which they have with wicked rashnesse broken in uncalled. But they cannot shew one title of a letter that maintaineth their sacrificing Priesthood. Why therefore shall not their sacrifices vanish away which cannot be offered without a Priest?

11 Yet do we not deny but that the offering up of Christ is there so shewed in us, that the spectacle of the Crosse is in a manner set before our eyes: as the Apostle saith that Christ was crucified in the eyes of the Galatians, when the preaching of the Crosse was set before them. But forasmuch as I see that those old fathers also wrested this remembrance another way than was agreeable with the institution of the Lord, (because their supper contained I wot not what repeated or at least renewed forme of sacrificing) the safest way for godly hearts shall bee to rest in the pure and simple ordinance of God: whose also the supper is therefore called, because in it his authoritie alone ought to be in force. Truly sith I finde that they have kept a godly and true sence of this whole mysterie, and I doe not perceive that they meant to abate any thing were it never so little from the onely sacrifice of the Lord, I cannot condemne them of ungodlinesse: yet I thinke that they cannot be excused, but that they have offended somewhat in the manner of the celebration. For they counterfeited the Jewish manner of sacrificing more neerely than either Christ had ordained, or the nature of the Gospell did beare. Therefore that same overthrowing appliance to heavenly things is the onely thing wherin a man may worthily blame them, for that being not contented with the simple and naturall institution of Christ, they swarved to the shadows of the law.

12 If a man doe diligently weigh, that this difference is put by the word of the Lord betweene the sacrifices of Moses, and our Thanksgiving, that whereas those did represent to the Jewish people, the same effectualnesse of the death of Christ, which is at this day delivered to us in the Supper, yet the manner of representing was divers. For in those, the Leviticall priests were commanded to figure that which Christ should performe: there was brought a sacrifice which should be in the stead of Christ himselfe: there was an altar whereupon it should bee offered: Finally all things were so done, that there was set before their eyes an image of the sacrifice which was to bee offered to God for a satisfactorie cleansing. But since the time that the sacrifice is ended the Lord hath appointed to us another order: namely, that it should convey to

The faithfull people the fruit of the sacrifice offered to him by the sonne. Therefore hee hath given us a table whereat we should eat, not an altar wherupon sacrifice should bee offered: hee hath not consecrated priests to sacrifice, but Ministers to distribute the holy banquet. How much more high and holy the mystery is, so much more religiously and with greater reverence it is meet to be handled. Therefore there is no way safer than putting away all boldnesse of mans understanding, to stick fast in that alone, which the Scripture teacheth. And truly if wee consider that it is the Supper of the Lord and not of men, there is no cause why we would suffer our selves to be removed one haire's breadth from it by any authority of men or prescription of yeeres. Therefore when the Apostle minded to cleanse it from all faults which had readie crept into the Church of the Corinthians, he useth the readiest way thereunto, that is, he calleth it backe to the only institution of it, from whence he sheweth that a perpetuall rule ought to be fetched.

1 Cor. 11. 20.

The name of sacrifice, two kinds thereof in the law, in the Gospel, two other thereunto answerable.

13 Now lest any wrangler, should stirre us up strife by reason of the names of sacrifice and sacrificing priest, I will also declare, but yet briefly what in the whole discourse I have meant by a sacrifice, and what by a sacrificing priest. Who so stretch the word sacrifice to all holy Ceremonies and doings of Religion, I see not by what reason they do it. We do know that by the continuall use of the Scripture a sacrifice is called that which the Greeks call sometime Thusia, sometime Prophora, sometime Telete. Which being generally taken comprehendeth whatsoever is in any wise offered to God. Wherefore we must make distinction: but yet so that this distinction may have a supernall appliance of similitude from the sacrifices of the law of Moses: under the shadowes whereof the Lord willed to represent to his people the whole truth of sacrifices. Of those although there were divers formes, yet they may all be referred to two sorts. For either there was oblation made for sinne after a certaine manner of satisfaction, whereby guiltinesse was redeemed before God: or it was a signe of the worshipping of God, and a testifying of religion: sometime in stead of supplication, to crave the favour of God: sometime in stead of thanksgiving, to testify thankfulness of minde for benefits received: sometime only for an exercise of godlinesse, to renew the stablishing of the covenant, to which latter sort pertained burnt offerings, drinke offerings, oblations, first fruits, and peace offerings. Wherefore let us also divide ours into two kinds; and for teachings sake let us call the one the sacrifice of worship and of godly devotion, because it consisteth in the honouring and worshipping of God, which the faithfull both owe and yeeld unto him: or, if you will, the sacrifice of Thanksgiving: for as much as it is given to God of none but of them that being laden with immeasurable benefits, do render to him themselves with all their doings. The other may be called propitiatory or of expiation. The sacrifice of expiation is that which tendeth to appeale the wrath of God, to satisfie his judgement, and so to wash and wipe away finnes: whereby the sinner cleaned from the filthy spots of them, and restored into purity of righteousness, may returne into favour with God himselfe. So in the law those were called sacrifices that were offered for the purging of finnes: nor for that they were sufficient to recover the favour of God, or to put away iniquity: but for that they shadowed out such a true sacrifice which at length was fully done by Christ alone: and by him alone, because it could be done by none other: and once, because the effectualnesse and force of that one sacrifice which Christ hath fully done, is eternall, as he himselfe hath testified with his owne mouth, when he said that it was ended and fulfilled: that is to say, that whatsoever was necessary to the reconciling of the fathers favour, to the obtaining of the forgiveness of finnes, to righteousness and to salvation, all the same was performed and fulfilled with that his onely oblation, and there so nothing wanted thereof, that there was afterward no place left to any other sacrifice.

Exod. 29. 3.

John 19. 30.

In the sacrifice of the Masse Christ blasphemed and sold, the sacrificer himselfe not authorized.

14 Wherefore I determine, that it is a most wicked reproch, and blasphemous not to be suffered, as well against Christ as against the sacrifice which hee hath fully done by his death upon the crosse for us, if any man by renewing an oblation thinke to purchase the pardon of finnes, to appeale God, and to obtaine righteousness. But what is else done by Massing, but that by deserving of new oblation we may be made partakers partakers of the passion of Christ. And that there might bee no measure of madding, they thought it but a small thing to say that there is made indifferently a common sacrifice for the whole Church, unless they further said that it is in their choice to apply it peculiarly to this man or that man to whom they would, or rather to every one who-soever he were that would buy for himselfe such ware with ready money. Now because they could not reach to the price that Judas had, yet that they might in some marke resemble their author, they kept the likeness of number. Judas sold him for thirty silver pence: these fellows sell him after the French account, for thirty brazen pence: but Judas sold him once, these fellows sell him as oft as they can finde a buyer. In this sense also we deny that they be sacrificing priests, that is to say, they that with such an oblation are meanes to God for the people, they that appeasing God, may purchase the satisfactory purging of finnes. For Christ is the onely Bishop and sacrificing priest of the new Testament, into whom all priesthoods are removed, and in whom they be shut up and ended. And if the Scripture had made no mention of the eternall priest-hood of Christ: yet forasmuch as God, since that hee hath taken away those old priest-hoods, hath ordained none, the Apostles argument remaineth invincible, that no man taketh honour to himselfe, but he that is called of God. By what assistance there-fore dare these robbers of God, that boast themselves for the butchers of Christ, call themselves the sacrificing Priests of the living God?

15 Plato hath an excellent place in his second booke of common weale. Where when he entreateth of the old manners of expiation, and laugheth to scorne the foolish confidence of evill men and wicked doers, which thought that their wicked doings were by these as by coverings hidden that the gods could not see them, and did, as if they had gotten warrant of the gods by covenant, more carelesly follow their owne lusts: hee seemeth throughly to touch the manner of satisfactory. purging of the Masse, such as is at this day in the world. To beguile and undermine another man, all men know to be unlawfull. To grieve widowes with wrongfull dealings, to rob the fatherlesse, to trouble the poore, by evill craftie meanes to catch other mens goods to themselves, with forswearings and deceits to enter forcibly into any mans possessions; to oppresse any man with violence and tyrannous feare, all men confesse to be wicked: How therefore dare so many commonly do all these things, as though they should freely be bold to doe them? Truly, if we rightly weigh it, no other cause doth so much encourage them, but because they have confidence, that by the sacrifice of a Masse, as by payment of full price for recompence, they shall satisfie God, or at the least that this is an easie way to compound with him. Then Plato proceedeth further to scorne their grosse blockishnesse, which thinke that by such satisfactorie cleansing those paines are redeemed that otherwise they should suffer in hell. And whereto serve at this day the yearely obites, and the greater part of Masses, but that they which throughout all their life have bene most cruell tyrants, or most ravenous robbers, or given forth to all mischievous doings, should as though they were redeemed by this price, escape the fire of purgatory?

16 Under the other kinde of sacrifice, which we have called the sacrifice of thanksgiving, are contained all the dutifull workes of charity, which when wee extend to our brethren, wee honour the Lord himselfe in his members: then, all our prayers, praifings, giving of thanks, and whatsoever we doe to the worshipping of God. All which things finally doe hang upon the greater sacrifice, whereby we are in soule and body hallowed to be a holy Temple to the Lord. For neither is it enough, if our outward doings be applied to the obeying of him: but first our selves, and then all that is ours ought to be consecrate and dedicate to him: that whatsoever is in us, may serve his glory, and may favour of zealous endeavour to advance it. This kind of sacrifice tendeth nothing at all to appease the wrath of God, nothing at all to obtaine forgiveness of finnes, nothing at all to deserve righteousness: but is occupied onely in magnifying and extolling of God. For it cannot be pleasant and acceptable to God, but at their hands, whom by forgiveness of finnes already received hee hath by other meanes reconciled to himselfe, and therefore acquitted them from guiltinesse. But it is so necessary for the Church, that it cannot bee away from it. Therefore it shall bee everlasting, so long as the people of God shall continue, as wee have before already shewed out of the Prophet: for in that meaning I will take this propheticke. For from the rising of the Sunne to the going downe thereof, great is my name among the Gentiles, and in every place incense shall be offered to my name, and a cleane offering: because my name is terrible among the Gentiles, saith the Lord: so farre is it off, that we would put it away. So Paul biddeth us to offer our bodies a sacrifice living, holy, acceptable to God, a reasonable worship. Where he spake very pithily, when he added that this is our reasonable worshipping: for he meant the spirituall manner of worshipping of God, which hee did secretly set in comparison against the carnall sacrifices of the law of Moses. So liberall doing of good and communicating, are called sacrifices by which God is pleased. So the liberality of the Philippians, whereby they had relieved the poverie of Paul, is called a sacrifice of sweet smelling. So all the good works of the faithfull are called spirituall sacrifices.

17 And why do I seeke out many examples? For commonly this manner of speaking is often to be found in the Scriptures. Yea and while the people of God was yet holden under the outward schooling of the law, yet the prophets did sufficiently expresse, that under those carnall sacrifices was the truth, which the Christian Church hath in common with the nation of the Jewes. After which manner David prayed, that his prayer might as incense ascend into the sight of God. And Osee called giving of thanks, the calves of lips, which in another place David calleth the sacrifices of praise. Whom the Apostle himselfe following, calleth them also the sacrifices of praise, and expoundeth them the fruits of lips confessing to his name. This kind of sacrifice the Supper of the Lord cannot want: wherein when we declare his death and render thanksgiving, wee doe nothing but offer the sacrifice of praise. Of this office of sacrificing, all wee Christians are called a kingly priesthood: because by Christ wee offer to God that sacrifice of praise of which the Apostle speaketh, the fruit of lips that confess to his name. For neither do we with our gifts appear in the sight of God without an intercessour, Christ is he, which being the Mediator coming betweene, we offer us and ours to the Father. He is our Bishop, which being entred into the sanctuary of heaven, hath opened the entrie to us. He is the altar, upon which wee lay our gifts, that in him we may be bold all that we are bold. It is hee (I say) that hath made us a kingdome and Priests to the Father.

Masse a great deceiver of the world.
Revel. 1. 6.

18 What remaineth, but that the blinde may see, the deafe may heare, children themselves may understand this abomination of the Masse? which being offered in a golden cup, hath made drunke the kings and people of the earth from the highest to the lowest, hath so stricken them with drownesse and giddinesse, that being become more senselesse than bruit beasts, they have set the whole ship of their safetie onely in this deadly devouring gulfe. Truly Satan never did bend himselfe with a stronger engine then this to assaile and vanquish the kingdome of Christ. This is the Helene for whom the enemies of the truth fight at this day with so great rage, so great furiousnesse, so great crueltie: and a Helene indeed, with whom they so defile themselves with spirituall whoredome, which is the most cursed of all. I doe not here so much as once touch with my little finger those grosse abuses wherewith they might colour the unholie purenesse of their holy Masse: how filthie marketings they use, how dishonest gaines they make with their massings, with how great ravening they fill their covetousnesse. Onely I doe point unto, and that with few and plain words, what manner of thing is even the very holiest holinesse of the Masse, for which it hath deserved in certaine ages past to be so honourable and to be had in so great reverence. For to have these so great mysteries set out according to their worthinesse, requireth a greater worke: and I am unwilling to mingle herewith those filthie uncleanneses that commonly shew themselves before the eyes and faces of all men, that all men may understand, that the Masse taken in her most picked purenesse, and wherewith it may be set out to the best shew, without her appendances, from the roote to the top swarmeth full of all kind of wickednesse, blasphemie, idolatrie, and sacriledge.

* The Sacrament in the Church but only by Priests, and the Lords Supper.

19 * The readers now have in a manner almost all those things gathered into an abridgement, which wee have thought behoovefull to be knowne concerning these two Sacraments: the use of which hath bene delivered to the Christian Church from the beginning of the new Testament, to continue to the very end of the world: namely, that Baptisme should be as it were a certaine entry into it, and an admission into faith: and the Supper should be as it were a continuall food, wherewith Christ spiritually feedeth the family of his faithfull. Wherefore as there is but one God, one faith, one Christ, one Church, his body: so there is but one Baptisme, and is not oft ministred againe. But the Supper is from time to time distributed, that they which have bene once received into the Church, may understand that they be continually fed with Christ. Beside these two as there is no other sacrament ordained of God, so neither ought the Church of the faithfull to acknowledge any other. For that, it is not a thing that lieth in the choise of man to raise and set up new sacraments, he shall easily understand that remembreth that which hath been here before plainly enough declared, that is, that sacraments are appointed of God to this end, that they should instruct us of some promises of his, and testifie to us his good will toward us: and he also that calleth to minde, that none hath bene Gods counsellor, that might promise us any certainty of his will, or assure us, and bring us out of care, what affection he beareth toward us, what hee will give, or what he will deny us. For therewith is also determined; that no man can set forth a signe to be a testimony of any will or promise of his: it is hee himselfe alone, that can by a signe give testifie to us of himselfe. I will speake it more briefly, and peradventure more grossly, but more plainly, A Sacrament can never be without promise of salvation. All men gathered on a heape together can of themselves promise nothing of our salvation. Therefore neither can they of themselves set forth or set up a Sacrament.

20. Therefore let the Christi in Church bee contented with these two, and let her not openly nor admit or acknowledge any third for the present time, but also not desire or looke for any to the end of the world. For whereas certaine diverse Sacraments, beside those their ordinarie ones, were given to the Jewes according to the divers course of times, as Manna, Water springing out of the rocke, the Brazen Serpent and such other: they were by this change put in minde that they should not stay upon such figures whose state was not very stedfast: but that they should looke for some better thing from God, which should continue without any decaying and without any end. But we are in a farre other case, to whom Christ is openly shewed: in whom all the treasure of knowledge and wisdom are hidden with so great abundance and plenty, that either to hope for or looke for any new encrease to these treasures, is verily to move God to wrath, and provoke him against us. We must hunger for, seeke looke upon, learne, and throughly learne Christ alone, untill that great day shall appeare, wherein the Lord shall openly shew to the full the glory of his kingdome, and himselfe such as hee is, to be beholden of us. And for this reason this our age is in the Scripture signified by the last houres, the last dayes, the last times, that no man should deceive himselfe with vaine looking for any new doctrine of revelation. For many times and in many sorts hee spake before the Prophets, in these last dayes the heavenly Father hath spoken in his beloved Sonne, which onely can manifestly shew the Father: and indeed hee hath manifestly shewed him to the full, so much as becometh us, while we now behold him by a glasse. As therefore this is now taken away from men, that they cannot make new Sacraments in the Church of God: so it were to be wished, that as little as were possible of mans invention might be mingled with those Sacraments that are of God. For like as when water is powred in, the wine departeth and is allayed: and as with leaven scattered among it, the whole lumpe of dough waxeth fower: so the purenesse of the mysteries of God is nothing else but defiled when man addeth any thing of his owne. And yet we see how farre the Sacraments are swarved out of kinde from their naturall pureness, as they be handled at this day. There is each where too much of pompes, ceremonies and gesturings: but of the word of God in the meane time there is neither any consideration or mention, without which even the Sacraments themselves are not Sacraments. Yea and the very ceremonies that are ordained of God, in so great a rout cannot once lift up their head, but lie as it were oppressed. How little is that scene in Baptisme, which only ought there to have shined and beene looked upon, as we have in another place rightfully complained, even Baptisme it selfe? As for the Supper, it is utterly buried, since that it hath beene turned into the Masse, saving that it is seene once every yeete but in a mangled and halfe torne fashion.

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER.

Of the five falsely named Sacraments: where is declared, that the other five which have beene hitherto commonly taken for Sacraments, are no Sacraments: and then is shewed what manner of things they be.

A Sacrament defined to be a visible signe of invisible grace, and thus applied in the schoole of Rome to five other, be fals, whose two before handled.

Our former discourse concerning Sacraments might have obtained this with the sober and willing to learne, that they should not over curiously proceed any further, nor should without the word of God embrace any other Sacraments beside those two which they knew to be ordained of the Lord. But forasmuch as that opinion of the seven Sacraments, being commonly used in all mens talke, having wandered through all schooles and preachings, hath by very ancientie gathered roots, and is yet still settled in the minds of men: I thought that I should doe a thing worth the travell, if I should severally and more neerely search those other five that are commonly aduumberd among the true and naturall Sacraments of the Lord, and wiping away all deceitfull colour, should set them forth to bee seene of the simple such as they bee, and how falsely they have beea hitherto taken for Sacraments. First, I here protest to all the godly, that I doe not take in hand this contention about the name for any desiring of striving, but that I am by weighty causes led to fight against the abuse of it. I am not ignorant that Christians are Lords; as of words, so of all things also, and therefore may at their will apply words to things, so that a godly fence be kept, although there be some unproperesse in the speaking. All this I grant: although it were better that the words should be made subject to things, than things to the words. But in the name of Sacrament there is another consideration. For they which make seven Sacraments, doe therewithall give to them all this definition, that they be visible formes of invisible grace: they make them altogether vessels of the holy Ghost: instruments of giving of righteousnesse, causes of the obtaining of grace. Yea and the master of the featences: himselfe deneth that the Sacraments of the Law of Moses are properly called by this name, becaule they did not deliver indeed the thing that they figured. Is it, I beseech you, to bee suffered, that those signes which the Lord hath hallowed with his owne mouth, which he hath garnished with excellent promises, should not bee accounted for Sacraments: and in the meane time this honour should be conveighed away to those usages which men either have devised of themselves, or at least doe observe without expresse commandement of God? Therefore either let them change the definition, or let them abstaine from the wrongfull using of this word, which doth afterward engender false opinions and full of absurdity. Extreame anointing (say they) is a figure and cause of invisible grace, because it is a Sacrament: If wee ought in no wise to grant that which they gather upon it, then truly wee must resist them in the name it selfe, lest thereby wee admit that it may give occasion to such an error. Againe when they would prove it to beea Sacrament, they adde this cause, for that it consisteth of the outward signe and the word. If wee finde neither commandement nor promise of it, what can wee doe else but cry out against them?

2. Now appeareth that wee brawle not about the word, but doe move a controversie not superfluous concerning the thing it selfe. Therefore this we must strongly hold fast that wee have with invincible reason before confirmed, that the power to institute a Sacrament is in the hand of none but of God onely. For a Sacrament ought with a certaine promise to raise up and comfort the consciences of the faithfull: which could never receive this certaintie from man. A Sacrament ought to bee to us a witnessing of the good will of God toward us, whereof none of all men or Angels can be witness, forasmuch as none hath been of Gods counsell. Therefore it is hee alone which doth with right authoritie testifie of himselfe to us by his Word. A Sacrament is a seale, wherewith the testament or promise of God is sealed. But it could not be sealed with bodily things and elements of this world, unlesse they be by the power of God framed and appointed thereunto. Therefore man cannot ordaine a Sacrament, because this is not in the power of man, to make that so great mysteries of God should lie hid-den under so base things. The word of God must goe before, which may make a Sacrament to be a Sacrament, as Augustine very well teacheth. Moreover it is profitable that there be kept some difference between the Sacrament and other ceremonies, unlesse we will fall into many absurdities. The Apostles prayed kneeling: therefore men shall not kneele without a Sacrament. It is said that the disciples prayed toward the East: therefore the looking into the East shall be a Sacrament. Paul willeth men in every place to lift up pure hands, and it is rehearsed that holy men often times prayed with their hands lifted up, then let the lifting up of hands also be made a Sacrament. Finally, let all the gestures of the holy ones turne into Sacraments. Howbeit I would not also much passe upon these things, if so that they were not joynd with those other greater discommodities.

Rom. 11. 34.

3 If they will presse us with the authority of the old Church, I say that they pretend a false colour. For this number of seven is no where found among the Ecclesiasticall writers: neither is it certaine at what time it first crept in. I grant indeed that sometime they be very free in using the name of a Sacrament: but what mean they thereby? even all ceremonies and outward rites, and all exercises of godlinesse. But when they speake of those signes that ought to be witnesses of the grace of God towards vs, they are contented with these two, Baptisme, and the Supper. Let any man should thinke that I falsely boast of this, I will here rehearse a few testimonies of Augustine. To Lamentius he saith, First I would have thee to hold fast that which is the chief point of this disputation, that our Lord Christ (as hee himselfe saith in the Gospell) hath made us subject to a light yoke and a light burden. Wherefore hee hath bound together the fellowship of the new people with Sacraments very few in number, very easie in observing, very excellent in signification. As are Baptisme hallowed in the name of the Trinity, and the communicating of the body and blood of the Lord; and whatsoever else is set forth in the Canonick Scriptures. Againe, in his booke of Christian doctrine. Since the Lords resurrection, the Lord himselfe and the doctrine of the Apostles hath delivered certaine few signes in stead of many, and those most easie to be done, most reverend in understanding, most pure in observing: as is Baptisme and the celebrating of the body and blood of the Lord. Why doth he here make no mention of the holy number, that is, of the number of seven? It is likely that he would have passed it over, if it had bene at that time ordained in the Church, specially sith he is otherwise in observing of numbers more curious than need were? Yea, when he nameth Baptisme and the Supper, and speaketh nothing of the rest: doth he not sufficiently signifie, that these two mysteries doe excell in singular dignity, and that the other ceremonies doe rest beneath in a lower degree? Wherefore I say that these Sacramentary Doctors are destitute not onely of the word of the Lord, but also of the consent of the old Church, how much soever they glory of this pretence. But now let us come downe to the speciall things themselves.

Of Confirmation.

4 This was the manner in old time, that the children of Christians, when they were growne to age of discretion should be brought before the Bishop: that they would fulfill that duty which was required of those that being growne in yeares did offer themselves to Baptisme. For these sate among those that were to be catechised, till being fully instructed in the mysteries of the faith, they could make a confession of their faith before the Bishop and the people. Therefore they that were baptised being infants, because they had not then made confession of their faith before the Church, were about the end of their child-hood, or in the beginning of their yeeres of discretion presented againe by their parents, and were examined of the Bishop according to the forme of the Catechisme, which they had then certaine and common. And that this doing, which otherwise ought worthily to be grave and holy, might have the more reverence and dignitie, there was added also the Ceremonies of laying on of hands. So that same child, his faith being allowed, was let goe with solemne blessing. The old writers doe oft make mention of this manner. Leo the Pope writeth: If any returne from Hereticks, let him not be baptised againe (but which he wanted among the Hereticks) let the vertue of the spirit bee given him by the Bishops laying on of his hands. Here our adversaries will erie out that it is rightfully called a Sacrament, in which the holy Ghost is given, but Leo himselfe doth in an other place declare what hee meaneth by those words: Who so (saith he) is baptised among hereticks, let him not be re-baptised; but with calling upon the holy Ghost, let him be confirmed with the laying on of hands: because he received onely the forme of Baptisme without sanctifying. Hierome also maketh mention of it, writing against the Luciferians. But although I doe not denie that Hierome some what erreth therein, for that he saith that it is an observacion of the Apostles: yet he is most farre from these mens follies; and the very same also he qualifieth, when he addeth, that this blessing is given to the Bishops onely, rather in honour of their priesthood, than by the necessitie of law. Therefore such laying on of hands, which is done simply in stead of blessing, I praise and would that it were at this day restored to the pure use thereof.

For confirmation as at this day
they use it in the Church of Rome,
there is in the word of God no warrant.

5. But the latter age having in a manner blotted out the thing it selfe, hath let I wot not what feigned confirmation for a Sacrament of God. They have feigned that the vertue of confirmation is, to give the holy Ghost to the increase of Grace, which in baptisme were new begotten to life. This Confirmation is celebrate with amoyning, and with this forme of words, I signe thee with the signe of the holie crosse, and confirme thee with the chrefime of salvation, in the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holie Ghost. All this is gaily and triuoly done. But where is th the word of God, that may promise here the presence of the holy Ghost? They cannot bring forth one title. Whereby then will they certifie us, that their chrefime is the vessell of the holy Ghost? We see oyle, that it is a thicke and fat liquor and nothing else: Let the word (saith Augustine) be added to the element, and there shall bee made a Sacrament. Let them (I say) bring forth this word, if they will have us in the oyle to look upon any thing but the oyle. If they did acknowledge themselves ministers of the Sacraments, as they ought, we needed to strive no longer. This is the first law of a minister, that he doe nothing without commandement. Go to, let them bring forth any commandement of this point of ministerie, and I will not speake one word more. If they have no commandement, they cannot excuse their boldnesse full of sacriledge. After this manner the Lord asks the Pharisees, whether the baptisme of John were from heaven or from men: if they had answered from men, then hee had made them confesse that it was trifling and vaine: if from heaven, then were they compelled to acknowledge the doctrine of John. Therefore lest they should too much slander John; they durst not confesse that it was from men. If therefore Confirmation bee from men, it is proved to bee vaine and trifling: if they will perswade us that it is from heaven, let them prove it.

Acts 8. 17.

6. They doe indeed defend themselves with the examples of the Apostle, whom they thinke to have done nothing rashly. This is well indeed: neither would wee blame them, if they shewed themselves followers of the Apostles. But what did the Apostles? Luke reporteth in the Acts that the Apostles which were at Hierusalem, when they heard that Samarita had received the Word of God, sent thither Peter and John: they prayed for the Samaritanes, that they might receive the holy Ghost, which was not yet come into any of them, but they were baptised onely in the name of Jesus: when they had prayed, they laid their hands upon them: by which laying on, the Samaritanes received the holy Ghost. And of this laying on of hands he divers times maketh mention. I heare what the Apostles did: that is, they faithfully executed their ministerie. The Lord willed that those visible and wonderfull graces of the holie Ghost, which he then powred out upon his people, should be ministered and distributed of his Apostles by the laying on of hands. But under this laying on of hands: I thinke there was not contained any higher myserie, but I expound it, that they adjoynd adjoynd such a ceremony, that by the very outward doing they might signifie, that they commended, and as it were offered to God him upon whom they laid their hands. If this ministry which the Apostles then executed, were yet still remaining in the Church, the laying on of hands also ought to be kept. But since the same grace hath ceased to bee given, whereto serveth the laying on of hands? Truly the holy Ghost is yet present with the people of God, without whom being guider and director, the Church of God cannot stand. For we have the eternall promise and which shall ever stand in force, by which Christ calleth to himselfe them that thirst, that they may drinke living waters. But those miracles of powers, and manifest workings, which were distributed by the laying on of hands have ceased, neither behooved it that they should be but for a time. For it behooved that the preaching of the Gospell while it was new, should bee gloriously set forth and magnified, with unheard of, and unwonted miracles. From which when the Lord ceased, he did not by and by forsake his Church, but taught that the royaltie of his kingdome and the dignitie of his word was excellently enough disclosed. In what point therefore will these stage-players say that they follow the Apostles? They should have done it with laying on of hands, that the evident power of the holy Ghost might by and by shew forth it selfe. This they bring not to passe: why therefore doe they boast that the laying on of hands maketh for them, which wee reade indeed that the Apostles used, but altogether to another end?

John 7.37.

7. This hath like reason as if a man should teach that the breathing wherewith the Lord breathed upon his Disciples, is a Sacrament whereby the holy Ghost is given. But whereas the Lord did this once, hee did not also will that we should doe the same. After the same manner also the Apostles laid on their hands, during the time that it pleased the Lord that the visible graces of the holy Ghost should bee distributed at their prayers: not that they which come after, should onely player-like and without the thing indeed counterfeit an emptie and cold signe, as these Apes doe. But if they prove that in laying on of hands they follow the Apostles (wherein they have no like thing with the Apostles, saving I wor not what overthwart wrongfull counterfeiting) yet whence cometh their oyle which they call the oyle of salvation? Who taught them to seeke salvation in oyle? Who taught them to give to it the power of strengthening? Did Paul, which draweth us far away from the elements of the world, which condemneth nothing more than the sticking to such petty observation? But this I boldly pronounce not of my selfe, but from the Lord. Who so call oyle the oyle of salvation, they forswear the salvation which is in Christ, they deny Christ, they have no part in the kingdome of God. For oyle is for the belly, and the belly for oyle, the Lord shall destroy both. For all these weake elements, which decay with very use, belong nothing to the kingdome of God, which is spirituall, and shall never decay. What then? will some men say: doe you measure with the same measure, the water wherewith we be baptised, and the bread and wine under which the Supper of the Lord is given? I answer, that in Sacraments given of God, two things are to bee looked unto; the substance of the bodily thing which is set before us, and the forme that is by the word of God printed in it, wherein lieth the whole strength. In respect therefore that the bread, wine, and water that are in the Sacraments offered to our sight, doe keepe their owne substance, this saying of Paul alway hath place, Meat for the belly, and the belly for meates: God shall destroy them both. For they passe and vanish away with the fashion of this world. But in respect that they be sanctified by the word of God, that they may be Sacraments, they doe not hold us in the flesh, but doe truly and spirituallly teach us.

8. But let us yet more neerely looke into it, how many monsters this fat liquor fostereth and feedeth. These anointers say, that the holy Ghost is given in baptism, to innocencie: in confirmation, to increase of grace: that in Baptisme, we are new begotten into life: in confirmation, we are prepared to battell. And they are so past shame, that they deny that Baptisme can well be done without confirmation. O wickednesse! Are wee not therefore in Baptisme buried together with Christ, being made partakers of his death, that we may be also partners of his resurrection? But this fellowship with the death and life of Christ, Paul expoundeth to bee the mortifying of our flesh, and quickning of our spirit: for that our old man is crucified, that wee may walke in newnesse of life. What is to be armed to battell if this be not? If they counted it a matter of nothing to tread under feet the word of God: why did they not yet at least reverence the Church, to whom they will in every point seeme to obedient? But what can bee brought forth more strong against their doctrine, than that decree of the Millevian Council? Who so saith, that Baptisme is given onely for forgiveness of sinnes, and not for a helpe of grace to come, accused he be. But whereas Luke, in the place which we have alledged, saith that they were baptised in the name of Iesus Christ, which had not received the holy Ghost: he doth not simply deny that they were endued with any gift of the holy Ghost, which beleaved in Christ with heart, and confessed him with mouth: but meaneth of that receiving of the holy Ghost, whereby the open powers and visible graces were received. So is it said that the Apostles received the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, whereas it had been long before said unto them of Christ, It is not you that speake, but the Spirit of my Father which speaketh in you. Behold all ye that are of God, the malicious and poysonous deceit of Sathan. That thing which was truly given in Baptisme, he lyingly saith to be given in his confirmation, that he may by stealth leade you unaware from Baptisme. Who now can doubt that this is doctrine of Sathan, which cutting away from Baptisme the promises properly belonging to Baptisme, doth convey away and remove them, to another thing? It is found (I say) upon what manner of foundation this godly anointing standeth. The word of God is, that all they which are baptised in Christ, have put on Christ with his gifts. The word of the Anointers is, that they received in Baptisme no promise, by which they may be armed in battailes. That is the voice of truth, therefore this must be the voice of lying. Therefore I can more truly desire this confirmation than they have hitherto defined it: namely, that it is a notable slander of Baptisme, which darkeneth, yea abolisheth the use thereof: that it is a false promise of the Devill, which draweth us away from the word of God. Or if you will, it is oyle defiled with the lying of the Devill, which as it were by overspreading, of darkenesse deceiveth the eyes of the simple.

9 They adde furthermore, that all the faithfull ought after Baptisme to receive the holy Ghost by laying on of hands, that they may bee found full Christians: because he shall never be a Christian, that is not chrestmed with the Bishops Confirmation. These be their owne sayings word for word. But I had thought that whatsoever things pertained to Christianity, were all set forth in writing and comprehended in Scriptures. Now, as I perceive, the true forme of Religion is to be sought and learned from elsewhere than out of the Scriptures. Therefore the whole wisdom of God, the heavenly truth, the whole doctrine of Christ, doth but begin Christians, and oyle maketh them perfect. By this sentence are damned all the Apostles, and so many Martyrs, whom it is most certaine to have never bene chrestmed: forasmuch as the oyle was not yet made, which being powred upon them, they might fulfill all the parts of Christianitie, or rather might be made Christians which yet were none: But though I hold my peace, they do largely confute themselves. For how many of the number of their owne people doe they anoint after Baptisme? why therefore doe they suffer such halfe Christians in their flocke, whose imperfection might easily bee holpen? Why doe they with so carelesse negligence suffer them to omit that which was not lawfull to be omitted without grievous offence? Why doe they no more severely call upon the keeping of a thing so necessary, and without which salvation cannot bee obtained, unlesse peradventure some bee prevented by death? Verily when they so freely suffer to be despised, they secretly confesse that it is not of so great value as they boast it.

10 Last of all they determine that this holy anointing is to bee had in greater reverence than Baptisme: because this anointing is peculiarly ministred by the hands of the chiefe Bishops, but Baptisme is commonly distributed by every Priest. What may a man here say, but that they are utterly mad, which so flatter their owne inventions, that in comparison of them they carelesly despise the holy ordinances of God?

O mouth that robbest God, darest thou set a sac liquor onely defiled with the stinke of thine owne breath, and enchanted with murmuring sound of wordes, against the Sacrament of Christ, and to compare it with water hallowed with the word of God? But thy wickednesse accounted this but a small matter, unlesse thou didst also prefer it above the same. These be the answers of the holy sea, these be the oracles of the Apostolike trestle. But some of them, even in their owne opinion, began somewhat to qualifie this unbridled madnesse. It is (say they) to be worshipped with greater reverence: peradventure not for the greater vertue and profit that it giveth: but because it is given of the worthier men, and is made in the worthier part of the body, that is, in the forehead: or because it bringeth a greater increase of vertues, although Baptisme avails more to forgivenessse. But in the first reason do they not bewray themselves to be Donatits, which measure the force of the Sacrament by the worthinesse of the minister. But I will admit, that Confirmation be called the worthier by reason of the worthinesse of the Bishops hand. But if a man aske of them, from whence so great prerogative hath been given to Bishops, what reason will they bring besides their owne lust? The Apostles alone used that power, which alone distributed the holy Ghost. Are the Bishops alone Apostles? Yea are they Apostles at all? But let us also grant them that: why doe they not by the same argument affirme, that Bishops alone ought to touch the Sacrament of the blood in the Supper of the Lord: which they therefore denie to lay men, because the Lord gave to the Apostles alone? If to the Apostles alone, why do they not conclude: therefore to the Bishops alone? But in that place they make the Apostles, simple Priests: but now the giddinesse of their head carrieth them another way, suddenly to create them Bishops. Finally Ananias was no Apostle, to whom yet Paul was sent that he should receive his sight, be baptised, and be filled with the holy Ghost. I will adde this also to the heape. If by the law of God this was the proper office of Bishops, why have they been so bold to give it away to common Priests? as we reade in a certaine Epistle of Gregorie.

11 As for their other reason, how trifling, fond, and foolish is it, to call their confirmation worthier than the baptisme of God, because in it the forehead is anointed with oyle, and in baptisme the binder part of the head, as though baptisme were done with the oyle and not with the water? I call all the godly to witnesse, whether those Iosels doe not endeavour themselves to this onely end, to corrupt the purenesse of the Sacraments with their leaven. I have already spoken this in another place, that in the Sacraments, that which is of God, scarcely glimmereth through at holes, among the rout of the inventions of men, If any man did not beleve me therein, let him now beleve his owne Masters. Loe passing over the water, and making no account of it, they highly esteeme the onely oyle in baptisme. Wee therefore on the contrary side do say that in Baptisme the forehead also is dipped in water. In comparison of this, wee esteeme not their oyle worth one peece, whether it be in baptisme or in confirmation. If any alleadge that it is sold for more, by this adding of price, the goodnesse (if any were in it) is corrupted: so much lesse may they commend a most filthy deceit by theft. In the third reason they bewray their owne ungodlinesse, while they prate that in confirmation is given a greater increase of vertues than in Baptisme. By the laying on of hands the Apostles distributed the visible graces of the spirit. In what thing doe these mens sac liquor shew it selfe fruitfull? But away with these qualifiers, that cover one sacriledge with many sacriledges. It is like the Gordian: which it is better to breake in sunder, than to labour so much in undoing it.

12 But now when they see themselves destitute of the word of God and probable reason, they pretend as they are wont, that it is a most ancient observation and stablished by consent of many ages. Although that were true, yer they winne nothing thereby. A Sacrament is not from the earth, but from heaven: not from men, but from God alone. They must prove God to be the authour of their Confirmation if they will have it taken for a Sacrament. But why do they object antiquity, whereas the old writers, when they minde to speake properly, do no where reckon moe Sacraments than two? If a forresse of our faith were to be sought from men, wee have an invincible tower, that the old fathers never acknowledged those for sacraments which these men doe lyngly faigne to the sacraments. The old writers speake of laying on of hands : but doe they call it a Sacrament? Augustine plainly affirmeth that it is no other thing than prayer. Neither let them here barke against mee with their stinking distinctions, that Augustine meant that, nor of the laying on of hands used to confirmation, but which was used to healing or reconciliation. The booke remaineth and is abroad in the hands of men. If I wrest it to any other sence than Augustine himselfe wrote it, I give them leave after their ordinary manner to oppresse me, not onely with railing; but also with spitting at me. For he speaketh of them that returned from schisme to the unity of the Church. He denieth that they needed to be newly baptised: for hee saith, that the laying on of hands sufficeth, that by the bond of peace the Lord may give them the holy Ghost. But for as much as it might seeme an absurdity, that the laying on of hands should be done of new rather than Baptisme: he sheweth a difference. For (saith he) what other thing is the laying on of hands, than prayer upon a man? And that this is his meaning appeareth by another place, where he saith: Hand is laid upon Heretikes amended, for the coupling of Charitie, which is the greatest gift of the holy Ghost, without which whatsoever holy things are in man, they availe not to saluation.

13 But I would to God we did keepe still the manner which I have said to have bene in the old time, before that this untimely delivered image of a Sacrament was borne: not that it should be such a confirmation as they faigne, which cannot once be named without injury to baptisme: but a Catechising, whereby children or they that were neere to the age of discretion did declare an account of their faith before the Church. But it should be the best manner of Catechising, if a forme were written to that use, containing and familiarly setting out a summe in a manner of all the Articles of our Religion, in which the whole Church of the faithfull ought without controversie to agree: that a child being ten yeeres old should offer himselfe to the Church to declare a confession of his faith, should be examined of every article, and answer to every one: if hee were ignorant of any thing, or did not understand it, he might be taught. So should he before the Church witnessing and beholding it, professe the onely, true, and pure faith, wherewith the people of the faithfull doth with one minde worship the one God. If this discipline were at this day in force, truly the slothfulnesse of some parents would be whetted, who doe carelesly neglect the instruction of their children as a thing nothing belonging to them, which then without open shame they could not omit: there should bee among Christian people a greater consent of faith, and not so great ignorance and rudenesse of many: some should not be so rashly carried away with new and strange doctrines: finally all should have as it were a certaine orderly instruction of Christian learning.

Of Penance.

14 In the next place they set penance, of which they intreat so confusedly and disorderly, that consciences can beare away no sure or sound thing of their doctrine. We have already in another place declared at large what we have learned out of the Scriptures concerning repentance, and then what they also teach of it. Now we have this onely to touch, what reason they had that raised up the opinion, which hath heretofore reigned in Churches and Schooles, that it is a Sacrament. But first I will briefly say somewhat of the usage of the old Church, the pretence whereof they have abused to stablish their fained invention. This order they kept in publike penance, that they which had fully done the satisfaction enjoyed them, were reconciled with solemne laying on of hands. That was the signe of absolution, whereby both the sinner himselfe was raised up before God with trust of pardon and the Church was admonished gently to receive him into favour, putting away the remembrance of his offence. This Cyprian oftentimes calleth, to give peace. That this doing might be of great dignity, and have more commendation among the people it was ordained that the bishops authority should alway be used for the meane herein. From hence came that decree of the second Councill at Carthage: Be it not lawfull to a Priest at the Masse publikely to reconcile a penitent. And another decree of the Councill at Aranjium, let those which in time of their penance depart out of this life, be admitted to the Communion without the laying on of hands used in the reconciling: if they recover of their sicknes let them stand in the degree of penitents, and when the time is fully expired, let them receive of the Bishop the laying on of hands used in reconciling. Againe the decree of the third Councell at Carthage: Let not the Priest without the authoritie of the Bishop, reconcile a penitent. All these tended to this end, that the severitie which they would have to be used in that behalfe, should not with too much lenitie grow to decay. Therefore they willed the Bishop to be judge of it, which was likely that he would be more circumspect in the examination thereof. Howbeit Cyprian in a certaine place sheweth, that not onely the Bishop, but also the whole Clergie laid their hands on him. For thus he saith. At the full time they doe penance, then they come to the Communion, and by the laying on of hands of the Bishop and the Clergie they receive power to partake of the Communion. Afterward by proesse of time it came to this point, that beside publick penance they used this ceremonie also in private absolutions. Hereupon came that distinction in Gratian betweene publick and private reconciliation. I judge that some old usage of which Cyprian maketh mention, to have bene holy and healthfull for the Church, and I would that it were at this day restored. As for this latter, although I dare not disallow it, or speake more sharply against it, yet I thinke it to be lesse necessarie. Howsoever it be, yet we see that the laying on of hands in penance is a ceremonie ordained of men, not of God, which is to be set among meane things and outward exercises: and those verily which are not to be despised, but which ought to be in a lower degree than those that are commended unto us by the word of the Lord.

15 But the Romanists and Schoolemen, (which have an ordinarie custome to corrupt all things with wrong expounding them) doe here very carefully travell in finding out a Sacrament. Neither ought it to seeme any marvell, for they seeke a knot in a rush. But where they have it best, they leave a thing entangled in suspence, uncertaine, and confounded and troubled wih diversitie of opinions. They say therefore that the outward penance is a Sacrament, and if it bee so, that it ought to be taken for a signe of the inward penance, that is, of the contrition of heart, which shall bee the thing of the Sacrament: or that they both together are a Sacrament, not two Sacraments, but one full one. But, that the outward penance is onely the Sacrament: the inward is both the thing and the Sacrament: and that the forgiveness of sinnes is called the thing and not the Sacrament. Let them which keepe in remembrance the definition of a Sacrament which we have above set, examine thereby that which these men call a Sacrament, and they shall finde that it is not an outward ceremonie ordained of the Lord for the confirming of our faith. If they cavill that my definition is not a law which they need to obey: let them heare Augustine, whom they saigne that they esteeme as most holy. Visible Sacraments (saith hee) were ordained for carnall mens sake, that by degrees of Sacraments they may be conveighed from those things that are seene with eyes to those things that are understood. What like thing doe either they themselves see, or can they shew to other in that which they call the Sacrament of Penance? The same Augustine saith in another place: It is therefore called a Sacrament, because in it one thing is seene, and another thing is to be understood. That which is seene hath a bodily forme, that which is understood, hath a spirituall fruit. Neither doe these things in any wise agree with the Sacrament of Penance such as they saigne it, where there is no bodily forme that may represent a spirituall fruit.

16 And, to kill these beasts upon their owne fighting place, if there be any Sacrament here to be sought, may it not bee much more colourably said that the absolution of the Priest is a Sacrament, than Penance either inward or outward? for it might readily bee said, that it is a ceremonie to assure our faith of the forgiveness of sinnes, and hath a promise of the keys as they call it. Whatsoever yee shall binde or loose upon earth, shall be bound or loosed in heaven. But some man would have objected, that the most part of them that are absolved of the Priests obtaine no such thing by such absolution, whereas by their doctrine the Sacraments of the new law ought to worke indeed that which they figure. This were but to be laughed at. For, as in the Supper, they make a double eating, a Sacramentall eating, which is equally common to good and to evill, and a spirituall eating which is onely proper to the good: why might they not also faigne that absolution is received two wayes? Yet could I not hitherto understand what they meant with this their doctrine, which wee have already taught how far it disagreeeth from the truth of God, when we purposely intreated of that argument. Here my mind is onely to shew, that this doubt withstandeth not, but that they may call the absolution of the Priest a Sacrament. For they might answer by the mouth of Augustine that sanctification is without the visible Sacrament, and the visible Sacrament without inward sanctification. Again, that the Sacraments doe worke in the onely elect that which they figure. Again, that some doe put on Christ so farre as to the partaking of the Sacrament, other some to sanctification: the one, the good and evill equally doe: this other the good onely. Truly they have more than childishly erred and be blinded in the cleere sunne, which travelling with great hardnesse, yet espied not a thing so plaine and open to every man.

17 Yet least they should waxe too proud, in what part soever they set the Sacrament, I denie that it ought rightfully to bee taken for a Sacrament. First, because there is no speciall promise to it, which is the onely substance of a Sacrament. Again, because whatsoever ceremonie is here shewed forth, it is the meere invention of men; whereas wee have already proved that the ceremonies of Sacraments cannot be ordained but of God. Therefore it was a lie and deceit which they have invented of the Sacrament of Penance. This faigned Sacrament they have garnished with a meete commendation, calling it a second boord after shipwracke, because if a man have by sinning marred the garment of innocencie which hee received in Baptisme, he may by penance repaire it. But it is the saying of Hierom. Whosoever it be, it cannot be excused but that it is utterly wicked if it be expounded after their meaning. As though Baptisme bee blotted out by sinne, and is not rather to bee called to remembrance of every sinner, so oft as hee thinketh of the forgiveness of sinne, that he may thereby gather up himselfe, and recover courage, and strengthen his faith? that hee shall obtaine the forgiveness of sinnes which is promised him in Baptisme. But that which Hierome hath spoken hardly and unproperly, that by penance Baptisme is repaired (from which they fall away that deserve to be excommunicate from the Church) these good expositors draw to their wickednesse. Therefore you shall most sily speake, if you call Baptisme the Sacrament of Penance, sith it is given for a confirmation of grace, and seale of confidence, to them that purpose repentance. And least you should thinke this to be our devise, beside this that it agreeth with the words of the Scripture, it appeareth that it was in the old Church commonly spoken like a most certaine principle. For in the booke of Faith to Peter, which is said to be Augustines, it is called the Sacrament of Faith and of Penance. And why flee we to uncertaine sayings? As though we could require any thing more plaine, than that which the Evangelist reciteth: that Iohn preached the Baptisme of repentance unto forgiveness of sinnes?

Of Extreme unction as they call it.

18 The third faigned Sacrament is Extreme unction, which is not done but of the Priest, and that in extremes (so they terme it) and with oyle consecrate of the Bishop, and with this forme: By this holy anointing, and by his most kinde mercie, God pardon thee, whatsoever thou hast offended by seeing, by hearing, by smelling, feeling, tasting. They faigne that there be two vertues of it, the forgiveness of sinnes, and ease of bodily sicknesse if it be so expedient: if not, the salvation of the soule. They say that the institution of it is set of James, whose words are these: Is any sicke among you? Let him bring in the Elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oyle in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sicke man, and the Lord shall raise him up: and if he be in sinnes, they shall be forgiven him. Of the same sort is this anointing, of which wee have above shewed that the other laying on of hands is, namely a playlike hypocrisie, whereby without reason and without fruit they would resemble the Apostles. Marke rehearseth that the Apostles at their first sending, according to the commandement which they have received of the Lord, raised up dead men, cast out devils, cleansed leprous men, healed the sicke, and that in healing of the sicke they used oyle. They annointed (saith hee) many sicke men with oyle, and they were healed. Hereunto James had respect, when he commanded the Elders to bee called together to annoint the sicke man. That under such Ceremonies is contained no higher mystery, they shall easily judge which marke how great liberty the Lord and his Apostles used in these outward things. The Lord going about to restore sight to the blind man, made clay of dust and spittle, some he healed with touchings, other some with his word. After the same manner the Apostles healed some diseases with the word only, some with touching, other some with annointing. But it is likely that this annointing was not (as all other things also were not) causelessly put in ure, I grant: yet not that it should bee a meane of healing, but onely a signe, that the dulnesse of the unskillfull might be put in mind from whence so great power proceeded, to this end that they should not give the praise thereof to the Apostles. And that the holy Ghost and his gifts are signified by oyle it is a common and usuall thing. But that same grace of healing is vanished away, like as also the other miracles, which the Lord willed to bee shewed for a time, whereby he might make the new preaching of the Gospell marvellous for ever. Therefore though we grant never so much, that annointing was a Sacrament of those powers which were then ministered by the hands of the Apostles, it now nothing pertaineth to us to whom the ministrations of such powers is not committed.

19 And by what greater reason doe they make a Sacrament of this annointing, than of all other signes that are rehearsed to us in the Scripture? Why doe they not appoint some Syloah to swim in, whereinto at certaine ordinary recourses of time sicke men may plunge themselves? That (say they) should bee done in vaine. Truly no more in vaine than annointing. Why doe they not lye along upon dead men, because Paul raised up a dead child with lyeing upon him? Why is not clay made of spittle and dust, a Sacrament? But the other were but singular examples: but this is given of Iames for a commandment. Verily James spake for the same time, when the Church yet still enjoyed such blessing of God. They affirme indeed that there is yet still the same force in their annointing: but we find it other wise by experience. Let no man now marvel, how they have with such boldnesse mocked soules, which they know to be senselesse and blind when they are spoiled of the Word of God, that is, of their life and light: such they are nothing ashamed to goe about to mocke the living and feeling senses of the body. Therefore they make themselves worthy to be scorned, while they boast that they are endued with the grace of healings. The Lord verily is present with his in all ages, and so oft as need is he helpeth their sicknesses no lesse than in old time: but he doth not so utter those manifest powers, nor distributeth miracles by the hands of the Apostles: because this gift both was but for a time, and also is partly fallen away by the unthankfulnesse of men.

20 Therefore as not without cause the Apostles have by the signe of oyle openly testified, that the grace of healings committed to them was not their owne power, but the power of the holy Ghost: so on the other side they are wrong doers to the holie Ghost, which make a stinking oyle and of no force, to be his power. This is altogether like as if one would say that all oyle is the power of the holy Ghost, because it is called by that name in Scripture: that every dove is the holy Ghost, because hee appeared in that forme. But these things, let them looke too. So much as for this present it is enough for us, we doe most certainly perceive that their annointing is no Sacrament: which is neither a Ceremonie ordained of God, nor hath any promise. For when wee require these two things in a Sacrament, that it be a ceremonie ordained of God, and that it have a promise of God: we doe therewithall require that the same ceremonie be given to us, and that the promise belong unto us. For no man doth affirme that Circumcision is now a Sacrament of the Christian Church, although it both was an ordinance of God, and had a promise knit unto it: because it was neither commanded to us, nor the promise which was adjoynd to it was given to us with the same condition. That the promise which they proudly boast of in their annointing, is not given to us, we have evidently shewed, and they themselves declare by experience.

rience. The ceremonie ought not to have been used, but of them that were endued with the grace of healings, not of these butchers that can more skill of slaying and murdering than of healing.

21 Howbeit although they obtaine this, that that which James commandeth concerning anointing, agreeth with this age (which they are most farre from) yet even so they shall not have much prevailed in proving of their unktion wherewith they have hitherto annointed us. James willett that all sicke men be annointed; these men infect with their fat liquor, not sicke men, but corpses halfe dead, when the life lyeth alreadie labouring at the top of their lips, or (as they themselves terme it) in extremes. If they have in their Sacrament a present medicine, wherby they may either ease the sharpnesse of diseases, or at least may bring some comfort to the soule; they are too cruell that doe never heale in time. James willett that the sicke man be annointed of the elders of the Church: these men allow no annointer but the petty sacrificing Priest. Whereas they expound in James presbyters the Elders to bee Priests; and fondly say that the plural number is there set for comelincesse sake: that is but trifling: as though the Churches at that time abounded with swarms of sacrificing Priests; that they might goe in along pompous shew to carrie a Pageant of holy oyle. When James simply biddeth that sicke men be annointed, I understand by it none other annointing but of common oyle: and none other is found in Markes rehearsal. These men vouchsafe to have none other oyle, but that which is hallowed of the Bishop, that is to say, warmed with much breathing on it, enchanted with much mumbling, and with the knee bowed nine times saluted in this manner: thrise haile holy oyle; thrise haile holy Christe: thrise haile holy balme. One of whom have they sucked such conjurations? James saith; that when the sicke man is annointed with oyle, and prayer hath bene pronounced over him, if he be in finnes they shall be forgiven him; namely, that the guiltinesse being taken away, they may obtaine release of the paine; not meaning that finnes are put away with fat liquor, but that the prayers of the faithfull wherby the afflicted brother is commended to God, shall not be vaine. These men doe wickedly lye, that by their holy, that is to say, abominable annointing, finnes are forgiven. Lye how gaily they shall prevail, when they have bene at large suffered to abuse the testimony of James at their pleasure. And least we should need to travell long in proofs hereof, their owne Chronicles doe discharge us of this hardnesse. For they report, that Pope Innocentius which in Augustines time governed the Church of Rome, ordained that not only Priests, but also all Christians should use oyle to annoint for their necessity and others. Author hereof is Sigebert in his Chronicles.

Of Ecclesiasticall Orders.

22 The fourth place in their register hath the Sacrament of Order, but the same so fruitfull, that it breedeth out of it selfe seven litle Sacraments. But this is very worthy to bee laughed at; that whereas they affirme that there bee seven Sacraments, when they goe about to rehearse them, they reckon upon thirteene. Neither can they alleadge for themselves, that they are but one Sacrament, because they tend all to one Priesthood, and are as it were certayne degrees unto it. For sith it is evident, that in every one of them are severall Ceremonies, and they themselves say that there bee divers graces: no man can doubt but that they ought to bee called seven Sacraments, if there opinions bee received. And why strive wee about it as though it were a thing doubtfull, for as much as they themselves doe plainly and severally declare seven? But first wee will briefly knit up by the way, how many and how unfavoury absurdities they draff in unto us, when they goe about to commend to us their Orders in stead of Sacraments: and then wee will see whether the Ceremonie which Churches use in ordering of Ministers, ought to bee called a Sacrament at all. They make therefore seven Ecclesiasticall orders or degrees, which they garnish with the name of a Sacrament. Those bee dorekeepers, Readers, Exorcistes, Acoluthes, or followers, Subdeacons, Deacons, Priests. And seven they say that they bee, for the sevenfold grace of the holy Ghost, wherewith they ought to bee endued that are promoted unto them. But it is increased and more largely heaped to them in their promotion. Now

ifs. James did command annointing as a thing to continue in the Church, yet not annointing at ch unseasonable time, by such persons, with such oyle, in such persuasion, as the Church of Rome useth. Jan. 5. 14.

In their Sacrament of orders seven pettie Sacraments contained or as some of them doe thinke more.

Lib 4. Senz. dist. 34. cap. 9.

the number it self is hallowed with a wrongful expounding of the Scripture, when they thinke that they have read in Esay seven vertoes of the holy Ghost, whereas both indeed Esay there rehearseth but sixe, and also the Prophet meant not to comprehend them all in that place: for he is elsewhere as well called the Spirit of life, of sanctification, of adoption of the children, as hee is in that place called the Spirit of wisdom, of understanding, of counsell, of strength, of knowledge, and of the feare of the Lord. Howbeit some fabuller men, make not seven orders, but nine; after the likeness (as they say) of the Church triumphant. But among them also there is strife: because some would have the shaving of the cleargie to be the first order of all; and Bishopricke the last: other some excluding shaving altogether, reckon Archbishopricke among the orders; Isidore otherwise divideth them. For hee maketh Psalmitts and Readers to bee divers: hee appointeth the Psalmitts for songs, and the Readers to the reading of the Scriptures, wherewith the people may bee instructed. And this distinction is kept by the Canons. In so great diversity what will they have us to follow or flee? Shall wee say that there bee seven orders? So teacheth the master of the schoole: but the most illuminate doctors doe otherwise determine. Againe they also disagree among themselves. Moreover the most sacred Canons call us another way. Thus forsooth do men agree, when they dispute of godly matters without the word of God.

23. But this exceedeth all folly, that in every one of these they make Christ fellow with them. First (say they) he executed the office of dore-keeper, when hee did with a whip made of cords, drive the buiers and sellers out of the temple. Hee signifieth himselfe to be adore-keeper, when he saith, I am the dore. Hee tooke upon him the office of a Reader, when he read Esay in the Synagogue. Hee did the office of an Exorcist; when touching the tongue and eares of the deafe and dumbe man, hee restored to him his hearing. He testified himselfe to be an Acoluth or follower in these words. Hee that followeth mee walketh not in darkenesse. Hee executed the office of a Subdeacon, when being girded with a linnen cloth hee washed the disciples feet. Hee did beare the person of a Deacon, when hee distributed his Body and Blood in the Supper. Hee fulfilled the office of Priest, when hee offered himselfe upon the crosse a sacrifice to his Father. These things cannot so bee heard without laughing, that I marvell that they were written without laughing, if yet they were men that wrote them. But most notable is their subtiltie wherewith they play the Philosophers about the name of Acoluth, calling him a Ceroferar, a taper bearer with a word (as I thinke) of sorcery, truly such a one as was never heard of in all nations and languages, whereas Acoluthos in Greeke simply signifieth a follower. Howbeit if I should earnestly tarry in confuting these men, I should my selfe also worthily be laughed at, they are so trifling and very mockeries.

24. But that they may not bee able yet still with false colours to deceive even very silly women, their vanitie is by the way to bee uttered. They create with great pompe and solemnity their Readers, Psalmitts, Dorekeepers, Acoluthes, to execute those offices, whereunto they appoint very children, or those whom they call lay men. For who for the most part lighteth the candles, who powreth wine and water into the cruet, but a childe or some base fellow of the laity, that maketh his gaite thereof? Doe not the same men sing, Doe they not shut and open the Church dores? For who ever saw in their Temples an Acoluth, or Dorekeeper executing his office? But rather he that when hee was a boy did the office of an Acoluth, when hee is once admitted into the order of Acoluthes, ceaseth to bee that which hee beginneth to bee called, that they may seeme to will of purpose to cast off the office when they take upon them the rite. Behold why they have need to be consecrate by Sacraments, and to receive the holy Ghost, namely, that they may doe nothing. If they alleage for excuse, that this is the frowardnesse of times, that they forsake and neglect their ministeries: let them therewithall confesse that there is at this day in the Church no use nor fruit of their holy orders, which they marvellously advance, and that their whole Church is full of curse; because it suffereth tapers and cruets to bee handled of children and prophane men, which none are worthy to touch but they that are conse-

strate Acoluthes: and because it committeth the songs to children, which ought not to be heard but of a hallowed mouth. As for their Exorcists, to what end doe they consecrate them? I heare that the Jewes had their Exorcists: but I see that they were so called of the exorcismes or conjurations, which they used. Of these counterfeit exorcists who ever heard it spoken, that they shewed any example of their profession? It is fained that they have power given them to lay their hands upon mad men, that are to be catechised, and men possessed with devills: but they cannot persuade the devills that they have such power, because the devills doe not only not yeeld to their commandements, but also use commanding authority over them. For a man can scarcely find every tenth of them, that is not led with an evill Spirit. Therefore whatsoever things they babble concerning their petty Orders, they are patched together of foolish and unsavoury lies. Of the old Acoluthes, and Dorekeepers, and Readers, wee have spoken in another place, when we declared the order of the Church. Our purpose here is onely to fight against that new found invention of the sevenfold sacrament in Ecclesiasticall orders. Of which there is no where any thing read, but among these foolish praters the Sorbonists and Canonists.

