THE TRANSLATOR TO
the Reader.

Good Reader, here is now offered you the sixth time printed in English M. Calvins booke of the Institution of Christian Religion; a booke of great labour to the Author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Calvins first wrote it when he was a young man, a booke of a small volume, and since that season he hath at sundry times published it with new increases, still protesting, at every edition, himselve to be one of those qui scribendo proficiunt, & proficiendo scri- bunt, which with their writing doe grow in profiting, and with their profiting doe proceed in writing. At length, having in many his other works travelled about exposition of sundry books of the Scriptures, and in the same finding occasion to discourse of sundry common places and matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occasions of the Text that were offered him, and not in any other method, were not so ready for the Readers use: he therefore entred into this purpose to enlarge this booke of Institutions, and therein to treat of all those Titles and Common places largely, with this intent, that whensoever any occasion fell in his other books to treat of any such cause, he would not newly amplifie his books of Commentaries and Expositions therewith, but referre his Reader wholly to this Store-house and Treasurie of that sort of Divine learning. As age and weaknesse grew upon him, so he hastened his labour; and according to his petition to God, he in a manner ended his life with his worke: for he liued not long after. So great a Jewell was meet to be made most beneficiall, that is to say, applied to most common use. Therefore in the very beginning of the late Queenes most blessed raigne I translated it out of Latine into English, for the commodity of the Church of Christ, at the speciall request of my deare friends of worthy memory, Reginald Wolfe, and Edward Whitechurch; the one her Majesties Printer for the Hebrew, Greeke and Latine tongues; the other her Highnesse Printer of the Booke of Common Prayer. I performed my worke in the house of my said friend Edward Whitechurch, a man well knowne to be of upright heart and dealing, an ancient zealous Gospeller, as plaine and true a friend as ever I knew living, and as desirous to doe any thing to common good, pecially by the advancement of true Religion. At my said first edition of this booke I considered how the Author thereof had of long time purposely laboured to write the same most exactly, and to packe great plenty of matter in small roome of words, yea, and those so circumspectly and precisely ordered, to avoid the cavillations of such, as for enmity to the truth therein contained, would gladly seeke and abuse all advantages which might be found by any oversight in penning of it, that the sentences were thereby become so full, as nothing might well be added without idle superfluity, and againe so nicely pared, that nothing could be diminished without taking away some necessary substance of matter therein expressed. This manner of writing, beside the peculiar termes of arts and figures, and the difficulties of the matters themselves, being thorowout interlaced with the Schoolmens controversies, made a great hardnes in the Authors owne booke, in that tongue wherein otherwise he is both plentiful and easie: in somuch that it sufficeth not to reade him once, unlesse you can be content to reade in vaine. This consideration encumbred me with great doubtfulness for the whole order and frame of my translation. If I should follow the words, I saw that of necessity the hardnesse in the translation must needs be greater than was in the tongue, wherein it was originally written. If I should leave the course of words, and grant my selfe liberty after the naturall manner of mine owne tongue, to say that in English which I conceived to be his meaning in Latine, I plainly perceived how hardly I might escape error, and on the other side in this matter of faith and religion, how perillous it was to erre. For I durst not presume to warrant my selfe to have his meaning without his words. And they that wote what it is to translate well and faithfully, specially in matters of Religion, do know that not the only grammatical construction of words sufficeth, but the very building and order to observe all advantages of vehemence or grace, by placing or accent of words, maketh much to the true setting forth of a writers minde. In the end, I rested upon this determination to follow the words so neere as the phrase of the English tongue would suffer me. Which purpose I so performed, that if the English booke were printed in such paper and letter as the Latine is, it should not exceed the Latine in quantity. Wherby, beside all other commodities that a faithful translator of so good a worke may bring, this one benefit is moreover provided for such as are desirous to attaine some knowledge of men the Latine tongue. (which is at this time to be wished in many of those for whose profession this book most fitly serveth) that they shall not finde any more English than shall suffice to construe the Latine withall, except in such few places where the great difference of the phrases of the languages forced me: so that comparing the one with the other, they shall both profit in good matter, and furnish themselves with understanding of that speech, wherein the greatest treasures of knowledge are disclosed. In the doing hereof, I did not onely trust mine owne wit or ability, but examined my whole doing from sentence to sentence thorowout the whole booke, with conference and overlooking of such learned men, as my translation being allowed by their judgement, I did both satisfie mine owne conscience that I had done truly, and their approving of it might be a good warrant to the Reader, that nothing should herein be delivered him but found, unmingled, and uncorrupted doctrine, even in such sort as the Authour himselfe had first framed it. All that I wrote, the grave, learned, and vertuous man M. David Whitehead, (whom I name with honourable remembrance) did among other, compare with the Latine, examining every sentence thorowout the whole booke. Beside all this, I privately required many, and generally all men with whom I ever had any talke of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truly translated, or not plainly Englished, they would enforme me thereof, promising either to satisfie them or to amend it. Since which time I have not beene advertised by any man of any thing which they would require to be altered. Neither had I my selfe, by reason of my profession being otherwise occupied, any leasure to peruse it. And that is the cause why not onely at the second and third time, but also at this Impression, you have no change at all in the worke, but altogether as it was before. Indeed I perceived many men well minded and studious of this booke, to require a Table for their ease and furtherance. Their honest desire I have fulfilled in the second Edition, and have added thereto a plentifull Table, which is also here inserted, which I have translated out of the Latine, wherein the principall matters discoursed in this Booke are named by their due titles in order of Alphabet, and under every title is set forth a brieve summe of the whole doctrine taught in this Booke concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place : and therewith is added the Booke, Chapter, and Section or division of the Chapter, where the same doctrine is more largely expressed and proved. And for the readier finding thereof, I have caused the number of the Chapters to be set upon every leafe in the Booke, and quoted the Sections also by their due number with the usuall figure of Algorithmic. And now at this last publishing, my friends by whose charge it is now newly imprinted in a Roman letter, and smaller Volume, with divers other Tables, which since my second Edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be translated, and here added for your benefit. Moreover, whereas in the first Edition the ill manner of my scribbling hand, the interlining of my Copie, and some other causes well knowne by the workmen of that faculty, made very many faults to passe the Printer, I have in the second Impression caused the Booke to be composed by the printed Copie, and corrected by the written : whereby it must needs be that it was much more truly done than the other was, as I my self do know above 300. faults mended. And now at this last printing, the composing after a printed copy bringeth some ease, and the diligence used about the correction, having beene right faithfully looked unto, it cannot but be much more truly set forth. This also is performed, that the Volume being smaller, with a letter faire and legible, it is of more easie price, that it may be of more common use, and so to more large communicating of so great a treasure to those that desire Christian knowledge for instruction of their faith, and guiding of their duties. Thus on the Printers behalfe and mine, your ease and commodity is provided for. Now resteth your owne diligence for your owne profit, in studying it. To spend many words in commending the worke it selfe, were needlesse : yet thus much I thinke I may both not untruly and not vainly say, that though many great learned men have written books of Common places of our Religion, as Melancton, Sarcerius, and other, other, whose works are very good and profitable to the Church of God : yet by the consenting judgement of those that understand the same, there is none to be compared to this worke of Calvin, both for his substantiall sufficiency of doctrine, the sound declaration of truth in Articles of our Religion, the large and learned confirmation of the same, & the most deep and strong confutation of all old and new heresies : so that (the holy Scriptures excepted) this is one of the most profitable books for all students of Christian Divinity. Wherein (good Readers) as I am glad for the glory of God, and for your benefit, that you may have this profit of my travell ; so I beseech you let me have this use of your gentleness, that my doings may be construed to such good end as I have meant them : and that if any thing mislike you by reason of hardness, or any other cause that may seeme to be my default, you will not forthwith condemne the worke, but reade it oftner : in which doing you will finde (as many have confessed to me that they have found by experience that those things which at the first reading shall displease you for hardness, shall be found so easie as so hard matter would suffer, and for the most part more easie than some other phrase which should with greater loosenesse, and smoother sliding away deceive their understanding. I confesse indeed it is not finely and pleasantly written, nor carrieth with it such delightfull grace of speech as some great wise men have bestowed upon some foolisher things ; yet it containeth sound truth set forth with faithfull plainnesse, without wrong done to the Authors meaning : and so if you accept and use it, you shall not faile to have great profit thereby, and I shall thinke my labour very well employed.

THOMAS NORTON

TO THE MOST MIGHTY AND NOBLE PRINCE, FRANCISCE

THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING THE French King his Soueraigne Lord,

JOHN CALVINE with eth peace and saluation in Christ.

Hen I did first set my hand to this worke, I thought nothing less (most noble king) than to write any thing that afterward should bee presented to your maiestie. Onely my mind was to re.ich certaine introductions, whereby they that are touched with some zeale of religion, might be instructed to true godlinesse. And this travell I tooke principally for my countrymen the Frenchmen, of whom I understood very many to hunger and thirst for Christ, but I saw very few that had rightly received so much as any little knowledge of him. And that this was my meaning, the booke it selfe doth cleareth, being framed after a simple and plaine manner of teaching. But when I percei ved, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so farre prevailed in your Realme, that in it there is no roome for sound doctrine: I thought I should doe a thing worth my travell, all in one worke, both to give an instruction for them, and to declare a confession to you: whereby yee may learne what manner of doctrine that is, against which those furious men burne in so great rage, who at this day trouble your realme with sword and fire. For I will not feare to confesse that I have in this worke comprehended in manner, the summe of that selfesame doctrine, against which they crye out, that it ought to be punished with prisonment, banishment, condemnation without judgement, and with fire, that it ought to be chased away by land & sea. I know indeed with how hainous informations they have filled your minde and eares, to make our cause most hatefull unto you: but this of your clemencie ought you to weigh, that there shall be no innocencie, neither in words ner deeds, if it may be enough to accuse. Truly, if any, so bring the same in hatred, shall alledge that this doctrine whereof I go now about to yeeld account unto you, hath been long agoe condemned by consent of all degrees, and as sinned by many judgements already given in judiciall courts, all that be saith shall amount to no more but that it hath partly been violently throwne downe by the banding and power of the adversaries thereof, and partly bene traiterously and fraudulently appressed with their lies and subtle practises and slanders. Herein is violence shewed, that without hearing the cause, bloodie sentences are pronounced against it: herein is fraud, that it is without deserving accused of sedition and evil doings. And that none may thinke that we wrongfully complaine of these things, you your selfe can beare witness most noble king, with how lying slanders it is daily accused unto you: as that it tendeth to no other end but to writhe from kings their scepters out of their hands, to throw downe all judges seates and judgements, to subvert all orders and civill government, to trouble the peace & quiet of the people, to abolish all lawes, to undoe all proprieties and possessions, finally to turne all things upside downe. And yet you heare the smallest portion. For horrible things they spread abroad among the people: which if they were true, the whole world might worthily judge it with the maintainers thereof, w<sup>o</sup>rth of a thousand fires and gallows. Who can now marvell th<sup>t</sup> a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrong full accusations are believed? Lo, this is the cause that all degrees agree and conspire to the condemning of us and our doctrine. They that sit to judge, being ravished with this affection pronounce for sentences their foreconceivd determinations which they brought from home with them: and thinke that they have well enough discharged their duties, if they command no more to be drawne to execution, but such as are found guiltie either by their owne confession or by sufficient witnessse. But of what fault? of that condemned doctrine, say they. But by what law condemned? Herein should have stood the succour of defence for them, not to denie the doctrine it selfe, but to maintaine it for true. But heere is all libertie once to mutter, utterly cut off from us.

Wherefore I do not unju<sup>s</sup>tly require, most victorious King, that it may please you to take into your owne hand the whole bearing of the cause which hitherto hath bene troublesomly handled or rather carelessly tossed without all order of law, more by outrageous heate than judiciall gravitie. Neither yet thinke, that I heere go about to make mine owne private defence, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe returne into my native countrie, to which although I beare such affection of naturall love as becommeth me, yet at the case now is, I not discontentedly want it. But I take upon me the common cause of all the godly, yea, and the cause of Christ himselfe, which at this day having bene by all meanes torne and troden downe in your kingdome, lieth as it were in dispaired case, and that indeed rather by the tyrannie of certaine Pharisees than by your owne knowledge. But how that commeth to passe, it is not heere needfull to tell: truly it lieth in great distresse. For thus farre have the ungodly prevailed, that the truth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chased away and scattered abroad, yet it lieth hidden as buried and unregarded: as for the fillic poore Church, it is either wasted with cruell slaughters, and so driven away with banishments, or dismaied with threats and terrors, that it dare not once open her mouth. And yet still they continue with such rage and fiercenesse as they are wont, thrusting strongly against the wall already bending and the ruine which themselves have made. In the meane time no man steppeth forth, to set himselfe in defence against such furies. And they if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to favour the truth, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and unskillenesse of ignorant men. For thus the good natured men forsooth do speake, calling that error and unskillnesse which they know to be the most certaine trust of God: calling them ignorant men, whose wit they see that Christ hath not so despised, but that he hath vouchsafed to communicate to them the misteries of his heavenly wisdom. So much are all ashamed of the Gospell. It shall be your office (most noble King) not to turne away your eares nor your mind from so just a defence: specially when so gre<sup>a</sup>t a matter is in question: namely how the glory of God may be maintained safe in earth, how the truth of God may keepe her honor, how Christ may have his kingdome preserved whole among us. This is a matter worthie for your eares, worthie for your judgement, worthie for your royall throne. For, even this thought maketh a true king to acknowledge himselfe in the governance of his kingdome to be the minister of God. Neither doth he now use a kingdome but a robberie, which reigneth not to this end that he may serve the glorie of God. And he is deceived that looketh for a long prosperitie of that kingdom, which is not ruled by the scepter of God, that is, by his holy word: for as much as the heavenly Oracle cannot prove vaine, whereby it is proclaimed that the people shall be scattered abroad where prophetic faileth. Neither ought the contempt of our basenesse to withdraw you from this purpose. We verily know right well, how poore and abject fillic men we be, namely in the sight of God miserable sinners, in the sight of men most despised persons, yea and (if you will) certaine excrements and outcasts of the world, or what soever viler thing may be named: so that there remaineth nothing for us to glorie upon before God, but his only mercie, whereby we are without any our deserving received into the hope of eternall salvation: and before men, nothing but our weaknesse, which among them it is taken for a most great shame to confesse so much as in countenance. But our doctrine must be advanced hie above all glorie of the world, must stand unvanquishable above all power: because it is not ours; but the doctrine of the living God and of his Christ, whom the Father hath appointed king to beare rule even from sea to sea, and from the rivers even to the ends of the earth: and so to beare rule, rule, that striking the whole earth with the only rod of his mouth, he may breake it with all the iron and brassen strength, with all the golden and silver glistering thereof, as it were potters vessels: as the Prophets prophesie of the royalty of his kingdom. Our adversaries indeed doe crie out to the contrary, and say that we falsly pretend the word of God, whereof we be most wicked corrupters. But how this is not only a malicious slander, but also a notable shamesfull, you your selfe by reading our confession, may according to your wisdom judge. Yet heere it is also good to say somewhat, either to moove you to willingness and heedfulness, or at the least to prepare you a way to the reading of it. Paul, when he willed all prophesie to be framed to the agreeableness of faith, hath set a most sure rule whereby the expounding of Scripture ought to be tried. Now if our doctrine be examined by this rule of faith, the victorie is already in our hands. For what doth better or more fitly agree with faith, than to acknowledge our selves naked of all vertue, that of God we may be clothed? empty of all good, that of him we may be filled? the bond servants of sinne, that of him we may be made free? blinde, that of him we may be enlightened? lame, that of him we may be made straight? feeble, that of him we may be uphelden? to take from our selves all matter of glorying, that be alone may be glorious only, and in him we may glorie? When we say these and such like things, they interrupt vs and crie out that by this meane is overthrowne I wot not what, blind light of nature, fained preparations, steewill, workes meritorious of eternall saluation, together with their supererogations: because they cannot abide that the whole praise and glory of all goodness, vertue, righteousness, and wisdom should remaine in God. But wee read not that they were blamed that haue drawne too much out of the fontaine of liuing water: on the contrary side they are sharply rebuked which haue digged to themselves pits, broken pits, which are not able to hold water. Againe, what is more agreeable with faith, than to promise to themselves that God will be to them a favourable Father, where Christ is acknowledged to be a brother and procurer of fauour? than assuredly to looke for all things joyfull and prosperous at his hand, whose unspeakable love toward vs hath proceeded so farre, that he hath not spared his only begotten Sonne, but that he gave him for vs? than to rest in sure looking for saluation and eternall life, where we thinke upon Christ giuen of the Father, in whom such treasures are hidden? Heere they step in against vs, and crie out that it is certaine of assistance is not without arrogancie and presumption. But as nothing of our selves, so all things ought we to presume of God: and we are for none other reason spoiled of vaine glorie, but that we should learne to glorie in the Lord. What is there more? Consider (most mightie Prince) all the parts of our cause, and thinke that we are worse than any kind of wicked men, unless you plainly finde that we are in trouble and railed at, because we put our trust in the liuing God: because we beleue that this is the eternall life, to know one true God, and him whom he hath sent Jesus Christ. For this hope, some of vs are bound in iron, some are whipped, some are caried about in mockage, some are condemned without judgement, some are most cruelly tormented, some escape away by flight: but all are distressed with trouble, all are most terribly accused, some with slanders, and handled in most haينous wise. Now looke upon our adversaries (I speake of the degree of Priests, at whose becke and will the other exercise enimities against vs) and consider with me a little while, with what zeale they be carried. As for the true religion, which is taught in the Scriptures, and which ought to be holden certaine among all men, they easily give leave both to themselves and other to be ignorant of it, to neglect and despise it: and they thinke that it maketh small matter what every man beleue or not beleue concerning God and Christ, so that he doth with an unexpressed faith (as they call it) submit his minde to the judgement of the Church: neither are they much moued, if it happen that the glory of God be defiled with manifest blasphemies, so that no man lift up his finger against the supremacye of the Apostolike See, and authoritie of our holie mother the Church. Why therefore doe they with so great crueltie and fiercenesse fight for the Masse, Purgatorie, Pilgrimages, and such wises, so farre forth, that they say that without most expressed faith (as I may so call it) of these things, godlinesse cannot stand: where as yet they prooue not that any of these things come out of the word of God. Why so? but because their bellie is their god, their kitchen is their religion: which being taken away, they thinke that they shall not only be no Christians, but also no men. For though some of them doe plentifully glut themselves, and otherwise live with gnawing of poore crust, yet they live all of one pot, which without these warming helpes should not only waxe cold, but also broughtly freeze. Therefore how much more enuery of them is carefull for his belly, so much more earnest warrior he is for their faith. Finally nally they all endeavour themselves to this, to keepe still either both kingdome safe, and their belly full: but of pure zeale none of them sheweth any token, be it never so little. Neither yet so doe they cease to slander our doctrine, and by all the colours that they can, to accuse and disteme it, whereby they may bring it into hatred or suspicion. They call it new, and lately forg'd: they cavill that it is doubtfull, and uncertaine: they demand by what miracles it is confirmed: they aske whether it be meete that it should prevaile against the consent of so many holy fathers, and the most ancient customs: they presse upon us to confesse it to be schismaticall, which moveth warre against the Church, or that the Church hath lien dead in many ages, in which no such thing hath beene heard of. Last of all they say that there need no arguments, for (say they) it may by the fruits be judged of what sort it is, namely which hath bred so huge a heape of sects, so many turmoiles of seditions, so great licentiousnesse of vices. Truly full easie it is for them, to triumph upon a forsaken cause before the light-beleeving and ignorant multitude. But if we might also have our turne: likewise allowed us to speake; verily this sharpe beate would soon be cooled wherewith they doe so with full mouth and licentiously as unpunishedly foame against us.

First whereas they call it new, they doe great wrong to God, whose holy word deserved not to be accused of newnesse. To them indeede I nothing doubt that it is new, to whom Christ is new, and his Gospell is new. But they that knew that preaching of Paul to be old, that Jesus Christ died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our justification, shall finde nothing new among us. Whereas it hath long lien hidden, unknowne, and buried: that is the fault of the ungodlinesse of men. Now saith it is by the bountifullnesse of God restored to us, it ought at least by right of full restitution to receive againe the title of ancientie.

Out of the same fountaine of ignorance springeth this, that they take it for doubtfull and uncertaine. This verily is it which the Lord by his Prophet complaineth, that the ox knew his owner, and the asse his masters stall, but his people knew not him. But howsoever they wicke at the uncertaintie of it: if they were driven to seale their owne doctrine with their owne blood, and with losse of their life; men might see how much they set by it. But farre other is our assurance, which dreadeth neither the terrour of death, nor yet the very judgement seat of God.

Whereas they require miracles of us, they deal unreasonably with us. For we come wth new Gospell, but hold fast the selfe same Gospell, for confirming of the truth whereof, all the miracles doe serve that ever Christ and his Apostles have don. But this thing they have speciall above us, that they can even to this day confirme their faith with continuall miracles. Yea but rather they alleadge miracles, which may weaken a mind otherwise well established: they are so either trifling and worchie to be laughed at, or vaine and lying. And yet, although they were never so monstrous, they ought not to have been of any value against the word of God: forasmuch as the name of God ought both in every place and at every time: to be hallow'd, whether it be by miracles or by naturall order of things. This false colour might peradventure have made the better shew, if the Scripture did not informe us of the lawfull end and use of miracles. For, Marke teacheth that the signes which followed the preaching of the Apostles were set forth for the confirming of it: Likewise Luke also saith, that the Lord did beare witness: to the word of his grace, when signes and wonders were shewed by the hands of the Apostles. Wherewith wholly agreeth that saying of the Apostle, that when the Gospell was preached, salvation was confirmed by this, that the Lord did beare witness to it with signes, and wonders, and divers powers. But those things which we heare to be the sealings of the Gospell, shall we turne to the destroying of the credit of the Gospell? those things which are appointed only to stablish the truth, shall we apply to confirming of lies? Therefore it is meet that the doctrine, which (as the Evangelists saith) goeth before miracles, be first examined and tryed. If it be allowed, then it may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine (as Christ teacheth) this is the marke, if it tend not to the seeking of the glorie of man, but of God. With Christ affirmeth this to be the prooff of doctrine, miracles are wrongfully esteemed which are drawne to any other end than to glorifie the name of God alone. And we ought to remember that Sathan hath his miracles, which although they be juggling deceits rather than true powers: yet are such as may deceive the ignorant and unskillfull. Magicians and enchanters have bene alwaies famous in miracles: wonderfull miracles have nourished idolatrie: which yet do not prove to us, that the superstition of Magicians and idolaters is lawfull. And with this battering ram in the old time the Donatists did shake the simplicitie of the common people, for that they excelled in miracles. Therefore we doe now make the same answer to our adversaries, which Augustine then made to the Donatists: that the Lord hath made us warie against such miracle-workers, when he foretold that there should come false Prophets, which with lying signes, and divers wonders, should if it were possible, bring the elect into error. And Paul hath given warning that the kingdom of Antichrist should be with all power, and signes, and lying wonders. But these miracles (say they) are done not of idols, not of forcerers, nor of false Prophets, but of the Saints. As though we knew not that this is the craft of Satan, to transfigure himselfe into an Angell of light. In old time the Egyptians worshipp'd Jeremie, which was buried among them, with sacrifices, and other divine honours. Did not they abuse the holy Prophet of God to idolatry? And yet by such worshippings of his tombe, they obtained that they thought the healing of the stingings of the serpents, to be the just reward thereof. What shall we say: but that this hath bene, and ever shall be the most just vengeance of God, to send strength of illusion to them that have not received the love of truth, that they may beleeve lying? Therefore we want not miracles, and those certaine, and not subject to cavillations. As for miracles which they bring forth for themselves, they are mere illusions of Satan, forasmuch as they lead away the people from the true worshipping of their God, to vanity.

Moreover, they doe slanderously set the Fathers against us, (I meane the ancient Fathers and the writers of the age as yet more uncorrupted) as though they had them for maintainers of ungodlinesse: by whose authority if the debate were to be ended, the better part of the victorie (to speake even most modestly) would bend to our side. But where as many things have bene excellently well and wisely written of those Fathers, and in some things, that hath hapned to them which is wont to happen to men, those good natur'd children forsooth, according to the rightnesse that they have, both of wit, judgement, and minde, doe worship only their faults and errors: and those things which are well spoken, they either make not, or feigne as if they knew them not, or doe corrupt them: so as a man may say, that their care was altogether to gather dung in the gild of the Fathers. Then they oppress us with importunate crying out against us, as despisers and enemies of the Fathers. But we doe so not despise them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I could very easily prove by their consenting voyces, the greater part of these things that we say at this day. But we so read their writings, that we alway remember, that all things are ours, we serve us, not to have dominion over us: and that wee are Christs alone, whom we must obey in all things without exception. Who so keepeth not this choice, shall have nothing certaine in Religion: forasmuch as those holy men were ignorant of many things, doe oftentimes strive one with another, yea, and sometimes fight with themselves. Not without cause (say they) we are wined of Salomon, that we pisse not the old bounds which our Fathers have set. But there is not all one rule in the bounding of fields, and the obedience of faith, which ought to be so framed that it straiten her people, and the house of her father. If they have so great delight to use allegories, why do they not rather expound the Apostles, than any other to be their fathers, whose appointed bounds it is not lawfull to plucke up? For so did Hierome expound it, whose words they have registred among their Canon. But if they will have the bounds of the same Fathers, whom they meane, to be stedfastly kept: why doe they so oft as they list, so licentiously passe them? Of the number of the fathers were they, of whom the one said, that our God eateth not, nor drinketh, and that therefore he needeth neither cups nor dishes: the other said that the holy things require not gold, and that those things please not with gold, which are not bought with gold. Therefore they passe the bound, which are in the holy things so much delighted with gold, silver, ivory, marble, precious stones, and silke, and thinke that God is not rightly worshipp'd, unlesse altogether they bee dissolutely set out with exquisite gorgeousnesse, or rather with outrageous excessse. A Father was he which said, that hee therefore did freely eat flesh on the day in which other abstained, because hee was a Christian. Therefore they passe the bounds, when they accuse the soule that tasteth flesh in Lent. Fathers were they, of whom the one said, that a Monke which laboureth not with his hands, is judged as evill as a violent taker, or (if you will) a robber: the other said, that it is not lawfull for Monks to live of other mens goods, although they be continually busied in contemplation, in Prayers, in studie. This bound also they have passed, when they placed the idle and barrell bellies of Monks in stewes and broathel houses, to be fatt'd with other mens substance. A father was he, which said, that it is a horrible abomination to see any image painted, either of Christ or of any Saint in the temples of christians, Neither was this pronounced by the mouth of one man alone, but also decreed by an Ecclesiasticall Council, that that which is worshipp'd should should not be painted on walls. They are farre from holding themselves within these bounds, when they leave not one corner without images. Another Father counselled, that having done the duty of naturall kindnesse toward the dead in burying them, we should let them rest. These bounds they breake, when they cast into men a continuall carefulnesse of the dead. One of the Fathers was he, which testified that the substance of bread and wine in the Sacrament of the Supper so remaineth and ceaseth not, as in the Lord Christ remaineth the substance and nature of man joyued with the substance of God. Therefore they passe measure, which saigne that after the words of the Lord rehearsed, the substance of bread and wine ceaseth, thit it may be transubstantiate into his body and blood. Fathers were they, which as they delivered to the whole Church but one Sacrament of Thanksgiving, and as they debarred from it wicked and bairnus evill doers: so did grievously condemne all those, which being present did not communicate of it. How farre have they removed those bounds, when they fill not onely Churches, but also private houses with their masses, and admit all men to looke upon them, and every man so much more gladly, as he more largely payeth, how uncleane and wicked soever they be: but allure no man to faith in Christ, and faithfull communic'ing of the Sacraments: yea, rather doe boastingly set out to take their owne worke for the grace and merit of Christ. Fathers were they, of whom the one decreed, that they should be altogether debarred from the use of the holy Supper of Christ, which holding themselves contented with partaking of the one kinde, abstained from the other. And the other Father stoutly maintaineth, that to the Christian people the blood of the Lord ought not to be denied, for the confessi'ion whereof they are commanded to shed their owne blood. These bounds also they have taken away, when they have by an inviolable law commanded the selfe same thing which the one of these Fathers punished with excommunication, and the other reprov'd with a strong reason. A Father was he, which affirmed it to be rashnesse to determine any thing of a doubtfull matter on the one side or the other, without cleere and evident witnessings of the Scripture. This bound they forgot, when they established so many constitutions, so many canons, so many misterly determinations, without any word of God. A Father was he, which among other heresies reproached Montanus with this, that he was the first that had charged men with lawes of fasting. This bound also they have farre passed, when they commanded fasting with most straight lines. A Father was he, which denied that marriage ought to be forbidden to Ministers of the Church, and pronounced a mans lying with his owne wife to be chastity: And Fathers were they, which agreed to his authority. Beyond these bounds have they gone, when they severely enjoyed unmarried life to their sacrificers. A Father was he which judged, that onely Christ ought to be heard, of whom it is said, Here him: and that we ought not to have regards, what other men which were before us have said or done, but what Christ (which is the first of all) hath commanded. This bound neither doe they appoint to themselves, nor doe suffer other to have it appointed them, when they set both over themselves and other, any masters whatsoever they be, rather than Christ. A Father was hee, which affirmed that the Church ought not to sit it selfe before Christ, because he alway judged truly: but the judges of the Church, as men, are commonly deceived. They breaking through this bound also, sticke not to affirme, that the whole authority of the Scripture hangeth upon the awardment of the Church. All the Fathers have with one heart accused, and with one mouth pronounced it abominable, that the holy Word of God should be entangled with the subtilties of Sophisters, and brawlings of Logicians. Doe they hold themselves within these bounds, when they goe about nothing else in their whole life, but withendlesse strifes, and more than sophisticall brabbings: to wrap and encumber the simplicitie of the Scripture? so that if the Fathers were now raised to life againe, and should heare such an art of bawling, which these men call speculative Divinity, they would believe that nothing lesse is done than any disputation had of God. But my talke should spread it selfe beyond due bounds, if I would reckon up how boldly these men shake off the yoke of the Fathers, whose obedient children they would seeme to be, truly both moneths and yeares would be too little for me. And yet they are of so extreme and desperate shamelesse, that they dare blame us, for that we sticke not to passe the ancient bounds.

But now whereas they call us to custome, they nothing prev'ile. For we should be most unjustly dealt with, if we should be driven to yeeld to custome. Truly if the judgements of men were right, custome should be taken of the good. But it oftentimes hapeth that men doe otherwise. For, that which is seene to be done of many, by and by obtaineth the right of a custome.

stone. But the state of men hath so rarely at any time bene in so good case, that the better things pleased the greater number. Therefore for the most part of the private vices, of many hath bene made a publike error, or rather a common consent of vices, which now those good men would have to stand for a Law. Who so have eier, doe see that not onely one sea of evils hath overflowed, but many poisonous pestilences have invaded the world, that all things runne headlong to ruine: so that either the matters of men must be utterly despair'd, or wee must lay hand unto, or rather use violence upon so great evils. And remedie it by no other reason driven away, but because we have now long time accustomed us to evils. But be it that publike error have plie in matters of common weale: yet in the kingdomes of God his onely truth is to be heard and regarded, to which by no succeeding course of yeeres, by no custome, by no conspired agreement, may any prescription be limited. So in old time Esay taught the elect of God, that they should not say Conspiring, to all things in which the people said Conspiring: that is to say, that they should not conspire together to the wicked agreement of the people, nor should feare and dread the peoples feare: but rather that they should sanctifie the Lord of hosts, and he should be their feare and dread. Now therefore let them as much as they list object against us both passed and present ages, if we sanctifie the Lord of hosts, we will not be much afraid. For whether it be that many ages have consented to like ungodlinesse, hee is strong to take vengeance to the third and fourth generation: or if the whole world together conspire into one selfe same wickednes, he hath by experience taught what is the end of them that offend with the multitude, when he did with a general overflowing destroy the whole kind of men preserving Noe with a small household, which should by his faith being but one man condemne the whole world. Finally an evill custome, is none other than a common pestilence, in which they doe nevertheless die that die with companie of a multitude. Moreover they ought to have considered that which Cyprian saith in certaine places, that they which sin by ignorance, although they cannot cleare themselves from all fault, yet may seeme after some manner accountable: but who so obstinately refuse the sinne offered by the grace of God, they have nothing to pretend for their excuse.

As for their double horned argument, they doe not drive us to so hard a straight with it, to compell us to confesse, that either the Church hath lien dead a certaine time, or that wee have controversie against the Church. Truly the church of Christ hath lived and shall live, so long as Christ shall raigine at the right hand of the father: by whose hand she is upholden, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power she keepeth her safety. For hee will undoubtedly performe that which he hath once promised, that he will be present with his even untill the ending of the world. Against it now we have no warre at all. For we do with one consent together with all the people of the faithfull honour and worship the one God and Christ the Lord, in like sort as hee hath alway been worshipped of all the gady. But they themselves not a little way erre from the truth, when they acknowledge no church, but which they see with present eie, and goe about to compasse it about with those bounds in which it is not enclosed. Upon these points hangeth our controversie: first that they affirme that the forme of the church is alway appearing & to be seen: then that they set the same forme in the sea of the Church of Rome, and in the order of their prelates. We on the contrary side affirme, both that the church may consist of no appeering forme, and that the forme it selfe is not contained in that outward shining shew, which they foolishly have in admiration, but hath a farre other marke, namely, the pure preaching of the word of God, and the right ministracion of sacraments. They are in a rage, unless the church may be alwayes pointed out with a finger. But how oft hapned it in the people of the Jewes as hee is deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme thinke we to have shined, when Helias bewailed that he alone was left? How long since the coming of Christ hath it lien hid without forme? How since that time hath it been so oppressed with wars, seditions, and heresies that it shined out on no side? If they had lived at that time, would they have beleeved that there was any Church? but it was said to Helias, that there were preserved seven thousand men, which had not bowed their knee before Baal. Neither ought it to be doubtfull to us, but that Christ hath alway reigned in earth since he ascended into heaven. But if the gady had their sight any discernable forme with their eies, should they not by and by have been discouraged? And verily Hilarie accounted it even already in his time for a most great fault, that being occupied with the foolish admiration of the dignitie of Bishops, they marked not a deadly pestilence lurking under that vjor. For thus he saith: One thing I wonne you beware of Antichrist: for you are ill taken with the love of wals: ye doe ill worship the Church of God in houses and buildings: under them ye do ill thrust in the name of peace. It is doubtfull that in those, Antichrist shall sit. Mountaines, and woods, and lakes, and prisons, and caves are safer for me. For in these the Prophets, when they were either abiding or throwne into them, did prophesie. But what doth the world at this day honour in his horned bishops, but that it thinketh them to be the holy Prelats of Religion, whom it seeth to be heads over great Cities? Away therefore with such foolish esteeming. But rather let us leave this to the Lord, for as much as he alone knoweth who be his, and sometime also taketh away from the sight of men the outward knowledge of his Church. That is (I grant) a horrible vengeance of God upon the earth. But if the wickednesse of men so deserve, why doe we seeke to withstand the just vengeance of God? In such wise the Lord both in times past hath taken vengeance of the unthankfulness of men. For because they would not receive his truth, and had quenched his light, he suffered them being blinded in sense, both to be mocked with lies full of absurdity, and to be drowned in deepe darknesse, so that there was no face of the true Church to be seene. Yet in the meane time he saved his both being scattered abroad, and lying hidden in the midst of errors and darknesse, from destruction. And no marvell, For he can skill to save both in the very confusion of Babylon, and in the flame of the burning oven. But whereas they would have the forme of the Church to be judged by I wote not what vaine pompous shew: how perillous that is, I will rather point unto, than declare, lest I should draw out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolike See, and the Bishops that are anointed and consecrate by him, so that they be trimmed with fillets and Miters, doe represent the Church, and ought to be taken for the Church: and therefore they cannot erre. How so? Because they are Pastors of the Church, and consecrate to the Lord. And were not Aaron and the other Rulers of Israel also Pastors? But Aaron and his sonnes after that they were made Priests, did yet erre when they made the Calfe. After this reason, why should not the foure hundred Prophets which tied to Achab, have represented the Church? But the Church was on Micheas side, being indeed but one man alone, and unregarded, but out of whose mouth came truth. Did not the false Prophets in resemblance beare both the name and face of the Church, when they did with one violent assault rise up against Jeremy, and with threatening boasted that it was not possible that the Law should perishe from the Priest, counsell from the wise man, the word from the Prophet? Jeremy alone was sent against the whole company of the Prophets, to declare from the Lord, that it should come to passe, that the Law should perishe from the Priest, counsell from the Wise man, and the word from the Prophet. Did not such a glistening shew shine in that counsell which the Bishops, Scribes, and Pharisees assembled, to take advise together for the killing of Christ? Now let them goe and sticke fast in the outward visor, that they may make Christ and all the Prophets of God, schismatike: and on the other side make the ministers of Satan, the instruments of the Holy Ghost. If they speake as they thinke, let them faithfully answer me, in what nation and place they thinke that the Church remained since the time that by the decrees of the Councell at Basile, Eugenius was thrust downe and deprived from the estate of Pope, and Aymee set in his place. They cannot, though they would burst for it, deny that the Councell, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawfull, and summoned not onely of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of schisme, rebellion, and obstinacie, with the whole stocke of Cardinals and Bishops, which had with him practised the dissolution of the Councell. Yet afterward being borne up by the favour of Princes, he recovered his Papacie safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had bene orderly made by the authority of a generall and holy Synode, vanished away in a smoke; saying that he himselfe was appeall with a Cardinals hat, as it were a barking dogge with a peece of bread cast unto him. Out of the bosome of these heretikes, rebels, and obstinates, are proceeded all the Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Abbts, and Priests, that have bene since. Here they are taken, and can goe no further. For to whether side will they give the name of the Church? Will they deny that the Councell was generall, which wanted nothing to the outward Majestie: namely, which being solemnly summoned by two Bulls, and well framed in the order of all things, continued in the same dignity to the last end? Will they confesse Eugenius with all his company a schismatike, by whom they all are sanctified? Therefore either let them otherwise define the forme of the Church, or they all, as many as there are of them, shall be of us accounted schismatikes, which wittingly and willingly have bene ordered of Heretikes. If it had never before bene knowne that the Church is not bound to outward pompes, they themselves may be to us a large proofe, which wonder that glorious title of the Church have so long so proudly boasted themselves, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the Church. I speake not of their manners, and those tragick doings wherewith their whole life smarmeth still: because they say, that they be the Pharisees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if you will spare some of your leisure to reade our writings, you shall plainly know that the very doctrine, the doctrine it selfe, for the which they say that they be the Church, is a deadly butcherie of soules, the firebrand, ruine, and destruction of the Church.

Finally, they doe not uprightly enough, when they doe spitefully rehearse how great troubles, uproares, and contentions, the preaching of our doctrine hath drawne with it, and what fruits it now beareth in many. For the blame of these evils is unworthily laid upon it which ought rather to have beene imputed to the malice of Satan. This it is as it were a certaine naturall property of the Word of God, that whensoever it riseth up, Satan is never quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most trusty marke, whereby it is discerned from lying doctrine, which doe easily shew forth themselves, when they are received with favourable eares of all men, and are heard of the world rejoycing at them. So in certaine ages past, when all things were drowned in deep darknesse, the Lord of this world made a sport and a play in manner of all men, and lay idle and tooke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in sound peace. For, what should he else do but laugh and play, being in quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdome? But when the light shinning from above somewhat scattered abroad his darknesse, when that strong man troubled and assailed his kingdome, then he began to shake off his wonted drowsinesse, and hastily to arme himselfe. And first he stirred up the force of men, whereby he might violently oppresse the truth beginning to shine. By which when he nothing prevailed, he turned to subtil entrapplings. He stirred up dissensions and disagreements of doctrine by his Catabaptists, and other monstrous lewd men, whereby he might darken it, and at length utterly quench it. And now he continueth to assaile it with both engines. For he travaileth both by the force and power of men to plucke up that seed: and with his darrell (as much as in him lieth) to choke it, that it may not grow and beare fruit. But all this he doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his craft unto us, that he should not take us in amare, and hath armed us with sufficient defences against all his engines. But how great malignnesse is it to lay upon the Word of God, the hatred either of the seditions, which naughty and rebellious men doe stirre up, or the sects which deceivers doe raise against it? Yet it is no new example, Elias was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the Jewes a seditions man. The Apostles were accused of making a commotion among the people. What other thing do they which at this day do father upon us all the troubles, uproares & contentions that boile up against us? But what is to be answered to such, Elias hath taught us: namely, that it is not we that scatter errors, or stir up uproares: but it is they themselves which wrestle against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to beat backe their rashnesse, so againe we ought to meet with the weaknesse of other, who oftentimes happen to be moved with such offences, and in their dismying to waver. But let them, to the end that they may not faint with this dismying, and be discouraged, know that the Apostles in their time felt by experience the same things that now happen unto us. There were unlearned & trustedfast men, which wrestled to their owne destruction, those things that Paul had written by the inspiration of God as Peter saith. There were despisers of God, that when they heard that sin abounded, to the end that grace might more abound, by and by objected; We will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When they heard that the faithfull are not under the law, they by and by answered, We will then saine, because we are not under the Law but under grace. There were that accused him as an exhorter to evil. There entred privily many false Apostles to destroy the Churches which he had builded. Some by envie and contention, and not purely, yea, and maliciously preached the Gospell, thinking to adde more affliction to his bands. Somewhere the Gospell not much profited. All sought their owne, and not the things of Jesus Christ. Some went backward, dogs to their vomit, and swine to their wallowing in the mire. The most part did draw the libertie of the spirit to the licentiousnesse of the flesh. Many brethren crept in, by whom there came afterward great danger to the godly. Among the brethren themselves were many strifes raised up. What should the Apostles have done in this case? Should they not either have dissembled for a time, or rather altogether have given over and forsaken the Gospell, which they

law to be the seed-plot of so many contentions, the matter of so many dangers, the occasion of so many offences? No. But for helpe in such distresses this came in their mind, that Christ is the stone of stumbling, and rocke of offence, set into the ruine and rising againe of many, and for a signe that should be spoken against. With which affiance they being armed, went forward boldly through all dangers of uproares and offences. With the same thought we ought also to be upholden, forasmuch as Paul testifieth, that this is the perpetuall property of the Gospell, to be the favour of death unto death to them that perish, although it were ordained to this use, that it should be the favour of life unto life, and the power of God unto the salvation of the faithfull: which verily we should also feele, if we did not with our unthankfulnesse corrupt this so singular a benefit of God, and turne that to our owne destruction, which ought to have bene to us the onely defence of our safety.

But now I returne to you, my Sovereaign Lord. Let those false reports nothing move you, by which our adversaries travell to cast you in feare of us, with saying that by this new Gospell (for so they call it) nothing is hunted for and sought, but sit occasion of seditions, and unpunished liberty of vices. For our God is not the Author of division, but of peace; and the Sonne of God is not the minister of sinne, which came to destroy all the works of the Devill. And we are unworthily accused of such desires, whereof we never gave any suspection, were it never so small. It is likely that we forsooth doe practise the overthrowing of kingdomes, of whom there hath never bene heard any one seditious word, whose life hath ever bene knowne quiet and simple, when we lived under you, and which now being chased from home; yet cease not to pray for all things prosperous to you and your kingdome. It is likely forsooth that we hunt for licentiousnesse of vices, in whose behaviours although many things may be found faulty, yet there is nothing worthy of so great reproaching; neither have we with so ill successe (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospell, but that our life may be to these back-biters an exemplar of chastitie, liberality, mercy, temperance, patience, modestie, and whatsoever other vertue. Verily it is by the prooffe it selfe evident; that we doe unsainedly feare and worship God, forasmuch as we desire that his name be hallowed both by our life and our death: and envie it selfe is compelled to beare of some of us a witness of innocencie and civill uprightnesse, in whom this onely thing was punished with death, which ought to have bene accounted for a singular praise. But if any under pretence of the Gospell doe stirre up tumults, (as hitherto it hath not bene found, that there have bene any such in your Realme) if any pretend the liberty of the grace of God to defend the licentiousnesse of their vices, (of which sort I have knowne many) there be lawes, and penalties of lawes, by which they may according to their deservings be sharply punished: yet so, that in the meane time the Gospell of God be not evill spoken off, for the wickednesse of naughty men. Thus have you (O King) the venomous injustice of the slanderers largely enough declared, that you may not with an care of too easie beleefe bend to their reports. I feare me also lest it be too largely set out, forasmuch as this Preface is in a manner come to the quantity of a whole Booke of defence, whereby I intended not to make a defence in deed, but onely to mollifie your minde aforehand, to give audience to the disclosing of our cause: which your minde, though it be now turned away and estranged from us, yet, and enslaved against us, yet we trust that we shall be able to recover the favour thereof, if you shall once have without displeasure and troublesome affection, read over this our confession, which we will to be in stead of a defence for us to your Majestie. But if the whisperings of the malicious doe so possesse your eares, that there is no place for accused men to speake for themselves: and if those outrageous furies doe still, with your winking at them, exercise cruelty with prisoning, tormenting, cutting and burning; we shall indeed, as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, be brought to all extremities; yet so that in our patience we shall possesse our soules, and wait for the strong hand of the Lord: which shall without doubt be present in time, and stretch forth it selfe armed, both to deliver the poore out of affliction, and to take vengeance on the despisers, which now triumph with so great assurednesse.

The Lord the King of Kings stablish your throne with righteousnesse, to the Reader.

JOHN CALVINE

T the first setting out of this worke, because I did not looke for that successe, which the Lord of his unmeasurable goodnesse hath given, I had (as men use to doe in small works) for the most part lightly passed it over. But when I understood that it was received with that favour of all the godly, which I never durst have desired, much lesse have hoped for; as I verily felt in my heart that much more was given to me than I had deserved, so I thought it should be a great unthankfulnesse if I should not at the least after my slender ability endeavour to answer so favourable affections toward me; and which of themselves provoked my diligence. And this I attempted not onely in the second setting forth of it: but how often since that time the worke had bene imprinted, so oft it hath bin enriched with some encrease. But although I did not then repent me of the labour that I had employed: yet I never held my selfe contented, till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Now I trust I have given you that which may be allowed by all your judgements. Truly with how great endeavour I have applied my selfe to the doing of this service to the Church of God, I may bring forth for an evident witness, that this last Winter, when I thought that the Feaver Quarrane had summoned mee to death, how much more the sicknesse enforced upon me, so much lesse I spared my selfe, till I might leave this booke to over-live me, which might make some part of thankfull recompence to so gentle provoking of the godly, I had rather indeed it had bene done sooner: but it is soone enough, if well enough. And I shall then thinke that it is come abroad in good season, when I shall perceive that it hath brought yet more plentiful fruit, than it hath done heretofore to the Church of God. This is my onely desire. And truly full ill it were with me, if I did not holding my selfe contented with the allowance of God alone, despise the judgement of men, whether they be the foolish & froward judgements of the unskillfull, or the wrongfull and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath thorowly settled my minde to the endeavour both of enlarging his kingdome, and of helping the common profit: and though I am cleere in mine owne conscience, and have himsele and the Angels to witness with me, that since I tooke upon me the office of a teacher in the Church, I have tended to none other purpose but that I might profit the Church in maintaining the doctrine of godlinesse: yet I thinke there is no man that hath bene snatched at, biten and torne in sunder with more slanders than I. When my Epistle was now printing, I was certainly informed that at Angsburgh where the assembly of the states of the Empire was holden, there was a rumour spread abroad of my revolting to the Papacie, and the same was more greedily received in the Courts of Princes than was meet. This forsooth is their thankfulness who are not ignorant of many trials had of my steadfastnesse, which trials as they shake off so foule a slander, so they should with all indifferent and gentle Judges have defended me from it. But the Devill with his whole rout is deceived, if in oppressing me with filthy lies, hee thinke that by his unjust dealing I shall be either the more discouraged or made the lesse diligent: because I trust that the Lord of his unmeasurable goodness will grant me that I may with even sufferance continuē in the course of his holy calling. Whereof I give to the godly Readers a new prooffe in this setting forth this booke. Now in this travell, this was my purpose so to prepare and furnish them that be studious of holy Divinitie to the reading of the Word of God, that they may both have an easie entrie into it, and goe forward in it without stumbling: for I thinke that I have in all points so knit up together the summe of Religion, and disposed the same in such order, that whosoever shall well have it in minde, it shall not bee hard for him to determine both what hee ought chiefly to seeke in Scripture: and to what marke to apply whatsoever is contained in it. Therefore this as it were a way being once made plaine, if I shall hereafter set forth any expositions of Scripture, because I shall not need to enter into long disputations of articles of doctrine, and to wander out into common places: I will alway knit them up shortly. By this meane the godly Reader shall be eased of great paine and tediousnesse, so that hee come furnished aforehand with the knowledge of this present worke, as with a necessary instrument. But because the intent of this purpose, doth cleerely as in mirrors appeare in so many commentaries of mine, I had rather to declare indeed what it is, than to set it out in words. Farewell friendly Reader, and if thou receive any fruit of my labours, helpe mee with thy prayers to God our Father.

THE FIRST CHAPTER.

That the knowledge of God and of our selves, are things conijuncted : and how they be linked the one to the other.

THe whole summe in a manner of allour wisdome, which onely ought to be accounted true and perfect wisdome, consisteth in two parts, that is to say, The knowledge of God, and of our selves. But whereas these two knowledges be with many bonds linked together ; yet whether goeth before or engendreth the other, it is hard to discern. For first, no man can looke upon himselfe, but he must needs by and by turne all his senses to the beholding of God, in whom he liveth and is moved : because it is plaine, that those gifts wherewith we be endued, are not of our selves, yea, even that we have being is nothing else but an essence in the one God. Finally, by these good things that are as by drop-meale powred into us from heaven, we are led as it were by certaine streames to the spring head. And so by our owne needinesse, better appeareth that infinite plentie of good things that abideth in God. Specially that miserable ruine, wherinto the fall of the first man hath throwne us, compelleth us to lift up our eyes, nor onely being foodlesse and hungry, to crave from thence that which we lacke, but also being awakened with feare, to learne humility. For as there is found in man a certaine world of all miseries, and since we have bene spoiled of the divine apparell, our shamefull nakednesse discloseth an infinite heape of filthy disgracements : it must needs be that every man be pricked with knowledge in conscience of his owne unhappinesse, to make him come at the least unto some knowledge of God. So by the understanding of our ignorance, vanity, beggery, weaknesse, perversnesse, and corruption, wee learne to reknowledge, that no where else but in the Lord abideth the true light of wisdome, sound veritie, perfect abundance of all good things, and purity of righteousnesse. And so by our owne evils we are stirred to consider the good things of God : and we cannot earnestly aspire toward him, untill we beginne to mislike our selves. For of all men what one is there, that would not willingly rest in himselfe ? Yea, who doth not rest, so long as hee knoweth not himselfe, that is to say, so long as he is contented with his owne gifts, and ignorant or unmindfull of his owne misery ? Therefore every man is by the knowledge of himselfe, not onely pricked forward to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him.

2. Again, it is certaine, that man never commeth unto the true knowledge of himselfe, unlesse he hath first beholden the face of God, and from beholding thereof doe descend to looke into himselfe. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in us) wee alway thinke our selves righteous, innocent, wise, and holy, untill that with manifest proofes wee be convinced of our unrighteousnesse, filthinesse, folly, and uncleannesse. But we are not convinced thereof, if we looke upon our selves only, and not upon God also, who is the onely rule whereby this judgement ought to be tried. For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrisie, therefore a certaine vaine resemblance of righteousness doth abundantly content us in stead of righteousness indeed. And because there appeareth nothing among us, nor about us, that is not defiled with much filthinesse, therefore that which is somewhat lesse filthy pleaseth us as though it were most pure, so long as we hold our selves within the bounds of mans uncleannesse. Like as the eye which is used to see nothing but blacke, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, wee may yet more plainly discern by our bodily sense how much we are blinded in considering the powers of the soule. For if at mid-day wee either looke downe upon the ground, or behold those things that round about lie open before our eyes, then we thinke our selves to have very assured and piercing force of sight: but when we looke up to the Sunne, and behold it with fixed eyes, then that same sharpnesse that was of great force upon the ground, is with so great brightnesse by and by dazeled and confounded, that wee are compelled to confesse, that the same sharpsight which we had in considering earthly things, when it commeth to the Sunne, is but mere dulnesse. Even so commeth it to passe in weighing our spirituall good things. For while we looke no further than the earth, so long being contented with our owne righteousness, wisdom and strength, we doe sweetly flatter our selves, and thinke us in manner halfe gods. But if wee once beginne to raise up our thought unto God, and to weigh what a one he is, and how exact is the perfection of his righteousness, wisdom, and power, after the rule whereof we ought to be framed: then that which before did please us in our selves with false pretence of righteousness, shall become loathsome to us as greatest wickednesse: then that which did marvellously deceive us under colour of wisdom, shall sinke before us as extreme folly: then that which did beare the face of strength shall be proved to be most miserable weaknesse. So slender doth that, which in us seemeth even most perfect, answer in proportion to the purenesse of God.

3. Here of proceedeth that trembling and amazenesse, wherewith the Scripture in many places reciteth that the holy men were stricken and astonished so oft as they perceived the presence of God. For when wee see that they which in his absence did stand assured and unmoved, so soone as he discloseth his glory, beginne so to quake, and are so dismayed, that they fall downe, yea are swallowed up, and in manner are destroyed with feare of death: it is to be gathered thereby, that man is never sufficiently touched and inwardly moved with knowledge of his owne basenesse, untill hee have compared himselfe to the Majestie of God. But of such dismay we have often examples both in the Judges and in the Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: We shall die, because the Lord hath appeared vnto us. And therefore the history of Iob, to throw men downe with knowledge of their owne folly, weaknesse, and uncleannesse, bringeth alway his principall proove from describing Gods wisdom, strength, and clean: esse. And that not without cause. For we see how Abraham, the nearer that hee came to behold the glory of God, the better acknowledged himselfe to be earth and dust. We see how Elias could not abide to tarry his comming to him with uncovered face: so terrible is the beholding of him. And what may man doe that is but corruption and a worme, when even the Cherubins for very feare must hide their faces? Even this is it that the Prophet Ezra speaketh of: The Sunne shall blush, and the Moone shall be ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reigne, that is to say, when hee displayeth his brightnesse, and bringeth it nearer to sight, then in comparision thereof the brightest thing of all shall be darkned. But howsoever the knowledge of God and of our selves are with mutuall knot linked together, yet the order of right teaching requieth, that first we intreat of the knowledge of God, and afterward come downe to speake of the knowledge of our selves

THE SECOND CHAPTER.

What it is to know God, and to what end tends: be the knowledge of him.

I Meane by the knowledge of God, not onely that knowledge, whereby we conceive that there is some God, but also that, whereby we learne so much as behoveth us to know of him, and as is profitable for his glory: finally so much as is expedient For, to speake properly, we cannot say that God is knowne where there is no religion nor godlinesse. But here I doe not yet touch that speciall kinde of knowledge whereby those men that are in themselves reprobate and accursed, do conceive God the Redeemer in Christ the Mediator: but I speake onely of that first and simple manner of knowledge, whereunto the very order of nature would have led us, if Adam had continued in state of innocencie. For although no man, such mankinde is in this ruine, can perceive God to be either a father, or author of salvation, or in any wise favourable, unlesse Christ come as a meane to pacifie him towards us: yet it is one thing to feele, that God our Maker doth by his power sustaine us, by his providence governe us, by his goodnesse nourish us, and endue us with all kinds of blessings; and another thing to embrace the grace of reconciliation offered us in Christ. Whereas therefore the Lord first simply appeareth as well by the making of the world, as by the generall doctrine of the Scripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Christ to be the Redeemer: hereupon arise two sorts of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, and then the other shall orderly follow in the place fit for it. For although our minde cannot conceive the knowledge of God, but that it must give to him some kinde of worship, yet shall it not be sufficient simply to know that it is he onely that ought to be honoured and worshipped of all men, unlesse we be also perswaded that he is the fountaine of all good things, to the end that we should seeke for nothing else where but in him. I meane hereby, not onely for that as he hath once created this world, so by his infinite power he sustaineth it, by his wisdom he governeth it, by his goodnesse hee preserveth it, and specially mankinde he ruleth by his righteousnesse and judgement, suffereth by his mercy, and savegardeth by his defence: but also because there can no where be found any one drop either of wisdom, or of light, or of righteousnesse, or of power, or of uprightnesse, or of sincere truth, which floweth not from him, or whereof he is not the cause: to this end verily, that we should learne to looke for and crave all these things at his hand, and with thanksgiving account them received of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to use meere schoolmaster of godlinesse, out of which springeth Religion: Godlinesse I call a reverence of God, joynd with love of him, which is procured by knowledge of his benefits. For men will never with willing obedience submit themselves to God, untill they perceive that they owe all things to him, that they are nourished by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, so that nothing is to be sought elsewhere than in him. Yea, they will never yeeld themselves truly and with all their heart wholly to him, unlesse they assuredly beleve that in him is perfect felicity reposed for them.

2. Therefore they doe but trifle with vaine speculations, which in intreating of this question, doe make it their purpose to discusse what thing God is, where it rather behoveth us to know what manner one he is, and what agreeth with his nature. For to what end serveth it to confesse as the Epicure doth, that there is a God, which doth one delight himselfe with idlenesse, having no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know such a God with whom we have nothing to doe? But rather the knowledge of him ought to serve to this end, first to frame us to feare and reverence: then that by it guiding and teaching us, wee may learne to crave all good things at his hand, and to account them received of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy minde, but that thou must therewithall by and by thinke, that forasmuch as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right subject and bound to his authority, that thou oweit him thy life, that whatsoever thou enterprisest, whatsoever thou doest, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truly it followeth that thy life is perverly corrupted if it be not framed to obeying of him, forasmuch as his will ought to be our law to live by. Againe, thou canst not cleerly see him, but that thou must needs know that hee is the fountaine and originall of all good things, whereupon should grow both a desire to cleave unto him, and an assured trust in him, if mans owne corruptnesse did not draw his minde from the right searching of him. For first of all, the godly minde doth not as by a dreame imagine to her selfe any God at adventure; but stedfastly beholdeth the onely one and true God: and doth not falsly forge of him whatso ever her selfe liketh, but is content to beleewe him to be such a one as he discloseth himselfe, and doth alway with great diligence beware that with presumptuous rashnesse she passe not beyond his will, and so wander out of the way. And when she so knoweth him, because she understandeth that he governeth all things, she assuredly trusteth that he is her safe keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth her selfe to his faith, because she understandeth that he is the authour of all good things: therefore if any thing trouble her, or if she want any thing, by and by she flieth to him for succour, looking for helpe at his hand. Because she is perswaded that he is good and mercifull, therefore with assured confidence she resteth on him, and doubteth not in all her evils to finde ready remedy in his mercifull kindnesse. Because she knoweth him to bee her Lord and father, therefore shee determineth that hee is worthy that shee should in all things have regard to his authority, reverence his majesty, procure the advancement of his glory, and obey his commandemens. Because she seeth that he is a righteous Judge, and armed with his severity to punish sinners, therefore she alway setteth his judgement feare before her eyes, and with feare of him withdraweth and restraineth her selfe from provoking his wrath. Yet is she not so afraid with the feeling of his judgement, that she would convey her selfe from it, although there were a way open to escape it: but rather she doth no lesse love him, while he extendeth vengeance upon the wicked, then while he is beneficiall to the good, forasmuch as she understandeth that it doth no lesse belong to his glory, that he hath in store punishment for the wicked and euill doers, than that he hath reward of eternall life for the righteous. Moreouer shee doth not for onely feare of punishment refraine her selfe from sinning: but because she loveth and reverenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoureth him as her Lord, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet she dreadeth his onely displeasure. Now behold what is the pure and true religion, even faith joyned with an earnest feare of God, so that feare may containe in it a willing reverence, and draw with it a right forme of worshipping, such as is appointed in the law. And this is the more heedfully to be noted, because all men generally doe worship God, but few doe reuerence him, while each where is great pompous shew in ceremonies, but the purenesse of heart is rare to be found.

3. Truly, they that judge rightly, will alway hold this for certaine, that there is graven in the minds of men a certaine feeling of the God-head, which never can be blotted out. Yea, that this perswasion, that there is a God, is even from their generation naturally planted in them, and deeply rooted within their bones, the very obstinacie of the wicked is a substantiall witness, which with their furious striving, yet can never winde themselves out of the feare of God. Although Diagoras and such other doe jest and laugh at all that hath in all ages bene beleevd concerning religion: although Dionysius doe scoffe at the heavenly judgement: yet that is but a laughter from the teeth forward, because inwardly the worme of conscience gnaweth them much more sharply than all hot searing irons. I alledge not this that Cicero saith, that errors by continuance of time grow out of use, and religion daily more and more encrease and waxeth better. For the world (as a little hereafter we shall have occasion to shew) travelleth as much as in it lyeth to shake off all knowledge of God, and by all meanes to corrupt the worshipping of him. But this onely I say, that when the dull hardnesse which the wicked do desirously labour to get to despise God withall, doth lie pinningly in their hearts, yet the same feeling of God, which they would most of all desire to have utterly destroyed, liveth still, and sometime doth utter it selfe: whereby we gather that it is no such doctrine as is first to be learned in Schooles, but such a one whereof every man is a teacher to himselfe even from his mothers wombe, and such a one as nature suffereth none to forget, although many bend all their endeavour to shake it out of their minde. Now, if all men be borne and doe live to this end, to know God, and the knowledge of God is but fickle and lightly vanisheth away, unlesse it proceed thus farre: it is evident, that they all swerve out of kinde from the law of their creation, that doe not direct to this marke all the whole thoughts and doings of their life. Of which the Philosophers themselves were not ignorant. For Plato meant nothing else, when he oftentimes taught, that the soveraigne good of the soule is the likeness of God, when the soule having throughly conceived the knowledge of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore very aptly doth Grillus reason in Plinarch, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion be once taken from their life, are not onely nothing better than brut beasts, but also many wayes much more miserable, for that being subiect to so many sorts of evils, they continually draw forth a troublesome unquiet life: and therefore the worshipping of God is the onely thing that maketh them better than brut beasts, by which alone they aspire to immortality.

In Phedrone
& thetereo.

THE THIRD CHAPTER.

That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.

WE hold it out of controversie, that there is in the minde of man, even by naturall instinction, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the end that no man should flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himselfe hath planted in all men a certaine understanding of his divine Majestic, the remembrance whereof, with powring in now and then as it were new drops, he continually reneweth: that when all, not one excepted, doe know that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all be condemned by their owne testimony, for that they have not both worshipped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truly if the not knowing of God be any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where else be any example of it more than among the grossest sorts of people and farthest from civill order of humanity. But (as the heathen man saith) there is no nation so barbarous, no kinde of people so savage, in whom resteth not this perswasion that there is a God. And even they that in other parts of their life seeme very little to differ from brut beasts, yet doe continually keepe a certaine seed of Religion. So throughly hath this common principle possessed all mens minds, and so fast it sticketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath beene no Countrey, no City, yea, no house, that could be without religion, in this is implied a certaine secret confession, that a feeling of the Godhead is written in the hearts of all men. Yea, and idolatry it selfe is a substantiall proofe of this perswasion. For we know how unwillingly man abaseth himselfe to honour other creatures above himselfe. Therefore when he had rather worship a blocke and a stone, than he would be thought to have no God, it appeareth that this imprinted perswasion of Gods is of most great force, which is impossible to be razed out of the minde of man, that it is much more easie to have the affection of nature broken, as indeed it is broken when man from his owne naturall swelling pride of his owne will, stoopeth downe even to the basest creatures to honour God.

Why God hath imprinted some knowledge of himselfe in all mens minds, as
that all nations,
even idolaters themselves doe
prove.

nat. Deor.

2. Wherefore it is most vaine which some doe say, that religion was devised by the subtilty and craft of a few, by this policie, to keepe the simple people in awe, whereas they themselves that procured others to worship God, beleevd nothing lesse than that there was any God at all. I grant indeed that subtil men have invented many things in Religion, whereby to bring the people to a reverence, and cast them in a feare, to make their minds the more pliable to obedience: But this they could never have brought to passe, unlesse the minds of men had bene already before hand perswaded that there was a God, out of which perswasion as out of seed springeth that ready inclination to religion. Neither is it likely that even they which subtilly deceived the simple sort with colour of religion, were themselves altogether without knowledge of God. For though in times past there have beene some, and at this day there arise up many that deny that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes feele that which they are desirous not to know. We reide of none that ever did breake forth into more presumptuous and unbrideled despising of God, than Caius Caligula: yet

Yes, they which

ably be denied.

none more miserably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appeared. And so against his will he quaked for feare of him whom of wilfull purpose he endeyoured to despise. And the same may a man commonly see to happen to such as he was. For the bolder despiser of God that any man is, the more is he troubled at the very noise of the falling of a leafe. And whence commeth that, but from the revengement of Gods majesty, which doth so much the more vehemently strike their consciences as they more labour to flie away from it? They doe indeed looke about for all the starting holes that may be, to hide themselves from the presence of the Lord: but whether they will or no, they are still holden fast tied. For howsoever sometime it seemeth to vanish away for a moment, yet it often returneth againe, and with new assault doth run upon them: so that the rest which they have, if they have any at all, from torment of conscience, is much like to the sleepe of drunkards or franticke men, which even while they sleepe doe not quietly rest, because they are at every moment vexed with horrible and dreadfull dreames. Therefore the very ungodly themselves serve for an example to prove that there alway liveth in all mens minds some knowledge of God.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER.

*The evanionis
which superstitious persons have of God, cannot be excused for that they are the
owne blindness.*

BUT as experience teacheth that God hath sowne the seed of religion in all men, so scarcely may be found the hundreth man, that having it conceived in his heart doth cherish it, but no man in whom it ripeneth, so farre is it off, that any fruit appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that some become vaine in their owne superstitions, or that some doe of set purpose maliciously revolt from God; yet all doe runne out of kinde from the true knowledge of him. So cometh it to passe that there remaineth no true godlinesse in the world. But whereas I said that some by errour fall into superstition, I meane not thereby as though their simplicity might excuse them from blame, because the blindness that they have, is commonly alway mingled both with proud vanity and with stubbornesse. Vanity and the same joynd with pride appeareth in this, that they miserable men both in the seeking of God, doe not climbe above themselves as they ought to have done, but measure him according to the proportion of their owne fleshy dulnesse, and also neglecting the sound manner of searching for him, doe curiously flie to vaine speculations. And so they conceive him not such a one as he offereth himselfe, but doe imagine him such a one as of their owne rash presumption they have forged him. Which gulfe being once opened, what way soever they stirre their feet, they must needs alway runne headlong into destruction. For whatsoever afterward they goe about toward the worshipping and service of God, they cannot account it done to him, because they worship him not, but rather the device of their owne heart, and their owne dreame in stead of him. This perversnesse doth Paul expressly touch, where he saith, That they were made fooles when they coveted to be wise. He had before said, that they were made vaine in their imaginations: but lest any man should thereby excuse them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded because not contented with sobriety, but presumptuously taking upon themselves more than they ought, they wilfully bring darknesse upon them, yea with vaine and forward pride doe make themselves fooles. Whereupon followeth, that their foolishnesse is not excusable, whereof the cause is not onely vaine curiosity, but also a greedinesse to know more than is meet for them; joynd with a false confidence.

2. As for this that David saith, That the wicked and mad men thinke in their hearts, that there is no God: First that it is meant onely of those that choaking the light of nature; doe of purpose make themselves senselesse, as we shall see againe a litle hereafter. Even as we see that many after that they have beene hardened with boldnesse and custome of sinning, doe furiously put from them all the remembrance of God, which yet is by very feeling of nature inwardly ministred into their minds. Now David, to make their madnesse the more detestable, bringeth them in as though they precisely denied, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but because in taking from him his judgement and providence, they shut him up idle in heaven. For whereas nothing lesse agreeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the government of the world, and leave it to fortune, to winke at the finnes of men, so as they may live in licentious outrage unpunished; whosoever he be that quenching the feare of the heavenly judgement, doth carelesly follow his owne affections, he denieth that there is a God. And this is the just vengeance of God, to draw a faineesse over their hearts, so that the wicked when they have once closed their eyes, even in seeing may not see. And David in another place is the best expounder of his owne meaning, where he saith: That the feare of God is not before the eyes of the wicked. Againe, that in their evill doings they proudly rejoyce at themselves, because they perswade themselves that God doth not looke upon them. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowledge some God, yet they doe rob him of his glory, in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witnesseth) cannot deny himselfe, because he continually abideth like himselfe: so it is truly said, that these men in faining God to be a dead and vaine image, doe deny God. Moreover it is to be noted, that although they wrestle against their owne naturall feeling, and do desire not onely to shake out God from thence, but also to destroy him in heaven; yet their dull hardnesse can never so farre prevaille, but that God sometime draweth them backe to his judgement seat. But forasmuch as they are not withholden with any feare from running violently against God: therefore it is certaine that there reigneth in them a brutish forgetfulnesse of God, so long as that blinde pang of rage doth so forcibly carry them.

3. So is that vaine defence overthrowne, which many are wont to pretend for excuse of their superstition. For they thinke, that any devotion to religion sufficeth, whatsoever it be, though it be never so much contrary to order and truth. But they consider not, that true Religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetuall rule: and that God himselfe abideth always like himselfe, and is no imagined Ghost or phantasie, that may be diversly fashioned after every mans liking. And truly we may plainly see with how lying deceits superstition mocketh God, while she goeth about to doe him pleasure. For catching hold of those things in a manner onely; which God hath testified that he careth not for, she either contemptuously useth, or openly refuseth those things that he appointeth and saith to be pleasant unto him. Therefore whosoever do set up new invented formes of worshipping God, they worship and honour their owne doting devices: because they durst not so trifle with God, unless they had first fained a God, agreeing with the follies of their trifling toys. Wherefore the Apostle pronounceth, that that unfayned and wandring opinion of the majestie of God, is a very not knowing of God. When (saith he) yee knew not God, yee served them that in nature were no Gods. And in another place he saith, that the Ephesians were without a God at such time as they strayed from the right knowledge of the one God. And at least in this case, it differeth not much, whether thou beleeve one God or many, because in both cases thou departest from and forsakest the true God: whom when thou hast once forsaken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable Idoll. It followeth therefore, that we must determine with Lactantius, that there is no lawfully allowable Religion, but that which is joynd with truth.

4. There is also a second fault, that they neither have at any time any consideration of God, but against their wils, nor doe approach toward him, till for all their holding backe they be forcibly drawne to him: and even then also they have not a willing feare that proceedeth from reverence of Gods majestie, but onely a servile and constrained feare, which the judgement of God wringeth out of them: which judgement because they cannot escape, therefore they dread it, but yet so, as therewithall they abhorre it. And so that saying of Strabo, that feare first made gods in the world, may be fitly spoken of ungodlinesse, and of this kinde of ungodlinesse onely. They that have a minde abhorring from the justice of God, doe heartily wish to have his throne of judgement overthrowne, which they know to stand for punishment of offences against his justice: by which affection they warre against God, who cannot be without his judgement. But when they understand that his power impossible to bee avoided, hangeth over them: because they can neither by force remove it, nor by flight escape it, therefore they all feeling of his power, which

they feare it. So left they should in all things seeme to despise him, whose majestie still presseth upon them, they use a certaine outward forme of Religion, such as it is: but in the meane time they cease not to defile themselves with all kinde of vices, to joyne outrageous mischiefes to mischiefes, untill they have in all points violated the holy law of the Lord, and destroyed his whole righteoufnesse, or at least they are not so holden backe with that fained feare of God, but that they sweetly rest in their sinnes, and flatter themselves, and had rather to follow the intemperance of their flesh, than restrain it with the bridle of the holy Ghost: But forasmuch as the same is but a void and lying shadow of religion, yea, scarcely worthy to be called a shadow: hereby againe is easily gathered, how much the true godlinesse, which is powred into the hearts of the faithfull, I meane that out of which Religion springeth, doth differ from this confused knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked compasses, to seeme nigh unto God, whom they flie from. For whereas there ought to have bene one continuall unbroken course of obedience in their whole life, they in a manner in all their doings carelesly rebelling against him, labour with a few sacrifices to appease him. Whereas they ought to have served him with holinesse of life and sincerenesse of heart, they invent triflings and observances of no value, to procure his favour withall. Yea, they doe the more licentiouslie lie dull in their owne dregs, because they trust that they may be discharged against him with their owne mockeries of propitiatory satisfactions. Finally, whereas their affiance ought to have bene fastened in him, they neglecting him doe rest in themselves, or in creatures. At length they entangle themselves with such a heape of errours, that the darke mist of malice doth choake, and at last utterly quench those sparks, that glimmeringly shined to make them see the glory of God. Yet that seed still remaineth which can by no meane be plucked up by the root, to beleve that there is a certaine Godhead: but the same seed is so corrupted, that it bringeth forth of it none other but very evill fruits. Yea thereby is that which I travell to prove more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of the Godhead naturally graven in the hearts of men, forasmuch as the very reprobates themselves are of necessity enforced to confesse it. In quiet prosperity they pleasantly mocke at God, yea, they are full of talke and prating to diminish the greatnesse of his power: but if once any desperation touch them, it stirreth them up to seeke the same God, and minstreth them sudden short prayers: by which it may appeare, that they were not utterly ignorant of God, but that the same which ought sooner to have bene uttered, was by obstinacie suppressed.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER.

That the knowledge of God doth shiningly appeare in the making of the world, and in the continuall government thereof.

Moreover because the furthest end of blessed life standeth in the knowledge of God: that the way to felicity should be stopped to none, therefore God hath not onely planted in the minds of men that seed of Religion which we have spoken of, but also hath so disclosed himselfe in the whole workmanship of the world, and daily so manifestly presenteth himselfe, that men cannot open their eyes, but they must needs behold him. His substance indeed is incomprehensible, so that his divine Majesty farre surmounteth all mens senses: but he hath in all his works graven certaine marks of his glory, and those so plaine and notably discernable, that the excuse of ignorance is taken away from men, be they never so grosse and dull witted. Therefore the Prophet rightly crieth out, That he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he should have said, that then he first began to come forth to be seene in visible apparel, since the time that he first displayed his ensigne in the creation of the world, by which even now what way soever we turne our eyes, he appeareth glorious unto us. In the same place also the same Prophet aptly compareth the heavens as they be displayed abroad to his royall pavillions: he saith that he hath framed his Parlours in the waters, that the clouds are his chariots, that he rideth upon the wings of the winds, that the winds and lightnings are his swift messengers. And because the glory of his

power and wisdom doth more fully shine above, therefore commonly the heaven is called his palace. And first of all, what way soever thou turne thy eyes, there is no peece of the world, be it never so small, wherein are not seene at least some sparkles of his glory to shine. But as for this most large and beautifull frame, thou canst not with one view peruse the wide compass of it, but that thou must needs be on every side overwhelmed with the infinite force of the brightnesse thereof. Wherefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes doth very well call the ages of the world the spectacle of invisible things, for that the so orderly framing of the world serveth us for a mirrour wherein we may behold God, which other wise is invisible. For which cause the Prophet assigneth to the heavenly creatures a language that all nations understand, for that in them there is a more evident testification of the God-head, than that it ought to escape the consideration of any nation, be they never so dull. Which thing the Apostle declaring more plainly, saith, That there is disclosed vnto men so much as was behoofefull to be knowne concerning God : because all men without exception, doe throughly see his invisible things even to his very power and God-head, which they understand by the creation of the world.

2. As for his wonderfull wisdom, there are innumerable proofes both in heaven and in earth that witness it : I meane not onely that secreter sort of things, for the needier marking whereof, Astrologie, Physicke, and all naturall Philosophie serveth, but even those things that thrust themselves in sight of every one, even of the rudest unlearned man, so that men cannot open their eyes but they must needs be witnesses of them. But truly they that have digested, yea or but tasted the liberal Arts, being holpen by the aid thereof, doe proceed much farther to looke into the secrets of Gods wisdom. Yet is there no man so hindered by lacke of knowledge of those Arts, but that hee throughly seeth abundantly enough of cunning workmanship in Gods workes, to bring him in admiration of the workman thereof. As for example, to the searching out of the movings of the starres, appointing of their places, measuring of their distances, and noting of their properties, there needeth Art and an exacter diligence : by which being throughly perceived, as the providence of God is the more manifestly disclosed, so it is convenient, that the minde rise somewhat the higher thereby to behold his glory. But forasmuch as the unlearned people, yea, and the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the onely helpe of their eyes, cannot be ignorant of the excellencie of Gods cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable and yet so feverally well ordered and disposed variety doth of it selfe shew forth it selfe : it is evident that there is no man to whom God doth not largely open his wisdom. Like wise it requireth a singular sharpnesse of wit, to weigh with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportionall agreement, the beauty, and use in the frame of mans body : but by all mens confession, the body of man doth utter in very shew of it selfe so cunning a compacting together, that for it the maker of it may worthily bee judged wonderfull.

3. And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in old time did not without cause call man a little world, because he is a rare representation of the power, goodness and wisdom of God, and containeth in himselfe miracles enough to occupie our mindes, if we will be content to make them. And for this reason Paul, after that hee had said that the very blinde men may finde out God by groping for him, by and by saith further, that he is not to be sought farr off, because all men doe feele undoubtedly within themselves the heavenly grace wherewith they be quickned. But if we need to goe no further than our selves, to finde and take hold of God : what pardon shall his slothfulness deserve that will not vouchsafe to descend into himselfe to finde God ? And the same is the reason why David, when he had shortly spoken in the advancement of the wonderfull name and honor of God that doth every where gloriously shine, by and by crieth out : What is man that thou art mindfull of him ? Againe, Out of the mouth of infants and sucking babes thou hast established strength. For so hee pronounceth that not onely in the whole kinde of man is a mirrour of the workes of God, but also that the very infants while they yet hang on their mothers breasts, have tongues eloquent enough to preach his glory, so that there needeth no other Orators. And there-therefore he doubteth not to set their mouthes in the vaward, as being strongly armed to subdue their madnesse, that would according to their devillish pride covet to extinguish the name of God. And hereupon ariseth that which Paul alleageth out of Aratus, that we are the off-spring of God : because he garnishing us with such excellencie, hath testified that he is our father. Like as even by common reason, and as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truly no man will assentingly and willingly yeeld himselfe to serve God, but he that having tasted his fatherly love, is mutually allured to love and worship him.

4. * And here is disclosed the soule unthankfulnesse of men, which while they have within themselves a work-house gloriously furnished with innumerable works of God, and also a shop stuffed with inestimable plenty of riches, and when they ought to burst forth into praising of him, are contrariwise puffed up and doe swell with so much the greater pride. They feele how diversly in marvellous wise God worketh in them : they are taught by experience it selfe, how great variety of gifts they possesse by his liberalitie : whether they will or no, they are enforced to know that these are the tokens of his Godhead : and yet they suppress it close within them. Truly they need not to goe out of themselves, so that they would not in presumptuously taking upon themselves that which is given from heaven, burie within the ground that which brightly giveth light to their mindes to see God. But even at this day the earth beareth many monstrous spirits, which sticketh not to abuse the whole seed of the god-head that is sowne in mans nature, and to employ it to suppress the name of God. How detestable, I pray you, is this madnesse, that man finding God a hundred times in his body and his soule, should by the very same pretence of excellencie deny that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chance made different from brut beasts. But they pretend a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of all things, and so doe convey God away. They see that exquisite workmanship in all their members, from their mouth and their eyes even to the nailes of their toes, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare gifts of the soule, doe represent a divine nature that doth not easily suffer it selfe to be hid : unless the Epicureans like the Giants Cyclopes would (bearing themselves bold upon this high degree) outrageously make warre against God. Doe the whole treasures of the heavenly wisdom so meet together, to rule a worme of five feet long : and shall the whole universality of the world be without this prerogative ? First to agree that there is a certaine instrumentall thing that answereth to all the parts of man, doth so serve nothing at all to obscure the honour of God that it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let the Epicure answer me, what meeting of undivisible bodies, boyling the meat and drinke in man, doth dispose part into excrements and part into blood, and bringeth to passe that there is in all the members of man such an endeavouring to doe their office, even as if so many severall soules did by common advice rule one body.

5. But I have not now to doe with that stie of Swine. I rather speake unto them, that being given to subtilities, would by crooked conveyance with that cold saying of Aristotle, both to destroy the immortality of the soule, and also to take from God his right. For because there are instrumentall powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they binde the soule to the body, that it cannot continue without the body, and with praises of nature they doe as much as in them is, suppress the name of God. But the powers of the soule are farre from being inclosed in those exercises that serve the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the stars, to learne the greatnesse of one, to know what space they be distant one from another, with what swiftnesse or slownesse they goe their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or that way ? I grant indeed that there is some use of Astrologie : but my meaning is onely to shew that in this so deepe searching out of heavenly things, it is not an instrumentall measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it selfe severally from the body. I have shewed one example, by which it shall be easie for the Readers to gather the rest. Truly the manifold nimblenesse of the soule, by which it surveyeth both heaven and earth, joyneth things past with things to come, keepeth in memory things heard long before, and expresseth each thing to it selfe by imagination, also the ingeniousnesse by which it inventeth things incredible, and which is the mother of so many marvellous arts, are sure tokens of divine nature in man. Beside that, even in sleeping it doth not onely roll and turne it selfe, but also conceiveth many things profitable, reasoneth of many things, and also prophecieth of things to come. What shall we in this case say, but that the signes of immortality that are imprinted in man, cannot be blotted out? Now what reason may beare that man shall be of divine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator? Shall we forsooth by judgement that is put into us discern betweene right and wrong, and shall there be no Judge in heaven? Shall we even in our sleepe have abiding with us some remnant of understanding, and shall no God be waking in governing the world? Shall we be so counted the inventors of so many arts and profitable things, that God shall be defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from another and not from our selves, all that we have, is in divers wise distributed among us? As for that, which some doe babble of the secret inspiration that giveth livenesse to the world, it is not onely weak, but also ungodly. They like well that famous saying of Virgil:

*First heaven and earth, and flowing fields of seas,
The shining globe of Moone, and Titans starres,
Spirits seeds within, and throughout all the lims,
Infused minde the whole huge masse doth move,
And with the large bigge body mix it selfe.
Thence come the kinds of men and eke of beasts,
And liver of flying fowles, and monsters strange,
That water beares within the marble Sea.
A ferie livenesse and heavenly race there is Within those seeds, &c.*

Æn. 6.

Forsooth, that the world that was created for a spectacle of the glory of God, should be the Creator of it selfe. So in another place the same Author following the common opinion of the Greeks and Latine, saith:

*Some say that Bees have part of minde divine,
And heavenly draughts. For eke they say that God Goes through the coasts of Land, and creeks of Sea,
And through deepe skie. And hence the sheeps and herds,
And men, and all the kinds of savage beasts
Each at their birth receive their subill lives.
And thereto are they rendred all at list,
And all resolved are return'd againe.
No place there is for death: but lively they,
Flie into number of the stars above,
And take their place within the lofty skie.*

Geo. 4.

Loe, what that hungrie speculation of the universall minde that giveth soule and livenesse to the world, availeth to engender and nourish godlinesse in the hearts of men. Which doth also better appeare by the blasphemous sayings of the filthy dogge Lucretius, which are derived from the same principle. Even this is it, to make a shadowish God, to drive farre away the true God whom we ought to feare and worship. I grant indeed that this may be goddily said, so that it proceed from a godly minde, that Nature is God: but because it is a hard and an unproper manner of speech, for as much as nature is rather an order prescribed by God: therefore in things of so great weight and to which is due a singular religionnesse, it is hurtfull to wrap up God confusedly with the inferiour course of his works. Let us therefore remember, so oft as any man considereth his owne nature, that there is one God which so governeth all natures, that his will is to have us looke unto him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worshipped and called upon of us: because there is nothing more against conveniencie of reason, than for us to enjoy those excellent gifts that favour of divine nature in us, and to despise the Author that freely doth give them unto us. Now as concerning his power with how notable examples doth it forceably draw us to consider it, ulesse perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a strength it is with his onely word to uphold this infinite masse of heaven and earth, with his onely becke, sometime to shake the heaven with noise of thunders, to burne up each thing with lightnings, to set the aire on fire with lightning flames; sometime to trouble it with divers sorts of tempests, and by and by the same God when he list in one moment to make faire weather: to hold in the Sea as if it hanged in the aire, which with his height seemeth to threaten continuall destruction to the earth, sometime in horriblewise to raise it up with outrageous violence of winds, and sometime to appeare the waves and make it calme againe. For proofe hereof doe serve all the praises of God gathered of the testimonies of nature, specially in the booke of Iob and in Esay, which now of purpose I overpasse, because they shall elsewhere have another place fiter for them, where I shall entreat of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Onely my meaning was now to touch, that both strangers and they of the hould of God have this way of seeking God common to them both, that is, to follow these first draughts which both above and beneath doe as in a shadow set forth a lively image of him. And now the same power leadeth us ro consider his eternitie. For it must needs be that he from whom all things have their beginning, is of eternall continuance, and hath his beginning of himselfe. But now if any man enquire the cause whereby hee both was once lead to create all these things, and is now moved to preserve them: we shall finde that his only goodnesse was it that caused him. Yea and although this onely be the cause, yet ought the same abundantly to suffice to allure us to the love of him, forasmuch as there is no creature (as the Prophet saith) upon which his mercy is not powred out.

The workes of God in cherishing the good, punishing the wicked, and calling sinners home un to himselfe, are proofe of his exceeding power and verine.

6. Also in the second sort of his workes, I meane those that come to passe beside the ordinarie course of nature, there doth appeare no lesse evident proofe of his powers. For in governing the fellowship of men he so ordereth his providence, that whereas he is by innumerable meanes good and bountifull to all men, yet by manifest and daily tokens he declareth his favourable kindnesse to the godly, and his severity to the wicked and evill doers. For not doubtfull are the punishments that he layeth upon hainous offences: like as hee doth openly shew himselfe a defender and revenger of innocencie, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpeth their necessitie, affwageth and comforteth their sorrowes, releeveth their calamities, and by all meanes provideth for their safety. Neither ought it any thing to deface the perpetuall rule of his justice, that he oftentimes permitte wicked men and evill doers for a time to rejyce unpunished: and on the other side suffereth good and innocent to be tossed with many adversities, yea and to be oppressed with the malice and unjust dealing of the ungodly. But rather a much contrary consideration ought to enter into our mindes: that when by manifest shew of his wrath he punisheth one sinne, we should therefore thinke that he hateth all sinnes: and when he suffereth many sinnes to passe unpunished, wee should thereupon thinke that there shall be another judgement to which they are deferred to be then punished. Likewise how great matter doth it minister us to consider his mercy while he oftentimes ceaseth not to shew his unwearied bountifullnesse upon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tendernesse, untill he have subdued their frowardnesse with doing them good?

The goodnesse of God is shewed by lowering men that are in miserie, by strenght by overthrowing them that are mighty, by wisdom by disposing all things in fittest opportunitie.

7. To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth, how God in cases past hope, doth suddenly and wonderfully and beside all hope succour men that are in miserie and in a manner lost, whether hee defend them wandering in wilderness from the wild beasts, and at length leadeth them into the way againe, or ministreth food to the needy and hungry, or delivereth prisoners out of horrible dungeons and iron bands or bringeth men in perill of shipwracke safe unto the haven, or healeth the halfe dead of diseases, or scorseth the earth with heat and drinesse, or maketh it fruitfull with secret watering of his grace, or advanceth the basest of the rascall people, or throweth downe the noble Peeres from the high degree of dignity: by such examples shewed forth, hee gathereth that those things which are judged chances happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heavenly providence and specially of his fatherly kindnesse, and that thereby is given matter of rejoycing to the godly, and the wicked and reprobate have their mouthes stopped. But because the greater part infected with their errors are blind in so cleere a place of beholding, therefore he crieth out, that it is a gift of rare and singular wisdom, wisely to weigh these works of God: by sight whereof they nothing profit, that otherwise seeme most cleere sighted. And truly how much soever the glory of God doth apparently shine before them, yet scarcely the hundredth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power and wisdom are no more hid in darkness: whereof the one, his power, doth notably appeare, when the fierce outrageousnesse of the wicked being in all mens opinion unconquerable, is beaten flat in one moment, their arrogancie tamed, their strongest holds raised, their weapons and armour broken in peeces, their strengths subdued, their devises overthrowne, and themselves fall with their own weight: the presumptuous boldnesse, that advanced it selfe above the heavens, is throwne downe even to the bottome point of the earth againe, the lowly are lifted up out of the dust, and the needy raised from the dunghill, the oppressed and afflicted are drawne out of extreame distresse, men in despaired estate are restored to good hope, and unarmed beare away the victory from the armed, few from many, the feeble from the strong. As for his wisdom, it selfe sheweth it selfe manifestly excellent, while it disposeth every thing in fittest opportunitie, confoundeth the wisdom of the world bee it never so piercing, findeth out the subtiltie in their subtiltie, finally, governeth all things by most convenient order.

8. Wee see that it needeth no long or laboursome demonstration, to fetch our testimonies, to serve for the glorious declaration and proofe of Gods majestie: for by these few that we have touched, it appeareth that which way soever a man chance to looke, they are so common and ready that they may be easily marked with the eye, and pointed out with the finger. And here againe is to be noted, that we are called to the knowledge of God, not such as contented with vaine speculation, doth but flie about in the braine, but such as shall be sound and fruitfull, if it be rightly conceived and take roote in our hearts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whereof because wee feele within us, and doe enjoy the benefits of them, it must needs bee that wee bee inwardly moved much more lively with such a knowledge, than if wee should imagine God to be such an one, of whom wee should have no feeling. Whereby wee understand that this is the rightest way and fittest order to seeke God, not to attempt to enter deeply with presumptuous curiosity throughly to discusse his substance, which is rather to be reverently worshipped than scrupulously searched: but rather to behold him in his workes, by which he maketh himselfe neerer and familiar, and doeth in a manner communicate himselfe unto us. And this the Apostle meant, when he said, that God is not to be sought a farre off, forasmuch as hee with his most present power dwelleth within every one of us. Wherefore David having before confessed his unspeakable greatnesse, when he descendeth to the particular rehearshall of his workes, protesteth, that the same will shew forth it selfe. Therefore we also ought to give our selves into such a searching out of God, as may so hold our wit suspended with admiration, that it may therewithall throughly move us with effectual feeling. And, as Augustine teacheth in another place, because we are not able to conceive him, it behooveth us as it were fainting under the burden of his greatnesse, to looke unto his workes, that we may be refreshed with his goodnesse.

9. Then such a knowledge ought not onely to stirre us up to the worshipping of God, but also to awake us, and raise us to hope of the life to come. For when we consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mercifulnesse, and of his severity, are but begun and not halfe full: without doubt we must thinke, that here in hee doth but make a shew afore hand of those things, whereof the open disclosing and full deliverance is deferred unto another life. On the other side, when wee see that the godly are by the ungodly grieved with afflictions, troubled with injuries, oppressed with slanders, and vexed with despightfull dealings and reproches: contrariwise that wicked doers doe flourish, prosper, and obtaine quiet with honour, yea, and that unpunished: wee must by and by gather that there shall be another life, wherein is laid up in store both due revenge for wickednesse, and reward for righteousnesse. Moreover when wee note that the faithfull are often chastised with the rods of the Lord, wee may most certainly determine that much lesse the ungodly shall escape his scourges. For very well is that spoken of Augustine. If every sinne should now bee punished with open paine, it would be thought that nothing were reserved to the last Judgement. Again, if God should now openly punish no sinne, it would be beleevd, that there were no providence of God. Therefore we must confesse, that in every particular worke of God, but principally in the universall generality of them, the powers of God are set forth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankind is provoked and allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicitie. But whereas these his powers doe in his works most brightly appeare, yet what they principally tend unto, of what valour they be, and to what end we ought to weigh them: this we then onely attaine to understand when we descend into our selves, and do consider by what means God doth shew forth in us his life, wisdom, and power, and doth use towards us his righteousness, goodnesse, and mercifull kindnesse. For though David justly complaineth that the unbelieving doe dote in folly, because they weigh not the deepe counsels of God in his governance of mankind: yet that is also most true, which he saith in another place, that the wonderfull wisdom of God in that behalfe exceedeth the haire of our head. But because this point shall hereafter in place convenient be more largely entreated, therefore I doe at this time passe it over.

Psal. 92. 7.

Psal. 40. 13.

God manifesting himselfe, men profit not by it, because they be bold things done without regarding the doer, or they ascribe that to sinners which he doth, or if they have some feeling of God, they deprave it with doing fancies, which fault is common unto all, even the sharpest mitted.

10. But with how great brightnesse sever God doth in the mirrour of his workes shew by representation both himselfe and his immortall kingdom: yet such is our grosse blockishnesse, that we stand dully amazed at so plaine testimonies, so that they passe away from us without profit. For as touching the frame and most beautifull placing of the world, how many a one is there of us, that when he either listeth up his eyes to heaven, or casteth them about on the divers countries of the earth, doth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, and doth not rather rest in beholding the workes without having regard of the workman? But as touching those things that dayly happen beside the order of naturall course, how many a one is there that doth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about and rowled by blinde unadvisednesse of fortune, than governed by providence of God? But if at any time wee be by the guiding and direction of these things driven to the consideration of God, (as all men must needs be) yet so soone as we have without advisement conceived a feeling of some godhead, we by and by slide away to the dotages or erroneous inventions of our flesh, and with our vanitie we corrupt the pure veritie of God. So herein indeed we differ one from another, that every man privately by himselfe procureth to himselfe some peculiar error: but in this point we all are most like together, that we all, not one excepted, doe depart from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disease not onely common and grosse wits are subject, but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are endued with singular sharpnesse of understanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole sect of Philosophers bewrayed their owne dulnesse and beastly ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe over all the rest, which are much more unreasonably foolish. Plato himselfe, the most religious and sober of all the rest, vainly erreth in his round globe. Now what might not chance to the other, when the chiefe of them, whose part was to give light to the rest, doe themselves so erre and stumble? Likewise where Gods governance of mens matters doth so plainly prove his providence, that it cannot be denied, yet this doth no more prevail with men, than if they beleevd that all things are tossed up and downe with the rash will of Fortune: so great is our inclination to vanitie and error. I speake now altogether of the most excellent, and not of the common sort, whose madnesse hath infinitely wandered in prophaning the truth of God.

\ Men when they trust to their owne wits, become in their opinions concerning God, either vain as the Stoikes, and the Egyptians, or irreligious as the Epicurians, or irrelatue as Symonides.*

11. * Hereof proceedeth that unmeasurable sinke of errors, wherewith the whole world hath bene filled and overflowne. For each mans wit is to himselfe as a maze, so that it is no marvell that every severall nation was diversly drawne into severall devises, and not that only, but also that each severall man had his severall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonnesse was joynd to ignorance and darkenesse, there hath bene scarcely at any time any one man found, that did not forge to himselfe an idoll or fanisie in steed of God. Truly, even as out of a wide and large spring doe issue waters, so the infinite number of gods hath flowed out of the wit of man, while every man over licentiously straying, erroneously deviseth this or that that concerning God himselfe. And yet I need not here to make a register of the superstitions, wherewith the world hath bene entangled: because both in so doing I should never have end, and also though I speake not one word of them, yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeareth how horrible is the blindness of mans minde. I passe over the rude and unlearned people. But among the Philosophers, which enterprised with reason and learning to pearce into heaven, how shamefull is the disagreement? With the higher wits that any of them was endued, and filled with Art and Science, with so much the more glorious colours he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one doe narrowly looke upon, he shall finde them to be but vanishing false colours. The Stoicks seemed in their owne conceit to speake very wisely, that out of all the parts of nature may be gathered divers names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torne in sunder. As though we were not already more than enough enclined to vanity, unlesse a manifold plenty of Gods set before us, should further and more violently draw us into error. Also the Ægyptians mysticall science of divinity sheweth, that they all diligently endeavoured to this end, not to seeme to erre without a reason. And it is possible, that at the first sight some thing seeming probable, might deceive the simple and ignorant: but no mortall man ever invented any thing, whereby religion hath not bene foully corrupted. And this so confuse diversity emboldened the Epicures and other grosse despisers of godlinesse, by little and little to cast off all feeling of God. For when they saw the wisest of all to strive in contrary opinions, they stuck not out of their disagreements, and out of the foolish or apparantly erroneous doctrine of each of them, to gather, that men doe in vaine and fondly procure torments to themselves while they search for God, which is none at all. And this they thought that they might freely doe without punishment, because it was better briefly to deny utterly, that there is any God, than to saigne uncertaine gods, and so to raise up contentions that never should have end. And too much fondly doe they reason, or rather cast a mist to hide their ungodlinesse by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reason that any thing should be taken away from God. But for as much as all doe confesse, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and unlearned do so much disagree, thereupon is gathered that the wits of men are more then dull and blinde in the heavenly mysteries, that do erre in seeking out of God. Some other do praise that answer of Symonides, which being demanded of King Hieron, what God was, desired to have a daies respire granted him to study upon it. And when the next day following, the King demanded the same question, hee required two daies respire, and so oftentimes doubling the number of daies at length answered: How much the more I consider it, so much the harder the matter seemeth unto me. But granting that he did wisely to suspend his sentence of so darke a matter, yet hereby appeareth, that if men be onely taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, soundly, and plainly concerning God, but only are tyed to confused principles to worship an unknowne God.

12 Now we must also hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religion (as all they must needs do that are given to their owne opinion) do depart from the one God. They will boast that their meaning is otherwise: but what they meane, or what they persuade themselves maketh not much to the matter, sith the holy Ghost pronounceth, that all they are Apostataes, that according to the darkenes of their own minde, do thrust devils in the place of God. For this reason, Paul pronounceth that the Ephesians were without a God, till they had learned by the Gospell, what it wasto worship the true God. And wee must not thinke this to be spoken of one nation onely, forasmuch as hee generally affirmeth in another place, that all men were become vaine in their imaginations, since that in the creation of world, the Maiesty of the Creator was disclosed unto them. And therefore the Scripture, to make place for the true and one onely God, condemneth of falsehood and lying, whatsoever Godhead in old time was celebrate among the Gentiles and leave no God at all, but in the mount Sion, where flourished the peculiar knowledge of God. Truly, among the Gentiles the Samaritanes in Christs time seemed to approach nearest to true godlinesse: and yet we heare it spoken by Christs own mouth, that they knew not what they worshipped. Whereupon followeth, that they were deceived with vaine error, Finally, although they were not all infected with grosse faults, or fell into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approved religion that was grounded onely upon common reason. For albeit, that there were a few that were not so mad as the common people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainly true, that the Princes of this world conceive not the wisdom of God. Now if the most excellent have wandered in darknesse, what is to be said of the very dregs? Wherefore it is no marvell, if the holy Ghost doe refuse as bastard worshippings all formes of worshipping, devised by the will of men. Because in heavenly mysteries opinion conceived by wit of men, although it doe not alway breed a heape of errors, yet is alway the mother of error. And though there come no worse of it, yet is this no small fault, at adventure, to worship an unknowne God: of which fault, all they by Christs owne mouth are pronounced guiltie, that are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best lawmakers that ever were, proceeded no further, than to say that religion was grounded upon common consent. Yea, and in Xenophon, Socrates praised the answer of Apollo, wherein he willed that every man should worship gods after the manner of the country, and the custome of his owne Citie. But how came mortall men by this power, of their owne authoritie to determine that which far surmounteth the world? or who can so rest in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinances of peoples, as to receive without doubting a God delivered by mans devise? Every man rather will stand to his owne judgement, than yeeld himselfe to the will of another. Sith therefore it is too weake and feeble a bond of godlinesse, in worshipping of God to follow either a custome of a City or the consent of antiquity, it remaineth that God himselfe must testifie of himselfe from heaven.

13. In vaine therefore to many Lampes lightned do shine in the edifice of the world, to shew forth the glory of the creator, which doe so every way display their beames upon us, that yet of themselves they can not bring us into the right way. Indeed they raise up certain sparkles, but such as be choked up before that they can spread abroad any full brightnesse. Therefore the Apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the world, images of things invisible, saith further, that by faith is perceived, that they were framed by the word of God, meaning thereby that the invisible Godhead is indeed represented by such shewes, but that we have no eyes to see the same thoroughly, unless they be enlightned by the revelation of God through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world, was disclosed that which was to bee knowne concerning God, doth not meane such a disclosing as may be comprehended by the wit of men: but rather sheweth that the same proceedeth no further but to make them unexcusable. The same Paul also, although in one place he saith, that God is not to be sought a far off as one that dwelleth within us: yet in another place teacheth to what end that neerenesse availleth. In the ages past (saith he) God suffered the nations to walke in their own waies: yet he left not himselfe without testimonie doing good from heaven, giving showers and fruitfull seasons, filling the hearts of men with food and gladnesse. Howsoever therefore the Lord be not without testimony, while with his great and manifold bountifullnesse he sweetly allureth men to the knowledge of him: yet for all that, they cease not to follow their owne waies, that is to say, their damnable errors.

14. But although we want naturall power, whereby we cannot climbe up unto the pure and cleere knowledge of God, yet because the fault of our dullesse is in our selves therefore all colour of excuse is cut away from us. For wee cannot so pret end ignorance, but that even our conscience doth still condemne us of slothfulnesse and unthankfulnesse. It is a defence forsooth right worthy to be received, if a man will alledge that he wanted eares to heare the truth, for the publishing whereof the very dumbe creatures have loud voices: if a man shall say that hee cannot see those things with his eyes, which the creatures without eyes doe shew him: if man shall lay for his excuse the feblenesse of his wit, where all creatures without reason doe instruct him: Wherefore sith all things do shew us the right way, we are worthily put from all excuse of our wandering and straying out of the way. But howsoever it is to bee imputed to the fault of men, that they doe by and by corrupt the seede of the knowledge of God sowne in their mindes by marvellous workmanship of nature, so that it groweth not to good and cleane fruit: yet it is most true that we are not sufficiently instructed by that bare and simple simple testimony, that the creatures doe honorably declare of Gods glory. For so soone as we have taken by the beholding of the world a small taste of the Godhead, wee leaving the true God, doe in stead of him raise up dreames and fantasies of our owne braine, and doe convey lither and thither from the true fountaine the praise of righteousness, wisdom, goodnesse and power. Moreover we doe so either obscure, or by ill esteeming them, deprave his daily doings, that we take away both from them their glory, and from the author his due praise.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER.

That, to attaine to God the Creator, it is needfull to have the Scripture to be our guide and mistress.

Therefore although that same brightnesse, which both in heaven and earth shineth in the eyes of all men, doth sufficiently take away all defence from the wickednesse of men, even so as God, to wrap all mankind in one guiltinesse, doth shew his divine majestie to all without exception as it were portraied out in his creatures: yet is it necessarie that we have also another and a better helpe that may rightly direct us to the very Creator of the world. Therefore not in vaine he hath added the light of his word, that thereby he might be knowne to salvation. And this prerogative he hath vouchsafed to give us, whom it pleased him more neerely and more familiarly to draw together to himselfe. For because he saw the mindes of all men to be carried about with wandering and unstedfast motion, after hee had chosn the fewes to his peculiar flocke, hee compassed them in as it were with barres, that they should not wander out in vanitie as other did. And not without cause hee holdeth us with the same meane in the true knowledge of himselfe. For otherwise even they should quickly swarve away that seeme to stand stedfast in comparison of other. For as old men, or purblind, or they whose eyes are dimme sighted, if you lay a faire booke before them, though they perceive that there is somewhat written therein, yet can they not read two words together: but being holpen with spectacles set betweene them and it, they begin to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering up together in our mindes the knowledge of God, which otherwise is but confused, doth remove the mist, and plainly shew us the true God. This therefore is a singular gift, that to the instruction of his Church God useth not onely dumbe teachers, but also openeth his owne holy mouth: not onely publisheth that there is some God to be worshipped, but also therewithall pronounceth that he himselfe is the same God, whom we ought to worship: and doth not onely teach the elect to looke upon God, but also presenteth himselfe unto them to be looked upon. This order hath he kept from the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to give them also his word. Which is the righter and certainer marke to know him by. And it is not to be doubted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham, and the rest of the fathers by this helpe attained to that familiar knowledge which made them, as it were, severally different from the unbelievers. I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened into the hope of eternall life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was needfull for them to know God not onely to be the Creator, but also the Redeemer: as doubtlesse they obtained both by the word. For that kinde of knowledge whereby was given to understand who is the God, by whom the world was made and is governed, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowledge adjoynded, which onely quickneth dead soules, whereby God, is knowne not onely to be the maker of the world, & the only author and judge of all things that are done, but also to be the redeemer in the person of the mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fall of the world and corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreat of the remedy thereof. Therefore let the readers remember that I do not yet speake of the covenant, whereby God hath adopted to himselfe the children of Abraham, and of that speciall part of doctrine whereby the faithfull have alway beene peculiarly severed from the prophane nations: because that doctrine was founded upon Christ: but I speake how we ought to learne by the Scripture, that God which is the Creator of the world, is by certaine markes severally discerned from the counterfeit multitude of false gods. And then the order it selfe shall conveniently bring us to the redeemer. But although we shall alleage many testimonies out of the new Testament, and some also out of the law and the Prophets, wherein is expresse mention made of Christ: yet they shall all tend to this end, to prove that in the scripture is disclosed unto us God the creator of the world, and in the scripture is set forth what we ought to think of him, to the end that we should not seeke about the bush for an uncertaine godhead.

2. But whether God were knowne to the fathers by oracles and visions, or whether by the meane and ministracion of men hee informed them of that which they should from hand to hand deliver to their posterity: yet it is undoubtedly true, that in their hearts was engraven a stedfast certainty of doctrine, so as they might bee perswaded and understand, that it which they had learned came from God. For God alwaies made undoubted assurance for credit of his word, which farre exceeded all uncertaine opinion. At length that by continuall proceeding of doctrine, the truth surviving in all ages might still remaine in the world, the same oracles which he had left with the fathers, his pleasure was to have, as it were, enrolled in publick tables. For this intent was the law published, wherunto after were added the Prophets for expositors. For though there were divers uses of the law, as hereafter shall better appeare in place convenient: and especially the principall purpose of Moses, and all the Prophets was to teach the manner of reconciliation betwene God and men, for which cause also Paul calleth Christ the end of the law: yet, as I say once againe, beside the proper doctrine of faith and repentance which sheweth forth Christ the mediator, the Scripture doth by certaine markes and tokens paint out the onely and true God, in that that he hath created and doth governe the world, to the end he should be severally knowne and not reckoned in the false number of fained gods. Therefore although it behooveth man earnestly to bend his eyes to consider the workes of God, forasmuch as hee is set, as it were, in this gorgeous stage to bee a beholder of them: yet principally ought hee to bend his eares to the word, that hee may better profit thereby. And therefore it is no marvell that they which are borne in darkenesse doe more and more waxe hard in their amazed dulesse, because very few of them doe give themselves pliable to learne of the word of God, whereby to keepe them within their bounds, but they rather rejoyce in their own vanity. Thus then ought we to hold, that to the end true religion may shine among us, wee must take our beginning at the heavenly doctrine. And that no man can have any taste be it never so litle of true and sound doctrine, unlesse he have been scholar to the Scripture. And from hence groweth the original of true understanding, that we reverently embrace whatsoever it pleaseth God therein to testifie of himselfe. For not onely the perfect and in all points absolute faith, but also all right knowledge of God springeth from obedience. And truly in this behalfe God of his singular providence hath provided for men in and for all ages.

3. For if we consider how slipperie an inclination mans minde hath to slide into forgetfulnesse of God, how great a readinesse to fall into all kind of errors, how great a lust to forge oftentimes new and counterfeit religions, we may thereby perceive how necessary it was to have the heavenly doctrine so put in writing, that it should not either perish by forgetfulnesse, or grow vaine by error, or be corrupted by boldnesse of men. Such therefore it is manifest that God hath alway used the helpe of his word, toward all those whom it pleased him at any time fruitfully to instruct, because hee foresaw that his image imprinted in the most beautifull forme of the world was not sufficiently effectuell: Therefore it behooveth us to travell this straight way, if we earnestly covet to attaine to the true beholding of God. We must, I say, come to his word, wherein God is well and lively set out by his workes, when his workes be weighed not after the perversnesse of our owne judgement, but according to the rule of the eternall truth. If we swarve from that word, as I said even now, although we run never so fast: yet wee shall never attaine to the marke, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must thinke, that the brightnesse of the face of God, which the Apostle calleth, such as cannot be attained unto, is unto us like a maze, out of which wee cannot unwrap our selves, unlesse we be by the line of the word guided into it: so that it is much better for

The fathers, which knew God by the word, knew also the word to be of God, who hath published the same in writing that all ages might be taught by it.

Rom. 10. 4.

For many causes it was necessary the word should be written, and that we should see our selves therein.

1 Tim. 6. 16.

us to halt in this way, than to runne never so fast in another. And therefore David oftentimes when he teacheth that superstitions are to be taken away out of the world, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this word reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine whereby he challengeth to himselfe a lawfull government: because errors can never be rooted out of the hearts of men, till the true knowledge of God be planted.

4. Therefore the same Prophet, after that he hath recited that the heavens declare the glory of God, that the firmament sheweth forth the workes of his hands, that the orderly succeeding course of daies and nights preacheth his majestie, then descendeth to make mention of his word. The law of the Lord (saith he) is undefiled, converting soules: the witnesse of the Lord is faithfull, giving wisdom to little ones: the righteousnesse of the Lord are upright, making hearts cheerefull, the commandment of the Lord is bright, giving light to the eyes. For although he comprehendeth also the other uses of the law, yet in generall hee meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vaine call unto him all nations by the beholding of the heaven and earth, therefore this is the peculiar schoole of the children of God. The same meaning hath the 29. Psalm, where the Prophet having preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, winds, showers, whirlwinds, and stormes, shaketh the earth, maketh the mountaines to tremble and breaketh the Cedar trees: in the end at last hee goeth further and saith, that his praises are sung in the sanctuarie, because the unbelievers are deafe and heare not all the voices of God that resound in the aire. And in like manner in another Psalm, after that he had described the terrible waves of the Sea, he thus concludeth: thy testimonies are verified, the beautie of thy temple is holinesse for ever. And out of this meaning also proceeded that which Christ said to the woman of Samaria, that her nation and the rest did honor that which they knew not, and that onely the Iewes did worship the true God. For whereas the wit of man by reason of the feeblenesse thereof can by no means attaine unto God, but being holpen and lifted up by his holy word, it followed of necessitie, that all men except the Jewes, did wander in vanitie and error, because they fought God without his word.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER.

By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be established, that is, by the witnesse of the holy Ghost, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine. And that it is a wicked invention to say, that the credit thereof doth hang upon the judgement of the Church.

BUt before I goe any further, it is needfull to say somewhat of the authority of the Scripture, not onely to prepare mens mindes to reverence it, but also to take away all doubt thereof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there set forth, there is no man of so desperate boldnesse, unlesse he be void of all common sense and naturall wit of man, that dare derogate the credit of him that speaketh it. But because there are not daily oracles given from heaven, and the onely Scriptures remaine, wherein it hath pleased him to preserve his truth to perpetuall memorie; the same scripture by none other means is of full credit among the faithfull, but in that they doe beleve that it is as verily come from heaven, as if they heard the lively voice of God to speake therein. This matter indeed is right worthy both to bee largely entreated of and diligently weighed. But the readers shall pardon mee if heerein I rather regard what the proportion of the worke which I have begunne may beare, than what the largenesse of the matter requireth. There is growne up among the most part of men a most hurtfull error, that the Scripture hath only so much authority as by common consent of the Church is given unto it: as if the eternall and inviolable truth of God did rest upon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great scorne of the holy Ghost, they aske of us who can assure us that these Scriptures came from God: or who can ascertaine us that they have continued unto our age safe and uncorrupted: who can persuade us, that this one booke ought to be reverently received, and that other to be stricken out of the number of Scripture, unlesse the Church did appoint a certaine rule of all these things? It hangeth therefore (say they) upon the determination of the Church, both what reverence is due to the Scripture, and what books are to be reckoned in the canon thereof. So these robbers of Gods honour, while they seeke under colour of the Church to bring in an unbridled tyrannie, care nothing with what absurdities they snare both themselves and other, so that they may enforce this one thing to be beleaved among the simple, that the Church can doe all things. But if it be so: what shall become of the poore consciences that seeke stedfast assurance of eternall life, if all the promises that remaine thereof, stand and be stayed onely upon the judgement of men? When they receiue such answer, shall they cease to wauer and tremble? Againe to what scornes of the vngodly is our faith made subject? into how great suspection with all men is it brought, if this be beleaved, that it hath but as it were a borrowed credit by the favour of men?

The Church depending upon the scripture, doth not by her testimonie give it credit, but because it hath an euidence of certaintie with it selfe, doth therefore of diuine acknowledgement it to be the truth of God.

2. But such babblers are well confuted even with one word of the Apostle. He testifieth that the Church is builded upon the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles. If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apostles be the foundation of the Church: then must it needs be, that the same doctrine stood in stedfast certaintie, before that the Church began to be. Neither can they well cavill, that although the Church take her first beginning thereof, yet it remaineth doubtfull what is to be said of the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, unless the judgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Christian Church were at the beginning builded vpon the writings of the Prophets and preaching of the Apostles: whereioeuer that doctrine shall be found, the allowed credit thereof was surely before the Church, without which the Church it selfe had never beene. Therefore it is a vaine forged device, that the Church hath power to judge the Scripture, so as the certaintie of the Scripture should be thought to hang vpon the will of the Church. Wherefore when the Church doth receive the Scripture and sealeth it with her consenting testimonie, she doth not of a thing doubtfull, and that otherwise should be in controuersie, make it authentike and of credit: but because she acknowledged it to be the truth of her God, according to her dutie of godlinesse, without delay the doth honour it. Whereas they demand, how shall we be persuaded it came from God, unless we resort to the decree of the Church? This is all one as if a man should aske, how shall we learne to know light from darkenesse, white from black, or sweete from sower? For the Scripture sheweth in it selfe no lesse apparent sense of her truth, than white and blacke things doe of their colour, or sweete and sower things of their taste.

Contra epist. fundamenta. l. c. 5.
The authoritie of the Church, as S. Augustine conuicteth, is of force to win unbelieuers to their first liking of the Scripture, whether of when once they doe beleue they see then a sounder foundation whereupon they rest their faith.

3. I know that they commonly alleadge the saying of Augustine, where he saith that he would not beleue the Gospell, save that the authoritie of the Church mooved him thereto. But how untruly and cavillously it is alleadged for such a meaning, by the whole tenor of his writing it is easie to perceiue. He had to doe with the Manichees, which required to be beleaved without gainesaying, when they vaunted that they had the truth on their side, but proved it not. And to make their Manichees to be beleaved, they pretended the Gospell. Now Augustine asketh them what they would doe, if they did light upon a man that would not beleue the Gospell it selfe, with what manner of perswasion they would draw him to their opinion. Afterward hee saith: I my selfe would not beleue the Gospell, &c. save that the authority of the Church mooved me thereto. Meaning that he himselfe, when he was a stranger from the faith, could not otherwise be brought to embrace the Gospell for the assured truth of God, but by this, that he was overcome with the authority of the Church. And what marvell is it, if a man not yet knowing Christ, have regard to men? Augustine therefore doth not there teach that the faith of the godly is grounded vpon the authority of the Church, nor meaneth that the certaintie of the Gospell doth hang thereupon: but simply and only, that there should be no assurednesse of the Gospell to the infidels, whereby they might be wonne to Christ, unless the consent of the Church did drive them unto it. And the same meaning a little before he doth plainly confirme in this saying: When I shall praise that which I beleue, and scorne that which thou beleuest, what thinkest thou meet for us to judge or doe? but that we forsake such men as first call us to come and know certaine truths, and after command us to beleue things uncertaine: and that we follow them them that require us firſt to beleefe that which we are not yet able to ſee, that being made ſtrong by beleev'ing, we may attaine to underſtand the thing that we beleefe: not men now, but God himſelfe inwardly ſtrengthening and giving light to our minde. Theſe are the very words of Auguſtine, whereby every man may eaſily gather, that the holy man had not this meaning, to hang the credit that we have to the Scriptures upon the will and awardment of the Church, but onely to ſhew this, (which wee our ſelves alſo doe confeſſe to be true) that they which are not yet lightened with the ſpirit of God, are brought by the reverence of the Church unto a willingneſſe to be taught, ſo, as they can finde in their hearts to learne the faith of Chriſt by the Goſpell: and that thus by this meane the anchoritie of the Church is an introduction, whereby we are prepared to beleefe the Goſpell. For, as we ſee, his minde is that the aſſurance of the godly bee ſtayed upon a far other foundation. Otherwiſe I doe not deny but that hee often preſieth the Manichies with the conſent of the whole Church, when hee ſeeketh to proove the ſame Scripture which they reſuſed. And from hence it came, that hee ſo reproched Fauftus for that he did not yeeld himſelfe to the truth of the Goſpell ſo grounded, ſo ſtabliſhed, ſo gloriouſly renowned and from the very time of the Apoſtles by certain ſucceſſions perpetually commended. But hee never travelleth to this end, to teach that the authoritie which wee acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth upon the determination or decree of men. But onely this, which made much for him in the matter that he diſputed of, hee bringeth forth the univerſall judgement of the Church, wherein he had the advantage of his adverſaries. If any deſire a fuller proove hereof, let him read his booke concerning the profit of beleev'ing. Where he ſhall finde that there is no other readineſſe of beleefe commended unto us by him, but that which only giveth us an entrie, and is unto us a convenient beginning to inquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to reſt upon bare opinion, but to leane to the certaine and ſound truth.

4. We ought to hold, as I before ſaid, that the credit of this doctrine is not eſtabliſhed in us, untill ſuch time as we be undoubtedly perſwaded, that God is the Authour thereof. Therefore the principall proove of the Scripture is commonly taken of the perſon of God the ſpeaker of it. The Prophets and Apoſtles boaſt not of their owne ſharpe wit, or any ſuch things as procure credit to men that ſpeake: neither ſtand they upon prooves by reaſon, but they bring forth the holy name of God, thereby to compeſſe the whole world to obedience. Now we have to ſee how not onely by probable opinion, but by apparant truth it is evident, that in this behalfe the name of God is not without cauſe nor deceitfully pretended. If then we will provide well for conſciences, that they be not continually carried about with unſtedfaſt doubting, nor may waver, nor ſtay at every ſmall ſtop, this manner of perſwaſion muſt be ſecked deeper than from either the reaſons, judgements or the conjectures of men, even from the ſecret teſtimonie of the holy Ghoſt. True indeed it is, that if we liſted to worke by way of arguments, many things might be alleaged that may eaſily proove, if there be any God in heaven, that the law, the prophecies and the Goſpell came from him. Yea, although men learned and of deepe judgement would ſtand up to the contrarie, and would ſimply and ſhew forth the whole force of their wits in this diſputation: yet if they be not ſo hardened as to become deſperately ſhameleſſe, they would be compelled to confeſſe, that there are ſeene in the Scripture manifeſt tokens that it is God that ſpeaketh therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrine thereof is from heaven. And ſhortly hereafter we ſhall ſee, that all the bookes of the holy Scriptures doe far excell all other writings whatſoever they be. Yea, if we bring thither pure eies and uncorrupted ſenſes wee ſhall forthwith finde there the majeſtie of God, which ſhall ſubdue all hardneſſe of gainſaying, and enforce us to obey him. But yet they doe diſorderly, that by diſputation travell to eſtabliſh the perfect credit of the Scripture. And truly although I am not furniſhed with great dexterity, nor eloquence: yet if I were to contend with the moſt ſubtle deſpiſers of God, that have a deſire to ſhew themſelves witty and pleaſant in ſebbling the authority of the Scripture, I truſt it ſhould not be hard for me to put to ſilence their bablings. And if it were profitable to ſpend labour in confuting their cavillations, I would with no great buſineſſe ſhake in ſunder the brags that they mutter in corners. But though a man doe deliver the sound word of God from the reproches of men, yet that sufficeth not forthwith to fasten in their hearts that assurednesse that godlinesse requireth. Profane men because they thinke religion standeth onely in opinion, to the end they would beleve nothing fondly or lightly, do covet and require to have it proved to them by reason, that Moses and the Prophets spake from God. But I answer, that the testimonie of the holy Ghost is better than all reason. For as onely God is a convenient witness of himselfe in his own word, so shall the same word never find credit in the hearts of men, untill it be sealed up with the inward witness of the holy Ghost. It behooveth therefore of necessitie that the same holy Ghost which spake by the mouth of the Prophets, doe enter into our hearts to perswade us, that they faithfully uttered that which was by God commanded them. And this order is very aptly set forth by Esay in these words: My spirit which is in thee, and the words that I have put in thy mouth, and in the mouth of thy seed shall not faile for ever. It grieveth some good men, that they have not ready at hand some cleere prooffe to alleage, when the wicked doe without punishment murmur against the word of God: As though the holy Ghost were not for this cause called both a seale and a pledge, because untill hee doe lighten mens mindes, they doe alway waver among many doubtings.

Esaï. 51. 16.

The Scripture for its selfe sake is worthy of credit, which notwithstanding it doth not obtain in us, till our hearts be enlightened that we therein perceive as it were the very breathing of the divine majestie.

5. Let this therefore stand for a certainly perswaded truth, that they whom the holy Ghost hath inwardly taught, doe wholly rest upon the Scripture, and that the same Scripture is to be credited for its selfe sake, and ought not to be made subject to demonstration and reason: but yet the certainty which it getteth among us, it attaineth by the witness of the holy Ghost. For though by the onely Majestie of its selfe it procureth reverence to be given to it: yet then onely it thoroughly pearceeth our affections, when it is sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost. So being lightened by his vertue, we do then beleve not by our owne judgement, or other mens, that the Scripture is from God: but above all mans judgement we hold it most certainly determined, even as if we beheld the Majestie of God himselfe there present: that by the ministerie of men it came to us from the very mouth of God. Wee seeke not for arguments and likelyhoods to rest our judgement upon: but as to a thing without all compasse of consideration, wee submit our judgement and wit unto it. And that not in such sort as some are wont sometime hastily to take hold of a thing unknowne, which after being thoroughly perceived displeaseth them: but because we are in our consciences well assured that we hold an invincible truth. Neither in such sort, as silly men are wont to yeeld their minde in thraldome to superstitions, but because we undoubtedly perceive therein the strength and breathing of the divine majestie, wherewith we are drawne and stirred to obey, both wittingly and willingly, and yet more lively and effectually than mans will or wit can attaine. And therefore for good cause doth God cry out by Esay, that the Prophets with the whole people doe beare him witness, because being taught by prophecies, they did undoubtedly beleve without guile or uncertaintie that God himselfe had spoken. Such therefore is our perswasion, as requireth no reasons: such is our knowledge, as hath a right good reason to maintaine it, even such a one, wherein the minde more assuredly and stedfastly resteth, than upon any reasons: such is our feeling, as cannot proceed but by revelation from heaven. I speake now of none other thing but that which every one of the faithfull doth by experience finde in himselfe, saving that my words doe much want of a full declaration of it. I leave heere many things unspoken, because there will be elsewhere againe a convenient place to entreat of this matter. Onely now let us know, that onely that is the true faith, which the spirit of God doth seale in our hearts. Yea with this only reason will the sober reader, and willing to learne be contented. Esay promiseth, that all the children of the renewed Church shall be the schollers of God. A singular privilege therein doth God vouchsafe to grant to his elect onely, whom he severeth from all the rest of mankind. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready cheerefulness to heare the voice of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moses, as it is written: Say not in thy heart, who shall ascend into heaven, or who shall descend into the deepe? the word is even in thine owne mouth. If it be the pleasure of God that this treasure of understanding bee laid up in store for his children; it is no marvell nor unlikely, that in the common multitude of men is seene such ignorance and dulnesse. The common multitude I call even the most excellent of them, untill such time as they be grafted in the body of the Church. Moreover Esay giving warning that the Prophets doctrine should seeme incredible, not only to strangers but also to the Jewes that would bee accounted of the household of God, addeth this reason: because the arme of God shall not bee revealed to all men. So oft therefore as the finalnesse of number of the beleivers doth trouble us, on the other side let us call to minde, that none can comprehend the mysteries of God but they to whom it is given.

THE EIGHT CHAPTER.

That so farre as mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proofs to establish the credit of Scripture.

UNlesse we have this assurance, which is both more excellent and of more force than any judgement of man, in vaine shall the authoritie of Scripture either bee strengthened with arguments, or established with consent of the Church, or confirmed with any other meanes of defence. For unlesse this foundation be laid, it still remaineth hanging in doubt. As on the other side when exempting it from the common state of things, we have embraced it devoutly, and according to the worthinesse of it: then these things become very fit helpes, which before were but of small force to grasse and fasten the assurance thereof in our mindes. For it is marvellous, how great establishment groweth hereof, when with earnest studie we consider how orderly and well framed a disposition of the divine wisdom appeareth therein, how heavenly a doctrine in every place of it, and nothing favouring of earthlinesse, how beautifull an agreement of all the parts among themselves, and such other things as availe to procure a majesty to writings. But more perfectly are our hearts confirmed when we consider, how we are even violently carried to an admiration of it, rather with dignitie of matter, than with grace of words. For this also was not done without the singular providence of God, that the high mysteries of the heavenly kingdome should for the most part bee uttered under a contemptible basenesse of words, lest if it had bene beautified with more glorious speech, the wicked should cavill that the onely force of eloquence doth raigue therein. But when that rough and in a manner rude simplicitie doth raise up a greater reverence of it selfe than any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may wee judge but that there is a more mightie strength of truth in the holy Scripture, than that it needeth any Art of words? Not without cause therefore the Apostle maketh his argument, to prove that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded upon the power of God, and not upon mans wisdom, because his preaching among them was set forth not with enticing speeche of mans wisdom but in plaine evidence of the spirit and of power. For the truth is then set free from all doubting, when not upholden by forraigne aides it selfe alone sufficeth to sustaine it selfe. But how this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, hereby appeareth, that of all the writings of men, be they never so cunningly garnished, no one is so farre able to pearce our affection. Read Demosthenes or Cicero, read Plato, Aristotle, or any other of all that sort: I grant they shall marvellously allure, delight, move, and ravish thee. But if from them thou come to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it shall so liuely move thy affections, it shall so pearce thy heart, it shall so settle within thy bones, that in comparison of the efficacy of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philosophers shall in manner vanish away: so that it is easie to perceive that the Scriptures, which doe farre excell all gifts and graces of mans industrie: doe in deed breath out a certaine divinity.

2. I grant indeed, that some of the Prophets have an elegant, cleere, yea, and a beautifull phrase of speeche, so as their eloquence giveth not place to the prophane writers: and by such examples it pleased the holy Ghost to shew that hee wanted not eloquence, though in the rest hee used a rude and grosse style. But, whether a man read David, Esay, and such like, who have a sweet and pleasant flowing speeche, or Amos, the Heardman, Jeremy and Zachary, whose rougher talke favoureth of countrey rudenes: in every one of them shall appeare the majestic of the holy Ghost that I speake of.

Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfai'ter of God, that with deceitfull resemblance he might the better creepe into simple mens mindes: so hath he craftily spred abroad with rude and in manner barbarous speech those wicked errors wherewith he deceiveth silly men, and hath oft times used discontinued phrases, that under such visor he might hide his deceits. But how vaine and uncleanly is that curious counterfai'ting, all men that have but meane understanding doe plainly see. As for the holy Scripture, although froward men labour to bite at many things, yet is it full of such sentences as could not be conceived by man. Let all the Prophets be looked upon, there shall not one be found among them, but he hath farre excelled all mans capacitie, in such sort that those are to be thought, to have no judgement of taste to whom their doctrine is unfavoric.

3. Other men have largely entreated of this argument, wherefore at this time it sufficeth to touch but a few things, that chiefly make for the principall summe of the whole matter. Beside these points that I have already touched, the very antiquitie of the Scripture is of great weight. For howsoever the Greeke writers tell many fables of the Ægyptian divinitie: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is farre inferior to the age of Moses. And Moses deviseth not a new God, but setteth forth the same thing which the Israelites had received in long processe of time, conveyed in time to them by their Fathers as it were from hand to hand concerning the everlasting God. For what doth he else but labour to call them backe to the covenant made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing never heard of before, hee had had no entrie to begin. But it must needs be that the deliverance from bondage, wherein they were detained, was a thing well and commonly knowne among them, so that the hearing of the mention thereof did forth with raise up all their minds. It is also likely that they were informed of the number of the CCCC yeeres. Now it is to be considered, if Moses, which himselfe by so long distance of time was before all other writers, doe from a beginning so long before himselfe, fetch the originall deliverance of his doctrine: how much the holy Scripture then is beyond all other writings in antiquitie?

4. Unless perhaps some list to believe the Ægyptians, that stretch their ancientie to six thousand yeeres before the creation of the world. But sith their vaine babbling hath beene alway scorned even of all the prophane writers themselves, there is no cause why I should spend labour in confuting of it. But Iosephus against Apion, alleadgeth testimonies worthie to be remembered out of ancient writers, whereby may be gathered, that by consent of all nations the doctrine that is in the law hath beene famous even from the first ages, although it were neither read nor truely knowne. Now, that neither there should remaine to the malicious any cause of suspicion, nor to the wicked any occasion to cavill, God hath for both these dangers provided good remedies. When Moses rehearseth what Jacob almost three hundred yeeres before had by heavenly inspiration pronounced upon his owne posterity, how doth hee set forth his owne tribe? yea, in the person of Levi he spotteth it with eternall infamie. Semeon (saith hee) and Levi the vessels of wickednesse. My soule come not into their counsell, nor my tongue into their secret. Truly, hee might have passed over that blot with silence, in so doing not onely to please his Father, but also not to staine himselfe and his whole familie with part of the same. How can that writer be suspected, which unconstrainedly publishing by the oracle of the Holy Ghost, that the principall ancestor of the familie wherof himselfe descended, was an abominable doer, neither privately provided for his owne honor, nor refused to enter into displeasure of all his owne kinsmen, whom undoubtedly this matter grieved. When also hee rehearseth the wicked murmuring of Aaron his owne brother, and Mary his sister: shall we say that he spake after the meaning of the flesh, or rather that hee wrote it obeying the commandement of the holy Ghost? Moreover, sith himselfe was highest in authoritie, why did he not leave at least the office of the high priesthood to his owne sonnes, but appointeth them to the basest place? I touch heere onely a few things of many. But in the law it selfe a man shall each where mee'te with many arguments, that are able to bring full proofe to make men beleeve, that Moses without all question commeth from heaven as an Angell of God.

5. Now these so many and so notable miracles that he recounteth, are even as many establishments of the law that he delivered, and the doctrine that hee published. For, this that he was carried in a cloud up into the mountaine: that there even to the fortieth day he continued without company of men: that in the very publishing of the law his face did shine as it were beset with sunne beames: that lightnings flashed round about: that thunders and noises were heard each where in the ayre: that a trumpet sounded being not blowne with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloud set betweene, was kept from the sight of the people: that his authoritie was so miraculously revenged with the horrible destruction of Core, Dathan, and Abiram, and all that wicked faction: that the rocke stricken with a rod did by and by powre forth a river: that at his praier it rained Manna from heaven: did not God herein commend him from heaven, as an undoubted Prophet? If any man object against me, that I take these things as confessed, which are not out of controversie, it is easie to answer this cavillation. For seeing that Moses in open assembly published all these things, what place was there to faine before those witnesses that had themselves seen the things done? It is likely forsooth that he would come among them, and rebuking the people of infidelity, stubbornnesse, unthankfulnesse, and other sinnes, would have boasted that his doctrine was established in their owne sight with such miracles, which indeed they never saw.

6. For this is also worthe to be noted, so oft as he telleth of any miracles, he therewithall odiously joyneth such things as might stir the whole people to cry out against him, if there had beene never so little occasion. Whereby appeareth, that they were by no other meane brought to agree unto him, but because they were ever more than sufficiently convinced by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainlier knowne, than that the prophane could denie that miracles were done by Moses: the father of lying hath ministred them another cavillation, saying, that they were done by Magickall artes and forcerie. But what like prooffe have they to accuse him for a forcerer, which so farre abhorred from such superstition, that hee commandeth to stone him to death, that doth but aske counsell of forcerers and soothsaiers? Truly no such deceiver useth his juggling casts, but that he studieth to amaze the mindes of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses? by this that he crieth out that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth only execute those things that God hath appointed, he doth sufficiently wipe away all blot of thinking evill of him. Now if the things themselves be considered, what enchantment could bring to passe, that Manna daily raining from heaven, should suffice to feed the people? And if any man keepe in store more than is just measure, by the very rotting thereof he should be taught that God did punish his want of heelese? Beside that, with many great prooffes God suffered his servant to be tried, that now the wicked can nothing prevaile with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people proudly and impudently make insurrections, sometime divers of them conspiring among themselves went about to overthrow the holy servant of God: how could he have beguiled their fury with illusions? And the end that followed, plainly sheweth, that by this meanes his doctrine was established to continue to the end of all ages.

7. Moreover where he assigneth the chiefe government to the tribe of Juda in the person of the Patriarch Jacob, who can deny that this was done by spirit of prophetic, specially if we weigh in consideration the thing it self, how in conning to passe it proved true? Imagine Moses to have beene the first Author of this prophetic: yet from the time that he did first put it in writing, there passed foure hundred yeeres wherein there was no mention of the scepter in the tribe of Juda. After Saul was consecrate king, it seemed that the kingdome should rest in the tribe of Benjamin. When David was anointed by Samuel, what reason appeared there why the course of inheritance of the kingdome should be changed? who would have looked that there should have come a King out of the base house of a heardman? And when there were in the same house seven brethren, who would have said that that honour should light upon the yongest? By what meane came he to hope to be a King? who can say that this anointment was governed by any arte, travell or policie of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of the heavenly prophetic? Likewise those things that Moses afore speaketh, albeit darkly, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the covenant of God, seeing they came to passe almost two thousand yeeres after, doe they not make it plaine, that hee spake by the inspiration of God? I overskip his other tellings aforehand of things, which doe so evidently favour of the revelation of God, that all men that have their sound wit may plainly perceive that it is God that speaketh. To be short, that same one song of his, is a cleere looking glasse, wherein God evidently appeareth.

8. But in the other Prophets the same is yet also much more plainly seene. I will choose out onely a few examples, because to gather them all together were too great a labour. When in the time of Esfay the kingdome of Iuda was in peace, yea, when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some stay and defence, then did Esfay prophesie of the destruction of the Citie, and exile of the people. But admit that yet this was no token plaine enough of the instinct of God, to tell long before of such things as at that time seemed false, and afterward proved true: yet those prophecies that hee uttereth concerning their deliverance, whence shall we say that they proceeded but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whom the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There passed more than an hundred yeeres from the time that Esfay so prophesied before that Cyrus was borne: for Cyrus was borne in the hundredth yeere or thereabouts after the death of Esfay. No man could then guess that there should be any such Cyrus, that should have warre with the Babylonians, that should bring subject so mighty a monarchy under his dominion, and make an end of the exile of the people of Israel. Doth not this bare telling without any garnishment of words evidently shew, that the things that Esfay speaketh, are the undoubted oracles of God, and not the conjectures of men? Again, when Ieremie, a little before that the people were carried away, did determine the end of the captivitie within threescore and ten yeeres, and promised returne and libertie, must it not needs be that his tongue was governed by the spirit of God? what shamelesse shall it be to denie, that the credit of the Prophets was established by such proves, and that the same thing was fulfilled indeed, which they themselves doe report to make their sayings to be believed? Behold, the former things are come to passe, and new things doe I declare before they come forth, I tell you of them. I leave to speake how Hieremie and Ezechiel being so farre asunder, yet prophesying both at one time, they so agreed in all their sayings, as if either one of them had endited the words for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing prophecies of things to come for the space of six hundred yeeres after, in such sort as if he had compiled an history of things already done, and commonly knowne? These things if godly men have well considered, they shall be sufficiently well furnished, to appease the barkings of the wicked. For the plaine prooffe hereof, is too cleare to be subject to any cavillations at all.

9. I know what some learned men doe prate in corners, to shew the quicknesse of their wit in assaulting the truth of God. For they demand, who hath assured us that these things which are read under title of their names, were ever written by Moses and the Prophets? Yea, they are so hardy to move this question, whether ever there were any such Moses or no. But if a man should call in doubt whether ever there were any Plato, or Aristotle, or Cicero, who would not say, that such madnesse were worthy to be corrected with strokes and stripes? The Law of Moses hath bene marvellously preserved, rather by heavenly providence than by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Priests it lay buried a little while: yet since the time that the godly King Iosias found it, it hath still by continuall succession from age to age bin used in the hands of men. Neither did Iosias bring it forth as an unknowne or new thing, but such a thing as had bene ever commonly published, and whereof the remembrance was at that time famous. The originall booke it selfe was appointed to be sacredly kept in the Temple, and a copie written out thereof, to remaine with the keepers of the Kings Records. Onely this had hapned, that the Priests had ceased to publish the law according to the old accustomed manner, and the people themselves had neglected their wonted reading of it. Yea, there in manner passed no age, wherein the establishment thereof was not confirmed and renewed. They that had David in their hands, knew they not of Moses? But to speake of them all at once, it is most certaine that their writings came to posterity none other wise but from hand to hand (as I my terme it) by continuall orderly course of yeeres delivered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speak, and partly while the remembrance was fresh of it, did learne of them which heard them that they had so spoken.

10. As for that which they object out of the history of the Maccabees, to minish the credit of Scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be devised more fit to stablish the same. But first let us wipe away the colour that they lay upon it, and then let us turne upon themselves the engine that they raise up against us. When Antiochus (say they) commanded all the bookes to be burned, whence are come these copies that wee now have? On the other side I aske them, in what shop they could so soone be made? It is evident, that after the crueltie appeased they were immediately abroad againe, and were without controversie knowne to be the same of all godly men, that having been brought up in the doctrine of them, did familiarly know them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were conspired together, did insolently triumph with reproches upon the Jewes, yet never was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookes. For whatsoever they thinke the Jewes religion to be, yet still they thinke Moses to be the Author of it. What then doe these praters else, but bewray their owne more than doggish frowardnesse, while they falsely say, that these bookes are changed and new put in their places, whose sacred antiquity is approved by consent of all histories? But to spend no more labour vainly in confuting such foolish cavillations: let us rather hereby consider how great a care God had for the preservation of his word, when beyond the hope of all men he saved it from the outrage of the most cruell tyrant, as out of a present fire: that he endued the godly priests and other with so great constancie, that they sticke not to redeeme this booke even with losse of their life if need were, and so to convey it over to posteritie: that he disappointed the narrow search of so many governours and souldiours. Who can but acknowledge the notable and miraculous worke of God, that these sacred monuments which the wicked verily thought to have beene utterly destroyed, and by and by came abroad againe as fully restored, and that with a great deale more honour? For by and by followed the translating of them into Greeke to publish them throughout the world. And not in this only appeared the miraculous working, that God preserved the tables of his covenant from the bloody proclamations of Antiochus: but also that amongst so manifold miserable afflictions of the Jewes, wherewith the whole nation was sometime worne to a few and wasted, and last of all, brought in manner to utter destruction, yet they remained still safe and extant. The Hebrew tongue lay not onely unesteemed, but almost unknowne. And surely had it not been Gods pleasure to have his religion provided for, it had perished altogether. For how much the Jewes that were since their returne from exile, were swarned from the naturall use of their mother tongue, appeareth by the Prophets that lived in that age; which is therefore worthy to be noted, because by this comparison the antiquity of the law and the Prophecie is the more plainly perceived. And by whom hath God preserved for us the doctrine of salvation contained in the law and the Prophets to the end that Christ might in his appointed time be openly shewed? even by the most cruelly bent enemies of Christ, the Jewes, whom Saint Augustine doth therefore worthily call the keepers of the Library of the Christian Church, because they have ministred unto us that thing to reade, whereof themselves have no use.

11. * Now if we come to the new Testament, with how sound pillars is the truth thereof upholden? The three Evangelists write the Historie in base and simple speech. Many proud men doe loath that simplicitie, because they take no heed to the chiefe points of doctrine therein, whereby it were easie to gather, that they intreat of heavenly mysteries above mans capacity. Surely whosoever hath but one drop of honest shame will be ashamed if he reade the first Chapter of Luke. Now, the Sermons of Christ, the summe whereof is shortly comprised by these three Evangelists, doe easily deliver their writing from all contempt. But Iohn thundering from an high, those whom he compelleth not to obedience of faith, he throweth downe their stubbornesse more mightily than any thunderbolt. Now let come forth all these tharped nosed fault-finders, that have a great pleasure to shake the reverence of Scripture out of their owne and other mens hearts, let them reade Johns Gospell: Will they or no, they shall there finde a thousand sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishness, yea, that may print a horrible brand in their owne consciences to reſtraine their laughing. The same is to be thought of Peter and Paul, in whose writings although the more part be blinde, yet the very heavenly majesty in them holdeth all men bound, and as it were fast tied unto it. But this one thing doth sufficiently advance their doctrine above the world, that Matthew being before all given to the gaine of his money boorde, Peter and John brought up in their fisher boates, all grosse unlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might deliver to other. Paul, not onely from a professed, but also from a cruell and bloudie enemy converted to a new man, with sudden and unhoped change doth shew, that being compelled by heavenly authority, he now maintaineth that doctrine, which before he had fought against. Now let these dogs deny that the holy Ghost came downe upon the Apostles, or let them discredit the history: yet still the truth it selfe openly cryeth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which being before time despised men among the rascall people, suddenly began so gloriously to intreat of heavenly mysteries.

12. There be yet also furthermore many very good reasons, why the consent of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no small matter, that since the Scripture was first published, the wils of so many ages have constantly agreed to obey it. And that howsoever Satan with all the world hath travelled by marvellous meanes, either to oppresse it or overthrow it, or utterly to blot and deface it out of mens remembrance, yet ever still like a palme tree, it hath risen up above, and remained invincible. For there hath not lightly been in oldtime any Sophister, or Rhetorician that had any more excellent wit than other, but he hath bent his force against the Scripture: yet they all have nothing prevailed. The whole power of the earth hath armed it selfe to destroy it, and yet all their enterprises are vanished away, as in smoke. How could it have resisted being so mightily on each side assailed, if it had had none other defence but mans? Yea, rather it is hereby proved, that it came from God himselfe, that all the travels of men striving against it, yet it hath of her owne power still risen up. Beside that, nor one Citie alone, nor one onely nation hath agreed to receive and embrace it: but so farre as the world extendeth in length and breadth, the Scripture hath attained her credit, by one holy conspiracie of divers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreeable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of minds so divers and disagreeing in manner in all things else, ought much to move us, because it appeareth, that the same is brought about none other way, but by working of the heavenly majesty: no small estimation groweth unto it, when we behold their godlines, that do so agree, I meane not of them all, but onely of those, with whom as with lights it pleased God to have his Church to shine.

13. Now with what assuredness of minde ought wee to submit us to that doctrine which we see established and witnessed with the blood of so many holy men? They when they had but once received it, stuck not boldly without feare, yea and with great cheerefulness to die for it: how should it then come to passe, that we having it conveyed to us with such an assured pledge, should not with certaine and unmoveable persuasion take hold of it? It is therefore no small confirmation of the Scripture, that it hath bene sealed with the blood of so many witnesses, especially when we consider that they suffred death to beare witness of their faith: and nor of a frantike disemperance of brain, as sometime the erroneous spirits are wont to do, but with a firme and constant, and yet sober zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not few nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignity and majestic, not onely ascertained unto godly hearts, but also honourably defended against the subtilties of cavillers, yet be they such as be not of themselves sufficiently available to bring stedfast credit unto it, untill the heavenly Father disclosing therein his majestic, doth bring the reverence thereof out of all controversy. Wherefore then onely the Scripture shall suffice to that knowledge of God that bringeth salvation, when the certeinety thereof shall be grounded upon the inward persuasion of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that serve to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as second helps of our weaknesse they follow that

THE NINTH CHAPTER.

That thoſe ſmatick men, which forſaking Scripture, reſort unto revelation, doe overthrow all the principles of godlineſſe.

NOW they that forſaking the Scripture doe imagine I wot not what way to attain unto God, are to be thought not ſo much to be holden with error, as to bee carried with rage. For there have ariſen of late certaine giddie brained men, which moſt preſumptuouſly pretending a ſchoole of the ſpirit, both themſelves doe forſake all reading, and alſo doe ſcorne their ſimplicity which ſtill follow the dead and ſlaying letter as they call it. But I would faine know of theſe men, what ſpirit that is, by whoſe inſpiration they are carried up ſo high, that they dare deſpiſe the doctrine of the Scriptures as childiſh and baſe. For if they answer that it is the Spirit of Chriſt, then ſuch careleſſeſſe is worthe to be laughed at. For I thinke they will grant, that the Apoſtles of Chriſt and other faithfull in the primitive Church were lightned with none other ſpirit. But none of them did learne of that ſpirit to deſpiſe the word of God: but rather every one was mooved more to reverence it, as their writings doe moſt plainly witneſſe. And ſurely ſo was it foretold by the mouth of Eſay. For where hee ſaith: My ſpirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, ſhall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy ſeed for ever: he doth not binde the old people to the outward doctrine, as though they were ſet to learne to ſpell, but rather he teacheth, that this ſhall be the true and perfect felicity of the new Church under the reigne of Chriſt, that it ſhall no leſſe be led by the voice of God, then by the ſpirit of God. Whereby we gather, that theſe lewd men with wicked ſacriledge doe ſevere aſunder thoſe things that the Prophet hath joynd with an inviolable knot. Moreover, Pam being raviſhed up into the third heaven, yet ceaſed not to goe forward in the doctrine of the law and the Prophets, even ſo as he exhortheth Timothy, a Doctour of ſingular excellencie to apply reading. And worthily is that commendation to be remembered, wherewith he ſetteth forth the Scripture, ſaying, that it is profitable to teach, to admoniſh, and to reprove. that the ſervants of God may be made perfect. How divelliſh a madneſſe is it to ſaigne, that the uſe of Scripture is but tranſitory, and laſteth but for a while? which indeed guiderh the children of God even to the laſt end? Again, I would have them answer mee this: whether they have taſted of a o- ther ſpirit than that which the Lord promiſed to his diſciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madneſſe, yet I thinke they are not carried with ſuch giddineſſe, that they dare ſo boaſt. But what manner of ſpirit did he ſpeake of in his promiſe? even that ſpirit which ſhould not ſpeak of it ſelfe, but ſhould miniſter and inſpire into their minds thoſe things which he the Lord himſelfe had taught by his word. It is not therefore the office of the ſpirit, which is promiſed us, to ſaine new and unheard-of revelations, or to coyne a new doctrine, whereby we ſhould bee led from the received doctrine of the Goſpell, but to ſeale in our mindes the ſelfe ſame doctrine that is commended unto us by the Goſpell.