25. Now let us consider of the ceremonies which they use about it. First whomsoever they receive into their order of soldiers, they doe with one common signe enter them into Clergie. For they shave them in the crowne, that the crowne may betoken kingly dignity, because Clerks ought to bee kings, that they may rule themselves and other. For Pe. 2. speaketh thus of them, Ye are a chosen kinde, a kingly priesthood, a holy nation, a people of purchase. But it was sacrileage to take to themselves alone that which is given to the whole Church, and proudly to glory of the title which they had taken from the faithfull. Peter speaketh to the whole Church: these fellows wrest it to a few shaven men: as though it were said to them alone: bee ye holy: as though they alone were purchased by the blood of Christ, as though they alone were by Christ made a Kingdome and Priesthood to God. Then they assigne also other reasons, the top of their head is made bare, that their mind may be declared to bee free unto the Lord, which with open face may behold the glory of God. Or that they may be taught that the faults of their mouth and their eies must bee cut off. Or the shaving of their head is the putting away of temporall things, and the haire combed about the crowne are the remnants of goods that are retained for their sustentance. All in signes: because forsooth the vaille of the temple is not yet cut in sunder. Therefore being persuaded that they have gaily discharged their duties, because they have figured such things by their crowne, of the very things indeed they performe nothing at all. How long will they mocke us with such false colours and deceits? The Clergie by shearing off a few haire doe signifie that they have cast away the abundance of temporall goods, that they behold the glory of God, that they have mortified the lust of the eares and eies: but there is no kind of men more ravening, more feosly dull, more lustfull. Why doe they not rather truly performe holinesse, than with false and lying signes counterfeyt a shew of it?

26. Moreover when they saw that the crowne of the Clergie hath the beginning and reason from the Nazarites: what other thing doe they alleadge than that their mysteries are sprung out of the Jewish ceremonies, or rather that they are mere Jewishnesse? But whereas they further say, that Priscilla, Aquila, and Paul himselfe, taking a vow upon them did sheare their heads, that they might bee purified: they bewray their grosse ignorance. For it is no where read of Priscilla: and of Aquila also it is doubtful: for that same shearing may as well be referred to Paul as to Aquila. But that wee may not leave to them that which they require, that they have an example of Paul: the simpler must note that Paul did never sheare his head for any sanctification, but onely to serve the weaknesse of his brethren. I am wont to call such vowes the vowes of charity not of godlinesse: that is to say, not taken in hand for any service of God, but to beare with the rudenesse of the weak: as hee himselfe saith, that he was made a Jew to the Jewes, &c. Therefore hee did this, and the same but once, and for a short time, that hee might for a time fashion himselfe to the Jewes. These men when they will without any use counterfeyt the purifying of the Nazarites, what do they else but raise up another Jewishness, when they wrongfully covet to follow the old Jewishness? With the same religiousness was that decreall Epistle made, which according to the Apostle, forbiddeth Clerkes that they should not suffer their haire to grow, but sheare it round like a boyles. As though the Apostle when he teacheth what is comely for all men, were careful for the round shearing of the Clergie. Hereby let the Readers consider, of what force and worthinesse are those other mysteriesthat follow, into which there is such an entrie.

27. Whence the shearing of Clerkes tooke beginning, appareth sufficiently even by Augustine alone. Whereas at that time none suffered their haire to grow: but oice men, and such as coveted a smoothnesse and trimnesse, not meese enough for men: it seemed to be a point of no good example, if that were permitted to the Clergie. Therefore Clerkes were commanded eather to sheare their head or to shaveit, that they should not beare any shew of woman-like trimming. But this was so common, that certaine Monkes, that they might the more set out their holinesse wih notable and severall attire from other men, did let their haire grow long. But afterward when the fashion turned to wearing of haire, and certaine nations were added to Christianisme which alway used to weare long haire, as Byzance, Germanie, and England: it is likely that Clerkes did every where sheare their heads, least they should seeine to covet the gainesse of haire. At the last in a corrupter age, when all old ordinances were either perverted or gone out of kinde into superstition, because they saw no cause in the shearing of the Clergie (for they had retained nothing but a foolish counterfeiting) they fled to a mysterie, which now they superstitiously thrust in unto us for the approving of their Sacrament. The doore-keepers at their consecration receive the keyes of the Church, whereby they may understand that the keeping of it is committed to them. The readers receive the holy Bible. The exorcists receive the formes of exorcismes, which they should use over mad men & them that are to bee catechised. The Acoluthes receive their tapers and cruets. Loe these are the ceremonies wherein (if God will) there is so much secre power, that they may be not onely signes and tokens, but also causes of invisible grace. For this they require by their definition, when they will have them taken among the Sacraments. But to make an end in few words, I say it is an absurditie that in their Schooles and Canons they make these lesser orders Sacraments: whereas even by their owne confession that teach this, they were unknowne to the primitive Church, and devised many yeeres after. For Sacraments, sith they containe the promise of God, cannot bee ordained of Angels, nor of men, but of God alone, whose office alone it is to give promise.

28. There remaine three orders, which they call the greater. Of the which, Subdeaconrie (as they call it) was removed into that number, since that the route of the smaller ones began to grow. But because they seeme to have a testimonie for these out of the Word of God, they doe peculiarly for honours sake, call them holy orders. But now it is to bee seene, how crookedly they abuse the ordinances of God to their pretence. Wee will begin at the order of the Priesthood or the sacrificers office. For by these two names they signifie one thing, and so they call them to whom they say that it pertaineth to offer upon the Altar the sacrifice of the bodie and blood of Christ, to pronounce prayers, and to blesse the gifts of God. Therefore at their consecration they receive the Paine with the hostes, for tokens of power given to them, to offer acceptable sacrifices to God. And their hands are anointed: by which signe they are taught, that they have power given them to consecrate. But of the Ceremonies wee shall speake hereafter. Of the thing it selfe I say: it so hath no title of the Word of God which they pretend, that they could not more wickedly corrupt the order set by God. First verily this ought to stand for a thing confessed (which wee have affirmed in entreating of the Popish Masse) that they are all wrong-doers to Christ, which call themselves sacrificing Priests, or offer a sacrifice of appeasment. Hee was appointed and consecrate of the Father a Priest with an oath, according to the order of Melchisedech, without any end, without any successour. Hee once offered a sacrifice of eternall satisfactorie cleansing, and reconciliation: and now also being entred into the sanctuarie of heaven, hee maketh intercession for us. In him we are all sacrificing Priests, but to praies and giuing of thanks, finally to offer us and ours to God. It was his singular office alone, with his offering to appease God, and to purge finnes. When these men take that upon them, what remaineth but that their sacrificing Priesthood is ungodly and full of sacriledge? Truly they are too wicked, when they dare garnish it with the name of a Sacrament. As touching the true office of Priesthood, which is commended to us by the mouth of Christ, I willingly account it in that degree. For therein is a ceremonie, first taken out of the Scriptures, then such a one as Paul testifieth not to be vaine nor superfluous; but a faithful signe of spirituall grace. But whereas I have not set it for a third in the number of Sacraments; I did it because it is not ordinarie and common among all the faithfull, but a speciall rite for one certaine office. But sith this honour is given to the Christian ministerie, there is no cause therefore why the Popish sacrificers should bee proud. For Christ commanded distributers of his Gospell and mysteries to bee ordained, not sacrificers to be consecrated. Hee gave them commandement to preach the Gospell and to feede the flocke, not to offer sacrifices. Hee promised them the grace of the Holy Ghost, not to make satisfactorie purging of finnes, but rightly to execute and to maintaine the government of the Church.

29 The ceremonies agree very well with the thing it selfe. Our Lord when hee sent forth the Apostles to preach the Gospell, did blow upon them. By which signe hee represented the power of the holy Ghost which he gave unto them. This blowing these good men have retained, and as though they did put forth the holy Ghost out at their throate, they whisper over their silly Priests that they make, Receive the holy Ghost. So leave they nothing which they do not overtwhartly counterfeit: I will not say like players (which use their gesturings neither without art nor without signification) but like Apes, which counterfeit every thing wantonly and without any choice. Wee keepe (say they) the example of the Lord. But the Lord did many things which hee willed not to be examples to us. The Lord said to the Disciples, Receive the holy Ghost. Hee said also to Lazarus, Lazarus come forth, Hee said to the Man sicke of the Palsie, Rise, and walke. Why doe not they say the same to all dead men and sicke of the Palsie? Hee shewed a prooffe of his divine power, when in blowing upon the Apostles hee filled them with the grace of the holy Ghost. If they goe about to doe the same thing, they enviously counterfeit God, and doe in a manner challenge him to strive with them: but they are far from the effect, and doe nothing with this foolish gesturing but mocke Christ. Verily they bee so shamelesse, that they dare affirme that they give the holy Ghost. But how true that is, experience teacheth, which crieth out that so many as bee consecrated Priests are of Horses made Asses, of fooles made mad men. Neither yet doe I strive with them for that: onely I condemne the ceremonie it selfe, which ought not to have bene drawne to be an example, forasmuch as it was used of Christ for a singular signe of one miracle: so farre it is off, that the excuse of following his example ought to defend them.

30 But of whom received they the anointing? They answer that they received it of the Sonnes of Aaron, from whom their order also tooke beginning. Therefore they had rather alway to defend themselves with wrongfull examples, than to confesse that themselves have devised that which they use without cause. But in the meane time they consider not, that while they professe themselves the successors of the Sons of Aaron, they are wrong doers of the Priesthood of Christ, which alone was shadowed and figured by all the old sacrificing Priesthoods. In him therefore they were all contained and fulfilled, in him they ceased, as wee have sometimes already repeated, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes without helpe of any glosses testifieth. But if they bee so much delighted with the ceremonies of Moses, why doe they not hastily take Oxen, Calves, and Lambes to make sacrifices? They have indeed a good part of the old Tabernacle and of the whole Jewish manner of worshipping: but yet this wanteth in their religion, that they doe not sacrifice Calves and Oxen. Who cannot see that this observation of anointing is much more hurtfull than Circumcision, especially when there is adjoynd superstition and Pharaisaicall opinion of the worthinesse of the worke? For the Jewes did set in Circumcision, trust of righteounesse: these men doe. for in anointing, spirituall graces: Therefore while they cover to be counterfaiers of the Levites; they are made Apostates from Christ, and doe put themselves from the office of Pastors.

31 This is (if God will) the holy oyle that printeth the marke that cannot be rased out. As though oyle could not be wiped away with dust and salt; or if it sticke fast, with sops. But this marke is spirituall. What hath oyle to doe with the Soule? Have they forgotten that which they oft chaunt to us out of Augustin, that if this word be taken from the water, it shall be nothing but water, and that it hath this from the word that it is a Sacrament? What word will they shew in their fat liquor? Will they shew the commandement that was given to Moser, concerning the anointing of the Sonnes of Aaron? But there is also commandement given, of the coate, the Ephod, the hat, the crowne of holinesse, with which Aaron was to be garnished, and of the coates, girdles, and miters, wherewith the sonnes of Aaron were to be clothed. There is commandement given, to kill a Calf, and barne the fat of him for incense, to cut Rammes and burne them, to sanctifie their eares and garments with the blood of another Ramme, and innumerable other observations, which being pist together, I marvel why the only anointing of oyle please them. But if they love to be sprinkled, why are they rather sprinkled with oyle than with blood? Forsooth they goe about a wittie thing, to make one Religion of Christianitie, Jewishnesse, and Paganisme, as it were of patches sowed together. Therefore their anointing stinketh which is without the sale; that is, the Word of God. There remaineth laying on of hands, which as I grant in true and lawfull Orderings to be a Sacrament, so I denie that it hath any part in this play, where they neither obey the commandement of Christ, nor have respect to the end whereunto the promise ought to lead us. If they will not have the signe denyed them, they must apply it to the thing it selfe, whereunto it is appointed.

32 About the order also of Diaconie I would not strive with them, if the true ministerie which was in the Apostles time and in the purer Church, were restored to the incorrupted state thereof. But what like thing have they whom those men feigne to be Deacons? I speake not of the men (least they should complaine that the doctrine is wrongfully weighed by the faulkes of the men) but I affirme that for those whom they deliver us by their doctrine; they unworthily fetch testimonie from the example of them whom the Apostolicke Church ordained Deacons. They say that it pertaineth to their Deacons to stand by the Priests, to minister in all things that are done in the Sacraments; namely in Baptisme, in the Chrefine, in the Patine, in the Challice; to bring in the offerings and lay them upon the Altar, to make ready the Lords Table, and to cover it; to carry the Crosse, to pronounce and sing the Gospell and Epistle to the people. Is here any one word of the true ministerie of Deacons? Now let us heare the instituting of them. Upon the Deacon that is ordered, the Bishop alone layeth his hand. He layeth a prayer booke and a Stoale upon his left shoulder; that he may understand that hee hath received the light yoke of the Lord, wherby hee may subdue to the feare of God those things that pertaine to the left side. Hee giveth him the text of the Gospell, that hee may perceive himselfe to be a publisier of it. And what belong these things to Deacons? They doe even like as if a man would say that hee ordained them Apostles whom hee appointed onely to burne frankincense, to trim the Images, to sweep the Churches, to catch Mice, to drive away Dogs. Who could suffer such kinde of men to be called Apostles, and to be compared with the very Apostles of Christ? Therefore let them not hereafter lyingly say that those be Deacons, whom they institute onely for their enterlude-like plays. Yea and by the very name it selfe they sufficiently declare what manner of office they have. For they call them Levites, and will have their order and beginning referred to the children of Levi. Which I give them leave to doe, so that they doe not afterward garrish them with the feathers of other.

33 Of Subdeacons to what purpose is it to speake? For whereas indeed they were in old time appointed for care of the poore, they assigne to them I wot not what trifling businesse, as to bring the Challice with the Patine, the little cruets with water, and

No reason why the Church of Rome should in the making of her Priests, use the ceremonie of anointing more than the rest, which were used in the making of Leviticall Priests: laying on of hands side in that which no commandment of God hath warranted. Exod. 30. 35.

the towell to the Altar, to powre water to wash hands, &c. Now whereas they speake of receiving and bringing in of offerings, they meane those which they devoure as abandoned to their holy use. With this office very well agreeth the forme of their consecrating. That he receive of the Bishop, the Patine and the Chalice: of the Archdeacon, the cruet with water, the manuale, and such other baggage. Within these trifles they require to have us confesse that the holy Ghost is enclosed. What godly man can abide to grant this? But, to make once an end, wee may determine the same of them that we doe of the rest. Neither need wee to repeat further these things that are above declared. This may be enough to teach the sober and willing to learne (whom I have taken in hand to instruct) that there is no Sacrament of God but where is shewed a Ceremonie joynd with a promise: or rather verily but where is a promise seen in a Ceremonie. Here is not found one syllable of any certaine promise: therefore it were in vaine to seeke a Ceremonie to confirme the promise. Againe of those Ceremonies that they use, it is not read that any one is institute of God. Therefore here can be no Sacrament.

Of Matrimonie.

34 The last is Matrimonie, which as all men confesse to be ordained of God, so no man untill the time of Gregorie ever saw that it was given for a Sacrament. And what sober man would ever have thought it? It is a good and holy ordinance of God, so tillage, carpentrie, shoemakers craft, barbers craft, are lawful ordinances of God, and yet they are no Sacraments. For there is not only this required in a Sacrament, that it be the worke of God, but that it be an outward Ceremonie appointed of God to confirme a promise. That there is no such thing in Matrimonie, very children also can judge. But (say they) it is a signe of the holy thing, that is, of the spirituall conjoyning of Christ with the Church. If by this word Signe, they understand a Token set before us of God to this end, to raise up the assurednesse of our faith, they are far beside the truth. If they simply take a signe for that which is brought to expresse a similitude, I will shew how wittily they reason. Paul saith, as one starre differeth from another star in brightnesse, so shall bee the resurrection of the dead. Loe here is one Sacrament. Christ saith, The kingdome of heaven is like a graine of mustard seed. Loe here is another. Againe, The kingdome of heaven is like unto leaven. Loe here is the third. Esay saith, Behold, the Lord shall feed his flocke as a shepherd. Loe here the fourth. In another place, The Lord shall goe forth as a Giant. Loe here is the fifth. Finally what end or measure shall there be? There is nothing but by this meane it shall be a Sacrament. How many parables & similitudes are in the Scripture, so many Sacraments there shall be. Yea and these shall be a Sacrament because it is written, the day of the Lord is like a theefe. Who can abide these Sophisters prating so foolishly? I grant indeed that so oft as wee see a Vine, it is very good to call to remembrance that which Christ saith, I am a Vine, ye be branches, my Father is the vine-dresser. So oft as shepherd with his flocke commeth toward us, it is good also that this come to our minde, I am a good shepherd, my sheepe heare my voice. But if any man adde such similitudes to the number of Sacraments, he is meet to be sent to Ancyra.

35 But they still lay forth the words of Paul, in which hee giveth to Matrimonie the name of a Sacrament: he that loveth his wife, loveth himselfe. No man ever hated his owne flesh, but nourisheth it and cherisheth it, even as Christ doth the Church: because we are members of his bodie, of his flesh and of his bones. For this a man shall leave his Father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh. This is a great Sacrament: but I say in Christ and in the Church. But so to handle the Scriptures, is to mingle heaven and earth together. Paul, to shew to married men what singular love they ought to beare to their wives, setteth forth Christ to them for an example. For as he powred forth the bowels of his kindnesse upon the Church which he had espoused to himselfe: so ought every man to be affectioned toward his owne wife. It followeth after, he that loveth his wife loveth himselfe: as Christ loved the Church. Now to teach how Christ loved the Church as himselfe, yea how he made himselfe one with his Spouse the Church, hee applyeth to him those things things which Moses reporteth that Adam spake of himselfe. For when Eva was brought into his sight, whom he knew to have beene shapen out of his side: This woman (sith hee) is a bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh. Paul testifieth that all this was spiritually fulfilled in Christ and us, when he saith that wee are members of his bodie, of his flesh, and of his bones, yea and one flesh with him. At length he addeth a concluding sentence, This is a great myserie. And least any man should be deceived with the double signifying of the words, hee expresseth that hee speaketh not of the fleshly conjoyning of man and woman, but of the spirituall marriage of Christ and the Church. And truly it is indeed a great myserie, that Christ suffered a rib to be taken from himselfe, whereof wee might be shapen: that is to say, when he was strong, he willed to be weake, that we might be strengthened with his strength: that now we may not our selves live, but he may live in us.

36 The name of Sacrament deceived them. But was it rightfull that the whole Church should suffer the punishment of their ignorance? Paul said Myserie: which word when the Translator might have left being not unasked with Latin eares, or might have translated it a Secret: hee chose rather to put in the word Sacrament, yet in no other sense than Paul had in Greeke called it a myserie. Now let them goe and with crying out raile against the skill of tongues, by ignorance whereof they have so long most fowly beene blinde in an easie matter, and such as offereth it selfe to be perceived of every man. But why doe they in this one place so earnestly sticke upon this little word Sacrament, and some other times doe passe it over unregarded? For also in the first Epistle to Timothie the Translator hath used it, and in the selfe same Epistle to the Ephesians: in everie place for Myserie. But let this slipping bee pardoned them: at least the yelers ought to have had a good remembrance. For, when they have once set out Matrimonie with title of a Sacrament, afterward to call it uncleannesse, defiling, and fleshly filthinesse, how giddy lightnesse is this? how great an absurditie is it to debarre Priests from a Sacrament? If they denie that they debarre them from the Sacrament, but from the lust of copulation: they escape not so away from mee. For they teach that the copulation it selfe is a part of the Sacrament, and that by it alone is figured the uniting that wee have with Christ in conformitie of nature: because man and woman are not made one but by carnall copulation. Howbeit some of them have here found two Sacraments: the one of God and the Soule; in the betrothed man and woman: the other of Christ and the Church, in the husband and the wife. Howsoever it be, yet copulation is a Sacrament, from which it is unlawfull that any Christian should bee debarred: Unlesse peradventure the Sacraments of Christians doe so ill agree, that they cannot stand together. There is also another absurditie in their doctrines. They affirme that in the Sacrament is given the grace of the holy Ghost: they teach that copulation is a Sacrament: and they denie that at copulation the holy Ghost is at any time present.

37 And, because they would not simply mocke the Church, how long a row of errors, lies, deceits, and wickednesses have they knit to one error? so that a man may say; that they did nothing but seeke a Den of abominations, when they made of Matrimonie a Sacrament. For when they once obtained this, they drew to themselves the hearing of causes of Matrimonie: for it was a spirituall matter, which prophane Judges might not meddle with. Then they made lawes, whereby they established their tyrannie, but those partly manifestly wicked against God, and partly most unjust toward men. As are these: That mariages made betweene yong persons without consent of their Parents, should remaine of force and established, that the mariages be not lawfull betweene the kinsfolkes to the seventh degree: and if any such bee made, that they bee divorced. And the very degrees they saigne against the lawes of all nations, and against the civill government of Moses. That it bee not lawfull for a man that hath put away an adulteresse, to marrie another. That spirituall kinsfolkes may not bee coupled in marriage. That there bee no mariages celebrated, from Septuagesime to the weekes of Easter, in three weekes before Midsummer, nor from Advent, to Twelfside. And innumerable other like, which it were long to rehearse. At length wee must creepe out of their mire, wherein our talke hath now carried longer

Of Civill Government.

NOW whereas wee have above set two kindes of government in man, and whereas wee have spoken enough of the one kinde which consisteth in the Soule or in the inward man, and hath respect to eternall life : this place requireth that we speake somewhat also of the other, which pertaineth onely to the civill and outward righteousness of manners. For the course of this matter seemeth to bee severed from the spirituall doctrine of Faith, which I tooke in hand to entreat of: yet the proceeding shall shew that I doe rightfully joyne them together, yea that I am of necessitie compelled to doe it: specially sith on the one side, madde and barbarous men doe furiously goe about to overthrow this order stablished by GOD: and on the other side the flatterers of Princes, advancing their power without measure, sticke not to set it against the Empire of God himselfe. Unless both these mischiefs bee met withall, the purenesse of Faith shall bee lost. Beside that it is not smally for our behoofe, to know how lovingly God hath in this behalfe provided for mankind, that there may flourish in us a greater desire of godlinesse to witnesse our thankfulness. First, ere wee enter into the thing it selte, wee must hold fast that distinction which we have above set, (least as it commonly happeneth to many) wee unwisely mingle these two things together, which have altogether diverse consideration. For when they heare that libertie is promised by the Gospell, which acknowledgeth among men no King and no Magistrate, but hath regard to Christ alone: they thinke that they can take no fruit of their libertie, so long as they see any power to have preeminence over them. Therefore they thinke that nothing shall bee safe, unless the whole world be reformed into a new fashion: where may neither be Judgements, nor Lawes, nor Magistrates, nor any such thing which they thinke to withstand their libertie. But whosoever can put difference betweene the bodie and the Soule, betweene this present and transitorie life, and that life to come and eternall: hee shall not hardly understand that the spirituall kingdome of Christ, and the civill government are things farre a sunder. Sith therefore that is a Jewish vanitie, to seeke and inclose the kingdome of Christ under the elements of the world: let us rather thinking, as the Scripture plainly teacheth, that it is a spirituall fruit, which is gathered of the benefit of Christ, remember to keepe within the bonds thereof this whole libertie which is promised and offered us in him. For what is the cause why the same Apostle which biddeth us to stand, and not to bee made subject to the yoke of bondage, in another place forbiddeth bond-servants to be carefull of their state: but because spirituall libertie may very well agree with civill bondage? In which sense also these his sayings are to bee taken: In the kingdome of God there is no Jew, nor Grecian, no male, nor female, no bondman, nor freeman. Again, There is no Jew, nor Grecian, Circumcision, Uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, Bondman, Freeman: but Christ is all in all. Whereby he signifieth, that it maketh no matter in what estate thou be among men, nor under the lawes of what nation thou livest: forasmuch as in these things consisteth not the kingdome of Christ.

2 Yet doth not this distinction tend hereunto, that wee should thinke that the whole order of Policie is an uncleane thing, nor pertaining at all to Christian men. So indeede doe the phrenticke men, that are delighted with unbridled licentiousnesse, cry out and boast. For sith wee be dead by Christ to the elements of the world, and being removed into the kingdome of God doe sit among the heavenly ones: they thinke that it is unworthy for us, and farre beneath our excellence, to bee occupied with these prophane and uncleane cares that are busied about affaires not pertaining to a Christian man. To what purpose (say they) are lawes without judgements and judgement seates? But what hath a Christian man to doe with judgements themselves? yea if it be not lawfull to kill, whereto serve lawes and judgements among us?

But

Gal. 3. 28.
Col. 3. 11.

The use of civill government amongst Christians.

But as wee have even now given warning, that this kinde of government is severall from that spirituall and inward kingdome of Christ: so it is also to be knowne that they nothing disagree together. For the Civill government doth now begin in us upon earth certaine beginnings of the heavenly kingdome, and in this mortall and vanishing life, doth as it were enter upon an immortall and incorruptible blessednesse: but the intent of his spirituall government is, so long as we shall live among men, to cherish and maintaine the outward worshipping of God, to defend the sound doctrine of Godlinesse and the state of the Church, to frame our life to the fellowship of men, to fashion our manners to civill righteousnesse, to procure us into friendship one with another, to nourish common peace and quietnesse: all which I grant to be superfluous, if the kingdome of God, such as it is now among us doe destroy this present life. But if the will of God bee so, that we while we long toward the heavenly countrey, should be wayfaring from home upon the earth: and sith the use of such wayfaring needeth such helpes: they which take them from man, doe take from him his very nature of man. For whereas they alleadge that there is so great perfection in the Church of God, that her owne moderate government sufficeth it for a law: they themselves doe foolishly imagine that perfection which can never bee found in the common fellowship of men. For sight of naughtie men the pride is so great, and the wickednesse so obstinate, as cannot be restrained with great sharpnesse of lawes: what thinke wee that they will doe, if they see unpunished libertie lye open to their lewdnesse, which cannot even with force be sufficiently compelle not to doe evill.

3 But of the order of Policie, there shall be another fitter place to entreat. Now our meaning is to have this onely understood, that to thinke to drive it away, is outrageous barbarousnesse, the use whereof is no lesse among men, than of bread, water, the sunne, and aire, but the dignitie much more excellent. For it tendeth not onely hereunto (which is the onely commoditie of all those things) that men may breath, eat, drinke, and bee cherished (although indeed it comprehendeth all these things, while it maketh that they live together) yet I say, it tendeth not hereunto onely: but also that idolatrie, sacriledges against the name of God, blasphemies against his truth, and other offences of religion may not rise up and bee scattered among the people, that common quiet bee not troubled, that every man may keepe his owne safe and unappaired, that men may use their affaires together without hurt, that honestie and modestie bee kept among them: finally that among Christians may be a common shew of religion, and among men may be man-like civilitie. Neither let any man bee moved, for that I doe now referre the care of establishing of religion to the Policie of men, which I seemed before to have set without the judgement of men. For I doe no more here, than I did before, give men leave after their owne will to make lawes concerning religion and the worshipping of God, when I allow the ordinance of Policie, which endeavourth hereunto, that the true religion which is contained in the law of God, be not openly and with publicke sacriledges freely broken and defiled. But the Readers being holden by the very plainnesse of order, shall better understand what is to be thought of the whole kinde of Civill government, if we severally entreat of the parts thereof. There be three parts of it: the Magistrate which is the governour and keeper of the lawes: the Lawes according to which hee governeth the People, which are governed by the lawes, and obey the Magistrate. Therefore let us first consider of the office of the Magistrate, whether it be a lawfull vocation and allowed of God, what matter of office he hath, and how great is his power, then with what lawes a Christian civill state is to be ordered: then last of all, what profit of the lawes commeth to the people, what reverence is due to the Magistrate.

4 The Lord hath not onely testified that the office of Magistrates is allowed and acceptable to him, but also setting out the dignitie thereof with most honourable titles, hee hath marvellously commended it unto us. That I may rehearse a few of them. Whereas whosoever bee in place of Magistrates are named Gods, let no man thinke that in that naming is small importance. For thereby is signified that they have commandement from God, that they are furnished with the auctoritie of God, doe altogether beare the person of God, whose stead they doe after a certaine manner supply. This is not my cavillation, but the exposition of Christ. If the Scripture (such bee) called them Gods to whom the word of God was given: What is this else, but that God hath committed his businesse to them, that they should serve in his office, and (as Moses and Iosaphat said to their Judges whom they appointed in every severall City of Iuda) that they should sit in judgement, not for man but for God? To the same purpose maketh this that the wisdom of God affirmeth by the mouth of Salamon, that it is his worke, that Kings raigne, and counsellors decree righteous things, that Princes beare principality, and all the Iudges of the earth execute judgement: For this is all one in effect as it had beene said, that it commeth not to passe by the perversnesse of men, that the government of all things in earth is in the hand of Kings and other Rulers, but by the providence and holy ordinance of God, to whom it is so seemed good to order the matters of men: for as much as hee is both present and President among them in making of lawes and in executing uprightnesse of judgements. Which Paul also plainly teacheth, when he reckoaneth governments among the gifts of God, which being diversly distributed according to the diversitie of grace, ought to be employed of the servants of Christ to the edification of the Church. For although hee there properly speaketh of a Councell of grave men, which in the primitive Church were appointed that they should have the rule of ordering the publick discipline (which office in the Epistle to the Corinthians he calleth Government) yet for as much as wee see that the end of civill power commeth to the same point, it is no doubt but that hee commendeth unto us all kinde of just government. But hee speaketh more plainly, where he purposely maketh a full discourse of that matter. For both he sheweth that power is the ordinance of God, and that there are no powers, but they are ordained of God: and that the Princes themselves are the ministers of God, to the well doers unto praise: to the evil, revengers unto wrath. Hereunto may be added also the examples of holy men: of which some have possessed kingdomes, as David, Iosias, Ezechias; othersome, Lordships, as Ioseph and Daniel: othersome, Civill governments in a free people, as Moses, Josue, and the Iudges: whose offices the Lord hath declared that he alloweth. Wherefore none ought now to doubt that the civill power is a vocation not onely holy and lawfull before God, but also the most holy, and the most honest of all other in the whole life of men.

5. They which covet to bring in a state without Rulers, take exception and say that although in old time there were Kings and Iudges over the rude people, yet at this day that servile kinde of governing agreeth not with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his Gospell. Wherein they bewray not onely their ignorance, but also their devillish pride, while they take upon themselves perfection, of which not so much as the hundredth part is seene in them. But what manner of men these they bee, it is easie to confute it: because where David exhorteth all Kings and Rulers to kisse the Sonne of God, hee doth not bid them, giving over their authoritie, to take themselves to a private life, but to submit the power that they beare to Christ, that hee alone may have preeminence above all. Likewise Ely, when hee promiserh that Kings shall bee foster-fathers of the Church, and Queenes shall bee Nurses, hee doth not depose them from their honour: but rather doth by an honourable title make them defenders to the godly worshippers of God. For, that Prophecie pertaineth to the coming of Christ. I doe wittingly passe over many testimonies which doe each where offer themselves, and especially in the Psalmes wherein all Governours have their right maintained. But most cleare of all is the place of Paul, where admonishing Timothie that in the common assembly prayers must be made for Kings, hee by and by addeth a reason, that wee may under them lead a quiet life with all godlinesse and honestie: in which words he committeth the state of the Church to their defence and save-guarding.

6 Which consideration ought continually to busie the Magistrates themselves, for as much as it may put a great spurre to them whereby they may bee pricked forward to their dutie, and bring them a singular comfort whereby they may mitigate the hardnesse of their office, which truly are both many and great. For with how great an endeavor of uprightnes, wisdom, mildnes, continency, and innocency, ought they to charge themselves, themselves; which know themselves to be appointed ministers of the righteousness of God? By what assurance shall they admit injustice to their judgement seat, which they heare to be the throne of the living God? By what boldnesse shall they pronounce a wrongfull sentence with that mouth, which they understand to be appointed an instrument for the truth of God? With what conscience shall they subscribe to wicked decrees with the hand which they know to be ordained to write the actes of God? In a summe, if they remember that they be the vicegerents of God, they must watch with all care, earnestnesse, and diligence, that they may represent in themselves unto men a certaine image of the providence, preservation, goodnes, good will, and righteousness of God. And they must continually set this before their eyes, that if all they be accursed, that doe execute in deceit the worke of the vengeance of God, they are much more grievously accursed, that use themselves deceitfully in a rightfull vocation. Therefore when Moses and Iosaphat minded to exhort their Judges to their dutie; they had nothing more effectually to move their minds withall, than that which wee have before rehearsed, Looke what yee doe. For yee sit in judgement not for man but for God: namely, hee which is neere to you in the cause of judgement. Now therefore let the feare of the Lord be upon you. Looke and bee diligent: because there is no perversnesse with the Lord our God. And in another place it is said, God stood in the assemblie of the Gods, and sitteth judge in the middelt of the gods, that they may be encouraged to their durie when they heare that they be the deputies of God, to whom they must one day yeeld account of the government of their charge. And worthily this admonition ought to be of great force with them. For if they make any default, they are not onely wrong doers to men whom they wickedly vex, but also slanderers to God himselfe, whose holy judgements they defile. Again they have also whereupon they may singularly comfort themselves, when they consider with themselves that they are not busied in prophane affaires, and such as are not fit for the servant of God, but in a most holy office, namely forasmuch as they are the deputies of God.

7 As for them that are not moved with so many testimonies of Scripture from being bold to raile at this holy ministerie, as a thing disagreeing with Christian religion and godlinesse: what doe they else but raile at God himselfe, the dishonour of whom cannot but be joynd with the reproch of his ministerie? And verily they doe not refuse the Magistrates, but doe cast away God, that he should not raigne over them. For if the Lord said this truly of the people of Israel: because they had refused the government of Samuel: why shall it be belisse truly said at this day of them that give themselves leave torage against all governments ordained of God? But sith the Lord said to the Disciples, that the kings of nations beare rule over them; but that among them it is not so, where hee that is the first must be made the least: by this saying it is forbidden to all Christians that they should not take kingdomes or government upon them. O handsome expositors. There rose a strife among the Disciples which of hem excelled other: the Lord, to suppress this vaine ambition, taught them that their ministerie is not like unto kingdomes, in which one man hath preeminence above the rest. I beseech you, what doth this comparison make to the dishonour of kingly dignitie? yea what doth it prove at all, but that the ministerie of an Apostle is not the office of a king? Moreover although among the Magistrates themselves there be divers formes, yet there is no difference in this behalfe but that we ought to take them all for the ordinances of God. For Paul also doth comprehend them altogether, when he saith, that there is no power but of God: and that which best liked him of all, is combined with notable testimony above the other, namely the power of one; which because it bringeth with it a common bondage of all (except that one man to whose will it maketh all things subject) in old time could lesse be allowed of noble and the excellent sort of naturis. But the Scripture to meete with their unjust judgements, expressly by name affirmeth, that it is the providence of Gods wisdom that Kings doe raigne, and peculiarly commandeth the King to be honored:

18 And truly it were very vaine that it should be disputed of private men which should be the best state of policie in the place where they live: for whom it is not

awfull to consult of the framing of any common weale. And also the same could not be simply determined without rashnesse, forasmuch as a great part of the order of this question consisteth in circumstances. And if thou compare also the states themselves together without circumstances, it shall not be easie to discern, which of them overweigheth the other in profitablenesse, they match so equally together. There is an easie way to fall from kingdome into tyranny: but not much harder is it to fall from the rule of the chiefeest men to the faction of a few: but most easie of all from the peoples government; to sedition. Truly if those three formes of governments which the Philosophers set out, to be considered in themselves, I will not deny that either the government of the chiefeest men, or a state tempered of it and common government far excelleth all other, not of it selfe, but because it most seldome chanceth that kings to temper themselves that their will never swarveth from that which is just and right: againe, that they bee furnished with so great sharpnesse of judgement and wisdome that every one of them seeth so much as is sufficient. Therefore the fault or default of men maketh, that it is safer and more tolerable that many should have the government, that they may mutually one helpe another, one teach and admonish another, and if any advance himselfe higher than is meete, there may bee overseers and masters to restraine his wilfulnesse. This both hath alway beene approved by experience, and the Lord also hath confirmed it with his authoritie, when hee ordained among the Israelites a government of the best men very neere unto common government, at such time as he minded to have them in best estate, till hee brought forth an image of Christ in David. And as I willingly grant that no kinde of government is more blessed than this, where liberty is framed to such moderation as it ought to be, and is orderly established to continuance: so I count them also most blessed, that may enjoy this estate: and if they stoutly and constantly travell in preserving and retaining it, I grant that they doe nothing against their duty. Yea and the magistrates ought with most great diligence to bend themselves hereunto, that they suffer not the liberty of the people, of which they are appointed governours, to be in any part minished, much lesse to be dissolved: if they be negligent and litle carefull therein, they are false Faith-breakers in their office, and betrayrs of their Country. But if they would bring this kinde to themselves, to whom the Lord hath appointed another forme of government, so that thereby they be moved to desire a change, the very thinking thereof shall not onely be foolish and superstitious, but also hurtful. But as if thou bend not thine eyes onely to one City, but looke about or behold the whole world together, or at least spread abroad thy sight into farther distances of countries, without doubt thou shalt finde that this is not unprofitably appointed by the providence of God, that diverse Countries should be ruled by diverse kindes of government. For the elements hang together but by an unequal temperature, so Countries also are with their certaine inequality very well kept in order. Howbeit all these things also are spoken in vaine to them whom the will of the Lord shall satisfie. For if it be his pleasure to set Kings over kingdomes, Senates, or Officers over Free-cities, whomsoever hee maketh Rulers in the places where wee are conversant, it is our dutie to shew our selves yeelding and obedient unto them.

9 Now the office of Magistrates is in this place to be declared by the way, of what sort it is described by the Word of God, and in what things it consisteth. If the Scripture did not teach, that it extendeth to both the Tables of the Law, we might learne it out of the prophane writers. For none hath intreated of the duty of Magistrates, of making of lawes and of publike weale, that hath not begun at religion and the worshiping of God. And so have they all confessed, that no policy can be happily framed, unlesse the first care be of godlinesse, and that those lawes be preposterous which neglecting the right of God, doe provide onely for men. Such therefore withall the Philosophers religion hath the first place, and with the same hath alway beene observed by the universall consent of all Nations, yet Christian Princes and Magistrates be ashamed of their slothfulnesse, if they endeavour not themselves to this care. And wee have already shewed, that this duty is specially enjoyned them of God: as it is meete, that they should employ their travell to defend and maintaine his honour, whose Vicegerents rears they be, and by whose benefit they govern. For this cause also chiefly are the holy Kings praesid in Scripture, for that they restored the worship of God being corrupted or overthrowne, or tooke care of religion, that it might flourish pure and safe under them. But contrariwise the holy history reckoneth states without governours, among faulters, saying that there was no King in Israel, and that therefore every man did what pleased himselfe. Whereby their folly is confuted, which would have them neglecting the care of God, onely to apply themselves to bee Judges of law among men. Although God appointed governours in his name to decide controversies, and omitted that which was of much weightier importance, that hee himselfe should be worshipped according to the prescribed rule of his Law. But a desire to innovate all things without punishment moveth troublesome men to this point, that they wish all revengers of the breach of peace to be taken away. As for so much as pertaineth to the second table, Ieremis warneth kings, to doe judgement and righteousness, to deliver the forcibly oppressed from the hand of the false accuser, not to grieve the stranger and widow, nor to doe wrong, and nor to shed innocent blood. To the same purpose maketh the exhortation which is read in the 82. Psalm, that they should render right to the poore and needie, acquite the poore and needie, deliver the poore and needie from the hand of the oppressor. And Moses giveth charge to the Princes whom hee had sent in his stead: let them heare the cause of their brethren, and judge betweene a man and his brother and a stranger, and not know faces in judgement, let them heare as well the little as the great, and bee not afraid of any man; because it is the judgement of God. But I speake not of these things; that kings should norge: to themselves multitudes of horses, nor cast their mindes to covetousnesse, nor to be lifted up above their brethren: that they may bee continually busied in studying upon the Law of the Lord all the daies of their life: that Judges swaie not to the one side, nor receive gifts: because in declaring here the office of Magistrates, my purpose is not so much to instruct the Magistrates themselves, as to teach other what Magistrates bee, and to what end they are set of God. Wee see therefore that they bee ordained, defenders and revengers of innocencie, honesty, and quietnesse, whose onely endeavour should bee to provide for the common safetie and peace of all men. Of which verities David professeth that he will be an exemplar, when hee shall be advanced to the royall seat: that is, that hee will not consent to any evil doing, but abhorre wicked men, slanderers, and proud men, and get to himselfe from each where honest and faithfull men. But sith they cannot performe this, unlesse they defend good men from the wrongs of the evil, let them helpe the good with succour and defence, let them also bee armed with power whereby they may severally suppress open evil doers and wicked men, by whose lewdnesse the common quiet is troubled, or vexed. For wee thoroughly finde this by experiance which Solon said, that common weales consist of reward and punishment, and that when those bee taken away, the whole discipline of Cities faileth and is dissolved. For the care of equitie and justice was not hold in the minds of many, unlesse there bee due honour ready for vertue: neither can the wilfulnesse of wicked men bee restrained but by severitie and chastisement of paines. And these two parts the Prophet comprehendeth, when hee biddeth kings and other governours to doe judgement and righteousness. Righteousnesse is, to take into charge of tuition, to embrace, to defend, to revenge, to deliver the innocent, judgement is, to withstand the boldnesse of wicked men, to repress their violence, to punish their offences.

10. But here, as it seemeth, doth arise a high and hard question. If by the Law of God all Christians are forbidden to kill, and the Prophet prophesieth of the holy Moen of God, that is, the Church, that in it they shall not afflict nor hurt: how many magistrates be together both godly and blood-shedders? But if wee understand, that the Magistrate in executing of punishments, doth nothing of himselfe, but executeth the very selfe judgements of God, wee shall be nothing combred with this doubt. The law of the Lord to biddeth to kill: least manslaughter should be unpunished, the law-maker himselfe giveth to the ministers the sword in their hand, which they should draw forth against all man slayers. To afflict and to hurt, is not the doing of the godly; but this is not to hurt, nor to afflict, by the Lords commandment to revenge the afflictions of the godly. I would to God that this were alway present before our mindes, that nothing is here done by the rashnesse of man, but all things by the authority of God that commandeth, which going before us, we never swarve out of the right way. Ualtesse perhaps there bee a bridle put upon the righteousnesse of God, that it may not punish wicked doings. But if it be not lawfull to appoint any law to it, why shall we cavill against the ministers of it? They beare not the sword in vaine, saith Paul for they be the ministers of Gods wrath, revengers to evill doers. Therefore if Princes and other Rulers know that nothing shall be more acceptable to God than their obedience, let them apply this ministry, if they desire to shew their godlinesse, righteousnesse, and uncorruptnesse allowable to God. With this affection was Moses led, when knowing himselfe appointed by the power of the Lord to be the deliverer of his people, he laid his hand upon the Egyptian. Again, when by slaying of three thousand men in one day, he took vengeance of the sacriledge of the people. David also when nio to the end of his life he gave commandment to Salomon his sonne to slay Ioab and Semei. Whereupon he also rehearseth this among the vertues of a king, to slay the wicked of the land, that all workers of wickednesse may be driven out of the City of God to which purpose also pertaineth the praise that is given to Salomon. Thou hast loved righteousnesse and hath hated wickednesse. How doth that milde and gentle nature of Moses burne out into so great cruelty, that being sprinkled and embred with the bloud of his brethren, he runneth throughout the Campe to new slughters? How doth David, a man of so great gentlenesse in all his life, among his last breathings make that bloody testament, that his sonne should not bring the hoare haire of Ioab and Semei in peace to the grave? But they both when they executed the vengeance committed to them of God, so sanctified with cruell dealing their hands which they had defiled with sparing. It is an abomination with kings, saith Salomon, to doe iniquity, because his throne is stablished in righteousnesse. Again, The king which sitteth in the throne of iudgement spreadeth his eyes upon every evill man. Again, A wife king setteth the wicked, and turneth them upon the wheele. Again, Take away the drosse from the silver, and there shall come forth a vessell to the melter; take way the wicked man from the sight of the king, and this throne shall be fast set in righteousnesse. Again, hee that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the righteous, both are abomination to the Lord. Again, A rebellious man purchaseth evill to himselfe and a cruell messenger is sent unto him. Again, Who so saith to the wicked man, thou art righteous, him peoples and nations do curse. Now if their true righteousnesse be, with drawe sword to pursue guilty and wicked men: let them put up their sword and hold their hands pure from blood, while in the meane time desperate men do raigae wick murders, and slughters: then they shall make themselves guilty of most great wickednesse, so much lesse shall they get thereby the praise of godlinesse and righteousnesse. O rely let there bee no precise and cruell rigorousnesse, and that judgement seat which may worthily be called the rocke of accused men. For I am not hee that either favour extreme cruelty, or doethinke that righteous judgement can bee pronounced, but while clemency the best and surest Counsellor of Kings, as Salomon affirmeth, the preserver of the kings throne is assistant, which a certaine man in old time truly said to be the principall gift of Princes. Yet a magistrate must take heed to both, that he doth neither with rigorousnesse of minde, wound rather than heale, or by superstitious affection of clemency fall into a most cruell gentlenesse, if with soft and loose tenderesse he be dissolute to the destruction of many men. For this was in old time not without cause commonly spoken under the Empire of Nerva, that it is indeed evill to live under a Prince under whom nothing is lawfull, but much worse under whom all things, are lawfull.

II. But sith sometime kings and peoples must of necessity take sword in hand to execute such publike vengeance, by this reason wee may also judge that the warres are lawfull which are so taken in hand. For if there be power delivered them, whereby they may maintaine quiet to their dominion, whereby they may keepe downe the seditious stitres of unquiet men, whereby they may helpe the forceably oppressed, whereby they may punish evill doings: can they at siter seasons utter it, than to suppress his rage which troubleth both privately the rest of every man, and the common quiet of all men, which seditiously maketh uprores, which committeth violent oppressions and haynous evill doings; If they ought to bee preservers and defenders of the lawes, they must also overthrow the enterprises of all them by whose wicked doing the discipline of lawes is corrupted. Yea if they worthily punish those thieves whose injuries have extended only to a few: shall they suffer a whole country to be without punishment vexed and wasted with robberies? For it maketh no difference whether he be a king or one of the basest of the commonalty, that invadeth anothers country into which hee hath no right, and spoileth it like an enemy: all are a like to be taken and punished for robbers. This therefore both naturall equity, and the rule of duty teacheth that Princes are armed not onely to restraine private duties with judicall punishments, but also to defend with warre the dominions committed to their charge, if at any time they be enemy-like assailed. And such warres the holy Ghost by many testimonies of scripture declareth to be lawfull.

12 If it be objected against me, that in the New Testament is neither witness nor example which teacheth that warre is a thing lawfull for Christians: first I answer, that the same rule of making warre which was in old time remaineth also at this day, and that on the contrary side there is no cause that may debarre Magistrates from defending of their subjects. Secondly, that an expresse declaration of these matters is not to be sought in the writings of the Apostles, where their purpose is not to frame a civill state but to stablish the spirituall kingdome of Christ. Last of all I say that in them also is shewed by the way, that Christ hath by his coming changed nothing in this behalfe. For if Christian doctrine (that I may speake in Augustines owne words) condemned all warres, this should rather have bene said to souldiers when they aske counsell of salvation, that they should cast away their weapons, and utterly withdraw themselves from the warre. But it was said to them: strike no man, doe no man no wrong, let your wages suffice you. Whom he taught that their wages ought to suffice them, he did verily not forbid them to be warriors, But all Magistrates ought here to take great heed, that they nothing at all follow their owne desires: but rather, if they must punish let them not be borne away with a headlong angerinesse, let them not be violently carryed with hatred, let them not broile with unappeaseable rigor. yea let them (as Augustine saith) pitie a common nature in him in whom they punish his private fault. Or if they must put on armour against the enemy, that is, the armed robber, let them not lightly seeke occasion thereof, nor take it being offered unlesse they be driven to it by extreme necessity. For if we ought to performe much more than that heathen man required, which would have war to seeme a seeking of peace: truly we ought first to attempt all things ere we ought to try the matter by warre. Finally, in both kindes let them not suffer themselves to be carryed with any private affection, but be led onely with common feeling. Otherwise they doe very ill abuse their power, which is given them, not for their owne commodity, but for others benefit and ministry. Moreover of the same rightful rule of making of warre hangeth the order both of Garisons, and Leagues, and other civill fortifications. Garisons I call those that are placed in townes to defend the borders of the Countrie: Leagues, which are made with Princes adioyning for this covenant that if any trouble happen in their lands they may mutually helpe them, and joyne their forces in common together to suppress the common enemies of mankind: Civill fortification, whose use is in the art of war.

13 This also I will last of all adde, that tributes and taxes are the lawfull revenues of Princes, which they may chiefly employ to sustaine the common charges of their office: which yet they may likewise use to their private royalty which is after a certaine manner conioyned with honour of the princely state that they beare. As we see that David, Ezechias, Iosias, Iosaphat, and other holy Kings, and Ioseph also and Daniel, according to the estate of the person that they did beare, were without offence of godliness sumptuous of the common charge, and we reade in Ezechiel that there was a very large portion of land assigned to the Kings. Where although he paint out the spirituall kingdome of Christ, yet he fetcheth the exemplar of his similitude from the lawfull kingdome of men: But ye. so that Princes againe on their behalves should remember, that their treasure chambers are not so much their owne private coffers, as the treasures of the whole people (for so Paul testifieth) which they may not without manifest wrong prodigally waste or spoile: or rather that it is the very blood of the people, which not to spare, is most cruell unnaturalnesse: and let them thinke, that their impositions, and subsidies, and other kindes of tributes, are nothing but the supports of publicke necessitie, wherewith to wearie the poore communally without cause, is tyrannicall exaction. These things doe not encourage Princes to wastfull expence and riot, (as verily there is no need to adde a fire brand to their lusts that are of themselves too much already kindled) but sith it much behooveth that they should with pure conscience before God be bold to doe all that they are bold to doe, least with wicked boldnesse they come into the despising of God, they must be taught how much is lawfull for them. Neither is this doctrine superfluous for private men, that they should not rashly and stubbornly give themselves leave to grudge at any expences of Princes, although they exceed common and civill measure.

A false and foolish opinion, that a state cannot bee well ordered by the common laws of nations except the civill lawes of Moses be observed.

14 Next to the Magistrate in civill states are lawes, the most strong sinewes of common wealthes, or (as Cicero calleth them according to Palto) the soules, without which the Magistrate cannot stand, as they againe without the Magistrate have no lively force. Therefore nothing could be more truly said, than that the law is a dumbe Magistrate, and that the Magistrate is a living law. But whereas I promised to speake with what lawes a Christian civill state ought to be ordered, there is no cause why any man should looke for a long discourse of the best kinde of lawes, which both should bee infinite, and pertained not to this present purpose and place: yet in a few words, and as it were by the way, I will touch what lawes it may use goddily before God, and be rightly governed by them among men. Which selfe thing I had rather to have utterly passed over with silence, if I did not understand that many doe herein perilously erre. For there bee some that denie that a common-weale is well ordered, which neglecting the civill lawes of Moses, is governed by the common lawes of nations. How dangerous and troublesome this sentence is, let other men consider, it shall bee enough for me to have shewed that it is false and foolish. That common devision is to be kept, which divideth the whole law of God published into morall ceremoniall, and judicall lawes; and all the parts are to be severally considered, that we may know what of them pertaineth to us, and what not. Neither in the meane time let any man be combred with this doubt, that judicalls and ceremonialls also pertaine to the morall lawes. For although the old writers which have taught this division, were not ignorant that these two latter parts had their use about manners, yet because they might bee charged and abrogate, the moralls remaining safe they did not call them moralls. They called that first part peculiarly by that name, without which cannot stand the true holines of manners, and the unchangeable rule of living rightly.

Men of all ages bound to the morall law of Moses the ceremoniall given for a time, judicall instituted of God for them, not for all men to be governed by.

15 Therefore the morall law (that I may first begin thereat) sith it is contained in two chiefe points, of which the one commandeth simply to worship God with pure faith and godlinesse, and the other to embrace men with unfained love, is the true and eternall rule of righteousness prescribed to the men of all ages and times that will bee willing to frame their life to the will of God. For this is his eternal and unchangeable will, that he himselfe should be worshipped of us all, and that we should mutually love one another. The ceremoniall law was the schooling of the Jewes, wherewith it pleased the Lord to exercise the certaine childhood of that people, till that time of fullnesse came, wherein he would to the full manifestly shew his wisdom to the earth, and deliver the truth of those things which then were shadowed with figures. The judicall law given to them for an order of civill state, gave certaine rules of equity and righteousness, by which they might behave themselves harmelesly and quietly together. And as that exercise of ceremonies properly pertained indeed to the doctrine of godlinesse (namely which kept the Church of the Jewes in the worship and religion of God) yet it might be distinguished from godlinesse it selfe; so this forme of judicall orders (although it tended to no other end, but how the selfe-same charity might best be kept which is commanded by the eternall law of God) yet had a certaine thing differing from the very commandment of loving. As therefore the Ceremonies might be abro-gare, godlinesse remaining safe and not destroyed: so these iudiciall ordinances: also being taken away, the perpetuall duties and commandements of charitie may continue. If this be true, verily there is liberty left to every nation to make such lawes as they shall foresee to be profitable for them: which yet must bee framed after the perpetuall rule of charitie, that they may in deed varie in forme, but have the same reason. For I thinke that those barbarous and savage lawes, as were those that gave honour to theeves, that allowed common copulations, and other both much more filthie and more against reason, are not to bee taken for lawes: for as much as they are not onely against all righteousnesse, but also against naturall gentlenesse and kindnesse of men.

16 This which I have said shall be plaine, if in all lawes we behold these two things as wee ought, the making and the equity of the law, upon the reason whereof the making it selfe is founded and stayeth. Equitie, because it is naturall, can bee but one of all lawes: and therefore one law, according to the kind of matter, ought to bee the propounded end to all lawes. As for making of lawes, because they have certaine circumstances upon which they partly hang, also that they read all together to one marke of equitie, though it be divers it maketh no matter. Now sith it is certaine that the law of God which we call morall is nothing else but a testimonie of the naturall law, and of that conscience which is engraven of God in the mindes of men, the whole rule of this equity whereof wee now speake is set forth therein. Therefore it alone also must bee both the marke and rule and end of all lawes. Whatsoever lawes shall bee framed after that rule, directed to that marke, and limited in that end, there is no cause why wee should disallow them, howsoever they otherwise differ from the Iewish law or one from another. The law of God forbid 'euch to steale. What paine was appointed for thes in the civill state of the Iewes, is to be seene in Exodus. The most ancient lawes of other Nations punished theft with recompence of double: the lawes that followed afterward, made difference betweene manifest theft and not manifest. Some proceeded to banishment, some to whipping, some at last to the punishment of death. False witness was amongst the Iewes punished with recompence of equall paine, in some places onely with great shame, in some places with hanging, in other some with the Crosse. Manslaughter all lawes universally doe revenge with blood, yet with divers kinds of death. Against adulteries in some places were ordained severer paines, in some places lighter. Yet wee see how with such diversity all tend to the same end. For with one mouth they altogether pronounce punishment against all the offences which have bene condemned by the eternall law of God, as manslaughter, thefts, adultery, false witnessings: but in the manner of punishment they agree not. Neither is the same needfull, nor yet expedient. There is some country, which unlesse it shew rigor with horrible examples against man-slayers, should immediately bee destroyed with murders and robberies. There is sometime that requireth the sharpenesse of paines to bee increased. If there arise any trouble in a common-weale, the evils that are wont to grow thereof must bee amended with new ordinances. In time of warre all humanity would in the noise of armour fall away, unlesse there were cast into men an unwoonted feare of punishments. In barrenesse, in pestilence, unlesse greater severity bee used, all things will come to ruine. Some nation is more bent to some certaine vice, unlesse it bee more sharply suppressed. How malicious and envious shall hee bee against the publike profit, that shall bee offended with such diversitie which is most fit to hold fast the observing of the law of God? For, that which some say, that the Law of God given by Moses is dishonoured, when it being abrogate, new are preferred above it, is most vaine. For neither are other preferred above it, when they are more allowed, not in simple comparison, but in respect of the estate of the times, place, and nation: neither is that abrogate which was never made for us. For the Lord gave not the Law by the hand of Moses, which should bee published into all Nations, and flourish every where: but when hee had received the nation of the Iewes into his faith, defence, and protection, hee willed to bee a lawmaker peculiarly to them, and like a wise lawmaker, hee had in making of his lawes a certaine singular consideration of them.

17 Now remaineth that wee consider that which wee have set in the last place;
what

The diversity of lawes, and hee necessary that they should be divers, as times and places and occasions differ.

what profit of lawes, judicial orders, and magistrates, cometh to the common fellowship of Christians. Wherewith also is coupled another question, how much private men ought to yeeld to Magistrates, and how farre their obedience ought to proceede. Many thought the office of Magistrates to be superfluous among Christians, because forsooth they cannot godly crave their aide, namely sith they are forbidden to revenge, to sue in the Law, and to have any controversie. But whereas Paul contrariwise plainly testifieth; that hee is the Minister of God to us for good: we thereby understand, that hee is so ordained of God, that wee being defended by his hand and succours against the maliciousnesse and injuries of mischievous men, may live a quiet and assured life. If he be in vaine given us of the Lord for defence, unless it bee lawfull for us to use such benefit: it sufficiently appeareth that hee may also without ungodlinesse bee called upon and sued unto. But here I must have to doe with two kindes of men. For there be many men that boile with so great rage of quarrelling at the law, that they never have quiet with themselves unless they have strife with other. And their controversies they exercise with deadly sharpnesse of hatred, and with mad greedinesse to revenge and hurt, and doe pursue them with unappealable stiffenesse even to the very destruction of their adversary. In the meane time, that they may not bee thought to doe any thing but rightfully, they defend such perversnesse with colour of Law. But though it be granted thee to goe to law with thy brother, yet thou mayst not by and by hate him, nor be carried against him with furious desire to hurt him, nor stubbornly to pursue him.

18. Let this therefore be said to such men, that the use of lawes is lawfull, if a man doe rightly use it. And that the right use both for the plainie to sue, and for the defendant to defend, as if the defendant being summoned doe appeare at an appointed day, and doth with such exception as he can, defend his cause without bitterness, but onely with this affection to defend that which is his owne by law: and if the plainie being unworthily oppressed either in his person or his goods, doe resort to the defence of the Magistrate, make his complaint, and require that which is equity and conscience, but farre from all greedie will to hurt or revenge, farre from sharpnesse and hatred, farre from burning heate of contention, but rather ready to yeeld of his owne and to suffer any thing, than to bee carried with an enemy like minde against his adversary. Contrariwise when being filled with malice of minde, corrupted with envie, kindled with wrath, breathing out revenge, or finally so enflamed with the heate of the contention, they give over any part of charitie, the whole proceeding even of a most just cause cannot but be wicked. For this ought to be a determined principle to all Christians, that a controversie though it be never so righteous, can never bee rightly pursued of any man, unless he beare as good will and love to his adversary, as if the matter which is in the controversie were already concluded and ended by composition. Some man will here peradventure say, that such moderation is so never used in going to law, that it should be like a miracle, if any such were found. I grant indeed, as the manners of these times be, that there is seldome seene an example of a good contender in law, yet the thing it selfe being defiled with addition of no evill, ceaseth not to be good and pure. But when we heare that the helpe of the Magistrate is a holy gift of God: wee must so much the more diligently take heed, that it bee not defiled by our fault.

19. As for them that precisely condemne all contending at law, let them understand that they doe therewithall despise the holy ordinance of God, and a gift of that kind of gifts which may be cleane to the cleane: unless peradventure they will accuse Paul of wicked doing, which did both put away from himselfe the slanders of his accusers, with declaring also their deceit and maliciousnesse, and in judgement claimed for himselfe the prerogative of the City of Rome, and when need was hee appealed from an unrighteous governour to the Emperours judgement seat. Neither withstanding it, that all Christians are forbidden to desire revenge, which we also doe drive far away from Christian judgement seat. For, if the contention be about a common case, he goeth not the right way that doth not with innocent simplicity, commit his cause to the Judge as to a common defender, thinking nothing lesse than to render mutual com-

compence of evill, which is the affection of revenge: or if any matter of life and death, or any great criminall action bee commenced, wee require that the accuser be such a one, as cometh into the Court being taken with no boiling heate of revenge, and touched with no displeasure of private injurie, but onely having in minde to withstand the enterprises of a mischievous man, that they may not hurt the common weale. But if thou take away a revenging minde, there is no offence done against that commandement whereby revenge is forbidden to Christians. But they are not onely forbidden to desire revenge, but they are also commanded to waite for the hand of the Lord, which promiseth that hee will bee a present revenger for the oppressed and afflicted: but they doe prevent all revenge of the heavenly defendour, which require helpe at the Magistrates hand either for themselves or other. Not so. For wee must thinke that the Magistrates revenge is not the revenge of man, but of God, which (as Paul saith) hee extendeth and exerciseth by the ministerie of man for our good.

20 And no more doe wee disagree with the words of Christ, by which he forbiddeth to resist evill, and commandeth to turne the right cheek to him that hath given a blow on the left, and to suffer him to take away thy cloake that taketh away thy coat. Hee willeth indeede there that the mindes of his should so much abhorre from desire of recompensing like for like, that they should sooner suffer double injurie to be done to themselves, than to desire to requite it: from which patience neither doe we also lead them away. For Christians truly ought to bee a kinde of men made to beare reproches and injuries, open to the malice, deceits, and mockages, of naughty men: and not that onely but also they must bee bearers of all these evils, that is to say, so framed with all their hearts, that having received one displeasure they make themselves ready for another, promising to themselves, nothing in their whole life but the bearing of a continuall crosse. In the meane time also they must doe good to them that do them wrong, and wish well to those that curse them, and (which is their onely victorie) strive to overcome evill with good. Being so minded they will not seeke eye for eye, tooth for tooth, as the Pharisees taught their Disciples to desire revenge, but (as we are taught of Christ) they will so suffer their bodie to be mingled, and their goods to be maliciously taken from them, that they will forgive, and of their owne accord pardon those evils so soone as they are done to them. Yet this evennesse and moderation of mindes shall not withstand, but that the friendship toward their enemies remaining safe they may use the helpe of the Magistrate to the preserving of their goods, or for zeale of publike commoditie may see a guiltie and pestilent man to be punished, whom they know that hee cannot bee amended bur by death. For Augustine truly expoundeth that all these commandements tend to this end, that a righteous and godly man should bee readie to beare patiently the malice of them whom hee seeketh to have made good men, that rather the number of the good may increase, nor that hee should with like malice adde himselfe also to the number of the evill: then, that they more pertaine to the preparation of the heart, which is inwardly, than to the worke which is done openly: that in secret may be kept patience of minde with good will, but openly that may be done which wee see may bee profitable to them to whom wee ought to beare good will.