2. Whereby we plainly underſtand, that we ought right ſtudioſly to apply the reading and hearing of the ſcripture, if we liſt to take any uſe and fruit of the ſpirit of God. As alſo Peter praiſeth their diligence that are heedfull to the doctrine of the Prophets, which yet might ſeeme to have given place after the riſing of the lights of the Goſpell. On the other ſide, if any ſpirit leaving the wiſdome of the word of God doth thruſt unto us another doctrine, that the ſame ſpirit ought rightfully to bee ſuſpected of vanity and lying. For what? when Satan transformeth himſelfe into an Angell of light, what credit ſhall the holy Ghoſt have among us, if we be not ſeverally knowne by ſome aſſured marke? And truly it hath bene plainly pointed out unto us by the word of the Lord, but that theſe miſerable men doe willingly covet to erre to their

owne destruction, while they seeke a spirit rather from themselves than from him. But (say they) it is dishonorable, that the spirit of God, whom all things ought to obey, should be subject to the Scripture. As if this were a dishonour to the holie Ghost to bee every where legall and liketo it selfe, to agree with it selfe in all things and no whereto vary. Indeed, if it were to be tried by the rule either of men or of Angels, or any others rule whatsoever, then it might well bee thought, that it were brought into obedience, or if yee list so to terme it, into bondage. But when it is compared with it selfe, when it is considered in it selfe, who can therefore say, that there is any wrong done unto it? But thus it is brought to triall. I grant, but such a triall wherewith it was his owne pleasure to have his Majestie established. It ought to content us so soone as he entrench into us. But least under his name the spirit of Satan should creepe in, he will have us to know him by that image of himselfe, which he hath printed in the Scriptures. Hee is the Author of the Scriptures: he cannot be diverse and unlike himselfe. Therefore it must needs be, that he continually remaine such as he hath shewed himselfe therein. This is no dishonour unto him, unless perhaps we count it honorable to swarve and goe out of kind from himselfe.

3. Whereas they cavill that we rest upon the letter that slaieth, heerein they suffer punishment for despising of the Scripture. For it is plaine enough that Paul there contendeth against the false Apostles, which commending the law without Christ did call away the people from the benefit of the new Testament, wherein the Lord doth covenant that he will grave his law within the bowels of the faithfull, and write it in their hearts. The letter therefore is dead, and the law of the Lord killeth the Readers of it, when it is severed from the grace of Christ, and not touching the heart, only soundeth in the eares. But if it be effectually printed in our hearts by the holy Ghost, if it present Christ unto us: then is it the word of life, converting soules, giving wisdom to little ones, &c. Also in the same place the Apostle calleth his preaching the ministry of the holy Ghost: meaning that the holy Ghost doth so stick to his truth which he hath expressed in the Scriptures, that then only he putteth forth and displaith his force, when the Scriptures hath her due reverence and dignitie. And it disagreeeth not herewith which I before said, that the word it selfe is not much assured unto us, unless it be confirmed by the witness of the holy Ghost. For with a certaine mutuall knot the Lord hath coupled together the assurance of his word and of his spirit, so that perfect reverence to the word doth then settle in our minds when the holy Ghost shineth upon us to make us therein behold the face of God: and on the other side without all feare of being deceived we doe embrace the holy Ghost, when we reknowledge him in his owne image, that is, in his word. Thus it is undoubtedly: God brought not abroad his word among men for a sodaine shew, meaning at the coming of his spirit by and by to take it againe, but he after sent the same spirit with whose power he had desubstituted his word, to make an end of his worke with effectually confirmation of his word. In this sort Christ opened the minds of the two disciples, not that they should cast away the Scriptures and wax wise of themselves, but that they should understand the Scriptures. Likewise Paul when he exhorted the Thessalonians not to extinguish the spirit, doth not carry them up on high to vaine speculations without the word, but by and by saith further, that prophecies are not to be despised: wherby without doubt is meant, that the light of the spirit is choked up so soone as prophecies come to be despised. What say these proudly swelling men, ravished with the spirit, to these things, which reckon this only to be an excellent illumination, when carelessly forsaking and saying farewell to the word of God, they both boldly and rashly doe take hold of all that they have conceived in their sleepe? Truly, a farre other sobriety becommeth the children of God: which as they see that without the spirit of God they are void of all light of truth, so doe they know that the word is the instrument wherewith the Lord distributeth to the faithfull the light of his spirit. For they know none other spirit but that which dwelt and spake in the Apostles, by whose oracles they are continually called to the hearing of the word.

THE TENTH CHAPTER.

That the Scripture, to correct all superstition, doth in comparison set the true God against all the gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

BUt because we have shewed, that the knowledge of God which in the frame of the world and all the creatures is somewhat plainly set forth, is yet more familiarly and plainly declared in the word: now is it good to consider, whether the Lord shew himselfe such in the Scripture as it pleased him first to bee represented in his workes. But I shall at this time be contented onely to point unto it, whereby the godly minds being admonished, may know what is chiefly to bee searched in the Scriptures concerning God, and be directed to one certaine marke in their seeking. I doe not yet touch the peculiar covenant, whereby God severed the stocke of Abraham from other nations. For even then he appeared the redeemer in receiving to his children by free adoption those that before were enemies. But we are yet about that knowledge: that resteth in the creation of the world, and ascendeth not to Christ the mediator. And although by and by it shall be good to alleage certaine places out of the new Testament, for as much as even out of it, both the power of God the Creator, and his providence in preserving of the first nature is approved, yet I warne the Readers before, what is not my purpose to doe, to the end that they passe not the appointed bounds. So for this present, let it suffice us to learne, how God the maker of heaven and earth doth governe the world by him created. Every where is renowned both his fatherly bounty and inclined will to doe good, and there are also examples rehearsed of his severity, which shew him to be a righteous punisher of wicked doings, specially where his sufferance nothing prevaileth with the obstinate.

2 In certaine places are set forth more plaine descriptions, wherein his naturall face is as in an image represented to be seene. For in the place where Moses describeth it, it seemeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehend all that was lawfull for men to understand of God. The Lord (saith he) the Lord, a mercifull God, and gracious, patient, and of such mercy, and true, which keepeth mercy unto thousands, which takeeth away iniquity and wicked doings, before whom the innocent shall not bee innocent, which rendreth the wickednesse of the fathers to the children and childrens children. Where let us marke, that this eternity and being of himselfe is expressed in the twise repeating of that honourable name: and that then his vertues are rehearsed, in which is described unto us, not what he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is toward us: that this knowledge of him may rather stand in a lively feeling, than in an empty and supernaturall speculation. And here wee do heare recited those vertnes of his which we noted to shine in the heaven and earth. That is to say, clemency, bounty, mercy, justice, judgement, and truth. For might and power are contained under this name Elohim, God. With the same names of addition doe the Prophets set him forth when they meanfully to paint out his holynesse. But, because I would not heape up too many examples together, at this present let one Psalm suffice us, wherein the summe of all his vertues is so exactly reckoned up, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly do we perceive God by information of experience, to be such as he declarerth himselfe in his word. In Jeremy where he pronounceth, what a one he would have us know him to be, hee setteth forth a description not altogether so full, but yet coming all to one effect. Hee that glorieth, saith he, let him glorie in this, that he knoweth me to bee the Lord that doth mercy, justice, and judgement on the earth. Surely, these three things are very necessary for us to know: Mercy, in which alone consisteth all our salvation: judgement, which is daily executed upon evill doers, and more grievous is prepared for them to eternall destruction: Justice, whereby the faithfull are preserved and most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou hast conceived, the prophecy saith, thou hast sufficiently enough whereof thou mayest glory in God. And yet here are not omitted either his truth or his power, or his holinesse or goodnesse. For how should the knowledge stand sure which is here required of his justice, mercy, and judgement, unlese

The same power, providence, mercy, and justice of God which shines in the creatures of the world, is also taught in holy scripture.

Exod. 34. 6. Moses, David, and Jeremy teach the same which heaven and earth doe teach concerning God, namely his power, goodnesse, mercy, holnesse, justice, judgement and truth, and they teach to the same end, that we will yield him obedi. nce, and put confidence in him. Psal. 145. 3.

less it did rest upon his unmoveable truth? And how should we believe that he doth governe the earth with justice and judgement, but understanding his power? And whence commeth his mercy but of his goodnesse? If then all his waies be mercie, judgement, and justice, in them must holinesse also needs bee seene. And to none other end is directed that knowledge of God that is set forth unto us in the Scriptures, than is that knowledge also which appeareth imprinted in his creatures, that is to say: it first moveth us to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the end we may learne first to honour him with perfect innocencie of life and unfaigned obedience, and then to hang altogether upon his goodnesse.

Howsoever the name of one God was knowne among the Gentiles, their knowledge of him hath bene alwaies so corrupted, that the Scripture directing to the true God, giveth speciall warning of theirs as false.

3. But heere I meane to gather a summe of generall doctrine. And first let the readers note, that the Scripture to the end to direct us to the true God, doth expressly exclude, and cast away all the gods of the Gentiles, because commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath bene corrupted. True it is indeed that the name of one God was every where knowne and renowned. For even they that worshipped a great number of gods, so oft as they did speake according to the proper sense of nature, they simplie used the singular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wisely marked by Iustine the martyr, which for this purpose made a booke of the monarchie of God, where by many testimonies he sheweth that this, that there is but one God, was engraven in the hearts of all men. The same thing also doth Tertullian prove by the common phrase of speech. But forasmuch as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drawne or false to false forged devices, and so their senses are become vaine, therefore all that ever they naturally understood of the being but one God, availed no further, but to make them inexcusable. For even the wisest of them doe plainly shew the wandring error of their minde, when they wish some god to assist them, and so in their prayers doe call upon uncertaine gods. Moreover in this, that they imagined God to have many natures, although they thought somewhat lesse absurdly then the rude people did of Iupiter, Mercurie, Venus, Minerva, and other: yet were they not free from the deceits of Satan, and as we have already said elsewhere, whatsoever waies of escape the Philosophers have subtilly invented, they cannot purge themselves of rebellion, but that they all have corrupted the truth of God. For this reason Habacuc after he had condemned all idols, biddeth to seeke God in his owne temple, that the faithfull should not admit him to be any other than such as he had disclosed himselfe by his word.

Abas.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

That it is unlawfull to attribute unto God a visible forme, and that generally they forsake God, so many as doe erect to themselves any images.

The Scripture is of no one thing more careful then lest men corrupt the glory of God, first by conceiving, and then by expressing him under any shape or similitude.

BUT as the Scripture provided for the rude and grosse wit of man, useth to speake after the common manner: so when it meaneth to make severally knowne the true God from the false gods, it chiefly compareth him with idols: not that it doth allow these inventions that are more subtilly and finely taught by the Philosophers, but the plainier to disclose the foolishnesse of the world, yea rather their madnesse in seeking God so long as they cleave every one to their owne imaginations. Therefore that exclusive definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought all that manner of godhead, that men frame to themselves by their owne opinion, because God himselfe is the only convenient witnes of himselfe. In the meane time, such this brutish-grossnesse hath possessed the whole world, to cover visible shapes of God, and so to forge themselves gods of timber, stone, gold, silver, and other dead and corruptible matter, wee ought to hold this principle, that wickid falshood the glorie of God is corrupted so oft as any shape is faigned to represent him. Therefore God in the law, after hee had once challenged the glory of his deitie to himselfe alone, meaning to teach us what manner of worshipping him he alloweth or refuseth, addeth immediately: Thou shalt make thee no graven image, nor any similitude, in which words he restraineth our libertie, that wee attempt not to represent him with any invisible image. And there hee shortly reckoneth up all the formes wherewith of long time before, superstition had begun to

turne his truth into lying. For we know that the Persians worshipped the Sun. yea, and so many stars as the foolish nations saw in the skie, so many gods they fained them. And scarce was there any living creature which was not among the Egyptians a figure of God, But the Grecians were thought to be wiser than the rest, because they worshipped God in the shape of a man, But God comparcth not images one with another, as though one were more and another lesse meete to be used, but without any exception he rejecteth all images, pictures, and other signes, whereby the superstitious thought to have God neere unto them.

2. * This is easie to be gathered by the reasons which he joyneth to the prohibition First with Moses: Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou heardest a voice, but thou sawest no body. Therefore take heed to thy selfe, least peradventure thou be deceived and make to thy selfe any likenesse, &c. Wee see how openly God setteth his voice against all counterfeit shapcs, that we may know that they forsake God whosoever doe cover to have visible formes of him. Of the Prophets onely Esay shall be enough, which speaketh oft and much hereof, to teach that the majestie of God is defiled with uncomely and foolish counterfeiting, when hee being without body, is likened to bodily matter: being invisible, to a visible image: being a spirit, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lump of timber, stone, or gold. In like manner reasoneth Paul: For as much as we are the generation of God, we ought not to thinke that the godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone graven by art and invention of man. Whereby it certainly appeareth, whatsoever images are erected, or pictures painted to expresse the shape of God, they simply displeaseth him as certaine dishonors of his majestie. And what marvell is it if the holy Ghost doe thunder out these oracles from heaven, sith he compelleth the very wretched and blinde Idolaters themselves to confesse this in earth? It is knowne how Seneca complained, as it is to be read in Augustine. They dedicate (saith he) the holy immortal and inviolable Gods in most vile and base stuffe, and put upon them the shapcs of men and beasts, and some of them with kind of man and woman mingled together, and with sundrie shapen bodies, and such as they call Gods, which if they should receive breath and meet them, would be reckoned monsters. Whereby againe plainly appeareth, that it is a fond cavillation wherewith the defenders of images seeke to escape, which say, that the Jewes were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstition. As though that thing pertained to one nation only which God bringeth forth of his eternall being, and the continuall order of nature. And Paul spake not to the Jewes but to the Athenians, when he confuted their error in counterfeiting a shape of God.

3. * God indeed, I grant, sometime in certaine signes hath given a presence of his Godhead, so as he was said to be beholden face to face, but all these signes that ever hee shewed, did aptly serve for meanes to teach, and withall did plainly admonish men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloud and smoke, and flame, although they were tokens of the heavenly glorie, yet did they as it were bridle and retrain the mirdes of men, that they should not attempt to passe any further. Wherefore, not Moses himselfe, to whom God disclosed himselfe most familiarly in comparison of other, obtained by prayer to see that face, but received this answer, that man is not able to sustaine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghost appeared under the likenesse of a Dove, but sith he immediately vanished away, who doth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment, the faithfull are put in minde, that they ought to beleve him to be an invisible spirit, that holding them contented with his vertue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a man, was a foreshewing of the revealing that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Jewes to abuse this pretence to erect to themselves a representation of the godhead, in the shape of man. Also the mercie seate wherein God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the law, was so made, as it might teach that the best beholding of the God-head is this, when mens minds are carried beyond themselves with admiration of it. For the Cherubins with their wings stretched abroad did cover it, the veile did hide it, and the place it selfe being set far inward, did of it selfe sufficiently keepe it secret. Therefore it is very plaine that they bee very mad, that * Although God be refused to declare the presence of his God-head by corporal signs yet even therein he hath still given some note to show that here-upon we should not presume to erect unto our selves a representation of that deity which we cannot comprehend. The Jewes having such rudiments is no argument why we should have them because they had, much lesse worship them when it they did not.

that goe about to defend the images of God and of Saints with the example of these Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant these little images, but to shew that images are not meete to represent the mysteries of God? for as much as they were made for this purpose, that hiding the mercie seat with their wings, they should not onely keepe backe the eyes of man, but also all his senses from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash hardinesse. For this purpose maketh it, that the Prophets described the Seraphins, shewed them in a vision, with their face covered: whereby they signifie, that to great is the brightnesse of the glory of God, that the Angels themselves are kept from direct beholding it, and the small sparks thereof that shine in the Angels, are withdrawn from our eyes. Although yet so many as rightly judge, doe acknowledge that the Cherubins of whom we now speake, pertained onely to the old manner of introduction, as it were of children used in the law. So to draw them now for an example to our age is an absurditie. For that childish age, as I may so terme it, is passed, for the which such rudiments were appointed. And it is much shame, that the panime writers are better expounders of the law of God than the Papists are. Iuvenall reprocheth the Jewes, as it were in scorn, that they honour the white clouds and the deitie of heaven. I grant he speaketh perversly and wickedly: and yet he speaketh more truly in saying that they have among them no image of God, than the Papists doe which prate that they had a visible image of God. And whereas that people with a certaine hot hastinesse, brake out oftentimes to seeke them idols, even as waters out of a great fresh spring boile out with violent force: hereby rather let us learne how great is the inclination of our nature to idolatrie, lest throwing upon the Jewes the blame of that fault which is common to all, we sleepe a deadly sleepe under vaine allurements to sinne.

4. * To the same purpose serveth this saying: The idols of the Gentiles are Gold and Silver, even the works of mens hands. Because the Prophet doth gather of the stuffe it selfe, that they are no gods that have a golden or silver image: and he taketh it for confessed truth, that it is a foolish fained invention whatsoever we conceive of our owne sense concerning God. He nameth rather gold and silver, than clay or stone, that the beantie or the price should not serve to bring a reverence to idols. But hee concludeth generally, that nothing is lesse allowable, then gods to be made of dead stuffe. And in the meane while he standeth as much upon this point, that men are carried away with roo made a rashnesse, which themselves bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, ready to vanish away at every moment, yet dare give the honor of God to idols. Man must needs confesse that himselfe is but a creature of a daies continuance, and yet he will have a peece of metall to be counted God, to which himselfe gave the beginning to be a God. For whence came the beginning of idols but from the will of men? Very justly doth the heathen Poet give them this taunt:

*I was sometime a fig tree by ggs, a blocke that served for nought:
The workman doubted what of me were fittest to be wrought:
A Forme to sit upon, or else a Priap God to be:
At length he thought it better was a God to make of me.*

Forsooth an earthly silly man that breatheth on his owne life in manner every moment, by his workmanship shall convey the name and honour of God to a dead stocke. But forasmuch as the Epicure in scoffingly jesting hath cared for no religion, let us leave the taunts of him and such as he is, and let the rebuking of the Prophet prick us, or rather thrust us through where he saith, that they are too much beastly-witted that with one selfe peece of wood doo make a fire and warme themselves. doe heat the oven to bake bread, doe roost or seeth flesh, and doe make them a God before which they fall downe humbly to pray. Therefore in another place he doth not only accuse them by the law, but also doth reproch them that they have not learned of the foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing lesse convenient than to bring God to the measure of five foote, which is above all measure and incomprehensible. And yet this same monstrous thing which manifestly repugneth against the order of nature, custome sheweth to be naturall to men. We must moreover hold in mind, that superstitions are in Scripture commonly rebuked in this phrase of speech, that they are the workes of mens hands which want the authoritie of God: that this may be certaine, that all these manners of worshipping that men doe devise of themselves are detestable. The Prophet in the Psalme doth amplifie the madnesse of them that therefore are indued with understanding, that they should know that all things are moved with the onely power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to things dead and sencelesse. But because the corruption of nature carrieth as well all nations, as each man privatly to so great madnesse, at last the holy Ghost thundreth with a terrible curse against them, saying: Let them that make them become like to them, and so many as trust in them. And it is to be noted that a similitude is no lesse forbidden than a graven image, whereby the fond subtiltie of the Greekes is confuted. For they thinke they are well discharged if they grave not a God, while in painting they doe more licentiouslly outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not onely to be made by the graver, but also to be counterfai- ted by any other workman, because such counterfai-ting is evill, and to the dishonor of his Majestie.

5. I know that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens bookes. Gregorie so said, but the spirit of God pronounceth farre otherwise, in whose schoole if Gregorie had bene taught, he would never so have spoken. For whereas Hieremie plainly saith, that the stocke is a doctrine of vanitie: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyes: surely hereof is a generall doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying, whatsoever men learne by images concerning God. If any man take exception, and say that the Prophets reprove them onely which abused images to wicked superstition: I grant that to be true. But I adde further that which is easie for all men to see, that they condemne that thing wholly which the Papists take for an assured principle, that images are in stead of bookes. For they doe in comparison set images against God, as things directly contrarie, and such as never can agree together. This comparison I say is made in those places which I have alleaged. Sith there is but one true God whom the Jewes did worship, it is amisse and falsly done to forge visible shapes to represent God, and men are miserably deceived, that thereby seeke for knowledge of God. Finally if it were not true that it is a deceitfull and corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophets would not so generally condemne it. At least thus much I win of them, when we shew that it is vanitie and lying, that men doe attempt to represent God with images, we doe nothing but rehearse word for word that which the Prophets have taught.

6. Let be read what Lactantius and Eusebius have written of this matter, which stick not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall, of whom images are to be seene. Likewise Augustine: which without doubting pronounceth that it is unlawfull not onely to worship images, but also to set up images to God. And yet sith hee none other thing but the same which many yeeres before was decreed by the Eliber- tine Councell, where of this is the xxxvi. Chapter. It is ordained that no pictures be had in the Church, that the thing which is honored and worshipped bee not painted on the walls. But most notably is that which in another place Augustine alleageth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his owne assent, that they which first brought in the images of gods, both tooke away the feare of God, and brought in error. If Varro alone should say this, peradventure it should be but of small authoritie. Yet ought it of right to make us ashamed, that a heathen man groping in darknesse came to this light, to see that bodily images are therefore unmeet for the majestie of God, because they diminish the feare of God, and increase error in men. The prooffe it selfe witnesseth that this was no lesse truly than wisely spoken. But Augustine having borrowed it of Varro, bringeth it forth as of his owne minde. And first he admonisheth, that the first errors wherewith men were entangled concerning God, began not of images, but as with new matter added, increased by them. Secondly he expoundeth that the feare of God is therefore diminished or rather taken away thereby, because his majestie may easily in the foolishnes, and in the fond and absurd forging of images, grow to contempt. Which second thing I would to God we did not by prooffe find to be so true. Whosoever therefore will cover to be rightly taught, let him elsewhere learne than of images, what is meete to be kuowne concerning God.

7. Wherefore if the Papists have any shame, let them no more use this shift to say that that images are lay mens bookes, which by many testimonies of Scripture are so openly confuted. And although I grant them so much, yet should they not much get thereby for defence of their idols. What monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is well knowne. The pictures and images that they dedicate to Saints, what are they but examples of extreame riot and uncleannesse, whereunto if any would fashion himselfe, he were worthe to be beaten with staves? Surely, the brothel houses can shew harlots more chastly and soberly attired, than their temples shew images of these whom they would have called Virgins: Even as uncomely array give they to the Martyrs. Let them therefore fashion their idols at least to some honest shew of shamefastnes, that they may somewhat more colourably lie in saying, that they are the bookes of some holiness. But if it were so, yet then would wee answer, that this is not the right way to teach the faithfull people in holy places, whom God would have there instructed with far other doctrine than with these trifles. God commanded in the Churches a common doctrine to be set forth to all men in preaching of his word, and in his holy mysteries: whereunto they shew themselves to have a minde not very heedfull, that cast their eyes about to behold images. But whom doe the Papists call lay and unlearned men, whose unskillfulnesse may beare to be taught onely by images? Forsooth even those whom the Lord knowledgeth for his disciples, to whom hee vouchsafeth to reveale the heavenly wisdom, whom he willeth to be instructed with the wholsome mysteries of his kingdome. I grant indeed as the matter standeth, that there are at this day many which cannot be without such bookes. But whence I pray you groweth that dulnesse, but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which onely was meete to instruct them with? For it is for no other cause, that they which had the cure of Churches gave over their office of teaching to idols, but because themselves were dumbe. Paul testifieth that Christ is in the true preaching of the Gospel painted out, in a manner crucified before our eyes. To what purpose then were it to have commonly set up in Churches so many crosses of wood, stone, silver and gold, if this were well and faithfully bearen into the peoples heads, that Christ died to beare our curse upon the crosse, to cleanse our finnes with the sacrifice of his body, and to wash them away with his blood, and finally to reconcile us to God the Father? Of which one thing they might learne more than of a thousand crosses of wood or stone. For perhaps the covetous doe set their minds and eyes faster vpon the golden and silver crosses, than upon any words of God.

8. As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by common consent thought to be true which is written in the booke of Wisdome, that they were the first authors of them, which gave this honour to the dead superstitiously to worship their memory. And truly I grant that this evill custome was very ancient, and I deny not that it was the first brand wherewith the rage of men being kindled to idolatrie, did more and more burne therein. Yet doe I not grant that this was the first originall of this mischief. For it appeareth by Moses that images were used before that this curiosity in dedicating the images of dead men, whereof the prophane writers make often mention, were come in ure. When he telleth that Rachel had stolne her fathers idole, he speaketh it as of a common fault. Whereby wee may gather that the wit of man is, as I may so call it, a continuall worship of idols. After the generall flood, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passed not many yeeres but that men according to their own lust fained them gods. And it is likely that the holy Patriarch yet living, his childrens children were given to idolatry, so that to his bitter griefe he saw the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord had but late purged with so horrible judgement. For Thave and Nachor even before the birth of Abraham were worshippers of false gods, as Iosue testifieth. Seeing the generation of Sem so soone swarved, what shall we judge of the posterity of Cham, who were already cursed in their father? The mind of man, as it is full of pride and rash boldnes, presumeth to imagin God according to her own conceit: and as it is possessed with dulnes, yea, overwhelmed with grosse ignorance, so it conceiveth vanitie, and a fond fantasie in steed of God: And in these evils is added a new mischief, that man attempteth to expresse in workmanship such a god, as he inwardly conceiveth. Thus the minde begetteth the idoll, and the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israelites prooveth that this was the beginning of idolatrie, that mendoe not beleewe that God is among them, unless he shew himselfe carnally present. We know not (said they) what is become of this Miser: make us gods that may goe before us. They knew that there was a God, whose power they had had experience of in so many miracles: but they did not beleewe that he was nigh unto them, unless they did see with their eyes a corporall representation of his face to be a witness unto them of the God that governed them. Their minde was therefore to know by the image going before them, that God was the guide of their journey. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the flesh is alway unquiet till it hath gotten some counterfeit deuce like it selfe, wherein it may vainely delight as in an image of God. In a manner in all ages since the creation of the world, men to obey this blinde desire have erected signes wherein they imagined God to be present before their carnall eyes.

9 After such invention forged, by and by followeth worshipping. For when men thought that they beheld God in images, they did also worship him in them. At length being both with minds and eyes altogether fastned thereon, they began to waxe more and more brutish, and to wonder at them and haue them in admiration, as if there were some nature of godhead in them. So it appeareth that men brake not out into the worshipping of images, till they were perswaded in some grosse opinion: not to thinke the images to be gods, but to imagine that there did a certaine force of Godhead abide in them. Therefore, whether thou represent to thy selfe either God or a creature in the image, when thou fallest downe to worship, thou art already bewitched with some superstition. For this reason the Lord hath forbidden not onely images to be erected that are made to expresse a likeness of him, but also any titles or stones to be dedicated that should stand to be worshipped. And for the same reason also in the commandement of the law, this other point is added concerning worshipping. For so soone as they have forged a visible forme for God, they also tie the power of God unto it. So beastly foolish are men, that there they fasten God where they counterfeit him, and therefore must they needs worship it. neither is there any difference whether they simply worship the idol, or God in the idol. This is alway idolatrie when honours due to God are given to an idol, under what colour soever it be. And because God will not be worshipped superstitiously, therefore whatsoever is given to idols is taken from him. Let them take heed hereunto that seeke for pretences to defend the abominable idolatrie, wherewith these many ages past, true religion hath bene drowned and overthrowne. But (say they) the images are not taken for Gods. Neither were the Jewes themselves so unadvised to forget that it was God, by whose hands they had been brought out of Egypt before they made the calf. Yea when Aaron said, that those were the gods by whom they were delivered out of the land of Egypt, they boldly assented, shewing a plaine token of their meaning, that they would still keepe that God that was their deliverer, so that they might see him goe before them in the calf. Neither is it to be beleewed that the heathen were so grosse as to beleewe, that God was no other thing but stocks and stones. For they changed their images at their pleasure, but still they kept the same gods in their minde: and there were many images of one God, and yet they did not according to the multitude of images saigne them many gods. Besides that, they did daily consecrate new images, yet did they not thinke that they made new gods. Let the excuses be read which Augustine saith were pretended by the Idolaters of his age. When they were rebuked, the common sort answered, that they did not worship that visible thing, but the deitie that did in it invisibly dwell. And they that were of somewhat better religion, as he calleth it, did say that they did neither worship the image, nor the spirit in it, but by the corporall image they did behold the signe of that thing which they ought to worship: How then? All idolaters, whether they were of the Jewes, or of the Gentiles, were none other wise minded then as I have said: being not contented with a spiritual understanding of God, they thought by the images he should be more sure & neerer imprinted in them. After once that such disordered counterfeiting of God well liked them, they never ended till daily more & more deluded with new deceits, they imagined that God did shew forth his power in images. And neverthelesse, both the Jewes were perswaded that under such images they did worship the one true Lord of heauen and earth: and likewise the Gentiles, their false gods, whom yet they fained to dwell in heauen.

10. Whosoever denie that it hath thus been done in time past, yea within our owne remembrance, they impudently lie. For, why fall they downe before them? And when they pray, why turne they toward them as to the eares of God? For it is true that Augustine saith, that no man prayeth or worshippeth when he so beholdeth an image, but he is so affected in minde, that he thinketh himselfe to be heard of it, or that it will doe for him what he desireth. Why is there such difference betweene the images of one God, that passing by one image with litle reverence or none done to it, they honour another solemnly? Why doe they weary themselves with vowed pilgrimages to visit those images whereof they have like at home? Why doe they at this day in defence of them as it were for their religion and countrey, fight to slaughter and destruction, in such sort, as they would better suffer to have the one onely God, than their idoles to be taken from them? And yet I doe not reckon up the grosse errors of the common people, which are almost infinite, and doe in manner possesse the hearts of all men. I doe onely shew what themselves doe confesse when they meane most of all to excuse themselves of idolatrie. We doe not call them (say they) our gods. No more did the Jewes nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time past: and yet the Prophets each where cease not to cast in their teeth their fornication with stocks and stones, for doing no more but such things as are daily done by them, that would be counted Christians, that is to say that they carnally worshipped God in stocks and stones.

11 Although I am not ignorant, nor thinke good to passe it over, as if I knew it not, how they seeke to escape with a more subtile distinction, whereof I shall againe make mention more at large hereafter. For they pretend that the worship which they give to images is Idolodulia, which is service of images, and not Idolatria, which is worship of images. For so they terme it when they teach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God, give unto images and pictures that worship which they call Doutlia, or service. And so they thinke themselves without blame, if they be but the servants and not also the worshippers of idoles: as though it were not a litle lighter matter to worship then to serve. And yet while they seeke a hole to hide them in the greeke word, they childishly disagree with themselves. For seeing Latresein in Greeke signifieth nothing but to worship, their saying commeth but to this effect, as if they would say, that they worship indeed their images, but without any worshipping. And there is no cause why they should say that I seeke to catch them in words: but they themselves, while they seeke to cast a mist before the eyes of the simple, doe bewray their owne ignorance. And yet though they be never so eloquent, they shall not attaine by their eloquence to prove unto us, that one selfesame thing, is two sundry things. Let them (say I) shew me a difference in the thing it selfe whereby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer or a murderer cannot escape guiltinesse of his fault, by giving his sinne a new devised name: so it is a very absurditie to thinke that these men be quit by new device of a name, if in the matter it selfe they nothing differ from those idolaters whom they themselves are compelled to condemne. But so far are they from proving that their case differeth from the case of those idolaters, that rather the fountaine of all this whole mischief is an unorderedly counterfeiting, wherein they have strived with them, while both with their owne wit they devise, and with their owne hands they frame them signifying forines to expresse them a fashion of God.

12 And yet am I not so superstitious that I thinke no images may be suffered at all. But forasmuch as caruing and painting are the gifts of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully used. Lest these things which God hath given us for his glory and for our owne benefit, be not only defiled by disordered abuse, but also turned to our owne destruction. We thinke it unlawfull to have God fashioned out in visible forme, because himselfe hath forbidden it, and because it cannot be done without some defacement of his glory. And lest they thinke that it is onely we that are in this opinion, they that have been travelled in their workes, shall finde that all sound writers did alway reprove the same thing. If then it be not lawfull to make any bodily image of God, much lesse shall it be lawfull to worship it for God, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawfull, that onely those things be painted and graven whereof our eyes are capable: but that the majesty of God which is farre above the sence of our eye, be not abused abused with uncomely devised shapes. Of this sort are partly histories and things done, partly images and fashions of bodies, without exprelling of any things done by them. The first of these have some use in teaching or admonishing a man: but what profit the second can bring save onely delectation, I see not: and yet it is evident, that even such were almost all the images that heretofore have stood up in Churches. Whereby wee may judge that they were there set up not by discreet judgement or choice, but by foolish and unadvised desire. I speake not how much amisse and uncomely they were for the most part fashioned, nor how licentiouslly Painters and Carvers have in this point shewed their wantonnesse, which thing I have already touched. Onely I speake to this end; that though there were no fault in them, yet doe they nothing availe to teach.

13. But leaving also that difference, let us by the way consider, whether it be expedient in Christian Temples to have any images at all, that doe expresse either things done, or the bodies of men. First, if the authority of the ancient Church doe any thing move us, let us remember that for about five hundred yeares together, while religion yet better flourished, and sincere doctrine was in force, the Christian Churches were universallly without images. So they were then first brought in for the garnishment of Churches, when the sincerity of ministracion was not a little altered. I will not now dispute, what reason they had with them that were the first Authors thereof. But if a man compare age with age, he shall see that they were much swarved from that uprightnesse of them that were without images. What? doe we thinke that those holy Fathers would have suffered the Church to bee so long without the thing which they judged profitable and good for them? But rather because they saw either little or no profit in it, and much danger to lurke underneath it, they did rather of purpose and advisedly reject it, than by ignorance and negligence omit it. Which thing Augustine doth also in expresse words testifie: When they be set in such places (saith he) honourably on high, to be scene of them that pray and doe sacrifice, although they want both sense and life, yet with the very likenesse they have of lively members and senses, they so move the weake minds, that they seeme to live and breathe, &c. And in another place: For that shape of members doth worke, and in manner enforce thus much, that the minde living within a body doth thinke that body to have sense, which he seeth like unto his owne. And a little after: Images doe more availe to bow downe an unhappy soule, by this that they have mouth, eyes, eares, and feet, than to amend it by this, that they neither speake, nor see, nor heare, nor goe. This truly seemeth to be the cause why Iohn willed us to beware not onely of worshipping of Images, but also of Images themselves. And we have found it too much in experience, that through the horrible madnesse which hath heretofore possessed the world, to the destruction in a manner of all godlines, so soon as Images be set up in Churches, there is as it were a signe set up of idolatry, because the folly of men cannot refrain it selfe, but it must forthwith run on to superstitious worshippings. But if there were not so much danger hanging therby; yet when I consider for what use temples are ordained, me thinks it is very ill besetmng the holinesse thereof, to receive any other images than these lively and natural images, which the Lord by his word hath consecrate: I meane Baptisme, and the Lords Supper, and other ceremonies wherewith our eyes ought both more earnestly to bee occupied, and more lively to be moved, than that they should need any other images framed by the wit of men. Loe, this is the incomparable commodity of images, which can by no value be recompenced, if we beleeve the Papists.

14. I thinke I had spoken enough of this thing already, but that the Nicene Synode doth as it were lay hand on me to enforce me to speake more. I meane not that most famous Synode which Constantine the Great assembled, but that which was holden eight hundred yeares agoe, by the commandement and authority of Irene the Emperesse: For that Synode decreed, that Images should not onely be had in Churches, but also worshipped. For whatsoever I should say, the authority of the Synode would make a great prejudice on the other side; although, to say truth, that doth not so much move mee, as make it appeare to the Readers how farre their rage extended, that were more desirous of images than became Christians. But first let us dispatch this: They that at this day maintaine the use of images, alleage the decree of that Nicene Synode for their defence.

In Psal. 113.

1 Joh. 5. 21.

The frivolous arguments of Papists, whereby it was disputed in the Nicene Synode, that images were to be had in Churches.

But there is extant a booke of confutation bearing the name of Charles the Great, which by the phrase wee may gather to have bene written at the same time. Therein are recited the sentences of the Bishops that were present at that Councell, and the arguments wherewith they contended. John the Legate of the East parts said : God created man after his owne image : and thereupon gathered that wee ought to have images. The same man thought that images were commended unto us in this sentence : Shew me thy face because it is beautifull. Another to prove that images ought to be set upon altars, cited this testimony : No man lighteth a candle and putteth it under a bushell. Another, to shew that the beholding of them is profitable for us, brought forth a verse out of the Psalme : The light of thy countenance is sealed upon us. Another tooke this similitude : As the Patriarchs used the Sacrifices of the Gentiles, so must Christian men have the images of Saints in stead of the images of the Gentiles. To the same purpose have they writhed this saying : Lord, I have loved the beauty of thy house. But specially witty is the exposition of this place : As we have heard so have we seene; that God is not knowne by onely hearing of his word, but also by looking upon images. Like is the sharp device of Bishop Theodore : Marvellous (saith he) is God in his Saints. And in another place : In the Saints that are in the earth : therefore this ought to be referred to images. Finally, so filthy are their unfavoury follies that it grieveth me to rehearse them.

15. When they talke of the worshipping : then are brought forth the worshipping of Pharao, and of the rod of Ioseph, and of the pillar that Jacob set up. Albeit in this last example, they doe not onely deprave the meaning of the Scripture, but also bring in that which is no where to bee read. Then these places seeme to them marvellous strong and meet proofes. Worship his foot-stoole. Againe, worship on his holy hill. Againe, all the rich men of the people shall worship thy countenance. If a man would in scorn put the personage of a riding foole upon the patrones of Images, could he gather together greater and grosser follies? But to put all out of doubt, Theodosius Bishop of Mira, doth so earnestly confirme by the dreames of his Archdeacon, that images ought to be worshipped, as if he had an oracle from heaven to shew for it. Now let the favourers of images, goe and presse us with the decree of that Synode. As though those reverend fathers doe not altogether discredit themselves, in either so childishly handling, or so ungodly and foully tearing the Scriptures.

16. Now come I to those monstrous impieties, which it is marvell that ever they durst vomit, and twice marvellous that they were not cried out against with high detestation of all men. And it is good that this outrageously wicked madnesse be bewrayed, that at least the false colour of antiquity may be taken away, which the Papiis pretend for the worshipping of images. Theodosius the Bishop of Amorus pronounceth a curse against all them that will not have images worshipped. Another imputeth all the calamities of Grecia and the East part to this, that images were not worshipped. What punishment then were the Prophets, the Apostles and Martyrs worthy to suffer, in whose time there were no images? They adde further, If the Emperours image be met with perfume and censing : much more is this honour due to the images of Saints. Constantius Bishop of Constance in Cyprus, professeth that hee reverently embraceth images, and affirmeth that hee will give to them the same honourable manner of worship that is due to the Trinity that giveth life. And whosoever refuseth so to doe, hee curseth him and sendeth him away with the Manichees and Marconites. And, that yee should not thinke that this was the private sentence of one man, they did all assent unto it. Yea, John the Legate of the East parts being further carried with heat, said, it were better to bring all brothell houses into the Citie, than to deny the worshipping of images. At length by consent of them all it was decreed, that worse than all heretikes are the Samaritans, and worse than the Samaritans are the enemies of images. And because the play should not be without his solemne farewell, this clause was added, let them be glad and rejoice, that having the image of Christ doe offer sacrifice unto it. Where is now the distinction of Latria and Dulia, wherewith they are wont to seeke to blinde the eyes both of God and men? For the Councell without any exception doth give even as much unto images, as unto the living God himselfe.

Their arguments brought for proove that they might be worshipped.

Honour, and the same honour given by that Synod unto images which is due unto God himselfe.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER.

That God is severally discerned from idols, that he may be onely and wholly worshipped.

WE said in the beginning that the knowledge of God standeth not in bare speculation, but draweth with it the worshipping of him, and by the way we touched how he is rightly worshipped, which point shall bee in other places more largely set forth. Now I doe but shortly repeat, that so oft as the Scripture affirmeth that there is but one God, it striveth not for the bare name of God, but withall commandeth this, that whatsoever belongeth to the God-head, be not given to any other. Whereby also appeareth what pure religion doth differ from superstition. Ensebeia, in Greeke signifieth as much as true worship, because alway even the blinde themselves groping in darknesse have found that this rule ought to bee holden, that God be not unorderly worshipped. The name of religion although Cicero truly and well deriveth from religere, to record, or gather up together: yet is the reason that he assigneth enforced and farre fet, that good worshippers did often record, and diligently weigh what was the truth. I rather thinke that that name is set as a contrary to wandering liberty, because the greater part of the world unadvisedly taketh hold of that which they first meet withall, and flieth about hither and thither: but true godlinesse, to the end it may stand in stedfast state, religit, that is to say, doth gather up it selfe together within her bounds. Like as I thinke superstition to have her name hereof, that not being contented with the manner and order prescribed, she heapeth up together a superfluous number of vaine things. But to leave the words, it hath alway beene agreed by the consent of all ages, that religion is with false errors corrupted & perverted. Whereupon we gather that it is a very fond colour which the superstitious doe pretend, when with indiscreet zeale they give themselves leave to doe all things. And although this confession sound in the mouths of all men: yet herein a shamefull ignorance bewrayeth it selfe, that neither they cleave to the one God, nor have any regard of order in the worshipping of him, as we have already shewed. But God, to claime his owne right unto himselfe, crieth out that he is jealous, and that he will be a severe revenger if he be mingled with any fained god. And then he fetcheth forth the lawfull manner of worshipping, to hold mankind in obedience. He containeth both these points in his law, when first hee bindeth the faithfull unto himselfe that he onely may bee their law-maker: and then he prescribeth a rule whereby to be worshipped after his owne minde. Of the law, because the uses and ends thereof are many, I will intreat in place fit for it. Now I onely touch this point, that thereby men are bridled, that they run not out of the way to wrong worshippings. Now, as I first said, we must hold in minde, that if all that ever properly belongeth to God-head doe not rest in God alone, he is spoiled of his honour, and his worship broken. And there must we somewhat heedfully marke with what subtilties superstition deceiveth. For it doth not so revolt unto strange gods, that it seemeth to forsake the highest God, or to bring him downe into the number of other gods: but whilest he granteth unto him the highest place, he setteth round about him a number of lesser gods: among whom hee divideth his offices. And so (albeit cloakedly and craftily) the glory of the God-head is cut in parts, that it remaineth not whole in him. So in the old time, as well they of the Jewes as of the Gentiles did set beneath the father and judge of gods a great rout of gods, which should every one according to his degree in common have with the highest God the government of the heaven and earth. So the Saints that in a few ages past departed this life, are advanced to the fellowship of God, to be worshipped, called upon, and honoured in stead of him. And yet with such abomination wee thinke that the majestic of God is not so much as divided, when indeed it is a great part suppressed and extinguished, saying that wee retaine still a poore opinion of his supreme power: and in the meane time deceived with entangled subtilties, we are suddenly carried to divers gods.

2. For this purpose also was invented the distinction of Latria and Dulia, as they terme them, that is worship and service, wherby they might freely seeme to give away the honours of God to Angels and dead men. For it is evident, that the worship which the Papiſts give unto Saints, differeth nothing indeed from the worship of God. For all alike without diversity they worship both God and them: saying that when they be charged with it, they wind away with this exception, that they keepe still for God the honour that is due unto him inviolate, because they leave unto him the worship that they call Latria. But sith the question standeth upon the matter, and not the word, who would permit them so carelesly to mock in a matter of all matters most weighty? But to let that also passe, yet win they nothing by this distinction, but to prove, that they give worship to one God, and service to another. For Latria in Greeke signifieth as much as in Latine Cultus, and in English worship, Dulia properly signifieth service. And yet sometime in Scripture this difference is confounded together without diversitie. But grant it be a perpetuall difference, then must wee search what both the words may meane. Dulia is service, Latria is worship. Now no man doubteth that to serve, is more than to worship. For many times a man could hardly beare, to serve him whom he would not sticke to worship. So is it an unequal dealing to give to the Saints that which is the greater, and to leave to God that which is the lesser. But many of the ancient authors have used this distinction. What maketh that matter, if all men doe perceive it to be not only just, but altogether very sound?

3. Now leaving nice subtilties, let us weigh the matter it self. When Paul putteth the Galatians in remembrance what they were before that they were lightened in the knowledge of God, he saith that they gave Duliam service to those that of nature were no gods. Although he name Latriam or worship, is therefore their superstition excusable? He doth neverthelesse condemne their perverse superstition, which hee termeth by the name of Dulia, service, than if hee had expressed the name of Latria, worship. And when Christ repulseth the assault of Sathan with his buckler, that it is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, the name of Latria was not brought in question: Satan required but an adoration. Likewise when the Angell reprooved Iohn, because he fell downe on his knees before him, we ought not to thinke that Iohn was so mad that he would give unto the Angell the honor that was due only to God. But because it was not possible, but that all worship that is joynd with religion favoureth somewhat as pertaining to God, therefore he could not adore the Angell, but that he must take away somewhat from the glorie of God. We read indeed often, that men have beene honoured: but that was a civill honor, as I may so call it. But religion hath another rule, which so soone as it is joynd with worship, bringeth with it a prophane abuse of the honour of God. The same may we see in Cornelius. He had not so slenderly profited in godlinesse, but that he had learned to give the soveraigne worship to God alone. Therefore, when he fell downe before Peter, he did it not of this meaning, to worship him in the steede of God. And yet did Peter earnestly forbid him to doe that which hee did. And why so? but because men doe never so narrowly put difference betweene the worship of God and of his creatures: but that without diversitie they give away that unto the creature, which belongeth unto God. Wherefore if we have one God, wee must remember that nothing be it never so litle must be taken away from his glorie, but that he keepe still that which is properly his. Therefore Zachary when he preacheth of the repairing of the Church, in plaine words expresseth: That there shall not onely be one God, but also that there shall be one name of that God, to the end that he have nothing in common with idols. What manner of worship God requireth, we shall see in another place when it falleth in order. For it pleased him in his law to prescribe unto men what is lawfull and right, and so to bind them to a certain rule, that every man should not give himselfe leave to devise what forme of worship he list. But because it is not expedient to load the readers with heaping many matters together, I will not touch that point yet. Onely let it suffice for this time to keep in minde, that every carrying away of the dutifull behaviours of godlinesse to any other then to God alone, is not without robbrie of God. And first superstition devised to give divine honours to the Sunne, or other Starres or idols: then followed ambitious pride, which garnishing mortall men with spoiles taken from God, presumed to prophane all that ever was holy. And although this principle remained among them, to honour the soveraigne deitie, yet grew it in use indifferently to offer sacrifices to spirits, lesser gods, or dead men of honour. So slipperie is the way to slide into this fault, to make common to a number that which God severly challengeth to himselfe alone.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, which essence consisteth in it three persons.

THAT which is taught in the Scriptures concerning the incomprehensible and spirituall essence of God, ought to suffice not onely to overthrow the foolish errors of the common people, but also to confute the fine subtilties of prophane Philosophy. One of the old writers seemed to have said very well, That God is all that we doe seee, and all that we doe not seee. But by this meane hee hath imagined the God-head to be powred into all the parts of the world. Although God, to the intent to keepe men in sober minde, speaketh but sparsely of his owne essence, yet by those two naues of addition that I have rehearsed, he doth both take away all grosse imaginations, and also represseth the presumptuous boldnesse of mans mind. For surely his immeasurable greatnesse ought to make us afraid, that we attempt not to measure him with our sense: and his spirituall nature forbiddeth us to imagine any thing earthly or fleshly of him. For the same cause he often assigneth his dwelling place to be in heaven. For though, as he is incomprehensible, he filleth the earth also: yet because he seeth our mindes by reason of their dullnesse to lie still in the earth, for good cause he lifteth us up above the world, to shake off our both and sluggishnesse. And here filleth to ground the error of the Manichees, which in appointing two originall beginnings, have made the devill in a manner equall with God. Surely, this was as much as to breake the unity of God and restraints his unmeasurable esse. For where they have presumed to abuse certaine testimonies: that sheweth a foule ignorance, as their error it selfe sheweth a detestable madnesse. And the Anthropomorphytes are also easily confuted, which have imagined God to consist of a body, because oftentimes the Scripture ascribeth unto him a mouth, eares, eyes, hands, and feet. For what man, yea, though he be slenderly witted, doth not understand that God doth so with us speake, as it were childishly, as nurses doe with their babes? Therefore such manner of speeches doe not so plainly expresse what God is, as they doe apply the understanding of him to our slender capacity. Which to doe, it behoved of necessity that he descended a great way beneath his owne height.

2. But hee also setteth out himselfe by another speciall marke, whereby hee may be more neerly knowne. For he doth declareth himselfe to be but one, that hee yet giveth himselfe distinctly to be considered in three persons: which except wee learne, a bare and empty name of God without any true God lieth in our braine. And that no man should thinke that he is a threefold God, or that the one essence of God is divided in three persons, we must seeke here a short and easie definition to deliver us from all error. But because many doe make much ado about this word Person, as a thing invented by man: how justly they doe so, it is best first to see. The Apostle naming the Sonne the engraven forme of the Hypostasis of his Father, he undoubtedly meaneth, that the Father hath some being wherein he differeth from the Sonne. For to take it for essence (as some Expositors have done, as if Christ like a peece of wax printed with a seale did represent the substance of the Father) were not onely hard, but also an absurdity. For since the essence of God is single or one and undivisible, he that in himselfe containeth it all, and not by peece-meale, or by derivation, but in whole perfection, should very improperly, yea, fondly be called the engraven forme of him. But because the Father although hee be in his owne property distinct, hath expressed himselfe wholly in his Sonne, it is for good cause said, that he hath given his Hypostasis, to be seene in him. Wherewith aptly agreeth that which by and by followeth, that he is the brightnesse of his glory. Surely by the Apostles words we gather, that there is a certaine proper Hypostasis in the Father, that shineth in the Sonne: whereby also againe is easily perceived the Hypostasis of the Sonne that distinguisheth him from the father. Like order is in the Holy Ghost, For wee shall by and by prove him to be God, and yet hee must needs be other than the Father. Yet this distinction is not of the essence, which it is unlawful

The Scripture teacheth God to be an essence unmeasurable and spirituall, doth not onely stay men from measuring God by sense and from imagining any earthly thing of him, but also by the one doubt convince the Manichees, by the other the Anthropomorphytes of madnesse.

unlawfull to make manifold. Therefore if the Apostles testimony be credited, it followeth that there be in God three Hypostases. This terme seeing the Latines have expressed with the name of Person, it were too much pride and waywardnesse to brawle about so cleare a matter. But if we list word for word to translate, we may call it subsistence. Many in the same sense have called it substance. And the name Person hath not bene in use among the Latines onely, but also the Grecians, perhaps to declare a consent, have taught that there are three Prosopa, that is to say, Persons in God. But they, whether they be Greeks or Latines that differ one from another in the word, doe very well agree in the summe of the matter.

3. Now howsoever the heretikes barke at the name of Person, or some overmuch precise men doe carpe that they like not the word fained by device of men: sith they cannot get of us to say, that there be three, whereof every one is wholly God, nor yet that there be many Gods: what unreasonableness is this, to mislike words, which expresse none other thing but that which is testified and approved by the Scriptures? It were better (say they) to restraine not onely our meanings but also our words within the bounds of Scripture, than to device strange names that may bee the beginning of disagreement and brawling: so doe we tire our selves with strife about words; so the truth is lost in contending: so charity is broken by odiously brawling together. If they call that a strange word, which cannot be shewed in Scripture, as it is written in number of syllables: then they binde us to a hard law, whereby is condemned all exposition that is not peeced together, with bare laying together of texts of Scripture. But if they meane that to be strange, which being curiously devised, is superstitiously defended, which maketh more for contention than edification, which is either unaptly, or to no profit used, which withdraweth from the simplicity of the word of God, then withall my heart I embrace their sober minde. For I judge that we ought with no lesse devout reverence to talke of God than to thinke of him, for as much as whatsoever we doe of our selves thinke of him, is foolish, and whatsoever we speake is unfavoury. But there is a certaine measure to be kept. We ought to learne out of the Scriptures a rule both to thinke and speake, whereby to examine all the thoughts of our minde, and words of our mouth. But what withstandeth us, but that such as in Scripture are to our capacity doubtfull and entangled, wee may in plainer words expresse them, being yet such words as doe reverently and faithfully serve the truth of the Scripture, and be used sparsely, modestly, and not without occasion? Of which sort there are examples enough. And whereas it shall by prooffe appeare that the Church of great necessity was enforced to use the names of Trinity, and Persons, if any should then finde fault with the newnesse of words, shall he not be justly thought to be grieved at the light of the truth, as he hath blamed onely this, that the truth is made so plaine and cleare to discern?

4. Such newnesse of words, if it be so to be called, commeth then chiefly in use, when the truth is to be defended against wranglers that doe mocke it out with cavillations. Which thing we have at this day too much in experience, who have great businesse in vanquishing the enemies of true and sound doctrine. With such folding and crooked winding these slippery snakes doe slide away, unlesse they be strongly griped and holden hard when they be taken. So the old Fathers being troubled with contending against false doctrines, were compelled to shew their meaning in exquisite plainnesse, lest they should leave any crooked by-ways to the wicked, to whom the doubtfull constructions of words were hiding holes of errors. Arius confessed Christ to be God, and the Sonne of God, because hee could not gaine-say the evident words of God, and as if hee had bene so sufficiently discharged, did faine a certaine consent with the rest. But in the meane while hee ceased not to scatter abroad that Christ was create, and had a beginning as other creatures. But to the end they might draw forth his winding subtiltie out of his den, the ancient Fathers went further, pronouncing Christ to be the eternall Sonne of the Father, and consubstantiall with the Father. Hereat wickednesse began to boile, when the Ariants began to hate and detest the name Omoufion, consubstantiall. But if in the beginning they had sincerely and with plaine meaning confessed Christ to be God, they would not now have denied him him to bee consubstantiall with the Father. Who dare now blame these good men as brawlers and contentious, because for one little words sake, they were so hot in disputation, and troubled the quiet of the Church? But that little word shewed the difference betweene the true beleeving Christians, and the Arians that were robbers of God. Afterward rose up Sabellius, which accounted in a manner for nothing the names of the Father, the Sonne, and Holy Ghost, saying in disputation that they were not made to shew any manner of distinction, but onely were severall additions of God, of which sort there are many. If he came to disputation, hee confessed, that hee beleeved the Father God, the Sonne God, the Holy Ghost God. But afterward he would readily slip away with saying, that he had in no otherwise spoken, than as if he had named God, a strong God, just God, and wise God: and so hee sung another song, that the Father is the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost is the Father, without any order, without any distinction. The good Doctors which then had care of godlinesse, to subdue his wickednesse, cryed out on the other side, that there ought to be acknowledged in one God three properties: and to the end to fence themselves against the crooked writhen subtilties with plaine and simple truth, they affirmed, that there did truly subsist in one God, or (which came all to one effect) that there did subsist in the unity of God a Trinity of Persons.

With the names of Trinity and Person no man should be offended.

The crooked subtilties of heretikes hath caused sound believers to devise new words for plainer opening of that under which their consciences lurked, as, consubstantiall, against the Arians: Personall Trinity, against the Sabellians.

5. If then the names have not bene without cause invented, we ought to take heed, that in rejecting them we be not justly blamed of proud presumptuousnesse. I would to God they were buried indeed, so that this faith were agreed of all men, that the Father, and the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, be one God: and yet that the Father is not the Sonne, nor the Holy Ghost the Sonne, but distinct by certaine properties. Yet am I not so precise, that I can finde in my heart to strive for bare words. For Inote, that the old Fathers, which otherwise speake very religiously of such matters, did not every where agree one with another, nor every one with himselfe. For what formes of speech used by the Councils doth Hilary excuse? To how great libertie doth Augustine sometime breake forth? How unlike are the Greeks to the Latines? But of this variance one example shall suffice for this time. When the Latines meant to expresse the word Omoussion, they called it Consubstantiall, declaring the substance of the Father and the Sonne to be one, so using the word substance for essence. Whereupon Hierome to Damasius saith, it is sacrilege to say, that there are three substances in God: and yet above an hundred times you shall finde in Hilary, that there are three substances in God. In the word Hypostasis, how is Hierome accumbred? For hee suspecteth that there lurkech poyson in naming three Hypostases in God. And if a man doe use this word in a godly sense, yet he plainly saith, that it is an improper speech, if he spake unfaindly, and did not rather wittingly and willingly seeke to charge the Bishops of the Eastlands, whom he fought to charge with an unjust slander. Sure this one thing he speakech not very truly, that in all prophane schooles, Ousia, essence is nothing else but Hypostasis, which is proved false by the common and accustomed use. Augustine is more modest and gentle, which although he say, that the word Hypostasis in that sense is strange to Latine eares, yet so farre is it off, that he taketh from the Greeks their usual manner of speaking, that hee also gently beareth with the Latines that had followed the Greeke phrase. And that which Sozomen writeth in the sixth booke of the Tripartite history, tendeth to this end, as though hee meant that he had by unskilfull men benee wrongfully applied unto this matter. Yea, and the same Hilary himselfe layeth it for a great fault to the heretikes charge, that by their waywardnesse he is compelled to put those things in perill of the speech of men, which ought to have bene kept in religiousnesse of mind, plainly confessing that this is to doe things unlawfull, to speake that ought not to be spoken, to attempt things not licenced. A little after, he excuseth himselfe with many words, for that he was so bold to utter new names. For after hee had used the naturall names, Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost, he addeth, that whatsoever is sought further, is beyond the compasse of speech, beyond the reach of sense, and beyond the capacity of understanding. And in another place hee saith, that happy are the Bishops of Gallia, which neither had, nor received, nor knew any other confession, but that old and simple one, which from the time of the Apostles was received in all Churches. And much like is the excuse of Augustine, that this word was wrung out of necessity by reason of the imperfection of mens language in so great a matter: not to expresse that which is, but that it should not be unspoken how the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost are three. This modestie of the holy men ought to warne us, that wee doe not forth with so severely, like Censors, note them with infamie that refuse to subscribe and sweare to such words as we propound them: so that they doe it not of pride, of frowardnesse, or of malicious craft. But let them againe consider, by how great necessity we are driven to speake so, that by little and little they may be enured with that profitable manner of speech. Let them also learne to beware, lest sith we must meet on the one side with the Arrians, on the other side with Sabellians, while they be offended that we cut off occasion from them both to cavill, they bring themselves in suspition, that they be the disciples either of Arrius or Sabellius. Arrius saith, that Christ is God, but he mutereth that he was created, and had a beginning. He saith, Christ is one with the Father, but secretly he whispereth in the eares of his disciples, that he was made one as the other faithfull bee, although by singular prerogative. Say once that Christ is Consubstantiall with his Father, then plucke you off his visor from the dissembler, and yet you adde nothing to the Scripture. Sabellius saith, that the severall names, Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost, signifie nothing in God severally distinct: say that they are three; and he will crie out that you named three Gods. Say that there is in one essence a Trinity of Persons, then shall you in one word both say what the Scripture speaketh, and stop their vaine babling. Now if any be holden with so curious superstitio, that they cannot abide these names: yet is there no man, though he would never so faine, that can deny but that when we heare of one, we must understand an unity of substance: when we heare of three in one essence, that it is meant of the persons of the Trinity. Which thing being without fraud confessed, we stay no longer upon words. But I have long agoe found, and that often, that whosoever doe obstinately quarrell about words, doe keepe within them a secret poyson: so that it is better willingly to provoke them, than for their pleasure to speake darkly.

6. But leaving disputation of words, I will now beginne to speake of the matter it selfe: I call therefore a Person, a subsistence in the essence of God, which having relation to the other is distinguished from them with uncommunicable propertie. By the name of the subsistence we meane another thing than the essence: For if the word had simply bene God, and in the meane time had nothing severally proper to it selfe, Iohn had said amisse, that it was with God. Where he forthwith addeth, that God himselfe was the same Word, he calleth us backe againe to the one single essence. But because it could not be with God, but that it must rest in the Father: hereof ariseth that subsistence, which though it be joyned to the essence with an unseparable knot, yet hath it a speciall marke, whereby it doth differ from it. So of the three subsistences, I say, that each having relation to other, is in property distinguished. Relation is here expressly mentioned; for when there is simple and indefinite mention made of God, this name belongeth no lesse to the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Sonne, the severall propertie of either doth discern him from the other. Thirdly, whatsoever is proper unto every one of them is uncommunicable; for that which is given to the Father for a marke of difference, cannot agree with, nor be given to the Sonne. And I mislike not the definition of Terullian, so that it be rightly taken, That there is in God a certaine disposition or distribution, which yet changeth nothing of the unity of the essence.

7. But before that I goe any further, it is good that I prove the God-head of the Sonne and of the Holy Ghost; then after wee shall see how they differ one from another. Surely when the Word of God is spoken of in the Scripture, it were a very great absurdity to imagine it onely a fading and vanishing voice, which sent into the aire, commeth out of God himselfe, of which sort were the oracles given to the fathers, and all the prophecies: when rather the Word is meant to be the perpetuall wisdom abiding with the Father, from whence all the oracles and prophecies proceeded. For as Peter testifieth, no lesse did the old Prophets speake with the spirit of Christ, than did the Apostles, and all they that after them did distribute the heavenly doctrine. But because Christ was not yet openly shewed, wee must understaud that the Word was

The essence of God is one simple and single thing, wherein there are three subsistences, each differing from the other, having some incommunicable propertie.
John i. i.

Lib. contra Praxeam.

The word whereof in Scripture it is said that the spirit was of it, the world made and sustained by it, that it was begotten of God before the worlds, that it worketh with before all worlds begotten of the Father. And if the Spirit was of the Word, whose instruments were the Prophets, we doe undoubtedly gather that he was true God. And this doth Moses teach plainly enough in the creation of the world, when he setteth the word as the meane. For why doth he exprefly tell, that God in creating of all his works said, Be this done: or that done: but that the vnsearchable glory of God may shiningly appeare in his images? The subtle-nosed and babling men doe easily mocke out this, with saying that the name Word, is there taken for his bidding or commandement. But better expositors are the Apostles, which teach that the worlds were made by the same, and that he susteineth them all with his mightie Word. For here we see that the word is taken for the bidding or commandement of the Sonne, which is himselfe the eternall and essentiall Word to the Father. And to the wise and sober it is not darke that Salomon saith, where he bringeth in wisdome begotten of God before all worlds, and bearing rule in the creation of things, and in all the works of God. For to say that it was a certaine commandement of God, serving but for a time, were very foolish and vaine: whereas indeed it was Gods pleasure at that time to shew forth his stedfast and eternall purpose, yea and some thing more secret. To which intent also maketh that saying of Christ: My Father and I doe worke even to this day. For in saying: That from the beginning of the world, he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare, that which Moses had more shortly touched. Wee gather then that the meaning of Gods speaking was this, that the Word had his office in the doing of things, and so they both had a common working together. But most plainly of all doth Iohn speake, when he sheweth that the same Word, which from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father, the cause of all things. For he both giueth to the Word a perfect and abiding essence, and also assigneth unto it some thing peculiar to itselfe, and plainly sheweth how God in speaking was the creatour of the world. Therefore as all revelations proceeding from God doe well beare the name of the word of God, so ought we yet to set in the highest place that substantiall Word, the wellspring of all Oracles, which being subject to no alteration, abideth alwayes one and the selfe same with God, and is God himselfe.

8 Heere many dogs doe barke against vs, which when they dare not openly take from him his Godhead, doe secretly steale from him his eternitie. For they say, that the Word then began first to be, when GOD in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But very indiscreetly doe they to imagine a certaine innovation of the substance of God. For as those names of God that have relation to his outward worke, began to be given vnto him after the beginning of his worke, as for example, this that he is called the creator of heaven and earth: so doth godlinesse know or admit no name, that should signifie any new thing in himselfe to have chanced vnto God. For if any should come to him from else where than in himselfe, then this saying of Iames should faile, that every good giving, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh downe from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadowing by turning. Therefore nothing is lesse to be suffered, then to faigne a beginning of that Word which both alwayes was God, and after ward was Creator of the World. But full subtilly forsooth they reason, that Moses in saying that God then first spake, doth secretly shew, that there was no word in him before. Which is a most trifling argument. For it followeth not, because a thing at some one certaine time beginneth to bee shewed openly, that therefore it had never any being before. But I conclude farre otherwise and say: seeing that in the same moment that God said, Let light bee made, the power of the Word appeared and shewed it selfe: the same Word was long before: but if a man aske how long before, he shall finde no beginning. For hee appointed no certaine space of time when himselfe said: Father glorifie me with the glory which I had with thee before the World was. And this thing Iohn also left not untouched, because he first sheweth that in the beginning the Word was with God, before that he cometh to the creation of the world. We say therefore againe, that the Word which was conceived of God before any beginning of time, was continually remaining with him. Whereby both his eternitie, true essence, and Godhead is proved.

that place where we shall specially intreat of the redemption: yet because it ought to be certainly holden without controuersie among all men, that Christ is the same Word clad with flesh, in this place it will be very fit to recite all those testimonies that prooue Christ to be God. When it is said in the xlv. Psalme, Thy throne O God is for ever and ever: the Iewes doe cavill and say, that the name Elohim is also applied to the Angels and soveraigne powers. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place that raiseth an eternal throne to any creature. For he is heere not simply called God, but also the eternal Lord. Again, this title is given to none but with an addition, as it is said: that Moses shall be for a God to Pharao. Some reade it in the genitive case, which is very foolish: I grant indeed that oftentimes a thing is called Divine or of God, that is notable by any singular excellence: but heere by the tenure of the text: it appeareth, that such a meaning were hard and forced, and will not agree: but if their stubbornesse will not so yeeld: In Efsay is very plainly brought in for all one both Christ and God, and hee that is adorned with the soveraigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (saith he) is the name whereby they shall call him, the strong God, the Father of the World to come, &c. Heere the Iewes barke againe, and turne the text thus: this is the name whereby the strong God, the father of the world to come, shall call him: so that they leave this onely to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpose should so many names of addition in this place bee heaped vpon God the Father, seeing it is the purpose of the Prophet, to adorne Christ with such speciall notes, as may build our faith vpon him? Wherefore it is out of doubt that he is heere in like sort called the strong God, as he is a little before called Immanuel. But nothing can bee found plainer then that place of Hieremy, where he saith, that this shall be the name whereby the seed of David shall be called Jehovah our righteoufnesse. For where the Iewes themselves doe teach, that all other names of God are but adiectiue names of addition, and that this onely name Jehovah, which they call vnspokeable, is a substantive name to expresse his essence: we gather that the Sonne is the onely and eternal God, which saith in another place that hee will not give his glorie to another. But heere also they seeke to scape away, because that Moses gaue that name to the Altar that he builded: and Ezechiel gave it to the new cite Hierusalem. But who doth not see that the Altar was builded for a monument that God was the advancement of Moses, and that Hierusalem is not adorned with the name of God, but onely to testify the presence of God? For thus saith the Prophet: The name of the cite from that day shall be Jehovah there. And Moses saith thus: He builded an Altar and called the name of it, Jehovah my exaltation. But more businesse ariseth by another place of Hieremy, where the same title is applied to Hierusalem in these words: this is the name whereby they shall call her Jehovah, our righteoufnesse. But this testimonie is so farre from making against the truth which we defend, that it rather confirmeth it. For whereas hee had before testified that Christ is the true Jehovah from whom floweth righteoufnesse, now he pronounceth that the Church shall so verely seele the same, that she may gloriously use the very name it selfe. And so in the first place is set the fountaine and cause of righteoufnesse, in the other the effect.

10 Nowif this doe not satisfie the Jewes, that Jehovah is so often presented in the person of an Angell, I see not with what cavillations they can mocke it out. It is said, that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the same Angell challengeth to himselfe the name of the eternal God. If any take exception and say, that this is spoken in respect of the person that he representeth: this knot is not thus loosed. For being a servant he would not suffer Sacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refusing to eate bread, commandeth Sacrifice to be offered to Jehovah. And then he prooueth that himselfe indeed was the same Jehovah, and therefore Munob and his wife by this token did gather, that they had seene not onely an Angell but God. And theace came it that he said we shall die because we haue seene God. And when his wife answereth, if Jehovah would haue slaine vs, he would not haue received Sacrifice at our hands: in this she doth confesse that he was God which before was called the Angell. Beside this, the answer of the Angell himselfe taketh away all doubt of it, saying: why doest thou aske me of my name, which is marvellous? So much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Servetto, when he affirmed that God never appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshipped in place of him. But truly and wisely have the true teaching doctors of the Church expounded, that the same principall Angel was the Word of God, which then as aforehand began to execute the office of mediator. For though hee was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a meane betweene God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nie communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell: yet still in the meane time hee retained that which was his owne, to be the God of unspeakable glorie. The same thing meaneth Oses, which after he had recited the wraffling of Jacob with the Angell, saith: Jehovah the God of hostes, Jehovah, worthis of memorie is his name. Here againe Servetto carpeth, that God did beare the person of an Angell. As though the Prophet did not confirme that which Moses had said: Why dost thou aske mee of my name? And the confession of the holy Patriarch doth sufficiently declare that he was not a created Angell, but one in whom the full Godhead was resident, when he said: I have seene God face to face. And for this cause Paul saith, that Christ was guide of the people in the wildernesse. For though the time was not yet come of his abasement: yet that eternall Word shewed a figure of that office to which he was appointed. Now if the second Chapter of Zacharie be weighed without contention, the Angell that sent another Angell was by and by pronounced to be the God of hostes, and to him is soveraigne power ascribed. I omit innumerable testimonies on the which our faith safely resteth, although they doe not much move the Jewes. For when it is said in Esaie: Behold, this is our God, this is Jehovah, we shall wait upon him, and he shall save us: they that have eyes may see, that herein is meant God which raiseth up for the salvation of his people. And these vehement demonstrations twise repeated, suffer it to be drawne no otherwhere but to Christ. And yet plainer and fuller is the place of Malachie, where he promiseth that he shall come, the Lord that was then desired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the only soveraigne God was the temple dedicate, which temple yet the Prophet doth claime for Christ, whereupon followeth, that Christ is the same God that was ever honored among the Iewes.

II. As for the new Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefore we must travell rather shortly to choosé out few, than largely to heape up all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediatour in flesh: yet all that I shall bring forth, shall aptly serve to prove his God-head. First, this is worthy to be singularly marked, that those things which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles do shew that they are either already performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where Esaie prophecieth that the Lord of hostes shall be to the Iewes and Israëlites a stumbling stone and a rock to fall upon: Paul affirmeth that the same is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore he declareth him to be the Lord of hosts: Likewise in another place, We must all (saith he) once be brought to appeare before the judgement throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to mee shall all tongues sweare. Seeing God in Esaie speaketh this thing of himself, and Christ indeed performeth it in himselfe, it followeth, that he is the selfe same God, whose glorie may not be withdrawn to another. And that thing, which writing to the Epehians he alleadgeth out of the Psalmes, is evident that it can be applied to none but to God alone. Ascending on high he hath carried captivity captive, meaning that such ascending was in shadow shewed, when God in notable victorie against forreigne nations did shew forth his power, but he declareth that in Christ it was more fully performed. So Iohn testifieth that it was the glorie of the Sonne that was revealed to Esaie by a vision, whereas indeed the Prophet himselfe writeth that the majesty of God appeared unto him. And it is evident that those things which the Apostle writing to the Hebrewes applieth to the Sonne, are the plaine titles of God: as, Thou Lord in the beginning didst lay the foundations of heaven and earth, &c. Againe, worship him all ye his Angels. And yet hee abuseth not those titles when he draweth them to Christ. For all those things that are spoken of in those Psalmes, he himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he, that rose up and had mercie of Sion. It was he, that claimed to himselfe the kingdome of all the nations and Ilands. And why should Iohn sticke to apply the majestie of God to Christ, which in his preface he had said that the word was alway God? why should Paul feare to set Christ in the judgement throne of God, having before with so open proclamation declared his Godhead, where hee said that he was God blessed to the end of worlds? And to make appeare, how well he agreeth in this point with himselfe, in another place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If hee bee God, to bee praised to the end of worlds, then he is the same to whom in another place hee affirmeth all glory and honour to be due: And thus he hideth not, but plainly cryeth out, that he would have counted it no robbérie, if hee had shewed himselfe equall with God, but that hee willingly abased himselfe. And that the wicked should not carpe that he is some made God, Iohn goeth further and saith: He is the true God and the eternal life. Although it ought abundantly to satisfie us, that hee is called God, specially of that witness which expressly affirmeth unto us, that there are no more Gods but one. That same witness is Paul, which saith thus: How many soever be called Gods, either in heaven or in earth, to us there is but one God from whom are all things. When we heare of the same mouth, that God was openly shewed in the flesh, that God with his owne blood purchased the Church unto himselfe: why should wee imagine a second God which hee himselfe acknowledgeth not: And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the same meaning. Likewise Thomas in protesting him to be his Lord and his God, doth professeth that he is that only one God, whom he had alwaies worshipped.

12 * Now if we esteeme his Godhead by the works that in the Scripture are ascribed unto him, it shall thereby more evidently appeare. For when hee said that from the beginning he was thither to working with his Father: the Jewes were most dull in understanding of all his other sayings, yet then perceived that he tooke upon him the power of God. And therefore as Iohn telleth, they sought the more to kill him, because he did not only breake the Sabbath, but also did call God his Father, making himselfe equall with God. How dull shall we be then, if we doe not perceive that his Godhead is herein plainly affirmed? And truly to order the world with providence and power, and to governe all things with the authority of his owne might, which the Apostle ascribeth unto him, belongeth to none but onely to the creator. And he not onely enterpargeth the government of the world with his Father, but also all other offices which cannot bee made common to God with his creatures. The Lord cryeth out by the Prophet: I am he, I am he, that doe away thine offences for mine owne sake. According to the meaning of this sentence, when the Jewes thought that wrong was done to God for that Christ did forgive sinnes: Christ not only affirmed in words, but also proved by miracle that this power belonged unto himselfe. We see therefore that hee hath, not the ministracion, but the power of forgiveness of sinnes, which the Lord saith he will not suffer to passe away from himselfe to any. What shall we say of searching, and peering the secret thoughts of hearts? is it not the propertie of God alone? But the same had Christ: whereby is gathered that he is God.

13 * Now in his miracles he plainly and clearly doth he appeare? And though I grant that as well the Prophets as the Apostles did equall, and like miracles to these, that he did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their ministracion disposed the gifts of God; he, shewed forth his owne power. He used sometime prayer, to the end to give glory unto his Father. But we see for the most part his owne power shewed unto us. And how could it otherwise be but that he was the very authour of miracles, that by his owne authoritie gave power to other to deale miracles abroad? For the Evangelist declareth that he gave power to the Apostles to raise up the dead, to heale the leprous, to cast out devils, &c. And they so used the ministracion thereof, that they sufficiently shewed that this power came not from elsewhere but from Christ. In the name of Jesus Christ (saith Peter) rise and walke. It is therefore no marvelle if Christ alledged his miracles to confound the unbelievingnesse of the Jewes: forasmuch as they were such as beeing done by his owne power, did give a most plaine testimonie of his Godhead. If elsewhere then in God there is no salvation, no righteousnesse, no life: and Christ containeth all these things in him, surely he is thereby declared to be God. And no man can object against me and say, that life and salvation is powred into him by God: for it is not said that he received salvation, but that hee is saluation himselſe. And if none be good but onely God: how can hee bee onely man, being I will not ſay good and juſt, but ſelſe goodneſſe and juſtice? Yea, from the firſt beginning of the creation as the Evangelist witneſſeth, in him was life: and hee then being life was the light of men. Wherefore being ſupported with ſuch prooves we are bold to reſoſe our faith and hope in him: when yet we know that it is an ungodlineſſe that robbeth God for any man to ſatten his confidence in creatures. Beleeve yee in God ſaith hee. Beleeve then alſo in me. And ſo doth Paul expound thoſe two places of Eſay, Whoſoever truſteth in him, ſhall not bee put to ſhame. Againe, Out of the root of Eſay ſhall hee come that ſhall riſe to rule peoples, in him the nations ſhall truſt. And why ſhould we ſecke our more teſtimonies of Scripture for this matter, when wee ſo often meeete with this ſentence? He that beleeveth in me hath eternall life. Moreouer the invocation which hangeth upon faith belongeth alſo to him, which yet is proper to the majeſty of God, if he have any thing at all proper to himſelſe. For one Prophet ſaith: Whoſoever calleth upon the name of Iehovah ſhall be ſaved: and another ſaith, a moſt ſtrong towre is the name of Iehovah: to it the righteous ſhall flee and hee ſhall be ſaved, but the name of Chriſt is called upon for ſalvation: it followeth therefore that he is Iehovah. As for invocation, we have an example of it in Stephen, when he ſaith, Lord Ieſu receive my ſpirit. Againe, in the whole Church, as Ananias teſtifieth in the ſame booke. Lord (ſaith hee) thou knoweſt how great evils this man hath done to thy Saints: that call upon thy name. And that it may bee more plainly underſtanded, that the whole fulneſſe of the Godhead doth corporally dwell in Chriſt; the Apoſtle doth confeſſe that hee brought no other doctrine among the Corinthians but the knowledge of him, and that hee preached no other thing but that knowledge. What, I pray you, and how great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached unto us, whom he willeth to glory in the knowledge of himſelſe alone? Who dare ſay, that he is but a creature, of whom the onely knowledge is our whole glory? Beſide that, the ſalutations ſet before the Epistles of Paul, with the ſame benefits from the Sonne, which they doe from the Father: whereby wee are taught nor onely that thoſe things which the Father giveth us, doe come unto us by his interceſſion, but alſo by community of power, he is the author of them. Which knowledge by practice is without doubt more certaine and perfect than any idle ſpeculation. For there the godly mind doth behold God moſt preſent: and in manner handle him, where it feeleth it ſelſe to bee quickned, lightned, ſaved, juſtified, and ſanctified.

14 Wherefore out of the ſame fountaines we muſt fetch our meane of proving to confirme the Godhead of the holy Ghoſt. Very plaine is the teſtimonie of Moſes in the hiſtory of the creation, that the ſpirit of God was upon the depths, or upon the unfaſhioned heape: becauſe hee ſheweth that not onely the beauty of the world that is now to be ſeene is preſerved by the power of the Spirit, but ere this beauty was added, the Spirit was then buſied in preſerving that conſuſed lump of things. And that ſaying of Eſay cannot be cavilled againſt. And now Iehovah and his Spirit hath ſent me. For hee communiceth with the Holy Ghoſt his chiefe power in ſending of Prophets: Whereby appeareth the divine majeſty of the holy Ghoſt. But our beſt proove, as I have ſaid, ſhall be by familiar uſe. For that which the Scriptures impute unto it, is farre from the property of creatures, and ſuch a thing as wee our ſelves doe learne by affirmed experience of godlineſſe. For he it is that being each where powred abroad, doth ſuſtaine and giveth growing and life to all things in heaven and in earth. And by this point hee is proved to benone of the number of creatures, for that hee is not comprehended within any bounds: but by powring his lively force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the very worke of God. Moreover, if regeneration into an incorruptible life be better and more excellent than any preſent quickning: what ſhall we judge of him from whoſe power the ſame proceedeth? And that he is the author of regeneration, nor by a borrowed, but by his owne force, the Scripture in many places teacheth: and not of that onely, but alſo of the immortality to come. Finally, as unto the Sonne, ſo unto him alſo are applied all thoſe offices that are moſt of all properly belonging to the Godhead. For hee ſearcheth the deepe ſecrets of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of counsell. He giveth wisdom and skill to speake, whereas yet the Lord pronounceth to Moses that it is onely his worke to doe it. So by him wee cometo a partaking of God, so that we may feele his power as it were working life in us. Our justification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, truth, grace, and what good thing soever may be thought of, because it is the holy Ghost onely from whom proceedeth all kinde of gifts: For that sentence of Paul is right worthy to be noted. Although there be divers gifts, and manifold and sundry is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spirit: because hee maketh him not onely the originall and beginning, but also the author. Which a little after is more plainly expressed in these words. One and the same spirit distributeth all things as he will. For if hee were not something subsisting in God, he would not attribute unto him choice of mind and will. Therefore most evidently doth Paul give to the holy Ghost divine power, and sheweth that he is substantially resident in God.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathered that we are the temple of God, because his spirit dwelleth in us: which thing is not lightly to be passed over. For whereas God so often promisseth that he will choose us for a temple to himselfe, that promise is no other way fulfilled, but by his spirit dwelling in us. Surely, as Augustine very well saith: if we were commanded to make unto the holy Ghost a temple of timber and stone, because such worship is due to God onely, it were a cleere argument that he is God: now therefore how much clearer is this, that wee ought not to make a temple, but our selves to bee a temple for him? And the Apostle himselfe calleth us sometime the temple of God, sometime the temple of the holy Ghost, both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lied to the holy Ghost, said that he lied not unto men, but unto God. And where Esay bringeth in the Lord of hostes speaking, Paul teacheth that it is the holy Ghost that speaketh. Yea, where commonly the Prophets say, that the words which they utter are the words of the Lord of hosts, Christ and the Apostles doe referre them to the holy Ghost: Whereby it followeth that he is the true Iehovah, that is the chiefe author of prophecies. Againe, where God complaineth that hee was provoked to wrath by the stubbornesse of his people; instead of that, Esay saith that his holy spirit was grieved. Last of all, if blasphemie against the holy Ghost be not forgiven in this world nor in the world to come, whereas he may obtaine pardon that hath blasphemed against the Sonne: his divine majesty is hereby plainly proved, the offence or diminishment whereof is an unpardonable crime. I doe wittingly and of purpose omit many testimonies that the ancient writers have used. They have thought it a marvelous meete place to alleage out of David: with the word of the Lord the heavens were established, and all the power of them with the spirit of his mouth; to prove that the world was no lesse the worke of the holy Ghost than of the Sonne. But for as much as it is commonly used in the Psalmes to repeat one thing twise: and in Esay the spirit of his mouth is as much to say, as his word, that reason is very weak. Therefore I thought good to touch a few such things as godly minds might soundly rest upon.

16 And as God hath more plainly disclosed himselfe by the coming of Christ, so he is also in the three persons become more familiarly knowne. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice vs for this present. Paul so knitteth these three together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this manner. Because there is but one Faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he thereby proveth that there is but one Faith. Therefore if we be entered into the faith and religion of one God by Baptisme: wee must needs thinke him the true God in whose name we are baptised: And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solemne protestation, Christ meant to testifie that the perfect light of faith was already delivered, when hee said: Baptise them in the name of the Father and of the Sonne and of the holy Ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of one God, which with perfect brightnesse hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost. Whereby is evident that in the essence of God abide three persons, in which the one God is knowne. And surely, for asmuch as our faith ought not to looke hither and thither, nor diversly to wander about, but to have regard to be the one God, to be applied applied to him, and to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easily proved, that it there bee divers kindes of faith, there must also bee many Gods. Now whereas Baptisme is a Sacrament of Faith: it prooveth unto us the unitie of God, because it is but one. And hereof also followeth, that it is not lawfull to bee baptised but into one God, because we embrace the faith of him, into whose name we are baptised. What meant Christ then, when he commanded to be baptised, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, but that we ought with one faith to belevee in the Father, Sonne, and the Holy Ghost? Therefore sith this remaineth certaine, that there is but one God, and not many, wee determine that the Word and the Spirit are nothing else but the very selfe essence of God. And very foolishly did the Arians prate, which confessing the Godhead of the Sonne, did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedonians, who would have to be understood by the Spirit, onely the gifts of grace that are powred forth into men. For as wisdom, understanding, prudence, fortitude, feare of God do proceed from him: so he only is the spirit of wisdom, prudence, fortitude, and godlines. Yet is not he divided according to the distribution of his graces: but howsoever they bediversly deait abroad, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle saith.

17. Againe, there is shewed in the Scriptures a certaine distinction of the Father, from the Word, and of the Word from the Spirit. In discussing whereof, how great religiousse and sobriety we ought to use, the greatnesse of miterieit selfe doth admonish us. And I very well like that saying of Gregorie Nazianzen: I cannot thinke upon the one, but by and by I am compassed about with the brightnesse of the three: And I cannot severally discern the three, but I am suddenly driven backe to one. Wherefore let it not come in our mindes once to imagine such a Trinitie of Persons as may hold our thought withdrawne into severalties, and doth not forthwith bring us againe to that unitie. The names of Father, Sonne, and holie Ghost, doe proove a true distinction, that no man should thinke them to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his workes is diversly entituled: but yet it is a distinction, not a division. The places that we have already cited, doe shew that the Sonne hath a proprietie distinct from the Father, because the Word had not beene with God, if he had not beene another thing than the Father: neither had he had his glorie with the Father, but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himselfe from the Father, when he saith, that there is another which beareth him witnesse. And for this purpose maketh that which in another place is said, that the Father created all things by the Word, which hee could not, but being after a certaine manner distinct from him. Moreover, the Father came not downe into the earth, but hee that came out from the Father. The Father died not, nor rose againe, but hee that was sent by him. Neither yet did this distinction begin at the taking of the flesh: but it is manifest that hee was also before, the only begotten in the bosome of the Father. For who can abide to say, that then the Sonne entered into the bosome of the Father, when hee descended from heaven to take manhood upon him? He was therefore before in the bosome of the Father, and enjoyed his glorie with the Father. As for the distinction of the Holy Ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he saith, that it proceedeth from the Father. And how oft doth he shew it to be another beside himselfe? as when hee promisseth that he will send another comforter, and often in other places.

18. But to borrow similitudes from matters of men, to expresse the force of this distinction, I know not whether it bee expedient. Indeed the old fathers are wont so to doe sometime: but withall they doe confesse, that whatsoever they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much afraid to bee any way bold, lest if I bring forth any thing untruly, it should give occasion either to the malicious to cavill, or to the unskillfull to be deceived. Yet such distinction as we have marked to be set out in Scriptures, it is not good to have left unspoken. And that is this, that to the Father is given the beginning of working, the fountaine and spring of all things: to the Sonne wisdom, counsell, and the very disposition in the doing of things: to the Holy Ghost is assigned power and effectually working. And although eternitie belong unto the Father, and eternitie to the Sonne and to the Holy Ghost also, for as much as God could never have been without his wisdom and power, and in eternity is not to be sought, which was first or last: yet this observation of order is not vaine or superfluous wherein the Father is reckoned first, and then of him the Sonne, and after of them both the holy Ghost. For every mans minde of it selfe enclineth to this, first to consider God, then the wisdom rising out of him, and last of all the power wherewith he putteth the decrees of his purpose in execution. In what sort the Sonne is said to be of the Father onely, and the holy Ghost both of the Father and the Sonne, is shewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the 8 Chapter to the Romans, where the same spirit is without difference sometime called the spirit of Christ, and sometime of him that raised up Christ from the dead: and that not without cause. For Peter doth also testify that it was the spirit of Christ, wherewith the Prophets did prophesie, whereas the Scripture so often teacheth, that it was the Spirit of God the Father.

19 Now this distinction is so farre off from standing against the single unitie of God, that thereby we may prove that the Sonne is one God with the Father, because he hath one spirit with him, and that the holy Spirit is not a thing divers from the Father and the Sonne. For in each Hypostasis is understood the whole substance, with this, that every one hath his owne property. The Father is whole in the Sonne, and the Sonne is whole in the Father, as himselfe affirmeth: I am in the Father; and the Father is in me. And the Ecclesiasticall writers doe not grant the one to be severed from the other, by any difference of essence. By these names that betoken destination (saith Augustine) that is meant wherby they have relation one to another, and not the very substance wherby they are all one. By which meaning are the sayings of the old writers to be made agree, which otherwise would seeme not a little to disagree. For sometime they say that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, and sometime that the Sonne hath both Godhead and essence of himselfe, and is all one beginning with the Father. The cause of this diversitie Augustine, doth in another place well and plainly declare, when hee saith: Christ having respect to himselfe, is called God, and to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himselfe is called God, as to his Sonne is called the Father, where, having respect to the Sonne he is called the Father, he is not the Sonne: and whereas to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: and where he is called as to himselfe the Father, and as to himselfe the Sonne: it is all one God. Therefore when we simply speake of the Sonne: without having respect to the Father, wee doe well and properly say, that he is of himselfe: and therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation betweene him and his Father, then wee rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Augustine concerning the Trinitie, doth nothing but set forth this matter. And much safer it is to rest in that relation that he speaketh of, than in too subtly pearcing into the high misterie, to wander abroad by many vaine speculations.

20 Let them therefore that are pleased with sobernesse, and contented with measure of faith, shortly learne so much as is profitable to be knowne: that is, when we profess that we beleve in one God, under the name of God, we understand the one onely and single essence, in which we comprehend three Persons or Hypostases. And therefore so oft as wee doe indefinitely speake of the name of God, wee meane no lesse the Sonne and the holy Ghost than the Father. But when the Sonne is joynd to the Father, then commeth in a relation, and so we make distinction betweene the Persons. And because the properties in the persons bring an order with them, so as the beginning and originall is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father and the Sonne, or the holy Ghost together, the name of God is peculiarly given to the Father. By this meane is retained the unitie of the essence, and regard is had to the order, which yet doth minish nothing of the godhead of the Sonne and of the Holy Ghost. And whereas we have already seene that the Apostles doe affirme, that the Sonne of God is hee, whom Moses and the Prophets doe testify to bee Iehovah the Lord, we must of necessity alway come to the unitie of the essence. Wherefore it is a detestable sacriledge for us to call the Sonne a severall God from the Father, because the simple name of God, doth admit no relation, and God in respect of himselfe, cannot be said to be this or that. Now, that the name of Iehovah the Lord indefinitely taken is applied to Christ, appeareth by the words of Paul, where he saith: Therefore I have thrise prayed the Lord, because that after he had received the answer of Christ, My grace is sufficient for thee: he saith by and by, that the power of Christ may dwell in me. It is certaine that the name Lord is there set for Iehovah, and therefore to rethaine it to the person of the Mediator, were very fond and childish; for so much as it is an absolute sentence that compareth not the Father with the Sonne. And we know that after the accustomed manner of the Greekes, the Apostles doe commonly set the word Kyrios, Lord, instead of Iehovah. And not to fetch an example farre off, Paul did in no other sense pray to the Lord, than in the same sense that Peter citeth the place of Iosel: Whosoever calleth upon the name of the Lord shall bee saved, But where this name is peculiarly given to the Soane, we shall see that there is another reason thereof, when we come to a place fit for it. Now it is enough to have in minde, when Paul had absolutely prayed to God, he by and by bringeth in the name of Christ. Even so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Spirit. For there is no cause against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spirituall, wherein the Father the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost bee comprehended. Which is very plaine by the Scripture. For, even as there wee heare God to bee made a Spirit: so we doe heere the Holy Ghost, for so much as it is an Hypostasis of the whole essence, to be called both God, and proceeding from God.

21 But for as much as Sathan, to the end to roor out our faith, hath alway mooved great contentions, partly concerning the divine essence of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghost, and partly concerning their distinction of persons: And as in a manner in all ages he hath stirred up wicked spirits to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day hee travelleth out of the old embers to kindle a new fire: therefore here it is good to answer the perterse foolish errors of some. Hitherto it hath bene our purpose, to leade as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to strive hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the truth which wee have already peaceably shewed, must bee rescued from the cavillations of the wicked. Albeit my chiefe travell shall yet be applied to this end, that they which give gentle and open cares to the word of God, may have wherenpon stedfastly to rest their foote. In this point, if any where at all in the secreet mysteries of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, and with great moderation, and to take great heed that neither our thought, nor our tongue proceed any further than the bounds of Gods word doe extend. For how may the minde of man by his capacity define the immeasurable essence of God, which never yet could certainly determine how great is the body of the Sunne, which yet he daily seeth with his eyes? yea, how may she by her owne guiding attaine to discusse the substance of God, that cannot reach to know her owne substance? Wherefore Iesus willingly give over unto God the knowledge of himselfe. For he onely, as Hilarie saith, is a convenient witnesse to himselfe, which is not knowne but by himselfe. Wee shall give it over unto him, if wee shall both conceive him to be such as he hath opened himselfe unto us, and shall not elsewhere search to know of him, then by his owne word. There are to this end written five homilies of Chrysofome against the Anomi. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not bee restrained by them from babbling unbrideledly. For they have behaved themselves in this behalfe no whit more modestly, than they are wont in all other. By the unhappy successe of which indiscretion, wee ought to be warned to take care that wee bend our selves to travell in this question, rather with tractable willingnesse to learne, than with sharpnesse of wit, and never have in our mind either to search for God any where else than in his holy word, or to thinke any thing of him, but having his word going before to guide us, or to speake any thing but that which is taken out of the same word. The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, as it is very hard to know, so doth it bring more businesse and comberance to some wits than is expedient. Let them remember that the minds of men doe enter into a maze, when they follow their owne curiosity, and so let them suffer themselves to bee ruled with the heavenly oracles, howsoever they cannot attaine the height of mysterie.

22 To make a register of the errors, wherewith the purenesse of faith in this point of doctrine hath in times past bene assailed, were too long and full of unprofitable

table tediousnesse: and the most part of hereticke have so attempted to overwhelm the glory of God with grosse dotting errors, that they have thought it enough for them to shake and trouble the unskillfull. And from a few men have sprung up many sects, whereof some doe teare in sundr the essence of God, some doe confound the distinction that is betweene the Persons. But if wee hold fast that which is already sufficiently shewed by the Scripture, that the essence of the one God which belongeth to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, is single and undivided: Again, that the Father by a certaine property differeth from the Sonne, and the Sonne from the Holy Ghost: we shall stop up the gate not onely against Arius, and Sabellius, but also the other old authors of errors. But because in our time there be risen up certaine phreneticke men as Servetus and other like, which have encumbred all things with new deceits: It is good in few words to discusse their falshoods. The name of the Trinity was so hateful, yea, so detestable to Servetus, that he said, that all the Trinitaris, as he called them, were utterly godlesse. I omit the foolish words that he had devised to raile withall. But of his opinions this was the summe. That God is made Tripartite, when it is said, that there abide three persons in his essence, and that this Trinity is but a thing imagined, because it disagreeeth with the unity of God. In the meane time the Persons hee would have to be certaine outward conceptions of Forme, which are not truly subsisting in the essence of God, but doe represent God unto us in this or that fashion. And at the beginning that there was in God nothing distinct, because once the Word and the Spirit were all one: but since that Christ arose God out of God, the holy Ghost sprung also another God out of him. And though sometime he colour his follies with allegories, as when he saith, that the eternall word of God was the spirit of Christ with God, and the bright shining of his forme: Again, that the holy Ghost was the shadow of the godhead, yet afterward hee bringeth the godhead of them both to nothing, affirming that after the rate of distribution, there is both in the Sonne and the holy Spirit a part of God, even as the same spirit in us, and also in wood and stones is substantially a portion of God. What hee bableth of the Person of the Mediator, we shall hereafter see in place convenient. But this monstrous forged devise, that a Person is nothing else but a visible forme of the glory of God, needeth no long confutation, For whereas Iohn pronounceth, that the word was God before the world was yet create, hee maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, yea, and from farthest Eternity of time, that Word which was God was with the Father, and had his owne proper glory with the Father, he could not be an outward or figurative shiniug: but it necessarily followeth that hee was an Hypostasis that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirit, but in the history of the creation of the world, yet he is not there brought in as a shadow, but an essential power of God, when Moses sheweth that the very unfashioned lump was sustained in him. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternall Spirit was alwaies in God, when he preserved and sustained the confused matter of heaven and earth, untill beauty and order were added unto it. Surely hee yet could not bee an image or representation of God as Servetus dreameth. But in other points he is compelled more openly to disclose his wickednesse, in saying that God by his eternall purpose, appointing to himselfe a visible Sonne, did by this meanes shew himselfe visible. For if that be true, there is no other Godhead left unto Christ, But so farre as he is by the eternall decree of God ordeined his forme. Moreover, he so transformeth those imagined shapes, that hee sticketh not to faine new accidents in God. But this of all other is most abominable, that hee confusedly minglet as well the sonne of God, as the holy Ghost, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the essence of God, of which every portion is God. And namely hee saith, that the spirits of the faithfull are coeternall and consubstantiall with God: albeit in another place hee assigneth the substantiall Deiry, not onely to the soule of man, but also to other creatures.

23 Out of this sinke came forth another like monster. For certaine lewd men meaning to scape the hatred and shame of the wickednesse of Servetus, have indeed confessed, that there are three Persons, but adding a manner how: that the Father which is truth and properly the one onely God, informing the Sonne and the holy Ghost, hath powred his godhead into them. Yea they forbear not his horrible manner of speech: that the father is by this marke distinguished from the sonne and the holy Ghost, that he is the onely essentiatour or maker of the essence. First they pretend this colour, that Christ is each where called the sonne of God, whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they marke not, that though the name of God be also common to the sonne, yet by reason of preheminance it is sometime given to the Father onely, because hee is the fountaine and originall of the Deity, and that for this purpose, to make the single unity of the essence to be thereby noted. They take exception and say: If hee be truly the sonne of God, it is in convenient to have him reckoned the sonne of a Person. I answer that both are true: that is, that hee is the sonne of God because he is the Word begotten of the Father before all worlds ( for wee come not yet to speake of the Person of the Mediatour ) and yet for explication sake wee ought to have regard of the Person, that the name of God bee not taken simply, but for the Father onely. For if wee meane none to be God but the Father, wee plainly throw downe the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore so often as mention is made of the Godhead, wee must not admit a comparison betweene the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truly the God that appeared to Esay was the true and onely God, and yet Iohn affirmeth that the same was Christ. And he that by the mouth of Esay testified, that hee should be a stumbling stone to the Jewes was the onely God: and yet Paul pronounceth that the same was Christ. Hee that cryeth out by Esay, I live, and to mee all knees shall bow, is the onely God: and yet Paul expoundeth that the same was Christ. For this purpose serve the testimonies that the Apostle reciteth. Thou O God hast laid the foundations of heaven and earth. Againe, let all the Angels of God worship him; which things belong to none, but to the onely God. and yet hee saith, that they are the proper titles of Christ. And this cavillation is nothing worth, that that is given to Christ, which is proper to God, because Christ is the shining brightnesse of his glory. For because in each of these places is set the name of Iehovah, it followeth, that it is so said in respect that he is God of himselfe. For if he be Iehovah, it cannot be denied that he is the same God, that in another place crieth out by Esay: I, I am, and beside me there is no God. It is good also to consider that saying, of Hieremie, The gods that have not made the heavens and earth, let them perish out of the earth that is under the heaven. Whereas on the other side we must needs confesse, that the Sonne of God is hee, whose Godhead is oft proved in Esay by the creation of the world. And how can it be that the Creator, which giveth being to all things, shall not be of himselfe, but borrow his being of another? For whosoever saith that the Sonne was essentiate or made to be of his Father, denieth that he is of himselfe. But the holy Ghost saith the contrary, naming him Iehovah. Now if we grant that the whole essence is in the Father onely, either it must be made partable, or be taken from the Sonne, and so shall the Sonne bee spoiled of his essence, and be a God onely in name and title. The essence of God, if wee beleve these trifles: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as hee is onely God, and is the essence maker of the Sonne. And so shall the Godhead of the Sonne bee an' strait from the essence of God, or a derivation of a part out of the whole. Now must they needs grant by their owne principle, that the holy Ghost is the Spirit of the Father onely. For if he be a derivation from the first essence, which is onely proper to the Father, of right he cannot bee accounted the Spirit of the Sonne: which is confuted by the testimony of Paul, where hee maketh the Spirit common to Christ and the Father. Moreover, if the Person of the Father bee wiped out of the Trinity, wherein shall hee differ from the Sonne and the holy Ghost, but in this, that hee onely is God? They confesse Christ to bee God, and yet they say, hee differeth from the Father. Againe, there must bee some marke of difference to make that the Father bee not the Sonne. They which say that marke of difference, to be in the essence, doe manifestly bring the true Godhead of Christ to nothing, which cannot bee without essence, yea, and that the whole essence. The Father differeth not from the Sonne; unlesse he have something proper to himselfe that is not common to the Sonne. What now will they find wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the essence; let them answer, if he have not communicated the same to the Sonne. But that could not not bee in part, for to say that hee made halfe a God were wicked. Beside that, by this meanes they doe fouly teare in sunder the essence of God. It remaineth therefore that the essence is whole, and perfectly common to the Father and the Sonne. And if that be true, then as touching the essence there is no difference of the one of them from the other. If they say, that the Father in giuing his essence, remaineth nevertheless the only God, with whom the essence abideth? then Christ shall bee a figurative God, and a God only in shew and in name, but not indeed: because nothing is more proper to God than to be, according to this saying: He that is hath sent me unto you.

24 It is easie by many places to prove that it is false which they hold, that so oft as there is in Scripture mention made absolutely of God, none is meant thereby but the Father. And in those places that they themselves doe alleadge, they fouly bewray their owne want of consideration, because there is also set the name of the Sonne. Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatively taken, and therefore restrained to the Person of the Father. And there objection where they say, If the Father were not onely the true God, he should himselfe be his owne Father, is answered with one word. It is not inconvenient for degree and orders sake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not onely of himselfe begotten his wisdoms, but also is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For sith Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, he is called the Sonne of God, not onely in respect that he was the eternall Word before all worlds begotten of the Father: but also because he tooke upon him the Person and office of the Mediator to joyne us unto God. And because they doe so boldly exclude the Sonne from the honour of God, I would faine know whether the Sonne when he pronounceth, that none is good but God, doe take goodnesse from himselfe? I doe not speake of his humane nature, least perhaps they should take exception, and say, that whatsoever goodnesse was in it, it came of free gift. I aske whether the eternall Word of God bee good or no? If they say nay, then wee hold their ungodlinesse sufficiently convinced: in saying yea, they confound themselves. But whereas at the first sight, Christ seemeth to put from himselfe the name of Good, that doth the more confirme our meaning. For sith it is the singular title of God alone, forasmuch as he was after the common manner saluted by the name of Good, in refusing false honour, he did admonish them, that the goodnesse wherein he excelled, was the goodnesse that God hath. I aske also, where Paul affirmeth that onely God is immortall, wise, and true, whether by these words Christ be brought into the number of men mortall, foolish and false? Shall not he then be immortall, that from the beginning was life to give immortality to Angels? Shall not he be wise, that is the eternall wisdom of God? Shall not the truth it selfe bee true? I aske furthermore, whether they thinke that Christ ought to bee worshipped or no? For hee claimed this unto himselfe, to have all knees bow before him: it followeth that he is the God which did in the law forbid any other to be worshipped but himselfe. If they will have that meant of the Father onely which is spoken in Ezay: I am, and none but I: this testimony I turne against themselves, for as much as wee see, that whatsoever pertaineth to God is given to Christ. And their cavillation hath no place, that Christ was exalted in the flesh, wherein hee had beene abased, and that in respect of the flesh, all authority is given him in heaven and in earth: because although the majestie of King and Judge extend to the whole Person of the Mediatour, yet if hee had not beene God openly shewed in the flesh, hee could not have beene advanced to such height, but that God should have disagreed with himselfe. But this controuersie Paul doth well take away, teaching that he was equall with God, before hee did abate himselfe under the shape of a servant. Now how could this equalitie have stood together, unless he had beene the same God whose name is Iah and Iehovah: that rideth upon the Cherubin, that is King of all the earth and Lord of the world? Now howsoeuer they babble against it, it cannot bee taken from Christ which Ezay saith in another place: He, he, is our God, for him wee have waited, whereas in these words he describeth the coming of God the Redeemer, not onely that should bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but also fully in all points restore the Church. And with their other cavillation they nothing prevaile in saying, that Christ was God in his Father. For though wee confesse that in respect of order and degree the beginning of the Godhead is in the Father, yet we say that it is a detestable invention to say, that the essence is onely proper to the Father, as though he were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this meanes either he should have moe essences than one, or else they call Christ God only in title and imagination. If they grant that Christ is God, but next after the Father, then shall the essence be in him begotten and fashioned, which in the Father is unbegotten and unfashioned. I know that many quicke-nosed men doe laugh at this, that we gather the distinction of Persons out of the words of Moses, where he bringeth in God speaking thus: Let us make man after our image. But yet the godly readers doe see how vainly and fondly Moses should bring in this as a talke of divers together, if there were not in God moe Persons than one. Now certaine it is, that they whom the Father spake unto were uncreate: but nothing is uncreate but God himselfe, yea the one only God. Now therefore unlesse they grant that the power of creating was common, and the authoritie of commanding common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost: it shall follow that God did not inwardly thus speake to himselfe, but directed his speech to other forraigne workemen. Finally one place shall easily answer two of their objections. For whereas Christ himselfe pronounceth that God is a Spirit, this were not convenient to be restrained to the Father only, as if the word himselfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spirit doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is also comprehended under the indefinite name of God. But he addeth by and by after that, none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they that worship him in spirit and truth: whereupon followeth another thing, because Christ doth under a head execute the office of a teacher, he doth give the name of God to the Father, not to the intent to destroy his owne Godhead, but by degrees to lift us up unto it.

25 But in this they are deceived, that they dreame of certaine undivided singular things, whereof each have a part of the essence. But by the Scriptures, we teach, that there is but one essentiall God, and therefore that the essence as well of the Sonne as of the holy Ghost is unbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first, and hath of himselfe begotten his wisdom, therefore rightfully as is above said, he is counted the originall and fountaine of all the Godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is unbegotten, and the Father also in respect of Person is unbegotten. And foolishly they thinke that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quaternitie, because falsely and cavilously they ascribe unto us a device of their owne braine, as though we did saigne that by derivation there come three persons out of one essence: whereas it is evident by our writings, that we doe not draw the persons out of the essence, but although they be abiding in the essence we make a distinction betweene them. If the Persons were severed from the essence, then peradventure their reasons were like to be true. But by that meanes it should bee a Trinitie of Gods and not of persons, which one God containeth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence doe meete to make up the Trinitie, as though we did imagine that there descend three Gods out of it. And this exception groweth of like foolishnesse where they say, that then the Trinitie, should be without God. For though it meet not to make up the distinction as a part or a member, yet neither are the persons without it, nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God, could not be the father, and the Sonne is none other wise the Sonne but because he is God. We say therefore, that the Godhead is absolutely of it selfe. Whereby we grant that the Sonne in so much as he is God, is of himselfe without respect of his person, but in so much as he is the Sonne, we say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his person is God himselfe. And the true teaching writers that in old time have spoken of the Trinitie, have onely applied this name to the Persons; for so much as it were not onely an absurd error but also a grosse ungodlinesse, to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will have these three to meete, the essence, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, it is plaine that they doe destroy the essence of the Sonne and the holy Ghost: for else the parts joyned together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in every distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimies or severall names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the Godmaker, and nothing should remaine in the Sonne but a shadow, and the Trinitie should be nothing else, but the joyning of one God with two creatures.

26 Whereas they object, that if Christ be properly God, he is not rightfully called the Sonne: to that we have already answered, that because in such places there is a comparison made of the one Person to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but restrained to the Father only, in so much as he is the beginning of the Godhead, not in making of essence as the mad men do fondly imagine, but in respect of order. In this meaning is construed that saying of Christ to the Father: this is the eternall life, that men beleeve in thee the one true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. For speaking in the person of the Mediatour, he keepeth the degree that is meane betwene God and men: and yet is not his majestie thereby diminished. For though he abased himselfe, yet he left not with the Father his glory that was hidden before the world. So the Apostle in the second chapter to the Hebrewes, though he confesseth that Christ for a short time was abased beneath the Angels, yet he sticketh not to affirme withall, that he is the same eternall God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the person of the Mediator speaketh to the Father, under this name of God, is comprehended the Godhead which is his also. So when he said to the Apostles: It is profitable that I goe up to the Father, because the Father is greater: He giveth not unto himselfe only the second degree of Godhead to be, as touching his eternall essence, inferiour to the Father; but because having obtained the heavenly glory, he gathereth together the faithfull to the partaking of it. He seeth his Father in the higher degree, inso much as the glorious perfection of brightnesse that appeareth in heaven, differeth from that measure of glory that was seene in him being clothed with flesh. After like maner in another place Paul saith: that Christ shall yeeld up the kingdome to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more absurd than to take away eternall continuance from the Godhead of Christ. If he shall never cease to be the Sonne of God, but shall alway remaine the same that he was from the beginning, it followeth that under the name of the Father, is comprehended the one essence that is common to them both. And surely therefore did Christ descend vnto us, that lifting us up unto his Father, he might also lift us up unto himselfe, in as much as he is all one with the Father. It is therefore neither lawfull nor right, exclusively to restrain the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For, John doth for this cause affirme that he is true God, that no man should thinke, that he resteth in a second degree of Godhead beneath his Father. And I marvel what these framers of new Gods doe meane, that while they confesse Christ to be true God, yet they forthwith exclude him from the Godhead of his Father. As though there could any be a true God, but he that is the one God: or as though the Godhead powred from one to another, be not a certaine new forged imagination.

27 Whereas they heape up many places out of Irenaeus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the onely and eternall God of Israel: that, is either done of a shamefull ignorance, or of an extreme wickednesse. For they ought to have considered, that then the holy man had to doe in disputation with those franticke men, that denied that the Father of Christ was the same God that in old time spake by Moses and the Prophets; but that he was I wot not what imagined thing, brought out of the corruption of the world. Therefore he altogether travelleth in this point, to make it plaine, that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture, but the Father of Christ, and that it is amisse to devise any other, and therefore it is no marvell if he fo oft conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was spoken of by Christ and the Apostles. And in like manner now, whereas we are to stand against another sort of error; we may truly say that the God which in old time appeared to the fathers, was none other but Christ. But if any man object that it was the Father, our answer is in readinesse, that when we strive to defend the Godhead of the Sonne, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heede to this purpose of Irenaeus, all that contention shall cease. And also by the sixth Chapter of the third booke, the whole strife is ended, where where the good man standeth all upon this point, to prove that he which is in Scripture absolutely and indefinitely called God: is verily the one onely God, and that Christ is absolutely called God. Let us remember that this was the principall point whereupon stood all his disputation, as by the whole processe thereof doth appeare: and specially the 46 Chapter of the second booke, that he is not called the Father by darke similitude or parable, which is not very God indeed. Moreover in another place he saith, that as well the Sonne as the Father were joyntly called God by the Prophets and Apostles. Afterward he defineth how Christ which is Lord of all, and King, and God, and Iudge, received power from him, which is the God of all, that is to say in respect of his subjection, because he was humbled even to the death of the crosse. And a litle after he affirmeth, that the Sonne is the maker of heaven and earth, which gave the Law by the hand of Moses, and appeared to the Fathers. Now if any man doe prate that with Irenæus onely the Father is the God of Israel, I will turne againe upon him that which the same writer plainly teacheth, that Christ is all one and the same: as also he applyeth unto him the prophetic of Habauc: God shall come out of the South. To the same purpose serveth that which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke. Christ himselfe therefore with the Father is the God of the living. And in the twelfth Chapter of the same booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleevd God, because Christ is the maker of heaven and earth and the onely God.

28. And with no more truth doe they bring in Tertullian for their defender. For though hee bee rough sometime and crabbed in his manner of speech, yet doth hee plainly teach the summe of that doctrine that we defend. That is to say, whereas he is the one God, yet by disposition and order he is his Word: that there is but one God in unitie of substance, and yet that the same unitie by mistry of orderly distribution, is disposed into Trinitie, that there are three, not in state but in degree, not in substance, but in forme, not in power, but in order. He saith that he defendeth the Sonne to bee a second next to the Father, but he meaneth him to be none other than the Father, but by way of distinction. In some places he saith that the Sonne is visible. But when hee hath reasoned on both parts he defineth that hee is invisible in so much as hee is the Word. Finally where he affirmeth, that the father is determined in his owne person, he prooveth himselfe farre from that error which we confute. And though he doth acknowledge none other God but the Father, yet in the next peece of his writing expounding himselfe, he saith, that he speaketh not exclusively in respect of the Sonne, because he denieth that the Sonne is any other God beside the Father and that therefore their sole government is not broken by distinction of Person. And by the perpetuall course of his purpose it is easie to gather the meaning of his words. For he disputeth against Praxas that though God bee distinguished into three Persons, yet are there not made many Gods nor the unitie torne in sunder. And because by the imagination of Praxas Christ could not bee God, but he must also bee the Father, therefore he so much laboureth about the distinction. Whereas he calleth the Word and the Spirit a portion of the whole, although it be a hard kinde of speech, yet is it excusable, because it is not referred to the substance, but onely sheweth the disposition and order that belongeth onely to the Persons, as Tertullian himselfe witnesseth. And hereof hangeth that: How many Persons thinkest thou there are, O most froward Praxas, but even so many as there be names? And so a litle after that, they may beleve the Father and the Sonne each in their names and Persons. Hereby I thinke may be sufficiently confuted their impudency, that seeke to beguile the simple with colour of Tertullians authority.

29. And surely whosoever shall diligently compare together the writings of the old Authors, shall find no other thing in Irenæus, than that which hath been taught by other that came after. Iustine is one of the ancientest, and herein all things doth agree with us: Yet let them object that he as the rest doe, calleth the Father of Christ the onely God. The same thing doth Hilrie teach, yea, and speaketh more hardly, that the eternitie is in the Father. But doth he that to take away the essence of God from the Sonne? And yet is hee altogether in defence of the same faith that wee follow. Yet are they not ashamed to picke out certaine mangled sentences whereby they would perswade that Hilarie is a Patron of their error. Where they bring in Ignatius: if they will have that to be of any authority, let them prove that the Apostles made a Law for Lent and such like corruptions of religion. Nothing is more unfavourable than those fond trifles that are published under the name of Ignatius. Wherefore their impudencie is so much lesse tolerable, that disguise themselves with such visors to deceive. Moreover the consent of the ancient Fathers is plainly perceived by this, that at the Councell of Nice, Arrim never durst alleadge for himselfe the authority of any one allowed writer. And none of the Greekes or Latines doth excuse himselfe and say, that he dissenteth from them that were before. It needeth not to be spoken how Augustine whom those Iosells doe most hate, hath diligently searched the writings of them all, and how reverently he did embrace them. Truly even in matters of least weight he useth to shew what compelleth him to dissent from them. And in this matter, if hee had read any thing doubtfull or darke in others, he hideth it not. But the doctrine that these men strive against, hee taketh it as confessed, that from the farthest time of antiquitie it hath bene without controversie received. And by one word it appeareth that hee was not ignorant what others had taught before him, where hee saith that in the Father is unitie, in the first booke of Christian doctrine, will they say that he then forgate himselfe? But in another place he purgeth himselfe from such reproch, where he calleth the Father the beginning of the whole Godhead, because he is of none: considering indeed wisely, that the name of God is specially ascribed to the Father, because if the beginning should not be reckoned at him, the single unity of God cannot be conceived. By this I trust the godly reader will perceive that all the cavillations are confuted, wherewith Satan hath hitherto attempted to pervert or darken the pure truth of doctrine. Finally I trust that the whole summe of doctrine in this point is fully declared, if the readers will temper them of curiosity, and not more greedily than meet is, seeke for combersome and entangled disputations, For I take not in hand to please them, that doe delight in an untemperate desire of speculation. Truly I have omitted nothing of subtle purpose that I thought to make against me. But while I studie to edifie the Church, I thought it best to leave many things untouched which both finally profited, and would grieve the readers with superfluous tediousness. For to what purpose were it to dispute, whether the Father doe alwaies beget? For as much as it is folly to faine a continuall act of begetting, such it is evident that from eternity there have bene three Persons in God.

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

That the Scripture even in the creation of the world and of all things: doth by certaine markes put difference betweene the true God, and fained gods.

*Esay. 40. 27.
The creation of the world taught by Moses, that men might know the God which made it, and not enquire why he made it no sooner*

Although Esay doth worthily reproch the worshippers of false gods with foolishness, for that they have not learned by the very foundations of the earth, and round compass of the heavens, which is the true God: yet such is the dulness and grosseness of our wit, that least the faithfull should fall away to the inventions of the Gentiles, it was necessary to have God more expressly painted out unto them. For whereas the saying that God is the minde of the world, which is counted the most tolerable description that is found among the Philosophers, is but vaine, it behooveth us more familiarly to know him, least wee alwaies waver in doubtfulness. Therefore it was his pleasure to have an history of the creation remaining, whereupon the Faith of the Church might rest, and seeke for none other God but him, whom Moses hath declared to be the maker and builder of the world. There is first set forth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeares the faithfull might come to the first original of mankind, and of all things. Which knowledge is very necessary, not onely to confute those monstrous fables that sometime were spread in Egypt and other parts of the world, but also, that the beginning of the world once being knowne, the eternity of God may more clearly shine forth and ravish us in admiration of it. Neither ought wee to be anything moved with that ungodly mocke, that it is marvell why it came no sooner in the minde of God to make the heave and the earth, and why why he sitting idle did suffer so immeasurable a space to passe away, such he might have made it many thousand ages before: whereas the whole continuance of the world that now draweth to an end, is not yet come to six thousand yeares. For why God so long deferred it, is neither lawfull nor expedient for us to enquire. Because if mans minde will travaile to attaine thereunto, it shall faile an hundred times by the way, neither were it profitable for us to know that thing which God himselfe to prove the modesty of our faith, hath of purpose willed to be hidden. And well did that godly old man speake, which when a wanton fellow did in scorne demand of him, what God had done before the creation of the world, answered, that hee builded Hell for curious fooles. Let this grave and severe warning repress the wantonnesse that ticketh many, yea, and driveth them to ill and hurtfull speculations. Finally, let us remember that the same invisible God whose wisdom, power, and justice is incomprehensible, doth set before us the history of Moses as a looking glasse, wherein his lively image appeareth. For, as the eyes that either are growne dimme with age, or dulled with any disease, doe not discern any thing plainly, unlesse they be holpen with spectacles: so such is our weaknesse, that unlesse the Scripture direct us in seeking of God, we doe forth with run out into vanity. And they that follow their owne wantonnesse, because they be now warned in vaine, shall all too late feele with horrible destruction, how much it had bene better for them reverently to receive the secret counsels of God, than to vomit out blasphemies, to obscure the heaven withall. And rightly doth Augustine complaine that wrong is done to God when further cause of things is sought for, than his onely will. The same man in another place doth wisely warne us, that it is no lesse evill to move question of immeasurable spaces of times than of places. For how broad soever the circuit of the heavens is, yet there is some measure of it. Now, if one should quarrell with God for that the emptinesse wherein nothing is contained, is an hundred times more, shall not all the godly abhorre such wantonnesse? Into like madnesse runne they that busie themselves about Gods sitting still, because at their appointment he made not the world innumerable ages sooner. To satisfie their owne greedinesse of minde, they covet to passe without the compassse of the world, as though in so large a circuit of heaven, and earth, they could not finde things enough that with their inestimable brightnesse may overwhelm all our senses: as though in six thousand yeeres, God hath not shewed example, in continuall consideration whereof, our mindes may be exercised. Let us therefore willingly abide inclosed within those bounds wherewith it pleased God to environ vs, and as it wereto pen up our minds, that they should not stray abroad with liberty of wandring.

2 For like reason is it that Moses declareth, that the worke of God was not ended in a moment but in six daies. For by this circumstance wee are withdrawne from forged inventions to the one onely God that divided his worke into sixe daies, that it should not grieve us to be occupied all the time of our life in considering of it: For though our eyes, what way soever we turne them, are compelled to looke upon the workes of God, yet see we how fickle our head is, and if any godly thoughts doe touch us; how soone they passe away. Here againe mans reason murmureth, as though such proceedings were disagreeing from the power of God, untill such time as being made subject to the obedience of faith, shee learne to keepe that rest wherunto the hallowing of the seventh day calleth us. But in the very order of things, is diligently to be considered the fatherly love of God toward mankind, in this: that hee did not create Adam untill hee had stored the world with all plenty of good things, For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren and empty, if he had given him life before that there was any light, he should have seemed not so well to provide for his commodity. But now where hee first disposed the motions of the Sunne and the Planets for the use of man, and furnished the earth, the waters, and the aire with living creatures, and brought forth abundance of fruits to suffice for food, taking npon him the care of a diligent and provident householder, hee shewed his marvellous bounty towards us. If a man doe more heedfully weigh with himselfe those things that I doe but shortly touch, it shall appeare that Moses was the sure witness and publisher of the one God the creator. I omit here that which I have already declared, that hee speaketh not there

history.*

The creation of Angels is a thing necessary to be knowne both because they are the most noble part of Gods workes, and also for that there are sundry errors concerning Angels, which cannot without such knowledge be refuted.

onely of the bare essence of God, but also setteth forth unto us his eternall Wisdome and Spirit, to the end we should not dreame that God is any other, than such as he will be knowne by the image that he hath there expressed.

3 But before that I begin to speake more at large of the nature of man, I must say somewhat of Angels. Because, though Moses applying himselfe to the rudenesse of the common people, reciteth in his history of the creation no other workes of God but such as are seene with our eyes, yet whereas afterward he bringeth in Angels for ministers of God, we may easily gather, that he was the creator of them in whose service they employ their travell and offices. Though therefore Moses speaking after the capacity of the people, doth not at the very beginning rehearse the Angels among the creatures of God: yet that is no cause to the contrary, but that we may plainly and expressly speake those things of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Because if we desire to know God by his works, so noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Beside that, this point of doctrine is very necessary for the confuting of many errors. The excellency of the nature of Angels hath so dazeled the minds of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offered them, if they should be made subject to the authority of one God, and brought as it were in obedience. And hereupon were they fained to be God. Thererofe upon one Manichæus with his sect, which made themselves two originall beginnings of things, God and the devill, and to God he assigned the beginning of good things, and of things of evill nature he determined the devill to be the author. If our mindes should be entangled with this error, God should not keepe whole his glory in the creation of the world. For, whereas nothing is more proper to God than eternity and a being of himselfe as I may so terme it, they which give that unto the devill, doe they not in a manner give him the title of Godhead? Now where is the almightinesse of God become, if such authority bee granted to the devill, that he may put in execution what he will though God say nay and withstand it? As for the onely foundation that the Manichees have, that it is unlawfull no ascribe unto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is evill; that nothing hurteth the true faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally evill in the whole Universality of the world, because neither the frowardnesse and malice both of man and the devill, nor the finnes that proceed thereof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherein God hath not shewed an example both of his wisdome and justice. Therefore to answer these perverse devises: it behooveth us to lift up our mindes higher than our eyes can attaine to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the Nicene creed God is called the Creator of all things, things invisible are expressed. Yet will we be carefull to keepe the measure that the rule of godlinesse appointeth, least the readers with searching to understand further than is expedient, should wander abroad, being led away from the simplicity of Faith. And surely, forasmuch as the holy Ghost teacheth us alway for our profit, and such things are as finally available to edifie, hee doth either leave wholly unspoken, or but lightly, and as it were overrunningly touch them: it shall bee also our duty to bee content not to know those things that doe not profit us.

4 That the Angels for as much as they are the ministers of God ordained to execute his commandments, are also his creatures, it ought to be certainly out of all question. To move doubt of the time and order that they were created in, should it not rather be a busie waywardnesse than diligence? Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heavens were made, with all their armies, to what purpose than is it, curiously to search, what day the other more secret armies of heaven beside the starrs and planets first began to bee? But, because I will not be long, let us, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remember that we ought to keepe one rule of modestie and sobriety, that of obscure things we neither speake, nor thinke, nor yet desire to know any other thing than that hath bene taught us by the Word of God: and another point, that in reading of Scripture we continually rest upon the searching and studying of such things as are certaine to edification, and not give our selves to curiosity or studie of things unprofitable. And because it was Gods pleasure to instruct us, not in trifling questions, but in sound godlinesse, feare of his name, true confidence, and duties of holinesse:

Superfluous speculations, and curious questions about Angels, are to be avoided.
Gen. 1. 1.

Let us rest upon such knowledge. Wherefore, if we will be rightly wise, we must leave those vanities that idle men have taught without warrant of the Word of God, concerning the nature, degree, and multitude of Angels. I know that such matters as this, are by many more greedily taken hold of, and are more pleasant to them than such things as lie in dayly use. But if it grieue us not to be the schollers of Christ, let it not greiue us to follow that order of learning that he hath appointed. So shall it fo come to passe, that being contented with his schooling, we shall not onely forbear, but also abhorre superfluous speculations, from which hee calleth us away. No man can deny, that the same Demyse, whatsoeuer man hee was, hath disputed many things both subtly and wittily in his Hierarchy of Heaven: but if a man examine it more neerely, hee shall finde that for the most part it is but meere babling. But the datifull purpose of a Divine is, not to delight eares with prating, but to stablish consciences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable. If one should read that booke, he would thinke that the man were slipped downe from heaven, and did tell of things not that he had learned by heresy, but that hee had seene with his eyes. But Paul which was ravished above the third heaven, hath uttered no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawfull for man to speake the secrets that hee had seene. Therefore bidding farwell to that trifling wisdom, let us consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would have us know concerning his Angels.

5 It is commonly read in the Scripture, that the Angels are heavenly Spirits, whose ministration and service God useth for putting in execution of those things that he hath decreed. For which reason that name is given them, because God useth them as messengers to shew himselfe unto men. And upon like reason are derived the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they doe like a Guard environ their Prince, and doe adorne and set forth the honourable shew of his majestie, and like souldiers they are alway attending upon the engine of their Captaine, and are ever so prepared and in readinesse to doe his commandments, that so soone as he doth but beckon to them, they prepare themselves to worke, or rather be at their worke already. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his royalty, the other Prophets doe describe, but principally Daniel where he saith, that when God sat him downe in his throne of judgment, there stood by a thousand thousand, and ten thousand companies of ten thousands of Angels. And because God doth by them marvellously shew forth and declare the might & strength of his hand, therefore they are named strengthes, because he exerciseth and useth his authority in the world by them, therefore they are sometimes called principalities, sometime powers, sometime Dominions. Finally, because in them as it were sitteth the glory of God, for this cause also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certainly say, because another exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the holy Ghost often useth those other former names to advance the dignity of the ministry of Angels. For it were not reason that those instruments should be let passe without honour, by whom God doth specially shew the presence of his majestie. Yea, for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their ministery, as in a looking glasse, they partly represent unto us the Godhead. Although indeed I mislike not this that the old writers doe expound, that Christ was the Angell, where the Scripture saith, that the Angell of God appeared unto Abraham, Iacob, Moses, & other, yet oftentimes where mention is made of all the Angels indeed, this name is given unto them. And that ought to seeme no marvell. For if this honour be given unto Princes and governors, that in their office they stand in steed of God that is soveraigne King and Judge, much greater cause there is why it should be given to the Angels, in whom the brightnesse of the glory of God much more abundantly shineth.

6 But the Scripture standeth most upon teaching us that, which might most make to our comfort and confirmation of Faith: that is to wit, that the Angels are the distributors and administrators of Gods bounty toward us. And therefore the Scripture reciteth, that they watch for our safety: they take upon them the defence of us, they direct our wayes, they take care that no hurtfull thing betide unto us. The sentences are universall, which principally pertaine to Christ the head of the Church, and then to all the faithfull. He hath given his Angels charge of thee, to keepe thee in all thy wayes. They shall beare thee up in their hands, lest thou chance to hit thy feet against a stone. Againe, the Angell of the Lord standeth round about them that feare him, and he doth deliver them. Whereby God sheweth that he appointeth to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keep. After this order the Angell of the Lord doth comfort Agar when she fled away, and commandeth her to be reconciled to her mistress. God promiseth to Abraham his servant an Angell to be the guide of his journey. Jacob in blessing of Ephraim and Manasses prayeth, that the Angell of the Lord by whom he himselfe had been delivered from all evill, may make them prosper. So the Angell was set to defend the tents of the people of Israel. And so oft as it pleased God to reskew Israel out of the hands of their enemies, he raised up revengers by the ministry of Angels. So finally (to the end I need not to rehearse many moe) the Angels ministred to Christ and were ready assistant to him in all necessities. They brought tydings to the women of his resurrection, and to the disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fulfill their office of defending us, they fight against the devill & all enemies, and doe execute the vengeance of God upon them that are bent against us. As we reade that the Angell of God to deliver Hierusalem from the siege, slew in one night an hundred foure score and five thousand in the campe of the King of Assyria.

7 But whether to every of the faithfull be a severall Angell assigned for their defence, I dare not certainly affirme. Surely when Daniel bringeth in the Angell of the Persians, & the Angell of the Grecians, he sheweth that he meant, that there are to kingdoms and provinces certaine Angels appointed as governors. And when Christ saith that the Angels of children do alway behold the face of the father, he seemeth to mean that there are certaine Angels to whom the preservation of them is given in charge. But I cannot tell whether we ought therby to gather, that every one hath his Angell set over him. But this is to be holden for certainty, that not one Angell onely hath care of every one of us, but that they all by one consent doe watch for our safety. For it is spoken of all the Angels together, that they more rejoyce of one sinner converted to repentance, than of ninety and nine just that have stood still in their righteousnesse. And it is said of moe Angels than one, that they conveyed the soule of Lazarus into the bosome of Abraham. And not without cause did Elizabeth shew to his servant so many fery chariots that were peculiarly appointed for him. But one place there is that seemeth more plaine than the rest to prove this point. For when Peter being brought out of prison knocked at the doores of the house where the brethren were assembled, when they could not imagine that it was he, they said it was his Angell. It should seeme that this came in their minde by the common opinion, that to every of the faithfull are assigned their Angels for governors. Albeit yet here it may be answered that it may well bee, notwithstanding any thing that there appeareth, that we may thinke it was any one Angell, to whom God had given charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continuall keeper: as the common people do imagine that there are appointed to every one two Angels, as it were divers Ghosts, a good Angell and a bad. But it is not worth travaile curiously to search for that which doth not much import vs to know. For if this doe not content a man, that all degrees of the army of heaven doe watch for his safety, I doe not see what he can be the better, if he understand that there is one Angell peculiarly appointed to keepe him. And they which restraine unto one Angell the care that God hath to every one of vs, doe great wrong to themselves, and to all the members of the Church: as if that power to succour us had beene vainly promised us, wherewith being environed and defended, we should fight the more boldly.

8 They that dare take upon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angels, let them looke well what foundation they have. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the great Prince, and with Iude, the Archangell. And Paul saith, it shall be an Archangell that shall with sound of trumpet call men to the judgement. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours betweene Angels, or discern one from another by speciall markes, and appoint every one his place and standing? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michael and Gabriel, and if you list to adde the third out of the history of Tobie, may by their signification seeme to be given to the Angels, according according to the capacity of our weaknesse, although I had rather leave that exposition at large. As for the number of them, wee heare by Christs mouth of many Legions, by Daniel many companies of ten thousands, the servant of Elezecus saw many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is said, that doe campe round about them that feare God. As for shape, it is certaine, that spirits have none, and yet the Scripture for the capacity of our wit doth not in vaine under Cherubin and Seraphin paint us our Angels with wings, to the intent we should not doubt that they will bee ever with incredible swiftnesse, ready to succour us, so soone as need shall require, as if the lightning sent from heaven should flie unto us with such swiftnesse as it is wonted. Whatsoever more than this may be sought of both these points, let us beleve it to be of that sort of mysteries, whereof the full revelation is deferred to the last day. Wherefore let us remember to take heed both of too much curiosity in searching, and too much boldnesse in speaking.

9 But this one thing which many troublesome doe call in doubt, is to bee holden for certainty, that Angels are ministring spirits, whose service God useth for the defence of his, and by whom he both distributeth his benefits among men, and also putteth his other workes in execution. It was in the old time the opinion of the Sadduces, that by Angels is meant nothing else, but either the motions that God doth inspire in men, or the tokens that hee sheweth of his power. But against this error cry out so many testimonies of Scripture, that it is marvell that so grosse ignorance could bee suffered in that people. For to omit those places that I have before alleaged, where are recited thousands and Legions of Angels: where joy is given unto them: where it is said that they uphold the faithfull with their hands, and carry their soules into rest: that they see the face of the Father, and such like: there are other places whereby it is cleerly proved, that they are indeed spirits of a nature that hath substance. For whereas Stephen and Paul doe say, that the law was given by the hand of Angels, and Christ saith, that the elect after the resurrection shall be like unto Angels, that the day of judgement is not knowne to the very Angels: that he shall then come with his holy Angels: howsoever they be writted, yet must they so be understood. Likewise when Paul charged Timothy before Christ and his chosen Angels, to keepe his commandements, he meant not qualities or inspirations without substance, but very spirits. And otherwise it standeth not together that is written in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, that Christ is become more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made subject unto them: that Christ tooke upon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we meane not the blessed spirits, to whom may these comparisons agree? And the author of that Epistle expounderh himselfe, where hee placeth in the kingdome of heaven the soules of the taichfull and the holy Angels together. Also the same that we have already alleaged, that the Angels of children doe alway behold the face of God, that they doe rejoyce at our safety, that they marvell at the manifold grace of God in the Church, that they are subject to Christ, the head. To the same purpose serveth this, that they so appeared to the holy Fathers in the forme of men, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Christ himselfe for the principall preeminence that he hath in the person of the Mediator, is called an Angell. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furnish the simple with defence against those foolish and reasonlesse opinions, that many ages agoe raised by Satan doe now and then spring up againe.

10 Now it resteth, that we seeke to meet with that superstition which is commonly wont to creepe in, where it is said: that Angels are the ministers and deliverers of all good things unto us. For by and by mans reason falleth to this point, to thinke that therefore all honour ought to be given them. So commeth it to passe, that those things which belong onely to God and Christ, are conveyed away to Angels. By this meane wee see that in certaine ages past, the glory of Christ hath bin many waies obscured, when Angels without warrant of Gods word were loden with immeasurable titles of honour. And of all the vices that we speake against, there is almost none more ancient than this. For it appeareth that Paul himselfe had much to doe with some which so advanced Angels, that they in manner would have brought Christ under subjection. And therefore he doth so carefully presse this point in his Epistle to the Colossians, that Christ is not onely to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is also the author of all the good things that they have : to the end wee should not forsake him and turne unto them, which cannot sufficiently helpe themselves, but are faine to draw out of the same fountaine that we doe. Surely forasmuch as there shineth in them a certaine brightnesse of the majestie of God, there is nothing whereunto we are more easly inclined, than with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worshipping of them, and to give unto them all things that are due onely to God. Which thing John in the Revelation confesseth to have chanced to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he received this answer. See thou doe it not. For I am thy fellow servant, Worship God.

11 But this danger wee shall well beware of, if we doe consider why God useth rather by them than by himselfe without their service to declare his power, to provide for the safety of the faithfull, and to communicate the gifts of his liberality among them. Surely he doth not this of necessity, as though he could not be without them : for so oft as pleaseth him, hee letteth them alone, and bringeth his worke to passe with an onely becke : so farre is it of, that they be any aid to him, to ease him of the hardnesse thereof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weaknesse, so that we want nothing that may availe our minds, either in raising them up in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough and enough againe for us, that the Lord affirmeth that hee is our protector. But while we see our selves besieged with so many dangers, so many hurtfull things, so many kindes of enemies : it may be (such is our weaknesse and frailty) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for despair, unlesse the Lord after the proportion of our capacity doe make us to conceive his preiſence. By this meane he not onely promiseth that he will have care of us, but also that he hath an innumerable guard to whom he hath given in charge to travell for our safetie, and that so long as wee bee compassed with the garison and support of them, whatsoever danger betideth, we bee without all reach of hurt. I grant wee doe amisse that after this simple promise of the protection of God alone, wee still looke about from whence other help may come unto us. But for as much as it pleaseth the Lord of his infinite clemencie and gentlenesse : helpe this our fault there is no reason why we should neglect his so great benefit. An example thereof wee have in the servant of Elizem, which when hee saw the hill besieged with the Army of the Syrians, and that there was no way open to escape, was stricken downe with feare, as if his master and he were then utterly destroyed. Then Elizem prayed God to open his servants eyes, and by and by he saw the hill furnished with horses and fiery chariots, that is, with a multitude of Angels to keepe him and the Prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered up his heart againe, and was able with a dreadlesse mirde to looke downe upon his enemies, with sight of whom he was before in a manner driven out of his wit.

That which God doth us to relieve our weaknesse, must not cause us to diminish his glory.

12 Wherefore whatsoever is said of the ministerie of Angels, let us apply it to this end, that overcoming all distrust, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are therefore provided us of God, that we should not be made afraid with multitude of enemies, as though they could prevaile against his helpe, but should flie unto that saying of Elizem, that there be moe on our side than be against us. How much then is it against order of reason, that wee should bee led away from God by Angels, which are ordained for this purpose, to testifie that his helpe is more present among us ? But they doe leade us away indeed, if they doe not streight lead us as it were by the hand to him, that wee may have eie unto, call upon, and publish him for our onely helper : if we consider not them to bee as his hands that move themselves to no worke but by his direction : if they doe not hold us fast in the one Mediator Christ, so that we may hang wholly of him, leane al upon him, be carried to him and rest in him. For that which is described in the vision of Jacob, ought to sticke and be fastened in our minds, how Angels descend downe to the earth unto men, and from men doe goe up to heaven by a ladder, whereupon standeth the Lord of hostes. Whereby is meant, that by the onely intercession of Christ it commeth to passe, that the ministeries of the Angels doe come unto us, as he himselfe affirmeth, saying : Hereafter ye shall see the heavens open and the Angels descending to the sonne of man, John 1. 51. Therefore the servant of Abraham being committed to the custody of the Angell, doth not therefore call call upon the Angell to helpe him, but holpen with that commendation, he prayeth to the Lord, and beseecheth him to shew his mercy to Abraham. For as God doth now therefore make them ministers of his power and goodness, to the intent to part his glory with them: so doth he not therefore promise us his helpe in their ministracion, that we should divide our confidence betwene him and them. Let us therefore forsake that Platonick philosophy, to seeke the way to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpose, that they may make God more gentle unto us, which superstitious and curious men have from the beginning gone about, and to this day doe continue to bring into our religion.

Gen. 28. 12.

13 As for such things as the Scripture teacheth concerning devils, they tend in a manner all to this end, that we may be carefull to beware aforehand of their awaits and preparations, and furnish our selves with such weapons as are strong and sure enough to drive away even the strongest enemies. For whereas Satan is called the god and prince of the world, whereas he is named the strong armed man, the spirit that hath power of the aire, and a roaring Lion: these descriptions serve to no other purpose, but to make us more wary and watchfull, and readier to enter into battell with him. Which is also sometime set out in expresse words. For Peter after hee had said, that the devill goeth about like a roaring Lion, seeking whom hee may devour, by and by addeth this exhortacion, that we strongly resist him by faith. And Paul after he had given warning that we wrastle not with flesh and blood, but with the princes of the aire, the powers of darknesse, and spirituall wickednesse, by and by biddeth us put on such armour as may serve for so great and dangerous a battell. Wherefore let us also apply all to this end, that being warned how there doth continually approach upon us an enemic, yea, an enemy that is in courage most hardy, in strength most mighty, in policy most subtle, in diligence and celerity unweariable, with all sorts of engines plenteously furnished, in skill of warre most ready, we suffer not our selves by sloth and cowardise to bee surprised, but on the other side with bold and hardy minds set our foot to resist him (and because this warre is onely ended by death) encourage our selves to continue. But specially knowing our owne weaknesse and unskillfullnesse. Let us call upon the helpe of God and enterprise nothing but upon trust of him, for as much as it is in him onely to give us policy, strength, courage, and armour.

14 And that we should be the more stirred up and enforced so to doe, the Scripture warneth us, that there are not one or two or a few enemies, but great armies that make warre with us. For it is said, that Mary Magdalen was delivered from seven devils, wherewith she was possessed. And Christ saith, that it is the ordinary custome, that if after a devill be once cast out, a man make the place open againe, he bringeth seven spirits worse than himselfe, and returneth into his possession, finding it empty. Yea it is said that a whole legion besieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that wee must fight with an infinite multitude of enemies, least despising the fewnesse of them, we should be more slacke to enter in battell, or thinking that we have some respite in the meane time granted, we should give our selves to idlenesse. Whereas many times Satan or the devill is named in the singular number, thereby is meant that power of wickednesse which standeth against the kingdom of Justice. For as the Church and the fellowship of Saints have Christ to their head, so the faction of the wicked is painted out unto us with their prince, that hath the cheife authority among them. After which manner this is spoken, Goe ye cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the devill and his Angels.

15 Here also this ought to stirre us up to a perpetuall warre with the devill, for that he is every where called the enemic of God and of us. For if we have regard of Gods glory, as it is meet we should, then ought we with all our force to bend our selves against him, that goeth about to extinguish it. If wee be affectioned to maintaine the kingdom of Christ as we ought, then must we needs have an unappealeable warre with him that conspireth the ruine thereof. Againe, if any care of our owne safety doe touch us, then ought wee to have neither peace nor truce with him that continually lieth in wait for the destruction of it. Such a one is he described in the third Chapter of Genesis where he leadeh him away from the obedience that hee did owe to God, that hee both robberth God of his due honour, and throweth man himselfe headlong into destruction. Such a one also is hee set forth in the Evangelists, where he is called an enemy, and is said to scatter tares, to corrupt the seed of eternall life. In summe, that which Christ testifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murderer, and a liar, we find by experience in all his doings. For hee assaileth the truth of God with lies, obscureth the light with darknesse, entangleth the minds of men with errors, raiseth up hatreds, kindleth contentions and strifes, doth all things to this end to overthrow the kingdome of God, and drowne men with himselfe in eternall destruction. Whereby appeareth, that he is of nature froward, spitefull, and malicious. For needs must there be great frowardnesse in that wit, that is made to assaile the glory of God and salvation of men. And that doth Iohn speake of in his Epistle, when he writeth, that he sinneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that hee is the author, captaine, and principall workeman of all malice and wickednesse.

the first created good, hath swar-ved out of his kind by falling voluntarily from God.

Iohn 8. 44.

16 But forasmuch as the devill was created by God, let us remember that this malice which we asigne in this nature, is not by creation, but by deprivation. For whatsoever damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himselfe by his owne revolting and fall. Which the scripture therefore giveth us warning of, least thinking that hee came out such a one from God, wee should ascribe that to God himselfe which is farthest from him. For this reason doth Christ say that Satan speaketh of his owne when he speaketh lies, and addeth a cause why, for that he stood not still in the truth. Now when hee saith that he stood not still in the truth, he sheweth that once he had bene in the truth. And when he maketh him the father of lying, he taketh this from him, that hee can not lay that fault to God whereof hee himselfe is cause to himselfe. Although these things be but shortly and not very plainely spoken, yet this is enough for this purpose, to deliver the majesty of God from all slander. And what maketh it matter to us, to know more or to any other purpose concerning devils? Many perhaps doe grudge, that the Scripture doth not orderly and distinctly in many places set forth that fall and the cause, manner, time, and fashion thereof. But because these things doe nothing pertaine to us, it was better, if not to be suppressed wholly, yet to be but lightly touched, and that partly because it was not becoming for the holy Ghost to feed curiosity with vaine histories without any fruit: and we see that it was the Lords purpose to put nothing in his holy oracles but that which we should learne to edification. Therefore, least wee our selves should tarry long upon things superfluous, let us be content shortly to know thus much concerning the nature of devils, that at the first creation they were the Angels of God: but by swarving out of kinde, they both destroyed themselves, and are become instruments of destruction to others. Thus much, because it was profitable to be knowne, is plainly taught in Peter and Iude, God spared not (say they) his Angels which had sinned, and not kept their beginning, but had forsaken their dwelling place. And Paul naming the elect Angels doth without doubt secretly by implication set the reprobate Angels in comparison against them.

17 As for the discord and strife that wee say is betweene God and Satan, wee must so take it that still we hold this for certaine, that he can doe nothing but by the will and sufferance of God. For we read in the history of Iob, that he presented himselfe before God to receive his commandements, and durst not goe forward to doe any enterprise till he had obtained licence. So when Achab was to be deceived he tooke upon him that he would be the spirit of lying in the mouth of all the Prophets, and so being sent of God he performed it. For this reason is hee called the evill spirit of the Lord that tormented Saul, because by him as with a scourge the finnes of the wicked king were punished. And in another place it is written, that the plagues were laid upon the Egyptians by the evill angels. According to these particular examples Paul doth generally testifie, that the blinding of the wicked is the worke of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. It is evident therefore that Satan is under the power of God, and so governed by his authority that hee is compelled to doe him service. Now when we say that Satan resisteth God, that the workes of Satan disagree with the workes of God, we doe therewithall affirme that this disagreement and strife hangeth upon the sufferance of God. If speake not now of his will, nor of his endeavour, but of the effect onely. For with the devill is wicked of nature, he is not inclined to obey the will of God, but is wholly carryed to stubbornesse and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himselfe and of his owne wickednesse, that of desire and purpose hee withstandeth God. And by this wickednesse hee is stirred up to the enterprising of those things that he knoweth to bee most against God. But because God holdeth him fast tied and restrained with the bridle of his power, he executeth onely those things that are granted him from God. And so doth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to apply his service whether soever God compelleth him.

18 Now because God boweth the uncleane Spirites hither and thither as pleaseth him, he so tempereth this government, that they exercise the faithfull with battell, they set upon them out of ambushes, they assaile them with invasions, they presse them with fighting, and oftentimes wearie them, trouble them, make them afraid, and sometime wound them, but never overcome nor oppresse them. But the wicked they subdne and draw away, they raigne upon their soules and bodies, and abuse them as bondslaves to all mischevous doings. As for the faithfull, because they are unquieted of such enemies, therefore they heare these exhortations. Doe not give place to the Devill. The devill your enemy goeth about as a roaring lyon, seeking whom hee may devour, whom resist yee being strong in faith, and such like. Paul confesseth that he himselfe was not free from this kind of strife, when he saith, that for a remedy to tame pride, the Angel of Satan was given to him by whom hee might bee humbled. This exercise therefore is common to all the children of God. But because that same promise of the breaking of Satans head, pertaineth generally to Christ, and to all his members, therefore I say, that the faithfull can never be overcome nor oppressed by him. They are many times stricken downe, but they are never so astonied withal, but that they recover themselves. They fall downe many times with violence of strokes, but they are after raised up againe: they are wounded, but not deadly. Finally, they so labour in all the course of their life that in the end they obtaine the victory: but I speake not this of every doing of theirs. For we know that by the just vengeance of God David was for a time given over to Satan, by his motion to number the people: and not without cause Paul said: there is hope of pardon, although many have beene entangled with the snares of the devill. Therefore in another place the same Paul saith, that the promise above alleaged is begun in this life, wherein wee must wrastle, and is performed after our wratling ended: when he saith, the God of peace shall shortly beate downe Satan under your feete. This victory hath alway fully bene in our head Christ, because the Prince of the world had nothing in him, but in us that are his members it doth now partly appeare, and shall be persecuted, when being unclouted of our flesh by which we are yet subject to weaknesse, we shall bee full of the power of the Holy Ghost. In this manner when the kingdome of Christ is raised up and advanced, Satan with his power falleth downe, as the Lord himselfe saith, I saw Satan fall as a lightning downe from heaven. For by this answer hee confirmeth that which the Apostles had reported of the power of his preaching: Again, When the Prince possesseth his owne pallace, all things that he possesseth are in peace, but when there cometh a stronger, hee is throwne out, &c. And to this end Christ in dying overcame Satan which had the power of death, and triumphed upon all his armies, that they should not hurt the Church, for otherwise they would every moment an hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weaknesse, and what is his furious strength) how could we stand, yea never so little time against his manifold and continuall assaults, but being supported by the victory of our captaine? Therefore God suffereth not the devill to raigne over the soules of the faithfull, but onely delivereth him the wicked and unbelieving to governe, whom God doth not vouchsafe to have reckoned in his flocke. For it is said, that he possesseth this world without controversie till he is thrust out by Christ. Again, that hee doth blinde all them that believe not the Gospell. Again, that hee performeth his worke in the stubborn children, and worldly, for all the wicked are the vessels of his wrath. Therefore to whom should they bee rather subject than to the minister of Gods vengeance? Finally, they are said to be of their Father the Devill, because as the faithfull are hereby knowne to bee the children of God, because they beare his image: so they bee the image of Satan into which which they are gone out of kinde, are properly discerned to be his children. 19 As wee have before confuted that trifling Philofophy concerning the holy Angels, which teacheth, that they are nothing else but good inspirations or motions, which God stirreth up in the minds of men : so in this place must we confute them that fondly say, that devils are nothing else but evil affections and perturbations of the mind, that are thrust into us by our flesh. That may we shortly doe, because there be many testimonies of Scripture, and those plaine enough upon this point. First, where the uncleane Spirits are called Angels, Apostataes, which have swarved out of kinde from their beginning, the very names doe sufficiently expresse, that they are not motions or affections of minds, but rather indeed as they be called minds, or spirits endued with sense and understanding. Likewise, whereas both Christ and Iohn doe compare the children of God with the children of the Devill : were it not an unfit comparison, if the name of the Devill signified nothing else but evil inspirations ? And Iohn addeth somewhat more plaine, that the Devill sinneth from the beginning. Likewise, when Inde bringeth in Michael the Archangell fighting with the Devill, doublelesse he setteth against the good Angell, an evil and rebellious Angell. Wherewith agreeth that which is read in the history of Iob, that Satan appeared with the holy Angels before God. But most plaine of all are those places that make mention of the punishment which they begin to feele by the judgement of God, and specially shall feele at the resurrection. Sonne of David, why art thou come before the time to torment us ? Again, Goe ye cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the Devill and his Angels. Again, If he spared not his owne Angels that had sinned : but cast them downe, into hell, and delivered them into chaines of darkenesse to be kept unto damnation, &c. How fond should these speeches be, that the Devils are ordained to eternall judgement, that fire is prepared for them that they are now already tormented and vexed by the glory of Christ : if there were no devils at all ? But because the matter needeth no disputation among them that believe the word of the Lord, and little good is done with testimonies of Scripture among those vaine students of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is new : I suppose I have performed that which I purposed, that is, that the godly minds should be furnished against such fond errors, wherewith unquiet men doe trouble both themselves and other that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, lest any entangled with that error, while they thinke they have none to stand against them, should wax more slow and unprovided to resist.

20 In the meane time let it not be wearisome unto us, in this so beautifull a stage to take godly delight of the manifest and ordinary workes of God. For, as I have elsewhere already said, though this be not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine of Faith, to remember, that what way soever we turne our eies, all that we see are the workes of God, and with godly consideration to weigh for what end God did make them. Therefore that we may conceive by faith so much as behooveth us to know of God, it is good first of all to learne the history of the creation of the world, how it is shortly rehearsed by Moses, and afterward more largely set out by holy men, specially by Basile and Ambrose. Out of it wee shall learne that God by the power of his word and spirit created heaven and earth of nothing, and thereof brought forth all living creatures, and things without life, with marvellous order disposed the innumerable variety of things, to every thing he gave the proper nature, assigned their offices, appointed their places and abidings, and where all things are subject to corruption, yet hath he so provided, that of all sorts some shall be preserved to the last day, and therefore some he cherisheth by secret meanes, and powreth now and then, as it were a new liveness into them, and to some hee hath given the power to increase by generation, that in their dying, that whole kinde should not die together. So hath hee marvellously garnished the heaven and the earth, with so absolutely perfect plenty, variety, and beauty of all things as possibly might bee, as it were a large and gorgeous house furnished and stored with abundance of most finely chosen stufte: last of all how in framing Man, and adorning him with so goodly beauty, and with so many and so great gifts, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his workes. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set forth at large the creation of the world, let it suffice to have once againe touched toucht these few things by the way. For it is better, as I have already warn'd the readers, to fetch a fuller understanding of this matter out of Moses, and other, that have faithfully and diligently convey'd the history of the world by writing to perpetuall memory.

21. It is to no purpose to make much ado in disputing, to what end the consideration of the works of God ought to tend, or to what marke it ought to be apply'd: for as much in other places already a great part of this question is declared, so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in few words be ended. Truly, if wee were minded to set out as it is worthy, how inestimable wisdom, power, justice, and goodnesse of God appeareth in the framing of the world, no eloquence, no garnishment of speech could suffice the largenesse of so great a matter. And no doubt it is Gods pleasure that wee should be continually occupied in so holy a meditation, that while we behold in his creatures as in looking glasses the infinite riches of his wisdom, justice, bountie and power, we should not run over them, as it were with a flying eye, or with a vaine wandring looke, as I may so call it, but that we should with consideration rest long upon them, cast them up and downe earnestly and faithfully in our minds, and oft repeat them with remembrance. But because wee are now busied in that kinde that pertaineth to order of teaching, it is meet that we omit those things that require long declamations. Therefore to be short, let the readers know that then they are conceiv'd by faith, what this meaneth, that God is the Creator of heaven and earth, if they first follow this universall rule, that they passe not over with not considering or forgetfulnesse of those vertues, that God presenteth to bee seene in his creatures, then, that they so learne to apply themselves, that they may therewith bee thoroughly mov'd in their hearts. The first of those we doe, when we consider how excellent a workmans worke it was, to place and aptly set in so well disposed order the multitude of the stars that is in heaven, that nothing can be devis'd more beautifull to behold: to set and fasten some of them in their standings, so that they cannot move, and to other some, to grant a free course, but so that in moving they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all, that it may divide in measure the dayes and nights, moneths, yeares, and seasons of the yeare, and to bring this inequality of dayes which wee daily see, to such a tempered order that it hath no confusion. Likewise when we marke his power in sustaining so great a body, in governing of the so swift whirling about of the engine of heaven, and such like. For these few examples doe sufficiently declare, what it is to record the power of God in the creation of the world. For else, if I should travell as I said, to expresse it all in words, I should never make an end, for as much as there are so many miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodnesse, so many examples of his wisdom, as there be formes of things in the world, yea, as there be things either great or small.

22. Now remaineth the other part which commeth neerer to faith, that while we consider that God hath ordained all things for our guard and safety, and therewithall doe feele his power and grace in our selves, and in so great good things that hee hath bestow'd upon us: we may thereby stirre up our selves to the trust, invocation, praise and love of him. Now, as I have before said, God himselfe hath shewed in the very order of creation, that for mans sake he created all things. For it is not without cause that he divided the making of the world into six dayes, whereas it had bene as easie for him in one moment to have in all points accomplished his whole worke, as it was by such proceeding from peece to peece to come to the end of it. But then it pleas'd him to shew his providence and fatherly carefulnesse toward us, that before he made man he prepar'd all that he foresaw should be profitable for him, and fit for his preservation. How great unthankfulnesse now should it be to doubt, whether this good Father doe care for us, whom we see to have bin carefull for us ere that we were borne? How wicked were it to tremble for distrust lest his goodnesse would at any time leave us destitute in necessity, which we see was displayed for us being not yet borne, with great abundance of all good things? Beside that we heare by Moses that by his liberality all that ever is in the world is made subject to us. Sure it is that he did it not to mocke us with an empty name of gift. Therefore we shall never lacke anything, so farre as it shall be available for our preservation. Finally to make an end, so oft as wee name God the creator of heaven and earth let this come in our mindes withall, that the disposition of all things which he hath created, is in his hand and power, and that wee are his children whom he hath taken into his owne charge and keeping to foster and bring up: that we may looke for all good things at his hand, and assuredly, that he will never suffer us to lacke things needfull for our safetie, to the end our hope should hang upon none other: that whatsoever we desire, our prayers may be directed to him: of what thing soever we receive profit, we may acknowledge it to be his benefit, and confesse it with thanksgiving: that being allured with so great sweetnesse of his goodnesse and liberality, wee may studie to love and honour him with all our heart.

The first thing that we are to weigh attentively when we behold heaven and earth is, what vertues of God there are presented to be seene in creatures.

The fruit of our considering the creatures of God must be the feeling of his goodness toward our selves and our growing thereby in faith, hope, and godlinesse.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

What a one man was created: wherein there is intreated of the powers of the soule, of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integrity of nature.

Man's first excellency doth stop their mouths which blame God with mens evils, and his being made so excellent out of the earth, doth both humble him and commend his maker.

NOW must we speake of the creation of man, not onely because he is among all the works of God the most noble and most excellent example of his justice, wisdom and goodnesse: but also because as we have said in the beginning, we cannot plainly and perfectly know God, unlesse we have withall a mutuall knowledge of our selves. Although the same knowledge be of two sorts, the one to know what we were created at the first beginning, the other to know what our estate began to be after the fall of Adam (for it were but to small profit for us to know our creation, unlesse we did also in this lamentable fall know what is the corruption and deformitie of our nature:) yet at this time we will be content with description of our nature when it was pure. And before we descend to this miserable estate whereunto man is now in thraldome, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For we must take heed that in precisely declaring onely the naturall evils of man, we seeme not to impute them to the author of nature. For ungodlinesse thinketh her selfe to have sufficient defense in this colour, if it may lay for her selfe that whatsoever fault she hath, the same did after a certaine manner proceed from God, and sticketh not if shee be accused, to quarrell with God, and to lay the fault upon him whereof shee is worthily accused. And they that would seeme to speake somewhat more reverently of the majestie of God, yet doe willingly seeke to excuse their owne wickednesse, by nature, not considering that therein, though not openly they blame God also, to whose reproch it should fall if it were proved that there is any fault in nature. Sith then wee see that our flesh gapeth for all the waies to escape, whereby she thinketh the blame of her owne evils may any way be put off from her, we must diligently travell to meete with this mischief. Therefore we must so handle the calamitie of mankinde that we cut off all excuse, and deliver the justice of God from all accusation. Afterward in place convenient we shall see how farre men be now from that purenesse that was given to Adam. And first we must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth and clay, a bridle was put upon his pride, for there is no greater absurditie, then for them to glorie in their excellencie, that doe not onely dwell in a cottage of clay, but also are themselves in part but earth and ashes. But forasmuch as God did not onely vouchsafe to give life unto an earthen vessell, but also it was his pleasure that it should be the dwelling house of an immortal Spirit, Adam might justly glorie in so great liberality of his maker.

2. Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule and body, and by the name of soule I meane an immortal essence; and yet created, which is the nobler part of him. Sometime it is called the Spirit. Albeit when these two names Soule and Spirit are joyned together, they differ one from the other in signification, yet when Spirit is set by it selfe it meaneth as much as Soule. As, when Salomon speaking of death, saith that then the Spirit returneth to him that gave it. And Christ commending his Spirit to his Father, and Stephen his spirit to Christ, doe both meane none other thing, but that when the Soule is delivered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirit, because

The soule of man many waies proved to be a spiritual, and immortal substance.

Eccle. 12. 7.
A.C. 7. 59.

cause it is a breath or a power by God inspired or powred into bodies which yet hath no essence, both the thing it selfe, and all the Scripture sheweth, that they doe too grossly erre. True it is, that while men are fastned to the earth more than they ought to be, they wax dull, yea, because they are estranged from the Father of lights, they are blinded with darknesse, so that they doe not thinke upon this, that they shall remaine alive after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darknesse, but that they be touched with some feeling of immortality. Surely the conscience which discerning betweene good and evill, answereth the judgement of God, is an undoubted signe of an immortall spirit. For how could a motion without essence attaine to come to the judgement seat of God, and throw it selfe into feare by finding her owne guiltinesse? For the body is not moved with feare of a spirituall paine, but that falleth onely upon the Soule. Whereby it followeth, that the Soule hath an essence. Moreover the very knowledge of God doth prove that the soules which ascend up above the world are immortall: for a vanishing liveliness were not able to attaine to the fountaine of life. Finally, for as much as so many excellent gifts where with mans minde is endued, doe cry out that there is some divine thing engraven in it, there are even so many testimonies of an immortall essence. For that sense which is in bruit beasts, goeth not out of the body, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently set before it. But the nimblenesse of the minde of man which vieweth the heaven and earth, and secrets of nature, and comprehending all ages in understanding and memory, digesteth every thing in order, and gathereth things to come by things past, doth plainly shew, that there lieth hidden in man a certaine thing severall from the body. We conceive by understanding the invisible God and Angels, which the body cannot doe. We know things that be right, just, and honest, which are hidden from the bodily senses. Therefore it mult needs be that the spirit is the seat of this understanding. Yea, and our sleepe it selfe, which astonieth a man, and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plaine witnes of immortality, for as much as it doth not onely mislitter unto us thoughts of those things that never were done, but also foreknowing of things for time to come. I touch these things shortly which even prophane writers doe excellently set out with more gorgious garnishment of words: but with the godly readers a simple putting in minde of them shall be sufficient. Now if the Soule were not a certaine thing by it selfe severall from the body, the Scripture would not reach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death we remove out of the tabernacle of the flesh, that we doe put of that which is corruptible, finally at the last day we may receive reward every man as hee hath behaved himselfe in his body. For these places and other that we doe each where commonly light upon, doe not onely manifestly distinguish the soule from the body, but also in giving to the soule the name of Man, doe shew that it is the principall part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithfull to cleanse themselves from all defiling of the flesh and the Spirit, hee maketh two parts of man wherein abideth the filthinesse of sinne. And Peter where hee calleth Christ the shepherd and Bishop of soules, should have spoken fondly if there were no soules about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conveniently stand together which he saith of the eternall salvation of soules, and where he biddeth to cleanse our soules, and where he saith, that evil desires doe fight against the soule, and where the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes saith, that the Pastors do watch that they may yeeld account for our soules, unless it were true that soules had a proper essence. To the same purpose serveth it that Paul calleth God for witness to his owne soule, because it could not be called in judgement before God unless it were subject to punishment. And this is also more plainly expressed in the words of Christ, when he biddeth us to feare him, which after that he hath killed the body, can throw the soule into hell fire. Now where the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes doth distinguish the fathers of our flesh from God, which is the onely Father of spirits, hee would not otherwile more plainly affirme the essence of soules. Moreover, if the soules remained not alive being delivered from the prisons of their bodies, Christ should very fondly have brought in the soule of Lazarus joying in the bosome of Abraham, and againe, the soule of the rich man subject to horrible torments. The same thing doth Paul confirme, when hee teacheth that wee wander abroad from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that wee enjoy his presence being out of the flesh.

Act 23, 8.

Man was created like to God, not in the fashion of his body, nor because he was framed as the first according to the shape which the sonne of God should afterwards take upon him: nor because he was like unto Christ, who is properly Gods Image, but for that in his first integrity he resembled the excellencie of his Creator. Gen. 1. 27. Gen. 1. 16.

But, because I will not be long in a matter that is not obscure, I will adde onely this out of Luke, that it is reckoned among the errors of the Sadduces, that they did not believe that there were any Spirits and Angels.

3. Also a strong prooffe hereof may bee gathered of this, where it is said, that man is create like to the Image of God. For although the glory of God doe appeare in the outward shape of man, yet is it no doubt that the proper seat of the Image of God, is in the Soule. I doe not deny that as concerning our outward shape, in as much as the same doth distinguish and sever us from bruit beasts, we doe also therein more neerely approach to God than they: neither will I much stand against them which thinke that this is to be accounted of the Image of God, that where all other living creatures doe grovelingwise behold the ground, to man is given an upright face, and he is commanded to looke upon the heaven, and to advance his countenance towards the starres: so that this remaine certaine, that the Image of God which appeareth or shineth in these outward signes, is spirituall. For Osander (whom his writings declare to have bene in fickle imaginations fondly witty) referring the Image of God without difference, as well to the body as to the soule, mingleth heaven and earth together. For he saith, that the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost did settle their image in man, because though Adam had stood without falling, yet should Christ have become man. And so by their opinion the body that was appointed for Christ, was but an example or figure of that bodily shape which then was formed. But where shall hee finde that Christ is the image of the Spirit? I grant indeed that in the person of the Mediator shineth the glory of the whole God-head. But how shall the eternall word be called the image of the Spirit whom he goeth before in order? Finally, it overthroweth the distinction betweene the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, if hee doe here call him his image. Moreover I would faine learne of him how Christ doth resemble the Holy Ghost in the flesh that hee tooke upon him, and by what markes and features hee doth expresse the likenesse of him. And whereas this saying: Let us make man after our image, doth also belong to the person of the Sonne, it followeth, that he must be the image of himselfe, which is against all reason. Beside that, if Osanders inventions be beleevd, man was fashioned onely after the figure and patterne of Christ in that he was man, and so that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Christ, in that that he was to be clothed with flesh, whereas the Scripture in a far other meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their subtil invention is more colourable which doe thus expound it, that Adam was create in the image of God, because he was fashioned like unto Christ, which is the onely image of God. But that exposition also is not found. Also some Interpreters make a great disputation about Image and Likenesse, while they seeke a difference betweene those two words, where is no difference at all, saying, that this word Likenesse is added to expound the other. First, we know that among the Hebrewes such repetitions are common, wherein they expresse one thing twice: and in the thing it selfe, there is no doubt, but that man is therefore called the image of God, because he is like to God. Whereby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which doe subtilly argue about the words, whether they point Zelem, that is to say, Image in the substance of the soule, or Demuth, that is to say, Likenesse in the qualities, or what other thing soever it bee that they teach. For whereas God determined to create man after his owne image, this being somewhat darkly spoken, hee doth as by way of explication repeat it in this saying, After his Likenesse, as if he would have said, that hee would make man, in whom hee would represent himselfe as an Image, because of the markes of Likenesse graven in him. And therefore Moses a little after reciting the same thing, doth repeat the Image of God twice, leaving out the name of Likenesse. And it is a trifling objection that Osander maketh, that not a part of man, or the soule onely with the gifts thereof, is called the Image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name given him of the earth, from whence he was taken. Trifling, I say, will all readers that have their sound wit judge this objection. For where whole man is called mortall, yet is not the soule thereby made subject to mortality. Again, where hee is called a living creature endued with reason, it is not thereby meant, that the body hath reason and understanding. Although therefore the soule is not the whole man, yet is it not inconvenient, that man in respect of the soule be called the image of God, albeit I hold still that principle which I have before stablished, that the image of God extendeth to the whole excellencie, whereby the nature of man hath preeminence among all kinde of living creatures. Therefore in that word is noted the integrity that man had when he was endued with right understanding, when he had his affection framed according to reason, and all his senses governed in right order, and when in excellent gifts he did truly resemble the excellencie of his Creator. And though the principall seat of the image of God were in the minde and heart, or in the soule and the powers thereof, yet was there no part of man, nor so much as the body, wherein did not some sparks thereof appeare. Certaine it is that also in all the parts of the world, there doe shine some resemblance of the glory of God: whereby we may gather that where it is said, that his image is in man, there is in so saying a certaine secret comparison, that advanceth man above all other creatures, and doth as it were seuer him from the common sort. Neither is it to be denied, that the Angels were create after the likenesse of God, sith (as Christ himselfe testifieth) our chiefe perfection shall be to become like unto them. But not without cause doth Moses by that peculiar title set forth the grace of God toward us, specially, where he compareth onely visible creatures with man.

Mat. 22. 30.

4. But yet it seemeth that there is not given a full definition of the image of God, unlesse it plainlier appeare in what qualities man excelleth: and whereby he ought to be counted a glasse, resembling the glory of God. But that can be by no other thing better knowne, than by the repairing of mans corrupted nature. First it is doubtlesse, that when Adam fell from his estate, he was by that departure estranged from God. Wherefore although we grant that the image of God was not altogether defaced and blotted out in him, yet was it so corrupted, that all that remaineth is but ugly deformity. Therefore the beginning of recovery of safety for us, is in that restoring which we obtaine by Christ, who is also for the same cause called the second Adam, because he restored us unto true and perfect integritie. For although where Paul doth in comparison set the quickning spirit that Christ giveth to the faithfull, against the living soule wherein Adam was created, he setteth forth the more abundant measure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take away this other principall point, that this is the end of our regeneration, that Christ should new fashion us to the image of God. Therefore in another place he teacheth, that the new man is renewed according to the image of him that created him. Where with agreeth this saying: Put on the new man which is created according to God. Now it is to be seene what Paul doth principally comprehend under this renewing. First, he speaketh of knowledge, and after of pure righteousness and holinesse. Whereby we gather that the image of God was first of all to be seene in the light of the minde, in the uprightnesse of the heart, and soundnesse of all the parts. For although I grant that this is a figurative phrase of speech to set the part for the whole: yet cannot this principle be overthrowne, that that thing which is the chiefe in the renewing of the image of God, was also the principall in the creation of him. And for the same purpose maketh it that in another place he teacheth, that we beholding the glory of God with open face, are transformed into the same image. Now doe wee see how Christ is the most perfect image of God, according to the which wee being fashioned are so restored, that in true godlinesse, righteousnessse, purenesse and understanding, we beare the image of God. Which principle being established, Osanders imagination of the shape of our body doth easily vanish away of it selfe. Whereas the man alone is in Paul called the image and glory of God, and the woman is excluded from that degree of honour, it appeareth by the rest of the text, that the same is to be applied onely to civill order of policie. But that under the name of image, whereof we speake, is comprehended all that belongeth to the spiritual and eternall life, I thinke it be already sufficiently proved. And the same thing doth John confirme in other words: saying, that the light which was from the beginning in the eternall word of God was the light of men. For where his purpose was to praise the singular grace of God, whereby man excelleth all living creatures, to sever him from the common sort, because hee hath attained no common life, but joynd with the light of understanding, he therewithall sheweth how he was made after the image of God. Therefore sith the image of God is the uncorrupted

The excellencie wherein man resembled God, consisteth in knowledge, and holinesse, not in the number of the faculties of his minde, nor in the power which God gave him over other creatures.

excellencie of the nature of man, which shined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was so corrupted and almost defaced that nothing remaineth since that ruine, but disordered, mangled, and filthily spotted: yet the same doth in some part appeare in the elect, in so much as they are regenerate, and shall obtaine her full brightnesse in heaven. But that we may know on what parts it consisteth, it shall be good to intreat of the powers of the soule. For that speculative device of Augustine is not found, where he saith, that the soule is a glasse of the Trinitie, because that there are in it, understanding, will, and memory. Neither is their opinion to bee approved, which set the image of God, in the power of dominion given unto him, as if hee resembled God onely in this marke, that he is appointed Lord and possessor of all things, whereas indeed the image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, and is an inward good gift of the soule.

The doctrine of Philosophers concerning the nature and powers of the soule.

5. But before I goe any further, it is needfull that I meet with the doting error of the Manichees, which Servetus hath attempted to bring in againe in this age. Where it is said, that God breathed the breath of life into the face of man, they thought that the soule did convey into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the immeasurable God were come into man. But it is easie even shortly to shew how many grosse and soule absurdities this devillish error draweth with it. For if the soule be by derivation part of the essence of God, it shall follow that the nature of God is subject not onely to change and passions, but also to ignorance, evill lusts, weaknesse, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more unconstant than man, because contrary motions doe toss and diversly drowne his soule, oftentimes he is blinde by ignorance, oft he yeeldeth as vanquished even to small tentations, and we know that the soule it selfe is the sinke and receiver of all filchinesse, all which things we must ascribe to the nature of God, if we grant that the soule is of the essence of God, or a secret in-flowing of the God-head. Who would not abhorre this monstrous device? Truly indeed doth Paul alleage out of Aratus, that we are the off-spring of God, but in quality and not in substance, inasmuch as he hath garnished us with godly gifts. But in the meane time, to teare in sunder the essence of the Creator, as to say, that every man doth possess a part of it, is too much madnesse. Therefore we must certainly hold, that the soules although the image of God be graven in them, were no lesse created than the Angels were. And creation is not a pouring out of one substance in another, but a beginning of essence made of nothing. And although the spirit of man came from God, and in departure out of the flesh returneth to God, yet is not forth with to be said, that it was taken out of his substance. And in this point also Ossander, while he glorieth in his illusions, hath entangled himselfe with an ungodly error, not acknowledging the image of God to bee in man without his essentiall justice, as though God by the inestimable power of his holy spirit could not make us like unto himselfe, unless Christ should substantially power himselfe into us. With whatsoever colour many doe goe about to disguise these deceits, yet shall they never so beguile the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wits, but that they will easily see that these things favour of the Manichees error. And where S. Paul intreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be readily gathered out of his words, that man was made of like forme to God, not by in-flowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his spirit. For he saith, that in beholding the glory of Christ, we are transformed into the same image, as by the Spirit of God, which surely so worketh in us, that it maketh us not of one substance with God.

6. It were but folly to borrow of the Philosophers a definition of the soule, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immortall substance. Indeed some other also, that is the Socratians, doth touch it, but so as none doth plainly teach that to other, which himselfe was not perswaded. But therefore is Plato of the better judgement, because he doth in the soule consider the image of God. Some other doe so binde the powers and vertues of the soule to this present life, that being out of the body they leave to it nothing. Now we have already taught by the Scripture, that it is a bodilisse substance: now must we adde that although properly it is not comprehended in place, yet it is set in the body, and doth there dwell as in a house, not onely to minister life to all the parts of the body, and to make the instruments thereof meet and fitly serving for the actions that they are appointed for, but also to beare the chiefe office in governing ming the life of man, and that not onely about the duties in this earthly life, but also to stirre us up to the service of God. Although this latter point in this corruption is not plainly perceiv'd, yet even in the vices themselves there remaine imprinted some leavings thereof. From whence cometh it but of shame, that men have so great care what be reported of them? And whence cometh shame, but of regard of his honesty? Whereof the beginning and the cause is, that they understand that they are naturally borne to observe justice, in which persuasion is enclosed the seed of religion. For as without all controversie man was made to meditation of the heavenly life: so it is certaine that the knowledge thereof was engraven in his soule. And surely man should want the principall use of his understanding, if he should be ignorant of his owne felicitie, whereof the perfection is, that he is joynd with God, and therefore it is the chiefe action of the soule to aspire thereunto. And so the more that every man studieth to approach unto God, the more he thereby proveth himselfe to be endued with reason. As for them that would have divers soules in man, that is, a feeling soule, and a reasonable soule, although they seeme to say somewhat by reason proveable, yet because there is no stedfast certainty in their reasons, we must reject them, unlessse wee listed to accumber our selves in things trifling and unprofitable. A great disagreement say they, there is betweene the instrumentall motions, and the part of the soule endued with reason. As though reason it selfe did not also dissent from it selfe, and some devices of it doe strive with other some, as they were armies of enemies. But for as much as that trouble some selfe proceedeth of the corruption of nature, it were amisse to gather thereby, that there are two Soules, because the powers of the Soule doe not agree together, in such well framed order as they ought. But as for more subtill disputation of the powers themselves, I leave that to the Philosophers. A simple definition shall suffice us for edification of godlinesse. I grant that the things that they teach are true, and not onely pleasant but also profitable to be knowne, and well gathered of them, and I forbid not such as are desirous to learne to study them. First therefore I admit that there are five senses, which Plato better liked to call instruments, whereby all objects are powered into Common sense, as into a place of receipt: then followeth Phantasie, which judgeth those things one from other that Common sense hath conceived, next is Reason, to which belongeth the universall judgement of things: last, the Understanding minde, which with earnestly bent and quiet viewing beholdeth all those things, that Reason is wont to discourse upon, and consider. And to the Understanding minde, Reason and Fancie, which are the three powers of the Soule, that rest in knowledge, there doe answer three other that doe rest in Appetite, that is to say, Will, the parts whereof are to cover those things that the Understanding minde and Reason doe lay before it: the power of Anger, which catcheth those things that Reason and Fancie doe misliker unto it. The power of Desiring, which taketh hold of these things that Fancie and Sense presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at the least likely to be true, yet because I feare that they shall more entangle us with obscurenesse, than further us, I think it best to overpasse them. If any man list otherwise to divide the powers of the soule, and to call the one the power of Appetite, which although it be without reason it selfe, yet doe obey Reason, if it be by other meane directed, and to call the other the power of Understanding, which is by it selfe partaker of Reason, I am not much against it, neither will I confute this opinion, that there are three beginnings of doing: that is to say, Sense, Understanding, and Appetite. But let us rather chuse a division, that is within the capacity of all men, which cannot bee had of the Philosophers. For they when they meane to speake most plainly, doe divide the soule into Appetite and Understanding, but either of these they make of two sorts. Understanding, they say, is sometime contemplative, which being contented with onely knowledge, hath no moving of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingenium, wit. Sometime they say it is practical, which by conceiving of good or evil doth diversly move the Will. And Appetite they doe divide into Will and Lust. Will they call that, when Appetite which they call horme obeyeth to Reason; and Lust they call that, when the Appetite shaking off the yoke of Reason, runneth out to intemperance. So alway they imagine reason to be that in man, whereby man may rightly governe himselfe.

7. But we are constrained somewhat to swerve from this manner of teaching, because the Philosophers which knew not the corruption of mans nature, which came for punishment of his fall, doe wrongfully confound the two very divers states of man. Let us therefore thus thinke of it, that there are in the soule of man two parts, which shall serve at this time for our present purpose, that is to say, Understanding and Will. And let it be the office of Understanding, to discern betweene objects, or things set before it, as each of them shall seeme worthy to be liked or disliked: and the office of Will, to chuse and follow that which Understanding saith to be good, and to refuse and flie that which Understanding shall disallow. Let us not here be stayed at all with the nice subtilties of Aristotle, that the minde hath of it selfe no moving, but that it is choice which moveth it, which choice he calleth the desiring Understanding. But to the end wee be not entangled with superfluous questions, let this suffice us, that the Understanding is as it were the guide and governour of the Soule, and that Will hath always regard to the appointment of Understanding, and abideth the judgement thereof in her desires. According whereunto, Aristotle himselfe hath truly said, that fleeing or following is in Appetite such a like thing, as in the Understanding minde is affirming and denying. Now how certaine the government of Understanding is to direct the Will: that we will consider in another place. Here wee meane onely to shew that there can be found no power in the Soule but that may well be said to belong to the one of these two members. And in this sort under Understanding wee comprehend Sense, which other doe so distinguish, that they say Sense is inclined to pleasure, for which Understanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to passe, that the Appetite of Sense is Concupiscence and Lust, the affection of Understanding is Will. Againe, in stead of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I set the name of Will, which is more commonly used.

8. God therefore hath furnished the Soule of man with an Understanding minde, whereby he might discern good from evill, and right from wrong, and having the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers have called this directing part the Guider. To this he hath adjoynt Will, to which belongeth choice. With these noble gifts the first state of man excelled, so that he not onely had enough of reason, understanding, wisdom, and judgement, for the government of this earthly life, but also to climbe up even to God and to eternall felicity. Then to have choice added unto it, which might direct the Appetites, and order all the instrumentall motions, and that so the will might be altogether agreeable to the government of reason. In this integrity, man had free-will, whereby if he would he might have attained eternall life. For here it is out of place to move question of the secret predestination of God: because wee are not now about to discuss what might have chanced or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might have stood if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his will was pliable to either side, and there was not given him constancie to continue, therefore he so easily fell. Yet his choice of good and evill was free. And not that onely, but also in his understanding minde, and in his will was most great uprightnesse, and all his instrumentall parts orderly framed to obedience, untill by destroying himselfe he corrupted the good things that were in him. From hence cometh it that all the Philosophers were so blinded, for that in a ruine they sought for an upright building, and for strong joynts in an unjoynted overthrow. This principle they held, that man could not be a living creature, endued with reason, unlesse there were in him a free choice of good and evill: and they considered, that otherwise all the difference should be taken away betweene vertues and vices, unlesse man did order his owne life by his owne advise. Thus farre had they said well if there had beene no change in man, which change because they knew not of, it is no marvell though they confound heaven and earth together. But as for them which professing themselves to be the disciples of Christ, doe yet seeke for free-will in man, that hath beene lost and drowned in spiritual destruction, they going in meane betweene the Philosophers opinions and heavenly doctrine are plainly deceived, so that they touch neither heaven nor earth. But of these things we shall better speake in place fit for them: now onely this we have to hold in minde.

minde, that man at his first creation was farre other than his posterity ever since, which taking their beginning from him being corrupted, hath from him received an infection derived to them as it were by inheritance. For then all the parts of his soule were framed to right order, then stood safe the soundnesse of his understanding minde, and his will free to chuse the good. If any doe object that it stood but in slippery state, because his power was but weak. I answer that that state was yet such as sufficed to take from him all excuse, neither was it reasonable to restrain God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not sinne at all. I grant such a nature had beene better, but therefore precisely to quarrell with God, as though it had beene his duty to have given that unto man, is too much injustice, for as much as it was in his owne choice to give how much pleased him. But why he did not uphold him with the strength of stedfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his owne secret counsell: it is our part only to be so farre wise as with sobriety we may. Man received indeed to be able if he would, but he had not to will that he might be able. For if this will should have followed stedfast continuance. Yet is hee not excusable, which received so much that of his owne will hee hath wrought his owne destruction. And there was no necessity to compell God to give him any other than a meane will and a fraile will, that of mans fall he might gather matter for his owne glory.

gratia ad Valentinum. cap. 12.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

That God by his power doth nourish and maintaine the world, which himselfe hath created, and by his providence doth governe all the parts thereof.

BUT it were very fond and bare to make God a Creator for a moment, which doth nothing since hee hath once made an end of his worke. And in this point principally ought wee to differ from the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine unto us no lesse in the continuall state of the world, than in the first beginning of it. For though the minds of the very wicked in onely beholding of the heaven and earth, are compelled to rise up unto the Creator, yet hath faith a certaine peculiar manner by it selfe, whereby it giveth to God the whole praise of creation. And therefore serveth that saying of the Apostle, which we before alleaged, that wee doe not understand but by faith, that the world was made by the word of God. For unlesse we passe forward even unto his providence, wee doe not yet rightly conceive what this meaneth, that God is the Creator, howsoever we doe seeme to comprehend it in minde, and confesse it with tongue. When the sense of the flesh hath once set before it the power of God in the very creation, it resteth there, and when it proceedeth furthest of all, it doth nothing but weigh and consider the wisdom, power, and goodness of the workman in making such a peece of worke (which things doe of themselves offer and thrust themselves in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certaine general doing in preserving and governing the same, upon which dependeth the power of moving. Finally, it thinketh that the lively force at the beginning put into all things by God, doth suffice to sustaine them. But Faith ought to pierce deeper, that is to say, whom hee hath learned to be the Creator of all things, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall governour and preserver of them: and that not by stirring with an universall motion as well the whole frame of the world, as all the parts thereof, but by sustaining, cherishing and caring for, with singular providence every one of those things that hee hath created even to the least sparrow. So David after hee had first said that the world was created by God, by and by descendeth to the continuall course of his providence. By the word of the Lord (saith hee) the heavens were established, and all the power thereof by the spirit of his mouth. By and by hee addeth: The Lord looked downe upon the sonnes of men, and so the rest that hee saith farther to the same effect. For although they doe not all reason so orderly, yet because it were not likely to be beleevd, that God had care of mens matters, unlesse hee were the maker of the world, nor any man doth earnestly beleve that God made the world, unlesse hee be perswaded that God hath also care of his works: therefore not without cause David doth by good order convey us from the one to the other. Generally indeed both the Philosophers doe teach, and mens minds doe conceive that all parts of the world are quickned with the secret inspiration of God. But yet they attaine not so farre as David both himselfe proceedeth and carrieth all the godly with him, saying, all things wait upon thee, that thou maist give them food in due season. Thou givest it to them and they gather it. Thou openest thy hand and they are filled with good things. But if thou hide thy face they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Againe, if thou send forth thy Spirit, they are created, and thou renewest the face of the earth. Yea, although they agree to the saying of Paul, that we have our being and are moved, and doe live in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth unto us: because they taste not of Gods speciall care whereby alone his fatherly favour is knowne.

2. That this difference may the better appeare, it is to be knowne, that the providence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in comparison set as contrary to fortune and chances that happen by adventure. Now for as much as it hath bene commonly beleeved in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a manner in all men, that all things happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to have bene beleeved concerning Providence, is by that wrong opinion not onely darkned, but also in manner buried. If a man light among theeves or wilde beasts, if by wind suddenly rising he suffer shipwracke on the Sea, if he be killed by the fall of a house or of a tree, if another wandering in desert places finde remedy for his povertie, if having bene tossed with waves, hee attaine to the haven, if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chances as well of prosperity as of adversity, the reason of the flesh doth ascribe to fortune. But whosoever is taught by the mouth of Christ, that all the haire of his head are numbred, will seeke for a cause further off, and will firmly beleeve that all chances are governed by the secret counsell of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although every one of them have his owne property naturally put into it, yet doe they not put forth their power, but onely so farre as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therefore nothing else but instruments, whereby God continually powreth in so much effect as pleaseth him, and at his will boweth and turneth them to this or that doing. Of no creature is the power more marvellous, or more glorious than of the Sunne. For besides that it giveth light to the whole world with his brightnesse, how great a thing is this that hee cherisheth and quickneth all living creatures with his heat? that he breatheth fruitfulnessse into the earth with his beames? that out of seeds warmed in the bosome of the ground, he draweth a budding greenesse, and sustaining the same with new nourishments doth increase and strengthen it, till it rise up in stalkes? That hee feedeth it with continuall vapour till it grow to a flower, and from a flower to fruit? That then also with baking it, hee bringeth it to ripenessse? That trees likewise and vines being warmed by him, doe first bud and shoot forth branches, and after send out a flower, and of a flower doe engender fruit? But the Lord, because hee would claime the whole glory of all these things to himselfe, made the light first to bee, and the earth to bee furnished with all kinds of hearbs and fruits before that he created the Sunne. A godly man therefore will not make the Sunne to be either a principall or a necessary cause of those things which were before the creation of the Sunne, but onely an instrument which God useth because it so pleaseth him, whereas hee might leave it and doe all things as easily himselfe. Then when we reade that the Sunne stood still two dayes in one degree at the prayer of Josua, and that the shadow thereof went backe ten degrees for Ezechias his sake, by those few miracles God hath declared that the Sunne doth not daily so rise and goe downe by blinde instinct of nature, but that hee to renew the remembrance of his fatherly favour toward us, doth governe the course thereof. Nothing is more naturall than spring-tide to come immediatly after Winter, Summer after Spring, and Harvest in course after Summer. But in this orderly course is plainly seene so great and so unequal diversity, that it may easily appeare that every yeare, moneth and day, is governed by a new and speciall providence of God.

3 And truly God doth claime and will have us give unto him an almightieffes, not such as the Sophisters doe imagine, vaine, idle, and as it were sleeping, but waking, effectually, working and busied in continuall doing. Nor such a one as is onely a generall beginning of a confused motion, as if hee would command a river to flow by his appointed channels, but such a one as is bent and ready at all his particular movings. For he is therefore called almightie, not because he can doe and yet sitteth still and doth nothing, or by generall instinct onely continueth the order of nature that hee hath before appointed: but because he governing both heaven and earth by his providence so ordereth all things that nothing chanceth but by his advised purpose. For whereas it is said in the Psalme, that hee doth whatsoever he will, therein is meant his certaine and determined will. For it were very foote to expound the Prophets words after the Philosophers manner, that God is the first Agent or doer, because he is the beginning and cause of all mooving: whereas the faithfull ought rather in adversity to ease themselves with this comfort, that they suffer nothing but by the ordinance and commandement of God, because they are under his hand. If then the government of God doe so extend to all his workes, it is a very childith cavillation to enclose it within the influence of nature. And yet they doe no more defraud God of his glory than themselves of a most profitable doctrine, whosoever doe restraints the providence of God within so narrow bounds, as if he suffered all things to be carried with an unguided course, according to a perpetuall law of nature. For nothing were more miserable than man if he should be left subject to every motion of the heaven, the aire, the earth, and the waters. Beside that, by that meane the singular goodnesse of God towards every man is too much unhonourably diminished. David crieth out that babes yet hanging on their mothers breasts, are eloquent enough to magnifie the glory of God, because even so soone as they become out of the wombe, they finde foode prepared for them by his heavenly care. This is indeed generally true, so that yet our eyes and senses overpasse not that unmarked which experience plainly sheweth, that some mothers live full and plentifull, breasts, some other almost drie, as it pleaseth God to feed one more liberally, and another more scarcely. But they which give the due praise to the almightieffes of God doe receive double profit thereby, the one that he hath sufficiently large ability to doe them good, in whose possession are both heaven and earth, and to whose becke all creatures doe attend upon, to yeeld themselves to his obedience: the other that they may safely rest in his protection, to whose will are subject all these hurtfull things that may any way bee feared, by whose authority as with a bridle Satan is restrained with all his furies and all his preparation, upon whose backe doth hang all that ever is against our safety. And no other way but this can the immeasurable and superstitious feares bee corrected or appeased, which wee oftentimes conceive by dangers happening unto us. Superstitiously fearefull I say we be, if where creatures doe threaten us or give us any cause of feare, wee be so afraid thereof, as if they had of themselves any force or power to doe us harme, or did unforesee or by chance hurt us, or as if against the hurts that they doe, there were not sufficient helpe in God. As for example. The Prophet forbiddeth the children of God that they should not feare the starres and signes of the heaven, as the unbelievers are wont to doe. Hee condemneth not every kinde of feare. But when the unbelievers to give away the government of the world from God unto Planets, doe saigne that our felicity or misery doth hang on the decrees and foreshewings of the starres, and not of the will of God, so commeth it to passe, that their feare is withdrawne away from that onely one, whom they ought to have regarded, unto the starres and comets, Who so therefore will beware of this unfaithfulnesse, let him keepe alwaies in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandring power, working or motion, but that they are governed by the secreet counsell of God, so that nothing can chance but that which is decreed by him both witting and willing it so to be.

4 First therefore let the readers learne, that providence is called that, not where-with God idely beholdeth from heaven what is done in the world, but where-with as guiding the sterne hee setteth and ordereth all things that come to passe. So doth it no lesse belong to his hands than to his eyes. For when Abraham said unto his sonne, God shall shall provide, he meant not onely, that God did foreknow the successe then to come, but that he did cast the care of a thing to him unknowne upon the will of God, which is wont to bring things doubtfull and confused to a certaine end. Whereby followeth, that providence consisteth in doing : for too much fondly doe many trifle in talking of bare fore-knowledge. Their error is not altogether so grosse which give unto God a government but disordered, and without advised choice, (as I have before said,) that is to say, such as whirleth and driveth about with a generall motion the frame of the world, with all the parts thereof, but doth not peculiarly direct the doing of every creature. Yet is this error not tolerable. For as they teach, it may be (notwithstanding this Providence which they call universall) that all creatures may be moved by chance, or man may turne himselfe hither or thither by free choice of his will. And so doe they part the government betweene God and man, that God by his power inspirereth into man a motion whereby hee may worke according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his owne doings by his owne voluntary advice : Briefly they meane that the world, mens matters, and men themselves are governed by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I speake not of the Epicureans (which pessilence the world hath alwayes beene filled with) which dreame of an idle and slothfull God : and other as mad as they, which in old time imagined that God did so rule about the middle region of the aire, that he left things beneath to Fortune : For against so evident madnesse, the dumme creatures themselves doe sufficiently cry out. For, now my purpose is to confute that opinion that is in a manner commonly beleeved, which giving to God a certaine blinde, and I wot not what uncertaine motion, taketh from him the principall thing, that is, by his incomprehensible wisdom to direct and dispose all things to their end : and so in name onely and not in deed it maketh God ruler of the world, because it taketh from him the government of it. For what (I beseech you) is it else to governe, but so to be over them that are under thee, that thou maist rule them by appointed order ? Yet doe I not altogether reject that which is spoken of the universall providence : so that they will againe grant me this, that the world is ruled by God, not onely because hee maintaineth the order of nature which himselfe hath set, but also because he hath a peculiar care of every one of his works. True it is, that all sorts of things are moved by a secret instinct of nature, as if they did obey the eternall commandment of God, and that which God hath once determined doth of it selfe proceed forward. And hereunto may that bee applied which Christ saith, that He and his Father were even from the beginning alwayes working. And that which Paul teacheth, that in him we live, are moved, and have our being, and that which the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, meaning to prove the God-head of Christ, saith, that by his mighty commandment all things are sustained. But they doe wrong which by this colour doe hide and darken the speciall providence, which is confirmed by so certaine and plaine testimonies of Scripture, that it is marvell that any man could doubt of it. And surely they themselves that draw the same veile which I speake of to hide it, are compelled by way of correction to adde, that many things are done by the peculiar care of God, but then they doe wrongfully re-straine the same onely to peculiar doings. Wherefore wee must prove that God doth so give heed to the government of the successes of all things, and that they all doe so proceed from his determinate counsell, that nothing happeneth by chance.

Heb. 1. 3.

The particular appointment of God appeareth in the divers alterations of things naturall, and extendeth to every drop of raine, to every accident which befalleth the least bird.

5. If wee grant that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all things are either of themselves or by chance carried whether the inclination of nature deriveth them, the mutuall succeeding by turnes of dayes and nights, of Winter and Summer, shall be the worke of God, in so much as hee appointing to every one their duties, hath set them a certaine law, that is, if they should alway keepe one measure in equall proportion, as well the dayes that come after the nights, the moeths after moeths, and yeares after yeares. But when sometimes immoderate heats with drinnesse doe burne up all the graine, sometime unseasonable raines doe maire the corne, when sudden harme commeth by hailes and tempests, that shall not be the worke of God, unlesse perhaps it be because the clouds or faire weather, or cold or heat have their beginning of the meeting of the Planets or other naturall causes. But by this meane is there no roome left, neither for the fatherly favour, nor for the judgements of God. If they say that God is beneficiall enough to mankinde because he poureth into the heaven and earth an ordinary power, whereby they doe finde him nourishment: that is too vaine and prophane an invention, as though the fruitfulnessse of one yeare were not the singular blessing of God, and dearth and famine were not his curse and vengeance? But because it were too long to gather together all the reasons that serve for this purpose, let the authority of God himselfe suffice us. In the law and in the Prophets hee doth often times pronounce, that so oft as he watereth the earth with dew and raine, he declareth his favour: and that when by his commandement the heaven is hardened like iron, when corne is consumed with blasting and other harmes, when the fields are stricken with haile and tempests, it is a token of his certaine and speciall vengeance. If we grant these things, then it is assured that there falleth not a drop of raine but by the certaine commandement of God. David praiseth the generall providence of God, that he giveth meat to the Ravens, birds that call upon him: but when God himselfe threatneth famine to living creatures, doth he not sufficiently declare that he feedeth all living things sometime with scarce, and sometime with more plentifull portion as he thinketh good? It is a childish thing, as I said before, to restraine this to particular doings, whereas Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparrow of never so small a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his Father. Surely, if the flying of birds be ruled by the purpose of God, then must we needs confesse with the Prophet, that hee so dwelleth on high, that yet he humbleth himselfe to looke upon all things that chance in heaven and earth.

6. But because we know that the world was made principally for mankindes sake, we must therefore consider this end in the governance of man. The Prophet Hieremie crieth out: I know, Lord, that the way of man is not his owne, neither belongeth it to man to direct his owne steps. And Salomon saith, the steps of man are ruled by the Lord, and how shall a man dispose his owne way? Now let them say that man is moved by God according to the inclination of his owne nature, but that man himselfe doth turne that moving whither it pleaseth him. But if that were truly said, then should man have the free choice of his owne wayes. Peradventure they will deny that, because he can doe nothing without the power of God. But seeing it is certaine that the Prophet and Salomon doe give unto God, not onely power, but also choice and appointment, they cannot so escape away. But Salomon in another place doth finely rebuke this rashnesse of men, that appoint unto themselves another end without respect of God, as though they were not led by his hand. The preparacions (saith he) of the heart are in man, but the answer of the tongue is of the Lord. It is a fond madnesse that men will take upon them to doe things without God, which cannot so much as speake but what he will. And the Scripture to expresse more plainly that nothing at all is done in the world but by his appointment, sheweth that those things which seeme most happening by chance, are subject to him. For what can you more ascribe to chance, than where a broken bough falling from a tree killeth a wayfaring man passing by it? But the Lord saith farr otherwise, which confesseth that he hath delivered him into the hand of the slayer. Likewise, who doth not leave the happening of lots to the blindness of fortune? But the Lord suffereth it not, which claimech the judgement of them to himselfe: for he saith that it commeth not to passe by a mans owne power that stones are cast into the lap and drawne out againe, but that thing which onely might be said to come of chance he testifieth to come from himselfe. For the same purpose maketh that saying of Salomon. The poore man and the usurer meet together, God lighteneth both their eyes. For although poore men and rich be mingled together in the world, while every one hath his state assigned him from God, he admonisheth that God which giveth light to all men is not blinde, and so he exhorteth the poore to patience, because whosoever are not contented with their owne estate, they seeke to shake off the burthen that God hath laid upon them. So another Prophet rebuketh the ungodly men, which ascribe to the diligence of men or to fortune, that some lie in misery and some arise up to honour. To come to preferment is neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the South, for God is the Judge, he maketh low and hee maketh high. Because God cannot put off the office of a Judge, thereupon the Prophet proweeth, that by his secret purpose some are in honour, and other some remaine in contempt.

7. And also I say that the very particular successes are generally witnesses of Gods singular providence. God raised in the desert a South wind to bring the people plenty of fowles : when his pleasure was to have Jonas throwne into the Sea, hee sent out a wind to raise up a tempest. But they that thinke that God governeth not the world, will say, that this chanced beside common use : But thereby I doe gather that never any wind doth rise or increase but by the speciall commandement of God. For otherwise it should not be true, that he maketh the winds his messengers, and fiery flames his ministers, that hee maketh the clouds his chariots, and rideth upon the wings of the wind, unlesse hee did by his will drive about the clouds and winds, and shew in them the singular presence of his power. So in another place wee are taught that so oft as the Sea swelleth with blast of winds, those violences doe testifie a singular presence of God. He commandeth and raiseth up the stormy winds, and it lisseth up the waves thereof, and then hee turneth the storme to calme, so that the waves thereof are still. As in another place hee saith, that hee scourged the people with burning winds. So whereas the power of engendring is naturally given to men, yet God willeth it to bee imputed to his speciall grace, that he leaveth some in barrenesse, and vouchsafeth to grant issue to other some, the fruit of the wombe is his gift. Therefore said Jacob to his wife, am I as God that I can give thee children ? But to make an end : there is nothing more ordinary in nature than that we be fed with bread. But the holy Ghost pronounceth, that not onely the growing of the fruits of the earth is the speciall gift of God, but also that men live not by onely bread, because it is not the very full feeding that nourisheth, but the secret blessing of God : as on the other side hee threatneth, that hee will breake the stay of bread. Neither could wee earnestly pray for our daily bread, unlesse God did give us food with his fatherly hand. Therefore the Prophet to persuade the faithfull, that God in feeding them doth fulfill the office of a good father of household, doth put them in minde, that he giveth meat to all flesh. Finally, when we have on the one side ; The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his cares bent to their prayers : on the other side ; The eye of the Lord is upon the ungodly to destroy the memory of them out of the earth : Let us know that all creatures both above and beneath are ready to obedience, that hee may apply them to what use soever he will, whereupon is gathered, that not onely his generall providence remaineth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his marvellous counsell is applied to a certaine and proper end.

8. They which would bring this doctrine in hatred, doe cavill that this is the learning that the Stoikes teach of Fatum or Destinie, which also was once laid for reproach to Augustine. As for us although we be loth to strive about words, yet we allow not this word Fatum, both because it is one of those whose prophane novelities S. Paul teacheth us to flie, and because some men doe goe about with the edionnesse thereof to bring Gods truth in hatred. As for the very opinion of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully laid to our charge. For we doe not as the Stoikes doe, imagine a necessity by a certaine perpetuall knot and entangled order of causes which is contained in nature : but we make God the Judge and Governour of all things, which according to his wisdom hath even from the farthest end of eternity decreed what hee would doe, and now by his power putteth in execution that which hee hath decreed. Whereupon wee affirme that not onely the heaven and earth and other creatures without life, but also the purposes and wills of men are so governed by his Providence, that they bee directly carried to the end that it appointeth. What then ? will one say, doth nothing happen by Fortune or by Chance ? I answer that Basilius Magnus hath truly said that Fortune and Chance are heathen mens words, with the signification whereof the minds of the godly ought not to be occupied. For if every good successe bee the blessing of God, and every calamity and adversity bee his curse, now is there in mens matters no place left for Fortune or Chance. Wee ought also to bee moved with this saying of Augustine in his booke against the Academies hee saith ; It doth displeaseth mee that I have have so oft named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to have any goddesse meant thereby, but onely a chanceable happening in outward things either good or evil. Of which word Fortune are derived those words which no religion forbiddeth us to use, forte, forsan, forsitan, fortasse, fortuito, that is, perhap, peradventure, by fortune and by chance, which yet must all be applied to the providence of God. And that did I not leave unspoken when I said, for perchance even the same that is commonly called Fortune is also ruled by secret order. And we call chance in things nothing else, but that whereof the reason and cause is unknowne. I said this indeed, but it repenteth me that I did there so name Fortune. Forasmuch as I see that men have a very evill custome, that where they ought to say, thus it pleased God, they say, thus it pleased Fortune. Finally, he doth commonly in hisbookes teach, that the world should be unorderly whirled about if any thing were left unto Fortune. And although in another place he determineth that all things are done partly by the free will of man, and partly by the providence of God, yet doth he a litle after sufficiently shew that men are subject unto and ruled by providence, taking this for a principle, that nothing is more against convenience of reason, than to say that any thing chanceth but by the ordinance of God, for else it should happen without cause or order, by which reason he also excludeth that happening that hangeth upon the will of men: and by and by after he plainlier saith that we ought not to seeke a cause of the will of God. And so oft as he maketh mention of sufferance, how that is to be understood, shall very well appeare by one place where he proveth that the will of God is the soveraigne and first cause of all things, because nothing happeneth but by his commandement or sufferance. Surely he seigneth not God to sit still idle in a watch tower, when it is his pleasure to suffer any thing, whereas he useth an actuall will (as I may so call it) which otherwise could not be called a cause.

9. But for as much as the dulnesse of our understanding cannot by a great way attaine to the height of Gods providence, we must use a distinction to helpe to lift it up. I say therefore, howsoever all things are ordained by the purpose and certaine disposition of God, yet to us they are chanceable, not that we thinke that Fortune ruleth the world and men, and unadvisedly tosseth all things up and downe (for such beastlinesse ought to be farre from a Christian heart) but because the order, meane, end, and necessity of those things that happen, doth for the most part lie secret in the purpose of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore those things are as it were chanceable, which yet it is certaine to come to passe by the will of God. For they seeme no otherwise, whether we consider them in their owne nature, or whether we esteeme them according to our knowledge and judgement. As for an example, let us put the case, that a Merchant being entred into a wood in company of true men, doth unwisely stray away from his fellowes, and in his wandering chanceth upon a den of robbers, lightheth among theeves, and is killed, his death was not onely foreseene with Gods eye, but also determined by his decree. For it is not sild that he did foresee how farre each mans life should extend, but that he hath set and appointed markes which cannot be passed. And yet so farre as the capacity of our minde conceiveth, all things herein seeme happening by chance. What shall a Christian here thinke? even this, whatsoever happened in such a death, he will thinke it in nature chancing by fortune as it is indeed, but yet he will not doubt that the providence of God did governe to direct Fortune to her end. In like manner are the happenings of things to come. For as all things that be to come are uncertaine unto us, so we hang them in suspence, as if they might fall on either part, yet this remaineth settled in our hearts, that nothing shall happen but that which God hath already foreseene. In this meaning is the name of chance oft repeated in Ecclesiastes, because at the first sight men doe not attaine to see the first cause which is farre hidden from them. And yet that which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the secret providence of God, was never so blotted out of the hearts of men, but that even in the darknesse there alway shined some sparkes thereof. So the Soothsayers of the Philistines, although they waver in doubtfulnessse, yet they ascribe adversity partly to God, partly to Fortune. If (say they) the arke goe that way, we shall know that it is God that hath stricken us: but if it goe the other way, then a chance hath light upon us. Indeed they did foolishly, when their cunning of soothsaying deceived them, to flee to fortune. but in the meane while we see them constrained, so that they dare not thinke that the evill hap which chanced unto them did come of fortune. But how God with the bridle of his providence turneth all successes whither pleaseth him, may appeare by one notable example. Behold even at one moment of time, when David was found out and neere taken in the desert of Mahon, even then the Philistines invaded the land, and Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to provide for the safety of his servant did cast this let in Sauls way, surely although the Philistines going to armes were sudden, and beside the expectation of men, yet may we not say that it came by chance. But those things that seeme to us to happen by chance, faith will acknowledge to have bene a secret mooving of God. I grant there doth not alway appeare the like reason, but undoubtedly we ought to believe, that whatsoever changes of things are seene in the world, they come by the secreter stirring of the hand of God. But that which God purposeth is so of necessity to come to passe, that yet it is not of necessitie precisely nor by the nature of it selfe. As thereof is a familiar example in the bones of Christ. Forasmuch as he had put on a body like unto ours, no wise man will deny that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet was it impossible that they should be broken: whereby we see againe that not without cause were in schooles invented the distinction of necessitie in respect, and necessitie absolute, or consequent and consequence, whereas God had subject to brickeenesse the bones of his Sonne, which he had exempted from being able to be broken, and so brought to necessitie by reason of his owne purpose, that that thing could not be, which naturally might have bene.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

Whereto and to what end this doctrine is to be applyed, that we may be certaine of the profits thereof.

Four things in considering the providence of God doe make the consideration thereof sweet and comfortable, that is for we see things to come, as well as past: that it worketh by, with and without meanes: that it respecteth principally the Church of God: and that it worketh even when the course of things doth seeme to perswade the contrary.

NOW forasmuch as mens wits are bent to vaine curious subtilties, it is scarcely possible but that they shall encomber themselves with entangled doubts, whosoever do not know the true and right use of this doctrine. Therefore it shall be expedient here to touch shortly, to what end the Scripture teacheth, that all things are ordered by God. And first of all is to be noted, that the providence of God ought to be considered as well for the time to come as for the time past: secondarily, that the same is in such sort the governor of all things, that sometime it worketh by meanes, sometime without meanes, and sometime against all meanes. Last of all, that it tendeth to this end that God may shew that he hath care of all mankind, but especially that he doth watch, in ruling of his Church, which he vouchsafeth more neerely to looke unto. And this is also to be added, that although either the fatherly favour and bountifullnesse of God, or oftentimes the severity of his judgement doe brightly appeare in the whole course of his providence: yet sometime the causes of those things that happen are secret, so that this thought creeper into our minds, that mens matters are turned and whirled about with the blinde sway of fortune, or so that the flesh stirreth us to murmur, as if God did to make himselfe pastime, tosse them like tennis bals. True it is, that if we were with quiet and still minds ready to learne, the very successes it selfe would at length plainly shew, that God hath an assured good reason of his purpose, either to traine them that be his to patience, or to correct their evill affections and tame their wantonnesse: or to bring them downe to the renouncing of themselves, or to awake their drowynesse: on the other side to overthrow the proud, to disapprove the subtiltie of the wicked, to confound their devises. But howsoever the causes be secret and unknowen to us: wee must assuredly hold that they are laid up in hidden store with him, and therefore wee ought to cry out with David, God, thou hast made thy wonderfull works so many, that none can count in order to thee thy thoughts towards vs. I would declare and speake of them, but they are more than I am able to expresse. For although alwayes in our miseries we ought to thinke upon our sinnes, that the very punishment may move us to repentance, yet doe we see how Christ giveth more power to the secreter purpose of his Father, than to punish every one according to his deserving. For of him that was borne blinde hee saith; neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the glory of God may bee shewed in him. For here naturall sense murmureth when calamity commeth even before birth, as if God did unmercifully so to punish the silly innocent, that had not deserved it. But Christ doth testifie that in this looking glasse the glory of his Father doth shine to our sight, if we have cleere eyes to behold it. But we must keepe modesty, that wee draw not God to yeeld cause of his doings, but let us to reverence his secret judgements, that his will bee unto us a most just cause of all things. When thicke clouds doe cover the heaven, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heavisome mistineffe is cast before our eyes, and the thunder troubleth our eares, and all our senses are amazed with terrour, we thinke that all things are confounded and troubled together: and yet all the while there remaineth in the heaven the same quietnesse and calmnesse that was before. So must wee thinke that while the troublesome state of things in the world taketh from us ability to judge, God by the pure light of his righteousnesse and wisdom, doth in well framed order governe and dispose even those very troublesome motions themselves to a right end. And surely very monstrous is the rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly call the works of God to account, and examine his secret meanings, and to give unadvised sentence of things unknowne, than they will doe of the deeds of mortall men. For what is more unorderedly than to use such modesty towards our equals, that we had rather suspend our judgement, than to incur the blame of rashnesse, and on the other side proudly to triumph upon the darke judgements of God, which it became us to regard with reverence?

2. Therefore no man shall well and profitably weigh the providence of God, but he: that considering that he hath to doe with his Creator and the maker of the world, doth with such humility as he ought submit himselfe to feare and reverence. Hereby it cometh to passe, that so many dogges at this day doe with venomd bitings, or at least barking, assaile this doctrine, because they will have no more to bee lawfull for God, than their own reason informeth them. And also they raile at us with all the spitefullnesse that they are able, for that not contented with the commandements of the law, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we doe further say, that the world is ruled by his secret counsels. Asthough the things that we teach were an invention of our owne braine, and as though it were not true that the holy Ghost doth every where expressely say the same, and repeateth it with innumerable formes of speech. But because some shamerestraineth them, that they dare not vomit out their blasphemies against heaven: they saigne that they contend with us, to the end they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not grant that whatsoever happeneth in the world, is governed by the incomprehensible purpose of God, let them answer to what end the Scripture saith, that his judgements are a deepe bottomlesse depth. For whereas Moses cryeth out that the will of God is not to be sought a farre off in the clouds, or in the depths, because it is familiarly set forth in the law: it followeth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomlesse depth. Of the which Paul also saith; O the depth of the richnesse both of the wisdom, and of the knowledge of God: how unsearchable are his judgements, and his wayes past finding out? for who hath knowne the minde of the Lord, or who hath bene his counsellour? And it is indeed true, that in the Gospell and in the Law are contained mysteries which are farre above the capacity of our sense: but for as much as God for the comprehending of these mysteries which hee hath vouchsafed to open by his Word, doth lighten the minds of them that see his, with the spirit of understanding: now is therein no bottomlesse depth, but a way wherein we must safe walke, and a candle to guide our feet, and the light of life, and the schoole of certaine and plainly discernable truth. But his marvellous order of governing the world, is worthily called a bottomlesse depth: because while it is hidden from vs, we ought reverently to worship it. Right well hath Moses expressed them both in few words. The secret things (saith hee) belong to the Lord our God: but the things revealed belong to vs and to our children for ever. Wee see how hee biddeth us not onely to study in meditation of the law, but also reverently to looke up unto the secret providence of God. And in the booke of Iob is rehearsed one title of this depth, that it humbleth our mindes. For after that the authour of that booke in surveying up and downe the frame of the world, had honourably entreated of the works of God, at length he addeth: Loe, these be part of his wayes, but how little a portion heere we of him? According to which reason in another place he maketh difference betweene the wisdom that remaineth with God, and the measure of wisdom which hee hath appointed for men. For after he hath preached of the secrets of nature, he saith that wisdom is knowne to God onely, and is hidden from the eyes of all living creatures. But by and by after, he saith further, that it is published to the end it should be searched out, because it is said unto man: behold, the feare of God is wisdom. For this purpose maketh the saying of Augustine: Because wee know not all things which God doth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in onely good will we doe according to the law, because his providence is an unchangeable law. Therefore, saith God doth claime unto himselfe the power to rule the world, which is to us unknowne, let this bee to us a law of sobernesse and modesty, quietly to obey his soveraigne authoritie, that his will may be to us the onely rule of justice, and the most just cause of all things. I mean not that absolute will, of which the Sophisters doe babble, separating by wicked and prophane disagreement his justice from his power, but I mean that providence, which is the governess of all things, from which proceedeth nothing but right: although the causes thereof be hidden from us.

3. Whosoever shall be framed to this modesty, they neither for the time past will murmur against God for their adversities, nor lay upon him the blame of wicked doings, as Agamemnon in Homer did, saying, I am not the cause, but Jupiter and destinie: nor yet againe, as carried away with destinies, they will by desperation throw themselves into destruction, as that young man in Plautus which said; Unstable is the chance of things: the Destinies drive men at their pleasure, I will get me to some rocke there to make an end of my goods and life together. Neither yet (as another did) they will pretend the name of God to cover their owne mischievous doings: for so saith Lycanides in another comedy: God was the mover. I beleeve it was the will of the gods: for if it had not beene their will, I know it should not so come to passe. But rather they will search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by the guiding of the Holy Ghost, they may travell to attaine thereunto. And also being ready to follow God, whither soever he calleth, they shew indeed that nothing is more profitable than the knowledge of his doctrine. Very foolishly doe prophane men tumult with their fondnesse, so that they in manner confound heaven and earth together as the saying is; If God hath marked the point of our death, we cannot escape it; then it is labour vainly lost in taking heed to our selves. Therefore whereas one man dareth not venture to goe the way that he heareth to be dangerous, lest he be murdered of thieves: another sendeth for Physitians, and wearieth himselfe with medicines to succour his life: another forbeareth grosse meates for feare of appairing his feeble health: another dreadeth to dwell in a ruinous house. Finally, whereas men devise alwayes and endeavour with all diligence of minde whereby they may attaine that which they desire: either all these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the will of God, or else life and death, health and sicknesse, peace and warre, and other things, which men as they covet or hate them, doe by their travell endeavour to attaine or escape, are not determined by his certaine decree. And further they gather, that the prayers of the faithfull are disordered, or at the least superfluous, wherein petition is made that it will please the Lord to provide for those things which he hath already decreed from eternity. To bee short, they destroy all counsels that men doe take for time to come, as things against the providence of God, which hath determined what hee would have done, without calling them to counsell. And then whatsoever is already happened, they so impute it to the providence of God, that they winke at the man whom they know to have done it. As, hath a Ruffian slaine an honest Citizen? hee hath executed (say they) the purpose of God. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because hee hath done the thing that was foreseene and ordained by the Lord, hee is a minister of his providence.

Hath

Hath the Sonne carelesly, neglecting all remedies, waited for the death of his father? he could not resist God that had so before appointed from eternity. So all mischievous doings they call vertues, because they obey the ordinance of God.

4. But as touching things to come, Salomon doth well bring in agreement together, the purposes of men with the providence of God. For as he laugheth to scorne their folly, which boldly doe enterprife any thing without the Lord, as though they were not ruled by his hand: so in another place he speaketh in this manner: The heart of man purposeth his way, but the Lord doth direct his steps, meaning, that we are not hindered by the eternall decrees of God, but that under his will we may both provide for our selves, and dispose all things belonging to us. And that is not without a manifest reason. For he that hath limited our life within appointed bounds, hath therewithall left with us the care thereof, hath furnished us with meanes and helps to preserve it, hath made us to have knowledge before hand of dangers, and that they should not oppresse us unaware, hee hath given us provisions and remedies. Now it is plaine to see what is our duty, that is to say; If God hath committed to us our owne life to defend, our duty is to defend it. If he offer us helps, our duty is to use them. If he shew us dangers before, our duty is not to runne rashly into them. If he minister us remedies, our duty is not to neglect them. But no danger shall hurt, unlesse it be fatall, which by all remedies cannot be overcome. But what if dangers be therefore not fatall, because God hath assigned the remedies to repulse and overcome them. See how thy manner of reasoning agreeth with the order of Gods disposition. Thou gatherest that danger is not to be taken heed of, because forasmuch as it is not fatall, we shall escape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore enjoyne thee to take heed of it, because he will not have it fatall unto thee. These mad men doe not consider that which is plaine before their eyes, that the skill of taking counsell and heed is inspired into men by God, whereby they may serve his providence in preserving of their owne life: as on the other side by negligence and sloth they procure to themselves these evils that he hath appointed for them. For how commeth it to passe, that a circumspect man while hee provideth for himselfe, doth wade himselfe out of evils that hang over him, and the foole perisheth by unadvised rashnesse, but for that both folly and wisdom are the instruments of Gods disposition on both parts? Therefore it pleased God to hide from us all things to come, to this end, that wee should meet with them as things doubtfull, and not cease to set prepared remedies against them, till either they be overcome, or be past all helpe of care. And for this cause I have before admonished, that the providence of God doth not alway shew it selfe naked, but as God by using of meanes doth in a certaine manner cloth it.

5. The same men doe unorderly, and unadvisedly draw the chances of time past to the naked providence of God. For because upon it doe hang all things whatsoever happen, therefore (say they) neither robberies, nor adulteries, nor man-slaughters, are committed without the will of God. Why then (say they) shall a theefe be punished, for that he spoiled him whom the Lords will was to punish with poverty? Why shall the murderer be punished who hath slaine him whose life the Lord hath ended? If all such men doe serve the will of God, why shall they be punished? But I deny that they serve the will of God. For we may not say, that he which is carried with an evill minde doth service unto God as commander of it, where indeed he doth but obey his owne wicked lust. He obeyeth God, which being enforced of his will doth labour to that end, whereunto Gods will calleth him. But whereby are we enforced of his will, but by his word? Therefore in doing of things we must see that same will of God, which hee declareth in his word. God requireth of us onely that which he commandeth. If we doe any thing against his commandement, it is not obedience but obstinacie and transgression. But unlesse he would, we should not doe it. I grant. But doe we evill things to this end to obey him? But he doth not command us to doe them, but rather we runne on head-long, not minding what he willeth, but so raging with the intemperance of our owne lust, that of set purpose we bend our travell against him. And by these meanes in evill doing we serve his just ordinance, because according to the infinite greatnesse of his wisdom he hath good skill to use evill instruments to doe good. And see how foolish

The providence of God doth not abolish but establish the meanes by leaving the end certaine onely to himselfe, so as uncertaine, that we might take the wayes which are likely to bring us into it: and which we should purpose to our selves:

lish is their manner of arguing. They would have the doers unpunished for mischievous acts, because they are not committed but by the disposition of God. I grant more: that thieves and murderers and other evill doers are the instruments of Gods providence, whom the Lord doth use to execute those judgements which he hath with himselfe determined. But I deny that their evill doings ought to have any excuse thereby. For why? shall they either entangle God in the same wickednesse with them, or shall they cover their naughtinesse with his righteousnesse? They can doe neither of both. Because they should not be able to excuse themselves, they are accused by their owne conscience. And because they should not be able to blame God, they finde all the evill in themselves, and in him nothing but a lawfull use of their evillesse. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you, commeth the stinke in a dead carrion, which hath bene both rotted and disclosed by heat of the Sunne? All men doe see that it is raised by the beames of the Sunne. Yet no man doth therefore say, that the Sun-beames doe stinke. So when there resteth in an evill man the matter and guiltinesse of evill, what cause is there why it should be thought that God is any thing defiled with it if he use their service at his pleasure? Away therefore with this doggish frowardnesse, which may indeede a farre off barke at the justice of God, but cannot touch it.

6. But these cavillations or rather doting errors of phrentike men shall easily bee shaken away by godly and holy meditation of the providence, which the rule of godlinesse teacheth us, so that thereof may grow unto us a good and most pleasant fruit. Therefore a Christian heart when it is most assuredly perswaded that all things come to passe by the disposition of God, and that nothing happeneth by chance, will alway bend his eyes to him as to the principall cause of things, and yet will consider the inferior causes in their place. Then he will not doubt that the singular providence of God doth watch for his preservation, which providence will suffer nothing to happen, but that which shall turne to his good and salvation. And because he hath to doe first of all with men, and then with the other creatures, he will assure himselfe that Gods providence doth reigne in both. As touching men, whether they be good or evill, he will acknowledge that all their counsels, wils, enterprises and powers are under the hand of God, so that it is in Gods will to bow them whiche he list, and to restrain them so oft as pleaseth him. That the singular providence of God doth keepe watch for the safety of the faithfull, there are many and most evident promises to witnesse. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and hee shall nourish thee, and shall not suffer the righteous to fall for ever, because he careth for us. He that dwelleth in the helpe of the highest, shall abide in the protection of the God of Heaven. He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of mine eye. I will be thy shield, a brasen wall: I will be enemy to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her children, yet will I not forget thee. And also this is the principall intent in the Histories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doth with such diligence keepe the wayes of the Saints, that they doe not so much as stumble against a stone. Therefore as a little before we have rightfully rejected their opinion which doe imagine an universall providence of God, that stoopeth not specially to the care of every creature: yet principally it shall be good to reknowledge the same speciall care toward our selves. Whereupon Christ after he had affirmed that not the sparrow of least value doth fall to the ground without the will of the father, doth by and by apply it to this end, that we should consider, that how much we be more worth than sparrows, with so much neere care doth God provide for us, and he extendeth that care so farre, that we may be bold to trust that the haire of our head are numbered. What can we wish our selves more, if not so much as a haire can fall from our head but by his will? I speake not onely of all mankinde, but because God hath chosen his Church for a dwelling house for himselfe, it is no doubt but that he doth by singular examples shew his care in governing of it.

7. The servant of God being strengthened with these both promises and examples, will joyne with them the testimonies which teach that all men are under Gods power, whether it be to win their minds to will good, or to restrain their malice that it may do no hurt. For it is the Lord that giveth us favour not onely with them that will us well, but also in the Ægyptians, and as for the maliciousnesse of our enemies, hee knoweth how by divers wayes to subdue it. For sometime he taketh away their wit from them, so that they can conceive no sound or sober advice, like as he sent forth Satan to fill the mouths of all the Prophets with lying to deceive Ahab. He made Rehoboam mad by the young mens counsell, that he might be spoiled of his kingdome by his owne folly. Many times when he granted them wit, yet he maketh them so afraid and astonished, that they cannot will or go about that which they have conceived. Sometime also when he hath suffered them to goe about that which lust and rage did counsell them, he doth in convenient time breake off their violences, and suffereth them not to proceed to the end that they purposed. So did he before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achitophel that should have bene to Dauids destruction. So also he taketh care to governe all his creatures for the benefit and safety of them that be his, yea, and to governe the devill himselfe, which as we see durst enterprise nothing against Job without his sufferance and commandment. Of this knowledge necessarily ensueth both a thankfullnesse of minde in prosperous successs of things, and also patience in adversity, and an incredible assurednesse against the time to come. Whatsoever therefore shall betide unto him prosperously and according to his hearts desire, all that he will ascribe vnto God, whether he feele the bounty of God by the ministry of men, or be holpen by liuelesse creatures. For thus he will thinke in his minde : Surely it is the Lord which hath inclined their minds to me, which hath joynd them unto me to be instruments of his goodnesse towards me. In plenty of the fruits of the earth, thus he will thinke, that it is the Lord which heareth the heaven, that the heaven may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare her fruits. In other things he will not doubt that it is the only blessing of the Lord whereby all things prosper, and being put in minde by so many causes, he will not abide to be unthankfull.

8. If any adversity happen, he will by and by therein also lift up his minde to God, whose hand availeth much to imprint in us a patience and quiet moderation of heart. If Ioseph had still continued in recording the fallshood of his brethren, he could never have taken a brotherly mind toward them. But because he bowed his mind to the Lord, he forgat the injury, and inclined to meeknesse and clemencie, so farre forth that of his owne accord he comforted his brethren and said : It is not you that sold me into Aegypt, but by the will of God I was seate before you to save your lives. You indeed thought evill of me, but the Lord turned it to good. If Job had had respect to the Chaldees, by whom he was troubled, he would forthwith have bene kindled to revenge. But because he did therewithall acknowledge it to be the work of God, he comforted himselfe with this most excellent saying : The Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away, the Lords name be blessed. So David : when Semei had railed and cast stones at him, if he had looked upon man, he would have encouraged his souldiers to reacquite the injurie : But because he understood that Semei did it not without the moving of the Lord, he rather appeased them : Let him alone (said he) for the Lord hath commanded him to curse. With the same bridle in another place doth he restraine the intemperancie of sorrow. I held my peace (saith he) and became as dumbe, because thou O Lord, didst it. If there be more effectull remedy against wrath and impatience, surely he hath not a little profited which hath learned in this behalfe to thinke upon the providence of God, that he may alway call backe his minde to this point. It is the Lords will, therefore it must be suffered, not onely because it is not lawfull to strive against it, but also because he willeth nothing but that which is both just and expedient. In summe, this is the end, that being wrongfully hurt by men, we leaving their malice (which would doe nothing but enforce our sorrow, and whet our minds to revenge) should remember to climbe up unto God, and learne to beleve assuredly, that whatsoever our enemy hath mischievously done against us, was both suffered and sent by Gods disposition. Paul, to refrain us from recompencing of injuries doth wisely put us in minde, that we are not to wrestle with flesh and blood, but with the spirituall enemy the devill, that we may prepare our selves to strive with him. But this is the most profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath, that God doth arme as well the Devill as all wicked men to strive with us, and that he sitteth as Judge to exercise our patience. But if the misfortunes and miseries that oppresse us doe chance without the worke of men, let us remember the doctrine of the Law : whatsoever is prosperous floweth from the fountaine of Gods

Gods blessing, and that all adversities are his cursings: and let that most terrible warning make us afraid: If ye walke stubbornly against me, I will also walke stubbornly against you. In which is rebuked our sluggishness, when according to the common sense of the flesh accounting all to be but chance that happeneth of both sorts, we are neither encouraged by the benefits of God to worship him, nor pricked forward with his scourges to repentance. The same is the reason why Hieremie and Amos did so sharply rebuke the Jewes, because they thought that things as well good as evil came to passe without the commandement of God. To the same purpose serveth that Sermon of Esay, I the God that create light, and fashion darknesse, that make peace and create evil: I God doe make all these things.

9. And yet in the meane time a godly man will not winke at the inferiour causes. Neither will he, because he thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodness by whom he hath received benefit, therefore let them passe unconsidered, as though they had deserved no thanks by their gentleness: but he will heartily thinke himselfe bound unto them, and will willingly confesse his bond, and travell as he shall be able, and as occasion shall serve, to recompence it. Finally, in benefits received he will reverence and praise God as the principall Authour, but he will honour men as the ministers, and as the truth is indeed he will understand that he is by the will of God bound to them, by whose hand it was Gods will to be beneficiall unto him. If he suffer any losse by negligence or want of foresight, he will determine in his minde, that the same was done indeed with the will of God, but he will impute it also to himselfe. If any man be dead by sickness whom he hath negligently handled, whereas of duty he should have taken good heed unto him, although he be not ignorant that the man was come to his appointed time beyond which he could not passe, yet will he not thereby lessen his offence, but because he had not faithfully discharged his duty toward him, he will so take it as if he had perished by fault of his negligence. Much lesse when there is used any fraud, and concealed malice of minde in committing either murder or theft, will he excuse it under pretence of Gods providence, but he will in one selfe evil act severally behold both the righteousness of God, and the wickednesse of man, as both doth manifestly shew themselves. But principally in things to come he will have consideration of such inferiour causes. For he will reckon it among the blessings of God if he be not disappointed of the helps of men which he may use for his safety. And so he neither will be negligent in taking of counsell, nor slothfull in craving their helpe whom he seeth to have sufficient whereof he may be succoured: but thinking that whatsoever creatures can any thing profit him, the same are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his use as the lawfull instruments of Gods providence. And because he doth not certainly know what successe the businessse will have which he goeth about, (saying that in all things he knoweth that the Lord will provide for his benefit) he will with study travell to that which he shall thinke expedient for himselfe, so farre as he can conceive in minde and understanding. And yet in taking of counsels he will not be carried on by his owne wit, but will commit and yeeld himselfe to the wisdom of God, that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence shall not so stay upon outward helps, that if he have them he will carelesly rest upon them, or if he want them he will be afraid as left destitute, for he will have his minde alway fastened upon the Providence of God, neither will he suffer himselfe to be drawne away from the stedfast beholding thereof, by consideration of present things. So though Joab acknowledged that the successe of battell is in the will and hand of God, yet he gave not himselfe to slothfulnessse, but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaveth it unto the Lord to govern the end. We will stand valiant (saith he) for our Nation, and for the Cities of our God: But the Lord doth what is good in his eyes. This knowledge shall deposite us of rashnesse and wrongfull confidence, and shall drive us to continuall calling upon God: and also shall uphold our minds with good hope, so as we may not doubt assuredly and boldly to despise those dangers that compass us about.

10. In this point doth the inestimable felicity of a godly minde shew forth it selfe. Innumerable are the evils that doe besiege mans life, and doe threaten him so many deaths. As, not to goe further than our selves: forasmuch as our bodies is a receptacle of a thousand thousand diseases, yea, hath enclosed and doth nourish within it the causes of diseases; man cannot carrie himselfe but he must needs also carrie about with him many formes of his owne destruction, and draw forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it else be called, where henceforth is cold, nor sweareth without perill? Now whether soever thou turne thee, all things that are about thee are not onely untrusty friends; to thee, but doe in manner openly threaten and seeme to shew thee present death. Goe into a Ship, there is but a foot thicknesse betwene thee and death. Sit on horsebacke, in the slipping of one foot thy life is in danger. Goe thorow the streets of the Citie, even how many tiles are upon the houses, to so many perils art thou subject. If there be an iron toole in thy hand or thy friends, thy harme is ready prepared. How many wilde beasts thou seeest, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou meane to shut up thy selfe, even in a garden well fenced, where may appeare nothing but pleasantnesse of aire and ground, there sometime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subject to fire, doth in the day time threaten thee with poverty, and in the night time with falling upon thy head. Thy field, forasmuch as it lieth open to haile, frost, drough, and other tempests, it warneth thee of barrennesse, and thereby famine. I speake not of prisonings, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which, part doe besiege us at home, and part doe follow us abroad. In these streights must not man needs bee most miserable, which even in life halfe dead doth plainly draw forth a carefull and fainting breath, as if he had a sword continually hanging over his necke? But thou wilt say, that these things chance seldome, or at the least not alwayes, nor to all men, and never all at once. I grant, but seeing we are put in minde by the examples of other, that the same things may happen to our selves, and that our life ought of duty no more to be free than theirs, it cannot bee but that wee must dread and feare them as things that may light upon us. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearfulnesse? Besides that, it is not without dishonourable reproach of God to say, that hee hath set open Min the noblest of all his creatures to the blinde and unadvised strokes of fortune. But here my purpose is to speake onely of the misery of man, which hee should feele if he should be brought subject under fortunes dominion.

11. But when that light of Gods providence hath once shined upon a godly man, he is now releevd and delivered not onely from the extreame anguish and feare wherewith he was before oppressed, but also from all care. For as justly he seareth fortune, so hee dare boldly committ himselfe to God. This is (I say) his comfort to understand that the heavenly Father doth so hold in all things with his power, so ruleth them with his authority and countenance, so ordereth them with his wisdome, that nothing befalleth but by his appointment; and that he is received into Gods tuition, and committed to the charge of Angels, and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but so farr as it shall please God the governour to give them place. For so it is sung in the Psalme. For he shall deliver thee from the hunters snare, and from the noy-some pestilence. He will cover thee under his wings, and thou shalt be sure under his feathers. His truth shall bee thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not bee afraid of the feare of the night, nor of the arrow that flieth by day, nor of the pestilence that walketh in the darknesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at noone day. And from thence proceedeth that boldnesse of the Saints to glory. The Lord is my helper, I will not feare what flesh may doe to me. The Lord is my Protector, why shall I be afraid? If whole camps stand up against me, if I walke in the midst of the shadow of death, I will not cease to hope well. Whence I pray you have they this, that their assurednesse is never shaken away from them? but hereby, that where the world seemeth in shew to bee without order whirled about, they know that God worketh every where, whose worke they trust shall be for their preservation. Now if their safety be assailed either by the devill or by wicked men, in that case if they were not strengthened with remembrance and meditation of Providence, they must needs by and by be discouraged. But when they call to minde, that the devill and all the rout of the wicked, are so every way holden in by the hand of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceive any mischief against us, nor goe about it when they have conceived it, nor if they goe never so much about it, can stirre one finger to bring it to passe but so farr as he shall suffer, yea, so farre as he shall command, and that they are not onely holden fast bound with fetters, but also compelled with bridle to doe service : here have they abundantly wherewith to comfort themselves. For as it is the Lords worke to arme their fury and to turne and direct it whither it pleaseth him, so is it his worke also to appoint a measure and end, that they doe not after their owne will licentiously triumph. With which perswasion Paul being established, did by the sufferance of God appoint his journey in another place, which he said was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had onely said that hee had beene stopped by Satan, hee should have seemed to give him too much power, as if it had beene in Satans hand to overthrow the very purposes of God : but when he maketh God the Judge, upon whose sufferance all journies doe hang : he doth therewithall shew, that Satan whatsoever he goe about, can attaine nothing but by Gods will. For the same reason doth David, because for the sundry changes wherewith mans life is tossed, and as it were whirled about, hee doth flie to this sanctuary, say, that his times are in the hand of God. He might have said either the course of his life, or time in the singular number. But by the word Times, he meant to expresse that howsoever the state of man be unsteadfast, whatsoever alterations doe now and then happen, they are governed by God. For which cause Resn and the King of Israel, when joyning their powers to the destruction of Juda, they seemed as firebrands kindled to waite and consume the land, are called by the Prophet smoking brands, which can doe nothing but breathe out a little smoke. So when Pharao was terrible to all men by reason of his riches, strength, and number of men, he himselfe is compared to a beast of the Sea, and his army to fishes. Therefore God saith, that he will take the Captaine and the armie with his hooke and draw them whither he list. Finally, because I will not tarry long upon this point, if a man marke it he shall easily see that the extremity of all miseries is the ignorance of Gods Providence, and the chiefe blessednesse standeth in the knowledge thereof.

12. Concerning the Providence of God, this that is said were enough for so much as is profitable both for the perfect learning and comfort of the faithfull, (for to fill the vaine curiosity of men, nothing can be sufficient, neither is it to be wished that they be satisfied) were it not for certaine places, which seeme to meane otherwife than is above declared, that God hath not stedfast and stable purpose but changeable, according to the disposition of inferiour things. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of God, as that he repented him of the creating of man, of the advancing of Saul to the kingdom. And that he will repent him of the evil that he had determined to lay upon his people, so soone as he perceiveth any conversion of them. Againe, there are rehearsed divers repeales of his decrees. He had declared by Ionas to the Ninivites, that after fortie dayes once past Ninivie should be destroyed, but by and by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle sentence. He had by the mouth of Esay pronounced death to Ezechias, which he was moved by his teares and prayers to deferre. Here-upon many doe make argument, that God hath not appointed mens matters by eternall decree, but yearly, daily, and houely appointeth this or that, as every mans deservings are, or as he thinketh it equity and justice. Concerning his repentance, this we ought to hold, that the same can no more be in God, than ignorance, errour, and weaknesse. For if no man doe wittingly and willingly throw himselfe into the case that he need to repent, we cannot say that God doth repent, but that we must also say, that God is ignorant what will come to passe, or that he cannot avoid it, or that he headlong and unadvisedly runneth into a purpose whereof he by and by fore-thinketh him. But that it is so farre from the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in the very mention making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at all, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted, that in the same Chapter they are both so joyned together, that the comparison doth very well bring the shew of repugnancie to agreement. His changing is figuratively spoken, that God repented that he had made Saul King, and by and by after it is added; The strength of Israel shall not lie, nor shall be moved with repenting. Because he is not a man that he may repent. In which words his unchangeablenesse is affirmed plainly without any figure. Therefore it is certaine that the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men is perpetual, and above all-repentance penitence. And that his constancie should not be doubtfull, his very aduersaries have bene compelled to beare him witnesse. For Balsam whether he would or no, could not chuse but burst out into this saying, that he is not like a man to lye: nor as a sonne of man to be changed, and that it is not possible that he should not doe that he hath said, and not fulfill whatsoeuer he hath spoken.

13. What meaneth then this name of repentance? even in the same sort that all the other phrasēs of speech which doe describe God unto us after the manner of men. For because our weaknesse doth not reach to his highnesse, that description of him which is taught us, was meet to be framed low to our capacity, that we might understand it. And this is the manner how to frame it low for us, to paint out himselfe not such a one as he is in himselfe, but such a one as he is perceived of us. Whereas he hit himselfe is without all moving of a troubled minde, he yet testifieth that he is angry with sinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angry, we ought not to imagine that there is any moving at all in him, but rather to consider that this speech is borrowed of our common sense, because God beareth a resemblance of one chafed and angry so oft as he exerciseth judgement: so ought we to understand nothing else by this word of Repentance but a changing of deedes, because men by changing of their deedes, are wont to declare that they dislike them. Because then every change among men is an amendment of that which misliketh them, an amendment commeth of repentance; therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God changeth in his works. In the meane time yet neither is his purpose nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but he followeth on with one continuall course that which hee had from eternitie fore seene, allowed, and decreed, howsoever the alteration seeme sudden in the eyes of men.

14. Neither doth the holy History shew that Gods decrees were repelled when it sheweth that the destruction was pardoned to the Ninivites which had bene before pronounced, and that the life of Ezechias was prolonged after warning given him, of death. They that so construe it are deceived in understanding of threatnings: which although they doe simply affirme, yet by the successe it shall be perceived that they contained a secret condition in them. For why did God send Jonas to the Ninivites to tell them aforehand of the ruine of their Citie? Why did he by Esay give Ezechias warning of death? For he might have brought to nought both him and them without sending them any word of their destruction. He meant therefore another thing, than to make them by fore-knowing of their death to see it comming a farre off. Even this he meant; not to have them destroyed, but to have them amended that they should not be destroyed. Therefore this that Jonas prophesied that Ninive should fall after forty dayes, was done to this end that it should not fall: That hope of longer life was cut off from Ezechias, was done for this purpose, that he might obtaine longer life. Now who doth not see that God meant by such threatnings to awake them to repentance, whom he made afraid, to the end that they might escape the judgement which they had deserved by their sinnes? If that be so agreed, the nature of the things themselves doth lead us to this, to understand in the simple threatening a secret implied condition, which is also confirmed by like examples. The Lord rebuking the King Abimelech for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, useth these words: Behold, thou shalt die for the woman that thou hast taken, for she hath a husband. But after hee had excused himselfe, God said thus: Restore the wife to her husband, for hee is a Prophet, and shall pray for thee that thou maist live: If not, know that thou shalt die the death, and all that thou hast. You see how in this first sentence he vehemently striketh his minde to bring him to be more heedfully bent to make amends, and in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: doe not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawne from the first purpose of God, by this that he made void the thing which he had before pronounced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternall ordinance, when in giving warning of the punishment he moveth those to repentance, whom his will is to spare, rather than varieth any thing in his will, no nor in his word, saving that he doth not expresse the same thing in syllables which is yet easie to understand. For that saying of Esay must needs remain true,

THE EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

That God doth use the service of wicked men, and so boweth their mindes to put his judgements in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

How God doth not onely permit but appoint the things to be done which wicked men doe.

Here ariseth a hard question out of other places, where it is said that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe and all the reprobate. For the sense of the flesh scarcely conceiveth how he working by them, should not gather some spot of their fault, yea, in his common working be free from all fault, and justly condemne his ministers. Upon this was devised the distinction betweene Doing and Suffering: because many have thought this doubt unpossibile to be dissolved: that both Satan and all the wicked are so under the hand and power of God, that he directeth their malice, unto what end it pleaseth him, and useth their wicked doings to the executing of his judgements. And their modestie were peradventure excusable, whom the shew of absurditie putteth in feare, if it were not so that they doe wrongfully with a lying defence goe about to deliver the justice of God from all unrightfull blame. It seemeth to them unreasonable, that man should by the will and commandement of God be made blinde, and so by and by be punished for his blindenesse. Therefore they seeke to escape by this shift, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the will of God. But he himselfe plainly pronouncing that he doth it, doth reject that shift. As for this that men doe nothing but by the secret commandement of God, and doe trouble themselves in vaine with deliberating, unlesse he doe by his secret direction stablish that which he hath before determined, it is proved by innumerable and plaine testimonies. It is certaine that this which we before alleaged out of the Psalme, that God doth all things that he will, belongeth to all the doings of men. If God be the certaine appointer of warre and peace, as it is there said, and that without exception: who dare say that men are carried causelessly with blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, and sitteth still? But in speciall examples will be more lightsome plainnesse. By the first Chapter of Iob we know that Satan doth no lesse appeare before God to receive his commandements than doe the Angels which doe willingly obey. Indeed it is after a divers manner and for a divers end: but yet so that he cannot goe about any thing but with the will of God. Although there seeme afterward to be added a bare sufferance of him to afflict the holy man: yet because that saying is true; The Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away, as it pleased God so is it come to passe: We gather that God was the author of that triall of Iob, whereof Satan and the wicked theeves were ministers. Satan goeth about to drive the holy man by desperation to madnesse. The Sabees cruelly and wickedly doe invade and rob his goods that were none of theirs. Iob acknowledgeth that he was by God stripped of all his goods, and made poore, because it so pleased God. Therefore whatsoever men or Satan himselfe attempt, yet God holdeth the sterne to turne all their travels to the executing of his judgements. It was Gods will to have the false King Achab deceived: the devill offered his service thereunto: he was sent with a certaine commandement to be a lying spirit in the mouth of all the Prophets. If the blinding and madnesse of Achab be the judgement of God, then the device of bare sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to say, that the Judge doth onely suffer and not also decree what he will have done, and command the ministers to put it in execution. It was the Jewes purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate and the souldiers to follow their raging lust, and yet in a solemne prayer the disciples doe confesse, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that which the hand and counsell of God had determined: even as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose and foreknowledge of God delivered to be slaine. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden, from the beginning did wittingly and willingly appoint that which the Jewes did execute, as in another place he rehearseth, that God which shewed before by all his Prophets that Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it.

Abolon

Abolon defiling his fathers bed with incestuous adultery, committed detestable wickednesse. Yet God pronounceth that this was his owne worke. For the words are these, Thou hast done it secretly, but I will doe it openly, and before the Sunne. Hieremie pronounceth that all the cruelty that the Chaldees used in Jurie, was the worke of God. For which cause Nebuchadnezar is called the servant of God, God every where cryeth out that with his hissing, with the sound of his trumpet, with his power and commandement the wicked are stirred up to warre. He calleth the Assyrian the rod of his wrath, and the axe that he moveth with his hand. The destruction of the holy Citie and ruine of the Temple he calleth his worke. David not murmuring against God, but acknowledging him for a righteous judge, yet confesseth that the curlings of Semei proceeded of the commandement of God. The Lord (such he) commanded him to curse. We often finde in the holy History, that whatsoever happeneth it commeth of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the sonnes of Heli, and very many things of like sort. They that be meanly exercised in the Scriptures doe see, that for shortnesse sake, I bring forth of many testimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainly enough, that they doe trifle and talke fondly, that thrust in a bare Sufferance in place of the Providence of God, as though God sate in a watch Tower waiting for the chances of Fortune, and so his judgements should hang upon the will of men.

2. Now as concerning secret motions, that which Salomon speaketh of the heart of a King, that it is bowed hither or thither as pleaseth God, extendeth surely to all mankind, and is as much in effect as if he had said, whatsoever we conceive in minde, is by the secret inspiration of God directed to his end. And truly if he did not worke in the mindes of men, it were not rightly said, that he taketh away the lip from the true speakers, and wisdom from aged men, that he taketh the heart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander where is no beaten way. And hereto belongeth that which we oft reade, that men are fearefull so farre forth as their hearts be taken with his feare. So David went out of the campe of Saul, and none was ware of it, because the sleepe of God was come upon them all. But nothing can be desired to be more plainly spoken, than where he so oft pronounceth, that he blindeth the eyes of men, and striketh them with giddinesse, that he maketh them drunke with the spirit of drowfinesse, casteth them into madnesse, and hardneth their hearts. These things also many doe referre to sufferance, as if in forsaking the reprobate he suffered them to be blinded by Satan. But that solution is too fond, forasmuch as the holy Ghost in plaine words expresth, that they are stricken with blindness & madnesse by the just judgement of God. It is said, that he hardned the heart of Pharao, also that he did make dull and strengthlen it. Some doe with an unfavorie cavillation mocke out these phrases of speech, because in another place it is said Pharao did harden his owne heart, there is his owne will set for the cause of his hardening. As though these things did not very well agree together, although in divers manners, that man while he is moved in working by God, doth also worke himselfe. And doe turne backe their objection against themselves. For if to harden doe signifie but a bare sufferance, then the very motion of obstinacie shall not be properly in Pharao. Now how weak and foolish were it so to expound, as if Pharao did onely suffer himselfe to be hardned? Moreover the Scripture cutteth off all occasions from such cavillations. For God saith, I will hold his heart. So of the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, Moses saith, that they went forth to battell, because the Lord had hardned their hearts. Which smething is repeated by another Prophet, saying: He turned their hearts that they should hate his people. Againe in Esay he saith, that he will send the Assyrians against the deceitfull nation, and will command them to carrie away the spoile, and violently take the prey, not meaning that he will teach wicked and obstinate men to obey willingly, but that he will bow them to execute his judgements, as if they did beare his commandements graven in their mindes. Whereby appeareth that they were moved by the certaine appointment of God. I grant that God doth oftentimes worke in the reprobate by Satans service as a meane, but yet so that Satan doth his office by Gods moving, and proceedeth so farre as is given him. The evill spirit troubled Saul, but it is said that it was of God, that we may know that the madnesse of Saul came of the just vengeance of God. It is also said, that the same Satan doth blinde

the mindes of the unfaithfull: but how so, but onely because the effectuall working of errour commeth from God himselfe, to make them believe lies that refuse to obey the truth? After the first manner of speaking it is said, If any Prophet shall speake lyingly, I God have deceived him. According to the other manner of speech it is said, that he giveth men into a reprobate minde, and to cast them into filthy desires, because he is the chiefe authour of his owne just vengeance, and Satan is but onely a minister thereof. But because we must entreat of this matter againe in the second booke, where we shall discourse of the free or bond will of man, I thinke I have already shortly spoken so much as this place required. Let this be the summe of all, that forasmuch as the will of God is said to be the cause of all things, his providence is thought the governesse in all purposes and works of men, so as it sheweth forth her force not onely in the elect, which are governed by the holy Spirit, but also compelleth the reprobate to obedience.

3. Forasmuch as hitherto I have recited onely such things as are written in the Scriptures, plainly and not doubtfully, let them that feare not wrongfully to slander the heavenly oracles, take heed what manner of judgement they take upon them. For if by fained pretending of ignorance they seeke a praise of modesty, what can be imagined more proudly done, than to set one small word against the authority of God? as I thinke otherwise, I like not to have this touched. But if they openly speake evil, what prevaile they with spitting against the heaven? But this is no new example of waywardnesse, because there have bene in all ages wicked and ungodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shall feele that thing indeed to be true, which long agoe the holy Ghost spake by the mouth of David, that God may overcome when he is judged. David doth by the way rebuke the madnesse of men in this fo unbridled licentiousnesse, that of their owne filthinesse they doe not onely argue against God, but also take upon them power to condemne him. In the meane time he shortly admonisheth, that the blasphemies which they vomit up against the heaven doe not reach unto God, but that he driving away the clouds of cavillations, doth brightly shew forth his righteousnesse, and also our faith (because being grounded upon the Word of God, it is above all the world) doth from her high place contemptuously looke downe upon these mists. For first, where they object, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrary wils, because he decreeth those things by secret purpose, which he hath openly forbidden by his law, that is easily wiped away. But before I answer it, I will once againe give the Readers warning that this cavillation is throwne out not against me, but against the holy Ghost, which taught the holy man Iob this confession: as it pleased God so it came to passe. When he was spoiled by thieves, he acknowledged in the injurie and hurt that they did him, the just scourge of God. What saith the Scripture in other places? The sons of Heley obeyed not their Father, because it was Gods will to kill them. Also another Prophet cryeth out, that God which sitteth in heaven doth whatsoever he will. And now I have shewed plainly enough that God is the authour of all those things which these judges would have to happen only by his idle sufferance. He testifieth that he createth light and darknesse, that he formeth good and evil, that no evil happeneth which he himselfe hath not made. Let them tell me, I beseech them, whether he doe willingly or against his will execute his owne judgements? But as Moses teacheth, that he which is slaine by the falling of an axe by chance, is delivered by God into the hand of the striker: so the whole Church saith in Luke, that Herod and Pilate conspired to doe those things which the hand and purpose of God had decreed. And truly if Christ were not crucified with the will of God, whence came redemption to us? And yet the will of God neither doth strive with it selfe, nor is changed, nor fainteth that he willeth not the thing that he will: but where it is but one and simple in him, it seemeth to us manifold, because according to the weaknes of our wit we conceive not how God in divers manner willeth and willeth not one selfe thing. Paul, after that he hath said that the calling of the Gentiles is a hidden mysterie, within a while after saith further, that in it was manifestly shewed the manifold wisdom of God: because for the dulnesse of our wit the wisdom of God seemeth to us manifold, or (as the old interpreter hath translated it) of many fashions: shall we therefore dreame that there is any variety in God himselfe, as though he either

changeth his purpose, or dissenteth from himselfe? Rather when we conceive not how God will have the thing to be done, which he forbiddeth to doe, let us call to minde our owne weaknesse, and therewithall consider that the light wherein he dwelleth, is not without cause called inaccessible, because it is covered with darknesse. Therefore all godly and sober men will easily agree to this sentence of Augustine, that sometime man with good will willeth that which God willeth not. As if a good sonne willeth to have his father to live, whom God will have to die. Againe it may come to passe, that man may will the same thing with an evill will, which God willeth with a good will. As if an evill sonne willeth to have his father to die, and God also willeth the same. Now the first of these two sonnes willeth that which God willeth not, and the other sonne willeth that which God also willeth, and yet the naturalnesse of the first sonne doth better agree with the will of God, although he willeth a contrary thing, than the unnaturalnesse of the other sonne which willeth the same thing. So great a difference is there what to will doth belong to man, and what to God, and to what end the will of every one is to be applied, to have it either allowed or disallowed. For those things which God willeth well he bringeth to passe by the evill wils of evill men. But a little before he had said, that the Angels Apostataes in their falling away, and all the reprobate, in as much as concerneth themselves, did that which God would not, but in respect of the omnipotencie of God, they could by no meanes so doe, because while they did against the will of God, the will of God was done upon them. Whereupon he crieth out; Great are the works of God, and ought to be sought out of all them that love him: that in marvellous manner the same thing is not done without his will which is also done against his will, because it could not be done if he did not suffer it; and yet he doth it not against his will but willingly: and he being good, would not suffer a thing to be done evill, unlesse for that he is omnipotent, he could of evill make good.

4. In the same manner is asoiled, or rather vanisheth away the other objection: that if God doe not onely use the service of wicked men, but also governeth their counsels and affections, he is the authour of all wicked doings, and therefore men are unworthily condemned, if they execute that which God hath decreed, because they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confound his will and commandment together, which it appeareth by innumerable examples to differ farre asunder. For though when Abolon abused his fathers wives, it was Gods will to punish Dauids adultery with that dishonour: yet he did not therefore command the wicked sonne to commit incest, unlesse perhaps you meane it in respect of David, as he speaketh of the railings of Semei. For when he confesserth that Semei railleth at him by the commandment of God, he doth not therein commend his obedience, as if that froward dogge did obey the commandment of God, but acknowledging his tongue to be the scourge of God, he patiently suffereth to be corrected. And this is to be holden in minde, that when God performeth by the wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret judgement, they are not to be excused, as though they did obey his commandment, which indeed of their owne evill lust they doe purposely breake. Now how that thing is of God, and is ruled by his secret providence, which men doe wickedly, the election of King Ieroboam is a plaine example, in which the rashnesse and madnesse of the people is severely condemned, for that they perverted the order appointed by God, and falsly fell from the house of David, and yet we know it was his will that he should be anointed. Whereupon in the very words of Osée there appeareth a certaine shew of repugnancie, that where God complained that that kingdome was erected without his knowledge, and against his will, in another place he saith, that he gave the kingdome to Ieroboam in his rage. How shall these sayings agree? that Ieroboam reigned not by God, and that he was made King by the same God? Even thus, because neither could the people fall from the house of David, but that they must shake off the yoke which God hath laid upon them: neither yet had God his liberty taken away, but that he might so punish the unthankfulnesse of Salomon. We see therefore how God in not willing false breach of alleagiance, yet to another end justly willeth a falling away from their Prince, whereupon Ieroboam beside all hope was by holy anointing driven to bee King. After this manner doth the holy History say, that there was an enemy raised up to spoile

Salomons sonne of part of his Kingdome. Let the Readers diligently weigh both these things, because it hath pleased God to have the people governed under the hand of one King. Therefore when it was divided in two parts, it was done against his will. And yet the division tooke beginning of his will. For surely whereas the Prophet both by words and ceremony of anointing did move Ieroboam when he thought of no such thing, to hope of the Kingdome, this was not done without the knowledge or against the will of God, which commanded it so to be done: and yet is the rebellion of the people justly condemned, for that as it were against the will of God, they fell from the posterity of David. In this maner it is also afterward further said, that where Rehoboam proudly despised the request of the people, this was done by God, to confirme the word which he had spoken by the hand of Ahiha his servant. Loe how against Gods will the sacred unitie is torne in sunder, and yet with the will of the same God ten tribes doe forsake Salomons sonne. Let us adde another like example. Where the people consenting, yea laying their hands unto it, the sonnes of Ahab were slaine, and all his offspring rooted out. Iehu said indeed truly, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the ground, but that he had done all that he had spoken by the hand of his servant Elias. And yet not unjustly he rebuketh the Citizens of Samaria, for that they had put their hands unto it. Are ye righteous, saith he? If I have conspired against my Lord, who hath killed all these? I have before (as I thinke) already declared plainly, how in one selfe worke both the fault of man doth bewray it selfe, and also the righteousness of God gloriously appeareth. And for modest wits this answer of Augustine shall alway suffice: whereas the Father delivered the Sonne, and Christ delivered his body, and Judas delivered the Lord: why in this delivering is God righteous, and man faulty? because in the same one thing which they did, the cause was not one, for which they did it. If any be more cumbred with this that we now say, that there is no consent, of God with man, where man by the righteous moving of God doth that which is not lawfull, let them remember that which Augustine saith in another place: Who shall not tremble at these judgements, where God worketh even in the hearts of evil men whatsoever he will, and yet rendreth to them according to their deservings? And truly in the falshood of Judas, it shall be no more lawfull to lay the blame of the wicked deed to God, because he himselfe willed him to be delivered, and did deliver him to death, then it shall be to give away the praise of our redemption to Judas. Therefore the same writer doth in another place truly tell us, that in this examination God doth not enquire what men might have done, or what they have done, but what their will wasto doe, that purpose and will may come into the account. They that thinke this hard, let them a little while consider, how tollerable their owne waywardnesse is, while they refuse a thing witnessed by plaine testimonies of Scripture, because it exceedeth their capacity, and doe finde fault that those things be uttered, which God, unlesse he had knowne them profitable to be knowne, would never have commanded to be taught by his Prophets and Apostles. For our being wise ought to be no more but to embrace with meeke willingness to learne, and that without exception, whatsoever is taught in the holy Scriptures. As for them that doe more srowardly outrage in pra-ting against it, sith it is evident that they babble against God, they are not worthy of a longer confutation.

Christian Religion, which intreateth of the

THE FIRST CHAPTER.

That by Adams sinne and falling away, mankinde became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate: wherein is intreated of Originall sinne.

Of without cause hath the knowledge of himselfe bene in the old Proverb so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all things that pertaine to the course of mans life, then much more shamefull is the not knowing of our selves: whereby it cometh to passe, that in taking counsell of any thing necessary, we be miserably dazed, yea, altogether blinded. But how much more profitable this lesson is, so much more diligently must we take heed, that we do not disorderly use it, as we see some of the Philosophers have done. For they in exhorting man to know himselfe, doe

*We must learne thoroughly to know our selves, that the consideration of the graces of God may make us thankfull and be beholding of our miseries
humble us.*

withall appoint this to be the end, why he should know himselfe, that he should not be ignorant of his owne dignity and excellencie: and nothing else doe they will him to behold in himselfe, but that whereby he may swell with vaine confidence, and be puffed up with pride. But the knowledge of our selves, first standeth in this point, that considering what was given us in creation, and how bountifullly God continueth his gracious favour toward us, we may know how great had bene the excellency of our nature, if it continued uncorrupted: and we may withall thinke upon this, that there is nothing in us of our owne, but that we have as it were gotten by borrowing all that God hath bestowed upon us, that we may alwayes hang upon him. Then, that we call to minde our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feeling whereof may throw downe all glorying and trust of our selves, and overwhelme us with shame, and truly humble us. For as God at the beginning fashioned us like his owne image, to the end to raise up our mindes both to the study of vertue, and to the meditation of eternall life, so lest the so great noblenesse of our kinde, which maketh us different from brut beasts, should be drowned with our slothfulnesse, it is good for us to know that we are therefore endued with reason and understanding, that in keeping a holy and honest

life, we should proceed on forward to the appointed end of blessed immortality. But the first dignity cannot come in our minde, but by and by on the other side the heave sight of our filthinesse, and shame doth thrust it selfe in presence, since we in the person of the first man are fallen from our first estate, whereupon groweth the hatred and loathing of our selves, and true humility, and there is kindled a new desire to seeke for God, in whom every of us may recover those good things, whereof we are found altogether void and empty.

2. This thing surely the truth of God appointeth to be sought in examining of our selves, I mean, it requireth such a knowledge as may both calke away from all confidence of our owne power, and making us destitute of all matter to glory upon, may bring us to submission. Which rule it behoveth us to keepe, if we will attaine to the true marke both of right knowledge and well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleasant is that other opinion that allureth us rather to consider our good things, than to looke upon our miserable needinesse and dishonour, which ought to overwhelm us with shame. For there is nothing that mans nature more coveteth, than to be stroked with flattery: and therefore when he heareth the gifts that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that side with over-much lightnesse of beleeve: whereby it is so much the lesse to be marvelled, that herein the greatest part of men have perniciously erred. For sith there is naturally planted in all mortall men a more than blinde love of themselves, they doe most willingly perswade themselves that there is nothing in them that they ought worthily to hate. So without any maintenance of other this most vaine opinion doth each where get credit, that man is abundantly sufficient of himselfe to make himselfe live well and blessedly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modestly, howsoever they grant somewhat to God, least they should seeme arrogantly to take all to themselves, yet they so part it, that the principall matter of glory and confidence alway remaineth with themselves. Now if there come talke, that with her allurements tickleth the pride that already of it selfe itcheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delight them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling most favourably advanced the excellencie of mans nature, so hath he beene accepted with the well liking rejoycement, in manner of all ages. But whatsoever such commendation there be of mans excellencie that teacheth man to rest in himselfe, it doth nothing but delight with that her sweetnesse, and indeed so deceiveth, that it bringeth to most wretched destruction all them that assent unto it. For to what purpose availeth it for us, standing upon all vaine confidence to devise, appoint, attempt and goe about those things that we thinke to be for our behoofe, and in our first beginning of enterprize to be forsaken and destitute of sound understanding and true strength, and yet to goe on boldly till we fall downe to destruction? But it cannot other wise happen to them that have affiance that they can doe any thing by their owne power. Therefore if any man give heed to such teachers that hold vs in considering onely our owne good things, he shall not profit in learning to know himselfe, but shall bee carried violently away into the worse kinde of ignorance.

3 Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doth agree with the common naturall meaning of all men, that the second part of wisdom consisteth in the knowledge of our selves, yet in the very manner of knowing there is much disagreement. For by the judgement of the flesh, a man thinketh that he hath then well searched himselfe, when trusting upon his owne understanding and integrity, hee taketh boldnesse and encourageth himselfe to doing the duties of vertue, and bidding battell to vices, travelleth with all his study to bend himselfe to that which is comely and honest. But he that looketh upon and trieth himselfe by the rule of Gods judgement, findeth nothing that may raise up his minde to good affiance: and the more inwardly that he hath examined himselfe, the more he is discouraged, till being altogether spoyled of all confidence he leaveth to himselfe nothing toward the well ordering of his life. And yet would not God have us to forget the first noblenesse that he gave to our father Adam, which ought of good right to awake us to the study of righteousnesse and goodnesse. For we cannot consider either our owne first estate, or to what end we are created, but we shall be pricked forward to study upon immortality, and to desire the Kingdome of God. But that consideration is so farre from putting us in courage, that rather discouraging us, it throweth us downe to humbleness. For what is that first estate of ours? even that from whence we are fallen. What is that end of our creation? even the same from which we are altogether turned away: so that loathing our owne miserable estate, we may groane for sorrow, and in groaning may also sigh for the losse of that dignity. But now when we say that man ought to behold nothing in himselfe that may make him bold courage: we meane that there is nothing in him upon assistance whereof he ought to be proud. Wherefore, if any list to heare what knowledge man ought to have of himselfe, let us thus divide it, that first he consider to what end he is created, and endued with gifts that are not to be despised, by which thought he may be stirred up to the meditation of the hearing of God and of the life to come. Then let him weigh his owne strength, or rather needie want of strength, by perceiving whereof he may lie in extreme confusion, as one utterly brought to nought. The first of these considerations tendeth to this end, that he may know what is his duty: and the other, how much he is able to doe towards the performing of it. We will entreat of them both, as the order of teaching shall require.

The true knowledge of our selves emboldeneth not, but casteth downe: it teacheth us what our duty is, and how unable we are to performe it.

4. But because it must needs be that it was not a light negligence, but a detestable wicked act which God so severely punished, we must consider the very forme of the same in the fall of Adam, that kindled the horrible vengeance of God upon all mankinde. It is a childish opinion that commonly hath bene received concerning the intemperance of gluttony, as though the summe and head of all vertues consisted in the forbearing of one onely fruit, when there flowed on every side store of all sorts of dainties that were to be desired, and when in that blessed fruitfulness of the earth, there was not onely plenty, but also variety to make fare for pleasure. Therefore we must looke further, because the forbidding him from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, was the triall of obedience, that Adam in obeying might prove that he was willingly subject to the government of God. And the name of the tree it selfe sheweth, that that commandment was given for none other end, than for this, that he contented with his owne estate, should not with wicked lust advance himselfe higher. But the promise whereby he was bidden to hope for eternall life, so long as he did not eat of the tree of life, and againe, the horrible threatning of death so soone as he should taste of the tree of knowledge of good and evil served to prove and exercise his Faith. Hereof it is not hard to gather by what meanes Adam provoked the wrath of God against himselfe. Augustine indeed saith not amisse when he saith, that pride was the beginning of all evils. For if ambition had not lifted up man higher than was lawfull and than was permitted him, he might have continued in his estate: but we must fetch a more full definition from the manner of the tentation that Moses describeth. For such the woman was with the deceit of the Serpent led away by infidelity, now it appeareth that disobedience was the beginning of the fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, teaching that all men were lost by one mans disobedience. But it is withall to be noted, that the first man fell from the subjection of God, for that he not onely was taken with the enticements of Satan, but also despising the truth, did turne out of the way to lying. And surely Gods Word being once despised, all reverence of God is shaken off. Because his majestie doth no other wayes abide in honour among us, nor the worship of him remaine inviolate, but while we hang upon his mouth. Therefore infidelity was the root of that falling away. But thereupon arose ambition and pride, to which was adjoynd unthankfulness, for that Adam in coveting more than was granted, did unreverently despise the so great liberality of God wherewith he was enriched. And this was a monstrous wickednesse, that the sonne of the earth thought it a small thing that hee was made after the likeness of God, unlesse he might also be made equall with God. If Apostasie be a filthy and detestable offence, whereby man draweth himselfe from the allegiance of his Creator, yea, outrageously shaketh off his yoke: then it is but vaine to extenuate the sinne of Adam. Albeit it was no simple Apostasie, but joynd with shamefull reproches against God, while they assented to the slanders of Satan, wherein he accused God of lying, envie, and niggardly grudging. Finally, infidelity opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obstinate rebellion, to make men cast away the feare of God, and throw themselves whither their lust carried them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly teach, that the gate of salvation is opened unto us, when at this day we receive the Gospell by our eares: even as by the same windowes, when they stood open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam would never have bene so bold, as to doe against the commandement of God, but for this, that he did not beleve his word. Truly this was the best bridle for the right keeping of all affections in good order, to thinke that there is nothing better than to keepe righteousnesse in obeying the commandements of God, and then that the chiefe end of happy life is to be beloved of him. He therefore being carried away with the blasphemies of the devill, did (as much as in him lay) extinguish the whole glory of God.

In Psal. 19.

Rom. 5. 19.

Rom. 8.

All Adams offspring through his sinne are made sinfull, not by imitation onely as Pelagius taught, but by propagation, receiving the contagion of sin and uncleannesse before they be-bold the light of this life.

5. As the spirituall life of Adam was, to abide joyned and bound to his Creator, so his alienation from him was the death of his soule. Neither is it marvell if he by his falling away, destroyed all his owne posterity, which perverted the whole order of nature in heaven and earth. All the creatures doe groane, saith Paul, being made subject to corruption against their will. If one should aske the cause: no doubt it is for that they beare part of that punishment that man deserved, for whose use they were created. Sith then the curse that goeth thorowout all the coasts of the world, proceeded from his fault both upward and downward, it is nothing against reason, if it spread abroad into all his issue. Therefore after that the heavenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone suffer this punishment, that in place of wisdom, strength, holinesse, truth, and justice, (with which ornaments he had bene clothed) there came in the most horrible pestilences, blindnesse, weaknesse, filthinesse, falshood, and injustice, but also he entangled and drowned his whole offspring in the same miserie. This is the corruption that commeth by inheritance, which the old writers called originall sinne, meaning by this word sinne, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they have had much contention, because there is nothing further off from common reason, than all men to be made guilty of one mans fault, and so the sinne to become common. Which seemeth to have bene the cause why the oldest Doctors of the Church did but darkly touch this point, or at the least did not set it out so plainly as was convenient. And yet that fearfulness could not bring to passe, but that Pelagius arose, whose prophane invention was that Adam sinned onely to his owne losse, and hurted not his posterity. So through this subtilty Satan went about by hiding the disease, to make it incurable. But when it was proved by manifest testimonie of Scripture, that sinne passed from the first man into all his posteritie, he brought this cavillation, that it passed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men travelled in this point, and above all other Augustine, to shew that we are corrupted not by forren wickednesse, but that we bring with us from the wombe of our mother a viciousnesse planted in our begetting, which to deny was too great shamefulnessse. But the rashnesse of the Pelagians and Celestians will not seeme marvelous to him, which by the writings of the holy man shall perceive, how shamelesse beafts they were in all other things. Surely it is not doubtfully spoken that David confesseth that he was begotten in iniquities, and by his mother conceived in sinne. He doth not there accuse the finnes of his father or mother, but the better to set forth the goodnesse of God toward him, he beginneth the confession of his owne wickednesse at his very begetting. Forasmuch as it is evident that that was not peculiar to David alone, it followeth that the common estate of all mankind is noted under his example. All we therefore that descend of uncleane seed, are borne infested with the contagion of sinne, yea, before that we see the light of this life, we be in the sight of God filthy and spotted. For who could give cleane of the uncleannesse? not one: as it is in the booke of Iob.

Pf. 1. 9. 7.

Job. 14. 4.

In Adam our nature being corrupted commeth into us such as he by sin had made it: whereupon it

6. Wee heare that the uncleannesse of the parents so passeth into the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we shall not finde the beginning unlesse we goe up to the first parent of all us, to the Well head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not onely the progenitor, but also the root of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankind worthily corrupted: which the Apostle maketh plaine by comparing of him and Christ. As (saith he)

by one man sinne entred into the whole world, and death by sinne, and so death went over all men, forasmuch as all have sinned : so by the grace of Christ, righteousnesse and life is restored unto us. What will the Pelagians here prate ? that Adams sinne was spread abroad by imitation ? Then have we no other profit by the righteousnesse of Christ, but that he is an example set before us to follow ? Who can abide such robbery of Gods honour ? If it be out of question that Christs righteousnesse is ours by communication, and thereby life : it followeth also that they both were so lost in Adam, as they bee recovered in Christ : and that sinne and death so crept in by Adam, as they are abolished by Christ. The words are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, as by the disobedience of Adam they were made sinners : and that therefore betweene them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping us in his destruction, destroyed us with him, and Christ with his grace restored us to salvation. In so cleere light of truth, I thinke we need not a longer or more laborious prooffe. So also in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, when he goeth about to stablish the godly in the trust of the resurrection, he sheweth that the life is recovered in Christ, that was lost in Adam, he that pronounceth that we are all dead in Adam, doth also therewithall plainly testifie, that we are infected with the filth of sinne. For damnation could not reach unto them that were touched with no guiltinesse of iniquitie. But it can be no way plainlier understood what he meareth than by relation of the other member of the sentence; where he teacheth that hope of life is restored in Christ. But it is well enough knowne that the same is done no other way, than when by marvellous manner of communicating, Christ powreth into us the force of his righteousnesse. As it is written in another place, that the Spirit is life unto us, for righteousnesse sake. Therefore we may no otherwise expound that which is said that we are dead in Adam, but thus, that he in sinning did not onely purchase mischief and ruine to himselfe, but also threw downe our nature headlong into like destruction. And that not onely to the corruption of himselfe, which pertaineth nothing to us, but because he infected all his seed with the same corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwise the saying of Paul could not stand true, that all are by nature the sonnes of wrath, if they were not already accursed in the wombe. And it is easily gathered that nature is there meant not such as it was created by God, but such as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not convenient that God should be made the Authour of death. Adam therefore so corrupted himselfe, that the infection passed from him into all his off-spring. And the heavenly Judge himselfe Christ, doth also plainly enough pronounce, that all are borne evill and corrupted, where he teacheth, that whatsoever is borne of flesh, is flesh, and that therefore the gate of life is closed against all men, untill they be begotten againe.

7. Neither for the understanding thereof is any curious disputation needfull, which not a little cumbered the old writers, whether the Soule of the Sonne doe proceed by derivation from the Soule of the Father, because in it the infection principally resteth. We must be contented with this, that such gifts as it pleased the Lord to have bestowed upon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam lost them after he had received them, he lost them not onely from himselfe, but also from us all. Who shall be carefull of a conveyance from soule to soule, when he shall heare that Adam received these ornaments which he lost, no lesse for us than for himselfe ? that they were not given to one man alone, but assigned to the whole nature of man ? Therefore it is not against reason, if he being spoiled, nature be left naked and poore : if he being infected with sinne, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten root arose up rotten branches, which sent their rottenesse into the other twiggies that sprung out of them. For so were the children corrupted in the Father, that they also were infective to their children : that is to say, so was the beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continuall flowing from one to another, it is conveyed from the ancestors into the posterity. For the infection hath not her cause in the substance of the flesh or of the Soule, but because it was so ordained of God, that such gifts as he had given to the first man, man should both have them, and lose them as well for himselfe as for his. As for this that the Pelagians doe cavill, that it is not likely that the children followeth, that we are dead because he was dead of whom we are : sonnes of wrath because they were : that begat us : flesh because we are borne of flesh.

Whether we have our soules or no, by derivation from our parents, as we have our bodies, is a needlesse question in this case. children doe take corruption from godly parents, sith they ought rather to be sanctified by their cleannesse, that is easily confuted. For they descend not of their spirituall regeneration, but of their carnall generation. Therefore as Augustine saith, whether the unbeliever be condemned as guilty, and the bekeever quit as innocent, they both doe beget not innocents, but guilty, because they beget of the corrupted nature. Now whereas they doe in manner partake of the parents holinesse, that is the speciall blessing of the people of God, which proveth not but that the first and universall curse of mankind went before. For of nature is guiltinesse, and sanctification is of supernaturall grace.

8. And to the end that these things be not spoken of a thing uncertaine and unknowne, let us define Originall sinne. But yet I meane not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but will bring forth one onely, which I thinke to be most agreeable with truth. Originall sinne therefore seemeth to be the inheritable descending perversnesse and corruption of our nature, powred abroad into all the parts of the soule, which first maketh us guilty of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth these workes in us, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the flesh: and that it is properly that Paul oftentimes calleth sinne. And these workes that arise out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, thefts, hatreds, murders, banquettings, after the same manner he calleth the fruits of sinne, albeit they are likewise called sinnes both commonly in the Scriptures, and also by the same Paul himselfe. Therefore these two things are distinctly to be noted: that is, that being so in all parts of our nature corrupted and perverted, we are now even for such corruption onely holden worthily damned and convicted before God, to whom is nothing acceptable but righteousnesse, innocencie and purenesse. And yet is it not that bond in respect of anothers fault. For where it is said, that by the sinne of Adam we are made subject to the judgement of God, it is not so to be taken, as if we innocent and undeserving did beare the blame of his fault. But because of his offending we are all clothed with the curse, therefore it is said that he hath bound us. Nevertheless, from him not the punishment onely came upon us, but also the infection distilled from him, abiderh in us, to the which the punishment is justly due. Wherefore howsoever Augustine doth oftentimes call it anothers sinne, (to shew the more plainly, that it is conveyed into us by propagation) yet doth he also affirme with all that it is proper to every one. And the Apostle himselfe expressly witnesseth, that therefore death came upon all men, because all men have sinned, and are wrapped in Originall sinne, and defiled with the spots thereof. And therefore the very infants themselves, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bound, not by anothers, but by their owne fault. For although they have not as yet brought forth the fruits of their owne iniquity, yet they have the seed thereof inclosed within them: yea, their whole nature is a certaine seed of sinne: therefore it cannot but be hatefull and abominable to God. Whereupon followeth, that it is properly accounted sinne before God: for there could be no guiltinesse without sinne. The other point is, that this perversnesse never ceaseth in us, but continually bringeth forth new fruits, even the same workes of the flesh which we have before described: like as a burning furnace bloweth out flame and sparkles, or as a spring doth without ceasing cast out water. Therefore they which have defined Originall sinne, to be a lacking of Originall righteousnesse which ought to have beene in us, although indeed they comprehend all that is in the thing it selfe: yet they have not fully enough expressed the force and efficacie thereof. For our nature is not onely bare and empty of goodnesse, but also is so plenteous and fruitfull of all evils, that it cannot be idle. They that have said, that it is a concupisence, have used a word not very farre from the matter, if this were added, which is not granted by the most part, that whatsoever is in man, even from the understanding to the will, from the soule to the flesh, is corrupted and stuffed full with this concupisence: or, to end it shorter, that whole man is of himselfe nothing else but concupisence.

9. * Wherefore, I have said that all the parts of the soule are possessed of sinne sith Adam fell away from the fountaine of righteousnesse. For not onely the inferiour appetite allured him, but wicked impiety possessed the very castell of his minde, and pride pride peirced to the innermost part of his heart. So that it is a fond and foolish thing, to reſtraine the corruption that proceeded from thence, onely to the ſenſuall motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine nourture that allureth, ſtirreth and draweth to ſinne onely that part, which among them is called Senſualitie. Wherein Peter Lombard hath diſcloſed his groſſe ignorance, which ſeeking and ſearching for the place of it, ſaith that it is in the fleſh, as Paul witneſſeth, not properly indeed, but becauſe it more appeareth in the fleſh, as though Paul did meane onely a part of the ſoule, and not the whole nature which is in compariſon ſet againſt ſupernaturall grace. And Paul there taketh away all doubt: teaching that corruption reſteth not in one part alone: but that nothing is pure and cleane from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, he doth not onely condemne the inordinate motions of appetites that appeare, but ſpecially travelleth to prove that the underſtanding minde is ſubject to blindneſſe, and the heart to perverneſſe. And the ſume third Chapter to the Romans is nothing elſe but a deſcription of Originall ſinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the ſpirit which is compared with the old man and the fleſh, doth not onely ſignifie the grace whereby the inferior or ſenſuall part of the ſoule is amended, but alſo containeth a full reformation of all the parts. And therefore Paul doth command, not onely that our groſſe appetites bee brought to naught, but alſo that we our ſelves be renewed in the ſpirit of our minde, as likewiſe in another place hee biddeth us to bee transformed in newneſſe of minde. Whereupon followeth, that the ſame part, wherein moſt of all ſhineth the excellencie and nobleneſſe of the ſoule, is not onely wounded, but alſo ſo corrupted, that it needeth not onely to be healed, but in manner to put on a new nature. How farre ſinne poſſeſſeth both the underſtanding minde and the heart, wee will ſee hereafter. Here I onely purpoſed ſhortly to touch that the whole man from the head to the foote is ſo overwhelmed as with an overflowing of water, that no part of him is free from ſinne and that therefore whatſoever proceedeth from him is accounted for ſinne, as Paul ſaith, that all the affections of the fleſh or thoughts are enmities againſt God, and therefore death,

10. Now let them goe, that preſume to make God author of their ſinnes, becauſe we ſay that men are naturally ſinnefull. They doe wrongfully ſeek the worke of God in their owne filthineſſe, which they ought rather to have ſought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet ſound and uncorrupted. Therefore our deſtruction commeth of the fault of our owne fleſh and not of God, for aſmuch as wee periſhed by no other meane but by this, that wee degenerated from our firſt eſtate. But yet let not any man heere murmur and ſay, that God might have better foreſcene for our ſalvation, if he had provided that Adam ſhould not have fallen. For this objection both is to bee abhorred of all godly mindes, for the too much preſumptuous curioſitie of it, and alſo pertaineth to the ſecret of predeſtination, which ſhall after bee entreated of in place convenient. Wherefore let us remember that our fall is to bee imputed to the corruption of nature, that we accuſe not God himſelfe the author of nature. True indeed it is, that the ſame deadly wound ſticketh faſt in nature: but it is much materiall to know, whether it came into nature from elſewhere, or from the beginning hath reſted in it. But it is evident that the wound was given by ſinne. Therefore there is no cauſe why we ſhould complaine but of our ſelves: which thing the Scripture hath diligently noted. For Eccleſiaſtes ſaith: This have I found, that God hath made man righteous, but they have ſought many inventions. It appeareth that the deſtruction of good is to be imputed only to himſelfe, for aſmuch as having gotten uprightneſſe by the goodneſſe of God, he by his owne madneſſe is fallen into vanity.

11. We ſay therefore that man is corrupted with faultineſſe naturall, but ſuch as proceeded not from nature. We denie that it proceeded from nature, to make it appeare that it is rather a qualitie come from ſome other thing, which is happened to a man, than a ſubſtantiall propertie that hath bene put into him from the beginning. Yet wee call it Naturall, that no man ſhould thinke that every man getteth it by evill cuſtome, whereas it holdeth all men bound by inheritably deſcending right: And this we do not of our owne heads without authoritie. For, for the ſame cauſe the Apoſtle teacheth, that we are all by nature the children of wrath. How could God, whom all his meaneſt workes doe pleaſe, be wrathfull againſt the nobleſt of all his creatures? But hee is rather wrathfull againſt the corruption of his worke, then againſt his worke it ſelfe. Therefore if, for that mans nature is corrupted, man is not unſuly ſaid to be by nature abhominable to God, it ſhall be alſo not unaply called naturally perverſe and corrupted. As Auguſtine feareth not in reſpect of nature corrupted, to call the finnes naturall which doe neceſſarily raigne in our fleſh where the grace of God is abſent. So vaniſheth away the fooliſh trifling deviſe of the Manichees, which when they imagined an evilneſſe having ſubſtance in man, preſumed to forge for him a new Creator, leaſt they ſhould ſeeme to aſſigne to the righteous God the cauſe and beginning of evil.

We are termed corrupt by nature not becauſe God hath put corruption as a naturall qualitie in vs.

THE SECOND CHAPTER.

That man is now ſpoiled of the Freedom of will, and made ſubject to miſerable bondage.

The doctrine which concerneth
the bondage of our will, muſt not make us ſtoobyll unto good things, as if they did not appertaine unto us, but rather bumble and care-full that knowing our owne weaknes, we preſume not to truſt
unto our ſelves.

Sith we have ſeene, that the dominion of ſinne, ſince the time that it held the firſt ſman bound unto it, doth not onely raigne in all mankind, but alſo wholly poſſeſſeth every ſoule: now muſt we more neerely examine, ſince we are brought into that bondage, whether we be ſpoiled of all Freedom or no: and if yet there remaine any parcell, how farre the force thereof proceedeth. But to the end that the truth of this queſtion may more eaſily appeare unto us, I will by the way ſet up a marke, whereunto the whole ſumme may be directed. And this ſhall bee the beſt way to avoide error, if the dangers be conſidered that are like to fall on both ſides. For when man is put from all uprightneſſe, by and by he thereby taketh occaſion of ſlothfulneſſe: and becauſe it is ſaid, that by himſelfe he can doe nothing to the studie of righteousneſſe, forthwith he neglecteth that wholly, as if it pertained nothing unto him. Againe, hee can preſume to take nothing upon himſelfe, be it never ſo litle, but that both Gods honour ſhall be thereby taken from him, and man himſelfe be overthrowne with raſh confidence. Therefore to the end we ſtrike not upon theſe rockes, this courſe is to bee kept, that man being enformed that there remaineth in him no goodneſſe, and being on every ſide compaſſed about with moſt miſerable neceſſity, may yet bee taught to aſpire to the goodneſſe whereof he is void, and to the libertie whereof he is deprived, and may be more ſharply ſtirred up from ſlothfulneſſe, than if it were ſaigned that hee is furniſhed with greateſt power. How neceſſarie this ſecond point is, every man ſeeth. The firſt, I ſee is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being ſet out of controverſie, it ought then plainly to ſtand for truth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his owne, as far as it behooveth that he be throwne downe from falſe boaiſting of himſelfe. For if it were not granted to man to glory in himſelfe even at that time, when by the bountyfullneſſe of God, he was garniſhed with moſt ſingular ornaments, how much ought he now to be humbled, ſith for his unthankfulneſſe he is thruſt downe from high glorie into extreame ſhame? At that time, (I ſay) when he was advanced to the higheſt degree of honour, the Scripture attributeth nothing elſe unto him, but that he was created after the image of God, whereby it ſecretly teacheth, that man was bleſſed, not by his owne good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth now, but that he being naked and deſtitute of all glory, doe acknowledge God, to whoſe liberalitie he could not be thankfull when he flowed full of the riches of his grace: and that now at length with confeſſion of his owne povertie hee glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Alſo it is as much for our profit, that all praiſe of wiſdome and ſtrength bee taken from us; as it pertaineth to the glory of God that they joyne our ruine with the robbie of God, that give unto us any thing more than that which is true. For what is elſe done when we are taught to fight of our owne force, but that we be liſted up on hie on a ſtaffe of a reede, that it may by and by breake, and we fall to the ground? Albeit, our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the ſtaffe of a reede. For it is but ſmoke all that vaine men have imagined and doe babble of them. Wherefore not without cauſe is this excellent ſentence oft repeated by Auguſtine, that Free will is rather throwne throwne downe headlong, than stablished by them that defend it. This I thought needfull to speake before, as by way of Preface for many mens sakes, which when they heare mans power overthrowne from the ground, that the power of God may be builded in man, doe much hate this manner of disputing as dangerous, much more superfluous, which yet appeareth to bee both in religion necessarie, and for us most profitable.

2. Whereas we have a litle before said, that in the understanding minde, and in the heart are placed the power of the soule, now let us consider what they both are able to doe. The Philosophers indeed with great consent doe imagine that in the understanding minde sitteth reason, which like a lampe giveth light to all counsels, and like a Queene governeth the Will; for they say that it is so endued with divine light, that it can give good counsell, and so excelleth in lively force that it is able well to governe. On the other side, that sense is dull and bleare eyed, that it alway creepeth on the ground, and walloweth in grosse objects, and never lifteth up it selfe to true insight. That the Appetite, if it can abide to obey Reason, and doe not yeeld it selfe to sense to bee subdued, is scarrid on to the studie of vertues, holdeth on the right way, and is transformed into will: but if it give it selfe subject into the bondage of sense, it is by it corrupted and perverted, so that it degendeth into lust. And whereas by their opinion there doe sit in the soule those powers that I have spoken of before, understanding, sense, Appetite or will, which word will is now more commonly used, they say that understanding is endued with reason, the best governess toward good and blessed life, so that it doe hold it selfe within his owne excellencie, and shew forth the force that is naturally given it. But that inferior motion of it, which is called sense, wherewith man is drawne to error and deceit, they say to be such, that it may be tamed with the rod of reason, and by litle and litle be vanquished. They place will in the middt betwene reason and sense, as a thing at her owne ordering, and having libertie whether it list to obey to reason, or give forth it selfe to be ravished by sense.

3. Sometime indeed they doe not denie, being overcome by very experience, how hardly man stablisheth reason to raigene as Queene within himselfe, while sometime he is tickled with entisements of pleasure, sometime deceived with false semblance of good things. sometimes importunately stricken with immoderate affections, and violently haled out of the way as it were with ropes or strings of sinewes, as Plato saith. For which reason Cicero saith that these sparkes given by nature, are with perverse opinions and evill manners by and by quenched: But when such diseases have once gotten places in the mindes of men, they grant that they doe more outrageously overflow, than that they easily may be restrained: and they sticke not to compare them to wilde horses which throwing away reason as it were casting the Chariot driver, do range unruledly and without measure. But this they make no question of, that vertues and vices are in our owne power. For if (say they) it be in our choise to doe this or that, then is it also in our choise not to doe. Now if it be in our choise not to doe, then is it also to doe, but of free choise we seeme to doe those things that wee doe, and to forbear those things that we forbear. Therefore if we doe any good thing when we list, we may likewise leave it undone: if we doe any evill, wee may also eschew the same. Yet some of them have burst forth into so great licentiousnesse, that they have boasted that it is indeed Gods gift that we live, but our owne that we live well and holily. And thence cometh that saying of Cicero in the person of Cotta: because every man himselfe getteth vertue to himselfe therefore never any of the wise men did thanke God for it. For (saith he) for vertue we be praised, and in vertue we glorie, which should not be if it were the gift of God, and not of our selves. And a litle after: This is the judgement of all men that Fortune is to be ascribed of God, but wisdom to be taken of himselfe. This therefore is the summe of the opinion of all the Philosophers: that the reason of mans understanding is sufficient for aright governance: that Will being subject to it, is indeed moved by Sense to evill things. But even as it hath free election, so can it not be stopped, but that it follow reason for her guide in all things.

4. Among the Ecclesiasticall writers, albeit there have beene none that did not acknowledge both that the soundnesse of reason in man hath beene sore wounded by sinne, and his will exceedingly entangled with perverse desires, yet many of them have too much assented to the Philosophers, of which the ancient, as I thinke, did so much advance the strength of man upon this consideration, least if they should have expressly confessed his weaknesse, first they should have made the Philosophers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them: and then lest they should give to the flesh, which of it selfe was dull to goodnesse, a new occasion of slothfulness. Therefore because they would not teach any thing that were an absurdity in the common judgement of men, their studie was to make the doctrine of the Scripture halfe to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that second point, nor to make place for slothfulness, appeareth by their owne words. Chrystome hath in one place: Because God hath put good and evill things in our owne power, he hath given us Freedom of election, and he withholdeth not the unwilling, but embraceth the willing. Again, oftentimes he that is evill, if he will is turned into good, and he that is good by slothfulness falleth and becommeth evill, because God made our nature to have freewill, and he layeth not necessitie upon us, but giving convenient remedies, suffereth all to lie in the minde of the patient. Again, As unlesse wee bee holpen by the grace of God, we can never doe any thing well: so unlesse we bring that which is our owne, we cannot obtaine the favour of God. And hee had said before, that it should not be all of Gods helpe, but we must also bring somewhat. And this is commonly a familiar word with him, let us bring that which is ours, God will supply the rest. Wherewith agreeth that which Hierome saith, that it is our part to begin, but Gods to make an end: our part to offer what we can, his to fulfill what we cannot. You see now what in these sayings they gave to man toward the studie of vertue more than was meete, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dulnesse that was naturally in us. But if they did prove that in it onely wee sinned, with what apt handeling they have done the same, we shall after see. Surely that the sayings which we have rehearsed are most false, shall by and by appeare. Now although the Grecians more than other and among them principally Chrystome have passed measure in advancing the power of mans will, yet all the old writers, except Augustine, doe in this point so either varie, or waer, or speake doubtfully, that in manner no certaintie can be gathered of their writings. Therefore we will not rarrie upon exact reckoning of every one of their sayings, but here and there wee will touch out of every one of them so much as the plaine declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them that followed after, while everie one for himselfe sought praise of wit, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by little and little one after another into worke and worke, till it came so farre, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted onely in his sensuall part, and to have reason altogether, and will for the more part uncorrupted. In the meane time this flew about in all mens mouthes, that the naturall gifts were corrupted in man, and the supernaturall were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, scarcely the hundreth man did even slightly understand. As for my part, if I would plainly shew of what sort is the corruption of nature, I could be easily contented with these words, But it is much materiall that it be heedfully weighed what a man, being in all parts of his nature corrupted and spoyled of his supernaturall gifts, is able to doe. They therefore which boasted themselves to be the disciples of Christ, spake of this matter too much like Philosophers. For the name of Free-will still remained among the Latines, as if man had still abiden in uncorrupted state. And the Grecians were not ashamed to use the word much more arrogantly: For they called it Autexousion, that is to say, of her owne power, as if a man had the power himselfe, Because therefore all, even to the common people, had received this principle, that man was endued with Free-will, and many of them that would seeme excellent, cannot tell how far it extendeth: first let us search out the force of the word it selfe, and then let us proceed on by the simplicities of the Scripture, to shew what man is able to doe of his own nature, toward good or evill. What Free-will is, whereas it is a word commonly found in all mens writings, yet few have desired. Yet it seemeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he said that it is a power of reason to discern good or evill, and a power of will to choosē either of them.

And

And Augustine varieth not from him, when he teacheth, that it is a power of reason and will, whereby good is chosen while grace assisteth, and evil when grace ceaseth. Bernard, while he meaneth to speake more subtilly, speaketh more darkly, which saith, that it is a consent by reason of the libertie of will that cannot be lost, and the judgement of reason that cannot be avoided. And the definition of Anselmus is not familiar, enough, which saith that it is a power to keepe uprightnesse for it selfe. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Schoolemea, have rather embraced Augustines definition, because it both was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they saw that will was not sufficient for it selfe. But they bring also of their owne such things as they thought either to be better, or to serve for plainer declaration. First, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choise, is rather to bee referred to reason whose part is to discern betweene good and evil things: and the adjective Free, pertaieth properly to will, which may be turned to either of both. Wherefore, such Freedom properly belongeth to will, Thomas saith, that it would very well agree, if Free will be called a power of choosing, which being mixt of understanding and appetite, doth more incline to appetite. Now have we in what things they teach that the power of Free will consisteth, that is to say, in reason and will. Now remaineth that we shortly see how much they giue to either part.

5. They are commonly wont to make subject to the free determination of man things mean, that is, which belong not to the kingdom of God: but they do referre true righteousies to the speciall grace of God and spirituall regeneration. Which thing while the Author of the booke, Of the calling of the Gentiles meaneth to shew, hee reckoneth up three sorts of Wills, the first Sensitive, the second Naturall, the third Spirituall, of which he saith, that man hath the first two at his owne libertie, the last is the worke of the holy Ghost in man. Which whether it be true or not, shall be entreated in place fit for it, for now my purpose is but shortly to rehearse the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Hereby it commeth to passe, that when writers speake of Free-will, they principally seeke not what it is able to doe to civill or outward doings, but what it can do to the obedience of the law of God. Which latter point I thinke so to be the principall, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I trust, I shall shew a good reason. There hath bene a distinction received in Schooles, that reckoneth up three sorts of freedoms, the first, from necessity, the second from sinne, the third from inerie. Of which the first so naturally sticketh fast in man, that it can by no meane be taken away: the other two are lost by sinne. This distinction I willingly receive, saying that there necessitie is wrongfully confounded with compulsion: betweene which two how much difference there is, and how necessarie that difference is to be considered, shall appeare in another place.

Lib. 2. dist. 26.

6. If this be received, then shall it be out of controversie that man hath not free will to doe good workes, unlesse he be holpen by grace, and that by speciall grace, which is given to the onely elect by regeneration. For I doe not passe upon these phrentike men, which habble that grace is offered generally and without difference. But this is not yet made plaine, whether he be altogether deprived of power to doe well, or whether he have yet some power, although it be but little and weak, which by it selfe indeed can doe nothing, but by helpe of grace doth also her part. While the Master of the Sentences goeth about to make that plaine, he saith there are two sorts of grace necessary for us, whereby we may be made meete to doe a good worke: the one they call a working grace, whereby we effectually will to doe good: the other a Together working grace, which followeth good will in helping it. In which division this I mislike, that while he giveth to the grace of God an effectuall desire of good, he secretly sheweth his meaning that man already of his owne nature, after a certaine manner, desireth good though uneffectually. As Bernard affirming that good will is indeed the worke of God, yet this he granteth to man, that of his owne motion he desireth that good will. But this is farre from the meaning of Augustine, from whom yet Lombard would seeme to have borrowed this division. In the second part of the division, the doubtfulnesse of speech offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong exposition. For the thought that we do therefore work together with the second grace of God, because it lieth in our power, either to make void the first grace by refusing it, or to confirme it by obediently following it. Whereas the authour of the booke, Of the calling of the Gentiles, doth thus expresse it, that it is free from them that use the judgement of reason, to depart from grace, that it may bee worthie reward not to have departed, and that the thing which could not be done but by the working together of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merits, by whose will it was possible to have not bene done. These two things I had a will to note by the way, that now, Reader, thou maiest see how much I dissent from the soundest sort of the Schoolemen. For I doe much farther differ from the later Sophisters, even so much as they be farther gone from the ancient time. But yet somewhat, after such a sort as it is, we perceive by this division, after what manner they have given free will to man. For at length Lombard saith, that wee have not free will therefore, because we are alike able either to doe or to thinke good and evill, but onely that we are free from compulsion: which freedome is not hindred, although wee be perverse and the bondmen of sinne, and can doe nothing but sinne.

7. Therefore, man shall be said to have free will after this sort, not because hee hath a free choice as well of good as of evill, but because he doth evill by Will and not by compulsion. That is very well said: but to what purpose was it: to garnish so small a matter with so proud a title? A goodly liberty forsooth, if man be not compelled to serve sinne: so is he yet a willing servant that his will is holden fast bound with the fetters of sinne. Truly I doe abhorre striving about words wherewith the Church is vainly wearied, but I thinke that such words are with great religious carefulnesse to be taken heed of, which sound of any absurditie, specially where the error is hurtfull. How few I pray you are there, which when they heare that free will is assigned to man, doe not by and by conceive, that he is Lord both of his owne minde and will, and that hee is able of himselfe to turne himselfe to whether part he will? But some one will say: that perill shall be taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bent to fallitie, hee will sooner conceive an error of one little word, than a truth out of a long tale. Of which thing we have a more certaine experience in this very word, than is to be wished. For omitting that exposition of the old writers, all they in manner that came after, while they sticked upon the naturall signification of the word, have bene carried into a trust of themselves that bringeth them to destruction.