21 But this which is wont to bee objected, that contentings in law are altogether condemned of Paul, is also false: It may easily bee perceived by his words, that there was an innumerable rage of striving at law in the Church of the Corinthians: so farre forth that they did make the Gospell of Christ and the whole religion which they professed, open to the cavillations and evill speakings of the wicked. This is the first thing that Paul blameth in them, that by their intemperance of contentions, they brought the Gospell in slander among the unbelievers. And then this point also, that in such sort they strived among themselves brethren with brethren. For they were so farre from bearing of wrongs, that they greedily gaped one for anothers goods, provoked one another, and being unprovoked did hurt. Therefore hee inveigheth against that rage of contending, and not simply against all controversies. But hee pronounceth that it is a fault or a weakesse, that they did not rather suffer losse of their goods than to travell even to contentions for the preserving of them: namely when they were so easily moved with every damage, and for most small causes did runne to the Court of Law and to controversies, hee saith that this is a prooffe that they were of a minde too readie to anger, and not well framed to patience. Christians verily ought to doe this, that they had alway rather to yeeld of their owne right than to goe to law, from whence they can scarcely get out againe but with a minde too much moved and kindled to hatred of their brother. But when a man seeth that without losse of charitie he may defend his owne, the losse whereof should be a fore hinderance unto him: if hee doe so hee offendeth nothing against this saying of Paul. Finally (as wee have taught in the beginning) charitie shall give every man best counsell, without which whatsoever controversies are taken in hand, and beyond which whatsoever doe proceede, we hold it out of controversie that they be unjust and wicked.

22 The first dutie of Subjects toward their Magistrates is, to thinke most honorably of their office, namely which they acknowledge to be a jurisdiction committed of God, and therefore to esteeme them and reverence them as the ministers and deputies of God. For a man may finde some, which yeeld themselves very obedient to their magistrates, and would not that there were not some whom they should obey, because they so know it to be expedient for the common benefit: but of the Magistrates themselves they thinke no otherwise than of certaine necessarie evils. But Peter requireth somewhat more of us, when hee commandeth that the King be honored, and Salomon, when hee commandeth God and the King to be feared: For Peter under the word of honoring containeth a sincere and well deeming estimation: and Salomon joyning the King with God, sheweth that he is full of a certaine holie reverence and dignitie. This is also a notable commendation in Paul, that wee obey not onely for wrath but for conscience. Whereby hee meaneth that Subjects ought to be led not onely with feare of Princes and Rulers to be holden in their subjection (as they are wont to yeeld to their armed enemy, which see that vengeance shall readily be taken upon them if they resist) but because the obediences that are shewed to them are shewed to God himselfe, for as much as their power is of God. I speake not of the men, as if the visor of dignitie did cover foolishnesse, or sluggishnesse, or cruelties, or wicked manners, and full of mischievous doing: but I say that the decree it selfe is worchie of honour and reverence: that whosoever be rulers may be esteemed with us, and have reverence, in respect of their being rulers.

23 Of this then also followeth another thing: that with minds bent to the honoring of them, they declare their obedience in prooffe to them: whether it be to obey their proclamations, or to pay tribute, or to take in hand publicke offices and charges that serve for common defence, or to doe any other of their commandments. Let every soule (saith Paul) be subject to the higher powers. For he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. The same Paul writeth to Titus: Warne them that they be subject to rulers and powers, that they obey the Magistrates, that they be readie to every good worke. And Peter saith, Bee ye subject to everie humane creature (or rather as I translate it, Ordinance) for the Lords sake, either to the King as most excellent, or to the rulers that are sent by him, to the punishment indeed of evill doers, but to the praise of well doers. Moreover that they should testifie that they doe not faigne subjection, but are sincerely and heartily subject, Paul addeth that they should commend to God the safety and prosperitie of them under whom they live. I exhort (saith hee) that there bee made prayers, beseechings, intercessions, thanksgivings for all men, for Kings and for all that be set in superioritie, that wee may live a peaceable and quiet life with all godlinesse and honestie. Neither let any man here deceive himselfe. For sith the Magistrate cannot be resisted, but that God himselfe must also be resisted: although it may be thought that an unarmed magistrate may freely be despised, yet God is armed which will strongly take vengeance on the despising of himselfe. Moreover under this obedience I containe moderation, which private men ought to binde themselves to keepe in cases touching the publicke state, that they doe not of their owne head intermedle in publicke businesse, or rashly breake into the office of the Magistrate, and enterprife nothing publicly. If any thing shall in a publike ordinance be behoovefull to bee amended, let not themselves raise uprores, nor put their handsto the doing of it, which they all ought to have fast bound in this behalfe: but let them commit it to the judgement of the Magistrate, whose hand alone is herein at liberty. I meane, that they presume to doe nothing uncommanded. For when the commandement of the ruler is adjoyned, then are they also furnished with publicke authority. For as they are wont to call the counsellors of a King, his cares and eies: so not unfitly, a man may call them the hands of the Prince, whom by his commandement he setteth in authority for the doing of things.

24. Now forasmuch as wee have hitherto described a Magistrate such as is indeed the same that he is called, namely, the father of the country, and (as the Poet calleth him) the pastor of the people, the keeper of peace, the protector of righteousnesse, the revenger of innocency: hee is worthily to be judged a mad man, that alloweth not such a government. But whereas this is in a manner the experience of all ages, that of Princes some being carelesse of all things, to the foreseeing whereof they ought to have bene heedfully bent, doe without all care slothfully wallow in delights: other some addicted to their gaine, doe set out to sale all lawes, priviledges, judgements, and grants: other some spoile the poore communitie of mony, which they may after waste upon mad prodigall expending: other some exercise meere robberies, in pillaging of houses, defiling of virgins and matrones, murdering of innocents: many cannot be perswaded that such should bee acknowledged for Princes, whose authority they ought to obey so farre as they may. For in so great hainous unworthinesse among doings, so much contrary to the duty not onely of a Magistrate, but also of a man, they behold no forme of the image of God, which ought to shine in a Magistrate, when they see no token of that minister of God, which was given for praife to the good, and for vengeance to the evill: so neither doe they also acknowledge such a governor, whose dignity and authority the Scripture commendeth unto us. And truly this feeling of affection hath alway been naturally planted in the minds of men, no lesse to hate and abhor tyrants, than to love and honour lawfull kings.

25. But if we looke to the word of God, it will lead us further, that we be subject not only to the government of those princes, which execute their office toward us well, and with such faithfulness as they ought, but also of all them, which by what meane soever it be, have the dominion in possession although they performe nothing lesse than that which pertaineth to the dutie of Princes. For though the Lord testifieth that the Magistrates is a speciall great gift of his liberality for preserving of the safetie of men, and a pointeth to Magistrates themselves their bounds: yet hee doth therewithall declare, that of what sort soever they be, they have not their authority but from him: that those indeed, which rule for benefit of the commonweale, are true exemplars and patternes of his bountifullnesse: that they that rule unjustly and wilfully are raised up by him to punish the wickednesse of the people: that all equally have that majesty wherewith he hath furnished a lawfull power. I will proceed no further, till I have added some certaine testimonies of that point. Yet wee need not much to labour to prove that a wicked King is the wrath of God upon the earth, forasmuch as I thinke that no man will say the contrary, and otherwise there should bee no more said of a King than of a common robber that violently taketh away thy goods, and of an adulterer that defileth thy bed, of a murderer that seeketh to kill thee, whereas the Scripture reckoneth all such calamities among the curses of God. But let us rather tarry upon proving that which doth not so easily settle in the minds of men: that in a most naughty man, and most unworthy of all honour, if so that hee have the publicke power in possession, remaineth that noble and divine power which the Lord hath by his word given to the ministers of his righteousnesse and judgement, and therefore that he ought of his subjects to be had in as great reverence and estimation, so much as pertaineth to publicke obedience, as they would have the best King if he were given them.

26. First, I would have the readers to perceive and diligently to marke that providence

The evill dealings of Magistrates the cause why men thinke they may without any both reverence and obedience from them.

Subjection due from us even to those Magistrates who towards us neglect their duty and abuse their authority.

dence and singular doings of God, which is in the Scripture not without cause so oft rehearsed unto us, in distributing of kingdomes and making Kings whom it pleaseth him. In Daniel, it is said : The Lord changeth times and courses of times, hee casteth away and maketh Kings. Againe : That the living may know that the Highest is mighty in the kingdome of men, and he shall give it to whom he will. With which manner of sentences whereas the whole Scripture aboundeth, yet that same Prophecie of Daniel specially swarmeth full. Now what manner of King was Nebuchadnezar, he that conquered Hierusalem, it is sufficiently knowne, namely a strong invader and destroyer of others. Yet in Ezekiel the Lord affirmeth that he gave him the land of Egipt for the service that hee had done to him in wasting of it. And Daniel said to him. Thou King art King of Kings, to whom the King of heavens hath given a mighty, and strong, and glorious kingdome : to thee, I say, he hath given it, and all the lands where dwell the children of men, the beasts of the wood and fowles of the aire : he hath delivered them into thy hand, and hath made thee to beare rule over them. Againe hee said to his son Belsazzar : the highest God hath given to Nebuchadnezar thy Father, kingdome and royalty, honour and glory : and by reason of the royalty that he gave him, all peoples, tribes, and languages were trembling and fearefull at his sight. When we heare that a King is ordained of God ; let us thereof call to remembrance those heavenly warnings concerning the honour and fearing of a King : then wee shall not doubt to account, a most wicked Tyrant in the same place wherein the Lord hath vouchsafed to set him : Samuel when hee gave warning to the people of Israel, what manner of things they should suffer at the hands of their Kings, said : This shall bee the right of the King that shall raigne over you : he shall take your sonnes and put them to his Chariot, to make them his horsemen, and to plough his land, and reape his crop, and to make instruments of warre. Hee shall take your daughters, that they may bee his dressers of oynments, his Cookes and Bakers. Your lands, your Vineyards, and your best Olive plants, he shall take away and give to his bond-servants. He shall take tithes of your Seeds and Vineyards, and shall give them to his Eunuches and bond-servants. He shall take away your bond-men, your bond-women and your Asses, and set them to his worke. Yea and he shall take tithes of your flockes, and ye shall bee his bond-servants. Verily Kings should not have done this of right, whom the law did very well intruēt to all continence : but it was called a right over the people which it behooved them of necessitie to obey, and they might not resist it : as if Samuel had said. The wilfulnesse of Kings shall runne to such licentiousnesse, which it shall not be your part to resist, to whom this only thing shall be left, to obey their commandements, and hearken to their word.

27 But chiefly there is in Jeremie a notable place and worthie to bee remembered, which although it be somewhat long, yet I will be content to rehearse, because it most plainly determineth this whole question. I have made the earth and men, saith the Lord, and the living creatures that are on the overface of the earth in my great strength and stretched out arme, and I will deliver it to him, whom it pleaseth in mine eyes. And now therefore I have given all these lands into the hands of Nabuchadnezar my servant, and all nations and great Kings shall serve him, till the time shall come of that land. And it shall bee as a nation and a kingdome that hath not served the King of Babell. I will visite that nation in sword, famine, and pestilence. Wherefore serve ye the King of Babell and live. Wee see with how great obedience the Lord willed that cruell and proud Tyrant to bee honoured, for no other reason but because he possessed the kingdome. And the same was by the heavenly decree, that hee was set in the throne of the kingdome, and taken up into kingly majestie, which it was unlawfull to violate. If wee have this continually before our mindes and eyes, that even the most worst Kings are ordained by the same decree, by which the autoritie of Kings is established, these seditious thoughts shall never come into our minde, that a King is to bee handled according to his deservings, and that it is not meete that we should shew our selves subjects to him that doth not on his behalf shew himselfe a King unto us.

28 In vaine shall any man object that this was a peculiar commandement to the Israelies

Israelites. For it is to be noted with what reason the Lord confirmeth it. I have given (saith he) the kingdom to Nebuchadnezzar: Wherefore serve yee him and live. To whomsoever therefore it shall be certain that the kingdom is given, let us not doubt that hee is to be obeyed. And so soone as the Lord advanceth any man to the royall estate, he therein declareth his will to us, that he will have him raigne. For thereof are generall testimonies of the Scripture. Salomon in the xxviiij. Chapter, Many Princes are because of the wickednesse of the people. Againe, Job in the xij. Chapter, He taketh away subjection from Kings, and girdeth them againe with the girdle. But this being confessed, there remaineth nothing but that we must serve and live. There is also in Jeremie the Prophet, another commandement of the Lord, wherein he commanded his people to seeke the peace of Babylon, whither they had been led away captive, and to pray to him for it, because in the peace of it should be their peace. Behold the Israelites being spoiled of all their goods, plucked out of their houses, led away into exile, and cast into miserable bondage, are commanded to pray for the safety of the conquerour: not as in other places we are commanded to pray for our persecutors: but that the kingdom may be preserved to himselfe, and quiet, that they themselves may also live prosperously under him. So David being already appointed King by the ordinance of God, and annointed with his holy oyle, when he was without any his deserving unworthily persecuted of Saul, yet the head of him that layed wait for his life, hee esteemed holy, whom the Lord hath hallowed with the honour of Kingdome. Farre be it from me (saith he) that I should before the Lord doe this thing to my Lord, the annointed of the Lord, that I should lay my hand upon him: because hee is the annointed of the Lord. Againe, My Soule hath spared thee, and I have said, I will not lay my hand upon my Lord, because he is the annointed of the Lord. Againe, Who shall lay his hand upon the annointed of the Lord, and shall be innocent? So sure as the Lord liveth, unlessse the Lord strike him, or his day be come that he die, or he goe downe into battell: farre be it from me that I should lay my hand upon the annointed of the Lord.

29. Finally, wee owe this affection of reverence, yea, and devotion to all our Rulers, of what sort soever they be, which I doe therefore the oftner repeat, that wee may learne not to search what the men themselves be, but take this for sufficient, that by the will of the Lord they beare that personage in which the Lord himselfe hath imprinted and engraved an inviolable Majestie. But (thou wilt say) Rulers owe mutuall duties to their Subjects. That I have already confessed. But if thou thereupon conclude, that obediences ought to be rendred to none but to just Governours, thou art a foolish reasoner. For, husbands are also bound to their wives, and parents to their children with mutuall duties. Let Parents and Hasbands depart from their dutie: let Parents shew themselves so hard and unpleasable to their children, whom they are forbidden to provoke to anger, that with their peevishnesse they doe unmeasurably wearie them: let the husbands most despirefully use their wives, whom they are commanded to love, and to spare them as weake vessels: shall yet therefore either children be lesse obedient to their parents, or wives to their husbands? but they are subjects both to evill parents and husbands, and such as doe not their dutie. Yea, whereas all ought rather to endeavour themselves not to looke behinde them to the bagge hanging at their backe, that is, not to enquire one of anothers duties, but every man set before him that which is his owne dutie: this ought chiefly to have place among those that are under the power of other. Wherefore if wee be unmercifully tormented of a cruell Prince, if wee be ravenously spoiled of a covetous or riotous Prince, if we be neglected of a slothfull Prince, finally, if we be vexed for godlinesse sake, of a wicked and ungodly Prince; let us first call to minde the remembrance of our finnes, which undoubtedly are chastised with such scourges of the Lord. Thereby our humility shall bridle our impatience. Let us then also call to minde this thought, that it pertaineth not to us to remedie such evils: but this onely is left for us, that we crave the helpe of the Lord, in whose hands are the hearts of Kings, and the bowings of Kingdomes. Hee is the God that shall stand in the assembly of Gods, and shall in the midst judge the Gods, from whose face all Kings shall fall, and bee broken, and all the Judges of the earth that ſhall have not kiſſed his annointed, that have written unjuſt lawes to oppreſſe the poore in judgement, and doe violence to the cauſe of the humble, to make widowes a prey, and rob the fatherleſſe.

30 And here both his marvellous goodneſſe, and power, and providence ſheweth it ſeſe: for ſometime of his ſervants hee raiſeth up open revengers, and furniſheth them with his commandment, to take vengeance of their unjuſt government, and to deliver his people many waies oppreſſed out of miſerable diſtreſſe: ſometime hee directeth to the ſame end the rage of men that intend and goe about another thing. So he delivered the people of Iſrael out of the tyranny of Pharaoh by Muſes: and out of the violence of Chuſum King of Syria, by Othoriel: and out of other thraldomes, by other Kings and Judges. So hee tamed the pride of Tyrus, by the Ægyptians: the inſolence of the Ægyptians, by the Aſſyrians: the fierceneſſe of the Aſſyrians by the Chaldees: the Boldneſſe of Babylon, by the Medians, and by the Persians when Cyrus had ſubdued the Medians. And the unthankfullneſſe of the Kings of Juda and Iſrael, and their wicked obſtinacy toward his ſo many benefits, hee did beat downe and bring to diſtreſſe ſometime by the Aſſyrians, ſometime by the Babylonians, albeit not all after one manner. For the firſt ſort of men when they were by the lawfull calling of God ſent to doe ſuch acts: in taking armour againſt Kings, they did not violate that majeſtie which is planted in Kings by the ordinance of God: but being armed from heaven they ſubdued the leſſer power with the greater: like as it is lawfull for Kings to puniſh their Lords under them. But theſe latter ſort, although they were directed by the hand of God whether it pleaſed him, and they unwittingly did worke, yet purpoſed in their minde nothing but miſchiefe.

31 But howſoever the very doings of men bee judged, yet the Lord did as well execute his worke by them, when hee did breake the bloody ſcepters of proud Kings, and overthrow their intolerable governments. Let Princes heare and bee aſtraide, But we in the meane time muſt take great heed, that we doe not deſpiſe or offend that authority of Magiſtrates full of reverend majeſty, which God hath eſtabliſhed with moſt weighty decrees, although it remaine with moſt unworthy men, and which doe with their wickedneſſe, ſo much as in them is, deſile it. For though the correcting of unbridled government bee the revengement of the Lord, let us not by and by thinke that it is committed to us, to whom there is given no other commandment but to obey and ſuffer. I ſpeake alway of private men. For if there bee at this time any Magiſtrates for the behalfe of the people, (ſuch as in old time were the Ephori, that were ſet againſt the kings of Lacedemonia, or the Tribunes of the people, againſt the Roman Conſuls: or the Demarchi, againſt the Senate of Athens: and the ſame power alſo which peradventure, as things are now, the three eſtates have in every Realme, when they hold their principall aſſemblies) I doe ſo not forbid them according to their office to withſtand the outraging licentiousneſſe of kings: that I affirme that if they winke at kings wilfully ranging over and treading downe the poore commonalty, their diſſembling is not without wicked breach of faith, becauſe they deceitfully betray the liberty of the people, whereof they know themſelves to bee appointed protectors by the ordinance of God.

32 But in that obedience which wee have determined to bee due to the authorities of Governours, that is alway to be excepted, yea chiefly to be obſerved, that it doe not lead us away from obeying of him, to whoſe will the deſires of all kings ought to be ſubject, to whoſe decrees all their commandments ought to yeeld, to whoſe Majeſty their maces ought to be ſubmitted. And truly how unorderly were it, for the ſatiſfying of men to runne into his diſpleaſure for whom men themſelves are obeyed? The Lord therefore is the King of kings, who when he hath opened his holy mouth, is to be heard alone for altogether and above all: next to him wee be ſubject to thoſe men that are ſet over us: but no otherwiſe than in him. If they command any thing againſt him, let it have no place and let no account bee made of it: neither let vs herein any thing ſtay upon all that dignity wherewith the Magiſtrates excell, to which there is no wrong done, when it is brought into order of ſubjection in compariſon of that ſingular and truly ſoveraigne power of God. After this reaſon reason Daniell denieth that he had any thing offended against the king, when he obeyed not his wicked proclamation: because the king had passed his bounds, and had not only beene a wrong doer to men, but in lifting up his horns against God he had taken away power from himselfe. On the other side the Israelites are condemned because they were too much obedient to the wicked commandement of the king. For when Ieroboam had made golden calves, they forsaking the Temple of God, did for his pleasure turne to new superstitions. With like lightnesse their posterity inclined themselves to the ordinances of their kings. With this the Prophet sharply reprocheth them, that they embraced the commandements of the king: so farre is it off, that the pretence of humility may deserve praise, wherewith the flatterers of the court doe cover themselves and deceive the simple, while they say that it is not lawfull for them to refuse any thing that is commanded them of their prince: as though God resigned his right to mortall men, giving them the rule of mankinde: or as though the earthly power were diminished, when it is made subject to the author of it, before whom even the heavenly powers do humbly tremble for feare. I know how great and how present perill hangeth over this constancy, because kings doe most displeasantly suffer themselves to be despised, whose displeasure (saith Salomon) is the messenger of death. But sith this decree is proclaimed by the heavenly herald Peter: That we ought to obey God rather than men, let us comfort our selves with this thought, that we then performe that obedience which the Lord requireth, when we suffer any thing rather, whatsoever it be, than swarve from godlinesse. And that our courages should not faint, Paul putteth also another spurre to us: That wee were therefore redeemed of Christ with so great a price as our redemption cost him, that we should not yeeld our selves in thraldome to obey the perverse desires of men, but much lesse should bee bound to ungodlinesse.

Coluthes.

Coluthes in the old Church. book. 4 Chapter 4. Section 1.9. and chap. 19. Sect. 22. 23.

Adams fall.

The fall of Adam proceeded not of intemperance, of gluttony, but of infidelitie: for he despising the word and truth of God, turned out of the way to the lies of Satan: which infidelity opened the gate to ambition and pride, whereunto was adjoynd unthankfulnesse: and ambition was the mother of disobedience. 2. 1. 4.

By the fall of Adam with other creatures have bene after a sort deformed, it is no marvell, that all mankind was corrupted, that is to say, swarved out of kynd from his first originall, and made subject to curse. This the old Doctors called Originall sinne, but yet did not so plainly set forth this point of doctrine as was convenient. In the meane time it is proved by reasons and testimonies of Scripture, that Pelagius wrongly erred when hee said that by imitation only, not by propagation, sinne passed from the first man into all his posterity. 2. 1. 5. 6.

And though the pestilence of sinne doe principally abide in the soule, yet it doth not therefore permaine to the discussing of this Doctrine, to dispute whether the soule of the child commeth of the engendring substance of the father: for as much as the cause of the infection is not in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was ordained of God, that those gifts which hee at the first had given to man, man should have and loose them for him and his. Finally it maketh not against this doctrine, that the children of the faithfull are sanctified. 2. 1. 7.

That by the fall of Adam the naturall gifts in man were corrupted and the supernaturall were taken away, is a saying that many have used, but few have understood. 2. 2. 4. 16. which saying is expounded. 2. 2. 12. that is to say, that the supernaturall gifts, faith, the love of God, charity toward our neighbours, desirous endeavour of holinesse and righteousnesse were taken away, but are restored by Christ: and that the naturall gifts, namely the understanding mind, and the heart are corrupted, because the soundnesse of understanding and the uprightnesse of heart were both taken away: Also that reason in man was not utterly blotted out, but partly weakened and partly corrupted: and so will, because it cannot be severed from the nature of man, was not viterly destroyed, but made thrall to corrupt desires. 2. 2. 12.

It is proved by the testimonies of Augustine and of the Scripture, that God not only foresaw or suffered, but also by his will disposed the fall of the first man, and in him the vaine of his posterity, 3. 23. 7. 8.

Angels.

Angels are creatures of God although Moses doe not expresse them in the history of the creation. 1. 14. 3.

Of the time or order wherein they were created, it is not expedient to enquire, forasmuch much as the Scripture (which wee ought to follow for our rule) declareth nothing thereof.

1. 14. 4.

Why the heavenly spirits are called Angels, Armies, Vertues, Principallities, powers, dominions, thrones, Gods. 1. 14. 5.

Concerning Angels the Scripture teacheth so much as is available for our comfort and for the confirming of our faith, namely that they are distributors and ministers of Gods bountifalnesse towards us, and the same by divers waies. 1. 14. 6. 9.

Not only one Angell hath severall care of every one of us, but they all with one consent doe watch for our safety: and therefore it is superfluous to inquire whether every man have his severall Angell assigned to be his keeper. 1. 14. 7.

Of the number and degrees of Angels, it is curiousnesse to enquire, and rashnesse to determine: And why, whereas they be spirits, the Scripture painteth them with wings under Cherubin and Seraphin. 1. 14. 8.

Against the Sadduces and such other fantastical men, it is proved by sundry testimonies of the Scripture, that Angels are not qualities or inspirations without substance, but very spirits indeed. 1. 14. 9.

That superstition is herein to be avoided, and that wee give not to Angels those things that belong only to God and Christ. 1. 14. 10.

For avoiding of this perill, we must consider that whereas God useth their service, hee doth it not of need, as though he could not be without them, but for the comfort of our weaknesse. 1. 14. 11. And therefore whatsoever is said of the ministry of Angels, ought to be referred to this end, that overcoming all distrust, our trust in God should be thereby the more strongly stablished, and not that they should lead us away from God. 1. 14. 12.

That the Angels also were created after the likeness of God. 1. 15. 3.

Of the ascending of Christ into heaven.

Although Christ in his rising againe began more fully to shew forth his glory and power: yet in his ascending into heaven hee first truly began his kingdome, because hee then powred out greater abundance of his spirit more voially advanced his raigne, and showed greater power both in helping them that are his, and in overtthrowing his enemies. And yet that he is so absent according to the presence of his flesh, that he is alway every where according to the presence of his maiesty, and with the faithfull according to his unspeakable and invisible grace. 2. 16. 14.

Of Christ sitting at the right hand of his Father, and of the manifold fruit which our faith gathereth thereof. 2. 16. 15. 16.

Baptisme.

THE definition of Baptisme. The first end thereof is to serve our faith before God, the other end, to serve our confession before men. It bringeth to our faith three things first that it is a signe of our cleansing, assuring us that all our finnes are done away. 4. 15. 1. which is proved by testimonies of the Scripture, and that it is not the water that cleanseth us, but the blood of Christ. Sect. 2.

The force of Baptisme is not restrained to the time past: but we are by it washed and cleansed once for all our life: and yet that we may not hereof take a liberty to sinne from thence forward. 4. 15. 3.

The power of the daies (as they call it) that is to say, the ministry of the Church, by which the forgiveness of finnes is daily preached unto us, is not to be severed from Baptisme. 4. 15. 4.

The Second fruit of faith by Baptisme, is that it sheweth to us our mortifying in Christ, and a new life in him. 4. 15. 5.

The third fruit is, that it testifieth that we are so united to Christ, that we are partakers of all his good things. For which cause Christ is called the proper object of Baptisme, and the Apostles baptised into the name of Christ, in whom we doe so obtaine the matter both of our cleansing and of our regeneration, as we obtaine the cause thereof in the father, and the effect in the holy Ghost. 4. 15. 6.

It is proved that the Baptisme was all one which was ministred of Iohn and of the Apostles, although some of the old doctors thought otherwise. 4. 15. 7. and that it maketh not to the contrary, that more abundant graces of the Spirit are powred out, since the resurre-

Both our mortifying and our cleansing were as by shadow signified among the people Israel, by the passage through the sea, and the comfortable calling of a cloud. 4. 15. 9.

It is false which some have taught, that by Baptisme we are restored to the same righteousness and pureness of nature which Adam had at the beginning. And there is shewed that in the children of God doe remaine yet some leavings of sin, although the same raigne not in them: which doe what their endeavours, and doob not give them occasion to flatter themselves. 4. 15. 10. 11. the same is proved by Paul. Sect. 12.

How Baptisme serveth our confession before men. 4. 15. 13.

What is the order to use Baptisme, both for confirmation of our faith, and for a confession before men. Where it is shewed that the graces of God are not inclosed in the Sacrament, so as they bee given to us by the vertue thereof. 4. 15. 14. 15.

Baptisme is nothing increased by the worthinesse of him that doth minister it, nor diminished by his unworthinesse: against the donatists, and our Catabaptists which require a rebaptizing, because wee have beene baptized in the kingdome of the Pope. 4. 15. 16. their arguments are confuted Sect. 17. 18.

Baptisme is a continuall Sacrament of repentance for all our life, so that we need no other Sacrament of penance. 4. 19. 17.

Of the conjuring of the water, the waxe candle, the chresme, the blowing, the spittle, and such other trifles added to the simple ceremony of Christ: and the order of purely ministering it in the Church is shewed. 4. 15. 19.

It is shewed that to minister Baptisme pertaineth to the Ministers of the Church and not to private men, much lesse to Women: and the contrary objections are confuted. 4. 15. 20. 21. 22.

Baptisme of Infants.

The Baptizing of infants doth very well agree with Christs institution, and with the nature of the signe. 4. 16. &c.

Baptisme succeeded in the place of Circumcision, wherein they be like, and wherein they be unlike. 4. 16. 3. 4.

Sith it is certaine that the same covenant which it pleased God to make with Abraham is sealed in infants with the outward Sacrament, therefore ought Baptisme also to have place among them. 4. 16. 6.

Baptizing of infants is well proved by this that Christ embraced children and laid his hands upon them. 4. 16. 7.

A confutation of certaine arguments of the enemies of infants Baptisme. 4. 16. 8. 22. 23. 25. 27. 28. 29.

There commeth great fruit by the Baptizing of infants, both to the Faithfull parents and to the children. 4. 16. 9. Which fruit Satan travaileth by the Anabaptists to take from us. 4. 16. 32.

A confutation of the Adversaries arguments saying, that there be other things signified in Baptisme than there are in Circumcision: that our covenant differeth from the old covenant, that other are called children at that day then were at that time. 4. 16. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15.

A confutation of their other fained differences betweene Circumcision and Baptisme. Sect. 16. Also of this objection, that Baptisme is a sacrament of repentance and of faith neither of which can be in tender infancy. 4. 16. 20. 21.

In them of ripe age, faith and understanding ought to goe before Baptisme: but in infants the Baptisme of the faithfull goeth before understanding. 4. 16. 24.

A confutation of their error, which condemne to eternall death all that are not baptized. 4. 16. 26.

This, that Christ was not Baptized till his age of 30. yeeres. was for a good cause, and sheweth nothing for the enemies of infants baptisme. 4. 16. 29.

Why the supper is not to be ministred to the infants of the faithfull, and Baptisme not to be denied them. 4. 16. 30.

A long rehearsall of the arguments wherewith wicked Servetus did fight against the Baptisme of infants, and a confutation of the same arguments. 4. 16. 31.

Bearing of the Crosse.

It behooveth that we deny our selves, that we may beare the Crosse, because it is Gods will to exercise all his under the Crosse, beginning at Christ his first begotten Sonne. Which fellowship with Christ doth already give us great ground of patience and comfort. 3.8.1.

The Table.

It is for many causes necessary for us to lead our life under a continual Crosse: first to beate downe our arrogancy and trust of our owne strength. And this remedy even the most holy doe neede, as is proved by the example of David. 3.8.2. Hereby our trust in God is confirmed, and our hope increased. Sect. 3.

Secondly, that our patience may be tried, and we may be formed to obedience. 3.8.4.

Which is most needfull for us, sit in the wisdomnesse of our sins is so great to make us shake off the yoke of God when he doth once handle us gently. Sect. 5.

Sometime also to punish our offences committed: wherein we acknowledge that he doth the office of a good father towards us, but contrariwise the unfaitfull are oftentimes made more obstinate. 3.8.6.

A singular comfort when we suffer either shame or losse, or any other calamity for righteousness: which Crosse most properly belongeth to the faithfull. 3.8.7.

How necessary it is for the faithfull, in the bitterness of afflictions, to be furnished with this thought, that God loveth them, but in augry with their faults. 3.4.34.

Bishops.

The name of Bishop in the old Church was given to some one in every severall compny of Ministers, for politike order, and not that they should beare a Lordly rule over others. 4.4.2.

It was the office as well of the Bishop as of other Priests, to preach and minister the Sacraments. 4.4.3.

The old Church did commonly observe the order appointed by the Apostles in calling of Ministers. 4.10.11.12.13.

With what forme the Ministers of the old Church were consecrate after their election. 4.4.14.15.

Of the ceremony of ordering of true Priests. 4.19.28.

Oftentimes the order of Priests: prophets, and Pastors, hath bene most corrupt in the Church. 4.9.3.4.5.

Men are not bound without exception to obey the Pastors of Churches, but in the Lord and his Word. 4.9.12.

What Bishops, and of what qualities, be made in the Papacy. 4.5.1.

The right of the people in election is taken away, and the old canons broken. 4.5.2.3.

What Priests are made in the Papacy, and to what end. 4.5.4.5.

Of the gifts of Benefices in the Papacy. 4.5.6.7.

How faithfully all Priests in the Papacy do execute their office, whether they be Monkes, or secular, as Canons, Deanes, Parsons of Parishes, Bishops, &c. 4.5.8.9.10.11.

The negligence of them that governed Churches in the time of Gregory and Bernard. 4.5.12.

The whole manner of Ecclesiasticall governance as it is at this day in the Papacy, is nothing else but a place of spoile, wherein thieves doe rob without law and measure. 4.5.13.

Of the dissolute licentiousnesse in all parts of their life, which priests and Bishops, &c. use in the Papacy. 4.5.14.

C

Calling.

OF the effectual or inward calling, which is a sure testimony of election, and hangeth upon the only free mercy of God. 3.24.1.2.

Against them, which in predestination doe make man a worker with God. Also against them that hang election upon that which followeth election. 3.24.3.

The certaintie of our election is to be knowne by the word and calling of God, and we ought not to pearse into the eternall counsell of God. 3.24.4.

The father hath chosen us onely in Christ, in him therefore let us hold the stedfast ground of our election. 3.24.5. and so, that thereof also we may conceive a sure confidence of perseverance to the end. 3.24.6.7.8.9.

Two kinds of calling universall, and speciall. 3.24.8.

It is proved by divers examples and testimonies of Scripture, that the elect before there calling do differ nothing from other men, and that it is false which some men doe dream, that there is a certain seed of election planted in their hearts, even from their nativity. 3.24.10.11.

It is shewed at large that as God doth by the effectualnesse of his calling toward the elect, make perfect the salvation to which hee had by his eternall counsell appointed them: so he hath his judgements against the reprobats, whereby he putteth his purpose concerning them in execution, and maketh way for his predestination. 3. 24. 12. 13. 14. &c.

The Table.

Cardinals.

When the name of Cardinals first began, and how they have so suddenly start up to so great honour. 4. 7. 30.

Ceremonies.

The old Ceremonies are taken away, as touching their use only, but not as touching their effect, for we have the same effect at this day most evidently and effectually in Christ. And this doth nothing diminish their holiness as it is proved 2. 7. 16. and being weighed by themselves and without Christ, they are worthily called of Paul bandwritings against us. 2. 7. 17.

The ordinances concerning Ceremonies in the Popes Law, doe command observation for the most part unprofitable, and sometime also foolish although they have a great seeming of wisdom: moreover they oppresse consciences with their infinite multitude. 4. 10. 11. 12. 13.

The Popish Ceremonies cannot be executed by this colour, that they be ordained for the instruction of the ignorant as the ceremonies of the law were: because there appeareth in in this point a manifest difference betweene us and the people before Christ. 4. 10. 14.

The Popish Ceremonies are bekeved to be sacrifices cleansing sins, and deserving eternall life: they are without doctrine, and are smart to catch money. 4. 10. 15.

Charity toward our neighbour.

It is proved, against the Sorbonists that Charity is the love of our neighbour, and not of our selves. 2. 8. 54.

Vnder the name of neighbour is contained every man, be hee never so much a stranger to us, and our enemy. 2. 8. 55. and therefore the Schoolmen are condemned of ignorance which of the commandments of God, not to desire revenge, and to love our enemies, have made Counsels, to the necessary keeping whereof Monkes alone doe binde themselves: and it is proved that the old doctors of the Church, Iesay and Gregory himselfe thought otherwise. 2. 8. 56. 57.

Wee have need of patience, that we be not weary of doing good to other. And we ought not to have respect to the unworthinesse or other qualities of men which might withdraw us, but to God which so commandeth us. 3. 7. 6.

To the fulfilling of all the parts of charity, it is not enough if we performe all the dutifull deeds of charity, but we must doe it with a sincere affection of heart. Wherein the chiefe point is, that we take upon our selves the person of him whom we see to need our helpe. So shall we avoide disdainfull pride and other corruptings of charity. 3. 7. 7.

Christ and the Apostles in rehearsing the summe of the Law doe sometime leave out the first table: not for that it more availeth to the summe of righteousnesse to live innocently with men, than to honour God with godlines: but because unfained charity is the prooffe of true godlinesse. 2. 8. 52. 53.

A confutation of the Pharisees of our time which hold that we are justified by charity, because Paul saith that charity is greater than faith and hope. 3. 18. 8.

An exposition of the tenth commandment wherein (as in the former commandments) is forbidden not only all purpose to hurt our neighbor, but also all lust or desire against charity. 2. 8. 49. 58.

God doth for good cause and worthily require of us so great ferventnesse and uprightnesse of love. 2. 8. 50.

An exposition of the sixth commandment, wherein not only the slaughter or hatred of our neighbour is forbidden us, but also the preserving of his life is commanded us, because man is both our flesh and the image of God. 2. 7. 39. 40.

Children.

See obedience of children to parents.

Church.

The Church the mother of the faithfull. 41. 1. 4. 5.

An exposition of this article of the Creed, I beleeve the holy Church. 4. 1. 2. 3.

The holinesse of the Church is not yet perfected. 4. 8. 12.

Of the invisible Church: and of the visible Church, the signes whereof are the pure preaching of the word and ministracion of Sacraments. 4. 8. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11.

Where

The Table.

Wherefoever those signes are, we ought not to depart from that fellowship. 4. 8. 12.

There may some fault creepe in, either in doctrine or in ministration of Sacraments, for the which yet we ought not to cast off the communion of that Church, and much lesse for the imperfession of life and corruptnesse of manners. And herein the Authaptists are reprooved. 4. 1. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16.

The Church is none otherwise holy, but that it alway hath many faults, and yet it ceaseth not to be the Church, as is proved by testimonies of Scripture and the experience of all ages. 4. 1. 17. 18. 19.

See Ministry of the Church.

Churches power as touching Articles of faith.

It is proved by the example of the Apostles and Prophets, and of Christ himselfe, that whatsoever authoritie the Church hath, is properly not given to men, but to the word, the ministration whereof is committed to them: And therefore it was never lawfull for the Church, to teach any other thing, than that which she received of the Lord. 4. 8. 1. 2. 3. 4. 8. 9.

Christ hath ever taught his Church: and yet he hath used divers manners of teaching according to the diversitie of times, ere the Law was written, in the time of the Law and the Prophets, and last of all since that he himselfe was openly shewed in the flesh. 4. 8. 5. 6. 7.

False Church.

Where lying and falshood hath gotten the upper hand and reigne, there is not the Church. And this is proved to be in the Papacie, although they there boast of a perpetuall succession of Bishops. 4. 2. 1. 2. 3. 4.

They are not Heretikes or Schismatikes that depart from the Papacie. 4. 2. 5. 6.

How much soever a man make the best of the faults of the Popish Church, yet the state thereof is no better than was in the kingdome of Israel under Jeroboam. 4. 2. 7. 8. 9. 10.

Yet by the goodnesse of God there remaine in the Papacy cert. in footsteps of the Church: and so is that fulfilled which hath been written, that Antichrist should sit in the Temple of God. 4. 2. 11. 12.

A comparison of the power which the true Church hath in teaching, with the tyranny of the Pope and his ministers in forging new articles of faith. 4. 8. 10. Of the Papists principle, that the Church cannot erre. 4. 8. 13.

It is false to say that it behooved that the Church should add to the writings of the Apostles. 4. 1. 14. 15. 16.

A confutation of the arguments which the Papists make, to prove that there is power given to the Church to coine new articles of faith. 4. 8. 11. 12.

Christ.

The Godhead of the Sonne is proved. 1. 13. 7.

Against certaine dogs which doe privily stole away from the Sonne of God his eternitie, affirming that hee then first began to bee, when God spake at the creation of the world. 1. 13. 8.

Divers testimonies of Scripture, which affirme Christ to be God, and first out of the old Testament. 1. 13. 9. 10. and then out of the new Testament. Sect. 11.

A prooffe of the same Godhead, by the works that are in the Scriptures ascribed unto him. 1. 13. 12. also by his miracles and certaine other things. Sect. 13.

A difference betwene Christes working of miracles, and the Prophets or Apostles doing of the like. 1. 13. 13.

It is proved by many and most strong testimonies of Scripture, that Christ tooke upon him a true substance of mans flesh, and not a Ghost or counterfeit shape of man, as the Marcionites fained, nor yet a heavenly bodie as the Manichees lyingly affirmed. 2. 13. 1.

An exposition of the places of Scripture, which Marcion writted to the confirmation of his error, and also of those which Manicheus wrested, and many of their Disciples doe wrest at this day. 2. 13. 2. 3. where also are confuted the new Marcionites, which to prove that Christ tooke his bodie of nothing do bold women have no seed: There are also certaine other things confuted, which are objected as absurdities. 2. 13. 4.

Christian libertie.

How necessary is the knowledge thereof.
3.19.1.

Christian libertie consisteth in three parts :
The first is entreated of 3.19.2.3. The second.
Sect. 4.5.6. The third. Sect. 7.8.

Christian libertie is a spirituall thing, and all they doe wrongfully expound it, which either make it a cloke for their lusts, or doe abuse it with offence of their weak brethren.

Clerkes or Clergie.

Of Clerkes in the old Church. 4.4.9.

Concupiscence or Lust.

The difference betweene concupiscence and counsell. 2.8.49.

That all the concupiscences of men are evill and guilty of sinne, not insomuch as they are naturall, but because they are all inordinate by reason of the corruption of nature. And so did Augustine thinke, if he be diligently weighed.
3.3.12. and this is proved by many places of his writings. 3.3.13.

Confession Auricular.

Concerning Confession, the schoole Divines doe fight against the Canonists, affirming that it is not by the commandment of God. A confutation of the arguments whereupon the first sort doe stand, first because the Lord in the Gos-pell did send the Leprous whom he had clen-sed to the Priests : and there is shewed the true meaning of the doing. 3.4.4.

A confutation of their second argument, for that the Lord commanded his Disciples to loose and unwinde Lazarus when he was raised from death. 3.4.5.

A true exposition of two places by which they travell to uphold their confession : that is to say, that they which came to the Baptisme of John did confesse their sins, and James willeth us to confesse our sins one to another. 3.4.6.

The use of confessing to a Priest was very ancient, but yet free as a politicke order, not as a law set by Christ or his Apostles : and afterward the same was abrogated by Nectarius bishop of the Church of Constantinople because of a Deacon which had under that pretence abused a woman. This tyrannous law was not laid upon Churches before the time of Innocent the third, about three hundred yeeres past, and the foolishnesse and barbarousnesse of that ordinance is declared. 3.4.7.

Witnesses of the said abrogation, out of Chrystostome Bishop of Constantinople.
3.4.8.

An exposition of Innocents law concerning the confession of all sins, where are rehearsed the divers opinions of the Romish Divines concerning the number and use of keys, and the power of binding and loosing. 3.4.15.

The lewdnesse of all the particular articles of the law of confessing, and specially of that concerning the rehearsing of all sins. 3.4.16.
and a plaine description of the cruelty wherewith poore consciences were by divers circumstances tormented therein. 3.4.17.

By a similitude is described how a great part of the world hath hitherto obeyed such illusions. That it is an impossible law, and maketh men hypocrites. And then is shewed a most certaine rule of Confession according to the example of the Publican. 3.4.18.

A confutation of this article, that sins are not forgiven, and that the gate of Paradise is shut, &c. unlesse there be first firmly conceived a vow of confession, where also their objection is confuted that judgement cannot be pronounced till the cause be heard, that is to say, that absolution cannot be given till all the sins be rehearsed. 3.4.18.

It is no marvell that we condemne and abolish auricular confession, and our adversaries doe safely assigne so great profit unto it, for so much as on the other side it armeth men to boldnesse of sinning. 3.4.19.

They doe falsely pretend that they have the power of the keys, saith they are not the successors of the Apostles, nor have the holy Ghost, forasmuch as they doe daily without consideration lose those things which the Lord hath commanded to be bound, and binde what hee hath commanded to be loosed. 3.4.20.

It is proved false that they say that the power of the keys may sometime be used without knowledge, forasmuch as by that meane the absolution should be uncertaine. Where also is spoken of the absolution and condemnation which the ministers of the Gospell or the Church doe pronounce according to the word, of the certainty thereof. 3.4.22.

The absolution of the Priests in the Papacy is uncertaine, as well on the behalfe of him that assureth, as of him that confesseth : but contrariwise

The Table.

contrariwise it is in the absolution of the Gospel which hangeth upon this only condition, if the sinner seeke his purging in the only sacrifice of Christ, and to yeeld to the grace offered unto him. 3.4.22.

The Popish Doctors, when they alleadge for themselves the power of loosing given to the Apostles, doe wrongfully wrest to auricular confession those sayings which Christ spake partly of preaching of the Gospel, and partly of Excommunication. The errors of Lombard and such other in this matter: and concerning the manner of remission with enjoying of penance and satisfaction. 3.4.23.

A summe of all before spoken: and what the faithfull ought to thinke of auricular confession. 3.4.24.

True Confession.

What kind of confession is taught us by the word of God, namely to confesse to God the knower of our hearts and of all our thoughts. 3.4.9.

Out of this secret confession made to God, followeth a voluntary confession before men, so oft as it is behoovefull for the glory of God, or the humbling of our selves. And of this second kind there was an ordinary use in the old Church, and is also in the Church at this day. But yet extraordinarily it ought after a speciall manner to be used, whensoever it shall happen that the people be guilty in any generall offence, or to be plagued with any calamity. Of the profit of such confession. 3.4.10.11.

Of two other sorts of private confession: of which the first is used for our owne cause, when wee require comfort of our brethren, because the feeling of sinnes doth vex and trouble us: in which case we must chiefly resort to our Pastors: and this remedy is warily and moderately to be used, that no bondage be brought in. The other sort is to appease and reconcile our neighbour, if he be in any thing offended by our fault, under which kinde is contained their confession which have sinned so far as to the offence of the whole Church. 3.4.12.13.

The power of the keyes hath place in the three kinds of confession. Of the fruit which they that confesse doe receive thereby, because they know that forgiveness of sinnes is declared to them by the messenger of Christ. 3.4.14.

Of confession of sinnes one sort is generall, another speciall. 3.20.9.

Confirmation Popish.

Of the popish sacrament of confirmation foisted in place of that holy institution. 4.19.4.

That the example of the Apostles is wrongfully alleadged for defence thereof. 4.19.6.

It is blasphemie when they call it the oyle of salvation. 4.19.7.8. and when they say that none are made full Christians till they be anointed with the Bishops confirmation. Sect. 9. and when they say that this anointing is to bee had in greater reverence than Baptisme. Sect. 10.11.

It is to bee wished, that the manner of the old Church were brought in use againe, to call children to give account of their faith. 4.19.13.

Conscience.

Consciences, when they seeke assistance of their justification before God ought to forget all the righteousness of the law. 3.19.2.3.

The consciences of the faithfull doe not follow the law as constrained by necessity of the law, but being free from the yoke of the law, doe voluntarily obey the will of God. 3.19.4.5.6.

Of the freedome of conscience in outward and indifferent things. 3.19.7.8.

The consciences of the faithfull being set at libertie by the benefit of Christ, are made free from the power of all men: and how this is to be understood, where also is spoken of the spirituall and civill government, and what difference is to be put betweene them. 3.19.14.15.

Of Councils.

Wee must keepe a meane in honouring of Councils, that wee take nothing away from Christ; and our doctrine for the most part is confirmed by the ancient Councils. 4.9.1.

By the Scripture the Councils have no authority, unlesse they be assembled in the name of Christ: and what that is. 4.9.2.

It is false which the papists affirm that truth
I 12 remaineth

remaineth not in the Church unlesse it bee among the Pastors, and that the Church it selfe is not unlesse it remaine to be seene in generall Councils. 4.9.3.4.5.6.7.

What things are to be weighed in searching the authority of any Council: and that Augustine prescribeth a very good way therein. 4.9.8.

Council one against another. 4.9.9. and even in those former and ancient Councils are found faults and errors. 4.9.10.11.

Creation of the world.

Although God ought to be knowne by the creation of things, yet lest the faithfull should fall away to the fained inventions of the heathen, his will was that the history of the creation should remaine written, and the time thereof expressed in the Scripture. 1.14.1. where there ungodly scoffing is confuted, which aske why it came not sooner in Gods minde to create heaven and earth. 1.14.1.

For the same purpose it is rehearsed that God ended his worke, not in a moment, but in six dayes: and likewise the order is set forth, namely that Adam was not created till God had first furnished the world with all plenty of good things. 1.14.2.22.

A confutation of the error of Manicheu concerning two originall beginnings. 1.14.3.

It is proved by the Scriptures that the knowledge of God which appeareth in the workmanship of the world cannot by it selfe alone bring us into the right way. 1.5.13. & yet are we rightly without all excuse. Sect. 14.

Although the beholding of heaven & earth and the consideration of the ordering of things pertaining to men, doe move us to worship God, yet all these things passed away without profit, even from the wisest philosophers. 1.5.10.

Hereupon came the infinite number of gods, and the contrarieties of opinion among the sects of Philosophers concerning God. 1.5.11.

The substance of God is incomprehensible: but in his works, by engraving certaine points of his glory therein hee hath after a certaine manner presented himselfe to be seene. 1.5.1.

The wisdom of God is testified, not only by those things which Philosophers and learned men do find by speculation in heaven & earth, but also which common men do perceive by the only helpe of their eyes. 1.5.2.

That wee may with true faith conceive so much as beboveth us to know concerning God, it is good to learne the history of the creation of the world, in such sort as Moses hath set it forth, the chiefe points whereof are briefly rehearsed. 1.14.20.

The consideration of the worke of God, that is to say, of the creation of all things, ought to be applied to two principall ends, first that we doe not with unthankfull neglecting or forgetfulnessse passe over his vertues which be presenteth apparently to be seene in his creatures. 1.14.21. Secondly, that we may learne to apply them to our selves whereby wee may stir up our selves to the trust, invocation, praise, and love of him. 2.14.22.

The Papists have no true Deaconrie left, forasmuch as all the disposition of Church goods among them is openly turned to sacrifice and robbery. 4.5.16.18.19.

A confutation of the shamefulnessse of certaine Papists, which say that the riotous excessse of Priests, and of all the Popish Church, is the gloriousnesse of the Kingdome of Christ which the holy Prophets spake of before. 4.5.17.

Death of Christ.

Although Christ hath by the whole course of his obedience, that is to say, by his whole life, & all the parts thereof, redeemed us, yet the Scripture to set forth more plainly the manner of our salvation, doth ascribe the same as peculiar & proper to the death of Christ. In the which the voluntary yielding of Christ hath the first place which yet was so voluntary as he gave over his owne affection not without strife. Also his condemnation is to be considered: Wherein two two things are to be noted, namely that Christ was reputed among the wicked, and yet that his innocency was oftentimes testified even by the judges owne mouth. 2. 1. 5.

The manner of his death is to be marked, that is to say, the accursed cross. And it is declared by many testimonies of Esay and the Apostles, that this behoued so to be, that the curse which was due to us being cast up in him and so overcome and taken away, we should be delivered. And this was figuratively represented in the sacrifices of Moses law, which at the last was performed in Christ, the originall truth of all figures. 2. 1. 6.

Both in the death and buriall of Christ a double benefit is set before us, that is to say, deliverance from death whereunto we were in bondage and the mortifying of our flesh. 2. 1. 6.

Descending of Christ to hell.

The descending of Christ to hell containeth the mysterie of a great thing, and is of no small importance to the effect of our redemption. Divers expositions of this article are rehearsed and confuted. 2. 16. 8. 9.

A true, godly, holy and comfort able exposition thereof out of the word of God, which is also confirmed by the testimony of the old doctors, that Christ did not only suffer a bodily death, but also did feele the rigour of Gods vengeance, whereby hee might both appease his wrath and satisfie his just judgement: and therefore it behoued that he should, as it were hand to hand wrestle with the power of hell and with the horrour of everlasting death, yet was God not at any time either his enemy, or angry with him. But he did suffer the grievousness of Gods severity, in respect that he being stricken and beaten with the hand of God, did feele all the tokens of Gods wrath and punishment. 2. 16. 10. 11.

A confutation of certaine wicked and unlearned men, which at this day doe find fault with this exposition crying out, that the Son of God hath wrong done to him, and that he is charged with desperation, which is contrary to faith. Therefore it is proved against them with manifest testimonies, that these two things doe very well stand together, that Christ feared, was troubled in spirit, was afraid, was tempted in every point as we are, and yet that he is without sinne. 2. 16. 12

Divels.

Those things that the Scripture teacheth concerning divels, tend commonly to this end, that we should be carefull to beware of their deceits, and furnish our selves with those weapons which may be able to beate backe the most mighty enemies. 1. 14. 13.

That we should be the more stirred up to do so, it sheweth us that there is not one or two divels, but great armies of evill spirits that make warre against us: and in what sence it sometime speaketh of the devill in the singular number. 1. 14. 14.

This ought to enflame us to a continuall war with the diuell, for that he is every where called enemy to God and us. 1. 14. 15.

The divell is naturally wicked, a murderer, a lyar, and forger of all maliciousnesse. 1. 14. 15. But this evillnesse of nature is not by creation, but by corruption. 1. 14. 16.

It is curiosity to enquire of the cause, manner, time and fashion of the fall of the evill angels, forasmuch as the Scripture leaveth it unspoken. 1. 14. 16.

This the devill bath of himselfe and of his owne naughtynesse, desirously and purposely to strive against God, but he can do and performe nothing unlesse God be willing and grant it. 1. 14. 17.

God so tempereth this government, that he giveth Satan to reigne over the soules of the faithfull, forasmuch as in the end they ever obtaine the victory, although in some particular doings they be wounded and beater downe: but hee only giveth the wicked to him to governe, and to use his power upon their soules and bodies. 1. 14. 18.

A confutation of them which say that divells are not hing else but evill affections or perturbations: and it is proved by testimonies of Scripture, that they are mindes or Spirits endued with sence and understanding. 1. 14. 19.

Discipline.

Discipline is a thing most necessary in the Church. 4. 12. 1.

Of private admonishings, which is the first foundation of the discipline of the Church. 4. 12. 2.

Of the Ecclesiasticall Senate, that is to say, the Sencors or Elders, which together with the Bishops have the oversight of manners. 4. 3. 8.

Princes aswell as common people ought to be subject to the discipline of the Church, and so was it wont to be in the old time. 4. 12. 7.

Of the old discipline of the Cleargie, and the yeerely assembling of provinciall Synodes : and how this order is buried in the Papacie, saving that they keepe certaine shadows thereof. 4. 12. 22.

Excommunication.

WHat is the power of the jurisdiction of the Church, and how necessary and ancient it is. 4. 11. 1. 4.

Of the power of binding and loosing so much as pertaineth to discipline, wherein there is spoken of excommunication. 4. 11. 2.

This power of the Church is distinct from the civill power, and the one is a helpe to the other. Therefore the opinion of some men is false which thinke that it ought to have no place where are Christian magistrats. 4. 11. 1. 3. 8.

This is a staied and continuall order in the Church, and not enduring only for a time. 4. 11. 4.

Of the right use of this jurisdiction in the old Church: and how this power belonged not to one man alone, but to the assembly of the Elders. 4. 11. 5. 6. and Chap. 12. Sect. 7.

Of the excommunication of the Church, and the authority thereof. 4. 12. 4.

The ends which the Church hath regard unto in corrections and Excommunication. 4. 12. 5.

Of exercising the discipline of the Church according to the proportion of finnes, forasmuch as some be private and some be publike, some be negligent defaulters, some be heinous offences. 4. 12. 3. 4. 6.

In excommunication severity ought to be tempered. And in this behalfe is noted the extreme rigorousnesse of them in old time. 4. 12. 8.

Every private man ought to esteeme them that bee excommunicate as strangers from the Church, but not to account them past hope, but to endeavour to the uttermost of their power to bring them into the way again. 4. 12. 9. 10.

If the bench of Elders doe not so diligently correct faults as they ought, or if the Pastors cannot amend all things as they would, yet private men ought not to depart from the Church, neither ought the Pastors to shake off their ministry. 4. 12. 11.

Against the precisenesse of the old Donatists and of the Anabaptists of our dayes, which doe acknowledge no Congregation of Christ, but where there is in every point an Angeliike perfection. 4. 12. 12.

If the corruption of any sinne have infected the whole multitude, the rigorousnesse of discipline must be tempered with mercy, lest the whole body be destroyed. 4. 12. 13.

F

The name of faith otherwise taken among holy writers than it is among the profane. 4. 22. 13.

How it is to be understood that God is the object of faith. 2. 6. 4.

Of faith. And here the Sophisters are reproved, which understand nothing else by this word faith, but a common assent to the history of the Gospell, and doe simply call God the object of faith, in the meane time leaving out Christ, without whom there is no faith, nor any access to God. 3. 2. 1.

A confutation of the Schoolemens doctrine concerning unexpressed faith, whereas faith requireth an expresse acknowledging of the goodnesse of God, in which standeth our righteousness. 3. 2. 2.

Our faith, so long as wee are wavering in the world, is wrapped with many remnants of ignorance, and in all things infidelity is ever mingled with faith, whereof many examples are seene in the disciples of Christ before that they came to perfect light, yet this is still most true, that understanding is ever joyued with faith. 3. 2. 3. 4.

There is a certaine obedience to Christ, and aptnesse to learne, with a desire to profit, which is called by the name of faith, whereas it is but a preparation to faith, and that same may be called an unexpressed faith: yet it far differeth from the Papists invention. 3. 2. 5.

The true faith or knowledg of Christ, is when we conceive him in such sort as he is offered of the father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. And faith hath a mutuall relation to the word and the word to faith, because the word is the fountaine of faith, the ground of faith, and the mirror in which faith beholdeth God. 3. 2. 6.

Faith, although it assent to all the parts of the word of God, yet most properly it hath regard therein to the good will and mercy of God, that is to say, the promises of grace grounded upon Christ, for the understanding and certainty whereof, the holy Ghost lighteneth our mindes and strengtheneth our hearts: Heven upon is gathered the definition of faith. 3. 2. 7.

The Table.

A confutation of the Sophisters distinction of Faith, furnished and formelesse: whereby it appeareth that they never thought of the singular gifts of the holy Ghost, for as much as Faith can in no wise be severed from a godly affection. 3. 2. 8.

This word faith hath divers significations and is sometime taken for the power to doe miracles, with which gift of God, sometime the wicked are endued: sometime it is figuratively taken for that knowledge of God which is in some wicked men, which is rather a shadow and image of Faith, of which faith there are divers sorts in them. 3. 2. 9. 10.

The reprobate have also sometime such a like feeling as the elect have, yet they doe not fully conceive the force of spirituall grace, but onely confusedly. Nevertheless the same is a certaine inferiour working of the holy Ghost. But this feeling differeth far from the peculiar testimonie which hee giveth to the Elect. 3. 2. 11.

Yet is not the Spirit deceitfull, which lightly sprinkleth the reprobate sometime with such a knowledge of the Gospell, and feeling of the love of God as afterward doth vanish away. Sometime also here is stirred up in their hearts a certaine desire of mutuall love toward God, but such a love as is hyred and not a hartly love. At length it is concluded that there be some which doe not faigne a faith, and yet doe lacke the true faith. Which is also proved by testimonies. 3. 2. 12. and such a feeling is in the Scripture called faith, although it be improperly so called. 3. 2. 13.

Faith is sometime taken for the sound doctrine of religion, and the whole summe thereof: contrariwise sometime it is restrained to some particular object, and sometime it signifieth the ministry of the Church. 3. 2. 13.

Faith is most rightfully called knowledge and science, and yet such a knowledge as rather consisteth of certaine persuasion than of understanding, for as much as that which our minde conceiveth by faith is most infinite. 3. 2. 14.

Faith is not content with a doubtfull opinion or a darke conceiving, but requireth a full and seiled assurednesse: and hereunto are to be referred all those titles of commendation wherewith the holy Ghost setteth forth the authority of the word of God. 3. 2. 15.

Many doe so conceive the mercy of God, that they receive very little comfort thereof, because they doubt whether he will be mercifull to themselves or no: but there is a farr other feeling of the abundant store of Faith, the chiefe ground whereof is that we do not thinke the promises to be true without our selves untrue, but rather that by inwardly embracing them, we may thinke them our owne. Hereupon is gathered, who may truly be called faithfull. 3. 2. 15. 16.

Though of Faith toward in acknowledging the goodnesse of God toward them are not only oftentimes tempted with unquietnesse, but also are sometime shaken with most grievous troubles: yet this word standeth not but that faith bringeth assurednesse with it because howsoever they be troubled, yet they never faile and depart from that sure assistance which they have conceived of the mercy of God, but striving with their owne weaknesse they alwaies get the upper hand at last: which is proved by many examples in David. 3. 2. 17.

A description of the battell of the flesh and the spirit within a faithfull soule. 3. 2. 18.

The assurednesse of Gods good will. 3. 2. 18.

A confutation of the most pestilent subtil reasoning of certaine halfe Papists, which although they confesse that so oft as we looke upon Christ, we finde plentiful matter to hope well, yet will needs have us to waver and doubt in consideration of our owne unworthinesse. And it is proved that we ought nevertheless to looke for assured salvation, for as much as Christ by a certaine marvellous communion doth dayly grow together more and more into one body with us. 3. 2. 24.

So soone as wee have any one drop of faith we begin to behold God mercifull unto us, although a far off in deede, yet with so assured sight, as we know we are not deceived: both these points are proved by testimonies of Paul 3. 2. 19. 20.

It is shewed by examples, how faith armeth and fortifieth it selfe with the word of God to beare the violent assaults of tentations, and how the godly minde never suffereth the assistance of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it, although it be assailed with many remnants of unbeliefs and distrust. 3. 2. 21.

In the good will of God, which faith is said to have respect unto, although faith doe chiefly looke unto the assured expectation of eternall life, yet there are also contained promises of this present life and a perfect surety of all good things, but the same such as may be gathered of the word: both these points are confirmed by testimonies of Scripture. 3. 2. 28.

Faith although it embrace the word of God in every point, that is to say, in the commandments aments also and in the prohibitions and threatenings, yet hath her foundation and proper mark whereunto it is directed, in the free promise of mercie, and for this reason the Gospel is called the word of faith, and is set as contrarie to the law. 3.2.29.

Yet doe we not by this distinction reare faith in sunder as Pighius shamefully cavilleth. 3.2.30.

Faith doth not lesse need the word of God, than the fruit doth need the lively root of the tree, and with the word must be joyued a consideration of the power of God, without the which mens cares will either not willingly, heare the word, or not esteeme it worthily. His power is to be considered: in that that it is effectuall, that is to say, by the workes of God, and by his benefits either particular or ancient, and such as he hath bestowed upon the whole church. 3.2.31.

The faithfull oftentimes so behave themselves, that some errors are mingled with their faith, and they seeme to passe the bounds of the word, but yet so that faith hath alway the upper hand: This is proved by the examples of Sara and Rebecca, whom in the crooked turnings of their minde, God did by a secret bridle hold fast in the obedience of his word. 3.2.31.

By reason of our blindness and stiffneckedness, the word sufficeth not to make us have faith, unless the spirit of God doe enlighten our minde, and strengthen our heart with his power: and the same spirit is not only the beginner of our faith, but also doth encrease it by degrees. 3.2.33.

Although it seeme to the most part of men a most strange doctrine, that no man can beleve in Christ, but hee to whom it is given, yet is proved to be most true by reasons, testimonies of Scripture, and examples. 3.2.34.

Therefore faith is called the spirit of faith, the worke and good pleasure of God: and it is a singular gift, which hee giveth by singular priviledge to whom he will, as it is proved by notable sentences taken out of Augustine. 3.2.35.

It is not enough that the minde be enlightened with understanding of the word, unless also the assuredness of the word be powred into the very heart, both which things the spirit worketh, which is therefore called the seal, the pledge, and the spirit of promise. 3.2.36.

Although faith be tossed with divers doubtings, yet it alway at the last, escapeth out of the gulf of tentations, and receiveth most sweet quietnesse. 3.2.37.

A confutation of the damnable doctrine of the Schoolmen, which say that we can none otherwise determine of the grace of God toward us, than by morall conjecture. 3.2.38.

They are proved to be miserably blinde, in saying that it is unlesse for us to conceive an undoubted knowledge of the will of God: A good comparison of them and Paul in this point of doctrine. 3.1.39.

A confutation of their trifling shift that although we may take upon us to judge of the grace of God according to the present state of righteousness, yet the knowledge of persevering to the end abideth in suspense. 3.2.40.

It is proved that the definition of faith taught in this chapter, Sect. 7. agreeth with the Apostles definition: Heb. cap. 11. And the error of the Schoolmen, that charity is before faith and hope, is confuted by the testimonie of Bernard. 3.2.41.

Hope is alway engendred of faith, and is the undivided companion of faith, so that whosoever lacketh hope, is proved also to have no faith. Also faith is nourished and strengthened by hope, and how necessary are the helpes of hope to stablish faith which is assailed with so many sorts of tentations. 3.2.42.

By reason of this conjoyning and alliance of faith and hope, the scripture doth many times use those two words without difference, and sometime joyneth them together. A confutation of the error of Peter Lombard, which maketh two foundations of faith, that is to say, the grace of God, and the merit of workes. 3.2.43.

Of the imperfection of faith, and the confirming and encrease thereof. 4.1.4.7.8.

Fasting.

Of that part of discipline of the Church, which concerneth the appointing of fasting, or extraordinary prayers: and how Pastours ought to use it. 4.12.14.16.17.

It is to be provided that no superstition crepe in in fasting. 4.12.19.

The holy and rightfull Fasting hath three ends. 4.12.15.

The definition of fasting. 4.12.18.

Of the superstition of Lent, & the diversity of observing the same Fasting. 4.12.20.21.

Feare.

The faithfull are oftentimes troubled with Feare and distrust by reason of the feeling of their owne weaknesse. 3.2.17.

Another kinde of feare conceived in a godly heart, either by examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked, or by consideration of his owne misery : Such feare is so much not contrary to faith, that the faithfull are much exhorted to have it. Neither is it any marvell, if there bee in a faithfull soule both feare and faith, sith on the other side in the wicked there are both dull negligence and carefulnesse. 3.2.22.23.

The feare of God proceedeth out of a double feeling, namely, when we honour God as our father, and feare him as our Lord : Neither is it any marvell if one minde have both those affectiōns.

This feare differeth from the feare of the unfaithfull, which they commonly call a servile feare. 3.2.27.

Of forsaking our selves.

The first beginning of framing our life after the rule set forth in the Law, is to consider that we are not at our owne liberty, but halloved and dedicated to God. And therefore we ought to forsake our selves, and our owne reason, (which as the Philosophers thinke ought alone to be obeyed) to the end that wee may be governed by the Word and Spirit of the Lord. 3.7.1.

All that we ought not to seeke those things that are our owne, but those things that are according to the will of the Lord, and doe serve to advance his glory. And that this is the forsaking of our selves, without the which there is a world of vices enclosed in the soule of man, and if there be any seeming of vertue at all, the same is corrupted with wicked desire of glory. 3.7.2.

The forsaking or mortifying of our selves, is partly in respect of men, and partly, yea, and chiefly in respect of God. Toward other men, the Scripture commandeth us to doe two things : namely, to preferre them to honour before our selves, and with unfained truth to imply our selves wholly to procure their commodities. How the first of these points is to be performed, is taught in the 3.4.7. and also how the Scripture leadeth us by the hand to the second point, is shewed in the 3.7.5.

See certaine things pertaining to this purpose. 3.20.43.

Free-will.

Man was endued with free-will in the first estate of his creation. 1.15.8. which he lost by his fall. Of this the Philosophers were ignorant, and so all such as follow them, giving free-will to man, are utterly deceived. 1.15.8.

The pliability or weak power of free-will which was in the first man, doth not excuse his fall. 1.15.8.

It is as well for our profit as for the glory of God, to acknowledge our strength to be but a staffe made of a reed, yea, but a smoke. In the meane time we must beware, that while we take all uprightness from man, wee doe not thereof take occasion of slothfulnessse. But rather we ought thereby to be stirred up to seeke in God all the goodnesse whereof we our selves are void. The defenders of free-will doe rather throw it downe headlong than stablish it. 2.2.1.

The Philosophers determine three powers of the soule, Understanding, Sense, and Will or Appetite : and they thinke that the reason of mans understanding sufficeth for his good governance : that will is by sense moved to evil, so that it doth hardly yeeld it selfe to reason, and sometime is diversly drawne from the one to the other, but yet that it hath a free election, and cannot be stopped, that it may follow reason, her guide in all things : finally, that vertues and vices are in our powers. 2.2.2.3.

The Ecclesiasticall Writers, although they acknowledged the soundnesse of understanding and the freedome of will to have beene sore wounded by sinne, yet have spoken too much Philosophically of this matter. The old Writers did it for this purpose, first because they were loth to teach a thing that should be an absurdity in the common judgement of men, and also specially, lest they should give a new occasion of slothfulnessse to the flesh being already too much dull to godlinesse, as appeareth by many sayings of Chrysostome and Hierome. The Greeke Doctors above all others, and specially Chrysostome, doe exceed measure in advancing free will. But all the old writers generally, except Augustine, doe so vary and waver in this point of doctrine, that there can almost no certainty be gathered of their writings. They which came after them, fell one after another to worse and worse. The definitions of freewill out of Origen, Augustine, Bernard, Anselme, Peter Lombard, and Thomas. 2.2.4.

In what things they doe commonly give freewill to man, and of the three sorts of mans will. 2.2.5.

Also of the common distinction of the three sorts of liberty. 2.2.5.

Whether man be wholly deprived of power to doe good, or whether he have yet some power though it be weak: where it is spoken of the common distinction of grace working and grace working together, and what is amisse in the same distinction. 2.2.6.

Forasmuch as it cannot otherwise bee said that man hath freewill, but because he doth evill of his owne will, and not by compulsion, it had bene very good for the Church that this word freewill had never beene used, which had raised up men to a damnable trust of themselves. The old writers also do oft declare what they mean by that word, specially Augustine, out of whom there are many places alleadged, where he weakneth and mocketh the strength thereof, both when he calleth it Bondwill, and when hee expoundeth the thing its selfe as it is at large. 2.2.7.8.

Although the old Ecclesiasticall writers doe sometime too much advance freewill, and have spoken doubtfully and diversly in that matter: yet it appeareth by very many of their sayings, that they little or nothing esteeming mans power, gave the whole praise of all goodnesse to the holy Ghost. Many such sentences are rehearsed out of Cyprian, Augustine, Eucherius, Chrysostome. 2.2.9.

The power of mans will is not to be weighed by the successe of things, but by the choice of judgement and the affection of will. 2.4.8.

It is proved against the defenders of freewill that sinne is of necessity, and yet nevertheless ought to be imputed: also that it is voluntarie, and yet cannot be avoided. 2.5.1.

A solution of another objection of theirs, where they say that unless both vertues and vices proceede of free election of will, it were no reason that man should either be punished or rewarded. 2.5.2.

Also another objection, where they say that if this were not the power of our will, to choose good or evill, then of necessitie either all men should be good, or all men evill. 2.5.3.

Against the same men also it is proved that exhortations, admonitions, and rebukings are not in vaine, although it be not in the power of the sinner to obey: and there is shewed what effect the same do worke both in the wicked and the faithfull. 2.5.4.5.

It is not to bee gathered by the commandments and law of God, that man hath freewill and strength to performe them, for God doth not only command what ought to be done, but also promiseth grace to obey. 2.5.6.7.9.

This is proved as well in the commandments which require the first conversion to God, as also in those which speake simply of the observing of the law, and those which command men to continue in the received grace of God. For the same God which requireth those things, doth testifie that the conversion of a sinner, holinesse of life, steadfastnesse of continuance, are his free gifts, and the praise thereof is not to be parted betweene God and man. 2.5.8.9.11.

The condition all promises, as, if ye will, if ye beare, and such like, doe not prove that there is in man a free power of willing or be'ring: yet it is proved that God doth not mocke men in so bargaining with them. Also what is the use of such protestations, both toward the godly and toward the ungodly. 2.5.10.

The reprochings, wherein God saith to his people that they were the cause that they received not all kind of good things at his hand doe not prove that it was mans power to escape the evils wherewith they were afflicted. And there is spoken of the use of such reprochings as well toward them that obstinately goe forward in their faults, as toward the conformable that are converted to repentance. Also whereas the Scripture doth sometime give to us the office of doing, it doth so for no other reason but to awaken the slothfulness of the flesh. 2.5.11.

The saying of Moses, The commandment is nere to thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart &c. maketh nothing for the defenders of free will, forasmuch as he there speaketh not of the bare commandments, but of the Evangelicall promises of the Law. 1.5.12.

No more doe those places make for them, where it is said, that the Lord looketh and watcheth to see what men will doe. 2.5.13.

THe Scripture teaching the immeasurable and spirituall substance of God, doth overthrow not onely the follies of the common people, but also the subtil inventions of prophane philosophy, and the error of the Manichees concerning two originall beginnings, and the false opinion of the Anthropomorphites concerning a bodily God. 1.13.1.

Gospell.

Christ, although hee were knowne to the Jewes in the time of the Law, was yet shewed indeed only by the Gospell: and the holy Fathers, tasted of that grace, which is now offered to us with full abundance: they saw the day of Christ, albeit with a dim sight, the glory whereof now shineth in the Gospell, without any vaile betwene us and it. 2.9.1.2.

In the same place also is shewed, that the Gospell is properly and specially called the publishing of the grace given in Christ, and not the promises that are written by the Prophets concerning the remission of sins. Against the doctrine of Servetus, which taketh away the promises under this pretence, that by the faith of the Gospell we have the fulfilling of all the promises, it is proved that though Christ offer to us in the Gospell a present fulnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enjoying thereof lieth hidden under the custody of hope so long as we live in this world, and therefore we must yet rest upon the promises. 2.9.3.

Testimonies whereby the God-head of the Holy Ghost is proved. 1.13.14.15.

The Holy Ghost is the bond wherewith Christ doth effectually binde us to him, and without it, all that Christ hath suffered and done for the salvation of mankind, doth nothing profit us. 3.1.1.3.

Christ came after a singular manner furnished with the Holy Ghost, to sever us from the world, and therefore he is called the Spirit of sanctification. Why he is sometime called the Spirit of the Father, and sometime the Spirit of the Sonne. He is called the Spirit of Christ, not only in respect that Christ is the eternall Word, but also according to his person of Mediator. 3.1.2.

An exposition of the titles wherewith the Scripture setteth forth the Holy Ghost: and there is entreated of the beginning and whole restoring of our salvation: The titles be these, the Spirit of adoption, the earnest and seale of our inheritance, life, water, oyle, ointment, fire, a fountaine, the hand of God, &c. 3.1.3.

Faith is the chiefe worke of the Holy Ghost, and therefore to it for the most part are all those things referred which are commonly found in the Scripture to expresse the force and effectuall power of the Holy Ghost. 3.1.4.

Humility.

It is not the true humility which God requireth of us, unless we acknowledge our selves utterly void of all goodnesse and righteousness. 3.12.6.

Of this humilitie there is an example shewed in the Publicane. 3. 12. 7.

That wee may give place to the calling of Christ, both presumption and carelesseesse must be far away from us. 3. 12. 8.

There is no danger lest man should take too much from himselfe, so that hee learne that which wanteth in himselfe, is to be recovered in God. It is a diuinish word, although it be swete to us, that lifteth up man in himselfe:
for repulsing thereof, there are recited out of the Scripture many weighty sentences, which doe vigorously throw downe man: and also there are recited certaine promises, which doe promise grace to none but to them that doe pine a-whose eyes all things are open. 2. 8. 16.

An exposition of the second commandment:
where is spoken of idoles and images. 2. 8. 17.

The Scripture to the intent to bring us to the true God, doth expressly exclude all the gods of the Gentiles, 1. 10. 3. and specially all idols and images. 1. 11. 1.

God is severed from idoles, not only that he alone should haue the name of God, but that he alone should be wholly worshipped, and no-conveyed to any other. 1. 12. 1.

their eyes. 1. 11. 8.

After such an invention by and by followeth the worshipping of the image, like as of God or of any other creature in the image: both which the law of God forbiddeth. 1. 11. 8. 9.

Against them, which for defence of a bominable idolatrie, doe pretend that they doe not take the images for Gods, it is proved that neither the Iewes did thinke their casse to be God, nor the beaten when they made to themselves images did ever thinke the same to be God, whom no man excuse. 1. 11. 9.

The Papists are so perswaded as the Hea-

Of the justification of faith, and first of the definition of the name, and of the thing it selfe. 3. 11.

The article of doctrine concerning the Justification of Faith, is of great importance. 3. 11. 1.

It is proved by the Scripture against the Supbisters, that this is a sure principle, that we are justified by faith onely. 3. 11. 19. 20.

That wee may be thoroughly persuaded of the free justification, wee must lift up our mindes to the Judgement seat of God: before which, nothing is acceptable but that which is whole and perfect in every behalfe, the dread- full majestie whereof is described by many places of Scripture. 3. 1. 2. 12.

All godly writers doe shew that when men have to doe with God, the only place of refuge for conscience, is in the free mercy of God, excluding all trust of works: And this is proved by testimonies of Augustine and Bernard. 3.12.3.

Two things are to be observed in free justification: the first, that the Lord keepe fast his glory unminished: which is done when he alone is acknowledged to be righteous, for they glory against God, which glory in themselves. 3.13.1.2. the second, that our consciences may have quietnesse in the sight of his judgement. 3.13.3.4.5.

Knowledge of God.

To know God, is not onely to conceive that there is some God, but to understand so much as becometh us to know of him, and so much as availeth for his glory, and is expedient. 1.2.1.

The knowledge of God ought to tend to this end: first, to frame us to feare and reverence: and then that by it guiding and teaching us, we may learne to aske all good things of him, and to account the same received at his hand. 1.2.2. & 1.5.8.

The Philosophers had no other knowledge of God, than that which made them unexcusable, but did not bring them to the truth. 2.2.18.

This persuasion is naturally planted in all men, that there is some God. 1.2.3. and that to this end, that they which doe not worship him, may be condemned by their owne judgement. 1.3.1.

Law.

The Law, that is to say, the forme of Religion set forth by Moses, was not given to hold the old people still in it, but to nourish in their hearts the hope of salvation in Christ, untill his coming, which is proved by this, that Moses repeateth the mention of the covenant: and by the order of the ceremonies appointed as well in Sacrifices as in washings, also by the office of Priesthood of the tribe of Levi, and the honour of kingdome in David and his posterity. The Law also of the ten Commandments was given to prepare mento seeke Christ. 2.7.1.2. and that is done, when it maketh us unexcusable, being bring on every side convicted of our finnes, to move us to seeke for pardon of our guiltinesse. 2.7.3.4.

It is proved by the Scripture, and declared that the observing of the Law is impossible. 2.7.5.

There are three uses and offices of the morall Law: The first is, that shewing unto us the righteousnesse which onely is acceptable unto God, it may be as a glasse for us, wherein wee may behold our weaknesse, and by it our wickednesse, and finally by them both, our accursednesse: Neither turneth this to any dishonour of the Law, but maketh for the glory of the bountifullnesse of God, which both with help of grace aideth us to doe that which we are commanded, and by mercy putteth away our offences. Neither yet doth this office altogether cease in the reprobate. 2.7.6.7.8.9.

The second office is to restrate the reprobate with feare of punishment, lest they unbridledly commit the wickednesse which inwardly they alway nourish and love: and also to draw backe the children of God before their regeneration from outward licentiousnesse. 2.7.10.11.

The third office concerneth the faithfull: for the Law although it be already written with the finger of God in their hearts, yet profiteth them two wayes: First by studying upon it they are more confirmed in the understanding of the will of the Lord, and are stirred up and strengthened to obedience, that they goe not out of kinde by the sluggishnesse of the flesh. 2.7.12.13. For as touching the curse of the Law, it is taken away from the faithfull, that it can no more extend it selfe against them in damning and destroying them. 2.7.14.

By the ten commandments of the law we learne the same things which we but slenderly taste by instruction of the Law of nature: First that we owe to God reverence, love, and feare, that righteousnesse pleaseth him, and wickednesse displeaseth him: finally, that examining our life by the rule of the Law, we are unworthy to be accounted among the creatures of God, and that our power is insufficient, yet no power at all to performe the Law. Both these points ingendred in us humility, and abasing of our selves, which teacheth us to see to the mercy of God, and to crave the helpe of his grace. 2.8.1.2.3.

Forasmuch as God the Law-maker is spirituall, that is to say, speaketh as well to the soule as to the body, therefore the Law likewise requireth not only an outward honesty, but also an inward and spirituall righteousnesse, and a very angelike purenesse. 2.8.6. which is proved by Christs own exposition, when he confuted the Pharisees wrong interpretation, which required onely a certaine outward observation of the Law. 2.8.7.

There is alway more in the commandments & prohibitions of the Law, than is expressed. Therefore for the right and true expounding of them, it behooveth to weigh what is the intent or end of every of them: Then from that which is commanded or forbidden, we must draw an argument to the contrarie, that wee may understand, that not only an evill is forbidden, but also the good is commanded which is contrarie to that evill. 2.8.8.9.

The Law teacheth not onely certaine introductions and principles of righteousnesse, but the very accomplishment thereof, the expressing of the image of God, and the perfection of holinesse: which Law is all contained in two points, that is to say, the love of God and of our neighbour. 2.8.51.

Life of a Christian man.

The Law containeth a rule how to frame a mans life, and divers places also of the Scripture doe here & there declare it, and not without an orderly manner of teaching, although not so exquisite and curious as the Philosophers doe. 3.6.1.

Herein the Scripture doth two things: it stirreth us up to the love of righteousness, and teacheth a rule how to follow the same. The first point it worketh by divers arguments and reasons, 3.6.2. and herein the Scripture layeth much better foundations, than can be found in all the bookes of the Philosophers, 3.6.2.

Life present, and the helpes thereof.

The Scripture teacheth the best way how to use the goods of this life. 3.10.4.5.

Two faults must be avoided: that we doe neither binde our consciences with too much rigorosnesse, nor give loose raines to the intemperancie of men. 3.10.1.3.

God both in clothing and in food provided not onely for our necessity, but also for our delights, 3.10.2.

It is most necessary, that every one of us in all the doings of this life doe looke upon his vocation, that we attempt nothing rashly, with doubtfull conscience. 3.10.6.

God disdaineth not to provide also for the necessities of our earthly body, & in what sense we aske of him our daily bread. 3.20.44.

Life to come.

God doth by divers mysteries teach us the contempt of this present Life, that we may earnestly desire Life to come. 3.9.1.2.4.

Such a contempt of this life is required of us, that we neither hate it, nor be unthankfull to God, of whose clemencie it is a testimonie to the faithfull. 3.9.3.

An admonition to them which are bolden with too much feare of death, that Christians ought rather to desire that day which shall make an end of their continuall miseries, and fill them with true joy. 3.9.5.6.

Of the incomprehensible excellencie of the eternall felicity (which is the end of the resurrection) the taste of the sweetnesse whereof we ought here continually to take, but yet to avoid curiosity, whereupon doe arise trifling and noysome questions, ye 1, and hurtfull speculations. And there shall bee an equall measure of glory to all the children of God in heaven. 3.25.10.11. In which place also is an answer to the questions which some men doe move concerning the state of the children of God after the resurrection.

In what sense eternal life is sometime called the reward of works. 3.18.2.4.

Magistrates.

THe office of Magistrates is not onely holy and lawfull before God, but also the most holy and honourable degree in all the life of men, and this is proved by divers titles wherewith the Scripture doth set it forth, and by the examples of holy men which have borne civill power. 4.20.4.

This consideration is a pricke to godly Magistrates, to move them to the doing of their duty, and also it is a comfort to ease the hard travels of their office. 4.20.6.

A confusion of them, which say that though in the old time under the law Kings and Judges ruled over Gods people, yet this servile kind of government doth not agree with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his Gospell. 4.20.5.7.

They are which exclude the Magistrates from the charge of Religion, forasmuch as their office extendeth to both the tables of the Law. It is proved by Scripture, that they are ordained Protectors and defenders, as well of the worshiping of God as of common peace and honesty, which they cannot thoroughly performe without the power of the sword. 4.20.9.

A declaration of this question by Scripture, how the Magistrates may be godly, and also draw their swords, and shed the blood of men, and it is proved, that they are so farre from sinning in punishing of offenders, that this is one of the vertues of a King, and a prooffe of their godlinesse. Herein the Magistrates must beware of two faults, namely, extreme rigorositie, and superstitious desire of piety. 4.20.10.

It is the duty of subjects towards Magistrates, to thinke honourably of them as of the Ministers and Deputies of God, forasmuch as concerneth their degree, but not that they should esteeme the vices of men for vertues. 4.20.22.

It is also their duty with minds heartily bent to the honouring of them, to declare their obedience toward them, whether it bee in following their decrees or paying of tributes, &c. to pray to God for their safety and prosperitie, to raise no tumults, and not to thrust themselves into the office of the Magistrate. 4.20.23.

Even wicked Princes of evill life, and wch rule tyrannously (forasmuch as pertainteth to publike obedience) ought to be had in as great reverence and honour as we would give to the best King that might be, 4.20.24.25. because even they also have the publike power not without the providence & singular power of God. Which is proved by divers testimonies and examples of Scripture: and there is shewed with what considerations those subjects ought to bridle their owne impatience which live under such ungodly and wicked Tyrants. 4.20.26.27.28.29.31.

It is not lawfull for private men to rise up against Tyrants, but onely for them which by the lawes of the Kingdome or of the Countrey, are the defenders of the libertie of the people. 4.20.31.

The Lord by his marvellous goodnesse and providence doth sometime raise up some of his servants to punish Tyrants, and sometime also hee directeth thereunto the rage of wicked men, whilk they intend another thing. 4.20.30.

In the obedience which is due to the commandments of Kings and Rulers this is alway to be excepted, that it draw us not away from the obedience of God. Neither is any wrong done to them when wee refuse to obey them in such things as they command against God: And this is our duty, how great and present perillsoever doe hang upon such constancie. 4.20.32.

Man.

Man is by knowledge of himselfe not onely moved to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him. 1.1.1.

The creation of Man is a notable shew of the power, wisdom, and goodnesse of God: Wherefore Man is by some of the Philosophers called a little world. 1.5.3.

The unthankfulness of men, which feeling tokens of the providence of God both in their soule and body, yet do not give God praise. 1.5.4.

Two sorts of knowledge of our selves, the one in our first originall estate, the other after Adams fall, and the later is not to be received without considering the first, lest we should seeme to impute corruption to God the Author of nature. 1.15.1.

The knowledge of himselfe is most necessary for man, which consisteth in this (as the truth of God prescribeth) that first considering to what end hee is created and endued with excellent gifts, he should hang altogether upon God, of whom hee hath all things by

After the fall of Adam, he should truly in himself and conceive a new desire to seeke God, that in him he may recover these good things, of which he himselfe is fowled with with and empty. Wherefore we must be clear in this point we bearken not to the judgements of the flesh, and to the booke of Philosophers, which while they in themselves in considering only our good things, would carry us away into a mist which is not ours of our selves.

2. I. 1. 2. 3.

Man can never come to the true knowledge of himselfe, unless hee have first beheld the face of God, that is to say, till he have be-ggen to know and weigh by the Word of God, what, and how exact is the perfection of his righteousness, wisdom, and power, to the which we ought to be made of like forme.

I. I. 2.

Even the most holy men were stricken with feare and astonishment, when God did extraordinarily show his presence and glory unto them. I. I. 3.

That whole Man is corrupted in both parts of him (that is to say both in understanding, minde, and in heart or will) is proved by divers titles wherewith the Scripture describeth him, specially when it saith that hee is flesh: And there is declared that this word flesh is not referred onely to the sensuall part but also to the superior part of the soule. 2. 3. 1.

That men doe in vaine seeke for any good thing in their owne nature, is proved by Paul, which entreating of the universall kindred of the children of Adam, & not rebuking the corrupted manners of some one age alone, but accusing the perpetuall corruption of nature taketh from men righteousness, that is to say, uprightnesse and purenesse, and then understanding, and last of all the feare of God. 2. 3. 2.

A consultation of the objection concerning certain Heathen men, which forasmuch as they were all their life long by the guiding of nature bent to be endeavour of vertue and hon-nesty, do seeme to waine us, that we should not esteeme the nature of man, altogether corrupt.
 Therefore it is declared that in the unbelievers
 God doth not inwardly cleanse the corruption of nature wherewith man is in each part defiled, (as he doth in the elect) but by this providence sometime he bridleth it in them, that it breake not forth into deeds, and restraineth it by divers waies, so much as he knoweth to be expedient for preserving of the universall state of things. 2. 3. 3.

Those vertues which were said to have beene in heathen Men, are not sufficient proofes of the purenesse of nature, for as much as their mind was inwardly not upright, being corrupted with ambition or some other poison, & not directed with desire to set forth the glory of God: and also for as much as those vertues are not the common gifts of nature, but the speciall graces of God, which hee diversly and by a certaine measure giveth to prophane Men, as oftentimes to Kings, and sometime to private men. 2. 3. 4.

Marriage.

An exposition of the seventh commandement, wherein the Lord forbiddeth fornication and requirith chastity and cleanness, which we ought to keepe and preserve both in our minde, and in our eies, and in the apparell of our body, and in our tongue, and in the moderate use of meat and drinke. 2. 8. 41. 44.

Continence is a singular gift of God, which he giveth not to all men, but to some, yea and that sometime for a season: As for them to whom it is not granted, let them alway flee to marriage, which is ordained of the Lord for the remedy of mans necessity. 2. 8. 41.
 42. 43.

Maried persons must beware that they commit nothing unbeseeming the honesty and temperance of Marriage: Otherwise they seeme to be adulterers of their owne wives, and not husbands. 2. 8. 44.

The Papists doe wrongfully call Marriage a Sacrament: And their reasons are confuted.
 4. 19. 34. It is proved that the place of Paul, wherewith they seeke to cloke themselves, maketh nothing for them. 4. 19. 35.

In the meane they disagree with themselves when they exclude Priests from this sacrament, and do say that it is uncleannesse and defiling of the flesh. 4. 19. 36.

By this false colour of Sacrament, the Pope with his Clergy have drawne to themselves the hearing of causes of Matrimony, and have made lawes of marriage, which partly are manifestly wicked against God, and partly most unjust toward men, which lawes are rehearsed. 4. 19. 37.

Mediator Christ.

It behooved that Christ, to the end that hee might

The Table.

might performe the office of Mediator, should be made man, forasmuch as God had so ordained, because it was best for us, with none other could be the means for restoring of peace betwene God and us, none other could make us the children of God, none other could assure unto us the inheritance of the heavenly kingdom, none other could, for remedy sit mans obedience against mans disobedience. 2. 12. 1. 2. 3.

A confutation of their fantasticall conceit, which affirme that Christ should have become man, although there had needed no remedy for the redeeming of mankind. And it is proved by many reasons and texts, that forasmuch as the whole Scripture crieth out that he was clothed with flesh, to the end that hee might be the redeemer, therefore it is too great rashnesse to imagine any other cause or purpose 2. 12. 4.

Neither is it lawfull to search further concerning Christ: and those that do search further, doe with wicked boldnesse runne forward to the feigning of a new Christ: And herein Osiander is reproved, which hath at this time renewed this question, and affirmeth that this error is confuted by no testimony of Scripture. 2. 12. 5.

And the principle is overt broome which he buildeth on, that man was create after the image of God, because he was formed after the likeness of Christ to come, that he might resemble him whom the father had already decreed to cloth with flesh: And there is shewed that the image of God in Adam, was the markes of excellency wherewith God had garnished him, which doth also shine in the Angels. 2. 12. 6. 7.

A solution of other objections or absurdities which the same Osiander seareth: namely, that then Christ was borne and create after the image of Adam but as it were by choice: and that the Angels should have lacked their head, and men should have lacked Christ their king. 2. 12. 6. 7.

How the two natures do make one person of the Mediator in Christ: Which is shewed by a similitude taken of the joyning of the soule and body in one man: And then it is proved by divers places that the Scripture doth many times give unto Christ those things which properly belongeth to the Godhead, and sometime those things which must be referred onely to the manhood, and sometime giveth to the one nature that which is proper to the other: which figurative manner of speech is called communicating of properties. 2. 14. 1. 2. and sometime also giveth to Christ those things which doe comprehend both natures together, but doe severally well agree with neither of them. Which last point the most part of the old writers have not sufficiently marked: Yet it is good to be noted, for the dissolving of many doubts, and for avoiding of the errors of Nestorius and Eutiches. 2. 14. 3. 4.

A confutation of the error of Servetus, which had put in the stead of the Son of God, an imagined thing made of the substance of Gods spirit, flesh, and three elements uncreat: His subtilty is disclosed, and there is proved (which thing he denieth) that Christ was the Sonne of God, even before that he was borne in the flesh, because he is that word begotten of the father before all worlds. 2. 14. 5.

Also it is proved that he is truly and properly the Son of God in the flesh, that is to say in the nature of man, but yet in respect of his Godhead, and not of his flesh, as Servetus babbleth. 2. 14. 6.

An exposition of certaine places which Servetus and his disciples doe enforce for defence of their error: There is also another cavillation of his disclosed, that Christ before that he appeared in the flesh, is in no place called the son of God but under a figure. 2. 14. 7.

Also there is opened the error of all them which doe not acknowledge Christ the Son of God but in the flesh: and there are briefly rehearsed the grosse subtilties of Servetus, wherewith hee hath bewitched himselfe, and other, overt brooming that which pure faith beleaveth concerning the person of the Sonne of God. And thereupon is gathered that with the crafty subtilties of that filthy dog, the hope of salvation is utterly extinguisht. 2. 14. 8.

Merit of Christ.

It is truly and properly said that Christ merited for us the grace of God and salvation. Where it is proved that Christ was not onely the instrument or minister of salvation, but also the Author and principall doer thereof: And in so saying, the grace of God is not defaced, because the merit of Christ is not set against mercy, but bangerth upon it. And those things which are Sabalterna, fight not as contraries. 2. 17. 1.

The distinction of the merit of Christ and of the grace of God is proved by many places of Scripture. 2. 17. 2.

There are alleaged many testimonies of Scripture,

Scripture, out of which it is certainly and soundly gathered, that Christ by his obedience hath truly purchased and deserved favour for us with his Father. 2. 17. 3. 4. 5.

It is a foolish curiosity to enquire whether Christ hath deserved, any thing for himselfe: and it is rashnesse to affirme it. 2. 17. 6.

Merits of works.

The boastings that are made of the Merits of works, doe overthrow as well the praise of God in giving righteousness, as also the certainty of salvation. 3. 15. 1.

Whosoever first applied the name of Merit to good works in the sight of Gods judgement, he did against the purenesse of Faith. And though the old fathers used that name, yet they so used it, that they have in many places shewed, that they attribute nothing to works. 3. 15. 2.

An exposition of certaine places, wherewith the Sophisters goe about to prove that the name of merit toward God is found in the Scripture. 3. 15. 4.

It is proved by authority of the Apostles and Augustine, that the rewards of righteousness doe hang upon the more liberality of God. 2. 5. 2.

It is proved that this is a false saying, that Christ merited for us onely the first grace, and that afterward we doe merit by our owne works. 3. 15. 6. 7.

There be certaine things touching Merits, in the title of Justification by Faith.

Ministerie of the Church.

Of the Ministry of the Church, and of them which despise this manner of learning. 4. 1. 5.

Of the efficacy of the Ministerie. 4. 5. 6. God, which might teach the Church either himselfe alone, or by Angels, yet doth it by the Ministerie of men for three causes. 4. 3. 1.

The Ministerie of the Church is garnished with many notable titles of commendation in the Scripture. 4. 3. 2. 3.

Of Apostles, Prophets, Evangelists, Pastors and Teachers: and what is the severall office of every of them. 4. 3. 4. 5.

The chiefe parts of the office of Apostles and Pastors are to preach the Gospel, and Minister the Sacraments. 4. 3. 6.

Pastors are so bound to their Churches, that they may not remove to any other place without publicke authority. 4. 3. 7.

They are called in the Scripture, Bishops, Priests, Pastors and Ministers which governe Churches. 4. 3. 8.

Noman ought to thrust himselfe into the Church to teach or governe: But there is a calling required. 4. 3. 10.

The preaching of the word of God, is compared to seed which is scattered in the ground: Whereby wee understand that the whole increase proceedeth of the blessing of God and the effectual working of the holy Ghost. 4. 14. 11.

What manner of men ought to be chosen Bishops, and in what sort and whom they are to be chosen, and with what forme or ceremony they are to be ordered. 4. 3. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16.

The old Church before the Papacy divided all their Ministers into three degrees, Pastors, Elders, and Deacons. 4. 4. 1.

Of the commission to remit and retaine sins or to binde or loose, which is a part of the power of the keyes, and pertaineth to the Ministry of the word. 4. 11. 1.

Monkery.

None series in the old time were the seed plots of Ecclesiasticall orders: And there is described out of Augustine the forme of the old Monkery, and how they were wrount at that time to get their living with the labor of their hands. Whereby appeareth that at this day the manner of Popish Monkery is far otherwise. 4. 13. 8. 9. 10.

Of the proud title of perfection wherewith the Monkes doe set out their kinde of life. 4. 13. 11. because they binde themselves to keepe the counsels of the Gospel (as they call them) whereunto other Christian men are not bound. Sect. 12. and because they have forsaken all their possessions. Sect. 13.

As many as go into Monasteries, doe depart from the Church, seih they openly aff me that their Monkery is a forme of second Baptisme. 4. 13. 14.

The Popish Monkes doe in manners much differ from the old Monkes. 4. 13. 15.

Some things are to be mistaked even in the profession of the old Monkery, and they that were the Authors thereof brought a perillous example into the Church. 4. 13. 16.

Monks with their vowes doe consecrate themselves not to God but to the devil. 4. 13. 17.

Patience.

A Part of the forsaking of our selves, in respect of God, is contentation of minde and sufferance: Which we shall performe, if in seeking the commoditie and quiet of this present life, we yeeld our selves wholly to the Lord, and doe not desire, hope for, or thinke upon any other meane of prospering than by his blessing. 3. 7. 8.

So shall it come to passe that we shall never seeke our owne commodities by unlawfull meanes, or with wronging of our neighbours: also that we shall not burne with unmeasurable desires of riches or of honors: finally, if things prosper well with us, we shall yet be holden from pride, and if they happen ill, we shall yet be restrained from impatience. 3. 7. 9. Which extendeth to all chancēs whereunto our present life is subject, whereof the faithfull doe alwayes acknowledge the hand of God their Father, and not fortune, to be the governour. 3. 7. 10.

The Patience of the faithfull is not such as is without all feeling of sorrow, but such as being upholden by godly comfort, fighteth against the naturall feeling of sorrow. Therefore the patience of the Stoikes is to be rejected: neither is it in it selfe any fault to weepe or feare. 3. 8. 8. 9.

A description of that striving which is ingendred in the hearts of the faithfull by the feeling of nature, which feeling cannot be cleane done away, and by the affection of godlinesse, wherewith that same feeling must be subdued and tamed. 3. 8. 10.

There is a great difference betweene Philosophicall and Christian patience. Forasmuch as the Philosophers doe teach us to obey, because we so must of necessity: but Christ teacheth it, because it is righteous, and also because it is profitable for us. 3. 8. 11.

Pardons.

The so long continuing of pardons declareth in how deepe darknesse of errors men have bene drowned, these certaine ages past. 3. 5. 1.

What pardons are by the Papisht doctrine: Whereby is proved that they are a dishonouring of the blood of Christ: A comparison of Christ and Papisht pardons. 3. 5. 1.

A confutation of the wicked doctrine of pardons, by the notable saying of Leo Bishop of Rome, and of Augustine. And there is shewed that the blood of Martyres is not unlawfull, although it have no place in forgiveness of sins. 3. 5. 3. 4.

Either the Gospell of God must lie, or pardons must be lying deceits. And there is shewed what seemeth to have bene the beginning of them. 3. 5. 5.

Penance, the Papisht Sacrament.

Of the usage of the old Church in publike penance: and of the laying on of hands at reconciliation. Also how in proceesse of time the laying on of hands was used in private absolutions. 4. 19. 14.

The divers opinions of the Schoolemen how Penance is a Sacrament: And there is shewed that the definition of a Sacrament doth not agree with it. 4. 19. 15. 16.

It is a lie, and a deceitfull error which they have invented concerning the Sacrament of Penance: and it is a wicked and blasphemous title wherewith they have garnished it, a second board after ship-wracke from Baptisme. 4. 19. 17.

Perseverance.

See Booke 2. Chap. 5. Sect. 3.

A confutation of the most wicked error that Perseverance is given of God according to the Merit of men, so as every man hath shewed himselfe not unthankfull for the first grace: and in this opinion is shewed a double error. Of the common distinction of grace working, and working together: and how Augustine used it, qualifying it with an apt definition. 2. 3. 11.

Politicke Government.

There is a difference to be made betweene Politic,

Policy, and the inward government of the Soule. There doctrine is to be rejected which goes about to overthrow Policy as a thing not necessary for Christians, or as a thing that overthroweth the spiritual liberty of the Soule. Also those fluterers are to be rejected, which doe give too much unto it, and doe set it in comparison against the authority of God. 4.20.1.23.

Policy is the gift of God, which bringeth great commodities to mankinde and no small helpe to the defence of the state of religion. Politicke government hath three parts, the Magistrate, The Lawes, and the People. 4.20.3.

Of the three formes of Civill government, Aristocracy the government of the best choisest men. Democracy the government of the people, Monarchy the government of one: it cannot simply be determined which of these is the best: yet it cometh to passe by the fault of men, that it is safer and more tolerable to have many to governe, than one to raigne. But all these formes are of Gods, and diversly disposed by him: therefore it is the duty of private men to obey, and not to make innovation of states after their owne will. 4.20.8.

Of the immunity that the Romish Clergy take to themselves, which was altogether unknown to the Bishops of the old Church. 4.11.15.

In matters of Faith, the judgement in the old time pertained to the Church and not to Princes, although sometime princes entremedled their authority in ecclesiasticall matters, but the same was done to preserve and not to trouble the order of the Church. 4.11.15.16.

Of the authority of the sword usurped by the Bishops in the Papacy: and how they have by little and little from so small beginnings grown to so great increase. 4.11.9.10.

Pope.

It is proved that the supremacy of the sea of Rome is not by the institution of Christ. 4.6.1.2.3.4.

Neither had Peter any principality in the Church or among the Apostles. 4.6.5.6.7.

Neither is it profitable nor may be, that one man should have rule over the whole Church. 4.6.8.9.10.

Although Peter had had a supremacy in the Church, yet it followeth not that the seat of that supremacy ought to be at Rome. 4.6.11.12.13.

It is proved by many arguments that Peter was not Bishop of Rome. 4.6.14.15.

The old Bishops of Rom., in the most part of their Epistles did ambitiously set forth the glory of their sea, but those Epistles at that time had no credit. Also they did thrust in certaine forged things, as though they had been written in the old time by holy men. 4.7.11.20.

Although in the time of Gregorie, the authority of the Bishop of Rome was greatly increased, yet it is proved by his writings that it was then farre from unbrideled dominion and tyranny. 4.7.12.13.22.

There was strife for the supremacy betwene the Bishop of Constantinople and the Bishop of Rome. 4.7.14.15.16. untill Phocas granted to Boniface the third, that Rome should be the head of all Churches: which afterward Pipine confirmed, when he gave to the sea of Rome jurisdiction over the Churches of France. 4.7.17.

From thenceforth the tyranny of the Sea of Rome increased more and more, partly by ignorance and partly by negligence of Bishops: which destruction of the whole order of the Church Bernard lamenteth and layeth to the Popes charge. 4.7.18.22.

Prayer.

True faith cannot be idle from calling upon God. 3.20.

How necessary, and how many waies profitable is the exercise of praying. 3.20.2. although the Lord will not cease while we crave not, nor needeth any to put him in minde. Sect. 3.

The first rule of well framing our prayer, is that wee be no otherwise disposed in heart and minde, than becommeth them that enter into talke with God. 3.20.4.5.

The second rule is, that in praying we alway feele our owne needinesse, and that earnestly considering that wee want all these things that wee aske, wee joyne with our prayer an earnest and fervent desire to obtaine. 3.20.6.

Wee ought to pray at all times, and in the greatest quietnesse of our estates, the only remembrance of our finnes ought to bee no small provocation to move us to that exercise. 3.20.7.

The third rule of praying well, is that wee forsake all confidence of our owne glory, lest if wee presumptuously take any thing, be it never so little, unto our selves, wee wish our vaine pride fall downe from his face. 3.20.8.

The beginning of praying well is the obtaining of pardon, with an humble and plaine confession of offence. 3.20.9.

In what sense the prayers of certaine holy men are to be taken, in which to intreat God, they seeme to alleage their owne righteousness. 3.20.10.

The fourth rule of praying well, is that being so overthrowne and beaten down with true humility: wee bee neverthelesse encouraged to pray with an assured hope to obtaine: so in our prayers, faith and repentance doe meet together. 3.20.11.

Of the perseverance of patience in the exercise of Prayer. 3.20.51.52.

Of Predestination.

It is proved that the doctrine of predestination is a doctrine of most sweet fruit. There are rehearsed three principall profits thereof: and they are admonished which being moved with a certaine curiosity, do beyond the bounds of Scripture breake into the secrets of the wisdom of God. 3.1.1.2. and also they which would have all mention of Predestination to be buried. Sect.3.4.

What is Predestination, and what is the foreknowledge of God, and how the one of them is wrongfully set after the other. The example of Predestination in all the off-spring of Abraham, in respect of other nations, is confirmed by many testimonies of Scripture. 3.21.5.

Also there is shewed a speciall Predestination, whereby even among the children themselves he hath made difference betweene some and othersome. Sect.6.7.

A confirmation of the doctrine of Predestination taken out of testimonies of Scripture. 3.22.

Of them that make a foreknowledge of Merits the cause of Predestination. Also of otherment that blame God, because he electeth some, and passeth over other. 3.22.1.

God as well in election as in reprobation hath no respect of works neither passed nor to come, but his good pleasure is the cause of both. 3.22.2.3.4.5.6.7.11.

This is proved by Augustine, Sect.8. and the trifling subtill device of Thomas to the contrary is confuted. Sect.9.

The promises of salvation are not directed to all, but peculiarly to the elect. 3.22.10.

Against those hogges which under colour of Predestination, doe goe carelesly forward in their sins: and against all them which say that if this doctrine take place, all endeavour of well-working decayeth. 3.23.12.

Against them which say that this doctrine overthroweth all exhortations to godly life, it is proved by Augulline, that preaching bath his course, and yet the knowledge of Predestination is not hindered thereby. 3.23.13.

In this point of doctrine we must so temper our manner of teaching the truth, that so farre as we may, we wisely beware of offence. 3.23.14.

Whereas some obye the preaching of the Word of God, and othersome despise it, or bee more blinded and hardened thereby, although this come to passe by their owne malice and unthankfulnesse, yet wee must therewith also know, that this diversity hangeth upon the secret counsell of God, than which it is unlawfull for any further cause. 3.24.12.13.14.

An exposition of certaine places wherein God seemeth to deny that it commeth to passe by his ordinance, that the wicked perish, but in as much as against his will they wilfully bring destruction upon themselves. And there is shewed that those places make nothing against the doctrine of Predestination. 3.24.15.16.

The universality of the promises of salvation, maketh nothing against the doctrine of the predestination of the reprobate: and yet not without cause are they framed universally. 3.24.16..

Here also are confuted certaine objections of them which deny this point of doctrine.

Priesthood, Kingdome, and Prophetical office of Christ.

That we may know to what end Christ was sent of his father, and what he brought unto us, three things are chiefly to be considered in him, his Prophetical office, his Kingdome, and his Priesthood: and therefore is given to him the title of Christ (or Messias which signifieth annointed) although he be specially so called in respect of his Kingdome. Albeit that God al-way gave Prophets and teachers to his Church, yet it is proved that all the godly looked for full light of understanding, only at the coming of Messias: and that he when he appeared was annointed a Prophet, not onely for himselfe, but also for all his body, 2.15.1.2.

As touching his Kingdome, first we must note the spirituall nature thereof, whereupon also is gathered the eternall continuance of it, which is of two sorts: the one pertaineth to the whole body of the Church, the other is proper to every member: both sorts are declared and plainly set forth by testimonies of Scripture. 3.15.3.

It is declared that the profit of the Kingdome of Christ cannot otherwise be perceived of us, but when we acknowledge it to be spirituall: and the same profit consisteth in two things, namely, that it enricheth us with all good things necessary to eternall salvation, secondly, that it fortifieth us with strength and vertue against the devill and all his assaults. And so Christ reigneth for us rather than for himselfe, whereupon we are rightfully called Christians: Where it is said, that at the last day he shall yeeld up his Kingdome to God and his father, and such like sayings, the same maketh nothing against the eternity of his kingdome. 4.15.4.5.

As touching his Priesthood, that the efficacy and profit thereof may come to us, it is shewed that wee must beginne at the death of Christ. Hereupon it followeth that he is an everlasting intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine favour, whereby ariseth to godly consciences both boldnesse to pray, and quietnesse: finally that he is so a Priest, that he joyneth us in the fellowship of so great an honour, to the end that the Sacrifices of prayers and praise which come from us, may be acceptable to God. 2.15.6.

Promises.

Not without cause all the promises are concluded in Christ: for as much as every promise is a testifying of the Law of God toward us, and none of us is beloved of God without Christ. Neither was Naaman the Syrian, Cornelius the Captaine, nor the Eunuch to whom Philip was carried, without knowledge of Christ, although they had but a very small taste to him, and a faith in some part unexpressed. 3.2.32.

The Table.

The Lord, to the end to fill our hearts with love of righteousness and hatred of wickedness, was not content to set forth bare commandments only, but addeth Promises of blessings both of this present life and of eternall bliss: and also threatenings both of present miseries and of eternall death: The threatenings declare the great pureness of God: the Promises doe shew his great love to righteousness, and his wonderfull goodness toward men. 2. 8.4.

Providence of God.

Profane men, by fleshly understanding doe confesse God the Creator, otherwise than wee doe by faith: forasmuch as faith doth teach that he is also the governour of all things not by a certaine universall motion, but by a singular providence which extendeth even to the least sparrow. 1. 16. 1.

They which give any thing to fortune, doe bury the Providence of God, by whose secret counsell all successes are governed. 1. 16. 2.

Things without life, although each of them have their property naturally planted in them, yet doe not put forth their force, but so far as they bee directed by the present hand of God: which is proved by the Sunne, before which hee would, both light to be, and the earth to abound with all kinde of good things: which also we read to have stood still by the space of two daies, and gone backe two degrees at the commandement of God. 1. 16. 2. also by the starres and figures of the heaven, which the unbelievers doe feare. Sect. 3.

The almightinesse of God is busied in continuall doing, so that it extendeth to every particular act, and nothing hapneth but by his counsell: Which who so doe not acknowledge, they defraude God of his glory and doe extenuate his goodness: But wee on the other side doe receive double fruit thereof. 1. 16. 3.

It is proved that the providence of God doth not onely behold things that are done, but governeth all successes: Whereby is overthrowen the fained invention of bare foreknowledge, and of universall providence onely: also the error of the Epicures is confuted, and of them which give to God a governance onely above the middle region of the aire. Yet there may a certaine universall providence be granted, but so, that the speciall providence bee not darkened, which doth governe not onely certaine but all particular doings. 1. 16. 4. 5.

That not onely the beginning of motion is in the disposing of God, is proved by the plentifullnesse of one yeere and the barrennesse of another, for whereas God calleth to the one his blessing, and the other his curse and vengeance. 1. 16. 5.

The providence of God in governing the world, is chiefly to be considered in mankind, and in the divers estate of all men, and divers disposing of successes. 1. 16. 6. 7.

Against them which cavill, that this doctrine of the providence of God, is the Stoicks doctrine of fate or destiny. 1. 16. 8.

Whether any thing happen by fortune or chance: Where is rehearsed the saying of Basilus Magnus, that chance and fortune are words of heathen men: also the saying of Augultine, that hee repented that hee had used the name of Fortune. Yet those things may be said to happen by fortune in respect of us, which being considered in their nature, or weighed according to our knowledge, doe seeme so, although in the secret counsell of God they be necessitie: Also all things that are to come, may be said to be happening, in asmuch as they bee uncertaine to us. 1. 16. 8. 9.

What things are to be considered, that the doctrine of the Providence of God, may be referred to a right hand, that wee have the profit thereof: and where the causes of those things that happen, appeare not unto us, wee must beware that wee doe not thinke, that things are rolled by the sway of fortune: but wee must so reverence his secret judgements, that wee esteeme his will the most just cause of all things. 1. 17. 1.

Against certaine dogges which at this day doe barke against the Providence of God, it is proved by the Scripture that whereas God hath so revealed his will in the Law, and the Gospell, that hee illuminateth the mindes of them that bee his with the Spirit of understanding, to perceive the mysteries therein contained, which otherwise are incomprehensibill, yet the order of governing the world is called a bottomlesse depth, because when we know not the causes thereof, yet we ought reverently to honour it. 1.

Such profane men doe foolishly comber themselves, when they alleadge that if the doctrine of the Providence of God be true, then the prayers of the faithfull in which they aske any thing for time to come are vaine, no counsell is to be taken for things to come, and then men which doe any thing against the Law of God, doe not sinne: These dangerous errors they shall avoid, which in considering the providence of God, shall frame themselves to true modesty. 1. 17.3.

As concerning things to come, it is proved that the Scripture doth well jynne the advisements of men with the Providence of God: because wee are not hindred by his eternall decrees, but that under his will, wee may both foresee for our selves, and order our owne things: For the knowledge of consulting and taking heede, are inspired into men by the Lord, whereby wee may serve his Providence, in the preserving of our owne life 1. 17.4.

In all successes of times past the will of God doth governe: and yet the doers of wicked deeds are not excused, because they are accused by their owne conscience, and doe not obey the will of God, but their owne lust. They are indeed the instruments of Gods providence, but so, that they finde the whole evil in themselves, and in God is found nothing but a lawfull use of their evilnesse. 1. 17.5. and 1. 18.4. Where also the same thing is shewed in the election of King Jeroboam, the tenne Tribes forsaking the house of David, the slaughter of the sonnes of Achab, and in the betraying of the sonne of God.

A godly and holy meditation of the Providence of God, which is taught by the rule of godlinesse first that being certainly perswaded that nothing happeneth by Fortune, wee alwaie cast our eyes to God the chiefe cause of all things: then that wee doubt not that his singular Providence watcheth for us, whether wee have to doe with men as well evil as good, or with his other Creatures: To which use wee must apply the promises of God in the Scripture which testifie the same, the examples whereof are rehearsed. 1. 17.6.

We must also adjoyne those testimonies of Scripture which teach that all men are under the power of God, whether we need to get their good wils to restraine the malice of our enemies: which last point God worketh divers waies, sometime by taking away their wit, sometime when hee granteth them wit, hee fraieteth them that they dare not goe about that which they have conceived: and sometime also when he suffereth them to goe about it, hee breaketh their enterprises; Upon which knowledge necessarily followeth a thankfulness of minde in so prosperous success of things. 1. 17.7.

In adversity when we are hurt by men, is required patience and quiet moderation of minde: Which is shewed in the examples of Joseph being afflicted of his brethren, Job persecuted of the Chaldees, and David railed upon of Semei. If we happen to be distressed with any misery without the worke of men this selfe same doctrine is the best remedy against impatience because the Scripture testifieth, that even adversities also doe come from God. 1. 17.8.

A Godly man principally regarding the providence of God, yet will not leave inferior causes unmarked. Therefore if he have received a benefit of any man, he will heartily know and confesse himselfe to be bound unto him. If he have taken harme or done harme to any other by his negligence or want of heed, he will impute it unto himselfe, much lesse will be excuse his owne offences. In things to come chiefly he will have consideration of inferior causes, but yet so that in determining he will not be carried away with his owne wit, but commit himselfe to the wisdom of God: neither shall his trust so stay upon outward helps, that hee will carelesly rest upon them if hee have them, nor be dismayed for feare if hee want them. 1. 17.9.

A large description of the inestimable felicity of a godly minde which reflecth upon the providence of God: and on the other side the miserable carefullnesse wherewith wee must needs be distressed when the weaknesse of this earthly cottage maketh us subject to so many diseases, with our life, and safety is beseged with infinite dangers at home, abroad, upon the land, in the water, by men, and by devils. 1. 17. 10. 11.

Those places of Scripture, where it is said that God repented him; maketh nothing against the doctrine of Providence, forasmuch as therein (like as also when he is said to be angry) the Scripture applying it selfe to our capacity describeth him, not such as hee is, but such as we seele him to be. Likewise, where he spared the Ninivites, to whom hee had threatned destruction within fortie daies, whereas he prolonged the life of Ezechias for many yeeres, to whom he had declared present death: because such threatnings containe an unexpressed condition. Which is well proved by a like example in King Abimelech, which was rebuked for Abrahams wife. 1. 17. 12. 13. 14.

A confutation of them which coveting to get a praise of modestie, goe about to maintaine the righteousness of God with a lying defence, when they say; that those things which Satan and all the reprobate doe naughtily, are done by the sufferance of God, and not by his providence and will. And it is proved by the affliction of Iob, the deceiving of Achab, the killing of Christ, the incestuous adulterie of Absolon, and many other examples, that men doe worke nothing but that which he hath already decreed with himselfe, and doth appoint so to be by his secret direction. 1. 18. 1.

And this hath place, not onely in outward doings, but also in secret motions. For it is proved by the hardning of Pharaon, and other testimonies, that God worketh even in the minds also and hearts of the wicked. Neither maketh it any thing to the contrarye, that oftentimes the worke of Satan is used therein: for God worketh neverthelesse, but after his owne manner, using a just revenge. 1. 18. 2. therefore God is not the Author of sinnes. Sect. 4.

They are proved guilty of insollerable pride, which refuse this doctrine under pretence of modestie. A confutation of their objection when they say that if nothing happen but with the will of God, then hath he in himselfe two contrarye wills, forasmuch as he doth appoint those things to be done by his secret counsell, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawes. And there is shewed, that God doth not disagree with himselfe; that the will of God is not changed, that hee doth not faine himselfe to will that which he willeth: but whereas there is in God, but one simple will, the same to us appeareth divers, because for the weakenesse of our understanding, wee conceive not how hee diversly both willeth not, and willeth one selfe thing to be done. Finally it is proved by Augultine, that man sometime with good will willeth something which God willeth not, and sometime willeth that thing with evill will, which God willeth with good will. 1. 18. 3.

The consideration of Gods power in governing this frame of heaven and earth, and all parts that are in them. 1. 5. 5.

The fellowship of men is so governed by the providence of God, that he preserveth himselfe liberall, mercifull, righteous, and severe. 1. 5. 6.

Those things which in the life of men are counted chances, as well of prosperitie as adversitie are so many tokens of the heavenly providence. 1. 5. 7. and ought to awaken us to the hope of the life to come. Sect. 9.

How God worketh in the hearts of them that be his, and Satan in them that be his, but yet so that they are not excused. 2. 4. 1.

God worketh also in the wicked, and even in the same worke wherein Satan worketh, and yet is not God, so said to be the Author of sinne: neither is Satan or the wicked excused, but there is difference betweene the one and the other, both in the end and manner of doing. 2. 4. 2. 5.

The old writers oftentimes reserved these things not to the working of God, but to his foreknowledge, or sufferance, lest the wicked should thereby take occasion to speake irreverently of the workes of God. But the Scripture when it saith that God blindeth, hardeneth, and such like, declareth somewhat more than a sufferance: although God doe worke two waies in the reprobate, namely by forsaking them, and taking his Spirit from them, and also by delivering them to Satans the minister of his wrath. 2. 4. 3. 4.

The ministerie of Satan is used to stir forward the reprobate, whensoever the Lord by his providence directeth them hither or thither. 2. 4. 5.

Purgatory.

We ought not to winke at the doctrine of Purgatorie, forasmuch as it is a damnable invention of Satan which maketh void the crosse of Christ, &c. 3. 5. 6.

An answer to the objection of the Papists, that it hath beene ancient usage of the Church that prayers should be made for the dead. Where is shewed that this was done by them in the old time, without the word of God, by a certaine wrongfull imitation, lest Christians if they were slow in having care of funerals and the dead, should seeme worse.

worse than heathen men. Yet herein was a great difference between this slipping of these old men, and the obstinate error of the Papists. 3.5.10.

R

Redeemer Christ.

THe knowledge of God the Creator is unprofitable unto us, unless faith doe also follow, setting him forth in Christ a Father and Redeemer to us, and this doctrine from the beginning of the world in all ages hath bene bolden among the children of God. 2.6.1.

It is proved by divers arguments and testimonies of Scripture, that the happy state of the Church hath alway bene grounded upon the person of Christ. For both the first adoption of the chosen people, and the preserving of the Church, the deliverance of them in perils, and the restoring after their dissipation, did alway hang upon the grace of the Mediator. And the hope of all the godly was never reposed any other where than in Christ. 2.6.2.3.4.

It is to be diligently considered how Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, that wee may find in him all things necessary for us, (as Bernard saith) he is to us light, meat, oil, salt, &c. 2.16.1.

An exposition how we should say that God was our enemy untill he was reconciled to us by Christ, whereas to give Christ to us, and to prevent us with mercy, were signes of the love wherewith he before embraced us. And there is shewed that the Scripture useth this speech and such other, to apply it selfe to our capacity: and yet it doth not the same falsely. And all this is proved by the authority of Scripture, and the testimony of Augustine. 2.16.2.3.

Regeneration.

Against certaine Anabaptists, which invent a phrenicke intemperance in stead of spiritual Regeneration, namely that the children of God being now restored into the state of innocencie, ought no more to be carefull to bridle the lust of the flesh, but onely to follow the spirit for their guide. 3.14.

They are deceived which say that Religion was devised by the subtilty of certaine men to hold the simple people in order. 1.3.2.

The very wicked and godlesse men are compelled whether they will or no to feele that there is a God. 1.3.2. and in what sense David saith, that they thinke that there is no God. 1.4.2.

Remission of Sinnes.