8. But if the autoritie of the Fathers doe move us, they have indeed continually the word in their mouth: but they do withall declare, how much they esteeme the use of it. First of all Augustine, which sicketh not to call it Bond will. In one place he is angry with them that deny free will: but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he saith onely, Let not any man be so bold to denie the freedome of will, that he go about to excuse sinne. But surely in another place he confesseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost, forasmuch as it is subject to lusts, that do binde and conquer it. Again that when will was overcome with sinne, whereinto it fell, nature began to want freedome. Again that man having ill used his free will, lost both himselfe and it. Again, free will is become captive, that it can doe nothing toward righteousness. Again, that it cannot be free, which the grace of God hath not made free. Again, that the justice of God is not fulfilled when the law commandeth, and man doth of his owne strength but when the holy Ghost helpeth, and mans will not free, but made free by God, obeyeth. And of all these things he shortly rendereth a cause, when in another place he writeth, that man received great force of free will when he was created, but he lost it by sinning. Therefore in another place, after that he had shewed that free will is established by grace, hee sharply inveiyeth against them that take it upon them without grace. Why therefore (saith he) dare wretched men either be proud of free will before that they be made free, or of their owne strength if they be already made free? And they marke not that in the very name of free will, is mention of freedome. But where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedome. If then they bee the bondmen of sinne, why do they boast them of free will? For of whom a man is overcome, to him he is made bond. But if they bee made free, why doe they boast them as of their owne worke? Are they so free, that they will not be his bondservants, which saith:

Without

Without me ye can doe nothing? Beside that also in another place hee seemeth sportingly to mocke at the use of that word, when he said, that will was indeed free, but not made free, free to righteousnesse, but the bondservant of sinne. Which saying in another place he repeateth and expoundeth. that man is not free from righteousnesse, but by choise of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Saviour. He that doth rellitifie, that the freedome of man is nothing else but a free making or manumission from righteousnesse, seemeth trimly to mocke at the vaine name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the use of this word with no evill signification, hee shall not bee troubled by me for so doing. But because I thinke it cannot be kept without great perill, and that it should turne to a great benefit to the Church, if it were abolished: neither will I my selfe use it, and I would wish other, if they aske me counsell, to forbear it.

9. I may seeme to have brought a great prejudice against my selfe, which have confessed, that all the ecclesiastical writers, except Augustine, have spoken so doubtfully or diversly in this matter, that no certaintie can be had out of their writings. For some will so construe this, that I meant therefore to thrust them from giving any voice herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other end but this, that I simply and in good faith would have godly wits provided for, which if they wait upon those mens opinions in this point, they shall alway waver uncertaine. In such sort doe they sometime teach, man being spoiled of all strength of free will, to flee to grace only: sometime they furnish or seeme to furnish him with his owne armour. But it is not hard to make appeare, that in such doubtfulness of speech, they nothing, or very little esteeming mans strength, have given the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I heere recite certaine sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainly taught. For what meaneth that saying of Cyprian which Augustine so often repeateth, that wee ought to glorie of nothing, because we have nothing of our owne, but that man wholly despoiled in himselfe, may learne to hang all upon God? What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whom he that reacheth his hand, shall live? and that the tree of knowledgè of good and evill, is the free choice of will, whereof who so tasteth, forsaking the grace of God, he shall die? What meaneth that of Chrysostome, that every man is naturally not onely a sinner, but also altogether sinne? If we have no good thing of our owne: If man from top to toe be altogether sinne: if it be not lawfull to attempt how much the power of free will is able to doe, how then may it be lawfull to part the praise of a good worke betweene God and man? I could rehearse of this sort very many sayings out of other, but lest any man should cavill, that I choose out those things onely that make for my purpose, and doe craftily leave out such things as make against me, therefore I doe forbear such rehearsal. Yet this I dare affirme, howsoever they be sometime too busie in advancing free will, that this yet was their purposed marke, to teach man being altogether turned away from trust of his owne power, to have his strength reposed in God alone. Now come I to the simple setting forth of the truth, in considering the nature of man.

10. But I am here constrained to repeate that, which in the beginning of this Chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is most discouraged and throwne downe with conscience of his owne miserie, needinesse, nakednesse and shame, so hath he best profited in knowledge of himselfe. For there is no danger to be feared, lest man will take too much from himselfe, so that he learne, that what he wanteth is to be recovered in God, but to himselfe he can take nothing more than his owne right, be it never so little, but that he shall destroy himselfe with vaine confidence, and conveying the honour of God to himselfe, become guiltie of halnous sacriledge. And truly so oft as this lust invadeth our minde, that we desire to have somewhat of our owne, which may rest in our selves rather than in God, let us know that this thought is ministred us by no other counsellor, but by him that perswaded our first parents to have a will to be like unto Gods, knowing both good and evill. If it be the word of the devill that raiseth up man in himselfe, let us give no place unto it, unlesse wee list to take counsell of our enemy. It is pleasant indeed, for a man to have so much strength of his owne, that he may rest in himselfe. But that we be not allured to this vaine affiance, let so many fore sentences make us afraid, by which we be throwne downe: as are, Cursed is he which trusteth in man, and setteth flesh to be his arme. Again, that God hath not pleasure in the strength of a horse, neither deliteth in the legs of man, but deliteth in them that feare him, and attend upon his mercie. Again, that it is he which giveth strength unto him that fainteth, and unto him that hath no strength, he increaseth power, even the young men shall faint and be wearie, and the young men shall stumble and fall, but they that wait upon the Lord, shall renew their strength. All which sayings tend to this end, that we leane not upon any opinion of our own strength, be it never so little, if we meane to have God favourable unto us, which resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. And then againe, let these promises come into our remembrance: I will powre out water upon the thirstie, and Flouds upon the drie ground. Again, all yee that thirst come unto the waters. Which promises doe testifie, that none are admitted to receive the blessings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their own povertie. And such promises are not to be passed over, as is that of Esay: Thou shalt have no more Sunne to shine by day, neither shall the brightnesse of the Moone shine unto thee: for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the God thy glorie. The Lord indeed doth not take away the shining of the Sunne or Moone from his servants, but because he will himselfe alone appeare glorious in them, he calleth their confidence farre away, even from those things, that are counted in their opinion most excellent.

11. Truly, that saying of Chrysostom: hath alway exceedingly well pleased me, that the foundation of our Wisdome is humilitie: but yet more that saying of Augustine, as (saith he) that same Rhetorician being asked, what was the first thing in the rules of eloquence, answered Pronunciation: and what was the second, he answered Pronunciation: and what was the third, he answered Pronunciation: so if one aske me of the rules of Christian religion, the First, the Second, and Third time, and alwaies I would answer Humilitie. But he meaneth not humilitie, when a man knowing some little vertue to be in himselfe, abstaineth from pride and haughtinesse of minde, but when he truly feeleth himselfe to be such a one, as hath no refuge but in humility: as in another place he declareth: Let no man (saith he) flatter himselfe: of his owne he is a devill. That thing whereby he is blessed, he hath of God onely, For what hast thou of thine owne, but sinne? Take away from thee sinne which is thine owne, for righteoufnesse is Gods. Again, why is the possibilitie of nature so presumed on? it is wounded, maimed, troubled, and lost, it needeth a true confession, and not a false defence. Again, when every man knoweth that in himselfe he is nothing, and of himselfe hee hath no help, his weapons in himselfe are broken, the wars are ceased. But it is needfull, that all the weapons of wickednesse be broken in sunder, shivered in peeces and burnt, that thou remaine unarmed and have no help in thy selfe. How much more weake thou art in thy selfe, so much the more the Lord receiveth thee. So upon the threescore and ten Psalme he forbiddeth us to remember our owne righteoufnesse, that we may acknowledge the righteoufnesse of God: and he sheweth that God doth so commend his grace unto us, that we may know our selves to be nothing, that we stand only by the mercie of God, when of our selves we are nothing but evill. Let us not therefore strive here with God for our right, as if that were withdrawn from our salvation which is given to him. For as our humblenesse is his highnesse, so the confession of our humblenesse hath his mercie readie for remedie. Neither yet doe I require that man not convinced should willingly yeeld himselfe: nor if he hath any power, that he should turne his minde from it, to be subdued unto true humilitie, but that laying away the disease of selfe love and desire of victorie, wherewith being blinded, he thinketh too highly of himselfe, he should well consider himselfe in the true looking glasse of the Scripture.

12. And the common saying which they have borrowed out of Augustine pleaseth me well, that the naturall gifts were corrupted in man by sinne, and of the supernaturall he was made empie. For in this latter part of supernaturall gifts, they understand as well the light of faith as of righteoufnesse, which were sufficient to the attaining of heavenly life and eternall felicity. Therefore banishing himselfe from the kingdom of God, he was also deprived of the spirituall gifts wherewith he had bene furnished to the hope of eternall salvation. Whereupon followeth, that hee is so banished from

from the kingdome of God, that all things that belong to the blessed life of the soule, are extinguished in him, untill by grace of regeneration he recover them. Of that sort are faith, the love of God, charitie toward our neighbours, the studie of holinesse and righteousnesse. All these things, because Christ restoreth them unto us, are counted things coming from another to us, and beside nature, and therefore wee gather that they were once taken away. Againe soundnesse of the understanding minde, and uprightnesse of heart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of naturall gifts. For though there remaine somewhat left of understanding and judgement together with will, yet can we not say, that our understanding is sound and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkenesses. And as for our will, the perversnesse thereof is more than sufficiently knowne. Sith therefore reason, whereby a man discerneth betweene good and evill whereby he understandeth and judgeth, is a naturall gift, it could not be altogether destroyed, but it was partly weakened, partly corrupted, so that foule ruines thereof appeare. In this sence doth Iohn say, that the light shineth yet in darknesse, but the darknesse comprehended it not. In which words both things are plainly expressed, that in the perverted and degendred nature of man, there shine yet some sparkes that shew that he is a creature having reason, and that he differeth from brute beasts, because hee is endued with understanding: and yet that this light is choaked with great thicknesse of ignorance, that it cannot effectually get abroad. So will, because it is inseparable from the nature of man, perished not, but was bound to perverse desires, that it can cover no good thing. This indeed is a full definition, but yet such as needeth to be made plaine with more words. Therefore, that the order of our talke may proceed according to that first distinction, wherein wee divided the soule of man into understanding and will: let us first examine the force of understanding. So to condemne it of perpetuall blindnesse, that a man leave unto it no manner of skill in any kinde of things is not onely against the word of God, but also against the experience of common reason. For we see that there is planted in man a certaine desire to search out truth, to which hee would not aspire at all, but having felt some favour thereof before. This therefore is some sight of mans understanding, that he is naturally drawne with love of truth, the neglecting whereof, in brute beasts proveth a grosse Sense without reason, albeit, this little desire, such as it is, fainteth before it enter the beginning of her race, because it by and by falleth into vanitie. For the wit of man cannot for dulnesse keepe the right way to search out truth, but straieth in divers errors, and as it were groping in darkenesse, oftentimes stumbleth, till at length it wander and vanish away, so in seeking truth, it doth bewray how unick it is to seeke and finde truth. And then it is sore troubled with another vanitie, that oftentimes it discerneth not those things, to the true knowledge whereof it were expedient to bend it selfe, and therefore it tormenteth it selfe with fond curiositie, in searching out things superfluous and nothing worth: and to things most necessarie to be knowne, it either taketh no heed, or negligently or seldome turneth, but surely scarce at any time applyeth her studie earnestly unto them. Of which perversnesse, whereas the prophane writers doe commonly complaine, it is found, that all men have entangled themselves with it. Wherefore Salomon in all his Ecclesiastes, when he had gonethrough all these studies, in which men thinke themselves to be very wise, yet he pronounceth that they are all vaine and trifling.

13. Yet doe not all travailes of Wit so alway become voide, but that it attaineth somewhat, specially when it bendeth it selfe to these inferior things. Yea, and it is not so blockish, but that it tasteth also some litle of the higher things, howsoever it more negligently apply the searching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiving. For when it is carried up above the compass of this present life, then is it principally convinced of her owne weaknesse. Wherefore, that we may the better see how far according to the degrees of her abilitie, it proceedeth in every thing, it is good that I put forth a distinction. Let this therefore be the distinction, that there is one understanding of earthly things, and another of heavenly things. Earthly things I call those that doe not concerne God and his kingdome, true righteousnesse and the blessed esse of eternall life, but have all their respect and relation to this present life, and are as it were and will, though they be no: quite taken away, yet the soundnesse of them is lost: the unsoundnesse of his understanding may be seene by by vs often saying in that which he seeketh, & his not seeking that which belongs to must unto him.

Mans naturall capacity may attaine to the knowledge of things belonging to this present life. As first there are in all mens minds certaine seeds of understanding those things which concern will order & policie is grounded.

were contained within the bounds thereof. Heavenly things, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousness, and the mysteries of the heavenly kingdom. Of the first sort are policie, governance of household, all handie crafts, and liberrall Sciences. Of the second sort are the knowledge of God and Gods will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the first, this we must confesse, because man is a creature by nature given to live in companies together: he is also by naturall institution bent to cherish and to preserve the fellowship of these companies, therefore we see that there are in the minds of all men universall impressions of a certaine civill honestie and order. Hereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that understandeth not, that all companies of men ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiveth not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Hereof commeth that same perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of all men unto lawes, because the seeds thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I weigh not the dissensions and fightings that afterward arise while some desire to pervert law and right, the loose absolute government of Kings, that lust strayeth abroad in stead of right, as theeves and robbers, some (which is a fault more than common) thinke that to be unjust, which other have established for just: and on the other side stiffly say, that to be laudible, which other have forbidden. For these men doe not therefore hate lawes, because they doe not know that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raging with beadie lust, doe fight against manifest reason, and for their fanatic doe abhorre that, which in understanding of minde they allow. The latter sort of it striving in such that taketh not away the first conceiving of equitie. For when men doe strive among themselves concerning the points of lawes, they agree together in a certaine summe of equitie. Wherein is proved the weaknesse of mans wit, which even then when it seemeth to follow the right way, yet halteth and staggereth, but still this remaineth true, that there is sown in all men a certaine seed of poliitike order. And that is a large prooffe, that in the ordering of this life, no man is void of the light of reason.

Men have naturally a power and facility to learne and find out arts wherein no withstanding the liberality of God shineth, without which all would be as some are even mere naturalls.

14. Now doe follow the arts, both the liberrall, and the handie crafts, in learning whereof, because there is in us all a certaine aptnesse, in them also doth appeare the force of mans wit: but albeit, all men be not apt to learne them all, yet is this a token certaine enough of the common naturall power, that there is almost no man found, whose conceit of wit doth not in some art or other shew forth it selfe. Neither have they onely a power or facilitie to learne, but also to devise in every art some new thing, either to amplifie or make perfecter that which hath been learned of another that went before, which thing, as it moved Plato erroneously to teach, that such conceiving is nothing else but a calling to remembrance, so by good reason it ought to compell us to confesse, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the wit of man. These points therefore doe plainly testifie, that there is given to men naturally an universall conceiving of reason and of understanding. Yet is it so an universall benefit, that therein every man ought for himselfe to acknowledge the peculiar grace of God. To which thankfulness the creator himselfe doth sufficiently awake us, when he createth naturall fooles, in whom he maketh us to see with what gifts mans soule excellerh, if it be not endued with his light, which is so naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free gift of his liberality towards every man: But the invention and orderly teaching of the same arts, or a more inward and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a few, is no perfect argument of the common conceiving of wit, yet because without difference it happeneth to the godly and ungodly, it is rightfully reckoned among naturall gifts.

15. So oft therefore as we light upon prophane writers, let us bee put in minde by that marvellous light of truth that shineth in them, that the wit of man, how much soever it be perverted and fallen from the first integritie, is yet still clothed and garnished with excellent gifts of God. If we consider that the spirit of God is the onely fountaine of truth, we will neither refuse nor despise the truth it selfe, whosoever it shal appeare except we will dishonorably use the spirit of God: for the gifts of the holy Ghost cannot be set light by, without contempt and reproch of himselfe: And what? shall we denie that the truth shined to the old Lawyers, which have set forth Civill order and

Discipline

Discipline with so great equity? Shall wee say that the Philosphers were blinde both in that exquisite contemplation, and cunning description of nature? Shall wee say that they had no wit, which by setting in order the art of speech, have taught vs to speake with reason? Shall we say that they were mad, which in setting forth Physicke, have employed their diligence for us? What of all the Mathematicall sciences? Shall wee thinke them dotting errors of mad men? No, rather we cannot reade the writings of the old men concerning these things, without great admiration of their wit. But shall we thinke any thing praise-worthy or excellent, which wee doe not reknowledge to come of God? Let us be ashamed of so great unthankfulnesse, into which the heathen Poets fell not, which confessed that both Philosophie and Lawes, and all good Arts, were the inventions of gods. Sith then it appeareth that these men whom the Scripture calleth naturall men, were of so sharpe and deepe sight in searching out of inferior things, let us learne by such examples how many good things the Lord hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath bene spoyled of the true God.

16. But in the meane time yet let us not forget, that these are the most excellent good gifts of the spirit of God, which for the common benefit of mankind he dealeth abroad to whom it pleaseth him. For if it behooved, that the understanding and skill that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, should be powred into Besleuel and Oliab by the spirit of God, it is no marvell if the knowledge of those things which are most excellent in mans life, be said to be communicated unto us by the spirit of God. Neither is their cause why any man should aske, what have the wicked to doe with Gods spirit, which are altogether estranged from God. For where it is said that the spirit of God dwelleth in the faithfull onely: that is to be understood of the spirit of sanctification, by the which we are consecrated to God himselfe, to be his temples: yet doth he neverthelesse fill, move, and quicken all things with the vertue of the same spirit, and that according to the property of every kinde which he hath given to it by law of creation. If it have been the Lords will that we should be holpen by the travell and service of the wicked in naturall Philosophy, Dialectike, the Mathematicall knowledges, and other: let us use it, lest if we neglecting the gifts of God, willingly offered in them, we suffer just punishment for our slothfulnesse. But lest any should thinke a man to be blessed, when under the elements of this world there is granted unto him so great an ability to conceive truth: it is also to be added, that all this power to understand, and the understanding that followeth thereof, is a vanishing and transitorie thing before God, where is not a stedfast foundation of truth. For Augustine teacheth most truly, whom (as we have said) the Master of the Sentences, and the other Schoolemen are compelled to assent unto, as the free gifts were taken from man after his fall, so these naturall gifts which remained, were corrupted. Not that they be defiled of themselves, in as much as they come from God, but because they cease to be pure to a defiled man, that he should have no praise of them.

17. Let this be the summe: that it is seene that in all mankind is reason which is proper to our nature, which maketh us to differ from bruit beasts, as bruit beasts doe differ in sense from things without life. For whereas there be borue certaine naturall fooles and idiots, that default obscureth not the generall grace of God: but rather by such sight we are put in minde, that what is left unto our selves, ought justly to be ascribed to the kindnesse of God, because if he had not spared vs, our rebellion had drawne with it the destruction of our whole nature. But whereas some doe excell in sharpnesse of conceiving, some other doe passe in judgement, some have a quicker wit to learne this or that art: in this variety God setteth forth his grace unto us, that no man should claime to himselfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods meere liberality. For how becommeth one more excellent than another, but that in common nature might appeare above other the speciall grace of God, which in omitting many, saith openly that it is bound to none. Beside that, God powreth in singular motions, according to the calling of every man. Of which thing we meet with many examples in the bookes of the Judges, where it is said, that the spirit of the Lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in every noble act there is a speciall instruction. By which reason the strong men followed Saul, whose hearts the Lord

John 1. 13.

Mat. 16. 17.

It is the principall illumination of the spirit whi<sup>ch</sup> he openeth the eyes of Gods elect, and twi<sup>ce</sup>

Lord had touched. And when his ministring in the kingdome was prophesied of, Simeon saith thus: The spirit of the Lord shall come upon thee, and thou shalt be another man. And this was continued to the whole course of government: as after it is spoken of David, that the spirit of the Lord came upon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in another place as touching particular motions: yea, in Homer men are said to excell in wit, not onely as Ulysses hath dealt to every man, but also as the time required. And truly experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amazed as were most sharpe and deepe witted, that the wits of men are in the hand and will of God to rule them at every moment: for which reason it is said, that he taketh wit from the wise, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diversity we see remaining some marks of the image of God, which doe make difference betweene all mankinde and other creatures.

18. Now is to be declared what mans reason seeth, when it commeth to the kingdome of God, and to that spirituall insight, which consisteth chiefly in three things: to know God, and his fatherly favour toward us, wherein our salvation standeth: and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his Law. Both in the first two, and in the second properly they that are most wittie, are blinder than Moles. I deny not that there be here and there read in Philosophers, concerning God, many things well and aptly spoken, but yet such as doe alway favour of a certaine giddie imagination. The Lord gave them indeed, as is above said, a little taste of his Godhead, that they should not pretend ignorance to colour their ungodlinesse: and many times he moved them to speake many things, by confession whereof themselves might be convinced: But they so saw the things that they saw, that by such seeing they were not directed to the truth, much lesse did attaine unto it, like as a wayfaring man in the midst of the field, for a sudden moment, seeth farre and wide the glittering of lightning in the night time, but with such a quickly vanishing sight, that he is soone covered againe with the darknesse of the night, than he can stirre his foot, so farre is it off that he can be brought into his way by such a helpe. Beside that, those small drops of truth, wherewith as it were by chance, they sprinkle their books, with how many and how monstrous lyes are they defiled? Finally, they never so much as smelled that assurednesse of Gods good will toward us, without which mans wit must needs be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore mans reason neither approacheth, nor goeth toward, nor once directeth sight unto this truth, to understand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward us.

19. But because we being drunke with a false persuasion of our owne deepe insight, doe very hardly suffer our selves to be perswaded, that in matters of God it is utterly blinde and dull: I thinke it shall bee better to confirme it by testimonies of Scripture, than by reasons. This doth Iohn very well teach in that place which I even now alleaged, when he writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which should be the light of men, and that the light did shine in darknesse, and the darknesse comprehended it not. Hee sheweth indeed, that mans soule is lightened with the brightnesse of Gods light, so that it is never altogether without some small flame, or at least some sparkle of it, but yet, that with such a light he comprehendeth not God. And why so? because mans quicknesse of wit, as toward the knowledge of God, is but meere darknesse. For when the Holy Ghost calleth men darknesse, he at once spoileth them of all ability of spirituall understanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithfull which embrace Christ, are borne nor of blood, or of the will of the flesh, or of man, but of God. As if he should say, flesh is not capable of so high wisdom to conceive God, and that which is Gods, lesse it bee lightened with the spirit of God. As Christ testified, that this was a speciall revelation of the Father, that Peter did know him.

20. If we were perswaded of this which ought to be out of all controversie, that our nature wanteth all that, which our heavenly Father giveth to his elect by the spirit of regeneration, then here were no matter to doubt upon. For thus speaketh the faithfull people in the Prophet: For with thee is the fountaine of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing, when hee saith, that no man can call call Iesus the Lord, but in the holy Ghost. And Iohn Baptist seeing the dulnesse of his disciples, crieth out, that no man can receive any thing, unlesse it be given him from above. And that he meaneth by gift a speciall illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appeareth hereby, that he complaineth that in so many words as he had spoken to commend Christ to his disciples, he prevailed nothing. I see (saith he) that words are nothing to informe mens mindes concerning divine things, unlesse the Lord give understanding by his spirit. Yea, and Moses, when he reprocheth the people with their forgetfulnesse, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes grow wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefit of God. Thine eyes (saith he) have seene those great tokens and wonders, and, The Lord hath not given thee a heart to understand; nor eares to heare, nor eyes to see. What should he expresse more, if he called us blocks in considering the workes of God? Whereupon the Lord by the Prophet promiseth for a great grace, that he will give the Israelites a heart, that they may know him: signifying thereby, that mans wit is onely so much spiritually wise as it is lightened by him. And this Christ plainly confirmed with his owne mouth, when he saith, that no man can come to him, but he to whom it shall be given from the Father. What? is not he himselfe the lively image of the Father in whom the whole brightnesse of his glorie is expressed unto us? Therefore he could not better shew what our power is to know God, than when he saith, that we have no eyes to see his image, where it is so openly set present before us: What? came he not into the earth for this purpose, to declare his Fathers will unto men? and did he not faithfully doe his office? Yes surely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, unlesse the inward schoolemaster the holy Ghost, set open the way to our mindes. Therefore none come to him, but they that have heard and beene taught of the Father. What manner way of learning and hearing is this? Even, when the holy Ghost by marvellous and singular vertue formeth the eares to heare, and the mindes to understand. And lest that should seeme strange, he allegeth the prophesie of Esay where when he promiseth the repairing of the Church, that they which shall be gathered together to salvation, shall be taught of the Lord. If God there forethweth some peculiar thing concerning his elect, it is evident that he speaketh not of that kinde of learning that was also common to the wicked and ungodly. It remaineth therefore that we must understand it thus, that the way into the kingdome of God is open to no man, but to him to whom the holy Ghost by his enlightening shall make a new minde. But Paul speaketh most plainly of all, which of purpose entering into discourse of this matter, after he had condemned all mens wisdom of folly and vanities, and utterly brought it to nought, at the last concludeth thus; that the naturall man cannot perceive those things that are of the spirit of God, they are foolishnesse unto him, and hee cannot understand them because they are spiritually judged. Whom doth hee call naturall? even him that stayeth upon the light of nature. He I say comprehendeth nothing in the spiritual mysteries of God. Why so? is it because by foolishnesse he neglecteth it? Nay, rather although he would travell never so much, he can doe nothing, because forsooth they are spiritually judged. What meaneeth that? because being utterly hidden from the light of man, they are opened by the onely revelation of the spirit: so that they are reckoned for folly where the spirit of God giveth not light. Before hee had advanced those things that God hath prepared for them that love him, above the capacite of eyes, eares, and mindes. Yea, hee testifieth that mans wisdom was a certaine veile, whereby mans minde was kept from seeing God. What meane wee? The Apostle pronounceth, that the wisdom of this world is made folly by God: and shall we forsooth give unto it sharpnesse of understanding, whereby it may peirce to the secret places of the heavenly kingdome? Farre be such beatlinesse from us.

21. And so that which here he taketh away from men, in another place in a prayer he giveth it to God alone. God (saith he) and the father of glorie, give to you the spirit of wisdom and revelation. Now thou hearest that all wisdom and revelation is the gift of God. What followeth? and lighten the eyes of your minde. Surely if they neede a new revelation, then are they blinde of themselves. It followeth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling, &c. Therefore he confesseth, that the wits of men are not capable of so great understanding, to know their owne calling. And let not

some Pelagian babble heere, that God doth remedie that dulnesse or unskilfulnesse, when by the doctrine of his word he directeth mans understanding, whither without a guide he could not have attained. For David had a law, wherein was comprehended all the wisdom that may be desired, and yet not contented with that, hee requireth to haue his eyes opened that he may consider the mysteries of the same law. By which speech truly he secretly saith, that the Sunne riseth upon the earth where the word of God shineth to men: but they get not much thereby, untill hee himselfe, that is therefore called the father of lights, doe give them or open their eyes, because whereoeuer he shineth not with his spirit, all things are possessed with darkenesse. So the Apostles were well and largely taught by the best Schoolemaster: yet if they had not needed the spirit of truth to instruct their minds in that same doctrine which they had heard before he would not have bidden them looke for him. If the thing that wee aske of God, wee doe thereby confesse that wee want: and God in that that hee promisseth it us, doth argue our neede, let no man doubt to confesse that he is so much able to understand the mysteries of God as he is inlightned with his grace. Hee that giveth to himselfe more understanding is so much the more blinde, for that he doth not acknowledge his owne blindnesse.

22. Now remaineth the third point, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which wee doe rightly call the knowledge of the works of righteousnesse, wherein mans wit seemeth to be of somewhat more sharp sight, than in the other two before. For the Apostle testifieth, that the Gentiles which have no law, while they doe the works of the law are to themselves in stead of a Law, and doe shew the law written in their hearts. Their consciences bearing them witnes, and their thoughts accusing them within themselves: or excusing them before the judgement of God. If the Gentiles have righteousnesse naturally graven in their minds, surely we cannot say that we are altogether blind in the order of life. And nothing is more common, than that man by the law naturall, of which the Apostle speaketh in that place, is sufficiently instructed to a right rule of life. But let us weigh to what purpose this knowledge of the law is planted in men: then it shall by and by appeare, how farr it bringeth them toward the marke of reason and truth. The same is also evident by the words of Paul, if a man doe marke the placing of them. He had said a little before, that they which sinned in the Law, are judged by the Law, they which have sinned without Law doe perish without Law. Because this might seeme unreasonable, that the Gentiles should perish without any judgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their Conscience is to them in stead of a Law, and therefore is sufficient for their just damnation. Therefore the end of the law naturall is, that man may be made inexcusable. And it shall be defined not ill after this sort, that it is a knowledge of conscience, that sufficiently discerneth betweene just and unjust, to take away from men the pretence of ignorance, while they are proved guiltie by their owne testimonie. Such is the tenderesse of man toward himselfe, that in doing of evils he alway turneth away his minde so much as hee may from the feeling of sinne. By which reason it seemeth that Plato was moved to thinke that there was no sinne done but by ignorance, That indeede were fitly said of him, if mens hypocrisie went so farr in hiding of vices, that the minde might not know it selfe guiltie before God. But when the sinner seeking to eschew the judgement imprinted in him, is now and then drawne backe unto it, and not suffered so to wirke, but that he be compelled whether he will or no, sometime to open his eyes: it is falsely said that he sinneth onely by ignorance.

23. * Themistius saith more truly, which teacheth that understanding is seldom deceiued in the generall defining of things, that it is blindnesse when it goeth any further, that is, when it commeth downe to the special case. Every man, if it be generally asked, will affirme, that manslaughter is euill: but he that conspireth to kill his enemies, deliberate upon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemne adulterie, but in his owne, privately he will flatter himselfe. This is ignorance, when a man comming to the speciall case forgetteth the rule that he had lately agreed upon in the generall question. Of which thing Augustine discourseth very finely in his exposition of the first verse of the 47. Psalme: albeit the same thing is not continuall. For sometime the shamefulnesse of the euill deede so presseth the conscience, that not deceiving him-

ſelfe under falſe reſemblance of a good thing, but wittingly and willingly he runneth into evill. Out of which affection came theſe ſayings: I ſee the better and allow it, but I follow the worſe. Wherefore, me thinke, Ariſtole hath very aptly made diſtinction betweene incontinence and intemperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he ſaith, that there by reaſon of troubled affection or paſſion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it marketh not the evill in his owne act, which it generally ſeeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentance immediately followeth. But intemperance is not extinguished or broken by feeling of ſinne, but on the other ſide obſtinately ſtandeth ſtill in her conceived choiſe of evill.

24 Now when thou heareſt judgement univerſally named in the difference of good and evill, thinke it not every ſound and perfect judgement. For if mens hearts are furniſhed with choiſe of juſt and unjuſt, onely to this end, that they ſhould not pretend ignorance, it is not the needfull to ſee the truth in every thing. But it is enough and more, that they underſtand ſo farre that they cannot eſcape away, but being convict by wittneſſe of their conſcience, they even now already begin to tremble at the judgement ſeate of God. And if we will try our reaſon by the law of God, which is the examplar of true righteouſneſſe, we ſhall finde how many waies it is blinde. Truly it attaineth not at all to thoſe that are the chiefe things in the firſt table, as of confidence in God, of giving to him the praife of ſtrength and righteouſneſſe, of calling upon his name, of the true keeping of the Sabbath. What ſoule ever by naturall ſence did ſinell out, that the lawfull worſhipping of God conſiſteth in theſe and like things? For when prophane men will worſhip God, although they be called away an hundred times from their vaine trifles, yet they alway ſlide backe thither againe. They deny in deeде that ſacrifices doe pleaſe God, unleſſe there be adjoynd a pureneſſe of minde: whereby they declare, that they conceive ſomewhat of the ſpirituall worſhipping of God, which yet they by and by corrupt with falſe inventions. For it can never be perſwaded them, that all is true that the law preſcribeth of it. Shall I ſay, that that wit excelleth in any ſharpe underſtanding, which can neither of it ſelfe be wiſe, nor harken to teaching? In the commandements of the ſecond table it hath ſome more underſtanding, by ſo much as they came neerer to the preſervation of civill fellowſhip among men. Albeit even herein alſo it is found many times to faile. To every excellent nature it ſeemeth moſt unreaſonable, to ſuffer an unjuſt, and too imperious a manner of governing over them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the judgement of mans reaſon is none other, but that it is the part of a fervile and baſe courage to ſuffer it patiently: and againe, the part of an honeſt and free borne heart to ſhake it off: And revenge of injuries is reckoned for no fault among the Philoſophers. But the Lord condemning that too much nobleneſſe of courage commandeth his to keepe the ſame patience that is ſo ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the law, our underſtanding marketh not conſcience at all. For a naturall man ſuffereth not himſelfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diſeaſes of his deſires. The light of nature is choaked up, before that it come to the firſt entrie of this bottomleſſe depth. For when the Philoſophers note immoderate motions of minde for faults, they meane thoſe motions that appeare and ſhew forth themſelves by groſſe tokens, but they make no account of thoſe evill deſires that doe gently tickle the minde.

25 Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault withall before, for that he imputed all ſinnes to ignorance, ſo is their opinion to be rejected, which teach that purpoſed malice and ſrowardneſſe is uſed in all ſinnes. For we finde it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reaſon is overwhelmed with ſo many ſorts of being deceived, is ſubject to ſo many errours, ſtumbleth at ſo many ſtayes, is entangled with ſo many ſtraites, that it is farre from ſure directing. But how little it is eſteemed before the Lord in all parts of our life, Paul ſheweth when he ſaith, that we are not ſufficient to thinke any thing of our ſelves, as of our ſelves. He ſpeaketh not of will or affection, but he taketh alſo this away from us, that wee ſhould not thinke that it can come in our minds how any thing is to be done well. Is our diligence, inſight, underſtanding and heed ſo corrupted, that it can deviſe or thinke upon nothing that is right before the Lord? that ſeemeth too hard to us, that doe unwillingly ſuffer our ſelves to be ſpoiled of the ſharpeneſſe of reaſon, which wee account a moſt pretious gift. But to the holy Ghost it seemeth most full of equitie, which knoweth that all the thoughts of wise men are vaine: and which pronounceth plainly, that all invention of mans heart is onely evill. If all that our wit conceiveth, deviseth upon, purposeth and goeth about, is alway evill, how can it come in our mindes to purpose that which pleaseth God, to whom onely holinesse and righteousnesse is acceptable? So is it to be seene, that the reason of our minde, which way soever it turne it selfe, is miserably subject to vanitie. David knew this weakenesse in himselfe, when hee prayed to have understanding given him, to learne the Lords commandements aright. For hee secretly saith therein, that his owne wit sufficeth him not, which desireth to have anew given him. And that not onely once, but almost tenne times in one Psalme, hee repeateth the same prayer. By which repeating hee privily declareth, wih how great neede heeis driven to pray for it. And that which he prayeth for himselfe alone, Paul commonly useth to pray for the Churches. Wee cease not (saith hee) to pray for you, and to desite that yee may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wisedome and spirituall understanding, that yee may walke worthily of God, &c. But so oft as hee maketh that thing the good gift of God, let us remember that hee doth withall testifie, that it lieth not in mans power. And Augustine so farre acknowledged this default of reason to understand those things that are of God, that he thinketh the grate of illumination to be no lesse necessarie for our mindes, than the light of the sunne is for our eyes. And not content with that, he addeth a correction of that, saying, that we lift up our eyes to see the light: but the eyes of our minde lie shut unlesse the Lord open them. And the Scripture teacheth, that our mindes are not enlightned one day alone, that they may afterward see by themselves: for that which I even now alleaged out of Paul, belongeth to continuall proceedings and encreasing. And this doth David expressly set out in these words: With my whole heart have I sought thee, make mee not to stray from thy commandements. For when he had beene regenerated, and had not slenderly profited in true godlinesse, yet hee confesseth, that for every moment he needeth continuall direction, least he should swarve from the knowledge wherewith he is endued. Therefore, in another place, he prayeth to have the right spirit renewed, which he had lost by his owne fault, because it belongeth to the same God to restore unto us the same thing being lost for a time, which himselfe gave at the beginning.

26 Now is will to be examined, wherein standeth the chiefe libertie of free choise, for it hath beene already seene, that choise doth rather belong to will, than to understanding. First, that this thing which the Philosophers have taught, and is received with common consent, that is, that all things by naturall instinct and desire that which is good, may not seeme to belong to the uprightnesse of mans will: Let us marke that the force of free will, is not to be considered in such appetite, as rather proceeding of the inclination of the essence, than of the advisement of the understanding minde. For even the Schoolemen doe confesse, that free will hath no action, but when reason turneth it selfe to objects, whereby they meane that the object of appetite must be such as may be subject to choise, and goe before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choise. And truly if a man consider what is the naturall desire of good in man he shall finde that it is common to him with beasts. For they also desire to bee well, and when any shew of good appeareth that moveth their sense, they follow it, But man doth neither choose by reason, that he may follow with diligence that thing which is indeed good for him, according to the excellencie of his immortall nature, nor taketh reason to counsell, nor bendeth his minde, but without reason, without counsell, like a beast followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedom of will, if a man by sense of nature bee carried to desire that which is good: but this is requisite, that he discern good by right reason, and when he hath knowne it, that he choose it, and when he hath chosen it, that he follow it. But least any man should doubt, there is to be noted a double sophistical argument. For appetite is not heere called the proper manner of will, but a naturall inclination: and good is called not as of vertue or justice, but of estate, as we say: This man is well, or in good case. Finally, although a man doe never so much desire to attain

that is good, yet he followeth it not: As there is no man to whom eternall blessednesse is not pleasant, yet is there none that aspireth unto it, but by the mooving of the holy Ghost. Wherefore sith the naturall desire in men to bee well, maketh nothing to proove the freedome of will, no more than in metalls and stones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their substance: let us consider in other things, whether Will be so infected and corrupted in all parts, that it engendreth nothing but evil: or whether it keepeth still any parcell unhurt, from whence doe grow good desires.

27 They that doe attribute to the first grace of God, that wee will effectually, seeme on the other side to say secretly, that there is in the soule a power of it selfe to aspire to good, but it is so weake, that it cannot grow to a perfect affection, or raise up any endeavour. And there is no doubt that the schoolemen have commonly embraced this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the old writers: for as much as they are wont to consider man in pure naturall things, (as they terme it) such a one as the Apostle describeth him in these words: I doe not the good that I would, but the evil that I would not, that I doe. To will is present unto mee, but to performe it I finde not. But after this manner is the discourse that Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully perverted. For he entreateth of the Christian wrastring (which he shortly toucheth to the Galathians) which the faithful continually feele within themselves, in the battell betweene the flesh and the spirit. But the spirit is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apostle doth there speake of the regenerate, appeareth by this, hat when he had said, that there dwelleth no goodnesse in him, he addeth an exposition, that he meaneth it of his flesh. And therefore he saith, that it is not hee that doth the evil, but sinne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in me, that is, my flesh? Even as much as if he had said thus: God dwelleth not in mee of my selfe, for there is no good to be found in my flesh. Hereupon followeth that manner of excuse: I my selfe doe not the evil, but sinne that dwelleth in me. Which excuse belongeth onely to the regenerate, which doe with the chiefe part of their soule tend unto good. Now, the conclusion that is adjoynded after, declareth all this matter evidently. I am delighted (saith he) with the law, according to the inward man: But I see another law in my members fighting against the law of my minde. Who hath such a striving in him selfe, but he that being regenerate by the spirit of God, carrieth the leavings of his flesh about with him? Therefore Augustine, where as once hee had thought, that that had been spoken of the nature of man, revoked his exposition as false, and ill agreeing together. And truly, if we allow this, that men without grace have some motions to good, though they be but small, what shall we answer to the Apostle which saith, that we are not sufficient so much as to thinke any good? What shall we answer to the Lord that pronounceth by Moses, that every invention of mans heart is onely evil? Wherefore sith they have stumbled by false taking of one place, there is no cause why we should stay upon their judgement. Let rather this saying of Christ prevaile. He that doth sinne is the servant of sinne. We are all sinners by nature, therefore wee be all holden under the yoke of sinne. Now if whole man be subject to the dominion of sinne, then must it needs be, that the will it selfe which is the chiefe seate thereof, be bound fast with most strait bondes. For otherwise the saying of Paul would not stand together, that it is God which worketh will in us, if any will did goe before the grace of the Holy Ghost. Away therefore with all that many have triflingly spoken concerning preparation. For although sometime the faithfull doe pray to have their hearts formed to the obedience of the law, as David doth in many places: yet it is to be noted, that even that desire of praying is from God. Which wee may gather of his words, for when he wisheth to have a cleane heart created within him, surely he taketh not on himselfe the beginning of creation. Therefore, let rather this saying of Augustine have place with us; God will prevent thee in all things: And sometime prevent thou his wrath. How? Confesse that thou hast all these things of God, that whatsoever good thou hast, is of him: whatsoever evil, it is of thy selfe. And a litle after: Nothing is ours but sinne.

It is not sufficient to confesse that grace maketh the desires of our will effectually, which otherwise would not be able to attaine any good thing which is wished for: but we must acknowledge that it is the grace of the holy ghost which worketh in us the very first beginning to thinke of wishing well.

BVT man cannot be any way better knowne in either part of his soule, than if he come forth with his titles wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. If he be painted whole in these words of Christ, That which is borne of the flesh, is flesh: as it is easie to proove, then is he prooved to be a very miserable creature. For the affection of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for as much as it is enimitie against God, and so is not subject, nor can be subject to the law of God. Is flesh so perverse, that with all her affection she continually useth enimities against God? that she cannot agree with the righteousnesse of the law of God? Finally, that she can bring forth nothing but matter of death? Now, grant that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth onely to the sensuall, and not to the higher part of the soule. But that is sufficiently confuted by the words of Christ, and of the Apostle. It is the Lords argument, that man must be borne againe, because he is flesh. He commandeth not to be borne againe according to the body. But in mind he is not borne againe, if a part of it be amended, but when it is all renewed. And that doth the comparison, set in both places, confirme. For the spirit is so compared against the flesh, that there is left no meane thing betweene them. Therefore whatsoever is not spirituall in man, is after the same reason called fleshly. But we have nothing of the Spirit but by regeneration. It is therefore flesh whatsoever we have of nature. But of that matter, if otherwise wee could have any doubt, that is taken away from us by Paul, where after he had described the old man, whom hee had said to be corrupt with concupiscences of errorr, he biddeth us to be renewed in the spirit of our minde: you see hee doth not place unlawfull and evill lusts onely in the sensitive part, but also in the very minde, and therefore requireth a renewing of it. And truely a little before he had painted out such an image of mans nature, as did shew that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and perverted: for whereas he writeth that all nations doe walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in understanding, estranged from the life of God, by reason of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindness of their heart: it is no doubt that this is spoken of all them whom the Lord hath not reformed to the uprightness both of his wisdom and justice: which is also made more plaine by the comparison by and by adjoynd, where he putteth the faithfull in minde, that they have not so learned Christ. For of these words we gather, that the grace of Christ, is the onely remedie whereby we be delivered from that blindness, and the evils that ensue thereof. For so had Esaï also prophesied of the kingdome of Christ, when he promised, that the Lord should be an everlasting light to his Church, when yet darkenesse covered the earth, and a mist the peoples. Whereas he testifieth, that the light of God shall arise onely in the Church, truely without the Church he leaveth nothing but darkenesse and blindness. I will not rehearse particularly such things as are written every where, specially in the Psalms and in the Prophets against the vanitie of man. It is a greather thing that David writeth, if he be weyed with vanity, that he shall be vainer than vanity it self. His wit is wounded with a grievous weapon, when all the thoughts that come out of it are scorned as foolish, trifling, mad and perverse.

2 No easier is the condemnation of the heart, when it is called guilefull and perverse above all things: but because I studie to be short, I will be content with one place alone, but such a one as shall be like a most bright looking glasse, wherein wee may behold the whole image of our nature. For the Apostle, when hee goeth about to throw downe the arrogancie of mankinde, doth it by these testimonies: That there is not one righteous man, there is not one man that understandeth or that seeketh God, All are gone out of the way, they are made unprofitable together, there is none that doth good, no not one: their throate is an open sepulcher, with their tongues they worke deceitfully, the poyson of Serpents is under their lips, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: whose feete are swift to shed blood, in whose waies is sorrow and unhappinesse unhappinesse, which have not the feare of God before their eyes. With these thunderbolts he invyeth, not against certaine men, but against the whole nation of the sonnes of Adam. Neither declaimeth he against the corrupt manners of one or two ages, but accuseth the continuall corruption of nature. For his purpose is in that place, not simply to chide men, to make them amend, but to teach rather that all men are oppressed with calamitie, impossible to be overcome, from which they cannot get up againe, unlesse they be plucked out by the mercie of God. And because, that could not bee proved unlesse it had beene by the overthrow and destruction of nature, he brought forth these testimonies whereby is proved that our nature is more than destroyed. Let it is therefore remaine agreed, that men are such as they be here described, not only by fault of evill custome, but also by corruptnesse of nature. For otherwise the Apostles argument cannot stand, that there is no salvation for man but by the mercie of God, because he is in himselfe utterly lost and past hope. I will not here busie my selfe in proving the applying of these testimonies that no man should thinke them unwise used. I will so take them as if they had beene first spoken by Paul, and not taken out of the Prophets. First he taketh away from man righteousnesse, that is integritie and purenesse, and then understanding. The want of understanding, he proveth by Apostasie or departing from God, whom to seeke is the first degree of wisdom. But that want must needs happen to them that are fallen away from God. Hee sayeth farther, that all are gone out of the way and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doth good, and then he adjoyneth the hainous faultes, wherewith they defile their members that are once let loose into wickednesse. Last of all he testifieth that they are voide of the feare of God, after whose rule our steppes should have beene directed. If these be the inheritable gifts of mankind, it is in vaine to seeke for any good thing in our nature. Indeepe I grant that not all these faults doe appeare in every man: yet can it not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the hearts of all men. For as the body while it already fofreth enclosed within it, the cause and matter of disease, although the paine be not yet vehement, cannot be called healthie: no more can the soule be reckoned sound, while it swarmeth full of such diseases of vices, albeit the similitude doth not agree in all points. For in the body be it never so much diseased, there remaineth a quicknesse of life: but the soule being drowned in this gulf of destruction, is not onely troubled with vices, but also altogether voide of all goodnesse.

3 The same question in a manner which hath beene before assyled, now riseth up againe of new. For in all ages there have beene some, which by guiding of nature have beene bent to vertue in all their life. And I regard it not, though many slippings may be noted in their manners: yet by the very studie of honesty they have shewed a prooffe that there was some purenesse in their nature. What reward such vertues have before God, although we will more fully declare when we shall speake of the merits of works, yet we must somewhat speake in this place: so farre as is necessarie for making plaine of this present argument. These examples therefore seeme to put us in mind, that wee should not thinke mans nature altogether corrupt, for that by her instruction some men have not onely excelled in some noble actes, but also in the whole course of their life have behaved themselves most honestly. But here wee must thinke, how in this corruption of nature there is some place for the grace of God, not to cleanse it, but inwardly to restrain it. For if the Lord would suffer the mindes of all men as it were with loose reins to runne wildly into all sortes of lusts, without doubt there would be no man, but he would in plaine experience make us beleve, that all those evils wherewith Paul condemneth all nature, are most truly said of him. For what? Canst thou exempt thy selfe out of the number of them, whose feete are swife to shed blood, their hands defiled with robberies and manslaughters, their throats like unto open sepulchres, their tongues deceitfull, their lips venomous, their workes unprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whose minde is without God, whose inwards are perversenesse whose eyes are bent to entrappings, their hearts lift up dispitefully to triumph over other, and all the parts of them applyed to infinite mischiefes? If every soule be subiect to all such monsters, as the Apostle boldly pronounceth, truly wee see what would come to passe, if the Lord would suffer the lust of man to wander after his owne inclination.

The maine benefit of prophecie is no argument of nature, because is cometh not of them but of the grace of God working in them, not the grace that regenerateth the heart, but that brideth onely and restraineth the perverse sinnes of mans all inclination. Rom. 3. 10.

nation. There is no madde beast that is so headlong carried away, there is no streame be it never so swift and strong, whereof the overflowing is so violent. The Lord healeth these diseases in his elect by this meane that we will by and by set forth. In some he onely restraineth them with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, so farre as he foreseeth to be expedient for preserving of the universitie of things. Hereby some are holden in by shame, some by feare of lawes, that they burst not forth into many sortes of filthinesse, howbeit they doe for a great part not hide their uncleannesse. Some because they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, doe after a certaine sort aspire toward it. Some rise up above the common sort, that by their majesticke they may keepe other in their duerie. So God by his providence bridleth the perversenessse of nature, that it breake not forth into dooings, but hee clenseth it not within.

4 But yet the doubt is not dissolved. For either we must make Camillus like unto Catilina, or else in Camillus we shall have an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodnesse. I grant indeed that those goodly gifts which were in Camillus both were the gifts of God and seeme worthie to be commended, if they be weyed by themselves, but how shall they be proofes of naturall goodnesse in him? must we not returne to the minde, and frame our argument in this sort? If a naturall man excelled in such uprightnesse of manners, then nature is undoubtedly not without power toward the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were perverse and crooked, and following any thing rather than upright streightnesse? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you grant that he was a naturall man. Now what power of mans nature to goodnesse will you rehearse unto me in this behalte, if in the greatest shew of purenesse it be found that he is alway carried to corruption? Therefore, least ye commend a man for vertue, whose vices deceive you under vertues Image, doe not so give unto the will of man power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remaineth fast in her owne perversenessse. Albeit this is a most sure and easie solution of this question, that these are not common gifts of nature but speciall graces of God, which he diversly and to a certaine measure dealeth among men that are otherwise ungodly. For which reason we feare not in common speech to call one man well natured, and another of evill nature, and yet we cease not to include them both under the universall state of mans corruption, but wee shew what speciall grace God hath bestowed upon the one, which he hath not vouchsafed to give to the other. When his pleasure was to make Saul King, he formed him as a new man. And that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homer, sayeth that Kings sonnes are created notable by some singular marke, because God providing for mankind, furnisheth these with a Princely nature whom he appointeth to beare government: and out of this storehouse came all the great Captaines that are renowned in histories. The same is also to be thought of private men. But because as every man hath most excelled, so his ambition hath most mooved him forward (with which spot all vertues are defiled, so that they loose all favour before God) it is to be accounted nothing worth, whatsoever seemeth praise worchie in ungodly men, beside that the chicfe part of uprightnesse faileth, where there is no studie to advance the glory of God, which all they want whom he hath not regenerate with his spirit. Neither is it vainely spoken in Esay, that upon Christ resteth the spirit of the feare of God, whereby wee are taught, that so many as are strange from Christ are without the feare of God, which is the beginning of wisdome. As for the vertues that deceive us with vaine shew, I grant they shall have praise in the court of policie, and in the common fame of men, but before the heavenly judgement seate, they shall be of no value to deserve righteousnesse.

5 With such bondage of sinne therefore as Will is deteined, it cannot once moove it selfe to goodnesse, much lesse applie it selfe. For such mooving is the beginning of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholly imputed to the grace of God. As Jeremy prayeth to the Lord to turne him, if he will have him turned. Whereupon the Prophet in the same Chapter, describing the spirituall redemption of the faithfull people, saith that they were redeemed out of the hand of a stronger, meaning with how strait fetters a sinner is bound so long as being forsaken of the Lord, hee liveth under the

The vertues of ungodly men do neither come of naturall goodnesse and by nature all corruption they are so polluted, that in the sight of God they are loathsome. Aug. lib. 4. cont. Julianum.

The will of man being corrupt, is of necessity yet without compulsion inclined unto sinne. Jerc. 31. 18.

yoke of the Diuell. Yet Will still remaineth, which with most bent affection is both enclined and hasteth to sinne. For man was not deprived of Will when hee did cast himselfe into this necessitie, but of the soundness of Will. And Bernard saith not unaptly, which teacheth that to Will is in us all: but to Will good is a profiting, to Will ill is a default: and therefore simply to Will, is the worke of man: to Will evill of corrupt nature: to Will well of grace. Now, whereas I say, that Will put from liberty is by necessitie drawne or led into evill, it is marvell if that should seeme a hard speech unto any man, which neither hath any absurditie in it, nor varieth from the use of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betwene necessitie and compulsion. But if a man aske them, is not God of necessitie good? is not the Devill of necessitie evill? what can they answer? For so is goodnesse knit with Gods divinitie, that it is no more necessarie that he be God than that he be good. And the Diuell is by his fall so estranged from partaking of goodnesse, that he can doe nothing but evill. But now if any robber of God doe barke against this and say, that God deserveth small praise for his goodnesse, which he is compelled to keepe: shall not this bee a readie answer to him, that it cometh to passe by his infinite goodnesse and not by violent impulsion, that he cannot doe evill. Therefore if this, that it is of necessitie that God doe well, doe not hinder the free will of God in doing well, if the Devill which cannot doe but evill yet willingly sinneth, who shall then say that a man doth therefore lesse willingly sinne for this that he is subject to necessitie of sinning? This necessitie, whereas Augustine each where speaketh of it, even then also when he was enviously pressed with the cavillation of Celestinus, he stuck not to affirme in these words, by libertie it came to passe that man was with sin, but now the corruption which flowed from punishment, hath of libertie made necessitie. And so oft as he filleth into mention thereof, he doubteth not to speake in this manner of the necessitie bondage of sinne. Therefore let this summe of that distinction be kept, that man since he is corrupted, sinneth indeed willingly and not against his will nor compelled, by a most bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulsion, by motion of his owne lust, and not by forraine constraint: but yet of such perverseness of nature as he is, he cannot but bee moved and driven to evill. If this be true, then surely it is plainly expressed that he is subject to necessitie of sinning. Bernard agreeing to Augustine writeth thus, onely man among all living creatures is free: and yet by meane of sinne, he also suffereth a certaine violence, but of will and not of nature, that even thereby also he should not be deprived of freedome, for that which is willing is free. And a little after, will being changed in it selfe into worke by I wot not what corrupt and marvellous manner, so maketh necessitie, that very necessitie, for as much as it is willing, cannot excuse will, and will for as much as it is drawne by allurement, cannot exclude necessity, for this necessitie is after a certaine manner willing. Afterward he saith that we are pressed downe with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certaine willing bondage, therefore by reason of our bondage wee are miserable, by reason of our will we are inexcusable, because wil when it was free, made it selfe the bond servant of sinne. At length he concludeth, that the soule is so after a certaine marvellous and evill manner holden both a bond servant and free, under this certaine willing and ill free necessitie: a bound servant by reason of necessitie, free by reason of will, and that which is more marvellous and mote miserable, therein guiltie wherein it is free, therein bound wherein it is guiltie, and so therein bound wherein it is free. Hereby truly the Readers doe perceive that I bring no new thing, which long agoe Augustine brought forth out of the consent of all godly men, and almost a thousand yeeres after was kept still in monkes Cloysters. But Lombard when he could not distinguish necessitie from compulsion, gave matter to a pernicious error.

6 On the other side it is good to consider what nanner remedie is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended and healed. For whereas the Lord in helping us, giveth us that which we want, when we shall know what his worke is in us, it will straight way appeare on the other side what is our needinesse. When the Apostle saith to the Phillippians, that hee trusteth that he, which began a good worke in them, will performe it unto the day of Iesus Christ: it is no doubt, that by the beginning of a good worke, he meaneth the very beginning of conversion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in us by stirring up in our hearts the love, desire and endeavour of righteoufnesse, or (to speake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our hearts to righteoufnesse: he endeth it in confirming us to perseverance. And that no man should cavill that good is begun by the Lord, when will being of it selfe weake is holpen: the holy Ghost in another place declareth what will is able to doe being left unto it selfe. I will give you (saith he) a new heart. I will put a new spirit in the mids of you. And I will take away the stonie heart from your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my spirit in the midst of you, and I will make you to walke in my commandements. Who shall say that the weake-nesse of mans will is strengthened with helpe, whereby it may effectually aspire to the choise of that that is good, when it must be wholly transformed and renewed? If there be any softnesse in a stone, which by some helpe being made tenderer will abide to be bowed every way, then will I grant that the heart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, so that that which in it is perfect, be supplied by the grace of God. But if hee meant to shew by this similitude, that no goodnesse couldever be wronge out of our heart unlesse it be made throughly new: let us not part betwene him and us, that which he challengeth to himselfe alone. If therefore a stone be transformed into flesh, when God turneth us to the desire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our owne will taken away, and that which commeth in place thereof is all of God. I say that will is taken away, not in that it is will, because in the conversion of man, that which was of the first nature abideth whole: also I say that it is created new, not that will then beginneth to be, but that it be turned from an evill will into a good. And this I affirme to be wholly done by God, because we are not able so much as to thinke, as the same Apostle witnesseth: therefore in another place hee saith, that God doth not only help our weake will, or amend our perverse will, but that he worketh in us to will. Whereupon is easily gathered, that which I said before, that whatsoever good is in will, it is the worke of only grace. In which sense in another place he saith, that it is God that worketh all in all. Neither doth he there entreat of the universall government, but giveth unto God alone the praise of all good things that the faithfull have. And in saying, all, truly he maketh God the authour of spirituall life, even from the beginning to the end. Which selfe something he had taught before in other words, saying that the faithfull are of God in Christ, where he plainly maketh mention of the new creation, where in that which was of common nature before, is destroyed. For there is to be understood a comparifon betwene Adam and Christ, which in another place he more plainly expresth, where he teacheth that wee are the worke of God created in Christ to good workes, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. For he goeth about by this reason to prove, that our salvation is of free gift, because the beginning of all goodnesse, is at the second creation, which wee obtaine in Christ. But if there were any power of our selves, were it never so small, we should have also some portion of merit. But he to prove us altogether nothing worth, reasoneth that we have deserved nothing, because we are create in Christ to good workes, which God hath prepared. In which words he signifieth againe, that all parts of good workes even from the first motion, are proper to God only. For this reason, the Prophet after hee had said in the Psalme that we are the workmanship of God, that there should be no partition, addeth by and by, we made not our selves. That he speaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of spirituall life, appeareth by the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flocke of his pastures. Wee see now how he not contented simply to have given to God the praise of our salvation, doth expressly exclude us from all fellowship with him, as if he would say, that there resteth no peece, be it never so litle, for man to glorie in, because it is all of God.

7 * But there be some peradventure will grant, that Will being of her owne nature, turned away from good, is converted by the onely power of the Lord: but so that being prepared before, it hath also her owne part in doing, as Augustine teacheth, that grace goeth before every good worke, but so, that will doth accompanie it and not lead it, as a waiting maide after it, and not a foregoer. Which thing being not evill spoken by the holy man, Peter Lombard doth disorderly writhe to this purpose. But I as-

* It is not enough to make God the principall actor and leader of our will unto good things but the whole processe must be ascribed entirely unto him.

affirme, that as well in the words of the Prophet which I have alleaged, as in the other places these two things be plainly signified, that the Lord doth both correct our corrupted will, or rather destroy it, and also of himselfe putteth in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is prevented by grace, in that respect I give you leave to call it a waiting maide: but for that being reformed, it is the worke of the Lord, that is wrongfully given to man that he doth with will coming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not well written of Chrysostome, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke very well in it selfe, is even now we have seene by Paul. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mans will the waiting maide of grace, to assigne unto her a certaine second office in dooing a good worke, but because this only was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principall cause of salvation in mans deserving: therefore he stood only upon this point, that grace was before all deserving: which was sufficient for the matter that hee had in hand, nor meddling in the meane time with the other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace which yet in another place hee excellently well handleth. For sometimes when he saith, that the Lord doth prevent the willing that he may will, and followeth the willing that hee will not in vaine, hee maketh him altogether the whole Author of the good worke. Albeit his sentences touching this matter, are too plaine to neede any long arguing upon them. Men (saith he) doe labour to finde in our will something that is our owne and not of God, but how it may be found I know not. And in his first booke against Pelagius and Celestius, where he doth expound that saying of Christ, Every one that hath heard of my father cometh to me, he saith: Free will is so helpe not only that it may know what is to be done, but also may do it when it hath knowne it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the law, but by the grace of the spirit, he so teacheth, that he that hath learned, doth not onely see it knowing, but also desire it in willing, and performe it in doing.

8. And because we are now in hand with the chiefe point whereupon the matter hangeth, let us goe forward and prove the summe thereof to the readers, onely with a few and the most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then least any man should accuse us of wrongfull wresting the Scripture, let us shew that the truth which we affirme being taken out of the Scripture, wanteth not the testimony of this holy man, I meane Augustine. For I thinke it not expedient, that all the things be rehearsed that may be brought out of the Scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, so that by the most chosen that shall be brought forth, the way may be prepared to understand all the rest that are here and there commonly read. And againe, I thinke it shall not be unskillfully done, if I openly shew that I agree well with that man whom worthily the consent of godly men doth much esteeme. Surely, it is evident by plaine and certaine prooffe that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where else but onely from God, for there cannot be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right will of himselfe, but it proceedeth from the same good pleasure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the world. There is also another reason not unlike unto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of Faith, it is to be seene whence Faith it selfe cometh. For as much as the whole scripture crieth out that it is a free gift of God, it followeth, that it is of the meere grace of God, when we, which are with all our minde naturally bent to evil, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lord, when hee nameth these two things in the conversion of his people, to take away from them a stonie heart, and to give them a heart of flesh, plainly testifieth that that which is of our selves must be done away, that we may be converted to righteousness: and that whatsoever cometh in place thereof, is from himselfe. And he uttereth not this in one place only. For he saith in Jeremie: I will give them one heart and one way, that they may feare mee all their dayes. And a little after, I will give the feare of my name into their heart, that they depart not from me. Againe in Ezechiel: I will give them one heart, and I will give a new Spirit in their bowels. I will take away the stony heart out of their flesh, and I will give them a heart of flesh. He could not more evidently claime to himselfe, and take from us whatsoever is good and right in our will, then when hee declarerh that our conversion is a creation of a new Spirit, and of a new heart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodnesse till it be reformed, and that after reformation, so much as it is good, is of God and not of us.

9. And so read wee the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lord encline our heart to him: (saith Salomon) that wee may keepe his commandemens. He sheweth the forwardnesse of our heart, which naturally rejoyceth to rebell against the Law of God if it bee not bowed. And the same thing is in the Psalm: Lord incline my heart to thy testimonies. For the comparison of contrarietie is alway to be noted, which is betweene the perverse motion of the heart, whereby it is carried to obstinacie, and this correction, whereby it is led to obedience. When David feeling himselfe for a tyme without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a new heart within him, to renew a right Spirit within his bowels: doth he not acknowledge that all the parts of his heart are full of uncleannesse, and his Spirit writhen with crooked pervernesse? and in calling the cleannesse which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doth he not attribute it wholly to God? But if any man take exception and say, that the very prayer is a token of a godly and holy affection: our answer is readie, that though David were by that time somewhat come to amendment, yet doth he still compare his first state with that sorrowfull fall that he had felt. Therefore taking upon him the person of a man estranged from God, hee for good cause prayeth to have given him all these things that God giveth to his elect in regeneration. And so being like a dead man, he wisheth himselfe to be created of new; that of the bondslave of Sathan, he may be made the instrument of the holy Ghost. Marvellous and monstrous surely is the lust of our pride. God requireth nothing more earnestly, than that we should most religiously keepe his Sabbath, that is in resting from our owne workes, but of us nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our owne workes farewell, to give due place to the workes of God. If sluggishnesse hindreth not, Christ hath given testimonie evident enough of his graces to make them not to be enviously suppressed. I am (saith he) the Vine, you be the branches: My Father is a husbandman. As the branch cannot beare fruit of it selfe, unlesse it abide in the Vine, no more can you, unlesse you abide in me. For without mee you can doe nothing. If we beare fruit none otherwise than a branch buddeth being plucked out of the ground and without moisture: we neede no more to seeke what is the aptnesse of our nature to goodnesse. And this is a plaine conclusion: Without me you can doe nothing. He doth not say that we are too weake to be sufficient for our selves: but in bringing us to nothing, he excludeth all opinion of power be it never so little. If we being grafted in Christ, beare fruit like a Vine, which taketh her efficacy of liveness both from the moysture of the earth, and from the dew of heaven, and from the cherishing of the Sunne: I see nothing remaine for us in doing a good worke, if wee keepe whole for God that which is his. The sonde subtile devise is alleaged in vaine, that there is joyce already enclosed within the branch, and a certaine power to bring forth fruit, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the first roote, because it bringeth some of her owne. For Christ doth meane nothing else, but that we are a drie stick and nothing worth, when wee be severed from him, because by our selves being separate, we have no power to doe well: as also in another place, he saith Every tree that my Father hath not planted shall be rooted up. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth all the whole unto him in the place already alleaged. It is God (saith he) that worketh in us both to will and to performe. The first part of a good worke is will: the second is a strong endeavour in doing it: the Author of both is God. Therefore wee steale it from God, if we take to our selves any thing, either in will, or in effectuall working. If it were said that God doth helpe our weake will, then somewhat were left for us. But when it is said that hee maketh will, now all the good that is in it, is set out of us. And because the good will is yet still oppressed with weight of our flesh that it cannot rise up: Hee said further, that to overcome the hardnesse of that battell there is ministred unto us stedfastnesse of endeavour even to the elect. For otherwise it could not stand together which hee teacheth in another place, that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all things in all, wherein wee have before taught that the whole course of spirituall life is comprehended. For which reason, David, after hee had prayed to have the waies of the Lord opened unto him, that hee might walke in his truth, by and by addeth: Vaite thou my heart to feele thy name. In which words hee signifieth, that even they that are well minded, are subiect to so many withdrawings of minde, that they easily vanish or fall away, if they be not established to constancie. For which reason in another place, after hee had prayed to have his steppes directed to keepe the word of God, hee requireth also to have strength given him to fight. Let not any iniquitie (saith hee) beare rule over me. After this sort therefore doth the Lord both begin and a good worke in us: that it may all be his worke, that, Will conceiveth a love of that which is right, that, it is inclined to the desire thereof, that it is stirred up and moved to the endeavour of following it. And then that our choise, desire, and endeavour faint not, but doe proceed even to the effect: last of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

10. And hee moveth the will, not in such sort as hath in many ages beene taught and beleaved: that it is afterward in our choise, either to obey or withstand the motion, but with mightily strengthening it. Therefore that must be rejected which Chrysostome so oft repeateth: whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he secretly teacheth that God doth onely reach out his hand, to see if he will be holpen by his aide. Wee grant that such was the state of man while he yet stood, that he might bow to either part. But such he hath taught by his example how miserable is free will, unlesse God both will and can in us: what shall become of us, if hee give us his grace according to that small proportion? But rather we doe obscure and extenuate it with our unthankfulness. For the Apostle doth not teach, that the grace of a good will is offered us, if we doe accept it, but that he will performe it in us: which is nothing else, but that the Lord by his Spirit doth direct, bow and governe our heart, and reigneth in it as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezechiel, that he will give to the elect a new spirit onely for this end, that they may be able to walke in his commandements, but to make them walke indeed. Neither can Christs saying, (Every one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwise taken, than to teach that the grace of God is effectuell of it selfe: as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace God vouchsafeth not to give to all men generally without regard, as that saying (as I thinke of Occam) is commonly spoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him that doth what lieth in him. Men are indeed to be taught that Gods goodnesse is laid open for all men, without exception that seeke for it. But forasmuch as they onely begin to seeke for it, whom the heavenly grace hath breathed upon, nor so much as the little peece ought to be plucked away from his praise. Truly this is the prerogative of the elect, that being regenerate by the spirit of God, they are moved and governed by his guiding. Therefore Augustine doth worthily as well mocke them, that claime any part of willing to themselves, as he doth reprehend other which think, that that is generally given to all men, which is the speciall testimonie of free election. Nature, (saith he) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a brittle subtiltie of wit like Glasse, that glistereth with meere vanitie, where it is generally extended to all; which, God giveth onely to whom it pleaseth him. And in another place: How camest thou? by beleaving. Feare thou, lest while thou takest upon thee that thou hast found the just way, thou perish out of the just way, I came (saist thou) by Free-will, I came by mine owne will, why swellest thou? wilt thou heare that this also is given thee? Heare even him that calleth: No man commeth to mee unlesse my Father draw him. And it is without controversie gathered out of Jobns words, that the hearts of the godly are so effectually governed by Gods working, that they follow with an unchangeable affection. Hee that is begotten of God (saith hee) cannot sinne, because the seed of God abideth in him. For wee see that the meane motion which the Sophisters imagine, which wee at our libertie may either obey or refuse, is openly excluded, where an effectuell constancie to continue, is affirmed.

But forasmuch as this error hath growne upon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuse or receive the grace of God offered, that opinion being driven away, this other doth also fall of it selfe. Albeit herein they doe erre two manner of waies. For beside this that they teach that our thankfulness toward the first grace and our lawfull use thereof are rewarded with the latter gifts: they adde also, that now grace alone doth not worke in us, but that it is onely a worker together with us. Of the first this we ought to believe, that the Lord while he daily enricheth and heapeth his servants with new gifts of his grace, because he liketh and favoureth the worke which he hath begun in them, findeth in them somewhat whereupon to bestow greater graces. And hereto serve those sayings. To him that hath, shall be given. Againe, Oh, good servant, because thou hast been faithfull in few things, I will set thee over many. But here two things are to be taken heed of, that neither the lawfull use of the first grace be said to be rewarded with the latter graces, nor it be so counted a rewarding, that it cease to be reckoned the free grace of God. I grant therefore, that this blessing of God is to be looked for of the faithfull, that how much the better they have used the first graces, they shall be encreased with so much the greater. But I say, that this use also is of the Lord, and that this rewarding is of his free good will. And they use no lesse wrongfully than unhappily that old distinction of working and together working grace. Augustine used the same indeed, but delaying it with a fit conjunction, that God together working with us doth ead that which in working hee beginneth, and that it is still the same grace but changeth name, according to the divers manner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that hee doth not part it betweene God and us, as if there were a mutual meeting together by the motion of both, but onely not by the multiplication of grace. To which purpose belongeth that which in another place he teacheth, that many gifts of God doe goe before the good will of man, among the which the selfe same is one. Whereupon followeth, that he leaveth nothing that it may claime to it selfe. Which thing Paul also hath namely expressed: For when hee had said that it is God, which worketh in us both to will a id to performe, hee by and by addeth that he doth them both of his good will, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodnesse. Whereas they are wont to say, that after we have once given place to the first grace, our owne indeavours doe now worke together with the grace that followeth. To this I answer: If they meane that wee, after wee have bene once by the power of the Lord brought to the obedience of righteounesse, doe of our owne accord goe forward, and are inclined to follow the working of grace, I speake nothing against it. For it is most certaine, that there is such a readinesse of obeying, where the grace of God reigneth. But whence cometh that, but from this, that the Spirit of God alway agreeing with it selfe, doth cherish and confirme to steadfastnesse of continuing the same affection of obeying, which it selfe engendred at the beginning. But if they meane, that man taketh of himselfe somewhat whereby to labour with the grace of God, they are most pestilently deceived.

12. And to this purpose is that saying of the Apostle wrongfully wrested by ignorance: I have labored more than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me. For they take it so: that because it might seeme somewhat arrogantly spoken, that he preferred himselfe before them all: therefore hee corrected it with referring the praise to the grace of God, but yet so that hee calleth himselfe a worker together with grace. It is marvell that so many which otherwise were not evil men, have stumbled at this straw. For the Apostle doth not write that the grace of the Lord laboureth with him, to the intent to make himselfe partner of the labour, but rather by this correction hee giveth away all the praise of the labour, to grace onely. It is not I (saith he) that have labored, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doubtfulness of the speech deceived them: but specially the ill translation wherein the force of the Greeke article was left out. For if it be translated word for word, he doth not say, that grace was a worker together with him, but that the grace that was with him, was the worker of all. And the same thing doth Augustine teach, not darkely, though shortly, where he thus saith:

The

The good will of man goeth before many gifts of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selle is one, then followeth his reason: because it is written His mercy hath prevented me: And his mercy shall follow me. It preventeth man not willing, to make him will: and it followeth him willing, that he will not in vaine. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the Church speaking thus: Draw me in a man ier unwilling, that thou mayst make willing: draw mee lying slothfull, that thou mayst make me runne.

13. Now let us heare Augustine speaking in his owne words, least the Pelagians of our age, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbion, should as they are wont, lay to our charge, that all antiquitie is against us, wherein they follow their father Pelagius, by whom long agoe Augustine was drawne forth into the same contention. In his booke of Correction and grace writteu to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will rehearse shortly, but yet doe it in his owne words: that to Adam was given the grace of continuing in good if he would: and to us is given to will, and by will to overcome concupiscence: that he therefore had to be able if he would, but not to will that hee might be able: so us is given both to will and to be able. That the first libertie wasto be able not to sinne, ours is much greater, not to able to sinne. And least hee should be thought to speake of the perfection to come after immortalitie (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a litle after he plucketh out this doubt. For (saith he) the will of holy men is so much kindled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able, because they so will: they therefore will, because God worketh that they so will. For if in so great weakenes, in which yet it becometh the power to be made perfect, for repressing of pride, their owne will were left unto them, that by the helpe of God they may if they will, and God doth not worke in them to will: then among so many temptations Will should needs fall downe for weaknesse, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is succour given to the weaknesse of mans will, that it should be moved without swerving or severing by the grace of God, and therefore should not faint how weak so ever it be. Then he entreateth more largely how our hearts doe of necessitie follow the moving of God that worketh affection in them. And hee saith, that the Lord doth draw men indeed with their owne wills, but with such as hee himselfe hath wrought. Now have we that thing testified by Augustines mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not onely offered by God to be received or refused at every mans free election, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election and will in the heart: so that every good worke that followeth after, is the fruit and effect thereof, and that it have no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For there are also his words out of another place, that nothing but grace maketh every good worke in us.

14. But whereas hee saith in another place, that will is not taken away by grace, but from an evil will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good: he meanceth onely that man is not so drawne, that without any motion of heart he is carried as by an outward impulsion, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his very heart hee obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely given to the elect, he writeth thus unto Boniface: We know that grace is not given to all men, and to them to whom it is given, it is not given according to the merits of works, nor according to the merits of will, but of free favour: and to them to whom it is not given, we know that it is by the just judgment of God that it is not given. And in the same Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace following is given to the deserving of men, because in not refusing the first grace, they shewed themselves worthy. For hee will have Pelagium grant, that grace is necessarie to us for every of our doings, and is not given in recompence to works, that it may be grace indeed. But the matter cannot be comprehended in a shorter summe, than out of the eight Chapter of his booke to Valentine of Correction and Grace, where first he teacheth that mans will obtaineth not grace by libertie, but libertie by grace: and that by the same grace, by affection of delight printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthened with invincible force: that while grace governeth, it never falleth away: when grace forsaketh, it by and by tumbleth downe. That by the free mercie of God it both is converted to good, and being converted abideth in it, that the direction of mans will to good, and steadfastnesse after direction, hangeth upon the onely will of God, and not upon any merit of his owne. And so to man is left such a free will, if we list so to call it, as he writeth of in another place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able.

THE FOURTH CHAPTER.

Satan sitteth and ruleth in the wills of wicked men, who of themselves are most willing to be stirred, led and guided by him.

IT is sufficiently proved, as I thinke, that man is so holden captive with the yoke of sinne, that of his owne nature he can neither aspire by desire, nor travell by endeavour to goodnesse: beside that, we have rehearsed a distinction betwene compulsion and necessity, whereby it might appeare, that when hee sinneth of necessity, yet neverthelesse he sinneth willingly. But forasmuch as while he is subject in bondage to the Divell, he seemeth rather to be led by the divels will than his owne, it resteth now to be declared, of what sort are both kinds of working. And then is this question to be answered, whether in evill works there be any thing to be attributed to God: in which the Scripture sheweth that there is used some working of his. In one place Augustino compareth mans will to a horse, which is readie to be ruled by the will of his rider, and God and devill he compareth to riders. If God (saith he) sit upon it, he like a sober and cunning rider, governeth it temperately, spurreth it forward if it be too slow, plucketh it back if it be too quick, restraineth the wantonnesse and wildnesse of it, tameth the stubbornnesse of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the Divell have possessed it, he like a foolish and wanton rider, violently carrieth it through places where no way is, driveth it into ditches, rolleth it downe steepe places, spurreth it forward to stubbornnesse and fearenesse: which similitude we will for this time bee contented with, sith there commeth not a better in place. Where it is said that the will of naturall man is subject to the rule of the divell, to be stirred by him; it is not meant, thereby that man as it were striving against it, and resisting, is compelled to obey, as wee compell bondslaves against their will, by reason of being their Lords, to doe our commandments: but that being bewitched with the deceits of Satan, it of necessity yeeldeth it selfe obedient to every leading of him. For whom the Lord vouchsafeth not to rule with his Spirit, them by just judgment he sendeth away to be moved of Satan. Wherefore the Apostle saith, that the God of this world hath blinded the mindes of the unbelievers ordained to destruction, that they should not see the light of the Gospell. And in another place: That hee worketh in the disobedient children. The blinding of the wicked, and all the wicked deedes that follow thereupon, are called the workes of Satan, of which yet the cause is not to be sought elsewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariseth the roote of evill, wherein resteth the foundation of the kingdome of Sathan, which is sinne.

2 Cor. 4. 4.

Eph. 2. 2.

God and Satan and man working one and the selfesame all worke diversly in respect as well of the end as the manner of doing.
Job. 1.

2. But farre other is the order of Gods doing in such things. And that the same may appeare more certainly unto us: let the hurt done to the holy man Iob by the Chaldees be an example. The Chaldees killed his heardmen, and like enemies in warre, drove away his cattell for booties. Now is their wicked deed plainly seene, and in that worke Sathan is not idle, from whom, the History saith, that all this did proceede. But Iob himselfe did acknowledge the worke of the Lord in it, whom he saith to have taken away from him those things, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can we refer the selfesame worke to God, as Author, to Sathan as Author, and to man as Author of it, but that we must either excuse Sathan by the company of God, or report God to be the author of evill? Very easily: if first we looke upon the end; why it was done, and then the manner how. The purpose of the Lord is by calamity to exercise the patience of his servant: The divell goeth about to drive him to despaire. The Chaldees against right and law, seeke gaine of that which is another mans. Such diversitie in purposes, makerh great difference in the worke. And in the manner of doing there is no lesse diversitie. The Lord leaveth his servant to Sathan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did choose for ministers to execute it, hee did leave, and deliver to him to be driven to it. Satan with his venomous stings, pricked forward the mindes of the Chaldees which otherwise were perverse of themselves to doe that mischief: they furiously runne to doe wrong, and doe binde and defile all their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly said, that Satan doth worke in the reprobate, in whom hee exerciseth his kingdome, that is to say, the kingdome of wickednesse. It is also said that God worketh in them after his manner, because Satan himselfe forasmuch as he is the instrument of his wrath, according to his bidding and commandment, turneth himselfe hither and thither to execute his just judgements. I speake not here of Gods universall moving, whereby as all creatures are sustained, so from thence they take their effectuall power of doing any thing. I speake onely of that speciall doing, which appeareth in every speciall act. Wee see therefore that it is no absurditie, that one selfe ad bee ascribed to God, to Satan, and to man: but the diversitie in the end and manner of doing, causeth that therein appeareth the justice of God to be without fault, and also the wickednesse of Satan and man bewrayeth it selfe to their reproach.

3. The old writers in this point also, are sometime precisely afraid, simply to confesse the truth, because they feare lest they should so open a window to wickednesse, to speake irreverently of the workes of God. Which sobriety as I embrace, so I thinke it nothing dangerous, if we simply hold what the Scripture teacheth. Augustine himselfe sometime was not free from the superstition, as where he saith, that hardning and blinding, pertaine not to the worke of God, but to his foreknowledge. But the phrases of Scripture allow not these subtilties, which phrases doe plainly shew that there is therein somewhat else of God, besides his foreknowledge. And Augustine himselfe in his fifth booke against Iulianus, goeth earnestly about with a long processe to prove that sinnes are not against the permission and sufferance of God, but also of his power that so former sinnes might bee punished. Likewise, that which they bring forth, concerning permission is too weak to stand. It is oftentimes said, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that he turneth, boweth, and moveth their hearts as I have elsewhere taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is never expressed, if we flee to free foreknowlde or sufferance. Therefore we answer that it is done after two manners. For first, whereas when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darkenesse and blindnesse: whereas when his spirit is taken away, our hearts wax hard and become stonies: whereas when his direction ceaseth, they are wrested into crookednesse, it is well said that he doth blind, harden and bow them from whom hee taketh away the power to see, obey and doe rightly. The second manner, which cometh neere to the proprietie of the words, is that for the executing of his judgements by Satan the minister of his wrath, hee both appointeth their purposes to what end it pleaseth him, and stirreth up their wils; and strengthneth their endeavours. So when Moses rehearseth that King Sehon did not give passage to the people, because God had hardened his Spirit, and made his heart obstinate, hee by and by adjoyneth the end of his purpose: that he might (saith he) give him into our hands. Therefore because it was Gods will to have him destroyed, the making of his heart obstinate, was Gods preparation to his destruction.

4. After the first manner this seemeth to be spoken. He taketh away the lip from the speakers of truth, and taketh away reason from the Elders. Hee taketh the heart away from them that are set over the people, hee maketh them to wander where no way is. Again, Lord, why hast thou made us mad, and hardened our heart, that wee should not feare thee? Because they judge rather of what sort God maketh men by forsaking them, than how he performeth his worke in them. But there are other testimonies that go further: as are these of the hardening of Pharao: I will harden the heart of Pharao, that he doe not heare you, and let the people goe. Afterward hee saith, that he hath made heavie and hardened his heart. Did he harden it, in not sustaining it? That is true indeed: but hee did somewhat more, that hee committed; his heart to Satan to bee confirmed with obstinacie. Whereupon he had before said: I will hold his heart. The people went out of Egypt, the inhabitants of that countrey came forth and met them like enemies. By whom were they stirred up? Truly Moses affirmeth to the people that it was the Lord that had hardened their hearts. And the Prophet reciting the same historie, saith that he turned their hearts, that they should hate his people. Now can you not say, that they stumbled being left without the counsell of God. For if they bee hardened and turned, then they are of purpose bowed to that selfe thing. Moreover so oft as it pleased him to punish the transgressions of the people, how did hee performe his worke in the reprobate? so as a man may see, that the effectuallnesse of working was in him, and they onely did service as ministers. Wherefore sometime hee threatened that he would call them out with his whistle, sometime that they should be like a net for him to entangle them, and sometime like a mallet, to strike the Israelites. But specially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Sennacherib an Axe, which was both directed and driven by his hand to cut. Augustine in one place doth not amisse appoint it after this sort: that in as much as they sinne, it is their owne: in as much as in sinning they doe this or that, it is of the power of God, that divided the darknesse as pleaseth him.

In the evil motions of wicked men God worketh after two sorts, the one by withholding his grace, whereby they might be moved unto good, the other by using the ministerie of Satans so fir, frame and encline their wils Lib. de predest. & grat.

5. Now that the ministerie of Sathan is used to pricke forward the reprobate, so oft as the Lord by his providence appointeth them to this or to that, may sufficiently be proved, though it were but by one place onely. For it is oftentimes said in Samuel that the evill spirit of the Lord, and an evill spirit from the Lord, did either violently carry or leave Saul. To say that this spirit was the holy Ghost, is blasphemous. Therefore the uncleane spirit is called the spirit of God, because it answereth at his commandement and power, being rather his instrument in doing, than an authour of it selfe. This is also to be added withall, which Paul teacheth, that the efficacy of error and deceiving is sent by God, that they which have not obeyed the truth, may beleve lies. But there is alway great difference in one selfe same worke, betweene that which the Lord doth, and that which Satan and the wicked goe about. He maketh the evill instruments that hee hath under his hand, and may turne whether hee list to serve his justice. They in as much as they are evill, doe bring forth in effect the wickednes that they have conceived by corruptnesse of nature. The rest of such things as serve for to deliver the majesty of God from slander, and to cut off all chisling from the wicked, are already set forth in the Chapter concerning Providence. For in this place my purpose was onely to shew how Satan reigneth in the reprobate man, and how God worketh in them both.

6. Although we have before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what liberty man hath in those doings, which are neither just nor faulty of themselves, and belonging rather to the bodily than the spirituall life. Some in such things have granted him free election, rather, as I thinke, because they would not strive about a matter of no great importance, than that they minded certainly to prove the same thing that they grant. As for mee, although I confesse that they which doe hold that they have no power to righteousnesse, doe hold the thing that is principally necessary to salvation: yet I doe thinke that this point also is not to be neglected, that wee may know that it is of the speciall grace of the Lord, so oft as it cometh in our minde to choosethat which is for our profit, so oft as our will inclineth thereunto: againe, so oft as our wit and mind escheweth that which else would have hurt us. And the force of Gods providence extendeth thus far, not onely to make the successes of things to come to passe, as he shall foresee to be expedient, but also to make the wills of men to tend thereunto. Truly, if we consider in our wit the administration of outward things, we shall thinke that they are so far under the will of man: but if wee shall give credit to so many testimonies, which cry out that the Lord doth in these things also rule the hearts of men, they shall compell us to yeeld our will subject to the speciall moving of God. Who did procure the good wils of the Aegyptians to the Israelites, to lend them all their most precious Jewels? They would never have found in their hearts to have so done of their owne accord. Therefore their hearts were more subject to the Lord, than ruled by themselves. And truly if Jacob had not bene perswaded that God put into men divers affections as pleaseth him, he would not have said of his sonne Joseph, whom hee thought to be some Heathen Aegyptian: God grant you to finde mercy before this man. As also the whole Church confesseth in the Psalme, when it pleased God to have mercy upon it, he meekened the hearts of the cruell nations. Againe, when Saul so waxed on fire with anger, that he prepared him to warre, the cause is expressed, for that the spirit of God did enforce him. Who turned away Absolons minde from embracing the counsell of Achitophel, which was wont to be holden as an oracle? Who enclined Rehoboam to be perswaded with the young mens advise? Who made the nations that were before great, to bee afraid at the coming of Israel? Truly, the harlot Rahab confessed, that it was done by God. Againe, who threw downe the hearts of Israel with dread and fearefulnesse, but he that in the law threatned that he would give them a fearefull heart?

7. Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule whereof all things univerſally ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently proved that which I affirme, that God so oft as he meaneth to prepare the way for his providence, even in outward things doth bow and turne the wils of men, and that their choise is not so free, but that Gods will beareth rule over the freedome thereof. That thy minde hangeth rather upon the mooving of God, than upon the freedome of thine own choise, this daily experience shall compell thee to thinke whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in things of no perplexitie thy judgment and wit oft faileth thee, in things not hard to be done thy courage fainteth: againe in things most obscure, by and by present advise is offered thee: in things great and perillous, thou hast a courage overcoming all difficulty. And so do I expound that which Salomon saith: That the eare may heare, that the eye may see, the Lord worketh both. For I take it that he speaketh not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of using of them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hand and boweth whether hee will the heart of the King as the streames of waters: truly under the example of one speciall sort, he comprehendeth the whole generalitie. For if the will of any man bee free from subjection, that preeminence principally belongeth to the will of a King, which useth as it were a kingdom upon the will of other: but if the will of the King bee ruled with the hand of God, no more shall our will be exempted from the same estate. Upon this point there is a notable saying of Augustine: The Scripture if it be diligently looked upon doth shew, that not onely the good wils of men which hee of evill maketh good, and so being made by himselfe doth direct to good doings and to eternal life, but also these wils that preserve the creatures of the world, are so in the power of God, that he maketh them to be enclined whether he will and when he will, either to doe benefits, or to execute punishments, by a judgement most secret indeed, but the same most righteous.

8. Here let the Readers remember, that the power of mans wil is not so to be weighed by the successe of things, which some unskilfull men are unorderly wont to doe. For they seeme to themselves to proove trimly and wittily that mans will is in bondage, because even the highest Monarches have not all things flowing after their owne desire. But this power whereof we speake, is to be considered within man and not be measured by outward successe. For in the disputation of freewill, this is not to the question, whether man may for outward impediments, performe and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in minde: but whether he have in every thing both a free election of judgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man have, then Attilius Regulus enclosed in the narrownesse of a tunne, set full of sharpe pricks, shall no lesse have freewill than Augustus Cesar, governing a great part of the world with the becke of his countenance.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER.

A consultation of the objections that are wont to be brought for defence of Freewill.

IT might seeme that we have said enough already, concerning the bondage of mans will, if they that with false opinion of libertie, labour to throw it downe headlong, did not on the contrarie part pretend certaine reasons to assaile our meaning. First they heape up together divers absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring

Daily experience may enforce any man so to confesse that in common outward things the freedome of our choise is ruled and guided by the hand of God without which we could not of our selves see and obtaine that which is good, otherwise and avoid that which is evill.

* The meaning of the question concerneth the freedome of mans will is not often hindered or no form obtaining the things he willeth for, but whether his judgement and affection be so addicted unto evill that he cannot of himselfe deserre or dislike that which is good.

The necessity of sinning doth not excuse us when we sinne both because Adam of his owne accord made himselfe and his subject thereunto, and also for that he which necessarily sinneth, doth nevertheless voluntarily: which answereth their reason which argue in defence of free will, if sin be necessary, it ceaseth to be sinne: if voluntary, then it may be avoided, and is not necessary.

A second argument in defence of free will, wherein it is objected that the denial thereof is repugnant to Gods punishing or rewarding men. But he putteth them for their desert, though they sin of necessity, because they are voluntarily in those bonds: and he rewardeth them of his owne mercie, though because they doing well is merly by grace, they cannot deserve to be rewarded.

abhorring from common reason: afterward they set upon it with testimonies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beare backe in order. If (say they) Sinne bee of necessitie, then ceaseth it to bee sinne: if it bee voluntarie, then may it be avoided. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to assaile Augustine, with whose name we will not yet have them oppressed, till we have satisfied them, concerning the matter it selfe. I denie therefore that sinne ought the lesse to be imputed, because it is necessary. I denie againe that this doth follow which they conclude, that it may be avoided, because it is voluntarie. For if any man will dispute with God, and seeke to escape from his judgement by this pretence, because hee could no otherwise doe: God hath that answer ready which we in another place have spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaves to sinne, can will nothing but evil. For whence cometh this want of power which the wicked would gladly pretend, but upon this, that Adam of his owne accord made himselfe subject to the tyrannie of the Devill? Hereupon therefore grew the corruption, with the bonds whereof we are holden fast tied, for that the first man fell from his Creator. If all men be justly holden guilty of his falling away, let them not thinke themselves excused by necessitie, in which it selfe they have a most evident cause of their damnation. And this I have above plainly set forth, and I have given an example in the Devill himselfe, whereby it might appeare, that he which necessarily sinneth, doth nevertheless willingly sinne: as againe in the elect Angels, whereas their will cannot decline from good, yet it ceaseth not to be a will. Which same thing Bernard also aptly teacheth: that we are therefore the more miserable, because our necessitie is voluntarie: which yet holdeth us so subject unto it, that we be the bondslaves of sinne, as we have before rehearsed. The second part of their argument is faultie, because from voluntary it straightway leaperth to free: but we have before proved, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subject to free election.

2. They further say, that if both vertues and vices proceed not of free choice of will, it is not reasonable that either punishment should be laid upon man, or reward given to him. This argument, although it be Aristotles, yet I grant is in some places used by Chrysostome and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Hierome himselfe hideth not, and also rehearseth it in their owne words. If the grace of God worke in us: then it, not we that labour, shall be crowned. Of punishments I answer, that they are justly laid upon us, from whom the guiltinesse of sinne proceedeth. For what matter maketh it, whether sinne be done by free or bond judgement, so it be done by voluntarie lust: specially sith man is hereby proved a sinner, for that hee is under the bondage of sinne? As to the rewards of righteousness: a great absurditie forthwith it is, if we confesse that they hang rather upon Gods bountifullnesse, than upon our owne deservings. How oft finde wee this thing repeated in Augustine: that God crowneth not our deservings, but his owne gifts: and that they are called rewards, not as due to our deservings, but such as are rendered to the graces already bestowed upon us? Wisely indeed they note this, that now there remaineth no place for deservings, if they come not out of the fountaine of freewill: but where they reckon that which we say so far differing from truth, they are much deceived. For Augustine doubteth not, commonly to teach for necessary, that which they thinke so unlawfull to confesse, as where he saith: What be the merits of any men whatsoever they be? when he cometh, not with due reward, but with free grace, then hee alone being free, and that maketh free from sinne? He findeth all men sinners. Againe, if that shall be rendered to thee that is due to thee, thou art to bee punished: what is done then? God hath not given thee punishment which is due, but giveth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt bee estranged from grace, boast of thy deservings. Againe: Thou art nothing of thy selfe, Sinnes are thine, but deservings are Gods, punishment is due to thee: and when reward cometh, he shall crowne his owne gifts, and not thy deservings. And in the same meaning in another place, he teacheth that grace is not of deserving, but deserving of grace. And a little after he concludeth, that God with his gifts goeth before all deservings, that out of the same he may gather his owne deservings, and doth give altogether freely, because he findeth nothing whereupon to save. But what need is it to make a longer longer register, when such sentences are often found in his writings? But the Apostle shall yet better deliver them from this errour, if they heare what beginning he conveyeth the glory of the Saints: whom he hath chosen, them he hath called: whom he hath called, them he hath justified: whom he hath justified, them he hath glorified. Why then, as witnesseth the Apostle, are the faithfull crowned? because by the Lords mercy and not by their owne endeavour, they are both chosen, and called, and justified. Away therefore with this vaine feare, that there shall no more be any deservings, if free will shall not stand. For it is most foolish to be fraied away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth us. If (saith he) thou hast received all things, why gloriest thou, as if thou hadst not received them? Thou seest that for the same cause hee taketh all things from free will, to leave no place for deservings: but as the bountifullnesse and liberalitie of God is manifold, and impossible to be spent out, those graces which hee bestoweth on us, because he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne vertues.

3. Moreover they bring forth that which may seeme to be taken out of Chrysostome: If this be not the power of our will, to choose good or evil, then they that are partakers of the same nature, must either all be evil, or all be good. And not farre from that is hee, whatsoever he was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about under the name of Ambrose, when hee maketh this argument, that no man should ever depart from the faith, unless the grace of God did leave unto us the state of mutabilitie: wherein it is marvell that so excellent men fell beside themselves. For how chanceth it came not in Chrysostomes minde, that it is Gods election that so maketh difference betweene men? As for us, wee feare not to grant that which Paul with great earnestnesse affirmeth, that altogether are perverse and given to wickednesse: but with him we adjoyne this, that by Gods mercie it cometh to passe that all abide not in perversnesse. Therefore whereas naturally we are all sicke of one disease, they onely recover health upon whom it hath pleased God to lay his healing hand. The rest whom by just judgement he passeth over, pine away in their owne rottennesse till they be consumed. Neither is it of any other cause that some continue to the end, and some fall in their course begun. For continuance it selfe is the gift of God, which he giveth not to all indifferently, but dealeth it to whom it pleaseth himselfe. If a man aske for a cause of the difference, why some continue constantly, and some faile by unstedfastnesse, wee know none other cause but that God sustaineth the one sort strengthened with his power, that they perish not, and doth not give the same strength to the other sort, that they may be examples of inconstancie.

4. Further they presse us, saying, that exhortations are vainely taken in hand, that the use of admonitions is superfluous, that it is a fond thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of the sinner to obey. When the like things in time past were objected against Augustine, hee was compelled to write the booke of Correction and grace. Where although hee largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his adversaries to this summe: O man, in the commandement learne what thou oughtest to doe: in correction, learne that by thine owne fault thou hast not: in prayer, learne whence thou mayest receive that which thou wouldest have. Of the same argument in a manner is the booke of the Spirit and Letter, where he teacheth that God measureth not the commandements of his law by the strength of man, but when he hath commanded that which is right, hee freely giveth with his eldest power to fulfill it. And this is no matter of long disputation. First, we are not onely in this cause, but also Christ and all the Apostles. Now let the other looke how they will get the matter in striving, that match themselves with such adversaries. Doth Christ, which teacheth that we can doe nothing without him, any thing the lesse rebuke and chastise them that without him did evil? Doth hee lesse exhort every man to apply himselfe to good workes? How severely doth Paul inveigh against the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie? and yet he praierh for charitie to be given to the same men from God. He testifieth in the Epistle to the Romanes, that it is neither of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that liath mercie, and yet he ceaseth not afterward to admonish, to exhort, and to rebuke. Why doe they not therefore speake to the Lord, that he do not so lose his labour in requiring of men those things, which he himselfe alone can give, and in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why do they not admonish Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to raine, but in the mercy of God, going before them which now hath forsaken them? As if the Lord had not a very good reason of his doctrine, which offereth it selfe readily to be found of them that reverently seeke it, but how much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking doe worke of themselves, to the changing of the minde, Paul declareth, when he writeth, that neither he that planteth is any thing, nor he that watereth, but the Lord that giveth the increase onely, effectually worketh. So we see that Moses severally stablisheth the commandments of the Law, and the Prophets doe sharply call upon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confesse, that men doe then onely waxe wise, when a heart is given them to understand, that it is the proper worke of God to circumsise the hearts, and in steed of stonie hearts, to give hearts of flesh, so write his law in the bowels of men: finally in renewing of soules to make that his doctrine may be effectuell.

5. Wherefore then serve exhortations? For this purpose, if they bee despised of the wicked with an obstinate heart, they shall be for a witnesse unto them when they shall come to the judgement seat of the Lord, yea and even now already they beat and strike their conscience: for howsoever the most froward man laugheth them to scorne, yet can he not disprove them: but thou wilt say, what may silly miserable man doe, if the softnesse of heart, which was necessarily required to obedience, be denied him? Nay rather, why doth hee excuse himselfe, when hee can impute the hardnesse of heart to none but to himselfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly ready to mocke them out if they might, are throwne downe with the force of them whether they will or no. But the chiefe profit towards the faithfull is to be considered: in whom as the Lord worketh all things by his spirit, so hee leaveth not the instruments of his word, and useth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stand which is true, that all the strength of the godly resteth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the Prophet: I will give them a new heart, that they may walke in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their duty, and not rather left to the direction of the holy Ghost? Why are they moved with exhortation, sith they can make no more hast than the stirring forward of the holy Ghost worketh? Why are they chastised if at any time they be gone out of the way, sith they fall by the necessarie weaknesse of the flesh? O man, what art thou to appoint a law for God? If it be his pleasure, that we be prepared by exhortation to receive the selfe same grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this order to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing else profit with the godly; but to reprove them of sinne, they were even for that thing onely to bee counted not altogether unprofitable. Now, forasmuch as by the holy Ghost working inwardly, they much availe to enflame the desire of goodnesse, to shake off sluggishnesse, to take away the pleasure and venomous sweetnesse of wickednesse, and on the other side to engender a hatred or ircksomeesse thereof; who dare cavill that they are superfluous? If any man requite a plainer answer, let him take this: God worketh after two sorts in his elect, inwardly by his spirit, outwardly by his word: By his spirit, by enlightning their minds, by framing their hearts to the love and keeping of justice, he maketh them a new creature: By his word, hee stirreth them to desire, to seeke and attaine the same renewing, by them both hee sheweth forth the effectuell working of his hand; according to the proportion of his distribution. When he sendeth the same word to the reprobate, though not for their amendment, yet he maketh it to serve for another use: that both for the present time they may be pressed with witnesse of conscience; and may against the day of judgement be made more inexcusable. So though Christ pronounce that no man cometh to him, but whom the Father draweth, and that the elect doe come when they have heard and learned of the Father: yet doth not hee neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whom it necessarily behoveth to bee inwardly taught by the holy Ghost, that they may any thing profit. And Paul teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, because it is to them the favour of death to death, but a sweet favour to God.

6. They be very laborious in heaping together of testimonies of Scripture: and that they doe of purpose, that when they cannot oppresse us with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battels, when it commeth to hand strokes, the weaker multitude how much pompe and shew soever it hath, is with a few stripes discomfited and put to flight: so shall it bee very easie for us to overthrow them with all their rout. For because the places that they abuse against us, when they are once divided into their orders, doe meet upon a few speciall points, wee shall with one answer satisfie many of them: therefore it shall not be needfull to tarry upon dissolving every one of them particularly. Their chiefe force they set in the commandements, which they thinke to bee so temperate to our strengths, that whatsoever is proved to be required by the one, it necessarily followeth, that it may be performed by the other. And therefore they runne through every of the commandements, and by them doe measure the proportion of our strength. For (say they) either God mocketh us when he chargeth us with holinesse, godlinesse, obedience, chastitie, love and meekenesse: and when hee forbiddeth us uncleannesse, idolatrie, unchastnesse, wrath, robbetrie, pride, and such like: or he requireth onely those things that are in our power. Now we may divide into three sorts in manner all the commandements that they heape together. Some require our first conversion to God, some speake simply of the keeping of the law: some command us to continue in the grace of God that we have received. First let us speake of them all in generalitie, and then descend to the speciall sorts. To extend the power of man to the commandements of the Law, hath indeed long agoe begun to bee common, and hath some shew: but it proceeded from most rude ignorance of the Law. For they that thinke it a hainous offence, if it be said that the keeping of the Law is impossible, doe rest forth upon this most strong argument, that else the Law was given in vaine. For they speake in such sort, as if Paul had no where spoken of the law. For, I beseech them, what meane these sayings, that the law was set because of transgressions: That by the Law is the knowledge of sinne: that the Law maketh sinne: that the Law entred, that sinne might abound: was it meant that the Law was to be limited to our strengths least it should be given in vaine? or rather that it was set farre above us to convince our weakenesse? Truly by the same mans definition, the end and fulfilling of the Law is charity. But when he wisheth the mindes of the Thessalonians to be filled with charity, he doth sufficiently confesse, that the Law soundeth in our eares without profit, unless God inspire the whole summe thereof in our hearts.

7. Truly, if the Scripture did teach nothing else, but that the law is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeavour, I would also without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doth diligently and plainly declare unto us the manifold use of the Law: it is convenient rather to consider by that interpretation, what the Law may doe in man. For so much as concerneth this present cause: it teacheth that so soone as it hath appointed what we ought to doe, the power to obey commeth of the goodness of God, and therefore moveth us to prayer, whereby wee may require to have it given us. If there were onely the commandement and no promise, then were our strengths to be tried whether they were sufficient to answer the commandement, but sith there are promises joynd withall, which cry out, that not onely our aide, but also all our whole power consisteth in the helpe of Gods grace, they doe testifie enough and more, that wee are altogether unfit, much more insufficient to keepe the Law. Wherefore let this proportion of our strengths with the commandements of Gods law be no more enforced, as if the Lord had measured the rule of justice, which hee purposed to give in his Law, according to the rate of our weakenesse. Rather by his promises we ought to consider, how unready we are of our selves which in every behalfe doe so much need his grace. But who (say they) shall be perswaded that it is like to be true, that the Lord appointed his Law to stocks and stones? Neither doth any man goe about to perswade it. For the wicked are neither stocks nor stones, when being taught by the law that their lusts doe strive against God, they are proved guiltie by their owne witness. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weakenesse, they sit unto grace. For which purpose serve these sayings of Augustine. The Lord commandeth those things that wee cannot doe, that we may know what we ought to aske of him.

Great is the profit of the commandments, if so much bee given to free will, that the grace of God be the more honoured. Faith obtaineth that which the Law commandeth, yea the Law therefore commandeth, that faith may obtaine that which was commanded by the Law: yea, God requireth faith it selfe of us, and findeth not what to require, unless he give what to finde. Againe, Let God give what hee commandeth, and command what he will.

8. That shall more plainly bee seene in rehearsing the three sorts of commandments which we touched before. The Lord oftentimes commandeth both in the Law and in the Prophets, that we be converted unto him. But on the other side, the Prophet answereth, Convert me Lord, and I shall be converted: for after that thou didst convert me, I repented, &c. He commandeth us to circumcise the uncircumcised skin of our heart: and by Moses he declareth that this circumcision is done by his owne hand. Hee each where requireth newnesse of heart, but in another place he testifieth that it is given by himselfe. That which God promiseth (saith Augustine) wee doe not by free will or nature, but he himselfe doth it by grace. And this is the same note, that he himselfe rehearseth in the fifth place among the rules of Ticonius, that we wel make difference betwene the Law and the promises, or betwene the commandments and grace. Now let them go that gather by the commandments, whether man be able to doe any thing toward obedience in such sort that they destroy the grace of God, by which the commandments themselves are fulfilled. The commandments of the second sort are simple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to serve and cleave unto his will, to keepe his commandments, to follow his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that doe testifie that it is his gift whatsoever rightousnesse, holinesse, godlinesse, or puritie may be had. Of the third sort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithfull, which is rehearsed by Luke, that they should abide in the grace of God. But from whence that strength of constancie is to be had, the same Paul teacheth in another place. That remaineth, saith he, brethren, bee ye strong through the Lord. In another place he forbiddeth us, that we doe not grieve the spirit of God, wherewith we are sealed unto the day of our redemption. But because the thing that hee there requireth, could not bee performed by men, therefore hee wisheth it to the Theſſalonians, from God namely, that he would reckon them worthe of his holy calling: and fulfill all the purpose of his goodnesse, and the worke of faith in them. Likewise in the second Epistle to the Corinthians, in treating of almes, he oftentimes commendeth their good and godly will, yet a little after, he thanketh God that put it in the heart of Titus, to take upon him to give exhortation. If Titus could not so much as use the office of his mouth, to exhort other, but onely so farre as God did put unto him, how should other have bene willing to doe, unless God himselfe had directed their hearts?

9. The crasier sort of them doe cavill at all these testimonies: because there is no impediment, but that we may joyne our owne strengths, and God to helpe our weak endeavours. They bring also places out of the Prophets, where the effect of our conversion seemeth to be parted in halfe betwene God and us. Turne ye to mee, and I will turne to you. What manner of helpe the Lord bringeth us, we have above shewed, and it is not needfull here to repeate it. This one thing I would have granted me, that it is vainely gathered, that there is required in us a power to fulfill the Law, because God doth command the obedience of it: For as much as it is evident, that for the fulfilling of all the commandments of God, the grace of the law-giver is both necessarie for us, and promised unto us. Thereby then it appeareth, that at the least there is more required of us than we are able to pay. And that saying of Hieremie cannot bee wiped away with any cavillations: that the covenant of God made with the ancient people was void, because it was onely litterall, and that it could no otherwise bee established, than when the spirit commeth unto it, which frameth the hearts to obedience. Neither doth that saying, Turne ye to mee, and I will turne unto you, favour their error. For there is meant not that turning of God, wherewith hee reneweth our hearts to repentance, but wherewith he by prosperitie of things doth declare himselfe favourable and mercifull: as by adversitie hee sometime sheweth his displeasure. Whereas therefore the people being vexed with many sorts of miseries, and calamities, did complaine

that God was turned away from them; he answereth, that they shall not be destitute of his favour, if they returne to uprightnesse of life, ad to himselfe that is the patterne of righteousnesse: Therefore the place is wrongfully wrested, and it is drawne to this purpose, that the worke of our conversion should seeme to bee parted betweene God and men, These things we have comprehended so much the shorter, because the proper place for this matter shall be where we intreat of the Law.

10. The second sort of their arguments is much like unto the first. They alleadge the promises whereby God doth covenant with our will, of which sort are: Seeke good and not evil, and ye shall live. If yee will and doe heare, ye shall eate the good things of the earth: but if ye will not, the sword shall devour you, because the Lords mouth hath spoken it. Againe, if thou put away thine abominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not be driven out: If thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lord thy God, and observe and doe all his commandements which I command thee this day, then the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all the nations of the earth. And other like. They doe inconveniently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these benefits which the Lord doth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne will: unlessse it were in us to stablish them or make them voide. And right easie it is to amplifie this matter with eloquent complaints, that the Lord doth cruelly mocke us, when hee pronounceth that his favour hangeth upon our will, if the same will be not in our power And that this liberaltie of God should be a goodly thing forsooth, if he so set his benefits before us, that we have no power to use them: and a marvellous assurednesse of his promises, which hang upon a thing impossible, so as they might never be fulfilled. But of such promises as have a condition adjoynded, we will speake in another place: so that it shall be plaine, that there is no absurditie in the impossible fulfilling of them. And for so much as concerneth this place: I denie that God doth ungently mocke us when hee moveth us to deserve his benefits, whom he knoweth to bee utterly unable to doe it. For whereas the promises are offered both to the faithfull and to the wicked, they have their use with both sorts. As God with his commandements pricketh the consciences of the wicked, that they should not too sweetely take pleasure in their sinnes, without any remembrance of his judgements: so in his promises he doth in a manner take them to witness, how unworthy they are of his goodnessse. For who can denie that it is most rightfull and convenient, that the Lord doe good to them of whom he is honoured, and punish the despisers of his Majestie, according to his severitie? Therefore God doth well and orderly when in his promises he adjoyndeth this condition to the wicked that are bound with the fetters of sinne, that they shall then onely enjoy his benefits, if they depart from their wickednesse: or for this purpose onely, that they may understand that they are worthily excluded from these things, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Againe, because he seeketh by all meanes to stir up the faithfull to call upon his grace, it shall not be inconvenient, if he attempt the same thing also by promises, which we have shewed that hee hath done to great profit with commandements toward them. Being enforced of the will of God, by his commandements, we are put in mind of our miserie, which doe with all our heart too far dissent from the same and we be therewithall pricked forward to call upon his spirit, whereby we may be directed into the right way. But because our sluggishnesse is not sufficiently sharpened with commandements, there are added promises which with a certaine sweetness may allure us to the love of them. And that the more desire that we have of righteousnesse, we may be the more fervent to seeke the favour of God. Loe how in these requests (if you will: If you shall heare,) the Lord neither giveth us power to will nor to heare, and yet mocketh us not for our want of power.

11. The third sort of their arguments, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring forth the places wherein God reprocheth the unthankfull people, and saith that they themselves onely were the cause that they received not of his tender love all kinde of good things. Of which sort are the places: Amalek and the Cananee are before you, with whose sword you shall fall, because yee would not obey the Lord, because I called and yee answered not, I will doe to this house as I did to Silo. Againe, this nation hath not heard the voice of the Lord their God, nor hath received discipline, therefore it is cast away from the Lord. Again, because ye have hardened your heart and would not obey the Lord, all these evils are hapned unto you. How (say they) could such reproches be laid against them which might readily answer? As for us, we loved prosperitie, and feared adversitie. But whereas for to obtaine the one and avoid the other we obeyed not the Lord, nor hearkned to his voice: this was the cause thereof, for that it was not at our libertie so to doe, because we were subject to the dominion of sinne. Vainely therefore are these evils laid to our charge, which it was not in our power to avoid. But leaving the pretence of necessity, wherein they have but a weak and sickly defence, I aske of them whether they can purge themselves of all fault. For if they be found guiltie of any fault, then the Lord doth not without cause reprove them, that it came to passe by their perversesse, that they felt not the fruit of his clemencie. Let them answer therefore, whether they can deny, that their froward will was the cause of their stubbornesse. If they finde the spring head of the evil within themselves, why gape they to finde out forreine causes, that they might seeme not to have beene authors of their owne destruction? But if it be true that by their owne fault and none others, sinners are both deprived of the benefits of God, and chastised with punishments, then is there great reason why they should heare these reproches at the mouth of God: that if they goe obstinately forward in their faults, they may learne in their miseries rather to accuse and abhorre their owne wickednesse, than to blame God of unjust crueltie: that if they have not cast off all willingnesse to learne, they may be wearie of their sinnes, by the deserving whereof they see themselves miserable and undone, and may returne into the way, and acknowledge the same with earnest confession which the Lord rehearseth in chiding them. For which purpose it appeareth by the solemne prayer of Daniel, which is in the ninth chapter, that those chidings of the Prophets which are alleaged, did avails with the godly. Of the first use we see an example in the Jewes, to whom Jeremy is commanded to declare the cause of their miseries, whereas yet it should not have fallen otherwise than the Lord had foresaid. Thou shalt speak unto them all these words and they shall not heare thee: thou shalt call them, and they shall not answer thee. To what end then did they see to deafen men? that being even loth and unwilling, yet they should understand that it was true that they heard, that it were wicked sacrilege if they should lay upon God the blame of their evils which rested in themselves. By these few solutions thou maist easily deliver thy selfe from the infinite heape of testimonies, which for to erect an image of free-will, the enemies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as well out of the commandements as out of the protestations against the professors of the law. It is reprochfully spoken in the Psalme concerning the Jewes: a froward generation that have not made their heart straight. Also in another Psalme, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hearts, and that because all the fault of obstinacy remaineth in the perversesse of men. But it is fondly gathered thereof, that the heart is pitiable to either side, the preparing whereof is only of God. The Prophet saith: I have inclined my heart to keepe thy commandements, because he had willingly and with a cheerfull earnest affection of minde addicted himselfe to God, and yet he doth not boast himselfe to be the Author of his owne inclination, which he confessed in the same Psalme to be the gift of God. Therefore we must hold in minde the admonition of Paul, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne salvation with feare and trembling, because it is the Lord that worketh both the willing and the performing. Indeed hee assigneth them offices, to be doing, that they should not give themselves to sluggishnesse of the flesh: but in that hee commandeth them to have feare and carefulnesse, hee so humbleth them, that they may remember that the same thing which they are commanded to doe, is the proper worke of God, wherein plainly hee expresseth, that the faithfull worke passively, as I may so call it, in so much as power is ministred them from heaven, that they should claime nothing at all to themselves. Wherefore when Peter exhorteth us that we should adde power in faith, hee granteth not unto us a second office, as if we should doe any thing severally by our selves, but onely hee awaketh the slothfulnesse of the flesh, wherewith commonly faith itselfe is choked. To the same purpose seemeth that saying of Paul: Extinguish not the spirit, for slothfulnesse doth oftentimes creepe upon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their owne choise to cherish the light being offered them, his ignorance shall be easily confuted: because the selfe same diligence that Paul requireth, cometh onely from God. For we are also oftentimes commanded to purge our selves from all filthinesse: whereas the holy Ghost doth claime to himselfe alone the office of making holy. Finally, that by way of granting, the same thing is conveyed to us that properly belongeth to God, is plaine by the words of Iohn: Whosoever is of God, loveth himselfe. The advancers of free-will take hold of this saying, as if we were saved partly by the power of God, and partly by our owne: as though we had not from heaven the very same safe keeping, whereof the Apostle maketh mention. For which cause, Christ also prayeth his Father to save us from evill, and we know that the godly, while they warre against Satan, doe get the victorie by no other armour and weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God. Wherefore when Peter commanded us to purifie our soules in the obedience of truth, he by and by addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost.) Finally, how all mens strength is of no force in the spirituall battell, Iohn briefly sheweth, when he saith, that they which are begotten of God, cannot sinne, because the seed of God abideth in them. And in another place he rendreth a reason why: for that our faith is the victory that overcometh the world.

12. Yet there is alleaged a testimonie out of the law of Moses, which seemeth to be much against our salvation. For after the publishing of the Law, he protesteth unto the people in this manner. The commandment that I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither farre off: It is not in heaven, but hard by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy heart, thou shouldest doe it. Truly, if this be taken to be spoken of the bare commandments, I grant they be of no small weight to this present matter. For though it were easie to mocke it out with saying, that here is spoken not of the easinesse and readinesse of observation, but of knowledge: yet even so peradventure it would also leave some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtfull Expositor, taketh away all doubt from us, which affirmeth that Moses here spake of the doctrine of the Gospell. But if any obstinate man will say that Paul violently wrested those words, that they might be drawne to the Gospell, although his boldnesse so to say shall not be without impietie, yet is there sufficient matter beside the authority of the Apostles to convince him withall. For if Moses spake of the commandments only, then he puffed up the people with a most vaine confidence. For what should they else have done, but throwne themselves downe headlong, if they had taken upon them the keeping of the Law by their owne strength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that so ready easinesse to keepe the Law, where there is no access unto it, but by a headlong fall to destruction. Wherefore there is nothing more certaine, than that Moses in these words did meane the covenant of mercy, which he had published together with the streight requiring of the law. For in a few verses before he had taught, that our hearts must be circumcised by the hand of God, that we may love him. Therefore he placeth that easinesse, whereof hee straightway after speaketh, not in the strength of man, but in the helpe and succour of the holy Ghost, which performeth his worke mightily in our weaknesse. Albeit the place is not simply to be understood of the commandments, but rather of the promises of the Gospell, which are so farre from stablishing a power in us to obtaine righteousness, that they utterly overthrow it. Paul considering that same, proveth by this testimony, that salvation is offered us in the Gospell, not under that hard and impossible condition, wherewith the law dealeth with us, that is, that they onely shall attaine it which have fulfilled all the commandments, but under a condition that is easie, readie, and plaine to come unto. Therefore this testimony maketh nothing to challenge freedom to the will of man.

13. There are also certaine other places wont to be objected, whereby is shewed that God sometime withdrawing the succour of his grace, trieth men, and waiteth to see to what end they will apply their endevours, as is that place in Osee: I will goe to my place till they put it in their heart and seeke my face. It were a fond thing (say they) if the Lord should consider whether Israel would seeke his face, unlesse their mindes were pliable that they might after their own will incline themselves to the one side or the other. As though this were not a thing commonly used with God in the Prophets; to make a shew as if he did despise and cast away his people, till they have amended their life. But what will the adversaries gather out of such threatnings? If they meane to gather, that the people being forsaken of God, may purpose their owne saluation: all the Scripture shall cry out against them in so doing. If they confesse that the grace of God is necessary to conversion, why strive they with us? But they so grant it necessary, that still they will have mans power preserved unto him. How prove they that? truly not by this place, nor any like to it. For it is one thing, to depart aside from man, and to looke what he will doe being given over and left to himselfe, and another thing to helpe his little strength after the measure of his weakenesse. What then (will some man say) doe these manners of speaking meane? I answer that they are as much in effect, as if God had said: For as much as I prevaile nothing with this stubborne people by admonishing, exhorting and rebuking, I will withdraw my selfe a while: and sit still and suffer them to be afflicted: I will see if at length, after long miseries, they will begin to remember me, to seeke my face. The Lords going farre away, signifieth the taking away of Prophecy: his looking what men will doe, signifieth that he keeping silence, and as it were hiding himselfe, doth for a time exercise them with divers afflictions. Both these things hee doth to humble us the more. For we should sooner be dulled than amended with the scourges of adversitie, unlesse he did frame us to that tractablenesse by his spirit. Now whereas the Lord being offended and in a manner wearied with our obstinate stubborne- nesse, doth for a time leave us (that is by taking away his word in which he is wont to give us a certaine presence of himselfe) and doth make a prooffe what hee would doe in his absence, it is falsely gathered hereof that there is any strength of free will that hee should behold and trie, forasmuch as he doth it to no other end, but to drive us to acknowledgement our owne being nothing.

works which we doe are ours, so the good works which are termed ours we doe:
howbeit, so that to do is ours by nature but to doe well by grace which is given

14. They bring also for their defence the continuall manner of speaking that is used both in the Scriptures and in the talke of men. For good workes are called ours, and it is no lesse said that we doe the thing that is holy and pleasing to God, then that we commit sinnes. But if sinnes be justly imputed to us, as proceeding from us, truly in righteous doings also somewhat by the same reason ought to be assigned unto us. For it were against reason that it should be said that we doe those things, to the doing whereof being vnable of our owne motion, we are moved by God like stones. Therefore though we give the chiefe part to the grace of God, yet these manners of speaking doe shew that our endeavour hath also yet a second part. If that thing onely were still enforced, that good workes are called ours. I would object againe, that the bread is called ours, which we pray to have given us of God. What will they get by the title of possession, but that by the bountifullnesse and free gift of God, the same thing becommeth ours, which other wise is not due unto us? Therefore either let them laugh at the same absurditie in the Lords prayer, or let them not reckon this to be laughed at, that good workes are called ours, in which wee have no proprietie, but by the liberalitie of God. But this is somewhat stronger, that the Scripture oftentimes affirmeth that wee our selves doe worship God, obey the Law and apply good workes. Sith these are the duties properly belonging to the mind and will: how could it agree that these things are both referred to the holy Ghost, and also attributed to us, unlesse there were a certaine communicating of our endeavour with the power of God? Out of these snares wee shall easily unwinde our selves, if we well consider the manner how the spirit of the Lord worketh in the holy ones. The similitude wherewith they enviously presse us is from the purpose for who is so fond to thinke that the moving of man differeth nothing from the casting of a stone? Neither doth any such thing follow of our doctrine. We reckon among the naturall powers of man, to allow and refuse, to will and not to will, to endeavour and to resist, that is, to allow vanitie, and to refuse perfect goodnesse, to will evil, and to be unwilling to good, to endeavour our selves to wickednesse, and to resist righteousnesse. What doth the Lord herein? If it bee his will to use that perversnesse as an instrument of his wrath, he directeth and appointeth it to what end he will, that hee by an evil hand may execute his good worke. Shall we then compare a wicked man that so serveth the power of God, when he laboureth onely to obey his owne lust, to a stone that being throwne by the violence of another, is carried neither with moving nor sense nor will of his owne? We see how much difference there is. But what doth he in good things, of which is our principall question? when he erecteth his kingdome in them, he by his spirit restraineth mans will, that it be not carried up and downe with wandering lusts, according to the inclination of nature: and that it may be bent to holinesse and righteousness, he boweth, frameth, fashioneth and directeth it to the rule of his righteousness: and that it should not tumble or fall, he doth stablish and confirme it with the strength of his spirit. For which reason Augustine saith: Thou wilt say unto me: then are we wrought and workenot. Yea, thou both workest and art wrought, and thou workest well when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirit of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worke, and giveth himselfe the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first part he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the moving of the holy Ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodnesse. But where he by and by addeth, that by the name of helpe, may be gathered that we also doe worke somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did give any thing severally to us: but because he would not cherish slothfulnesse in us, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of grace. Therefore he said a little before, Unless God helpe us, we shall not be able to overcome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15. Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the word is taken when we speake of regeneration) is the rule of the spirit, to direct and governe the will of man. And it cannot governe it, unless it correct it, reforme it, and renew it (from whence wee say that the beginning of regeneration is, that that which is ours might be destroyed) and unless it move it, stirre it, drive it forward, carrie it, and hold it. Whereupon we do truly say, that all the doings that proceede from it, are wholly the onely worke of the same grace. In the meane time we deny not that it is very true that Augustine teacheth that will is not destroyed by grace, but rather repaired. For both these things doe stand very well together: that mens will be said to be restored, when the faultinesse and perversnesse thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of justice: and also that a new will be said to be created in man, forasmuch as it is so defiled and corrupted, that it needeth utterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cause to the contrary, but that wee may well be said to doe the same thing that the spirit of God doth in us, although our owne will doe of it selfe give us toward it nothing at all that may be severed from his grace. And therefore we must keepe that in mind which we have elsewhere alleaged out of Augustine, that some doe in vaine travell to finde in the will of man some good thing that is properly her owne. For whatsoever mixture men study to bring from the strength of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would delay wine with dirtie and bitter water. But although whatsoever good is in the will of man it proceedeth from the meer instinct of the holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in us to will, it is not without cause said, that wee doe those things whereof God chalengeth the praise to himselfe. First, because it is ours whatsoever by his goodnesse he worketh in us, so that we understand it to be not of our selves: and then because the minde is ours, the will is ours, the endeavour is ours, which are by him directed to good.

16. Those other testimonies beside these, that they scapet together here and there, shall not much trouble even meane wits that have well conceived onely the solutions above said. They alleage that saying out of Genesis, Thine appetite shall be under thee, and thou shalt beare rule over it. Which they expound of Sinne, as if the Lord did promise to Cain, that the force of Sinne should not get the upper hand in his minde, if hee would labour in subduing of it. But we say that it better agreeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be spoken of Abel. For there Gods purpose was to reprove the wickednesse of the envie that Cain had conceived against his brother. And that hee doth two waies. One, that in vaine he imagined mischief to excell his brother in Gods sight, before whom no honour is given but unto righteousness: the other, that he was too much unthankful for the benefit of God which he had already received, which could not abide his brother, although he had him subject under his authority. But lest wee should seeme therefore to embrace this exposition because the other is against us: let us admit that God spake of sinne. If it be so, then God either promiseth or commandeth that which he there declareth. If he command, then have we already shewed, that thereby followeth no prooffe of the power of man. If he promise, where is the fulfilling of the promise? for Cain became subject to sinne, over which he should have had dominion. They will say, that in the promise was included a secret condition, as if it had beene said, that he should have the victory if he would strive for it. But who will receive these crooked compasses? For if this dominion be meant of sinne, then no man can doubt that it is spoken by way of commandement, where in is not determined what we are able to doe, but what we ought to doe, yea although it be above our power. Albeit both the matter it selfe and the Order of Grammer doth require, that there be a comparison made of Cain and Abel, because the elder brother should not have beene set behind the younger, unlesse he had become worse by his owne wicked doing.

Those things which the grace of the Spirit worketh in us, we our selves are said to do, because the faculties whereby we work and the very act of working are ours, although the moving and the framing them to good be wholly and mercifully his.

17. They use also the testimonie of the Apostle, which saith, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Whereby they gather that there is somewhat by mans will and endeavour, which of it selfe though it be weake, being holpen by the mercy of God, is not without prosperous successe. But if they did soberly weigh what matter Paul there entreateth of, they would not so unadvisedly abuse this sentence. I know that they may bring forth Origen and Hierome for maintainers of their exposition: and I could on the other side set Augustine against them. But what they have thought it maketh no matter to us, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth that salvation is prepared onely for them, to whom the Lord vouchsafeth his mercy: and that ruine and destruction is prepared for all those that he hath not chosen. He had under the example of Pharaoh declared the state of the reprobate, and had also confirmed the assurednesse of free election by the testimonie of Moses, I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercie. Now hee concludeth that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie. If it be thus understood, that will or endeavour are not sufficient, because they are too weake for so great a weight, that which Paul saith, had not beene aptly spoken: Therefore away with these subtilties, to say: It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is some will, there is some running. For Pauls meaning is more simply, thus: It is not will, it is not running that gets us the way to salvation, herein is onely the mercy of God. For he speaketh no other wise in this place than hee doth to Titus, where he writeth, that the goodnesse and kindnesse of God appeareth not by the works of righteousness which we have done, but for his infinite mercie. They themselves that make this argument, that Paul meant that there is some will and some running, because he said, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, would not give me leave to reason after the same fashion, that we have done some good works, because Paul saith, that we have not attained the goodnesse of God by the good works that we have done. If they see a fault in this argument, let them open their eyes, and they shall perceive that their owne is not without the like deceit. For that is a sure reason that Augustine resteth upon, if it were therefore said that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, because neither the will nor the running is sufficient, Then it may be turned on the contrarie part that it is not of the mercie of God, because it alone worketh not. Sith this second is an absurditie, Augustine doth rightfully conclude, that this is spoken in this meaning, that there is no good will of man, unlesse it be prepared of the Lord, not but that we ought both to will and to run, but because God worketh both in us. No lesse unaptly do some wrest that saying of Paul: We are the workers with God, which out of doubt ought to be restrained onely to the ministers: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of themselves, but because God useth their service, after that he hath made them meete and furnished with necessary gifts.

18. They bring forth Ecclesiasticus, who, as it is not unknownen, is a writer whose authoritie is doubted. But although we refuse it not (which yet we may lawfully doe) what doth he testifie for free will? He saith, that man so soone as he was created, was left in the hand of his owne counsell: that commandments were given him, which if he observed, he should againe be preserved by them: that before man was set life and death, good and evil: that whatsoever he would should be given him. Be it, that man received from his creation power to obtaine either life or death. What if on the other side we answere that he lost it? Truly my minde is not, to speake against Salomon, which affirmeth that man at the beginning was create upright, and he forged unto himselfe many inventions. But because man in swerving, lost as it were by slipwrack both himselfe and all his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is given to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answer, not to them onely, but also to Ecclesiasticum himselfe whatsoever he be. If thou meane to instruct man, to seeke within himselfe power to attaine salvation, thy authority is not of so great force with us, that it may be any prejudice, bee it never so small, against the undoubted word of God. But if thou onely studie to restrain the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of her owne evils upon God, useth to seeke a vaine defence for it selfe, and therefore thou answerest that uprightnesse was given unto men, whereby it may appeare that himselfe was cause of his owne destruction, I willingly agree unto it: so that againe thou agree in this with me, that now by his owne fault he is spoiled of those ornaments, wherewith God had clothed him at the beginning: and that we confesse together, that now he more needeth a Phisitian than a defender.

19. Yet they have nothing oftner in their mouth than the parable of Christ of the wayfaring man, whom theeves laid abroad halfe dead in the way. I know that it is common almost with all writers, that the calamitie of mankinde is represented under the figure of that wayfaring man. Thereupon doe our adversaries gather an argument, that man is not so maymed with the robbery of sinne and the Devill, but that hee keepeth still remaining the leavings of his former good things, forasmuch as it is said, that hee was left halfe alive. For where is that halfe life, unless some portion both of right reason and will remained? First if I would not give place to their Allegorie, I beseech you, what would they doe? For there is no doubt that it was devised by the Fathers beside the naturall sense of the Lords words. Allegories ought to goe no further than they have the rule of Scripture going before them: so farre is it off, that they be by themselves sufficient to ground any doctrines. And there want not reasons, whereby I can, if I list, overthrow this devise, for the word of God leaveth not to man halfe a life, but teacheth that he is utterly dead, forasmuch as concerneth blessed life. And Paul when hee speaketh of our redemption, doth not say that we were healed, when we were halfe dead and halfe alive, but that we were raised up againe when we were dead. Hee calleth not upon them that are halfe alive to receive the light of Christ, but them that sleepe and are buried. And in like manner speaketh the Lord himselfe, when he saith, that the houre is come when the dead shall rise againe at his voice. With what face would they set this light allusion against so many plaine sentences? But let this Allegorie have the force of a certaine testimony, yet what shall they wring out of us thereby? Man is halfe alive, therefore he hath somewhat left safe. I grant: he hath a wit capable of understanding, although it pierce not to the heavenly and spirituall wisdome: he hath true judgement of honestie: hee hath some feeling of the Godhead, howbeit that hee attaine not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpose come all these things? Truly they bring not to passe that the same saying of Augustine bee taken from us, which is also approved by common consent of the Schooles: that after mans fall the freely given good things, whereupon salvation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his naturall gifts are corrupted and defiled. Let therefore this truth remaine with us undoubted, which can be shaken by no engines, that the minde of man is so estranged from the righteousnesse of God, that it conceiveth, coveteth, and enterpriseth all wickednesse, filthinesse, uncleannesse, and mischief: that his heart is so thoroughly soked in poyson of sinne, that it can breath out nothing but corrupt stinke: But if at any time they doe utter any goodnesse in shew, yet still the minde remaineth alway wrapped in hypocrisie and deceitfull crookednesse, and the heart entangled with inward perversnesse.

Eph. 2. 12.

SIth all mankinde hath perished in the person of Adam, that excellencie and nobilitie of beginning which we have spoken of, would so little profit us, that it would rather turne to our greater shame, till God appeare the redeemer in the person of his onely begotten Sonne, which acknowledgeth not men defiled and corrupted with sinne to be his worke. Therefore sith we are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the Creator whereof we have entreated, were unprofitable, unlesse there followed also faith setting forth God a Father unto us in Christ. Truly this was the naturall order that the frame of the world should be a Schoole unto us to learne godlinesse, from whence might be made a passage for us to eternall life and perfect felicitie: but since our falling away, whether soever wee turne our eies, upward and downeward, the curse of God still presenteth it selfe unto our sight, which while it possesseth and enwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, must needs overwhelme our owne soules with desperation. For although Gods will isthat his fatherly favour toward us doe still many waies appeare: yet by beholding of the world wee can not gather that he is our Father when our conscience inwardly pricketh us, and sheweth that there is in sinne just cause of forsaking, why God should not account and reckon us for his children. Beside that there is in us both slothfulness and unthankfulness: because both our mindes, as they be blinded, doe not see the truth, and also as all our senses be perverse, we maliciously defraude God of his glory. Therefore we must come to that saying of Paul: because in the wisdom of God, the world knew not God by wisdom, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preaching to save them that beleve. The wisdom of God he calleth this honourable stage of heaven and earth, furnished with innumerable miracles, by beholding whereof wee ought wisely to have knowne God. But because we so ill profited therein, he calleth us backe to the faith of Christ; which for that it seemeth foolish, the unbelievers doe disdain. Wherefore although the preaching of the Crosse doe not agree with mans wit, yet ought we humbly to embrace it, if we desire to returne to God our Creator and maker, that he may begin againe to be our Father. Truly since the fall of the first man, no knowledge of God availed to saluation, without the Mediator. For Christ speaketh not of his owne age onely, but comprehendeth all ages, when he saith that this is the eternall life, to know the Father the one true God, and him whom he hath sent Iesus Christ. And so much the fowler is their sluggishnesse, which take upon them to set open heaven to all prophane and unbelieving men, without his grace, whom the Scripture each where teacheth to be the onely gate whereby wee enter into saluation. But if any will restraie that saying of Christ onely to the publishing of the Gospell, we have in readinesse wherewith to confute him. For this hath been a common sentence in all ages and among all nations, that without reconciliation they that are estranged from God, and pronounced accursed, and the Children of wrath, cannot please God. And here may be also alleaged that which Christ answered to the woman of Samaris: Yee worship that yee know not, but we worship that which we know: because the saluation is from the Iewes. In which wordes hee both condemneth of falsehood all the religions of the Gentiles, and also assigneth a reason why, for that the Redeemer was promised under the Law to the onely chosen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worship ever pleased God, but that which had respect unto Christ. For which cause also Paul affirmeth that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and voide of the hope of life. Now where as Iohn teacheth that life was from the beginning in Christ, and that all the world fell from it, wee must returne to the same fountaine Christ. And therefore Christ, insomuch as hee is the reconciler, affirmeth himselfe to be the life. And truly the entrance of heaven belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meeete that they be accounted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the body of the onely begotten Sonne. And Iohn plainly testifieth, that they which beleve in his name, name, are made the children of God. But because it is not directly my purpose yet to discourse of Faith in Christ, therefore it shall for this time be sufficient to have touched it by the way.

2. And therefore God never shewed himselfe mercifull to the olde people, nor ever did put them in any hope of grace without the Mediatour. I omit to speake of the sacrifices of the Law, wherein the faithfull were openly and plainly taught, that saluation is no where else to be sought, but in the cleansing which was performed by Christ alone. Onely this I say, that the blessed and happy state of the Church hath bene alway grounded upon the person of Christ. For though God comprehended all the issue of Abraham in his covenant, yet doth Paul wisely reason, that Christ is properly that seede in whom all nations were to be blessed, forasmuch as we know that not all they were reckoned his seede that were begotten of him according to the flesh. For (to speake nothing of Ismael and other) how came it to passe, that of the two sonnes of Isaac, that is, Esau and Jacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet together in their mothers wombe, the one was chosen the other refused? Yea, how came it to passe that the elder was rejected and the yonger onely tooke place? And how also came it to passe, that the greater part should bee forsaken? It appeareth therefore, that the seede of Abraham was principally reckoned in one person, and that the promised saluation did never stand sure till it came to Christ, whose office is to gather together the things that were scattered abroad. Therefore the first adoption of the chosen people did hang upon the grace of the Mediatour. Which though it bee not in so plaine words expressed by Moses, yet it sufficiently appeareth that it was commonly knowne to all the godly. For before that there was any King create among the people, Hanna the mother of Samuel entreating of the felicity of the godly, even then said thus in her song: God shall give strength to his King, and shall exalt the horne of his anointed. In which words steemeaneth that God shall blesse his Church. Wherewith also agreeth the oracle that is within a litle after adjoynd: The Priest whom I shall appoint shall walke before mine anointed. Neither is it to bee doubted, but that the will of the heavenly Father was to have the lively image of Christ to be seene in David and his posteritie. Therefore meaning to exhort the godly to the feare of God, he biddeth them to kisse the Sonne. Wherewith this saying of the Gospell also agreeth: He that honoureth not the sonne, honoureth not the Father. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes the kingdome decayed: yet it behooved the covenant to stand which God had made in David and his successors: as also he said by the Prophets: I will not altogether cut off the kingdome, for David my servants sake, and for *Hierusalem*s sake, whom I have chosen: but there shall remaine one tribe to thy sonne. Where the same thing is repeated the second and third time. It is also expressly added: I will afflict the seede of David, but not for ever. Within a litle space of time after, it is said: For David his servants sake God hath given a light in Hierusalem, to raise up a Sonne, and to keepe Hierusalem in safetie. Now when the state grew toward destruction, it was said againe: God would not scatter Juda for David his servants sake, because he had spoken that hee would give a light to him and his sonnes for ever. Finally, this is the summe, that all other being passed over, onely David was chosen, upon whom the good pleasure of God should rest. As in another place it is said: He hath refused the tabernacle of Silo, and the tabernacle of Isosaph, and he hath not chosen the tribe of Ephraim, but hee hath chosen the tribe of Juda, the mount Sion which he hath loved. He hath chosen his servant David to feede Isacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. To conclude, it pleased God so to save his Church, that the safetie and preservation thereof should hang upon that one head, and therefore David crieth out. The Lord, the strength of his people, the strength of the saluations of his Christ. And by and by he addeth a praiser: Save thy people and blesse thine inheritance: meaning that the state of the Church is with an unseparable knot joynd to the government of Christ. And in the same meaning in another place: Lord save us: Let the King heare us in the day that wee shall call upon him. In which words he plainly teacheth; that the faithfull did upon none other confidence flie to the helpe of God; but because they were hidden under the succour of the King.

Which is gathered by another Psalme. Lord save us: Blessed is hee that commeth in the name of the Lord. Where it is plaine enough, that the faithfull are called backe unto Christ, that they may hope that they shall bee saved by the hand of God. The same respect hath the other prayer, where all the Church calleth upon the mercie of God. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, upon the sonne of man, whom thou hast preserved (or appointed) to thy selfe. For though the author of the Psalme bewaileth the scattering abroad of the whole people, yet he praieth for their restitution in the head alone. Where, when the people were led away into exile, the land wasted, and all things to mans seeming destroyed, Jeremy lamenteth the overthrow of the Church, he doth principally complaineth that by destruction of the kingdome all hope was cut off from the faithfull. Christ (saith he) the Spirit of our mouth is taken in our sinnes, to whom we said: In thy shadow we shall live among the nations. Hereby now it sufficiently appeareth that because God cannot bee mercifull to mankind without the Mediatour, therefore Christ was alway set before the holy fathers in time of the law, to whom they might direct their faith.

3. Now, where comfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliverance of the Church is described, there the banner of affiance and hope is advanced in Christ alone. God went out to the saving of his people with his Messiah, saith Habacuc. And so oft as the Prophets make mention of the restoring of the Church, they call backe the people to the promise made to David, concerning the everlasting continuance of the kingdome. And no marvell. For otherwise there had beene no assurance of the covenant. For which purpose serveth that notable answer of Esay. For when he saw that the unbelieving king Achaz refused that which hee had declared to him of the raising of the siege of Hierusalem and of present safetie, as it were foudainely, he passed over to Messias. Behold a Virgin shall conceive and bring forth a sonne, meaning indirectly that though the king and his people by their forwardnesse refused the promise offered unto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselves to discredit the truth of God, yet the covenant should not bee void, but that the Redeemer should come at his appointed time. Finally, it was the care of all the Prophets, to the end they might shew that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdome of David, whereupon hanged the redemption and everlasting salvation. So Esay saith: I will make a covenant with you the faithfull mercies of David. Behold I have give him for a witness unto nations, that is, because the faithfull when their state is at the worst, could not otherwise have any hope, but by the meanes of him being witness, that God would be appeasible toward them. Like wise Jeremie, to raise them up being in dispaire, saith: Behold the daies come, wherein I will raise up unto David a righteous branch, and then shall Juda be saved, and Israel shall dwell in safetie. And Ezechiel saith, I will raise up one shepherd over my sheepe, even David my servant. I the Lord will beea God to them, and my servant David for a shepherd. And I will make a covenant of peace with them. Also in another place, after hee had entreated of the incredible renewing, he saith: my servant David shall be their king, and there shall be one shepherd over all, and I will make an everlasting covenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a few places out of many, because I only meane to have the readers put in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway beene reposed no where else but in Christ. And all the other Prophets also speake agreeable hereunto, as it is said in Osee. The children of Juda and the children of Israel shall be gathered together, and shall appoint to themselves one head. Which he afterward more plainly expoundeth, The children of Israel shall returne, and shall seeke for the Lord their God, and David their King. And Michee speaking of the returne of the people expressly saith, The King shall goe before them, and the Lord in their head. So Amos meaning to praise the renewing of the people saith, I will in that day raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen downe, and I will hedge up the gaps, and raise up the places overthrowne, even because that was the onely standard of salvation, to have the royall glory to rise up againe on high in the stocke of David, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore Zachary, as his age was neerer to the appearing of Christ, so doth hee more plainly crie out: be glad thou daughter of Sion, rejoyce thou daughter of Hierusalem. Behold thy King commeth, righteous and saved. Which agreeth with the place of the Psalme before alleaged: The Lord the strength of the salvations of his anointed, Lord save us. Where salvation is derived from the head to the whole body.

4. It was Gods will to have the Jewes instructed with these prophecies, that to seeke for their deliverance, they should bend their eyes directly to Christ. And though they had shamefully swerved, yet could not the remembrance of the generall principle be abolished, that God by the hand of Christ, as hee had promised to David, would be the deliverer of the Church, and so the covenant should be of his owne free grant, whereby God had adopted his chosen. Hereby it came to passe, that this song founded in the mouth of the Children when Christ a little before his death entred into Hiersusalem, Hosanna to the Sonne of David. For it appeareth that it was commonly knowne and spoken of, and according to common use that they sung that the onely pledge of Gods mercie remained unto them, in the coming of the Redeemer. For this cause Christ himselfe, to make his Disciples plainly and perfectly beleeve in God, biddeth them to beleeve on himselfe, Beleeve yee in God (saith hee) then beleeve also in me. For though (to speake properly) Faith climbeth up from Christ to the Father, yet he meaneth that the same Faith, albeit it rest upon God, doth by little and little vanish away unlesse hee become a meane to hold it in assured stedfastnesse. Otherwise the Majestie of God is too high for mortall men, which creepe upon the ground like wormes, to attaine unto it. Wherefore I allow that common saying, that God is the object of Faith, but in such sort that it needeth correction. Because Christ is not in vaine called the invisible Image of God, but by this title we are put in minde, that if we finde not God in Christ, salvation cannot bee knowne unto us. For although among the Jewes, the Scribes and Pharisees had darkned with false inventions, that which the Prophets had spoken concerning the Redeemer: yet Christ tooke it for a thing confessed as received by common consent, that there was none other remedie in a dispaired case, and none other meane of delivering the Church, but by giving the Mediator. Indeed that was not commonly knowne among the people as it ought to have beene, which Paul teacheth, that Christ is the end of the Law. But how true and assured it is, doth plainly appeare by the Law and the Prophets. I speake not yet of Faith, because there shall be elsewhere a more convenient place for it. Oaely let the Readers hold this as fast stablished, that the first degree of godlinesse bee, to acknowledge God to be a Father unto us, to defend, governe, and cherish us, till he gather us together into the everlasting inheritance of his Kingdome: and that hereby it plainly appeareth which we said even now, that the knowledge of God which bringeth salvation, standeth not without Christ, and that therefore from the beginning he hath beene set forth unto all the elect, that they should looke upon him, and that in him should rest all their affiance. According to this meaning writeth Ireneus, that the Father which is unmeasurable, is in his Sonne measured, because he hath applied himselfe to the measure of our capacite, lest he should drowne our minds with the unmeasurableness of his glory. Which thing the phrentike men not considering, do wrest a profitable sentence to a wicked fantasie, as though there were in Christ but a portion of the God-head derived from the whole perfection: whereas it meaneth nothing else, but that God is comprehended in Christ alone. That saying of John hath alwaies beene true. Hee that hath not the Sonne, neither hath he the Father. For though in old time many did boast that they worshipped the soveraigne God, the maker of heaven and earth: yet because they had no Mediator, it was impossible that they should truly taste of the mercie of God, and so be persuaded that he was their Father. Therefore because they knew not the head, that is, Christ, the knowledge of God was but vaine among them, whereby also it came to passe, that at length falling into grosse and filthy superstitions, they bewraied their owne ignorance. As at this day the Turks although they report with full mouth, that the Creator of heaven and earth is their God, yet doe they thrust an idoll in place of the true God while they swerve from Christ.

Psal. 28. 8.

It was a common principle generally received amongst the Jewes, though not so perfectly understood as be- lieved, that their deliverer should be Christ, without whose knowledge all other nations vainly worshipped God.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER.

That the law was given, not to hold still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of Salvation in Christ, untill his coming.

The law was given by Moses to nourish men in hope of salvation by Christ, as appears by the often mention which he maketh of the covenant, and by the whole forme of ceremonies and service therein prescribed which without spirituall relation unto this were vaine and idle.

Act. 7. 44.
Heb. 8. 5.
Exod. 31. 40.

Exod. 19. 6.