Against them which dreame a perfection in this life, which taketh away neede of asking pardon. 3.20.45.

Of Remission of finnes: and in what sense finnes are called debts, and how we are said to forgive other that have offended against us. ibid.

Of the distinction of fault and paine, where with most strong testimonies of Scripture the dotting error of the Papists is confuted, namely, that when the fault is forgiven, yet God retaineth the paine, which remaineth to be redeemed with satisfactions. 3.4.29. 30. and there also is shewed that they cannot scape away with their distinction betweene everlasting paine and temporall paine.

Of certaine places of Scripture where-with they goe about to consume their error: where it is declared that there are two kindes of the judgement of God: the one of Vengeance, the other of Chastisement, which are wisely to be distinguished asunder. 4.4.31.

The first of these, that is to say, vengeance, the faithfull have alway earnestly praied to escape: the other that is to say, chastisement, they have received with quiet minde, because it hath a testimonie of love. And where it is said that God is angry with his Saints, the same is not meant of his purpose or affection to punish them; but is spoken of the vehement feeling of sorrow wherewith they are stricken so soone as they beare any part of his severity: and this is profitable for them. On the other side the reprobate, when they are stricken with the scourges of God doe already after a certaine manner begin to feele the paines of his judgement.

The Table.

All which things are proved by testimonies of the Scripture, and also by the expositions of Chrysolome and Augultine. 3. 4. 32. 33.

God when he had forgiven the adultery of David, chastised him both for common example, and also to humble him: and for this reason he daily maketh the faithfull (to whom he is mercifull) subject to the common miseries of this life. 3. 4. 35.

An exposition of the article of the Creed concerning remission of finnes. 4. 1. 20. 21.

The keyes were given to the Church, to forgive sins, not only to men at their first conversion to Christ, but to the faithfull all their life long. 4. 1. 22.

This doctrine is proved by testimonies of Scripture against the Novations, and certaine of the Anabaptists which saime that the people of God are by baptisme regenerate into an angelike life, and afterward there remaineth no pardon for them that fall. 4. 1. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27.

A confutation of them which make a voluntary transgression of the law a sinne unpardonable. 4. 1. 28.

Repentance.

Repentance cometh offaith, and goeth not before it. 3. 3. 1.

A confutation of their reasons, which thinke otherwise, but hereby it is signified any space of time wherein faith breedeth repentance: but onely is shewed that no man can earnestly endeavour himselfe to repent unlesse hee know himselfe to be Gods. Of the error of certaine Anabaptists, Iesuits, and such other which appoint to their novices certaine daies for repentance. 3. 3. 2.

Certaine learned men long before this time, made two parts of repentance, namely mortification, which they commonly call contrition, Vivification which they wrongfully expound to be comfort by the feeling of the mercy of God: whereas it rather signifieth a desire to live well. 3. 3. 3.

They doe also make two other sorts of repentance, the one of the Law, the other of the Gospell: where also are shewed examples of either sort out of the Scripture. 3. 3. 4.

A true definition of repentance taken out of the Scripture, and here repentance though it cannot be severed, yet ought to be distinguished from faith. 3. 3. 5.

A plainer declaration of the definition of repentance: where first is shewed, that there is required a turning to God, that is to say, an alteration, not only in outward works, but also in the soule it selfe. 3. 3. 6. then that it proceedeth of an earnest feare of God: where also is entreated of the sorrowfulness that is according to God. 3. 3. 7.

Thirdly, that saying is declared that repentance consisteth of two parts, the Mortification of the flesh, and the quickning of the Spirit. 3. 3. 8.

Both these things doe we obtaine by partaking of Christ, the first by communicating of his death, the second of his Resurrection. Therefore repentance is a new forming of the Image of God in us, and a restoring into the righteousness of God by the benefit of Christ: and this restoring is not fulfilled in us in one moment. 3. 3. 9.

But there remaineth in all the Saints, while they live in moriall body, murther of strife with their flesh, and so thought all the Ecclesiastical writers that have been of sound judgement: and specially Augultine, which calleth this nourishment of evil and disease of lusting in the elect, weaknesse, and sometime sinne: and indeed it is sinne. 3. 3. 10.

This is confirmed by the testimony of Paul, and by the sum of the commandments. Whereas it is said that God cleanse his Church from all sinne, the same is spoken rather of the guiltines of sinne, then of the matter of sinne it self, which ceaseth not to dwell in the regenerate (but ceaseth to raigne in them) though it bee not imputed. 3. 3. 11.

A declaration of the seven causes or effects, or parts or affections of repentance, which Paul rehearseth. These be study or carefulnesse, excusing, displeasure, feare, desire, zeale, revenge. Whereunto also is added out of Paul, and declared by an excellent admonition of Bernard, that in such renewing we must keepe a measure. 3. 3. 15.

The fruits of repentance are devotion toward God, charity toward men, holinesse and purenesse in all our life: but all these ought to begin at the inward affection of the heart, from whence outward testimonies may afterward spring forth: where also is spoken of certaine outward exercises of repentance, which the old writers seeme to enforce somewhat too much. 3. 3. 16.

Turning of the heart to God is the chiefe point of repentance: Sackcloth and Ashes, weeping and fasting, were used of them in the old time before Christ, as tokens of publique repentance: of which the two last may yet be used.

used to appease the wrath of God in the miserable times of the Church. 3.3.17.

The name of repentance or penance is improperly drawne from his naturall sense, to this outward profession. Publike confession is not alway necessary in sins: but private confession to God may never bee omitted, wherein wee ought to confesse not only those things that we have lately committed, but the displeasure of our grievous fall, ought also to call us backe to remembrance of our passed offences. Of speciall penance which is required of baineous offenders and certaine other: and of the ordinances which the children of God, even the most perfect ought to use all their life long. 3.3.18.

God doth therefore freely justifie them that be his, that hee may also with the sanctification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousness: therefore John, Christ, and the Apostles preached repentance and remission of finnes. The effect of which saying is declared. 3.3.19.

Christians ought to exercise themselves in a continuall repentance, and he hath most profited, that hath learned most to mislike himselfe. 3.3.20.

Repentance is a singular gift of God, unto which he calleth all men, which he giveth to all them whom hee purposeth to save, and which the Apostle pronounceth, that it shall never be given to wilfull Apostates, whose wickednesse is unpardonable, that is to say, such as have sinned against the holy Ghost. 3.3.8.

Although feined repentance doth not please God, yet he sometimes for a season spareth hypocrites which make a shew of some conversion, which he doth not for their sakes, but for common example, that we may learne more cheerefully to give our minds to unfained repentance: and this is proved by the examples of Achab, Elau, and the Israelites. 3.3.25.

The Schoole Sophisters doe fouly erre in those definitions which they make of repentance, and no better doe they divide it, when they part it into contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: where is entreated of certaine questions which they move: whereupon is easily gathered, that they babble of things which they know not, when they speake of repentance. 3.4.1.

When they require those three things in repentance, they must needs binde thereunto forgiveness of finnes: And if it be so, then are we most miserable, for as much as wee can never have quietnesse of consciences which is proved first in that contrition of heart, such as they require. 3.4.2.

There is a great difference betwene the doctrine of such contrition, and that contrition which the Scripture requireth of sinners, that they truly hunger and thirst for the mercy of God, 3.4.3.

In what sense the old writers thought that solemne penance, which was then required for baineous offences, might no more bee estioones done then Baptisme. 4.1.29.

Reason of Man.

Mans understanding is not so to be commended of perpetuall blindnesse, that we leave it no wit of understanding in any kinde of thing: but it hath some knowledge in as much as he is naturally carried with desire to search out truth: And yet this desire by and by falleth into vanity, because the minde of man cannot for dulnesse keepe the right way to search out truth, and for the most part he discerneth not of what things it is beehovefull for him to seeke the true knowledge. 2.2.12.

As touching earthly things it is proved by examples, that the mind of man hath a sharpe understanding, as first of households, sith every man understandeth that the fellowship of men must be holden together by lawes, and comprehendeth in minde the principles of those lawes. 2.2.13.

Also in liberall Arts and handy crafts for learning whereof, yea for amplifying and garnishing of the same, there is in man a certaine aptnesse, although some be more apt than other. But the light of reason, and understanding of men, is so generall a good quality in all men, that yet it is a free gift of Gods liberality toward every man: which thing God sheweth when he createth some Idiots und dull witted: also when he maketh one man to excell in sharp invention, another in judgement, another in quicknesse of minde, againe, when he powereth into men singular motions, according to every mans calling, and according to the time and matter that is to be done. 2.2.14.17.

The invention of Arts, the orderly teaching of deep and excellent knowledge thereof, which appeare to have beene in the old Lawyers, Philosophers, Physitians, being prophane men, doe declare unto us, that the minde of men hath much soever it be fallen from his first uprightnesse, is yet still garnished with excellent gifts of God. 2.2.15.

They are the gifts of the Holy Ghost which
the

The Table.

the Lord giveth to whom he will, even to the ungodly for the publike benefit of mankind: therefore we ought to use them although they be communicants unto us by the ministerie of the wicked, to whom they are but transitorie and fleeting, because they are without the sound foundation of truth. 2.2.16.

It is shewed in the first two points that mans reason seeth nothing that concerneth the kingdome of God and heavenly matters, which are contained in three things, that is to say, to know God, his suberly favour toward us, and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his law. 2.2.18. and to that purpose are alleaged divers testimonies of Scripture. Sect. 19.20.21. In the third it seemeth that he hath some more understanding than in the other, forasmuch as man is instructed by the law of nature to a right rule of life. But such knowledge is imperfect in the unbelievers, and availeth to no other end, but to make them unexcusable: neither doe they by that naturall light, see the truth in every thing. And here is expounded the saying of Themistius, that understanding in the universall definition is seldome deceived, but the error is when it descendeth to particular causes, and there is shewed that mans universall judgement in the difference of good and evill, is not always sound and upright. For it attaineth not those which are the chiefe things in the first table of the law namely, of confidence in God, &c. In the second table, although it have some more understanding, yet it appeareth that it sometime erreth: as when it judgeth that it is an absurditie to suffer too imperious government, and not to revenge wrong: also it knoweth not the disease of desire in the whole observation of the law. 2.2.22.23.24.

It is proved by the Scripture, that the sharppesse of our reason in all the parts of our life is nothing before the Lord, and our minds doe reape the grace of enlightning, not onely at the beginning, or for one day, but at every moment. 2.2.25.

See under the title of freewill, certaine things pertaining to this matter.

Resurrection of Christ.

Without the resurrection of Christ all is imperfect that wee beleve concerning his crosse, death, and buriall, thereof wee receive three profits: forasmuch as it hath both purchased us righteousnesse before God, and is to us a pledge of the Resurrection to come, and by his life we are now regenerate into newnesse of life. 2.16.13.

A declaration of the history of the Resurrection of Christ. 3.25.3.

Last Resurrection.

Forasmuch as the faithfull, doe chiefly need hope and patience, least they should faint in the course of their calling: he hath soundly profited in the Gospel which is accustomed to a continual meditation of the blessed Resurrection. 3.25.1.2.

The article concerning the last Resurrection, containeth a doctrine of great weight: grave and hard to believe: for the overcoming of which hardnesse by faith, the Scripture giveth two helpes, the example of Christ, and the almightinesse of God. 3.25.3.4.

A confutation of the Sadduces, which deny the Resurrection: and of the Millenaries which appoint the Kingdome of Christ to endure but a thousand yeeres. 3.25.5.

A confutation of their error, which imagine that soules at the last day shall not receive againe the bodies wherewith they are now clothed, but shall have new and other bodies. 3.25.7.8.

Of the manner of the Last Resurrection. 3.25.8.

By what reason the Last resurrection, which is a singular benefit of Christ, is common also to the wicked and the accursed of God. 3.25.2

Sabboth.

A N exposition of the fourth Commandement, the end thereof and the three causes whereupon we must note that it consisteth. 2.8.28.

The first cause is a shadowing of spirituall rest, that is to say, of our sanctification: this is proved by divers places to have bene the chiefe thing in the Sabboth. 2.8.29.

Why the Lord appointeth the seventh day. 2.8.30.31.

This part, forasmuch as it was Ceremoniall is taken away by the death of Christ. 2.8.31.

The two latter causes, that is to say, that there should bee certaine daies appointed for assemblies in the Church, and that there should be given to servants, a rest from their labour, do serve for all ages. 2.8.32.

Of daies of meeting in the Church to be as the word of God and common prayers: where is spoken of observing of the Sunday. 2.8.32. 33. and of superstition to be avoided in this behalfe. 2.8.34.

Sacraments.

What is a Sacrament. 4.14.1.

For what reason the old Writers used this word in that sense. 4.14.2.13.

A Sacrament is never without a promise going before, which the Lord sealeth by that meane, wherein hee provideth helpe for our ignorance and distresse, and also for our weaknesse. 4.14.3.5.6.12.

A Sacrament consisteth of the word and the outward signe: but the sacrament all word is to be taken otherwise than the Papists think. 4.14.4.

Sacraments cease not to be testimonies of the grace of God, although they be given also to the wicked, which doe gather to themselves more grievous damnation thereby. 4.14.7.

Our faith is so confirmed by Sacraments, that yet it hangeth upon the inward effectuall working of the spirit. 4.14.10.11. and no vertue is to be put in the creatures. Self. 12.

A confutation of the devilish doctrine of the Sophistical Schooler, that the Sacraments of the new law doe justifie and doe give grace, so that we doe not stop it with deadly sinne. 4.14.14.

Augustines good distinction betweene a sacrament and thing of the Sacrament, whereby is proved that though God in Sacraments doe truly offer Christ, yet the wicked receive nothing but the Sacrament, that is to say, the outward signe. 4.14.15.16.

We must not thinke that there is joynd or fastened to the Sacraments any secret vertue, whereby they by themselves doe give us the graces of the holy Ghost. 4.14.17.

In the old time God gave unto his people some sacraments in miracles and some in naturall things. And there is spoken of the tree of life and of the raine-bow. 4.14.18.

Sacraments are on the Lords behalfe testimonies of grace and salvation, and on our behalfe tokens of our profession. 4.14.19.

The Sacraments of the old Church under the law, tended to the same end that our Sacraments doe, that is to say, Christ: whom yet our Sacraments doe more plainly represent wherefore the Schoolemans doctrine is to be rejected, which say, that the old sacraments did shew a shadow of the grace of God, and ours doe give it presently. 4.14.20.21.22.23. &c.

The five falsely called Sacraments.

When we deny those five to be Sacraments, which are invented by men, we strive not about the name but the thing: because the Papists will have them to be visible formes of invisible grace. 4.19.1.

Many reasons are brought, why it is not lawful for men to make sacraments. Also there is a difference to be put betweene sacraments, and other ceremonie. 4.19.2.

The number of seven Sacraments cannot be proved by the authority of the old Church. 4.19.3.

Although the old Church under the law, had moe Sacraments yet at this day, the Christian Church ought to be content with those two, which Christ hath ordained: and it is not lawful for men to make other, nor to adde unto those any thing of their owne. 4.18.20.

Sacrifices.

A difference between the sacrifices of Moses his law, and the supper of the Lord in the Christian Church. 4.18.12.

What the name of a Sacrifice properly signifieth: and of the divers kinds of Sacrifices under the law: which may be divided into two sorts, whereof some may be called of thanksgiving, and other some propitiatory or of cleansing. 4.18.13.

Our onely propitiatory sacrifice is the death of Christ. Sacrifices of thanksgiving we have many, as all the duties of charity, prayers, praises, giving of thanks, and all that we doe to the worshipping of God. 4.18.13.16.17.

This manner of sacrificing is daily used in the Church, and in the Supper of the Lord: And thereupon all Christians are sacrificing Priests.

Satisfactions Papisticall.

Of satisfaction, which they make the third thing in penance, of retaining the paine, the fault being forgiven, and such like lies, which all are overthrowne, by setting against the free forgiveness of sinnes, by the name of Christ. 3.4.25.

A confutation of the blasphemous error of

The Table

of the Schoolemen, that forgiveness of finnes, and reconciliation is once done in Baptisme, but after Baptisme we must rise againe by satisfactions. 3.4.26.

By such error, Christ is spoiled of his honour, and the peace of conscience is troubled, forasmuch as they can never certainly determine, that their finnes are forgiven them. 3.4.27.

In Daniel, when Nebuchadnezar is commanded to redeeme his finnes with righteousness: that same redeeming is referred to God, rather than to men, and the cause of pardon is not there set forth, but rather the manner of true conversion. The same is to be said of certaine other places of Scripture. 3.4.36.

An exposition of that place in the Gospell, Many finnes are forgiven her because shee hath loved much: Meaning that love is not the cause, but the prooffe of forgiveness. 3.4.37.

The old writers of the Church did not speake of satisfactions in such sense as the Papists doe: for they understand that the penitent doe make satisfaction to the Church, and not to God. 3.4.38.39.

Scripture, the Word of God, and the authority thereof.

Men doe not sufficiently know God the Creator, and discern him from feigned gods, by consideration of his creatures, unless they be also holpen by the light of the Word. And God hath kept this order in teaching them that he is, not only since that hee chose the Jewes for his peculiar people, but also from the beginning, even toward Adam, Noe, and the other Fathers. 1.6.1.

Either by Oracles, or by Visions, or by the ministerie of other, the Fathers had the Word which they were certainly perswaded to be the Word of God, whereby they knew the true God, the creator and governour of all things: which word afterward, that he might provide for men in all ages, he caused to be written in the Law and the Prophets, as it were in public Registers. 1.6.2.3. in which place also is proved by testimonies of Scripture, that the doctrine of the Word, must bee joynt to the consideration of creatures, lest we conceive a fickle knowledge of God.

Of them which say, that the authority of Scripture hangeth upon the judgement of the Church, and in how ill case we should be, if it were so. 1.7.1.

This error is well confuted by the plice of Paul in the second Chapter to the Ephesians, where he saith, that the faithfull are builded upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets. 1.7.2.

In what sense Augustine saith, that hee would not have beleevd the Gospell, unless the authority of the Church did move him: which place they doe cavilously wrest to the confirmation of their error. 1.7.3.

Although there be many other arguments, which doe prove, yea, doe enforce the wicked to confesse, that the Scripture came from God, yet by none other meane than by the secret testimony of the Holy Ghost, our hearts are truly perswaded, that it is God which speaketh in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Gospell. And this is proved by many places of Esay. 1.7.4.5.

The orderly disposition of the wisdom of God, the doctrine favouring nothing of earthliness, the goodly agreement of all the parts among themselves, and especially that baseness of contemptible words, uttering the high mysteries of the heavenly kingdome, are second helps to stablish the credit of Scripture. 1.8.1.2.11.

Also be antiquity of the Scripture, whereby as the Bookes of other Religions are later than the Bookes of Moses, which yet doth not himselfe invent a new God, but setteth forth to the Israelites the God of their Fathers. 1.8.3.4.

Whereas Moses doth not hide the shame of Levi his father, nor the murmuring of Aaron his brother, and of Mary his sister, nor doth advance his owne children: the same are arguments, that in his Bookes is nothing feigned by man. 1.8.4.

Also the miracles which hapned, as well at the publishing of the Law, as in all the rest of time. 1.8.5.

Which miracles, when the prophane writers could not deny, they cavilled, that Moses did them by Magicall arts. Which slander is confuted by most strong reasons. 1.8.6.

Also whereas Moses speaking in the person of Jacob, assigneth the government to the Tribe of Juda, and where he telleth before of the calling of the Gentiles, whereof the one came to passe foure hundred yeares after, and the other almost two thousand yeares: these are arguments, that it is God himselfe which speaketh in the bookes of Moses. 1.8.7.

Whereas Esay telleth before of the capti-vities

The simplicity of the speech of the first three Evangelists, containing heavenly mysteries, the phrase of John thundring from on high with weighty sentences, the heavenly Majesty shining in the writings of Peter and Paul, the sudden calling of Mathew from the boord, the calling of Peter and John from their fisher-boats to the preaching of the Gospell, the conversion and calling of Paul, being an enemy to Apostleship, are signes of the holy Ghost speaking in them. 1.8.11.

death, and is deadly, except in the Saints which obtaine pardon by the mercy of God, 2.8.58.59.

A confutation of their fond distinction betwene deadly and veniall finnes, and of their slander when they say that we make all finnes equall, 3.4.28.

How it is to be expounded, that God visiteth the iniquity of the Fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation: and whether such revengement be unseemly for the righteousness of God. 2.19.20.

Sinne against the Holy Ghost.

The true definition of sinne against the holy Ghost, and examples thereof out of the Scripture. 3.3.22.

It is not one or another particular falling, but a generall forsaking, the description whereof is declared by the Apostle. Neither is it any marvell if God will be alwayes unappeasable to them that have so fallen. 3.3.23. forasmuch as he promiseth pardon onely to them that repent, which they shall never doe. And though the Scripture doe say that some such have groined and cryed, yet that was not repentance or conversion, but rather a blinde torment by desperation. 3.3.24.

Of the Soule.

That the Soule or Spirit of man is not only a breath, but an immortal substance, although it were created, is proved by conscience, by the knowledge of God, and by so many excellent gifts wherewith the minde of man is endued, yea, and by those things which it conceiveth in sleepe and also by many arguments taken out of the Scripture. 1.15.2. Finally, by this that is said, that man was created after the image of God. Sect. 3.

Against them that under the colour of nature doe deny the providence and governance of God, uttering it selfe in the marvellous and in a manner innumerable powers of the soule. 1.5.4.5.

A confutation of the error of the Manichees, and of Servetus, that the soule is a derivation of the substance of God: also of the error of Osiander, which acknowledgeth no image of God in man without an essentiall righteousness. 1.15.5.

Concerning the immortality of the Soule, in a manner none of the Philosophers hath certainly spoken: but they doe binde the powers thereof to this present life, whereas the Scripture doth so give to it the chiefe rule in governance of life, that it also stirreth up man to the worshipping of God. Also of the diversity of soules, and of the division of the powers of the soule according to the Philosophers. 1.15.6.

Another division more agreeable with Christian doctrine, that is to say, that the powers of the soule are understanding and will: and the office and force of either of them in mans first estate. 1.15.7.8.

That there yet remaineth somewhat of the seed of religion yet imprinted even in the corruption of the soule. 1.15.6.

Of their error which thought that whole man perisheth by death, and that the soules at the last shall rise againe with the bodies. 3.25.6.

Of the state of the soules from death to the last day. 3.25.6.

A description taken out of Bernard, of the miseries of a faithfull soule, being considered as it is in it selfe and of it selfe: and on the other side, of the assured glorying of a faithfull soule in Christ, which bloteth out all her unworthinesse. 3.2.2.5.

Superstition.

The simplicity of the superstitious doth not excuse them, because their blindnesse is found to be mingled with vanity, pride, and obstinacie. 1.4.1.3.

When superstition goeth about to please God, it mocketh him with lying courles. 1.4.3.

The superstitious doe not approach unto God, but against their will, and with servile feare. 1.4.4.

Whosoever doe corrupt the true religion, although they follow the consent of antiquity, or the custome of any Citie, yet they depart from the one and true God. 1.5.12.

It is proved by the etymologie of the words Superstition, Religion, Eusebeia or godlinesse, what difference is betwene Religion and Superstition. 1.12.1.

The craft of superstition, when granting the chiefe place to the one God, it besitteth him with a rout of smaller gods. 1.12.1.3.

Supper of the Lord.

Of the Bread and Wine the signes in the holy Supper: and it is declared by his owne words words at his Supper, why the Lord willed that we should use them. 4.17.1.

We gather a great fruit of confidence and sweetnesse out of this Sacrament, which testifieth that we are so growne together into one body with Christ, that whatsoeuer is his, we may lawfully call it ours. 4.17.2.

This is declared by the words of the Supper. 4.17.3.

The chiefe office of the Sacraments is not to give unto us the body of Christ without any higher consideration, but rather to seale that promise wherein hee testifieth that his flesh is verily meat. 4.17.4.

The Supper maketh not Christ then first to begin to be the bread of life, but that we should feele the force of that bread. He once gave his flesh for the life of the world, and daily giveth it to them that be his. We must beware that wee doe not too much abase or advance the signes. The eating of the flesh of Christ is not faith, but rather the effect of faith. 4.17.5.

So thought Chrysostome and Augustine, and in what sense Augustine saith, that in believing we eat the flesh of Christ. 4.17.6.

They doe not say enough, which passing over the mention of flesh and blood, doe thinke that wee are made partakers onely of the spirit of Christ. The mysterie of the Supper is so great, that neither the tongue can expresse with speaking, nor the heart comprehend with thinking the greatnesse thereof. 4.17.7.

How farre the perfect communicating of Christ extendeth. Where is declared that Christ, which from the beginning was the life giving word of the father, made the flesh which hee tooke upon him to be also life giving to us. 4.17.8.9.

The faithfull doe truly eat of the same flesh, how great distance of place soever there be betweene them and it. 4.17.10.

The mysterie of the Supper consisteth of two things, the bodily signes, and the spirituall truth: Which spirituall truth containeth three thing, signification, matter, and effect. 4.17.11.

Of the transubstantiation of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, which the Crafts-men of the court of Rome have forged. 4.17.12.13. &c. & 20.

They are without testimonie of antiquity. And in what sense the old writers said, that in the consecration is made a secret turning. Also the signification of the Supper agreeth not unless the substance of the outward signes remaine. 4.17.14.

The bread is a Sacrament to none but to men to whom the word is directed. And here are confuted certaine arguments of the teachers of transubstantiation. 4.17.15.

Of some men, which though they doe at one word grant that the substance of the signes remaineth, yet placing the body of Christ in bread and under bread, they fall backe into the locall presence, and feigne a being every where. 4.17.16. 17.18.20.

A confutation of their objections. 4.17.21.22.23. &c.

It is proved that this doctrine is not maintained, neither by the testimonie of Augustine, nor by authority of Scripture. 4.17.28. 29.30.31.

A confutation of certaine other of their objections, and chiefly of this that they say, that whatsoever we teach of spirituall eating, is against the true and reall eating: where also is declared that the body of Christ is in the Supper offered to the Infidels, but they receive it not. 4.17.33.

Neither can the saying of Augustine be drawne to this purpose, that the Sacraments are nothing appeared by the infidelity of men. Which is proved by divers other testimonies of the same man. 4.17.34.

How the body and blood of Christ is given to us in the Supper, and what manner of presence of Christ wee ought to hold therein. 4.17.18.19.32.

Of the exposition of the words of Christ in the Supper. 4.17.20.20.21.

The body of Christ is contained in quantity, and comprehended in heaven untill the last day, as it is proved by the Scriptures. 4.17.26.27.

Of the Papists carnall adoration, and concomitance, and consecration of the host (as they call it) and carrying it about in pompe. 4.17.35.36.37.

The mysterie of the Supper ought to stirre us up to giving of thanks, to exercise us in remembering the death of Christ, to kindle us to holinesse of life, and chiefly to charity. 4.17.37.38.

In the Papacie the Supper (the true ministration whereof is not without the word) is turned into a dumbe action. And here is spoken of the laying up of the Sacrament to be extraordinarily distributed to sicke men. 4.17.39.

The doctrine of the Papists, when they goe about to prepare men to the worthinesse of eating the body of Christ, with in cruell wise torment consciences: And the devill could not by any readier way destroy men. Of the best remedy to avoid this destruction. They erre which in the Supper doe require of the faithfull perfection of faith. 4.17.41.42.

As touching the outward usage of the ministracion of the Supper, there are many things indifferent: And how it ought to be administrated most comely. 4.17.43.

Of the small assembly at this day at the partaking of the Supper, which is a token of contempt, wherewith the holy Fathers in old time were much displeas'd: And how the custome which commanded men to communicate once every year, was a most certaine invention of the devill. 4.17.44.45.46.

It is proved by authority of the Scripture, and by the usage of the old Church, foure hundred years before the death of Gregory, and by many other arguments, that the constitution which tooke away from Lay men the cup of the Lord, came out of the Devils work-shop. 4.17.47.48.49.50.

Of the concomitance of the bloud in the flesh of Christ, which is a popish invention. 4.17.47.

The Supper of the Lord is prophanely abused, if it be given to all men without choice. Of the duty of ministers in rejecting the unworthy. 4.12.5.

A briefe summe of those things which wee ought to know concerning the two Sacraments. And why the Supper is oftentimes ministrated, and Baptisme but once. 4.18.19.

Swearing.

An exposition of the third commandment, in which these three things are contained, that we neither thinke nor speake any thing of God, nor of his word and honourable mysteries, nor yet of any of his workes, otherwise than reverently. 2.8.22.

A definition of Swearing: where is declared that it is a kinde of worshipping of God. And therefore we must beware that our oaths containe not any dishonour to the name of God, which is done in forswearing: or any contempt of it, which is done in superfluous oaths, or in which the name of any other than God is used. 2.8.23.24.25.

It is proved by Scripture against the Anabaptists: that all oaths are not forbidden us, that Christ in the Gospell changed nothing as touching the rule of Swearing, set forth in the law. 2.8.26. Which is proved by his owne example: and not onely publick, but also private oaths are permitted, keeping the moderation which the Law commandeth. 2.8.27.

Temples.

OF Temples of Christian men for assemblies of the congregation. 3.20.30.

It is proved by the authority of the old Church, and the reasons of Augustine, that it is not expedient, that there should bee any images in Christian Temples. 1.11.13.

The preaching of the Word and the Sacraments, are lively images which onely are fit to be in Christian Temples. 1.11.7.13.

The wickednesse of the Nicene Synode which was holden by the commandement of Irene the Emperesse, and the filthy follies thereof in allowing images in Temples, and the worshipping of them. 1.11.14.15.16.

Of the garnishing of Temples: and holy things in the old Church. 4.4.8. & 4.5.18.

Temptations.

Of divers kinds of Temptations: and in what sense it is said that God tempteth us. 3.20.46.

Testament, old and new.

Of the likenesse of the old and new Testament: Where is declared, that they are all one in substance and matter, but onely doe differ in ministracion. The likenesse standeth chiefly in three points. 2.10.1.2.

The first point is, that the old Testament did not hold the fathers in earthly felicity, but had chiefe regard to the life to come. Which is proved by Paul, which saith, that the promises of the Gospell are contained under it. 2.10.3.

The same also is proved by the Law and the Prophets: First, by considering the words of the covenant: I am your God. 2.10.7.8.

Again, I will be the God of your seed after you. Sect. 9. Also by the life of the holy Fathers, as Adam, Abel, Noe. Sect. 10. Abraham. Sect. 11. Isaac, Jacob, Sect. 12. 13. 14. And by many testimonies of David. Se. 15. 16. 17. 18. Of Job, Sect. 19. Generally of all the

The Table.

Letter Prophets. Sect. 20. But namely of Ezechiel. Sect. 21. of Eſay and Daniel. Sect. 22. A conclusion of this point with rehearsing certaine testimonies out of the new Testament. Sect. 23.

The second point is that the old Testament did not stand upon the merits of men, but upon the free mercy of God. The third point is that the covenant of the fathers with God, did then stand upon like knowledge of Christ the Mediator. 2. 10. 4.

Also in signification of Sacraments the Israelites under the law were equal with the Christian people. 2. 10. 5. 6.

There are foure differences of the old Testament from the new, wherunto we may adde a fift. The first is, that although in the old time also the Lords wil was to direct the soules of his people to the heavenly inheritance: Yet to the end that they might be the better nourished in the hope thereof, he gave it to them to be holden, and after a certaine manner tasted under earthly benefits. But now the grace of the life to come, being more clearly revealed by the Gospell, hee directeth our mindes the straight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferiour manner of exercising which hee used among the Israelites. 2. 11. 1.

Therefore the old Church is compared to an heire under age, which is governed by Guardians. 2. 11. 2.

For this reason, the Father so much esteemed this life, and the blessings thereof. 2. 11. 3.

The second difference is in figures wherewith the old Testament did shew forth the image and shadow of spirituall good things. The new Testament giveth the present truth and perfect bodie. There is also a reason shewed why the Lord kept this order: And a definition of the old Testament. 2. 11. 4.

In this sense it is said, that the Jewes were by the introduction or schooling of the Law led unto Christ: before that hee was delivered in the flesh. 2. 11. 5. which appeared in the most excellent Prophets that were endued with Singular grace of the Spirit. Sect. 6.

The third difference is taken out of the one and thirtieth Chapter of Jeremy, and the third Chapter of the second Epistle to the Corinthians, that the old Testament is littell, and the new Testament is spirituall: the old bringeth death, the new is the instrument of life. 2. 11. 7. 8.

The fourth difference is, that the Scripture calleth the old Testament, the Testament of bondage, because it engendreth feare in mens minds: but the new is called the Testament of liberty, because it raiseth them up to confidence and surety. The three latter differences are comparisons of the law and the Gospell. The first containeth also the promises made before the law. The Fathers lived so under the law and the old Testament, that they stayed not there, but alwaies aspired to the new, yea and embraced a certaine communicating thereof. 2. 11. 9. 10.

The fift difference is, that before the coming of Christ, the Lord had severed one nation, in which he would keepe the covenant of his grace, in the meane time neglecting all other nations. So the calling of the Gentiles is a certaine signe, wherewith the excellencie of the new Testament is set forth above the old: a thing so incredible, that it seemed yet new to the Apostles themselves, being exercised in reading of the Prophets, and endued with the holy Ghost. 2. 11. 11. 12.

A conclusion of this matter, and an answer to divers objections of some men, which say that this variety in the Church, this divers manner of teaching, so great change of usages and ceremonies, is a great absurdity. Where is declared that the constancy of God appeareth in his changing, and he hath done nothing but wisely righteously, and in mercy, when he governeth his Church, after one sort in childhood, and after another sort in riper age, and also when hee did keepe close in one people the shewing forth of his grace before the coming of Christ, which afterward hee powred forth upon all Nations. 2. 11. 13. 14.

Theft.

An exposition of the eight Commandement: where is entreated of divers kinds of Theft, and some which although men judge otherwise yet are accounted Thefts before God. And so hee that doth not performe that which by the office of his calling hee oweth to other, is a theefe. 2. 8. 43.

What we ought to doe, that we may obey this commandement, is shewed by divers examples according to the diversity of persons and offices. 2. 8. 46.

Traditions.

For as much as the Lord, willing to teach

The Table.

a rule of true righteousness, hath drawne all the parts thereof to his owne will, thereby it appeareth, that all the good workes which men devise of their owne will, are nothing worth before him: But the true worshipping standeth upon obedience only, which is the beginning, mother, and preserver of all vertues. 2. 8. 5.

Of Traditions of men, that is to say, ordinances proceeding from men, concerning the worshipping of God: And of the ungodlinesse and necessity of them. 4. 10. 1. 2. 5. 6. 7. 8.

A division of Popish constitutions, which they call Traditions of the Church, into such as containe ceremonies, and other which are said to pertaine to discipline. The wickednesse of both sorts, because they place the worship of God in them, and consciences are bound with precise necessity of them. 4. 10. 9.

For them the commandment of God is made void. 4. 10. 10.

A true marke for mens Traditions, which ought to be rejected of the Church, and of all godly men. 4. 10. 16.

A confutation of the pretence which some men use that defend Popish Traditions to be of God, because the Church cannot erre, and is governed by the holy Ghost. 4. 10. 17.

It is a meere mockery to say, that the Apostles were authors of the Traditions, wherewith the Church hath heretofore bene oppressed. 4. 10. 18. 19. 20.

The example of the Apostles, when they commanded the Gentiles to abstaine from things offered unto Idols, from strangled, and from bloud, is falsly alleaged to excuse the tyranny of the Popes Lawes. 4. 10. 21. 22.

The Lords kingdome is taken from him, when he is worshipped with the Lawes of mens Traditions: which is proved by examples and testimonies of Scripture to have alwaies bene a most hainous offence in the sight of God. 4. 10. 23. 24.

The invention of men cannot be defended by the example of Menoha, which being a private man offered sacrifice, nor of Samuel which sacrificed in Ramath. 4. 10. 25. nor of Christ that willed men to beare the burdens that the Scribes and Pharisees did bind together. 4. 10. 26.

Of holy and profitable ordinances of the Church, and the end that they tend unto. 4. 10. 1.

Of such ordinances of the Church as ought to be accounted holy, namely those which serve for comelinessse, or doe preserve order and peace in the Church. 4. 10. 27. 28. 29. We must wisely consider, which be of that sort. 4. 10. 30.

It is the duty of Christian people, to observe such ordinances: And what errors heretofore in are to be taken heed of: And how in the meane time, the liberty of consciences may still be preserved safe. 4. 10. 31. 32.

The holy doctors have been compelled to invent certain new words, to defend the truth of God against certaine subtle men, which mocked it out with shifting: as against Arius they invented this word Homoussion Consubstanciall, and against Sabellicus the name of three properties or persons. 1. 13. 4. 16.

Testimonies of Scripture, whereby is shewed the distinction of the Father from the Word, and of the word from the Spirit. 1. 13. 17.

Also in the Scripture there is a distinction made of the Father, from the Word and the Spirit, and of the Spirit from them both, as well by observation of order, as by propheties ascribed to them. 1. 13. 18.

This distinction of Persons maketh not against the most simple unity of God. 1. 13. 19.

In what sense the Fathers say, that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, and yet that the Sonne hath the essence of himselfe. 1.

13. 19.

A briefe summe of those things which we ought to beleve concerning the one essence of God and the three persons. 1. 13. 20.

And herein we must dispute soberly, and with great moderation, that neither our thought, nor our tongue, doe passe beyond the bounds of the word of God. 1. 23. 21.

A confutation of the daring errors of Seruetus in this point of doctrine. 1. 13. 22.

A confutation of the error of certaine lewd men, which say, that the Father is truly and properly the one only God, which in making the Sonne and the holy Ghost, did pourre his God-head into them. 1. 13. 23.

It is false which they say, that when mention is made of God in the Scripture, only the Father is meant thereby. 1. 13. 24.

Also it is false which they dreame of undivided substances, of which every one hath a part of the essence. 1. 13. 25.

An answer to their objection, that Christ, if he bee properly God, is wrongfully called the soune of God. 1. 13. 26.

An answer to many places which they bring out of Ireneus for prooffe of their opinion, where hee affirmeth the Father of Christ to bee the one onely and eternall God of Israel. 1. 13. 27.

Vowes.

Of Vowes which are made against the expresse word of God: whether they may well be vowed of Christian men, and how they are to be esteemed. 4. 13. 1. 6.

Of the Priests, Monkes and Nunnes Vowes of single life. 4. 13. 3. 17. 18. 19.

There bee foure ends of Vowes, to have respect to the time past, and two the time to come. 4. 13. 4. 5.

There is one common Vow of all the faithfull which they make in baptisme. 4. 13. 6.

Of the rashnesse and superstition of the world in making of Vowes. 4. 13. 1. 7.

Of Warres.

WArres are lawfull, when Magistrates are driven of necessity to take weapon in hand, to execute publike reuenge upon those that trouble the peace of their dominion, whether they bee civill or forraigne enemies. 4. 20. 11.

It maketh not to the contrary hereof, which many alleadge, that there is not in the new Testament any testimony or example which proveth that warre is a thing lawfull for Christians. But Magistrates ought to take great heed, that in taking of weapon in hand, they nothing at all follow their owne lusts. As War, so garrisons also, Meagues and civill fortifications are things lawfull for Christians to use. 4. 20. 12.

Will of God.

Of the secret will of God. Also of another Will, whereunto answereth Willing obedience. 3. 20. 43. 3. 24. 1. 7.

Will.

Will of Man.

Whether the Will of man be in every part thorow defiled and corrupted, so that it bringeth forth nothing but evil: Or whether it yet retain some liberty of choice. Where is declared the common saying taken out of the Philosophers, that all things by natural disposition cover that which is good. And there is shewed that the liberty of will cannot be proved thereby. 2.2.26.

The soule hath not onely a weake power, but no power at all of it selfe to aspire to goodnesse. And sith the whole man is subject to the dominion of sinne, it is proved by testimonies of Scripture and of Augustine, that the will of man is bound with most straight bonds. 2.2.27.

Man by his fall lost not his Will, but the soundnesse of his Will, so that he cannot move, much lesse apply himselfe to goodnesse, but is necessarily drawne or led into evil, howbeit not by compulsion but voluntarily. Which is proved by Augustine and Bernard. A large declaration of the difference betwene compulsion and necessity. 2.3.5.

Sith the Lord both beginneth and persisteth good in our hearts, sith hee worketh in us to will, that is to say, the good will, sith he createth a new heart, taketh away the stony heart, and giveth a fleshy heart, it followeth, that the Will of man is utterly corrupted, and hath no goodnesse at all. 2.3.6.

It is clearly proved by reasons and divers testimonies of Scripture, that God worketh good will in them that be his, not onely in preparing or turning them from the beginning, so as it may afterward doe some good of it selfe. But because it is his onely worke that the Will conceiveth a love of goodnesse, that it is inclined to the study thereof, that it is stirred and moved to an endeavour to follow it, and againe, that the choice, study, and endeavour doe not faile, but proceed to effect; finally, that man goeth constantly forward in them, and continueth to the end. 2.3.7.8.9.

Therefore it is proved by the authority of Scripture, and of Augustine, that this which hath bene in sight these many ages, that God so moveth our Will, that it is afterward in our owne choice to obey or disobey his motion, and other like sayings are utterly false. 2.3.10.11.12.13.14.

Also in doings, which of themselves are neither righteous nor unrighteous, and belong rather to the bodily than the spirituall life, the will of man is not free, but by the speciall motion of God is inclined to clemencie, mercie, wrath, feare, and other divers affections, when it pleaseth him to make way for his providence. Which is proved by Scripture, by daily experience, and by the authority of Augustine. 2.4.6.7.

Workes.

A comparison of the purenesse of God with all the righteousnesse of men. 3.12.4.5.

All the offspring of Adam being divided into foure kindes of men, it is proved that they have no holinesse or righteousnesse: First, in them which are endued with no knowledge of God, in whom although there doe sometime appeare excellent qualities (which are the gifts of God) yet there is in them nothing pure. 3.14.1.2.3.4.5.6.

The same is shewed in them which being professed by Sacraments, are Christians onely in name, denying God in their deeds: Also in hypocrites, which with vaine false colours doe hide the wickednesse of their heart. 3.14.7.8.

Finally, it is proved that even the children of God truly regenerated by his Spirit, cannot stand by any righteousnesse of their owne workes before the judgement of God, because they can bring forth no good worke that is not sprinkled with some uncleannesse of the flesh, and therefore damnable. Moreover, although they could bring forth any such worke, yet one sinne is enough to blot out the remembrance of all former righteousnesse. 3.14.9.10.11.

A confutation of the Papists sctis concerning the righteousnesse of workes: and especially of the same horrible monster of workes of supererogation. 3.14.12.13.14.15.

When we intreat of workes wee must thrust two pestilences out of our mindes: that wee put no trust in the righteousnesse of our owne workes, and that wee ascribe no glory unto them. 3.14.16.

The Scripture setteth out and declareth foure kindes of causes in stablishing our salvation: And it is proved that in them all, there is no regard of workes. 3.14.17.

Where sometimes the Saints doe bolden themselves with remembrance of their owne innocencie and uprightnesse: how the same is to be taken: and how it doth in no wise abate any thing from the free righteousnesse in Christ. 3.14.18.19.20.

Where

The Table.

Where the Scripture saith that the good workes of the faithfull doe move God to doe them good, the order is therein rather expressed than the cause. 3. 14. 21.

Why the Lord in the Scripture calleth good workes ours, and promiseth reward to them. 3. 15. 3.

A confutation of the Sophisters invention, concerning Morall workes, whereby men bee made acceptable to GOD, before that they be grafted in Christ. 3. 15. 6. and 17. 4.

Those rewards are given to the workes of the faithfull, which the Lord in his Law hath promised to the followers of righteousness: but thereof there are three causes to be considered. 3. 17. 3.

We may note in the Scripture two acceptances of man with God, of which the latter although it have respect to the good workes of the faithfull, yet is also the free mercy of God. 3. 17. 4. 5.

When it is said that God doth good to them that love him, here is not rehearsed a cause why he should doe them good, but rather the manner of what sort they be by his grace. 3. 17. 6.

An exposition of certaine place wherein the Scripture giveth to good workes the name of righteousness. And there is shewed that those places are not against the doctrine of justification of faith. 3. 17. 7.

One good worke or many doe not suffice for righteousness before God, although one sinne suffice to condemne. And here the principle hath no place, the contraries have all one rule. 3. 18. 10.

Why the Lord said that hee rendereth to workes that which he had freely given before Workes. 3. 18. 3. And therein hee helpeth our weaknesse least wee should bee discouraged. 3. 18. 4. 6. 7.

Hereupon hangeth the righteousness of the good Workes which the faithfull doe, that by pardon they are allowed of God. 3. 18. 5.

TO THE CHRISTIAN and Studious Readers of this Booke, AVGVSTINE MARLORATE. wisteth health.

Whoever shall read and peruse these two Tables following, and especially the latter, may marvell what I meant (after so many impressions and corrections of this worke) to collect and gather all the places of holy Scriptures therein alleaged: and a great part of the authorities therein expounded, whereas if any fruit or profit thereof were to be had, the same long before might have been done: and especially about three yeares past, when the Author himselfe was so diligent therein: who besides the many and profitable additions (which it containeth) hee himselfe setting the same in order, with his owne hands, and reducing it to a most exact perfection did then set and publish it forth, in such sort, that in Foure Bookes, being divided into Chapters and divers Sections, hee hath right worthily and in familiar manner, comprised the summe of the whole Christian Religion. And certainly I cannot deny but it would have been very good and commodious, if that any one man would have taken the paine, faithfully and truly to have collected those places: which thing I thought once to have done by the advice of the Imprinter, saving that my charge and office

The Preface.

office did elsewhere call me, as also when I had perused and set it in another order than it was before, and had even finished it, I was compelled to omit it, or at the least to surcease for the time. And after that this Booke being put forth both in Latine and French, was set to sale in every place, because I saw no man who then did take the paine to reduce the places of Scriptures to a Table, and understanding how profitable the same would be to all men: I could not chuse but after my power, and as leasure served in those troublesome times, to imploy my whole care and travell therein. And because all things should bee done and come forth more certaine and in better order: I would not give credit, nor trust to the numbers which the Imprinter had before set and made: for when I had diligently conferred them all, I found many false, many omitted, and some disorderly set: And surely that hapneth very soone to such as are not best skillfull in examining and perusing the places of holy Scripture to bee soone deceived. Wherefore all things diligently restored, and that supplied which seemed to want, I did so order the places of Scripture collected out of the old and new Testament, that if there were any, through forgetfulnesse, or by any other meanes omitted or overskiped: (as it cannot bee but that in a great harvest some one eare of corn shall escape the reapers hand) I durst warrant so few shall be found, that this Table being brought to triall, you shall not finde one much more plentifull or larger. Neverthelesse I doe pray and request the Readers, that if they doe finde any, they shall advertise the Imprinter, whereby the same may better bee examined and corrected. And this is to be noted, that such whole verses as I have compried in this Table, they were not wholly but in part alleaged, much lesse expounded in the Institution: which thing I did upon good consideration. For oftentimes it hapneth that in divers places of the Institutions, some authorities are alleaged, which are proved but by some part of the verse. And because in noting the places and numbers, we must use repetitions (which for the most part bring a loathsomnesse to the Reader) I thought it better to put in the whole verse, then by often divisions, to use vaine and superfluous repetitions. And as concerning the commodity which the Reader may gather by this my travell (besides that which by use and experience I am taught by these Tables, which for mine owne private studie and exercise I wrote upon the Institutions heretofore set forth) I durst to affirme this much that they which are not exercised in entreating the holy Scripture, and yet desirous to serve the Church of God, doe diligently endeavour themselves thereunto, they shall finde a large and plaine way, both with dexteritie to expound the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, as also aptly to apply the authorities here alleaged, and such like to the edifying of the Church, which is the very end of the whole. And although wee want not good Commentaries to discover unto us the naturall sense of the Scripture, which we doe now studie and apply: yet because they who wrote the same, and who with good successe have travelled therein, were contented with the plaine and sincere exposition of the text: none could tell by the use of the said Commentaries onely, (unlesse they were well practised in the principles of religion) how and to what common place they ought to apply the argument then in hand. But who can bee so contented to use this Table, whensoever he shall finde the places which he entreateth, he shall see how and to what end the same is to be applied, whether to the confirmation of true doctrine, or to the confuting of the adversaries, or to the reconciling of such places as seeme to be repugnant. And this shall be very commodious and profitable, not onely for the amplifying of any argument, but also to satisfie them, which are desirous to bee confirmed in the principall points of Christian Religion. For it is manifest how simple and slender is their oration and speech, which bring and alleage nothing else, but as they read in the Commentaries: where the Authors themselves (being most worthy and well learned) doe chiefly desire brevitic, because the readers should use and studie the common places themselves, to the end they should the more largely bee applied to those things which in the Commentaries are but briefly expounded. Againe, for as much as we have not alwaies in readinesse, what good Authors haue written upon the Scripture: and very few Commentaries upon some Bookes, and namely upon this Institution, are to be found or had: This Table expounding the obscure and hard authorities ties, shall greatly further and helpe the readers. For they shall either finde some ready interpretation, or some entrance whereby to search and finde out the true sense. And as touching the translation, I trust it shall not seeme strange to the reader, in that I have rather followed the selfesame words, as they bee in the Bible, than as they bee alleaged by Calvin in this his Institution. For hee being a man most excellently well learned, and of great reading (as by his workes it doth appeare, how ready and familiar the Scriptures were to him) had not alwaies the bookes in readinesse, or lying open before him, when hee wrote: neither was it necessary that whatsoever hee did aouoch out of the old or new Testament, hee should expresse or write it in the selfe same words: for it is sufficient, that the sense be faithfully retained, and the true propriety of the word observed, and so to eschew the cavillings of all men, saving such as will finde fault in that, which in the least part cannot be followed nor observed. Being therefore perswaded, that neither hee himselfe will be offended, nor the Reader millike, if the sentences in the Bible, bee translated according to the Hebrew, as concerning the old Testament, and according to the Greeke, as touching the new Testament: I have adventured to avouch the authorities of Scriptures in another order (as concerning the words) than they are alleaged in this booke of Institutions. And therefore sometimes that which is recited in the third person, this Table doth expresse in the second, and so contrariwise: but yet so, that the sense and meaning is alwaies reserved, which thing every man shall easily perceive, if diligently and without halty judgement, hee doe conferre every thing together: for else curious heads doe looke that fruit, which by advised reading they might have and receive. And as concerning the names and numbers of the bookes, and of the Chapters of the old Testament, we have not followed the common translation; but that which is most agreeable to the Hebrew. And therefore we doe advertise the readers, that they doe not take the first booke of the Kings, for the first of Samuel: nor the second of Kings for the second of the same Prophet: which is so done by them, who heretofore have quored the Chapters in this imprinted booke, because they followed the Concordances of the Bible, called the great Concordances, which is collected according to the common translation: and by that meanes, as it may evidently appeare to all men, some bookes of the old Testament are not lightly intituled: and the Psalmes otherwise and in another order divided, than did the Hebrewes. And forasmuch as all the principall points of religion are in this Booke copiously and faithfully expounded, we may easily refute the false opinions of the Adversaries. Whosoever shall come to the reading thereof, either with the minde to learne or a desire to profit: there is no doubt, but he shall very much profit himselfe, and helpe others: whose consciences he may so strengthen and assure, as they neede not to quail in any point, because they be assured, that their Faith is grounded upon the firme foundation of the Prophets and Apostles, who wrote and spake, being inspired by the holy Ghost, who hath willed and commanded his most precious and deare word, to be read, heard, and handled, in all feare and reverence, without adding thereunto, or taking from the same: least wee be worthily proved of our folly. Let us therefore, in all simplicity and feare of God, read so wholsome and necessary things, and daily proceed therein, in the grace and knowledge of God, who onely is the Saviour, head and Doctor of the Church: To whom now and for ever be all glory. The Table.

10. 1 And the Lord said unto Moses, g<sup>r</sup> in unto Pharao, for I have hardened his heart, and the hearts of his servants, that I may make these tokens on him. 2.4. 4.
11. 3 The Lord will give favour to his people before the Egyptians. And Moses was a great man in the Countrey of Egypt before the servants of Pharao and all the people. 2.4.6.
12. 5 It was a Lambe without spot, a bee Lambe of a yeere old. 4.16.31.
- 26 And when your children shall say unto you, what religion is this? 4.16.30.
- 43 This is the religion of passing over, every stranger shall not eate thereof. 4.17. 22.
- 46 Neither shall you breake the bones thereof. 1.16.9.
13. 12 Sanctifie to mee every first borne that doth open the wombe amongst the children of Israel, as well of men as of beasts, for they be all mine. 4.16.31.
14. 19 And the Angel of the Lord lifting up himselfe, which did goe before the campe of Israel, went after them. 1.14.6.
- 21 And when Moses had extended his hand against the sea, the Lord tooke it away, a mighty winde blowing and burning all the night, &c. 4.15.9.
- 26 And the Lord said unto Moses stretch out thy hand over the sea, that the waters may returne to the Egyptians and upon the chariots and horsemen of them. 4. 15.9.
- 31 The people feared the Lord and believed in him, and in his servant Moses. 4.8. 2.
15. 3. The Lord is a champion omnipotent in his name. 1.13.24. & 4.17.23.
16. 7 And in the morning you shall see the glory of the Lord I have heard you murmuring against the Lord. But we what be wee that you doe murmur against us privily. 1.8. 5.
- 14 And when the dew was ascended that was fallen, behold, upon the upper part of the earth there appeared a little thing in a manner of the likenesse, &c. 4.17.34. & 4. 18.20.
17. 6 Behold, I will stand there before thee upon the rocke Horeb, and thou shalt strike the rocke, and water shall proceede therefrom, that the people may drinke. 4.17.15. & 4.17.21. & 4.18.20.
- 15 And Moses did build an Altar, and called the name thereof Iehova Nalli. 1.13.9.
18. 16 And when there shall be any disputati<sup>o</sup>n amongst them, they shall come unto me, that I may judge betwene them, and that I may show the Commandements of God, and his Lawes. 4.11. 8.
19. 5. You shalt be unto me as the treasure and best of all the people, for all the earth is mine. 4.16.13.
- 6 And you shall bee unto me a kingly Priesthood, and a holy people. 2.7.1.
- 16 And now the third day was come, and it waxed bright in the morning, and behold, thundring began to bee heard, and lightnings to flash, and thicke clouds to cover the hill, and the sound of the Trumpet did make a noise very vehemently, and the people did feare which were in the tents. 1.8. 5.
20. 3 Thou shalt not have strange Gods before me. 1.13.24.
- 4 Thou shalt not make to thy selfe a graven image, neither any likenesse that is in heaven above the earth, neither that is in the earth beneath, neither of those things that be in the waters beneath the earth. 1.11.1. & 1.11.12. & 1.13.24.
- 5 Thou shalt neither worship them nor serve them: I am thy mighty Lord God jealous, visiting the iniquity of the Fathers upon the children, to the third and fourth generations of them that hate me. 1.12.1.
- 6 And being mercifull unto thousands of them that love mee and keepe my Commandements. 2.10.9.
- 13 Thou shalt not kill. 4.20.10.
- 24 In which shall bee the memorie of my name, I will come to thee and blesse thee. 4. 15.
21. 13 But bee that hath not lye in wait but that God hath given him into his hands &c. 1.16.6. & 1.18.3.
- 17 Hee that shall curse his Father or Mother, shall dye the death. 2.8.36.

 23.1. Thou shalt not admit a lie, neither shalt thou joyne thy hand, that thou shouldest beare false witness for the wicked. 2.8.47.
 4 If thou shalt meet the Ox or Ass or thy enemy going astray, bring him back unto him. 2.8.56.
 5 If thou shalt see the Ass of him that hateth thee lie under his burden, thou shalt not passe by but shalt lift it up together with him. 2.8.56.
 12 That thy Ox and thy Ass may take rest, and that the son of thy hand-maiden may be refreshed, and the stranger. 2.8.32.
 13 And yee shall not swear by the name of outward Gods: neither shall it be heard out of your mouth. 2.8.25.
 19 Thou shalt carry the first of thy fruits into the house of the Lord thy God. 3.7.5.
 20 Behold I will send my Angell, which may goe before thee, and may keepe thee in the way, and may bring thee into the place which I have prepared. 1.14.6.
 24. 17 And Moses entering the midst of the cloude, ascended into the hill, and was there forty daies and forty nights. 1.8.5. & 4.12.10.
 25. 17 Also thou shalt make a mercy seat of fine gold, two cubites and a halfe long, and one cubite and an halfe broad. 1.11.3.
 18 Thou shalt also make golden Cherubines beaten out on both sides of the Oracle. 1.11.3.
 20 Thou shalt cover both the sides of the mercy seat, stretching out their wings, and covering the Oracle, and their faces one to another, to the mercy seat wards, by the which the Arke is covered: in the which thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee. 1.11.3.
 40 Look in and doe according to the example which was shewed thee in the mountaine. 2.7.1. & 4.14.20.
 28.9 And thou shalt take two Onix stones, and thou shalt grave on them the names of the children of Israel. 3.20.18.
 10 Six names in one stone, and the other six on the other stone, according to the birth of them. 3.20.18.
 12 And Aaron shall carry the names of them before the Lord upon either shoulder, for a remembrance. 3.20.18.
 21 And the stones shall be according to the names of the children of Israel, 12. according to their names, graven as signets, e-
- very one according to his name, and they shall be for the twelve Tribes: 3.20.18.
 29.9 And thou shalt gird them with girdles, both Aaron and his sonnes, and thou shalt put on them oners, and they shall be Priests to me by a perpetual religion, &c. 4.2.9.
 36 And thou shalt offer a calfe every day for reconciliation, and thou shalt cleanse the Altar, &c. 2.17.4.18.13.
 30.10 And Aaron shall make a reconciliation upon the horns thereof once a yeare, with the blood that is offered for sinne. 2.15.6.
 30 Thou shalt anoint Aaron and his sonnes and thou shalt sanctifie them that they may minister unto mee in the Priests office. 4.19.31.
 31.3 And I have filled Basael with the spirit of God, with wisdom, understanding, and knowledge in each worke. 2.2.16
 13 Se that you keepe my Sabbath because it is a signe betweene mee and you in your generations. 2.8.29.
 32.1 Arise, make us gods that may goe before us, for why, we know not what hath happened to this man Moses, that brought us out of the land of Egypt. 1.11.8.
 4 And they said, these be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee out of the Land of Egypt. 1.11.9.
 27 Let every man put his sword by his side, and goe to anofer from gate to gate through the hoste, and slay every man his brother and friend, and neighbour. 4.20.10.
 32 Either pardon them this fault, or else if thou doe it not, wipe mee out of the booke which thou hast written. 3.20.35.

- 36 The Lord shall leade thee and the King which thou dost ordaine over thee, into a nation which thou dost not know, neither thy father, &c. 2.11.1.
- 65 For the Lord shall give unto thee a fearful heart, and failed eyes, and a soule consumed with griefe. 2.4.6.
- 29.2 You have seene all that the Lord did before you in the land of Egypt, &c. 2.2.20.
- 4 And the Lord gave not unto you an understanding heart, and seeing eyes, and eares which might heare, untill this present day 2.2.20.
- 18 Lest there bee amongst you a man or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart this day is contrary from the Lord our God, that it should goe and serve, &c. 3.17.5.
- 19 And when he hath heard the words of this oath, he blesse himselfe in his heart, saying: Peace shall be unto me, and I will make in the wickednesse of my heart: and so he take with drunkennesse his life. 3.17.5.
- 20 And the Lord shall not forgive him, but the most of all shall his rage fume, & his zeale against that man, and all the curses shall light upon him that are written in this booke, &c. 3.3.7.
- 29 The secret things belong unto our Lord God, but those that bee manifest unto us and our children for ever, that wee may doe every thing of this law. 1.17.2. & 3.21.3.
- 30.2 And thou shalt reurne unto him, and thou shalt be obedient unto his government,
- as I have commaunded thee this day, with thy children, &c. 3.3.6.
- 3 The Lord thy God shall bring thee backe from thy captivity, and he shall have mercy of thee, and hee shall gather thee together againe from amongst all the nations amongst whom he had scattered thee. 4.1.3.
- 6 The Lord thy God will circumcise thy heart, and the heart of thy seed that thou might love the Lord thy God, &c. 2.5.8. & 2.5.12. & 3.3.6. & 4.16.3.
- 10 If thou shalt for all this heare the voice of the Lord thy God, and shall keep his precepts and ceremonies which hee commaunded in this law, &c. 1.7.5.
- 11 The commandement that I doe commaund thee this day is not above thee, neither a burde off. 2.5.12.
- 13 Neither is it set beyond the sea, that thou shouldst say: who of us shall goe over the sea & fetch it us, that we may heare it? 2.5.12
- 14 But the word is very neere unto thee, in thy mouth and heart, that thou maiest do it. 2.5.12 & 3.24.3.
- 15 Consider that this day I have put before thy sight life and good, and contrarywise, death and evil. 3.17.1.
- 19 I doe call heaven and earth this day to witness, that I have put before you life and good, blessing and cursing: choose therefore life that thou mayest live and thy seed. 2.5.4 & 2.7.3.
- 32.5 They have corrupted themselves toward him by their vice, not being his children, but a froward and crooked generation 1.8.6.
- 8 When the almighty devided the nations, when he separated the finnes of Adam, hee appointed the bounds of the people, &c. 2.11.11. & 3.21.5.
- 15 The well beloved is waxen fat: hee hath kicked, being swollen up with fat, hath forsaken God his maker, &c. 3.8.5.
- 17 They have offered up to devils, and not to God. 4.13.17.
- 21 They have provoked mee with that which was not God. 1.13.15.
- 35 Vengeance is mine, and I will reward, &c. 2.8.56. & 4.20.19.
- 49 Set your hearts upon all the words that I testify unto you this day, that you may commaund them unto your children, that they may observe and doe all the words of the law. 2.7.3.
- 33.3 All holy men be in his hand. 2.10.9.
- 29 Blessed art thou O Israel, who is like thee

RUTH.

3.13 IF he wilnot have thee, I will take thee without any doubt: The Lord liveth. 2.8.27.

1 SAMUEL.

1.13. BVy Anna spake in her heart and only her lips did move, and her voice was not all heard, wherefore Heli thought she was drunken. 3.20.33.
 2.6 The Lord doth kill and quicken, he doth lead into hell and bringeth backe againe. 3.20.62.
 9 He will keepe the feete of his Saints: and the wicked shall keepe silence in darknesse. 2.18.18.
 10 And he will give rule unto his king: and he will exalt the borne of his anointed. 2.6.2.
 25 And they heard not the voice of their father, because the Lord would kill them. 1.18.3. & 3.24.14.
 34 And this shall be a signe unto thee, that shall come upon thy two sons, Hophni and Phinehas: they shall die both in one day. 1.18.1
 6.9 And you shall see, and if so it goe up by the way of his coasts against Betshames, he did us this great evil, &c. 1.16.9.
 7.3 If you do turne unto the Lord with all your hearts, put away the strange gods from amongst you, Balaam and Astaroth, and presse your hearts unto the Lord, &c. 3.3.5.
 6 And in that day they fasted, and they said there: we have sinned against the Lord. 4.12.17.
 17 He built their an altar to the Lord. 4.10.25.
 8.7 They have cast off thee, but mee that I should not rule over them. 4.20.6.
 11 This shall be the right of your king which shall rule you, hee shall take your sunnes and put them in his chariots, &c. 4.20.26.
 10.6 And the spirit of the Lord shall come upon thee, and thou shalt propheticke with them, and thou shalt be changed into another man. 2.2.17. & 1.3.4.

 9 Therefore when hee had turned his backe to goe from Samuel, God gave him another heart, and all these signes chanced in that day. 3.2.12.
 26 Saul also went home to Gibeah, and with him part of the army, whose heart God had touched. 2.2.17.
 11.6 Then the spirit of the Lord came upon Saul, when he heard these words, &c. 2.4.6.
 15 And all the people arose in Gilgall, and made Saul their king before the Lord, &c. 1.8.6.
 12.22 And the Lord will not forsake his people, for his great names sake, because the Lord swore he would make you his people. 3.21.5.
 14.44 And Saul said, God doe so, and more also unto mee, thou shalt dye the death Ionathan. 2.8.24.
 15.11 It repenteth me that I have made Saul king, because he hath forsaken me, and hath not done as I commanded him: and Samuel was sad, & cryed unto the Lord all night. 1.17.12. & 3.20.5.
 22 Whether will the Lord have burnt sacrifice and offerings, and not rather that the voice of the Lord should be obeyed, &c. 4.10.17. & 4.18.9.
 23 For rebellion is as the sinne of witchcraft and not to trust in the Lord as the sinne of idolatry, for that thou hast cast away the word of the Lord, &c. 3.4.33. & 4.10.17.
 29 For the triumpher in Israel will not spare, neither will hee be changed by repentance, neither is he man that he should repent. 1.17.12.
 30. But he said, I have sinned, but honour me I pray thee, before the seniors of my people &c. 3.3.4.
 35 But Samuel did bewaile Saul: and it repented the Lord that hee had made Saul king over Israel. 3.20.15.
 16.1 And the Lord said unto Samuel, how long wilt thou bewaile Saul? seeing I have cursed him, as that he shall not raigne, &c. 3.20.15.
 13 Samuel tooke therefore his borne of oyle, and anointed him in the middelt of his brethren. 1.8.7. & 2.2.17.
 14 And an evill spirit did vexce him from the Lord. 1.14.17. & 2.4.5.
 18.10 And after another day, the evill spirit of God entred Saul. 1.14.17. & 2.4.5.
 19.9 And the evill spirit of the Lord was upon

- upon Saul, and he sat in his house, and held a harp in his hand, &c. 2.4.5.
- 23.26 And Saul and his men went on the one side of the hill, and David and his men on the other side. 1.16.9
- 27 And a messenger came unto Saul, and said: make haste and come, because the Philistims have invaded thy countrey. 1.16.9.
- 24.7 The Lord keepe mee, that I doe not this thing unto my Lord the appointed of the Lord, that I should lay my hand upon him, which is the appointed of the Lord. 4.20.28.
- 11 But mine eye hath spared thee: for I said, I will not stretch out my hand against my Lord, because hee is the appointed of thy Lord. 4.20.8.
- 26.9 And David said unto Abithai, kill him not: for who shall stretch forth his hand against the appointed of the Lord, and bee blamelesse? 4.20.28.
- 12 All of them did sleepe, because the drowsinesse of the Lord fell upon them. 1.18.2.
- 23 The Lord shall reward every man according to his righteousnesse and faithfulnessse, for the Lord hath delivered thee into my hands, &c. 3.17.14.
- 41.13 And they tooke their bones, and buried them in a grove at Jabes, and they fasted seven daies. 4.12.17.

II SAMUEL.

- 5.8 Therefore it is said in a proverbe the blinde and lame shall not enter into the temple. 4.16.31.
- 7.14 The which if he shall doe any thing wickedly, I will correct him with the rod of men and in the plagues of the sonnes of men. 3.4.32.
- 17 Because thou O Lord God of the hosts of Israel, hast revealed unto thy servant, saying: I will build a house to thee, &c. 3.20.13.
- 28 Now therefore O Lord God, thou art God, and thy words are true, thou hast spoken unto thy servant these good things. 3.20.14.
- 10.12 Be thou a stout man, & let us fight for our people, and for the city of our God, and the Lord will doe that seemeth good in his owne eyes. 1.17.9.
- 11.4 David having sent Messengers, brought her, who when she came unto him, he slept

- with her. 4.1.24.
- 15 He wrote in a letter: put Uria in the front of the battie where the greatest skirmish is, and forsake him, that being stricken he may dye. ibid.
- 12.12 Thou didst it privily, but I will doe this in the sight of all Israel. 1.18.1.
- 13 And David said unto Nathan, I have sinned against the Lord. And Nathan said unto David: the Lord hath put away thy sinne, thou shalt not dye. 3.3.4. & 3.4.10. & 3.4.31. & 4.1.14.
- 14 Notwithstanding for because thou madest the enemies of the name of God blaspheme for this thing, the justice that is borne unto thee shall dye. 3.4.33.
- 16.10 The Lord hath commanded him that he should curse David, and who is it that dare say, why hast thou done so? 1.17.8. & 1.18.1. & 1.18.4.
- 22 Therefore they spread Absolon a tent upon the top of the house, and he went in unto the concubines of his father before all Israel. 1.18.1. & 1.18.4.
- 17.7 And Hushai said unto Absolon, it is not good counsell that Achitophel gave this time. 1.17.7.
- 14 The profitable counsell of Achitophel is scattered abroad by the becke of the Lord, that the Lord might bring upon Absolon evil. 1.17.7. & 2.4.6.
- 22.20 And he brought me forth into largenes, he delivered me because it pleased him. 3.5.17.
- 21 The Lord hath given unto me according unto my righteousnesse, and according unto the cleanness of my hands. 3.17.5.
- 24.1 And the wrath of the Lord was againe kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them in that he said unto Jacob: ge number Israel and Iuda. 1.14.18.
19. But the heart of David stroke him after he had numbered the people: and David said, &c. 3.3.4.
- 20 And going forth, he worshipped the kings, groveling with his face toward the earth. 1.12.3.

I. KINGS.

- 6 Thou shalt doe therefore according to thy wisdom, and thou shalt not bring his gray haire peaceably unto the grave. 4.20.10.
- 8 Thou hast also with thee Shimei the sonne of Gera the sonne of Gemini, of Bahurim, which cursed mee with an euill curse, &c. 4.20.10.
- 8.23 Which keepest covenants and mercies with thy seruants which walke before thee with all their hearts. 3.17.5.
- 46 If they sin against thee (for there is not a man that sinneth not) and being angry thou shalt deliuer them unto their enemies, &c. 2.7.5. & 3.14.9. & 4.1.15.
- 47 And if they shall repent them with all their hearts in the place of their captivity, &c. 4.1.25.
- 58 That hee may bow our hearts unto him, that wee may walke in all his waies, and that we may keepe his commandements and ceremonies, &c. 2.3.9.
- 11.22 Notwithstanding, in thy daies I will not doe it for David thy fathers sake. But I will rent it out of the hand of thy sunne. 2.6.2.
- 23 God stirred him up an aduersary, &c. 1.18.1.
- 31 I will rent the kingdome out of Salomons hands, and I will giue unto thee ten tribes 1.18.1.
- 34 Neither will I take the whole kingdome out of his hand, but I will ordaine him a captaine all the daies of his life for Davids sake, &c. 2.6.2.
- 39 And I will for this, afflict the seede of David, but not for ever. 2.6.2.
- 12.10 And the young men said unto him which were brought up together with him, speake thus unto this people, &c. 1.17.7.
- 15 And the king hearkened not unto the people, before the Lord was aduersary unto him, &c. 1.17.7. & 1.18.4. & 2.4.6.
- 20 Neither did any follow the house of David, but the tribe of Iuda only, &c. 1.18.4.
- 28 Councell being taken, hee made two golden calves, and said unto them: goe not further up to Ierusalem, behold thy gods Israel which brought thee, &c. 4.2.8.
- 30 And this thing turned to sinne, for the people went to worship euen to day. 4.20.32.
- 31 And hee made a house in high places, and priests of the rascals of the people which were not the sonnes of Levi. 4.2.8.
- 15.4 But for Davids sake the Lord his God gave him a light in Ierusalem, that hee should raise up his sonne after him, and that hee should stablish Ierusalem. 2.6.2.
- 18.10 The Lord thy God liueth, there is no nation or kingdome into the which my Lord hath not sent, &c. 2.8.27.
- 41 And Elias said to Achab: come up and eat and drinke, because their is a sound of much raine. 2.20.3.
- 42 But Elias came up unto the top of Carmel, and hee put his face groveling on the earth betweene his knees. 2.20.3.
- 43 And he said unto his boy, goe up and looke toward the sea: who when he went and saw and had beholde, he said, there is nothing: and hee said unto him againe returne seven times. 2.20.3.
- 19.8 And hee walked in the strength of that meate forty daies and forty nights, euen unto the hill of God Horeb. 4.12.20.
- 18 I haue left unto my selfe in Israel seven thousand men, whose knees haue not bowed before Baal. 4.1.2.
- 21.12 They proclaimed a fast, and set Naboth amongst the cheife of the people. 4.12.17.
- 28 And the word of the Lord came unto Elias the Tisbite, saying. 3.3.25.
- 29 Hast thou not seene Achab humbled before me? because he was humbled before me, I will not bring the euill in his daies, &c. 3.3.25. & 3.20.15.
- 22.6 The king of Israel gaubered therefore about forty Prophets. 4.9.6.
- 21 A spirit went forth and stood before the Lord and said, I will deceiue. 1.14.17. & 1.17.7. & 1.18.1.
- 22 And he said, I will goe out and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his Prophets. 4.9.6.
- 27 Thus saith the king, send this man into prison, and maintaine him with the bread of tribulation, and with the water of griefe untill I returne in peace. 4.9.6.

- 6.15 Out al as master, what shall we doe? 1.
14.11.
- 16 There be no with us than with them. 1.
14.12.
- 17 Lord open the eyes of this boy, that hee may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the ladde, and he saw and beheld, a mun-taine full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elizei. 1.14.7,8,11.
- 31 The Lord doe so, and see unto me, if the head of Elizei the sonne of Saphat shall stand upon him this day. 2.8.24.
- 10.7 And when letters came unto them they tooke the sonnes of the king, and slue seventy men, &c. 1.18.4.
- 10 Know now that there shall fall unto the earth nothing of the word of the Lord the which the Lord hath spoken, &c. 1.
18.4.
- 16.10 And when he had seene the star that was at Damascus, he sent to Vria the Priest the patterne thereof, and the likenesse, according to the worke thereof. 4.
10.23.
- 17.24 The king of Assyria brought mee from Babylon and from Cutha, &c. 4.10.23.
- 25 And when they began to dwell there, they feared not the Lord, and the Lord sent Lions unto them that they might kill them. 4.
10.23.
- 32 Thus they feared the Lord, and appointed out Priests out of themselves for the high places, &c. 3.2.13. & 4.10.23. & 4.15.
23.
- 33 And when they feared the Lord they did serve also their Gods, according to the manner of the people from whence they were brought, &c. 3.2.12.
- 34 Even unto this present day they follow
the ancient custome, they feare not the Lord neither keepe his ceremonies, &c. 3.2.
13.
- 19.4 And make prayer for the rest that hee

- 35 It came to passe in that night, the Angel of the Lord came and stroke in the campe of the Assyrians one hundred thousand and five thousand. 1.14.6.
- 20.1 Set thy house in an order, for thou shalt die and not live. 1.17.12.
- 2 Then Ezechias turned his face to the wall, and he prayed to the Lord. 3.3.4.
- 3 I beseech thee, Lord remember. I pray thee, how I have walked before thee in truth and in a perfect heart, and I have done the thing that thou likest of. 3.14.19. & 3.20.
10.
- 5 Behold, I have healed thee, the third day thou shalt goe up to the Temple of the Lord.
1.17.12.
- 9 Wilt thou that the shadow goe forwards two degrees, or that it goe backward so many. 4.14.18.
- 11 And I saias called upon the Lord and he brought backe the shadow by the lines by the which it went downe into the clocke of Achaz. 1.16.2.
- 21.4 And hee built Altars in the house of the Lord, of the which the Lord spake, I will put my name in Ierusalem. 4.10.23.
- 16 Moreover Manasses shed innocent blood overmuch, till hee filled up Ierusalem unto the mouth, &c. 3.24.11.
- 22.1 And hee did the thing that pleased the Lord, and hee walked in all the wayes of his Father David, and declined not neither on the right hand nor left. 4.10.23.
- 8 And Helcias the high Priest said unto Saphan the Scribe, I have found the booke of the Law in the house of the Lord and Helcias gave it to Saphan the Scribe, and he read in it. 1.8.8.

- 6 Seeke the Lord whilest hee may be found, call yee upon him whilest hee is neere. 3. 3. 20.
56. 1 Keepe judgement and doe justice, for my salvation is as hand to come, & my righteousnesse to be revealed. 3. 3. 10.
- 2 Blisssed is the man that doth this, and the son of man that layeth hold of it, that is to say, keeping the Sabbath that hee pollute it not, &c. 2. 8. 29.
- 7 I hope will I bring to my holy mountaine, and make them joyfull in my house of prayer, their sacrifice and burnt offerings shall be acceptable on my altar, because my house shall be called the house of prayer for all people. 3. 10. 29.
- 10 Their watchmen are all blinde, they have no knowledge, they be dum dogs, &c. 4. 9. 3.
57. 15 Thus saith the high and excellent, he that inhabiteth the eternitie, and whose name is holy, &c. 3. 12. 6. 58. 5. 1

58.5 It is such a fast that I have chosen, that a man should afflict his soule for a day that he should bow his head? &c. 4.12.19.
 6 And doe not I choose rather this fast, to lose the bands of iniquity, &c. 3.3.6.
 7 And hide not thy selfe from thine owne flesh. 3.7.6.
 9 Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall heare: thou shalt cry, and he shall say, here I am. 3.20.14.
 13 If thou turne away thy foot from the Sabbath, so that thou doe not thine owne will on my holy day, &c. 2.8.31. & 2.8.34.
 59.1 Behold the Lords band is not shortned, that hee cannot see, neither is his care heaue that he cannot heare. 3.11.21.
 2 But your iniquities have separated betwene you and your God, and your finnes hath bid his face from you that he will not heare. 2.12.1. & 3.11.21.
 7 Their feet doe runne to euill, and they make haste to speed innocent blood: the thoughts of them are vaine thoughts, desolation and destruction is in their paths. 2.3.2.
 36 And when the Lord did see (and that being abashed and wounded) that there was none, that there was none I say, that would offer himselfe, he made his arme the safeguard thereof, and his righteousnesse did sustaine it. 3.14.6.
 17 He put on righteousnesse for a breast-plate, and the helmet of saluation on his head, &c. 1.11.12.
 20 And the Redemptor shall come to Sion, and unto them that turne from their wickednesse in Jacob. 3.3.20.21.
 21 My spirit which is upon thee, and my word which I have put in thy mouth, shall never depart out of thy mouth, neither out of the mouth of thy seed, &c. 1.7.4. & 1.9.1. & 4.1.5.
 60.2 Behold, darknesse shall cover the earth, and amidst the people, but the Lord shall rise upon thee, and his glory shall appeare upon thee. 2.3.1.
 6 All they of Saba shall come, bringing gold and incense, and they shall shew forth the praises of God. 4.5.17.
 7 All the sheepe of Cedar shall be gathered unto thee. 4.5.17.
 19 The Sunne shall serue thee no more for day light, and the brightnesse of the Moone shall not shew to thee, &c. 2.2.10.
 61.1 The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, for because the Lord anointed me, and sent me that I should shew glad things unto the weake, &c. 2.15.2. & 3.3.20. & 3.4.3. & 3.12.7.

 3 And they shall be called trees of righteousness, and the planting of the Lord that he might be glorified. 3.14.16.
 93.10 But they did rebell and vexed his holy spirit. 1.13.15.
 16 For thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel knoweth us not, thou Lord art our Father, our Redeemer. 3.20.25.26.
 7 O Lord, why hast thou made us to erre from thy wayes? why hast thou hardened our hearts that we should not feare thee? 2.4.4. & 3.3.21.
 64.5 Behold, thou art angry because we haue sinned. 3.20.8.
 6 Wee haue bene all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesse is as a filthy cloth, and we all doe fade like a leafe, &c. 3.1.25.
 65.1 I have bene sought of them that asked not: I was found of them that sought mee not, &c. 3.2.4.2.
 1 I have stretched out my hands all the day to a rebellious people, which goe not in a good way. 3.24.16.
 16 Hee that will blesse himselfe in the cart, shall blesse himselfe in the true God: and he that will swear, shall swear by the true God, &c. 2.8.23.
 24 It shall come to passe, that before they call, I will answer: and as yet they speaking, I will heare. 3.20.14.
 25 They shall no more hurt or destroy in my holy mountaine, &c. 4.10.10.
 66.1 Heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstole: where is that house therefore that you build for mee? and where is that place of my rest? 3.20.30. & 4.17.24.
 2 But to whom shall I have regard, but unto him that is humble, and of a broken spirit, and who doth tremble at my Word? 3.12.6
 22 For as the new heauen and the new earth that I will make shall remaine before mee, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and name continue. 2.10.22.
 23 And there shall be continuall new Moones, and continuall Sabbaths, and all flesh shall come that it may worship before me. 2.8.30.
 24 Their wormes shall not die, and their fire shall not be put out, and they shall be habitation unto all flesh. 3.25.11.2.

JEREMIE.

1.6. O Lord God, behold, I cannot speake, for I am a child. 4.8.3.
 Behold

The Table.

9 Behold, I have put my word into thy mouth. 4.8.3.

10 Behold, this day have I set thee over the nations and over kingdoms, to pluck up and to rote out, and to destroy and scatter, that thou maist build and plant. 4.8.3.

2.13 For my people have committed two evils, they have forsaken me the fountaine of living waters, to dig them pits, even broken pits that can hold no waters. 3.20.14.

3 I They say, if a man put away his wife, and she goe from him, and become another mans, &c. 2.8.18. & 4.1.25.

2 Lift up thy eyes unto the high places, and behold where thou hast not plyed the harlot, &c. 2.8.18.

12 Goe and crie these words towards the North, and say: thou disobedient Israel, returne saith the Lord: & I will not let my wrath fall upon you, for I am mercifull, &c. 4.1.25.

4.1 O Israel, if thou returne, returne unto me saith the Lord, and if thou put away thine abominations out of my sight, thou shalt thou not remove. 2.5.10. & 3.3.6.

4 Break up your fallow ground, and sow not among the thornes: be circumcised to the Lord, and take away the foreskin of your hearts, ye men of Iudah, and inhabitants of Ierusalem, &c. 2.5.8. & 3.3.6.7. & 4.16.21.

9 And in that day, saith the Lord, the heart of the king shall perish, and the heart of the princes, and the priest shall be astonish'd, and the Prophets shall wonder. 4.9.6.

11 At that time shall it be said to this people, and to Ierusalem, a dry rinde in the high places of the wilderness, commeth toward the daughter of my people, &c. 1.16.7.

14 O Ierusalem, wash thine heart from wickednesse, &c. 2.5.8.

5.3 O Lord, are not thyeis upon the truth? thou hast stricken them but they have not sorrowed: thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction: they have made their faces harder than a stone, and have refused to turne. 3.4.35. & 3.14.8.

7 How should I spare thee for this? thy children have forsaken me, and sworne by them that are no Gods, &c. 2.8.23.

14 Because ye spake such words, behold, I will put my word into thy mouth, like a fire, and this people shall bee as wood, and it shall devour them. 3.24.13

6.13 For from the least of them, even to the greatest of them, every one is given to covetousnesse: and from the Prophet even to the Priest, they shall deale falsly. 4.9.3.

7.4 I trust not in lying words, saying, the Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord: this is the Temple of the Lord. 4.2.3.

5 For if you amend and redresse your waies, and your worker, if you execute judgement betwene a man and his neighbour, &c. 3.17.1.

13 Therefore now because ye have done all these works, saith the Lord, and I trowe specially and spake unto you: but when I spake, you would not heare mee, neither when I called would ye answer. 2.5.11.

14 I will doe unto this house, whereupon my name is called, &c. as I have done unto Shilo. 2.5.11.

22 For I spake not unto your Fathers nor commanded them, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt offerings and sacrifices. 4.10.15.

23 But this thing commanded I them, saying obey my voice, so I will be your God, &c. 4.10.15.17.

27 Therefore shalt thou speake all these words unto them, but they will not heare thee: thou shalt also cry unto them, but they will not consider thee. 2.5.11.

28 This is a nation that heareth not the voice of the Lord their God, nor receiveth discipline. 2.5.11.

9.32 Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor the strong man glory in his strength, neither the rich man glory in his riches. 3.13.1.

24 But let him that glorieth, glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, for I am the Lord which sheweth mercy and judgement, and righteousness in the earth, &c. 1.10.2.

10.2 Bee not afraid for the signes of heaven, though the heathen be afraid of such. 2.16.3.

8 But altogether they dote and are foolish, for the stocke is a doctrine of vanity. 1.11.5.

11 The Gods that have not made the heavens and the earth, shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens. 1.13.23.

23 O Lord, I know the way of man is no in himselfe, neither is it in man to walke and to direct his steps. 2.16.6.

24 O Lord correct mee, but with judgement not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing. 3.4.32.

- 11.7 For I have protested unto your fathers when I brought them up out of the land of Egypt, unto this day, rising early, and protesting, saying, obey my voice. 3. 20. 7. & 4. 10. 17.
8. Nevertheless they would not obey, nor incline their ears, &c. therefore I will bring upon them all the words of this covenant, which I command them to doe, &c. 3. 20. 7.
11. Behold, I will bring a plague among them which they shall not be able to escape, and though they cry unto me, I will not heare them. 3. 20. 7.
19. Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof, and cut him out of the land of the living &c. 4. 17. 15.
12. 16. And if they will learne the waies of my people, to swear by my name, the Lord Jehovah, as they taught my people to swear by Baal, &c. 2. 8. 23.
14. 7. O Lord though our iniquities testify against us, deal with us according to thy name: for our rebellions are many: we sinned against thee. 13. 20. 8.
14. The Prophets prophecie lies in my name, I have not sent them, neither did I command them, &c. 4. 9. 3.
15. 1. Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet mine affliction could not bee toward this people: cast them out of my sight and let them depart. 3. 20. 23.
17. 1. The sinne of Iudah is written with a pen of iron, and with a point of a Diamond, and graven upon the table of your heart, and upon the hornes of your altars. 3. 4. 29.
5. Thus saith the Lord, cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arme, and withdraweth his heart from the Lord. 2. 2. 10.
9. The heart is deceitfull and wicked above all things, who can know it. 2. 3. 2.
21. I take heed to your soules, and beare no burden on the Sabbath day, nor bring it in by the gates of Ierusalem. 2. 8. 29.
22. Neither carry forth burdens out of your houses on the Sabbath day, neither doe you any worke, but sanctifie the Sabbath, &c. 2. 8. 29.
27. But if you will not heare mee to sanctifie the Sabbath day, and not to beare a burden nor to goe through the gates, &c. 2. 8. 29.
18. 8. But if this nation against whom I have pronounced, mine from their wickednesse, I will repent of the plague that I thought to bring upon them. 1. 17. 12.
18. Come and let us imagine some devise against Ieremias: for the law shall not perish from the Priest, nor counsell from the wise, nor the word from the Prophet. 1. 4. 9. 5.
20. 2. Then Pashur smote Ieremias the Prophet, and put him in the stocks that were in the high gate of Benjamin, which was by the house of the Lord. 4. 9. 6.
21. 12. Execute judgement in the morning and deliver the oppressed out of the hand of the oppressor, &c. 4. 20. 9.
22. 3. Execute yee judgement and righteousness, and deliver the oppressed from the hand of the oppressor, &c. 4. 20. 9.
23. 1. Woe be unto the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheepe of my pasture, saith the Lord. 4. 9. 3.
5. Behold, the dayes come saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch and a king shall raigne, and prosper, and shall execute judgement and justice in the earth. 2. 6. 3.
6. And this is the name whereby they shall call him the Lord our righteousnesse. 1. 13. 9. & 3. 11. 8.
16. Heare not the words of the Prophets that prophecy unto you and teach you vanity, &c. 4. 9. 2.
24. Doe not I fill heaven and earth, saith the Lord. 4. 1. 5.
28. The Prophet that hath a dreame, let him tell a dreame, and he that hath my word, let him speake my word faithfully. 4. 8. 3.
24. 7. And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the Lord, and they shall bee my people, and I will be their God, for they shall returne unto me with their whole heart. 2. 2. 20.
25. 11. And this whole land shall be desolate, and astonished, and these nations shall serve the King of Babel seventy yeeres. 1. 8. 7.
12. And when the seventy yeeres are accomplished, I will visit the king of Babel, and that nation, saith the Lord, for their iniquity, &c. 1. 8. 7.
29. For we, I begin to plague the city, where my name is called upon, and should you goe free? &c. 3. 4. 34.
27. 5. I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground, &c. 4. 4. 20. 27.
6. But now I have given all these lands unto the hand of Nabuchadnesser the king of Babylon my servant, &c. 4. 20. 27. 28.
7. And all nations shall serve him, and his son and his sons son until the very time of his land come also, &c. 4. 20. 27.

The Table.

- 8 And the nation and kingdom which will not serve the same: Nebuchadnezar king of Babel, and that will not put their neck under the yoke of the king of Babel, &c.
4.20.27.
- 9 Therefore heare not your prophets, nor your Soothsayers, nor your dreamers, nor your Inchanters, nor your Sorcerers which say unto you thus, ye shall not serve the king of Babel, &c.
4.9.3.
- 24 Therefore heare not the words of the Prophets that speake unto you saying, yee shall not serve the king of Babel, &c.
4.9.3.
- 17 Heare them not, but serve the king of Babel, that ye may live, &c.
4.20.28.
- 29.7 And seeke the prosperity of the city, whether I have caused you to be carried away captives, and pray unto the Lord for it, for, &c.
4.20.28.
- 31.18 I have heard Ephraim lamenting this, thou hast corrected me & I was chastised as an untamed calfe: convert thou me and I shall be converted: for thou art the Lord my God, 2.3.5. & 3.5.8. & 3.24.15.
- 19 Surely after that I converted, I repented, and after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh, &c.
2.5.8.
- 31 Behold the daies come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Iudah.
2.11.7. & 3.4.29.
- 32 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, when I tooke them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt, the which my covenant they brake, &c.
2.5.9. & 2.11.7.
- 33 After those daies saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people.
2.8.14.
& 3.20.45.
- 34 For I will forgive their iniquity, and will remember their sins no more.
3.4.29.
& 3.20.45.
- 35 Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the Sun for a light to the day, and the courses of the Moone and of the Stars, for a light to the night, &c.
4.17.17.
- 32.16 Now when I shall deliver the booke of the profession unto Baruch, the sonne of Neriah, I prayed unto the Lord saying.
3.20.15.
- 18 Thou shewest mercy unto thousands, and recompensist the iniquities of the fathers into the bosome of their children after them, &c.
2.8.19.
- 23 But they obey not thy voice, neither walked in thy lawes all that thou commandest them to doe, they have not done, therefore thou hast caused this whole plague to come upon them, &c.
2.5.11.
- 39 And I will give them one heart and one way, that they may feare me for ever, for the wealth of thee, and of their children after them, &c.
2.3.8.
- 33.8 And I will cleanse them from all their iniquity whereby they have sinned against me: yea I will pardon all their iniquities, whereby they have sinned against me, &c.
3.20.45. & 4.1.20
- 16 And in those dayes shall Iudah be saved, and Ierusalem shall dwell safely, and he that shall call her is the Lord our righteousness, &c.
1.13.9.
- 42.2 Heare our prayer wee beseech thee and pray for us unto the Lord God, &c.
3.20.14.
- 9 Thus saith the Lord God of Israel unto whom yee sent me to present your prayers before him, &c.
3.20.14.
- 48.10 Cursed bee he that doth the worke of the Lord negligently, &c.
4.20.6.
- 50.20 In those daies, and at that time, saith the Lord, the iniquity of Israel, shall be sought for, and there shall be none: and the sins of Iudah, and they shall not be found, &c.
3.4.29.
- 23 How is the hammer of the whole world destroyed and broken? how is Babel become desolate among the nations, &c.
2.4.4.
- 25 The Lord hath opened his treasure and hath brought the weapons of his wrath, for this is the worke of the Lord God of hosts, in the Land of the Chaldeans, &c.
1.18.1.

LAMENTATIONS.

33.8 Hee shall die for his iniquity, but his blond will I require at thy hand, &c. 4.12.5.

11 I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turne from his way and live, &c. 3.24.15.

14 If he returne from his sinne, and doe that which is lawfull and right, &c. 3.17.15.

34.4 But with cruelty and with rigour have ye ruled them, &c. 4.11.14.

23 And I will set up a shepherd over them,
and hee shall feed them, even my servant
David, hee shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. 2.6.3.

36.21 But I frowned mine holy name which the house of Israel had polluted among the heathen whither they went, &c. 3.4.30.

22 I doe not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for mine holy names sake, which ye polluted among the heathen, &c.

3.12.3. & 3.15.2.

25 Then will I powre cleane water uppon you, and ye shall be cleane, and from all your filthinesse, and from all your Idols will I cleans you, &c. 3.1.3.

26 A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you, and I will take away the stony heart out of your body, and will give you a heart of flesh. 2.3.6. & 2.
5.8. & 3.24.1. & 3.24.15.

27 And I will put my spirit within you, and cause you to walke in my statutes, and ye shall keepe my judgements, and die therein.
1.3.10. & 2.3.6.

32 Be it knowne unto you, that I doe not this for your sakes, saith the Lord God: therefore O ye house of Israel, be ashamed and confounded for your owne wayes. 3.4.3.
& 3.12.3. & 3.15.2.

these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, heare the Word of the Lord.
2.10.21.

25 And my servant David shall be their Prince for ever. 2.6.3.

26 Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them: it shall be an ever lasting covenant with them, &c. 2.6.3.

48.21 And the residue shall be for the Prince on the one side, and on the other of the oblation of the Sanctuary, and of the possession of the City, &c. 4.2.13.

35 And the name of the City from that day shall be, The Lord is there. 1.13.4.

DANIEL.

2.21 HE taketh away Kings; and setteth up Kings, &c. 4.20.26.

37 Thou art a King of all Kings: the God of heaven hath given thee kingdom, power, and strength, and glory. 4.20.26.

44 And in the dayes of these Kings shall the God of heaven set up a Kingdom which shall never be destroyed: and his Kingdome shall not be given to another people, but shall brake and destroy all these Kingdomes, and it shall stand for ever, &c. 2.15.3.

4.24 Wherefore, O King, let my counsell be acceptable unto thee, and breake off thy sins by righteousnesse, and thine iniquities by mercy towards the poore, &c. 3.4.31.
& 3.4.36.

5.18 The most high God gave unto Nabuchadnezar thy father a Kingdome, and D d d d majestie,

Majestic, and honour, and glory, &c. 4.
20.26.

6.22 And unto thee O King, I have done no hurt, &c. 4.20.32.

7.4 The first was as a Lion, and had Eagles wings: I beheld, till the wings thereof were plucked off, &c. 1.8.7.

10 And ten thousand thousands stood before him: the judgement was set, and the books opened. 1.14.5. & 1.14.8. & 3.2.41.

25 And shall speake words against the most high, and shall consume the Saints of the most high, and thinke that he may change times and lawes, &c. 4.7.25.

9.5 We have sinned and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, yea, we have rebelled, and have departed from thy precepts, and from thy judgements. 3.4.9.

7 O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee, and unto us open shame, &c. 4.20.29.

10 For wee have not obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, to walke in his wayes, which he had laid before us, by the ministry of his servants the Prophets. 2.5.11.

18 For wee doe not present our supplications before thee for our owne righteousness, but for thy great tender mercies. 3.20.8.
& 3.20.14.

14 Seventy weekes are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy Citie, to finish thy wickednesse and to seale up thy sinnes, and to reconcile thy iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, &c. 2.7.2.
& 2.15.1. & 2.15.6.

27 And he shall confirme the covenant with many for one weeke: and in the midst of the weeke he shall cause the oblation and sacrifice to cease: and for the overspreading of the abominations, he shall leave us desolate, &c. 4.2.12.

10.13 But the Prince of the Kingdome of Persia withstood me, &c. 1.14.7.

20 But now I will returne to fight with the Prince of Persia, &c. 1.14.7.

12.1 And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great Prince which standeth for the children of the people, and there shall be a time of trouble. 1.14.7. & 1.14.8. & 2.10.11.

2 And many of them that sleepe in the dust of the earth, shall awake, and some to everlasting life, and some to shame and perpetuall contempt. 3.25.7.

3 And they that be wise, shall shine as the brightness of the firmament: and they that be many to righteousness, shall shine as the starres, for ever and ever. 3.25.10.

1.11 Then shall the children of Judah, and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land, &c. 2.6.3.

2.5 For their mother hath plied the harlot, she that conceived them hath done shamefully: for she said, I will goe after my lovers, &c. 2.8.18.

19 And in that day I will make a covenant for them with the wilde beasts, and with the fowles of the heaven, and with them that creepe upon the earth, &c. 4.1.20.

19 And I will marry thee unto mee for ever, yea, I will marry thee unto mee: in righteousness, and in judgement, and in mercy, and in compassion. 3.14.6. & 4.1.20.

23 And I will have mercy upon her that was not pitied, and I will say to them which were not my people, thou art my people: and they shall say, thou art my God. 3.14.6.

8.5 Afterward shall the children of Israel convert, and seeke the Lord their God, and David their King, and shall feare the Lord and his goodnesse in the latter dayes. 2.6.3.
& 3.2.23.

5.11 Ephraim is oppressed, and broken in judgement, because he willingly walked after the commandment. 4.20.32.

15 I will goe, and returne to my place, till they acknowledge their fault, and seeke mee, &c. 2.5.13.

6.1 Come, and let us returne to the Lord, for he hath spoiled us, and he will heale us: he hath wounded us, and he will binde us up. 3.3.2.

7.8 Ephraim is as a cake on the hearth not turned. 3.4.35.

8.4 They have set up a King, but not by me. 1.8.4.

9.8 The watch-man of Ephraim should bee in with my God: but that Prophet is the snare of a fowler in all his wayes, and hath in the house of his God. 4.9.3.

12.5 Tea, the Lord God of Hosts, the Lord himselfe is his memoriall. 1.13.10.

whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheeke, turne to him the other also. 4.20.
19. & 4.20.20.

45 That ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to arise on the evil, and on the good, &c. 3.
20.15. & 3.24.16. & 3.25.9.

46 For if you love them which love you, what reward shall you have? doe not the publicans even the same? 2.8.58.

6.2 Therefore when thou givest thine almes thou shalt not make a trumpet to be blowne before thee, as the hypocrites doe in the synagogue, and in the streets, to be praised of

- 28 And feare ye not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soule: but rather feare him which is able to destroy both soule and body in hell. 1.15.3. & 3.25.7.
- 29 Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your father? 1.16.1. & 1.16.5. & 1.17.1.
- 30 Yea, and all the haire of your head are numbered. 1.16.2.
- 32 Feare ye not therefore, yea are of more value than many sparrows. 1.17.6.
- 33 But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my father which is in heaven. 4.1.26.
- 11.10 For this is he of whom it is written: behold, I send my messenger before my face which shall prepare thy way before thee. 3.3.19.
- 11 Among them which are begotten of women, arose there not a greater than Iohn Baptist: not withstanding he that is least in the kingdome of heaven, is greater than he. 2.9.5.
- 13 For all the Prophets and the Law prophesied unto Iohn. 2.11.5.10.
- 23 And thou Capernaum, which art lifted up unto heaven, shall be brought downe to hell: for if the great works which have bene done in thee, had bene done among them of Sodome, they had remained to this day. 3.24.15.
- 25 At that time Iesus answered and said: I give thee thanks, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise, and men of understanding, & hast opened them unto babes. 3.2.34.
- 27 Neither knoweth any man the father, but the son, and he to whom the sonne will reveale him. 4.8.5.
- 28 Come unto me all yee that be weary and laden, and I will ease you. 3.3.20. & 3.4.3. & 3.12.7. & 3.18.9.
- 29 Take my yoke on you, and learne of mee that I am mecke and lowly in heart and ye shall finde rest unto your soules. 3.18.9.
- 30 For my yoke is easie, and my burden light. 5.19.3.
- 12.24 But when the Pharisees heard it, they said, This man casteth the devils no otherwise out, but through Beelzebub the prince of devils. 3.3.22.
- 31 Every sinne and blasphemie shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemie against the holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. 1.13.15. & 2.3.21. & 3.3.22.
- 22 And whosoever shall speake a word against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever shall speake against the holy Ghost it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. 3.5.7.
- 41 The men of Ninive shall rise in judgement with this generation, and shall condemne it: for they repented at the preaching of Iohnas, &c. 3.24.15.
- 43 Now when the unclean spirit is gone out of the man, hee walketh throughout drie places, seeking rest, and findeth none. 1.14.14. & 14.19.
- 13.4 And as he sowed, some seeds fell by the way side, and the fowles came and devoured them up. 3.22.10. & 4.14.11. & 4.17.33.
- 5 And some fell upon stony ground where they had not much earth, and anon they sprung up: because they had no depth of earth. 4.17.33.
- 9 He that hath eares to heare, let him heare. 3.23.13.
- 11 Because it is given unto you to know the secrets of the kingdome of heaven, but unto them is not given. 1.7.5. & 3.24.13.
- 16 But blessed are your eies, for they see: and your eares, for they heare. 2.9.1.
- 17 For verily I say unto you, that many Prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seene them, &c. 2.11.6.
- 24 The kingdome of heaven is like unto a man which soweth good seeds in his field. 4.1.13.
- 29 But he said, nay: least while ye goe about to gather the tares, ye plucke up also with them the wheat. 4.12.11.
- 31 The kingdome of heaven is like unto a graine of mustard seede, which a man taketh and soweth in the field. 4.19.34.
- 33 Another parable spake he unto them, saying: the kingdome of heaven is like leaven; which a woman taketh and hideth in three peckes of meale, till it be all leavened. 4.19.34.
- 39 And the enemy which soweth them, the devil, &c. 1.14.15.
- 47 The kingdome of heaven is like unto a net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of all kinde. 4.1.13. & 4.15.31.
- 14.25 And in the fourth watch of the night Iesus

The Table.

- Jesus went unto them, walking on the Sea. 4.17.29
- 15.3. Why doe yee also transgresse the commandement of God: by your tradition? 4.10.10
- 4 For God hath commanded, saying, honour thy father and mother, and he that curseth father and mother, let him die the death. 2.8.36
- 8 This people draweth neere unto mee with their mouth, and bonoweth me with their lips; but their heart is farr off from me. 3.10.31
- 9 But in vaine they worship me, teaching for doctrines, mens precepts. 4.10.15. & 4.10.23
- 13 Every plant which mine heavenly Father hath not planted, shall bee rooted up. 2.3.9. & 3.2.12. & 3.23.1. & 3.24.6
- 14 Let them alone, they bee blinde leaders of the blinde, and if the blinde lead the blinde, both shall fall in the ditch. 3.19.11. & 4.9.12
- 24 I am not sent, but unto the lost sheepe of the house of Israell. 2.11.12
- 16.6 Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Saducees. 4.10.26
- 12 Then understood they that he had not said that they should beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisee and Saducees. 4.10.16
- 17 Thou art Christ the Sonne of the living God. 4.6.6
- 17 Blessed art thou Simon the Sonne of Jonar, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. 2.2.19. & 3.1.14. & 3.2.34
- 18 And I say also unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rocke I will build my Church. 4.6.3. & 4.6.5
- 19 And I will give unto thee the keyes of the kingdome of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt binde upon earth, shall bee bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on the earth, shall be loosed in heaven. 3.4.12. & 4.1.32. & 4.2.10. & 4.6.4. & 4.11.1. & 4.12.4
- 23 Get thee behinde me, Satan: thou art an offence unto me, &c. 4.7.28
- 24 If any man will follow me, let him forsake himselfe, and take up his crosse and follow me. 3.7.2. & 3.8.1
- 27 For the Sonne of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his Angels: and then shall he give to every man according to his deeds. 3.18.1
- 17.2 And he was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the Sunne, and his clothes were as white as the light. 4.17.17
- 5 While hee yet spake, behold, a bright cloud shadowed them; and behold, there came a voice out of the cloud, saying: this is my wellbeloved Sonne in whom I am well pleased, heare him. 2.15.2. & 3.2.32. & 3.8.1. & 3.20.48. & 4.8.1. & 4.8.7
- 18.10 For I say unto you, that in heaven their Angels alwaies behold the face of my Father which is in heaven. 1.14.7. & 14.9
- 11 For the Sonne of man is come to save that which was lost. 2.12.4
- 15 If thy brother trespass against thee, goe tell him his fault betwene thee and him alone; if hee heare thee, thou hast wonne thy brother. 4.1.2.3
- 17 And if hee will not vouchsafe to heare thee, tell it unto the church; and if he refuse to heare the Church also, let him bee unto thee, as a heathen man, and as a Publican. 4.8.15. & 4.11.2. & 4.12.3
- 18 Verily I say unto you, whatsoever yee binde on earth, shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever yee loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. 3.4.12. & 3.4.20. & 4.1.12. and 4.2.16. and 3.6.4. and 4.12.4. and 4.12.9
- 19 Againe verily I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree in earth upon any thing, whatsoever they shall desire, it shall be given them of my Father which is in Heaven. 3.20.30
- 20 For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them. 4.1.9. and 4.6.4. and 4.9.2
- 22 I say not to thee, unto seven times; but unto seventy times seven times. 4.1.23
- 29 And his fellow therefore fell downe and besought him, saying, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. 4.1.23
- 19.6 Wherefore they are no more inwaie, but one flesh; let not man therefore put a sunder that which God hath coupled together. 4.15.22
- 11 All men cannot receive this saying, save them to whom it is given. 2.8.42. and 4.13.17
- 12 For there are some chaste, which were so borne of their mothers belly: and there be some chaste which bee made chaste by men; and there bee some chaste which have made themselves chaste for the kingdome of heaven, &c. 2.8.42

The Table.

- 13 Then were brought unto him little children, that he should put his hands upon them, and pray: and the Disciples rebuked them. 4.16.7.
- 14 Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of heaven. 4.16.7. & 4.16.17. & 4.16.26.
- 15 And when he had put his hands on them, he departed thence. 4.3.16
- 17 There is none good but one, even God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keepe the Commandements. 1.13.13.24 & 3.18.9
- 18 Thou shalt not kill: thou shalt not commit adulterie: thou shalt not steale, &c. 2.8.35.36.37.38.39. &c. to the end of the Chapter.
- 19 Honor thy Father and thy Mother, &c. 2.8.12.35
- 21 If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell all that thou hast, and give to the poore, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, &c. 4.13.13.
- 25 And when his Disciples heard it: they were exceedingly amazed, saying, who then can be saved? 3.7.9.
- 26 And Iesus beheld them and said unto them: with men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible. 2.7.5.
- 28 And Iesus said unto them, verily I say to you: that when the Sonne of man shall sit in the throne of his majestie, ye which followed me in the regeneration, shall sit also upon twelve thrones: and judge the twelve tribes of Israel. 2.16.18. & 3.25.10
- 29 And whosoever shall forsake houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my names sake, he shall receive a hundred fold more, and shall inherit life everlasting. 3.25.10.
- 20.1 For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a certaine housholder, which went out at the dawning of the day, to hire labourers into his vineyard, 3.18.3
- 25 Ye know that the Lords of the Gentiles have domination over them, and they that are great, exercise authoritie over them. 4.11.8. & 4.11.9.
- 26 But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your servant. 4.11.8.
- 28 Even as the sonne of man came not to be served, but to serve and to give his life for the ransom of many, 2.16.5.
- 21.9. Moreover, the people that went before and they also that followed cried, saying: Hosanna the sonne of David: blessed bee he that commeth in the name of the Lord, &c. 2.6.41.
- 22 Whatsoever ye shall aske in prayer, if ye beleave, ye shall receive it. 3.20.11.
- 25 The baptisme of Iohn whence was it? from heaven or of men? then they reasoned among themselves saying, if wee shall say from heaven, he will say unto us, why did ye not then beleave him. 4.19.5.
- 31 Whether of them twaine did the will of the father: they said unto him, the first. Iesus said unto them, verily I say unto you that the Publicanes and the harlots shall goe before you into the kingdom of God. 2.8.14. & 3.7.2.
- 22.2 The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certaine king, which married his sonne. 3.24.8.
- 12 Friend how camst thou in hither, and hast not on a wedding garment? 4.17.45
- 13 Binde him hand and foote, take him away, and cast him into utter darkenesse: there shall he weeping and gnashing of teeth. 3.25.12.
- 14 For many are called, but few are chosen. 3.24.6.
- 23 The same day the Sadduces came to him, which say that there is no resurrection. 2.10.23.
- 30 For in the resurrection, they neither marry wives, nor wives are bestowed in marriage, but are as the Angels of God in heaven. 1.14.9. & 1.15.3. & 2.12.6. & 3.25.11. & 4.1.4.
- 32 I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Iacob: God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. 2.10.6. & 4.16.3.
- 37 Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soule, and with all thy minde. 2.8.11. & 2.8.51. & 3.3.11.
- 39 And the second is like unto this, thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. 2.8.11
- 23.4 For they binde heavy burdens, and grievous to bee borne, and lay them on mens shouldrs, but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers. 4.10.1. & 4.10.16.
- 8 But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your doctour, to wit, Christ, and all ye are brethren. 4.8.8.
- 9 And cal no man your father upon the earth: for there is but one, your father which is in heaven. 3.20.38.
- 23 And ye leave the weightier matters of the law, as judgement, and mercy, and fidelity,

- fidelity, these ought ye to have done, and not to have left the other. 2.8.52.
- 25 Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for ye make cleane the out side of the cup, and of the platter, but within they are full of bribery and excess. 3.4.36.
- 37 Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the Prophets, and stonest them which are sent to thee: how often would I have gathered thy children together, &c. 3.24.16.
- 24.11 And many false Prophets shall arise, and shall deceive many. 4.9.4.
14. And this Gospell of the Kingdome shall be preached thorow the whole world, for a witness unto all Nations: and then shall the end come. 3.4.4.
- 24 For there shall arise false Christs, and false Prophets, and shall shew great signes and wonders: so that if it were possible, they should deceive the very elect. 4.9.4.
- 30 And then shall appeare the signe of the Sonne of man in heaven, and then shall all the kindreds of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Sonne of man come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. 2.16.17.
- 36 But of that day and houre knoweth no man, no not the Angels of Heaven, but my Father onely. 1.14.9.
- 45 Who then is a faithfull servant, and wise, whom his Master hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in season? 4.16.31.
- 25.3 The foolish tooke their lumps, but tooke not oyle with them. 3.5.7.
- 21 Then his Master said unto him, it is well done good servant and faithfull: thou hast bene faithfull in little, I will make thee ruler over much: enter into thy Masters joy. 2.3.11.
- 23 It is well done good servant and faithfull, thou hast bin faithfull in little, &c. 2.3.11.
- 29 For unto every man that hath, it shall be given, and he shall have abundance; and from him that hath not, even that he hath, shall be taken away. 2.3.11. & 3.15.4.
- 31 And when the Sonne of man cometh in his glory, and all the holy Angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory. 2.16.17.
- 32 And before him shall be gathered all Nations, and he shall separate one from another, as a shepheard separateth his sheepe from the goats. 2.16.17. & 3.25.9.
- 34 Come ye blessed of my father, inherit the Kingdome prepared for you from the foundations of the world. 3.18.1. & 3.18.2. & 3.18.3. & 3.24.16.
- 35 For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat; I thirsted and ye gave me drinke, &c. 3.18.1.
- 43 Verily, I say unto you, in as much as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it to me. 3.18.6.
- 41 Depart from mee ye cursed, into everlastig fire, which is prepared for the Devill and his Angels. 1.14.14. & 1.14.19. & 3.25.5.
- 46 And these shall goe into everlasting paine, and the righteous into life eternall. 3.25.5.
- 26.10 Why trouble ye the woman? for shee hath wrought a good worke upon mee. 25.8.
- 11 For ye have the poore alwayes with you, but me shall ye not have with you alwayes. 4.3.1. & 4.17.26. & 4.17.28.
- 12 For in that she poured this ointment upon my body, shee did it to bury me. 3.25.8.
- 15 And he said to them, what will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? and they appointed unto him thirty peces of silver. 4.18.14.
- 26 And as they did eat, Iesus tooke the bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to the Disciples, and said, take eat, this is my body. 4.14.20. & 5.16.30. & 4.17.1. & 4.17.20. & 4.19.23.
- 27 Also he tooke the cup, and when hee had given thanks hee gave it to them, saying, drinke ye all of it. 4.9.14.
- 38 Then said Iesus unto them, my soule is very heavy, even to the death; tarry ye here and watch with me. 2.16.12. & 3.8.9.
- 39 So he went a little further, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O my Father if it be possible let this cup passe from me, nevertheless not I as will, but as thou wilt. 2.16.12.
- 53 I thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my father, and hee will give me more than twelve legions of Angels. 1.14.8.
- 74 Then began he to curse himself, and to sweare, saying, I know not the man. 4.1.26.
- 75 Then Peter remembered the words of Iesus, which said unto him, Before the Cocke crow thou shalt deny me thrice. So he went out, and wept bitterly. 3.3.4.
- 27.4 I have sinned betraying the innocent blood, but they said, what is that to us? see thou to it. 3.3.4.
- 12 And

- 12 And when hee was accused of the chiefe Priests and Elders, hee answered nothing. 2.16.5.
- 14 But he answered him not to one word, in somuch that the Governour marvelled grievely. 2.16.5.
- 23 Then said the Governour, but what evil hath he done? then they cryed the more saying, let him be crucified. 2.16.5.
- 24 When Pilate saw that he availed nothing, but that more tumult was made, he tooke water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the bloud of this just man, looke you to it. 2.16.5.
- 46 And about the ninth houre Iesus cryed with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, Lamasabachthani? that is, my God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? 2.16.11.
- 50 Then Iesus cried ag aine with a loud voice, and yielded up the Ghost. 4.19.23.
- 52 And the graves did open themselves, and many bodies of the Saints, which slept, arose. 2.10.23. & 3.25.7.
- 53 And came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy City, and appeared to many. 2.10.23.
- 66 And they went and made the Sepulchre sure with the watch, and sealed the stone. 3.25.3.
- 28.5 But the Angell answered and said to the women, feare yee not, &c. 1.14.6.
- 6 He is not here, for he is risen, as he said, &c. 4.17.29.
- 7 Tell his Disciples that he is risen from the dead, &c. 1.24.6.
- 11 Now when they were gone, behold, some of the watch came into the City, and shewed unto the high Priests all the things that were done. 3.25.3.
- 12 And they gathered themselves together with the Elders, and tooke counsell, and gave large money to the souldiers 3.25.3.
- 13 Saying, Say, his Disciples came by night and stole him away while we slept. 3.25.5.
- 18 All power is given unto me in heaven and earth. 3.15.5.
- 19 Goe therefore and teach all Nations, Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost. 1.12.16. & 4.3.6. & 4.8.4. & 4.14.20. & 4.15.6. 18.20.22. & 4.16.27. & 4.19.28.
- 20 I am with you alwayes untill the end of the world. 1.16.14. & 4.8.8. & 4.8.11. & 4.17.26. & 4.17.28. & 4.17.30.

MARKE.

- 1 The beginning of the Gospell of Iesus Christ the Sonne of God. 2.9.2.
- 4 John did Baptize in the wilderness, and preached the Baptisme of amendment of life for remission of finnes. 3.3.19. & 4.19.17.
- 15 And saying, the time is fulfilled, and the Kingdome of God is at hand, repent and beleve the Gospell. 3.3.19.
- 3.15 And that they might have the power to heale sickneses, and to cast out Devils. 1.13.13.
- 28 Verily, I say unto you, all finnes shall be forgiven unto the children of men, and blasphemies, wherewith they blaspheme. 3.5.7.
- 29 But hee that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall never be given, but is culpable of eternall damnation. 1.13.15. & 3.3.22.
- 6.7 And gave them power over uncleane spirits. 1.13.13.
13. And they cast out many Devils, and they anointed many that were sicke with oyle, and healed them. 4.19.18. & 4.19.21.
- 7.33 Then hee tooke him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers in his eares, and did spit, and touched his tongue. 4.19.23.
- 8.38 For whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words among this adulterous and fainfull generation, of him shall the sonne of man be ashamed also, &c. 4.1.26.
- 9.24 Lord, I beleve, helpe my unbeliefe. 4.14.7.
- 44 To goe into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched. 3.25.12.
- 44 Where their worne dieth not, and the fire never goeth out. 3.25.12.
- 10.9 Therefore what God hath coupled together, let no man separate. 4.1.1.
- 30 But hee shall receive an hundred fold now at this present: houses and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions: and in the world to come eternal! life. 3.18.3.
- 11.24 Whatsoever yee desire when yee pray, beleve that yee shall have it, and it shall be done unto you. 3.20.11.
- 12.18 Then came the Sadduces unto him (which say, that there is no resurrection) and they asked him, saying. 3.25.5.
- 13.32 But of that day and houre knoweth

The Table.

- no man, nor the Angels which are in heaven, neither the Sonne himselfe, save onely the Father. 2.14.2
- 14.22 And as they did eat, Iesusooke the bread, and when he had giuenthankes, he brake it and gave it to them, and said, take, eat: this is my bodie. 4.17.1. & 4.17.20
- 33 And heeooke with him Peter, and James and John, and he began to be affraid, and in great bewinnesse. 3.8.9
- 34 And said unto them, my Soule is very heaue even unto the death: tarric here and watch. 2.16.12
- 15.28 Thus the Scripture was fulfilled which saith. And he was counted among the wicked. 2.16.5
- 16.9 He appeared first to Mary Magdalen, out of whom he had cast 7. devils. 1.14.14
- 15 Goeyee into all the world, and preach the Gospell to every creature. 4.3.4. & 4.3.12. & 4.16.27. & 4.19.28
- 16 He that shall beleue and be baptised, shall be saved. 4.15.1. & 4.16.28
- 19 So after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was receined into heaven, and sate at the right hand of God. 2.14.3. & 4.17.27
- LUKE.
- 1.6 BOth were justified before God, and walked in all the commandements and ordinances of the Lord, without reproofe. 3.17.7
- 15 And he shall be filled with the holy Ghost, even from his mothers womb. 4.16.17.
- 17 For hee shall goe before him in the spirit and power of Elias: to turne the hearts of the Fathers to their children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just men, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord. 4.1.6
- 31 For loe, thou shalt conceive in thy wombe, and beare a Sonne, and shalt call his name Iesim. 2.16.1
- 32 He shall be great, and shall be called the Sonne of the most high, and the Lord shall give unto him the throne of his Father David. 2.14.4.7
- 33 And he shall raigne over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom shall be none end. 2.14.3. & 2.15.3
- 34 Then said Marie unto the Angell, how shall this be, seeing I know no man? 4.17.25
- 35 And the Angell answered, and said unto her, the holy Ghost shall come upon thee,
- and the power of the most high shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be borne of thee, shall be called the Sonne of God. 2.14.5
- 4.3 And whence cometh this to me that the mother of my Lord should come to me? 2.14.4
- 54 He hath upholden Israel his servant, being mindfull of his mercie. 2.10.4
- 72 That he would shew mercie towards our Father, and remember his holy covenant. 2.10.4
- 73 And the oath which he sware to our Father Abraham. 2.10.4
- 74 That we being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, should serve him without feare. 3.16.2
- 77 And to give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their finnes. 3.11.22
- 79 To give light to them that sit in darknesse and in the shadow of death, and to guide our feet into the way of peace. 2.12.4
- 2.11 That is, that unto you is borne this day in the City of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. 2.15.5
- 13 And straight way there was with the Angell a multitude of heavenly souldiers, praising God, &c. 1.14.5
- 37 And shee was a widow about fourefcore and foure yeres, and went not out of the temple, and served God with fastings and prayers night and day. 4.12.16
- 52 And Iesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and men. 2.14.2
- 3.3. And hee came into all the coasts about Jordan, preaching the baptisme of repentance, for the remission of finnes. 3.3.19. & 4.15.7. & 4.19.17.
- 8 Bring forth therefore fruites worthy amendment of life, and begin not to say with your selves, wee have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. 3.3.5
- 14 The souldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, and what shall we doe? and he said, unto them, doe violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely, and be content with your wages. 4.20.12
- 16 John answered, and said to them all, indeed I baptise you with water, but one stronger than I, cometh, whose shoos latches I am not worthy to unloose: he will

The Table.

- baptise you with the holy Ghost and with fire. 3.1.3.4. & 4.15.6.7
- 22 And the holy Ghost came downe in a bodily shape like a Dove, upon him, and there was a voice from heaven, saying, thou art my beloved sonne: in thee I am well pleased. 4.17.21
- 23 And Iesus himselfe began to bee, about thirtie yeeres of age, being as men supposed the sonne of Ioseph, which was the sonne of Eli. 4.25.17.29
- 38 Which was the sonne of Enos, which was the sonne of Seth, which was the sonne of Adam, which was the sonne of God. 2.12 7. & 2.13.3
- 4.17 And there was delivered unto him the booke of the Prophet Elias: and when hee had opened the booke, hee found the place where it is written. 4.19.23
- 18 The spirit of the Lord is upon me because he hath anointed me, that I should preach the Gospell to the poore: hee hath sent mee, that I should heale the broken in heart. 2 15.2. & 3.3.20. & 3.4.3
- 5.13.14 And touched him, saying, I will be thou cleane. And immediately the leprosie departed from him. And hee commanded him that he should tell it to no man: but goe saith hee, and shew thy selfe to the Priest, and offer for thy cleansing, as Moses hath commanded, for a witnesse unto them. 3 4.4
- 34 Can ye make the children of the wedding chamber fast, as long as the bridegroome is with them? 4.12.17
- 6.13 And when it was day, called his Disciples, and of them hee chose twelve, which also he called Apostles. 4.3.5
- 23 Reioyce ye in that day. and bee glad, for behold your reward is great in heaven, &c. 3.18.1
- 24 But woe be to you that be rich, for you have received your consolation. 3.19.9
- 32 Be ye mercifull therefore, as your father also is mercifull. 3.7.6
- 7.29 Then all the people that heard, and the Publicanes justified God, being baptised with the baptisme of Iohn. 3.11.3
- 35 But wisdome is justified of all her children. 3.11.3
- 36 And one of the Pharisees desired him that he would eate with him: and hee went into the Pharisees house, and sate downe at the table. 3.4.37
- 47 Wherefore I say unto thee, many finnes are forgiven her: for shee loved much. To whom a little is forgiven, he doth love a little. 3.4.31
- 8.2 And certaine women, which were healed of euill spirits, and infirmitie, as Marie which was called Magdalen, out of whom went seven devils, 1.14.14.
- 7 And some fell among thornes, and the thornes sprung up with it, and shoaked it. 3.2.10
- 13 But they that are on the stones, are they which when they haue heard, receive the word with joy: but they haue no roots, which for a while beleue but in the time of temptation goe away. 3.2.10
- 15 But that which fell on good ground, are they, which with an honest and good heart heare the word, and keepe it, and bring forth fruit with patience. 4.14.11
- 9.23 If any man will come after me, let him denie himselfe, and take up his crosse daily and follow me. 3.15.8
- 26 For whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, of him shall the sonne of man be ashamed when he shall come in his glory, and in the glory of the Father, and of the holy Angels, 1.14.9
- 55 But Iesus turned about, and rebuked them, and said, ye know not of what spirit ye are. 3.20.15
- 10.1 After these things the Lord appointed other 70. also, and sent them two and two before him, &c. 4.3.4
- 6 And if the sonne of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him: if not, it shall returne to you againe. 3.23.14
- 16 He that heareth you, heareth me: and he that despiseth you despiseth me. 4.3.3. & 4.8.4
- 18 I saw Satan, like lightening, fall downe from heaven. 1.14.18
- 20 Neverthelesse, in this reioyce not, that the spirits are subdued unto you: but rather reioyce because your names are written in heaven. 3.24.9
- 21 The same hour reioyced Iesus in the spirit and said, I confesse unto thee Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and learned, and hast revealed them to babes: even so, father because it so pleased thee. 3.2.34
- 22 All things are given thee of my father: and no man knoweth who the sonne is, but the father: neither who the Father is, save the sonne: and he to whom the son will reveale him. 3.2.1. and 4.18.20
- 23 Blessed are the eyes which see that ye see 2.9.1
- 24 For

24 For I tell you, that many Prophets and Kings have desired to see these things which yee see, and have not seene them, &c. 2.9.
 1 & 2.11.6.