1 Pet. 2. 9.

BY this continuall processe that we have rehearsed, may be gathered, that the law was added about foure hundred yeeres after the death of Abraham, not for this intent to leade away the chosen people from Christ: but rather to keepe their minds in expectation untill his coming, to kindle a desire of him, and to confirme them in looking for him that they should not wax faint with long tariance. I meane by this word Law, not onely the ten commandements, which prescribe a rule how to live godly and righteously, but also the forme of religion delivered by the hand of Moses. For Moses was not made a lawgiver to abolish the blessing promised to the kindred of Abraham: but rather we see how every where he putteth the Jewes in remembrance of the free covenant made with their Fathers whose heires they were, as if hee had bene sent to renew the same. That was most plainly set forth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine and fond, than for men to offer up loathsome stinke of the fat of cattell, to reconcile themselves to God thereby: to flee to the sprinkling of water or blood to wash away their filthinesse? Finally, all the service of God appointed in the law (if it be considered by it selfe, and doe not containe shadowes and figures, which the truth should answer unto) shall bee but a very mockerie. Wherefore not without a cause both in Stephens sermon, and in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, is that place so diligently weighed. Where God commandeth Moses to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to the patterne that had bene shewed him in the mount. For if there had not bene some spirituall thing appointed that they should tend unto, the Jewes should no lesse have fondly spent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men that never earnestly applied the studie of godlinesse, cannot without loathsome tediousnesse abide to heare so many sundry fashions of usages: and they not onely marvell why God wearied his people with such a heape of ceremonies, but also they despise and scorne them as childrens plaies. And the cause is, for that they consider not the end, from which if the figures of the law be severed, they must needs bee condemned of vanitie. But that same figure sheweth, that God did not therefore command sacrifices because hee would occupie them that worshipped him with earthly exercises, but rather to raise up their mindes higher. Which may also plainly appeare by his nature: for as he is spirituall, so he is delighted with no other worshipping but spirituall. This doe the sayings of the prophets testifie, wherein they rebuke the Jewes of sluggishnesse, for that they thought that any sacrifices were of any value with God. Is that because their purpose is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expositors of the law, so they would by by this meane haue mens eyes directed to the marke from which the common people straid. Now by the grace offered to the Jewes it is certainly gathered, that the law was not voide of Christ. For Moses did set forth unto them this end of the adoption, that they should become a priestly kingdome to God. Which they could not obtaine unlesse there were had for the meane thereof a great and more excellent reconciliation than by the blood of beasts. For what is lesse likely than Adams children, which by inheritably descending infection are all borne the bondslaves of sinne to be advanced to royall dignitie, and so to become partakers of the glory of God, unlesse that so excellent a benefit should come unto them from elsewhere than from themselves? Also how could the right of Priesthood remaine in force among them, who by filthinesse of sinnes were abominable to God, unlesse they had bene consecrate in a holy head? Wherefore Peter doth very aptly turne that saying of Moses where he teacheth, that the fulnesse of grace, the taste whereof the Jewes had taken under the law, was given in Christ: Yee are (saith he) a chosen kindred, a kingly Priesthood. For to this end tendeth that turning of the words, to shew that they, to whom Christ appeared by the Gospell, have obtained more than their Fathers, because they are all endued both with Priestly and Kingly honour, that trusting upon their Media-tour they may freely be bold to come forth into the sight of God.

2. And here by the way it is to be noted, that the kingdome which at length was erected in the house of David, is part of the law, and contained under the minitrie of Moses. Whereupon followeth, that aswell in all the kindred of the Levites as in the posterity of David, Christ was set before the eyes of the old people as in a double looking glasse. For, I said even now, they could not otherwise be before God either Kings or Priests, which were both the bondlives of sinne and death, and desiled by their owne corruption. Hereby appeareth that that saying of Paul is most true, that the Jewes were holden as under the keeping of a schoolemaster, till the seede came for whose sake the promise was given. For, because Christ was not yet familiarly knowne, they were like unto children, whose weaknesse could not yet beare a full knowledge of heavenly things, but how they were by ceremonies, as it were led by the hand to Christ, is spoken before, and may be better understood by many testimonies of the Prophets. For although it was commanded them to come daily with new sacrifices to appease God: yet Esaie promisseth that all their finnes shall be cleaned with one only sacrifice. Wherewith Daniel agreeably saith: the Priests appointed of the tribe of Levi, did enter into the Sanctuarie: but of the onely Priest it was once said, that by an oath he was chosen of God to be a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec. At that time the anointing with oyle was visible: but Daniel by his vision pronounceth that there shall be another manner of anointing. And because I will not tarry upon many examples, the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes even from the fourth Chapter to the eleventh doth largely and plainly enough shew, that the ceremonies are nothing worth, and vaine till we come to Christ. As concerning the ten commandments: that lesson of Paul is likewise to be kept in minde, that Christ is the end of the law unto salvation, to every one that beleeveth. And another lesson, that Christ is the Spirit that quickneth the letter which of it selfe slaieth. For in the first of these two, hee meaneth that righteousness is vainly taught by commandments, until Christ doe give it both by free imputation, and by the Spirit of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Christ the fulfilling or end of the law. Because it should nothing profit us to know what God requireth of us, unlesse hee did succour us fainting and oppressed under the yoke and untollerable burden. In another place, he teacheth that the law was made for transgressions, that is to bring men to humilitie, being proved guiltie of their owne damnation. And because this is the true and onely preparation to seeke Christ, whatsoever he teacheth in diverse words, doe all very well agree together. But because hee then was in contention with perverse teachers, which sained that we doe deserve righteousness by the workes of the law, to confute their error, he was compelled sometime to speake precisely of the bare law, which yet otherwise is clothed with the covenant of free adoption.

3. But now it is good to know, how being taught by the morall law, we are made more inexcusable, that our owne guiltinesse may moove us to crave pardon. If it be true that we be taught perfection of righteousness in the law: then this also followeth, that the absolute keeping thereof is perfect righteousness before God, that is, whereby a man may be deemed and accounted righteous before the heavenly throne of judgement. Wherefore Moses when he had published the law, doubted not to protest before heaven and earth, that he had set before Israel life and death, good and evil. And wee may not denie, but that the reward of eternal salvation belongeth to the upright obedience of the law, as the Lord hath promised it. Again, yet it is good to examine, whether wee performe that obedience, upon desert whereof, we may conceive a trust of that reward. For to what small purpose is it, to see the reward of eternal life set in keeping of the Law, unlesse we further know whether we may by that way attaine to eternal life? But herein the weaknesse of the law doth shew it selfe. For because that keeping of the Law is found in none of us all, we are excluded from the promises of life, and doe fall into curse onely. I doe not now tell what doth come to passe, but what needes must come to passe. For whereas the doctrine of the law is farre above the power of man, he may indeede a farre off, looke at the promises, but yet not gather any fruit of them. Therefore this one thing remaineth, that by the goodnes of them he may the better weigh his owne miserie, while he considereth, that all hope of salvation being cut off, death doth certainly hang over him. On the other side doe presse us terrible penall lawes, which doe hold entangled and fast bound, not onely a few of us but every one without exception: they presse us, I say, and doe pursue us with an unappeasable rigour, so that we may, see most present death in the law.

The promises of the Law being conditionall, are not of no effect unto us, though we be unable to performe the condition, because our not performing it through mercy pardoned, and our weak obedience accepted, and rewarded, as if it were full performance.

The law is therefore said to be impossible for man to performe because no man ever hitherto hath been, and the Scripture teacheth that no man shall be so perfect.

4. Therefore if we looke onely upon the law, we can doe nothing; but be discouraged, be confounded, and despair, forasmuch as by it wee are all damned and cursed, and kept far off from the blessednesse that he offereth to them that worship him. Wilt thou say then, Doth the Lord so mocke us? For how smally doth it differ from mocking, to shew forth a hope of felicity, to allure and exhort men unto it, to protest, that it is laid open for us, when in the meane season the entry unto it is foreclosed and impossible to be come to? I answer: although the promises of the law, in so much as they are conditionall, doe hang upon the perfect obedience of the law, which can no where be found; yet are they not given in vaine. For when we have learned that they shall be void and of no effect unto us, unlesse God embrace us with his free goodnesse without regard of our workes, and unlesse we doe embrace by faith the same goodnesse given us by the Gospell, then want they not their effectualnesse, yea with their condition annexed. For then he doth so freely give all things unto us, that he addeth this also to the heape of his bountifullnesse, that not refusing our halfe full obedience, and remitting so much as it wanteth of full performance, he so maketh us to enjoy the fruit of the promises of the law, as if we our selves had fulfilled the condition. But we will at this present proceed no further in this matter, because it shall be more largely entreated of, when we shall speake of the justification of Faith.

5. Whereas we said that it is impossible to keep the law, that is in few words to be both expounded and proved. For it is wont among the people commonly to be accounted an opinion of great absurditie, so farre, that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accursed: what Hierome thought, I doe nothing stay upon: as for us, let us search what is truth. I will not here make long circumstances of divers sorts of possibilities. I call that impossible, which both never hath beene, and also is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it never hereafter may be. If wee recorde from the farthest time of memorie, I say that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the bodie of death, hath ever attained to that full perfection of love to love God with all his heart, with all his minde, with all his soule, with all his power: Again, that there hath beene none that hath not beene troubled with concupiscence. Who can say nay? I see indeed what manner of holy men foolish superstition doth imagine unto us, even such whose purenesse the heavenly Angels doe scarcely countervaile: but against both the Scripture and proove of experience, I say also, that there shall none hereafter be, that shall come to the marke of true perfection, unlesse hee be loosed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are open testimonies of Scripture. Salomon said, there is not a righteous man upon the earth that sinneth not. And David said: every living man shall not be justified in thy sight. Iob in many places affirmeth the same. But Paul most plainly of all: that the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. And by no other reason hee proveth that all that are under the law are subject to the curse, but because it is written, that cursed are all they that doe not abide in all the commandements thereof: meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confessed, that no man can abide in them. And whatsoever is forespoken by the Scriptures, that must be holden for perpetual, yea and necessary. With such subtiltie did the Pekagians trouble Augustine, saying, that there is wrong done to God, to say that hee doth command more than the faithfull are able by his grace to performe. Augustine, to avoid their cavillation confessed, that the Lord might indeed, if hee would, advance a mortall man to the purenesse of Angels: but that he neither hath done so at any time, nor will doe, because he hath otherwise affirmed in the Scriptures. And that doe I also not deny. But I adde further, that it is inconvenient to dispute of his power against his truth, and that therefore this sentence is not subject to cavillations if a man should say, that that thing is impossible to be, whereof the Scriptures doe pronounce that it shall not be. But if they dispute of the word: when the Disciples asked the Lord, who may be saved, hee answered with men indeed deede it is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Also Augustine with a most strong reason stiffly defendeth, that in this flesh wee never yeeld to God the due love that we owe him. Love (saith he) followeth knowledge, that no man can perfectly love God, but he that hath first fully knowne his goodnesse. Wee, while we wander in this world, see by a glasse and in a darke speech: it followeth therefore, that our love is imperfect. Let this therefore remaine out of controverſie, that in this flesh it is impossible to fulfill the law, if we behold the weaknesse of our owne nature, as it shall yett alſo in another place be proved by P. 111.

6. But that the whole matter may be more plainly set forth: let us in a compendious order gather up together the office and use of the law which they call Mor 1. Now, as far as I understand, it is contained in these three parts. The first is, that while it sheweth to every man the righteousnesse of God, that is, the righteousnesse which onely is acceptable to God, it admonisheth, certifieth, proove guiltie, yea and condemne every man of his own unrighteousnes. For so is it needfull that man blinded and drunke with love of himselfe, be driven both to the knowledge and the confession of his owne weaknesse and uncleannesse: for as much as if his vanitie be not evidently convinced, he swelleth with mad assurance of his owne strength, and can never be brought to think of the slenderesse thereof, so long as he measureth it by the proportion of his owne will. But so soone as hee beginneth to compare his strength to the hardnesse of the law, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For howsoever he before conceived a great opinion of it, yet by and by he feeleth it to pant under so greata burden, and then to shake and solter, at last even to fall downe and faint. So being taught by the schooling of the law, he putteth off that arrogancie wherewith before hee was blinded. Likewise he is to be healed of another disease of pride, whereof we have said that he is sicke. So long as he is suffered to stand to his owne judgement, hee deviseth hypocricie in stead of righteousnesse, wherewith being contented, hee riseth up in courage, by I wot not what forged righteousnesse, against the grace of God. But so soone as he is compelled to try his life by the balance of the law, then leaving the presumption of the counterfeited righteousnesse, he seeth himselfe to be an infinite space distant from holinesse: Again, that he floweth full of infinite vices, whereof before he seemed clean. For the evils of lust are hidden in so deepe and crooked privie corners, that they easily deceive the sight of man. And not without cause the Apostle saith, that hee knew no lust except the law had said: Thou shalt not lust: because except it be by the law disclosed out of her lurking holes, it destroyeth miserable man so secretly, that he feeleth not the deadly dart thereof.

7. * So the law is like a certaine looking glasse wherein we behold, first our weaknesse, and by that our wickednesse, and last of all by them both our accursednesse, even as a glasse representeth unto us the spots of our face. For when power faileth man to follow righteousnesse, then must he needs sticke fast in the mire of finnes. And after sinne, by and by followeth curse. And of how much the greater transgression the law holdeth us guiltie and convict, with so much the more grievous judgement it condemneth us. For this purpose maketh the saying of the Apostle, that by the law is the knowledge of sinne. For there hee speaketh onely of the first office of the law, the proove wherof is in sinners not yet regenerate. And liketo this are these two sayings, that the law entered, that sinne might abound; and therefore that it is the ministracion of death that worketh wrath and slaieth. For without doubt so much more groweth iniquitie, with how much more understanding of sin the conscience is stricken, because, unto breach of law is added obstinacie against the maker of the law. It followeth therefore that the law armeth the wrath of God to the destruction of the sinner, because of it selfe it can do nothing but accuse, condemne and destroy. And as Augustine writeth, if the spirit of grace be absent, the law is present with us, onely to this end, to accuse us and kill us. And yet when this is said, neither is the law dishonoured thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellencie thereof. Truly if our will were wholly framed and disposed to the obedience of the law, then plainly the onely knowledge of it were sufficient to salvation. But forasmuch as our fleshly and corrupt nature fighteth, as an enemy with the spirituall law of God, and is nothing amended with the discipline thereof, this followeth that the law which was given for salvation, (if it had found fit hearers) turneth to the occasion of sinne and death. For sith we are all proved transgressours of it, the more plainly that it openeth the righteousnesse of God, so much the more on the other side it discloseth our iniquitie: the more surely that it confirmeth the reward of life and salvation laid up for righteousnesse, so much the more assured it maketh the destruction of the wicked. So farre is it off therefore, that these sayings should be to the dishonour of the law, that they much availe to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. For truly, it hereby appeareth that we are hindred by our owne wickednesse and perversnesse, that we enjoy not the blessednesse of life set openly abroad for us by the law. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth us without the succour of the law, is made so much the sweeter, and the mercie more lovely that giveth it unto us: whereby we learne that he is never wearied with often doing us good and heaping new gifts upon us.

8 And whereas the iniquitie and condemnation of us all is sealed by the testimonie of the law, it is not done for this purpose (if at least we well profit in it) to make us fall downe with despaire, or with discouraged mindes to tumble downe headlong. In dedde the reprobate are amased after that manner, but that is by reason of their obstinacie, but with the children of God there behoveth to be another end of instruction. I grant the Apostle testifieth that we are all condemned by judgement of the law, that every mouth may be stopped, and that all the world may become bound unto God: but yet the same Apostle in another place teacheth, that God hath concluded all under unbeliefe, not to destroy all, or to suffer all to perish, but that he might have mercie of all; that leauing the foolish opinion of their owne strength, they might understand, that they stand and are upholden by the onely hand of God: that they being naked and emptie, may see in his mercie, that they may rest themselves wholly upon it, hide themselves wholly in it, take hold of it alone in stead of righteousnesse and merits, which is laid open in Christ for all men, who soever they be that with true faith doe desire and looke for it. For God in the commandments of the law appeareth but a rewarder of perfect righteousnesse, whereof we are all destitute; and on the other side a rigorous iudge of evill doings. But in Christ, his face shineth full of grace and lenitie, even toward the wretched and unworthy sinners.

9 Of profiting, to crave the grace of his helpe, Augustine speaketh of it, as when he writeth to Hilarie, The law commandeth that endeavouring to doe the things commanded, and being wearied with our weaknesse under the law, we should learne to aske the helpe of grace. Againe to Aselius: The profit of the law is to covince man of his owne weaknesse, and compell him to crave the Phisicke of grace that is in Christ. Againe, to Innocent of Rome: The law commandeth, and grace ministreth strength to doe. Againe, to Valentine: God commandeth those things that we cannot doe, that we may learne to know what to aske of him. Againe, the law was given to accuse you, that being accused you should feare, that fearing you should crave pardon, and not presume of your owne strengths. Againe, The law was given for this purpose, of great to make little, to shew that thou hast no strength of thine owne to righteousnesse, that thou as poore, unworthie, and needie, shouldest flee unto grace. After, he turneth his speech to God and saith: Doe so Lord, doe so mercifull Lord, command that which cannot be fulfilled: yea, command that which cannot but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men cannot fulfill it by their owne strength, every mouth may be stopped, and no man may thinke himselfe great. Let all be little ones, and let all the world be guiltie before thee. But I am not wise to heape up so many testimonies, sith that holy man hath written a booke properly of that matter, which he hath intituled, Of the Spirit and Letter. The second profiting he doth not so lively describe, either because he knew that it did hang upon the former, or because he did not so well understand it, or because he wanted words wherewith distinctly and plainly to expresse his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceived: but this first office of the law is not idle even in the reprobate also. For though they goe not thus far forward with the children of God, that after the throwing downe of their flesh, they be renewed and flourish againe in the inward man, but amased with the first terror do lie still in desperation: yet it serveth to shew forth

The end why the law doth bring men to the sight of their owne misery, is not that they might despaire, but that forsaking all confidence in themselves, they might rest upon the mercie of God in Iesus Christ alone. Rom. 3. 19. Rom. 11. 32.

Man being condemned of sin by the law, the effect thereof in the good is the craving of helpe from God, in the bad their despairing of themselves without aspiring to any helpe. Epist. 89. Epist. 200. Epist. 91. Lib de correptione & gratia. In Psal 70. In Psal 118. Sect. 27.

forth the equite of Gods judgement, that their consciences be tossed with such waies. For they ever willingly desire to make shift against the judgement of God. Now while the same is not yet opened, they yet so astonished with the testimonie of the law and their conscience, doe bewray in themselves what they have deserved:

10. The second office of the law, is that they which are touched with no care of that which is just and right, unlesse they be compelled, when they heare the terrible penall ordinances therein, may be restrained at least with feare of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inward minde is moved or affected withall, but because being as it were bridled, they withhold their hand from outward worke and doe keepe in their perversnesse within them, which otherwise they would ave outrageously poured out. Thereby they become truly neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being letted either by feare or shame, they dare not put that in practise which they have conceived in their minde, nor openly blow abroad the ragges of their lust: yet have they not a heart framed to the feare and obedience of God, yea, the more that they hold backe themselves, so much the stronger within they are kindled, they burne, they boile, readie to doe any thing, and to breake forth any whether, if this terror of the law did not stay them. And not that onely, but also they most spightfully hate the law, and doe detest God the lawmaker; so that if they could, they would very faine take him away, whom they cannot abide, neither when hee commandeth rightfull things, nor when hee revengeth him upon the despisers of his Majestie. In some indeed more darkely, and in some more plainly, but in all generally that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawne to the following of the law not by willing submission, but resisting and against their wils, onely by violence of feare. But this constrained and enforced righteousnesse, is necessarie for the publike common state of men, the quiet whereof is herein provided for, while order is taken that all things be not confounded with upore, which would come to passe, if all things were lawfull for all men. Yea, it is not unprofitable for the children of God to be exercised with this Schooling, so long as they before their calling being yet destitute of the spirit of sanctification, are still warron with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawne backe, though it be but from outward licentiousnesse, by the terror of Gods vengeance, although for that they are not yet tamed, in minde, they goe for the present time but a litle forward; yet they partly grow in ure to beare the yoke of Christ, so that when they are called, they be not altogether rude and raw to discipline, as to a thing unknowne. This office the Apostle seemeth properly to have touched, when hee saith that the law was not set for the righteous man, but for the unrighteous and disobedient, wicked, and sinners, evill doers and prophane men, slayers of their parents, and murderers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children, lyers, and perjured men, and whatsoever else is against found doctrine. For he saith, that it is a stay to the wilde outraging lusts of the flesh, that else would stray abroad without measure.

11. But to both may that be applied which he saith in another place, that the Law was to the Jewes a schoolemaster to Christ, for there are two sorts of men, whom with her schooling the leadeth by the hand to Christ. The one sort, of whom wee first spake, because they are too full of affiance of their owne strength or righteousness, are not meete to receive the grace of Christ, unlesse they bee first emptied: therefore the law bringeth them downe to humility by knowledge of themselves, that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other sort need a bridle to bee holden backe, lest they so give loose the reins to the wantonnesse of their flesh, that they fall off altogether from all studie of righteousness. For where the spirit of God doth not yet governe, there, sometime lusts doe so boyle, that it is in great perill lest they throw downe the soule that is subject to them into the forgetfulness and despising of God: and so would it come to passe, if God did not widd this remedie provide for it. Therefore those whom hee hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdome, if he doe not by and by regenerate them, hee keepeth them by the workes of the law under feare, untill the time of his vilitation, not that chaste and pure feare, such as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable feare for this that they may according to the capacitie, be taught by introduction to true godlinesse. Of this we have so many prooves, that it needeth no example. For whosoever have any time continued in not knowing of God, will confesse that this happened unto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the law in some feare and obedience of God, untill the time that being regenerate by his Spirit, they began heartily to love him.

1 Tim. 1. 9.

But for such men schooled by the terror of the law as well they that would otherwise be kept too highly of their owne righteousness as they which too boldly would follow the way of their owne lust.

12 The third use, which is also the principall use, and more neerly looketh unto the proper end of the Law, concerneth the faithfull, in whose hearts already liveth and reigneth the Spirit of God. For although they have the law written and graven in their hearts by the finger of God, that is to say, be so affectioned and minded by the direction of the spirit, that they desire to obey God; yet doe they still two waies profit in the law. For it is to them a very good meane, whereby they may daily better and more assuredly learne, what is the will of the Lord which they aspire unto, and may be confirmed in the understanding thereof. As if a servant be already bent with all the affection of his heart, to please his Lord: yet hath he neede diligently to search out and marke the fashions of his Lord, that he may frame and apply himselfe unto them. And let none of us exempt himselfe from this need. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wisdom, but that he may by daily instruction of the law, get new profit in proceeding to the purer knowledge of Gods will. Then because we neede not onely doctrine but also exhortation: this other profit shall the servant of God take by the law, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred up to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slippery way of offending. For after this manner, must these holy ones drive forward themselves, which with how great cheerefulnesse soever they travaile to Godward according to the spirit, yet they are alway loaden with the sluggishnesse of the flesh, that they proceede not with such full readinesse as they ought. To this flesh is the law given as a whip, that like a slow and dull Ass it may be pricked forward to worke. Yea to the spirituall man, because he is not yet dispatched of the burden of the flesh, it shall be a continuall pricke that suffereth him not to stand still. Even to this use David had respect, when he did set forth the law with those notable praises: The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting Soules: the justices of the Lord are upright, and clearing hearts: the commandements of the Lord is bright, that giveth light to the eyes, &c. Again: A lanthorne to my feet is thy word, and alight unto my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearseth in all that Psalme. Neither are these things against the sayings of Paul, wherein is shewed, not what use the Law ministreth to the regenerate, but what it is able to give to man of it selfe. But here the Prophet reporteth with how great profit the Lord doth instruct them by reading of the Law, to whom hee inwardly inspirith a readinesse to obey. And he taketh hold not of the Commandements onely, but also of the promise of grace annexed to the things, which only maketh the bitternesse to waxe sweet. For what were lesse amiable than the Law, if it should onely with requiring and threatening, trouble soules carefully with feare, and vexe them with terror? But specially David sheweth, that hee in the law conceived the Mediator, without whom their is no delight or sweetnesse.

13. Which while some unskillfull men cannot discern, they boldly shake away all Moses, and bid the two tables of the law farewell, because they thinke it is not agreeable for Christians to cleave to that doctrine that containeth the ministracion of death. Let this prophane opinion depart farre out of our minds. For Moses taught excellently well, that the same law which with sinners can engender nothing but death, ought in the holy to have a better and more excellent use. For thus, when he was readie to die, he openly said to the people: Lay your hearts upon all the words that I doe testifie to you this day, that ye may commit them to your children, that ye may teach them to keepe, to doe, and to fulfill all the things that are written in the volume of this law, because they are not vainely commanded you, but that every one should live in them. But if no man can denie that there appeared in it an absolute paterne of righteousnesse, then either we must have no rule at all to live justly and uprightly, or else it is not lawfull for us to part from it. For there are not many but one rule of life, which is perpetuall and cannot be bowed. Therefore, whereas David maketh the lye of a righteous man continuallie busied in the meditation of the law, let us not referre hat to one age onely, because it is most meete for all ages to the end of the world: and let us not therefore

The third office of the law respecting properly them that are regenerated by the spirit of grace, is first to instruct them what the will of God is, and secondly to breede in them eyes desire still more and more to goe forward in observing it.

Psal. 119. 105.

therefore be frayed away, or flie from being instructed by it, because it appointeth a much more exact holinesse than wee shall performe, while wee shall carry about the person of our body. For now it executeth not against us the office of a rigorous exacter, that will not be satisfied, but with his full taske performed: but in this perfection whereunto it exhorteth us, it sheweth us a marke, toward which in all our life to endeavour, is no lesse profitable for vs, than agreeable with our duty. In which endeavour if we faile not, it is well. For all this life is a race, the space whereof being runne out, the Lord will grant us to attaine to that marke, toward which our endeavours doe travell a faire off.

14. Now therefore, whereas the Law hath toward the faithfull a power to exhort, not such a power as may binde their consciences with curse, but such as with often calling on, may shake off sluggishnesse and pinch imperfection to awake it: many when they meane to expresse this deliverance from the curse thereof, doe say, that the Law is abrogate to the faithfull. (I speake yet of the Law morall) not that it doth no more command them that which is right, but onely that it bee no more unto them that which it was before, that is, that it do no more, by making afraid and confounding their consciences, damne and destroy them. And truly such an abrogation of the Law, Paul doth plainly teach, and also that the Lord himselfe spake of it, appeareth by this, that he would not have confuted that opinion that hee should dissolve the law, unless it had bene commonly received among the Jewes. But forasmuch as it could not rise causelessly and without any colour, it is likely that it grew upon false understanding of his doctrine, as in a manner all errors are wont to take occasion of truth, but least wee should also stumble at the same stone, let us diligently make distinction what is abrogate in the law, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lord protesteth that hee came not to destroy the law but to fulfill it: and that till heaven and earth passe away, no one jot of the law should passe away, but that all should be fulfilled: he sufficiently confirmeth that by his coming nothing should bee taken away from the due keeping of the law. And for good cause: sith hee came rather for this end, to heale offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the law remaineth for all Christians, inviolable, which by teaching, admonishing, rebuking, and correcting, may frame and prepare us to every good worke.

15. As for those things that Paul speaketh of the curse, it is evident that they belong not to the very instruction, but onely to the force of binding the conscience. For the law not onely teacheth, but also with authority requireth that which it commandeth. If it be not performed, yea if dutie be slackt in any part, it bendeth her thunder-bolt of curse. For this cause the Apostle saith, that all they that are of the workes of the law, are subject to the curse, because it is written: Cursed is every one, that fulfilleth not all. And he saith, that they bee under the works of the law, that doe not set righteousnesse in the forgiveness of sinnes, by which we are loosed from the rigour of the Law. He teacheth therefore that we must be loosed from the bonds of the Law, unless wee will miserably perish under them. But from what bonds? the bonds of that rigorous and sharp exacting, that releaseth nothing of the extremitie of the Law, and suffereth not any offence unpunished. From this curse (I say) that Christ might redeeme us, hee was made a Curse for us. For it is written: Cursed is every one that hangerth upon the tree. In the Chapter following indeed he saith, that Christ was made subject to the Law, to redeeme them that were under the Law, but all in one meaning, for hee by and by addeth, that by adoption we might receive the right of children. What is that? that we should not be oppressed with perpetuall bondage, that should hold our conscience fast strained with anguish of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth unshaken, that there is nothing withdrawne of the authoritie of the Law, but that it ought still to be received of us with the same reverence and obedience.

16. *Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which we abrogate not in effect, but in use onely. And this, that Christ by his coming hath made an end of them, doth so nothing diminish their holinesse, that it rather fettereth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they should have given but a vaine shew to the people, unless the power of the death and resurrection of Christ had bene shewed therein: so if they had not ceased, wee could not at this day discern to what purpose they were ordained. Therefore Paul, to prove that the keeping of them now is not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth, that they were shadows, whereof wee have the body in Christ. Wee see therefore how in the abolishing of them, the truth shineth better than if they did still a farre off, and as it were with a veile spread before, shew a figure of Christ, that hath already plainly appeared. And therefore the veile of the Temple at the death of Christ was torne in two peeces and fell downe: because now the true and expresse image of the heavenly good things was come to light, which before had been but imperfectly begun with darke rude draughts, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes saith. Hereunto serveh that saying of Christ, that the Law and the Prophets were unto the time of Iohn, and that from that time forward, the kingdome of God began to bee joyfully preached: not meaning that the holy Fathers were without the preaching that containeth the hope of salvation, and of eternall life, but because a farre off, and under shadows onely, they did behold that which wee at this day see in the full light. But why it behoved that the Church of God should climbe up higher from those first instructions; Iohn the Baptist declareth, for, that the Law is given by Moses, but grace and truth began by Jesus Christ. For although the purging of sinnes were truly promised in the old sacrifices, and the Arke of the covenant was a sure pledge of the fatherly favour of God, yet all this had bene but a shadow, if it had not bene grounded upon the grace of Christ, wherein is found, perfect and eternall stedfastnesse. Let this then remaine sure, that although the ceremoniall usages of the Law have ceased to be observed, yet by the end of them it is the better knowne, how great was the profit of them before Christ comming, which in taking away the use of them, hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

17. Somewhat more hard is the point that Paul noeth. And he hath renewed you together with him, when ye were dead by sinnes, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, forgiving you all your offences, blotting out the hand-writing that remained in the decrees against us, which was contrarie unto us, and he hath taken it away, fastning it to the crosse, &c. For it seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the law somewhat further, that now we have nothing to doe with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expound it of the law morrall, whose unappeasable rigour rather than doctrine thereof, they thinke to be taken away. Some more deeply weighing the words of Paul, doe espie that it is properly spoken of the law ceremoniall, and doe shew that this word Decree, doth more than once so signifie in Paul. For to the Ephesians he saith thus: He is our peace, that maketh both to bee one, that maketh voide the law of commandments consisting in the decrees, that he might make two in himselfe into one new man. It is no doubt that he speaketh there of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherewith the Jewes were severed from the Gentiles: wherefore I grant that those first expositions are rightfully reprov'd by these: but yet mee thinkes that these doe not sufficiently well set forth the minde of the Apostle. For I like not at all, to have these two places compared together in all points, when his purpose was to advertise the Ephesians of their adoption into the fellowship of Israel, hee teacheth that the stop is taken away, whereby they were before time kept asunder, that was in ceremonies. For the usages of washings and sacrifices, wherewith the Jewes were made holy unto the Lord, doe sever them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, who seeth not that he toucheth a higher mysterie? Indeede the point of the disputation there, is of Mosaicall observations whereunto the false Apostles did labour to drive the Christian people. But, as in the Epistle to the Galatians he searcheth that controversie further off, and as it were bringeth it backe to the first head thereof, so doth he also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you consider nothing else but a necessity of the use of them, to what purpose was it, to call it a hand-writing against us? moreover to set the whole sum in a manner of our redemption in this, that it should be cancelled? Wherefore the matter it selfe crieth out, that here is some more secret thing to be considered. And I trust that I have attained the naturall understanding of it; if at least this bee granted me to be true, which in one place is most truly written by Augustine, yea that hee hath taken out of the plaine words of the Apostle, that in the Jewish ceremonies was rather a confession than a cleansing of sinnes. For what did they else by sacrifices, but confesse themselves in their conscience guiltie of death, that did put cleannings in their place? What did they with their cleannings, but testifie themselves to be uncleane? And so was the hand-writing of their sinne and uncleannesse oft renewed by them; but there was no discharge in that testifying thereof. For which cause the Apostle writeth that at length by meane of the death of Christ, was performed the redemption of the offences that remained under the old Testament. Therefore the Apostle doth worthily call the ceremonies hand-writings against those that observe them: for asmuch as by them they did openly seale to their owne damnation and uncleannesse. And it hindereth not, that they were also partakers of the same grace with us. For this they obtained in Christ, not in the ceremonies, which were the Apostle doth sever from Christ, because being at that time used, they did obscure the glory of Christ. Thus learne we, that the ceremonies if they be considered by themselves, are well and fitly called handwritings against the salvation of men, because they were as solemne instruments that testified their being bound. When the false Apostles went about to binde the Christian Church to them againe: Paul did not without cause admonish the Cossians, by fetching the signification of them further off, to what point they should fall backe againe, if they suffered themselves in such sort to be yoked by them. For herewithall was the benefit of Christ wrested away from them, in asmuch as he having once performed the eternall cleanning, hath utterly abolished those daily observations, which were onely of force to seale sinnes, but could doe nothing to the putting away of them.

THE EIGHT CHAPTER.

HERE I thinke it shall not be from the purpose to interlace the tenne Commandements of the Law, with a short exposition of them, because thereby both that shall better appeare which I have touched, that the same keeping of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and then also we shall have besides that, a prooffe of the second point, that the Jewes did not onely learne by it what was the true force of godlinesse, but also by the terrour of the judgement, sith they saw themselves unable to keepe it, they were compelled whether they would or no, to be drawn to the Mediator. Now in setting forth the summe of those things that are required in the true knowledge of God, we have already taught, that we cannot conceive him according to his greatnesse, but that by and by his Majestie presenteth it selfe unto us, to binde us to the worship of him. In the knowledge of our selves we have set this for the chiefe point, that being void of the opinion of our own strength, and cleane stripped of the trust of our owne righteousnesse; and on the other side discouraged and beaten downe with conscience of our owne needinesse, we should learne perfect humility and abasement of our selves: The Lord setteth forth both these points in the Law, where first challenging to himselfe due power to governe, he calleth us to the reverence of his divine Majestie, and appointeth out unto us, where in it standeth and consisteth: and then publishing a rule of his righteousnesse, (against the righteousnesse whereof our nature as it is perverse and crooked, doth alway strive, and beneath the perfection whereof our power as of it selfe it is weake and feeble to doe good, lieth a great way below) he reprooveth us both of weakenesse and unrighteousnesse. Moreover, that inward law which we have before said to be graven, and as it were imprinted in the hearts of all men, doth after a certaine manner enforme us of the same things that are to be learned of the two tables. For our conscience doth not suffer us to sleepe a perpetuall sleepe without feeling, but that it inwardly is a witness and admonisher of those things that we owe to God, and layeth before us the difference of good and evill, and so accuseth us when we swarve from our duty. But man being wrapped in such darkenesse of errors as he is, skarfe even slenderly rather by that law of nature, what worship pleaseth God: but truly he is very farre distant from the right knowledge thereof. Beside that, he is so swollen with arrogancie and ambition, and so blinded with selfe-love, that he cannot yet looke upon, and as it were, descend into himselfe to learne to submit and humble himselfe, and confesse his owne misery. Therefore (as it was necessarie both for

The worship due to God, and the unrighteousnesse which is in us, because the inward law naturally written in our hearts cannot sufficiently reach, therefore God himselfe hath given a law which doth.

our dulnesse and stubbornesse) the Lord hath set us a law written, which should both more certainly testify that which in the law naturall was too obscure, and also should shake away our drowinesse, and more lively touch our minde and remembrance.

By the law we understand that we owe God obedience, and that be loath rightousnesse which we must seeke after, not excusing our selves by our inability which is no excuse.

2. Now it is easie to understand what is to be learned of the law, that is, that as God is our Creator, so of right he hath the place of our Father and Lord, and that by this reason we owe to him glorie, reverence, love, and feare. Yea, and also that we are not at our owne libertie, to follow whither soever that lust of our minde doth mooves us, but that we ought to hang upon his becke, and to rest onely upon that which pleaseth him. Then we learne, that he delighteth in righteousnesse, that he abhorreth wickednesse, and therefore that unlesse wee will with wicked unthankfulnesse fall away from our creator, we must necessarily observe righteousness all our life long. For if then onely wee yeeld unto him the reverence that wee owe, when we preferre his will before our owne, it followeth, that there is no other due worship of him, but the observation of righteousness, holinesse, and cleannesse. Neither may we pretend this excuse that wee want power, and like wasted debtors be not able to pay. For it is not convenient that we should measure the glorie of God by our owne power: for whatsoever we be, he alway abideth like to himselfe, a lover of righteousness, a hater of wickednesse. Whatsoever he requireth of us (because he can require nothing but that which is right) by bond of nature we must of necessity obey: but that we are notable, is our owne fault. For if we be holden bound of our owne lust wherein sinne reigneth, so that we are not loofe at liberty to obey our Father, there is no cause why we should alleadge necessity for our defence, the evill whereof is both within us, and to be imputed unto our selves.

3. When we have thus farre profited by the teaching of the law, then must wee by the teaching of the same law also descend unto our selves: whereby at length wee may carrie away two things. The first is, by comparing the righteousness of the law with our life, to learne, that we are farre off from being able to satisfie the will of God, and that therefore we are not worthie to have place among his creatures, much lesse to be reckoned among his children. The second is, in considering our strength, to learne that it is not onely sufficient to fulfill the law, but also utterly none at all. Hereupon followeth both a distrust of our owne strength, and a care and fearefulnesse of minde. For conscience cannot beare the burthen of iniquity, but that by and by the judgement of God is present before it: and the judgement of God cannot be felt, but that it striketh into us a dreadful horror of death. And like wise being constrained with proofes of her owne weaknesse, it cannot choose but by and by fall into despaire of her owne strength. Both these affections doe ingender humilitie and abatement of courage. So at length it cometh to passe, that man made afraid with feeling of eternall death, which he seeth to hang over him by the deserving of his own righteousness, turneth himselfe to the only mercy of God, as to the only haven of salvation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that he oweth unto the Law, despairing in himselfe, he may take breath againe and begin to crave and looke for help from elsewhere.

4. But the Lord not contented to have procured a reverence of his righteousness hath also added promises and threatenings to fill our hearts with love of him, and with hatred of wickednesse. For, because our minde is too blinde, to be mooved with the onely beauty of goodnesse, it pleased the most mercifull father of his tender kindnesse to allure us with sweetnesse of rewards, to love and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewards laid up for vertue, and that he shall not spend his labour in vaine, whosoever he be, that shall obey his commandments. Hee proclaimeth on the other side, that he not onely abhorreth unrighteousnesse, but also that it shall not escape unpunished, for that he will be a revenger of the contempt of his Majestie. And to exhort us by all meanes, he promiseth as well the blessings of this life present, as also eternall blessednesse to their obedience that keepe his commandments: and to the transgressors thereof, he threatneth both present miseries, and the punishment of eternall death. For the same promise, (he that doth these things shall live in them:) and also the threatening that answereth it, (the soule that sinneth, that same shall die) doe without doubt belong to the immortality or death that is come, and shall never be ended. Albeit, wheresoever is mentioned the good will or wrath of God, under the one is contained

tained the eternitie of life, under the other eternall destruction. Of present blessings and curses there is a longer register rehearsed in the law. And in the penall ordinances appeareth the soveraigne cleanness of God, that can suffer no iniquitie: but in his promises, beside his great love of righteousness, (which he cannot finde in his heart to defraud of her reward) there is also proved by his marvellous bountifullnesse. For whereas we and all ours are indebted unto his Majesty, by good right whatsoever he requireth of us, he demandeth it as due debt, but the payment of debt is not worthie of reward. Therefore he departeth with his owne right, when he offereth reward to our obediences, which we doe not yeeld of our selves as things that were not due: but what those promises doe bring unto us, is partly said already, and partly shall appeare more plainly in place fit for it. It sufficeth for this present, if we remember and consider, that there is in the promises of the law no small commendations of righteousness, that it may the more certainly appeare, how much the keeping thereof pleaseth God: that the penall ordinances are set for the more detestation of unrighteousnesse, least the sinner delighted with the sweet flatterings of vices, should forget that the judgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

5. Now whereas the Lord giving a rule of perfect righteousness, hath applied all the parts thereof to his owne will; therein, is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obedience, which is so much more diligently to be marked, as the wantonnesse of mans minde is more readie to devise now and then divers sorts of worshipping to win his favour withall. For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religion, because it is naturally planted in the wit of man, hath shewed and yet doth shew forth it selfe, that men doe alway delight to invent a way to bring righteousness beside the word of God; whereby it cometh to passe that the commandements of the law, have but small place among the works that are commonly called good works, while that innumerable rout of mens works occupieth almost all the roome. But what other thing meant Moses, than to restrain such licentiousnesse; when after the publishing of the law he spake thus to the people: Give heed, and heare all the things that I command thee, that it may be well to thee and to thy children after thee for ever, when thou shalt doe that which is good and pleasant before thy God. What I command thee, that only doe: adde not unto it, nor diminish it. And before, when he had protested, that this was his wisdom and understanding before other nations, that hee had received judgements, righteousness, and ceremonies of the Lord, he said further, Keepe therefore thy selfe and thy soule carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eyes have seene, and that at no time they fall out of thy heart. For because God did foresee, that the Israelites would not rest, but that after they had received the law, they would beside it travell in bringing forth new righteousness, if they were not severely holden backe: therefore he pronounceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteousness, which should have been the strongest stay to hold them backe, and yet they did not cease from that boldnesse so much forbidden them. But what of us? we are surely comprehended within the same charge: for it is no doubt that that continueth still whereby the Lord hath challenged to his law, the absolute doctrine of righteousness, yet we not contented therewith, doe monstrously travell with forging and coining of new good workes, one upon another. For the healing of this fault, the best remedy shall be, if this thought shall be stedfastly setled in us, that the law is given us from God to teach us a perfect righteousness: that therein is taught no righteousness, but the same that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore new formes of works are vainely attempted to win the favour of God, whose true worship standeth in onely obedience: but rather that such studie of good workes as wandreth out of the law of God, is an intollerable defiling of Gods righteousness and of the true righteousness, Augustine also saith most truly, which calleth the obedience that is done to God, sometime the mother and keeper, sometime the originall of all vertues.

6. But when we have expounded the law of the Lord, then more fitly and with more profit shall that be confirmed, which I have before spoken of the office and use of the law. But before that I begin to discourse every severall commandement by it selfe, it shall be good now to give such lessons as serve to the universall knowledge thereof.

First let us hold for determined, that the life of man is instructed in the law not onely to outward honestie, but also to inward and spirituall righteoufnesse. Which thing whereas no man can denie, yet there be few that rightly marke it. That commeth to passe, because they looke not upon the lawmaker, by whose nature, the nature of the law also ought to be weighed. If any King doe by Proclamation forbid to commit fornication, to kill, or to steale: in this case I grant that if a man doe onely conceive in his minde a lust to commit fornication, to sinne, or to steale, and doe not commit any of these things indeed, he is out of the compasse of this prohibition. And the reason is, for that because the foresight of a mortall lawmaker, could not extend but to outward civillitie: his commandements are not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose eie nothing escapeth, and which regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleannesse of the heart) under the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter, and theft, forbiddeth lust, wrath, hatred, covering of another mans guile, and whatsoever is like to these. For inso much as he is a spirituall lawmaker, he speaketh no lesse to the soule than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soule, are wrath and hatred: the theft of the soule, is evill desire and covetousnesse: the fornication of the soule, is lust. But mans lawes also (will some man say) have regard to intents and wills, and not to successes of fortune. I grant, but yet they are such intents and wils, as have outwardly broken out. They weigh with what intent every outward act hath been done; but they search not the secret thoughts. Therefore they are satisfied when a man onely withholdeth his hands from offending. On the other side, because the heavenly law is made for our mindes, therefore the restraint of mindes is principally needfull to the keeping thereof. But the common sort of men, even when they mightily dissemble their contempt of the law, doe frame their eies, their feete, their hands, and all the parts of their bodies to some observation of the law; in the meane time they hold their heart most farre off from all obedience, and thinke themselves well discharged, if they keepe close from men, that which they doe in the sight of God. They heare it said: Thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adulterie: Thou shalt not steale: they draw not out their sword to kill: they joyne not their bodies with harlots: they lay not their hands upon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole hearts they breath out murders, they boyle in lust, they cast their eies aside at all mens goods, and devoure them with covering. Now wanteth that which was the chiefe point of the law. Whence, I pray you, commeth so grosse dulnesse, but that leaving the lawmaker, they rather measure righteoufnesse by their owne wit? Against these doth Pavil mightily cry out, affirming that the law is spirituall, whereby he meaneth, that it not onely demandeth an obedience of the soule, minde and will, but also requireth an Angelike purenesse, which having all the filthinesse of the flesh cleane wiped away, may favour nothing but of the spirit.

7. When we say that this is the meaning of the law, wee thrust not in a new exposition of our owne, but we follow Christ, the best expositor of the law. For when the Pharisees had infected the people with a false opinion, that he performeth the law, that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the law: hee reproveth this most perillous error, and pronounced that unchaste looking at a woman is fornication: he protested that they are manslaughterers that hate their brother, for he maketh them guiltie of judgement that have but conceived wrath in their minde, and taken them guiltie of the councill that in murmuring or grudging have uttered any token of a displeased minde: and them guiltie of hell fire, that with taunts and railing breake forth into open anger. They that have not espied these things, have fained Christ to be another Moses, the giver of the law of the Gospell, which supplied the imperfection of the law of Moses. Whereupon commeth that common principle of perfection of the law of the Gospell, which farre passeth the old law, which is a most pernicious opinion. For hereafter, where we shall gather a summe of the commandements, it shall appeare by Moses himselfe, how reprochfully they dishonour the law of God. Truly it sheweth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hypocrisie, and it lea deth us away from that onely and perfect rule of righteoufnesse. But it is very easie to confute that error: for that they thought that Christ did adde unto the law, whereas he did but but restore the law to her integritie, which while he made it free, and cleansed it being obscured with lies, and defiled with the leaven of the Pharisees.

8 Let this be our second note, that there is alway more contained in the commandements and prohibitions, than is by words expressed, which yet is to be tempered, that it be not like a Lesbian rule, whereby licentious wresting the Scriptures, we may make of every thing what we list. For many bring to passe by this unmeasured libertie of running at large, that with some the authoritie of Scripture groweth in contempt, and either some despise of understanding it. Therefore if it be possible, we must take some such way, as may by right and perfect path leade us to the will of God, we must I say search how farre our exposition may exceede the bounds of the words, that it may appeare that it is not an addition of mens gloses knit to the word of God, but rather that the pure and naturall meaning of the law giver is faithfully rendred. Truly, in a manner in all the commandements it is so manifest, that there are figurative speeches, meaning more in expressing part, that he may worthily be laughed at, that will restraine the meaning of the law to the narrowesse of the words. It is evident therefore, that sober exposition doth passe beyond the words: but how farre, that remaineth hard to judge, unless there be some measure appointed: wherefore I thinke this to be the best measure, that if it be directed to the intent of the commandement, that is, that in every commandement be weighed, why it was given us. As for example: Every commandement is either by way of bidding or forbidding: the truth of both sorts shall forthwith be found, if we consider the intent or the end thereof. As the end of the fifth commandement is, that honour is to be given to their, to whom God appointeth it. This therefore is the summe of the commandement, that it is right and pleaseth God, that we honour them to whom he hath given an excellencie, and that hee abhorreth contempt and stubbornesse against them. The intent of the first commandement is, that God alone be honoured. The summe therefore of the commandement shall be, that true godlinesse, that is to say, true worship of his Majestie pleaseth God, and that he abhorreth ungodlinesse. So in every commandement we must looke upon what matter it treateth: then must we search out the end, till we finde what the lawmaker doth testifie therein, properly to please or displease him: and last of all, we must draw an argument from the same to the contrarie, after this manner: If this pleaseth God, then the contrarie displeaseth him: if this displease him, then the contrarie pleaseth him: if he commandeth this, then he forbiddeth the contrarie: if he forbid this, then he commandeth the contrarie.

9 That which is now somewhat darkly touched, shall in expounding of the commandements become very plaine by practice; wherefore it sufficeth to have touched it, saying that this last point is to be shortly confirmed with some prooffe thereof, because otherwise either it should not be understood, or being understood, it might perhaps at the beginning seeme to sound like an absurditie. This needeth no prooffe, that when a good thing is commanded, the evill is forbidden that is contrarie to it: for there is no man but he will grant it me. And common judgement will not much stick to admit, that when evill things are forbidden, the contrarie duties are commanded. It is an universall opinion that vertues are commended, when the contrarie vices are condemned. But we require somewhat more than those formes of speech doe signifie commonly among the people. For they for the most part take the vertue contrary to any vice, to be the abstaining from the same vice: we say that it proceedeth farther, that is, to contrarie duties and doings. Therefore in this commandement, Thou shalt not kill, the common sence of men will consider nothing else, but that we must abstaine from all hurt doing, or lust to doe hurt. I say, that there is further contained, that we should by all the helpes that we may, succour the life of our neighbour. And, lest I speake without a reason, I proove it thus: God forbiddeth that our brother be hurt or misused, because he willeth that our neighbours life be deere and precious unto us: he doth therefore require withall, those duties of love that may be done by us for the preservation of it. And so may we see how the end of the commandement doth alway dis-closure unto us, all that we are therein commanded or forbidden to doe.

10 But why God, in such as it were halfe commandements, hath by figures rather

The second rule to understand the law by, is, that in every commandement more is meant than the naked words doe literally import, and how much more the scope of each commandement compared with the matter thereof together with the contrary will show.

That the forbidding of evill in the law, implieth a commanding of the duties which are good,

The cause why God hath forbidden the very secret motion into sin by the name of the gosse and a sin ill dede, is that the foulness of such termes might make us the better to understand the ugliness of those faults, which being expressed by more proper and soft names we would make lesse account of.

The reason of dividing the law into two parts or tables, whereof the former containeth the duties which we owe properly unto God, is for that his worship is the fountaine, head and foundation, without which there can no good or acceptable duty passe from man to man.

Matth. 22. 27.

ther secretly signified, than expressed what his will was, whereas there were wont to be many reasons rendred thereof, this one reason pleaseth me above the rest. Because the flesh alway endeavoureth to extenuare the filthinesse of sinne, and to colour it with faire pretences, saving where it is even palpable for grossenesse, he hath set forth for an example in every kinde of offence that which was most wicked and abominable, in the hearing whereof our very senses might be mooved with horreur, thereby to imprint in our mindes a more hainous detesting of every sort of sinne. This many times deceiveth us in weighing of vices, that if any thing be secret, we make them seeme small. These deceits the Lord doth disclose, when he accustometh us to referre all the whole multitude of vices to these principall heads, which doe best of all shew, how much every kinde is abominable. As for example, wrath and hatred are not thought so hainous evils, when they are called by their owne names, but when they are forbidden us under the name of manslaughter, we better understand how abominable they are before God, by whose word they are set in the degree of so horrible an offence: and we mooved by his judgement, doe accustome our selves better to weigh the hainousnesse of those faults, that before seemed but light unto us.

11 Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the dividing of the law of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will judge, that there is sometime mention made not unfitly from the purpose, nor without cause. And we have a cause ready, that doth not suffer us to remaine in doubt of this matter. For God so divided his law into two parts, in which is contained the whole righteousnesse, that he hath assigned the first, to the duties of religion that peculiarly pertaine to the worshipping of his Godhead, the other, to the duties of charitie which belong unto men. The first foundation of righteousnesse is the worship of God: which being once overthrowne, all the other members of righteousnesse are torne in sunder and dissolved, like to the parts of an house unjoynted and fallen downe. For what manner of righteousnesse wilt thou call it, that thou vexest nor men with roberrie and extorsions, if in the meane time by wicked sacriledge thou spoilest Gods majestic of his glorie? that thou defilest not thy body with fornication, if with thy blasphemies thou profanely abuse the sacred name of God? that thou murderest no man, if thou travell to destroy and extinguish the memorie of God. Wherefore righteousnesse is vainely boasted of without religion, and maketh no better show, than if a mangled body with the head cut off, should be brought forth for a beautiful sight. And religion is not only the principall part of righteousnesse, but also the very soule wherewith it breatheth, and is quickned. For men keepe not equitie and love among themselves without the feare of God. Therefore we say that the worship of God is the beginning and foundation of righteousnesse, because when it is taken away, all the equitie, continence and temperance that men use among themselves, is vaine and trifling before God. We say also, that it is the spring head and lively breath of righteousnesse, because hereby men doe learne to live among themselves temperately, and without hurt doing one to another, if they reverence God as the judge of right and wrong. Wherefore in the first table, he instructeth us to godlinesse and the proper duties of religion, wherewith his majestic is to be worshipped: in the other, he prescribeth how for feare sake of his name, we ought to behave our selves in the fellowship of men. And for this reason our Lord (as the Evangelists rehearse it) did in a summe gather the whole law into two principall points: the one, that we should love God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength: the other, that we love our neighbour as our selves. Thus thou seest how of the two parts wherein he concludeth the whole law, he directeth the one toward God, and appointeth the other toward men.

12 But although the whole law be contained in two principall points, yet to the end to take away all pretense of excuse, it pleased our God to declare in the ten Commandements more largely and plainly all things that belong both to the honour, feare, and love of himselfe, and also that charitie which he commandeth us to beare to men for his sake. And thy studie is not ill spent to know the division of the commandements, so that thou remember that it is such a matter, wherein every man ought to have his judgement free, for which we ought not contentiously to strive with him that thinketh otherwise. But we must needs touch this point, lest the Readers should either scorne or marvell at the division that we shall use, as new and lately devised. That the law is divided in ten words, because it is oft approved by the authoritie of God himselfe, it is out of controversie; wherefore there is no doubt of the number, but of the manner of dividing. They that so divide them, that they give three commandments to the first table, and put other seven into the second, doe wipe out the number of the commandment concerning images, or at least they hide it under the first: whereas without doubt it is severally set by the Lord for a commandment, and the tenth commandment of not coveting the things of his neighbour, they doe fondly tear into two. Beside that, it shall by and by be done to understand, that such manner of dividing was unknowne in the pure age. Other doe reckon, as we doe, foure severall commandments in the first table, but in the place of the first, they set the promise without the commandment. As for mee, because unless I be convinced by evident reason, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commandments, me thinkes I see so many divided in very fit order. Therefore, leaving to them their opinion, I will follow that which I best allow, that is, that the same which these latter sort make the first commandment, shall be in stead of a preface to the whole law; and then shall follow the commandments, foure of the first table, and sixe of the second, in such order as they shall be rehearsed. Augustine also to Boniface agreeth with us, which in rehearsing them keepeth this order: that God onely be served with obedience of religion, that no idol be worshipped, that the name of the Lord be not taken in vaine, when he had before severally spoken of the shadowish commandment of the Sabbath. In an other place indeed that first division pleaseth him, but for too slender a cause, that is, because in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commandments, the mysterie of the Trinite more plainly appeareth. Albeit in the same place he sticketh not to confesse, that otherwise he rather liketh our division. Besides these, the authour of the unperfect worke upon Matthew, is on our side. Iosephus, undoubtredly according to the common consent of his time, assigneth to either table five commandments. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the distinction of religion and charitie, and also is confuted by the authoritie of the Lord himselfe, which in Matthew reckoneth the commandment of honouring our parents, in the number of the second table. Now let us heare God himselfe speaking in his owne words.

The first Commandment.

I am the Lord thy God, which hath brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no strange Gods before my face.

13 Whether you make the first sentence a part of the first commandment, or read it severally, it is indifferent unto me, so that you doe not denie me that it standeth in stead of a preface to the whole law. First in making of lawes is used to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all provideth, that the majestie of the law that he shall make, may never at any time come in contempt. For stablishing whereof, he useth three manner of arguments. First, he challengeth to himselfe power and right of dominion, whereby he may constrain his chosen people, that they must of necessitie obey him: then, he setteth fourth a promise of grace with sweetnes thereof to allure them to the studie of holinesse. Thirdly, he reciterh the benefit that he did for them, to reproove the Jewes of unthankfulnessse, if they doe not with obedience answer his kindnesse. Under the name of Jehovah, the Lord, is meant his authoritie and lawfull dominion. And if all things be of him, and doe abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him as Paul saith. Therefore we are with this word alone sufficiently brought under the yoke of Gods Majestie, because it were monstrous for us to seeke to withdraw our selves from under his government, out of whom wee cannot be.

14 After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, lest he should seeme to draw by only necessitie, he also allureth with sweetnesse in pronouncing, that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this

To keepe the law from growing into contempt the lawmaker in the preface therunto useth three meanes: the first is a declaration of his greatnes which to shew be termeth himselfe the Lord.

Speech a mutuall relation, which is contained in the promise : I will be to them a God, and they shall be to mee a people. Whereupon Christ proveth that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, hath immortall life, by this, that God testifieth that he is their God. Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he should say thus : I have chosen you to be my people, not onely to doe you good in this present life, but also to give you the blessednesse of the life to come. But to what end this tendeth, it is noted in divers places in the law. For when the Lord doth vouchsafe to deale thus mercifully with us, to call us into the company of his people, he chuseth us (saith Moses) that we should be a peculiar people unto himselfe, a holy people, and should keepe his commandements. From whence also commeth this exhortation : Be yee holy as I am holy. Now out of these two is derived that protestation that is in the Prophet: The sonne honoureth the father, and the servant honoureth his Lord. If I be a Lord, where is my feare? If I be a father, where is my love?

15. Now followeth the rehearall of his benefit, which ought to be of so much more force to move us, as the fault of unthankfulnesse is more detestable even among men. He then did put Israel in remembrance of a benefit lately done, but such a one as for the miraculous greatnesse thereof being worthy to be had in remembrance for ever, should remaine in force with their posterity. Moreover it is most agreeable for this present matter. For the Lord seemeth to say, that they were delivered out of miserable bondage for this purpose, that they should with obedience and readinesse of service honour him, the author of their deliverance. He useth also (to the end to hold us fast in the true worshipping of him alone) to set out himselfe with certaine titles, whereby he maketh his sacred Majestie to be differently knowne from all idols and forged gods. For, as I said before, such is our ready inclination to vanity, joynd with rash boldnesse, that so soone as God is named, our minde cannot take heed to it selfe, but that it by and by falleth away to some vaine invention. Therefore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedy for this mischief, he setteth out his owne God-head with certaine titles, and so doth compasse us in as it were within certaine grates, lest we should wander hither and thither, and rashly forge our selves some new god, if forsaking the living God, we should erect an idol. For this cause so oft as the Prophets meane properly to point out him, they cloath him, and as it were enclose him within those marks whereby he hath opened himselfe to the people of Israel. And yet when he is called the God of Abraham, or the God of Israel, when he is set in the Temple of Hierusalem among the Cherubins, these and like formes of speech doe not binde him to one place or to one people, but are set onely for this purpose, to stay the thoughts of the godly, in that God, which by his covenant that he hath made with Israel, hath so represented himselfe, that it is no way lawfull to vary from such a patterne. But let this remaine stedfastly imprinted, that there is mention made of the deliverance to this end, that the Jewes might the more cheerefully give themselves to the God that doth by right claime them unto him. And we (lest wee should thinke that the same nothing belongeth to us) ought to consider, that the bondage of Aegypt is a figure of the spirituall captivity, wherein we are all holden bound, untill our heavenly deliverer doe make us free by the power of his arme, and convey us into the kingdome of liberty. As therefore when in the old time he minded to gather together the Israelites that were scattered abroad, to the worshipping of his name, he delivered them out of the intollerable dominion of Pharaoh, wherewith they were oppressed : so all those to whom at this day he professeth himselfe a God, he doth now deliver from the deadly power of the devill, which was in a shadow signified by that corporall bondage. Wherefore there is no man, but his minde ought to be enflamed to hearken to the law which he heareth to have proceeded from the soveraigne King. From whom as all things take their beginning, so it mee that they have also their end appointed and directed to him. There is no man (I say) but he ought to be ravished to embrace the law-maker, to the keeping of whose commandements, he is taught that he is peculiarly chosen : for whose bounty hee looketh both for flowing store of all good things, and also the glory of immortall life : by whose marvellous power and mercy he knoweth himselfe to be delivered out of the jaws of death.

16. After that he hath grounded and stablished the authority of his law, hee setteth forth the first commandement, That we have no strange gods before him. The end of this

commandment is, that God will onely have preheminance, and enjoy wholly his owne authoritie among his people. And that it may be so, he commandeth that there be farre from us all ungodlinesse and superstition, whereby the glory of his godhead is either ther diminished or obscured: and by the same reason he commandeth, that we worship and honour him with true endeavour of godlinesse. And the very simplicitie of the words themselves doe in a manner expresse the same. For we cannot have God, but wee must also comprehend therein all things that properly belong to him. Whereas therefore he forbiddeth us to have other Gods, he meanth thereby, that we should not give away elsewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe unto God bee innumerable, yet not unlesly they may bee brought unto foure principall points: Adoration, whertunto as a thing hanging upon it, is adjoynd spirituall obedience of conscience: Affiance, Invocation, and Thanksgiving. Adoration I call the reverence and worship which every one of us yeldeth unto him, when hee submitte himselfe unto his greatnesse: wherefore I doe not without cause make this a part thereof, that we yeeld our consciences in subjection to his law. Affiance is an assurednesse of resting in him by reknowledging of his power, when reposing all wisdom, righteousnesse, power, truth, and goodnesse in him, we thinke our selves blessed with only partaking of him. Invocation, is a resorting of our minde to his faith and helpe as to our only succour, so oft as any necessity presseth us. Thanksgiving is a certaine thankfulnesse whereby the praise of all good things is given unto him. Of these, as God suffreth nothing to be conveyed away elsewhere, so he commandeth all to be wholly given to himselfe. Neither shall it be ynough to abstaine from having any strange God, unlesse thou restrain thy selfe in this, that many wicked contemners are wont, which thinke the readiest way to scorne all religion: but true religion must gee before, whereby our minds may be directed to the living God, with knowledge whereof they being endued, may aspire to reverence, feare and worship his Majesty, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, every where to seeke for his helpe, to reknowledge and advance with confession of praise the magnificence of his workes, as to the only marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerse superstition, whereby our mindes swarving from the true God, are drawne hither and thither as it were unto divers gods. Wherefore, if we be contented with one God, let us call to remembrance that which is before said, that all forged gods are to be driven farre away, and that the worship is not to be torne in sunder, which he alone claimeth to himselfe. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glory, be it never so litle, but that all things that belong to him may wholly remaine with him. The parcell of sentence that followeth (Before my face) encreaseth the hainousnesse: for that God is provoked to jealousie, so oft as we thru st our owne inventions in his place: as if an unchaste woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eyes, should the more vex his minde. Therefore when God testified that with his present power and grace, hee looked upon the people that hee had chosen, the more to fray them from the wicked act of falling from him, he giveth them warning that there can be no new gods brought in, but that he is witness and beholder of their sacrilege. For this boldnesse is increased with much wickednesse, that man thinketh that in his flying away, he can beguile the eyes of God. On the other side, God cryeth out that whatsoever we purpose, whatsoever we goe about, whatsoever we practise, it commeth in his sight. Let therefore our conscience be cleane even from the most secret thoughts of swarving from him, if wee will have our religion to please the Lord. For here requireth to have the glory of his godhead whole and uncorrupted not onely in outward confession, but also in his eyes, which doe behold the most secret corners of hearts.

The second Commandment.

Thou shalt not make to thee any graven image, nor any similitude: of those things that are in heaven above, or in earth beneath, or in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not worship them, nor serve them.

17 As in the first Commandment hee pronounced that hee is the one God, beside whom there are no other gods to be devised or had, so now he more openly declareth

The first Commandment will eie to establish his sole preeminence over his people, he requireth that which is due to be given him, and him alone, as adoration, affiance, invocation, and thanksgiving, which if we doe not yeld unto him, or doe unto others with him, either in whole, or in part, he hath a revenging eie to behold it, be it never so small or so ee.

The end of the second Commandment being to keep the worship of God pure from prophanation, he forbiddeth first to make any image for representation of God, and secondly to worship any image made.

Deur. 4. 15.

The penalty annexed to the second commandment which the better to imprint, God mentioneth his strength, his jealousy, his wrath in shewing both vengeance and mercy not slightly but with long continuance as well of the one as the other: and the reason why God of himselfe as in the person of a husband.

Jer. 3.

That by the punishment which God doth threaten to the children of the diso-

what manner of God he is, and with what kinde of worship he is to be honoured: that we may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The end therefore of this commandment is, that he will not have the lawfull worship of him, to be prophaned with superstitious usages. Wherefore in sum, he calleth and draweth us away from the carnall observations, which our foolish minde is wont to invent, when it conceiveth God according to her owne grossness. And therefore he frameth us to the lawfull worship of him, that is, the spiritual worship, and which is appointed by him. He speaketh of the grossest fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatry. And there be two parts of this commandment. The first restraineth our liberty, that we doe not presume to make subject our senses or by any forme to represent God, which is incomprehensible. The second part forbiddeth us to honour any images for religions sake. Moreover he shortly reciteth all the formes wherewith he was wont to be expressed in shape, by the prophane and superstitious nations. By those things that are in heaven, hee meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres, and peradventure also birds, as expressing his meaning in the fourth of Deuteronomie hee meaneth as well birds as stars. Which note I would not have spoken of, but that I saw some unskillfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other parts, because they are sufficiently knowne of themselves. And we have already in the first booke taught plainly enough, that whatsoever visible formes of God, man doth invent, they are directly contrary to his nature, and that therefore so farre as images come forth, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

18 The penall ordinance that followeth, ought not a little to avale to shake of our slothfulness. For he threateth: That he is the Lord our God, a strong and jealous God, that visiteth the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation, in them that hate his name, and sheweth mercy unto thousands to them that love him and keepe his commandments. This is as much in effect, as if he should have said that it is he onely upon whom wee ought to sticke. And to bring us thereunto, he speaketh of his power, that doth not without punishment suffer it selfe to be contemned or diminished. Here is indeed set the name El, which signifieth God. But because it is derived of strength, to expresse the sense the better, I did not sticke so to translate it or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himselfe Ielous, that can abide no fellow. Thirdly, he affirmeth that he will be a revenger of his majesty and glory, if any doe transfer it to creatures or to graven images, and that notwith a short or slender revenge, but such as shall extend to the children and childrens children, and childrens childrens children, that is, such as shall be followers of their fathers ungodlinesse: as also he sheweth a perpetuall mercy and bountifullnesse unto long continuance of posterity, to those that love him and keepe his law. It is a common manner with God to take upon him the person of a husband toward us. For the conjunction wherewith hee bindeth himselfe unto us, when he receiveth us into the bosome of his Church, is like unto a certaine holy wedlocke, that must stand by mutuall faithfulness. As he doth all the duties of a faithfull and true husband, so againe he requireth of us such love and chastity as ought to be in wedlocke, that we yeeld not our soules to Satan, to lust, and to filthy desires of the flesh; to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the Apostasie of the Iewes, complaineth that they did throw away chastity, and were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and chaste that he himselfe is, the more is he kindled to anger if he see his wives minde incline to a strange lover: soe the Lord that hath wedded us unto himselfe in truth, testifieth that hee hath a most fervently burning jealousy, so oft as neglecting the purenesse of his holy marriage, wee are defiled with wicked lusts, but specially then when we transfer to any other, or doe infect with any superstition the worship of his name, which ought to be most uncorrupted. For as much as by this meane, we doe not onely breake the faith given in wedlocke, but also so defile the very wedding bed with bringing into it adulterers.

19 In the threatening is to be scene what he meaneth by this, when he saith, that hee will visite the iniquities of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. For, beside that it standeth not with the equity of Gods justice, to punish the innocent for anothers offence, God himselfe also saith, that hee will not make the sonne to beare the wickednesse of the Father. But this sentence is more than once once repeated, of prolonging the punishment of the sinnes of the ancestors upon the generation to come. For so doth Moses oftentimes speake unto him : Lord, Lord, that rendrest the iniquities of the fathers to the children, unto the third and fourth generation. Likewise Hieremie : Thou that shewest mercy in thousands, that rendrest the iniquity of the fathers into the bosome of the children after them. Many, while they travell much in loosing this knot, thinke that it is to bee understood onely of temporall punishments, which if the children suffer for the parents faults, it is no absurditie, for as much as they are oftentimes laid upon them for their salvation, which is indeed true. For Esay declared to Ezechias, that his sonne should be spoyled of the kingdome, and carried into exile for the sinne that he had committed. The houses of Phariseo and Abimelech were plagued for offending Abraham. But when that is alleaged for affoyling of this question, it is rather a shift than a true exposition. For here and in like places he threatneth a more grievous revenge, than it may bee limited within the bounds of this present life. It is therefore thus to bee taken : that the just curse of the Lord, lyeth not onely upon the head of the wicked man himselfe, but also upon his whole family : when the curse once lieth upon them, what is else to bee looked for, but that the father being destitute of the spirit of God, live most wickedly, and the sonne likewise forsaken of the Lord for the fathers fault, doe follow the same way of destruction: and finally the childes childe, and the childe of the childes child, the cursed seed of detestable men doe fall headlong after them ?

20 First let us see, whether such revenge bee unseemely for the justice of God. If all the nature of man bee damnable, we know that destruction is prepared for them, to whom the Lord vouchsafeth not to communicate his grace. Nevertheless they do perishe by their owne unrighteousnesse, and not by unrighteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any cause to quarrell, Why they be not holpen by the grace of God to salvation, as other are. Whereas therefore this punishment is laid upon wicked men and evill doers for their offences, that their houses are deprived of the grace of God during many generations: who can accuse God for this just revenge ? But the Lord on the other side pronounceth, that the punishment of the fathers sinne shall not passe over unto the sonne. Note what is there entreated of. When the Israelites had bene long and continually vexed with many calamities, they began rouse for a Proverbe, that their fathers had eaten a sower grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge : whereby they meant that their fathers had committed sinnes, wherof they, being otherwise righteous, and not deserving it, did suffer the punishment, rather by the unappeasable wrathfulness of God, than by a modest severity. The Prophet pronounceth unto them that it is not so : because they are punished for their owne offences, and that it standeth not with the justice of God, that the righteous sonne should suffer punishment for the naughtinesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the visiting, wherof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the Lord taketh away from the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his truth and other helps of salvation : in this, that the children being blinded and forsaken of him, doe goe on in the steps of there fathers, they sustaine curses for their fathers offences. But in as much as they are put to temporall miseries, and at last to eternall destruction, herein they are punished by the just judgement of God, not for the sinnes of other, but for their owne iniquity.

21 On the other side is offered a promise of enlarging the mercy of God into a thousand generations, which promise is also often found in the Scriptures, and is set in the solemne covenant of the Church : I will bee thy God, and of thy seed after thee. Which thing Salomon having respect unto, writeth that the children of the righteous shall be blessed after their death, not onely by reason of holy bringing up, which also not a litle availeth thereunto, but also for that blessing promised in the Covenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Hereupon groweth great comfort to the faithfull, great terrour to the wicked. For if even after death the remembrance both of righteousnesse and wickednesse be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth unto posterity; much more shall it light & rest upon the heads of the doers themselves. But it maketh nothing against us, that the issue of the wicked many times commeth to good proofe, and the issue of the faithfull swarveth out of kind: because the Lawmaker meant not here to stablish such a perpetuall rule as should derogate his free election. For it sufficeth for the comfort of the righteous and for the terror of the sinner, that the penaltie is not vaine or of no effect, although it doe not alway take place. For as the temporall punishments that are laid upon a few wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sins, and of the judgement that shall one day be given upon all sinners, although many escape unpunished even to the end of their life: so when God giveth one example of this blessing to shew mercy and bountifullnesse to the sonne for the fathers sake, hee giveth a prooffe of his constant and perpetuall favour to them that worship him: and when hee once pursueth the wickednesse of the father in the sonne, he sheweth what judgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences. Which assurednesse hee had in this place principally respect unto. And by the way hee commendeth unto us the largenesse of his mercy which he extendeth unto a thousand generations, whereas he assigned but onely foure generations to vengeance.

bedient for their fathers fault that spiritual cause is not want whereby as the father being destitute of the spirit liveth wickedly, so the sonne likewise forsaken of God followeth the same way to destruction.

The third Commandement.

The ends of the third commandement is the holy estimation of Gods name which excludeth all conceits and speeches concerning him which are not according to his highnesse: all irreverend mentioning of his word, all carping at his worke: and if all vaine, much more impious abusing thereof.

22 The end of this Commandement is, that his will is to have the majesty of his name to be holy among us. Therefore the summe shall be that we doe not defile it with contemptuously and irreverently using it. With which prohibition the commandement hangeth orderly together, that wee take studie and care godlily to reverence it. Therefore we ought so to order our selves both in our mindes and in our tongues, that we neither thinke nor speak any thing of God himselfe or his mysteries, but reverently and with much sobriety: that in weighing his workes, we conceive nothing but honorable toward him. These three things I say, it behooveth us not negligently to marke, that whatsoever our minde conceiveth of him, whatsoever our tongue uttereth, it may favour of his excellency, and may agree with the holy highnesse of his name: and finally may serue to advance his magnificence. That we doe not rashly or disorderly abuse his holy word and reverend mysteries either to ambition, or to covetousnesse, or to our owne triflings: but that as they beare the dignity of his name imprinted in them, so they may keepe their honour and estimation among us. Last of all, that we doe not carpe against or speake evil of his works, as these wretched men are wont to babble reprochfully against them: but that whatsoever we rehearse done by him, we report it with words of praise of his wisdom, righteousnesse and goodnesse. That is to sanctifie the name of God. Where otherwise is done, it is defiled with vaine and perverse abuse, because it is violently carried from the right use whereunto onely it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoiled of his dignity, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there be so much evil in this rash readinesse to use the name of God out of season, much more mischeife is in this: if it bee employed to evil uses, as they doe that make it to serve the superstitions of Necromancy, cruel execrations, unlawfull conjurations, and other wicked enchantments. But swearing is chiefly mentioned in the commandement, as the thing wherein the perverse abuse of Gods name is detestable, that thereby wee may bee the better altogether frayed away from all defiling thereof. But that here is commandement given of the worship of God, and of the reverence of his name, and not of the truth and equity that is to be kept among men, appeareth by that, that he afterward in the second table condemneth perjurie and false witness, whereby hurt is done to the fellowship of men: but it were in vaine to repeat it againe, if this commandement intreated of the duty of charity. And also the division of the law it selfe requireth it, because as it is said, God did not in vaine appoint two tables for his Law, whereby is gathered that in this commandement he challengeth his owne right to himselfe, and defendeth the holinesse of his name and teacheth not what men owe to men.

23 First is to be learned what is an oath. It is a taking of God to witness to confirme the truth of that which wee speake. For those cursed speeches that containe ma-

nifest reproaches against God, are unworthily to be reckoned among oathes. That such taking to witnesse, when it is rightly done, is a kind of worshipping of God, is shewed in divers places of the Scripture. As when Ezay prophecieth of the calling of the Affyrians and Aegyptians into fellowship of the covenant with Israel. They shall speake (saith he) in the tongue of Canaan, and shall sweare in the name of the Lord. That is to say, in swearing by the name of the Lord, they shall yeelda confession of his Religion. Again, when he speaketh of the enlargement of his Kingdome, he saith; Whosoever shall blesse himselfe, shall blesse in the God of the faithfull: and he that shall sweare in the land, shall sweare in the true God. Jeremie saith, if they shall teach the people to sweare in my name as they have taught them to sweare by Baal, they shall bee builded up in the mids of my house. And for good cause it is said, that when wee call upon the name of the Lord to witnesse, we doe witnesse our religion toward him. For so we confesse that he is the eternall and unchangeable truth, whom we call upon, not onely as a most substantiall witnesse of truth above all other, but also as the onely defence thereof, which is able to bring forth hidden things into light, and then as the knower of hearts. For where testimonies of men doe faile, there we flee to God for witnesse, specially where any thing is to be proved that lyeth secret in conscience. For which cause the Lord is bitterly angry with them that sweare by strange gods, and hee judgeth that manner of swearing to be an argument of manifest falling from his allegiance: Thy sonnes have forsaken me, and doe sweare by them that are no Gods. And hee declareth the hainousnesse of his offence by the threatning of punishment: I will destroy them that sweare by the name of the Lord, and sweare by Melcham.

24. Now then we understand that it is the Lord his will that there be in our oathes a worship of his name: so much the more diligent heed is to be taken, that in stead of worshipping they doe not containe dishonour, contempt, or abasement of it. For it is no small dishonour, when perjurie is committed in swearing by him, wherefore it is called in the Law, profanation. For what is left unto the Lord when he is spoyled of his truth? he shall then cease to be God. But truly he is spoyled thereof, when he is made an affirmer and an approver of falshood. Wherefore, when Josua minded to drive Achan to confesse the truth, he said: My Sonne, give glory to the Lord of Israel, meaning thereby, that the Lord is grievously dishonoured if a man sweare falsely by him. And no marvell, for we doe as much as in us lieth, in a manner to staine his holy name with a lye. And that this manner of speech was used among the Jewes, so oft as any was called to take an oath, appeareth by the like protestation, that the Pharisees use in the Gospell of John. To this heedfulnessse the formes of oaths that are used in the Scriptures doe instruct us: The Lord liveth. The Lord doe these things unto me, and adde these things. The Lord be witnesse upon my soule. Which doe prove, that we cannot call God for witnesse of our sayings, but that we also wish him to take vengeance of our perjurie, if we speake deceitfully.

25. The name of the Lord is made vile and common, when it is used in superfluous oaths, although they be true. For in such case it is also taken in vaine. Wherefore it shall not be sufficient to abstaine from swearing falsely, unlesse wee doe also remember that swearing was suffered and ordained not for lust or pleasure, but for necessities sake: and therefore they goe beyond the lawfull use thereof, that apply it to things not necessarie. And there can no other necessity be pretended, but where it is to serve either Religion or charity, wherein at this day men doe too much licentiously offend, and so much the more intollerably, for that by very custome it hath ceased to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the judgement seat of God is not slenderly weighed. For every where without regard, the name of God is defiled in trifling talks, and it is not thought that they doe evill, because by long suffered and unpunished boldnesse, they are come to rest as it were in possession of so great wickednesse. But the commandement of the Lord remaineth in force, the penaltie abideth in strength, and shall one day have his effect, whereby there is a certaine speciall revenge proclaimed against them that use his name in vaine. This commandement is also transgressed in another point, that in our oathes wee put the holy servants of God in the place of God, with manifest ungodlinesse, for so wee transferre the glory of his God-head to them.

them. Neither is it without cause that the Lord hath given a speciall commandement to sweare by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that we should not be heard sweare by any strange gods. And the Apostle evidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing doe call upon a higher than themselves, and that God which had none greater than his owne glory to sweare by, did sweare by himselfe.

26 The Anabaptists not contented with this moderation of swearing, doe detest all oaths without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is general: I sly unto ye, sweare not all, but let your talke be yea yea, and nay nay, whatsoever is more than this, is of evill. But by this meane, they doe without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him adversarie to his Father, and as if he had come downe from heaven to repeale his Fathers decrees. For the eternall God doth not only in the law permit swearing as a thing lawfull, which were enough: but also in necessity doth command it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his Father, that hee bringeth no other thing, but that which his Father commanded him, that his doctrine is not of himselfe, &c. What then? will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterwards forbid and condemne the same thing in mens behaviours, which he hath before allowed by commanding it? But because there is some difficultie in the words of Christ, let us a little weigh them. But herein we shall never attaine the truth, unlesse we bend our eyes unto the intent of Christ, and take heed unto the purpose that he there goeth about. His purpose is not either to release or restraine the law, but to reduce it to the true and naturall understanding, which had bene very much depraved by the false glosses of the Scribes and Pharisees. This if we hold in minde, we shall not thinke that Christ did utterly condemne oaths, but onely those oaths which doe transgresse the rule of the law. Thereby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbear no manner of swearing but perjuries, whereas the law doth not onely forbid perjuries, but also all idle and superfluous othes. The Lord therefore the most sure expofitor of the law, doth admonish them, that it is not onely evill to forswear, but also to sweare. But how to sweare? in vaine. But as for these oaths that are commended in the law, he leaveth them safe and at liberty. They seeme to fight somewhat more strongly when they take earnest hold of this word, At all, which yet is not referred to the word, Swear, but to the forms of swearing that are after rehearsed. For this was also part of their error, that when they did sweare by heaven and earth, they thought that they did not touch the Name of God. Therefore after the principall kinde of offence against this commandement, the Lord doth also cut off from them all by shifts, that they should not thinke that they have escaped, if not speaking of the name of God, they call heaven and earth to witness. For here by the way it is also to be noted, that although the Name of God be not expresse, yet men by indirect formes do sweare by him, as if they sweare by the lively light, by the bread that they eat, by their Baptisme, or other tokens of Gods liberalitie towards them. Neither doth Christ in that place where he forbiddeth them to sweare by heaven and earth, and Hierusalem, speake it to correct superstition, as some men falsely thinke, but he rather confuteth their sophisticall subletie, which thought it no fault bablyngly to throw out indirect othes, as though they spared the holy name of God, which is engraven in all his benefits. But otherwise it is, where either a mortall man, or a dead man or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie devised that stinking forme of swearing by the life or soule of the King: for then the false making of Gods, doth obscure and minish the glory of the one onely God. But when we meane onely, to procure credit to our saying by the holy name of God, although the same be indirectly done, yet in all such trifling othes his majestie is offended. Christ taketh from this licentiousnesse, all pretence of excuse, in this, that hee forbiddeth to sweare at all. And James to the same purpose, reciting the same words of Christ which I have before alleaged, because the same rash boldnes hath alwaies bene in the world, which is a prophane misusing of the name of GOD. For if ye referre this word, at all, to the substance, as if without any exception it were altogether unlawfull to sweare: wherefore serveth that exposition which is added afterward? Neither by heaven nor by earth, &c? Whereby it sufficiently appeareth that those cavillations are met withall, by which the Jewes thought their fault to be excused.

27 Therefore it cannot now bee doubtfull to sound judgements, that the Lord in that place did onely reprove those oathes that were forbidden by the law. For he himselfe which shewed in his life an exemplar of the perfection that he taught, did not stick to sweare when occasion required. And his Disciples, who (we doubt not) did obey their Master in all things, followed the same example: who dare say that Paul would have sworne, if swearing had bene utterly forbidden? but when the matter so required, he sware without any sticking at it, yea, sometime adding an execration. But this question is not yet ended, because some doe thinke that onely publike oathes are excepted out of this prohibition; as, those oathes that we take when the Magistrate doth offer them to us, and require them of us. And such as Princes use to take in stablishing of leagues, or the people when they sweare allegiance to their Prince, or the souldier when he is put to an oath for his true service in the war, and such like. And to this sort they adjoyne, and that rightfully, such oathes as are in Paul, to confirme the dignitie of the Gospell, for as much as the Apostles in their office, are not private men but publike ministers of God. And truly I deny not that those are the safest oathes, because they are defended with soundest testimonies of Scripture. The Magistrate is commanded in a doubtfull case to drive the witness to an oath, and he on the other side to answer by oath: and the Apostle saith, that mens controversies are by this meanes ended. In this commandement both these have a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea, and wee may note, that among the old heathen men, the publike and solemne oath was had in great reverence, but common oathes that were usually spoken without consideration, were either nothing or very little regarded, because they thought that in these they had not to doe with the majestie of God at all. But yet it were too much dangerous to condemne private oathes, that are in necessary cases soberly, holily, and reverently taken, which are maintained both by reason and examples. For, if it be lawfull for private men in a weightie and earnest matter to appeale to God as judge betweene them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witnesse. Put the case: thy brother will accuse thee of false breach of faith, thou endevoorest to purge thy selfe according to the duetie of charitie, and he by no meanes will suffer himselfe to be satisfied. If thy good name come in perill by his obstinate maliciousnesse, thou shalt without offence appeale to the judgement of God, that it will please him in time to make thine innocencie knowne. Now if the weight of the words be considered, it is a lesse matter to call him to witnesse. Therefore I see not why in this case we should affirme, that the calling him to witnesse, is unlawfull. And we are not without many examples thereof. For though the oath of Abraham and Isaac with Abimelech be said not to serve for our purpose, because it was made in the name of a publike company, yet Jacob and Lazarus were private men, which stablished a covenant with mutuall oath betweene themselves. Booz was a private man which by the same meane confirmed his promise of marriage to Ruth. Abdiss was a private man, a just man and fearing God, which affirmed unto Elin by oath, the thing that he meant to perswade him. Therefore I have no better rule, but that oathes be so tempered, that they be not undadvised, that they be not common without regard, that they be not used of raging lust, nor trifling, but that they serve just necessitie, as where the Lords glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which the commandement of the law tendeth.

The fourth Commandement.

Remember that thou keepe holy the Sabbath day, Sixe dayes shalt thou worke and doe all thy workes. But on the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt doe no worke, &c.

28 The end of this Commandement is, that we being dead to our owne affections and workes, should be busied in meditation of the kingdome of God, and to the same meditation should be exercised, by such meanes as he hath ordained. But because this Commandement hath a peculiar and severall consideration from the rest, therefore it must have also a severall manner of exposition. The old writers use to call it a shadowish Commandement, for that it containeth the outward observation of the day, which

Which by the comming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherein I grant they say truly, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore we must fetch the exposition of it farther off. And (as I thinke) I have marked that there are three causes to be considered, whereupon this commandment consisteth. For first the heavenly lawmaker meant under the rest of the seventh day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel the spirituall rest, whereby the faithfull ought to cease from their owne workes, that they might suffer God to worke in them. Secondly, his will was to have one appointed day, wherein they should meet together to heare the Law, and execute the ceremonies, or at least bestow it peculiarly to the meditation of his workes; that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godlinesse. Thirdly he thought good to have a day of rest granted to servants, and such as lived under the government of other, wherein they might have some ceasing from their labour.

29 But we are many wayes taught, that the same shadowing of the spirituall rest, was the principall point in the Sabbath. For the Lord required the keeping of no commandment in a manner more severely, than this: when his meaning is in the Prophets to declare that all religion is overthrowne; then, he complaineth that his Sabbaths are polluted, defiled, not kept, nor sanctified: as though that piece of service being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honoured. He did set forth the observing thereof with high praises. For which cause the faithfull did among other oracles marvellously esteeme the reveiling of the Sabbath. For in Nehemiah thus spake the Levites in a solemne convocation, Thou hast shewed to our Fathers thy holy Sabbath, and hath given them the Commandments and the ceremonies, and the law by the hand of Moses. You see, how it is had in singular estimation among all the Commandments of the law. All which things doe serve to set forth the dignitie of the mysterie, which is very well expressed by Moses and Ezechiel. Thus you have in Exodus, See that ye keepe my Sabbath day, because it is a token betwene me and you in your generations: that you may know that I am the Lord that sanctifie you: keepe my Sabbath, for it is holy unto you. Let the children of Israel keepe the Sabbath and celebrate it in their generations, it is an everlasting covenant betwene me and the children of Israel, and a perpetuall token. Yet Ezechiel speaketh more at large. But the summe thereof commeth to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel should know that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our owne will, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward signe with the inward thing it selfe: we must altogether rest, that God may worke in us: we must depart from our owne will, we must resigne up our heart, we must banish all lutes of the flesh. Finally, we must cease from all the doings of our owne wit, that we may have God working in us: that we may rest in him, as the Apostle also teacheth.

30 This perpetuall ceasing was represented to the Jewes, by the keeping of one day among seven: which day, to make it be observed with greater devotion, the Lord commanded with his owne example. For it availeth not a little to stirre up mans endeavour, that he may know that he tendeth to the following of his Creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of seven, for as much, as that number is in the Scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cause chosen to signifie everlasting continuance. Wherewith this also agreeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his workes, maketh an end of describing the succeeding of dayes and nights. There may be also brought another probable note of the number, that the Lord thereby meant to shew that the Sabbath should never be perfectly ended, till it came to the last day. For in it we begin our blessed rest, in it we doe daily proceed in profiting more and more. But because we have still a continuall warre with the flesh, it shall not be ended until that saying of EJay be fulfilled, concerning the continuing of new Moone with new Moone, of Sabbath with Sabbath, even then when God shall be all in all. It may seeme therefore that the Lord hath by the seventh day, set forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbath at the last day, that our whole life might by continuall meditation of the Sabbath, aspire to this perfection.

31 If any man mislike this observation of the number, as a matter too curious, I am not against him, but that he may more simply take it: that the Lord ordained one certaine certaine day, wherein his people might under the schooling of the law be exercised to the continuall meditation of the spirituall rest: And that he assigned the seventh day either because he thought it sufficient, or that by setting forth the likenesse of his owne example, he might the better move the people to keepe it, or at least to put them in minde, that the Sabbath tended to no other end, but that they should become like unto their Creator. For it maketh small matter, so that the mysterie remaine which is therein principally set forth, concerning the perpetuall rest of our workes, to consideration whereof the Prophets did now and then call backe the Jewes that they should not thinke themselves discharged by carnall taking of there rest. Beside the places a ready alledged, you have thus in Ezra: If thou turne away thy foote from the Sabbath, that thou doe not thine owne will in mine holy day, and shalt call the Sabbath delicate and holy of the glorious Lord, and shalt glorifie him while thou doest not thine owne waies, and seekest not thine owne will to speake the word; then shalt thou be delighted in the Lord, &c. But it is no doubt, that by the coming of our Lord Christ, so much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. For hee is the truth, by whose presence all figures doe vanish away, he is the bodie, at sight whereof the shadowes are left, he, I say, is the true fulfilling of the Sabbath, we being buried with him by Baptisme, are grafted into the fellowship of his death, that we being made partakers of the resurrection, wee may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place the Apostle writeth, that the Sabbath was a shadow of a thing to come: and that the true bodie, that is to say, the perfect iustitance of truth is in Christ, which in the same place he hath well declared. That is not contained in one day, but in the whole course of our life, untilt that wee being utterly dead to our selves, be filled with the life of God. Therefore superstitious observing of daies ought to be farre from Christians.

32. But forasmuch as the two latter causes ought not to bee reckoned among the old shadowes, but doe belong alike to all ages: since the Sabbath is abrogate, yet this hath still place with us, that we should meet at appointed daies to the hearing of the word, to the breaking of the mysticall bread, and to publike prair: and then, that to servants and labourers be granted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt, that in commanding the Sabbath, the Lord had care of both these things. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the onely use of the Jewes to prove it. The second Moses spake of in Deuteronomie in these words: that thy man servant and thy maide servant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serve in Egypt. Againe, in Exodus: that thy Oxe and thy Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can denie that both these things doe serve for us as well as for the Jewes? Meetings at the Church, are commanded us by the word of God, and the necessity of them is sufficiently knowne in the very experience of life. Vnlesse they be certainly appointed and have their ordinary daies, how can they be kept? All things by the sentence of the Apostle, are to be done comely and in order among us. But so farre is it off, that comelinesse and order can be kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hand present trouble and ruine of the Church, if it bee dissolved. Now if the same necessitie bee among us, for reliefe whereof the Lord appointed the Sabbath to the Jewes: let no man say that it belongeth nothing unto us. For our most provident and tender Father, willed no lesse to provide for our necessitie than for the Jewes. But thou wilt say, why doe we not rather daily meete together, that the difference of daies may be taken away? I would to God, that were granted, and truly spirituall wisdom was a thing worthy to have daily a peece of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot be obtained of the weakenesse of many, to have daily meetings, and the rule of charitie doth not suffer us to exa& more of them, why should we not obey the order which we see laid upon us by the will of God.

33. I am compelled here to be somewhat long, because at this day many unquiet spirits doe raise trouble concerning the Sunday. They crie out that the Christian people are nourished in Jewishnesse, because they keepe some observation of daies. But I answer, that wee keepe those daies without any Jewishnesse, because we doe in this behalfe farre differ from the Jewes. For we keepe it not with strait religion as a ceremonie, wherein we thinke a spirituall mysterie to be figured, but we retaine it as a necessarie remedie to the keeping of order in the Church. But Paul teacheth that in keeping thereof they are not to be judged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vaine among the Galatians, because they did still observe daies. And to the Romanes, he affirmeth that it is superstition if any man do make difference betweene day and day. But who, saving these madde men onely doth not see, of what observing the Apostle meant? For they had no regard to this politicall end and the order of the Church, but whereas they kept them still as shadows of spirituall things, they did even so much darken the glory of Christ and the light of the Gospell. They did not therefore cease from handie works, because they were things that did call them away from holy studies & meditations, but for a certaine religion, that in ceasing from worke they did dreame that they still kept their miseries of olde time delivered them. The Apostle, I say, enveigheth against this disordered difference of daies and not against the lawfull choise of daies that serveth for the quietnesse of Christian fellowship: for in the Churches that he himselfe did ordaine, the Sabbath was kept to this use. For he appointeth the Corinthians the same day, wherein they should gather the collection to relieve the brethren at Ierusalem. If they feare superstition, there was more danger thereof in the feast daies of the Jewes, than in the Sundaies that the Christians now have. For so as was expedient for the overthrowing of superstition, the day that the Jewes religiously observed is taken away: and, so as was necessarie for keeping of comlineesse, order, and quiet in the Church, another day was appointed for the same use.

34. Albeit the old Father have not without reason of their choise, put in place of the Sabbath day, the day that we call Sunday. For whereas in the Resurrection of the Lord is the end and fulfilling of that rest, wherof the old Sabbath was a shadow: the Christians are by the very same day that made an end of shadows, put in minde that they should no longer stick unto the shadowish ceremonie. But yet I doe not so rest upon the number of seven, that I would binde the Church to the bondage thereof. Neither will I condemne those Churches, that have other solemne daies for their meetings, so that they be without superstition, which shall be, if they be onely applied to the observation of Discipline and well appointed order. Let the sum hereof be this: as the truth was given to the Jewes under a figure, so is it delivered us without any shadowes at all. First, that in all our life long we should be in meditation of a continuall Sabbath or rest from our own works, that the Lord may worke in us by his Spirit: then that every man privately so oft as he hath leisure, should diligently exercise himselfe in godly calling to minde the works of God, and also, that wee all should keepe the lawfull order of the Church appointed, for the hearing of the word, for the ministration of the Sacraments and for publike praier: thirdly, that we should not ungently oppresse them that bee under us. And so doe the triflings of the false Prophets vanish away that in the ages past have infected the people with a Jewish opinion, that so much as was ceremoniall in this commandement is taken away, which they in their tongue call the appointing of the seventh day, but that so much as is morall remaineth, which is the keeping of one day in the weeke. But that is nothing else in effect, than for reproch of the Jewes to change the day, and to keepe still the same holinesse in their minde. For there still remaineth with us the like signification of misterie in the daies as was among the Jewes. And truly wee see what good they have done by such doctrine. For they that cleave to their constitutions, doe by these as much exceede, as the Jewes in grosse and carnall superstition of the Sabbath: so that the rebukings that are read in Esay, doe no lesse fitly serve for them at these daies, than for those that the Prophet reprovved in his time. But this generall doctrine is principally to be kept, that lest religion should fall away or waxe faint among us: holy meetings are to be diligently kept, and those outward helpes are to be used that are profitable for to nourish the worshipping of God.

The fifth Commandement.

Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that thou maist live long upon the land which the Lord thy God shall give thee.

35. The end of this commandement is, that because the Lord delighteth in the preservation of his order, therefore he willet that those degrees of preeminence which he

he hath ordained, be not broken, the summe therefore shall be, that we reverence those whom the Lord hath set over us, that we yeeld to them honour, obedience and thankfulness. Whereupon followeth that it is forbidde us, to withdraw any thing from their dignitie, either by contempt, or obstinacie, or unthankfulness. For so doth the word Honour, in the Scripture signifie very largely: as when the Apostle saith, that the elders which rule well are worthy of double honour, he meane th not onely that reverence is due unto them, but also such recompence as their ministerie deserueth. And because this commandement of subjection, doth most of all disagree with the perverseness of mans nature, which as it swellth with greedinesse of climbing high, so it hardly abideth to be brought low: therefore he hath set that kinde of superiority for example, which by nature is most amiable and least envious: because hee might the easier meeke and reclaime our mindes to the use of submission. Therefore the Lord doth by litle and litle traine us to all lawfull subjection by that which is most easie to beare, forasmuch as the rule of all is alike. For to whom he giveth any preeminence, hee doth communicate his owne name with them, so farre as is necessarie to preserve the same preeminence: The name of Father, God, and Lord, doe so belong unto him alone, that so oft as wee heare one of them named, our mind must needs bee touched with a feeling of his majestie. Therefore whom he maketh partakers of these things, he maketh to glister with a certaine sparke of his brightnesse, that they may bee honorable every one according to his degree. Therefore in him that is our father we have to consider somewhat of the nature of God, because he beareth not the name of God without cause. He that is our Prince or our Lord, hath some partaking of honour with God.

36. Wherefore it ought not to be doubted that God doth here set a generall rule, that as we know any man to be by his ordinance set over us, so we yeeld unto him reverence, obedience, thankfulness, and such other duties as it lieth in us to doe. And it maketh no difference, whether they be worthy or unworthy. For of what sort soever they be, they have not without the providence of God attained that place, by reason whereof, the law-maker would have them to be honoured. Yet namely, he hath given commandement of reverence to parents, that have brought us into this life, to which reverence very nature ought in a manner to instruct us. For they are monstres and nomen, that breake the authoritie of parents with dishonour or stubbornnesse. Therefore the Lord commanded all the disobedient to their parents, to be slaine, as men unworthy to enjoy the benefit of light, that doe not reknowlege by whose meanes they came into it. And by many additions of the law it appeareth to be true that we have noted, that there are three parts of honour that he here speaketh of, Reverence, Obedience, and Thankfulness. The first of these the Lord establisheth when hee commandeth him to bee killed that curseth his Father or his Mother, for there he punisheth the contempt and dishonour of them. The second he confirmeth, when he appointeth the punishment of death for the disobedient and rebellious children. To the third belongeth that saying of Christ in the fiftenth of Matthew, that it is the commandement of God that we doe good to our parents. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of a commandement; he expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

37 There is annexed a promise for a commendation, which doth the rather put us in minde, how acceptable vnto God is the submission that is here commanded. For Paul useth the same pricke to stirre up our dulnesse, when he saith: that this is the first commandement with promise. For the promise that went before in the first table, was not speciall and properly belonging to one commandement, but extended to the whole law. Now this is thus to be taken: The Lord spake to the Israelites peculiarly of the land which he had promised them for their inheritance. If then the possession of the land was a pledge of Gods bountifullnesse: let us not marvell, if it pleased God to declare his favour by giving length of life; by which a man might long enjoy his benefit. The meaning therefore is thus: Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that by a long space of life thou mayest enjoy the possession of that land, that shall be unto thee for a testimonie of my favour. But sith all the earth is blessed to the faithfull, we doe worthily reckon this present life among the blessings of God. Therefore this promise doth likewise belong unto us, forso much as the continuance of this life is a prooffe of Gods good will.

For it neither is promised to us, nor was promised to the Jewes, as though it contained blessednesse in it selfe, but because it is wont to be to the godly a token of Gods tender love. Therefore if it chance that an obedient childe to his parents be taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes seene, yet doth God no lesse constantly continue in the performance of his promise, than if he should reward him with a hundred Acres of land, to whom he promised but one Acre. All consisteth in this, that wee should consider that long life is so farre promised us, as it is the blessing of God, and that it is his blessing so farre as it is a prooffe of his favour, which hee by death doth much more, plentifully and perfectly witnesse and shew in effect to his servants.

38. Moreover, when the Lord promiseth the blessing of this present life to the children that honor their parents with such reverence as they ought, he doth withall secretly say, that most assured curse hangeth over the stubborn and disobedient children. And that the same should not want execution: he pronounceth them by his law subject to the judgement of death, and commandeth them to be put to execution: and if they escape that judgement, he himselfe taketh vengeance on them by one meane or other. For we see how great a number of that sort of men are slaine in bartels and in fraies and some other tormented in strange unaccustomed fashions; and they all in a manner are a prooffe that this threatening is not vaine. But if any escape to old age, sith in this life being deprived of the blessing of God, they doe nothing but miserably languish, and are reserved for greater paines hereafter, they are farre from being partakers of the blessing promised to the godly children. But this is also by the way to be noted, that wee are not commanded to obey them but in the Lord. And that is evident by the foundation before laied: for they sit on high in that place, wherunto the Lord hath advanced them, by communicating with them a portion of his honour. Therefore the submission that is used toward them, ought to be a step toward the honouring of that soveraigne Father. Wherefore if they move us to transgress the law, then are they worthily not to be accounted Parents, but strangers that labour to withdraw us from obedience to the true Father. And so is to be thought of Princes, Lords, and all sorts of Superiours. For it is shamefull and against convenience of reason, that their preeminence should prevaile to presse downe his highnesse, sith theirs as it hangeth wholly upon it, so ought onely to guide us unto it.

The sixth Commandement.

39. The ende of this commandement is, that forasmuch as God hath bound together all mankinde with a certaine unite, that every man ought to regard the societie of all men, as a thing given him in charge, in some therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, whereby our neighbours body may be hurt, is forbidden us. And therefore we are commanded, if there be any power of succour in our travaile to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfully imploy the same, that we procure those things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them from hurt, and if they be in any danger, that we give them our helping hand. If thou consider that it is God the Law-maker that so saith, then thinke withall that his meaning is by this rule also to governe thy soule. For it were a fond thing to thinke, that he which espieth the thoughts of the heart, and principally resteth upon them, should instruct nothing but the body to true righteousness. Therefore the manslaughter of the heart is also forbidden in this law, and an inward affection to preserve our brothers life is here given in commandement. The hand indeede bringeth forth the manslaughter, but the minde conceiveth it, when it is infected with wrath and hatred. Looke whether thou canst be angry with thy brother, without burning in desire to do him hurt. If thou canst not bee angry with him, then canst thou not hate him, forasmuch as hatred is nothing but an old rooted anger. Although thou dissemble, and goe about to winde out thy selfe by vaine circumstances: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurt. If thou wilt still dally out with shifts to defend it, it is alreadie pronounced by the mouth of the holy Ghost, that he is a manslayer that hateth his brother in his heart. It is pronounced by the mouth of the Lord Christ, that he is guiltie of judgement that is angrie with his brother : that he is guiltie of the counsell that saith Rhacha : that he is guiltie of hell fire, that saith unto him Foole.

40. The Scripture noteth two points of equitie, upon which this commandment is grounded : because man is both the image of God & our own flesh, wherefore unless we will defile the image of God, we must have care to touch man no other wise, than as a sacred thing : and unless we will put off all naturallnesse of man, we must cherish him as our owne flesh. That manner of exhortation that is fetched from the redemption and grace of Christ, shall be intreated of in another place. God willed these two things naturally to be considered in man, that might perswade us to the preservation of him, that we should both reverence the image of God imprinted in him, and embrace our own flesh. He hath not therefore escaped the crime of manslaughter, that hath kept himselfe from shedding of blood. If thou commit any thing indeed, if thou goe about any thing with endeavour, if thou conceive any thing in desire and purpose that is against the safetie of another, thou art holden guiltie of manslaughter. And againe : If thou do not travell to thy power and as occasion may serve to defend his life, thou doest with like hainousnesse offend the law. But if there be so much care taken for the safetie of his body, let us hereby gather how much studie and travaile is due to the safetie of his soule, which in the Lords sight doth infinitely excell the body.

The seventh Commandment.

41. The end of the commandment is, that because God loveth chastitie and cleanness, therefore all uncleannesse ought to depart farre away from us. The summe therefore shall be, that we be defiled with no uncleannesse or lustfull intemperance of the flesh. Whereunto answereth the affirmative commandment, that we chastly and continently order all the parts of our life. But fornication he forbiddeh by name, to which all unchaste lust tendeth : that by the filthinesse of that which is more grosse and sensible, for so much as it also defileth the body, he might bring us to abhorre all filthy lust. Sith man was created in this estate, not to live a solitarie life, but to use a helper joynd unto him : and since that by the curse of sinne, he is driven the more to this necessitie, the Lord hath in this behalfe provided helpe for him, so much as was sufficient, when he ordained mariage, when he sanctified with his blessing the fellowship begunne by his authority. Whereby followeth, that all other fellowship of man and woman out of mariage, is accursed before him, and that the fellowship of mariage it selfe, was ordained for remedie of necessitie, that we should not run out into unbrided lust. Therefore let us not flatter our selves, sith we heare that man cannot be coupled with woman out of mariage, without the curse of God.

42. Now forasmuch as by the condition of nature, and by lust more enkindled since the fall of man, we are become doubly subject to the desire of company of women, except it be those whom God of his singular grace hath exempted from it : let every man looke well what is given unto him. Virginicie, I grant, is a vertue not to be despised : but sith it is to some denied, and to some granted but for a time, let them that are troubled with incontinencie, and striving with it cannot get the upper hand, resort to the helpe of mariage, that so they may keepe chastitie in the degree of their vocation. For they that cannot conceive this word, if they doe not succour their owne intemperance with the remedie that is offered and granted them, they strive against God and resist his ordinance. And let no man carpe against me (as many doe at this day) that being aided with the helpe of God, he can doe all things. For the helpe of God is present onely with those, that walke in his waies; that is in their vocation from which they do withdraw themselves, which forsaking the helpes of God, doe travaile to overcome and master their necessitie with vaine rashboldnesse. The Lord affirmeth that continencie is a singular gift of God, and of that sort that are not given generally, nor universally to the whole body of the Church, but to a few members thereof. For first he saith, that there is a certaine kinde of men, that have gelded themselves for the kingdome of heaven, that is, that they might the more loosely and freely apply themselves to the affaires of the heavenly kingdome. But, that no man should thinke that such gelding is in the power of man, he shewed a little before, that all men are not able to receive it, but they to whom it is peculiarly given from heaven, whereupon he concludeth: He that can take it, let him take it. But Paul yet affirmeth it more plainly, where he writeth, that every man hath his proper gift of God, one thus, another thus.

1 Cor. 7. 7.

They sinne grievously against God which use it not although they keep themselves unstained with any bodily uncleanesse.

43. Whereas we are by open declaration admonished, that it is not in every mans power to keepe chastitie in single life, although with studie and travell hee endeavour never so much unto it, and that it is a peculiar grace, which God giveth but to certaine men, that hee may have them the more readie to his worke; doe we not strive against God and nature which hee hath instituted, if we doe not apply the kinde of life to the proportion of our power? Here the Lord forbiddeth fornication, therefore he requireth cleanness and chastity of us. To keepe the same there is but one way, that every man measure himselfe by his owne measure. Neither let a man despise marriage as a thing unprofitable or superfluous for him, nor other wise desire single life, unlesse he be able to live without a wife. And therein also let him not provide onely for the quiet and commoditie of the flesh, but onely that being loosed from this bond, hee may bee the more in readinesse and prepared to all duties of godlinesse. And forasmuch as this benefit is given to many but for a time, let every man so long abstaine from marriage as hee shall be meete to live to keepe single estate. If strength faile him to tame his lust, let him learne that the Lord hath now laid upon him a necessitie to marrie. This the Apostle sheweth when he commandeth that to avoid fornication every man may have his owne wife, and every woman have her owne husband, that hee that cannot live continently should marrie in the Lord. First hee declareth that the most part of men are subiect to the vice of incontinence: and then of those that be subiect unto it, hee excepteth none, but commandeth all to that onely remedie, where with unchastitie is resisted. Therefore if they that be incontinent doe neglect to helpe their infirmity by this meane, they sinne even in this, that they obey not the commandement of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of unchastitie, while in the meane season his minde burneth inwardly with lust. For Paul defineth chastitie to be a cleannesse of the minde, joyned with chastitie of the body. A woman unmarried (saith he) thinketh upon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as he is holie both in bodie and spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to confirme that former commandement, he doth not only say, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himselfe with company of a harlot, but hee saith, that it is better to marrie than to burne.

1 Cor. 6. 14.

Marriage to be used as an holy remedie against evill not as a cover of dissolute life, all actions, causes and signes whereof must be avoided in thought, looke, raiment, speech, diet.
amb. lib. de Phil.

44. Now if married folkes do confesse that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lord, they are thereby admonished not to defile it with intemperate and dissolute lust. For though the honestie of marriage do cover the filthines of incontinence, yet it ought not forthwith to be a provocation thereof. Wherefore let not married folks thinke that all things are lawfull unto them, but let every husband have his owne wife soberly, and likewise the wife her husband, and so doing, let them commit nothing unseeming the honestie and temperance of marriage. For so ought marriage made in the Lord to be restrained to measure and modestie, and not to overflow into every kinde of extreme lasciviousnesse. This wantonnesse Ambrose reprooved with a saying very fore indeed, but not unfit for it, when he calleth the husband the adulterer of his owne wife, which in use of wedlocke hath no care of shamefastnesse or honestie. Last of all, let us consider what law-maker doth here condemne fornication, even hee which sith of his owne right he ought to possesse us wholly, requireth purenesse of the soule, spirit, and body. Therefore, when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth with wanton attire of bodie, with uncleanly gestures, and with filthy talke to lay wait to trap anothers chastitie. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a yong man above measure wantonly and daintily clothed, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily unchast, if we have aregard unto God that abhorreth all filthinesse.

thinesse in whatsoever part either of our soule or body it appeareth. And to put thee out of doubt, remember that the Lord here commendeth chastitie. If the Lord require chastitie of us, then he condemneth all that ever is against it. Therefore if thou covest to shew obedience, neither let thy minde burne inwardly with evill lust, nor let thine eyes run wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body be trimmed up for allurements, nor let thy tongue with filthy talke entice thy minde to like thoughts, nor let thy gluttonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certaine blots, where with the purenesse of chastitie is bespotted.

The eight Commandement.

45. The end of this commandement is, because God abhorreth unrighteousnesse, that every man may have his owne rendered unto him. The summe therefore shall be, that we are forbidde to gape for other mens goods, and that therefore we are commanded every man to employ his faithfull travaile to preserve to each man his owne goods. For thus we ought to thinke, that what every man possesseth is not happened unto him by chance of fortune, but by distribution of the soveraigne Lord of all things: and therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by evill meanes, but that wrong be done to the disposition of God. But of thefts there be many kindes: one standeth in Violence, when the goods of another are by any manner of force and robbing licentiousnesse bereaved. The other kinde consisteth in malicious deceit, where they are guilefully conveyed away. An other sort there is that standeth in a more hidden subtiltie, when they are wrung from the owner by colour of law. Au other sort in flatterie, where they are sucked away by pretence of gift. But lest we should tary too long upon renting of all the severall kinds of theft, let us know, that all craftie meanes whereby the possessions and money of our neighbours are conveyed unto us, when they once goe by crooked waies from sincerenesse of heart, to a desire to beguile, or by any meane to doe hurt, are to be accounted for thefts. Although by pleading the law, they may prevayle, yet God doth not otherwise weigh them. For he seeth the long captious subtilties, wherewith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the simpler minde, till at length he draw him into his nets. He seeth the hard and ungentle lawes, wherewith the mightier oppresseth and throweth downe the weaker. He seeth the allurements, wherewith as with baited hookes, the craftier taketh the unware. All which things are hidden from the judgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this maner of wrong is not onely in money, in wares, or in lands, but in every mans right. For we defraud our neighbour of his goods, if we denie him those duties which we are bound to do for him. If any idle Factor or Baylife doe devour his masters substance, and is not heedfull to the care of his thrift, if he either doe wrongfully spoyle, or doe riotously wast the substance committed unto him, if a servant doe mocke his master, if he disclose his secrets by any meanes, if he betray his life and his goods: againe, if the Lord doe cruelly oppresse his household, they are before God guiltie of theft. For he both withholdeth and conveyeth another mans goods, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

46. We shall therefore rightly obey this commandement, if being contented with our owne estate, we seeke to get no gaine but honest and lawfull, if we covet not to waxe rich with wrong, nor goe about to spoyle our neighbour of his goods that our own substance may increase, if we labor not to heape up cruell riches and wring out of other mens blood, if we do not immeasurably scrape together every way, by right and by wrong, that either our covetousnesse may be filled, or our prodigalitie satisfied. But on the other side, let this be our perpetual marke, to aide all men faithfully by counsell and helpe to keep their owne so far as we may: but if we have to do with false and deceitfull men, let us rather be ready to yeeld up some of our owne, then to strive with them. And not that onely, but let us communicate to their necessities, and with our store relieve their needs, whom we see to be oppressed with hard and poore estate. Finally, let

That every man may have his owne, we are in the eight commandement forbidden all practising whatsoever to the unjustlesse and danger of others, and all withholding of any duty where-by we are bound to do them good forasmuch as either of these duties make us guilty of thefts.

let every man looke how much he is by dutie bound unto other, and let him faithfully pay it. For this reason let the people have in honour all those that are set over them, let them patiently beare their government, obey their lawes and commandements, refuse nothing that they may beare, still keeping God favourable unto them. Again, let them take care of their people, preserve common peace, defend the good, restraints the evill, and so order all things, as readie to give account of their office to the soveraigne Judge. Let the Ministers of Churches faithfully apply their ministerie, and not corrupt the doctrine of salvation, but deliver it pure and sincere to the people of God, and let them instruct them not onely with learning, but also with example of life: finally, let them so be over them, as good shepherds be over the sheepe. Let the people likewise receive them for the messengers and Apostles of God, give them that honour whereof the highest master hath vouchsafed them, and minister unto them such things as are necessarie for their life. Let parents take on them to feede, rule, and teach their children, as committed to them of God, and grieve not, nor turne away their mindes from them with crueltie, but rather cherish and embrace them with such lenitie and tenderneesse, as becommeth their person. After which manner, we have already ~~said~~, that children owe to their parents their obedience. Let young men reverence old age, even as the Lord willed that age to be honorable. Let old men also governe the weaknesse of youth with their wisdom and experience, wherein they excell young men, not rating with rough and loud brawling, but tempering severitie with mildnesse and gentlenesse. Let servants shew themselves diligent and serviceable to obey, and that not to the eye, but from the heart, as serving God himselfe. Also let Masters shew themselves not testie and hard to please, nor oppresse them with too much sharpnesse, nor reprochfully use them, but rather acknowledge that they are their brethren and their fellow servants under the heavenly Lord, whom they ought mutually to love and gently to intreate. After this manner, I say, let every man consider what in his degree and place hee oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Moreover, our minde ought alwaies to have respect to the lawmaker, that we may know that this law is made as well for our minds, as for our hands, that men should studie to defend and further the commodities and profit of other.

The ninth Commandement.

Thou shalt not be a lying witness against thy neighbour,

47. The end of this Commandement is, that because God which is truth, abhorreth lying, we ought to observe truth without deceitfull colour. The summe therefore shall be, that wee neither hurt any mans name either with slanders or false reports, nor hinder him in his goods by lying: finally, that we offend no man, by lust to speake evill, or to be busie: with which prohibition is joynd a commandement, that so farre as we may, we employ our faithfull endeavour for every man in affirming the truth, to defend the safetie both of his name and goods. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to expound the meaning of his commandement in the three and twentie Chapter of Exodus in these words: Thou shalt not use the voice of lying, nor shalt joyne thy hand to speake false witness for the wicked. Again, Thou shalt see lying. Also in another place he doth not onely call us away from lying in this point, that we be no accusers, or whisperers in the people, but also that no man deceive his brother, for hee forbiddeth them both in severall commandements. Truly it is no doubt, but that as in the commandements before, he hath forbidden crueltie, unchastitie, and covetousnesse; so in this he restraineth falsehood. Whereof there are two parts as we have noted before. For either we offend the good name of our neighbours by maliciousnesse and froward minde to backbite, or in lying, and sometime in evill speaking we hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place, be understood solemne and judiciall testimonie, or common testimonie that is used in private talks. For we must alwaies have recourse to this principle, that of all the generall kinds of vices, one speciall sort is set for an example, whereunto the rest may be referred, and that that is chiefly chosen, wherein the filthinesse of the fault is most apparant. Albeit, it were convenient to extend

To uphold truth we are in the ninth commandment forbidden the abuse of the tongue in binding our neighbour, and commandeth to employ it for his benefit.
Levit. 19. 15.

tend it more generally to slanders and sinister backbitings wherewith our neighbours are wrongfully grieved; for that fallshood of witnessling which is used in iudiciall courts, is never without perjurie. But perjuries in so much as they doe prophane and defile the name of God, are already sufficiently met withall in the third commandement. Wherefore the right use of this commandement is, that our tongue in affirming the truth, doe serve both the good name and profit of our neighbours. The equitie thereof is more than manifest. For if a good name bee more precious than any treasures, whatsoever they be: then is it no lesse hurt to a man to be spoiled of the goodnesse of his name than of his goods. And in bereaving his substance, sometime false witness doth as much as violence of hands.

48. And yet it is marvellous with how negligent carelesnesse men doe commonly offend in this point, so that there are found very few that are not notably sicke of this disease: wee are so much delighted with a certaine poisoned sweetnesse both in searching out and in disclosing the evils of other. And let us not thinke that it is a sufficient excuse, if oftentimes we lie not. For he that forbiddeth thy brothers name to be defiled with lying, willteth also that it be preserved untouched, so farre as the truth will suffer. For howsoever he taketh heed to himselfe onely, so that he tell no lie, yet in the same he secretly confesseth that he hath some charge of him. But this ought to suffice us, to keepe safe our neighbours good name, that God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all evill speaking is utterly condemned. But we meane not by evill speaking that rebuking which is used for chastisement: nor accusation, or iudiciall processe, whereby remedie is sought for an evill, nor publike reprehension, which tendeth to pur other sinners in feare, nor bewraying of faults to them for whose safety it behooveth that they should be forewarned, lest they should be in danger by ignorance: but wee meane onely hatefull accusing, which ariseth of maliciousnes, and of a wanton wil to backbite. Also this commandement is extended to this point, that we cover not to use a scoffing kinde of pleasantnesse, but mingled with bitter taunts, thereby bitingly to touch other mens faults under pretence of pastime, as many doe that seeke praise of merrie conceits with other mens shame yea and griefe: also when by such wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a litle reproched. Now if we bend our eyes to the lawmaker, which must according to his rightfull authority, beare rule no lesse over the eares and minde than over the tongue: truly we shall finde that greedinesse to heare backbitings, and a hastie readinesse to evill judgements are no lesse forbidden. For it were very fond, if a man should thinke that God hateth the fault of evill speaking in the tongue, and doth not disallow the fault of evill maliciousnesse in the heart. Wherefore, if there be in us a true feare and love of God, let us endeavour so farre as wee may and as is expedient, and as charity beareth, that we give neither our tongue, nor our eares to evill speakings, and bitter jestings, lest we rashly without cause yeeld our minds to indirect suspitions. But being indifferent expositors of all mens sayings, and doings, let us both in judgment, eares, and tongue, gently preserve their honour safe.

The tenth Commandement.

49. The end of this commandement is, that because the Lords will is that our soule be wholly possessed with the affection of love: all lust is to be shaken out of our minde that is contrarie to charitie. The summe therefore shall bee, that no thought creepe into us, which may move our mindes with a concupiscentie hurtfull and turning toward anothers losse: wherewith on the other side agreeth the commandement, that whatsoever we conceive, purpose, will, or studie upon, bee joynd with the benefit and commoditie of our neighbours. But here as it seemeth, ariseth a hard and combersome difficultie. For if it be truly said of us before, that under the names of fornication and theft, are contained the lust of fornication, and the purpose to hurt and deceive, it may seeme superfluously spoken, that the covering of other mens goods should afterward be severally forbidden us. But the distinction betwene purpose and coveting; will easily loose us this knot. For purpose (as we have meant in speaking of it in the other commandments before) is deliberate consent of will, when lust hath subdued the minde: but covering may be without any such either aduise ment or assent, when the minde is onely pricked and tickled with vaine and perverse objects. As therefore the Lord hath heretofore commanded, that the rule of charitie should governe our wills, studies, and works: so now he commandeth the conceptions of our minde to bee directed to the same rule: that there be none of them crooked and writhen, that may prouoke our minde another way. As he hath forbidden our minde to bee bowed and led into wrath, harred, fornication, robbrie, and lying: so he doth now forbid us to be moued thereunto.

commande-

The great libertie which men give themselves in transgressing the law by their wanton delight to backbite, is scarce to judge, or to beare the law that doth so.

50. And nor without cause doth he require so great uprightnesse. For who can denie that it is righteous: that all the powers of the soule be possessed with charitie? But if any of them doe swarve from the marke of charitie, who can denie that it is diseased? Now whence commeth it that so many desires hurtfull to thy neighbour, doe enter in thy heart, but of this, that neglecting him thou carest onely for thy selfe? For if thy minde were altogether thoroughly foked with charitie, no parcel thereof should be open to such imaginations. Therefore it must needs bee voide of charitie, so farre as it receiveth concupisence. But some man will object, that yet it is not meeete that fantasies that are without order tossed in mans wit, and at length doe vanish away, should bee condemned for concupisence, whose place is in the heart. I answer that here our question is of that kinde of fantasies, which while they are present before our mindes, doe together bite and strike our heart with desire, so farre as it never commeth in our minde, to wish for any thing, but that our heart is stirred up and leapeth withall. Therefore God commandeth a marvellous ferventnesse of love, which he willeth not to be entangled with never so small snares of concupisence. He requireth a marvellously framed minde, which he suffreth not so much as with sleight provocations to be any thing stirred against the law of love. To this exposition Augustine did first open mee the way: because thou shouldst not thinke that it is without consent of some grave authoritie. And though the Lords purpose was to forbid us all wrongfull coveting: yet in rehearsing the same, hee hath brought forth for example those things that most commonly doe deceive us with a false image of delight: because he would leave nothing to concupisence when he draweth it from these things, upon the which most of all it rageth and triumpheth. Lo, here is the second Table of the law, wherein we are taught sufficiently what we owe to men for Gods sake, upon consideration whereof hangerh the rule of charitie. Wherefore you shall but vainely call upon those duties that are contained in this Table, unless your doctrine doe stay upon the feare and reverence of God, as upon her foundation. As for them which seeke for two commandments, in the prohibition of covering, the wise reader, though I say nothing, wil judge that by wrong deviation, they teare in sunder that which was but one. And it maketh nothing against us, that this word, Thou shalt not cover, is the second time repeated, for after that he had first set the house, then he reenterh the parts thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainly appeareth, that (as the Hebrewes doe very well) it ought to bee read in one whole sentence, and that God in effect commandeth, that all that every man possesseth should remaine safe and untouched, not onely from wrong and lust to defraud them, but also from the very least desire that may move our mindes.

51. But now to what end the whole law tendeth, it shall not be hard to judge: that is, to the fulfilling of righteousnesse, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the purenesse of God. For God hath therein so painted out his owne nature, as if a man do performe in deeds, that which is there commanded, he shall in a manner expresse an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moses meant to bring the sum thereof into the mindes of the Israelites, he said: And now Israel, what doth the Lord thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lord, and walke in his waies? love him and serve him in all thy heart, and in all thy soule, and keepe his commandments? And he ceased not still to sing the same song againe unto them, so oft as hee purposed to shew the end of the law. The doctrine of the law hath such respect herunto, that it joyneeth man, or as Moses in another place termeth it, maketh man to sticke fast to his God in holinesse of life. Now the perfection of that holinesse consisteth in the

The last commandment by some rent anisse into two containeth not bare conceptions or fancies, but such as doe bite and stirre the mind with desire repugnant to that which perfect charitie requieth, of which kind of concupisence those are rebeles for examples sake which are most usual in mens mindes.

The drift of the law is to teach perfect holinesse, which consisteth in pure love towards God and man, and not to set downe onely certain rudiments that were afterwards to be further perfected. Deu. 10. 12. Deu. 6. 5. & 11.

two principall points already rehearsed: That wee love the Lord God with all our heart, all our soule, and all our strength, and our neighbours as our selves. And the first indeed is, that our soule be in all parts filled with the love of God. From that by and by of it selfe forth floweth the love of our neighbour. Which thing the Apostle sheweth when he writeth, that the end of the law is love out of a pure conscience, and a faith not fained. You see how, as it were in the head is set conscience and faith unfained, that is to say in one word true godlinesse, and that from thence is charity derived. Therefore he is deceived, whosoever thinketh that in the Law are taught only certaine rudiments and first introductions of righteousness, wherewith men became to bee taught their first schooling, but not yet directed to the true marke of good workes: whereas beyond that sentence of Moses, and this of Paul, you can desire nothing as wanting of the highest perfection. For how farre I pray you, will he proceede that will not be contented with this institution, whereby man is instructed to the feare of God, to spirituall worshipping, to obeying of the Commandements, to follow the uprightnesse of the way of the Lord: finally to purenesse of conscience, sincere faith and love? Whereby is confirmed that exposition of the Law, which searcheth for and findeth out in the commandements thereof all the duties of godlinesse and love. For they that follow onely the drie and bare principles, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods will, know not the end thereof, as the Apostle witnesseth.

52. But whereas in rehearing the summe of the Law, Christ and the Apostle doe sometime leave out the first Table: many are deceived therein while they would finde draw their words to both the Tables. Christ in Matthew calleth the chiefe points of the Law, mercie, judgement, and faith: under the word Faith, it is not doubtfull to mee, but that he meaneth truth or faithfulness toward men. But some, that the sentence might be extended to the whole Law, take it for religiousnesse toward God. But they labor in vaine. For Christ speaketh of those workes wherewith man ought to prove himselfe righteous. This reason if we note, we will also cease to marvell why, when a young man asked him what be the commandements by keeping wherof wee enter into life: he answered these things onely: Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steale. Thou shalt beare no false witness. Honor thy Father and thy Mother. Love thy neighbour as thy selfe. For the obeying of the first Table consisted in manner all either in the affection, of the heart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the heart appeared not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continually use. But the workes of charity are such, as by them we may declare a perfect righteousness. But this commeth each where so oft in the Prophets, that it must needs be familiar to a reader but meanelly exercised in them. For in a manner alway, when they exhort to repentance, they leave out the first Table, and onely call upon Faith, Judgement, Mercie, and Equitie. And thus they doe not overskip the feare of God, but they enquire the earnest proofe thereof by the tokens of it. This is well knowne, that when they speake of the keeping of the law, they doe for the most part rest upon the second Table, because therein the studie of righteousness and uprightnesse is most openly seene. It is needlesse to rehearse the places, because every man will of himselfe easily marke that which I say.

53. But thou wilt say, is it then more available to the perfection of righteousness, to live innocently among men, than with true godlinesse to honor God? No, but because a man doth not easily keepe charitie in all points, unless he earnestly feare God, therefore it is thereby proved, that he hath godlinesse also. Beside that, forasmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from us unto him, which thing hee doth also testify by the Prophet: therefore he requireth not our duties to himselfe, but doth exercise us in good workes toward our neighbour. Therefore not without cause the Apostle stretcheth the whole perfection of the holy ones in charitie. And not inconveniently in another place he calleth the same the fulfilling of the law: adding that he hath performed the law that loveth his neighbour. Again, That all the law is comprehended in one word, Love thy neighbour as thy selfe. For he teacheth no other thing but the same which Christ doth when he saith: Whatsoever yee will that men doe to you, doe ye the same to them: For this is the law and the Prophets: It is certaine that in the law law and the Prophets Faith and all that belongeth to the true worship of God, holdeth the principall place, and that Love is beneath it in the lower degree: But the Lords meaning is, that in the law is onely prescribed unto us an observation of right and equitie, wherein we be exercised to testifie our godly feare of him, if there be any in us.

54. Heere therefore let us sticke fast, that then our life shall be best framed to Gods will and the rule of his Law, when it shall be every way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole Law there is nor read one syllable, that appointeth to man any rule of such things, as he shall doe or leave undone to the commoditie of his owne flesh. And surely such men are so borne of such disposition naturally, that they be too much carried all headlong to the love of themselves, and how much soever they fall from the truth, yet still they keepe that selfelove: there needed no law any more to enflame that love, that was naturally of it selfe, too much beyond measure. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that not the love of our selves, but the love of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the Commandements, and that he liveth best and most holily, that (so neere as may be) liveth and travelleth least for himselfe, and that no man liveth worse and more wickedly than he that liveth and travelleth for himselfe, and onely thinketh upon and seeketh for things of his owne. And the Lord, the more to expresse with how great earnestnesse we ought to be led to the love of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the love of our selves as by a rule; because he had no other vehementer or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the maner of speaking is diligently to be weighed. For he doth not, as certaine Sophisters have foolishly dreamed, give the first degree to the love of our selves, and the second to charitie, but rather that affection of love which we doe all naturally draw to our selves, hee giveth away unto other; wherenpon the Apostle saith, that Charitie seeketh not her owne. And their reason is not to be esteemed worth a haire, that the thing ruled is ever inferiour to his Rule. For God doth not make the love of our selves, a rule wherunto charity toward other should be subject, but whereas by perversnesse of nature the affection of love was wont to rest in our selves, hee sheweth that now it ought to bee elsewhere spread abroad, that wee should with no lesse cheerefulness, ferventnesse, and carefulnesse be ready to doe good to our neighbour than to our selves.

55. Now sith Christ hath shewed in the parable of the Samaritane that under the name of Neighbour every man is contained, be he never so strange unto us: there is no cause why we should restraîne the commandement of love within the bounds of our owne friendships and acquaintances. I deny not that the neerer that any man is unto us, the more familiarly he is to be holden with our endeavours to doe him good. For so the order of humanitie requireth, that so many moe duties of friendship, men should communicate together, as they are bound together with streighter bonds of kindred, familiaritie or neighborhood, and that without any offence of God, by whose providence we are in a manner driven thereunto. But I say that all mankind without exception is to be embraced with one affection of charitie: and that in this behalfe is no difference of Barbarion or Grecian, of worthy or unworthy, of friend or foe, because they are to be considered in God and not in themselves: from which consideration when we turne away, it is no marvell if we be entangled with many errors. Wherefore if we will keepe the true trade of loving, we must not turne our eies unto man, the sight of whom would offer enforce us to hate than to love, but unto God which commandeth that the love which we offer him, be powred abroad among all men: that this be a perpetual foundation, that whatsoever the man be, yet he ought to be loved because God is loved.

56. Wherefore it was a most pestilent ignorance or malice, that the Schoolemen of these commandements, touching not desiring of revengement, and loving our enemies, which in the old time both were given to the Jewes and at the same time were commonly given to all Christians, have made Counsels which it is in our liberty to obey or not to obey. And the necessarie obeying of them, they have posted over to Monkes, which were thought but in this one point forsooth more righteous than simple Christians, that they willingly bound themselves to keepe the Counsels. And they render a reason why they receive them not for lawes, for that they seeme too burdenous and heavie,

The law doth not teach us to love our selves, which we do: so vehemently without teaching that it setteth up our affection this way as a mark which we ought to reach in loving others. Vide Aug. li. i. de doct. Chri. cap. 23.

heavie, specially for Christians that are under the law of grace. So dare they presume to repell the eternall law of God touching the loving of our neighbours. Is there any such difference in any lease of the law? and are not therein the rather each where found commandements, that doe most severly require of us to love our enemies? For what manner of saying is that, where we are commanded to feed our enemy when hee is hungrie: to set into the right way his Oxen or Asses straying out of the way, or to ease them when they faint under their burden? Shall wee doe good to his beaſts for his sake, without any good will to himselfe? What, is not the word of the Lord everlasting? Leave vengeance to me, and I will requite it. Which also is spoken more plainly at large in another place: Seeke not vengeance, neither be mindefull of the injurie of thy citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowledge that the Lord was a lawmaker, and not lyingly faine that he was a counsell giver.

57 And what I pray you meane these things that they have presumed to mocke with all in their unfavourie glose? Love your enemies, doe good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, blesse them that curse you, that ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven. Who cannot heare reason with Chrysostome, that by so necessary a cause it plainly appeareth that they are no exhortations but commandements? What remaineth more when we be blotted out of the number of the children of God? But by their opinion, only Monks shall be the children of the heavenly father, they only shall be bold to call upon God their Father: what shall the Church doe in the meane season? It shall by like right bee sent away to the Gentiles and Publicans. For Christ saith: If ye be friendly to your friends, what favour looke you for thereby? doe not the Gentiles and Publicans the same? But we shall be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left unto us, and the inheritance of the kingdome of heaven taken away from us. And no lesse strong is Augustines argument. When (saith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lesse forbiddeth to touch the wife of thine enemy than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giveth leave to steale nothing at all, either from thy friend or from thine enemy. But these two, not to steale, and not to commit fornication, Paul bringeth within the compasse of the rule of love, yea and teacheth that they are contained under this commandement, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore either Paul must have beene a false expositor of the law, or it necessarily followeth hereby, that our enemies ought also to be loved, even by commandement, like as our friends. Therefore they doeruly bewray themselves to be the children of Satan, that doe so licentiously shake of the common yoke of the children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they have published this doctrine with more grosse dulnes or shamelesse. For there are none of the old writers that doe not pronounce as of a thing certaine, that these are meere commandements. And that even in Gregories age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his owne affirmation, for he without controverſie taketh them for commandements. And how foolish doe they reason? They say that they are too weighty a burden for Christians. As though there could bee devised any thing more weighty than to love God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength. In comparison of this law any thing may be counted easie, whether it be to love our enemy, or to lay away all desire of revenge out of our minde. Indeed all things are high and hard for our weaknesse, even the least title of the law. It is the Lord in whom wee use strength. Let him give what he commandeth, and command what he will. Christian men to be under the law of grace, is not unbrideledly to wander without law, but to be graſſed in Christ, by whose grace they are free from the curse of the Law, and by whose spirit they have a law written in their hearts. This grace Paul unproperly called a law, alluding to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men doe in the name of the law, dispute upon a matter of nothing.

58. * Of like sort it is that they called Veniall sinne, both secret ungodlinesse that is against the first Table, and also the direct transgressing of the last Commandement. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without advised assent, which resteth not long in the heart. But I say, that it cannot come at all into the heart, but by want of those things that are required in the law. We are forbid to have strange gods. When the mind shaken with the engines of distrust, looketh about elsewhere, when it is touched with a sodaine desire to remove her blessednesse some otherway: whence come these motions, although they quickly vanish away, but of this, that there is some thing in the soule empty, to receive such tentations? And to the end not to draw out this argument to greater length, there is a commandement given to love God with all our heart, with all our minde, with all our soule: if then all the powers of our soule be not bent to the love of God, we have already departed from the obedience of the law, because the enemies that doe therein, rise against his kingdome, and interrupt his decrees, doe prove that God hath not his throne well established in our conscience. As for the last commandement, we have already shewed that it properly belongeth thereunto. Hath any desire of minde pricked us? we are already guilty of coveting, and therewithall are made transgressors of the law, because the Lord doth forbid us, not onely to purpose and practise any thing that may be to anothers losse, but also to be pricked and swell with covering it. But the curse of God doth alway hang over the transgression of the law. Wee cannot therefore prove even the very least desires free from judgement of death.

In weighing of finnes (saith Augustine) let us not bring false balances to weigh what we list, and how we list at our owne pleasure, saying: this is heavy and this is light: but let us bring Gods balance out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lords treasury, and let us therein weigh what is heavy: rather let us not weigh, but reknowledge things already weighed by the Lord. But what saith the Scripture? Truly when Paul saith that the reward of sinne is death, he sheweth that he knew not this sinking distinction. Sith wee are too much inclined to hypocrisie, this cherishment thereof ought not to have beene added to flatter our slothfull consciences.

59. I would to God they would consider what that saying of Christ meaneth: He that transgresseth one of the least of these commandements, and teacheth men so, shall be counted none in the kingdome of heaven. Are not they of that sort, when they dare so extenuate the transgression of the law, as if it were not worthy of death? but they ought to have considered, not onely what is commanded, but what he is that commandeth, because his authority is diminished in every transgression, how little soever it be, of the law that hee hath given in commandement. Is it a small matter with them, that Gods majesty be offended in any thing? Moreover, if God hath declared his will in the law, whatsoever is contrary to the law, displeaseth him. Will they imagine the wrath of God to be so disarmed, that punishment of death shall not forthwith follow upon them? And he himselfe hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather finde in their hearts to heare his voice, then to trouble cleare truth with their unfavourie subtleties of argument. The soule (saith he) that sinneth, the same shall die. Again, which I even now alleaged, the reward of sinne is death. But albeit they grant it to be a sin, because they cannot deny it: yet they stand stille in this, that it is no deadly sinne. But sith they have hitherto too much borne with their owne madnesse, let them yet at length learne to wax wiser. But if they continue in dotage, we will bid them farewell: and let the children of God learne this, that all sinne is deadly, because it is a rebellion against the will of God, which of necessity provoketh his wrath, because it is a breach of the law, upon which the judgement of God is pronounced without exception: and that the finnes of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but because they obtaine pardon by the mercy of God.

THE NINTH CHAPTER.

That Christ although he was knowne to the Jewes under the law, yet was delivered onely by the Gospell.

BECAUSE it pleased God in the old time not vainely by expiations and sacrifices to declare himselfe a Father, and not in vaine he did consecrate a chosen people to himselfe: even then without doubt he was knowne in the same image, wherein he now appeareth to us with full brightnesse. Therefore Malachi, after that he had bidden the Jewes to take heed to the law of Moses, and to continue in studie thereof, (because after his death there should come a certaine interruption of the office of the Prophets) did forthwith declare, that there should arise a sonne of righteounesse.

Christ was knowne to the fathers under the law, but not so clearly as to us he is manifested in the Gospell.
Mal. 4. 2.

In which words he teacheth, that the Law availeth to this purpose, to hold the godly in expectation of Christ to come : but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when he should become in deed. For this reason doth Peter say, that the Prophets did make search, and diligently enquire of the salvation that is now opened by the Gospell : and that it was revealed unto them, that they should minister, not to themselves, nor to their owne age, but unto us, those things that are declared by the Gospell. Not that their doctrine was unprofitable to the people in old time, or nothing availed themselves : but because they enjoyed not the treasure which God sent unto us by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly set before our eyes. And whereas they did but a little sip of it, there is offered unto us a more plentifull enjoying thereof. Therefore Christ himselfe, which affirmeth that he had witness borne him by Moses, yet extolleth the measure of grace whereby we excell the Jewes. For speaking to the Disciples, he said; Blessed are the eyes that see that which yee see, and blessed are the eares that heare that which ye heare. For many Kings and Prophets have wished it, and have not obtained it. This is no small commendation of the revealing of the Gospell, that God preferred us before the holy Fathers that excelled in rare godlinesse. With which sentence that other place disagreeeth not, where it is said, that Abraham saw the day of Christ and joyced. For though the sight of a thing farre distant was somewhat darke, yet hee wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came that joy which accompanied the holy Prophet, even to his death. And that saying of John Baptist; No man hath seene God at any time, the onely begotten that is in the bosome of the Father, hath declared him unto us, doth not exclude the godly which had bene dead before him, from the fellowship of the understanding and light that shineth in the person of Christ : But comparing their estate with ours, hee teacheth that those mysteries which they saw but darkly under shadows, are manifest to us : as the Authour of the Epistle to the Hebrewes doth well set out, saying, that God diversly and many wayes spake in old time by the Prophets, but now by his beloved Sonne. Although therefore that onely begotten one, which is at this day to us the brightnesse of the glory, and the print of the substance of God the Father, was in old time knowne to the Jewes, as we have in another place alleaged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the old deliverance : yet it is true, which the same Paul elsewhere teacheth, that God which commanded the light to shine out of darknesse, hath now shined upon our hearts to set forth the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ : because when he appeared in this his Image, hee did in a manner make himselfe visible, in comparison of the darke and shadowish forme that had bene of him before. And so much the more foule and detestable is their unthankfulnesse and perversnesse, that are here so blinde at mid-day. And therefore Paul saith, that their minds are darkned by Satan, that they should not see the glory of Christ shining in the Gospell, though there be no veile set betweene them and it.

2. Now I take the Gospell for the cleare discloving of the mystery of Christ. I grant truly, that in that respect that Paul calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the Law, concerning the free forgiveness of sins, whereby God reconcileth men to himselfe, are accounted parts thereof. For he compareth such against these terrors, wherewith the conscience should be troubled and vexed, if salvation were to be sought by workes. Wheretupon followeth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contained under it all the testimonies that God in the old time gave to the Fathers, of his mercy and fatherly favour ; But in the more excellent signification of it, I say it is applied to the publishing of the grace given in Christ. And that meaning is not onely received by common use, but also hangeth upon the authority of Christ and the Apostles. Whereupon this is properly ascribed unto him, that he preached the Gospell of the kingdome. And Marke maketh his preface in this manner, The beginning of the Gospell of Jesus Christ. And there is no need to gather places to prove a thing sufficiently knowne. Christ therefore by his coming hath made cleere the life and immortality by the Gospell. By which words Paul meaneth, not that the Fathers were drowned in darknesse of death, untill the Sonne of God did put on flesh : but claiming this prerogative of honour to the Gospell, he teacheth that it is a new and unwonted kind of message, whereby God performed those things that he had promised, that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the Sonne. For although the faithfull have alway found by experience that same saying of Paul to be true, that in Christ are all the promises, yea and Amen, because they were sealed in their hearts: yet because he hath accomplished all parts of our salvation in his flesh, therefore that selfe lively delivering of the things rightfully obtained a new and singular title of praise. Whereupon commeth that saying of Christ, Hereafter ye shall see the heavens open, and the Angels of God ascending and descending upon the Sonne of man. For though he seeme to have relation unto the ladder shewed in a vision to the Patriarch Jacob: yet he setteth out the excellencie of his coming by this marke, that he opened the gate of heaven to all men, that the entry thereof may stand familiarly open to all men.

3. But yet we must take heed of the devillish imaginations of Servettus, which when he goeth about, or at least feigneth that he goeth about to extoll the greatnesse of the grace of Christ, utterly aboliseth the promises, as if they were ended together with the Law. He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospell there is brought unto us the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference betwene us and Christ. I did indeed even now declare, that Christ left nothing unperformed of the whole summe of our salvation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we doe already enjoy the benefits purchased by him, as though that saying of Paul were false, that our salvation is hidden in hope. I grant indeed, that wee by beleeving in Christ, doe also passe from death to life: But in the meane season, we must hold this saying of John, that although we know we be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, till we shall be like unto him: that is, till we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Christ offer unto us in his Gospell present fulnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enjoying thereof lieth still hid under the keeping of hope, till being unclodded of the corruptible flesh, we be transfigured into the glory of him that goeth before us. In the meane time the Holy Ghost biddeth us to rest upon the promises, whose authority ought with us to put to silence all the barkings of that filthy dogge. For as Paul witnesseth, godlinesse hath a promise as well of the life to come, as of the life present. For which reason he boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him. And in another place he putteth us in minde, that we have the same promises which in the old time were given to the holy men. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicity, that we are sealed up with the holy Spirit of promise, but yet we doe no other wise enjoy Christ, but so farre as we embrace him clothed with his promises. Whereby it commeth to passe, that he indeed dwelleth in our hearts, and yet we wander in journey abroad from him, because wee walke by faith and not by sight. And these two things doe not ill agree together, that we possess in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heavenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good things that are not seene. Onely there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises, because the Gospell sheweth with her finger that thing which the Law did shadow under figures.

4. And hereby also is their error convinced, which doe never otherwise compare the Law with the Gospell, but as they compare the inerts of works with the free imputation of righteousness. Although indeed this comparison of contraries be not to be rejected: because Paul doth oftentimes understand by the name of the Law, a rule to live righteously, wherein God requireth of us that which is his, not giving us any hope of life, unlesse we in all points obey it: and on the other side adding a curse if wee doe never so little swarve from it: that is in such places as he disputeth, that we doe freely please God, and are by pardon reckoned righteous, because the observation of the Law whereunto the reward is promised, is no where found. Therefore Paul doth fitly make the righteousness of the Law and of the Gospell, contrary the one to the other. But the Gospell did not so succeed in place of the whole law, that it should bring any diverse meane of salvation, but rather to confirme and prove to bee of force whatsoever the Law had promised, and to joyne the body to the shadows. For when Christ saith, that the Law & the Prophets were untill John: he maketh not the Fathers subject to the curse, which which the bond-servant of the law cannot escape : but rather, onely that they were instructed with certaine rudiments, so that they stayed a great way beneath the height of the doctrine of the Gospell. Therefore Paul calling the Gospell the power of God to salvation to every beleever, by and by addeth, that it hath witness of the Law and the Prophets. But in the end of the same Epistle, although hee shew that the title of praise of Jesus Christ is the Revelation of the mystery kept secret in the everlasting times : yet he doth qualifie that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching that hee is openly shewed by the writings of the Prophets. Whereupon we gather, that when we are to intreat of the whole law, the Gospell differeth from the Law onely in respect of the plaine disclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath bene laid open for us in Christ, it is now not without cause said, that at his coming the heavenly kingdome of God was erected in earth.

4. Now betweene the Law and the Gospell came John, which had an office that was meane, and of affinity to them both. For though when he called Christ the Lambe of God, and the sacrifice for the cleansing of sinnes, he shewed forth the summe of the Gospell, yet because he did not expresse that same incomparable strength and glory, which at length appeared in his resurrection, therefore Christ saith, that he was not equall to the Apostles. For so doe those words of his meane : that though John excell among the sonnes of women, yet he that is least in the kingdome of heaven, is greater than he. Because he doth not there commend the persons of men, but after hee had preferred John before the Prophets, he advanceth the preaching of the Gospell to the highest degree : which preaching we see in another place signified by the Kingdome of heaven. But whereas John himselfe doth answer, that he is but a voice, as though hee were inferior to the Prophets, he doth not that for feigned humilities sake, but meaneth to teach that the proper office of the Embassadour was not committed to him, but that he onely executeth the office of an apparitor : as it was fore-spoken by Malachie : Behold I send Eliaz the Prophet, before that the great and terrible day of the Lord doe come. And truly he did nothing else in the whole course of his ministry, but endeavour to get Disciples to Christ : as also Ezay proveth, that this was enjoyed him from God. And in this sense Christ is called a candle burning and shining, because the broad day had not yet appeared. And yet this is no let, but that he may be reckoned among the publishers of the Gospell, like as he used the same Baptisme, which was afterward delivered to the Apostles. But that which he beganne, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken up from them into the heavenly glory.

THE TENTH CHAPTER.

Of the likeness of the old and new Testament.

BY the things aforesaid it may now appeare evidently, that all the men whom from the beginning of the world God adopted in the state of his people, were with the same law, and with the bond of the same doctrine, which now remaineth in force among us, bound in covenant to him. But because it is of no small importance that this point be well established, I will adjoyne unto it for an addition, sith the fathers were partakers of all one inheritance with us, and hoped for all one salvation by the grace of all one Mediator, how far their estate differed from ours in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that we have gathered out of the Law and the Prophets for the prooffe thereof, doe make it plaine, that there was never any other rule of religion and godlinesse in the people of God : yet because in writers there are often times many things spoken of the difference of the old and new Testament, that may make the reader that is not of very sharpe judgement to bee in doubt : therefore we shall rightfully appoint one particular place for the better and more exact discussing of this matter : Yea, and that thing also, which other wise should have bene very profitable for us, is now made necessary by that monstrous losell Servetus, and by divers other mad men of the sect of Anabaptists, which have no other opinion of the people of Israel, than as of a herd of Swine : which they fondly feigne to have bene fatted up by the Lord here in this earth, without any hope of heavenly immortality. Therefore that wee may keepe away this pestilent error from godly minds, and also to plucke out of them all doubts which are wont by and by to arise upon hearing mention of the diversity betwene the old and the new Testament: let us by the way looke, what they have in them like, and what unlike one to the other: what covenant the Lord made with the Israelites in the old time before the coming of Christ, and what covenant he hath now made with us since Christ hath beene openly shewed.