25 Master, what shall I doe, to inherite eternall life? 4.12.13

27 And he answered, and said, thou shalt love thy Lord God, with all thy heart, and with all thy soule, and with all thy strength, and with all thy thought, and thy neighbour as thy selfe. 2.8.11

30 And a certaine man went downe from Ierusalem to Iericho, and fell among theeves. 1.5.19

36 Which now of these three, thinkest thou was neighbour to him that fell among the theeves? 2.8.55

11.2 And he said unto them when yee pray, say, Our Father which art in Heaven. 3.20.6. & 3.20.34

3 Our daily bread give us for this day. 2.5.14

21 When a strong man armed keepeth his place, the things that he possesseth are in peace. 1.14.13. & 1.4.18

22 But when a stronger than he commeth upon him, and overcommeth him, he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoiles. 1.14.18

39 And the Lord said unto him, indeed yee Pharisees make cleane the outside of the cup, and of the Platter, but the inward part is full ofravening and wickednesse. 3.4.36

12.5 Feare him which after hee hath killed, hath power to cast into hell, &c. 1.15.2

10 And whosoever shall speak a word against the soune of man, it shall be forgiven him: but unto him that shall blaspheme the holy Ghost, it shall never be forgiven. 1.13.15 & 3.21.22. & 3.5.7

14 Man, who made me a Iudge, or a divider over you? 4.11.9 & 4.11.11

14.21 Goe out quickly into the places and streetes of the Citie, and bring in hirher the poore and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind. 4.16

15.7 If say unto you, that likewise joy shall bee in heavea for one sinner that converteth more than for ninie and nine iust men, which need no amendment of life. 1.14.7

20 And when hee was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran and fell on his necke and kissed him. 3.28.37

16.2 And he called him, and said unto him how is it that I heare thus of thee? give an account of thy stewardship, for thou maifest be no longer steward. 3.10.5

9 And If say unto you, make you friends with the riches of iniquitie, that when you shall want, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. 3.18.6

15 Yee are they which justifie your selves before men, but God knoweth your heartes, &c. 3.11.3. & 3.12.2

16 The law and the Prophets, endured until Iohn, and since that time the kingdome of God is preached, and every man presseth into it. 2.7.16

22 And it was so, that the begger died, and was carriea by the Angels into Abrahams bosome, &c. 1.14.7. & 1.15.2. & 3.25.6

17.3 If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him: and if he repent, forgive him 3.7.6

4 And the Apostles said unto the Lord, increase our faith. 4.14.7

7 Who is it also of you, that having a servant plowing or feeding cattel, would say unto him go and by, when hee were come from the field, &c. 3.14.15

10 Solikewise yee, when yee have done all these things which are commanded you, say, we are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our dutie to doe. 3.14.14. & 3.15.3.

14 And when hee saw them, hee said unto them, goe shew your selves to the Priest, And it came to passe, that as they went, they were clesed, 3.4.4

29 And when he was demanded of the Pharisees, when the Kingdome of God should come, he answered them and said the kingdome of God commeth not with observation. 2.15.4

18.1 And he spake also a parable unto them to this end, that they ought alwaies to pray, and not to wax faint. 3.20.7

13 But the Publican standing asurre off, would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven, but smote his breast, saying: O God, be mercifull to me a sinner. 3.4.18. & 3.12.7

14 I tell you, this man departed to his house justified, rather than the other: for every man that exalteth himselfe, shall be brought low, and he that humbleth himselfe shall be exalted. 3.4.35. and 3.11.3

42 And Iesus said unto him receive thy sight, thy faith hath saved thee. 4.19.12

10.17 And hee said unto him, well good servant, because thou hast bin faithfull in a very

- little thing, take thou authoritie over ten Cities. 2.3.11. & 3.15.4
- 26 Unto all them that have it shall be given, and from him that hath not even that hee hath shall be taken from him. 2.3.11. & 3.15.4
- 20.27. Then came to him certaine of the Sadduces, which denie that there is any resurrection, &c. 2.10.23. & 3.25.5
- 37 And that the dead shall rise againe even Moses shewed it besides the Busb, when he said, the Lord is the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. 2.10.9
- 38 For he is not the God of the dead, but of them which live. 4.16.3
- 21.15 For I will give you a mouth and wisdom, where-against all your adversaries shall not be able to speake or resist. 4.3.12
- 28 And when these things begin to come to passe, then looke up and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth neere. 3.9.5
- 22.17 And hee tooke the Cup, and gave thanks, and said, take this and part it among you. 4.17.20. & 4.17.43. & 4.18.8
- 19 And he tooke bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave to them, saying, this is my body which is given for you : doe this in the remembrance of mee. 4.3.6. & 4.15.20. & 4.16.30. & 4.17.1.20.37
- 20 Likewise also after supper hee tooke the cup, saying, this cup is the new Testament in my blood, which is shed for you. 2.11.4. & 2.17.4. & 4.17.6.20
- 25 The kings of the Gentiles raigne over them, and they that beare rule over them : are called gracious Lords. 4.11.8.9. & 4.20.7
- 26 But yee shall not be so : but let the greatest among you, be as the least : and the chiefeest as he that serveth. 4.11.8
- 32 But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith faile not, &c. 3.24.6. & 4.7.27.28
- 43 And there appeared an Angel unto him from heaven, comforting him. 1.14.6. & 2.16.12
- 44 And his sweat was like drops of blood, trickling downe to the ground. 2.16.12. & 3.8.9
- 61 Then the Lord turned backe and looked upon Peter : and Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how hee had said unto him, before the Cocke crow, thou shalt denie me thrice. 3.4.35
- 62 And Peter went forth, and wept bitterly. 3.3.4
- 23.42 And he said unto Iesus, Lord remember mee, when thou comest into thy kingdom. 3.24.1. & 4.16.31
- 43 Then Iesus said unto him, verily I say unto thee, to day shalt thou bee with me in Paradise. 3.25.6
- 46 And Iesus cryed with a loud voice, and said, Father into thy hands I commend my spirit, &c. 1.15.2. & 3.25.6
- 24.5. They said unto them why seeke yee him that liveth among the dead ? 1.14.6
- 6 He is not here, but is risen : remember how he spake unto you when hee was yet in Galile. 3.25.3
- 11 But their words seemed unto them a fained thing, neither beleeveth they them. 3.2.4
- 12 Then arose Peter, and ran unto the sepulchre, and looked in, and saw the linnen clothes laid by themselves : and departed wondering in himselfe at that which was come to passe. 3.2.4
- 16 But their eyes were holden, that they could not know him. 4.17.29
- 26 Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory ? 2.17.6 & 3.18.7. & 4.17.32
- 27 And hee began at Moses, and at all the Prophets, and interpreted unto them in all the Scriptures the things that were written of him. 1.9.3. & 3.2.34
- 31 But hee was taken out of their sight. 4.17.29
- 39 Behold mine hands and my feet : for it is my selfe : handle mee and see : for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as yee see mee have. 2.14.2. & 3.25.3 & 4.17.29
- 44 All must be fulfilled which are written of mee in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes. 3.5.8
- 45 Then opened hee their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures. 3.2.34
- 46 Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise againe from the dead the third day. 2.12.4. & 3.3.19
- 47 And that repentance and remission of sinns should bee preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. 2.12.4. & 3.3.1. & 3.3.19
- 49 But tarry yee in the Citie of Ierusalem, until yee bee endued with power from on high. 4.3.12
- 51 And it came to passe, that as hee blessed them, he departed from them, and was carried up into heaven. 4.17.27

JOHN.

- 1.1 In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and that word was God. 1.1.13.6. & 1.13.11. & 1.13.22
- 3 All things were made by it, &c. 1.13.7. 1.13.17.
- 4 In it was life, and the life was the light of men. 1.13.13. & 1.15.4. & 2.2.19. & 2.6.1. & 4.17.8
- 3 And the light shineth in the darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not. 2.2.13
- 9 That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, 2.12.4
- 10 Hee was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. 2.12.4
- 12 But as many as receive him, to them hee gave power to be the finnes of God, even to them that believe in his name. 2.6.1. & 3.1.4. & 3.20.36. & 3.22.10
- 13 Which are borne inoe of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. 2.2.19. & 2.13.2. & 3.1.4
- 14 And the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we saw the glorie thereof, as the glory of the onely begotten sonne of the father, full of grace and tru h. 1.13.11. & 2.12.4. & 2.14.1. & 2.14.8
- 16 And of his fulnesse have all we received, and grace for grace. 2.13.1. & 2.15.5. & 3.11.9. & 3.20.1
- 17 For the law was given by Moses, but Grace and truth came by Iesus Christ, 2.7.16.
- 18 No man hath seene God at any time: the onely begotten sonne, which is in the bosome of the father, hee hath declared him. 1.13.17. & 2.2.20. & 2.9.1. & 4.17.30
- 23 I am the voice of him that cryeth in the wilderness, make straight the way of the Lord, as said the Prophet Elaias. 2.9.5
- 29 Behold the Lambe of God which taketh away the finnes of the world. 2.14.13. & 2.16.5. & 2.17.4. & 3.4.26. & 4.15.7
- 32 So Iohn bare witness saying, I saw the spirit come downe from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. 2.15.5. & 4.19.20
- 33 And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptise with water, hee said unto mee, upon whom thou shalt see the spirit come downe and tarry still on him, that is hee which baptiseth with the holy Ghost. 2.15.5
- 36 Behold the Lambe of God. 2.9.5
- 40 Andrew, Simon Peters brother, was one of the two which had heard it of Iohn, and that followed him. 4.6.5
- 42 And he brought them to Iesus, &c. 4.6.5
- 51 Hereafter shall ye see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the sonne of man. 1.14.12. & 2.9.2
- 2.2 And Iesus was called also, and his disciples into the marriage. 4.13.3.
- 9 Now when the governour of the feast had tasted, of the water that was made wine, &c. 4.23.3
- 15 Then he made a scourge of small cords, and drave them all out of the Temple with the sheepe and oxen, and poured out the changers money, and overthrow the tables. 4.19.23
- 19 Iesus answered and said unto them, deprey this temple, and in three dayes I will raise it up againe. 2.14.4. & 3.25.7
- 21 But hee spake of the Temple of his body. 2.14.4. & 3.25.7
- 23 Now when he was at Ierusalem, at the Passover in the feast, many believed in his name, when they saw the miracles which he did. 4.2.5
- 24 But Iesus did not commit himselfe unto them, because he knew them all. 3.2.12
- 3.3 Verily, Verily, I say unto thee except a man be borne againe, hee cannot see the kingdom of God. 2.3.1. & 4.16.17.
- 5 Except that a man be borne of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. 4.16.25
- 6 That which is borne of the flesh, is flesh: and that which is borne of the spirit, is spirit: 2.1.6. & 2.3.1
- 13 For no man ascendeth up to heaven, but he that hath descended from heaven, even the sonne of man which is in heaven. 2.14.2. & 4.17.30
- 14 And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the sonne of man be lifted up. 2.14.4. & 4.18.20
- 16 For God so loved the world, that he gave his onely begotten sonne, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have life everlasting. 2.12.4. & 2.16.4. & 2.17.1. & 3.14.17. & 3.24.5. & 3.24.7
- 23 And Iohn also baptised in Enon besides Salem, &c. 4.15.6
- 27 Man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven. 2.2.20
- 33 He that hath received his testimony, hath sealed that God is true. 3.2.8

34 For hee whom God hath sent, speaketh the word of God: for God giveth him not the spirit by measure. 2.15.1. & 2.15.5

36 He that beleevech in the Sonne, hath everlasting life: and hee that obeyeth not the Sonne, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. 4.16.31

4.1 Now when the Lord knew, that the Pharisees had heard, that Iesus made and baptised more disciples than Iohn. 4.15.6

14 But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never be more a thirst: but the water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water, springing out into everlasting life. 3.1.3

22 Yee worship that which yee know not: we worship that which we know: for salvation is of the Iewes. 1.5.12. & 1.6.4. & 2.6.1

23 But the houre commeth, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth, &c. 3.20.30 & 4.10.14

24 God is a spirit, &c. 1.13.24

25 I know well that Messias shall come, which is called Christ: when he is come he will tell us all things. 2.15.1. & 4.8.7

25 Behold, I say unto you, lift up your eyes, and looke on the regions, for they are white already unto harvest. 4.16.31

42 And they said unto the woman, how wee beleeve not because of thy saying: for wee have heard him our selves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, that Saviour of the world. 3.25

53 Then the Father knew that it was the same houe in the which Iesus had said unto him, thy sonne liveth. And he beleeved and all his household. 3.25

5.8 Iesus said unto him, rise: take up thy bed, and walke. 4.19.29

17 My father worketh hitherto, and I work. 1.13.7. & 1.13.12. & 1.16.4. & 2.14.2

38 Therefore the Iewes sought the more to kill him: not onely because hee had broken the Sabbath: but said also that God was his father, and made himselfe equall with God. 1.13.12.

21 For like as the father raiseth up the dead, and quickneth them, so the sonne quickneth whom he will. 2.14.3

22 For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgement to the Sonne. 2.14.3. & 2.16.18

23 Because that all men should honour the Sonne, as they honour the Father: he that honoureth not the Sonne, the same honou-

reth not the Father, which hath sent him. 2.6.2. & 2.14.3

34 He that heareth my Word, and beleeveth in him that sent me, hath everlasting life; and shall not come into condemnation, but hath passed from death to life. 2.9.3. & 3.15.6 & 3.25.1. & 3.24.5. & 4.16.26

25 The houre shall come, and now is, when the dead shall heare the voice of the Sonne of God, and they that heare it, shall live. 2.5.19. & 2.12.4. & 3.14.5

26 For as the Father hath life in himselfe, so likewise hath he given to the Son, to have life in himselfe. 4.17.9

28 Marvell not at this, for the houre shall come in the which all that are in the graves shall heare his voyce. 3.25.4. & 3.25.7

29 And they shall come forth that have done good unto the resurrection of life: but they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of condemnation. 3.17.1

32 There is another that beareth witness of me, &c. 1.13.17

35 Hee was a burning, and a shining candle: and yee would for a season have joyced in his light. 2.9.5

36 For the worke which the Father hath given me to finish, the same worke that I doe, beare witness of mee, that the Father sent me. 1.13.13

44 How can you beleeve, which receive honour one of another, and seeke not the honour that cometh of God alone? 3.11.9

46 For had ye beleeved Moses, ye would have beleeved me: for he wrote of me. 2.9.1

6.27 Labour not for the meat which perisheth; but for the meat that endureth unto everlasting life, which the Sonne of man shall give unto you, &c. 3.18.1. & 4.14.25

29 This is the worke of God, that yee beleeve in him whom he hath sent. 3.19.10

35 I am the bread of life: hee that cometh to mee shall not hunger, and hee that beleeveth in me shall never thirst. 3.24.5. & 4.17.4

37 All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me, I cast not away. 3.22.7. & 3.24.6

38 For I came downe from heaven, not to doe mine owne will, but his will which sent me. 2.14.2

39 And this is the Fathers will, which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up againe at the last day. 3.22.7. & 3.22.10. & 3.24.6. & 3.24.7. & 3.25.8

40 And this is the will of him that sent me, that every man which seeth the Sonne, and beleeveth in him, should have everlasting life, &c. 3.20.10. & 3.24.6

44 No man can come unto me, except the Father which sent me draw him, and I will raise him at the last day. 2.2.30. & 2.5.5. & 3.2.34. & 3.22.7. & 3.24.1.

45 It is written in the Prophets, and they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father commeth unto mee. 1.3.10. & 2.2.20. & 2.3.7. & 2.5.5. & 3.2.34. & 3.24.1. & 3.24.14

46 Not that any man hath seene the Father, save he which is of God, hee hath seene the Father. 3.2.34. & 3.22.10. & 3.24.1

47 He that beleeveth in me hath everlasting life. 1.13.13

48 I am the bread of life. 3.11.9. & 4.17.4 & 4.15.8.

49 Your Fathers did eat Manna in the wilderness, and are dead. 2.10.6.

50 This is the bread which commeth downe from heaven, that hee which eateth of it, should not die. 2.10.6 & 4.17.34

51 I am the living bread which came downe from heaven: if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. 3.11.8. & 4.17.5. & 4.17.14.

53 Then Iesus said unto them, verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Sonne of man, and drinke his blood, ye have no life in you. 3.11.9. & 4.17.6

54 Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. 3.11.9. & 4.17.34

55 For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drinke indeed. 2.17.5. & 4.17.8

56 Hee that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him. 4.17.33

57 As the living Father hath sent me, so live I by the father, and he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. 2.17.5

65 Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto mee except it bee given unto him of my Father. 3.23.13

70 Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devill. 3.22.7. & 3.24.9

716 My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. 2.8.26 & 48.4

37 Now in the last and great day of the feast, Iesus stood, and cried saying: if any man thirst, let him come unto mee and drinke. 2.16.14. & 3.1.2. & 3.1.3. & 4.19.6

38 For the holy Ghost was not yet given because that Iesus was not yet glorified. 4.17.2 & 8.12. Then spake Iesus againe unto them, saying, I am the light of the world, he that followeth mee, shall not walke in darknesse, but shall have the light of life. 2.15.3. & 3.2.1. & 3.11.12. & 4.19.23

16 For I am not alone, but I and the Father, &c. 1.13.17.

29 But he that sent me, is true: and the things that I have heard of him, those speake I to the world. 2.8.26

30 As he spake these things, many beleaved in him. 3.2.5

31 Then said Iesus to the Jewes which beleved in him: if yee continue in my Word, ye are verily my disciples. 3.2.12

34 Verily, verily, I say unto you, that whosoever committeth sinne, is the servant of sinne. 2.2.27

44 Yee are of your father the devill, &c. 1.14.15. he hath bene a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him: when he speaketh a lie, then speaketh he of his owne: for he is a liar, and the Father thereof. 1.14.16. & 1.14.18. & 1.14.19

47 Hee that is of God, heareth Gods words, yee therefore heare them not because yee are not of God. 4.2.4

50 And I seeke not mine owne praise, but there is one that seeketh it and judgeth. 3.14.2

56 Your father Abraham rejoyced to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad. 2.9.1 & 2.10.4

58 Iesus said unto them, verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I am. 2.14.2

9.3 Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the workes of God should be shewed on him. 1.17.1.

5 As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world. 2.14.3

6 As soone as hee had thus spoken hee spar on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and annointed the eyes of the blinde with the clay. 4.19.18

7 And said unto him, goe wash thee in the poole of Siloam (which is by interpretation, sent) hee went his way therefore, and washed, and came againe seeing. 4.19.19.

24 And said unto him: give glory unto God, &c. 2.8.24

31 Now wee know that God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God,

- God, and doth his will him heareth hee, 3 20.7. & 3.20.10
- 10.3 To him the porter openeth, and the sheepe heare his voyce, and hee calleth his owne sheepe by name, and leadeth them out.
5.24.6
- 4 And when hee hath sent forth his owne sheepe hee goeth before them, and the sheepe follow him: for they know his voyce. 3.22
10. & 4.2.4
- 5 And they will not follow a stranger, but they see from him: for they know not the voyce of strangers. 3.22.10
- 7 Then said Iesus unto them againe, verily, verily I say unto you, I am the doore of the sheep, 4.19.13
- 9 I am the doore: by me if any man enter in,
he shall be saved, and shall go in, and go out,
and find pasture. 2.14.3
- 11 I am the good shepheard, the good shep-heard giveth his life for his sheepe. 2.14.3 & 4.19.14
- 14 I am the good shepheard, and know mine
&c. 4.2.4
- 15 As the father knoweth me, so know I the father, and I lay downe my life for my sheep. 2.16.5
- 16 Other sheepe I have also, which are not of this fold: them also, must I bring &c. 3.24.6
- 17 Therefore doth my father love me, because I lay downe my life that I might take it againe. 2.12.4
- 18 No man taketh it from me, but I lay it downe of my selfe: I have power to lay it downe, and I have power to take it againe:
this commandement have I received of my father. 2.12.4. & 2.16.5
- 26 But yee beleve not, for yee are not of my sheepe, &c. 3.22.10
- 27 My sheepe heare my voyce, and I know them, &c. 2.24.6
- 28 And I give unto them eternall life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. 3.15.5. & 3.21.1 & 3.22.7. & 3.24.6
- 29 My Father which gave them me is greater then all, and none is able to take them out of my hand. 3.22.10
- 30 I and my father are one. 2.8.26
- 34 Is it not written in your law, I said, yee are gods? 4.26.13.
- 35 If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God was given, and the Scripture cannot be broken. 4.20.4
- 37 If I doe not the workes of the Father be-leeve ye not. 1.13.13
- 11.25 I am the resurrection and the life: he that beleeveth in me, though he were dead yet shall live. 1.13.11. & 2.12.4. & 3 25.9. & 4.16.17
- 41 Father I thanke thee, because thou hast heard me. 1.13.13
- 43 As he had spoken these things, hee cried with a lowd voyce: Lazarus come forth.
4.19.29
- 44 Then he that was dead, came forth bound hand and foot with bands, and his face was bound with a napkin. Iesus said unto them loose him, and let him goe. 3.4.5
- 47 Then gathered the high priests, and the pharisees a councell, and said: what shall we doe? &c. 4.9.7
- 12.27 Father, save me from this houre: but therefore came I unto this houre. 2.12.4 & 2.16.12
- 28 Father glorifie thy name, &c. 2.12.4
- 31 Now is the judgement of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out. 1.
14.13
- 32 And I, if I were lift up from the earth, will draw all mine unto me. 3.25.6
- 39 Therefore could they not belevee because that Elias saith againe. 3.24.13
- 41 These things said Elias, when he saw his glory and spake of him. 1.13.11. & 1.
13.23.
- 43 For they loved the praise of men, more than the praise of God. 3.11.9
- 49 For I have not spoken of my selfe, &c. 4 8.13.
- 13.4 He riseth from supper, and laicth aside his upper garment, and tooke a towel, and gird himselfe. 4.19.23.
- 15 For I have given you an example that ye should do, even as I have done to you. 3.16.
- 18 I speake not of you all: I know him whom I have chosen, &c. 3.22.7. & 3.24.9
- 34 A new commandment gave I unto you, that ye love one another as I have loved you, that even so yee love one another. 3 16.2
- 14.1 Yee beleve in God, beleve also in me.
1.13.13. & 2.6.4
- 5 Thomas said unto him: Lord we know not whether thou goest how can we then know the way? 4.17.23
- 6 I am the way, and the truth and the life.
&c. 1.13.17. & 2.6.1. & 3.20.21. & 4
16.17.
8. And Philip said unto him: Lord shew us the father, and it sufficeth us. 4.17.13
- 10 Bellevest thou not, that I am in the Father,

- ther, and the Father in me? the words which I spake unto you, I spake not of my selfe, but the Father that dwelleth in mee, he doth the workes. 2.14.2. & 4.8.23
- 11 Beleeve me that I am in the Father, and the Father in mee: at the least beleeve mee for the very workes sake. 2.13.13
- 13 And whatsoever yee aske in my name, that will I doe, that the Father may be glorified in the Sonne.
- 16 And I will pray the Father, and hee shall give you another comforter, &c. 1.13.17 & 4.8.11
- 17 Even the spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him, but yee know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. 3.1.4. & 3.2.39
- 25 But the comforter, which is the holy Ghost whom the Father will send in my name, hee shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, which I have told you. 2.2.1. & 3.1.4. & 4.8.8. & 4.8.13
- 28 For my Father is greater than I. 1.13.26
- 30 Hereafter will I not speake many things, unto you: for the prince of this world cometh, and he hath nought in me. 1.14.18
- 15.1 I am the true Vine, and my father is a husbandman: every branch that beareth not fruit in me, he taketh away: and every one that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more. 2.3.9. & 2.14.3. & 4.19.34
- 3 Now are yee cleane through the word, which I have spoken unto you. 3.6.3
- 5 I am the Vine, ye are the branches; he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without mee, &c. 2.2.8. & 2.3.9. & 2.5.4. & 4.19.34
- 10 If yee shall keepe my commandments yee shall abide in my love, even as I have kept my fathers commandments, and abide in his love. 3.16.2
- 16 But I have chosen you, and ordained you, that yee goe and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit remaine, &c. 3.22.3. & 3.22.8 & 4.1.6
- 19 If yee were of the world, the world would love his owne; but because yee are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. 3.22.7
- 26 Even the spirit of truth, which proceedeth of the father, &c. 1.13.17
- 16.2 They shall excommunicate you, &c. 4.2.6
- 7 It is expedient for you, that I goe away &c. 1.13.26. and 2.16.14. and 3.25.3. and 4.17.26
- 11 Of judgement, because the prince of this world is judged. 1.14.13
- 12 I have yet many things to say unto you, but you cannot beare them away. 3.21.2 & 4.8.14
- 13 When hee is come which is the spirit of truth, he will lead you into all truth: for he shall not speake of himselfe, but whatsoever he shall heare, that he shall speake, &c. 1.9.1. & 3.2.34. & 4.8.8. & 4.8.13
- 20 Verily, verily, I say unto you, that yee shall weep and lament, and the world shall rejoyce: and yee shall sorrow, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy. 3.8.9
- 24 Hitherto have you asked nothing in my name: aske and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full. 3.20.17
- 26 In that day shall ye aske in my name, &c. 3.20.18
- 28 I am come out from my father, and came into the world: againe, I leave the world, and goe to my father. 4.17.26
- 17.3 And this is life eternall, that they know thee to bee the onely very God, and whom thou hast sent Iesus Christe. 1.13.26. & 2.6.1. & 3.2.3
- 5 And now glorifie thou me, thou father with thine owne selfe, with the glory which I had with thee, before the world was. 1.13.8. & 1.13.22. & 2.14.2
- 6 I have declared thy name unto the man which thou gavest mee out of the world: thine they were, and thou gavest them me. 3.24.1. & 3.24.6
- 9 I pray for them: I pray not for the world but for them which thou hast given me, for they are thine. 3.22.7
- 12 While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name: those that thou gavest me, I kept, and none of them is lost, but the child of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled. 3.22.7. & 3.24.6 & 7.9
- 15 I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world: but that thou keepe them from evill. 2.5.11
- 19 And for their sakes sanctifie I my selfe, that they also may be sanctified through thy truth. 2.13.14. & 2.15.6. & 2.17.6 & 3.11.12
- 21 That they all may be one, as thou father art in mee, and I in thee, even that they may bee also one in us: that the world may beleeve.

believe, that thou hast sent me. 3:2.24
 18.4 Then Iesus knowing all things that should come unto him: went forth, and said unto them; whom seeke ye? 2:16.5
 36 Iesus answered: my kingdome is not of this world, if my kingdome were, of this world, my servants would surely fight, that I should not be delivered to the Iewes: but now is not my kingdome from hence. 2:15.
 37 Every one that is of truth, heareth my voice. 4:2.4
 38 Pilate said unto him, what is truth? and when he had said that, he went out againe unto the Iewes, and said unto them, I find in him no cause at all. 2:16.5
 19.30 Now when Iesus had received of the vineger, he said, it is finished, &c. 4:28.
 34 But one of the soldiers, with a spear, pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water. 4:14.22
 36 Not a bone of him shall be broken. I. 16.9
 20.8 Then went in also the other disciple, which came first to the sepulchre, and hee saw it and beleaved. 3:2.4
 17 Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my father, &c. 2:12.2. & 4:17.29
 19 The same day then at night, which was the first day of the weeke, and when the doores were shut where the disciples were assembled for feare of the Iewes, came Iesus and stood in the midst. &c. 4:17.29
 22 And when he had said that, hee breathed on them, and said unto them; receive the holy Ghost. 4:19.7.29
 23 Whosoever sinnes yeeremit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sinnes yeeretaine, they are retained, 3:4.10. & 4:1.22. & 4:2.10. & 4:6.3. & 4:6.4. & 4:8.4. & 4:11.1. & 4:12.4
 28 Thou art my Lord, and my God. 1:13.11
 31 But these things are written, that ye might beleve, that Iesus is Christ the son of God, and that in beleeving, ye might have life, &c. 3:2.6
 21.15 Simon sonne of Iona, lovest thou me more than these? he said unto him, yea Lord, thou knowest that I love thee: he said unto him, feed my lambs. 4:6.3. & 4:11.1. & 19.28
 8 When thou wast young, thou girdest thy selfe, and walkedst whether thou wouldest, but when thou shalt be olde, &c. 3.8:10

ACTES.

1.3 TO whom also he presented himselfe alive after that he had suffered by many infallible tokens being scene of them by the space of forrie dayes, and speaking of those things which appertained to the kingdome of God, 2:16.14. & 3:25.3. & 4:17.17
 5 For Iohn indeed: baptised with water, but ye shall bee baptised with the holy Ghost within these few dayes. 4:15.18
 8 But ye shall receive power of the holy Ghost, when he shall come on you; and ye shall bee witnesses unto mee both in Ierusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth. 4:3.12. & 4:19.28
 9 And when hee had spoken these things while they beheld, hee was taken up, for a cloud tooke him out of their sight. 2:16.14 & 3:25.1. & 4:17.17. & 4:17.27
 10 Behold two women stood by them in white appaell. 1:14.6
 11 This Iesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come, as ye have scene him goo into heaven. 1:14.6. & 2:16.17. & 4:17.24.27
 15 And in those dayes Peter stood up in the middes of the disciples, and said (now the number of names that were in one place, were about an hundred and twentie). 4:3.15
 23 And they presented two, Joseph called Barfabas, whose surname was Iustus, and Matthias. 4:3.13. & 4:3.14
 26 Then they gave forth their lots, and the lot fell on Matthias, and he was by a common consent counted with the eleven Apostles. 4:3.15
 23 And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like fire, and it sate upon each of them. 4:15.8
 4 And they were all filled with the holy Ghost, and began to speake with their tongues. 4:19.8
 21 Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved. 1:13.20
 23 Him, I say, have ye taken by the hands of the wicked, being delivered by the determinate counsell and foreknowledge of God, and have crucified and slaine. 1:18.1. & 3.22.6
 24 Whom God hath raised up, and loosed the sorrowes of death, because it was impossible.

- possible, that he should be holden of us, 2.26
 11. & 2.16.12
- 33 Since then that hee by the right hand of God hath bene exalted, and hath received of his father the promise of the holy Ghost, hee hath shed forth this which yee now see and heare. 2.16.15
- 37 Men and brethren, what shall wee doe?
 3.3.4. & 4.16.23
- 38 Amend your lives and bee baptised every one of you in the name of Iesus Christ, for the remission of finnes, and yee shall receive the gift of the holy Ghost. 4.15.7. & 4.16 23
- 39 For the promise is made unto you, and your children, and to all that are as farre off even as many as the Lord our God shall cal.
 4.16.15
- 41 Then they that gladly received his worde were baptised, and the same day, there were added to the Church about three thousand soules. 4.15.7. & 4.17.6
- 42 And they continued in the Apostles doctrine, and fellowship, and breaking of bread and prayers. 4.17.5. & 4.17.35. & 4.17 44
- 3.6 Then said Peter: Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I to thee, in the name of Iesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walke. 1.13.13. & 4.19.18
- 15 And yee killed the Lord of life whom God hath raised from the dead, whereof we are witnessse. 2.17.1
- 18 But these things which God before had showed by the mouth of all his Prophets, that Christ should suffer, &c. 1.18.1
- 19 Amend your lives therefore, and turne that your finnes may be put away, &c. 3.3.
 20
- 21 Whom the heaven must containe untill the time that all things be restored, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his Prophets, since the world began. 2.16.15 & 4.17.29
- 25 Yee are the children of the Prophets, and of the covenant, which God hath made unto our Fathers, &c. 2.10.23. & 4.16.15
- 26 First unto you God hath raised up his Sonne Iesus, and him he hath sent to blesse you, in turning every one of you from your iniquitie. 3.3.20
- 4.12 Neither is there salvation in any other;
 for among men there is given none other name under heaven, whereby we must bee saved. 2.16.1
- 28 To doe whatsoever thine hand and thy counsell had determined before to bee done
 1.18.1. & 1.18.3
- 32 And the multitude of them that beleev-ed, were of one heart, and of one soule: &c.
 4.1.3
- 5.4 Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto
 God. 1.13.15.
- 16 There came also a multitude out of the Cities round about unto Ierusalem, bringing sicke folke, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits, who were all healed.
 4.19.18
- 29 We ought rather to obey God than men.
 3.3.19
- 31 Him hath God lift up with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of finnes.
 33.19
- 41 So they departed from the councill, rejoycing that they were counted worthy to suffer rebuke for his name. 3.8.7
- 6.1 And in those dayes, as the number of the Discipulos grew, there arose a murmuring of the Grecians towards the Hebrewes, because that their widowes were neglected in the daylie ministring. 3.2.6
- 2 Then the twelve called the multitude of the Discipulos together, and said: It is not meet that we should leave the word of God to serve the tables. 3.2.6. & 4.3.15. & 4.
 11.9
- 3 Wherefore brethren, looke you out among you seven men of honest report, &c. 4.3.9
- 6 And they prayed and laid their hands on them. 4.3.16
- 7 And the word of God increased, and the number of the Discipulos was multiplied in Ierusalem greatly, &c. 3.2.6
- 10 But they were not able to resist the wis-dome, and the Spirit by the which he spake.
 3.3.22
- 7.5 And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not the breadth of a foot: &c. 2.10.
 1.3
- 28 Wilt thou kill me, as thou diddest the Egyptian yesterday? 4.20.10
- 44 Our fathers had the tabernacle of wis-

The Table.

- 55 But hee being full of the holy Ghost, looked stedfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Iesus standing at the right hand of God. 3.25.3. & 4.17.17. & 4.17.29
- 56 And said: behold, I see the heavens open and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God. 2.16.15. & 4.17.29
- 59 And they stoned Steven, who called on God, and said, Lord Iesus receive, &c. 1.13.1. & 1.15.2. & 3.25.6
- 8.13 Then Simon himselfe beleueed also, and was baptised, and continued with Philip, and wondered when he saw the signes, &c. 3.2.10
- 14 They sent unto them Peter and Iohn, 4.6.7. & 4.15.8
- 15 which when they were come downe prayed for them that they might receive the holy Ghost. 4.16.6
- 16 For as yet hee was come downe on none of them, but they were baptised onely in the name of the Lord Iesu. 4.15.6. & 4.19.31
- 17 Then laid they their handes on them, and they received the holy Ghost. 4.15.8 & 4.19.31
- 18 And when Simon saw, that through laying on of the Apostles handes, the holy Ghost was given, hee offered them money. 3.2.10
- 22 Repent therefore of this thy wickednesse, and pray God that if it bee possible, the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee 4.1.26
- 27 And he arose, and went on, and behold, a certaine Eunuch of Ethiopia, Candaces Queene of the Ethiopians chiefe Governour, who had the rule of all her treasure, and came to Ierusalem to worship. 3.2.32
- 31 And hee said how can I, except I had a guide? &c. 3.2.32
- 37 And Philip said unto him, if thou believest with all thy heart, thou maist, &c. 4.14.8. & 4.16.23
- 38 And they went downe both of them into the water, both Philip and the Eunuch, and hee baptised him. 4.16. 22. & 4.16.31
- 9.1 And Saul yet breathing out threatnings, and slaughter against the Disciples of the Lord, &c. 3.2.6
- 3 Now as hee journeyed it came to passe that as hee was come neere to Damascus, suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven. 4.17.17
- 4 And he fell on the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me. 3.25.3. & 4.17.29
- 6 Arise and goe into the cittie, and it shall be told thee what thou shalt doe. 4.3.3
- 10 And there was a certaine Disciple at Damascus named Ananias, and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias, and he said, behold, I am here Lord. 3.2.6
- 13 Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy Saints at Ierusalem. 1.13.13
- 14 Moreover here hee hath authoritie of the high Priests, to bind all that call upon thy name. 1.13.13
- 15 Hee is a chosen vessel unto mee, &c. 4.3.5
- 17 Then Ananias went his way, and entered into the house, and put his hands on him, and said, brother Saul, the Lord hath sent mee (even Iesus that appeared unto thee in the way, as thou camest) that thou mightest receive thy sight, &c. 4.19.10
- 19 So was Saul certaine dayes with the Disciples which were at Damascus. 3.2.6
- 25 Then the Disciple tooke him by night, and put him thorow the wall, and let him downe in a basket. 3.2.6
- 36 There was also at Joppa, a certaine woman a Disciple named Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas, shee was full of good works and almes which shee did 3.2.6
- 38 Now so far as much as Lidda was neere to Joppa, and the Disciples had heard that Peter was there, they sent unto him two men, &c. 3.2.6
- 40 But Peter put them all forth, and kneeled downe and praised, &c. 4.19.2
- 10.2 A devout man, and one that feared God with all his household, which gave much almes to the people, &c. 3.24.10
- 3 He saw in a vision evidently (about the ninth houre, of the day) an Angell of God comming unto him, &c. 4.3.3
- 25 And it came to passe as Peter came in, that Cornelius met him, and fell downe at his feet, and worshipped him. 1.10.3
- 31 And said, Cornelius thy prayer is heard and thy almes are had in remembrance in the sight of God. 3.2.32
- 34 Of a truth I perceive, that God is no acceptor of persons. 3.17.4. & 3.2.3.10
- 42 And he commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is hee that,

- 44 While Peter yet spake these words, the holy Ghost fell on them which heard the word. 4.16.31.
- 48 So he commanded them to be baptised in the name of the Lord, &c. 4.15.15.
- 11.3 Then wentest in to men uncircumcised, and hast eaten with them. 4.6.7.
- 4 Then Peter began, and expounded the thing in order to them. 4.6.7.
- 15 Then I remembered the word of the Lord, how hee said, John baptised with water, but you shall be baptised with the holy Ghost. 4.15.18.
- 18 When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles, granted repentance unto life. 3.3.21.
- 26 Inasmuch, that the Disciples were first called Christians in Antiochia. 3.2.6. & 4.16.31.
- 29 Then the Disciples every man according to his abilitie, purposed to send succour, &c. 3.2.6.
- 12.15 Then said they, It is his Angel. 1.14.7
- 13.2 Separate me Barnabas, and Saul, for the worke wherunto I have called them. 4.3.14.
- 3 Then fasted they and prayed, and laid their hands on them, and let them goe. 4.3.15. & 4.12.14. & 4.12.16.
- 36 Howbeit, David after hee had served his time, by the counsell of God hee slept, and was laid with his father, and saw corruption. 3.20.23.

ROMANES.

- 1 PAUL, a servant of Iesus Christ, called to be an Apostle, put a part to preach the Gospell of God. 2.14.6. & 4.3.10.
- 2 Which he had promised before by his Prophets in the holy Scriptures. 2.10.3.
- 3 Concerning his Sonne Iesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David, according to the flesh. 2.13.1.3. & 2.14.6.

- 4 And declared mightily to be the Sonne of God, touching the spirit of sanctification by the resurrection from the dead. 2.16.13. & 4.19.22.
- 5 By whom we have received grace and apostleship, that obedience might be given unto the faith in his name among all the Gentiles. 3.2.6. & 3.2.8. & 3.2.29.
- 7 Grace be with you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Iesus Christ. 1.13.13.
- 9 For God is my witness, whom I serve in my Spirit in the Gospell of his Sonne, that without ceasing I make mention of you. 2.8.27.
- 16 For I am not ashamed of the Gospell of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Grecian. 2.9.4. & 2.10.3. & 3.2.29. & 4.1.5.
- 17 For by it the righteousness of God is revealed, from faith to faith: as it is written, the just shall live by faith. 3.2.29.32. & 3.11.19.
- 19 For as much as this, which may be knowne of God, is manifest in them: for God hath shewed it unto them. 1.3.1.13.
- 21 Because that when they knew God, they glorified him not as a God, neither were thankfull, but became vaine in their imaginations, &c. 1.3.12.
- 22 When they professed themselves to be wise, they became fooles. 1.4.1.
- 28 For as they regarded not to know God, even so God delivered them up into a reprobate minde, to doe those things which are not convenient. 1.18.2.
- 2.6 Who will reward every man according to his works. 2.16.3. & 3.18.1.
- 11 For there is no respect of persons with God. 3.23.10.
- 12 For as many as have sinned without the Law, shall perish also without the Law, and as many as have sinned in the Law, shall be judged by the Law. 2.27.2.
- 13 For the bearers of the Law are not righteous before God: but the doers of the Law shall be justified. 2.13.15. & 3.17.8.
- 14 For when the Gentiles which have not the Law, doe by nature the things contained in the Law, they having not the Law, &c. 2.27.22.
- 15 Which shew the effect of the Law written in their hearts, their consciences also bearing them witness, and thoughts accusing one another, &c. 2.13.19.15. & 2.14.3.

25 If thou be a transgressor of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. 4.
14.24
3.4. Yes, let God be true, and every man a liar. &c. 4.15.17
9 What then? are wee more excellent? no, in no wise: for we have already proved, that all, both Jewes and Gentiles are under sin.
3.4.6
10 As it is written: there is none righteous, no not one. 2.1.9. & 2.3.2. & 2.5.3.
12 There is none that doth good, no not one.
2.3.3.
15 Their feete are swift to shed blond, &c. 2.
3.3.
19 Now wee know, that whatsoever the law saith, it saith it to them that be under the law, that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world be culpable before God. 2.7.8.
& 2.10.3. & 3.4.6.
20 Therefore by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law commeth the knowledge of sinne. 2. 5.6. & 2.7.7. & 3.11.19.
21 But now is the righteousness of God made manifest without the law, having witness of the law, and of the Prophets. 2.9.4. & 2.
10.3. & 3.11.18,19.
24 And are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Iesus. 2.
5.3. & 2.16.5. & 2.17.5. & 3.4.30. & 3.
11.4.19. & 3.15.6. & 3.20.45.
25 Whom God hath set forth to be a reconciliation through faith in his blond, to declar his righteousness, by the forgiveness of the sinner that are passed through the patience of God. 4.15.3
26 To shew at this time his righteousness, that he might be just, and a justifier of him which is of the faith of Iesus. 3.11.12. &
3.13.1. & 3.13.2. & 3.14.17.
27 Where is then thy rejoicing? It is excluded. By what law? of works? nay? but by the law of faith. 3.11.13. & 3.13.1.
4.2 For if Abraham were justified by works, hee hath wherewith to rejoyce, but not with
God. 3.11.13. & 3.11.18.
3 Abraham beleeveth God, and it was counted to him for righteousness. 3.17.8,10.
4 Now to him that worketh, the wages is not counted by favour, but by debt. 3.11.20.
5 But to him that worketh not, but beleeveth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. 3.11.3,6.
6 Even as David declareth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying. 2.17.5. & 3.11.4,20,22.

7 Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiv-ven, whose finnes are covered. 3.11.11.
10 How was it then imputed? when he was circumcised, or uncircumcised? &c. 4.
16.3.
11 After he received the signe of circumcision, as the seale of the righteousness of the faith which he had, when he was uncircumcised,
&c. 4.14.5,21,23. & 4.16.20.
12 And the father of circumcision, not unto them only which are of the circumcision,
&c. 4.16.12.
13 For the promise that hee should be the heire of the world, was not given to Abraham, or to his seede, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. 3.
14.11.
14 For if they which are of the law, be belee-ved, faith is made void, and the promise is made of none effect. 3.11.11. & 3.13.3.
15 For the law causeth wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression. 2.7.7. & 3.11.19.
17 As it is written: I have made thee a father of many nations, even before God whom he beleeveth, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. 2.10.11. & 3.2.15. & 3.14.5.
11 And being full certified that what he had promised he was able also to performe. 3.2.
31.
25 Who was delivered to death for our finnes, and is risen againe for our justification. 2.
16.5. & 2.16.13. & 2.17.5.
5. 1 Then being justified by faith, wee have peace toward God through our Lord Iesus
Christ. 3.2.16. & 3.13.5.
3 Knowing that tribulation bringeth forth patience, &c. 3.8.3.
5 And hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the holy Ghost, which is given unto us. 3.1.
2. & 3.2.12.
8 But God setteth out his love towards us, shew-ing that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. 2.12.4. & 2.16.4. & 3.4.25.
9 Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. 2.16.5.
10 For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Sonne, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life. 2.16.2.45. & 2.17.6. & 3.
11.21. & 3.14.4.

The Table.

12. As by one man sinne entered into the world, and death by sinne, and so death went over all men, forasmuch as all men have sinned. 2.1.6.8. & 2.13.4.
15. But yet the gift is not so, as is the offence: for if through the offence of one, many bee dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which by one man Iesus Christ, &c. 3.5.4.
16. Neither is the gift so, as that which entered in by one that sinned: for the fault came of one offence to condemnation, but the gift is of many offences to justification. 2.17.3.
19. For as by one mans disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many also be made righteous. 2.1.4. & 2.16.5. & 2.17.3. & 3.11.4.9.12. 23. & 4.14.21.
20. Moreover, the law entered therein, that the offence should abound: nevertheless, where sinne abounded, there grace abounded much more. 2.5.6. & 2.7.7.
- 6.3. Know ye not, that all we which have been baptised into Iesus Christ have been baptised into his death? 4.15.5.
4. Wee are buried then with him in baptisme into his death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glorie of the Father, so we also should walke in newnesse of life. 2.8.31. & 2.16.7.13. & 3.3.5. & 4.15.16.21. & 4.19.8.
6. Knowing this; that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sinne might be destroyed, that henceforth wee should not serve sinne. 3.3.9.11.
12. Let no sinne therefore reigne in your mortall body, that ye should obey in the lusts thereof. 3.3.13.
14. For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace. 3.19.6. & 4.15.12.
18. Being then made free from sinne, ye are made the servants of righteousness. 3.6.3. & 3.16.2.
19. I speake after the manner of men, because of the infirmities of your flesh, for as ye have given your members servants to uncleannesse, and so iniquitie, to commit iniquitie, &c. 3.24.10. & 3.25.8.
23. For the wages of sinne is death: but the gift of God is eternall life through Iesus Christ our Lord. 2.8.58.59. & 3.14.28. & 3.14.21.
- 7.1. Know ye not brethren, for I speake to them that know the law, that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? 4.13.12.
7. What shall we say then? is the law sinne? God forbid. Nay I knew not sinne, but by the law: &c. 2.5.6. & 2.7.6.
12. Wherefore the law is holie, and the commandment is holie, and just, and good. 2.9.4.
14. For wee know that the law is spiritual, &c. 2.8.6.
15. For I allow not that which I doe: for what I would that doe I doe not, but what I hate, that doe I. 2.2.27.
18. For I know, that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me, &c. 2.1.9.
19. For I do not the good thing which I would, but the evill, which I would not, that doe I. 2.2.27. & 33.11.
20. Now if I doe that I would not, it is no more I that doe it, but the sinne that dwelleth in me. 2.2.27.
23. But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my minde, and leading mee captive, into the law of sinne, which is in my members. 3.3.14.
24. O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? 3.9.4. & 3.1.11. & 3.1.12.
- 8.1. Now then there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Iesus, which walke not after the flesh, but after the spirit. 3.4.28. & 4.15.12.
3. For that that was impossible to be law, in as much as it was weak because of the flesh, God sending his owne Sonne, in the similitude of sinfull flesh, and for sinne, condemned sinne in the flesh. 2.7.5. & 2.12.4. & 2.13.1.4. & 2.16.6. & 3.2.32. & 3.4.27. & 3.11.23.
6. For the wisdom of the flesh is death: but the wisdom of the spirit, is life and peace. 2.3.1.
7. Because the wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. 2.19. & 3.3.8. & 3.20.24.
9. Now ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, because the spirit of God dwelleth in you: but if any man hath not the spirit of Christ, the same is not his. 3.1.2. & 3.2.39. & 4.17.12.
10. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sinne: but the spirit is life for righteousness sake. 2.1.6. & 2.1.3. & 3.2.24. & 3.25.3. & 4.17.12.

- 11 But if the spirit of him that raised up Ie-su from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortall bodies, because that his spirit dwelleth in you. 1.13.18. & 3.1.2.
& 3.2.39. & 3.25.3.8. & 4.17.12.
- 14 For as many as are led by the spirit of God,
they are the sonnes of God. 3.2.39.
- 15 For ye have not received the spirit of bondage, to feare againe: but ye have received the spirit of adoption, & c. 2.11.9. & 2.14.
5. & 3.1.3. & 3.2.11. & 3.13.5. & 3.
20.1. & 3.24.1. & 4.19.22.
- 16 The same spirit beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God. 3.
2.39.
- 17 If we be children, we are also heires, even the heires of God, and heires annexed with Christ, &c. 2.12.2.
- 19 For the fervent desire of the creature,
waiteth when the sonnes of God shall be revealed. 3.9.5. & 3.25.2.
- 20 Because the creature is subject to vanitie not of it owne will, &c. 2.1.5.
- 22 For we know that every creature groweth with us also, and travaileth in paine together unto this present. 2.1.5. & 3.25.2.
- 23 And not onely the creature, but wee also which have the first fruits of the spirit, even we doe sigh in our selves, waiting for the adoption, even the redemption of our body. 3.18.3.3. & 3.25.11.
- 24 For we are saved by hope, but hope that is seene, & no hope, &c. 2.9.3.
- 25 But if we hope for that we see not, we doe with patience abide for it. 3.2.41.42. & 3.25.1.
- 25 Likewise the spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what to pray as we ought, &c. 3.20.5.
- 27 But he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the meaning of the spirit, for he maketh request for the Saints, &c. 3.20.5,34.
- 29 For those which hee knew before, hee also predestinate to be made like to the image of his Sonne, that hee might be the first borne among many brethren. 2.13.2. & 3.1.1, 3. & 3.8.1. & 3.15.8. & 3.18.7. & 3.
24.1.
- 30 Moreover, whom hee did predestinate, them also hee called: And whom hee called, them also hee justified: And whom hee justifified, &c. 2.5.2. & 3.14.21. & 3.18.4. & 3.24.6.
- 32 Who spared not his owne Sonne, but gave him for us all to death, how shall hee not with him give us all things also? 2.14.7. & 2.
17.6. & 3.24.5.
- 33 Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods chosen? it is God that justifieth. 3.
11.36.11.
- 34 Who shall condemne? it is Christ that is dead, yete or rather which is risen againe;
who is also at the right hand of God, & c.
2.16.13. & 2.16.16. & 2.16.18. & 3.
20.20
- 35 Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or perill, or sword? 3.13.5. & 3.2.28.
- 36 For thy sake are wee killed all the day long,
we are counted as sheepe for the slaughter.
3.9.6. & 3.25.3. & 3.14.19.
- 38 For I am persecuted, that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor thing: to come. 3.2.16. & 3.24.0. & 3.15.8. & 3.24.6.
- 39 Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall bee able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ lesus our Lord. 3.2.16.28,40.
- 9.3 For I would wish my selfe to bee separated from Christ, for my brethren that are my kinsmen according to the flesh. 3.20.35.
- 5 Of whom are the Fathers, and of whom concerning the flesh Christ came, who is God over all, blessed for ever, Amen. 1.13.
11. & 2.13.13. & 2.14.6.
- 6 For all they are not Israelites, which are of Israel. 3.22.4. & 4.2.3.
- 7 Neither are they all children, because they are the seed of Abraham: But in Isaac shall thy seed be called. 3.21.7. & 4.16.14.
- 8 That is, they which are the children of the flesh, are not the children of Gods, but the children of the promise are accounted for the seed. 3.21.7.
- 11 For ere the children were borne, and when they had done neither good nor evil, that the purpose of God might remain according to the election, not by worke, but by him that calleth. 3.23.4.
- 12 It was said unto her, the elder shall serve the younger. 3.2.25.
- 13 As it is written, I have loved Jacob, and have hated Esau. 3.21.7. & 3.22.11.
- 14 What shall we say then? is there unright-eousnesse with God? God forbid. 3.22.8.
- 15 I will have mercy on him to whom I will shew mercy: and I will have compassion on him on whom I will have compassion. 3.22.6

The Table.

16 So open it is not in him that willerb, nor in him that runneth, but in God that sheweth mercy. 2.5.4.17. and 3.24.1.
 17 For this same purpose have I stirred thee up: but I might shew my power in thee, &c. 3.24.14.
 18 Therefore he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hat doeth. 1.18. 2. & 3.12.11.
 20 But, O man, who art thou that pleadst against God? &c. 3.23.1.4. & 3.24.16.
 21 Hath not the potter power of the clay to make of the same lump, &c. 3.17.5.
 22 What and if God would, to shew his wrath and to make his power knowne, suffer with long patience the vessels of wrath? &c. 1. 14.18. & 3.23.1.
 24 Even us, whom hee hath called, nor of the Jewes onely, but also of the Gentiles. 13.24. 16
 32 For they have stumbled at the stumbling stone. 1.13.23.
 33 Behold, I lay in Sion, a stumbling stone, and a rocke of offence. 1.10.11. And whosoever beleeveth on him, shall not bee confounded. 1.13.13
 34 For they being ignorant of the righteousness of God and going about to establish their owne righteousness, &c. 3.11.13.
 4 For Christ is the end of the law, for righteousness unto every one that bele. veth. 1. 6.2. & 2.6.4. & 2.7.2. & 3.2.6. & 4.8. 13.
 5 That the man that doth these things shall live thereby. 3.11.14. 17. & 3.17.3.
 6 But the righteousness of Faith speaketh on this wise: Say not in thine heart, who shall ascend into heaven: &c. 1.17.2.
 7 Or, who shall descend into the deepe? that is, to bring Christ againe from the dead. 1.17.2.
 8 This is the word of faith which we preach 2.3.12. & 3.2.39.30. and 4.14.14.
 9 For if thou shalt confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, and shalt beleev in &c. 3. 11.17.
 10 For with the heart man beleeveth unto righteousness, and with the mouth man confesseth to salvation. 3.2.2.8.
 11 Whosoever beleeveth in him, shall not bee ashamed. 1.13.13
 14 But how shall they call on him, in whom they have not beleevd, &c. 3.20.1.11.
 17 Then Faith is by hearing, and hearing &c. 3.20. 27. & 4.1.5. & 4.6.31. & 4.8.9. & 4.16.19.

11.2 God hath not cast away his people which he knew before, &c. 3.2.26.
 4 But what saith the answer of God to him? I have reserved unto my selfe seven thousand men, which have not bowed the knee to Bial. 4.1.2.
 5 Even so thou at this present time, is there a remnant, through the election of grace. 3.21.1.
 6 And if it be of grace, it is no more of works, or else were grace no more grace, &c. 3.14. 5
 16 For if the first fruits bee holy, so is the whole lump, and if the roote be holy, so are the branches. 4.16.15.
 17 And though some of the branches be broken off, and thou being a wilde Olive tree, wast graft in for them, and wast partaker of the roote and fatnesse of the Olive tree. 3.1.1.
 20 Wel, though unbelofe they are broken off, and thou standest by faith, be not high minded but feare. 2.3.22. & 3.24.0.
 26 And so all Israel shall bee saved, as it is written: The deliverer shall come out of Sion, and shall turne away the ungodlinesse from Jacob. 3.3.21.
 29 For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. 4.16.14.
 32 For God hath shut up all in unbelofe, that he might have mercy on all. 2.7.8. & 3.23 11. & 3.24.16.
 33 O the deepnesse of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God: how unsearchable are his iugments and his waies past finding out? 1.17.2. & 3.23.5
 34 For who hath knowne the minde of the Lord? or who was his counsellour? &c. 3. 2.34 & 4.18.19. & 4.19.2.
 35 Or who hath given unto him first, and hee shall be recompenced? 3.24.5. & 3.22.3. & 3.23.11.
 36 For of him, and through him, and for him are all things, &c. 2.8.13.
 11.1 I beseech you therefore brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye give up your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God which is your reasonable serving of God 3.7.1. & 3.16.3. & 4.18.16.
 2 And fashion not your selves like unto this world, but bee changed by the renewing of your minde, that ye may prove what is the will of God, good and acceptable, and perfect. 2.1.9. & 4.16.4.
 3 As God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith, 4.13.3. & 4.16.4. & 4.17.32.
 4 Fo

- 4 For as wee have many members in one bodie, and all members have not one office.
3.16.2
- 6 Whether we have prophetic, let us prophetic according to the proportion of our faith.
4.16.4. & 4.17.32.
- 7 Or an office, let us wait on the office, or see that teacheth, on teaching. 4.3.8.
- 8 Or see that exhorteth, on exhortation; he that distributeth, let him doe it with simplicites, he that rubbith, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerefulnessse. 4.3.8.
9. & 4.11.1. & 4.20.4.
- 10 Bee afflicted to love one another with brotherly love: in giving honour, goe one before another. 3.7.4.
- 14 Blesse them that persecute you: blesse, I say, and curse not. 4.20.20.
- 19 Dearely beloved, avenge not your selves,
but give place unto wrath: for it is written: Vengeance is mine, I will repay saith
the Lord. 4.20.19.
- 21 Bee not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with goodnesse. 4.20.20.
- 13.1 Let every soule be subject unto the higher powers: for there is no power but of God: and the powers that bee, are ordained of God. 3.19.15. & 4.10.3.5. & 4.
20.4.7.23.
- 4 For hee is the minister of God for thy wealthe: but if thou doe evil, feare: for hee beareth not the sword for nought for he is the minister of God to take vengeance on him that doth evil. 4.20.10. & 4.20.17.
& 4.20.19.
- 5 Wherefore ye must be subject, not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.
3.19.15. & 4.10.3.4.29.22.
- 6 For, for this cause ye pay also tribute: for they are Gods ministers, applying themselves for the same thing. 4.20.13.
- 8 Owe nothing to any man, but to love one another: for hee that loveth another, hath fulfilled the law. 2.8.53.
- 8 For this, thou shalt not commit adulterie, thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not steale, thou shalt not beare false witnessse, thou shalt not covet: and if there be any other commandement: it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. 2.8.57.
- 14 But put ye on the Lord Iesu Christ, and take no thoughts for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts of it. 3.1.1. & 3.10.3.
- 14.1 Him that is weak in the faith, receive unto you, but not for controversies of di-

- spirations sake. 3.19.11.
- 5 This man esteemeth one day above another day, and another man counteth every day alike: let every man be fully persuaded in his minde. 2.8.33.
- 10 For we shall all appeare before the judgement seat of Christ. 1.13.11. & 3.5.8.
- 11 For it is written I live, saith the Lord:
And every knee shall bow to me, and all tongues shall confesse unto God. 1.13.11.
23. & 3.25.7.
- 13 Let us not therefore judge one another anny more; but use our judgements rather in this, that no man put an occasion to fall, or a stumbling block before his brother. 3.19.11
- 14 I know and am persuaded through the Lord Iesu, that there is nothing uncleane of it selfe; but unto him that judgeth any thing to be uncleane, to him it is uncleane.
3.19.8.
- 17 For the kingdome of God is not meat and drinke: but righteousnesse and peace, and joy in the holy Ghost. 2.15.4.
- 22 Hast thou faith? have it with thy selfe before God; blessed is hee that condemneth not himselfe in that thing which hee allow-
eth. 3.19.8.
- 23 For he that doth it is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: and whatsoever is not of faith is sinne. 3.5.10.
& 3.15.6. & 4.13.17. & 4.15.22.
- 15.1 Wee which are strong, ought to beare
the infirmities of the weak and not to please our selves. 3.19.11.
- 5 Now the God of patience and consolation, grant that you bee like minded one towards another, according to Christ Iesus.
4.2.5.
- 6 That yee wish one mind, and with one mouthe may praise God, even the Father of our Lord Iesu Christ. 3.20.29.31.
- 8 Now I say that Iesu Christ was a Minister of the circumcision, for the truth of God; to confirm: the promises made unto the Fathers. 3.2.22. & 4.16.15.
- 12 There shall be a roare of Iesse, and he that shall rise to reigne over the Gentiles, in him shall the Gentiles trust. 1.13.13.
- 19 So that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have caused to abound the Gospell of Christ. 4.3.4.
- 20 Yea, so I enforced my selfe to preach the Gospell, not where Christ was named, &c.
4.3.4.
- 25 But now goe I to Jerusalem, to minister unto the Saints. 4.6.14.