2. And both these points may be made plaine with one word. The covenant of all the Fathers so differeth nothing from ours in substance and in matter it selfe, that it is altogether one and the selfe same; but the ministration is divers. But because of so great shortnesse no man were able to attaine a certaine understanding, we must needs proceed on with a longer declaration, if we meane to profit any thing at all. But in shewing how they are like, or rather all one, it shall be superfluous to discourse againe of new upon all the speciall particulars that have already beene declared: and it shall be out of season to mingle those things together that remaine yet to be spoken in other places. Here we must chiefly rest upon three principall points: First, that we hold, that carnall wealth and felicity was not the marke appointed to the Jewes to aspire unto, but that they were by adoption chosen unto the hope of immortality: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly assured unto them both by oracles, and by the law, and by the prophecies. Secondly, that the covenant whereby they were joynd to the Lord, was upholden not by any merits of theirs, but by the onely mercy of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knew Christ the Mediator, by whom they should both be joynd to God, and enjoy his promises. Of which points, because the second peradventure is not yet sufficiently knowne, it shall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we shall confirme by many and cleare testimonies of the Prophets, that it was of his owne meere goodnesse and tender favour, whatsoever good the Lord at any time did, and promised to the people of Israel. The third also hath already had here and there some plaine declaration of it, and we have not left the first altogether untouched.

3. Therefore in setting out of this point, because it most especially belongeth to this present matter, and for that they make us most controversie about it, we will employ the more earnest travell: but yet so, that if there want yet anything of the explication of the other, it may bee by the way supplied, or in convenient place added. Truly, the Apostle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he saith, that God the Father long before by the Prophets in the holy Scriptures promised the Gospell, which he afterward published according to the time appointed. Againe, that the righteousness of faith which is taught by the Gospell it selfe, hath witness of the Law and the Prophets. For the Gospell doth not hold the hearts of men in the joy of this present life, but lifteth them up to the hope of immortality: doth not fasten them to earthly delights, but preaching to them a hope laid up in heaven, doth in a manner transport them thither. For thus he defineth in another place. Since that ye beleevd the Gospell, ye are sealed up with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, for the redemption of the possession purchased. Againe, we have heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of your charity toward the holy ones, for the hopes sake that is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye have heard by the true speech of the Gospell. Againe: He hath called us by the Gospell to the partaking of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ. Wherefore it is called both the word of salvation, and the power of God to save the faithfull, and the kingdome of heaven. Now if the doctrine of the Gospell be spirituall, and openeth the entry to the possession of an incorruptible life: let us not thinke that they to whom it was promised and declared, did passe over and neglect the care of their soule, and lie dully like beasts in seeking pleasures of the body. Neither let any man here cavill, that the promises which are sealed in the Law and the Prophets, concerning the Gospell, were ordained for the new people. For within a little after, that which he spake of the Gospell promised in the Law, he addeth, that all the things that the law containeth are without doubt properly directed to them that are under the law. I grant indeed it is in another argument. But he was not so forgetfull, that when he had once said that all the things which the law containeth belong to the Jewes, he did not remember what in

The Fathers had the same covenant which we have: they looked for immortality and had it promised: they expected it by mercy and not by merit: they knew that Christi was their mediator to obtaine mercie, as well as we.

a few verses before he had affirmed of the Gospell promised in the law. Wherefore the Apostle sheweth most plainly, that the old Testament chiefly tended to the life to come, when he saith, that under it are contained the promises of the Gospell.

4. By the same reason followeth, both that it stood upon the free mercy of God, and also was confirmed by the meane of Christ. For the very preaching of the Gospell pronounceth no other thing, but that sinners are justified by the fatherly kindnesse of God, without their owne deserving, and the whole summe thereof is fulfilled in Christ. Who then dare make the Jewes without Christ, with whom we heare that the covenant of the Gospell was made, whereof Christ is the onely foundation? Who dare make them strangers from the benefit of free salvation, to whom we heare that the doctrine of the righteousnesse of faith was ministred? But that we dispute not long of an evident matter, we have a notable sentence of the Lord, Abraham rejoyced that he might see my day, he saw it and was glad. And the same thing which Christ there testified of Abraham, the Apostle sheweth that it was universall in the faithfull people, when he saith, that Christ abideth, yesterday, this day, and for ever. For he speaketh not there onely of the eternall God-head of Christ, but also of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the blessed Virgin and Zacharie in their songs, doe say, that the salvation revealed in Christ, is the performance of the promises which God in old time had made to Abraham and the Patriarchs. If the Lord in giving his Christ, discharged his old oath, it cannot be said but that the end thereof was alway in Christ an everlasting life.

5. Yea, and the Apostle doth make the Israelites equall with us, not onely in the grace of the covenant, but also in signification of sacraments. For meaning by examples of punishments, wherewith the Scripture reciteth, that they were corrected in the old time, to make the Corinthian afraid, that they should not runne into the like offences. He beginneth with this preface, that there is no cause why wee should challenge any prerogative unto our selves, to deliver us from the vengeance of God which they sustained, forasmuch as the Lord did not onely grant unto them the same benefits, but hee hath gloriously set forth his grace among them with the same tokens: As if hee should have said: If ye trust that ye be out of perill, because both Baptisme wherewith ye be marked, and the Supper which ye daily receive, have excellent promises, and in the meane time despising the goodnes of God, yee are licentious wanton: Know yee, that the Jewes also were not without such sacraments, against whom yet the Lord did most severely put his judgements in execution. They were baptised in passing over the sea, and in the clouds wherewith they were defended from the burning heate of the Sunne. They say, that that same passage was a carnall Baptisme, which after a certaine proportion answereth to our spirituall Baptisme. But if that were allowed true, the Apostles argument could not proceede, which meaneth heere to have this taken away from the Christians, that they thinke that they excell the Jewes by the prerogative of Baptisme. Neither is that which by and by after followeth, subject to this cavillation: that they did eat the same spirituall meat that wee eat, and drunke the same spirituall drinke, which he expoundeth to be Christ.

6. To overthrow this sentence of Paul, they object that which Christ saith: Your fathers did eate Manna in the wilderness, and are dead: hee that eateth my flesh, shall not die for ever. Which two places are very easily made to agree together. The Lord, because he then talked to hearers that sought onely to be filled with foode of their bellies, but cared not for the meat of the soule, tempered his talke somewhat to their capacitie: but especially he frameth the comparison of Manna, and of his body according to their sense. They required that he, to get himselfe some credit, would approve his power with doing some such miracle, as Moses did in the Wilderness, when hee obtained Manna from heaven. But in Manna they conceived nothing but the remedie of carnall hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they peirced not to that higher misterie which Paul hath respect unto: Christ therefore to shew how much greater a benefit they ought to looke for at his hand, than that which they reported that Moses did bestow upon their fathers, frameth this comparison: If it were a great miracle in your opinion, and worthy to be remembered, that the Lord by Moses ministred food food from heaven to his people, to sustaine them for a small time, that they should not perishe for hunger in the wilderness: gather hereby, how much more excellent is the meat that giveth immortalitie. We see why the Lord passed over that thing which was principall in Manna, and spake onely of the basest profit of it: even because the Jewes as it were of purpose to reproch him, did cast Moses in his teeth, which succoured the necessitie of the people with remedie of Manna: he answered that he is the minister of a much higher grace, in comparisou whereof, the carnall feeding of the people, which alone they so much esteemed, ought of right to bee nothing regarded. But Paul because he knew that the Lord when hee rayned Manna from heaven, did not onely powre it downe for the feeding of their belly, but also did distribute it for a spirituall mysterie, to be a figure of the spirituall quickening that is had in Christ, did not neglect that part that was most worthy of consideration. Wherefore it certainly and cleerely followeth that the same promises of eternall and heavenly life, which now the Lord vouchsafeth to grant unto us, were not onely communicated unto the Jewes, but also sealed with very spirituall Sacraments. Of which matter Augustine disputeth largely against Faustus the Manichee.

* The words of Christ in saying: Your Fathers did eat Manna, and are dead: do no contradict the Apostle, which saith: They did eat the same spirituall meat that we eat. For they went to whom Christ speaketh gave him occasion not to touch the mystery but onely the carnall use of their Manna.

7. But if the readers had rather to have testimonies alleaged unto them out of the law and the Prophets, whereby they may perceive that the spirituall covenant was common also to the Fathers, as we heare be Christ and the Apostles: I will also follow that desire, and so much the more willingly, because by that meane the adversaries shall be more surely convinced, so that they shall have afterward no way to dally. And I will begin at that prooffe, which although I know that the Anabaptists pride will thinke very fond and in a manner to be laughed at, yet shall much avails with such readers as are willing to learne and have their sound wit. And I take it as a principle confessed, that there is such effectuall force of life in the word of God, that whom so ever God vouchsafeth to be partakers thereof, it quickeneth their soules. For the saying of Peter hath alway bene of force, that it is the incorruptible seed which abideth for ever, as also he gathereth out of the words of Esay. Now sith God in the old time bound the Jewes unto him with this holy bond, it is no doubt that he did sever them into the hope of eternall life. For when I say they embraced the word, which should joyne them nigher to God, I take it for the maner of communicating it: not that generall manner, which is powred abroad throughout the heaven and earth and all the creatures of the world, which although it doe quicken all things, every one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doth not deliver them from necessitie of corruption: but I speake of this speciall maner, whereby the soules of the godly are both lightened unto the knowledge of God, and in a maner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the word, sith Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other Fathers cleaved unto God, I say that it is no doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortal kingdome of God. For it was a found partaking of God, which cannot be without the benefit of eternall life.

8. But if this seeme somewhat entangled: goe to, let us come to the very forme of the covenant, which shall not onely satisfie sober wits, but also shall sufficiently convince their ignorance that bend themselves to speake against it. For God did alwayes thus covenant with his servants: I will beto you a God, and ye shall be to me a people. In which words the Prophets themselves are wont to expound, that both life and salvation, and the whole summe of blessednesse is comprehended. For David doth not without cause often pronounce, that blessed is the people, whose God is the Lord: blessed is the nation, which he hath chosen to be his inheritance: and that not for earthly felicities sake, but because he delivereth them from death, he preserveth them for ever, and continually sheweth them eterna lmercie, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophets, Thou art our God, we shall not die: The Lord is our King, our lawmaker, he shall save us. Blessed art thou, O Israel, because thou art saved in the Lord God. But, not to labour overmuch in a thing needlesse, this admonition is found each where in the Prophets, that wee shall want nothing toward all abundance of good things, and assurance of salvation, so that the Lord be our God. And rightfully: For if his face so soone as it beginneth to shine, is a most present pledge of salvation: to what man shall he openly shew himselfe for his God, but that hee will also open to him his treasure of saluation? For he is our God with this condition, to dwell in the midst of us: as he testified by Moses. But such presence cannot be obtained, but that life must be also together had in possession with it. And although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spirituall life plaine enough in these words: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God unto their bodies alone; but principally to their soules. But soules, unless they be joyued to God by righteousness, remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let that joyning be present, it shall bring everlasting saluation with it.

9. Beside that, he did not onely testify that he was ro them their God, but he also promised that he would be so alway: to the end, that their hope not contented with present benefices, should be extended to eternity. And many sayings doe shew, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as where the faithfull not onely in present evils, but also for the time to come, doe comfort themselves with this, that God will never faile them. Now as concerning the second part of the promise, he yet more plainly assured them of the blessing of God to be prolonged unto them beyond the bounds of this life, saying; I will be the God of your seed after you. For if he minded to declare his good will toward them being dead, in doing good to their posteritie, much more would his favour not faile toward themselves. For God is not like unto men, which doe therefore carrie their love to their friends children, because their power is interrupted by death, so that they cannot employ their friendly doings upon them to whom they did beare good will. But God, whose bountifullness is not hindered by death, taketh not away from the very dead the fruit of the mercy, which for their sakes he powreth out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lords will was by a notable prooffe to set forth unto them the greatnesse and flowing plenty of his goodnesse, which they should seele after death, when he described it to be such as should flow over into all their posterity. And the truth of this promise the Lord did then seale, and as it were brought forth the fulfilling of it, when hee named himselfe the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, long after their death. For what? had it not beene a fond naming if they had utterly perished? For then had it beene all one, as if he had said, I am the God of them that are not. Wherefore the Evangelists rehearse, that with this one argument the Sadduces were so driven to a strait, that they could not deny that Moses did testify the resurrection of the dead, for that they had learned by Moses, that all the Saints were in his hand. Whereupon it was easie to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whom he that is the Judge of life and death had received into his safeguard, custodie, and protection.

10. Now (which is the principall point whereupon this controversie hangeth) let us looke, whether the faithfull themselves have not beene so instructed of the Lord, that they perceived that they should have a better life elsewhere, and so neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. First, the state of life that was enjoyed them by God, was a continuall exercise, whereby they might be put in minde, that they were the most miserable of all men, if their happinesse were onely in this life. Adam, most unhappy, even with onely remembrance of the happinesse that he had lost, did with painfull labours hardly sustaine his needinesse, and that he should not bee pressed with the curse of God in the onely labours of his hands, even there received hee extreme sorrow of that which remained for him to be his comfort: Of his two sonnes, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other he had left alive, whose sight he worthily detested and abhorred. Abel cruelly murdered in the very flower of his age, became an example of the wretchednesse of men. Noe, while the whole world carelessly lived in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great wearinesse in building the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to passe by his greater troubles, than if he should have died an hundred deaths. For beside that the Arke was to him as a grave for ten moneths, there is nothing more unpleasant than to be holden so long in manner drowned in dung of beasts. When hee had passed over so great difficulties, he fell into new matter of grieffe, he saw himselfe scorned of his owne sonne, and was compelled with his owne mouth to curse him, whom by the great benefit of God he had received safe from the generall flood.

Gen. 12. 12.

11. Abraham indeed may be one alone to be compared with an hundred thousand, if wee consider his faith, which is set forth unto us for the best rule of beleeving, of whose kindred we must be accounted, that we may be the children of God. But what more absurdity is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithfull, and not to possesse so much as the smallest corner among them? but he cannot be throwne downe out of the number, no nor from the most honourable degree, but that the whole Church must be destroyed. Now as touching the experiences of his life: When he was first called by the commandment of God, he was plucked away from his Countrey, his parents and his friends, in whom men thinke to be the chiefe sweetnesse of life: even as if God of determinate purpose meant to spoile him of all the pleasures of life: so soone as he came into the land where he was commanded to dwell, he was driven out from thence with famine. Thither he fled for succour, where to save himselfe, he was compelled to deliver out his wife to be abused, which wee know not whether it were more bitter to him than many deaths. When he was returned into the land of his owne dwelling, he was driven out againe from thence with famine. What a felicity is this, to dwell in that land, wherein a man must so oft be hungry, yea, die for famine, if we run not away? And therewithall he was brought to that necessity with Abimelech, that he must needs redeem his life with the losse of his wife, while many years long he wandred uncertainly hither and thither, he was compelled by the continuall brawlings of his servants to put away his Nephew whom he loved as his owne son. Which departing, without doubt he did not otherwise take than if he had suffered the cutting off of one of his limbs. A little after, he heard that he was carried away captive by his enemies. Whether soever he went, he found neighbours outrageously barbarous, which would not suffer him so much as to drinke water out of the Wells that himselfe had digged with great labour. For he would not have redeemed the use of them at the hand of King Gerar, if hee had not first bene forbidden. Now when he came to old age, hee saw the thing which is the most unpleasant and bitter that that age hath, himselfe punished with having no children, till beside all hope he begat Ismael, whose birth he yet paid deare for, when he was wearied with the brawling of Sara, as if hee in maintaining the stubbornnesse of his bond-woman were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his household. At length Isaac was borne, but with this condition, that his first begotten Ismael must, as forsaken, be cruelly cast out of doores. When onely Isaac was left, in whom the wearied age of the silly good man might rest, within a little after he was commanded to kill him. What can mans wretchedness be more miserable, than the father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Isaac had died of any sicknesse, who would not have thought the old man most miserable, that had a sonne given him in mockage, for whom his griefe of want of children should be doubled? If he had bene slaine by some stranger, the unhappinesse of the thing would have much increased his miserie. But this passeth all examples of miserie, to have him slaine with his fathers owne hand. Finally, hee was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man would in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he could finde none more fit than this of Abraham. And let no man object that hee was not altogether unhappy, for that hee at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great tempests. For wee cannot say that he liveth a blessed life, which for a long space together painfully weareth out of infinite troubles, but him that without feeling of evils, quietly enjoyeth present good things.

The lives of Isaac and Jacob especially, how farre from outward happinesse.

Gen. 28. 5.

12. Isaac that was lesse troubled with evils, yet scarce ever tooke any taste of sweetnesse. He hath also felt the same vexations, that doe not suffer a man to be blessed in the earth. Famine chased him out of the land of Canaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from his bosome: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all meanes oppressed him, so that he was faine to strive for his water: at home in his owne house he suffered much troublesomenesse by his childrens wives, he was grieved with disagreements of his sons, and could not remedy that so great a mischief, but by the banishment of him whom he had blessed. But as for Jacob, he is nothing else but a notable example of extreme infelicity. He passed his childhood most unquietly at home among the threatenings & terrors of his elder brother, to which at length he was compelled to give place.

When

When he was fled from his parents, and his native Countrey, beside that it was a grievous thing to live in banishment, he was nothing more kindly or gently received of his Uncle Laban. Then it sufficed not that he had served seven yeeres, a hard and cruell service, but that also must be by guile defrauded of his wife. For another wives sake hee was driven into new service, where hee was all the day fried with heat of the Sunne, and all the night lay waking and pained with frost and cold, as himselfe complained. While hee by the space of twenty yeares suffered so hard a life, hee was daily vexed with new injuries of his father in law. Neither was he quiet in his owne house, seeing it divided, and in a manner scattered abroad with the hatred, brawling, and envie of his wives. When he was commanded to returne into his Countrey, he was compelled to watch an advantage to take his journey, much like a shamefull running away: and yet could he not so escape the unjust dealing of his father in law, but was faine to suffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his journey. Then fell hee into a much more cruell distresse. For when he came neere to his brother, hee had so many deaths before his eyes, as might be prepared by a cruell man, and a bent enemy. So was he above measure tormented, and as it were drawn in sunder with terrible feares, so long as he looked for his brothers coming: when he came once in his sight, he fell downe as halfe dead at his feet, untill he found him more favourable than he durst have hoped. Beside that, at his first entry into the land, he lost Rachel his dearly beloved wife. Afterward hee heard word that the sonne which he had by her, and whom therefore he loved above the rest, was torne with wilde beasts: by whose death, how great griefe he conceived, he himselfe declared in this, that after long weeping, he obstinately stopp'd up all waies whereby comfort might come to him, leaving himselfe nothing, but to goe downe to his sonne wailing into the grave. In the meane time how great causes of griefe, waiting and wearinesse were the ravishment and desflouring of his daughter, and the boldnesse of his sonnes in revenging it, which not onely made him to be abhorred in sight of all the inhabitants of that Countrey, but also procured him most present perill of utter destruction? Then followed that horrible outrageous offence of Ruben his first begotten sonne, which was such, as there could not chance a more grievous. For whereas the desfling of a mans wife is reckoned among the highest ill fortunes: what is to be said of it, when that wickednesse is committed by a mans owne sonne? Within a little while after, his house is spotted with another unnaturall adulterie: so that so many shames might well breake a heart, that otherwise were most constant, and unable to bee vanquished with calamities. Neere before the end of his life, while he sought to provide succour for the famine of himselfe and others, he was stricken with tidings of a new misfortune, understanding that another of his sonnes was kept in prison, for recovering of whom he was compelled to leaye to the rest, Benjamin his only darling. Who can thinke that in such a heape of mischiefs hee had any one moment given him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himselfe, the best witness of himselfe, affirmed to Pharao, that his dayes were short and evill upon the earth. Now truly he that declareth that he hath passed his life by continuall miseries, denieth that hee felt the prosperity which the Lord had promised him. Therefore either Jacob did unkindly and unthankfully weigh the grace of God, or he truly professed that he had bene miserable upon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that he had not his hope fastened upon earthly things.

As the life of the Fathers sheweth, so the Apostle witnesseth that they looked for other blessednesse at the hands of God. Heb. 11. 9.

13. If these holy Fathers looked for (as undoubtedly they did) a blessed life at the hand of God, truly they both thought and saw it to be another manner of blessednesse, than the blessednesse of earthly life. Which thing the Apostle also doth shew excellently well: Abraham (saith he) direct by faith in the land of promise as in a strange land, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, partners with him of the same inheritance, for they looked for a City set upon a good foundation, the maker and builder whereof is God, all these are dead in faith, not receiving the things promised, but looking at them a farre off, and believing and confessing that they were guests and strangers upon the land. Whereby they declare that they sought for a Countrey, and if they had bene moved with desire of that land from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they sought for a better, that is the heavenly Countrey. Wherefore God is not ashamed med to be called their God, forasmuch as he hath prepared them a Citie. For they had bene duller than blockes, to follow promises so earnestly, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, unlesse they had looked for the fulfilling of them elsewhere. But this he chiefly enforceth, and that not without good reason, that they called this life a journey from home, even as Moses reporteth. For if they were strangers and forrainers in the land of Canaan, where is the Lords promise, whereby they were made heires of it? He sheweth plainly therefore, that the Lords promise concerning the possession thereof, had a further respect. Wherefore they purchased not one foot in the land of Canaan but for buriall, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receive the fruit of the promise till after death. And that is the cause why Jacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that hee compelled his sonne Joseph to promise it him, and to sweare to performe it: and why Joseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, when they were long before fallen to powder, to be removed thither.

14. Finally, it appeareth plainly, that in all the travels of this life, they had alway set before them the blessednesse of the life to come. For to what purpose should Jacob have so much desired, and with so great danger sought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a manner to be cast off from being his childe: but no good at all, unlesse he had respect to a higher blessing? And he declared that he had this meaning, by the words which he spake among his last breathings: Lord I will looke for thy salvation. What salvation could he have looked for, when he saw that he lay ready to give up the ghost, unlesse he had seene in death the beginning of a new life? But what dispute wee of the holy ones and children of God, when even hee was not without a taste of such understanding, which otherwife was enemie to the truth? For what meant Balaam when he said? Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my last times be like unto theirs: but that he meant the same thing that David afterward uttered, that the death of the Saints is precious in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked is very evill. If the furthest bound and end were in death, there could in it be noted no difference betweene the righteous and unrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diversity of the estates that after death shall fall to them both.

15. Wee are not yet come beyond Moses, which (as these men say) had no other office, but to persuade the carnall people to worship God by the fruitfulness of the ground, and plenty of all things. And yet (unlesse a man will see the light that willingly offereth it selfe) there is already a plaine declaration of the spirituall covenant. But if we come downe to the Prophets, there with most full brightnesse both the life everlasting, and the Kingdome of Christ doe utter themselves. And first of all David, which as he was before the other in time, so according to the order of Gods distribution, hee shewed the heavenly mysteries in shadowes more darkly than the rest, yet with what plainnesse and certainty directeth he all his sayings to that end: How he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence testifieth: I am here a forrainer and stranger, as all my fathers were. Every living man is vanity, every one walketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lord? even to thee is my hope. Truly, hee that confessing that in the earth there is nothing sound or stedfast, keepeth still a stedfastnesse of hope in God, considereth his felicity laid up in another place. To such consideration is he wont to call all the faithfull, so oft as he meaneth to comfort them truly. For in another place, after he had spoken of the shortnesse, and the transitory and vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: But the mercy of the Lord is for ever upon them that feare him. Like whereunto is that which is in the hundred and second Psalm. At the beginning Lord thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou abidest: they shall wax old like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparell, but thou remainest the selfe same, and thy yeares shall not faile: the sonnes of thy servants shall dwell, and thy posterity shall be established before thee. If the godly cease not for the decay of heaven and earth to be stablished before the Lord, it followeth that their salvation is joyned with the eternity of God. But that hope cannot stand at all, unlesse it rest upon the promise that is set forth in Esay: The heavens (saith the Lord) shall vanish away like smoke,

the earth shall be worne out like a garment, and the inhabitants of it shall perish like those things : But my saluation shall be for ever, and my righteousnesse shall not faile : where everlastingnesse is given to righteousnesse and saluation, not in respect that they remaine with God, but in respect that they are felt of men.

16. Neither may we otherwise take those things, that he commonly speaketh of the prosperous success of the faithfull, but to apply them to the open shewing of the heavenly glory. As these sayings : The Lord keepeth the soules of the righteous, hee shall deliver them from the hand of the sinner. Light is arisen to the righteous, and joy to the upright in heart. The righteousnesse of the godly man abideth for ever : his home shall be exalted in glory, the desire of the sinner shall perish. Againe : but the righteous shall confesse unto thy name, the upright shall dwell with thy countenance. Againe : the righteous shall be in eternall remembrance. Againe : the Lord shall redeeme the soules of his servants. For the Lord oftentimes leaveth his servants to the lust of the wicked, not onely to be vexed, but also to be torne in peeces and destroyed : he suffereth the good to lie languishing in darkenesse and filth, while the wicked doe in a manner shine among the starres. And he doth not so cheere them with the brightnesse of his countenance, that they enjoy long continuing gladnesse. Wherefore even hee also hideth not, that if the faithfull fasten their eyes upon the present state of things, they shall be stricken with a sore temptation, as though there were no favour or reward of innocencie with God. So much doth wickednesse for the most part prosper and flourish, while the company of the godly is oppressed with shame, povertie, contempt, and all kindes of crosses. It wanteth but little (saith he) that my foote slipped not, and my steps fell not abroad, while the fortune of fooles grieveth me, and while I see the prosperitie of the wicked. At length after rehearfall of it he concludeth : I beat my thought, if I could understand these things. But it is a torment to my spirit, till I enter into the sanctuarie of the Lord, and understand the last end of them.

17. Let us therefore learne yet by this confession of David, that the holy Fathers under the old Testament were not ignorant, how seldome or never God doth in this world performe to his servants those things that he promiseth them, and that therefore they did lift up their minds to Gods sanctuarie, wherein they had that laid up in store, which appeareth not in the shadow of this present life. That was the last judgement of God, which when they could not see with eyes, they were content to understand by faith. Trusting upon which assistance, what soeuer happened in the world, yet they doubted not a time would once come, when the promises of God should be fulfilled. As these sayings doe witness, I will behold the face of God in righteousnesse : I will be satisfied with thy countenance. Againe, I as a greene Olive tree in the house of the Lord. Againe, The righteous shall flourish as a Date tree, and shall spread in branches like the Cedar of Libanus, being planted in the house of the Lord, they shall flourish in the Palaces of our God : They shall still beare fruit, they shall be fat as greene in their old age. When he had said a litle before : How deepe are thy thoughts O Lord? while the wicked doe flourish, they bud out like an herbe, that they may perish forever. Where is that faire she w and beantie of the faithfull, but when the face of this world shall be turned inward by disclosing of the kingdom of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternitie, they despised the hardnesse enduring but a moment of present miseries, and boldly burst forth into these words : Thou shalt not suffer for ever the righteous to die, but thou shalt throw downe the wicked headlong into the pit of destruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternall destruction that may swallow up the wicked? Among whose felicities, this is also reckoned in another place, that they close up the end of their life in a moment without long languishing. Where is that so great stedfastnesse of the holy ones, whom David himselfe each where complaineth not onely to be shaken with trouble, but also to be oppressed, and utterly broken in peeces? Forsooth, hee did set before his eyes, not what the altering course of the world beareth, which is unstable and more nitedfast than the ebbing and flowing of tides, but what the Lord will doe, when he shall one day sit for the eternall setting of heaven and earth. As in another place he excellently well describeth it: The foolish do stay upon their wealthinesse, and are proud because of their great riches. And yet no man, though he flourish in never so great dignitie, can redeeme his brother from death, no man can pay to God the price of his ransom, but whereas they see that both the wise doe die, and that the wicked also and foolles doe perishe and leave their riches to strangers, yet they thinke that their houses shall abide for ever, and their dwellings to the end of ages, and they advance their names upon the earth, but man shall not continue in honour: he shall be like to the beasts that die. This imagination of theirs is extreamest folly, which yet their posterity doe greedily follow. They shall be placed like a stocke in Hell, and death shall have rule over them. When the light ariseth, the upright shall have dominion over them, the beautie of them shall perishe, Hell is their dwelling house. First, this laughing to scorne of the foolish for that they rest on the slipperie and rolling good things of the world, doth shew that the wise must seeke a farre other felicitie. But there be more evidently discloseth the myserie of the resurrection, where after the destruction and extinguishment of them, he erecteth the kingdom of the godly. For what rising of light (I pray you) shall we call that, but the revealing of the new life which followeth the end of this present life.

What David speakes of the faithfull mans prosperous success is bath relation to future life. It is in the world, so come. Psal. 97. 10. Psal. 112. 7. 9. Psal. 140. 12. Psal. 112. 6. Psal. 34. 23.

18. From thence did spring up that consideration, which the faithfull oftentimes used for a comfort of their miseries and remedie of patience: It is but a moment in the Lords displeasure, and life in his mercy. How did they determine afflictions to end in a moment, that were in affliction in a manner all their life long? where did they espie so long an enduring of Gods kindnesse, whereof they scarcely felt any little taste? If they had ticked fast upon the earth, they could have found no such thing, but because they looked upon heaven, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exercise his holy ones by the crosse, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, doe last the worlds age. Againe, they did foresee the eternall and never ending destruction of the ungodly, which were as in a dreame happy for one day. Whereupon came these sayings: The remembrance of the righteous shall be in blessing, but the name of the wicked shall rot. Precious is the death of the Saints in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked most evill. Againe, in Samuel: The Lord shall keepe the feet of the holy, and the wicked shall be put to silence in darkenesse. Which doe declare that they well knew, that howsoever the holy were diversly carried about, yet their last end is life and salvation: and that the prosperitie of the wicked is a pleasant way, whereby they by little and little slide forward into the gulfe of death. Therefore they called the death of such, the destruction of the uncircumcised, as of them from whom the hope of the resurrection was cut away. Wherefore David could not devise a more grievous curse than this: Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and not be written with the righteous.

19. But above all other, notable is that saying of Job: I know that my Redeemer liveth, and in the last day I shall rise againe out of the earth, and in my flesh I shall see God my Saviour: This hope is laid up in my bosome. Some that have a mind to make a shew of their sharpe wit, doe cavill that this is not to be understood of the last resurrection, but of the first day that Job looked to have God more gentle to him, which although we grant them in part, yet shall we enforce them to confesse whether they will or no, that Job could not have come to that largenesse of hope, if he had rested his thought upon the earth. Therefore we must needs confesse, that he lifted up his eyes to the immortality to come, which saw, that his Redeemer would be present with him, even lying in his grave. For to them that thinke onely of this present life, death is their uttermost desperation: which very death could not put off Jobs hope. Yea though he kill me (saith he) nevertheless I will still hope in him. And let no trifter here carpe against me and say, that these were the sayings but of a few, whereby is not proved that such doctrine was among the Jewes. For I will by and by answer him, that these few did not in these sayings utter any secret wisdom, whereunto onely certaine excellent wits, were severally and privately suffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghost appointed teachers of the people, so they openly published those mysteries of God, that were to be univerally learned, and ought to be the principles of the common religion among the people. Therefore when we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghost, wherein he spake of the spirituall life so clearly and plainly in the Church of the Jewes, it were a point point of intollerable stubbornesse to send them away onely to the fleshy covenant, wherein is mention made of nothing but earth and earthly wealthinesse.

20. If I come downe to the latter Prophets, there we may freely walke as in our owne field. For if it were not hard for us to get the upper hand in Dauid, Job, and Samuel, here it shall be much more easie. For God kept this distribution and order in disposing the covenant of his mercie, that how much the nearer it drew on in proccess of time to the full performance thereof, with so much greater increasments of revelation he did day by day more brightly shew it. Therefore at the beginning when the first promise of saluation was made unto Adam, there glistered out but as it were small sparkles of it. After, having more added unto it, a greater largeness of light began to bee put forth: which from thence forth brake out more and more, and displayed her brightnesse farther abroad, till at length all the clouds were driven away, and Christ the sonne of righteousness fully lightened the whole world. We need not therefore to feare that we faile of testimonies of the Prophets, if we seeke them to prove our cause, but because I see that there will arise a huge deale of matter, whereupon I should be constrained of necessitie to tarry longer than the proportion of my purpose may beare, for it would grow to a work of a great volume, and also because I have already, by those things that I have said before, made plaine the way, even for a Reader of meane capacity, so as hee may go forward without stumbling: therefore I will at this present abstaine from long tediousnesse: which to doe is no lesse necessarie: but giving the readers warning before-hand, that they remember to open their owne way with that key that we have first given them in their hand. That is, that so oft as the Prophets speake of the blessednesse of the faithfull people, whereof scarcely the least steps are seene in this present life, they may resort to this distinction: that the Prophets the better to expresse the goodness of God, did as in a shadow expresse it to the people by temporall benefits, as by certaine rough drawing of the portraiture thereof: but that the perfect image, that they have painted thereof, was such as might ravish mens mindes out of the earth, and out of the elements of this world, and of the age that shall perish, and of necessitie raise it up to the considering of the felicity of the life that is to come and spiritual.

21. We will be content with one example. When the Israelites being carried away to Babylon, saw their scattering abroad to be like unto death, they could hardly be removed from this opinion that they thought that all was but fables that *Ezechie*l prophced of their restitution: because they reckoned it even all one as if he had told them that rotten carcases should be restored againe to life. The Lord to shew, that even the same difficultie could not stop him from bringing his benefit to effect, shewed to the Prophet in a vision a field full of drie bones, to the which in a moment with the onely power of his word he restored breath and livenessse. The vision indeed served to correct the incredulitie at that present time: but in the meane season he did put the Jewes in minde how far the power of the Lord extended beyond the account of the people; which so easly quickened with his only becke, bones already rotten and scattered abroad: wherefore you shall compare that with another saying of Esoy, The dead shall rise, my carcase, they shall rise againe. Awake ye and rejoyce that dwell in the dust, because the dew of the greene field is thy dew, and thou shalt pluck downe the land of the Giants into ruine. Go my people, enter into thy tents: shut thy doores upon thee, hide thee a litle while, till my displeasure passe ouer. For behold, the Lord shall go out of his place, to visit the iniquity of the dweller upon the earth against him; and the earth shall shew forth her bloud, and shall no longer hide her slaine.

22. Albeit a man should doe fondly, that would go about to draw all to such a rule. For there be some places that without any covering do shew the immortalitie to come, that is prepared for the faithfull in the kingdom of God, of which sort we have recited some, and of like sort are the most part of the rest, specially these two, the one in Esoy. As a new heaven, and a new earth which I make to stand before me, so shall your seed stand, and there shall be moneth of moneth, and Sabbath of Sabbath: all flesh shall come to worship before my face, saith the Lord. And they shall goe out and see the dead carcases of the men that have offended against me, that their worme shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched. The other of Dauid. In that time shall rise up

23. Now, as for proving the other two points that the Fathers had Christ for pledge of their covenant, and that they reposed in him all their affiance of blessing, I will not travell therein at all, because they have both lesse controversie and more plainnesse. Let us therefore boldly determine this, which by no engines of the devill may be removed, that the old Testament, or covenant which the Lord made with his people Israel, was not limited within the compasse of earthly things, but also contained the promise of the spirituall and eternall life: the expectation whereof must needs have bene imprinted in all their mindes that truly consented to the covenant. But let us put farre away this mad and pernicious opinion, that either God did set forth in his promise to the Jewes nothing else, or that the Jewes sought nothing else but filling of their belly, delights of the flesh, flourishing wealth, outward power, fruitfulness of children, & whatsoever a naturall man esteemeth. For at this day Christ promiseth no other kingdome of heaven to his, but where they shall rest with Abraham, Isaac and Iacob. And Peter affirmed, that the Jewes of his time were heires of the grace of the Gospell, for that they were the children of the Prophets, comprehended in the covenant, which the Lord had in the old time made with his people. And, that the same should not bee witnessed with words onely, the Lord also approved it by deed. For in the very moment that he rose againe, hee vouchsafed to have many of the holy men to rise againe in company with him, and made them to be seene in the Cities: so giving an assured token, that whatsoever he did and suffered for the purchasing of eternall salvation, pertained no lesse to the faithfull of the old Testament, than unto us. For as Peter testified, they were also endued with the same spirit of faith, whereby we are regenerate into life. Now when we heare that the same spirit which is in us, a certaine sparkle of immortality, whereupon it is also in another place called the earnest of our inheritance, did likewise dwell in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Whereby it is so much the more marvell, that in the old time the Sadduces fell to such grossefesse of error, that they denied both the resurrection and also the substance of soules, both which points they saw sealed with so cleare testimonies of Scripture. And no lesse to be marvelled at, even at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdome of Christ; if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they should have that punishment for refusing the Gospell. For so it behooved, by the just judgement of God, to strike those mindes with blindness, which in refusing the light of heaven being offered them, did willfully bring themselves into darknesse. Therefore they read and continually turne over Moses, but they are stopped with a veile set betweene them and him; that they cannot see the light that shineth in his countenance. And so shall it remaine covered and hidden from them, till he be turned to Christ, from whom now they travell to lead and draw him away so much as in them lieth.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.

What then? wilt thou say: shall there bee no difference left betweene the old Testament and the New? and to what purpose serve all those places of Scripture, where they are compared one against the other, as things most contrarie? I doe willingly allow those differences that are rehearsed in the Scripture: but so that they nothing hinder the unite already established, as it shall bee plaine to see when we shall have intreated of them in order. Those differences are (as farre as ever I could marke or can remember) chiefly foure in number, to the which if you list to adjoyne the fifth, I am not against it: I say and trust to prove that they are all such as rather belong to the manner of ministation, than to the substance of them. And by this meane they shall nothing hinder, but that the promises of both the old and new Testament may remaine remain all one, and all one foundation of the same promises, Christ. Now the first difference is, that although, even in the old time also, the Lords will was to direct the mindes of his people, and to have them raised up to the heavenly inheritance, yet, that they might be the better nourished in hope thereof, he gave it to be scene or rather to be tasted of, under earthly benefits: but now having revealed the grace of the life to come, by the Gospell, hee more cleerely and plainly directeth our mindes the straight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferior manner of exercising which he used with the Israelites. They that marke not this purpose of God, doe not thinke that the old people climbed any higher than to the good things promised to the body. They so often heare the land of Canaan named, as the excellent, or rather onely reward for the keepers of Gods law. They heare that God threateth nothing more severely to the transgressors of the same law, than that they shall be driven out of the possession of the same land, and scattered abroad into strange regions. They see that in a manner to this effect come all the blessings and curses that are pronounced by Moser. Hereby they doe undoubtedly determine, that the Jewes not for their owne sakes, but for others, were severed from other nations, that is, that the Church of Christ might have an image, in whose outward forme she might see examples of spirituall things. But such the Scripture doth sometimes shew, that God himselfe directed all the earthly benefits that hee did for them to this end, that so hee might lead them by the hand to the hope of heavenly benefits: it was too much unskillfulnesse, I will not say blockishnesse, not to consider this order of disposition. The issue or point of our controversie with this sort of men is this, that they teach that the possession of the land of Canaan was to the Israelites their chiefe and last blessednesse, and that to us after the revealing of Christ, it doth but figuratively signifie the heavenly inheritance. On the other side wee affirme, that they did in the earthly possession which they enjoyed, as in a looking glasse behold the inheritance to come, which they believed to be prepared for them in heaven.

2. That shall better appeare by the similitude that Paul used to the Galathians. Hee compareth the nation of the Jewes to an heire, within age, which being not yet able to governe himselfe, followeth the guiding of the Tutor or schoolemaster, to whose custodie he is committed. And whereas he applieth that similitude to the ceremonies, that, nothing hindreth but that it may also very fitly serve to this purpose. The same inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for us: but such as yet, for want of age, they were not of capacity to enter upon and use. The same Church was among them, but whereof the age was yet but childish. Therefore the Lord kept them under this schooling, that he gave them not the spirituall promises so naked and openly, but as it were shadowed with earthly promises. Therefore, where he called Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and their posteritie unto hope of immortalitie, he promised them the land of Canaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes upon it, but that in beholding of it, they should exercise and confirme themselves in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare. And that they might not be deceived, there was given them a higher promise to testifie that that land was not the highest benefit of God. So Abraham was not sufficed to lie slothfull in the promise received of the land, but his minde was with a greater promise raised up unto the Lord. For Abraham heard this said unto him; I am thy protector, and thy reward exceeding great. Here we see, that Abraham hath the end of his reward set forth in the Lord, that hee should not account upon a transitorie and slipperie reward in the elements of this world, but rather thinke it to be such as cannot wither away. Afterward he adjoyneth the promise of the land, to no other intent, but that it should be a token of the good will of God, and a figure of the heavenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their owne sayings doe declare. So David riseth upward from temporall blessings, to that same highest and last blessing, My heart (saith he) and my flesh faint for desire of thee. God is my portion for ever. Againe, the Lord is the part of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art hee that sweest mine heritage for me. Again, I have cryed unto thee, O Lord, I have said, Thou art my hope, my portion in the land of the living. Truly, they that dare so speake, doe without doubt professe that with their hope they climb above the world, and all the good things here present. But the Prophets doe oft describe this blessednesse of the world to come, under the figure that they had received of the Lord. And so are these sayings to be understood. That the godly shall possess the land by inheritance, and the wicked shall be destroyed out of it. That Hierusalem shall abound with all kinde of riches, and Sion overflow with plentie of all things. All which we see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our wayfaring, or the earthly Hierusalem, but of the true cuntry of the faithfull, and that heavenly Citie wherein the Lord hath commanded blessing and life for ever.

3. This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the old Testament, did esteeme the mortall life and the blessings thereof more than is now meet to doe. For although they knew well that they should not rest in it, as in the end of their race; yet when they called to minde, what markes of his grace the Lord had pointed therein, to exercise them according to the final rate of their tendernes, they felt a greater sweetness of it, than if they had considered it by it selfe. But as the Lord in testifying his goodwill toward the faithfull, by present good things, did as in a shadow expresse the spirituall felicitie, by such figures and signes: so on the other side he did in corporall paines shew examples of his judgement against the reprobate. Therefore as the benefits of God were to be seene in earthly things, so were also his punishments. While the unskillfull do not weigh this comparison or agreement, as I may call it betweene the punishments and the rewards, they marvell at so much alteration in God, that in old time was so suddenly ready to take vengeance on every offence of man with sterne and horrible punishments, and now as if he had laid away the affection of his old angrienesse, he punisheth both much more gently and seldomer, yea, and for the same cause they do almost imagine severall gods of the old and new Testament: which the Manichees did indeed. But wee shall easily be delivered from such doubts, if we lay our mindes to consider this orderly disposition of God that I have spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie and set forth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicitie to come, by temporall benefits, and the grievousnesse of the spirituall death, by corporall paines. Whereby he delivered his Testament to the Israelites, as yet after a certaine manner folded up.

4. Another difference of the old and new Testament is said to be in the figures: for that the old Testament did shew onely an image in absence of the truth, and a shadow in steed of the bodie. But the new Testament giveth the truth present, and the sound bodie it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly wheresoever the new Testament is in comparison set against the old: but it is more largely intreated of in the Epistle to the Hebrewes than any where else. There the Apostle disputech against them which thought that the observation of Moses law might not bee taken away, but that they should also draw with them the ruine of religion. To confute this error, he useth that which had bene forespoken by the Prophet concerning the priesthood of Christ. For whereas there is given him an eternall priesthood, it is certaine, that that priesthood is taken away, wherein new successors were daily put in, one after another. But hee proveth that the institution of this new priesthood is to be preferred, because it is stablished with an oath. He after addeth further, that in the same change of the priesthood, is also contained the change of the testament. And that it was necessarie so to be, hee proveth by this reason: for that the weaknesse of the law was such, that it could helpe no thing to perfection. Then he proceedeth in declaring what was that weaknesse, even this, that it had a certaine outward righteousness of the flesh, which could not make the observers of them perfect, according to conscience: that by sacrifices of beasts it could neither wipe away finnes, nor purchase true holinesse. He concludeth therefore, that there was in it a shadow of good things to come, but not the lively image of the things themselves: and that therefore it had no other office, but to be as an introduction into a better hope, which is delivered in the Gospell. Here is to be seene, in what point the covenant of the law is compared with the covenant of the Gospell, and the ministerie of Christ, with the ministerie of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, then were there great difference betweene the two Testaments: but sith the point of our case leadeth us another way, we must tend to this end, to finde out the truth. Let us then set forth here the covenant which he hath stablished to be eternall, and never to perish. The accomplishment thereof, whereby it attaineth to be stablished and continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lord did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to be as it were solemne signes of the confirmation. Now this came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the law ought to give place to Christ or no. Although these ceremonies were indeed onely accidents, or verily additions and things adjoynd, or (as the people call them) accessarie things to the covenant, yet because they were instruments or meanes of the administration thereof, they beare the name of the covenant it selfe, as the like is wont to be attributed to other Sacraments. Therefore in summe: the old Testament is in this place called the solemne forme of confirming the covenant, contained in ceremonies and sacrifices. The Apostle saith, that because in it is nothing perfect, unlesse we passe further, therefore it behooved that they should be discontinued and abrogate; that place might be given to Christ the assurer and Mediatour of a better testament, by whom eternall sanctification is once purchased to the elect, and the transgressions blotted out that remained under the Law. Or if you like it better thus: That the old Testament of the Lord was that which was delivered, wrapped up in the shadowish and effectuall observations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, because it did but (as it were) hang in suspence untill it might stay upon a more stedfast and substantiall confirmation: and that then onely it was made new and eternall, after that it was consecrate and stablished by the blood of Christ. Whereupon Christ calleth the cup that he gave at his Supper to his Disciples, the Cup of the new Testament in his blood: to signifye that then the Testament of God attendeth his truth: by which it becommeth new and eternall, when it is sealed with his blood.

5. Hereby it appeareth in what sence the Apostle said: that in the schooling of the law, the Jewes were brought unto Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And he confesseth, that they were the children and heires of God, but yet such, as for their young age were to be kept under the custodie of a schoolmaster. For it behooved that ere the soune of righteousness was yet risen, there should neither be so great brightnesse of revelation, nor so great deepe sight of understanding. Therefore, God so gave them in measure the light of his Word, that they saw it as yet farre off and darkly. Therefore Paul expresseth this slendernesse of understanding by the tearme of young age, which the Lords will was to have bene exercised with the elements of this world, and with outward observations, as rules of instruction for children, untill Christ should shine abroad, by whom it behooved that the knowledge of the faithfull people should grow to full age. This distinction Christ himselfe meant of, when he said, that the Law and the Prophets were untill John, and that from thence forth the Kingdome of God is preached. What did the Law and the Prophets open to men of their time? even this, they gave a taste of that wisdom which in time to come should bee plainly disclosed: and they shewed it before, as it were twinklingly shining a far off. But when it came to passe that Christ might bee pointed to with the finger, then was the kingdome of God set open. For in him are laid abroad the treasures of all wisdom and understanding, whereby we attaine, even in a manner, into the secret closets of heaven.

6. And it maketh not against us, that there can scarcely any one be found in the Christian Church, that in excellencie of faith might be compared with Abraham, or that the Prophets excelled in such force of spirit, that even at this day they lighten the whole world withall. For our question is not here, what grace the Lord hath bestowed upon a few, but what ordinary disposition he used in teaching his people: such as is declared in the Prophets themselves, which were endued with peculiar knowledge above the rest. For even their preaching is darke, and enclosed in figures, as of things a farre off. Moreover how marvellous knowledge soever appeared in them above other, yet for as much as they were driven of necessity to submit them to the common childish instruction of the people, they themselves also were reckoned in number of children. Finally, there never chanced any such cleere sight to any at that time, but that it did in some part savour of the darknesse of the time. Whereupon Christ said, Many Kings and Prophets have desired to see the things that yee see, and have not seene them: and to heare the things that yee heare, and have not heard them. Therefore blessed are your eyes, because they see, and your eares because they heare. And truly it is meet that the presence of Christ should have this excellency of prerogative, that from it should arise the cleere revealing of the heavenly mysteries. And for this purpose also maketh that, which even we now alleaged out of the first Epistle of Peter, that it was opened to them, that their travell was profitable, principally for our age.

The third difference betweene the old covenant and the new mentioned by the Apostle out of Jerem. 7.

7. Now I come to the third difference, which is taken out of Jeremie, whose words are these: Behold the day shall come, saith the Lord, and I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and the house of Juda, not according to the covenant that I made with your Fathers, in the day when I tooke them by the hand, to leade them out of the land of Egypt, the covenant that they made void, although I ruled over them: But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel: I will put my law in their bowels, and I will write it in their hearts, and I will be mercifull to their iniquitie. And no man shall teach his neighbour, and no man his brother. For they shall all know me from the least unto the most. Of which words the Apostle tooke occasion to make this comparison betweene the law and the Gospell, that hee called the law a littrell, and the Gospell a spirituall doctrine: the law, hee said was fashioned out in Tables of stone, the Gospell written in hearts: that the law was the preaching of death, the Gospell the preaching of life: the law the preaching of damnation, the Gospell the preaching of righteousnesse: that the law is made void, that the Gospell abideth. Sith the Apostles purpose was but to declare the meaning of the Prophet, it shall be sufficient that we weigh the words of one of them, to attaine the meaning of them both. Albeit, there is some unlikenesse betweene them. For the Apostle speaketh more odiously of the law than the Prophet doth: and that not in simple respect of the law, but because there were certaine naughty men, having a wrong zeale to the law, which did with perverse love of the ceremonies, obscure the brightnesse of the Gospell. He disputeth of the nature of the law, according to their error and foolish affection. Therefore it shall be good to note that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, because they doe by comparison set the old and the new Testament, the one against the other: doe consider nothing in the law, but that which properly belongeth unto it. As for example: The law doth commonly in every place containe promises of mercie, but because they are borrowed from elswhere, therefore they are not reckoned as part of the law, when the meere nature of the law is spoken of. The onely thing they ascribe unto it, to command things that are right, and to forbid wicked doings: to promise reward to the followers of righteousnesse, and to threaten punishment to the transgressors: but in the meane time neither to change, nor amend the perversnesse of heart, that is naturally in all men.

1 Cor. 2. 6.

The severall branches of the third difference betweene the two Testaments.

8. Now let us expound the Apostles comparison, one piece after another. The old Testament is littrell, because it was published without the effectuall working of the spirit: The new is spirituall which the Lord hath spirituallly graven in the hearts of men: Therefore the second diversitie is as it were a declaration of the first. The old is deadly, because it can doe nothing but wrap all mankind within the curse: The new is the instrument of life, because it delivereth from curse, and restoreth into favour with God. The old is the ministry of damnation, because it condemneth all Adams children of unrighteousnesse: The new is the ministerie of righteousnesse, because it revealeth the mercie of God, by which we are made righteous. The last diversitie is to be referred to the ceremonies. Because the old testament had an image of things absent, it beloved that it should in time decay and vanish away: but the Gospell, because it giveth the true body in deed, keepeth still a firme and perpetual steadfastnesse. Jeremy indeed calleth even the morall law a weake and fraile covenant: but that is for another reason, because by the sudden falling away of the unthankfull people, it was by and by broken: but forasmuch as such breaking of it was the fault of the people, it cannot properly be laid upon the testament. But the ceremonies, forasmuch as by their owne weakenesse were dissolved by the coming of Christ, had the cause of their weakenesse within themselves. Now, that difference of the letter and spirit is not so to be taken, as though the Lord had given his lawes to the Jewes without any fruit at all, having none of them converted unto him. But it is spoken by way of comparison, to advance the abundance of grace, wherewith the same lawmaker as it were putting on a new personage, did honorably norably set forth the preaching of the Gospell. For if wee reckon up the multitude of these whom the Lord out of all peoples hath by the preaching of the Gospell regenerate with his spirit, and gathered into the communion of his Church, wee shall say, that there were very few, or in a manner none in the old time in Israel, that with affection of minde, and entirely from their heart embraced the covenant of the Lord: who yet were very many, if they be reckoned in their owne number without comparison.

9. Out of the third difference riseth the fourth. For the Scripture calleth the old Testament, the testament of bondage, for that it ingendreth feare in mens mindes: but the new Testament, the testament of libertie, because it raiseth them up to confidence and assurednesse. So saith Paul in the eight to the Romanes: Yee have not received the spirit of bondage againe to feare, but the spirit of adoption, by which we cry Abba father. Hereunto seruet that in the epistle to the Hebrewes, that the faithfull are not now come to the bodily mount, and to kindled fire, and whirlwind, darknesse, and tempest, where nothing can be heard or scene but that striketh mens minds with terrour, in so much as Moses himselfe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice sounded, which they all besought, that they might not heare: But that we are come to the Mount Sion, and the Citie of the living God, the heavenly Hierusalem. But that which Paul shortly toucheth in the sentence that we have alleaged out of the Epistle to the Romanes, he setteth out more largely in the Epistle to the Galathians, when he maketh an allegorie of the two sonnes of Abraham, after this manner, that Agar the bondwoman is a figure of the Mount Sinai, where the people of Israel received the law: Sara the free woman is a figure of the heavenly Hierusalem, from whence proceedeth the Gospell. That, as the seed of Agar is borne bond, which may never come to the inheritance, and the seed of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: so by the law wee are made subject to bondage, by the Gospell onely we are regenerate into freedome. But the summe commeth to this effect that the old Testament did strike into consciences feare and trembling: but by the benefit of the new Testament it commeth to passe, that they are made joyfull. The old did hold consciences bound unto the yoke of bondage, by the libertie of the new they are discharged of bondage, and brought into freedome. But if out of the people of Israel they object against us the holy Fathers, who sith it is evident that they were endued with the same spirit that we are, it followeth that they were also partakers both of the selfsame freedome and joy. We answer, that neither of both came of the law. But that when they felt themselves by the law to be both oppressed with the estate of bondage, and wearied with unquietnesse of conscience, they fled to the succour of the Gospell, and that therefore it was a peculiar fruit of the new Testament, that beside the common law of the old testament they were exempted from these evils. Moreover, we will deny that they were so endued with the spirit of freedome and assurednesse, that they did not in some part feele both feare and bondage by the law. For howsoever they enjoyed that prerogative which they had obtained by grace of the Gospell, yet were they subject to the same bonds and burdens of observation that the common people were. Sith therefore they were compelled to the carefull keeping of those ceremonies, which were the signes of a schooling much like unto bondage, and the hand writings whereby they confessed themselves guilty of sinne, did not discharge them from being bond: it may rightfully be said, that in comparison of us they were under the testament of bondage and feare, while we have respect to that common order of distribution that the Lord then used with the people of Israel.

10. The three last comparisons that we have recited, are of the law and the Gospell. Wherefore in them by the name of the Old Testament is meant the Law, and by the name of the New Testament is meant the Gospell. The first stretched further, for it comprehendeth under it the promises also that were published before the law, but whereas Augustine denieth that they ought to be reckoned under the name of the old Testament, therein hee thought very well, and meant even the same thing that we doe now teach, for he had regard to those sayings of Hieremie and Paul, where the old Testament is severed from the word of mercie and grace. And this also he very aptly adjoyneth in the same place, that the children of promise regenerate of God, which by faith working through love have obeyed the commandements, doe from the beginning of the world belong to the New Testament, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthly, and temporall, but spirituall, heavenly, and eternall good things, principally be leaving in the Mediator, by whom they doubted not that the spirit was not ministred unto them, both to doe good, and to have pardon so oft as they sinned. For the same thing it is that I minded to affirme, that all the Saints whom the Scripture rehearseth to have beene from the beginning of the world chosen by God, were partakers of the selfe same blessing with us unto eternall salvation. This difference therefore is betweene our division and Augustines: that ours (according to that saying of Christ: The Law and the Prophet were unto John: from thenceforth the kingdome of God is preached) doth make distinction betweene the clearenesse of the Gospell, and the darker distribution of the word that went before: and Augustine doth onely sever the weaknesse of the Law from the strength of the Gospell. And here also is to bee noted concerning the holy Fathers, that they so lived under the Old Testament, that they stayed not there, but alway aspired to the new, yea and embraced the assured partaking thereof. For the Apoitle condemneth them of blindnesse and accursednesse: which being contented with present shadowes, did not stretch up their minde unto Christ. For (to speake nothing of therest) what greater blindnesse can bee imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beast? than to seeke for the cleansing of the soule in outward sprinkling of water? than to seeke to appease God with cold ceremonies, as though he were much delighted therewith? For to all these absurdities doe they fall, that sticke fast in the observations of the law without respect of Christ.

11. The fifth difference that we may adde, lieth in this: that untill the coming of Christ the Lord had chosen out one nation, within which he would keepe severall the covenant of his grace. When the highlest did distribute the nations; when he divided the sonnes of Adam (saith Moses) his people fell to his possession: Jacob the cord of his inheritance. In another place he thus speaketh to the people: Behold the heaven and earth and all that is in it, are the Lord thy Gods. He cleaved onely to thy Fathers, he loved them to choose their seed after them, even your selves out of all nations. Therefore he vouchsafed to grant the knowledge of his name to that people onely, as if they onely of all men belonged unto him: he laid his covenant as it were in their bosome: to them he openly shewed the presence of his Godhead: them he honoured with all prerogatives. But (to omit the rest of his benefits, and speake that which onely here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by the communicating of his word, that hee might be called and counted their God. In the meane season he suffered other nations to walk in vanitie, as though they had not any entercourse or any thing to doe with him: neither did he to helpe their destruction, give them that which was onely the remedie, namely the preaching of his Word. Therefore Israel was then the Lords sonne that was his darling, other were strangers: Israel was knowne to him and received into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darknesse: Israel was sanctified, by God, other were prophane: Israel was honored with the presence of God, other were excluded from coming nigh unto him. But when the fulnesse of time was come, appointed for the restoring of all men, and that same reconciler of God and men was delivered indeed, the partition was plucked downe, which had so long holden the mercie of God enclosed within the bounds of Israel, and peace was preached to them that were far off, even as to them that were neere adjoynd, that being together reconciled to God, they might grow into one people. Wherefore, now there is no respect of Greeke or Jew, circumcision or uncircumcision, but Christ is all in all, to whom the nations are given for his inheritance, and the ends of the earth for his peculiar possession, that universally without difference he might have dominion from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the uttermost ends of the world.

12. Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable token, whereby is cleerely shewed the excellencie of the new Testament above the old. It had indeed beene before testified by many, and most plaine oracles of the Prophets, but so as the performance thereof was still deferred unto the kingdome of Messias. And Christ himselfe did not proceed unto it at the first beginning of his preaching, but deferred it so long, untill untill that all the parts of our redemption being performed, and the time of his abasement ended, he received of his father a name that is above all names: before whom all knees should bow. For which cause when this convenience of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to the woman of Canaan, that hee was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And hee suffered not his Apostles at the first sending to passe these bounds. Go not ye (saith he) into the way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the Cities of the Samaritans, but rather goe ye to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. But howsoever it was before uttered by so many testimonies, yet when the Apostles were first to begin it, it seemed so new and strange a thing unto them, that they were afraid of it, as of some monster. Truly very fearefully and not without sticking at it they first did set upon it. And no marvell, for it seemed against reason, that the Lord which by so many ages had chosen out Israel from all other nations, should now undoe that choise, as it were suddenly changing his purpose. It was indeed spoken off afore by prophecies: but they could not give so great heed to the prophecies, as to be nothing moved with the newnesse of the thing that they saw. And these examples which the Lord had shewed of the calling of the Gentiles, that should one day come to passe, were not sufficient to move them. For besides this that he had called very few, he did after a certaine manner ingrasse them into the household of Abraham, to adde them unto his people as parcel of them: but by this generall calling, the Gentiles were not only made equall with the Jewes, but also it appeared that they came into the place of the Jewes, that were become dead. And yet all those strangers whom God hath before that time brought into the bodie of the Church, were never made equall with the Jewes. And therefore not without a cause doth Paul so extoll this myserie hidden from ages and generations, and which he also saith to be marvellous to the very Angels.

13. In these foure or five points, I thinke I have well and faithfully set forth the whole difference of the old and new Testament, so much as sufficeth to the simple order of teaching. But because many report this varietie in governing the Church, this divers maner in teaching, so great alteration of usages and ceremonies, to be a great absurditie: they are also to be answered before that we passe forth to other things. And that may be done shortly, because the objections are not so strong that they need a curious confutation. It hangeth not together (say they) that God which doth alway stedfastly agree with himselfe, should suffer so great an alteration, as after ward to disallow the same thing, which he had before both commanded and commended. I answer that God ought not therefore to be counted mutable, for that he applied divers formes to divers ages, as he knew to be expedient for every one. If the husbandman appoint to his household one sort of businesse in Winter, and another in Sommer, shall we therefore accuse him of inconstancie, or thinke that he swarveth from the right rule of husbandrie, which agreeth with the continuall order of nature? Like wise if a father of a household doe instruct, rule and order his children of one sort in childhood, of another in youth, and of another in mans state, we cannot therefore say that he is fickle, and forsaketh his owne purpose. Why therefore doe wee charge God with reproch of inconstancie, for that he hath severed the diversitie of times with fit and agreeable marks? The last similitude ought fully to satisfie us. Paul maketh the Jewes like unto children, and Christians to young men. What disorder is there in this government of God: that he held them in their childish lessons, which according to the capacity of their age were fit for them, and instructed us with stronger, and as it were more manly discipline. Therefore herein appeareth the constancie of God, that hee taught one selfsame doctrine in all ages, and continueth in requiring the same worship of his Name, which he commanded from the beginning. But whereas he changed the outward forme and maner thereof, in that he shewed not himselfe subject to change: but so farre he tempered himselfe to the capacitie of man, which is divers and changeable.

14. But whence (say they) cometh this diversity, but because God willed it to be such? Could he not as well from the beginning, as since the comming of Christ, reveale the eternall life in plaine words without any figures, instruct those that are his with a few Sacraments and easie to perceive, give his holy spirit, and powre abroad his grace throughout the whole world? This is even like as if they should quarrell with God for that he hath created the world so late, sith hee might have created it from the beginning: or for that his will was to have enterchanged courses betwene winter and sommer, betwene day and night. But as for us, even as all godly men ought to thinke, let us not doubt that whatsoever God hath done, is wisely and righteously done, although oftentime, we know not the cause why it ought so to have beene done. For that were to take presumptuously too much upon us, not to give God leave to have the causes of his owne purpose secret to himselfe from us. But it is marvellous (say they) that hee now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrificing of beasts, and all that furniture of the Leviticall priesthood, wherewith in the old time he was delighted: As though these outward and transitorie things did delight God, or any way move affection in him. We have already said that he did none of these for his owne cause, but disposed them all for the salvation of man. If a Physician doe heale a yong man after one very good meane from his disease, and after ward doe use another manner of healing with the same man being old: shall we therefore say, that he hath refused the manner of healing which before pleased him, but rather continuing still in the same, he hath consideration of ages? So behoved it, that Christ being absent, should be expressed in figure by one sort of signes, and by another sort bee before shewed that hee was to come: and it is meet that now being already delivered, he be represented by other signes. But concerning Gods calling, now at the coming of Christ more largely spread abroad among all people than it was before, and the graces of the holy Ghost more plentifully powred out: who, I pray you can denie it to be right, that God have in his owne hand and will the disposing of his owne graces, to give light to what nations it pleaseth him? to raise up the preaching of his word in what places it pleaseth him? to give what doctrine and how great profiting and successe of doctrine it pleaseth him? and in what ages he will, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the world for their unthankfulnesse? and againe when he will, to restore it for his own mercy? We see therefore, that the cavillitions are too much unmeet, wherewith wicked men doe in this point disquiet the mindes of the simple, to make them call either the righteousnesse of God, or the faith of the scripture into doubt.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER.

That it behoved, that Christ to performe the office of the Mediator, should be made man.

It was necessary that he who should universally save man, should himselfe be both.

NOW it much behoved us that he should be both God and Man, which should be our Mediator. If a man aske of the necessitie, it was not indeede a simple or absolute necessitie, as they commonly call it, but it proceedeth from the heavenly decree, wherupon hanged all the salvation of men. But the most mercifull father appointed that which should be best for us. For whereas our owne iniquities had, as it were cast a cloud betwene him and us, and utterly excluded us from the kingdome of heaven, no man could be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but hee that could attaine unto God. But who could have attained unto him? could any of the sonnes of Adam? But all they did with their fathers shun the sight of God for feare. Could any of the Angels? but they also had need of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly and unseverably cleave unto God. What then? It was past all hope, unlesse the very Majesty of God would descend unto us, for we could not ascend unto it. So it behoved that the Sonne of God should become for us Immanuel, that is, God with us: and that in this sort, that by mutual joyning, his Godhead and the nature of man might grow into one together. Otherwise neither could the nearnesse be neere enough, nor the alliance strong enough for us to hope by, that God dwelleth with us. So great was the disagreement betwene our filthinesse, and the most pure cleanness of God. Although man had stood undefiled without any spot, yet was his estate too base to attaine to God without a Mediator. What could he then doe being plunged downe into death and hell, with deadly fall, defiled with so many spots, stinking with his owne corruption, and overwhelmed with all accursednesse? Therefore not without cause, Paul meaning to set forth Christ for the Mediator, doth expressly recite that he is Man. Our Mediator (saith he) of God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ. He might have said,

God:

God : or at the least he might have left the name of Man, as well as of God. But because the holy Ghost speaking by his mouth, knew our weaknesse : therefore to provide for it in time, he used a most fit remedy, setting among us the Sonne of God familiarly as one of us. Therefore least any man should trouble himselfe to know where the Mediator is to be sought, or which way to come unto him, in naming Man, he putteth us in minde that he is neere unto us, yea so neere that he toucheth us, for as much as he is our owne flesh. Truly he meaneth there even the same thing that in another place is set out with more words : that we have not a bishop that cannot have compassion of our infirmities, for as much as he was in all things tempted as we are, onely sinne excepted.

2 That shall also appeare more plainly, if we consider how it was no meane thing that the Mediator had to doe : that is, so to restore us into the favour of God, as to make us the children of men, the children of God : of the heires of hell, the heires of the kingdome of heaven. Who could doe that, unlesse the sonne of God were made also the sonne of man, and so take ours upon him to convey his unto us, and make that ours by grace, which was his by nature ? Therefore by this earnest we trust, that we are the children of God, because the naturall Sonne of God hath shapen for himselfe a body of our body, flesh of our flesh, bones of our bones, that he might be all one with us. He disdained not to take that upon him which was proper unto us, to make againe that to belong to us which hee had proper to himselfe, and that so in common together with us, he might be both the sonne of God and the sonne of man. Hereupon commeth that holy brotherhood which hee commendeth with his owne mouth, when he saith : I go up to my Father and your Father, my God and your God. By this meane is the inheritance of the kingdome of heaven assured unto us : for that the onely sonne of God, to whom it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted us into his brethren : because if we be brethren, then are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreover it was for the same cause very profitable, that he which should bee our Redeemer, should be both very God and very man. It was his office to swallow up death : who could do that but life it selfe ? It was his office to overcome sinne : who could doe that but righteousnesse it selfe ? It was his office to vanquish the powers of the world and of the aire : who could doe that but a power above both world and aire ? Now in whose possession is life, or righteousnesse, or the empire and powre of heaven, but in Gods alone ? Therefore the most mercifull God, in the person of his onely begotten Son, made himselfe our Redeemer, when his will was to have us redeemed.

3 Another principall point of our reconciliation with God was this, that man which had lost himselfe by his disobedience, should for remedy see obedience against it, should satisfie the judgement of God, and pay the penaltie of sinne. Therefore there came forth the true man, our Lord, he put on the person of Adam, and tooke upon him his name to enter into his steed in obeying his Father, to yeild our flesh the price of the satisfaction to the just judgement of God, and in the same flesh suffer the paine that we had deserved. For as much as therefore neither being onely God, he could seele death, nor being onely man he could overcome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yeeld the one subject to death to satisfie for sinnes, and by the power of the other he might wraastle with death, and get victory for us. They therefore that spoile Christ either for his Godhead or for his manhood, doe indeed either diminish his majesty and glory, or obscure his goodnesse : but on the other side they doe no lesse wrong unto men whose faith they do thereby weaken and overthrow, which cannot stand, but resting upon this foundation. Beside that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer should be the sonne of Abraham and David, which God had promised in the law and the Prophets. Whereby the godly minds doe gather this other fruit, that being by the very course of his pedigree brought to David and Abraham, they doe the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I even now declared, is principally to be holden in mind, that the common nature betwene him and us is a pledge of our fellowship with the sonne of God : that he clothed with our flesh vanquished death and sinne together, that the victory so might be ours and the triumph ours; that he offered up for sacrifice the flesh that he received of us, that having made satisfaction, he might wipe away our guiltinesse, and appeare the just

The manhood of Christ is a warrant unto us that man hath satisfi- ed God, that he is the promised, seed, and that we have fellowship with him, and interest in the fruit of all his actions.

Sith Christ from the beginning was promised to no other end, but the restoration of the world, no other wife set forth in sacrifice, taught by Prophets, spoken of by his Apostles and by himselfe: sith no other end can stand with his Priesthood, his title, that which the scriptures speak e-verywhere of him, it were too much rashnesse to affirme that the same of God had taken flesh although this cause had never bene.

4 Hee that shall be diligently heedfull in considering these things as he ought, will easily neglect these wandering speculations that ravish unto them light spirits and desirous of novelties: of which sort is, that Christ should have bene man, although there had bene no need of remedie to redeeme mankinde. I grant that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature uncorrupted, he was set as head over Angels and men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all creatures. But sith all the Scripture crieth out that he was clothed with flesh, that he might be the Redeemer; it is too much rash presumption to imagine any other cause or end. To what end Christ was promised from the beginning, it is well enough knowne: even to restore the world fallen into ruine, and to succour men being lost. Therefore under the law, the image of him was set forth in sacrifices, to make the faithfull to hope that God would bee mercifull to them, when after satisfaction made for sinne, hee should bee reconciled. But whereas in all ages, even when the law was not yet published, the Mediator was never promised without blood: we gather that hee was appointed by the eternal counsell of God to purge, the filthinesse of men, for that the shedding of blood is a token of expiation. The prophets so preached of him, that they promised that hee should bee the reconciler of God and men. That one specially notable testimonie of Ezra shall suffice us for all, where he foretelleth, that he shall bee stricken with the hand of God for the finnes of the people, that the chastisement of peace should bee upon him: and that hee should be a Priest that should offer up himselfe for sacrifice: that of his wounds should come health to other: and that, because all have strayed and bene scattered abroad like sheepe, therefore it pleased God to punish him, that he might beare the iniquities of all. Sith we heare that Christ is properly appointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, whosoever passeth beyond these bounds, hee doth too much follow foolish curiosity. Now when himselfe was once come, hee affirmeth this to be the cause of his comming, to appeale God, and gather us up from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles testifie of him. So John before that he teacheth that the Word was made flesh, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himselfe is to be heard before all, when he speaketh thus of his owne office: So God loved the world, that he gave his onely begotten Sonne, that whosoever beleeveth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. Againe: The hour is come that the dead shall heare the voice of the sonne of God and they that heare it shall live. I am the resurrection and life: he that beleeveth in me, although he bee dead, shall live. Againe, the sonne of man commeth to save that which was lost. Againe: The whole need not a Phisition. I should never make an end, if I should rehearse all. These possles doe with one consent call us to this fountaine. And truly if hee had not come to reconcile God, the honour of Priesthood should have come to nought. For as much as the priest appointed meane betweene God and man to make intercession; and he should not be our rightousnesse, because he was made a sacrifice for us, that God should not impute finnes unto us. Finally, he should be spoiled of all the honourable titles, wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. And also that saying of Paul should prove vaine, that, that which was impossible to the law, God hath sent his owne sonne, that in likeness of the flesh of sinne he should satisfie for us. Neither will this stand that hee teacheth in another place, that in this glasse appeared the goodnesse of God and his infinite goodnesse toward men, when Christ was given to bee the Redeemer. Finally, the Scripture every where assigneth no more end why the sonne of God would take upon him our flesh, and also received this commandment of his father, but to be made a sacrifice to appease his Father towards us. So it is written, and so it behooved that Christ should suffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore my Father loveth me, because I give my life for the sheepe, this commandment he gave me. As Moses lifted up the Serpent in the desert, so must the sonne of man be lifted up. In another place, Father, give me from this hour. But I am therefore come even to this hour. Father, glorifie thy Sonne. Where he plainly speaketh of the end why he tooke flesh, that he might be a sacrifice and satisfaction to doe away sinne. After the same sort doth Zachary pronounce, that hee came according to the promise given to the fathers, to give light to them that sat in the shadow of death. Let us remember that all these things are spoken of the sonne of God: in whom Paul in another place testifieth that that all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom are hidden, and beside whom he glorieth that he knoweth nothing.

5 If any man take exception and say, that none of all these things prove the contrary, but that the same Christ that redeemed men being damned, might also in putting on their flesh testified his love toward them, being preserved and safe. The answer is short, that forasmuch as the holy Ghost pronounceth, that by the eternall decree of God these two things were joynd together; that Christ should be our Redeemer, and also partaker of all one nature with us, therefore it is not lawfull for us to search any further. For whosoever is tickled with desire to know any more, he being not contented with the unchangeable ordinance of God, doth shew also that he is not contented with the same Christ that was given us to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not only rehearseth to what end he was sent, but also climbing to the high mysterie of predestination, he very fitly represseth all wantonnesse, and itching desire of mans wit. The father chose us in Christ before the creation of the world, to make us his sonnes by adoption, according to the purpose of his will: and he accepted us in his beloved Sonne, in whom we have redemption by his blood. Truly here is not the fall of Adam set before as though it were foremost in time, but is shewed what God determined before all ages, when his will was to help the misery of mankind. If the adversary object againe, that this purpose of God did hang upon the fall of man which he did foresee: it is enough and more for me, to say that they with wicked boldnesse breake forth to saigne them a new Christ, whosoever suffer themselves to search for more, or hope to know more of Christ then God hath fore appointed them by his secret decree. And for good cause did Paul, after he had so discoursed of the proper office of Christ, wish to the Ephesians the spirit of understanding, to comprehend what is the length, height, bredth, and depth, even the love of Christ, that surmounteth all knowledge: even as if of purpose he would set barres about our mindes, that when mention is made of Christ, they should not, be it never so little, swarve from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, sith this is a faithfull saying (as Paul testified) that Christ is come to save sinners, I doe gladly rest in the same. And whereas in another place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is now disclosed by the Gospell, was given us in Christ before the times of the world: I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the end. Against this modesty Osiander carpeeth unjustly, which hath againe in this time unhappily stirred this question before lightly moved by a few. He accuseth them of presumption that say, that the Sonne of God should not have appeared in the flesh, if Adam had not fallen, because this invention is confuted by no testimony of Scripture. As though Paul did not bridle froward curiosity, when after he had spoken of redemption purchased by Christ, hee by and by commandeth to avoid foolish questions. The madnesse of some did burst out so farre, that while they disorderly coveted to seeme witty, they moved this question, whether the sonne of God might have taken upon him the nature of an Ass. This monstrousnesse which all the godly doe worthily abhorre as detestable, let Osiander confute with this presence, that it is never expressly confuted in the Scripture. As though when Paul accounteth nothing precious or worthy to bee knowne, but Christ crucified, he doth therefore admit an Ass to be the author of salvation. Therefore he that in another place reporteth that Christ by the eternall counsell of his father, was ordained to be a head to gather all things together, will never the more acknowledge another that hath no office of redeeming appointed him.

6 But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would have it that man was created after the image of God, because hee was fashioned after the pattern of Christ to come, that hee might resemble him, whom the father had already decreed to cloth with our flesh. Whereupon he gathereth, that if Adam had never fallen from his first and uncorrupted originall state, yet Christ should have beene man. How trifling this is & wrested, all men that have found judgement do easily perceive of themselves. In the meane time first hee thinketh that hee hath seene what was the image of God, that forsooth the glory of God did not only shine in those excellent gifts wherewith he was garnished, but also that God himselfe essentially dwelt in him. But as for me although I grant that Adam did beare the image of God, inso much as hee was joynd to God, (which is the true and highest perfection of dignity) yet I say, that the likeness of God is no where else to be sought, but in those markes of excellency wherewith hee had garnished Adam above other living creatures. And that Christ was then the image of God, all men doe grant with one consent, and therefore that whatsoever excellency was graven in Adam, it proceedeth from this, that by the onely begotten sonne he approached to the glory of his creator. Therefore man was created after the Image of God, in whom the creators will was to have his glory seene as in a looking glasse. To this degree of honor was he advanced by the benefit of the onely begotten sonne: But I say further, that the same sonne was a common head aswell to Angels as to men; so that the same dignity that was bestowed upon man, did also belong unto Angels. For when we heare them called the children of God, it were inconvenient to deny, that there is something in them wherein they resemble their father. Now if his will was to have his glory to be represented as well in Angels as in men, and to be seene in both natures, Osiander doth fondly trifle in saying, that the Angels were then set behind men, because they did not beare the image of Christ. For they could not continually enjoy the present beholding of God, unlesse they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are no otherwise renewed after the image of God, but if they bee coupled with Angels, that they may cleave together under one head. Finally, if we beleeve Christ, this shall be our last felicity, to be made of like forme to the Angels, when we shall be received up into heaven. But if Osiander will conclude, that the originall paterne of the image of God was in Christ as hee is man, by the same reason a man may say, that Christ must needs have bene partaker of the nature of Angels, because the image of God pertaineth also to them.

7 Therefore Osiander hath no cause to feare, that God should be found a liar, unlesse it had bene first stedfastly and unchangeably decreed in his minde, to have his sonne incarnate: because if the integrity of Adam had not fallen, hee should with the Angels have bene like unto God, and yet it should not therefore have bene necessary, that the sonne of God should bee made either man or Angell. And in vaine hee feareth that absurdity, least unlesse the unchangeable counsell of God had bene before the creation of man that Christ should be borne, not as the redeemer, but as the first man, he should have lost his prerogative: for as much as now he should be borne man onely by an accident cause, that is, to restore mankinde being lost, and so it might be gathered thereupon, that Christ was created after the image of Adam. For why should hee so much abhor that which the Scripture so openly teacheth, that hee was made like unto us in all things except sinne? Whereupon Luke doubteth not to reckon him the sonne of Adam in his Genealogie. And I would faine know why Paul calleth Christ the second Adam, but because the estate of man was appointed for him, that hee might raise up the posterity of Adam out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he should have bene called the first Adam. Osiander boldly affirmeth, that because Christ was already before knowne man in the mind of God, men were formed after the same paterne. But Paul in naming him the second Adam, setteth a meane betweene the first beginning of man, and the restitution which we obtaine by Christ, the fall of man whereby grew the necessity to have nature restored to her first degree. Whereupon it followeth, that this same was the cause why the Sonne of God was borne to become man. In the meane time, Osiander reasoneth ill and unfavorably, that Adam, so long as he had stood without falling, should have bene the image of himselfe and not of Christ. I answer by the contrary, because though the Sonne of God had never put on flesh, nevertheless both in the body and in the soule of man should have shined the image of God, in the bright beames whereof it alway appeared, that Christ is verily the head, and hath the soveraigne supremacy in all. And so is that foolish subtletie a spoiled, which Osiander bloweth abroad, that the Angels should have lacked this head, unlesse it had bene purposed by God to cloath his Sonne with flesh, yea, though there had bene no fault of Adam. For he doth too rashly snatch hold of that which no man in his right wit will grant, that Christ hath no supremacie over Angels, that they should have him for their Prince, but in such as he is man. But it is easily gathered by the words of Paul, that in as much as he is the eternall word of God, he is the first begotten of all creatures, not that he is create, or ought to be reckoned among creatures: but because the state of the world in integritie, such as it was at the beginning garnished with excellent beauty, had no other originall: and then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the first begotten of the dead. For the Apostle in one short clause setteth forth in both these points to be considered, that all things were create by the Sonne, that hee might beare rule over Angels: and that he was made man, that he might begin to be the Redeemer. Of like ignorance is it that he saith, that men should not have had Christ to their King, if hee had not beene man. Asthough the kingdome of God could not stand, if the eternall Sonne of God, although not clothed with the flesh of man, gathering together both Angels and men into the fellowship of his heavenly glory and life, should himselfe beare the soveraignty. But in this false principle he is alway deceived, or rather deceiveth himselfe, that the Church should have beene without a head, unless Christ had appeared in the flesh. As though, even as the Angels enjoyed him their head he could not likewise by his divine power rule over men, and by the secret force of his spirit quicken and nourish them like his owne body, till being gathered up into heaven they might enjoy all one life with the Angels. These trifles that I have hitherto confuted, Osfander accounteth for most strong oracles: even so as being drunke with the sweetnesse of his owne speculations, he useth to blow out fond Bacchus cries of matters of nothing: But this one that he bringeth after, hee saith is much more strong; that is the prophetic of Adam, which seeing his wife said, this now is a bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh: But how proveth hee that to be a prophetic? Because in Matthew Christ giveth the same saying to God. Asthough whatsoever God hath spoken by men, containeth some prophetic. Let Osfander seeke prophesies in every Commandement of the Law, which, it is certaine to have come from GOD the Author of them. Beside that, Christ should have beene grosse and earthly, if he had rested upon the literall sense. Because he speaketh not of the mysticall union whereunto he hath vouchsafed to receive his Church, but onely of falthfulnesse betweene man and wife: for this cause he teacheth, that God pronounced that man and wife shall be one flesh, that no man should attempt to breake that insoluble knot by divorce. If Osfander loath this simplicitie, let him blame Christ, for that he led not his Disciples further to a mysterie, in more subtiltie expounding the saying of his Father. Neither yet doth Paul maintaine his error, which after he had said that we are flesh of the flesh of Christ, by and by addeth, that this is a great mystery, for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but under the figure and similitude of marriage to set forth the holy coupling together, that maketh us one with Christ. And so doe the words sound. Because when he giveth warning that he speaketh this of Christ and of his Church, hee doth as it were by way of correction, sever the spirituall joyning of Christ and his Church from the law of marriage. Wherefore this fickle reason easily vanisheth away. And I thinke I need no more to shake up any more of that sort of chaffe, because the vanitie of them all is soone found out by this short confutation. But this sobriety shall abundantly suffice to feed soundly the children of God: that when the fulnesse of times was come, the sonne of God was sent, made of woman, made under the law, to redeeme them that were under the law.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

That Christ tooke upon him the true substance of the flesh of man.

Now, unless I be deceived, it were superfluous to intreat againe of the Godhead of Christ, which hath already in another place beene proved with plaine and strong testimonies. It remaineth therefore to be seene, how he being clothed with our flesh, hath fulfilled the office of Mediator. The truth of his humane nature hath in the old time beene impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whom, the Marcionites tained a Ghost instead of the body of Christ, and the Manichees dreamed that he had a heavenly flesh. But both many and strong testimonies of the Scripture doe stand against them both. For the blessing is promised neither in a heavenly seed, nor in counterfeit shape of man, but in the seed of Abraham and Jacob. Neither is he the eternall throne promised to a man made of aire, but to the sonne of David, and to t'he fruit of his wombe. Therefore being delivered in the flesh, he is called the sonne of David and Abraham: not because he is onely borne of the wombe of the Virgin, and create in the aire, but because (as Paul expoundeth it) he is according to the flesh made of the seed of David, as in another place the Apostle teacheth, that hee descended of the Jewes. For which cause the Lord himselfe not contented with the bare name of man doth oftentimes call himselfe the sonne of man, meaning to expresse more plainly that he was man truly issued of the seed of mankind. Sith the holy Ghost hath so oft, by so many meanes, with so great diligence and simplicity declared a thing not obscure of it selfe, who would have thought any mento to bee so shamelesse as to presume yet to spread mists to darken it? And yet we have other testimonies at hand, if wee listed to heape up more of them. As is that saying of Paul: that God sent his sonne made of woman. And innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that hee was subject to hunger, thirst, cold, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of many these are chiefly to be chosen, that may most availe to edifie our minds in true confidence. As, where it is said, that he gave not so great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature upon him, but tooke our nature, that in flesh and blond he might by death destroy him that had the power of death. Again, that by benefit of that communicating we are reckoned his brethren. Again, that he ought to have bene made like unto his brethren, that he might be made a mercifull and faithfull intercessor: that wee have not a bishop cannot bee compatient of, our infirmities, and such like. And for the same purpose serveth that which we touched a litle before, that it behooved that the sonnes of the world should bee cleansed in our flesh, which Paul plainly affirmeth. And truly, whatsoever the Father hath given to Christ, it doth therefore belong to us, because he is the head, from which the whole body being knit together, growth into one. Yea, and otherwise that will not agree together, which is said: that the Spirit was given him without measure, that all we should draw of the fulnesse thereof. Forasmuch as there is no greater absurdity than to say, that God is enriched in his essence by any accidental gift. And for this cause Christ saith in another place: I doe sanctifie my selfe for them.

2 As for the places that they bring forth to confirme their error, they doe too unaply wrest them, and they nothing prevaile by their trifling subtilties, when they goe about to wipe away those things that I have alleaged for our part. Marcion imagineth that Christ did put on a fantastickall body instead of a true body: because in some places it is said, that he was made after the likenesse of a man, and that he was found in shape as a man. But so hee nothing weigheth, what is Pauls purpose in that place. For his meaning is not to teach what manner of body Christ tooke upon him, but that whereas he might have shewed forth his Godhead, he made no other shew of himselfe but as of an abject and unregarded man. For, to exhort us by his example to submission, hee sheweth, that forasmuch as he was God, he might have by and by set forth his glory to be seene to the world: but yet that he gave over some of his owne right and of his owne accord abased himselfe, because hee did put on the image of a servant and contented with that humility, suffred his Godhead to bee hidden with the veile of the flesh. He doth not here teach what Christ was, but how he behaved himselfe. And also by the whole processe of the text it is easily gathered, that Christ was abased in the true nature of man. For what meaneth this, that in shape he was found as man, but that for a time the glory of his Godhead did not shine forth, but onely the shape of man appeared in base and abject estate? For otherwise that place of Peter could not stand together, that he was dead in the flesh, but quickned in the spirit; if the Sonne of God had not bene weak in the nature of man: which Paul expresth more plainly in saying, that he suffered by reason of the weaknesse of the flesh. And hereunto serveth the exaltation: because it is expressly said, that Christ attained a new glory after that he abased himselfe, which could not well agree to bee spoken of any, but of a man having flesh and Soule. Manicheus framed Christ to a body of aire, because Christ is called the second Adam, heavenly of heaven. But neither in that place doth the

Apottle bring in a heavenly essence of the body, but a spirituall force which being powered abroad by Christ, doth quicken us. Now, as we have already seene, Peter and Paul doe sever the same from the flesh. But rather that doctrine which is received among the true teachers, concerning the flesh of Christ, is very well proved by that place. For if Christ had not all one nature of body with us, it were a very vaine argument, that Paul with such vehemency followeth: that if Christ be risen againe, we shall also rise againe: and if wee doe not rise, then that Christ also is not risen. By what cavillations so ever either the old Manichees or their new Disciples goe about to escape, they shall not winde themselves away. It is a soule shift, that they fondly say, that Christ is called the sonne of man, inasmuch as he is promised of men. For it is plaine, that after the Hebrew phrase, very man indeed is called the sonne of man. And Christ without doubt kept the phrase of his owne tongue. Also it ought to make no question, what ought to bee understood by the children of Adam. And (not to goe farre off) the place of the eight Psalme, which the Apostles apply to Christ, shall bee sufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindfull of him, or the sonne of man that thou visitest him? In this figure is expressed the true manhood of Christ. For though he were not immediately begotten of a mortall father, yet his rice came from Adam. For else that place could not stand which we have already alleaged that Christ is made partaker of flesh and blood, that he might gather to him young children to the service of God. In which words it is plainly determined, that Christ is made fellow and partaker of all one nature with us. In which meaning also hee saith, that both the Author of holinesse and they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is proved by the proesse of the text, that the same is referred to the fellowship of nature: because he by and by addeth. Therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. For if he had said before, that the faithfull are of God, in so great dignity, what cause should there be to be ashamed? But because Christ of his infinite grace doth joyne himselfe to the base and unnoble, therefore it is said, that he is not ashamed. But in vaine they object, that by this meane the wicked shall become the brethren of Christ: because wee know that the children of God are not borne of flesh and blood, but of the holy Ghost by faith. Therefore onely flesh maketh not a brotherly joyning. But although the Apostle give this honour to the faithfull onely, to be of one with Christ, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be borne of the same originall. As when wee say that Christ was made man, to make us the sonnes of God: this saying extendeth not to all men, because Faith is the meane which (spiritually) grasseth us into the body of Christ. Also they foolishly move a brawle about the name of First begotten. They say that Christ should have beene borne of Adam straight at the beginning, that hee might bee the first begotten among brethren. For the title of First begotten. is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, and excellency of power. And more colour hath that which they babble, that Christ tooke to him man and not Angels, because he received mankind into favour. For to set out more largely the honour which God vouchsafed to give us, he compared the Angels with us, which were in this behalfe set behinde us. And if the testimony of Moses be well weighed, where he saith, the seed of the woman shall breake the serpents head, it shall utterly end the controversie. For onely Christ is not there spoken of, but all mankind. Because the victory was to be gotten by Christ for us, he generally pronounceth that the posterity of the woman should get the upper hand of the devill. Whereunto followeth, that Christ issued of mankind, because it was Gods purpose there to raise up Eve, whom he spake unto with good hope, that she should not faint with sorrow.

3 They doe no lesse wickedly than foolishly entangle with allegories these testimonies where Christ is called the seed of Abraham, and the fruit of the wombe of David. For if the name of Seed had beene spoken in an allegory, truly Paul would not have left it untold, where hee plainly and without figure affirmeth, that there are not many sonnes of Abraham redeemers, but one Christ. Of like sort is it that they alleadge, that he is no otherwise called the sonne of David, but because hee was promised, and at length in his due time delivered. For after that Paul had once named him the sonne of God: in that hee by and by addeth, According to the flesh, hee truly meaneth of nature. And so in the ninth Chapter calling him the blessed God, he hath severally beside, that that according to the flesh hee descended of the Jewes. Now if hee were not truly begotten of the seed of David, to what purpose shall be this saying, that he is the fruit of his wombe? What meaneth this promise? Out of thy loynes shall he descend, that shall abide in thy feare. Now in the Genealogie of Christ, as it is rehearsed of Mathew, they doe Sophistically mocke. For though he doe not rehearse the parents of Mary but of Ioseph, yet because he speaketh of a thing sufficiently knowne abroad among the people, hee reckoneth it enough to shew that Ioseph came of the seed of David, when it was well knowne that Mary was of the same stocke. But Luke more expresth them in teaching that salvation brought by Christ, is common to all mankind: because Christ the author of salvation proceeded from Adam the common parent of all. I grant indeed, that by the Genealogie it can none otherwise be gathered that Christ was the sonne of David, but in so much as he was begotten of the Virgin. But the new Marcionites to colour their error do too proudly in this, that to prove Christ tooke his body of nothing, they affirme that women are seedlesse, and so they overthrow the principles of nature. But because that is no question of divinity, and the reasons that they bring are so sicke that they may very easily be confuted, therefore I will not touch those things that belong to Philosophy and Physicke, and will hold me contented to wipe away those things they alleadge out of Scripture: that is, that Aron and Loiudab tooke wives of the tribe of Iebudab, and so the difference of Tribes, had then beene comforted, if woman had engendring seed in her. But it is well enough knowne that as touching civill order, the kindreds are reckoned by the seed of the man, and yet the excellencie of the kinde of man above woman proveth not the contrary, but that in generation the seed of woman must meet. And this solution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckoneth up a Genealogie, it nameth the men onely: shall we therefore say, that the women are nothing? But very children doe know, that women are comprehended under the name of men. And after this sort is said, that women bring forth to their husbands, because the name of the household alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is granted to the excellency of the male kinde, that the children are counted noble or unnable, according to the estate of their fathers: so also in the state of bondage, the issue followeth the wombe, according to the judgement of the Civill Lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the issue is engendred of the seed of the woman. And it hath of long time beene received in common use of all nations, that the mothers are called Genetrices, that is engenderers. Wherewith Gods law also agreeth, which else should wrongfully forbid the marriage of the uncle with his sisters daughter, because there were no consanguinitie betweene them: and also it were lawfull for a man to marrie his sister by the mothers side, so that she were begotten of another father. But as I grant that there is a passive power ascribed to women, so doe I answer that the same thing is indifferently spoken of them that is of men. And Christ himselfe is not said to be made by the woman, but of the woman. But some of their company shaking off all shame doe too lewdly aske, whether wee will say that Christ was engendred of the menstruall seed of the Virgin, for I will likewise aske of them, whether he did not congeale in the blood of his mother, which they shall be constrained to confesse. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Mathewes words, that because Christ was begotten of Mary, he was engendred of her seed: as a like ingendring is meant when it is said, that Booz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Mathew here describe the Virgin as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed: but he severeth this marvellous manner of generation from the common manner, for that by her was Christ begotten of the seed of David. For even in the same sort, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of David, and Ioseph of Iacob, likewise it is said that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the Evangelist so frameth the order of his speech, and willing to prove that Christ came of David, is contented with this one reason, that he was begotten of Mary, Whereby it followeth, that he tooke it for a matter confessed, that Mary was of kinne to Ioseph.

Gal. 4. 4.

Math. 1. 5.

It is no dishonour unto Christ to have taken his
originall of man.

4 The absurdities wherewith they would charge us, are stuffed full of childish cavillations. They thinke it a shame and dishonour to Christ, if hee should have taken his originall of men: because hee so could not be exempt from the univerrall law that enclafeth all the offspring of Adam without exception under sinne. But the comparifon that that we reade in Paul doth easly assoile this doubt? that as by one man came sinne, and by sinne death, so by the righteousnesse of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith also agreeth another comparison of his: the first Adam of earth earthly, and naturall, the second of heaven heavenly. Therefore in another place, the same Apostle, where hee teacheth that Christ was sent in the likenesse of sinfull flesh to satisfie the law, doth so expressly sever him from the common estate of men, that hee bee very man without fault and corruption. But very childishly they trifle in reasoning thus: If Christ be free from all spot, and was by the secret working of the holy Ghost begotten of the seed of *Mari*e, then is not the womans seed, but only the mans seed uncleane. For we doe not make Christ free from all spot, for this cause that he is onely engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but because hee is sanctified by the holy Ghost, that the generation might be pure and uncorrupted, such as should have beene before the fall of Adam. And this alway remained stedfastly determined with us, that so oft as the Scripture putteth us in mind of the cleanness of Christ, it is meant of his true nature of manhood: because it were superfluous to say that God is cleane: Also the sanctification that he speaketh of in the seventeenth of Iohn, could have no place in the nature of God. Neither are there fained two seeds of Adam, although there came no infection to Christ: because the generation of man is not uncleane or vicious of it selfe, but accidental by his falling. Therefore it is no marvell, if Christ, by whom the estate of innocency was to be restored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas also they thrust this upon us for an absurdity, that if the word of God did put on flesh, then was it inclosed in a narrow prison of an earthly body: this is but meere waywardnesse: because although the infinite essence of the Word did grow together into one person with the nature of man: yet doe we feigne no inclosing of it. For the Sonne of God descended marvellously from heaven, so as yet he left not heaven; it was his will to be marvellously borne in the Virgins wombe, to be conversant on earth, and hang upon the crosse, yet that he alway filled the world even as at the beginning.

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

NOW where it is said that the Word was made flesh: that is not so to be understood, as though it were either turned into flesh, or confusedly mingled with flesh, but because he chose him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in, he that was the sonne of God, became also the sonne of man, not by confusion of substance, but by unity of person. For wee so affirme the Godhead joyned and united to the manhood, that either of them have their whole property remaining, and yet of them both is made one Christ. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like to so great a mystery, the similitude of man is most fit, whom we see to consist of two substances, whereof yet neither is so mingled with other, but that either keepeth the property of his owne nature. For neither is the soule the body, nor the body the soule. Wherefore both that thing may be severally spoken of the soule, which can no way agree with the body: and likewise of the body that thing may be said, which can by no meane agree with the soule: and that may be said of the whole man, which can be but unfully taken neither of the soule nor of the body severally. Finally, the properties of the soule are sometime attributed to the body, and the properties of the body sometime to the soule: and and yet hee that consisteth of them is but one man and not many. But such formes of speech doe signifie both that there is one person in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two divers natures which doe make the same person. And so doe the Scriptures speake of Christ: sometime they give unto him those things that ought singularly to be referred to his manhood, and sometime those things that doe peculiarly belong to his God-head, and sometime those things that doe comprehend both natures, and doe agree with neither of them severally. And this conjoyning of the two natures that are in Christ, they doe with such religiousse expresse, that sometime they doe put them in common together: which figure is among the old Authors called Communicating of properties.

The diuine and humane natures of Christ united in his person, yet in their properties distinguished, as the body and the soule in one and the same man.

2 These things were weak, unless many phrases of Scripture, and such as bee each where ready to finde, did prove that nothing hereof hath bene devised by man. That same thing which Christ spake of himselfe, saying: Before that Abraham was, I am, was farre disagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignorant with what cavillation the erroneous spirits doe deprave this place: For they say that he was before all ages, because he was already foreknowne the Redeemer, as well in the councill of the Father, as in the mindes of the godly. But whereas he openly distinguisheth the day of his manifestation from his eternall essence, and of purpose pronounceth unto himselfe an authority by antiquity wherein he excelleth above Abraham, hee doth undoubtedly challenge to himselfe that which is proper to the Godhead. Whereas Paul affirmeth that he is the first begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whom all things keepe their being: and whereas hee himselfe reporteth that he was in glory with the Father before the creation of the world, and that he worketh together with the Father, these things doe nothing more agree with the nature of men. It is therefore certaine, that these and such like are peculiarly ascribed to the Godhead. But whereas he is called the servant of the Father: and whereas it is said, that he grew in age, wisdom and favour with God and men: that hee seeketh not his owne glory: that he knoweth not the last day: that hee speaketh not of himselfe: that hee doth not his owne will: where it is said, that he was seene and felt: this wholly belongeth to his owne manhood. For in respect that he is God, neither can hee encrease in any thing, and he worketh all things for his owne sake, neither is any thing hidden from him, he doth all things according to the free choice of his owne will, and can neither be seene nor felt. And yet he doth not severally ascribe these things to his nature of man onely, but taketh them upon himselfe, as if they did agree with the person of the Mediator. But the communicating of properties is in this, that Paul saith, that God did by his owne blood did purchase unto him a Church: and the Lord of glory crucified. Again, where John saith, that the Word of life was felt. Truly God neither hath blood, nor suffereth, nor can be touched with hands. But because hee which was both very God and man, Christ being crucified, did shed his blood for us: those things that were done is his nature of man, are unproperly, and yet not without reason given to his Godhead. A like example is, where John teacheth that God gave his soule for us: therefore there also the property of the manhood is communicate with the other nature. Again, when Christ said being yet conversant in earth, that no man hath ascended into heaven, but the sonne of man that was in heaven: truly according to his manhood, and in the flesh that hee had put on, he was not then in heaven: but because himselfe was both God and man, by the reason of the unitie of both natures, he gave to the one that which belonged to the other.

3 But most plainly of all doe these places set forth the true substance of Christ, which doe comprehend both natures together: of which sort there are very many in the Gospell of him. For that which is there read is singularly belonging neither to his Godhead, nor to his manhood, but to both together, that he hath received of his Father power to forgive sinnes, to raise up whom hee will, to give righteousness, holiness, and salvation, to be made judge over the quicke and the dead, to be honoured even as the Father is: Finally, that he is called the light of the world, the good shepherd, the only dore, the true Vine. For such prerogatives had the sonne of God, when he was shewed in the flesh, which although he enjoyed with his Father before the world was made, yet he had them not in the same manner or the same respect, and which could not be given to such a man as was nothing but man. In the same meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: that Christ after the judgement ended, shall yeeld up the kingdome to God and the Father, Even the kingdome of the sonne of God, which had no beginning, nor shall have any ending: but even as he lay hid under the baseness of the flesh and abased himselfe, taking upon him the forme of a servant, and laying aside the port of Majesty, he shewed himselfe obedient to his Father: and having performed all such subjection, at length is crowned with honour and glory, and advanced to the highest dominion, that all knees shall bow before him: so shall hee then yeeld up to his Father both that name and crowne of Glory, and whatsoever he hath received of his father

father, that God may bee all in all. For to what purpose is power and dominion given him but that the father should governe us by his hand? In which sense it is also said, that he sitteth at the right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, till we may enjoy the present beholding of the godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excused, which while they took no heed to the person of the Mediator, have obscured the naturall meaning of almost all the doctrine that is read in the Gospell of John, and have entangled themselves in many snares. Let this therefore be unto us the key of right understanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Mediator, are not spoken simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore Christ shall reigne till he come forth to Judge the world, in so much as he joyneth us to his father, according to the small measure of our weaknesse. But when we being made partakers of the heavenly glory, shall see God such as he is, then he having performed the office of Mediator, shall cease to be the Embassadour of his father, and shall be contented with that glory which he enjoyed before the making of the world: and the name of Lord doth in no other respect peculiarly agree with the person of Christ, but in this, that it signifieth the meane degree betweene God and us. For which purpose maketh that saying of Paul: One God, of whom are all things; and one Lord, by whom are all things; even he to whom the dominion for a time is committed by the father, until his divine majesty be to be seene face to face. From whom so farre is it off that any thing shall decay, by yeelding up the dominion to his father, that hee shall become so much the more glorious. For then shall God also cease to be the head of Christ because Christs godhead shall then shine of it selfe, whereas yet it is covered with a certaine veile.

4 And this observation shall doe no small service to asswile many doubts if the readers doe fitly apply it. For it is marvellous how much the unskillfull, yea some not utterly unlearned, are cumbered with such formes of speech, which they see spoken by Christ, which doe well agree neither with his godhead nor with his manhood, because they consider not that they doe agree with his person wherein he is thewed both God and man, and with the office of a Mediator. And it is alway easie to see, how well all things hang together, if they have a sober expositor, to examine so great mysteries with such devout reverence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that is so furious and franticke spirits trouble not. They catch hold of those things that are spoken of his manhood, to take away the godhead: and likewise of those things that are spoken of his godhead to take away his manhood: and of those things that are so joyntly spoken of both natures; that they severally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is tharelse but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that hee is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man & God? We therefore doe determine that Christ, as hee is both God and man, consisting of both natures, united; though not confounded, is our Lord and the true Sonne of God, even according to his manhood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driven farre away from us, which when he went about rather to draw in sunder, then to distinguish the nature, did by the meane imagine a double Christ. Whereas we see that the Scripture cryeth out with loud voice against it, where both the name of the sonne of God is given to him that was borne of the Virgin, and the Virgin herselfe is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madnesse of Eutiches, least while we goe about to shew the unity of person, we destroy either nature. For we have already alleadged so many testimonies, and there are every where so many other to be alleadged; where his godhead is distinguished from his manhood: as may stop the mouthes even of the most contentious. And a litle hereafter I will adjoyne some testimonies to confute better that fained devise, but at this present one place shall content us. Christ would not have called his body a Temple, unlesse the godhead did distinctly dwell therein. Wherefore as Nestorius was worthily condemned in the Synod at Ephesus, so also was Eutiches afterward condemned in the Synode of Constantinople and Chalcedon: forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

5 Box in our age also there hath risen up no lesse pestilent a monster, Michael Servetus, which did thrust in place of the sonne of God, a fained thing made of the essence

Christ truly and properly the Sonne of God in the flesh, but not in respect of the flesh which

of God, of spirit, flesh and three elements vncreate. And first hee denied that Christ is by any other way the sonne of God, but in this that he was begotten of the holy Ghost in the wombe of the Virgin. But to this end tendeth his subtiltie, that the distinction of the two natures being once overthrowne, Christ might bee thought to be a certaine thing mingled of God and man, and yet neither God nor man. For in this whole proceffe he travaileth toward this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, there were onely certaine shadow with figures in God, whereof the truth or effect then at length was in being, when that word which was ordained to that honor, began truly to be the sonne of God. And we indeed doe confesse that the Mediator which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the sonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the ineffimable favour of God, unless this dignitie were given him to be, and be called the onely begotten sonne of God. But in the meane season the definition of the Church standeth stedfastly grounded, that hee is counted the sonne of God, because he being the Word begotten of the Father before all worlds, did by hypostaticall union take upon him the nature of man. Now the hypostaticall union is called with the old Fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures. which phrase of speech was devised to overthrow the dotting error of Nestorius, because hee feigned that the sonne of God did so dwell in flesh, that yet he the same was not man. Servetus slandereth us, that we make two sonnes of God, when we say that the eternall Word was already the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else, but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new God. And no more absurdity it is to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this away from eternall begetting to be the sonne, which the Angels words to Marie doe secretly shew, That holy thing that shall be borne of thee, shall be called the sonne of God: as if he should have said, that the name of the Sonne which was obscure in the time of the law, should now become famous and every where knowne abroad. Wherewith agreeth that saying of Paul, that now by Christ we are the children of God, freely and with boldnesse to cry Abba, Father. But were not the holy fathers in old time also accounted among the children of God? Yea, and bearing them bold upon that interest, they called upon God by name of their father. But because since the onely begotten Sonne of God was brought forth into the world, the heavenly fatherhood is become more plainly known: therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were a priviledge to the kingdome of Christ. But yet this is stedfastly to be holden, that God never was Father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the onely begotten sonne: and that men specially, whom their owne wickednesse maketh hatefull to God, are his children by free adoption because hee is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no cause why Servetus should cavill that this hangeth upon filiation or becoming a sonne, which God had determined with himselfe, because our purpose is not here to speake of the figures, how the expiation was shewed in the blood of beasts: but because they could not indeed be the children of God, unless their adoption were grounded vpon the head, it is without reason to take that from the head which is common to all the members. I goe yet further: Whereas the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose so great dignity did not hang upon the redemption to come: yet must it needs be, that the sonne is in order before them, which maketh the Father to be their Father. I will repeat it againe shortly, and adde the same of mankind. Sith from at their first beginning both Angels and men were created with this condition, that God should be common Father to them both, if that saying of Paul be true, that Christ was alway the head and the first begotten of all creatures, to have the first degree in all: I thinke I doe rightly gather that he was also the Sonne of God before the creation of the world.

6. But if his Filiation (if I may so terme it) began since hee was manifested in the flesh, it shall follow, that he was also sonne in respect of his nature of man. Servetus and other such frantike men would have it, that Christ which appeared in the flesh, is the Sonne of God, because out of the flesh he could not bee called by that name. Now let them answer me whether he be the Sonne according to both natures, and in respect of both. So indeed they prate, but Paul teacheth farre otherwise. Wee grant indeed, that Christ is in the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption onely and grace, but the true and naturall, and therefore onely Sonne, that by this marke he may be discerned from all other. For God vouchsafeth to give the name of his sonnes to us, that are regenerate into a new life: but the name of the true and onely begotten Sonne, he giveth to Christ onely. How can he be the onely sonne in so great a number of brethren, but because he possesseth that by nature, which wee have received by gift? And the honor we extend to the whole person of the Mediator, that he be truly and properly the Sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgin, and offered himselfe for sacrifice to his Father upon the crosse: but yet in respect of his Godhead, as Paul teacheth, when he saith, he was severed out to preach the Gospell of God, which he had before promised of his Sonne, which was begotten of the seed of David according to his flesh, and declared the Sonne of God in power. But why, when he nameth him distinctly the Sonne of David according to the flesh should hee severally say, that he was declared the Sonne of God, unlesse hee meant to shew that this did hang upon some other thing than upon the very flesh? For in the same sense in another place he saith, that he suffered by the weaknesse of the flesh, and rose againe, by the power of the spirit, even so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truly they must needs grant, that as he hath that of his Mother for which he is called the Sonne of David, so he hath that of his Father for which he is called the Sonne of God: and the same is another thing and severall from the nature of man. The Scripture giveth him two names, calling him here and there sometimes the Sonne of God, and sometimes the sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no contention moved: but according to the common use of the Hebrew tongue he is called the Son of Man, because he is of the offspring of Adam. By the contrarie I affirme, that he is called the Sonne of God in respect of the Godhead and eternall essence: because it is no lesse meet that it be referred to the nature of God, that he is called the Sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that hee is called the sonne of man. Againe, in the same place that I alleaged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotten of the seed of David, was no otherwise declared the Sonne of God in power, than he teacheth in another place, that Christ which according to the flesh descended of the Jewes, is God blessed for ever. Now if in both places the distinction of the double nature be touched, by what right will they say, that he which according to the flesh is the Sonne of man, is not also the Sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

7. They doe indeed disorderly enforce for the maintenance of their error, the place where it is said, that God spared not his owne Sonne, and where the Angel commanded, that the very same he that should be borne of the Virgin, should be called the Sonne of the Highest. But least they should glorie in so fickle an objection, let them weigh with us a litle, how strongly they reason. For if it be rightly concluded, that from his conception he began to be the Sonne of God, because he that is conceived is called the Sonne of God, then shall it follow that he began to be the Word at his manifesting in the flesh, because John saith, that hee bringeth them tidings of the Word of life, which his hands have handled. Likewise that, which is read in the Prophet: Thou Bethlehem in the land of Juda, art a litle one in the thousands of Juda: One of thee shall be borne to me a guide to rule my people Israel, and his coming forth from the beginning, from the daies of eternitie. How will they be compelled to expound this, if they will be content to follow such manner of reasoning? For I have protested, that wee doe not agree with Nestorius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made us the sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly conjoyning, because he is the onely begotten sonne of God in the flesh which he tooke of us. And Augustine doth wisely admonish us, that this is a bright glasse, wherein to behold the marvellous and singular favour of God, that hee attained honour in respect that hee is man which hee could not deserve. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellencie, even according to the flesh from the wombe of his Mother, to be the Sonne of God. Yet is there not in the unitie of person to be feigned such a mixture, as may take away that which is proper to the Godhead. For it is no more absurditie, that the eternall Word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures united into one person,

be divers wayes called the Sonne of God, then that hee be according to divers respects, called sometime the Sonne of God, and sometime the Sonne of Man. And no more doeth that other cavillation of Servetus accomber us: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is no where called the Sonne of God, but under a figure, because although the describing of him then was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already cleerely proved that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the word begotten of the eternall father, and that this name doth no otherwise belong to the person of the Mediator which he hath taken upon him, but because hee is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not bene called Father from the beginning, if there had not bene a mutual relation to the Sonne, by whom all kindred or fatherhood is reckoned in heaven and in earth: hereby it is easie to gather, that even in the time of the Law and the Prophets, he was the Sonne of God, before that this name was commonly knowne in the Church. But if they strive onely about the onely word, Salomon discoursing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to be incomprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (saith hee) or the name of his sonne. Yet I am not ignorant, that with the contentious this testimonie will not be of sufficient force: neither doe I much ground upon it, saying that it sheweth that they doe maliciously cavill, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that hee was made man. Beside that, all the oldest writers with one mouth and consent have openly testified the same: so that their shamelesnesse is no lesse worthie to be scorned than to be abhorred which dare object Jrenus and Tertullian against us, both which doe confesse that the Sonne of God was invisible, which afterward appeared visible.

8. But although Servetus hath heaped up horrible monstrous devises, which peradventure the other would not allow: yet if ye presse them hard, ye shall perceive that all they that doe not acknowledge Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in the flesh, doe grant it onely in this respect, that he was conceived in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Manichees in old time did foolishly affirme, that man hath his soule (as it were) by derivation from God, because they read that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast hold of the name of Sonne, that they leave no difference betweene the natures, but babble disorderly that Christ being man, is the Sonne of God, because according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begetting of Wisdome that Salomon speaketh of, is destroyed, and there is no account made of the godhead in the Mediator, or a fantasied Ghost is thrust in place of the Manhood. It were indeed profitable to confute the grosser deceits of Servetus, wherewith he hath bewitched himselfe and some other, to the end that the godly readers admonished by this example, may hold themselves within the compasse of sobernesse and modestie: saying that I thinke it should be superfluous, because I have already done it in a booke by it selfe. The summe of them cometh to this effect, that the Sonne of God was a forme in minde from the beginning, and even then hee was before appointed to be man that should bee the essentiall image of God. And hee doth acknowledge no other word of God but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to beget a Sonne, which also in act extended to the nature it selfe. In the meane time he confoundeth the Spirit with the Word, for that God distributed the invisible Word and the Spirit into flesh and soule. Finally the figuration of Christ, hath with them the place of begetting, but he saith, that he which then was but a shadowish sonne in forme, was at length begotten by the Word, to which he assigneth the office of seed: Whereby it shall follow that hogs and dogs are as well the children of God, because they were create of the originall seed of the Word of God. For although he compound Christ of three uncreate elements to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet hee saigneth that he is so the first begotten among creatures, that the same essentiall Godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And lest hee should seeme to strip Christ out of his godhead, he affirmeth that his flesh is consubstantiall with God, and that the Word was made man by turning the flesh into God. So while he cannot conceive Christ to be the Sonne of God, unless his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned into godhead, he bringeth the eternall person of the Word to nothing, and taketh from us the sonne of David, that was promised to bee the Redeemer. He oft repeateth this that the Sonne was begotten of God by knowledge and predestination, and that at length he was made man of that matter which at the beginning shined with God in the three elements, which afterward appeared in the first light of the world, in the cloud and in the pillar of fire. Now how shamefully he sometime disagreeeth with himselfe, it were too tedious to rehearse. By this short recitall the readers that have their found wit may gather, that with the circumstances of this uncleane dog the hope of salvation is utterly extinguished. For if the flesh were the godhead it selfe, it should cease to be the temple thereof. And none can be our Redeemer, but hee that bogotten of the seed of Abraham and David, is according to the flesh truly made man. And hee wrongfully standeth upon the words of John, that the Word was made flesh. For as they resist the error of Nestorius, so they nothing further this wicked invention, whereof Eutichius was author, for as much as the onely purpose of the Evangelist was to defend the unitie of persons in the two Natures.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER,

That we may know, to what end Christ was sent of his Father, and what he brought in, three things are principally to be considered in him, his Prophetical office, his Kingdome, and his Priesthood.

A V Augustine saith rightly, that although the Heretikes doe bragge of the name of Christ, yet they have not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onely proper to the Church. For if these things be diligently considered, that belong to Christ, Christ shall be found among them onely in name, and not in very deed. So at this day the Papists, although the name of the Sonne of God redeemer of the world, found in their mouth, yet because being contented with vaine pretence of the name, they spoile him of his power and dignitie: this saying of Paul may bee well spoken of them, that they have not the head. Therefore, that faith may finde sound matter of salvation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to bee established, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three parts. For hee is given both a Prophet, a King, and a Priest. Albeit, it were but small profit to know those names, without knowledge of the end and use of them. For they are also named among the Papists but coldly and to no great profit, where it is not knowne what each of these titles containeth in it. Wee have said before, how though God sending Prophets by continuall course one after another, did never leave his people destitute of profitable doctrine, and such as was sufficient to salvation: that yet the mindes of the godly had alway this perswasion, that full light of understanding was to bee hoped for onely at the comming of Messias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, even to the Samaritans, who yet never knew the true religion, as appeareth by the saying of the woman: When Messias commeth, he shall teach vs all things. And the Jewes had not rashly gathered this upon presumptions in their mindes: But as they were taught by assured oracles, so they beleaved. Notable among the other is that saying of Esaie: Behold, I have made him a witness to peoples. I have given him to be a guide and Schoolemaster to peoples: even as in another place he had called him the Angell or interpreter of the great counsell. After this manner the Apostle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the Gospell, after that he had said, that God in the old time spake to the Fathers by the Prophets diversly, and under manifold figures, addeth that last of all he spake unto us by his beloved Sonne. But because it was the common office of the Prophets to keepe the Church in suspense, and to uphold it untill the comming of the Mediator, therefore we read that in their scattering abroad, the faithfull complained that they were deprived of that ordinarie benefit, saying: Wee see not our tokens: there is not a Prophet among us: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But when Christ was now not farre off, there was a time appointed to Daniel to seale up the vision and the Prophet, not onely that the Prophecie which is there spoken of, should bee established in assured credit, but also that the faithfull should learne with contented mind to want the Prophets for a time, because the fulnesse and closing up of all revelations was at hand.

*Christ a Prophet, a King, & Priest so to be acknowledged, not with a cold mentioning of those titles, but with a right understanding of the end and use of them. The people of God before his comming looked for more light of his knowledge as his hands when he should come, then they received by their other Prophets. Enchirid. Laur. cap. 5. Col. 2. 19. 2. Now it is to be noted, that the title of commendation of Christ belongeth to these three offices. For we know that in the time of the Law, as well the Prophets as Priests and Kings were annointed with holy oyle. For which cause the renowned Name of Messias was given to the promised Mediator. But though indeed I confesse (as I have also declared in another place,) that he was called Messias, by peculiar consideration and respect of his kingdome: yet the annointings in respect of the office of Prophet and of Priest, have their place, and are not to be neglected of us. Of the first of these two is expresse mention made in Esay, in these words: The Spirit of the Lord Jehovah upon me. Therefore the Lord hath annointed me, that I should preach to the meeke, should bring health to the contrite in heart, should declare deliverance to captives, should publish the yeere of good will, &c. We see that he was annointed with the Spirit, to be the publisher and witnesse of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common manner: for he is severed from other teachers that had the like office. And here againe is to be noted, that he tooke not the annointing for himselfe alone, that hee might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole body, that in his continuall preaching of the Gospell, the vertue of the Spirit should joyne withall. But in the meane time this remaineth certaine, that by this perfection of doctrine which hee hath brought; an end is made of all prophecies, so that they doe diminish his authority, that being not content with the Gospell, doe patch any forraigne thing unto it. For that voice which thundred from heaven, saying: This is my beloved Sonne, heare him, hath advanced him by singular priviledge above the degrees of all other. Then this ointment is powred abroad from the head unto all the members, as it was forespoken by Joel: Your children shall prophesie, and your daughters shall see visions, &c. But where Paul saith, that hee was given us unto wisdom: and in another place, that in him are hidden all the treasures of knowledge and understanding: this hath somewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they which by faith perceive what he is, have comprehended the whole infiniteness of heavenly good things. For which cause he writeth in another place, I have counted it precious to know nothing, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawfull to passe beyond the simplicitie of the Gospell. And hereunto tendeth the dignitie of a Prophets office in Christ, that we might know that in the summe of the doctrine which hee hath taught, are contained all points of perfect wisdom.

3. Now come I to his kingdome, of which were vaine to speake, if the readers were not first warned, that the nature thereof is spiritual. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpose it serveth, and what it availeth us, and the whole force and eternitie thereof, and also the eternitie which in Daniel the Angell doth attribute to the person of Christ: and againe the Angell in Luke doth worthily apply to the salvation of the people. But that is also double or oft two sorts, for the one belongeth to the whole bodie of the Church, the other is proper to every member. To the first is to be referred that which is said in the Psalme: I have once sworne by my holinesse to David, I will not lie, his seed shall abide for ever, his seate shall be as the Sunne in my sight, it shall be stablished as the Moone for ever, and a faithfull witnesse in heaven. Neither is it doubtfull, but that God doth there promise, that he will be by the hand of his Sonne an eternall governer and defender of his Church. For the true performance of this prophesie can be found no where else but in Christ: forasmuch as immediately after the death of Salomon, the greater part of the dignitie of the kingdome fell away, and was to the dishonour of the house of David conveyed over to a private man, and afterward by little and little was diminished, till at length it came to utter decay, with heavie and shamefull destruction. And the same meaning hath that exclamation of Esay: Who shall shew forth his generation? For he so pronounceth that Christ shall remaine alive after death, that hee joyneeth him with his members. Therefore so oft as we heare that Christ is armed with eternall power, let us remember that the everlasting continuance of the Church is upholden by this support, to remaine still safe among the troublesome tossings wherewith it is continually vexed, and among the grievous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So when David scorneth the boldnes of his enemies, that goe about to breake the yoke of God and of Christ, and sayeth, that the kings and peoples raged in vaine, because hee that dwelleth in heaven is strong enough to breake their violent assaults : he assureth the godly of the continuall preservation of the Church, and encourageth them to hope well so oft as it happeneth to be oppressed. So in another place, when he saith, in the person of God : sit at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstole : he warneth us, that how many and strong enemies soever doe conspire to besiege the Church, yet they have not strength enough to prevaile against that unchangeable decree of God, whereby hee hath appointed his sonne an eternal King : whereupon it followeth, that it is impossible that the Devill with all the preparation of the world, may be able at any time to destroy the Church, which is grounded upon the eternall seate of Christ. Now for so much as concerneth the speciall use of every one, the very same eternall continuance ought to raise us up to hope of immortallitie. For we see, that whatsoever is earthly and of the world, endureth but for a time, yea and is very fraile. Therefore Christ, to lift up our hope unto heaven pronounceth, that his kingdome is not of this world. Finally, when any of us heareth, that the kingdome of Christ is spirituall, let him be raised up with this saying, and let him pearce to the hope of a better life : and whereas hee is now defended by the hand of Christ, let him looke for the full fruit of this grace in the world to come.

4. That, as we have said, the force and profit of the kingdome of Christ cannot otherwise be perceived by us, but when we know it to be spirituall, appeareth sufficiently though it were but by this, that while we must live in warfare under the crosse, during the whole course of our life, our estate is hard and miserable : what then should it profit us to be gathered together under the dominion of a heavenly King, unless we were certaine to enjoy the fruit thereof out of the state of this earthly life ? And therefore it is to be knowne, that whatsoever felicitie is promised as in Christ, it consisteth not in outward commodities, that we should lead a merry and quiet life, flourish in wealth, be assured from all harines, and flow full of those delightfull things that the flesh is wont to desire : but that it wholly belongeth to the heavenly life. But as in the world the prosperous and desired state of the people is partly maintained by plenty of good things and peace at home, and partly by strong forceable defences, whereby it may be safe against outward violence : so Christ also doth enrich his with all things, necessarie to eternall salvation of soules, and fortifieth them with strength, by which they may stand invincible against all assaults of principall enemies. Whereby we gather, that he reigneth more for us than for himselfe, and that both within and without : that being furnished so far as God knoweth to be expedient for us, with the gifts of the spirit, whereof wee are naturally emptic, we may by these first fruits perceive that we are truly joyned to God unto perfect blessednesse. And then, that bearing us bold upon the power of the same spirit, we may not doubt that we shall alway have the victorie against the Divell, the world, and every kind of hurtfull thing. To this purpose tendeth the answer of Christ to the Pharisees, that because the kingdome of God is within us, it shall not come with observation. For it is likely that because he professed that he was the same King, under whom the soveraigne blessing of God was to be hoped for, they in scorne required him to shew forth his signes. But he, because they (who otherwise are too much bent to the earth) should not foolishly rest upon worldly pompes, biddeth them to enter into their owne consciences, because the kingdome of God is righteousnesse, peace, and joy in the holy Ghost. Hereby wee are briefly taught, what the kingdome of Christ availeth us. For, because it is not earthly or fleshy, subject to corruption, but spirituall : he listeth us up even to eternal life, that we may patiently passe over this life in miseries, hunger, cold, contempt, reproches, and other griefes, contented with this one thing, that our king will never leave us destitute, but succour us in our necessities, till having ended our war, we be called to triumph. For such is his manner of reigning, to communicate with us all that he hath received of his Father. Now whereas he armeth and furnisheth us with power and garnisheth us with beautie and magnificence, enricheth us with wealth : hereby is ministred unto us most pleantfull matter to glory upon, and also bold courage to fight without feare against the Divell, sinne, and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteousness, we may valiantly overcome all the reproches of the world, and as he liberally listeth us with his gifts, so wee againe for our part, may bring forth fruit to his glory.

Therefore his kingly annointing is set forth unto us, not done with oyle or ointments made with spices, but he is called the annointed of God because upon him hath rested the spirit of wisdom, understanding, counsell, strength and teare of God. This is the oyle of gladnesse, wherewith the Psalme reporteth that he was annointed above his fellowes, because if there were not such excellencie in him, we should be all needy and hungry. For, as it is already said, he is not privately enriched for himselfe, but to poure his plentie upon us, being hungry and dry. For as it is said, that the Father gave the spirit to his Sonne, not by measure, so there is expressed a reason why, that all wee should receive of his fulnesse, and grace for grace. Out of which fountaine floweth that liberall giving, whereof Paul maketh mention, whereby grace is diversly distributed to the faithfull, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Hereby is that which I said sufficiently confirmed, that the kingdome of Christ consisteth in the spirit, not in earthly delights or pomps, and therefore we must forsake the world that we may be partakers of it. A visible signe of this holy annointing was shewed in the baptisme of Christ, when the holy Ghost rested upon him in the likenesse of a Dove. That the holy Ghost and his gifts are meant by the word Annointing, ought to seeme neither noveltie nor absurdity. For we are none other way quickned, specially for so much as concerneth the heavenly life: there is no drop of lively force in us, but that which the holy Ghost poureth into us, which hath chosen his seate in Christ, that from thence the heavenly riches might largely flow out unto us, whereof we are so needy. And whereas both the faithful stand invincible by the strength of their King, and also his spirituall riches plenteously flow out unto them, they are not unworthily called Christians. But this eternitie whereof we have spoken, is nothing derogate by that saying of Paul: Then hee shall yeeld up the kingdome to God and the Father. Againe: the Sonne himselfe shall be made subject, that God may be all in all things: for his meaning is nothing else, but that in that same perfect glorie, the administration of the kingdome shall not bee such as it is now. For the Father hath given all power to the Sonne, that by the Sonnes hand he may governe, cherish and sustaine us; defend us under his safeguard: and helpe us. So while for a little time we are waivering abroad from God, Christ is the meane betweene God and us, by little and little to bring us to perfect conjoyning with God. And truly, whereas he sitteth on the right hand of the Father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the Fathers deputie, under whom is the whole power of his dominion, because it is Gods will to rule and defend his Church by a meane (as I may so call it) in the person of his Sonne. As also Paul doth expound it in the first Chapter to the Ephesians, that hee was set at the right hand of the Father, to be the head of the Church, which is his body. And to no other meaning tendeth that which hee teacheth in another place, that there is given him a name above all names, that in the Name of Jesus all knees shall bow, and all tongues confesse that it is to the glory of God the Father. For even in the same words also hee setteth out in the kingdome of Christ an order necessarie for our present weakenesse. So Paul gathereth rightly, that God shall then bee by himselfe, the onely head of the Church, because Christs office in defending of the Church, shall bee fulfilled. For the same reason the Scripture commonly calleth him Lord, because his Father did set him over us to this end, to exercise his owne Lordly power by him. For though there bee many Lordships in the world, yet is there to us but one God the Father, of whom are all things and wee in him, and one Lord Christ, by whom are all things and wee by him saith Paul. Whereupon is rightly gathered that hee is the selfe same God, which by the mouth of Esay affirmed himselfe to be the King and the Law-maker of the Church. For though hee doe every where call all the power that hee hath, the benefit and gift of the Father, yet hee meaneth nothing else, but that he reigneth by power of God: because he hath therefore put on the personage of the Mediatour, that descending from the bosome and incomprehensible glory of the Father, hee might approach nigh unto us. And so much more rightfull it is, that we be with all consent prepared to obey, and that with great cheerefulnesse we direct our obediences to his commandement. For as he joyneth the offices of King and Pastor toward them that willingly yeeld themselves obedient: so on the other side, we heare that he beareth an yron scepter, to breake and bruse all the obstinate obstinate like potters vessels: we heare also that he shall be the iudge of nations, to cover the earth with dead corpses, and to overthrow the height that standeth against him.

Of which thing there are some examples seene at this day; but the full prooffe thereof shall be at the last judgement, which may also properly be accounted the last act of his Kingdome.

6. Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to bee holden, that the end and use of it is, that he should be a Mediator pure from all spots, that should by his holinesse reconcile us to God. But because the iust curse possesseth the entrice, and God according to his office of Judge is bent against us, it is necessary that some expiation be used, that he being a Priest may procure favour for us, to appease the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behoved that he should come forth with a Sacrifice. For in the Law it was not lawfull for the Priest to enter into the Sanctuary without blood, that the faithfull might know, that though there were a Priest become meane for us to make intercession, yet God could not bee made favourable to us before that our sinnes were purged. Vpon which point the Apostle discourseth largely in the Epistle to the Hebrews, from the seventh Chapter almost to the end of the tenth. But the summe of all commeth to this effect, that the honour of Priesthood can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrifice of his death hath wiped away our guiltinesse, and satisfied for our sinnes. But how weighty a matter it is, we are enforced by that solemne oath of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a Priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establish that principall point which he knew to be the chiefe joynt whereupon our salvation hanged. For as it is said, there is no way open for us or for our prayers to God, unlesse our filthinesse being purged, the Priests doe sanctifie us, and obtaine grace for us, from which the uncleannesse of our wicked doings and sinnes, doth debarre us. So doe wee see, that we must begin at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and profit of his Priesthood may come unto us. Of this it followeth, that hee is an eternall intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine favour, whereupon againe ariseth not onely assurance to pray, but also quietnesse to godly consciences, while they safely leane upon the fatherly tendernesse of God, and are certainly perswaded that it pleaseth him whatsoever is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the Law, God commanded sacrifices of beasts to bee offered to him: there was another and a new order in Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed host, and the Priest: because there neither could be found any other satisfaction for sinnes, nor any was worthy so great honour to offer up to God his onely begotten sonne. Now Christ beareth the person of a Priest, not onely by eternall meane of reconciliation to make the Father favourable and mercifull unto us, but also to bring us into the fellowship of so great an honor. For we that are defiled in our selves, yet being made Priests in him doe offer up our selves, and all ours to God, and doe freely enter into the heavenly Sanctuary, that all the sacrifice of prayer and praise that come from us, may be acceptable and sweet smelling in the sight of God: And thus far doth that saying of Christ extend: For their sakes I sanctifie my selfe: because, having his holinesse powred upon us, in as much as he hath offered us with himselfe to his Father, we that otherwise doe sinke before him, doe please him as pure and cleane, yea, and holy. Here unto serveth the anointing of the Sanctuary, whereof mention is made in David. For the comparison of contrarie tie is to benoticed betweene this anointing, and that shadowish anointing that dien was in use: as if the Angell should have said, that the shadows being driven away, there should bee a cleare Priesthood in the person of Christ: And so much more detestable is their invention, which not contented with the sacrifice of Christ, have presumed to thrust in themselves to kill him: which is daily enterprised among the Papists, where the Masse is reckoned a sacrificing of Christ.

life and salvation in him: as we be taught by that notable saying of Peter, that there is none other name under heaven given to men wherein they must be saved. Neither was the Name of Jesus given him unadvisedly, or at chanceable adventure, or by the will of men; but brought from heaven by the Angell the publisher of Gods decree, and with a reason also assigned: because he was sent to save the people from their finnes. In which words that is to be noted, which we have touched in another place, that the office of Redeemer was appointed him, that he should bee our Saviour: but in the meane time our Redemption should be but imperfect, unlesse he should by continual proceedings convey us forward to the uttermost marke of salvation. Therefore so soone as we swarve never so little from him, our salvation by little and little vanisheth away, which wholly resteth in him: so that all they willfully spoile themselves of all grace, that rest not in him. And the admonition of Bernard is worthy to be rehearsed, that the name of Jesus is not onely light, but also meat, yea, and oile also, without which all the meat of the soule is drie, and that it is also salt, without the seasoning whereof all that is set before us is unfavorie. Finally that it is hony in the mouth, melodie in the eare, and joyfullnesse in the heart, and also medicine, and that whatsoever is spoken in disputation is unfavorie, but where this Name soundeth. But here it behooveth to weigh diligently how salvation is purchased by him for us, that we may not onely bee perswaded that hee is the author of it, but also embracing such things as are sufficient to the stedfast upholding of our faith, wee may refuse all such things as might draw us away hither or thither. For sith no man can descend into himselfe, and earnestly consider what he is, but feeling God angry and bent against him, hee hath need carefully to seeke a meane and way to appease him, which demandeth satisfaction: there is no common assurednesse required, because the wrath and curse of God lyeth alway upon sinners, till they bee loose from their guiltinesse: who as he is a righteous judge, suffreth not his law to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to revenge it.

2. But before we go any further, it is to be seene by the way, how it agreed together, that God which prevented us with his mercy, was our enemy untill he was reconciled to us by Christ. For how could hee have given us in his onely begotten sonne a singular pledge of his love, unlesse he had already before that embraced us with his free favour? Because therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrarietie, I will first undoe this knot. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this manner in the scriptures, that God was enemy to men, till they were restored into favour by the death of Christ: that they were accursed till their iniquitie was purged by his sacrifice: that they were severed from God, till they were received into a conjoyning by his bodie. Such manner of phrases are applied to our capacite, that we may the better understand how miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in expresse words, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and everlasting death did rest upon us, wee would lesse acknowledge how miserable we should be without Gods mercie, and would lesse regard the benefit of deliverance. As for example, If a man heare this spoken to him: If God at such time as thou wast yet a sinner, had hated thee, and cast thee away as thou hadst deserved, thou shouldst have suffered horrible destruction: but because hee hath willingly and of his owne free kindnesse kept thee in favour, and not suffred thee to be estranged from him, he hath so delivered thee from that perill: truly he will be moved with, and in some part feele how much he oweth to the mercy of God. But if he heare on the other side that which the scripture teacheth, that he was by sinne estranged from God, the heire of wrath, subject to the curse of eternall death, excluded from all hope of salvation, a stranger from all blessing of God, the bondslave of Sathan, captive under the yoke of sinne: Finally, ordained unto and already entangled with horrible destruction, that in this case Christ became an intercessor to entreat for him; that Christ tooke upon him and suffered the punishment which by the just judgement of God did hang over all sinners, that he hath purged with his blood those evils that made them hateful to God, that by his expiation is sufficient satisfaction and sacrifice made to God the Father, that by this intercessor his wrath was appeased: that within this foundation resteth the peace betweene God and men: that upon this bond is contained his good will toward them: shall not he be so much the more moved with these. as it is more lively represented out of how great miserie he hath been delivered? In a summe, because our minde can neither desirously enough take hold of life in the mercy of God, nor receive it with such thankfulness as we ought, but when it is before stricken and throwne downe with the feare of the wrath of God and dread of eternall death, we are so taught by holy Scripture, that without Christ we may see God in manner wrathfully bent against us, and his hand armed to our destruction: and that we may embrace his good will and fatherly kindnesse no other where, but in Christ.

3. And although this be spoken according to the weaknesse of our capacitie, yet it is not falsly said. For God which is the highest righteousnesse, cannot love wickednesse which he seeth in us all. Therefore we all have in us that, which is worthy of the hatred of God. Therefore in respect of our corrupted nature, and then of evill life added unto it, truly we are all in displeasure of God, guiltie in his sight, and borne to damnation of hell. But because the Lord will not loose that which is his in us, he findeth yet somewhat that he of his goodnesse may love. For howsoever wee be sinners by our owne fault, yet we remaine his creatures. Howsoever we have purchased death to our selves, yet he made us unto life. So is he mooved by meere and free loving of us to receive us into favour. But sith there is a perpetuall and unappeasable disagreement betwene righteousness and iniquitie, so long as we remaine sinners, he cannot receive us wholly. Therefore, that taking away all matter of disagreement, he might wholly reconcile us unto him, he doth, by expiation set forth in the death of Christ, take away whatsoever evill is in us, that we, which before were uncleane and unpure, may now appeare righteous and holy in his sight. Therefore God the Father doth with his love prevent and goe before our reconciliation in Christ, yea because he first loved us, therefore he afterward doth reconcile us unto himselfe. But because untill Christ with his death come to succour us, there remaineth wickednesse in us, which deserveth Gods indignation, and is accursed and damned in his sight, therefore wee are not fully and firmly joynted to God, untill Christ doe joyne us. Therefore if wee will assure our selves to have God made well pleased and favourable unto us, wee must fasten our eies and mindes upon Christ onely: as indeed we obtaine by him onely, that our sinnes be not imputed to us, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

4. And for this reason Paul saith, that the same love, wherewith God embraced us before the creation of the world, was staid and grounded upon Christ. These things are plaine and agreeable with the Scripture, and doe make those places of Scripture to accord very well together, where it is said: that God declared his love towards us in this, that he gave his onely begotten Sonne to death: and yet that he was our enemy till hee was made favourable againe to us by the death of Christ. But that they may be more strongly proved to them that require the Testimonie of the old Church; I will alleadge one place of Augustine, where he teacheth the very same that we doe. The love of God (saith he) is incomprehensible and unchangeable. For hee began not to love us, since the time that we were reconciled to him by the blood of his Sonne. But before the making of the world he loved us, even before that we were any thing at all, that we might also be his children with his onely begotten sonne. Therefore whereas we are reconciled by the death of Christ, it is not so to bee taken as though the sonne did therefore reconcile us unto him, that he might now begin to love us whom he hated before: but we are reconciled to him that already loved us, to whom we were enemies by reason of sinne. And whether this be true or no that I say, let the Apostle beare witness. He doth commend (saith he) his love toward us, because when wee were yet sinners, Christ died for us. He therefore had a love to us, even then when we were enemies to him and wrought wickednesse. Therefore after a marvellous and divine manner he loved us, even then when he hated us. For he hated us in that wee were such as hee had not made us, and because our wickednes had on every side wasted away his worke, he knew how in every one of us, both to hate that which we our selves had made, and to love that which he had made. These be the words of Augustine.

5. Now where it is demanded, how Christ hath done away our sinnes, and taken away the strife betwene us and God, and purchased such righteousness as might make him favourable and well willing towards us: it may be generally answered, that hee

he hath brought it to passe by the whole course of his obedience. Which is proved by the testimonie of Paul. As by one mans offence many were made sinners, so by one mans obedience we are made righteous. And in another place he extendeth the cause of the pardon that delivereth us from the curse of the Law, to the whole life of Christ, saying: When the fulnesse of time was come, God sent his Sonne made of a woman, subject to the law, to redeeme them that were under the Law: And so affirmed that in his very baptisme was fulfilled one part of righteousnesse, that hee obediently did the commandement of his Father. Finally, from the time that hee tooke upon him the person of a servant, he began to pay the ranfome to redeeme us. But the scripture to set out the manner of our salvation more certainly, doth ascribe this as peculiar and properly belonging to the death of Christ. He himselfe pronounced that he gave his life to bee a redemption for many. Paul teacheth that he died for our finnes. Iohn Baptist cried out that Christ came to take away the finnes of the world, because he was the Lambe of God. In another place Paul saith, that we are justified freely by the redemption that is in Christ, because he is set forth the reconciler in his owne blood. Again, that we are justified in his blood and reconciled by his death. Again, he that knew not sinne, was made sinne for us, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. I will not recite all the testimonies, because the number would be infinite, and many of them must be hereafter alleaged in their order. Therefore in the summe of beliefs, which they call the Apostles creed, it is very orderly passed immediately from the birth of Christ to his death and resurrection, wherein consisteth the summe of perfect salvation. And yet is not the rest of his obedience excluded, which he performed in his life: As Paul comprehendeth it wholly from the beginning to the end in saying, that he abased himselfe, taking upon him the forme of a servant, and was obedient to his father to death, even the death of the crosse. And truly even in the same death his willing submission hath the first degree, because the sacrifice, unlesse it had been willingly offered, had nothing profited toward righteousnesse. Therefore, where the Lord testified, that hee gave his soule for his sheep, hee expressly addeth this, no man taketh it away from my selfe. According to the which meeting, Esay saith, that he held his peace like a Lambe before the shearer. And the historie of the Gospell rehearseth, that he went forth and met the souldiers, and before Pilate he left defending of himselfe, and stood still to yeeld himselfe to judgement to be pronounced upon him. But that not without some strife: for both hee had taken our infirmities upon him, and it behooved that his obedience to his Father, should bee this way tried. And this was no slender shew of his incomparable love towards us, to wrastle with horrible feare, and in the midst of these cruell torments to cast away all care of himselfe, that he might provide for us. And this is to be believed, that there could no sacrifice be well offered to God any otherwise, but by this that Christ forsaking all his owne affection, did submit and wholly yeeld himselfe to his fathers will. For proove whereof, the Apostle doth fully alleage that testimony of the Psalme: in the booke of the law it is written of me, that I may doe thy will, O God, I will, and thy law is in the midst of my heart. Then I said: Loe I come. But because trembling consciences finde no rest but in a sacrifice and washing whereby finnes are clenfed: therefore for good cause we are directed thither, and in the death of Christ is appointed for us the matter of life. Now forasmuch as by our owne guiltinesse, curse was due unto us, before the heavenly judgement seate of God, therefore first of all is recited how he was condemned before Ponce Pilate President of jury: that wee should know that the punishment wherunto we were subject, was laid upon the just one. Wee could not escape the dreadfull judgement of God: Christ, to deliver us from it, suffered himselfe to be condemned before a mortall man, yea a wicked and heathen man. For the name of the President is expressed not onely to procure credit to the historie, but that we should learne that which Esay teacheth, that the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and that by his stripes we are healed. For to take away our damnation, every kinde of death sufficed not for him to suffer, but to sauisie our redemption, one speciall kinde of death was to be chosen, wherein both drawing away our damnation to himselfe, and taking our guiltinesse upon himselfe, he might deliver us from them both. If he had bene murdered by theeves, or had bene ragingly slaine in a commotion of the the common people : in such a death there should have been no apparance of satisfaction. But when he was brought to be arraigned before the judgement seat, when hee was accused and pressed with witnesses against him, and was by the mouth of the judge condemned to die : by these tokens we understand, that he did beere the person of a guiltie man and of an evill doer. And here are two things to be noted, which both were afore spoken by the prophesies of the Prophets, and doe bring singular comfort and confirmation of Faith. For when wee heare that Christ was sent from the judges seat to death, and was hanged among theeves, we have the fulfilling of that Prophecie, which is alleaged by the Evangelist. He was accounted among the wicked. And why so? even to take upon him the steed of a sinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, because he suffered death not for cause of innocencie, but for sinne. On the other side when we heare that he was acquitted by the same mouth whereby hee was condemned, for Pilate was compelled openly more than once to beare witness of his innocencie : let that come in our minde which is in the other Prophet : that he repayed that which hee had not taken away. And so wee shall behold the person of a sinner and evill doer represented in Christ : and by the open appearance of his innocencie it shall become plaine to see, that he was charged rather with other offence than his owne. He suffered therefore under Poncs Pilate, and so by the solemne sentence of the President, was reckoned in the number of wicked doers : but yet not so, but that hee was by the same judge at the same time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he found no cause of condemnation in him. This is our acquittall, that the guiltinesse which made us subject to punishment, is removed upon the head of the Sonne of God. For this setting of one against the other, we ought principally to hold fast, lest we tremble and bee carefull all our life long, as though the just vengeance of God did hang over us, which the Sonne of God hath taken upon himselfe.

6. Beside that, the very manner of his death is not without a singular mysterie. The Crosse was accursed, not onely, by opinion of men, but also by decree of the Law of God. Therefore when Christ was lifted up to the Crosse, he made himselfe subject to the curse. And so it behoved to be done, that when the curse was removed from us to him, we might be delivered from all curse that for our finnes was prepared for us, or rather did already rest upon us. Which thing was also by shadow expressed in the law. For the sacrifices and satisfactorie oblations that were offered for finnes, were called Ashemoth, Which word properly signifieth sinne it selfe. By which figurative change of name, the holy Ghost meant to shew, that they were like unto cleansing plaisters to draw out to themselves, and beare the curse due to sinne. But that same which was figuratively represented in the sacrifices of Moses, is indeed delivered in Christ the originall pattern of all the figures. Wherefore he, to performe a perfect expiation, gave his owne soule to be an Asham, that is a satisfactorie oblation, as the Prophet calleth it, upon the which our filth and punishment might be cast, and so cease to be imputed unto us. The Apostle testifieth the same thing more plainly, where hee teacheth, that he which knew no sinne, was by his father made sinne for us, that we might be made the righteoufnesse of God in him. For the sonne of God being most cleane from all fault, did yet put upon him the reproch and shame of our iniquities, and on the other side covered us with his cleannesse. It seemeth that he meant the same when he speaketh of sinne, that sinne was condemned in his flesh. For the Father destroyed the force of sinne, when the curse thereof was removed, and laid upon the flesh of Christ. It is therefore declared by this saying, that Christ was in his death offered up to his father for a satisfactorie sacrifice, that the whole satisfaction for sinne being ended by his sacrifice, wee might cease to dread the wrath of God. Now it is plaine, what that saying of the Prophet meaneth that the iniquities of us all were laid upon him, that is, that he intending to wipe away the filthinesse of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of interchanged imputation, covered with them. Of this, the Crosse whereunto he was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (saith he) redeemed us from the curse of the Law, when he was made a curse for us. For it is written : Accursed is every one that hangeth on a tree : that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect unto, where hee teacheth that Christ did beare our finnes upon the tree.

tree. Because by the very token of the curse we doe more plainly learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laid upon him. And yet it is not so to be understood, that he tooke upon him such a curse, wherewith himselfe was overloden, but rather that in taking it upon him, he did tread downe, breake and destroy the whole force of it. And so faith conceiveth acquitall in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doth not without a cause honourable report the triumph that Christ obtained to himselfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame, had been turned into a Chariot of triumph. For he saith, that the hand-writing which was against us, was fastened to the Crosse, and the princely powers were spoiled and led openly. And no marvell: because (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered up himselfe by the eternall spirit. And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of things. But that these things may take stedfast roote, and be thoroughly setled in our hearts, let us alway thinke upon his sacrifice and washing. For we could not certainly beleve that Christ was the ransome, redemption, and satisfaction, unlesse he had been a sacrificed host. And therefore there is so often mention made of blood, where the Scripture sheweth the manner of our redeeming. Albeit the blood of Christ, that was shed, served not only for sacrifice, but also in steed of washing, to cleanse away our filthinesse.

7. It followeth in the Creede, that he was dead and buried: Where againe it is to be seene, how he did every where put himselfe in our stead, to pay the price of our redemption. Death held us bound under his yoke. Christ in our stead did yeeld himselfe into the power of death, to deliver us from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that wee should not die, or which is all one) by his death he did redeeme life for us. But in this he differed from us, that he gave himselfe to death, as it were to be devoured, not that he should be swallowed up with the gulfes of it, but rather that hee should swallow up it, of which we should have bene presently swallowed: that he gave himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppressed with the power thereof, but rather that he should overthrow death which approached neere us, yea, and had already beaten us downe and triumphed upon us. Finally, that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Devill, and might deliver them that by feare of death were all their life long subject to bondage. This is the first fruit that his death did bring us. An other is, that by enterparting of himselfe with us, hee mortifieth our earthly members, that they should no more hereafter use their owne workes: and killeth our old man, that it should no more live and bear fruit. And to the same purpose pertaineth his buriall, that we being made partakers thereof, should also be buried to sinne. For when the Apostle reacheth that we are grafted into the likenesse of the death of Christ, and buried with him to the death of sinne, that by his crosse the world was crucified to us, and we to the world, that we are dead together with him, he doth not onely exhort us to expresse the example of Christs death, but he declareth that there is such effectualnesse in it, as ought to appeare in all Christians, unlesse they will make his death unprofitable and fruitlesse. Therefore in the death and buriall of Christ, there is offered us a double benefit to be enjoyed, that is deliverance from death, wherunto we were become bond, and the mortifying of our flesh.

8. But it is not meet to overpasse his going downe to the hells, wherein is no small importance to the effect of redemption. For although it appeareth by the writings of the old Fathers, that that part which is read in the Creede was not in old time so much used in the Churches: yet in entreating of the summe of our doctrine, it is necessarie that it have a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a very profitable and not to be despised mysterie of a right weightie matter. And there are also some of the old writers that doe not leave it out. Whereby wee may guesse, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not presently but by little and little grow in use in the Churches. But this certainly is out of question, that it proceeded of the common judgement of all the godly: Forasmuch as there is none of the Fathers that doth not in his writings make mention of Christs going downe to the hels, although after divers manner of exposition. But by whom, or at what time it was first added, maketh litle to the purpose. But rather ther in the Creede this is to be taken heede unto, that we therein certainly have a full and in all points perfect summe of our faith, whereinto nothing may be thrust, but that which is taken out of the most pure word of God. Now, if any will not for precise curiositie admit it into the Creede, yet shall it straight way be made to appeare plainly, that it is of great importance to the sum of our redemption, that if it be left out, there is lost a great part of the fruit of the death of Christ. There are againe some that thinke, that there is no new thing spoken in this article, but that in other words the same thing is repeated, which was spoken before of his buriall: For as much as the word Infernum, Hell, is in the Scripture oftentimes used for the grave. I grant that to be true, which they alleadge of the signification of the word, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the grave, but there are against their opinion two reasons, by which I am easly perswaded to dissent from them. For what an idleness were it, when a thing not hard to understand, hath once bene set out in plaine and easie words, afterward with darker implication of words, rather to point toward it than to declare it. For when two maners of speaking that expresse one thing be joynd together, it behooveth that the latter be an exposition of the former. But what an exposition were this, if a man should say thus: Whereas it is said that Christ was buried, thereby is meant that he went downe to hell? Againe it is not likely that such a superfluous vaine repetition could have crept into this abridgement, wherein the chiefe points of our faith are summarily noted in as few words as was possible. And I doubt not that so many as shall have somewhat diligently weighed the matter it selfe, will easly agree with me.

9 Some expound it otherwise, and say that Christ went downe to the soules of the fathers that died in the time of the law, to carry them tidings that the redemption was performed, and to deliver them out of prison wherein they were kept inclosed: and to the prooffe hereof they doe wrongfully draw testimonies out of the Psalmes, that he brake the brazen gates and yron bars. Againe out of Zacharie, that he redeemed them that were bound, out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Psalmes speaketh of their deliverances that in farre countries are cast captive into bonds, and Zacharie compareth the Babylonicall overthrow, wherein the people was oppressed, to a dry pit or bottomlesse depth, and therewithall teacheth that the salvation of the whole Church is as it were a coming out of the deep helles: I wot not how it is come to passe, that they which came after, thought that there was a certaine place under the earth whereunto they have feigned the name of Limbus. But this fable although they were great authors, and at this day many doe earnestly defend it for a truth: is yet nothing else but a fable. For, to inclose the soules of dead men as in a prison, is very childish. And what need was it that Christs soule should goe downe thither to set them at libertie? I doe indeede willingly confesse, that Christ shined to them by the power of his spirit, that they might know that the grace which they had onely tasted of by hope, was then delivered to the world. And to this purpose may the place of Peter be probably applied, where he saith, that Christ came and preached to the spirits that were in a dungeon or prison, as it is commonly translated. For the very proceffe of the text leadeth us to this, that the faithfull which were dead before that time, were partakers of the same grace that we were: because he doth thereby amplify the force of Christs death, for that it peaced even to the dead, when the godly soules enjoyed the present sight of that visitation, which they had carefully looked for: on the other side it did more plainly appeare to the reprobate that they were excluded from all salvation. But whereas Peter in his saying maketh no distinction betwene them, that is not so to be taken, as though he mingled together the godly and ungodly without difference: but onely he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Christ.

10 But concerning Christs going downe to the helles, beside the consideration of the Creede, we must seeke for a more certaine exposition, and we assuredly have such a one out of the word of God, as is not onely holy and godly, but also full of singular comfort. Christs death had bene to no effect, if he had suffered onely a corporall death: but it behooved also that he should feele the rigour of Gods vengeance: that might both appeale his wrath and satisfie his just judgement. For which cause also it behooved that he should as it were hand to hand wastle with the armies of the helles and the horror of eternall death. We have even now alleaged out of the Prophet that the chastisement of our peace was laid upon him: that he was stricken of his Father for our finnes, and bruised for our infirmities. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the stead of wicked doers as suretie and pledge, yea, and as the very guiltie person himselve, to abide and suffer all the punishments that should have beene laid upon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be holden still of the sorrowes of death. Therefore it is no marvell if it be said that he went downe to the hels, sith he suffered that death wherewith God in wrath striketh wicked doers. And their exception is very fond, yea and to be scorned, which say, that by this exposition the order is perverted, because it were an absurditie to set that after his buriall which went before it. For after the setting forth of those things which Christ suffered in the sight of men, in very good order followeth that invisible and incomprehensible judgement which he suffered in the sight of God: that we should know that not only the body of Christ was given to be the price of our redemption, but that there was another greater & more excellent price paid in this, that in his soule he suffered the terrible torments of a damned and forsaken man.

11. According to this meaning doth Peter say, that Christ rose againe having loosed the sorrowes of death, of which it was impossible that he should be holden, or overcome. He doth not name it simply death: but he expresseth that the soane of God was wrapped in the sorrowes of death, which proceeded from the curse and wrath of God, which is the originall of death. For how small a matter had it beene, carelesly and as it were, in sport to come forth to suffer death? But this was a true proove of his infinite mercie, not to shun that death which he so fore trembled at. And it is no doubt that the same is the Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where he writeth: that Christ was heard of his owne Feare: some translate it Reverence or pietie, but how unfitly, both the matter it selfe, and the very manner of speaking proveth. Christ therefore praying with teares and mightie crie, is heard of his owne Feare: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed vp of death as a sinner: because in that place he had put our person upon him. And truly there can be imagined no more dreadfull bottomlesse depth than for a man to feele himselve forsaken and estranged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth upon him, even as if God himselve had conspired to his destruction. Even thither we see that Christ was throwne downe, so farre, that by enforcement of distresse he was compelled to cry out: My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whereas some would have it taken, that he so spake rather according to the opinion of other, than as he felt in himselve: that is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is evident, that this saying proceeded out of the very anguish of the bottome of his heart. Yet doe we not meane thereby, that God was at any time his enemy, or angry with him. For how could he be angry with his beloved Sonne, upon whom his mind rested? Or how could Christ by his intercession appease his Fathers wrath toward other, having him hatefully beat against himselve? But this is our meaning: that he suffered the grievousness of Gods rigor, for that he being stricken and tormented with the hand of God, did feele all the tokens of God when he is angry and punisheth. Whereupon Hillarie argueth thus, that by this going downe we have obtained this, that death is slaine. And in other places he agreeth with our judgement, as where he saith: The crosse, death, and hels are our life. Againe, in another place: The sonne of God is in the hels, but man is caried up to heaven. But why doe I alleadge the testimonie of a private man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a fruit of his victorie, that they were delivered which were by feare of death all their life long subject to bondage? It behooved therefore, that he should overcome that feare, that naturally doth continually torment and oppresse all mortall men: which could not be done but by fighting with it. Moreover, that his feare was no common feare, or conceived vpon a slender cause, shall by and by more plainly appeare. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the devill, with the horror of death, with the paines of the hels, it came to passe, that he both had the victorie of them, and triumphed over them, that we now in death should no more feare those things, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

12. Heere some lewd men, although unlearned, yet rather mooved by malice than by ignorance, crie out that I doe a hainous wrong to Christ, because it was against conveni-conueniencie of reason, that he should be fearfull for the saluation of his soule. And then they more hardly enforce this cavillation, with saying, that I ascribe to the sonne of God desperation, which is contrarie to faith. First, they doe but maliciously move controverſie of Christs feare and trembling, which the Evangelists doe so plainly report. For a little before that the time of his death approched, he was troubled in spirit, and passionate with heavineſſe, and at his very meeting with it, he began more vehemently to tremble for feare. If they say that he did but counterſeit, that is too foule a shift. We muſt therefore as Ambrase truly teacheth, boldly confeſſe the ſorrowfulneſſe of Chriſt, unleſſe we be aſhamed of his croſſe. And truly if his ſoule had not bene partaker of paine, hee had bene onely a redeemer for bodies. But it behooved that he ſhould waſtelle, to raiſe up them that lay throwne downe. And his heavenly glorie is ſo nothing impaired thereby, that even herein gloriously ſhined his goodneſſe which is never ſufficiently praiſed, that he reſuſed not to take our weakenefſe vpon him. From whence is alſo that comfort of our anguiſhes and ſorrowes, which the Apoſtle ſetteth before vs: that this Mediatour did feele our infirmities, that he might be the more earnestly bent to ſuccour us in miſerie. They ſay, that that thing which is euill of it ſelſe, is unworthily aſcribed unto Chriſt: As though they were wiser than the Spirit of God, which joyneth theſe two things together, that Chriſt was in all things tempted as we are, and yet that he was without ſinne. Therefore there is no cauſe that the weakenefſe of Chriſt ſhould make us afraid, whereunto he was not by violence or neceſſitie compelled, but by meere love of us, and by mercie was led to ſubmit himſelſe. And whatſoever he of his owne will ſuffered for us, diminiſheth nothing of his power. But in this one point are theſe backbiters deceived, that they doe not perceive in Chriſt an infirmite cleane and free from all fault and ſpot, becauſe he kept himſelſe within the bounds of obedience. For whereas there can be found no moderation in our corrupt nature, where all our affectiones doe with troubleſome violence exceede all meafure, they doe wrong to meafure the forme of God by that ſtandard. But when man was in his uncorrupted ſtate, then there was a moderation having force in all his affectiones, to reſtrain exceſſe. Whereby it might well be that he was like unto us in ſorrow, dread, and fearefulneſſe, and yet that by this marke he differed from us. Being ſo confuted, they leape to another cavillation that though Chriſt feared death, yet he feared not the curſe and wrath of God, from which he knew himſelſe to be ſafe. But let the godly readers weigh how honourable this is for Chriſt, that he was more tender and more fearefull than the moſt part of the very rascall ſort of men. Theeves and other euill doers doe obſtinately haſte to death, many doe with haughty courage deſpiſe it: ſome other doe mildly ſuffer it. But what conſtancie or ſtout courage were it for the ſonne of God to be aſtoniſhed and in a maner ſtricken dead with feare of it? For even that which among the common ſort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehemencie of griefe, very drops of blood did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a ſhew to the eies of other, but when in a ſecret corner, whither he was gone out of company, he groined unto his Father. And this putteth it out of all doubt, that it was needfull that he ſhould have Angels to coire downe from heaven to relieve him with an unwonted manner of comforting. How ſhamefull a tenderneſſe, as I ſaid ſhould this haue bene, to be ſo far tormented for feare of common death, as to melt in bloody ſweat, and not to be able to be comforted, but by ſight of Angels? What? doth not that prayer thrice repeated, (Father if it be poſſible, let this cup depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitterneſſe of heart, ſhew that Chriſt had a more cruell and harder battell than with common death? Whereby it appeareth that thoſe triflers againſt whom I now diſpute, doe boldly babble upon things that they know not, becauſe they never earnestly conſidered what it is, or of how great importance it is, that we be redeemed from the judgement of God. But this is our wiſedome, well to underſtand how deere our ſalvation did coſt the Sonne of God. Now if a man ſhould aſke me, if Chriſt went then downe to hell, when he prayed to eſcape that death: I anſwer, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered how grieuous and terrible torments he ſuffered, when he knew himſelſe to ſtand to be arraigned for our cauſe, before the judgement ſeate of God. But although for a moment of time, the diuine power of the ſpirit did hide it ſelſe to give place this interpretation of Christs descending into hell, as if it were a disgrace unto him to be made ſubiect unto ſuch paſſions.

to the weaknesse of the flesh: yet must we know, that the tentation by feeling of sorrow and feare, was such as was not against faith. And so was that fulfilled which is in the sermon of Peter, that he could not be holde of the sorrowes of death, because when he felt himselfe as it were forsaken of God, yet he did nothing at all swarve from the trust of his goodnesse. Which is proved by that his notable calling upon God, when for extremitie of paine he cried out, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For although he was about measure grieved, yet he ceaseth not to call him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forsaken. Moreover hereby is confuted as well the error of Apollinaris, as theirs that were called Monotbelites. Apollinaris saigned that Christ had an eternall spirit in stead of a soule, so that he was onely but halfe a man. As though he could cleanse our finnes any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is that affection or will of obedience but in the soule? which soule of his we know was troubled for this purpose, to drive away feare, and bring peace and quietnesse to our soule. Again, for confusion of the Monotbelites, we see how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of Godhead. I omit to speake how he did subdue the aforesaid feare with a contrarie affection. For therein is a plaine shew of contrariety. Father deliver me from this houre. But even therefore I came even into this houre. Father glorifie thy Name. In which perplexitie yet was there no such outrage in him as is seene in us, even then when we most of all endeavour to subdue our selves.

13. Now followeth his resurrection from the dead, without which all that we have hitherto were but imperfect. For in this there appeareth in the crosse, death, and buriall of Christ, nothing but weaknesse: faith must passe beyond all those things, that it may be furnished with full strength. Therefore although we have in his death a full accomplishment of salvation, because by it both we are reconciled to God, and his just judgement is satisfied, and the curse taken away, and the penaltie fully paid: yet we are said to be regenerate into a living hope, not by his death, but by his rising againe. For as he in rising againe rose up the vanquisher of death, so the victorie of our faith consisteth in the very resurrection: but how this is, is better expressed in the words of Paul. For he saith, that Christ died for our finnes, and was raised up againe for our justification: as if he should have said, that by his death sinne was taken away, and by his rising againe, righteousnesse was renewed and restored. For how could he by dying deliver us from death, if he himselfe had lien still overcome by death? How could he have gotten victorie for us, if himselfe had bene vanquished in fight: wherefore we doe so part the matter of our salvation betweene the death and resurrection of Christ, that by his death we say sinne was taken away and death destroyed, and by his resurrection righteousnesse was repaired, and life raised up againe: but so that by meane of his resurrection, his death doth shew forth her force and effect in us. Therefore Paul affirmeth, that in his very resurrection he was declared the Sonne of God, because then at last he uttered his heavenly power, which is both a cleare glasse of his godhead, and a stedfast stay of our faith. As also in another place he teacheth, that Christ suffered after the weaknesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spirit. And in the same meaning in another, where he treateth of perfection, he saith: that I may know him and the power of his resurrection. Yet by and by after hee adjoyneth the fellowship with death. Wherewith most aptly agreeth that saying of Peter: that God raised him up from the dead and gave him glorie, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith being upholden by his death should waver, but that the power of God which keepeth us under faith, doth principally shew it selfe in the resurrection. Therefore let us remember, that so oft as mention is made of his death onely, there is also comprehended that which properly belongeth to his resurrection, and like figure of comprehension is there in the word Resurrection, as oft as it is used severally without speaking of his death, so that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertaineth to his death. But forasmuch as by rising againe he obtaineth the crowne of conquest, so there should be both resurrection and life: therefore. Paul doth for good cause affirme that faith is destroyed, and the Gospell is become vaine and deceitfull, if the resurrection of Christ be not fastened in our hearts. Therefore in another place, after he

he had gloried in the death of Christ against all the terrors of damnation, to amplify the same, he saith further: Yea, the same, He which died, is risen up againe, and now standeth a Mediator for us in the presence of God. Furthermore, as we have declared, that upon the partaking of his crosse hangeth the mortification of our flesh: so is it to be understood, that by his resurrection we obtaine another commoditie which answereth that mortification. For (saith the Apostle) wee are therefore grafted into the likenesse of his death, that being partakers of his resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this, that we are dead together with Christ, to prove that we ought to mortifie our members upon earth: likewise also, because we are risen up with Christ, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to seeke for those things that are above, and not those that are upon the earth. By which words we are not onely exhorted to be raised up after the example of Christ, to follow a newnesse of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power, that we are regenerate into righteousness. We obtaine also a third fruit of his resurrection, that we are, as by an earnest delivered us, assured of our owne resurrection, of which we know that his resurrection is a most certaine argument. Whereof he disputeth more at large in the fiftene Chapter of his Epistle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is said, that he rose againe from the dead: in which saying is expressed the truth both of his death and of his resurrection: as if it had bene said, that he did both die the same death that other men naturally doe die, and received immortalitye in the same flesh which he had put on mortall.

14. To his resurrection is not unfitly adjoynd his ascending into heaven. For although Christ began more fully to set forth his glory and power by rising againe, for that he had now laid away that base and un noble estate of mortall life, and the shame of the crosse: yet by his ascending up into heaven onely, he truly began his kingdome. Which the Apostle sheweth where he teacheth, that Christ ascended to fulfill all things. Where in seeming of repugnancie, he sheweth that there is a goodly agreement: because he so departed from us, that yet his presence might be more profitable to us, which had been panned in a base lodging of the flesh, while he was conversant in earth. And therefore John, after that he had rehearsed that notable calling, If any thirst, let him come to me, &c. By and by saith, that the holy Ghost was not yet given to the faithfull, because Jesus was not yet glorified. Which the Lord himselfe also did testifie to the Disciples, saying: It is expedient for you that I goe away. For if I doe not goe away, the holy Ghost shall not come: But he giveth them a comfort for his corporall absence, that he will not leave them as parentlesse, but will come againe to them after a certaine manner, indeed invisible, but yet more to be desired, because they were then taught by a more assured experience, that the authority which he enjoyneth, and the power which hee useth, is sufficient for the faithfull, not only to make them live blessedly, but also to die happily. And truly we see how much greater abundance of his spirit he then powred out, how much more royally he then advanced his kingdome, how much greater powerd he then shewed, both in helping his, and in overthrowing his enemies. Being therefore taken up into heaven, he tooke away the presence of his body out of our sight: not to cease to be present with the faithfull that yet wandred in the earth, but with more present power to governe both heaven and earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with us to the end of the world; he performed by this his ascending, by which as his body was lifted up above all heavens, so his power and effectuall working was powred and spread abroad beyond all the bounds of heaven and earth. But this I had rather declare in Augustines words than mine owne. Christ (saith he) was to go by death to the right hand of the Father, from whence he is to come to judge the quicke and the dead: and that likewise in bodily presence according to the sound doctrine and rule of faith. For in spirituall presence with them, he was to come after his ascension. And in another place more largely and plainly: According to an unspeakeable and invisible grace is that fulfilled which he had spoken: behold I am with you all the daies even to the end of the world. But according to the flesh which the word tooke upon him, according to that he was borne of a virgin, according to that that hee was taken of the Jewes, that he was fastned on the tree, that he was taken down from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, that he was laid in the grave, that he was openly shewed in his rising againe: this was fulfilled, Ye shall not alway have me with you. Why so? because he was conversant according to the presence of his body fortie dayes with his disciples, and they being in his company, seeing him, nor following him, he ascended into heaven and is not here, for he sitteth there, at the right hand of his Father: and is here, for he is not gone away in presence of majestie. Therefore according to the presence of his majestie, we alway have Christ: according to the presence of his flesh, it was truly said to his disciples: but me ye shall not alway have. For the Church had him a few dayes according to the presence of his flesh, but now she holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eyes.

15 Wherefore, it by and by followeth, that he is sitten downe at the right hand of his Father: which is spoken by way of similitude, taken of Princes that have their sitters by, to whom they commit their office to rule and govern in their stead. So it is said, that Christ in whom the Father will be exalted and raigned by his hand: was received to sit at his right hand: as if it had bene said, that he was invested in the dominion of heaven and earth, solemnly entred vpon the possession of the government committed unto him, and that he not only entred vpon it, but also continueth in it, till he come downe to judgement. For so doth the Apostle expound it, when he saith thus: The Father hath set him at his right hand, above all principality and power, and strength and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world, but in the world to come, &c. He hath put all things under his feet, and hath given him to be head of the Church above all things. Now you see to what purpose belongeth that sitting, that is, that all creatures both heavenly and earthly may with admiration looke upon his majestie, be governed with his hand, behold his countenance, and be subject to his power. And the Apostles meane nothing else when they so oft rehearse it, but to teach, that all things are left to his will. Therefore they thinke not rightly, which thinke that blessednesse is only meant by it. And it forceth nor, that in the Actes Stephen testifieth that he saw him standing, because we speake not here of the gesture of his bodie, but of the majestie of his dominion: so that to sit is nothing else, but to be chiefe judge in the heavenly judgement seate.

16 Hereupon doth faith gather manifold fruit. For it learneth, that the Lord by his ascending into heaven, hath opened the entrie of the heavenly kingdome, which before had bene stopped vp by Adam. For when he entred into it in our flesh as in our name, thereupon followeth that which the Apostle saith, that we doe already in him, after a certaine manner sit in heaven. For that we doe not with bare hope looke for heaven, but already in our head we possess it. Moreover faith perceiveth that he sitteth with his father to our great benefit. For he is entred into a Sanctuary not made with hands, and there appeareth before the face of the father a continuall advocate and intercessour for us: he so turneth the fathers eyes to his righteousnesse, that he turneth them away from our sinnes: He so reconcileth his mind unto us, that by his intercession he prepareth us a way and passage to his throne, filling it with grace and mercifulnesse, which otherwise would have bene full of horror to wretched sinners. Thirdly, faith conceiveth his power, wherein consisteth our strength, might, wealth, and glorying against the hels. For ascending into heaven he led captivity captive, and spoiling his enemies he enriched his people, and daily filleth them with heapes of spirituall riches. He sitteth therefore on high, that from thence powring out his power unto us, he may quicken us to a spirituall life, sanctifie with his spirit, and grueish his Church with the divers gifts of his grace, preserve it safe against all hurts by his protection, restraine with the strength of his hand, the raging enemies of his crosse, and of our salvation: finally, hold all power both in heaven and in earth, till he have overthrowe all his enemies, which are also our enemies, and made perfect the building up of his Church. And this is the true state of his kingdome: this is the power that his Father hath given him, till he make an end of the last act, when he commeth to judge the quicke and the dead.

17 Christ doth in deede here shew to them that bee his, plaine proofes of his power present amongst them: but because under the basenesse of flesh his kingdome doth in a manner lie hidden in earth, therefore for good cause is faith called to thinke

upon that visible presence, which he will openly shew at the last day. For he shall in visible forme come downe to heaven, even such as he was seene to goe up: and he shall appeare to all men with unpeakeable majestie of his kingdome, with bright glistering of immortality, with infinite power of God-head, with a guard of Angels. From thence therefore we are bidden to looke for him to come our Redeemer at that day: when hee shall sever the lambs from the goats, the chosen from the forsaken: and there shall bee none of all either the quicke or the dead, that shall escape his judgment. For from the furthest corners of the world shall be heard the sound of the trumpet, wherewith all shall be called to his judgement seate, both they that shall be found alive at that day, and they whom death hath before taken out of the company of the quicke. Somethere bee that in this place expound the words of the quicke and the dead otherwise: and wee see that some of the old writers did sticke in doubt upon the construction of this article. But as the foresaid meaning is plaine and easie to perceive: so doth it better agree with the Creede which is evident that it was written according to the capacite of the common people. And herewith nothing disagreeeth that which the Apostle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which shall remaine in mortall life at the last judgement shall not die after a naturall manner and order: yet that change which they shall suffer, because it shall be like a death, is not unproperly called death. It is indeed certaine, that not all shall sleepe, but all shall be changed. What meaneth that? In one moment their mortall life shall perish and be swallowed up and be utterly transformed into a new nature. This perishing of the flesh no man can denie to bee a death: and yet in the meane time it remaineth true, that the quicke and the dead shall be summoned to the judgement: because the dead that are in Christ shall first rise, and then they that shall remaine and be living, shall with them be suddenly taken up into the aire, to meeete the Lord. And truly it is likely that this article was taken out of the sermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, and out of the solemne protestation of Paul to Timothie.

18. Hereupon ariseth a singular comfort, when we heare that he is judge, which hath already appointed us partners with him in judging: so far is it off, that he will goe up into the judgement seate to condemne us. For how should the most mercifull prince destroy his owne people? how should the head scatter abroad his owne members? how should the patron condemne his owne clients? For if the Apostle dare cry out, that while Christ is intercessour for us, there can none come forth that can condemne us: it is much true, that Christ himselfe being our intercessour, will not condemne them whom he hath received into his charge and tuition. It is truly no small assurednesse, that we shall be brought before no other judgement seate, but of our owne Redeemer, from whom our salvation is to be looked for: moreover that he which now by the Gospell promiseth eternall blessednesse, shall then by sitting in judgement performe his promise. Therefore to this end the Father hath honoured the Sonne, in giving him all judgement, that so he hath provided for the consciences of them that bee his, trembling for feare of the judgement. Hitherto I have followed the order of the Apostles Creede, because whereas it shortly in few words containeth the chiefe articles of our redemption, it may serve us for a Table, wherein we doe distinctly and severally see those things that are in Christ, worthy to be taken heede unto. I call it the Apostles Creede, not carefully regarding who were the author of it. It is truly by great consent of the old writers ascribed to the Apostles, either because they thought that it was by common travell written and set out by the Apostles, or for that they judged that this abridgement being faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, delivered by the hands of the Apostles, was worthy to be confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whensoever it proceeded at the first, it hath even from the first beginning of the Church, and from the very time of the Apostles, bene used as a publike confession, and received by consent of all men. And it is likely that it was not privately written by any one man, forasmuch as it is evident that even from the farthest age, it hath alway continued of sacred authoritie and credit among all the godly. But that thing which is onely to be cared for, we have wholly out of controversie, that the whole history of our faith is shortly and well in distinct order rehearsed in it; and that there is nothing contained in it that is not sealed with sound testimonies of Scripture. Which being understood, it is to no purpose pose either curiously to doubt, or to strive with any man who were the author of it : unlesse perhaps it be not enough for some man to be assured of the truth of the holy Ghost, but if he doe also vnderstand either by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hand it was written.

19. But forasmuch as we doe see, that the whole summe of our salvation, and all the parts thereof are comprehended in Christ, we must beware, that we doe not draw a way from him any part thereof, be it never so little. If we seeke for salvation, we are taught by the very name of Jesus, that it is in him : if we seeke for any other gifts of the Spirit, they are to be found in his anointing : if we seeke for strength, it is in his dominion : if we seeke for cleanness, it is in his conception : if we seek for tender kindness, it is in the womb it selfe in his birth, whereby he was made in all things like unto us, that he might learne to sorrow with us : if we seeke for redemption, it is in his passion : if we seeke for absolution, it is in his condemnation : if we seeke for release of the curse, it is in his crosse : if we seeke for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifice : if we seeke for cleansing, it is in his blood : if we seeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the hels : if we seeke for mortification of the flesh, it is in his buriall : if we seeke for newnesse of life, it is in his resurrection : if we seeke for immortalitie, it is in the same : if we seeke for the inheritance of the kingdome of heaven, it is in his entrance into heaven : if we seeke for defence, for assurednesse, for plenty and store of all good things, it is in his kingdome : if we seeke for a dreadlesse looking for the judgment, it is in the power given to him to judge. Finally, sith the treasures of all sorts of good things are in him, let us draw thence and from no where else, even till we be full with all. For they which being not content with him alone, are carried hither and thither into diverse hopes, although they have principall regard to him, yet even in this they are out of the right way, that they turne any part of their knowledge to any otherwhere. Albeit such distrust cannot creepe in, where the abundance of his good gifts hath once bene well knowne.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

THis question is also to be afoiled for an addition. For there are some subtle men after a wrong manner, which although they confesse that we obtaine salvation by Christ, yet cannot abide to heare of the name of deserving, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obscured : and so they will have Christ to be onely the instrument, or minister, not the Author, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. Indeed I confesse, that if a man will set Christ simply and by himselfe against the judgement of God, then there shall be no roome for deserving : because there cannot be found in man any worthinesse that may deserve the favour of God. But, as Augustine most truly writeth, the most cleare light of predestination and grace, is our Saviour himselfe, the man Christ Jesus, which hath obtained so to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deserving of workes, or of faith going before. I beseech you let me be answered, whereby that same Man deserved to be taken up by the Word, that is coeternall with the father, into one person, and so to be the only begotten Sonne of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the very fountaine of grace, from whom according to the measure of every one, it floweth abroad into all his members. By that grace every one from the beginning of his faith is made a Christian, by which that same man from his beginning was made Christ. Againe in another place : there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediatour himselfe. For he that made of the seede of David a man righteous, that never should be unrighteous, without any deserving of his will going before : even the same he doth of unrighteous make them righteous, that are the members of that head : and so forth as there followeth. Therefore when we speake of Christs deserving, we doe not say that in him is the beginning of deserving, but we climbe up to the ordinance of God, which is the first cause thereof : because God of his owne meere good will appointed him Mediatour, to purchase salvation for us. And so is the deserving of Christ unlesly set against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that things orderly derly one vnder another doe not disagree. And therefore it may well stand together, that mans justification is free by the meere mercy of God, and that there also the deserving of Christ come betweene which is contained under the mercie of God. But against our workes are aptly set, as directly contrarie, both the free favour of God, and the obedience of Christ, either of them in their degree. For Christ could not deserve any thing but by the good pleasure of God, and but because he was appointed to this purpose, with his sacrifice to appease the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a summe: because the deserving of Christ hangeth upon the only grace of God, which appointed us this meane of saluation, therefore as well the same deserving, as that grace, is fitly set against all the workes of men.

2. This distinction is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Sonne, that whosoever beleeveth in him shall not perish. We see how the love of God holdeth the first place, as the soveraigne cause or originall, and then followeth faith in Christ, as the second or neerer cause. If any man take exception and say, that Christ is but the formall cause, he doth more diminish his power than the words may beare. For if we obtaine righteousnesse by faith that resteth upon him, then is the matter of our saluation to be sought in him, which is in many places plainly proved. Not that we first loved him, but he first loved us, and sent his Sonne to be the appeasing for our finnes. In these words is cleerely shewed, that God to the end that nothing should withstand his love toward us, appointed us a meane to be reconciled in Christ. And this word Appeasing, is of great weight: because God after a certaine unspeakable maner, even the same time that he loved us, was also angry with us, untill he was reconciled in Christ. And to this purpose serve all those sayings: He is the satisfaction for our finnes. Againe: It pleased God by him to reconcile all things to himselfe, appeasing himselfe through the blood of the Crosse by him, &c. Againe, God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinne, Againe, he accepted us in his beloved Sonne. Againe, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by the Crosse. The reason of this mysterie is to be fetched out of the first Chapter to the Ephesians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were chosen in Christ, added therewithall, that we have obtained favour in him. How did God begin to embrace with his favour them whom he loved before the making of the world, but because he uttered his love when he was reconciled by the blood of Christ? For sith God is the fountaine of all righteousnesse, it must needs be, that man so long as he is a sinner, have God his enemy and his Judge. Wherefore the beginning of his love is righteousnesse, such as is described by Paul: He made him that had done no sinne, to be sinne for us, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. For he meaneth that we have obtained free righteousnesse by that sacrifice of Christ, that we should please God, which by nature are the children of wrath, and by sinne estranged from him. But this distinction is also meant so oft as the grace of Christ is joynd to the love of God. Whereupon followeth, that he giveth us of his owne that which he hath purchased: for other wise it would not agree with him, that this praise is given him severally from his Father, that it is his grace and proceedeth from him.

3. But it is truly and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Christ by his obedience hath purchased us favour with his Father. For this I take as a thing confessed, that if Christ hath satisfied for our finnes, if he hath suffered the punishment due unto us, if by his obedience he hath appeased God, Finally, if he being righteous, hath suffered for the unrighteous, then is saluation purchased for us by his righteousnesse: which is as much in effect as to deserve it. But, as Paul witnesseth we are reconciled and have received reconciliation by his death. But, reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is: that God, to whom we were hateful by reason of sinne, is by the death of his sonne appeased, so that he might be favourable unto us. And the comparison of contraries that followeth a litle after, is diligently to be noted, As by the transgression of one man, many were made sinners: so also by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: As by the sinne of Adon we were estranged from God and ordained to destruction, so by the obedience of Christ we are received into favour as righteous.

And

And the future time of the Verbe doth not exclude present righteoufnesse, as appeareth by the proceffe of the text: For he had said before, that the free gift was of many finnes vnto justification.

What is meant by saying that Christs deserving purchased grace.

1 Iohn 1. 5. Luke 22. 20. Iohn 1. 29.

4 But when we say, that grace is purchased us by the deserving of Christ, we meane this, that we are cleansed by his blood, and that his death was a satisfaction for our finnes. His blood cleanseth us from sinne. This blood is it, that is shed for remission of sinne. If this be the effect of his bloodshed, that sinne be not imputed unto us: it followeth, that with that price the judgement of God is satisfied. To which purpose serveth that saying of John the Baptist: Behold the Lambe of God that taketh away the sinne of the world. For he setteth in comparison Christ against all the sacrifices of the Law, to teach that in him only was fulfilled that which those figures shewed. And we know, what Moses elsewhere saith: Iniquitie shall be cleansed, sinne shall be put away and forgiven. Finally we are very well taught in the old figures, what is the force and effect of the death of Christ: And this point the Apostle setteth out in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, very fitly taking this principle, that remission is not wrought without shedding of blood. Whereupon he gathereth, that Christ for the abolishing of sinne, appeared once for all by his sacrifice. Againe: that he was offered up to take away the finnes of many. And he had said before, that not by the blood of goates or of calves, but by his owne blood he once entred into the holy place, finding eternall redemption. Now when he thus reasoneth: If the blood of a calfe doe sanctifie according to the cleanness of the flesh, that much more consciences are cleansed by the blood of Christ from dead workes: it easily appeareth that the grace of Christ is too much diminished, unlesse we grant vnto his sacrifice the power of cleansing, appeasing and satisfying. As a little after he addeth: This is the Mediator of the new Testament, that they which are called, may receive the promise of eternall inheritance by meane of death for the redemption of finnes going before, which remained under the law. But especially it is convenient to weigh the relation which Paul describeth, that he became a curse for us, &c. For it were superfluous, yea and an absurditie, that Christ should be charged with curse, but for this intent that he paying that which other did owe, should purchase righteoufnesse for them. Also the testimony of Ezay is plaine, that the chastisement of our peace was laid upon Christ, and that we obtained health by his stripes. For if Christ had not satisfied for our finnes, it could not have bene said, that he appeased God by taking vpon him the paine, whereunto we were subject. Wherewith agreeth that which followeth in the same place: For the sinne of my people I have stricken him. Let us also recite the exposition of Peter, which shall leaue nothing doubtfull that he did beare our sinne upon the tree. For he saith, that the burthen of damnation from which we were delivered, was laid upon Christ.

5. And the Apostles doe plainly pronounce, that he paid the price of ransome to redeeme us from the guiltinesse of death. Being justified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ, whom God hath set to be the propitiatorie by faith, which is in his blood. Paul commendeth the grace of God in this point, because he hath given the price of redemption in the death of Christ: and then hee biddeth us to flee unto his blood, that having obtained righteoufnesse, we may stand boldly before the judgement of God. And to the same effect is that saying of Peter: that we are redeemed not by gold and silver, but by the precious blood of the the unspotted Lambe. For the comparison also would not agree, unlesse with that price, satisfaction had bene made for sins: for which reason Paul saith that we are precious bought. Also that other saying of his would not stand together: There is one Mediator that gave himselfe to be a redemption, unlesse the paine had bene cast upon him which we had deserved: Therefore the same Apostle defineth, that the redemption in the blood of Christ is the forgiveness of finnes: as if he should have said, that we are justified or acquitted before God, because that blood answereth for satisfaction for us. Wherewith also agreeth the other place, that the hand writing which was against us, was cancelled upon the Crosse. For therein is meant the payment or recompence that acquiteth vs from guiltinesse. There is also great weight in these words of Paul: If we be justified by the workes of the Law; then Christ died for nothing. For hereby we gather, that we must fetch from Christ

Christ

Christ that which the law would give, if any man can fulfill it: or (which is all one) that we obtaine by the grace of Christ that; which God promised to our works in the law when he said: He that doth these things, shall live in them. Which hee no lesse plainly confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioch, affirming that by beleeving in Christ we are justified from all those things, from which we could not be justified in the law of Moses. For if the keeping of the law be righteousness, who can deny that Christ deserved favour for us, when taking that burden vpon him, he so reconciled us to God, as if we our selves had kept the law? to the same purpose serveth that which he afterward writeth to the Galatians: God sent his sonne subject to the law, that he might redeem those that were under the law. For to what end served that submission of his, but that he purchased to us righteousness, taking upon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof commeth that imputation of righteousness without workes, whereof Paul speaketh, because the righteousness is reckoned to us which was found in Christ onely. And truly for no other cause is the flesh of Christ called our meate, but because we finde in him the substance of life. And that power proceedeth from nothing else, but because the Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteousness. As Paul saith, that he gave himselfe a sacrifice of sweet favour. And in another place: He died for our sinnes, he rose againe for our justification. Hereupon is gathered, that not onely salvation is given us by Christ, but also that for his sake his Father is now favourable unto us. For there is no doubt but that is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God under a figure pronounceth by Esay saying: I will doe it for mine owne sake, and for David my servants sake. Whereof the Apostle is a right good witness, where he saith: Your sinnes are forgiven you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not expresse, yet John after his accustomed manner signifieth him by this pronoun He. In which sense also the Lord pronounceth, As I live because of my Father, so shall ye also live because of me. Wherewith agreeth that which Paul saith, It is given you because of Christ, not onely to beleve in him, but also to suffer for him.

6 But to demand whether Christ deserved for himselfe, (as Lombard, and the other Schoolemen doe) is no lesse foolish curiositie, than it is a rash determination when they affirme it. For what needed the Sonne of God to come downe to purchase any new thing for himselfe? And the Lord declaring his owne counsell, doth put it wholly out of doubt. For it is not said, that the Father provided for the commoditie of his Sonne in his deservings, but that he delivered him to death, and spared him not, because he loved the world. And the Prophets maners of speaking are to be noted, as, A child is borne to us. Againe: Reioyce thou daughter of Sion: behold thy King commeth to thee. Also that confirmation of love should be very cold, which Paul setteth out, that Christ suffered death for his enemies. For thereupon we gather, that he had no respect of himselfe: and that same he plainly affirmeth in saying, I justifie my selfe for them. For he that giveth away the fruit of his holinesse vnto other, doth thereby testifie that he purchaseth nothing to himselfe. And truly this is most worthily to be noted, that Christ, to give himselfe wholly to save us, did after a certaine maner forget himselfe. But to this purpose they doe wrongfully draw this testimonie of Paul: Therefore the Father hath exalted him, and given him a name, &c. For by what deservings could man obtaine to be Judge of the world, and the head of the Angels, and to enjoy the soveraigne dominion of God, and that in him should rest that same majestie, the thousand part whereof all the powers of men and Angels cannot reach unto? But the solution thereof is easie and plaine, that Paul doth not there intreat of the cause of exalting of Christ, but onely to shew the effect ensuing thereof, that it might be for an example to us. And no other thing is meant by that which is spoken in another place, that it behooved that Christ should suffer, and so enter into the glory of his Father.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE INSTITUTION OF Christian Religion, which intreateth of the manner how to receiue the grace of Christ, and what profits doe grow unto us, and what effects ensue thereof.

THE FIRST CHAPTER.

That those things which are spoken of Christ, doe profit vs by secret working of the holy Ghost.

No benefit cometh by Christ to vs, till the bond of the spirit haue conizred vs unto him.

Ow it is to be seene how those good things do come vnto us which the Father hath given to his onely begotten Sonne, not for his owne private use, but to enrich them that were without them and needed them. And first this is to be learned that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be severed from him, whatsoever he suffered or did for the salvation of mankinde, is unprofitable, and nothing availeth for us. Therefore that he may enter parten with us those things that he hath received of his Father, it be-hooveth that he become ours, and dwell in us. And for that cause he is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is said, that we are grafted into him, and did put on him. For (as I have before said) all that ever he possesseth belongeth nothing to us, untill we grow together into one with him. But although it be true that we obtaine this by faith: yet forasmuch as we see that not all without difference doe embrace this enterpartening of Christ, which is offered by the Gospell, therefore very reason teacheth us to climbe up higher, and to enquire of the secret effectuall working of the Spirit, by which is brought to passe, that we enjoy Christ and all his good things. I have before entreated of the eternall godhead and essence of the spirit, at this present let us be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and blood, that the spirit should testifie of him, lest the salvation that hee hath purchased, should slip away from us. For as there are alleadged three witnesses in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, so are there also three in the earth, Water, Blood, and the Spirit. And not without cause is the testimonie of the Spirit twice repeated, which we feele to be engra-ven in our hearts in stead of a seale: whereby cometh to passe, that it sealeth the washing and sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also saith, that the faithfull are chosen in sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Christ. By which words he telleth vs, that to the intent the shedding of that holy blood should not become void, our soules are cleansed with it by the secret watering of the holy

holy Spirit. According whereunto Paul also speaking of cleansing and justification, saith, that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Jesus Christ, and the Spirit of our God. Finally, this is the summe, that the holy spirit is the bond wherewith Christ effectually bindeth us unto him. For prooffe whercof also doe serve all that we have taught in the last booke before this, concerning his anointing.

2. But that this, being a matter especially worthie to be knowne, may be made more certainly evident, we must hold this in minde, that Christ came furnished with the holy Spirit after a certaine peculiar manner, to the end that he might sever us from the world and gather us together into the hope of an eternall inheritance. For this cause he is called the Spirit of sanctification, because he doth not onely quicken and nourish us with that generall power which appeareth as well in mankind as in al other living creatures, but also is in us the root and seed of heavenly life. Therefore the Prophets doe principally commend the kingdom of Christ by this title of prerogative, that then should flourish more plentifull abundance of the spirit. And notable above all the rest is that place of Isa: In that day I will poure of my spirit upon all flesh. For though the Prophet there seeme to restraints the gifts of the Spirit to the office of a prophecying, yet under a figure hee meaneth, that God by the inlightening of his spirit will make those his schollers, which before were unskillfull and void of all heavenly doctrine. Now forasmuch as God the Father doth for his Sonnes sake give us his holy Spirit, and yet hath left with him the whole fulnesse thereof, to the end that he should bee a minister and distributor of his liberalitie: he is sometime called the Spirit of the Father, sometime the Spirit of the Sonne. Ye are not (saith Paul) in the flesh but in the Spirit, for the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any have not the Spirit of Christ, he is not his. And hereupon hee putteth us in hope of full renewing, for that he which raised up Christ from the dead, shall quicken our mortall bodies, because of his Spirit dwelling in us. For it is no absurditie, that to the Father he ascribed the praise of his owne gifts, whereof he is the author: and yet that the same be ascribed to Christ, with whom the gifts of the spirit are left, that he may give them to those that be his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirst, to come to him to drinke. And Paul teacheth that the Spirit is distributed to every one, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. And it is to be knowne, that he is called the Spirit of Christ, not onely in respect that the eternall Word of God with the same Spirit joyned with the Father, but also according to his person of Mediator, because if he had not had that power, he had come to us in vaine. After which meaning he is called the second Adam given from heaven to be a quickning Spirit: whereby Paul compareth the singular life that the Sonne of God breatheth into them that be his, that they may be all one with him, with the naturall life, that is also common to the reprobate. Likewise where he wisheth to the faithfull the favour of Christ and the love of God, hee joyned withall the common partaking of the Spirit, without which no man can taste neither of the fatherly favour of God, nor of the bountifulnesse of Christ. As also hee saith in another place: The love of God is powred out into our hearts by the holy Spirit that is given us.

3. And here it shall be profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture setteth out the holy Spirit, where it treateth of beginning and whole restoring of our salvation. First, he is called the Spirit of adoption, because he is a witness unto us of the free good will of God, wherewith God the Father hath embraced us in his beloved onely begotten Sonne, that he might be a Father unto us, and doth encourage us to pray boldly, yea and doth minister us words to cry without feare, Abba, Father: by the same reason hee is called the earnest pledge, and seale of our inheritance, because he so giveth life from heaven to us wandering in the world, and being like to dead men, that wee may be assured that our soule is in safegard under the faithfull keeping of God, for which cause he is also called life, by reason of righteousness. And forasmuch as by his secret watering hee maketh us fruitful to bring forth the buds of righteousness, hee is oftentimes called water as in Ez: All ye that thirst come to the waters. Again: I will poure out my Spirit upon the thirte, and flouds upon the drie land: wherewith agreeeth that saying of Christ, which I did even now alleg: If any thirst, let him come to me. Albeit sometime he is so called, by reason of his power to purge and cleanse, as in Ezechiel, where the Lord promiseth cleane waters, where with he will wash his people from filthinesse. And forasmuch much as he restoreth and nourisheth into lively quicknesse, them upon whom hee hath powred the liquor of his grace, he is therefore called by the name of oile and ointment. Again, because in continually seething out & burning up the vices of our lust, he setteth our hearts on fire with the love of God & zeale of godlines, he is also for this effect worthily called fire. Finally, he is described unto us as a fountain, from whence do flow unto us all heavenly riches, or the hand of God, wherewith he useth his power: because by the breath of his power he so breatheth divine life into us, that wee are not now stirred by our selves, but ruled by his stirring and moving: so that if there be any good things in us, they be the fruits of his grace: but our own gifts without him, be darknesse of mind, and perversnes of heart. This point is set out plainly enough, that til our minds be bent upon the holy Ghost, Christ lieth in a manner idle, because we coldly espie him without us, yea and farre away from us. But we know that he profiteth none other but them whose head he is, and the first begotten among brethren, and them which have put on him. This conjoyning onely maketh that, as concerning us, hee is come not unprofitably with the name of Saviour. And for proofe hereof serveth that holy mariage, whereby we are made flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spirit onely he maketh himselfe one with us: by the grace and power of the same spirit we are made his members, so that he containeth us under him, and wee againe possesse him.

4. But forasmuch as faith is his principall worke, to it are for the most part referred all those things that we commonly finde spoken to expresse his force and working: because he bringeth us into the Gospell by nothing but by faith: as John Baptist teacheth, that this prerogative is given to them that beleeve in Christ, that they be the children of God, which are borne not of flesh and bloud, but of God: where setting God against flesh and bloud, he affirmeth it to bee a supernaturall gift that they receive Christ by faith, who otherwise should remaine subject to their owne infidelitie. Like whereunto is that answer of Christ: Flesh and bloud hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father which is in heaven. These things I do now but shortly touch, because I have already in treated of them at large. And like also is that saying of Paul, that the Ephesians were sealed up with the holy spirit of promise. For Paul sheweth that hee is an inward teacher, by whose working the Promise of salvation pearceth into our mindes, which otherwise should beate the aire of our cares. Likewise when he saith, that the Thessalonians were chosen of God in the sanctification of the Spirit and beleeving of the truth: by which joyning of them together, he briefly admonisheth that faith it selfe proceedeth from nothing else but from the holy Spirit: which thing John setteth out more plainly, saying: We know that there abideth in us of the spirit which he hath given us. Again, by this we know that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his spirit. Therefore Christ promised to his Disciples the spirit of truth which the world cannot receive, that they might be able to receive the heavenly wisdom. And he assigneth to the same spirit this proper office, to put them in minde of those things that hee had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine should the light shew it selfe to the blinde, unlesse the same spirit of understanding should open the eies of their minde: so as a man may rightly call the holy spirit the key, by which the treasures of the heavenly kingdom are opened unto us: and may call his enlightening the eye-sight of our minde to see. Therefore doth S. Paul so much commend the ministerie of the spirit: because teachers should crie without profiting, unlesse Christ himselfe the inward master, should draw them with his spirit that are given him by his Father. Therefore as wee have said, that perfect salvation is found in the person of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holy spirit and fire, lighting us into the faith of his Gospell, and so new begetting us, that we may be new creatures: and purging us from unholy filthinesse, doth dedicate us to be holy temples to God.

Of faith, wherein both is set the definition of it, and the properties that it hath, are declared.

BUt all these things shall be easie to understand, when there is shewed a plaine definition of faith, that the Readers may know the force and nature thereof. But first it is convenient to call to minde againe these things that have been already spoken, that sith faith is not

God doth appoint us by his law what we ought to doe, if wee fall in any point thereof the same terrible judgement of eternall death that he pronounceth doth rest upon us. Again, that forasmuch as it is not onely hard, but altogether above our strength and beyond all our power to fulfill the law, if we onely behold our selves, and weigh what estate is worthe for our deservings, there is no good hope left, but we lay cast away from God under eternall destruction. Thirdly, this hath been declared, that there is but one meane of deliverance to draw us out of so wretched calamitie: wherein appeareth Christ the Redeemer, by whose hand it pleased the heavenly Father, having mercy upon us of his infinite goodnesse and clemencie, to succour us, so that we with sound faith embrace this mercie, and with constant hope rest upon it. But now it is convenient for us to weigh this, what manner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to be his children, doe enter upon the possession of the heavenly kingdome; forasmuch as it is certaine that not every opinion, nor yet every perswasion is sufficient to bring to passe so great a thing. And with so much the more care and study must wee looke about for, and search out the naturall propercie of faith; by how much the more hurtfull at this day is the error of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the world, hearing the name of faith, conceiveth no higher thing, but a certayne common assent to the historie of the Gospell. Yea, when they dispute of faith in the Schooles, in barely calling God the object of faith, they doe nothing but (as we have said in another place) by vaine speculation rather draw wretched soules out of the right way, than direct them to the true marke. For whereas God dwelleth in a light that none can attaine to, it behooveth of necessity that Christ become meane betweene us and it. For which cause he calleth himselfe the light of the world: and in another place, The way, the truth, and the life, because no man cometh to the Father (which is the fountaine of life) but by him: because he onely knoweth the Father, and by him the faithfull, to whom it pleaseth him to disclose him. According to this reason Paul affirmeth, that he accounteth nothing excellent to be knowne but Christ: and in the xx. Chapter of the Acts he saith, that he preached faith in Christ, &c. And in another place hee bringeth in Christ speaking after this manner, I will send thee among the Gentiles that they may receive forgiveness of sinnes, and portion among holy ones, by the faith which is in mee. And Paul testifieth, that the glory of God is in his person visible unto us: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightening of the knowledge of Gods glory shineth in his face. It is true indeed that faith hath respect onely to the one God, but this also is to be added, that it acknowledge him whom he hath sent, even Jesus Christ. Because God himselfe should have lycenset and hidden far from us, unless the brightnesse of Christ did cast his beames upon us. For this intent, the Father left all that hee had with his onely begotten sonne, even by the communicating of good things with him to expresse the true image of his glory. For as it is said, that we must be drawne to the Spirit that we may be stirred to seeke Christ, so againe wee ought to be admonished, that the invisible Father is no where else to be sought but in this image. Of which matter Augustine speaketh excellently well, which entreating of the marke that faith should shoote at, saith, that we must know whether we must goe and which way: and then by and by after, he gathereth that the safest way against all errors is, that he is both God and man. For it is God to whom we goe, and man by whom we goe: and both these are found no where but in Christ. Neither doth Paul when he speaketh of faith in God, meane to overthrow that which he so oft repeateth of faith that hath her whole stay upon Christ. And Peter doth most fitly joyne them both together, saying that by him we beleeve in God.

2. Therefore this evil, even as innumerable other, is to be imputed to the Schoolemen, which have hidden Christ as it were with a veile drawne before him, to the beholding of whom unless we be directly bent, we shall alway wander in many uncertaine mazes. But beside this, that with their darke definition they doe deface and in a manner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they have forged a devise of unexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most grosse ignorance, doe with great hurt deceive the silly people: yea (to say truly and plainly as the thing is indeed) this devise doth not onely bary but utterly destroy the true faith. Is this to beleeve, to understand nothing, so that thou obediently submit the sence to the Church?

Faith is no unexpressed or unexpressed knowledge.

Faith standeth not in ignorance but in knowledge, and that not onely of God, but of the will of God. For neither doe we obtaine salvation by this, that we either are ready to embrace for true whatsoever the Church appointeth, or that we doe commit to it all the office of searching and knowing: but when we acknowledge God to be a mercifull father to us by the reconciliation made by Christ, and that Christ is given us unto righteousness, sanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I say, not by submitting of our sense, we attaine an entry into the kingdome of heaven. For when the Apostle saith, that with the heart we beleve to righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made to salvation, hee sheweth that it is not enough, if a man unexpressedly beleve that which hee understandeth not, nor seeketh to learne: but he requireth an expressed acknowledging of Gods goodnesse, in which consisteth our righteousness.

Rom. 10. 10.

Simple men abused when they are made beleve it is faith indeterminedly to hold what the Church holdeth, without further seeking what we have by Christ at the hands of God and how.

John 17. 3.

3. Indeed I denie not (such is the ignorance wherewith wee are compassed) that there now be, and hereafter shall be many things wrapped and hidden from us, till having put off the burden of our flesh we come neerer to the presence of God: in which very things that be hidden from us, nothing is more profitable than to suspend our judgement, but to stay our minde in determined purpose to keepe unity with the Church. But under this colour to entitle ignorance tempered with humilitie by the name of faith, is a great absurdity. For faith lieth in the knowledge of God and of Christ, not in reverence of the Church. And we see what a maze they have framed with this their hidden implication, that any thing whatsoever it bee without any choise, so that it be thrust in under title of the Church, is greedily received of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea sometime also most monstrous errors. Which unadvised lightnesse of beleefe, whereas it is a most certaine downefall to ruine, is yet excused by them, for that it beleeveth nothing determinately, but with this condition adjoynd, If the faith of the Church be such. So doe they faigne, that truth is holden in error, light in blindness, true knowledge in ignorance. But because we wil not tary long in confuting them, we doe onely warne the Readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the very plainnesse of the truth it selfe, will of it selfe minister a confutation ready enough. For this is not the question among them, whether faith bee yet wrapped with many remnants of ignorance, but they definitively say that they beleve aright, which stand amazed in their ignorance, yea and doe flatter themselves therein, so that they do agree to the authority and judgement of the Church, concerning things unknowne. As though the Scripture did not every where teach, that with faith is joynd knowledge.

4. But we doe grant, that so long as wee wander from home in this world, our faith is not fully expressed; not onely because many things are yet hidden from us, but because being compassed with many mists of errors, wee attaine not all things. For the highest wisdom of the most perfect is this, to profit more and proceed on further forward, with gentle willingnesse to learne. Therefore Paul exhorteth the faithfull, if upon any thing they differ one from another, to abide for revelation. And truly experience teacheth, that till we be unclothed of our flesh, wee attaine to know lesse than were to be wished, and daily in reading we light upon many darke places which doe convince us of ignorance. And with this bridle God holdeth us in modestie, assigning to every one a measure of faith, that even the very best teacher may be readie to learne. And notable examples of this unexpressed faith, wee may marke in the Disciples of Christ, before that they had obtained to be fully enlightned. We see, how they hardly tasted the very first introductions, how they did stickie even in the smallest points, how they hanging at the mouth of their master did not yet much proceed, yea when at the womans information they ran to the grave, the resurrection of their master was like a dreame unto them. Sith Christ did before beare witness of their faith, wee may not say that they were utterly without faith: but rather if they had not bene perswaded that Christ should rise againe, all care of him would have perished in them. For it was not superstition that did draw the women to embalme with spices the corpes of a dead man, of whom there was no hope of life: but although they beleved his words whom they knew to bee a speaker of truth, yet the grossnesse of that still possessed their mindes, so wrapped their faith in darknesse, that they were in a manner amazed at it. Whereupon it is said, that they then at the last beleved when they had by trial of the

Our Faith as long as we live is unexpressed, if unexpressed faith be taken for faith mingled with ignorance, of that which should expressly be knowne and beleved.
Phil. 3. 15.

thing it selfe proved the truth of the words of Christ, not that they then began to beleeve, but because the seed of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their hearts, then receiving liveness, did spring up. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an unexpressed faith, because they reverently embraced Christ for their onely teacher, and then being taught of him, they determined that he was the Author of their salvation: Finally, they beleeved that he came from heaven, by the grace of his Father to gather his Disciples to heaven. And we need not to seeke any more familiar prooffe hereof than this, that in all things alway unbelieve is mingled with Faith.

5. We may also call it an unexpressed Faith, which yet indeed is nothing but a preparation of Faith. The Evangelists doe rehearse that many beleeved, which onely being ravished to admiration with miracles, proceeded no further but that Christ was the Messias which had bene promised, albeit they tasted not so much as any slender learning of the Gospell. Such obedience which brought them in subjection willingly to submit themselves to Christ, bearing the name of Faith where it was indeed but the beginning of Faith. So the courtier that beleeved Christs promise, concerning the healing of his sonne when he came home, as the Evangelist testifieth, beleeved againe: because he received as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, and then submitted himselfe to his authoritie to receive his doctrine. Albeit it is to be known, that he was so tractable and ready to learne, that yet in the first place the word of the beleeving signifieth a particular beleeve: and in the second place maketh him of the number of the Disciples; that professed to be the schollers of Christ. A like example doth John set forth in the Samaritans, which so beleeved the womans report, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had heard him, said thus: Now wee beleeve not because of thy report, but we have heard him, and wee know that he is the Saviour of the world. Hereby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so that they be disposed to obedience, are called faithfull, indeed not properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindnesse vouchsafeth to grant so great honour to that godly affection. But this willingness to learne, with a desire to proceed further, differeth farre from that grosse ignorance, wherein they lie dull that are content with the unexpressed faith, such as the Papists have imagined: For if Paul severely condemneth them which alway learning, yet never come to the knowledge of truth, how much more grievous reproch doe they deserve, that of purpose studie to know nothing?

6. This therefore is the true knowledge of Christ, if we receive him such as hee is offered of his Father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. For as he is appointed to be the marke of our faith, so wee cannot goe the right way to him, but by the Gospell going before to guide us. And truly there are opened to us the treasures of grace, which being shut up, Christ should little profit us. So Paul joyneth faith an unseparable companion to doctrine, where he saith: Ye have not so learned Christ, for yee have been taught what is the truth in Christ. Yet doe I not so restraine faith to the Gospell, but that I confesse that there hath been so much taught by Moses and the Prophets, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath bene delivered in the Gospell a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is worthily called of Paul, the doctrine of faith. For which cause also he saith in another place, that by the comming of faith the law is taken away, meaning by this word faith, the new and accustomed manner of teaching, whereby Christ since hee appeared our Schoolemaster, hath more plainly set forth the mercie of his Father, and more certainly testified of our salvation. Albeit it shall bee the more easie and more convenient order, if wee descend by degrees from the generalitie to the specialtie. First we must be put in mind that there is a generall relation of faith to the Word, and that faith can no more bee severed from the Word, than the Sunne beames from the Sunne, from whom they proceed. Therefore in Elsay God crieth out: Heare mee and your soule shall live. And that same is the fountaine of Faith, John sheweth in these words: These things are written that yee may beleeve. And the Prophet meaning to exhort the people to beleeve, saith: This day if yee shall heare his voice. And to heare is commonly taken for to beleeve. Moreover, God doth not without cause in Elsay set this marke of difference betwene the children of the Church and Strangers, that he will instruct them all, that they may bee taught of him.

For if it were a benefit universall to all, why should hee direct his words to a few? Wherewith agreeth this, that the Evangelists doe commonly use the words Faithfull and Disciples, as severall words expressing one thing, and specially Luke very oft in the Acts of the Apostles. Yea and hee stretcheth that name even to a woman in the ninth Chapter of the Actes. Wherefore if faith doe swarve never so little from this marke, to which it ought to be directly levelled, it keepeth not her owne nature, but becommeth an uncertaine lightnesse of beleefe and wandring error of minde. The same Word is the foundation wherewith faith is upholden and sustained, from which if it swarve, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Word, and then their shall remaine no faith. We doe not here dispute whether the ministry of man be necessarie to sow the Word of God, that faith may be conceived thereby, which question we will elswhere intreat of: but we say that the Word it selfe, howsoever it be conveyed to us, is like a mirrour when faith may behold God. Whether God doth therein use the service of man, or work it by his own only power, yet he doth alway shew himselfe by his Word to those, whom his will is to draw unto him: Whereupon Paul defineth faith to be an obedience that is given to the Gospell Rom. 1. And in another place he praisth the obedience of faith in the Philippians. For this is not the onely purpose in the understanding of faith, that we know that there is a God, but this also, yea this chiefly, that we understand what will he beareth us. For it not so much behooveth us to know what he is in himselfe, but what a one he will be to us. Now therefore we are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of God, perceived by the Word. And the foundation hereof is a foreconceived perswasion of the truth of God. Of the assurednesse whereof, so long as thy minde shall dispute with it selfe, the Word shall bee but of doubtfull and weake credit, yea rather no credit at all. But also it sufficeth not to believe that God is a true speaker, which can neither deceive nor lie, unlesse thou further hold this for undoubtedly determined, that whatsoever proceedeth from him, is the sacred and inviolable truth.

7. But because not at every word of God mans heart is raised up to faith, wee must yet further seech what this faith in the Word hath properly respect unto. It was the saying of God to Adam: Thou shalt die the death. It was the saying of God to Cain: The blood of thy brother crieth to me out of the earth. Yet these are such sayings as of themselves can doe nothing but shake faith, so much lesse are they able to stablith faith. We denie not in the meane season that it is the office of faith to agree to the truth of God, how oft soever, whatsoever, and in what sort soever it speaketh: but now our question is onely, what faith findeth in the word of the Lord to leane and rest upon. When our conscience beholdeth onely indignation and vengeance, how can it but tremble and quake for feare? And how should it but flee God, of whom it is afraid? But faith ought to seeke God, and not to flee from him. It is plaine therefore, that wee have not yet a full definition of faith, because it is not to be accounted for faith to know the will of God, of what sort soever it be: But what if in the place of will, whereof many times the message is sorrowfull and the declaration dreadfull, we put kindnesse or mercie? Truly so wee shall come neerer to the nature of faith. For we are then allured to seeke God, after that wee have learned that salvation is laid up in store with him for us. Which thing is confirmed unto us, when hee declareth that he hath care and love of us. Therefore there needeth a promise of grace, whereby he may testify that hee is our mercifull Father, for that otherwise we cannot approach unto him, and upon that alone the heart of man may safely rest. For this reason, commonly in the Psalms these two things Mercie and Truth doe cleave together, because neither should it any thing profit us to know that God is true, unlesse hee did mercifully allure us unto him: neither were it in our power to embrace his mercie, unlesse he did with his owne mouth offer it. I have reported thy truth and thy salvation, I have not hidden thy goodnesse and thy truth. Thy goodnesse and thy truth keepe me. In another place: Thy mercie to the heavens, thy truth even to the clouds. Againe: All the waies of the Lord are mercie and truth, to them that keepe his covenant. Againe, His mercie is multiplied upon us, and the truth of the Lord abideth for ever. Againe: I will sing to thy name upon thy mercie and truth. I omit that which is in the Prophets to the same same meaning, that God is mercifull and faithfull in his promifes. For we shall rashly determine that God is mercifull unto us, unlesse himfelfe doe testifie of himfelfe, and prevent us with his calling, lest his will should be doubtful and unknowne. But wee have already seene, that Christ is the only pledge of his love, without whom on every side appeare the tokens of hatred and wrath. Now forasmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodnesse shall not much prevaile, unlesse he make us to rest in it, therefore such an understanding is to be banished as is mingled with doubting, and doth not soundly agree in it selfe, but as it were disputeth with it selfe. But mans wit, as it is blind and darkned, is farre from attaining and climbing up to perceive the very will of God: and also the heart of man, as it wavereth with perpetuall doubting, is farre from resting assured in that persuasion. Therefore it behoveth both that our wit bee lightened, and our heart strengthened by some other meane, that the Word of God may be of full credit with us. Now we shall have a perfect definition of faith, if we say, that it is a steadfast and assured knowledge of Gods kindnesse towards us, which being grounded upon the truth of the free promise in Christ, is both revealed to our minds, and sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost.

8. But before I proceed any further, it shall bee necessary that I make some preambles to resolve certaine doubts, that otherwise might make some stop to the Readers. And first I must confute that distinction that flieth about in the Schooles, betweene faith formed and unformed. For they imagine that such as are touched with no feare of God, with no feeling of godlinesse, doe belevee all that is necessary to salvation. As though the Holy Ghost in lightning our hearts unto faith, were not a witness to us of our adoption. And yet presumptuously, when all the Scripture crieth out against it, they give the name of faith to such persuasion void of the feare of God. Wee need to strive no further with their definition, but simply to rehearse the nature of faith, such as it is declared by the word of God. Whereby shall plainly appeare how unskillfully and foolishly they rather make a noise than speake of it. I have already touched part; the rest I will add hereafter as place shall serve. At this present I say that there cannot be imagined a greater absurditie, than this invention of theirs. They will have faith to be an assent, whereby every despiser of God may receive that which is uttered out of the Scripture. But first they should have seene whether every man of his owne power doe bring faith to himselfe, or whether the holy Ghost be by it a witness of adoption. Therefore they doe childishly play the fooles, in demanding whether faith which, a quality added doth forme, be the same faith or another and a new faith. Whereby appeareth certainly, that in sobabbling they never thought of the singular gift of the holy Ghost. For the beginning of beleeving doth alreadie containe in it the reconciliation, whereby man approacheth to God. But if they did weigh that saying of Paul. With the heart is beleeved to righteousnesse, they would cease to feigne that same cold qualitie. If we had but this one reason, it should bee sufficient to end this contention: that the very same assent (as I have already touched, and will againe more largely reapeate) is rather of the heart than of the braine, rather of a fection than of understanding. For which cause it is called the obedience of Faith, which is such as the Lord preferreth no kind of obedience above it: and that worthily, for as much as nothing is more precious to him than his truth, which as John the Baptist witnesseth, the beleevers doe as it were subscribe and seale unto. Sith the matter is not doubtfull wee doe in one word determinately say, that they speake fondly when they say that faith is formed by adding of godly affection unto assent: whereas assent it selfe, at least such assent as is declared in the Scriptures, consisteth of godly affection. But yet there is another plainer argument that offereth it selfe to be alleged. For whereas Faith imbraceth Christ as he is offered us of the Father: and Christ is offered not onely for righteousnesse, forgiveness of sinnes and peace, but also for sanctification, and a fountaine of living water: without doubt no man can ever truly know him, unlesse he doe therewithall receive the sanctification of the Spirit. Or, if any man desire to have it more plainly spoken, Faith consisteth in the knowledge of Christ. And Christ cannot bee knowne but with Sanctification of his Spirit: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meane be severed from godly affection.

S. Pauls words
maintenance of unformed faith.
1 Cor. 12. 10.

9. Whereas they are wont to lay this against us, that Paul saith: If a man have all Faith, so that he remove mountaines, if he have not charity, hee is nothing: whereby they would deforme Faith, in spoyling it of Charitie: they consider not what the Apostle in that place meaneth by Faith. For when in the Chapter next before it, he had spoken of the divers gifts of the holy Ghost, among the which hee had reckoned the divers kindes of languages, power and Prophecie, and had exhorted the Corinthians to follow the best of these gifts, that is to say, such gifts whereby more profit and commoditie might come to the whole body of the Church: hee straightway said further, that hee would shew them yet a more excellent way. That all such gifts, how excellent soever they be of themselves, yet are they nothing to be esteemed, unlesse they serve Charitie. For they were given to the edifying of the Church, and unlesse they be applied thereunto, they lose their grace. For proofe of this he particularly rehearseth them, repeating the selfe same gifts that he had spoken of before, but in other names. And he useth the words Powers and Faith, for all one thing, that is for the power to doe miracles. Sith therefore this, whether yee call it Power or faith, is a particular gift of God, which every ungodly man may both have and abuse, as the gift of tongues, as prophecie and other gifts of grace: it is no marvell if it be severed from Charitie. But all the error of these men standeth in this, that where this word Faith, hath divers significations, they not considering the diversitie of the thing signified, dispute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of James which they alleage for maintenance of the same error, shall be elswhere discussed. But although for teachings sake, when we meane to shew what manner of knowledge of God there is in the wicked, we grant that there are divers sorts of Faith: yet we acknowledge and speake of but one Faith of the godly, as the Scripture teacheth. Many indeed doe beleve that there is a God, they thinke that the historie of the Gospell and other parts of the Scripture are true (as commonly we are wont to judge of such things, as either are reported being done long agoe, or such as we our selves have been present at and seen.) There be also some that go further, for both they beleve the word of God to be a most assured oracle, and they doe not altogether despise his Commandements, and they somewhat after a fort are moved with his threatenings and promises. It is indeed testified that such have Faith: but that is spoken out by abuse, because they doe not with open ungodlinesse fight against the Word of God, or refuse or despise it: but rather pretend a certaine shew of obedience.

10. But this image or shadow of Faith, as it is of no value, so it is not worthie of the name of faith. From the found truth whereof how farre it differeth, although it shal be hereafter more largely entreated, yet there is no cause to the contrarie, why it should not now be touched by the way. It is said that Simon Magus beleved, which yet within a litle after bewrayed his owne unbeliefe. And whereas it is said that he beleved, we doe not understand it as some doe, that hee saigned a beleefe when hee had none in his heart: but we rather thinke that being overcome with the majesty of the Gospell, he had a certaine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to bee the Author of life and salvation, that he willingly professed himselfe to be one of his. After the same manner it is said in the Gospell of Luke, that they beleve for a time, in whom the seed of the Word is choaked up before it bring forth fruit, or before it take any root at all, it by and by withereth away and perisheth. We doubt not that such delighted with a certaine taste of the Word do greedily receive it, and begin to feele the divine force of it, so farre, that with deceitfull counterfeiting of faith, they beguile not only other mens eyes, but also their own minds. For they perswade themselves, that that reverence which they shew to the word of God, is most true godlinesse, because they thinke that there is no ungodlinesse but manifest and confessed reproach or contempt of his Word. But what manner of assent soever that be, it pearceth not to the very heart to remaine there established: and though sometime it seemeth to have taken roots, yet those are not lively roots. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanitie, is full of so many hiding holes of lying, is covered with so guilefull hypocrisie, that it oft deceiveth himselfe. But let them that glory in such shadowes of faith understand, that therein they are no better than the Divell. But that first sort of men are farre worse than the Divell, which which doe senselesly heare and understand those things, for knowledge whereof the Devils doe tremble. And the other are in this point equall with the devil, that the feeling such as it is wherewith they are touched, turneth onely to terrour and discouragement.

11. I know that some thinke it hard, that we assigne faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirmeth faith to be the fruit of election. Which doubt yet is easily dissolved: for though none receive the light of faith, nor doe truly feele the effectuall working of the Gospell, but they that are foreordained to salvation: yet experience sheweth that the reprobate are sometime mooved with the same feeling that the elect are, so that in their owne judgement they nothing differ from the elect. Wherefore it is no absurditie, that the Apostle ascribeth to them the taste of the heavenly gifts, that Christ ascribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they soundly perceive the spirituall force of grace and assured light of faith: but because the Lord, the more to condemne them and make them inexcusable, conveyeth himselfe into their mindes so farre forth, as his goodnesse may be tasted without the spirit of adoption. If any object, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithfull, whereby to prove certainly their adoption: I answer that though there be a great likeness and affinitye betweene the elect of God and them that are endued with a falling faith for a time, yet there liveth in the elect onely that assurance which Paul speaketh of, that they cry with full mouth, Abba Father. Therefore as God doth regenerate onely the elect with incorruptible seed forever, so that the seed of life planted in their hearts never perissheth: so soundly doth hee seale in them the grace of his adoption, that it may be stable and sure. But this withstandeth not but that that other inferiour working of the Spirit may have his course, even in the reprobate. In the meane season the faithfull are taught carefully and humbly to examine themselves, least in heed of assurednesse of faith, doe creepe in carelesse confidence of the flesh. Beside that, the reprobate doe never conceive but a confused feeling of grace, so that they rather take hold of the shadow, than of the sound bodie, because the holy spirit doth properly seale the remission of finnes in the elect onely, so that they apply it by speciall faith to their use. But yet it is truly said, that the reprobate belevee God to be mercifull unto them, because they receive the gift of reconciliation, although confusedly and not plainly enough: not that they are partakers of the selfe same faith or regeneration with the children of God, but because they seeme to have as well as they, the same beginning of faith, under a cloke of hypocritie. And I deny not that God doth so farre give light unto their mindes, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that same feeling so different from the peculiar testimonie which he giveth to his elect, that they never come to the sound effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore shew himselfe mercifull unto them, for that hee having truly delivered them from death, doth receive them to his safeguard, but onely he discloseth to them a present mercy. But he vouchsafeth to grant to the onely elect the lively roo of faith, so that they continue to the end. So is that objection answered, if God doe truly shew his grace, that the same remaineth perpetually established, for that there is no cause to the contrary, but that God may enlighten some with a present feeling of his grace, which after ward vanisheth away.

12. Altho though faith be a knowledge of Gods kindnesse towards us; and an assured persuasion of the truth thereof: yet it is no marvell that the feeling of Gods love in temporal things doth vanish away: which although it have an affinitye with faith, yet doth it much differ from faith. I grant, the will of God is unchangeable, and the truth thereof doth alway stedfastly agree with it selfe, but I deny that the reprobate doe proceede so farre as to attaine unto that secret revelation, which the Scripture saith do belong to the elect onely. Therefore I deny that they doe either conceive the will of GOD as it is unchangeable, or doe stedfastly embrace the truth thereof, because they abide in a feeling that vanisheth away: Like as a tree that is not planted deepe enough to take lively roots, in processe of time waxeth drie, although for a few yeeres it bringeth forth not onely blossomes, and leaves but also fruit. Finally, as by the fall of the first man, the image of God might have bene blotted out of his minde, and soile, so it is no marvell, if God doe shine upon the reprobate with certaine beames of his grace, which after ward he suffereth to be quenched. And there is no cause to the contrarie, but that he may lightly overwash some, and thoroughly soke other some with the knowledge of his Gospell. This is in the meane time to be holden for truth, that how small and weake soever faith be in the elect, yet because it is to them a sure pledge of the spirit of God, and a seale of their adoption, the print thereof can never be blotted out of their hearts: as for the reprobate, that they are overspread with such a light as after ward commeth to nought, and yet the spirit is not deceitfull, because he giveth not life to the seed that he casteth in their hearts, to make it abide alwaies incorruptible, as he doth in the elect. I goe yet further, for whereas it is evident by the teaching of the Scripture and by daylie experience, that the reprobate are sometime touched with the feeling of Gods grace, it must needs be that there is raised in their hearts a certaine desire of mutuall love. So for a time there lived in Saul a godly affection to love God, by whom he knew himselfe to be fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certaine sweetnesse of his goodnesse. But as the perswasion of the fatherly love of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate, so do they not soundly love him againe as his children, but are led with a certaine affection like hired servants. For to Christ onely was the spirit of love given, to this end, that he should poure it into his members. And truly that saying of Paul extendeth no further, but to the elect onely. The love of God is powred abroad into our hearts by the holy Spirit that is given us. Even the same love that engendreth the same confidence of calling upon him, which I have before touched. As on the contrarie side, we see God to be marvellously angry with his children, whom yet he ceaseth not to love: not that in himselfe he hateth them, but because his will is to make them afraid with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abate their pride of flesh, to shake off their drowlinesse, and to move them to repentance. And therefore all at one time, they conceive him to bee both angry with them, or with their sinnes, and also mercifull unto them: because they not fainedly doe pray to appease his wrath, to whom yet they flee with quiet assured trust. Hereby it appeareth, that it is not true that some doe counterfeit a shew of faith, which yet doe lacke the true faith, but while they are carried with a sodaine violent motion of Zeale, they deceive themselves with false opinion. And it is no doubt that sluggishnesse to possesseth them, that they doe not well examine thair heart as they ought to have done. It is likely that they were such to whom (as John witnesseth) Christ did not commit himselfe when yet they beleeved in him, because he knew them all, and knew what was in man. If many did not fall from the common faith, (I call it common, because the faith that lasteth but a time hath a great likenesse, and affinitie with the lively and continuing faith) Christ would not have said to his Disciples: If yee abide in my word, then are ye truly my Disciples, and yee shall know the truth; and the truth shall make you free. For he speaketh to them that had embraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increase of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishnesse quench the light that is given them. Therefore doth Paul affirme, that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vanish away, because they have not taken lively root. Like as Christ also saith in Matthew: every tree that my Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. In other there is a grosser kinde of lying, that are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. James inveieth against that kinde of men, that with deceitfull pretence doe wickedly abuse faith. Neither would Paul require of the children of God a faith unfained, but in respect that many doe presumptuously challenge unto themselves that which they have not, and with vaine coloured deceit, doe beguile other or sometime themselves. Therefore he compareth a good conscience to a chest wherein faith is kept, because many in falling from good conscience, have suffered shipwrack of their faith.

13. We must also remember the doubtfull signification of the word faith. For oftentimes faith signifieth the sound doctrine of religion, as in the place that we now alleadge, and in the same Epistle where Paul will have Deacons to hold fast the myserie of faith in a pure conscience. Again, where he publisheth the falling away of certaine from the faith. But on the other side he saith that Timothie was nourished up with the words of faith: Again where hee saith that prophane vanities and oppositions, false named sciences, are the cause that many depart from the faith: whom in another place he calleth reprobate touching faith. As againe he chargeth Titus, saying. Warne them that they be found in the faith. By soundnesse hee meaneth nothing else but purenesse of doctrine, which is easily corrupted and brought out of kinde by the lightnesse of men. Even because in Christ, whom Faith possesseth, are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge: therefore Faith is worthily extended to signifie the whole summe of heavenly doctrine, from which it cannot be severed. Contrariwise sometime it is restrained to signifie some particular object, as when Matthew saith, that Christ saw the Faith of them that did let downe the Man sicke of the Palsie through the Tiles: and Christ himselfe crieth out that he found not in Israel so great Faith as the Centurion brought. But it is likely that the Centurion was earnestly bent to the healing of his daughter, the care whereof occupied all his minde: yet because being contented with the onely assent and answere of Christ, he required not Christs bodily presence, therefore in respect of this circumstance, his Faith was so much commended. And a litle here before wee have shewed, that Paul taketh Faith for the gift of working miracles, which gift they have, that neither are regenerate by the Spirit of God, nor doe heartily worship him. Also in another place he setteth Faith for the doctrine whereby wee are instructed in Faith. For where hee writeth that faith shall be abolished, it is out of question that that is meant by the ministerie of the Church, which at this time is profitable for our weakenesse. In these formes of speech standeth a proportionall relation. But when the name of Faith is improperly removed, to signifie a false profession, or a lying title of faith, that should seeme to be as hard a figurative abuse, as when the feare of God is set for a corrupt and wrongfull maner of worshipping, as when it is oftentimes said in the holy History, that the forraign nations which had been transplanted into Samarita, and the places bordering thereabout, feared the fained Gods and the God of Israel, which is as much, as to mingle heaven and earth together. But now our question is, What is that Faith which maketh the children of God different from the unbelievers, by which wee call upon God by the name of our Father, by which we passe from death to life, and by which Christ the eternall salvation and life dwelleth in us. The force and nature thereof, I think I have shortly and plainly declared.

14. Now let us againe goe through all the parts of it, even from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I thinke) there shall remaine nothing doubtfull. When in defining Faith we call it a knowledge, we meane not thereby a comprehending, such as men use to have of those things that are subject to mans understanding. For it is so farre above it, that mans wit must goe beyond and surmount it selfe to come unto it, yea, and when it is come unto it, yet doth it not attaine that which it seeleth; but while it is perswaded of that which it conceiveth not, it understandeth more by the very assurednesse of perswasion, than if it did with mans owne capacity throughly perceive any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul saith very well, where hee calleth it, to comprehend what is the length, breadth, depth, and height, and to know the love of Christ, that farre surmounteth knowledge. For his meaning was to signifie, that the thing which our minde conceiveth by Faith, is every way infinite, and that this kinde of knowledge is farre higher than all understanding. But yet because the Lord hath disclosed to his Saints the secret of his will, which was hidden from ages and generations, therefore by good reason, Faith is in Scripture sometime called an acknowledging: and Jobn calleth it a certaine knowledge, where he testifieth, that the Faithfull do certainly know that they are the children of God. And undoubtedly they know it assuredly, but rather by being conformed by perswasion of Gods truth, than by being informed by naturall demonstration. And this also the words of Paul doe declare saying, that while we dwell in the body, we are wandering abroad from the Lord, because wee walke by Faith and not by sight: whereby hee sheweth that those things which wee understand by Faith, are yet absent from us and are hidden from our sight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of Faith standeth rather in a certainty than in comprehending.

15. We further call it a sure and stedfast knowledge, to expresse thereby a more sound constancie of perswasion. For as Faith is not contented with a doubtfull and rowling opinion, so is it also not contented with a darke and entangled understanding?

but requireth a full and fixed assurednes, such as men are wont to have of things found by experience and proved. For unbelief sticketh so fast and is so deepe rooted in our hearts, and we are so bent unto it, that this which all men confesse with their mouth to be true, that God is faithfull, no man is without great contention perswaded in his heart. Specially when he commeth to the prooffe, then the wavering of all men discloseth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cause the Scripture with so notable titles of commendation maintaineth the authoritie of the word of God; but endeavoureth to give remedie for the aforesaid disease, that God may obtaine to bee fully believed of us in his promises: The words of the Lord (saith David) are pure words, as the Silver tried in a furnace of earth, fined seven times. Again, The word of the Lord fined, is a shield to all that trust in him. And Salomon confirming the same, and in a manner in the same words, saith: Every word of God is pure. But such the whole 119. Psalme entreateth onely in a manner upon the same, it were superfluous to alleadge any more places. Truly so oft as God doth so commend his word unto us, he doth therein by the way reproch us with our unbelievingnesse: because that commendation tendeth to no other end, but to root up all perverse doubtings out of our hearts. There be also many which so conceive the mercie of God, that they take little comfort thereof. For they be even therewithall pinched with a miserable carefulnesse, while they doubt whether he will be mercifull to them or no, because they enclose within too narrow boundes the very same mercifulnesse, of which they thinke themselves most assuredly perswaded. For thus they thinke with themselves, that his mercie is indeed great and plentifull poured out upon many, offering it selfe and ready for all men: but that it is not certaine whether it will extend unto them or no, or rather whether they shall attaine unto it or no. This thought when it stayeth in the mid race, is but an halfe. Therefore it doth not so confirme the Spirit with assured quierness, as it doth trouble it with unquiet doubtfulness. But there is a farre other feeling of full assurednesse, which in the Scriptures is alway assigned to Faith, even such a one as plainly setting before us the goodnesse of God, doth clearly put it out of doubt. And that cannot be, but that we must needs truly seele and prove in our selves the sweetnesse thereof. And therefore the Apostle out of Faith deriveth assured confidence, and out of it againe boldnesse: For thus he saith, that by Christ wee have boldnesse, and an entrance with confidence, which is through Faith in him. By which words truly hee sheweth, that it is no right Faith, but when we are bold with quiet mindes to shew our selves in the presence of God. Which boldnesse proceedeth not but of assured confidence of Gods good will and our salvation. Which is so true, that many times this word Faith, is used for Confidence.

16. But hereupon hangeth the chiefe stay of our Faith, that we doe not thinke the promises of mercy which the Lord offereth to be true onely in other beside us, and not at all in our selves: but rather that in inwardly embracing them, wee make them our owne. From hence proceedeth that Confidence which the same Paul in another place calleth peace, unlesse some had rather say, that Peace is derived of it. It is an assurednesse that maketh the Conscience quiet and chearefull before God, without which the Conscience must of necessitie be vexed, and in a manner torne in peeces with troublesome trembling, unlesse perhaps it doe forget God and it selfe, and so slumber a little while. And I may truly say, For a little while, for it doth not long enjoy that miserable forgetfulness, but is with often recourse of the remembrance of Gods judgement sharply tormented. Briefly, there is none truly faithfull, but hee that being perswaded with a sound assurednesse that God is his mercifull and loving Father, doth promise himselfe all things upon trust of Gods goodnesse: and none but hee that trusting upon the promises of Gods good will toward him, conceiveth an undoubted looking for of salvation: as the Apostle sheweth in these words: if we keepe sure to the end our confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby hee meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord, but he that with Confidence glorieth that he is heire of the kingdome of heaven. There is none (I say) faithfull, but hee that leaning upon the assurednesse of his owne salvation, doth confidently triumph upon the Devill and death, as we are taught by that notable concluding sentence of Paul: I am perswaded (saith he) that neither death, nor

life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, wherewith he embraceth us in Christ Jesu. And in like manner the same Apostle thinketh, that the eyes of our minde are by no other meane well lightned, unlesse we see what is the hope of the eternall inheritance to which we are called. And each where his common manner of teaching is such, that he declareth, that no other wise we doe not well comprehend the goodnesse of God, unlesse we gather of it the fruit of great assurednesse.

17. But (some man will say) the faithfull doe finde by experience a farre other thing within themselves, which in recording the grace of God towards them, are not onely tempted with unquietnesse, which oftentimes chanceth unto them, but also are sometime shaken with most grievous terrours: so great is the vehemencie of temptations to throw downe their mindes: which thing seemeth not sufficiently well to agree with that assurednesse of faith. Therefore this doubt must be answered, if we will have our assured said doctrine to stand. But truly when we teach that faith ought to be certaine and assured, we doe not imagine such a certainty as is touch'd with no doubting, nor such an assurednesse as is assailed with no carefulnesse: but rather we say, that the faithfull have a perpetuall strife with their owne distrustfulnesse. So farre be we from settling their consciences in such a peaceable quietnesse, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other side we say, that in what sort soever they be afflicted, they doe never fall and depart from that assured confidence which they have conceived of the mercy of God. The Scripture setteth forth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable than in David, especially if a man behold the whole continuall course of his life. But yet how he was not alway of quiet minde, himselfe declareth by innumerable complaints, of which at this time it shall be sufficient to chuse out a few. When he reproacheth his owne soule with troublesome motions, what is it else but that he is angry with his owne unbelievingnesse? Why tremblest thou my soule (saith he) and why art thou disquieted within me? trust in God. And truly that same discouragement was a plaine token of destruction, even as if he thought himselfe to be forsaken of God. And in another place we reade a larger confession thereof, where he saith; I said in my overthrow, I am cast out from the sight of thy eyes. Also in another place he disputeth with himselfe in carefull and miserable perplexity, yea and quarrelleth of the very nature of God, saying; Hath God forgotten to have mercie? will he cast off for ever? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I have said, To die is mine: charges are of the right hand of the highest. For, as in despaire he condemneth himselfe to destruction, and not onely confesseth himselfe to be tossed with doubting, but as if he were vanquished in battell, he leaveth nothing to himselfe, because God hath forsaken him, and hath turned to destroy him, the same hand that was wont to be his helper. Wherefore not without cause he exhorteth his soule to returne to her quietnesse, because he had found by experience, that he was tossed among troublesome waves. And yet (which is marvellous) in all these assaults, Faith upholdeth the hearts of the godly, and is truly like unto a Date tree, to endeavour and rise upward against all burdens, how great soever they be: as David when he might seeme to be utterly overwhelmed, yet in rebuking himselfe, ceaseth not to rise up to God. And truly, he that striving with his owne weaknesse, resorteth to Faith in his troubles, is already in a manner conquerour. Which may be gathered by this sentence and other like: Wait for the Lord, be strong, he shall strengthen thy heart: Wait for the Lord. He reproacheth himselfe of fearfulnessse, and in repeating that same twice, confesseth himselfe to be sometimes subject to many troublesome motions. And in the meane time he doth not onely become displeas'd with himselfe in these faults, but earnestly endeavoureth to amendment. Truly, if we will more neerely by good examination compare him with Achaz, there shall bee found great difference; Esay was sent to bring remedie to the carefull griefe of the wicked King and hypocrite, and spake unto him in these words: Be in safeguard, and be quiet: feare not, &c. But what did Achaz? As it was before said, that his heart was moved, as the trees of the wood are shaken with wind, though he heard the promise, yet hee ceased not to quake for feare. This therefore is the proper reward and punishment of unbelieft, so to tremble for feare, that in temptation he turneth himselfe away from God, that doth not open to himselfe the gate by faith. Contrariwise, the faithfull whom the weighty burdens of temptations maketh to stoope, and in a manner oppresse, doe constantly rise up, although not without trouble and hardnesse. And because they know their owne weaknesse, they pray with the Prophet; Take not the word of truth away from my mouth continually. By which words wee are taught, that sometime they become dumbe, as though their faith were utterly overthrowne, yet they faint not, nor turne their backs, but proceed in their battell, and with prayer doe encourage their slothfulnesse, left by favouring themselves, they should grow to unensible dulnesse.

18. For the understanding thereof, it is needfull to turne to that division of the flesh and the spirit, whereof we made mention in another place, which doth in this behalfe most clearly appeare. The godly heart therefore seeleth a division in it selfe, which is partly delighted with sweetnesse by acknowledging the goodnesse of God, and partly grieved with bitternesse, by feeling of his owne misery, partly resteth upon the promise of the Gospell, and partly trembleth by reason of the testimonie of his owne wickednesse: partly rejoyleth with conceiving of life, and partly quaketh for feare of death. Which variation commeth by imperfection of Faith, forasmuch as wee never be in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all disease of distrustfulnesse, to be altogether filled & possessed with faith. Hereupon proceed those battells, when the distrustfulnesse that abideth in the remnants of the flesh, riseth up to assaile the faith which is inwardly conceived. But if in a faithfull minde assurednesse be mixed with doubtfulnesse, come we not alway to this point, that Faith standeth not in a certain and cleare knowledge, but in a darke & doubtfully entangled knowledge of Gods will towards us? No, not so. For though we be diversly drawne with sundry thoughts, yet are we not therefore by and by severed from faith, though we be vexed with tossing up and downe of distrustfulnesse, yet are we not therefore drowned in the bottomlesse depth thereof: and though we be shaken, yet be we not thrust downe out of our place. For this is alway the end of this battell, that faith doth at length with wrestling, overcome those hard troubles, wherewith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

19. Let this be the summe of all. So soone as any drop of faith, be it never so small, is powred into our hearts, we by and by beginne to behold the face of God milde and pleasant, and loving toward us: yet the same we see from a far off, and far distant from us, but with so sure sight, that we know we are not deceived. From thence forward, how much we profit (as we ought continually to profit) as it were by proceeding further, we come unto so much the neerer, and therefore certainer beholding of him, and by very continuance he is made more familiar unto us. So we see, that the minde enlightened with the knowledge of God, is first holden wrapped in much ignorance, which by little and little is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some things, or by darkly seeing that which the seeth, but that the enjoyeth a cleare knowledge of Gods will toward her, which is the first and principall point in faith. For as if a man being shut up in prison, have beames of the Sunne shining in side-long at a narrow window, or as it were but halfe glimmering, he wanteth indeed the free beholding of the Sunne, yet he seeth with his eyes an undoubted brightnesse thereof, and receiveth the use of it: so we being bound with the fetters of an earthly body, howsoever we be on each side shadowed with much darknesse, yet are we sufficiently enlightened unto perfect assurednesse, by the light of God, extending his beames of light upon us, though it be but a little, to shew forth his mercy.

20. Both these points the Apostle very well teacheth in divers places. For when he saith, that we know imperfectly, and prophetic imperfectly, and see by a darke speaking as by a glasse, he sheweth how slender a little portion of the true godly wisdom is given us in this present life. For though those words doe not expressly shew that our faith is imperfect so long as we groane under this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth unto us by our owne imperfection, that we have need to be continually exercised in learning, yet he secretly declareth that that thing which is infinite, cannot be comprehended by our small capacitie, and narrow compassse. And this Paul reporteth of the whole Church, but unto every one of us, his owne dulnesse is an hinderance & stay that he cannot come so neere as were to be wished. But how sure and undecivable a taste of it selfe, even a small drop of faith doth make us feeble, the same Apostle sheweth in another place, where he affirmeth, that by the Gospell we behold the glory of God with uncovered face, having no vail betweene us and it, so effectually that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglements of ignorance there must needs be wrapped together both much doubting and fearefull trembling, specially forasmuch as our heart, by a certaine naturall instinct of it selfe, is inclined to unbelieveingnesse. Beside that, there be tentations, both infinite in number, and divers in kinde, doe oftentimes with great sudden violence assaile us. But specially our owne conscience oppressed with heauey burden of sinnes lying upon it, doth sometime lament and grone with it selfe, and sometime accuseth it selfe: sometime secretly murmureth, and sometime is openly troubled. Whether therefore adversities doe shew an apparance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth finde in it selfe any prooffe or matter of his wrath, from thence unbeliefe doth take weapons and engines to vanquish faith withall: which are alway directed to this end, that we thinking God to bee our adversarie and hatefully bent against us, should both not hope for any helpe at his hand, and also be afraid of him as of our deadly enemye.

21. To beare these assaults, faith doth arme and fortifie herselfe with the Word of God. And when such a temptation assaileth, that God is our enemye, because he is sharpe against us: faith on the other side answereth, that even when hee punisheth hee is also mercifull, because his chastilements cometh rather of love than of wrath. When faith is stricken with this thought, that God is a revenger of iniquities, against that stroke he setteth his pardon ready for all offences, so often as the sinner resorteth to the mercifulnesse of the Lord. So a godly minde, howsoever it be in marvellous wise tossed and vexed, yet at length riseth up above all dangers, and never suffereth the confidence of Gods mercy to bee plucked away from it: But rather whatsoever contentions doe trouble & wearie it, in the end they turne to the assurednes of this confidence. And hereof this is a prooffe: that the holy ones, when they thinke themselves most of all pressed with the vengeance of God, yet even then doe make their complaints to the same God, and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, even then nevertheless they call upon him. For to what purpose were it, to make their mane to him, from whom they hoped for no comfort? truly they would never finde in their hearts to call upon him, unless they beleaved that there were some helpe at his hand prepared for them. So the Disciples, in whom Christ blameth their smallnesse of faith, complained indeed that they perished, but yet they called to him for helpe. And when he rebuked them for their small faith, yet he doth not reject them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the unbelievers, but stirreth them to shake of that fault. Therefore we affirme againe that which we have afore spoken, that the roote of faith is never plucked out of godly heart, but sticketh so fast in the bottome, that howsoever it be shaken and seeme to bend this way or that way, the light therof is so never quenched or choked up, but that it lieth at least hidden under some embers: and by this token is plainly shewed that the word which is an uncorruptible seed, bringeth forth fruit like to it selfe, the Spring whereof doth never wither and utterly perish. For whereas this is the extremest matter of despair to the holy ones to feeble according to the consideration of present things, the hand of God bent to their destruction: yet Job affirmeth, that his hope shall proceed so farre, that though God doe kill him, yet he will not therefore cease to trust in him. This is the truth therefore. Unbeliefe reigneth not within the hearts of the godly, but outwardly assaileth them: neither doth shee deadly wound them with her weapons, but onely troubleth them, or so hurteth them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth, serveth us for a shield, that being holden up against weapons, doth so receive the force of them, that it either utterly driverth them backe, or at least so breaketh their violence, that they cannot pierce them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a strong souldier with the violent stroke of a dart be compelled to remove his foot, and give ground a little: and when faith it selfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke bee in some part broken, but yet so that it is not stricken thorow. For alway the godly minde will attaine to rise thus high as to say with David, If I walke in the middle of the shadow of death. I will fear none evil, because thou art with me. It is indeed terrible to walke in the darknesse of death, and it cannot be but that the faithfull, how much strength soever they have, must be afraid of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, that they have God present with them, & providing for their safety, that feare is overcome with assurednes. For (as Augustine saith) how great engines soever the divell raiseth up against us, so long as he possesseth not the place of the hart, where faith dwelleth, he is cast out of the dores. And so if we may judge by the successe, the faithfull not onely escape safe from every battell, so that by and by receiving fresh courage, they are ready to come againe into the field: but also that is fulfilled which John saith in his Canonickall Epistle: This is the victorie that overcome the world, even your faith. For he affirmeth, that it shall not onely win the victory in one or few battels, or against some one assault, but also that it shall get the over-hand of all the world, although it be a thousand times assailed.

1 Joh. 5. 4.

All feare is not
faith.

22. There is another kinde of feare and trembling, but such a one as by it the assurednesse of faith is so nothing at all diminished, that thereby it is the more soundly established. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the example of Gods vengeance against the wicked are shewed for lessons for them to learne by, do carefully beware that they happen not to provoke Gods wrath against themselves with the same offences: or recording with themselves their owne miserie, doe learne to hang altogether upon the Lord, without whom they see themselves to be more sickle, and sooner vanishing than any blast of wind. For when the Apostle, in setting forth the scourges wherewith the Lord in old time had punished the children of Israel, purteth the Corinthians in feare, that they entangle not themselves with like evils: he doth not thereby abate their affiance, but onely shaketh away the dulnesse of the flesh, by which faith is wont more to be oppressed than strengthened. And when hee taketh occasion of the Jewes fall, to exhort him that standeth to take heed that he fall not, he doth not thereby bid us to waver, as though he were not fully assured of our stedfastnesse, but onely hee taketh away arrogant presumption, and rash trusting too much in our owne strength, that after the thrusting out of the Jewes, the Gentiles being received into their place, should not too much outrageously triumph against them. Albeit he speaketh there not onely to the faithfull, but also in the same saying comprehendeth the hypocrites that gloried onely in outward shew. For neither doth he admonish every man particularly, but making a comparison betweene the Jewes and the Gentiles, after that he had shewed that the Jewes, in this that they were rejected, did suffer just judgement for their unbelief and unthankfulnesse, he also exhorteth the Gentiles, that they should not, by being proud and extolling themselves, lose the grace of adoption lately conveyed in them. but as in that generall rejecting of the Jewes, there remained yet some that were not fallen from the covenant of adoption, so out of the Gentiles there might arise some, which without true faith, should be puffed up onely with foolish confidence of the flesh, and so abuse Gods loving kindnesse to their owne destruction. But although you take this as spoken to the elect and faithfull, yet thereupon shall follow no inconvenience. For it is one thing to hold downe the rash presumption, which out of the remnants of the flesh creepeth sometime even into the holy ones, that with vaine confidence it wax not outrageously wanton: and another thing to strike the conscience with feare, that it rest not with full assurednesse in the mercy of God.

23. Then, when he teacheth, that with feare and trembling we should worke our owne salvation, he requirerh nothing else, but that we should accustom us with much abasing of our selves, reverently to looke up into the mightinesse of God. For truly nothing doth so much awake us, to cast all our confidence and assurance of minde upon the Lord, as doth the distrust of our selves, and carefulnesse conceived by knowledge in conscience of our owne wretchednesse. And according to this meaning is that saying in the Prophet to be taken: In the multitude of thy goodnesse I will enter into thy Temple: I will worship in feare. Where hee comely conjoyneth the boldnesse of faith that leaneth upon Gods mercy with a reverent feare, which wee must needs feele so oft as comming into the sight of Gods Majestie, wee perceive by the glorious brightnesse thereof, how great is our owne filthines. And Salomon saith truly, where he pronounceth the man blessed, that continually maketh his owne heart afraid, for by hardning thereof men fall headlong into evill. But such feare he meaneth as may make us more heedfull, not such whereby we should be troubled and utterly fall: even such a feare as when the minde confounded in it selfe, doth recover it selfe againe in God: when despairing it selfe, it reviveth by trust in him. Therefore there is no cause to the contrary, but that the faithfull may at one time both be in feare, and also enjoy most assured comfort, in respect that sometime they turne their eyes to behold their owne vanity, and sometime they cast the thought of their minde upon the truth of God. But how (will some man say) shall feare and faith dwell both in one minde? Even thus, as contrarily unseensible dullnesse and carelesnesse. For whereas the wicked travell to procure to themselves a want of griefe, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet the judgement of God so preserth them, that they cannot attaine that which they desire. So there is nothing to withstand, but that God may exercise them that be his to humility, that in fighting valiantly, they may restrain themselves under the bridle of modesty. And by the proesse of the text it appeareth, that this was the intent of the Apostle, where he assigneth the cause of feare, and trembling to be the good pleasure of God, whereby hee giveth to them that be his, both to will well, and valiantly to goe through with it. According to this meaning ought we to take that saying of the Prophet: The children of Israell shall feare God and his goodnesse: because not onely godlinesse engendreth the reverence of God, but the very sweetnesse and pleasant taste of grace, filleth man being discouraged in himselfe with feare and admiration, to make him hang upon God, and humbly yeeld himselfe subject to his power.

24. Yet we doe not hereby make roome to that most pestilent Philoſophy, which many halfe Papiſts at this day begin to coine in corners. For, because they cannot defend that grosse doubtfullnesse which hath bene taught in Schooles, they flie to another device, to make a confidence mingled with distrustfullnesse. They confesse, that so oft as we looke unto Christ, we finde in him full matter to hope well: but because we are alwayes unworthy of those good things that are offered us in Christ, they would have us to waver and stagger in beholding our owne unworthinesse. Briefly, they place confidence so betwene hope and feare, that it altereth from the one to the other, by interchangeable times and courses: and they so compare faith and hope together, that when the one springeth up, the other is pressed downe, when the one ariseth, the other againe falleth. So when Satan seeth that those open engines wherewith before time hee was wont to destroy the assurednesse of faith, doe now nothing prevaille, he endeavoureth by crooked underminings to overthrow it. But what manner of confidence shall that be, which shall now and then yeeld to desperation? If (say they) thou consider Christ, there is assured salvation: but if thou returne to thy selfe, there is assured damnation. Therefore of necessity distrust and good hope must by interchangeable courses reigne in thy minde: As though we ought to imagine Christ standing a farre off, and not rather dwelling within us. For therefore we looke for salvation at his hand, not because he appeareth a farre off unto us, but because he hath grafted us into his body, and so maketh us partakers, not onely of all his good things, but also of himselfe. Therefore I turne this their argument against themselves: if thou consider thy selfe, there is certaine damnation. But because Christ with all his good things is by way of communicating so given unto thee, that all his things are made thine, and thou art made a member of him, yea, and all one with him: his righteousnesse drowneth thy finnes, his salvation taketh away thy damnation: he by his worthinesse commeth betwene thee and God, that thy unworthinesse come not in the sight of God. Briefly, this is the truth; wee ought neither to separate Christ from us, nor us from him, but with both hands to hold fast that fellowship whereby hee hath coupled himselfe unto us. So the Apostle teacheth us: The body indeed (saith hee) is dead by reason of sinne: but the spirit of Christ that dwelleth in you, is life for righteousness. According to these mens trifling device, he should have said, Christ indeed hath life with himselfe: but you, as you be sinners, remaine subject to death and damnation. But he saith farre otherwise. For he teacheth that that damnation which we deserve of our selves, is swallowed up by the salvation of Christ: and to prove it, he useth the same reason that I have alleaged, because Christ is not without us, but dwelleth within us, & cleaveth unto us not only with an undividable knot of fellowship, but with a certaine marvellous communion daily more and more groweth with us into one body, till he be made altogether one with us. And yet I deny not, as I have said a little before, that sometime there happen certaine interruptions of faith, as the weaknesse thereof is among violent sudden motions bowed hither or thither. So in the thicke mist of tentation the light thereof is choaked, but whatsoeuer hapneth, it ceaseth not from endeavour to seeke God.

25. And no otherwise doth Bernard argue, when hee purposely entreateth of this question, in his fifth Homilie in the dedication of the Temple. Oftentimes (I say) by the benefit of God studying upon the soule, mee thinke I finde in it two things as it were contrary. If I behold the soule it selfe, as it is in it selfe and of it selfe, I can say nothing more truely of it, than that it is utterly brought to naught. What need I now to reckon up particularly all the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with finnes, covered with darknesse, entangled with deceitfull entisements, itching with lusts, subject to passions, filled with illusions, alway inclined to evill, bent to all kinds of vice, finally, full of shame and confusion? Now if all the very righteousnesse of it, being looked upon by the light of truth, be found like a cloth stained with flowers, then what shall the unrighteousnesse thereof be accounted? If the light that is in us be darknesse, how great shall the very darknesse be? What then? without doubt man is made like unto vanity: man is brought to nought: man is nothing. But how then? is he utterly nothing whom God doth magnifie? How then is he nothing, toward whom Gods heart is set? Brethren, let us take heart againe: Though we be nothing in our owne hearts, peradventure there may somewhat of us lie hidden in the heart of God. O Father of mercies, O Father of the miserable, how dost thou set thy heart toward us? For thy heart is where thy treasure is. But how be we thy treasure, if we be nothing? All Nations are so before thee as if they were not, they shall be reputed as nothing. Even before thee, not within thee: so in the judgement of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pitie. Thou callest those things that are not as though they were. Therefore both they are not, because thou callest those things that are not, and also they are because thou callest them. For though they are not, in respect of themselves, yet with thee they are, according to that saying of Paul, not of the works of righteousnesse, but of him that calleth. And then he saith, that this coupling together of both considerations is marvellous. Truly those things that are knit together, doe not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion he more plainly declareth in these words. Now if with both these considerations we diligently looke upon our selves what we be, yea, in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I thinke our glorying seemeth to be tempered, but peradventure it is more encreased. Truly, it is perfectly stablished, that we glory not in our selves, but in the Lord. If we thinke thus; If he hath determined to save us, we shall by and by be delivered: now in this we may take courage. But let us climbe up into a higher watch tower, and seeke for the City of God, seeke for the Temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the Spouse. I have not forgotten, but I say it with feare and reverence, we I say be but in the heart of God. We be, but by his allowing as worthy, not by our owne worthinesse.

26. Now, the feare of the Lord, whereof commonly in every place witness is borne to all the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisdom, and in some places wisdom it selfe, although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a of double understanding. For God hath in himselfe the reverence both of a father and of a Lord. Therefore he that will truly worship him, will endeavour to shew himselfe both an obedient sonne, and a serviceable servant unto him: The obedience that is given to him as a father, the Lord by the Prophet calleth honour: the service that is done to him as a Lord, he calleth feare. The sonne (saith hee) honoureth the Father, and the servant the Lord. If I be a Father, where is my honour? If I be a Lord, where is my feare? But howsoever hee putteth difference betweene them, thou seest how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the feare of the Lord be unto us a reverence mingled with that same honour and feare. Neither is it any marvell if one minde receive both those affections. For he that considereth with himselfe what a Father God is unto us, he hath cause enough, although there were no hels at all, why he should dread his displeasure more grievously than any death. But also (such is the warrennes of our flesh to run to licentiousnes of sinning) to restrain the same by all meanes, we ought therewithall to take hold of this thought, that the Lord under whose power we live, abhorreth all iniquity, whose vengeance they shall not escape, that in living wickedly doe provoke his wrath against themselves.

27 But that which John saith, that feare is not in charity, but perfect charity casteth out feare, because feare containeth punishment, disagreeeth not with this that we say. For the wicked feare not God in this respect, that they dread to incurre his displeasure, if they might doe it without punishment: but because they know him to be armed with power to revenge: therefore they shake for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And also they so feare his wrath, because they thinke it hangeth over them, for that they looke every moment when it shall fall upon their heads. As for the faithfull: they (as is above said) both feare his displeasure more than punishment, and are not troubled with feare of punishment, as if it did hang over their necks, but they are made the more warie not to procure it. So saith the Apostle when he speaketh to the faithfull: Be ye not deceived: for this, commeth the wrath of God upon the children of unbeliefe. He threatneth not that Gods wrath will come upon them, but putteth them in minde to thinke upon this, that the wrath of God is prepared for such wicked doings as he had recited, that they themselves should not be willing also to prove it. Albeit it seldome happeneth, that the reprobate be awaked with only and bare threatnings, but rather being already grosse and unfeably dull with their own hardnesse, so oft as God thundreth from heaven, they harden themselves to obstinacy, but when they are once stricken with his hand, then whether they will or no, they be enforced to feare. This feare they commonly call a servile feare: and in comparison set it for contrary to free-natured and willing feare which becommeth children. Some other doe subtly thrust in a middle kind, because that same servile and constrained affection, sometime so subdueth mens minds, that they come willingly to the feare of God.

28 Now we understand, that in the good will of God, whereunto faith is said to have respect, the possession of salvation and eternall life is obtained. For if we can want no good thing, while God is favourable unto us, it abundantly sufficeth us to the assurednesse of salvation, when hee himselfe doth assure us of his love. Let him shew his face (such the Prophet) and we shall be safe. Whereupon the Scriptures determine this to be the summe of our salvation, that God putting away all enmities, hath received us into favour. Whereby they shew, that when God is reconciled untoous, there remaineth no perill, but that all things shall prosper well with us. Therefore faith having taken hold of the love of God, hath promises of the present life, and of the life to come, and perfect assurednesse of all good things; but that same, such as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainly promise to it selfe either the length of honor or wealth of this life, forasmuch as God willed none of these things to be appointed unto us, but is contented with this assurednesse, that God will never faile, howsoever many things faile us that pertaine to the maintenance of this present life. But the chiefe assurednesse of faith resteth in expectation of the life to come, which is set out of doubt by the word of God. But whatsoever miseries and calamities betide unto them whom God loveth, they cannot worke the contrary, but that his good will is perfect felicity. Therefore when he did meane to expresse the summe of blessednes, wenaed the favour of God, out of which spring doe flow unto us all kinds of good things. And this we may commonly note throughout the Scriptures, that whensoever mention is made not onely of eternall salvation, but also of any good thing in us, we be alway called backe to the love of God. For which cause David saith, that the goodnesse of God when it is felt in a godly heart, is sweeter and more to be desired than life it selfe. Finally, if all things else doe flow unto us according to our owne wishing, and we be uncertaine of Gods love or hatred, our felicity shall be accursed, and therefore miserable: But if the favourable face of God doe shine unto us, even our very miseries shall be blessed, because they are turned to helpe of our salvation. As Paul, when he heareth up a rehearsal of all adversities, yet hee glorieth that he was not by them severed from the love of God: and in his prayers he alway beginneth at the favour of God from whence floweth all prosperity. Likewise David setteth the onely favour of God against all the terrors that trouble us. If (saith he) I shall walke in the midst of the shadow of death, I will feare no evils, because thou art with me. And we alway feele that our minds doe waver, unlesse being contented with the favour of God, they seeke their peace in it, and have this inwardly fixed in them, that is said in the Psalme; Blessed is the people, whose God is the Lord, and the Nation whom he hath chosen to him for his inheritance.

29. We make the foundation of faith to be the free promise of God, because faith properly stayeth upon it. For though faith doe beleev God to be true in all things, whether he command or forbid, whether he promise or threaten, and also obediently receiveth his commandments, and bewareth of things that he prohibiteth, and hath regard to his threatnings, yet properly it beginneth at the promise, and therein continueth, and thereupon endeth. For, faith seeketh for life in God, which is not found in commandments or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercie, and in no other promise, but such as is freely given. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sent to our owne workes, doth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceive it to stand in our selves. Therefore if we will not have our faith to tremble and waver, we must stay it with that promise of salvation, which is willingly and liberally offered us of the Lord, rather in respect of our miserie, than of our owne worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle beareth this witness of the Gospell, that it is the word of faith, which name he taketh both from the commandments, and also from the promises of the law, because there is nothing that can stablish faith, but that liberall Embassage by which God reconcileth the world to himselfe. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the Gospell together, when hee teacheth that the ministerie of the Gospell was committed to him unto the obedience of faith, that the same is the power of God to salvation to every one that beleeveth: that in it is revealed the righteousnesse of God from faith to faith. And no marvell: For sith the Gospell is the ministry of reconciliation, there is no other testimony sure enough of Gods good will toward us, the knowledge whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest upon free promise, we doe not deny but that the faithfull doe every way embrace and receive the Word of God, but wee appoint the promise of mercie to be the proper marke of faith. Even as the faithfull ought indeed to acknowledge God to be the Judge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly have regard unto his mercifull kindnesse: for as much as he is described to them to be considered such a one as is loving and mercifull, farr from wrath, of much goodnesse, gentle unto all, powring forth his mercie upon all his workes.

30. Neither yet doe I regard the barkings of Pighius, or such other dogges, when they finde fault with this restraint, as though in dividing faith, it did take hold but of one peece thereof. I grant (as I have already said) that the generall object of faith (as they tearme it) is the truth of God, whether he threaten or put us in hope of favour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe feared the distraction of the world, when it was not yet seene. If the feare of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith then ought not the threatnings to be excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeed true. But the cavillers doe unjustly accuse us, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the parts of the Word of God. For our meaning is onely to shew those two things, first, that faith never stedfastly standeth untill it come to free promise: and then that we are no otherwise by it to be reconciled to God, but because it completh us to Christ. Both these points are worthy to be noted. Wee seeke such a faith, which may make difference betweene the children of God and the reprobate, betweene the faithfull and the unbelieving. If a man doe beleev that God both justly commandeth all that hee commandeth, and truly threatneth, shall hee be therefore called faithfull? Nothing lesse. Therefore there can be no stedfast stay of faith, unlesse it be grounded upon the mercy of God. But now to what end doe wee dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of salvation? But how doth faith bring salvation, but in respect that it graffeth us into the body of Christ? Therefore there is no inconvenience, if in the definition we doe enforce the principall effect thereof, off, and doe joyne unto the general name, instead of a difference, that marke that severeth the faithfull from the unbelieving. Finally, the malicious have nothing to finde fault withall in this doctrine, but they must wrap up Paul with us in the same blame, which calleth the Gospell properly the word of faith.

31. But hereupon againe we gather that which we have before declared, that faith, doth no lesse neede the word, than the fruit doth neede the lively root of the tree, because no other (as David testifieth) can trust in the Lord, but they that know his name. But this knowledge is not according to every mans imagination, but so far as God himselfe is witness of his owne goodnesse. Which the same Prophet confirmeth in another place, saying: Thy salvation is according to thy word. Againe, I have trusted in thy word save me. Where is to bee noted the relation of faith to the word, and then how salvation followeth. And yet in the meane time wee doe not exclude the power of God, with beholding whereof, unlesse faith sustaine it selfe, it can never give unto God his due honour. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certaine slender and common thing of Abraham, that he believed that God which had promised him the blessed seede, was able to performe it. Againe in another place, speaking of himselfe: I know whom I have believed, and I am sure that he is able to keepe that which I have left with him untill that day. But if a man weigh with himselfe how many doubtings of the power of God doe oftentimes creepe into mans minde, he shall well perceive that they, which doe highly esteeme it as it is worthie, have not a little profited in faith. We all will confesse, that God is able to doe whatsoever he will, but when even the least tentation throweth us downe with feare, and amazeth us with horror, thereby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of Gods power, when we prefer above it those things, that Sathan threatneth against Gods promises. This is the reason why Esay, meaning to print into the hearts of the people the assurednesse of salvation, doth so honorably in-treat of the infinite power of God. It seemeth oft that so soone as he hath begun to speak of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, hee by and by turneth to another thing, and wandreth about in long and superfluous circumstances, rehearsing how marvellously the Lord governeth the frame of Heaven and earth, and the whole order of nature; yet is here nothing that serveth not fitly for the circumstance of the matter that hee speaketh of. For unlesse the power of God whereby he is able to doe all things, be presently set before our eyes, our eares will hardly heare the Word or will not esteeme it so much as it is worth. Beside that, here is declared his effectual power, because godlinesse (as we have already shewed in another place) doth alway apply the power of God to use and worke, specially it setteth before it selfe those workes of God, whereby he hath testified himselfe to be a father. Hereupon commeth that in the Scriptures is so often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Israelites might have learned that God which was once the Author of salvation, will bee an everlasting preserver thereof. And David putteth us in minde by his owne example, that those benefites which God hath particularly bestowed upon every man, doe afterward avails to the confirmation of his faith. Yea when God seemeth to have forsaken us, it behoveth us to stretch our wits further, that his ancient benefites may recomfort us, as it is said in another Psalme, I have been mindfull of old daies. I have studied upon all thy workes, &c. Againe, I will remember the workes of the Lord, and his marvels from the beginning. But because without the word, all quickly vanisheth away that wee conceive of the power of God and of his workes: therefore we doe not without cause affirme that there is no faith, unlesse God give light unto it with testimonie of his grace. But here a question might be moved, what is to bee thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which being moved as it seemeth with zeale of faith, passed beyond the be bounds of the word. Sara, when she fervently desired the promised issue, gave her bondmaide to her husband. It cannot be denied but that she many waies sinned: but now I touch only this fault, that being carried away with her zeale, she did not restrain her selfe within the boundes of Gods word, yet it is certaine that that desire proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the Oracle of God, of the election of her sonne Jacob, procured his blessing by evill crafty meanes: shee deceived her husband the witness and minister of the grace of God: shee compelled her sonne to lie: shee by divers guiles and deceites corrupted corrupted the truth of God : Finally, in making a scorn of his promise, she did as much as in her lay, destroy it. And yet this act, how much soever it was evill, and worthis of blame, was not without faith, for it was necessarie that shee should overcome many offences, that shee might so earnestly endeavour to attaine that, which without hope of earthly profit was full of great troubles and dangers. As wee may not say that the holy Patriarch Isaac was altogether without faith, because he being by the same oracle of God admonished of the honour transferred to the younger sonne, yet ceased not to bee more favourably bent to his first begotten sonne Esau. Truly these examples do teach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet so that faith if it bee a true faith, hath alway the upper hand. For as the particular error of Rebecca did not make voide the effect of the blessing, so neither did it make void her faith which generally rained in her minde, and was the beginning and cause of that doing. Nevertheless therein Rebecca uttered how readie mans minde is to fall so soone as he giveth himselfe, never so little libertie. But though mans default and weakenesse doth darken faith, yet it doth not quench it : in the meane time it putteth us in minde, how carefully wee ought to hang upon the mouth of God, and also confirmeth that which wee have taught, that Faith vanisheth a way, unlesse it be upholden by the Word : as the mindes. both of Sara and Isaac and Rebecca had become vaine in their crooked wanderings out of the way, unlesse they had beene by Gods secret bridle holden in obedience of the Word.

32. Again, not without cause wee include all the promises in Christ, forasmuch as in the knowledge of him the Apostle includeth all the Gospell : and in another place he teacheth, that all the promises of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reason whereof is readie to be shewed. For if God promise anything, hee therein sheweth his good will : so that there is no promise of his, that is not a testimonie of his love. Neither maketh it any matter that the wicked, when they have great and continuall benefits of Gods liberalitie heaped upon them, doe thereby wrap themselves in so much the more grievous judgement. For sith they doe neither thinke, nor acknowledge that those things come unto them from the hand of God, for if they acknowledge it, they doe not with themselves consider his goodnesse, therefore they cannot thereby be better taught of his mercie than brut beasts, which according to the measure of their estate, doe receive the same fruit of Gods liberality, and yet they perceive it nor. Neither doth it any more make against us, that many times in refusing the promises appointed for them, they doe by that occasion procure to themselves the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promises doe then onely appeare, when they have found faith with us, yet the force and naturall proprietie of them is never extinguished by our unbeliefe or unthankfulnesse. Therefore when the Lord by his promises doth provoke man not onely to receive, but also to thinke upon the fruits of his bountifulnesse, he doth therewithall declare unto him his love. Whereupon wee must returne to this point, that every promise is a testifying of Gods love toward us. But it is out of question, that no man is loved of God but in Christ, hee is the beloved sonne, in whom the love of the Father abideth and resteth, and then from him powreth it selfe abroad unto us : as Paul teacheth, that we have obtained favour in the beloved one. Therefore it must needs be derived and come unto us by meane of him. For this cause the Apostle in another place calleth him our peace : in another place he setteth him out as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly naturall kindnesse bound unto us. It followeth then that we must cast our eyes upon him, so oft as any promise is offered us. And that Paul teacheth no absurditie, that all Gods promises whatsoever they bee, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. There be certaine examples that make for the contrarie. For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when he required of the Prophet the manner how to worship God aright, was instructed concerning the Mediator : yet his godlinesse is praised. Cornelius a Gentile and a Romane, could scarcely understand that which was knowne not to all the Jewes, yea and that very darkely : yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God, and the sacrifice of Naaman, by the Prophets answer allowed. Which thing neither of them could obtaine but by faith. Likewise it may be said of the Eunuch to whom Philip was carried, which if he had not had some faith, would nor have taken upon him the travell and expenses of so long a journey, to worship. Yet wee see, when

Philip examined him, how he bewrayed his ignorance of the Mediatour. And truly I grant that their faith was partly unexpressed, not onely concerning Christs person, but also concerning his power, and th<sup>e</sup> office committed unto him of the Father. Yet in the meane time it is certaine, that they were instructed in such principles, as gave them some taste of Christ, although but very small. Neither ought this to seeme strange: For neither would the Eunuch have come in haste to Jerusalem from a far Country to worship an unknowne God; neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Jewish Religion, spend so much time without being acquainted with the first grounds of true doctrine. As for Naaman, it had bene too fond an absurditie for Elizeus when he taught him of small things, to have said nothing of the principall point. Therefore although there were among them a darke knowledge of Christ, yet it is not likely that there was no knowledge, because they did use themselves in the sacrifices of the Law, which must have bene discerned by the very end of them, that is, Christ, from the false sacrifices of the Gentiles.

33. But this bare and outward declaration of the Word of God, ought to have largely sufficed to make it to be believed, if our owne blindness and stubbornesse did not withstand it. But our minde hath such an inclination to vanity, that it can never cleave fast unto the truth of God, and hath such a dulnesse, that it is alwayes blinde and cannot see the light thereof. Therefore there is nothing available done by the Word, without the enlightning of the Holy Ghost. Whereby also appeareth, that faith is far above mans understanding. Neither shall it be sufficient that the minde bee lightned with the Spirit of God, unlessse the heart bee also strengthened and stablished with his power. Wherein the Schoolmen doe altogether erre, which in considering of faith, doe onely take hold of a bare and simple assent by knowledge, leaving out the confidence and assurednesse of the heart. Therefore faith is both wayes a singular gift of God, both that the minde of man is cleansed to taste the truth of God, and that his heart is stablished therein. For the Holy Ghost not onely is the beginner of faith, but also by degrees increaseth it, untill by it he bring us to the heavenly Kingdome. That good thing (saith Paul) which was committed to thy keeping, keepe in the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us. But how Paul saith, that the Holy Ghost is given by the hearing of faith, we may easily dissolve it. If there had bene but one only gift of the Holy Ghost, then it had bene an absurdity for him to call the Holy Ghost the effect of faith, which is the author and cause of faith. But when he maketh report of the gifts wherewith God garnisheth his Church, and by encreasings of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no marvel if he ascribe those things to faith which maketh us fit to receive them. This is reckoned a most strange conclusion, when it is said, that no man but he to whom it is given, can believe in Christ. But that is partly because they doe not consider either how secret and high the heavenly wisdom is, or how great mans dulnesse is in conceiving the mysteries of God: and partly because they looke not unto that assured and stedfast constantnesse of heart, that is to say, the chiefe part of faith.

34. But if (as Paul preached) no man is witnesse of the will of man, but the spirit of man that is within him, then how should man be sure of the will of God? And if the truth of God be uncertaine among us, in those things which we presently behold with our eye, how should it be assured and stedfast among us there where the Lord promisseth such things, as neither eye seeth, nor wit comprehendeth? But herein mans sharpnesse of understanding is so overthrowne and faileth, that the first degree of profiting in Gods schoole, is to forsake his owne wit. For by it, as by a veile cast before us, we are hindered that we cannot attaine the mysteries of God, which are not disclosed but to little ones. For neither doth flesh and blond disclose, nor naturall man perceive those things that are of the spirit, but rather to him the learning of God is foolishnesse, because it is spiritually to be judged. Therefore herein the helpe of the Holy Ghost is necessary, or rather herein his force onely reigneth. There is no man that knoweth the mind of God, or hath bene his councillor: but the holy Spirit searcheth out all things, even the deepe secrets of God, by whom it is brought to passe, that we know the minde of Christ. No man (saith he) can come to mee, unlessse my Father that sent mee, draw him. Every one therefore that hath heard and learned of my Father, cometh: Not that that any man hath seene the father, but he that is sent of God. Even as therefore wee cannot come unto Christ, but being drawne by the spirit of God: so when wee bee drawne, we are lifted up in wit and minde above our understanding. For the soule enlightned by him, taketh as it were, a new sharpnesse of understanding, wherewith it may behold heavenly mysteries, with brightnesse whereof it was before dazeled in it selfe. And so mans understanding receiving brightnesse by the light of the holy Ghost, doth never till then truly begin to taste of those things that belong to the Kingdome of God, being before altogether unfavory, and without judgement of taste to take assay of them. Therefore when Christ did notably set out unto two of his disciples the mysteries of his kingdome, yet he nothing prevailed, untill he opened their senses, that they might understand the Scriptures. When the Apostles were so taught by his godly mouth, yet the Spirit of Truth must be sent unto them, to powre into their minds the same doctrine which they had heard with their eares. The word of God is like unto the Sunne, that shineth unto all them to whom it is preached, but to no profit among blinde men. But we are all in this behalfe blinde by nature, therefore it cannot pierce into our minde, but by the inward master, the holy Ghost, making by his enlightning an entry for it.

35. In another place, when we had to entreat of the corruption of nature, we have more largely shewed how unfit men are to beleewe. Therefore I will not weary the Readers with repeating the same againe. Let this be sufficient, that the spirit of faith is called of Paul, faith it selfe, which the spirit giveth us, but not which we have naturally. Therefore he prayeth that God fulfill in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the worke of God, and giving it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition, Gods good pleasure, he denieth that it is of mans owne motion: and not contented therewith, he addeth further, that it is a declaration of Gods power: writing to the Corinthians, where he saith, that faith hangeth not upon the wisdom of men, but is grounded upon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh indeed of outward miracles: but because the reprobates are blinde at the beholding of them, he comprehendeth also that inward seale, whereof he maketh mention in another place. And God the more gloriously to set forth his liberality in so noble a gift, vouchsafeth not to grant it to all universally without difference, but by singular priviledge giveth it to whom he will. For prooffe whereof wee have alleaged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithfull Expositor, crieth out that it would please the Saviour to teach him, and that the very beleiving it selfe, is of gift and not of deserving. No man (saith hee) commeth to me, unlesse my father draw him, and to whom it is given of my father. It is marvellous that two doe heare, the one despiseth, the other ascendeth up. Let him that despiseth impute it to himselfe: let him that ascendeth, not arrogantly assigne it to himselfe. In another place. Why is it given to one, and not to another? It grieveth me not to say it, this is the depth of the crosse. Out of I wot not what depth of the judgements of God which we may not search proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, saving that I see thus farre, that it is of God. But why him, and not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomlesse depth, it is the depth of the crosse. I may cry out with wondering, but not shew it in disputing. Finally, the summe commeth to this, that Christ when he enlightneth us unto faith by the power of his spirit, doth therewithall graffe us into his body, that we may be made partakers of good things.

truth is conceived in our minds, except the spirit scale it also to our hearts.*

36. Now it remaineth, that that which the minde hath received, may be further coveyed into the heart. For the Word of God is not thoroughly received by faith, if it swim in the top of the braine, but when it hath taken root in the bottome of the heart, that it may be an invincible defence to beare and repulse all the engines of tentations. Now if it be true, that the true understanding of the minde is the enlightning thereof, then in such confirmation of the heart, his power much more evidently appeareth, even by so much as the distrustfulness of the heart is greater than the blindness of the wit: and as it is harder to have the minde furnished with assurednesse, than the wit to be instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirit performeth the office of a seale, to seale up in our hearts those same promises, the assurance whereof it first imprinted in our wits, and serveth for an earnest to confirme and stablish them. Sith yee beleevd (saith the Apostle) yee are sealed up with the holy spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the Spirit the hartes of the faithfull are graven as with a seale? and how for the same reason he calleth him the Spirit of promise, because he ratifieth the Gospell unto us? Likewise to the Corinthians he saith: God which annointed us, which hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of his Spirit in our heart. And in another place when hee speaketh of confidence and boldnesse of hoping well, he maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof.

37. Neither yet have I forgotten that which I said before, the remembrance whereof experience continually renueth, that is, that Faith is tossed with divers doubtings, so that the mindes of the godly are feldome quiet, or at least doe not alway enjoy a peaceable estate: but with whatsoever engine they be shaken, either they rise up of the very gulfes of temptations, or doe abide fast in their standing. Truly this assurednesse onely nourisheth and defendeth Faith, when we hold fast that which is said in the Psalm. The Lord is our protection, our helpe in trouble, therefore we will not feare, when the earth shall tremble, and the mountaines shall leap into the heart of the Sea. Also this most sweet quietnesse is spoken of in another place: I lay downe and sleepe, and rose againe, because the Lord hath sustained mee: it is not meant thereby that David was alway with one undisturbed course framed to a merry cheerfulnesse: but in respect that he tasted the grace of God according to his proportion of Faith, therefore hee gloryeth that he without feare, despiseth all that ever might disquiet the peace of his minde. Therefore the Scripture meaning to exhort us to faith, biddeth us to be quiet. In Esay it is said: In hope and silence shall be your strength. In the Psalm: Hold thee still in the Lord, and waite for him. Wherewith agreeth that saying of the Apostle to the Hebrewes: Patience is needfull, &c.

38. Hereby we may judge how pestilent is that doctrine of the Schoolemen, that we can no otherwise determine of the grace of God toward us, than by morall conjecture, as every man thinketh himselfe worthy of it. Truly if wee shall weigh by our workes how God is minded toward us, I grant that wee can attaine it with any conjecture, be it never so slender: but sith Faith ought to have relation to a simple and free promise, there is left no cause of doubting. For with what confidence (I beseech you) shall we be armed, if we say that God is favourable unto us upon this condition, so that the purenesse of our life doe deserve it? But because I have appointed one place properly for the discussing hereof, therefore I will speake no more of them at this present, specially forasmuch as it is plaine enough, that there is nothing more contrarie to faith, than either conjecture or any thing neere unto doubting. And they doe very ill writhe to this purpose that testimonie of the Preacher, which they have oft in their mouths: No man knoweth whether hee bee worthe of hatred or love. For (to speake nothing how this place is in the common translation corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by such words: that is, that if any man will judge by the present state of things, whom God hateth, or whom God loveth, hee laboureth in vaine, and troubleth himselfe to no profit for his paines: sith all things happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth sacrifices and him that offereth none. Whereupon followeth, that God doth not alway witnesse his love to them, to whom he maketh all things happen prosperously, nor doth alwaies utter the hatred to them whom he punisheth. And that hee doth to condemne the vanitie of mans wit, sith it is so dull in things most needfull to be knowne: as hee had written a little before, that it cannot be discerned what the soule of man differeth from the soule of a beast, because it seemeth to die in like manner: If any man will gather thereof, that the opinion that we hold of the itamortality of Soules standeth upon conjecture: may he not worthily be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wits, which gather that there is no certaintie of Gods grace, because wee can conceive none by the carnall beholding of present things?

39. But they alleadge that it is a point of rash presumption, to take upon us an undoubted knowledge of Gods will. I would indeed grant it unto them, if wee did take so much upon us, that wee would make the incomprehensible secret purpose of God subject to the slenderesse of our wit: But when we simply say with Paul, that we have received not the spirit of this world, but the Spirit that is of God, by whose teaching we may know those things that are given us of God, what can they barke against it, but they must slanderously speake against the Spirit of God? But if it bee a horrible robbie of God to accuse the revelation that cometh from him, either to be lying, or unassured or undoubtfull, what doe we offend in affirming that it is assured? But they say, that this also is not without great presumptuousnesse that we dare so glory of the Spirit of Christ. Who would thinke that their dulnesse were so great that would be counted masters of the world, that they so fowly stumble in the first principles of Religion? Surely I would not thinke it credible, unlesse their owne writings, that are abroad did testifie it. Paul pronounceth that they onely are the children of God, that are moved with his Spirit: and these men would haue them that bee the children of God, to be moved with their owne spirit, and to be without the Spirit of God. Paul teacheth that we call God our Father, as the holy Ghost ministrerth that word unto us, which onely can beare witness to our Spirit that we are the Children of God: These men although they forbid us not to call upon God, yet doe take away his spirit, by whose guiding he should have been rightly called upon. Paul denieth that they are the servants of Christ, that are not moved with the Spirit of Christ: these men feigne a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirit of Christ. Paul maketh no hope of the blessed resurrection, unlesse we feele the holy Ghost abiding in us: they forge a hope without any such feeling. But peradventure they will answer, that they doe not denie, that we ought to be endued with it, but that it is a point of modestie and humilitie not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whether they be in the Faith, to proue themselves whether they have Christ, whom unlesse a man doe acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the Spirit that God hath given us (saith John) we know that he abideth in us. And what doe we else but call the promises of Christ in doubt, when we will be counted the servants of God without his Spirit, which he hath openly declared, that he would poure out upon all his? Beside that, we doe wrong to the holy Ghost, which doe separate from him Faith that is his peculiar worke. Sith these are the first lessons of godly religion, it is a token of miserable blindnesse to have Christians noted of arrogance, that dare glory of the presence of the holy Ghost, without which glorying Christianitie it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truly Christ said, that his Spirit is unknowne to the world, and is onely knowne of them with whom he abideth.

40. And because they will not goe about to overthrow the stedfastnesse of Faith with digging onely of one mine, they assaile it also otherwise. For they say, that although according to our present state of righteousnesse, we may gather a judgement of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perseverance to the end abideth in suspence. A goodly confidence of salvation forsooth is left unto us, if wee judge by morall conjecture, that for a present moment we be in favour, and what shall become of us to morrow we cannot tell. The Apostle teacheth farre other wise: I am surely perswaded (saith he) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, neither death nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shall sever us from the love wherewith the Lord embraceth us in Christ. They seeke to escape with a trifling solution, prating that the Apostle had that by special revelation. But they are holden too hard to slip away so. For there he entreateth of those good things that commonly come by Faith to the Faithfull, not those that hee himselfe specially feeleth. But the same Paul in another place putteth us in feare with mention of our weaknesse and unstedfastnesse: Let him that standeth (saith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a feare whereby wee should be overthrowne, but whereby we may learne to humble our selves under the mighty hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and truth is it to limit the assurednesse of Faith to a moment of time, whose proprietie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortality to come? Sith therefore the Faithfull doe impute it to the grace of God, that being lightened with his Spirit they doe by Faith enjoy the beholding of the heavenly life: so far is such glorying from presumptuousnes, that if any man be ashamed to confesse it, he doth therein more bewray his extreame unthankfulnesse, in unkindly hiding Gods goodnesse, than he doth declare his modestie or submission.

41. Because it seemed that the nature of Faith, could not otherwise better or more plainly bee declared, than by the substance of the promise upon which it resteth as upon her proper foundation; so that if the promise be taken away, Faith by and by falleth downe or rather vanisheih away: therefore we tooke our definition from thence, which yet varieth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applyeth to his discourse, where he saith that Faith is a substance of things to bee hoped for, and a certaintie of things that are not seene. For by this word Hypostasis substance (for that terme he useth) he meaneth as it were, an upholding stay, whereupon the godly minde leaneth and resteth. As if hee should say that faith is a certaine and assured possession of those things that are promised us of God, unless a man had rather to take Hypostasis for assistance, which I mislike not, albeit I follow that which is more commonly received. Again, to signifie that even to the last day when the bookes shall be opened, they are higher than those things that may be perceived with our senses, or seene with our eyes, or handled with our hands, and that the same are no otherwise possessed by us: but if wee goe beyond the capacity of our owne wit, and bend our understanding above all things that are in the world, yea and climbe above our selves, he hath therefore added that this assurednesse of possession, is of things that lie in hope, and therefore are not seene. For plain appearance (as Paul writeth) is not hope, neither hope we for those things that we see. And when he calleth it a certaintie or prooffe (or as Augustine hath of it) a confirmation of things not present: for in Greeke it is Elenchos, he saith as much as if he did say, that it is an evident shewing of things not appearing, a seeing of things not seene, a plainnesse of darke things: a presence of things absent, an open shewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such as they bee that pertaine to our salvation, cannot bee seene in themselves and in their owne nature, as they call it: but we behold them onely in his word, of whose truth we ought to be so fully perswaded, that we ought to hold all that he speaketh as it were already done and fulfilled. But how can the minde lift up it selfe to receive such a taste of Gods goodnesse, but that it must needs bee therewith wholly kindled to love God againe? For that flowing plenty of sweetnesse which God hath laid up in store for them that feare him, cannot be truly knowne, but that it must therewithall vehemently move affection: and whose affection it once moveth, it utterly ravisheth and carieth him beyond himselfe. Therefore it is no marvell, if into a perverse and crooked heart never entereth this affection, by which being conveyed up into the very heaven, we are suffered to come to the most secretly hidden treasures of God, and the most sacred privie places of his kingdome, which may not be defiled with the entrance of an uncleane heart. For that which the Schoolemen teach, that charitie is before faith and hope, is a meere madnesse. For it is faith onely that first engendreth charity in us. How much more rightly doth Bernard teach: I beleeve (saith he) that the testimony of conscience which Paul calleth the glory of the godly, consisteth in three things. For first of all it is necessary to beleeve that thou canst not have forgivenesse of finnes, but by the pardon of God: than, that thou canst have no good worke at all, unless he also give it: last of all that thou canst by no workes deserve eternall life, unless it also bee given freely. A little after he addeth that these things suffice not, but that there is a certaine beginning of faith, because in beleeving that finnes cannot be forgiven but of God, wee ought also to beleeve that they are not forgiven us, till also we be perswaded by the testimonie of the holy Ghost, that salvation is laid up in store for us: because God forgiveth finnes, he himselfe giveth merits, and he himselfe also giveth rewards, that wee may not stay still in this beginning. But these and other things shall be to be entreated of in places fit for them. Now let it onely suffice to know what faith is.

42. Now wherefoever this lively faith shall be, it cannot bee possible but that it hath with it the hope of eternall salvation, as an undividable companion: or rather that it engendreth or bringeth it forth out of it selfe, which hope being taken away, how eloquently and gloriously soever we talke of faith, yet we are convicted to have no faith at all.

all. For if faith (as is above said) be an assured persuasion of Gods truth, that it cannot lie unto us, nor deceive us, nor become void, then they that have conceived this assurednesse, truly doe therewithall looke for a time to come that God shall performe his promises, which in their persuasion cannot be but true: so that briefly hope is nothing else, but a looking for those things which faith hath beleved to bee truly promised of God. So faith beleeveth that God is true, hope looketh for the performance of his truth in convenient time. Faith beleeveth that he is our Father, hope looketh for him to shew himselfe such a one toward us. Faith beleeveth that eternall life is given us, hope looketh that it be one day revealed. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope resteth, hope nourisheth and sustaineth faith. For as no man can looke for any thing at Gods hand, but he that hath first beleved his promises: so againe the weaknesse of our faith must with patient hope and expectation bee sustained and cherished, that it fall not as fainting for wearinesse. For which reason Paul doth well place our salvation in hope. For hope, while it in silence looketh for the Lord, restraineth faith that it fall not headlong with too much haste; hope strengthneth faith, that it waver not in Gods promises, nor begin to doubt of the truth of them: hope refresheth faith that it wax not weary: Hope stretcheth faith to the uttermost bound, that it faint not in the mid course, nor in the very beginning. Finally, hope by continuall renewing and restoring, it maketh it now and then to rise up fresher than it selfe to continuance. But how many waies the helpes of hope are necessarie to the strengthening of faith shall better appeare, if we consider with how many sorts of temptations they are assailed and shaken, that have embraced the word of God. First, the Lord in deferring his promises doth oftentimes hold our mindes longer in suspence than we would wish: here it is the office of the hope to performe that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his promises doe tarrise, yet should wait still for them. Sometime hee suffereth us not onely to faint, but also seemeth to be highly displeas'd: here it is much more necessarie to have hope to helpe us, that according to the saying of another Prophet, we may still looke for the Lord that hath hidden his face from Isaac. There rise up all scorners (as Peter saith) that aske: where is his promise of his comming? for as much as since the fathers slept, all things so continue from the beginning of the creation. Yea the flesh and the world doe whisper the same thing in our eares. Here must faith stayed with sufferance of hope be holden fast fixed in beholding of eternitie that it may account a thousand yeeres like as one day.

43. For this conjoyning and alliance the Scripture sometimes confoundeth the names of Faith and Hope. For when Peter teacheth that we are by the power of God preserved through faith, unto the disclosing of salvation, he giveth that unto faith which did more fitly agree with hope, and not without cause, forasmuch as wee have already taught, that hope is nothing else but the nourishment and strength of faith. Sometimes they are joyned together: as in the same Epistle. That your faith and hope should be in God. But Paul to the Philippians out of faith, deriveth expectation, because in patiently hoping, we hold our desires in suspence, till Gods convenient opportunity be opened. All which matter wee may better understand by the 10. chapter to the Hebrewes, which I have already alleaged. Paul in another place, although he speake unproperly, yet meaneth the same things in these words: Wee looke in the spirit through faith for hope of righteousnesse, even because wee embracing the testimony of the Gospell concerning his free love, doe looke for the time when God shall openly shew that which is now hidden under hope. And now it is plaine how foolishly Peter Lombard laith two foundations of hope, that is, the grace of God, and the deserving of works. Hope can have no other marke to be directed unto, but faith: and wee have already declared that faith hath one only marke, the mercy of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may so speake) with both eyes. But it is good to heare what a lively reason he bringeth. If (saith he) thou darest hope for any thing without deserving, that shall not be worthy to be called hope, but presumption. Who (gentle reader) will not worthily abhorre such beasts, that say, it is a rash and presumptuous deed, if a man have confidence that God is true of his Word? For where the Lord willeth us to looke for all things at his goodnesse, they say it is presumption to leane and rest upon it.

A master meet for such schollers as he found in the mad schoole of filthy bablers. But as for us, when wee see that we are commanded by the oracles of God to conceive a hope of saluation, let us gladly presume so much upon his truth, as trusting upon his onely mercy, casting away the confidence of workes to be bold to hope well. Hee will not deceiue that said: Be it unto you according to your Faith.

Mat. 9. 19.

THE THIRD CHAPTER.

That we are regenerate by Faith. Wherein is entreated of Repentance.

Albeit we have already partly taught how Faith possesseth Christ, and how by it we enjoy his benefits: nevertheless this were yet darke, unless we did also make declaration of the effects that we feele thereby. Not without cause it is said, that the summe of the Gospell standeth in repentance and in forgiveness of sinnes. Therefore leaving out these two points, whatsoever we shall say of faith, shall be but a hungry and unperfect, yea and in a manner unprofitable disputation of Faith. Now forasmuch as Christ doth give both unto us, and we obtaine both by Faith, that is to say, both newnesse of life and free reconciliation, reason and order of teaching requireth, that in this place I begin to speake of both. Our next passage from Faith shall be to Repentance, because when this article is well perceived, it shall the better appeare how man is justified by onely Faith and meere pardon, and yet how reall holinesse of life (as I may so call it) is not severed from free imputation of righteousness. Now it ought to bee our of question, that Repentance doth not onely immediately follow Faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon and forgiveness is therefore offered by the preaching of the Gospell, that the sinner being delivered from the tyrannie of Satan, from the yoke of sinne, and from miserable bondage of vices, may passe into the kingdome of God, truly no man can embrace the grace of the Gospell, but he must returne from the errors of his former life into the right way, and apply all his studie to the meditation of Repentance. As for them that thinke that Repentance doth rather goe before Faith than flow or spring forth of it, as a fruit out of a tree, they never knew the force thereof, and are moved with too weake an argument to thinke so.

2. Christ (say they) and John in their preachings doe first exhort the people to Repentance, and then they afterward say that the kingdome of heaven is at hand. Such commandement to preach, the Apostles received, such order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they superstitiously stick upon the joyning together of syllables, they marke not in what meaning the words hang together. For when the Lord Christ and John do preach in this maner: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heaven is come neere at hand: doe they not fetch the cause of Repentance from very grace and promise of saluation? Therefore their words are as much in effect as if they had said: because the kingdome of heaven is come neere at hand, therefore repent yee. For Matthew when he had shewed that John so preached Faith that in him was fulfilled the prophetic of Ezra, concerning the voice crying in the wilderness. Prepare the way of the Lord, make straight the paths of our God. But in the Prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort and glad tidings. Yet when we referre the beginning of Repentance, to Faith, we doe not dreame a certaine meane space of time, wherein it bringeth it out; but wee meane to shew that a man cannot earnestly apply himselfe to Repentance, unless he know himselfe to be of God. But no man is truly perswaded that hee is of God, but he that hath first received his grace. But these things shall bee more plainly discussed in the proceffe following. Peradventure this deceived them, that many are first by terrors of conscience tamed, or framed to obedience, before that they have thoroughly digested, yea before they have tasted the knowledge of grace. And this is the feare at the beginning, which some account among vertues, because they see that it is neere to true and just obedience. But our question is not here how diversly Christ draweth us unto him, or prepareth us to the endeavour of godlinesse: onely this I say, that there can be no uprightnesse found where reigneth not the Spirit which Christ received, to communicate the same to his members. Then according to that saying of the Psalm: With thee is mercifulnesse, that thou maiest bee feared, no man shall ever reverently feare God, but he that trusteth that God is mercifull unto him: no man will willingly prepare himselfe to the keeping of the law, but he that is perswaded that his services please him: which tenderneffe in pardoning and bearing with faults, is a signe of fatherly favour. Which is also shewed by that exhortation of Osee, Come let us returne to the Lord, because he hath plucked us and he will heale us: he hath stricken us, and hee will cure us, because the hope of pardon is used as a pricke to make them not to lie dull in their finnes. But their doting error is without all colour of reason, which to begin at repentance doe appoint certaine daies to their new converts, during the which they must exercise themselves in penance: and when those daies are once past, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Gospell. I speake of many of the Anabaptists, specially those that marvellously rejoyce to be counted spirituall, and their companions the Jesuites, and such other dregs. Such fruits forsooth, that spirit, of giddinesse bringeth forth, to determine repentance within compass of a few daies, which a Christian man ought to extend in continuance throughout his whole life.

Repentance rightly said to consist of two parts, Mortification and Vivification: so that Vivification bee taken not for the cheerefulness which the soule receiveth when it recovereth out of feare & trouble, but for the purpose and desire which it hath to lead a new life.

Two kinds of repentance, the one of the Law, the other of the Gospell.

3. But certaine learned men, even long before these times, meaning to speake simply and sincerely of repentance, according to the truth of Scripture, have said that it consisteth of two parts, mortification, and vivification. Mortification they expound to be a sorrow of the soule and feare conceived of the acknowledging of sinne, and of the feeling of the judgement of God. For when a man is once brought into knowledge of sinne, then he truly beginneth to hate and abhorre sinne: then he heartily misliketh himselfe, confesseth himselfe to be miserable and lost, and wiseth himselfe to bee an other man. Further, when he is touched with some feeling of the judgement of God (for the one immediatly followeth upon the other) then he lieth stricken and overthrowen then hee trembleth, humbled and cast downe, then he is discouraged and despaireth. This is the first part of repentance, which they have commonly called contrition. Vivification they expound to bee the comfort that groweth of faith, when a man overthrowen with conscience of sinne, and stricken with feare of God, looking afterward unto the goodnesse of God, unto the mercy, favour and salivation, that is through Christ, raiseth up himselfe, taketh breath againe, recovereth courage, and returneth as it were from death to life. And these words, if they have a right exposition, doe aptly enough expresse the nature of repentance. But where they take Vivification for the cheerefulness, which the minde receiveth being brought into quietnesse from trouble and feare, therein I agree not with them: forasmuch as it rather signifieth a desire to live holily and godly which groweth of regeneration, as if it were said, that man dieth to himselfe, to begin to live to God.