- 30 Also brethren, I beseech you for our Lord Jesus his sake, and for the love of the Spirit that ye would strive with me by prayers to God for me. 3.20.20
- 16.3 Greete Priscilla and Aquila, my fellow helpers in Christ Jesus. 4.6.14.
- 7 Salute Andronicus and Iunia my cousins and fellow prisoners which are notable among the Apostles; and were in Christ before me. 4.3.5.
- 20 The God of peace shall tread Satan under your feet shortly. 1.14.18. & 3.15.5
- 25 By the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began 2.9.4
- 26 But now is opened, and published among all nations by the Scriptures of the Prophets
 &c. 2.9.4

I. CORINTHIANS.

- 1.1 Paul called to bee an Apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God and our brother Sothhenes. 4.3.10.
- 3 Grace be with you and peace from God the Father; and from the Lord Jesus Christ,
 1.13.13
- 9 God is faithfull by whom yee are called unto the fellowship of his Sonne Iesus Christ,
 &c. 3.5.5
- 11 For it hath beene declared unto mee my brethren, of you by them that are of the house of Cloe; that there are contentions among
 you. 4.1.14.
- 22 Now this I say, that every one of you saith
 I am Pauls, &c. 4.13.14
- 13 Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? Either were ye baptised into the name of Paul? 2.5.2. & 4.15.13
- 20 Where is the wise? where is the Scribe?
 where is the disputer of this world? &c.
 2.2.20.
- 21 For seeing the world by wisdom knew not God in the wisdom of God, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preaching to save them that beleee. 2.6.1
- 23 But wee preach Christ crucified, unto the Jewes, even a stumbling blocke, unto the Grecians foolishnesse. 3.24.14.
- 26 For brethren, you see your calling how that not many wise men after the flesh, not manic mighty, not many noble are called. 3 23.10
- 30 But yee are of him in Christ Iesus who of God is made unto us wisdom and righte-ousnesse, and sanctification, &c. 2.15.2. &
 2.16.19. & 3.3.19. & 3.4.30. & 3.11.6
 12. & 3.14.27. & 15.5. & 3.16.1.

- 2.2 For I esteeme not to know any thing amongst you, save Iesus Christ, and him crucified. 1.13.13. & 2.12.4.5. & 2.15.2. & 3.2.1
- 4 Neither stood my word and my preaching in the emising speech of mans wisdom, but in plaine evidence of the spirit. 1.8.1. & 4.
 1.6. & 4.14.11
- 5 That our faith should not be in the wisdom of man; but in the power of God. 3.2.
 35
- 8 Which none of the Princes of this world hath knowne, for had they knowne. &c. 1.5 12. & 2.14.2. & 4.17.30
- 10 But God hath revealed them unto us by the spirit: for the spirit searcheth all things;
 yea the deepe things of God. 1.13.14. & 3.2.34
- 11 For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him, even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the spirit of God. 3.2.34
- 12 Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are given to us of God. 3.2.39. & 4.8.11
- 13 Comparing things spiritual with spirituall things. 4.16.31
- 14 But the naturall man perceiveth not the things of the spirit of God, for they are fool-ishesse unto him; neither can hee know them, because they are spiritually discerned.
 2.2.20. & 3.2.34
- 16 For who hath knowne the minde of the Lord, that he might instruct him? but wee have the minde of Christ. 1.13.14. & 3.13.
 4
- 3.2 I gave you milke to drinke, and not meat, for yee were not able to bære it, neither yet
 now are yee able. 3.19.13.
- 3 For whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are yee not carnall and walke as men? 2.5.4. & 4.1.14
- 4 For when one saith, I am Pauls, another
 I am Apollos, are ye not carnall? 4.4.
 2. & 4.13.14
- 6 I have planted, Apollo watered: but God gaue the increase. 4.14.11.
- 7 So then neither is hee that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth but God that giveth the increase. 2.5.4.33.14. & 4.1.6.
- 8 And every man shall receive his wages,
 according to his labour. 3.16.3. & 3.18.
 1.
- 9 For wee together are Gods labourers; yee

- are Gods husbandry, and Gods building. 2.5.16. & 4.1.6
- 11 For other foundation can no man lay, than what which is laid, which is Iesus Christ. 3.15.5. & 4.6.6.
- 12 And if any man build on this foundation, gold, silver, or precious stones, timber, hay, or stubble. 3.5.9.
- 13 Every mans worke shall bee made manifest, for the day shall declare it because it shall be revealed by the fire, &c. 3.5.9.
- 14 If any mans worke that he hath built upon, abide, he shall receive wages. 3.5.9.
- 15 If any mans worke burne, hee shall loose, but he shall be safe himselfe, neverthelesse, yet as it were by the fire. 3.5.9.
- 16 Know ye not that ye are the temples of God and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? 1.3.15. & 3.6.3. & 3.16.2. & 3.25.7. & 4.3.1.
- 19 For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, for it is written, He catcheth the wise in their owne craftinesse. 2.5.7. & 2.2.20.
- 21 Therefore let no man rejoyce in man, for all things are yours. 4.19.1.
- 4.1 Let a man so thinke of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and disposers of the secrets of God. 4.3.6. & 4.8.1.
- 4 For I know nothing by my selfe, yet am I not thereby iustificed, but he that iudgeth me is the Lord. 3.12.2. & 2.17.14.
- 5 Therefore iudge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who will lighten things that are hid in darknesse, and make the counsels of the heart manifest, &c. 3.2.4.
- 7 For wha separatest thee? and what hast thou, that thou hast not received? if thou hast received it, why reioycest thou as though thou hast not received it? 2.5.2. & 3.7.4. & 3.24.12.
- 1.5 For in Christ Iesus I have begotten you through the Gospel. 4.1.6.
- 5.1 It is heard continually that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not once named among the Gentiles, &c. 4.1.14.
- 2 And ye are puffed up and have not rather sorrowed, that he which hath done this deed, might be put from among you. 4.1.15.
- 4 When ye are gathered together, and my Spirit, in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ, this say I as I say, by the power of the Lord Iesus Christ. 4.11.5. & 4.12.4.
- 7 Be delivered unto Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that the Spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Iesus. 4.12.5.6.
- 6 Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? 4.12.5.
- 7 For Christ our paschever is sacrificed for us. 4.12.13. & 4.18.3.
- 11 If any that is called a brother, be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such a one eate not. 4.1.15. & 4.12.5.
- 12 For what have I to doe, to iudge them also, which are without? doe ye not iudge them that are within? 4.11.5.
- 6.6 But a brother goeth to law with a brother and that is under the infidels. 4.20.21.
- 7 Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye goe to law, one with another. 4.1.14.
- 9 Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdoms of God, &c. 3.4.21. & 3.24.10.
- 10 Be not deceived, neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor wantons, nor buggers, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor railers, nor extortioners shall inherit the kingdome of God. 3.4.21.
- 11 But ye are iustificed in the name of the Lord Iesus, and by the spirit of our God. 1.13.14. & 3.1.1. & 3.6.3. & 3.14.6. & 3.24.10.
- 13 Meates are ordained for the belly, and the belly for the meates: but God shall destroy both it and them, &c. 3.25.8. & 4.13.9. & 4.19.7.
- 15 Know ye not, that your bodies are members of Christ, &c. 3.6.3. & 3.25.6. & 4.17.9.
- 19 Know ye not, that your body is the temple of the holy Ghost which is in you, whom you have of God? 1.13.15. & 3.3.9. & 3.25.7. & 3.25.9. & 4.3.1.
- 20 For ye are bought for a price: therefore glorifye God in your body, and in your spirit for they are Gods. 2.17.5. & 3.25.7.
- 7.2 Nevertheless, it avoid fornication, let every man love his wife and let every woman love her owne husband. 2.20.43.
- 3 Let the husband give unto the wife due benevolence, and likewise also the wife unto the husband. 4.12.16.
- 5 Desist not one another, except it bee with consents for a time, that ye may give your selves to fasting, and prayer: and againe come together that Satan tempt you not for your incontineny. 14.12.16.

The Table.

- 9 I would that all men were even as I my selfe am: but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that. 2.8.4.2.
- 9 But if they cannot abstaine, let them marrie: for it is better to marry than to burne. 2.8.4.3. & 4.13.17.
- 14 For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, & the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband, else were your children uncleane: but now are they holy. 2.1.7. & 4.16.6. & 4.16.15. & 4.16.31.
- 19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing: but the keeping of the commandments of God. 4.14.24.
- 21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but yet if thou mayest be free, use it rather. 4.20.1.
- 23 Te are bought with a price: bee not servants of men. 4.20.32.
- 31 And they that use this world, as though they used it not: for the fashion of this world goeth away. 3.10.1.4. & 4.19.7.
- 34 The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that shee may bee holie both in body and in spirit, &c. 3.10.1.4. & 4.19.7.
- 35 And this I speake for your owne commodities, not to tangle you in a snare. 4.10.2.
- 8.1 And as touching things sacrificed unto idols, mee know that wee have knowledge, &c. 4.10.22.
- 4 For though there bee that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, &c. 1.13.11
- 6 Yet unto us there is but one God, which is the father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord Iesus Christ, &c. 1.13.11. & 2.3.6. & 2.14.3. & 2.15.5.
- 9 But take heede least by any meanes this power of yours bee an occasion of falling to them that are weake. 3.19.11. & 4.10.22.
- 9.1 Am I not an Apostle? am I not free? have I not seene Iesus Christ our Lord? are yee not my worke in the Lord? 3.14.15. & 4.1.14. & 17.17. & 4.17.29.
- 2 For ye are the scale of my Apostleship in the Lord. 4.1.6.
- 5 Or have we not power to leade about a wife being a sister, as well as the rest of the Apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas. 4.12.25.
- 12 Neverthelesse we have not used this power, but suffer all things, that we should not hinder the Gospell of Christ. 3.4.15.
- 16 And woe is unto mee, if I preach not the Gospell. 4.5.6.
- 19 For though I bee free from all men, yet have I made my selfe servant to all men, that I might win the more. 3.19.12.
- 20 And unto the Jewes I became as a Jew, that I might win the Jewes, &c. 4.19.29.
- 22 To the weake I become as weake, that I may win the weake: I am made all things to all men, that I might by all meanes save some. 3.19.12.
- 10.1 Moreover, brethren I would not that ye should be ignorant, that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the Sea. 2.10.5.
- 2 And were all baptised unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea. 4.15.9.
- 3 And did all eat the same spirituall meat. 4.14.23. & 4.18.20.
- 4 And did all drinke the same spirituall drinke, for they dranke of the spirituall rocke that followed them: and the rocke was Christ. 1.13.10. & 2.9.1. & 4.14.26. & 17.15.21.22.
- 5 But with many of them God was not pleased, for they were overthrowne in the wilderness. 4.14.24.
- 11 And all these things came unto them for examples, and were written to admonish us, upon whom the ends of the world are come. 2.10.5. & 3.2.22.
- 12 Wherefore let him that thinketh hee standeth, take heed lest he fall. 3.2.40. & 3.24.6.
- 13 There hath no temptation taken you but such as appertaineth to man, &c. 3.20.40.
- 16 The cup of blessing which wee blesse, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? the bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? 4.17.10. & 4.17.15. & 4.17.22. & 4.17.38. & 4.18.8.
- 17 For wee that are many are one bread and one body, because wee all are partakers of one bread. 4.17.14.
- 23 All things are lawfull for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawfull for me, but all things edifie not. 3.19.12.
- 25 Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, eat ye, and aske no question for conscience sake. 3.19.11.
28. But if any man say unto you, this is sacrificed unto idols, eat it not because of him that shewed it, and for thy conscience. &c. 3.19.6. & 4.10.4.
- 29 And the conscience I say not thine but of that other, &c. 3.19.11. & 4.10.4.
- 31 Whether therefore yee eat or drinke,

The Table.

- or whatsoever ye doe, doe all to the glory of God 3.20.44.
- 32 Give none offence, neither to the Iewes nor to the Grecians, nor to the Church of God.
3.19.11.
- 11.4 Every man praying or prophesying having any thing on his head, dishonoureth his head. 4.19.26.
- 5 But every woman that prayeth or proph-etieth bare headed, dishonoureth her head.
4.10.29.
- 7 For a man ought not to cover his head: for-asmuch as he is the image and glory of God:
but the woman is the glory of the man. 1.
15.4.
- 16 But if any man lust to be contentious, we have no such custome, neither the Churches of God. 4.10.31.
- 20 When yee come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lords Supper.
4.18.12.
- 22 Have yee not houses to eat and drinke in?
despise ye the Church of God? &c. 4.10.29.
- 23 For I have received of the Lord that which I also delivered unto you, &c. 4.17.
35.50.
- 24 And when he had given it unto them, he brake it, and said, take eat, this is my body, which is broken for you: this doe you in remembrance of me. 4.17.1. & 4.17.20.
- 25 After the same manner also he tooke the cup, when he had supped, saying, this is the new Testament in my blood, &c. 4.17.37.
- 26 For as often as ye shall eat this bread and drinke this cup, yee shew the Lords death until he come. 4.16.30. & 4.17.20.
- 28 Let a man therefore examine himselfe, and so let him eat of this bread, and drinke of this cup. 4.1.15. & 4.16.30. & 4.17.40.
- 29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh his owne damna-tion, because hee discerneth not the Lords body. 4.1.15. & 4.16.30. & 4.17.33.
34.40.
- 31 For if wee would judge our selves wee should not be judged. 3.3.18.
- 32 But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, because we should not be condemned with the world. 3.4.33. & 3.8.6.
- 12.3 Wherefore I declare unto you, that no man speaking by the spirit of God, calleth Iesus execrable, &c. 2.2.20.
- 6 And there are diversities of operations, but God is the same, which worketh all in
all. 2.3.6.9.
- 8 For to one is given by the spirit, the word of wisdom, and to another the word of knowledge by the same spirit. 4.3.11.
- 10 And to another diversities of tongues, and to another the interpretation of tongues. 1.
13.14. & 3.29.
- 11 And all these things worketh even, the selfe same spirit, distributing to every man severally as he will. 1.13.14. & 4.13.3.
- 12 For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of the body which is one, though they be many, yet are but one body: even so is Christ. 1.13.16.
& 3.7.5. & 3.16.2. & 4.17.22.
- 13 For by one spirit are wee all baptised into one body, whether we are Iewes or Gracians, &c. 4.24.7. & 4.15.15. and 4.16.
23.
- 25 Lest there should bee any division in the body; but that the members should have the same care one of another. 3.20.20.
- 28 And God hath ordained some in the church, as first Apostles, secondly prophetes, thirdly, teachers, then them that doe miracles, after that the gift of healing, helpers,
&c. 4.3.8. & 4.11.1. & 4.20.4.
- 31 But desire you the best gifts, and I will yet shew you a more excellent way. 3.2.9.
- 13.1. Though I speake with tongues of men and Angels, and have not love, I am as sounding brasse, or as a tinkling Cymball.
2.5.4.
- 2 If I had all faith, so that I could remove mountaines, and had not love, I were nothing. 3.18.8.
- 3 And though I feed the poore with all my goods, and though I give my body that I be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me
nothing. 4.13.13.
- 4 Love suffereth long, it is humble, love envieth not, love doth not boast it selfe, it is not puffed up. 3.7.4.5.6.
- 9 For we know in part, and wee prophesie in part. 3.18.20.
- 10 But when that which is perfect, is come, then that which is in part, shall bee abolished. 3.2.13.
- 12 For now we see through a glasse darkly, but then shall we see face to face, &c. 3.2.
11. & 4.18.10.
- 13 And now abideth faith, hope and love, even these three: but the chiefest of these is love. 3.18.8.
- 14.15 What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, but I will pray with the understanding also, &c. 3.20.5. & 3.20.32.
- 16 Else, when thou blessest with the spirit, how how shall bee that occupieth the same of the unlearned, say Amen at thy giving of thanks, &c. 3.20.33

29 Let the Prophets speake two or three, and let the other iudge. 4.8.9. and 4.9.13

30 And if any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace.
4.1.12

34 Let your women keepe silence in the Chur-cher, for it is not permitted unto them to speake, &c. 4.10.29

40 Let all things be done honestly and by order. 2.8.32. and 3.20.29. and 4.3.10.
and 4.10.27.30

15.6 After that he was seene of more than five hundred brethren at once, &c. 2.25.3

10 But I laboured more abundantly than they all, yet not I, but the grace of God which is in me. 2.3.11. and 4.1.6

12 Now, if it be preached, that Christ is risen from the dead, how say some among you, that there is no resurrection of the dead?
3.25.7. and 4.1.14

13 For if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen. 3.25.3

14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching in vaine, and your faith is also in vaine. 3.25.3

16 For if the dead be not raised, then is Christ not raised. 2.13.2

17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vaine, &c. 2.13.2. and 2.16.13

19 If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable. 3.9.6.
and 3.18.4

20 But now is Christ risen from the dead, and was made the first fruites of them that sleep. 2.16.13

21 For sith by man came death, by man came also the Resurrection of the dead. 2.1.6

22 For, as in Adam all men die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. 4.16.17

25 For he must reigne till he hath put all his enemies under his feet. 2.16.16

28 And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Sonne also himselfe be subiect unto him, &c. 1.13.26. and 2.8.
30. and 2.14.3. and 2.15.5. and 3.20.
42. and 3.25.12

36 Thou foole, that which thou sowest is not quickned except it die. 3.25.4

39 All flesh is not the same flesh, but there is one flesh of men, &c. 3.25.8

41 There is another glory of the Sonne, another glory of the Moone, another glory of the Starres: for one Starre differeth from another Starre in glory. 1.4.19.34

45 The first Man Adam was made a living Soule: and the last Adam was made a quickning Spirit. 1.15.4. and 3.1.2

46 Howbeit that was not first made which is spirituall, but that which is naturall, and afterward that which is spirituall. 4.6.31

47 The first man is of the earth, earthen: the second man is the Lord from heaven. 2.1.27.
7. and 2.13.2. and 2.13.4. and 4.17.25

50 Flesh and blood cannot inherite the Kingdome of God, &c. 4.16.17

51 Behold, I shew you a secret thing, we shall not all sleepe, but we shall all be changed. 2.
16.17. and 3.25.8

52 In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, as the last trumpet: for the trumpet shall blow, and the dead shall be raised up incorruptible, and we shall be changed. 2.16.17

53 For this corruption must put on incorrup-tion, &c. 3.25.7

54 So when this corruptible hath put on incorruptible, and this mortall hath put on immortality, &c. 3.25.10

16. 2 Every first day of the weeke, let every one of you put aside by himselfe, and lay up as God hath prospered him, &c. 2.8.33

7 For I will not see you now in my passage:
but I trust to abide a while with you, if the Lord permitt. 1.17.18

II. CORINTHIANS.

1. 2. GRace be with you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Iesus Christ. 1.13.13

3 The Father of mercy, and the God of all comforts. 3.20.37

6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation which is wrought in the induring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is your consolation and salvation. 3.5.4

12 For our rejoycing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly purpense, and not in fleshly wise-dome, &c. 3.2.41. and 3.17.14

19 For the Sonne of God Iesus Christ who was preached among you by us, &c. 4.
17.50

20 For all the promises of God in him are yea, and are in him Amen, &c. 2.9.2. and 3.2
32. and 3.20.17. and 4.14.20

22 Who hath also sealed us, and hath given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts. 1.7.4
and 3.1.3. and 3.2.36. and 3.24.1

The Table.

23 Now, I call God for a record unto my Soule, that to spare you, I came not as yet to Corinthus. 2.8.24. and 2.8.27

24 Not that wee have dominion over your Faith, but that wee are helpers of your joy, &c. 4.8.9

25 It is sufficient unto the same man that be was rebuked of many. 3.4.13

7 So that now contrariwise, yee ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest the same should be swallowed up with over-much heavinesse. 4.1.29. and 4.12.8

8 Wherefore, I pray you, that you would confirm your love towards him. 4.12.9

16 To the one wee are the savour of death, unto death: and to the other the savour of life unto life, &c. 2.5.5

3 In that yee are manifest to be the Epistle of Christ, ministered by us, and written not with yoke, &c. 2.8.57

5 Not that wee are sufficient of our selves to thinke any thing, as of our selves, &c. 2.2.
15.27. and 2.3.6

6 Who also hath made us able Ministers of the new Testament, not of the letter, but of the Spirit: for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life. 1.9.3. & 2.7.2. and 3.
1.4. and 4.1.6. and 4.14.11

7 If then the ministracion of death written with letters, and engraven in stones was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not behold the face, &c. 2.7.7

8 How shall not the ministracion of the spirit be more glorious? 1.9.3

9 For if the ministry of condemnation was glorious, much more doth the ministration of Righteousnesse exceede in glory. 4.
3.3

14 Therefore their mindes are hardened:
for untill this day remaineth the same covering unaken away in the reading of the old Testament, which vaile in Christ is put away. 2.10.23

15 But even, unto this day when Moses read, the vaile is laid over their hearts. 2.
10.23

17 Now the Lord is the Spirit, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. 2.2.8

18 But we all behold as in a mirror, the glory of the Lord with open face, and are changed into the same image, &c. 1.15.4. and 1.
15.5. and 3.2.20. and 3.3.9

4.4 In whom the god of this world hath blinded the mindes, that is, of the Infidells, that the light of the glorious Gospell of Christ, which is the image of God, &c. 1.14.13

and 1.14.18. and 1.18.2. and 2.4.1

6 For God that commanded the light, to shine out of the darknesse, it be which hath shined in our hearts, &c. 2.9.1. and 3.2.1
and 4.1.5. and 4.3.3

7 But wee have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of that power might be of God, and not of us. 4.1.5. and 4.3.1

8 Wee are afflicted on every side, yet are wee not in distresse: in poverty, but not overcome of poverty. 3.8.9. and 3.15.8

9 Wee are persecuted, but not forsaken: cast downe, but we perish not. 3.15.8

10 Every where we beare about in our body, the dying of the Lord Iesus, that the life of Iesu also might be made manifest in our mortall flesh. 3.15.5. and 3.15.8. and 3.
18.7. and 3.25.3. and 3.25.7

13 And because we have the same spirit of faith, according as it is written, I beleevved, and therefore have I spoken, &c. 3.2.35

5.1 For we know, that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be destroyed, wee have a building given of God, &c. 3.25.6

2 For therefore wee sigh, desiring to be clothed with our house, which is from Heaven. 3.9.5

4 Because wee would not be unclothed, but would be clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. 1.15.2. and 3.9.5

5 Who also hath given unto us the earnest of the spirit. 2.9.3. and 3.2.36

6 Therefore we are always bold, though wee know, that while we are at home in this body, we are absent from the Lord. 1.15.2. &
3.2.14. and 3.9.4. & 3.25.1. & 3.25.6

7 For we walke by Faith, and not by sight. 2.
2.14

8 Nevertheless, wee are bold, and love rather to remove out of the body, and to dwell with the Lord. 1.15.2

10 For we must all appeare before the sudgement seat of Christ, &c. 1.13.11. and 1.
15.1. and 3.18.1. and 3.25.7

18 And all things are of God, which hath reconciled us unto himselfe by Iesu Christ, &c. 3.2.29. and 3.5.5. and 3.11.4. and 4.6.3.

19 For God was in Christ, and reconciled the world to himselfe, not imputing their sinnes unto them, &c. 2.12.4. and 2.17.2. and
3.2.32. and 3.4.25. and 3.11.22. and 3.
14.11. and 4.1.2.

20 Now then are wee Embassadors for Christ:

The Table.

Christ: as though God did beseech you through us, &c. 3.4.27. and 4.1.22. and 4.3.1

21 For hee hath made him to be sinne for us, which knew no sinne, that wee should be made the righteousnesse of God in him. 2.16.5. and 2.16.6. & 2.17.2. and 3.5.2. and 3.11.11. and 3.11.22. and 3.11.23

6.8 By honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report, &c. 3.8.8

16 For yee are the Temple of the living God, &c. 1.13.15. and 3.6.3. and 3.16.2

7.1 Seeing then that we have these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse our selves from all filthinesse of the flesh and the spirit, &c. 1.15.2. and 2.5.11. and 2.9.3. and 3.16.2. and 3.25.7

10 For godly sorrow causeth repentance unto salvation not to be repented off: but the worldly sorrow causeth death, 3.3.7. and 3.4.2

11 For behold, this thing, that yee have bene godly sorry, what great care it hath wrought in you, &c. 3.3.15

8.11 Now therefore performe to doe it also, that as there was a readinesse to will, even so yee may performe it of that which yee have. 3.5.8

16 And thank ye unto God, which hath put in the heart of Titus the same care for you. 2.5.8

17 Because hee accepted the exhortation, &c. 2.5.8

9.6 That hee which soweth sparingly, shall reape also sparingly, and he that soweth liberally, shall reape also liberally. 3.18.6

7 As every man wisheth in his heart, so let him give, not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerefull giver. 3.16.3

12 For the ministracion of this service, not onely supplicth the necessity of the Saints, &c. 3.7.5

10.4 For the weapons of our warfare are not carnall, but mighty through God, to cast, &c. 4.8.9. and 4.11.5. and 4.11.10

6 And having ready the vengeance against all disobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled. 4.6.3

8 For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, &c. 4.8.1

11.14 And no marvel: for Satan himselfe is transformed into an Angel of light. 1.9.2. and 4.12.12

12.2 I know a man in Christ above foueteen years agone (whether he were in the body,

I cannot tell, God knoweth) which was taken up into the third heaven. 1.9.1. and 1.14.4. and 4.3.3

4 How that hee was taken up into Paradise, and heard words which cannot be spoken, which are not possible for man to utter. 1.14.4

7 And lest I should be exalted out of measure, though the abundance of revelations, there was given unto mee a pricke in the flesh, the messenger of Satan, &c. 1.14.18. and 3.3.14. and 4.17.34

8 For this thing I besought the Lord thence, that it might depart from mee. 1.17.20 9 And he said unto mee, my grace is sufficient for thee? &c. that the power of Christ may dwell in me. 1.3.13 & 1.13.20. and 3.3.14.

21 I feare lest when I come againe, my God debaile me, among you, and I shall be vile many, &c. 3.3.18. and 4.1.27

13.4 For though, he was crucified concerning his infirmity, yet liveth hee through the power of God. And we no doubt are weake in him, &c. 2.13.2. and 2.14.6. and 2.16.13

5 Prove your selves, whether yee are in the Faith: examine your selves: know yee not your owne selves, how that Iesus Christ is in you, excepte ye be reprobates? 3.2.39

10 According to the power which the Lord hath given mee, to edification, and not to destruction. 4.8.1

13 The grace of our Lord Iesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the holy Ghost, &c. 3.1.2

GALATHIANS.

1.1 PAUL an Apostle not of men, neither by man, but of Iesus Christ. 4.3.13. and 4.3.14

2 And all the brethren that are with mee, unto the Churches of Galatia. 4.1.14

3 Grace be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Iesus Christ. 1.13.13

6 I marvel that yee are so soone removed away unto another Gospell, from him that hath called you in the grace of Christ. 4.1.27

8. But though that wee, or an Angel from Heaven preach unto you otherwise than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed, 4.9.12

16 To reveale his Sonne in mee, that I should

The Table.

- should preach him among the Gentiles, &c.* 3.22.7
18 Then after three yeeres I came againe to Ierusalem to visit Peter, and abode with him fiftene daies. 4.6.7. and 4.6.14
21 Then foureteene yeeres after, I went up againe to Ierusalem with Barnabas, and tooke with me Titus also. 4.6.14
3 But neither yet Titus which was with me, though he were a Grecian, was compelled to be circumcised. 3.19.12
6 God accepteth no mans person, &c. 3.23.10
7 When they saw the Gospell of the uncircumcision was committed unto mee, as the Gospell of the circumcision was unto Peter. 4.6.7.
8 For hee that was mighty by Peter in the Apostleship over the circumcision, was also mighty by me towards the Gentiles. 4.1.6. and 4.6.7
9 And when James, and Cephas, and Iohn knew of the grace that was given unto mee, &c. 4.6.13
14 But when I saw, that they went not the right way to the truth of the Gospell, I said unto Peter before all men, if thou, &c. 4.12.3
16 Know that a man is not iustified by the workes of the Law, but by the faith of Iesus Christ, &c. 3.17.2
19 For I through the Law am dea to the Law, and that I might live unto God, &c. 2.16.7
20 Thus I live yet, not I know, but Christ liveth in me, &c. 4.19.35
3.1 O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, &c. 1.11.7. and 4.1.27. and 4.18.11
2 Received ye the Spirit by the workes of the Law, or by the bearing of the Faith preached? 3.2.33. and 4.1.6
6 Yea, rather as Abraham receaved God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousnesse. 3.17.8
8 For the Scriptures foreseeing, that God would iustifie the Gentiles through faith, preached before the Gospell unto Abraham, &c. 3.11.3
10 For as many as are of the workes of the Law, are under the curse: for it is written, cursed is every man that continueth not in all things, &c. 2.7.5. and 2.7.17. and 2.16.2. and 3.11.19
12 And the Law is not of Faith: but the Man that shall doe these things shall live therein. 3.11.18. and 3.11.19
13 Christ hath redeemed us from the curse, &c. 2.7.15. and 2.8.57. and 2.16.2. and 2.16.6. and 2.16.19. and 2.17.4. and 3.4.27. and 3.11.12. and 3.19.3. and 4.13.21
16 Now, to Abraham and to his seede were the promises made, &c. 2.6.2. and 2.13.3. and 4.14.21
17 And this I say, that the Law which was foure hundred and thirty yeeres after, cannot disannull the Covenant that was confirmed afore of God in respect of Christ, that it should make the promises of no effect. 3.11.20
18 For if the inheritance be of the Law, it is no more by the promise, but God gave it unto Abraham by promise. 3.11.17
19 Wherefore then serveth the Law? it was added because of the transgression, &c. 1.14.9. and 2.5.6. and 2.7.2
21 Is the Law then against the promises of God? God forbid, &c. 3.11.19. & 3.4.6
22 But the Scripture hath concluded all under sinne, that the promise by the faith of Iesus Christ should be given to them that beleve 3.4.6
24 Wherefore the Law was a Schoolemaster to bring us to Christ, that wee might be made righteous by faith. 2.7.2. and 2.7.11. and 2.11.5
27 For all ye that are baptised into Christ, have put on Christ. 2.1.3. & 3.1.3. & 4.14.7. & 4.15.6. & 4.16.21. & 4.19.8
28 There is neither Jew nor Grecian: there is neither bond nor free: there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Iesus. 2.11.11. and 4.20.1
4.1 Then thus I say, that the heire as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be Lord of all, 2.11.2. and 2.11.5. and 2.11.13
2 But is under Tutors and Governours, untill the time appointed of the Father, 4.10.14
3 Even so wee, when we were children, were in bondage under the rudiments of the world. 4.10.14
4 But when the fulnesse of time was come, God sent forth his Sonnes, borne of a woman, &c. 2.16.5. and 2.7.15. and 2.11.11. and 2.12.7. and 2.13.1. and 2.13.3. and 2.17.5. and 4.29.15
5 That hee might redeeme them which were under the Law, that we might receive the adoption, &c. 2.7.15. and 3.19.2.
6 And because ye are the Sonnes, God hath

The Table.

hath sent forth the Spirit of his Sonne into your hearts; which cryeth, Abba, that is,
Father. 2.14.5. & 3.1.3. & 7.2.11. & 3.
1.5. & 7.2.20. 37

7 But even then, when ye knew not God, yee did service unto them which by nature are not Gods. 1.4.3. & 1.12.3.

8 But now, seeing yee know God, ye are rather knowne of God, &c. 4.1.27. & 4.10.10 & 4.19.7.

10 Ye observe daies, and monthes, and times, and yeeres, 2.8.33

11 I am in feare of yee, lest I have bestowed on you labour in vaine. 2.8.33.

12 For it is written that Abraham had two Sonne, one by a Servant, another by a free woman. 2.11.9. & 4.2.3

24 By the which things, another thing is mean: for these Mothers, are the two Testaments, &c. 2.11.9.

25 For Agar or Sina is a Mountaine in Arabia, and it answereth to Jerusalem that now is, &c. 3.2.6

26 But Ierusalem, which is above, is free:
and is the Mother of us all. 4.1.1.

28 We are after the manner of Isaac, children of the promise. 4.16.12

30 Put out the servant and her sonne, &c. 3.
18.2

5.1 Stand fast in the liberty therefore, wherwith Christ hath made us free, &c. 3.19.2 3.19.14. & 4.10.8. & 4.10.9. & 4.20.
1.

4 whosoever are justified by the Law, yee are fallen from grace. 3.19.14.

5 For we through the Spirit, wait for the hope of righteinesse through faith. 3.24.7.

6 In Christ Iesus neither circumcision avail-eth any thing, nor uncircumcision, &c. 3.
11.20.

13 For brethren, yee have been called unto liberty: onely use not your liberty, &c. 3.19.
11.

14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, which is, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. 2.8.53

17 For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, &c. 2.7.5. & 2.2 27.

19 Moreover the workes of the flesh are manifest, which are these, fornication, uncle-anesse, wantonnesse. 2.1.8 & 2.14.1 &
4.15.10

6.10 While we have therefore time, let us doe good unto all men, &c. 2.7.6. & 3.20.38

14 But God forbid that I should rejoyce, but in the crosse of our Lord Iesus Christ.

wherby the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world. 2.16.7

15 For in Christ Iesus, neither circumcision, availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, &c.
4.14.24

17 From henceforth let no man put me to testisse, for I beare in my body the marks, &c.
3.18.7. & 3.25.8.

EPHESIANS.

1.2 G Race be with you, and peace from God our Father, and from the
Lord Iesus Christ. 1.13.13

3 Which hath blessed us with all spirituall blessing in heavenly things in Christ. 3.2.2.
10

4 As hee hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that wee should be holy, &c. 2.3.8. & 2.8.5. & 2.12.5 & 2.16
4. & 3.15.5. & 3.17.15. & 3.19.2. & 3.
22.1.3. 23.12 & 3.24.3. & 3.
24.5.

5 Who hath predestinate us to be adopted through Iesus Christ unto himselfe. 2.12.
5. & 3.11.4. & 3.18.2.

6 To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherwith hee hath maid us accepted in his baptised. 2.17.2. & 3.2.2. & 3.11.4.

7 By whom wee have redemption through his blood, &c. 3.4.30

9 And hath opened unto us the mystere of his will, according to his good pleasure, &c. 4.
14.2. & 4.19.36

10 That in the dispensation of the fulnesse of the times, hee might gather together in one all things, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth, even in Christ. 2.12.5.
& 3.30.21

13 In whom, also yee have trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, even the Gospell of our salvation, &c. 1.7.4. & 2.9.2. & 2.
10.3. & 3.1.4. & 3.2.36. & 3.24.1. & 3.
24.8.

14 Which is the earnest of our inheritance, untill the redemption, &c. 3.24.8

17 That the God of our Lord Iesus Christ, the Father of glory, might give unto us the Spirit of wisdom, &c. 2.2.21.

18 That yee may know, what the hope of his calling, and what the riches of his glorious inheritance is in the Saints. 3.2.16. & 4.8.11

20 Which hee wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, &c. 2.16.15.

21 Farre above all principality and power,
and

The Table.

- and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, &c. 1. 14. 5. and 2. 15. 5.
and 2. 16. 15
- 23 And he hath appointed him over all things to be the head to the Church. 2. 15. 5. and 4. 6. 9
- 23 Which is his body, even the fulnesse of him that filleth all in all things. 2. 15. 5. and

- 3 Among w<sup>o</sup> on we also had our conversation in time past, in the lusts of our flesh, in fulfilling the wil of the flesh, and of the mind, &c. 2. 1. 6. and 2. 1. 11. and 4. 16. 17
- 4 But God which is rich in love, through his great love wherewith he loved us. 3. 14. 5
- 5 Even when wee were dead by sinnes hee quickned us, &c. 3. 5. 19
- 6 And hath raised us up together, and made us to sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus. 2. 16. 16. and 3. 15. 6. and 3.
25. 1
- 8 For by grace are yee saved through faith, and that not of your selves: it is the gift of God. 3. 13. 2. and 3. 14. 11
- 9 Not of works, least any man should boast himselfe. 3. 13. 2
- 10 For wee are his workmanship created in Christ Jesus unto good works, &c. 2. 3. 6. and 3. 3. 21. and 3. 14. 5. and 3. 15. 7. and 3.
23. 13
- 11 Wherefore remember that yee being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, and called uncircumcision, &c. 4. 14. 12. & 4. 16. 15
- 12 That ye were, I say, at that time without Christ, and were alienates from the commonwealth of Israel, &c. 1. 4. 3. and 1. 5.
12. and 2. 6. 1. and 3. 24. 10. and 4. 14. 12.
and 4. 16. 3. and 4. 16. 24
- 14 For he is our peace, which hath made of both one, &c. 2. 7. 17. and 2. 11. 11. and
3. 2. 28. and 3. 2. 32. and 3. 13. 4. and 4.

nesse, but unto holinesse. 3. 16, 2. & 3. 19
2. & 3. 23, 13

15 For this say we unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which live, and are remaining in the comming of the Lord, shall not prevent those which sleepe. 3. 25, 8

16 For the Lord himselfe shall descend from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of the Archangell, and with the trumpet of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise.
1. 14, 8. and 2. 16, 17

17 Then shall we which live and remaine, be caught up with them also in the clouds to meet the Lord in the aire: and so shall we be ever with the Lord. 2. 16, 7

5. 2 For you yourselves know perfectly, that the day of the Lord shall come even as a theefe in the night. 4. 19, 34

- 1.4 SO that we our selves rejoyce of you in the Churches of God, because of your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye suffer. 3.2,11 5 Which is a token of the righteous judgement of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdome of God, for the which ye also suffer. 3.2,11. & 3.18,7 6 For it is a righteous thing with God, to recompense tribulatio to them that trouble
 you. 3.9,6. & 3.18,7. & 3.25,4 7 And to you which are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Iesus shall shew himselfe from heaven with his mighty Angels. 3.18,7 9 Which shall bee punished with everlasting perdition, from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. 3.

 10 When he shall come to be glorified in his Sainis, and to be made marvellous in all them that beleeve (because our testimony toward you was beleevd) in that day.
 3.25,10
 11 Wherefore, we also pray alwayes for you that our God may make you worthy of his calling, and fulfill all the good pleasure of his goodnesse, and the worke of faith with power. 2.5,8. & 3.2,35 23 Let no man deceive you by any meanes for that day shall not come except there come a departing first, and that that man of sin be disclosed, even the some of perdition. 4.9,7 4 And exalteth himselfe against all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he doth sit as God in the temple of God, &c.
 4.2,12. & 4.7,25. & 4.7,29. & 4.9,4 9 Even him whose coming is by the working of Satan with all power and signes, and lying wonders. 1.14,17 11 And therefore God shall send them strong delusion, that they should beleve lies. 1 14,17. & 1.18,2. & 2.4,5 12 That all they might be damned, which

- beleve not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousnesse. 1.18,2. & 2.4,5 13 But wee ought alwayes to give thanks to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because he hath chosen you from the beginning to salvation, through sanctification of the spirit, and beleefe of the truth. 3.1,2 14 Whereunto he called you by our Gospell, so the obtaining of the glory of our Lord
 Iesus Christ. 2.10,3 3.6 We doe command you brethren, in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ, that ye withdraw your selves from every brother that walketh inordinately, &c. 4.1,26 10 For even when we were with you, this we warned you off, that if there were any that would not worke, that he should not eate.
 4.16,29
 12 Those that be such manner of persons, we command, and beseech for our Lord Iesus Christ, that they worke with quietnesse, and eate their owne bread. 3.1,26 14 And if there be any that follow not our counsell, note him by a letter, and have no company with him, that he may bee absta-
 med. 4.12,5 15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother. 4.12,10

2. In these latter dayes he spake to us by his Sonne. 1.13.7. & 4.8.7. & 4.18.20.
3. Who being the brightnesse of his glory, and the engraven forme of his person, and bearing up all things by his mighty Word, hath by himselfe purged our sinnes, &c. 1.13.2.12. & 1.16.4. & 2.2.20. & 2.14.3.
4. Being made so much more excellent than Angels, by how much he hath obtained a more excellent name. 1.14.9.
6. Let the Angels of God worship him. 1.13.11. & 1.13.23. & 1.14.9.
10. And thou O Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens be the works of thy hands. 1.13.11. & 1.13.23. & 1.13.26.
14. Be they not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister for their sakes that shall be heires of salvation. 1.14.9. & 3.20.23.
- 2.5. He hath not put in subjection to the Angels, the world to come, of which we speak. 1.14.9.
9. But we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour, which was made a little inferior to Angels, by reason of suffering death, that by Gods grace he might taste of death for all men. 1.13.26. & 2.16.7.
11. For he that sanctifieth, and those that are sanctified, are all of one: wherefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. 2.13.2.
14. That he might destroy through death, him that had the Empire and power of death, that is the Devill, &c. 1.14.18.

& 2.13.1.2. & 3.11.12.

15. And that he might deliver all them which for feare of death were all their life time subject to bondage. 2.16.7.
16. For in no wise he took the Angels; but he took the seed of Abraham. 1.14.9. & 2.13.1.2.
17. In all things it became him to be made like to his brethren, that he might be mercifull, and a faithful high Priest in all things concerning God. 2.13.1. & 2.16.2.19.
- 3.14. We be made partakers of Christ, if we keepe sure unto the end that beginning wherewith we are upholden. 3.2.16.
- 4.9. There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. 3.2.8.9.
14. Having therefore a great high Priest, that hath entred into heaven, even Jesus the Sonne of God, let us hold this profession. 2.7.2. & 4.4.21.
15. We have not a high Priest that cannot be touched with the infirmity of our flesh, but but was in all things tempted like us, yet without sinne. 2.12.1.7. & 2.13.1. & 2.16.12. & 4.17.24.
16. Let us approach therefore with boldnesse unto the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy, and finde grace to helpe at time of need. 3.2.12.17.
- 5.1. Every high Priest is taken from amongst men, and is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifice for sinnes. 2.12.4.
4. Neither doth any man take this honour to himselfe, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. 4.3.10. & 4.15.22. & 4.18.9.14.
5. And so Christ tooke not to himselfe this honour, to be made high Priest, &c. 4.14.21. & 4.18.2. & 21. & 4.18.2.
6. Thou art a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec. 4.19.28.
7. Which in the daies of his flesh did offer up prayers & supplications with strong crying and teares unto him, that was able to save him from death, and was also heard in that which he feared. 2.16.11.
8. Although he were the sonne, notwithstanding he learned obedience by those things that he suffered. 3.3.1.

- 6 If they fall, that they should be renewed againe by repentance, &c. 3.3.21.
- 10 For God is not unjust, that he should forget your works and labour of love, which ye shewed toward his name, &c. 3.18.7.
- 13 For when God made the promise to Abraham, when as he could sweare by none greater, he sweare by himselfe. 2.8.25.
- 16 For men verily sweare by him that is greater than themselves, and an oath for confirmation is an end of strife amongst them. 2.8.27.
- 7.3 Without father, without mother, without kindred, and having neither beginning of his daies, nor end of his life, but is likened to the Sunne of God, and continueth a priest for ever. 4.19.28.
- 7 But without all controversie, that which is the least is blessed of him that is greater. 4.18.2.
- 11 If there had beene a full perfection by the Leviticall priesthood, &c. 2.11.4.
- 12 The priesthood therefore being changed, it must needs bee, that there bee a change of the law. 3.4.4. & 4.6.2.
- 17 I bowart a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedech. 4.18.2.
- 19 The law sanctified nothing, but the bringing in of a better hope did it by the which we come neere to God. 2.7.17. & 2.11.4.
- 21 But this, he is made with an oath by him that said unto him, The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a Priest for ever, &c. 4.18.2.
- 22 Iesus is made so much greater surety of a better testament. 4.18.2.
- 24 And he, because he abideth for ever, hath an everlasting priesthood. 2.15.6.
- 25 Whereby he is able to save those which come unto God by him. 2.16.16.
- 8.1 But this is the summe of that which we have spoken: that wee have such a high priest, that sitteth on the right hand of the throne of majesty in heaven. 2.16.15.
- 5 See, quoth hee that thou make all things according to the patterne that was shewed thee in the mountaine. 2.7.1.
- 6 But now our high priest hath obtained a more excellent office, in as much as he is the Mediator of a better testament. 2.16.12.
- 9.1 The first Testament had also ordinances of religion, and a worldly sanctuary. 4.14.21.
- 7 But into the second went the high priest alone once every yeare, not without blood which hee offered for himselfe and for the people. 2.7.17. & 2.15.6.
- 8 Whereby the holy Ghost thus signified, that the way into the holiest of all, was not yet opened, whilst as yet the first tabernacle was standing. 2.7.17. & 2.15.6.
- 9 Wherein were offered gifts, and sacrifices that could not make holy, concerning the conscience of him that did service. 2.7.17. 2.11.14. & 4.14.25.
- 11 But Christ being come a high priest of good things to come. 2.16.16. & 4.14.21. & 4.18.2.
- 12 Neither by the blood of goats and calves but by his owne blood entred hee once into the holy place. 2.17.4. & 4.18.3.
- 13 For if the blood of buls and goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling them that are unclean, sanctifieth as touching the purification of the flesh. 2.17.4.
- 14 How much more shall the blood of Christ which through the eternall spirit offered himselfe without spot to God, &c. 2.16.6. & 3.16.2. & 4.14.11.
- 15 And for this cause hee is the Mediator of a new testament, that through death, &c. 2.7.17. & 4.17.4.
- 16 For where a testament is, there must bee the death of him that made the testament. 4.18.5.
- 22 And all things almost according to the law was purified by blood, and without shedding of blood there was no remission. 2.15.6. & 2.17.4.
- 26 But now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put a way sinne by the sacrifice of himselfe. 4.18.3.
- 27 And as it is ordained for men that they shall once dye, and after that cometh the judgement. 2.16.17. & 3.25.8.
- 28 So Christ was once offered to take away the sins of many, and unto them that looke for him, shall hee appeare the second time without sin unto salvation. 3.16.2.
- 10.1 For the Law having the shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offer yearely, sanctifie the consciences thereto. 2.7.16.17. & 2.11.4. & 4.14.23.
- 2 For would they not then have ceased to have beene offered because the offerers once purged, should have had no more conscience of sinne. 3.19.15. & 4.10.3. & 4.14.25.

- 21 He worshipped God leaning upon his staffe. 1.11.15.
- 12.3 Consider him therefore that indured such speaking against of sinners lest ye should be wearied and faint in your minds. 3.3.15.
- 5 And you have forgotten the exhortation, which speaketh unto you as unto children: My sonne, despise not the chastening of the Lord, neither faint in thy minde when thou art reprov'd of him. 3.4.32.
- 8 For if you bee without correction, wherof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sonnes. 3.8.6.
- 9 Moreover, wee have had the fathers of our bodies which corrected us, and wee gave them reverence, should we not much rather be in subjection unto the father of spirits, that we might live? 1.15.2.
- 17 For ye know how that afterward when he would have inherited the blessing, hee was rejected, for he found no place to repent, although hee sought the blessing with teares. 3.3.24.
- 18 For ye came not to the mount that might be touched, nor unto burning fire, nor to blacknesse, and darknesse, &c. 2.11.9.
- 22 But ye came to the mount Zion, and to the city of the living God, the celestiall Ierusalem, and to the company of innumerable angels. 1.14.9.
- 23 To the congregation of the first borne which are written in heaven, and to God the judge of all. 3.25.6.
- 13.4 Marriage is honourable amongst all men and the bed undefiled: but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. 4.9.14. & 4.12.25. & 4.13.3.
- 8 Iesus Christ the same yesterday, and to day, and also for ever. 2.10.4.
- 15 By him therefore let us daily offer up to God the sacrifice of praise, that is, the fruit of the lips, which confesse his name. 3.20.28. & 4.18.16.17.
- 16 To doe good, and to distribute forget not: for with such sacrifices God is pleased. 3.4.36. & 3.7.5. & 3.15.4. & 4.18.17.
- 17 Obey your guides and be ruled by them, for they watch for the health of your soules, as such that shall give account therefore. 1.15.2.

JAMES.

- 1.2 MY brethren, count it for an exceeding joy, so often as you fall into temptations. 3.20.46.
- 12 Blessed is the man that suffereth temptation, for when he shall be tryed, he shall receive the crowne of life. 3.17.10.
- 13 Let no man when he is tempted say that he is tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither doth hee tempt any man, 3.20.46.
- 14 But each one is tempted when he is drawne away by his owne concupiscence, and is infixed. 3.20.46.
- 15 Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin, and sinne when it is finished bringeth forth death. 3.3.13.
- 17 Every good gift and every perfect gift cometh from above from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow by turning. 1.13.8. & 2.2.21. & 4.14.10.
- 21 Wherefore lay aside all filthinesse and profusity of malitiousnesse, and receive with meeknesse the word that is ingrafted in you, which is able to save your soules. 4.17.25.
- 25 Hath not God chosen the poore of this world, that they should be rich in faith, and heires of the kingdome which he promised to those of whom he is beloved. 3.13.10.
- 10 For whosoever shall keepe the whole law, and yet faileth in one point, he is guilty of all. 3.14.10. & 3.18.10.
- 14 What avileth it him my brethren, though a man say hee hath faith, when hee hath no workes, can the faith save him? 3.29.12.
- 19 Thou beleevest there is one God, thou dost well, and the devils beleeve and tremble. 3.2.10.
- 21 Was not Abraham our father justified by the row worke, when hee offered Isaac his sonne upon the altar? 3.17.11.
- 4.3 You aske and you receive not, because you aske amisse, that yee might consume it on your lust. 3.20.7.
- 6 But the Scripture offereth more grace, and therefore saith, God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. 2.2.10. & 3.12.5.

- 8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you: cleanse your hands ye sinners, and purge your hearts ye wavering minded. 3.3.16.
- 11 He that speaketh evil of his brother speaketh against the law and condemneth it, but if thou condemne the law, &c. 4.10.7.
- 12 There is one law-giver that is able to save and to destroy. 4.10.7.
- 14 Who can tell what shall bee the next day, for what is your life? it is even a vapour, &c. 3.20.28.
- 15 For that yee ought to say, if the Lord will and if we live, we will doe this or that. 3.20.28.
- 5.12 Before all things, my brethren sweare not neither by heaven, neither by earth, neither any other oath, but let your yea be yea, and your nay nay, &c. 2.8.26.
- 13 Is any man afflicted amongst you? let him pray: is any man merry? let him sing Psalms. 3.20.7.
- 14 Is any sick amongst you? let him send for the Elders of the Church, and let them pray for him &c. 4.19.18,21.
- 15 And the prayer of faith shall save the sicke, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if hee have committed sinne, it shall be forgiven him. 3.20.11.
- 16 Acknowledge your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that yee may be healed: for the prayer of a righteous man availeth much if he be fervent. 3.4.6,12. & 3.20.27.
- 17 Elias was a man subject to those things that we be, and hee prayed earnestly that it might not raine, and it rained not on the earth for the space of three yeares and fixe moneths. 3.20.26.

PETER.

- 1.2 TO the elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father into sanctification of the spirit through obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Iesus Christ, grace and peace be multiplied unto you. 3.1.1. & 3.14.6. & 3.22.6. & 4.15.2.
- 3 Blessed be God the Father of our Lord Iesu Christ, who of his great mercy hath begotten us againe into a lively hope, by the resurrection of Christ Iesu from death. 2.16.13.

The Table.

- 5 Who are kept by the power of God through faith to salvation, which is prepared to be declared in the last day. 3.2.24. & 3.18.3.
- 7 That the tryall of your faith, being much more precious then gold which perisbeth although it be tryed by fire. 3.8.4.
- 9 Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of our soules. 1.15.2. & 3.18.3. & 3.25.1.
- 11 Searching when or what time the spirit which testified before of Christ which was in them, should declare the suffering that should come unto Christ, &c. 1.13.18. & 2.9.1.
- 12 Unto whom it was revealed, that they should not minister unto themselves, but unto us the things which are now shewed unto you by them. 2.9.1. & 2.11.6.
- 15 But as hee which hath called you is holy so be you holy in all manner of conversation. 3.6.3.
- 16 Be you holy, for Jam holy. 3.6.2.
- 18 Knowing that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold from your vaine conversation, received by the traditions of the fathers. 2.17.5.
- 19 But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lambe undefiled and without spot. 2.7.5. & 3.6.3.
- 20 Which was ordained before the foundation of the world, but was declared in the last times for your sakes. 3.22.6. & 4.18.20.
- 21 Which by his meanes doe beleve in God that raised him up from the dead and gave him glory, that your faith and hope might be in God. 2.16.13. & 3.2.1.43.
- 22 Seeing your soules are purified by obeying the truth through the spirit with brotherly love without fainting. 1.15.2. & 2.5.11.
- 23 Being borne againe, not of wort all seed, but of immortal, by the word of the living God, who liveth and endureth for ever. 2.10.7. & 4.1.6. & 4.16.18.31.
- 25 And ye as lively stoness be made a spirituous house, &c. 4.6.5. & 4.1.16.
- 9 But yee are a chosen generation, a kingly priesthood, a holy nation, a people that God hath challenged to himselfe, that you should shew forth the vertues of him which hath called you from darkenesse, into his wonderful light. 2.7.1. & 3.13.2. & 4.18.17. & 4.19.25.
- 11 Behold, I pray you as pilgrimes and strangers, and that you abstaine from the lusts of the flesh, which strive against the soule. 1.15.2.
- 13 Be you subject unto every ordinance of man for the Lords sake, whether it be to the King, as to the superior. 4.20.23.
- 17 Honour all men, love brotherlinesse, feare God, honour the King. 4.20.7.
- 21 Christ hath suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps. 3.16.2.
- 24 Who bore our finnes upon his body on the crosse, that we being dead to sin, might live to righteousnesse: by whose stripes ye are healed. 2.16.6. & 2.17.4. & 3.4.26. & 3.4.27. & 3.4.30. & 4.14.21.
- 22 You were as strayed sheepe, but now ye be turned to your shepheard and bisshop of your soules. 1.15.2. & 3.25.6.
- 3.7 Likewise ye husbands, us your selves as it becommet men of knowledge, giving honour to the woman as to the weaker vessel, &c. 4.20.29.
- 18 For Christ suffered once for finnes, the just for the unjust, that hee might bring us to God, and was put to death concerning the flesh, but lived according to the spirit. 2.13.2.
- 19 By the which he also went, and preached to the spirits that were in prison. 2.16.9.
- 21 To the which also the figure that now saveth us, even baptisme agreeth, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience maketh request to God by the resurrection of Iesus Christ. 3.19.15. & 4.10.3. & 4.14.4. & 4.14.24. & 4.15.2. & 4.16.21.
- 4.3 It is enough for us that in the forefront of our life, we have lived according to the lust of the Gentiles, when we walked in, &c. 3.15.8. & 3.24.11.
- 8 Before all things have fervent love amongst you, for love covereth the multitude of sin. 3.4.31. & 3.4.36.
- 10 Let every man as he hath received the gift, minister the same one to another, as good disposers of the manifold graces of God. 3.7.5.
- 11 If any man speake, let him speake as the words of God. 3.8.8. & 4.8.9.
- 17 For the time is come, that judgement must begin at the house of God, if so be it begin first with us, what shall be the end? &c. 3.4.34.
- 5.1 The elders which be amongst you, I beseech also that it be as an elder, &c. 4.6.7.
- 2 Feed the sucke of God, which dependeth upon you. 4.6.3. & 4.10.17.
- 3 Not as though ye were lords over Gods heritage. 4.4.9. & 4.10.7.

The Table.

- 5 God resisteth the proud and, giveth grace to the humble. 3.12.5.
 6 Humble your selves under the mighty hand of God, that hee may exalt you in due time. 3.2.40.
 7 Having all your care cast upon him: for he careth for you. 1.17.6.
 8 Be ye sober and watch, for your adversary the Devill, as a roaring lion walking about seeketh whom he may devour. 1.4.18. & 1.14.13. & 3.20.46
 10 And the God of all grace, which hath called us unto his eternall glory in Christ Iesus, after ye have suffered a little, make you perfect, &c. 3.20.46.

II. PETER.

- 1.4 Whereby most great and precious promises bee given us that by them we should be partakers of the godly nature, &c. 3.11.10. & 25.10.
 1 Therefore give evn all diligence therunto joyne moreover vertue to your faith and with vertue knowledge. 2.5.11.
 10 Wherefore brethren, give rather diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if you doe these things, you shall never fall. 3.13.8
 14 Seeing I know the time is at hand, that I must lay downe this my tabernack, as the Lord Iesus declared unto me. 3.25.6.
 19 We have also a most sure word of the Prophets, to the which ye doe well that you take heede, as unto a light that shineth in a darke place unill the day dawne, &c. 1.9.2.
 21 For the prophesie came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the holy Ghost. 1.13.7. & 1.13.18.
 2.1. There were false Prophets amongst the people, as amongst you there shall bee false teachers, &c. 4.9.4.
 4 If God spared not the Angels that sinned, but cast them downe into hell, and delivered downe into the chaines of darkenesse, &c. 1.14.16. & 1.14.19.
 9 The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations. 3.20.46.
 19 Of whomsoever a man is overcome, even of the same hee is brought into bondage. 2.2.8.
 3-4 Where is the promise of his comming? for

- since the fathers died, all things continue alike from the beginning, &c. 3.24.2.
 8 Dearly beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand yeeres, and a thousand yeeres as one day. 3.2.42.
 9 And would have no man to perish, but would have all men to come to repentance. 3.24.15.

I. IOHN.

- 1.1 That which was from the beginning that we have heard, that we have seene with our eyes, that we have beheld, and that our hands have handled of the word of life. 2.14.2. & 2.14.7. & 4.17.8.
 7 That if we walke in the light as he is in the light, we have mutuall fellowship, and the blis of his sonne Iesu Christ purgeth us from all sinne, &c. 2.17.4. & 3.5.2. & 4.14.21.
 9 If we confesse our sinnes, he is faithfull and just, so that he will forgive us our sins, &c. 3.4.9. & 3.29.
 10 If we say we have no sinne, we make him a liar, &c. 3.20.45.
 2.1 If any man have sinned, wee have an advocate with the father Iesu Christ the righteous. 3.4.26. & 3.20.17.
 2 He is the propitiation for our sinnes, and not for ours onely, but for the sinnes of the whole world, 2.17.2. & 3.4.26. & 3.20.20.
 12 I write unto you little children, because your sinnes be forgiven you for his names sake 2.17.5. & 3.4.26.
 18 Little children it is the last time: and as you have heard, Antichrist shall come. 4.18.20.
 19 They went out from us, but they were not of us, for if they had bene of us, they would have continued with us, &c. 3.3.23. & 3.24.6.7.
 20 But ye have anointment from him that is holy, ynd you know all things. 3.1.3.
 23 Whosoever denieth the Sonne, the same hath not the father. 2.6.4.
 27 But the ointment that you have received of him, abideth in you, neither need you that any man teach you, but as the same ointment teacheth you, &c. 3.1.3.
 3.1. Behol

- 3.1 Beheld, what love the father hath shewed on us, that we should be called the sonnes of God, for this cause the world knoweth you not, because it knoweth not him. 3.6.3. & 3.20.36.
- 2 Dearly beloved, wee are now the sonnes of God, but yet it doth not appeare what we shall be: and we know, that when hee shall appeare, wee shall belike him: for we shall see him as he is, &c. 2.9.3. & 3.2.14. & 3.11.10. & 3.25.10. & 4.18.20.
- 3 And every man that hath this hope in him, purgeth himselfe even as he is pure. 3.16. 2.
- 8 Hee that committeth sinne is of the devill, for the devill sinneth from the beginning, but the sonne of God, &c. 1.14. 15. 18. 19. & 3.15.8.
- 9 Whosoever is borne of God sinneth not, for his seed remaineth in him, neither can hee sinne, because he is borne of God. 2.3.10. & 2.5.11.
- 10 In this are the children of God knowne, and the children of the devill, &c. 1.14. 19. & 3.16.2.
- 15 Who so hateth his brother, is a man killer, and yee know that no man killer, hath eternall life abiding in him. 2.8.39.
- 16 Hereby have wee perceived love, that hee laid down his life for us, therefore we ought also to lay downe our lives for the brethren. 2.14.2.
- 20 For if our hearts condemne us, God is mightier than our hearts, and knoweth all things. 3.4.18.
- 22 And whatsoever wee aske, wee receive of him, because we keepe his commandments &c. 3.27.10.
- 24 Hee that keepeth his commandements, dwelleth in him and he in him: and by this we know, that hee dwelleth in us, even by the spirit that hee hath given us. 3.1.4. & 3.2.39.
- 4.1 Dearly beloved, beleve not every spirit, but prove the spirits whether they be of God, &c. 4.9.12.
- 3 What spirit soever confesseth not that Christ Iesus is come in the flesh is not of God. 4. 17.32.
- 10 Hee in love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, &c. 2.17.2 & 3.24.6.
- 11 Dearly beloved, if God so loved us, wee we ought to love one another. 3.16.2.
- 13 By this we know that we dwell in him & hee in us, because hee hath given us of his spirit. 3.1.4. & 3.24.2.

- 18 There is no feare in love, but perfect love casteth out feare, for feare hath painfullnesse, and he that feareth, &c. 3.2.27.
- 19 We love him because he loved us first. 2. 16.3.
- 5.4 Whatsoever is borne of God, overcometh the world, and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even your Faith. 1.18.3. & 2.5.11. & 3.2.1.
- 6 This is, that Christ Iesus which came by water and blood, &c. 4.14.22.
- 7 There be three which beare witness in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the holy Ghost, and those three be one. 3.1.1.
- 8 And there be three that beare witness in earth, the spirit, the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one. 3.1.1.
- 12 He which hath the Sonne, hath life, but he that hath not the Sonne of God hath not life in him. 3.14.4. & 3.1.6.
- 14 And this is the assurance that wee have in him, that if wee aske any thing according to his will, he heareth us, &c. 3.20. 5.
- 15 And if we know that he heareth us, whatsoever wee aske, we know that we have the petition that we have desired of him. 3.20. 52.
- 18 He that is borne of God, keepeth himselfe. 2.5.11.
- 19 Wee know wee be of God, and the whole world (yet in wickednesse). 3.2.14.
- 20 The same is very God and life eternall. 1. 17.11.26.
- 21 Babes keepe your selves from idols. Amen 1.11.13.