4. Some other, because they saw this word diversly taken in Scripture, have made two sorts of repentance; and because they should make them differently knowne by some marke, they have called one repentance of the law, by which the sinner wounded with the searing yron of sinne, and worne away with feare of the wrath of God, sticketh fast in that trouble and cannot winde himselfe out of it. The other Repentance they call of the Gospell, by which the sinner is indeed grievously vexed with himselfe, but he riseth up higher and taketh hold of Christ, the salve of his sore, the comfort of his feare, the haven of his miserie. Of the repentance of the law they put those examples. Cain, Saul, and Iudas. Whose repentance when the Scripture rehearseth unto us, it meaneth that they acknowledging the grievousnesse of their sinne, were afraid of the wrath of God, but in thinking upon God onely as a revenger and Judge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing else but a certaine entry of hell, whereinto they being entred into this present life, began already to suffer punishment, from the face of the wrath of Gods Majestie. The repentance of the Gospell, we see in all them, that being galled with the spurre of sinne in themselves, but recomforted and refreshed with confidence of the mercy of God, are turned unto the Lord. Ezechias was stricken with feare, when hee received the message of death: but he prayed weeping, and looking unto the goodnes of God, hee tooke againe good confidence unto him. The Ninivites were troubled with the horrible threatning of destruction. But they clothed themselves in sackcloth and ashes and prayed hoping that the Lord might be turned to them and turned from the furor of his wrath. David confessed that he had too much sinned in numbring the people : but he said further, Lord take away the wickednesse of thy servant. He acknowledged his offence of adulterie, when Nathan rebuked him, and did cast himselfe downe before the Lord, but there withall he also looked for pardon. Such was the repentance of them at the preaching of Peter were pricked in their heart, but trusting upon the goodnesse of God, they said furthermore : Ye men and brethren, what shall we doe ? And such was the repentance of Peter himselfe, which wept indeed bitterly, but he ceased not to hope well.

5. Although all these things be true, yet the very name of repentance (so farre as I can learne by the Scripture) is other wise to be taken. For where they comprehend Faith under repentance, it disagreeeth with that which Paul saith in the Acts, that hee testified to the Jewes and Gentiles repentance unto God and saith in Jesus Christ, where he reckoneth repentance and Faith as two divers things, What then ? Can true repentance stand without Faith ? No : But though they cannot be severed, yet they must be distinguished. As Faith is not without hope, and yet Faith and Hope are divers things, so repentance and Faith, although they hang together with one perpetuall bonde, yet they rather would be conjoynd than confounded. And truly I am not ignorant, that under the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning unto God, whereof Faith is not the least part : but in what meaning it is so comprehended, shall most easily appear when the force and nature thereof shall be declared. The name of repentance in Hebrew is derived of converting or returning, in Greeke of changing of the minde or purpose, and the thing it selfe doth not ill agree with either derivations, whereof the summe is, that we departing from our selves should turne unto God, and putting off our old minde, should put on a new. Wherefore in my judgement, repentance may thus not amisse be defined : that it is a true turning of our life unto God, proceeding from a pure and earnest feare of God, which consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and of the old man, and in the quickening of the Spirit. In this sense are to be taken all the preachings wherein either the Prophets in old time, or the Apostles afterward exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this only thing they travelled to perswade, that confounded with their owne finnes, and pricked with feare of the Lords judgement, they should fall downe and be humbled before him, against whom they had offended, and with true amendment returne into his right way. Therefore these words, To be turned or returne unto the Lord. To repent, or doe penance, are among them used without difference in all one signification. And therefore also the holy historie saith, that men repent after the Lord, when they that lived wantonly in their owne lusts, not regarding him, doe begin to follow his word, and are readie at their Captaines commandement to goe whither he calleth them. And John and Paul used these words, to bring forth fruits worthe of repentance, for, to lead such a life as may represent and testifie such an amendment in all their doings.

6. But before we goe any further, It shall be profitable that we doe more plainely set out at large the definition that we have made. Wherein there be chiefly three points to be considered. First when we call it a turning of life unto God; we require a transforming, not onely in outward workes; but also in the Soule it selfe, which when it hath put off her oldnesse, then beginneth to bring forth the fruits of workes agreeable to her renewing. Which when the prophet goeth about to expresse, he commanndeth them whom he calleth to repentance, to make them anew heart. Therefore Moses oftentimes meaning to shew how the Israelites might repent, and so be rightly turned unto the Lord, teacheth that it be done with all their heart, and with all their Soule, (which manner of speaking we see often repeated of the Prophets) and naming it the circumcising of the heart, he shaketh away all inward affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceive what is the naturall proprietie of repentance, than the fourth Chapter of Jeremie. If thou returne to me, O Israell, (saith the Lord) returne to me, plow up your arable land, and sow not upon thornes. Bee circumcised to the Lord, and take away the uncircumcised skinned of your hearts. See how he pronounceth, that they shall nothing prevaile in taking upon them the following of righteousness, unless wickednes be first plucked out of the bottome of their hearts.

And to move them throughly, he warneth them that they have to doe with God, with whom there is nothing gotten by dallying, because he hateth a double heart. Therefore Esay laugheth to scorne the foolish endeavours of hipocrites, which did indeed busily goe about an outward repentance in ceremonies, but in the meane time they had no care to loose the bundles of wickednesse, wherewith they held poore men fast tied. Where also he very well sheweth in what duties unfained repentance properly standeth.

7. The second point was, that we taught that repentance proceedeth of an earnest feare of God. For, before that the minde of a sinner be inclined to repentance, it must bee stirred up with thinking upon the judgement of God. But when this thought is once throughly settled, that God will one day goe up into his judgement seat, to require an account of all sayings and doings: it will not suffer the silly man to rest, nor to take breath one minute of time, but continually stirreth him up to thinke upon a new trade of life, whereby he may safely appeare at that judgement: Therefore oftentimes the Scripture, when it exhorteth to repentance maketh mention of the judgement: as in Jeremy least peradventure our wrath goe out as fire, and there bee none to quench it, because of the naughtinesse of your workes. In Pauls sermon to the Athenians: And whereas hitherto God hath borne with the times of this ignorance, now he giveth warning to men, that all men every where may repent them, because he hath appointed the day wherein he will judge the world in equity. And in many other places. Sometime it declareth by the punishments already extended, that God is a judge, that sinners should thinke with themselves, that worse things hang over them if they doe not repent in time. You have an example thereof in the 29. of Exodus. But because the turning beginneth at the abhorring and hatred of sinne, therefore the Apostle maketh sorrowfulnesse, such as is according to God, the cause of repentance. And hee calleth sorrowfulnesse according to God, when we are not onely afraid of punishment, but do hate and abhorre sin it selfe, forasmuch as wee understand that it displeaseth God. And no marvell. For unless we be sharply pricked, the slothfulnesse of our flesh could not be corrected, yea prickings would not suffice for the dulnesse and slothfulnesse thereof: unless God in stretching out his rods should pearce more deeply. This is also an obstinacy which must be beaten downe as it were with beetles. Therefore the perversnesse of our nature enforceth God to the severity that hee useth in threatening, because he should in vaine call us alluringly with faire speech while we lie sleepe. I recite not the testimonies that commonly offer themselves to be found. The feare of God is in another manner also the beginning of repentance. For though mans life were absolutely furnished with all points of vertues; if it bee not applied to the worshipping of God, it may indeed be praised of the world; but in heaven it shall bee meere abomination, forasmuch as the chiefe point of our righteousnesse is to give God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bead not our selves to yeeld us subject to his government.

8. Thirdly, it remaineth that wee declare what is meant by this that wee say, that Repentance consisteth in two parts, that is to say, mortifying of the flesh, and quickning of the spirit. The Prophets doe plainly expresse it, although somewhat simply and grossly according to the capacity of the carnall people, when they say: Cease from evill and doe goodnesse. Againe: Be washed, bee cleane, take away the evill of your workes from mine eies: Cease to doe perversly, learne to doe well, seeke judgement, helpe the oppressed &c. For when they call men away from wickednesse, they require the death of the whole flesh, which is stuffed full of wickednesse and perversnesse. It is indeed an uneasie and hard thing to put off our selves, and to depart from our naturall disposition: Neither can it be thought that the flesh is throughly dead, unless all that we have of our selves be abolished. But forasmuch as all the affection of the flesh is enmity against God, the first entry to the obeying of his law, is the forsaking of our owne nature: Afterward they expresse the renewing by the fruits that follow thereof, as righteousnesse, judgement, and mercy. For it were not enough to doe those duties rightly, unless the minde it selfe and the heart have first put on the affection of righteousnesse, judgement, and mercy. That is done when the spirit of God hath so foked in new thoughts and affections, our soules first washed with his holinesse, that they may rightly be counted new. And truly as wee are naturally turned away from God, so unlesse the forsaking of our selves doe goe before, wee can never goe toward that which is right. Therefore wee are so oft commanded to put off the old man, to forsake the world and flesh, to bid our lusts farewell, and to bee renewed in the spirit of our minde. Moreover the very name of mortification doth put us in minde how hard it is to forget our former nature: because we thereby gather that we are not otherwise framed to the feare of God, nor doe learne the principles of godlinesse, but when wee are violently slaine with the word of the spirit, and so brought to nought, even as though God should pronounce, that to have us to be accounted among his children, there needeth a death of all our common nature.

9. Both these things doe happen unto us by the partaking of Christ. For if wee doe truly communicate of his death, by the power thereof our old man is crucified, and the body of sinne dieth, that the corruption of our former nature may live no more. If we be partakers of his resurrection, by it we are raised up into a newnesse of life, that may agree with the righteousness of God. In one word, I expound Repentance to be regeneration, which hath no other marke whereunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adams offence foully defaced, and in a manner utterly blotted out, may be renewed in us. So the Apostle teacheth when he saith: but we representing the glory of God with uncovered face are transformed into the same image, out of glorie into glory, as by the spirit of the Lord. Again, be ye renewed in the spirit of your minde, and put on the new man, which is created according to God in righteousness and holinesse of truth. Again in another place: putting on the new man, which is renewed after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration we be by the benefit of Christ restored into the righteousness of God, from which we were fallen by Adam. After which manner it pleased the Lord wholly to restore all those whom he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this restoring is fullfilled not in one moment, or one day, or one yeare, but by continuall, yea and sometimes slow proceedings God taketh away the corruptions of the flesh in his elect, clenseth them from filthinesse, and consecrateth them for temples to himselfe, renewing all their senses to true purenesse, that they may exercise themselves all their life in Repentance, and know that this warre hath no end but in death. And so much the greater is the lewdnesse of that filthy railer and Apostata Scribbler, which foolishly saith, that I confound the state of this present life with the heavenly glory, when I expound by Paul, the image of God to be holinesse and true righteousness. As though when any thing is defined, wee should not seeke the whole fullnesse and perfection of it. And yet we deny not place for increase: but I say that how neere any man approacheth to the likenesse of God, so much the image of God shineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine hereunto, God assigneth them the race of Repentance wherinto to run all their life long.

10. The children of God therefore are so delivered by regeneration from the bondage of sinne, not that having now obtained the full possession of libertie, they should feele no more trouble by their flesh, but that they should have remaining a continuall matter of strife, wherewith they may be exercised, and not onely bee exercised, but also may better learne their owne weaknesse. And in this point all writers of sound judgement agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeling of evill, from whence continually spring desires that allure and stir him to sinne. They confesse also that the holy ones are still so holden intangled with that disease of lusting, that they cannot wight and but that sometime they are tickled and stirred either to lust, or to covetousnesse, or to ambition, or to other vices. Neither is it needfull to labour much in searching what the old writers have thought herein, forasmuch as onely Augustine may bee sufficient for it, which hath faithfully and with great diligence gathered all their judgements. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, such certainties as they shall desire to learne of the opinion of antiquitie. But there may seeme to bee this difference betweene him and us, that he when he granteth that the faithfull so long as they dwell in a mortall body are so holden bound with lusts, that they cannot but lust, yet dareth not call that disease sin, but being content to expresse it by the name of weaknes,

2 Cor. 4. 4.

In the regenerate
there remains still concupisence, which concupisence is sin and not weaknesse
only, as S. Augustine saith of it.

Lib. ad Bonif. 4.
Lib. 1. & 2.
contra Julia-

he teacheth that then onely it becommeth sinne, whea either worke or consent is added to conceit or receiving, that is, when Will yeeldeth to the first desire: but we account thevery same for sinne, that man is tickled with any desire at all against the law of God, yea we affirme that the very corruption that ingendreth such desires in us, is sinne. We reach therfore that there is alway sinne in the holy ones, untill they be unclodhed of the mortall body, because there remaineth in their flesh the peruerfnesse of lusting, that fighteth against uprightnesse. And yet he doth not alway forbear to use the name of Sinne, as when he saith: This Paul calleth by the name of sinne, from whence spring all sins unto a fleshly concupisence. This as much as pertaineth to the holy ones, looſeth the kingdome in earth, and perisheth in heaven. By which words hee confesseth, that the faithfull are guilty of sin, inasmuch as they are subject to the lusts of the flesh.

11. But this that is said, that God purgeh his Church from all sinne, that he promifeth that grace of deliverance by baptisme, and fulfilleth it in his elect, werefer rather to the guiltinesse of sinne, than to the very matter of sinne. God truly performeth this by regenerating them that be his, that in them that kingdome of sinne is abolished (for the holy Ghost ministreth them strength, whereby they get the upper hand and are conquerours in the battell) but it ceaseth only to reigne and not so dwell in them. Therefore we so say, that the old man is crucified, and the law of sinne abolished in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leavings, not to have dominion in them, but to humble them by knowledge in conscience of their owne weakenesse. And wee confesse that the same are not imputed, as if they were not: but wee affirme that this commeth to passe by the mercy of God, that the holy ones are delivered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise shoul justly bee reckoned sinners and guilty before God. And this sentence it shall not be hard for us to confirme, forasmuch as there are evident testimonies of the Scripture upon this matter. For what could wee have more plaine, than that which Paul cryeth out to the Romans Chapter 7. First both we have in another place shewed, and Augustine proveth by strong reasons, that Paul there speaketh in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that he useth these words, Evill and Sinne, that they which will speake against us may not cavill against those words: but who can deny, that a striving against the Law of GOD is evill, who can deny a withstanding of Iustice to be sinne? Finally, who will not grant that there is a fault where is a spirituall misery? But all these things are reported of this disease by Paul. Again, wee have an assured demonstration by the Law, by which this whole question may easily be discussed. For wee are commanded to love God with all our hearts, with all our soule, with all our powers. Sith all the parts of our Soule ought to be so occupied with the love of God, it is certaine, that they satisfie not the Commandement, that conceive in their heart any desire bee it never so litle, or suffer any such thought at all to enter into their mind, as may withdraw them from the love of God into vanity? For what? are not these the powers of the Soule, to be affected with sodaine motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceive with minde? Therefore, when these doe open a way for vaine or corrupt thoughts to enter into them, doe they not shew that they are even so much void of the love of God? Wherefore, who so confesseth not that all the lusts of the flesh are finnes, and that the same disease of lusting, which they call a feeding, is the well spring of sinne, he must needs deny that the transgression of the Law is sinne.

12 If any man thinke it an absurdity, that all the desires wherewith man is naturally moved in affection, are universally condemned, whereas they be put into man by God the author of nature. We answer, that we doe not condemne those desires that God hath so engraven into the minde of man at the first Creation, that they cannot be rooted out without destroying the very nature of man, but onely outrageous and unbridled motions that fight against the ordinance of God. But now sith by reason of the perversnesse of nature, all his powers are infected and corrupted, that in all her doings appeareth a continuall disorder and intemperance, because the desires cannot be severed from such intemperance: therefore we say that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to have the whole summe in fewer words) we teach that all the desires of men are evill: and wee accuse them to be guilty of sinne, not in that that they are naturall, but for

for that they are inordinate : and we call them inordinate, because no part or cleane thing can come out of a corrupt and uncleane nature. And Augustine doth not so much vary from this doctrine as he appeareth in shew, while he somewhat too much feareth the envy that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he sometime forbearth to use the name of sinne. Yet where he writeth that the Law of sinne still remaining in the holly ones, the only guiltinesse is taken away, he plainly sheweth that he doth not so much disagree from our meaning.

13 We will alleadge some other sentences, whereby shall better appeare what hee thought. In the second booke against Iulian : This Law of sinne is both released by the spirituall regeneration, and abideth in the mortall flesh, released herein, because the guiltinesse is taken away in the Sacrament whereby the faithfull are regenerate : and it abideth, because it worketh the desires against which the faithfull doe fight. Againe, Therefore the law of sin ( which was also in the members of so great an Apostle ) is released in baptisme, but not ended. Againe, The law of sinne ( of which yet remaining the guiltinesse, is in baptisme discharged ) Ambrose called wickenesse : because it is wickednesse for the flesh to lust against the spirit. Againe, Sinne is dead in respect of the guiltinesse wherein it held us, and even being dead, it still rebelleth till it be healed with perfection of buriall. And yet plainer in the fifth booke. As the blindness of heart is both a sinne, whereby man beleeveeth not in God : and also a punishment of sinne, whereby a proud heart is chastised with worthy correction : and the cause of sinne, when any thing is committed by the error of a blinde heart : so the lust of flesh against which a good spirit lusteth, is both sinne, because there is in it disobedience against the government of the minde : and also the punishment of sinne, because it is given for recompence to the deservings of the disobedient : and the cause of sinne in man, when hee consenteth by defection, or in man, when hee is borne by infection. Here without any doubtfull speech hee calleth it sinne, because when error was once overthrowne, and the truth confirmed, hee lesse feared slanderous reports. As in the 41. Homily upon Iohn, where doubt lesse he speaketh according to the true meaning of his minde, he saith. If in the flesh thou serve the law of sinne, doe that which the Apostle himselfe saith : let not sinne reigne in your mortall body to obey the desires thereof. He saith not, let it not be, but let it not raigne. So long as thou livest, sinne must needs be in thy members at least, let Raigne be taken from it. Let not that bee done which it commandeth. They that defend that lust is no sinne, are wont to object that saying of James : Lust, after that it hath conceived, bringeth forth sinne. But this is easily confuted. For unlesse wee thinke that hee speaketh of onely ill workes or actuall finnes, evill will it selfe, shall not be accounted sinne. But where he calleth mischievous deeds and wicked offences the offspring of sinne, and giveth unto them the name of sinne, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to lust, is an evill thing and damnable before God.

14. Certaine Anabaptists in this age, devise I wote not what phranticke intemperance instead of spirituall regeneration : saying that the children of God restored into the state of innocency, now ought no more to be carefull for brideling of the lust of the flesh : that the Spirit is to be followed for their guide, under whose guiding they never goe out of the way. It were incredible that mans minde could fall to so great madnesse, unlesse they did openly and proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truly it is monstrous. But it is meete that such should suffer the punishment of such blasphemous boldnesse, that so have perswaded their mind to turne the truth of God into a lie. Shall all the choise of honesty and dishonesty, right and wrong, good and evill, vertue and vice, bee taken away ? Such difference ( say they ) cometh of the cursednesse of old Adam, from which we are exempted by Christ. So now there shall be no difference betweene fornication and chastity, plaine dealing and subtilty, truth and lying, justice and extortion. Take away vaine feare, say they, the Spirit will command thee no evill thing, so that thou boldly and without feare yeeld thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choose but bee astonished at these monstrous things ? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madnesse of lusts, have put off all common reason, but what Christ ( I beseech you ) doe they frame unto us, and what spirit do they

belch out? For we reknowledge one Christ, and his onely Spirit whom the Prophets have commended, whom the Gospell given us doth preach, of whom we there heare no such thing. That Spirit is no patron of man-slaughter, whoredome drunkennesse, pride, contention, covetousnesse, and guile: but the authour of love, chastitie, sobriety, modesty, peace, temperance, and truth. It is not a giddy spirit, and runneth headlong without consideration through right and wrong, but is full of wisdom and understanding, that discerneth rightly betweene just and unjust. It stirreth not unto dissolure and unbridled licentiousnesse, but maketh difference betweene lawfull and unlawfull, and teacheth to keepe measure and temperance: but why doe we labour any longer in confusing this beastly rage? To Christians, the Spirit of the Lord is not a troublesome fantasie, which either themselves have brought forth in a dreame, or have received, being forged of other: but they reverently seeke the knowledge of him at the Scriptures, where these two things be taught of him: First that he is given us unto sanctification, that he might bring us into the obedience of Gods will, being purged from uncleannesse and defilings, which obedience cannot stand, unlesse lust be tamed and subdued, whereunto these men would give the bridle at liberty. Secondly, we are taught that we are so cleansed by his sanctification, that we are still beseged with many vices and much weaknesse, so long as we are enclosed in the burden of our body: whereby it commeth to passe, that being farre distant from perfection, we have need alway to increase somewhat, and being entangled in vices, we have need daily to wrestle with them. Wherenpon also followeth, that shaking off sloth and carelesnesse, we must watch with heedfull mindes, that wee be not compassed unware with the snares of our flesh. Unlesse peradventure we thinke that we have proceeded further than the Apostle, which yet was wearied of the Angell of Satan, that his strength might be made perfect with weaknesse, and which did unsaindly represent in his flesh, that division of the flesh and of the spirit.

15. But whereas the Apostle in describing of repentance, reckoneth seven either causes, or effects, or parts thereof, he doth that of a very good cause: and these they be: endeavour or carefulnesse, excusing, indignation, feare, desire, zeale, punishment. Neither ought it to seeme any absurdity, that I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted causes or effects. For both may be defended in disputation. They may bee also called affections joyned with repentance, but because, leaving out those questions, we may understand what Paul meaneth, wee shall bee content with a simple declaration of them. He saith therefore, that of the heaviness which is according to God, ariseth carefulnesse. For he that is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure, because he hath sinned against his God, is therewithall stirred up to diligence and heedfulnessse, to winde himselfe clearly out of the snares of the devill, to take better heed of his snares, to fall no more from the governance of the holy Ghost, not to be oppressed with security. Next is Excusing, which in this place signifyeth not the defence, whereby a sinner to escape the judgement of God, either doth deny that he hath offended or diminished the hainousnesse of his fault, but a purgation which standeth rather in craving of pardon, than in defence of the cause. Like as the children that are not reprobate, when they acknowledge and confesse their faults, doe yet use entreating, and that it may take place, they protest by all meanes that they can, that they have not cast away the reverence that they owe to their parents. Finally, they so excuse them, as they goe not about to prove themselves righteous and innocent, but onely that they may obtaine pardon. Then followeth indignation, thereby the sinner fretteth inwardly with himselfe, quarrelleth with himselfe, is angry with himselfe, when he recordeth his owne perversnesse, and his owne unthankfulnessse to God. By the name of feare, he meaneth, that trembling that is stricken into our minds, so oft as we thinke both what we have deserved, and how horrible is the severity of Gods wrath against sinners. For we must needs then be vexed with a marvellous unquietnesse, which both instructeth us to humility, and maketh us more ware against the time to come. Now if out of feare doe spring that carefulnesse, whereof hee had spoken before, then wee see with what linking they hang together. It seemeth to me that he hath used this word Desire, for diligence in our duty, and ready cheerefulnessse to obey, whereunto the acknowledging of our owne faults ought chiefly to provoke us. And thereunto also belongeth zeale, which he joyneeth immediately next unto it. For it signifieth a fearefulnesse, wherewith we be kindled when we be spurred forward with these pricking thoughts: what have I done? whether had I throwne my selfe headlong, if the mercy of God did not helpe me? The last of all his punishment, for the more rigorous that we be to our selves, and the straighter that wee examine our owne finnes, so much the more wee ought to trust that God is favourable and mercifull unto us. And truly it is not possible, but that the soule being stricken with horror of the judgement of God, must needs doe some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truly the godly doe feele what punishments are, shame, confusion, mourning, loathing of themselves, and other affections that spring out of earnest acknowledging of finnes. But let us remember that there is measure to be kept, that sorrow doe not swallow us up, because nothing more readily hapeneth to fearefull consciences than falling to despaire. And also by that crafty meane, whomsoever Satan findeth overthrowne with dread of God, hee more and more drowneth them in the gulfe of sorrow, that they may never rise up againe. Truly the feare cannot be too great which endeth with humility, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But alway (as the Apostle teacheth) the sinner must beware, that while he move himselfe to the loathing of himselfe, he despaire not, oppressed with too great feare, for so doe wee flee away from God which calleth us to him by repentance. Upon which point the lesson of Bernardis very profitable: Sorrow for finnes is necessary, if it be not continuall. I counsel you sometime to returne your fault from grievous and painful remembrance of your owne waies, and to climbe up to the plaine ground of cheerefull remembrance of benefits of God. Let us mingle hony with wormewood, that the wholesome bitternesse may bring us health, when it shall be drunke tempered with sweetnesse. And if you thinke of your selves in humility, thinke also of the Lord in goodnesse.

26 Now it may be also perceived what be the fruits of repentance, even the duties of godlinesse toward God, and of charity toward men, and therewithall a holinesse and purenesse in all our life. Finally, the more earnestly that any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods law, so much the surer tokens he sheweth of his repentance. Therefore the holy Ghost oftentimes, when he exhorteeth us to repentance, calleth us sometime to all the commandments of the law, sometime to the duties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that he hath condemned uncleannesse in the very fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterward to outward testimonies that doe set out true repentance, of which thing I will hereafter set before the readers eyes a table in description of a Christian life. I will not gather testimonies out of the Prophets, wherein they partly scorne at their follies that goe about to appease God with ceremonies, and doe shew that they be meere mockeries, and partly doe teach that outward uprightnesse of life is not the principall part of repentance, because God looketh upon the heart: whosoever is even meanelly exercised in the Scripture, shall perceive of himselfe with out any other mans putting in minde, that when we have to doe with God, we labour in vaine, unless we beginne at the inward affection of the heart. And the place of Joel shall not little helpe to the understanding of the rest, where hee saith, Teare your heart and not your garments. Also both those points are expressed in these words of James: Yee wicked doers, cleanse your hands: yee double men, purge your hearts. Where indeed there is an addition joynd to the first part, but after is shewed the very fountaine and beginning that they must wipe away their secret filthinesse, that there may be an altar set up to God in the very heart. Beside this there are also certaine outward exercises, which wee use privately as remedies to humble our selves or to tame our flesh, and publicly for the declaration of repentance. And they proceed from that punishment of which Paul speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflicted minde, to bee in loathsomenesse, mourning, and weeping, to flee gorgeousnesse and all trimming, and so forsake all delights. Then hee that feeleth how great an evill is the rebellion of the flesh, seeketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreover hee that well be-thinketh him how grievous a thing it isto have offended the justice of God, cannot rest untill hee have in his owne humility given glory unto God. Such exercises the old writers do oftentimes rehearse, when they speake of the fruits of repentance.

1 Cor. 7. 31.

But albeit they doe not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers shall pardon me, if I speake what I thinke: it seemeth unto me that they stand too much upon them: And if any man will wisely weigh it, I trust he will agree with mee, that they have two wayes gone beyond measure. For when they so much enforced, and with immeasurable commendation advanced that bodily discipline, this indeed they obtained, that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a manner darkned that, which ought to have beene of much greater importance. Secondly, in giving punishments they were somewhat more rigorous then ecclesiasticall mildnesse may beare, as we shall have occasion to shew in another place.

17 But because many when they heare weeping, fasting and ashes spoken of, both often in other places and specially in Ier, they measure the chiefe part of repentance by fasting and weeping: therefore there error is to bee taken away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of cutting their hearts and not their garments, is properly belonging to repentance: but weeping and fasting are not joynd as continuall or necessary effects thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a speciall circumstance. Because hee had Prophecied, that there hanged over the Iewes a most grievous destruction, therefore he counselleth them to prevent the wrath of God, not onely in repenting, but also in uttering tokens of their sorrow. For as a man standing to bee arraigned, useth humbly to abase himselfe with an overgrowne beard, uncombed haire and blacke apparell, to move the judge to pittie: so it behoved them when they stood accused before the judgement seat of God, in piteous array to beseech him not to extend his rigour. But although ashes and sackcloth did peradventure more fully agree with those times: yet it is certaine, that weeping and fasting should be to a very convenient good use among us, so oft as the Lord seemeth to threaten us any plague or calamity. For when hee maketh any danger to appeare, he doth after a certaine manner give warning, that he is prepared or armed to revenge. Therefore the Prophet did well, when he exhorted his countrimen to weeping and fasting, that is to the sorrowfull manner of accused men, whose offences he said a little before were had in examination. Even as if the Pastors of the Church should not doe ill at this day, if when they see any ruine hanging over the necks of their people, they would cry out upon them to make haste to fasting and weeping: so that they would with greater and more inward care and diligence, alway inforce that which is the principall point, that they must cut their hearts and not their garments. It is out of doubt, that fasting is not alway joynd with repentance, but it is appointed peculiarly for times of miserable plagues: and therefore Christ joyneth it with wayling, when he acquainteth the Apostles from need thereof, untill the time that being spoyled of his presence, they should bee tormented with griefe. I speake of solemne fasting. For the private life of the godly, ought to be tempered with honest sparing and sobriety, that in the whole course thereof, here may appeare a certaine kinde of fasting. But because all this matter shall bee to be declared againe in the place where hee shall intreat of the discipline of the Church, therefore I doe now the more slenderly touch it.

18 But this one thing I will adde here by the way: when the name of repentance is applied to this outward profession, then it is improperly turned from the naturall meaning which I have above set forth of it. For it is not so much a turning unto God as a confession of fault, with a beseeching of God not to charge them with the paine and guiltinesse. So to doe penance in ashes and sackcloth is nothing else, then to utter a displeasur when God is angry with us for grievous offences. And this is a publicke kinde of confession, wherby we condemning our selves before the Angels and the world doe prevent the judgement of God. For Paul rebuking their slothfullnesse that tenderly beare with their owne faults, saith: if we did judge our selves, we shall not be judged of God. But it is not alway necessary to make men openly of counsell and witnesses of our repentance: but to confesse privately to God is a part of true repentance which cannot bee omitted. For there is nothing more unreasonable than to looke to have God to pardon us the finnes in which wee flatter our selves, and doe hide them by hypocrisse, lest he should bring them to light. And it behooveth us not onely to confesse those finnes which wee daily commit, but more grievous offences ought to draw vs further, and to call againe into our remembrance things that seeme long agoe buried. Which lesson David giveth us by his example. For being touched with shame of his newly committed faults, hee examineth himselfe even to the time when hee was in his mothers wombe, and confesseth that even then hee was corrupted and infected with the filthinesse of the flesh. And this hee doth not to diminish the hainousnesse of his fault, as many hide themselves in the multitude, and seeke to escape punishment by wrapping other with them. But David doth farre otherwise, which with simple plainnesse enforceth his fault in saying, that being corrupt from his first infancy, he hath not ceased to heape evils upon evils. Also in another place hee likewise so examineth his passed life, that he craveth the mercy of God for the finnes of his youth. And truly then onely shall wee prove our drossinesse to be shaken away from us, if groaning under our burden and bewailing our evils, we aske reliefe of God. It is moreover to be noted, that the repentance which we are commanded continually to apply, differeth from that repentance, that listeth up as it were from death, them that either have filthily fallen, or with unbridled licentiousnesse have throwne forth themselves to sinne, or after a certaine manner of rebellious revolting, have shaken off the yoke of God. For the Scripture oftentimes, when it exhorteth to repentance, meaneth thereby as it were a passage or rising againe from death into life: and when it rehearseth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatry and other grosse offences. And in like manner Paul threatneth mourning unto sinners that have not done penance for their wantonnesse, fornication, and unchastity. This difference is to be diligently marked, least while we heare that few are called to penance, a more than carelesse assurednesse should creepe upon us, as though the mortifying of the flesh did no more belong unto us, the care whereof, the corrupt desires that alway tickle us, and the vices that commonly bud up in us, doe not suffer us to release. Therefore the speciall Repentance which is required but of some, whom the Devill hath violently carried away from feare of God, and fast bound with damnable snares, taketh not away the ordinary Repentance which the corruptnesse of nature compelleth us to apply throughout all the whole course of our life.

19 Now if that be true, which is most evidently certaine, that all the summe of the Gospell is contained in these two principall points, Repentance and Forgivenessse of finnes: doe we not see, that the Lord doth therefore freely justifie them that be his, that he may also by the sanctification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousness? Iohn the Angel sent before the face of Christ to prepare his waies, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdome of Heaven is come neere at hand. In calling them to Repentance, he did put them in minde to acknowledge themselves sinners, and all that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lord, that they might with all their hearts desire the mortifying of there flesh and a new regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdome of God, he calleth them to Faith. For by the kingdome of God which he taught to be at hand, he meant forgivenessse of finnes, salvation, and life, and all that ever we get in Christ. Wherefore in the other Evangelists it is written, Iohn came preaching the Baptisme of Repentance unto forgivenessse of finnes. And what is that else, but that they being oppressed and wearied with the burden of finnes should turne to the Lord, and conceive good hope of forgivenessse and salvation? So Christ also began his preaching: The kingdome of God is come neere at hand: repent yee and beleve the Gospell. First hee declareth that the treasures of Gods mercy are opened in him, and then he requireth repentance, and last of all confidence in the promises of God. Therefore when hee meant briefly to comprehend the whole summe of the Gospell, he said that we must suffer and rise againe from the dead, and that Repentance and forgivenessse of finnes must be preached in his name. The Apostles also preached the same after his resurrection, that hee was raised up by God, to give to Israel repentance and forgivenessse of finnes. Repentance is preached in the name of Christ, when men doe heare by the doctrine of the Gospell, that all their thoughts, their affections, and their endeavours are corrupt and faulty, and that therefore it is necessary that they be borne againe if they will enter into the kingdome of God. Forgivenessse of sins is preached when men are taught that Christ is made to them redemption, righteousnesse, salvation and life: in whose name they are freely accounted righteous and innocent in the sight of God. Whereas both these graces are received by Faith, as I have in another place declared: yet because the goodnesse of God whereby sinnes are forgiven, is the proper object of Faith, therefore it shall be good that it be diligently distinguished from Repentance.

20 Now as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of Repentance, openeth us the first entry unto Christ, which sheweth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which grone, labour, are loden, are hungry and thirsty, and pine away with sorrow and misery: so must wee endeavour toward Repentance, throughout all our life apply it, and follow it to the end, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to Repentance: he was sent to blesse the unworthy, but so that every one should turne himselfe from his wickednesse. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgivenesse of sinnes, he likewise useth to require on our part Repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercy ought to be to men a cause to repent them, Doe (saith he) judgement and righteousnesse, because salvation is come neere at hand. Againe, there shall come to Sion a Redeemer, and to them that in Jacob repent for their sinnes. Againe, Seeke the Lord while hee may be found: call upon him while he is neere. Let the wicked leave his way and the wickednesse of his thoughts, and bee turned to the Lord, and hee shall have mercy on him. Againe, Turne ye and repent, that your sinnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condition is not so annexed as though our Repentance were a foundation to deserve pardon, but rather (because the Lord hath determined to have mercy upon men to this end that they should repent) hee teacheth men whether they shall travell if they will obtaine grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwell in the prison of our body, we must continually wrastle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our owne naturall soule. Plato saith in certaine places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditation of death, but we may more truly say, that the life of a Christian man is a perpetuall studie and exercise of mortifying the flesh, till it being utterly slaine, the Spirit of God get the dominion in us. Therefore I thinke that he hath much profited, that hath learned much to mislike himselfe: not that hee should sticke fast in that mire and goe no further, but rather that he should hast and long toward God, that being grafted into the death and life of Christ, hee should study upon a continuall repentance: as truly they cannot other wise doe, that have a naturall hatred of sinne: for no man ever hated sinne, unlesse he were first in love with righteousnesse. This doctrine, as it was most simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the truth of the Scripture.

21 Now that Repentance is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so well knowne by the doctrine above taught, that I need not to repeat a long discourse to prove it againe. Therefore the Church prayeth, and hath in admiration the benefit of God, that hee hath given the Gentiles Repentance unto salvation. And Paul commanding Timothy to be patient and milde toward the unbelievers, saith: If at any time GOD give them Repentance that they may repent from the snares of the devill. God indeed affirmeth that hee willethe the conversion of all men, and directeth his exhortations generally to all men: But the effectuall working thereof hangeth upon the Spirit of regeneration. Because it were more easie to create us men, than of our owne power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole course of regeneration we are not without cause called, the worke of God created to good workes, which hee hath prepared that wee should walke in them, Whomsoever the Lords will is to deliver from death, those he quickeneth with the spirit of regeneration: not that repentance is properly the cause of salvation, but because it is already sene that it is unseparable from Faith and from the mercy of God: sith (as Esey testifieth) that there is a Redeemer come to him, and to those that in Jacob are returned from their wickednesse. This truly standeth stedfastly determined, that wheresoever liveth the feare of God, there the Spirit hath wrought unto the salvation of man. Therefore in Esey, when the Faithfull complaine and lament that they are forsaken of God, they reckon this as a token of being reprobates, that their hearts were hardened by God. The Apostles also meaning to exclude Apostataes from hope of salvation, appointeth this reason, that it is impossible impossible for them to be renewed unto Repentance : because God in renewing them whom he will not have perish, sheweth a token of his fatherly favour, and in a manner draweth them unto him with the beames of his cheerefull and mery countenance : on the other side with hardning them, he thundreth against the reprobate, whose wickednesse is unpardonable. Which kinde of vengeance the Apostle threatneth to willfull Apostataes, which when they depart from the Faith of the Gospell, doe make a scorn of God, reprochfully despise his grace, and defile and tread under feet the blood of Christ, yea as much as in them is they crucifie him againe. For hee doth not (as some fondly rigorous men would have it) cut off hope of pardon from all wilfull sinners, but teacheth that Apostasie is unworthy of all excuse : so that is no marvell that God doth punish a contempt of himselfe so full of sacriledge, with unappeasable rigor. For he saith that it is impossible, that they which have once bene enlightened, have tasted of the heavenly gift, have bene made partakers of the holy Ghost, have tasted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they fall, should be renewed to Repentance, crucifying againe of new, and making a scorn of the Sonne of God. Againe in another place : If (saith hee) wee willingly sinne after knowledge of the truth received, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of judgement, &c. These also be the places, out of the wrong understanding whereof, the Novations in old time have gathered matter to play the mad men : with whose rigorousnesse certaine good men being offended ; beleeveth this to be a counterfet Epistle in the Apostles name, which yet in all parts doe truly favour of an Apostolike Spirit. But because wee contend with none but with them that allow it, it is easie to shew, how these sentences doe nothing maintaine their error. First it is necessary that the Apostle agree with his Master, which affirmeth that all sinne and blasphemy shall bee forgiven, except the sinne against the holy Ghost, which is not forgiven neither in this world, nor in the world to come, It is certaine (I say) that the Apostle was contented with this exception, unlesse wee will make him an adversary to the grace of Christ. Whereupon followeth, that pardon is denied to no speciall offences, but onely to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, cannot be ascribed to weaknesse, and openly sheweth that a man is possessed of a devill.

22. But to discusse this, it behooveth to enquire what is that same so horrible offence, that shall have no forgiveness. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth it an obstinate stiffnesse even unto death, with despaire of pardon, that doth not well agree with the very words of Christ, that it shall not bee forgiven in this world. For either that is spoken in vaine, or it may be committed in this life. But if Augustines definition be true, then it is not committed, unlesse it continue even unto death. Whereas some other say that he sinneth against the holy Ghost, that envieith the grace bestowed upon his brother : I see not from whence that is fetched. But let us bring a true definition which being once proved with sure testimonies, shall easily by it selfe overthrow all the rest. I say therefore, that they sinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose resist the truth of God, with brightnesse whereof they are so dazed, that they cannot pretend ignorance : which they doe onely to this end to resist. For Christ meaning to expound that which hee had said, immediatly addeth : Hee that speaketh a word against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiven him : but he that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall not bee forgiven. And Matthew for the blasphemy against the holy spirit putteth the spirit of blasphemy. But how can a man speake a reproach against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost ? They that stumble unaware against the truth of God, not knowing it, which doe ignorantly speake evill of Christ, having yet this minde, that they would not extinguish the truth of God disclosed unto them, or once with one word offend him, whom they had knowne to be the Lords anointed : these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that doe most hatefully detest the doctrine of the Gospell, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of the Gospell, they would be ready to worship withall their heart. But they whose conscience is convinced, that it is the word of God which they forsake and fight against, and yet cease not to fight against it, they are said to blaspheme the holy Ghost : forasmuch as they wraſtle againſt the enlightning that is the worke of the holy Ghost. Such were many of the Jewes, which when they could not reſiſt the Spirit that ſpake by Stephen, yet endeavoured to reſiſt. It is no doubt but that many of them were carried unto it with zeale of the law, but it appeareth that there were ſome other that of malicious wickedneſſe did rage againſt God himſelfe, that iſto ſay againſt the doctrine, which they were not ignorant to bee of God. And ſuch were thoſe Phariſees, againſt whom the Lord envieth, which to overthrow the power of the holy Ghost, deſamed him with the name of Beelzebub. This therefore is the ſpirit of blaſphemy, when mans boldneſſe of ſet purpoſe, leapeth forth to reproach the name of God. Which Paul ſignifieth when hee ſaith, that hee obtained mercy, becauſe he had ignorantly committed thoſe things through unbeleefe, for which otherwiſe he had bene unworthy of Gods favour. If ignorance joyned with unbeleefe was the cauſe that he obtained pardon, thereupon followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowledge is joyned to unbeleefe.

23. But if thou marke it well, thou ſhalt perceive that the Apoſtle ſpeaketh not of one or other particular fall, but of the univerſall departing whereby the reprobate doe forſake ſalvation. And it is no marvell, that they whom Iohn in his canonically Epistle affirmeth not to have bene of the elect, from whom they went out, doe feele God unappeaſable. For he directeth his ſpeech againſt them, that imagined, that they might returne to the Chriſtian religion, although they had once departed from it : and calling them from this falſe and peſtilent opinion, hee ſaith that which is moſt true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Chriſt, that wittingly and willingly have caſt it away : but they caſt it not away, that onely in diſſolute licentiousneſſe of life tranſgreſſe the word of the Lord, but they that of ſet purpoſe caſt away his whole doctrine. Therefore the deceit is in theſe words of falling and ſinning. Becauſe the Novatians expound Falling to bee, if a man being taught by the law of the Lord, that he ought not to ſeale or to commit fornication, abſtaineth not from ſtealing or fornication. But contrariwiſe I affirme, that there is a ſecret compariſon of contraries, wherein ought to bee repeated all things contrary to that which was firſt ſpoken, ſo that here is expreſſed not any particular fault but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may ſo call it) the Apoſtaſie of the whole man. Therefore when he ſaid, they which have fallen after that they have once bene enlightned, and have taſted the heavenly gift, and bene made partakers of the holy Ghost, and alſo taſted the good word of God and the powers of the world to come : it is to bee underſtanded of them, that with adviſed ungodlineſſe have choked the light of the holy Spirit, have ſpit out againe the taſte of the heavenly gift, have eſtranged themſelves from the ſanctification of the holy Ghost, have troden under foote the word of God and the powers of the world to come. And the more to expreſſe that adviſed purpoſe of wickedneſſe, in another place afterward he addeth this word by name Wilfully. For when he ſaith, that there is left no ſacrifice for them that ſinne willingly after knowledge of the truth received, he doth not deny, that Chriſt is a continuall ſacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which hee expreſly crieth out almoſt in the whole Epistle, where he declareth the prieſthood of Chriſt) but he ſaith, that there remaineth no other when that is once forſaken . and it is for ſaken, when the truth of the Goſpell is of ſet purpoſe renounced.

24. But whereas ſome doe thinke it too hard and too far from the tender mercifulneſſe of God, that any are put away that flee to beſeeching the Lords mercy : that is eaſily answered. For he doth not ſay, that pardon is denied them if they turne to the Lord : but he utterly denieth, that they can riſe unto Repentance, becauſe they are by the juſt judgement of God ſtricken with eternall blindneſſe for their unthankfulneſſe. And it maketh nothing to the contrary, that afterward he applyeth to this purpoſe the example of Eſau, which in vaine attempted with howling and weeping to recover his right of the firſt begotten. And no more doth that threatning of the Prophet, when they cry I will not heare. For in ſuch Phraſes of ſpeech is meant neither the true converſion, nor calling upon God, but that carefullneſſe of the wicked wherewith being bound, they are compelled in extremity to looke unto that which before they careleſly neglected, neglected that there is no good thing for them but in the Lords helpe. But this they doe not so much call upon, as they mourne that it is taken from them. Therefore the Prophet meaneth nothing else by crying, and the Apostle nothing else by weeping, but that horrible torment which by desperation fretteth and vexeth the wicked. This, it is good to marke diligently, for else God should disagree with himselfe, which cryeth by the Prophet that he will be mercifull so soone as the sinner turneth. And as I have already said, it is certaine that the minde of man is not turned to better, but by Gods grace preventing it. Also his promise 'concerning calling upon him, will never deceive. But that blind torment wherewith the reprobate are diversly drawne, when they see that they must needs seeke God, that they may finde remedy for their evils, and yet doe flee from his presence, is improperly called Conversion and Prayer.

25 But a question is proved, whereas the Apostle denieth that God is appeased with fained repentance, how Achab obtained pardon and turned away the punishment pronounced upon him, whom yet it appeareth by the rest of the course of his life to have bene onely stricken amazed with sudden feare. He did indeed put on sackcloth, scattered ashes upon him, lay upon the ground, and (as it is testified of him) he was humbled before God: but it was not enough to cut his garments when his heart remaineth thicke and swolne with malice. Yet we see how God is turned to mercy. I answer, that so sometimes hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that ever the wrath of God lyeth upon them, and that it is done not so much for their sakes, as for common example. For whereas Achab had his punishment mitigated unto him, what profit got he thereby, but that hee should not feele it alive in earth? Therefore the curse of God although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and he himselfe went into eternall destruction. This same is to be seene in Esau. For though he had a repulse, yet a temporall blessing was granted him at his weeping. But because the spiritual inheritance, by the Oracle of God could not rest but with one of the brethren, when Jacob was chosen and Esau refused, that putting away did exclude the mercy of God: this comfort was left him as to a beastly man, that he should be fat with the fat of the earth and the dew of Heaven. And this is it that I said even now, that it ought to be referred to the example of the other, that we should learne the more chearefully to apply our mindes and endeavours to repentance, because it is not to be doubted that when we are truly and hartily turned, God will be ready to forgive us, whose mercifullnesse extendeth it selfe even to the unworthy, so long as they shew any griefe at all. And therewithall we be also taught, how terrible judgement is prepared for all the obstinate, which now make it a sport with no lesse shamelesse face, than iron heart to despise and set nought by the threatnings of God. After this manner he oftentimes reached out his hand to the children of Israell, to relieve their miseries, although their crimes were counterfeited, and their hearts double and false, as himselfe in the Psalm complaineth, that they by and returned to their nature, and so minded with so friendly gentle dealing to bring them to earnest conversion, or to make them unexcusable. Yet in releasing punishments for a time, he doth not bind himselfe to a perpetuall law thereby, but rather riseth sometimes more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their paines, that thereby may appeare how much fainting displeaseth him. But (as I have said) he sheweth some examples of his readinesse to give pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendment of life, and there pride may be the more grievously condemned, that stubbornly kicke against the pricke.

The first is out of Gregorie, and is rehearsed lib. 4. Sent. dist. 14. cap. 7. The second out of Amb. & refer. illic. & in Decr. Dist. 3. de penitent. c. Penit. prior. The third out of August. refer. ca. Dist. ca. Pen. post. The fourth out of Amb. refer. Dist. 11. Pen. ca. Vera Penit.

so many volumes, being a matter otherwise not very hard, that a man shall hardly finde how to get out, if he once fall into their degrees. First, in defining it, they shew that they never understood what Repentance was. For they take hold of certaine sayings of the old writers, which do nothing at all expresse that nature of Repentance, as that to repent is to weepe for sinnes passed and not to commit againe other evils to be lamented. Againe, that it is to lament evils passed, and not to commit againe other evils to be lamented. Againe: that it is a certaine sorrowfull revenge, punishing in himselfe that which he is sorrie to have committed. Againe: that it is a sorrow of heart, and bitteresse of soule, for the evils that a man hath committed or to which he hath consented. But, to grant these things well said of the Fathers ( which a contentions man might easily enough denie ) yet they were not spoken to this intent to describe Repentance, but onely to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall againe into the same offences, out of which they had bene drawne. But if we list to turne all such titles of commendation into definitions, then other may also be adjoynd as rightfully as they. As this of Chrysostome, Repentance is a medicine that destroyeth sinne, a gift given from heaven, a marvellous vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the law. Yea and the doctrine which they afterward teach, is somewhat worse then these definitions. For they sticke so earnestly in outward exercises that a man can gather nothing else out of infinite volumes, but that Repentance is a discipline and rigorousnesse that serveth partly to tame the flesh, and partly to chastise and punish wices: but they keepe marvellous silence of the inward renewing of the minde that draweth with it correction of life. There is indeed much take among them of Contrition and Attrition: they torment soules with many doubts, and doe thrust into them much trouble and carefulnesse: but when they seeme to have throughly wounded the hearts, they heale the bitteresse with a light sprinkling of ceremonies. And when they have thus curiously defined repentance, they divide it into contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke, no more logically then they defined it, although they would seeme to have wasted all their age in framing of syllogismes. But if a man will goe about to prove by the definition ( which kind of argument is of force among Logicians ) that a man may weepe for his sinnes passed, and commit no more to bee wept for, that hee may bewaile his evils passed, and commit no more to be bewailed, and that hee may punish himselfe for that which he was sorrie to have committed, &c. although he doe not confesse with his mouth: how will they maintaine their division? For if that true penitent man doe not confesse, then Repentance may be without confession. But if they answer, that this division is referred to repentance in respect that it is a Sacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of Repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is there [no cause to blame mee, but let them lay the fault in themselves that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truly ( according to my grossenesse ) when any thing is disputed of, doe referre all things to the very definition, which is the stay and ground of the whole disputation. But admit that to be their masterlike licence. Now let us particularly consider all the parts in order. Whereas I doe negligently leape over as trifles those things that they with great gravitie of countenance doe publish for mysteries. I doe it not unwittingly, ( neither were it very painefull for me to confute all that they thinke themselves to have deeply and subtly disputed ) but I would thinke it against conscience to wearie the Readers with such trifles without any profit. Truly it is easie to know by the questions which they move and toss, and wherewithall they miserably encomber themselves, that they prate of things that they know not. As for example: whether the repentance of our sinne pleaseh God, when obstinacy endureth in other. Againe: whether the punishments laid upon man by God, doe availe to satisfaction. Againe: whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterated for deadly sinnes: where they foully and wickedly define, that penance is daily done but for venial sinnes. Likewise they very much torment themselves with a grosse error, upon the saying of Hierome, that repentance is a second board after shipwracke. Wherein they shew that they never waked from their brutish dulnesse, to feele so much as a farre off the thouthandth part of their faults.

2 But I would the Readers should note, that here is not a quarrell about the shadow of an Ass, but the most earnest matter of all others is intreated of, that is to say, forgiveness

attaine to

nesse of finnes. For where as they require three things to repentance, contrition of heart confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: they doe therewithall teach that those three things are necessary to the obtaining of forgiveness of finnes. But if it be boove us to know any thing at all in all our religion, this truly behoveth us most of all: I meane to understand and know well by what meane, with what law, upon what condition, with what easinesse or hardnesse the forgiveness of finnes is obtained. If this knowledge stand not plaine and certaine, the conscience shall have no rest at all, no peace with God, no confidence or assurednesse, but continually trembleth, wavereth, is troubled, is tormented, is vexed, horribly dreadeth, hateth and fleeth the sight of God. But if the forgiveness of finnes hang upon those conditions to which they doe bind it, then nothing is more miserable, nothing in more lamentable case than we. They make Contrition, the first part of obtaining pardon, and they require that to bee a true Contrition, that is to say perfect and full: but in the meane time they doe not determine when a man may be assured, that hee hath to the full measure perfectly performed this contrition. Truly I grant that every man ought diligently and earnestly to enforce himselfe, with bitterly weeping for his finnes, to whet himselfe more and more to a loathing and hatred of them. For this is a sorrow not to be repented, that breedeth repentance unto salvation. But when there is such a bitterness of sorrow required as may proportionally answer the greatnesse of the fault, and such as may in ballance counterpoise with the trust of pardon; here, the poore consciences are marvellously tormented and troubled, when they see themselves charged with a due contrition of finnes, and doe not so attaine the measure of that due, that they can determine with themselves, that they have duly performed so much as they duly ought. If they say that wee must doe as much as lyeth in us, then come wee still to the same point that we are at before: for how dare any man assure himselfe that he hath employed all his force to bewaile his finnes? So when the consciences having long wrestled with themselves, and long beene exercised with battels, doe at length finde no haven to rest in, yet somewhat to ease themselves, they enforce themselves to a sorrow, and wring out teares to make perfect their contrition.

3. But if they say that I slander them: Let them come forth and shew any one man, that by such doctrine of contrition hath not either beene driven to despaire, or hath not set for his defence a counterfeiting of sorrow instead of true sorrow, against the judgement of God. We have also our selves said in one place, that forgiveness of finnes never commeth without repentance, because none but the afflicted and wounded with conscience of finnes, can sincerely call upon the mercy of God: but we have therewithall further said, that repentance is not the cause of the forgiveness of finnes. As for those torments of soules, which they say must bee performed of duty, we have taken them away: we have taught the sinner not to looke upon his owne contrition nor his owne teares, but to fasten both his eyes upon the onely mercy of God. We have only put him in minde that Christ called the labouring and laden; when hee was sent to publish glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preach remission to captives, to deliver prisoners: and to comfort them that mourne. From which should be excluded both the Pharisees, that filled with their owne righteousnesse, doe not acknowledge their owne povertie, and also the despisers that carelesse of Gods wrath doe seeke no remedie for their evils. For such doe not labour, nor are laden, nor contrite in heart, nor bond, nor captive. But there is great difference betweene teaching a man to deserve forgiveness of sins with due and full contrition, which the sinner can never performe: and instructing him to hunger and thirst for the mercy of God, that by the acknowledging of his owne miserie, by his owne quietnesse, wearinesse and captivity, it may bee shewed him, where he ought to seeke for reliefe, rest and liberty: and finally, he may be taught in the humbling of himselfe, to give glory to God.

4. Concerning confession, there hath beene alwaies great strife betweene the Canonists and the Schoole divines: while the one sort affirme, that confession is commauded by the speciall commandement of God, and the other sort deny it and say, that it is commauded onely by the Ecclesiasticall constitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable shamelesse of the divines, that have corrupted and and violently wrested as many places of Scripture, as they alleaged for their purpose. And when they saw that they could not so obtaine that which they required, they which would bee thought more subtil then the rest, escaped away with this shift, that confession came from the law of God, in respect of the substance of it, but afterward received forme of the law Positive. Even as the foolishlest sort among the Lawyers doe say, that Citations came from the law of God, because it is said: Adam where art thou? And likewise Exceptions, because Adam answered as it were by way of exception saying: The wife that thou gavest me, &c. But that both citations and exceptions received from given them by Civill law. But let us see by what arguments they prove this confession, either Formed or Unformed to bee the commandements of God.

The Lord (say they) sent the leprous men to their Priests. But what? Sent he them to confession? Who ever heard it spoken, that the Leviticall Priests were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they flie to allegories, And say. It was commanded by the Law of Moses, that the Priests should discern betweene leprosie and leprosie: sin is a spirituall leprosie, therefore it is the priests office to pronounce upon it. Before that I answer them, I aske this by the way, If this place make them judges of the spirituall leprosie, why doe they draw to them the knowledge of naturall and fleshy leprosie? This forsooth is not to mocke with the Scriptures. The law giveth to the Leviticall Priests the knowledge of the Leprosie, therefore let us take it upon us. Sinne is a spirituall leprosie, therefore let us all be examiners of sinne. Now I answer: sith the priesthood is removed, it is necessary that the Law bee removed also. All priesthoods are removed to Christ, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him only all the right and honour of priesthood is also removed. If they love so well to follow allegories, let them set Christ before them for the onely priest, and heape upon his judgement seat the free jurisdiction of all things: this we can easily be contented to suffer. Moreover their allegorie is very unitt, that setteth among the ceremonies that law which is meere-ly politike. Why then did Christ send the leprous men to the Priests? That the Priests should not cavill that he did breake the law that commanded the man healed of the leprosie, to be shewed before the Priests and purged with offering of sacrifice: therefore hee commanded the leprous men being cleansed, to doe that which belonged to the law. Goe (saith hee) and shew your selves to the Priest, and offer the gift that Moses hath commanded in the Law that it should bee for a witnesse unto them. And truly this miracle should have beene a witnesse unto them, for they had pronounced them leprous, and now they pronounce them healed. Are they not, whether they will or no, compelled to become witnesses of Christs miracles? Christ leaveth to them his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But because they still dally with it, therefore this worke is for a witnesse unto them. So in another place: This Gospell shall bee preached in all the world, for a witnesse to all nations. Againe: Ye shall be led before kings and governours, for a witnesse to them, that is: that in the judgement of God they may be more strongly convinced. But if they had rather follow Chrysofome: hee also teacheth that Christ did this for the Jewes sake that he should not be accounted a breaker of the Law. Albeit in so cleare a matter I am ashamed to alleage the witnesse of any man: whereas Christ pronounceth that he leaveth the right of the law whole to the priests as to the professed enemies of the Gospell, which were alway bent to carpe against it, if their mouth had not beene stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priests may still keepe this profession, let them openly take parts with them which must of necessity be restrained by force, that they speake not ill against Christ. For this nothing belongeth to his true ministers.

5 They bring their second argument out of the same fountaine, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirme any doctrine. But let them bee of force, if I doe not prove that I can make a fairer shew of them for my side, then they can for theirs. They say, The Lord commanded his Disciples, that when Lazarus was raised up, they should unbind and loose him from his bonds. Here first they lie: for it is no where read that the Lord said this to the Disciples: and it is much more likely that hee said to the Jewes that stood by him, that the miracle might bee made the more evident without suspicion of fraud, and his power appeare the greater, that without any touching, with his onely word he raised up dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lord, to take away all wrongfull opinion from the Jewes, willed them to rowle away the stone, to feele the stinke, to behold assured tokens of death, to see him rising by the onely power of his word, and them first to feele him living. And this is the judgement of Chryostom. But let us grant that this was spoken to the Disciples: what will they get thereby: That the Lord gave his Apostles power to loose. But how much more sily and more handsomely might these things be applied by way of allegorie, to say that by this signe the Lord meant to instruct his faithfull, to loose them that he had raised up: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those finnes that he had forgotten: th<sup>t</sup> they should not condemne them for sinners, whom he had acquitted: that they should not reproach men with those things that he had forgiven: that they should not be rigorous to punish, and lightly offended, where he is mercifull and easily entreated to spare? Truly, nothing ought to move us more to readinesse to forgive, than the example of the judge that threatneth that he will be unappealable to them that bee too rigorous, and ungentle. Now let them goe and boast of their allegories.

Auricular confession make. 7 proved either by their acknowledging of their sins whom Iohn did baptize, or by S. Iames his willingments to make their mutuell confessions

6 But now they joyne more neere hand with us. when they fight (as they thinke with open sentences. They that came to Iohns baptisme, did confesse their finnes, and Iames willeth that we confesse our sins one to another. No marvaile if they that would bee baptized did confesse their finnes, for it is said before that Iohn preached the baptisme of Repentance, and baptized in water unto Repentance. Whom should hee then have baptized, but them that had confessed themselves sinners? Baptisme is a token of the forgiveness of finnes: and who should bee admitted to this token but sinners, and they that acknowledge themselves to be such? Therefore they confessed their finnes, they might be baptized. And not without a cause doth Iames bid us confesse one to another. But if they did marke what followeth next after, they would understand, that this also maketh litle for them. Confesse (saith he) one to another your finnes, and pray one for another. He joyneth together mutuell confession and mutuell prayer. If we must confesse to the priests onely, then must we also pray for Priests onely. Yea, What and if it might follow of the words of James, that onely Priests might confesse? for when hee willeth that wee should confesse one to another, hee speaketh onely to them that may heare the confession of other: his word is in Greeke Alléour, mutually, interchangeably by turnes, or (if they so like best to terme it) by way of reciprocation one to another. But so enterchangeably none can confesse, but they that are meet to heare confessions. Which prerogative sith they vouchsafe to grant onely to Priests, we doe also put over the office of confessing to them onely. Therefore away with such triflings, and let us take the very meaning of the Apostle which is simple and plaine: that we should lay our weakenesse one in anothers bosome to receive mutuell counsell, mutuell compassion, and mutuell comfort one of another: then that we being naturally privy to the weakenesse of our brethren, should pray for them to the Lord. Why doe they then alludge Iames against us: which doe so earnestly require the confession of the mercy of God? but no man can confesse Gods mercie, unlesse he have first confessed his owne miserie. Yea we rather pronounce him accursed that doth not before God, before his Angels, before the Church, yea and before all men confesse himselfe a sinner. For the Lord hath concluded all under finnes, that all mouthes might bee stopped, and all flesh humbled before God, and he onely justified and exalted.

Gal. 3. 22. Rom. 3. 9.

Auricular confession a meer humane constitution not grounded upon any divine law. This was the 183. Pope.

7 But I marvaile with what face they dare affirme, that the confession whereof they speake, is of the law of God: the use whereof we grant indeed to bee very ancient, but such as we are able to prove in old time to have bene at liberty. Truly even their owne Chronicles declare, that there was no certaine Law or constitution of it before the times of Innocent the third. Surely, if they had had a more ancient law they would rather have taken hold thereof, than have been contented with the decree of the councill of Laterane, and so made themselves to be laughed at, even of children. In other things they sticke not to make forged decrees, which they father upon the most ancient Councils, than they may with very reverence of antiquity dazle the eyes of the simple. In this point, it came not in their miade to thrust in such a false packe. Therefore by their owne witness, there are not yet passed three hundred yeares since

Innocent

Innocent the third laid that shure upon men, and charged them with necessity of Confession. But, to speake nothing of the time: the very barbarousnesse of the words miniseth the credit of that law. For where these good fathers command every one of both kindes, male and female, once every yeare to confesse all his finnes to his owne priest, pleasant men doe merrily take exception, that in this commandement are contained only Hermaphrodites, and say that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female onely. Since that time, a more grosse beastlinesse hath bewrayed it selfe in their schollers, that cannot expound what is meant by his owne priest. Whatsoever all the Popes hired bablers doe prate, wee hold both that Christ was never the author of this law that compelleth men to reckon up their sins, and also that there passed a thousand and two hundred yeeres from the resurrection of Christ before that any such law was made. And so, that this tyranny was then first brought in, when all godlinesse and learning being destroyed, the visitors of Pastors had without choise taken all licentiousnesse upon them. Moreover, there are evident testimonies both in histories and other ancient writers, which teacheth that this confession was a politicke discipline reedemed by the Bishops, not a law made by Christ or his Apostles. I will alleage but one out of many, which shall be a plaine proofe thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitution of Bishops was diligently kept in all the West churches, but especially at Rome. Whereby he sheweth that it was no universall ordinance of all churches. But he saith that there was one of the Priests peculiarly appointed to serve for this office. Whereby he doth sufficiently confute that which these men doe falsly say of the keyes given for this use universally to the whole order of priesthood. For it was not the common office of all priests, but the speciall duty of some one that was chosen thereunto by the Bishop. The same is he, whom at this day in all the Cathedrall churches they call Penitentiarie, the examiner of hainous offences, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then he saith immediately after, that this was also the manner at Constantinople, till a certain woman feigning that she came to confession, was found so to have coloured under that pretence the dishonest company that shee used with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nectarius a man notable in holinesse and learning, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessing. Here, here let these asses lift up their eares. If auricular confession were the law of God, how durst Nectarius repell and destroy it? Will they accuse for an heretike and schismaticke Nectarius a holy man of God, allowed by the consenting voices of all the old fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemne the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the manner of confessing was not onely let slip for a time, but also discontinued even till within time of his remembrance. Yea let them condemne of Apostasie not onely the Church of Constantinople, but also all the East Churches which have neglected that law, which (if they say true) is inviolable and commanded to all Christians.

8 This abrogation Chrysofome, which was also bishop of Constantinople doth in so many places evidently testifie, that it is marvell that these dare mutter to the contrary. Tell (saith he) thy finnes that thou mayest doe them away, if thou be ashamed to tell any man thy finnes that thou hast done, tell them daily in thy soule. I doe not say, Confesse them to thy fellow servant, that may reproach thee: tell them to God that taketh care for them. Confesse thy sins upon thy bed, that there thy conscience may daily recognise her evils. Againe: but now it is not necessary to confesse when witnesses be present: let the examination of thy finnes be done with thy thought: let this judgement be without witness: let onely God see thee confessing. Againe: I doe not lead thee into a stage of thy fellow servants, I doe not compell thee to disclose thy finnes to men, rehearse and utter thy conscience before God. Shew thy wounds to the Lord the best surgeon, and aske salve of him. Shew to him, that will reproach thee with nothing, but will most gently heale thee. Againe: Tell no man, least he reproach thee, for neither is it to be confessed to thy fellow servant, that may utter abroad, but to the Lord. To the Lord shew thy wounds which hath care of thee, that is both gentle and a Physician. Afterward hee bringeth in God speaking thus: I compell thee not to come into the mids of a stage, and call many witnesses, tell thy sinne to me alone privately vately that I may heale thy fore. Shall we say that Chrysoſtom: did ſo raſhly, when hee wrote this & other like things, that he would deliver mens conſciences from theſe bonds wherewith they be bound by the law of God? not ſo. But he dare not require that as of neceſſitie, which he doth not underſtand to be commanded by the word of God.

9. But that the matter may be made the plainer and eaſier, firſt wee will faithfully rehearſe, what kinde of confeſſion is taught by the word of God: and then we will alſo declare their inventions, but not all (for who could draw dry ſuch an infinite ſea?) but onely thoſe wherein they comprehend the ſumme of their ſecret confeſſion. Heere I am loth to rehearſe how of the old tranſlator hath given in confeſſation this word Confeſſe in ſteed of Praise: which the groſſeſt unlearned men commonly know: ſaying that it is good to have their preſumptuouſneſſe bewraied, that doe give away that which was written of the praifes of God, to their owne tyrannicall commandement. To proove that confeſſion availeth to cheere the mindes, they thruſt in that place of the Psalme: In the voice of rejoycing and confeſſion. But if ſuch change may ſerve, then we ſhall have what we liſt, proved by what we liſt. But ſeeing they are ſo become paſt ſhame, let the godly readers remember that by the juſt vengeance of God they have bene caſt into a reprobate minde, that their preſumption ſhould bee the more deteſtable. But if we will reſt in the ſimple doctrine of the Scripture, we ſhall not be in danger of any ſuch decits to beguile us. For there is appointed one order of confeſſing, that for as much as it is the Lord that forgiveth, forgetteth, and putteth away ſins: therefore we ſhould confeſſe our ſinnes to him for to obtaine pardon, hee is the Phyſician therefore let us ſhew our diſeaſes unto him. It is hee that is grieved and offended, therefore let us ſeeke peace at his hand. Hee is the knower of hearts, and privie to all thoughts, therefore let us make haſt to powre out our hearts, before him. Finally it is he that calleth ſinners, therefore let not us delay to come to him. I have (ſaith David) made my ſinne knowne unto thee, and have not hidden my unrighteouſneſſe. I have ſaid, I will confeſſe againſt me my unrighteouſneſſe to the Lord, and thou haſt forgiven the wickedneſſe of my heart. Such is the other confeſſion of David. Have mercy upon me O God, according to thy great mercy. And ſuch is the confeſſion of Daniel; Wee have ſinned, Lord we have done perverſly, we have committed iniquities, and have bene rebellious in ſwarving from thy Commandement. And ſuch are other confeſſions that are commonly found in Scripture, the rehearſall whereof would almoſt fill a great volume. If we confeſſe our ſinnes (ſaith Iohn) the Lord is faithful to forgive us our ſinnes.. To whom ſhould we confeſſe? even to him: that is, if we fall downe with a troubled and humbled hart before him, if hartily accusing and condemning our ſelves before him we pray to be acquitted by his goodneſſe and mercy.

10. He that hartily and before God ſhall embrace this confeſſion, ſhall undoubtedly have both a tongue readie to confeſſe, ſo oft as it ſhall be needfull for him to publiſh the mercy of God before men, and not onely to whiſper the ſecret of his heart to one man, and once, and in his eare: but oft and openly, and in the hearing of all the world ſimply to rehearſe both his owne ſhame and the magnificence and glory of God. After this manner when David was rebuked of Nathan, he was pricked with the ſting of conſcience, and confeſſed his ſinne before both God and man. I have (ſaith hee) ſinned to the Lord, that is to ſay, now I alleadge nothing for my excuſe, I uſe no ſhifts, but that all men may judge me a ſinner, and that the ſame thing which I would have had ſecret from the Lord, may be alſo open to men. Therefore a willing confeſſion before men alway followeth the ſecret confeſſion that is made to God, ſo oft as it is profitable for the glory of God or for the humbling of our ſelves. For this reaſon the Lord in old time ordained in the people of Iſrael, that the Prieſt ſhould firſt ſpeake the words, and the people ſaying after him, ſhould openly confeſſe their iniquity in the Church: For hee foreſaw that this helpe was neceſſary for them, that every man might bee the better brought to a juſt reknowledging of himſelfe. And meet it is that with the confeſſion of our owne miſery we ſhould among our ſelves, and before all the world glorifie the goodneſſe and mercy of our God.

11. And it is convenient that this kinde of confeſſion bee both ordinary in the Church, and alſo extraordinarily uſed in ſpeciall manner, if it happen at any time the people to be guilty of any generall fault. Of this second kinde we have an example in that solemn confession which all the people used by the meanes and guiding of *Esdra*s and of Nehemias. For whereas that long banishment, the destruction of the City and Temple, the dissolving of religion, was the punishment of the common revolting of them all: they could not acknowledge the benefit of deliverance in such sort as was meet, unlesse they did first condemne themselves. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation some few sometime be innocent. For sith they see the members of a feeble and diseased body, they ought not to boast of healthfulness. Yea it is not possible but they must also themselves gather some infection, and beare part of the blame. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or war, or barrenesse or any other plague: if it be our duty to flie to mourning, to fasting, and to other signes of guiltinesse: then confession it selfe, whereupon all these things doe hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinary confession, beside that it is commended by the Lords owne mouth, there is no wise man that considering the profit thereof, dare disallow it. For whereas in all holy assemblies we make our apparance in the sight of God and the Angels: what other beginning may there be of our pleading, but our reknowledging of unworthinesse? But that (some man will say) is done by every prayer: For so oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confesse our sinnes. I grant. But if you consider how great is our carelesnesse, or drouinesse, or sluggishnesse, you will grant me that it should be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemn use of confession, the Christian common people should be exercised to humbling themselves. For though the ceremony that the Lord commanded the Israelites, was parcell of the nurture of the law, yet in some manner it also belongeth to us. And truly we see that this use is in well ordered Churches, profitably observed, that every Sunday the minister should rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe and of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes and craveth pardon of the Lord. Finally, with this key the gate to prayer is opened as well privately to every man, as univerally to all men.

12. Moreover the Scripture alloweth two formes of private confession, one that is made for our owne sake, whereof that saying of James is spoken, that wee should confesse our sinnes one to another, for his meaning is, that disclosing our wickednesse one to another, we should one helpe another with mutuall counsell and comfort. The other forme that is to be used for our neighbours sake, to appease him and reconcile him unto us, if he have in any thing benee offended by us. Now in the first kinde of confession, although James in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bosome we should unload our selves, leaveth us a free choise to confesse to him, that shall seeme meetest unto us of all the flocke of the Church: yet we ought principally to choose the Pastors, because they are for the most part in comparison of the other to be judged meetest. I say that they are meetest in comparison of the rest, because the Lord appointeth them by the very calling of their ministerie, at whose mouth we should be instructed to subdue and correct our sinnes, and also may receive comfort: by trust of pardon. For as the office of mutuall admonishment and reproving is committed to all men, yet it is specially joynted to the ministers. So when as wee all ought to comfort and confirme one another in confidence of Gods mercie: yet wee see that the ministers to assure our consciences of the forgivenesse of sinnes, are ordained as it were witnesses and pledges therefore, in so much that they be said to forgive sinnes and loose soules. When thou hearest this to be ascribed unto them, thinke that it is for thy profit. Therefore let every one of the faithfull remember this to be his dutie, if hee be privately so vexed and troubled with the feeling of sinnes, that he cannot winde out himselfe without helpe of another, not to neglect the remedy that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his reliefe to use the private confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to crave the private helpe of him, whose dutie it is both publickly and privately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Gospell. But alway this moderation is to be used, where God appointeth no certaintie, not to binde consciences with a certaine yoke. Hereupon followeth that such Confession ought to be free: not to be required of all men, but to be commended to those onely that shall understand themselves to have neede of it. Then that even they that use it for their neede, should not be compelled by any commandement, or trained by any deceit, to reckon up all their finnes, but so farre as they shall thinke it behoovefull for them, that they may receive sound fruit of comfort. Faithfull Pastors ought not only to leave this liberty to the Churches, but also to maintaine it, and stoutly stand in defence of it, if they will have tyrannie absent from their ministry, and superstition from the people.

13. Of the other sort of confession Christ speaketh in Matthew. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there rememberst that thy brother hath any thing against thee, leave thy gift there, and goe, and first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For so charity, that hath bene appaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging and craving pardon of the offence that wee have committed. Under this kinde is contained their confession, that have sinned even the offending of the whole Church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the private offence of one man, to forbid from holy mysteries all them that have sinned against their brother, till they be with just amends reconciled: how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the Church with any evill example, should recover the favour of the Church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corinthian received againe to the communion, when he had yeelded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was used in the old Church, as Cyprian maketh mention. They doe penance (saith he) in due time, and then they come to confession, and by laying on of the hands of the Bishop and the Cleargy, they receive leave to come to the communion. Any other order or forme of confessing, the Scripture utterly knoweth not, and it is not our duty to binde consciences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth us to bring in bondage. In the meane time I doe so much not speake against it, that the sheepe should present themselves to their shepherd when they meane to be partakers of the holy Supper, that I would most gladly have it every where observed. For both they that have an encumbred conscience, may from thence receive singular profit, and they that are to be admonished doe by that meane prepare place for admonishment, but so alway that tyrannie and superstition be away.

14. In these three kinds of confession, the power of the keyes hath place: that is either when the whole Church with solempne reknowledging of their fault craveth pardon: or when a private man, that by any notable fault hath bred common offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the unquietnesse of his conscience, doth neede helpe of the minister, discloseth his weaknesse unto him. But there are divers waies of taking away offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is provided for, yet the principall end is, that hatred should be taken away, and mens mindes knit together with a bond of peace. But this use that I have spoken of is not to be despised, that we may the more willingly confesse our finnes. For when the whole Church standeth as it were before the judgement seate of God, confesseth it selfe guilty, and hath one onely refuge unto the mercy of God: it is no slender or light comfort to have there present Christs Embassador, having commandement of reconciliation, of whom it may heare absolution pronounced unto it. Here the profitablenesse of the keyes is worthily commended, when this embassage is performed rightly, and with such order and religiousnesse as becometh it. Likewise when he that had in a manner estranged himselfe from the Church, receiveth pardon and is restored into brotherly unitie: how great a benefit is it that he understandeth himselfe to be forgiven by them, to whom Christ hath said: To whomsoever ye forgive finnes in earth, they shall be forgiven in heaven. And of no lesse effectualnesse and profit is private absolution, when it is asked by them that have need of speciall remedie to relieve their weaknesse. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he which heareth the generall promises that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithfull, remaineth nevertheless in some doubt and hath still an unquiet minde, as though hee had not yet obtained pardon: and the same man, if he have disclosed to his parson the secret fore of his minde, and heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe that saying of the Gospell, Thy sins are forgiven thee, Be of good hope, stablisheth his mind unto assurednesse and is delivered from that trembling where with he was before tormented. But when we speake of the keyes, wee must take heed that we dreame not of a certaine power severed from the preaching of the Gospell.

In another place we shall have occasion more fully to declare this matter againe, where we shall intreat of the government of the Church: and there shall wee see that all the power to binde and to loofe; which Christ hath given to his Church, is bound to the word. But this is most true in the mystery of the keyes, the whole force whereof standeth in this, that the grace of the Gospell be publikely and privately sealed up in the hearts of the faithfull, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which cannot bee done but by onely preaching.

15. But what say the Romish Divines? They decree that every one of either kind, so soone as they come to the yeeres of discretion, must yeerely once at the least confesse all their finnes to their owne Priest: and that their sinne is not forgiven, unlessse they have firmly conceived an intent to confesse it: which intent if they performe not when occasion is offered that they may doe it, there is now no more curie open for them into Paradise. And that the Priest hath the power of the keyes wherewith he may loofe and binde a sinner: because the word of Christ is not in vaine. Whatsoever yea binde, &c. About this power they stoutly fight among themselves. Some say that there is but one key in substance, that is the power to binde and loofe, and as for knowledge, that it is indeed requisite for a good use, but that it is onely as an accessary and is not essentially joynd with the other. Some other, because they saw this to be too much an unbridled licence, have reckoned up two keyes, discretion and power. Other againe, when they saw the lewd boldnesse of Priests to bee restrained by this moderation, have forged other keyes, that is to say, authority, of discerning which they should use in giving determinate sentence and power, which they should practise in executing of their sentence: and that knowledge standeth by as a Counsellor. But they dare not simply expound this binding and loofing to be to forgive and put away finnes: because they heare the Lord crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I, it is I that put away thy finnes, O Israell. But they say it is the Priests office to pronounce who be bound or loofed, and to declare whose finnes are forgiven or retained, and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolveth and retaineth finnes, or by sentence when he excommunicateth and receiveth againe to partaking of the Sacraments. Finally, when they understand that they be not yet out of this donbr, but that it still may be objected against them, that oftentimes their priests doe binde and loofe men unworthy, which are not therefore bound or loofed in heaven: then (which is their last refuge) they answer that the giving of the keyes must be construed with a limitation, that is to say, that Christ hath promised, that before his judgement seat such sentence as the Priest shall be allowed as hath bene justly pronounced, according as the deservings of him that is bound or loofed, did require. Moreover they say, that these keyes are given by Christ to all Priests, and are delivered to them by their Bishops, at the time of their promoting to Priesthood: but the free use of them remaineth onely with such as doe exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended priests have indeed the keyes, but rustie and bound up. And they that say these things may well seeme modest and sober in comparison of the rest, which upon a new anwill have forged new keyes, with which they say the treasure of the Church is locked up. These keyes we shall hereafter trie in place fit for it.

16. Now I will in few words answer to every one of these particularly. But at this present I speake not by what right or what wrong they binde the soules of the faithfull with their laws, forasmuch as we wil consider that when place serveth. But where they charge men with a law of reckoning up all their finnes: where they say that sinne is not forgiven but upon condition, if there be an intent conceived to confesse it: where they babble that there remaineth no entrie into Paradise, if occasion of confessing bee neglected: this is in no wise to be suffered. Must all finnes be reckoned up? But David, (who as I thinke) had well studied upon the confession of his finnes, yet cried out: who shall understand his errors? Lord cleanse mee from my secret finnes. And in another place. My iniquities have passed above my head, and like a waigthy burden have waxed heave above my strength. Truly hee understood how great was the bottomlesse depth of our finnes: how many were the sorts of our mischievous doings, how many heads this monster Hydra did beare, and how long a taile she drew after her. Therefore hee went went not about to reckon up a register of them, but out of the depth of evils, he cried unto the Lord : I am overwhelmed, I am buried and choaked, the gates of hell have compassed me, let thy hand draw me out, which am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and ready to die. Who now may thinke upon the numbering of his sinnes, when he seeth that David can make no number of his ?

17. With this butchery, the soules that have bene touched with any feeling of God, have been more cruelly vexed. First they called themselves to account : then they divided sinnes into armes, into boughes, into branches, and into twigges, according to these mens rules : then they weighed the qualities, quantities, and circumstances. And so the matter went a little forward : But when they had proceeded a little further, than was on each side skie, and on each sea, no haven, no safe roade : the moe that they had passed over, the greater heape alway did thrust it selfe into their sight, yea they rose up as high mountaines, and there appeared no hope, not so much as after long compassings, any way to escape. And so they did sicke fast betwene the sacrifice and the stone, and at last was found no other issue but desperation. Then these cruell butchers, to ease the wounds that themselves had made, laid certaine gentle plaisters, that every man should doe as much as he could. But new cares againe rose up, yea new torments did flea the silly soules, as to thinke : I have not employed time enough, I have not ind devoured my selfe with such diligence as I ought, I have passed over many things by negligence, and the forgetfulness that commeth by negligence is not excusable. Then were there ministred other plaisters to asswage such paines, as, Repent thee of thy negligence : if it be not altogether carelesse, it shall be pardoned. But all these things cannot close up the wound, and are not so much easement of the evill; as poyson covered with hony, that they should not with their bitterness offend the first taste but enter into the bowels before that they be perceived. Therefore this terrible saying alway calleth upon them and soundeth in their eares : Confesse all thy sinnes. And this horrour cannot be appeased but by assured comfort. Heere let the readers consider, how possible it is to bring into account all the doings of a whole yeere, and to gather together what sinnes they have done every day; forasmuch as experience proveth to every man, that when at evening he shall reckon up the faults but of one day, his memory is confounded therewith, so great a multitude and diversity presenteth it selfe. For I speake not of grosse and blockish hypocrites that thinke they have done sufficiently, if they have noted three or foure of the greatest sinnes : but I speake of the true worshippers of God, which when they see themselves oppressed with the examination that they have made, doe adde also this saying of John : If our owne heart doe accuse us, God is greater than our heart : and so they quake for feare at the sight of the Judge, whose knowledge far surmounteth our understanding.

18. But whereas a great part of the world rested them upon such flatteries, where-with so deadly a poyson was tempered, this came not so to passe, because they beleevd that God was satisfied, or because they themselves were fully satisfied : but that the anchor cast as it were in the mid sea, should rest a little from sailing, or as a wayfaring man weary and fainting should lie downe in the way. I labour not much in proving this. For every man may be witness to himselfe, I will in a short sum shew, what manner of Law this was. First simply it is impossible, and therefore it can doe nothing but destroy, damne, confound, and cast in ruine and desperation. And then when it hath led sinners from the true feeling of their sinnes, it maketh them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themselves. For while they are wholly busied in reckoning up of their sinns, in the meane time they forget the secret sinke of vices, their hidden Iniquities, and inward filthinesse, by knowledge whereof they should chiefly have weighed their misery. But this was a most certain rule of confession, to acknowledge and confesse the bottomlesse depth of our evill to be so great as passeth our understanding. After this rule we see that the Publicanes confession was made, Lord be mercifull to me a sinner : as if hee should say : All that ever I am, I am altogether a sinner, and I cannot attaine with wit, or expresse with tongue the greatnesse of my sinnes : let the bottomlesse depth of thy mercy swallow up the bottomlesse depth of my sinne. But when thou wilt say, what ? are not all our sinnes to be confessed ? is no confession acceptable to God, but that which is knit up in these two words, I am a sinner? No, but rather we must endeavour our selves as much as in us lieth, to poure out our heart before the Lord, and not onely in one word confesse our selves sinners, but also truly and heartily acknowledge our selves to bee such: and withall our thought record, how great, and diversis our silt of finnes, not onely that we be uncleane, but what, how great, and in how many parts is our uncleannesse: not onely that we be debtors, but with how great debts wee bee loden, and how many waies charged: not onely that we be wounded, but also with how many and deadly strokes wee bee wounded. With this reknowledging when the sinner hath wholly powred out himselfe before God, let him earnestly and sincerely thinke that yet there remaine moe finnes, and that the secret corners of their evils are so deepe, that they cannot bee thoroughly disclosed. And hee crieth out with David Who understandeth his errors? Lord cleanse me from my hidden finnes. Now where they affirme that finnes are not forgiven but with an intent of confessing firmly conceived, and that the gate of Paradise is shut against him that neglecteth occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that wee should grant them that. For there is no other forgiveness of sinne, than alwaies hath benee. It is not read, that all they have confessed their finnes in the eare of some Priest, That wee reade to have obtained forgiveness of finnes at Christs hand. And truly they could not confesse, where there were neither any Priests Confessors, nor any confessing at all. And in many ages after, this confession was unheard of, at which time finnes were forgiven without this condition. But that wee may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doubtfull matter, the word of God is plaine, which abideth for ever: Whensoever the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. Hee that dare adde any thing to this word, bindeth not finnes, but the mercie of God. For whereas they say, that judgement cannot be given but when the cause is heard, we have a solution in readinesse, that they doe presumptuously take that upon themselves, which have made themselves Judges. And it is a marvell that they doe so boldly frame to themselves such principles, as no man in his right wit will grant. They boast that the office of Binding and Loosing is committed to them, as though it were a certaine jurisdiction joyned with Inquisition. Moreover their whole doctrine crieth out, that this authoritie was unknowne to the Apostles. Neither doth it belong to the Priest, but to him which desireth absolution, to know certainly whether the sinner be loosed or no: forasmuch as he that heareth can never know whether the reckoning be just and perfect. So should there bee no absolution but such as is restrained to his words that is to be judged. Moreover the whole order of Loosing standeth of Faith and Repentance, which two things are hidden from the knowledge of man, when sentence must be given upon another man. It followeth therefore that the assurance of Binding and Loosing is not subject to the judgement of an earthly Judge: because the minister of the word, when he doth his office, cannot give absolution but conditionally: but that this is spoken for the finnes sake, Whose finnes ye forgive, &c. that they should not doubt that the pardon which is promised by the Commandement and word of God, shall be ratified in Heaven.

19. Therefore it is no marvell, if wee condemne and desire to have utterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent and so many waies hurtfull to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferent, yet forasmuch as it is to no use nor profit, and hath given cause to so many wickednesse, sacrileges and errors, who will not thinke that it ought to bee presently abolished? They doe indeed reckon up some good uses, which they boast upon as very profitable, but these either false or of no value at all. One onely they commend with a singular prerogative, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, whereby the sinner both is for a time to come made wayrer, and preventeth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though we did not humble a man with shamefastnesse enough, when we call him to that high judgment seate of heaven. I meane to the hearing of God. It is forsooth very well profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge we cease to sinne, and bee not ashamed to have God witness of our evill conscience. Although the very same is also most false, for it is to bee seene that by nothing groweth greater confidence or licentiousnesse to sinne, than when when men having made confession to a Priest, thinke that they may wipe their mouth and say, I did it not. And not onely they are made all the yeere long the bolder to sin; but all the rest of the yeere bearing themselves bold upon confession, they never sigh unto God, they never returne to themselves, but heape sinnes upon sinnes, till they vomit up all at once as they thinke. And when they have once vomited them up, they thinke themselves discharged of their burden, and that they have taken away from God the judgement that they have given to the Priest, and that they have brought God in forgetfulness when they have made the Priest privie. Moreover who doth merrily see the day of confession at hand? Who goeth to confession with a cheerefull heart, and commeth not to it rather against his will, and as it were drawing backward, like as if he were taken by the necke and drawne to prison? unlesse peradventure it bee the very Priests, that use joyfully to delight themselves with mutuall rehearals of their doings, as it were with merrie tales? I will not defile much paper with monstrous abominations whereof auricular confession swarmeth full. Onely this I say, if that holy man did not unwisely, that for one rumor of fornication tooke away confession out of the Church, yea out of the remembrance of his flocke: then wee be thereby put in minde what is needfull to be done at this day upon infinite whoredomes, adulteries, incests, and bawderies.

20. Where the Confessioners alleadge for this purpose the power of the Keyes and doe thereupon set the poupe and proue of their kingdome, as the proverbe is: it is to be seene how much they ought to availe. Then (say they) are the Keyes given without cause? Is it said without cause: Whatsoever you loose upon earth, shall be also loosed in Heaven? Doe we then make the word of Christ voide? I answer there was a weightie cause why the Keyes should be given, as both I have even now already declared, and shall more plainly shew againe when I come to entreat of excommunication. But what if I doe with one sword cut off the hold of all that they require, that is, with saying, that sacrificing Priests are not the vicars nor successors of the Apostles? But this shall also be to be intreated of in another place: but now they raise up an engine whereby they would most of all defend themselves, and thereby may all their buildings bee overthrowne. For Christ did not give his Apostles the power to binde and loose, before that he gave them the holy Ghost. Therefore I say, that none have the power of the Keyes that have not first received the holy Ghost. I denie that any man can use the Keyes but having the holy Ghost going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to be done. They trifling say, that they have the holy Ghost. But indeed they deny it, unlesse peradventure they saigne (as they doe saigne indeed) the holy Ghost to bee a vaine thing and a thing of nothing, but therein they shall not bee beleevd. And by this engine they are utterly overthrowne, that of whatsoever doore they boast that they have the Key, a man may alway aske them whether they have the holy Ghost, which is the Judge and governour of the Keyes. If they answer that they have, then they may be asked againe, whether the holy Ghost may erre. This they will not bee glad to speake exprely, although they crookedly utter the same by their doctrine. It is therefore to be gathered, that no Priests have power of the Keyes which doe commonly without consideration loose those things that the Lord would have to be bound, and bind those things that the Lord commanded to be loosed.

21. Whereas they see themselves convinced by most cleare experiments, that they doe without choise loose and binde the worthy and unworthy, they usurpe a power without knowledge. And though they dare not denie that knowledge is requisite for a goode use, yet they write that the very power is given to evill disposers of it. But this is the power, whatsoever thou bindest or loosest in earth, shall be bound or loosed in heaven. Either the promise of Christ must lie, or they that have this power doe well binde and loose. Neither may they dally and say, that the saying of Christ is limited according to the deserving of him that is bound or loosed. And wee also confesse that none can bee bound or loosed, but they that are worthe to bee bound or loosed. But the Messengers of the Gospell and the Church have the word, by which they measure this worthinesse, in this word the messengers of the Gospell, may promise to all men forgiveness of sinnes in Christ by Faith, they may proclaime damnation unto all and upon all that embrace not Christ. In this word the Church pronounceth that fornicators, adulterers, thieves, manslayers, covetous men, unjust men, have no part in the kingdome of God, and bindeth such with most sure bonds. With the same word the Church looseth them whom it comforteth being repentant. But what power shall this be, nor to know what is to be bound or loosed, and nor to be able to binde or loose without knowledge: Why then doe they say that they loose by authority given unto them, when the loosing is uncertaine? What have wee to doe with this imaginative power, if there be no use of it? But I have it alreadie proved that either there is no use of it, or so uncertaine an use as may be accounted for none at all. For whereas they confesse that there is a great part of Priests that doe not rightly use the Keies, and that the power without lawfull use is of no effect. Who shall assure me that he, of whom I am loosed, is a good user of the keies? If he be an evill user of it, what hath he else but such a void disposing of them, as to say, what is to be bound or loosed in thee I know not, for as much as I lacke the right use of the keies, but if thou deserve, I loose thee. But so much might doe, I will not say a lay man (for they could nor beare that with patient eares) but a Turke or a Divell, For it is as much as to say, I have not the word of God the sure rule of loosing, but there is power given me to loose thee, if thy deservings be so. We see therefore what they meant, when they defined the keies to be the authoritie of discerning, and power of executing? and that knowledge is adjoynd for a counsellor, and like a counsellor serveth for a good use: undoubtedly even they desire to raigne at their owne will, licentiously without God and his word.

1 Cor. 6. 9.

The uncertain-
of popish ab-
solutio.

22. If any man take exception and say, that the lawfull ministers of Christ shall be no lesse doubtfull in their office, because the absolution that hangeth upon Faith shall alway remaine doubtfull: and then that sinners shall have either none, or a cold comfort, because the minister himselfe which is no competent judge of their faith, cannot be assured of their absolution: we have answered thereunto in readinesse. For they say that no finnes are forgiven by the Priest, but such whereof himselfe hath bene the hearer: so by their opinion, the forgiveness hangeth upon the judgement of the Priest, and if he doe not wisely discern who be worthy of pardon, the whole doing is void and of no effect. Finally the power whereof they speake, is a jurisdiction adjoynd to examination, whereunto pardon and absolution is restrained. In this point is found no sure ground, but rather it is a bottomlesse depth: For where the confession is not found, the hope of pardon is also laine, and then the Priest himselfe must needs sticke in suspence while he cannot tell, whether the sinner doe faithfully reckon up all the evill deeds. Finally (such is the ignorance and rudenesse of Priests) the most part are no fitter to doe this office, than a shoemaker to plow the ground, and the rest in a manner all ought worthily to suspect themselves. Hereupon therefore riseth the perplexitie and doubtfulness of the Popes absolution, because they will have it grounded upon the person of the Priest, and not onely that, but also upon knowledge, that he may judge onely of things informed, examined and proved. Now if a man should aske of these good doctors, whether a sinner be reconciled to God, when some finnes are forgiven: I see not what they have to answer, but that they shall bee compelled to confesse that all is unprofitable, that the Priest pronounceth of the forgiveness of those finnes that he hath heard rehearsed, so long as the other finnes are not delivered from condemnation. On the behalfe of him that confesseth how hurtfull carelesnesse holdeth his conscience bound, appeareth hereby that when hee resteth upon the Priests discretion, as they call it, he can determine nothing certainly by the word of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleere from all these absurdities. For the absolution is conditional, that the sinner should trust that God is mercifull unto him, so that he sincerely seeke the cleansing of his finnes in the sacrifice of Christ, and obey the grace offered him. So hee cannot erre, which according to the office of a Preacher, proclaimeth that which is given him in instructions by the Word of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleare absolution, when that simple condition is annexed of the embracing the grace of Christ, according to that generall doctrine of the master himselfe. Be it done to thee according to thy Faith. Which hath been wickedly despised in the Papacie.

Mat. 9. 29.

23. How foolishly they confound those things that the Scripture teacheth of the power of the keyes, I have promised that I will speake in another place, and there shall be a more convenient place for it, when I come to intreat of the government of the Church. But let the readers remember that those things are wrongfully wrested to Auricular and secret confession, which are spoken by Christ partly of the preaching of the Gospell, and partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they object that the power of loosing is given to the Apostles, which Priests may use in forgiving sinnes acknowledged unto them, it is plaine that they take a false and fond principle, because the absolution that serveth Faith, is nothing else but a witness of pardon taken out of the free promise of the Gospell. As for the other confession, that hangeth upon the discipline of the Church, it pertaineth nothing to secret sinnes but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken away. But whereas they scrape together here and there testimonies, to prove that it sufficeth not to confesse sinnes either to God onely or to lay men, unless a Priest be the hearer of them, their travell therein is but lewd, and such as they may be ashamed of. For when the Ancient Fathers counsell sinners to unburden themselves to their owne Pastour, it cannot bee expounded of particular rehearfall which then was not in use. Then Lombard and such like (such was their sinister dealing) seeme of set purpose to have given themselves to fained bookes, by pretence whereof they might deceive the simple. They doe indeed truly confesse, that because absolution alway accompanieth Repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with Repentance, although he have not yet confessed, and therefore that then the Priest doth not so much forgive sins as pronounce and declare them forgiven. Albeit in the word of declaring, they lye bring in a grosse error, thrusting a ceremonie in steed of doctrine. But whereas they patch unto it, that hee is absolved in the face of the Church that had already obtained pardon before God: they doe inconveniently draw to the peculiar use of every particular man, that which wee have already said to bee appointed for the common discipline, where the offence of a heinous and notorious fault is to be taken away. But by and by after, they deprave and corrupt moderation, adding an other manner of forgiving with an enjoying of penalty and satisfaction, wherein they presumptuously claime to their owne sacrifices a power to part that in halves, which God hath in all places promised us whole together. For when he simply requireth Repentance and Faith, this partition or exception is a very roberie of God. For it is in effect as much as if the Priest taking upon him the person of a Tribune, should become intercessor to God and would not suffer God of his meere liberality to receive him into favour, that hath lien prostrate before the Tribunes seates and there hath been punished.

24. The whole summe cometh to this point, that if they will make God the Author of this counterfet confession, therein is their falsehood condemned, as I have proved them false forgers in the few places that they alleadge. But sith it is evident that it is a Law made by men, I say that it is both tyrannicall and made injuriously against God, who binding mens consciences to his word, will have them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obtaining of pardon, there is a necessity prescribed of that thing which the Lord would be free, I say that this is a sacrifice not to be suffered, because there is nothing more properly belonging to God, than to forgive sinnes, wherein consisteth salvation for us. Moreover I have shewed that this tyrannie was first brought in, when the world was oppressed with filthy barbarousnesse. I have also taught that it is a pestilent law, that either throweth downe headlong into desperation the poore soules in whomsoever abideth a feare of God: or where there reigneth carelesnesse, delighteth them with vaine flatteries, and so maketh them duller. Last of all I have declared, that whatsoever mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and deprave pure doctrine, and hide ungodlinesse with deceitfull colours.

25. The third place in repentance they assigne to satisfaction, whereof all that ever they babble may be overthrowne with one word. They say that it is not enough for him that repenteth, to abstaine from his former evils, and change his behaviour into better, unless hee make satisfaction to God for those things that hee hath done: And that that there be many helpees by which we may redeeme sins, as weepings, fastings, oblations and the workes of charity. With these we must winne the Lord to bee favourable, with these we must pay our debts to the righteousnesse of God, with these wee must make amends for our faults, with these wee must deserve pardon. For although by the largenesse of his mercy he hath forgiven our fault, yet by the discipline of his justice he retaineth the paine, and that this is the paine that must be redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they say cometh to this point, that wee doe indeede obtaine pardon of our finnes at the mercifullnesse of God, but by meanes of the deserving of our workes, by which the offence of our finnes may be recompensed, that due satisfaction may bee fully made to Gods righteousnesse. Against such lies, I set the free forgivenesse of finnes, than which there is nothing more evidently spoken of in the Scripture. First what is forgivenesse, but a gift of meere liberalitie? For the creditor is not said to forgive, that acknowledgeth by acquittance that the money is paid, but he that without any payment willingly of his owne liberality cancelleth the debtors bond. Secondly, why is this word, Freely added, but to take away all opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore doe they yet set up their satisfaction, that are stricken downe with so mightie a thunderbolt? But what? when the Lord crieth out by Efay, It is I, It is I that doe put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will not be mindfull of thy finnes: doth he not openly declare, that he fetcheth the cause and foundation of forgivenesse onely from his owne goodnesse? Moreover whereas the whole Scripture beareth this witness of Christ, that forgivenesse of finnes is to bee received by his name, doth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then doe they teach, that it is received by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they denie that they give this to satisfactions, although they say that the name be used as helpees by way of meanes. For whereas the Scripture saith. By the name of Christ, it meaneth that wee bring nothing, we alleadge nothing of our owne, but rest upon the onely commendation of Christ. As Paul, where hee affirmeth that God is reconciling the world to himselfe in Christ, for his sake not imputing to men their finnes, he immediately sheweth the meane and manner how, because he that was without sinne, was made sinne for us.

26. But (such is their perversnesse) that say that both forgivenesse of finnes and reconciliation are performed both at one time, when we are in Baptisme received into the favour of God by Christ: that after Baptisme wee must rise againe by satisfactions, and that the blood of Christ profiteth nothing, but so farre as it is distributed by the keyes of the Church. Neither doe I speake of a doubtfull matter, forasmuch as they have in most evident writings bewraied their owne filthinesse, and not one or two of them, but all the Schoolemen univerally. For their master after that hee had confessed that Christ had paid the penaltie of finnes upon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, immediately correcteth his saying with adding this exception, that in Bap-tisme all temporall penalties of finnes are released, but after baptisme they are mini-shed by the helpe of penance, that so the crosse of Christ and our penance may worke together. But John saith far otherwise, if any sinne, we have an advocate with the father, even Jesus Christ, which is the propitiation for our finnes, I write unto you children, because your finnes are forgiven you for his names sake. Truly, hee speaketh to the faithfull, to whom when he setteth forth Christ to be the propitiation of finnes, hee sheweth that there is no other satisfaction, by which God, being displeased, may bee made favourable and appeased. Hee doth not say: God was once reconciled vnto you by Christ, now seeke you other meanes, but he maketh him a perpetuall advocate, al-way to restore us by his intercession into the favour of his father: a perpetuall propitiation, by which our finnes may be cleansed away. For this is ever true that the other
John said: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him that taketh away the finnes of the world. He taketh them away (saith he) himselfe and none other, that is to say, foras-much as he alone is the Lambe of God, he alone also is the oblation for finnes, he alone the propitiation sacrifice, he alone the satisfaction. For whereas the right and power to forgive belongeth properly to the Father, in the respect that hee is distinguished from the sonne, as we have already seene: Christ is heere set in another degree, that taking upon

upon himselfe the paine due unto us, he hath taken away our guiltinesse before the judgement of God. Whereupon followeth, that we shall no otherwise be partakers of the satisfaction made by Christ, unless the same honour remaine whole with him. which they do wrongfully take to themselves that goe about to appease God with their owne recompensings.

27. And here it is good to consider two things: that Christ may have his due honour kept unto him whole and unminished: and that the consciences being assured of the forgivenesse of sin, may have peace with God. Esay saith, that the father hath laid the iniquities of us all upon his sonne, that wee should bee healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other words saith: that Christ did in his body beare our finnes upon the tree. Paul writeth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sinne for us. That is to say, that the force and curse of sinne was slaine in his flesh, when he was given to be a sacrifice, upon which the whole heape of our finnes with all their malediction and curse, with the dreadfull judgement of God, and condemnation of death should be cast. Heere those triflings are in no case to be heard, that after the first purging, every one of us doth none otherwise feele the effectualnesse of the passion of Christ, than after the measure of satisfactorie repentance: but so oft as we fall, we be called backe to the only satisfaction of Christ. Now set before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgivenesse of finnes: that if we afterward fall, to the obtaining of a second forgivenesse our workes doe worke with it. If these things may have place, doe these things that are heere before assigned to Christ, remaine safe unto him? It is a marvellous great defence, betwene this, that our iniquities are laid upon Christ, that they should be cleansed in him, and this, that they are cleansed by our owne workes: betwene this that Christ is the procuring of mercy, and this, that God must be made mercifull by workes. But if wee speake of pacifying the conscience: what pacification shall this be for a mans conscience, to heare that his finnes are redeemed by satisfactions? When shall hee certainly know the measure of his satisfaction? Therefore he shall alway doubt whether he have God mercifull or no, he shall alway be vexed, and alway quake for feare. For they that rest upon light petty satisfactions, doe too contemptuously esteeme the judgement of God, and doe little consider how great is the grievousnesse of sinne, as we shall declare in another place. But although we grant them to redeeme some finnes with just satisfaction: yet what will they doe when they are oppressed with so many sins, for satisfaction whereof, an hundred lives, although they were wholly applied thereunto, cannot suffice? Beside that, all the places wherein the forgivenesse of finnes is affirmed, doe not belong to younglings, but to the already regenerate children of God, and them that have bene long nourished in the bosome of the Church. That embassage which Paul so honourably extolleth, I beseech you in the name of God, be yee reconciled unto God, is not directed to strangers, but to them that had bene already regenerate. But hee bidding satisfactions farewell, sendeth them to the crosse of Christ. So when he writeth to the Colossians, that Christ by the bloud of the crosse hath pacified all things in heaven or in earth, he restraineth not this to the onely moment wherein we are received into the church, but extendeth it to our whole course. Which easily appeareth by the proceffe of the text, where he saith, that the faithfull have a redemption by the bloud of Christ, that is forgivenesse of finnes. Albeit it is superfluous to heape together moe places that readily offer themselves to be found:

28. Here they flee to the sanctuarie of the foolish distinction, that some finnes are venial, and some deadly: that for deadly finnes is great satisfaction due, that veniall finnes are purged with more easie remedies, as with saying of the Lords prayer, with sprinkling of holy water, with absolution at the masse. So they mocke and trifle with God. But whereas they alway have in their mouth veniall and deadly sin, yet they could never discern the one from the other, saying that they make ungodlines and uncleannesse of heart a veniall sin. But we (as the Scripture the rule of right and wrong teacheth us) do pronounce, that the reward of sin is death, and that the soule that sinneth is worthy of death. But that the finnes of the faithfull are veniall, not for that they doe not deserve death, but because by the mercie of God there is no condemnation to them that that are in Christ Jesus, because they are not imputed: because they are taken away by pardon. I know how unjustly they slander this our doctrine. For they say, that it is the Stoicks strange conclusion, concerning the equalitie of finnes. But they shall easily be convinced by their owne mouth. For I demand of them, whether among the very same finnes that they confesse to be deadly, they doe not acknowledge one to bee greater than another. It doth not therefore immediately follow, that finnes are equal, because they are altogether deadly. When the Scripture definitively saith, that the reward of sinne is death, that the obedience of the Law is the way of life, and that the transgression of the Law is death, they cannot escape this sentence. What end of satisfying then will they finde in so great heape of finnes? If the satisfaction of one day bee the satisfaction of one sin, while they are about that one satisfaction, they wrap themselves in many sins, sith the justest man passeth no one day wherein he falleth not many times. Now when they shall prepare themselves to make satisfaction for these sins, they shall heape up great numbers, yea rather innumerable. Then the hope of satisfying being cut off, what doe they stay upon? how dare they still thinke of satisfying?

29. They goe about to winde out themselves: but (as the proverbe is) the water still cleaveth upon them. They forge a distinction of fault and penaltie. They confesse that the fault is forgiven by the mercie of God, but that when the fault is forgiven, the penaltie remaineth, which the rightousnesse of God requireth to bee paid: and that satisfactions doe properly belong to the release of the penaltie. Good God what a skipping lightnesse is this? now they confesse that the forgiveness of the fault lieth freely open for men, which sometime they teach men to deserve with prayers and weepings, and all other kindes of preparations. But yet still all that is taught us in the Scripture concerning the forgiveness of finnes, doth directly fight against this distinction. Which although I thinke that I have already more then sufficiently confirmed, yet I will adde some other testimonies wherewith these winding snakes may bee holden so fast, that they shall not be able once to fold in the top of their taile. This is the new Testament which the Lord hath covenanted with us in Christ, that hee will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by these words, wee learne by another Prophet, where the Lord saith: If the righteous turne away from his rightousnesse, I will not remember all his rightousnesse. If the wicked depart from his wickednesse, I will not remember all his iniquities. Whereas he saith that he will not remember their rightousnesse, that is as much to say, that hee will have no regard of them in respect to reward them. Therefore not to remember finnes, is as much as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in another place to cast it behinde his backe, to wipe it away like a cloude, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to hide it. By such manners of speech the holy Ghost doth plainly expresse his meaning unto us, if we would apply unto him willing eares to learne. Truly, if God doe punish sins, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembereth them: if he call them to judgement, he doth not hide them: if he examine them, hee doth not cast them behinde his backe: if hee looke upon them, hee hath not wiped them away like a cloud, if hee sith them, hee hath not cast them into the bottome of the Sea. And in this manner doth Augustine expound it in plaine words. If God have covered finnes, then hee would not looke upon them: if he would not looke upon them, then hee would not marke them: if hee would not marke them, then he would not punish them: he would not know them, he had rather pardon them. Why therefore did hee say that finnes were covered, that they should not be seene? What was meant by this that God did see finnes, but that he did punish them? But let us heare also out of another place of the Prophet, upon what conditions the Lord forgiveth finnes. If (saith hee) your finnes be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow: if they be red like crimson, they shall be as wooll. And in Jeremy we reade thus: In that day the iniquitie of Iacob shall be sought for, and shall not be found: the sinne of Judah, and it shall not be. Because I will bee favourable to the remnants that I shall preserve. Wilt thou briefly understand what is the meaning of those words? Weigh on the other side what is meant by these speeches: that the Lord doth binde up iniquities in a sacke, doth gather them into a bundle and lay them up, and doth grave them with an yron pointell in an adamant stone. If they signi-ſie (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance ſhall be given for recompence, then is it alſo not to be doubted, but that by contrarie ſentences the Lord affirmeth; that hee remitteth all recompencing of vengeance. Here I muſt beſeech the Readers not to hearken to my gloſſes, but onely that they will ſuffer the word of God to take ſome place.

30. What, I pray you, had Chriſt done for us, if wee ſhould ſtill be compelled to ſuffer paine for finnes? For when we ſay that hee did beare all our finnes in his bodie upon the tree, we meane nothing elſe thereby, but that hee ſuffered all the paine and puniſhment that was due unto our finnes. And the ſame hath Eſay more lively declared, where he ſaith: the chaſtiſement (or correction) of our peace was upon him. What is the correction of our peace but the paine due to finnes: and which wee ſhould have ſuffered before that we could be reconciled to God, unleſſe that he had entred into our ſtead? Lo, thou ſeeſt plainly, that Chriſt ſuffered the paines of finnes, to deliver them that be his from them. And ſo oft as Paul maketh mention of the redemption performed by Chriſt, he uſed to call it in Greeke Apolutroſin, whereby hee meaneth not redemption: as it is commonly taken, but the very price and ſatisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Chriſt gave himſelfe Antilutron, a price of ranſome for us. What propitiation is there with the Lord (ſaith Auguſtine) but ſacrifice? And what ſacrifice is there, but that which is offered for us in the death of Chriſt? But that which is appointed in the law of Moſes for cleaſing the offences of finnes, miniſtreth us a ſtrong battell ramme. For the Lord doth not there appoint this or that manner of ſatisfying, but requireth the whole recompence in ſacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doth moſt diligently and in moſt exact order ſet out all the ceremonies of expiation. How commeth it to paſſe, that hee commandeth to recompence faults committed, with no workes at all, but requireth onely ſacrifices for ſatisfaction, but becauſe his will is ſo to declare, that there is onely one kinde of ſatisfaction, whereby his judgement is appeaſed? For the ſacrifices that the Iſraelites did then offer, were not weighed by the worke of men, but were eſteemed by their truth, that is to ſay, by the onely ſacrifice of Chriſt. But what manner of recompence the Lord receiveth of us, Oſee hath very well expreſſed in few words. Thou ſhalt (ſaith he) take away iniquitie, O God. Loe, here is forgivenesse of finnes. And wee ſhall pry thee the calves of our lips: Loe here is ſatisfaction. I know that they doe ſubtilly ſlip away, when they make diſtinction betweene everlaſting paine, and temporall paines. But when they teach that temporall paine is any kind of puniſhment, that God taketh as well of the bodie as of the ſoule, except onely everlaſting death, this reſtraining of it doth little helpe them. For the places that we have above recited, doe expreſly meane this, that God receiveth us into favour with this condition, that in pardoning the fault, he pardoneth all the paine whatſoever we had thereby deſerved. And ſo oft as David or the other Prophets doe crave pardon of finnes, they doe alſo there withall pray to be releaſed of the paine. Yea, the very feeling of Gods judgement doth drive them thereunto. Again, when they promiſe mercy at the Lords hand, they doe in manner alway of purpoſe preach of the paines and the forgivenesse thereof. Truly, when the Lord in Ezechiel pronounceth that hee will make an end of the exile in Babylon, and that for his owne ſake, not for the Jewes ſake, he doth ſufficiently ſhew that both are of free gift. Finally, if wee be delivered by Chriſt from guiltineſſe of fault, the paines that come thereof muſt needes ceaſe.

31. But for ſo much as they doe alſo arme themſelves with testimonies of Scripture, let us ſee what manner of arguments thoſe be that they alledge. David (ſay they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of adulterie and manſlaughter, received pardon of his ſinne, and yet he was afterward puniſhed by the death of his ſonne that hee had gotten by that adulterie. We are taught to redeeme with ſatisfactions ſuch paines as were to be extended after forgivenesse of the fault. For Daniel adviſed Nebuchadnezar to redeeme his finnes with almes. And Salomon writeth that for equitie and godlineſſe, iniquities are forgiven. And in another place, that with charitie the multitude of finnes is covered. Which ſentence Peter alſo confirmeth. Again, in Luk the Lord ſaith of the woman that was a ſinner, that many finnes are forgiven her, becauſe ſhee hath loved much. How perverſly & wrongfully they ever weigh the doings of God, but if they had marked (as they should not have overpassed it) that there are two Kindes of Gods judgement, they would have seene in this rebuking of David, a farre other manner of punishment, than such as might bee thought to tend to revengement. But because, it is not a litle beboveth us all to understand, whereunto the chastisements have respect, wherewith God correcteth us for our sinnes, and how much they differ from those examples wherewith he pursueth the wicked and reprobate with indignation: therefore I thinke it shall not bee beside the purpose, to comprehend it shortly in a summe. For the order of plaine teaching, let us call the one kinde of judgement, the judgement of Revenge, the other of Chastisement. It is to bee understood, that God so punisheth his enemies with the judgement of revenge, that hee useth his wrath against them, confoundeth them, destroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let us take that to bee properly the vengeance of God, when his punishing is joynt with his indignation: with the judgement of chastisement he dealeth not so cruelly, as to bee angry: nor punisheth to destroy, nor sendeth downe his lightning to kill. Therefore it is not properly punishment or vengeance, but correction and admonishment. The one is the doing of a Judge, the other of a Father. For the Judge when he punisheth an evill doer, hee hath regard to the offence, and punisheth the very fault: when the father somewhat rigorously correcteth his childe, hee doth it not to be revenged on him, or to punish him, but rather to teach him, and make him wari-er in time to come. Christostom: in a certaine place useth a similitude somewhat differing from this, but yet it commeth to the same point. The sonne (saith hee) is beaten, and the servant also is beaten: but the one is punished as a bondservant, because hee hath offended, and the other is chastised as a freeman and as a sonne, needing correction. To the one his correction serveth for proove and amendment, to the other for a scourge and punishment.

32. But that we may have the whole matter shortly and in a ready summe, let this bee the first of two distinctions. Wheresoever punishment is to revenge, there sheweth it selfe the curse and wrath of God, which he alway withholdeth from the faithfull. Contrariwise, Chastisement both is a blessing of God, and beareth a testimony of his love, as the Scripture teacheth. This difference is commonly every where sufficiently expressed in the word of God. For whatsoever afflictions the wicked suffer in this present life, therein is painted out unto us as it were, a certaine entry of hell, from whence they doe already see a far off their eternall damnation: and they are so far from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by such beginning they are prepared to the most cruell hell, that at length abideth for them. But the Lord chastising chasticeth his servants, but hee doth not put them to death. Therefore they confesse that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them unto true instruction. But as we read every where that the holy ones suffer such punishments with quiet minde, so they have alway praied to escape the first kinde of scourges. Chastice mee Lord (saith Jeremy) but in thy judgement, not in thy wrath, least thou destroy me. Poure out thy wrath upon the nations that have not knowne thee, and upon the kingdomes that have not called upon thy name. And David saith: Lord rebuke mee not in thy wrath nor correct me in thy anger. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie, that oftentimes it is said, that the Lord is angry with them that be his, when hee punisheth their sinnes. As in Esay: I will confesse to thee O Lord, because thou hast been angry with mee: thy wrath is turned, and thou hast comforted mee. Againe Abacuc. Thou that hast beene angry shall remember mercy. And Michie: I will beare the wrath of the Lord, because I have sinned against him. Where hee putteth us in minde that not onely they that are justly punished, nothing prevaile with murmuring against him, but also that the faithfull have asswagement of their sorrow, in considering the purpose of God. For after the same manner it is said that hee doth defile his owne inheritance, which yet (as we know) he will never defile. But that is spoken not in respect of the purpose or meaning of God that punisheth, but of the vehement feeling of sorrow which yet they feele that suffer any of his severitie, whatsoever it bee. But he not onely pricketh his faithfull with no small rigour, but sometimes so woundeth them, that they thinke themselves not farre from the damnation of hell. So hee testifieth that they have de-ferued his wrath, and so it becometh that they should loath themselves in their evils, and be touched with the greater care to appease God, and carefully make haste to crave pardon. But even in the very same doing, hee sheweth a more evident testimonie of his fatherly kindeesse than of his wrath. For the covenant continueth, that was made with us in our true Salomon: the truth whereof hee that cannot discern, hath affirmed, that it shall never bee made void. If (saith hee) his children forsake my Law, and walke not in my judgements: if they defile my statutes, and keepe not my commandments; I will visite their sinnes with a rodde and with stripes: but I will not take away my mercie from him. Of which mercie to make us assured, hee saith, that the rodde wherewith hee will correct the posteritie of Salomon, shall bee of men, and stripes of the children of men: by which clauses when he meaneth moderation and lenitie, hee therewithall secretly declareth, that they cannot but be confounded with extreame and deadly horrour, that feele the hand of God to bee against them. How great regard he hath of this lenity in chastising his Israel, hee sheweth in the Prophet: I have purged thee (saith he) in fire: But not as Silver, for then thou shouldst have bene all consumed. Albeit hee teacheth that chasticements serve him for to cleanse him, but hee further saith, that hee useth the same so temperately, that hee bee not too much consumed by them. And that is needfull. For the more that every man reverently feareth God, and giveth himselfe to follow godlinesse, so much the tenderer he is to beare his wrath. For the reprobate, although they groane under his scourges, yet for that they weigh not the cause, but rather turne their backe both to their owne sinnes and to the judgement of God: by that stoutheinesse they gather a hardnesse: or because they murmure and kicke against him, and doe make an uprore against their Judge, that furious sudden rage astonieth them with madnesse and furor. But the faithfull being admonished by his correction, by and by descend to consider their sinnes, and being stricken with dread and horror, they flee in humble wise to pray to him for pardon, unlesse the Lord did asswage these sorrowes wherewith the poore soules torment themselves, they would faint a hundred times even in small tokens of his wrath.

33. Then let this bee the second distinction, that when the reprobate are stricken with the scourges of God, they do already after a certaine manner begin to suffer paines by his judgement, and though they shall not escape unpunished, for that they have not taken heed to such tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not punished to this end, to make them come to a better minde: but onely that, to their great hurt, they should prove God to be a Judge and revenger. But children are beaten with rods, not that they should thereby be punished of God for their sinnes, but that they should thereby profit to amendment. Therefore we take it that they rather have respect to the time to come, than to the time past. This I had rather expresse in Chrysostomes words than mine owne. For this (saith he) God doth lay paine upon us, not punishing our sins past, but correcting us against time to come. And so saith Augustine: That which thou sufferest, that for which thou lamentest, is a medicine to thee and no paine, a chastisement and no damnation. Put not away the scourge, if thou wilt not bee put away from the inheritance, &c. Know ye brethren that all this miserie of mankind when the world groaneth, is medicinall sorrow, and not a penall sentence, &c. These sentences I have therefore thought good to alleadge, that the manner of speech that I have above written, should not seeme to any man new and unused. And hereunto serve all the complaints full of indignation wherein the Lord offendeth doth expostulate of the unkindnesse of the people, for that they stiffely despised all punishments. In Esay hee saith: To what purpose should I strike you any more: from the sole of the foot to the crowne of the head, there is no whole place. But because the Prophets are full of such sayings, it shall be sufficient to have briefly shewed that God doth punish his Church for none other intent, but that it should be tamed and amend. Therefore when he did cast Saul out of the kingdom, he punished him to revengement: When he tooke from David his yong sonne, he corrected him to amendment. According to this meaning is that to be taken which Paul saith, we are judged of the Lord, we are corrected that we should not be damned with this world: that is, when we that be the children of God are afflicted with the hand of our heavenly Father, this is no paine wherewith we should bee confounded, but onely a chastisement wherewith wee should bee instructed. In which point Augustine is plainly on our side. For he teacheth that the paines wherewith men are alike chastised by God, are diversly to be considered: because to the holy ones they are battels and exercises after the forgiveness of their sinnes, to the reprobate they are without forgiveness paines of wickednesse. In which place he rehearseth how paines were laid upon David and other godly men, and saith, that the same tendeth to this end, that their godlinesse should bee such humbling of them, bee exercised and proved. And where Esfay saith, that the Jewish people had their iniquity forgiven them: because they had received full chastisement at the Lords hand: this proveth not that the pardon of sinnes hangeth upon the full payment of the paine: but it is in effect as much as if he had said: Because ye have already suffered paines enough, and by the grievousnesse and multitude thereof have beene now pined away with long mourning and sorrow, therefore it is now time that receiving the tidings of full mercie, your hearts should joyce and feele mee to be your father. For there God did take upon him the person of a father, which repenteth him even of his just severity, when hee was compelled sharply to correct his Sonne.

34. With these thoughts it is necessary that the faithfull be furnished in bitterness of afflictions. It is time that the judgement began at the house of the Lord, in which his name is called upon. What should the children of God doe, if they did beleve the severity of God that they feele to bee his vengeance? For hee that being stricken by the hand of God, imagineth God a punishing Judge, cannot conceive him but angry and enemy unto him, and detest the very scourge of God as a curse and damnation: Finally, hee can never be perswaded that God loveth him, that shall thinke him so minded toward him, that he is still minded to punish him. But hee onely profiteth under the rod of God, that thinketh him to be angry with his sinnes, but mercifull and loving to himselfe. For otherwise that mult needes happen, which the Prophet complaineth that he felt, where hee saith. Thy wraths, O God have passed over mee: thy terrours have oppressed me. Also that which Moses writeth, because wee have fainted in thy wrath: and wee have beene troubled in thy indignation, thou hast set our iniquities in thy sight, and our secrets in the light of thy countenance: because all our daies are gone away in thy wrath: our yeeres are consumed as the word that is passed out of a mouth. On the other side David saith thus of his fatherly chastisements, to teach that the faithfull are rather holpen than oppressed thereby: Blessed is the man whom thou hast corrected O Lord, and hast instructed in thy law, to give him quiet from evill daies, while a pit is digged for the sinner. Truly it is a hard tentation, when God sparing the unbelievers and winking at their faults, seemeth more rigorous against them that be his. Therefore hee gave them a cause of comfort, the admonishment of the law, whereby they should learne, that it is done to provide for their salvation when they are called againe into the way, and the wicked are carried headlong into their errors, whose end is the pit. And it is no difference whether the paine be everlasting, or during for a time. For as well warre, famine, pestilence, and sickness, as the judgement of eternall death are the curses of God: when they are laid upon men to this end, to be instruments of the Lords wrath and vengeance against the Reprobate.

35. * Now (as I thinke) all men doe perceive whereupon tended that chastisement of the Lord upon David: even to bee an instruction that God is grievously displeased with manslaughter and adultery, against which he had shewed so great indignation in his beloved and faithfull servant: that David should be taught to be no more so bold to do the like deede: and not to be a paine wherby he should make a certaine recompence to God. And so is to be judged of the other kinde of correction, whereby the Lord punished his people with a sore pestilence, for Dauids disobedience, whereinto he was fallen in numbering the people: For he did indeed freely forgive to David the guiltinesse of his sinne: but because it pertained both to the publike examples of all ages, and also to the humbling of David, that such a hainous offence should not remaine unpunished: therefore he most sharply chastised him with his rod. Which marke also

The miseries whereunto we are subject would swallow us up if we did not know that he which afflicteth us doth it as a father and not as a Iudge. 1 Pet. 4. 17. Jer. 25. 29. Psal. 88. 17. Psal. 90. 7.

we ought to have before our eyes in the universall course of mankind. For whereas after pardon obtained, we doe all yet suffer the miseries that were laid upon our first parent for paine of sinne: we perceive our selves by such exercises to be admonished, how grievously God is displeas'd with the transgression of his law: that being throwne downe and humbled with knowledge in conscience of our owne miserable estate, wee may the more fervently aspire to true blessednesse. But hee shall be most foolish that shall thinke that the calamities of this present life are laid upon us for the guiltinesse of sinne. And that I thinke was the meaning of Chrystome when he wrote thus. If God do therefore lay paines upon us, that he should call us, persevering in evils to repentance, than when repentance is once shewed, the paine shall be superfluous. Therefore as hee knoweth it to be expedient for every mans nature, so hee handleth one man more roughly, and another with more loving tendernesse. Therefore where hee mindeth to teach, that hee is not unmeasurable in taking punishments, hee reprocheth to the hard harted and obstinate people that being stricken yet they make not an end of sinning. In this meaning he complaineth, that Ephraim was a cake scorched one the one side, and raw one the other, because the corrections did not peirce into their mindes, that the people having their vices boiled out, might hee made meet to receive pardon. Truly hee that so speaketh, sheweth, that so soone as a man hath repented, hee will by and by become appeasable: and that by our stiffnesse hee is enforced to that rigour in chastising of faults, which should have beene prevented with willing amendment. Yet forasmuch as we all are of such hardnesse and rudenesse, as universallly needeth chastisement: it seemed good to him being a most wise Father, to exercise all without exception with a common scourge, all their life long. But it is marvellous why they so cast their eyes upon the onely example of David, and are not moved with so many examples, in which they might have beholden free forgivenesse of finnes. It is read that the Publican went out of the Temple justified. There followed no paine. Peter obtained pardon of his offence, his teares we read (saith Ambrose) his satisfaction wee read not. And the man sicke of the Palsie heard it spoken to him: Rise, thy finnes are forgiven thee. There was no paine laid upon him. All the absolutions that are rehearsed in the Scripture, are set out as given freely. Out of this great number of examples a rule should rather have beene gathered, than of that onely example that containeth in it a certaine speciall matter.

36. Daniel in his exhortation wherein he counselleth Nabucadnezar to redeeme his finnes with righteousnesse, and his iniquities with pitying of the poore: his meaning was not to say, that righteousnesse and mercy are satisfactory appeasements of God, and redemption of paines (for God forbid that there were ever any redemption saving only the blood of Christ) but to refer this word Redeeming rather to men than to God, as if he had said: O King, thou hast used an unrighteous and violent government, thou hast oppressed the humble, thou hast spoiled the poore, thou hast hardly and unjustly handled thy people: for thy unjust exactions, for thy violence and oppression, now render to them mercy and righteousnesse. Likewise Salomon saith, that with charity the multitude of finnes is covered: not before God, but among men themselves. For thus is the whole verse: Hatred raiseth up contentions, but charitie covereth all iniquitie. In which verse, as his manner is, he doth by way of comparison of contraries, compare the evils that grow of hatreds, with the fruits of charity: in this meaning, they that hate together, doe one bite, barke at, reproch and raile at another, and turne all things to the worst, but they that love together, do dissemble many things among themselves, doe winke at many things, and pardon many things one to the other: not that the one alloweth the others faults, but beareth with them, and helpeth them with admonitions rather than galleth them with reproaching them. And it is not to be doubted that Peter alleageth this place in the same sense, unlesse wee will accuse him of depraving and wrongfully wresting the Scripture. But whereas hee teacheth that sinne is purged with mercifulnesse and liberality, he doth not meane that recompence is there-with made for sinne before the face of the Lord, so that God being appeas'd by such satisfaction doth release the paine that otherwise he would have laid upon them, but after the accustomed manner of the Scripture hee declareth that they shall finde him mercifull unto them that leaving their former vices and iniquities, doe turne to him by godlinesse and truth: as if he should say, that the wrath of God doth cease and his iudgement rest, when we cease from our evill doings. Neither doth hee there describe the cause of pardon, but rather the manner of true conversion. As many times the Prophets doe declare, that Hypocrits doe in vaine pester God with forged ceremonious usages in steed of repentance, whereas it is uprightnesse of life with the duties of charity that delighteth him. As also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes commending liberality and gentleness, teacheth that such sacrifices please God. And when Christ, taunting the Pharisees that giving heed only to cleansing of dishes, they neglected the cleannesse of the hearr, commanded them to give almes that all might bee cleane: hee did not thereby exhort them to make satisfaction: but onely teacheth what manner of cleannesse pleaseth God. Luke 7. 35.

37. As touching the place of Luke, no man that hath with sound judgement read the parable that the Lord did there recite, will make us any controversie thereupon. The Pharisee thought with himselfe, that the Lord did not knowe the woman, which he had so easily received into his presence. For he thought that Christ would not have received her, if he had knowne her such a sinner as she was. And thereby hee gathered, that Christ was not a Propheet that might in such sort bee deceived. The Lord, to shew that she was no sinner to whom her finnes was already forgiven, did put out this parable. There were two debtors to one creditor upon usurie: the one ought fifty, the other ought five hundred, both had their debts forgiven them. Whether oweth more thanke? the Pharisee answered: he, to whom most is forgiven. The Lord replied: learne hereby that this womans finnes are forgiven her, because she hath loved much. In which words (as you see) he maketh not her love the cause, but the proofes of the forgiveness of her finnes. For they are derived upon a similitude of that debtour, to whom five hundred was forgiven, to whom he did not say that therefore it was forgiven, because hee had loved much: but therefore loved much, because it was forgiven. And hereunto must that similitude be applied in this sort: Thou thinkest this woman to bee a sinner: but thou oughtest to know that she is none such, for as much as her finnes bee forgiven her: And that her finnes be forgiven her, her love ought to prove unto thee, whereby shee rendereth thanke for this benefit. It is an argument gathered of the following effect, whereby any thing is proved by signes ensuing. By what meane shee obtained forgiveness of finnes, the Lord openly testifieth: Thy faith, saith hee, hath saved thee. Therefore we obtaine forgiveness by faith: By charitie wee give thankes and testifie the bountifullnesse of the Lord.

Hom. 2. in
Psal. 50.

38. As for those things that are commonly found in the bookes of old Writers concerning satisfaction, they little move me. I see indeed that many of them, (I will speake plainly) in a manner all whose bookes remaine, have either erred in this point, or spoken to crabbedly and hardly: but I will not grant that they were so rude and unskillfull as to have written those things in that sense that the new Satisfactioners doe read them. Chrysostome in one place writeth thus: where mercy is required, examination ceaseth: where mercy is asked, judgement is not rigorous: where mercy is craved, there is no place for paine: where is mercy, there is no inquisition. Where is mercy, the answer is pardoned. Which words howsoever they be wrested, yet they can never bee made to agree with the schoolemens doctrines. In the booke of Ecclesiasticall doctrines, which is fathered upon Augustine, is read thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the causes of finnes, and not to grant an entry to their suggestions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of satisfaction, that was said to bee given in recompence of finnes committed, was even in those times laughed to scorne: forasmuch as they referre all satisfaction to a heedfulness in obtaining from finnes in time to come. I will not allege that which the same Chrysostome saith, that he requireth of us no more, but that wee should confesse our finnes unto him with teares, with such sentences are many times found in his writings and others. Augustine indeed in some places calleth the workes of mercie, remedies to obtaine forgiveness of finnes: but because no man should stumble at that little word, he himselfe preventeth it in another place. The flesh of Christ (saith he) the true and onely sacrifice for sinnes, not onely these sinnes that are wholly put away in baptisme, but also these that afterward creepe in by weakenesse: for which the whole Church crieth out at this day, Forgive us our trespasses. And they are forgiven by that singular sacrifice.

39. They have for the most part called satisfaction, not a recompence to bee rendered to God, but an open declaration whereby they that had beene excommunicate when they would be received againe to the communion, did ascertaine the Church of their repentance. For there were joynd unto them when they did repent certaine fastings and other things, whereby they might perswade men, that they were truly and hartly wearie of their former life, or rather blot out the remembrance of their former doings? and so they were said to make satisfaction not to God, but to the Church. Which is also expressed of Augustine in these words in his Enchiridion to Laurence: Out of that ancient custome the confessions and satisfactions that are at this day used, tooke their beginning. Truly very viperous birthes, by which is brought to passe, that there remaineth not so much as a shadow of that better forme, I know that the old writers doe sometime speake somewhat hardly, and as I said even now, I doe not deny that peradventure they erred heerein. But those things that were besprinkled with a few spots, when they are once handled with these mens unwashed hands, are altogether defiled. And if we must contend with the authority of old writers: good God, what old writers doe they thrust unto us? A good part of those wherewith Peter Lombard their champion hath botched up his patched Sentences, is gathered out of the unfavoured dotages of certaine Monkes that are carried about under the name of Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine and Chrysostome. As about this present question he taketh in a manner all out of Augustines booke of repentance, which is foolishly botched of good and bad by some scraper together. It beareth indeed the name of Augustine, but such a booke as no man being but meanely learned, would vouchsafe to acknowledge for his. But whereas I doe not so narrowly examine their follies, let the readers pardon me whom I would ease of that tediousnesse. For to me it should not be very laboursome, and yet very plausible to bewray to their great shame, those things that they have heretofore boasted upon as mysteries, but because my purpose is to teach fruitfully, therefore I passe them over.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER.

Of this doctrine of satisfaction doe flow indulgences or pardons. For they say that, that which our power wanteth to make satisfaction, is supplied by these pardons. And they runne so farre forth into madnesse, that they define them to bee the distribution of the merits of Christ and of the Martyrs, which the Pope dealeth abroad by his Bulles. But although they have more need of Helleborus to purge their phrentike braine, than arguments to answer them, so that it is not much worth the travell to stand upon confuting such trifling errors, which are already shaken with many battlerammes, and of themselves grow into decayed age, and bend toward falling: yet because a short confutation of them shall be profitable for some that be ignorant, I will not altogether omit it. As for this that pardons have so long stand safe, and have so long beene unpunished, having beene used with so outrageous and furious licentiousnesse: this may serve to teach us in how darke a night of errors, men in certaine ages past have beene drowned. They saw themselves to be openly and uncolourably scorned of the Pope and his Bulbearers, gainful markets to bee made of the salvation of their soules the price of salvation to be valued at a few pence, and nothing set out to bee freely given: that by this colour they be wiped of offerings, to bee filthily spent upon brothels, bawds and banketings, that the greatest blowers abroad of the pardons are the greatest despisers of them, that this monster doth daily more and more with greater licentiousnesse overrunne the world, and grow into outrage, and that there is no end, new lead daily brought, and new money gotten. Yet with high reverence they received, they worshipped worshipped and bought pardons, and such as among the rest saw somewhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceits, whereby men might bee beguiled with some profit: At the length, since the world suffered it selfe to bee somewhat wiser, pardons wax cold, and by little and little become frozen, till they utterly vanish away.

2. But forasmuch as many that see the filthy gamings, the deceits, thefts, and robberies, wherewith the pardoners have heretofore mocked and beguiled us, yet see not the very fountaine of ungodlinesse from whence they spring: It is good to shew not onely of what sort pardons bee, but also what they bee, when they are wiped from all spots. They call the treasure of the Church, the merits of Christ and of the holy Apostles and Martyrs. The principall custodie of this barme (as I have already touched) they faigne to be delivered to the Bishop of Rome, that he should have the distribution of so great gifts, that hee might both give them by himselfe, and also grant jurisdiction to other to give them. Hereupon procede from the Pope sometime plenary pardons, sometime pardons for certaine yeares: from the Cardinals, pardons for a hundred daies: from Bishops, pardons for fortie daies. But they be (as I may naturally describe them) the profaning of the blood of Christ, Satans mockerie, to lead away the Christian people from the grace of God, from the life that is in Christ and to turne them from the true way of salvation. For how could the blood of Christ be more filthily prophaned, than when it is denied to suffice to the remission of finnes, to reconciliation and satisfaction, unlesse the want thereof as being withered and wasted should be otherwise supplied and perfected? The law and all the Prophets (saith Peter) beare witness of Christ, that by him forgiveness of sinne is to be received: Pardons give remission of finnes by Peter, Paul, and the Martyrs. The blood of Christ (saith John) cleanseth us from sinne: Pardons doe make the blood of Martyrs the washing away of finnes. Christ (saith Paul) which knew not sinne, was made sinne for us, that is the satisfaction of sinne, that wee might be made the righteousness of God in him: Pardons doe set the satisfaction of finnes in the blood of Martyrs. Paul cryed out and testified to the Corinthians, that onely Christ was crucified and died for them: the Pardons pronounce, that Paul and other died for us. In another place hee saith that Christ purchased the Church with his blood: the pardons appoint another price of purchase in the blood of Martyrs. The Apostle saith, that Christ with one oblation made perfect for ever them that were sanctified: the pardons cry out to the contrary and say, that sanctification is made perfect by the Martyrs, which otherwise were not sufficient. John saith that all the Saints washed their Gownes in the blood of the Lambe: The pardons teach men to wash their Gownes in the blood of Saints.

3. Leo Bishop of Rome writeth notably well to the Palestines against these sacrileges. Although (saith he) the death of many Saints hath benee precious in the sight of the Lord, yet the killing of no innocent hath benee the prostitution of the world. The righteous received, but gave not crownes: and out of the valiantnesse of the faithfull are graven examples of patience, not gifts of righteousness. For their deaths were every one singular to themselves, and none of them did by his end pay the debt of another, forasmuch as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised up againe. Which sentence (as it was worthy to be remembered) he repeated in another place. There can nothing bee required more plaine to destroy this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speaketh no lesse fitly to the same effect, Though (saith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the blood of no Martyrs is shed for the forgiveness of finnes. Which thing Christ hath done for us, neither hath hee therein done that for us, that we should follow him, but hath given us a thing to rejoyce upon. Againe in another place, As onely the Sonne of God was made the Sonne of Man, to make us with him the Sonnes of God: so hee alone for us hath taken upon him punishment without evill deservings, that wee by him might without good deservings, obtaine grace not due unto us. Truly whereas all their doctrine is patched together of horrible sacriledges and blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemie than all the other. Let them remember themselves whether these bee not their decrees: that the Martyrs have by their death done more to God, and deserved more, than was needefull for themselves: and that they had remaining so great a plentie of deservings, as did also overflow overflow unto other : and that therefore, least so great goodnesse should be superfluous, their blood is mingled with the blood of Christ, and of both these bloods is made the treasure of the Church, for the remission and satisfaction of finnes. And that so is the saying of Paul to be taken : I supply in my bodie those things that want of the sufferings of Christ for his bodie, which is the Church. What is this else but to leave Christ onely his name, otherwise to make him a common pettie Saint, that may scarcely among the multitude be knowne from the rest ? He onely, onely should have bene preached, he onely set forth, he onely named, he onely bene looked unto, when the obtaining of forgiveness of sinne, satisfaction, and sanctification are entreated of : But let us heare their curtailed arguments. Least the blood of the Martyrs should be shed in vaine, therefore let it be employed to the common benefit of the Church. Is it so ? was it no profit to glorifie God by their death ? to subscribe to his truth with their blood ? by despising this present life, to testifie that they sought for a better life ? by their steadfastnesse to strengthen the faith of the Church, and overcome the stubbornnesse of the enemies ? But this is the matter indeed : they acknowledged no profit of the Martyrs death, if Christ onely be the propitiator, if he onely died for our finnes, if hee onely was offered up for our Redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might nevertheless have obtained the crowne of victorie, if they had died in their beds. And whereas they have sought even to the shedding of their blood, it would not agree with the justice of God to leave the same barren and fruitlesse. As though God could not tel how to encrease in his servants their glory, according to the measure of his gifts. But the Church receiveth in common together profit enough, when it is by their triumphes encouraged to a zealous desire to fight.

4. But how maliciously doe they wrest that place of Paul where hee saith, that hee supplieth in his bodie those things that wanted of the sufferings of Christ ? for hee referreth not the fault of supplying to the worke of redemption, satisfaction, and expiation : but to those afflictions wherewith all the members of Christ, that is to say, all the faithfull must be exercised so long as they shall be in this flesh. Hee saith therefore that this remaineth of the sufferings of Christ, that hee daily suffereth in his members the same that he once suffered in himselfe. Christ vouchsafeth to doe us so great honour, to reckon and account our afflictions his owne. Whereas Paul addeth these words, For the Church, hee meaneth not for the redemption, for the reconciliation, for the satisfaction of the Church, but for the edifying and profit of the Church. As in another place he saith, that he suffereth all things for the elects sake, that he may obtaine the salvation which is in Christ Jesu. And he wrote to the Corinthians, that he suffered all the troubles that hee suffered, for their comfort and salvation. And immediately in the same place expoundeth himselfe, when he saith further, that hee was made a minister of the Church, not for redemption, but according to the dispensation that was committed unto him, to preach the Gospell of Christ. If they yet require another expofitor, let them heare Augustine. The sufferings of Christ (saith he) are in Christ onely as in the head : and both in Christ and the Church, as in the whole body. Whereby Paul being one member saith, I supply in my bodie that which wanteth in the sufferings of Christ. Therefore, if thou whatsoever thou be that hearest this, art one of the members of Christ, whatsoever thou sufferest of them that are not the members of Christ, that same wanted in the sufferings of Christ. But wherunto the sufferings of the Apostles taken for the church of Christ do tend, hee expoundeth in another place where he saith : Christ is to me the gate unto you : because ye are the sheepe of Christ bought with his blood : acknowledging your price, which is not given of mee, but preached by me. Then he addeth, As he hath given his soule, so ought wee to give our soules for our brethren, to edifie peace, and confirme Faith. These are Augustines words. But God forbid, that Paul should have thought that any thing wanted in the sufferings of Christ, as concerning all fulnesse of righteousnesse, salvation and life, or that hee meane to adde any thing thereunto, which so plainly and honorably preacheth, that the abundance of grace was so largely powred out by Christ, that it far surmounted all the force of sinne, By it onely all the Saints have been saved, and not by the merit of their own life or death as Peter expressly testified : so that hee should bee slanderous against against God and Christ, that should repose the worthinesse of any Saint any where else than in the onely mercy of God. But why doe I tarry hereupon any longer, as upon a matter yet doubtfull, sith the very bewraying of such monstrous errors is a sufficient confutation of them?

Whence the gracious indulgence of Christ which should be published by preaching of the Gospell began to be folded up in parchment and lead.

2 Cor. I.

1 Cor. I. 7.

5. Now (to passe over such abominations) who taught the Pope to enclose in lead and parchment the grace of Jesus Christ, which the Lord willed to bee distributed by the word of the Gospell? Truly either the Gospell of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered us in the Gospell, with all abundance of heavenly benefits, with all his merits, with all his righteousnesse, wisdom and grace, without any exception, Paul witnesseth where he saith, that the word of reconciliation was delivered to the ministers, whereby, they might use this forme of message as it were Christ giving exhortation by them: we beseech you, be ye so reconciled to God. He hath made him that knew no sinne, to be made sinne for us, that we might bee made the righteousnesse of God in him. And the faithfull know of what value is that common partaking of Christ, which (as the same Apoetick witnesseth) is offered to bee enjoyed in the Gospell. Contrariwise the pardons doe bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine pittance of grace and fasten it to lead and parchment, yea and to a certaine place, and sever it from the word of God. If a man should aske whence this abuse tooke beginning: it seemeth to have proceeded hereof, that when in time past penitents were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all could beare, they which felt themselves above measure oppressed with penance enjoyed them, required of the Church a release. The mitigation that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the Church to God, and said that they were recompences, whereby men may redeeme themselves from the judgement of God, then they therewithall did also draw these indulgences or pardons to be propitiatorie remedies, to deliver us from deserved punishments. As for these blasphemers that wee have recited, they forged them so shamelesly, that they can have no colour at all.

6. Now let them no more trouble us with their purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed downe, and overthrowne from the very foundations. For I do not agree to some men, that thinke best to dissemble in this point, and make no mention at all of Purgatorie, whereupon (as they say) great contentions do arise, but small edification is gotten. Truly I my selfe would also thinke such trifles worthy to be negligently passed over, if they did not account them earnest matters: But forasmuch as purgatorie is builded of many blasphemies, and is daily upholden with new blasphemies, and raiseth up many & grievous offences, truly it is not to be winked at. This peradventure might after a sort have been dissembled for a time, that it was invented by curious and bold rashnes without the word of God: that men beleevved of it by I wot not what revelations, fained by the craft of Sathan: that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested. Albeit the Lord giveth not leave to mans presumptuousnes so to break into the secret places of his judgements, and hath severely forbidden men to enquire for truth at dead men, neglecting his word, & permitteth not his word to be so unreverently defiled. But let us grant, that all those things might for a while have been borne with, as things of no great importance. But when the cleansing of sinnes is sought elsewhere than in the blood of Christ, when satisfaction is given away to any other thing, then it is most perillous not to speake of it. Therefore we must cry out not onely with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throat and sides: that Purgatorie is the damnable devise of Sathan, that it maketh void the Crosse of Christ, that it layeth an intollerable slander upon the mercie of God, that it feebleth and overthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatorie among them, but the satisfaction that the Soules of men departed doe pay after their death? So that overthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatorie is immediately overthrowne by the very rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than evident that the blood of Christ is the only satisfaction, propitiatorie sacrifice, and cleansing for the sinnes of the faithfull: what remaineth but that Purgatorie is a meere and horrible blasphemie against Christ? I passe over the robberies of God wherewith it is daily defended, the offences that it breedeth in religion, and other things innumerable, which wee see to have come out of the same spring of ungodlinesse.

7. But it is good to wring out of their hands such places as they have fallſly and wrongfully taken out of the Scripture. When (ſay they) the Lord affirmeth that the ſinne againſt the hoſy Ghoſt ſhould not be forgiven in this world, nor in the world to come, thereby hee ſheweth that there is a forgiveneſſe of ſome ſinnes in the world to come. But who ſeeth not that the Lord there ſpeaketh of the fault of ſinne? Now if it be ſo; what is that to their Purgatorie, for ſomuch as by their opinion the paine is there ſuffered of thoſe ſinnes, whereof they deny not the fault to be forgiven in this preſent life? But that they may no more carpe againſt us, they ſhall have yet a plainer ſolucion. When the Lord meant to cut off all hope of pardon from ſo hainous wickedneſſe, he thought it not enough to ſay that it ſhould never be forgiven, but the more to amplifie it, he uſed a diviſion, wherein hee comprehended both the judgement that every mans conſcience ſeeth in this life, and the laſt judgement that ſhall be openly pronounced at the reſurrection; as though he ſhould have ſaid: Beware ye of malicious rebellion, as of moſt preſent damnation. For he that of ſet purpoſe, ſhall endeavour to quench the light of the holy Ghoſt, ſhall not obtaine pardon, neither in this life which is given to ſinners for their converſion, nor in the laſt day when the Lambes ſhall be ſepered by the Angels of God from the Goates, and the kingdome of heaven ſhall be cleaned from all offences. Then they bring forth that parable out of Matthew: Agree with thine adverſarie, leaſt he deliver thee to the Judge, and the Judge to the Serjeant, and the Serjeant to the priſon, from whence thou ſhalt not get out, untill thou haſt paid the uttermoſt farthing. If in this place the Iudge doe ſignifie God, and the adverſarie plaintife the divell, the Serjeant the Angell, and the priſon Purgatorie, I will gladly yeeld unto them. But if it be evident to all men, that Chriſt meant there to ſhew into how many dangers and miſchietes they caſt themſelves, that had rather obſtinate-ly purſue the extremity of the law, than deale according to equitie and good right, to the end to exhort his diſciples the more earneſtly to agreement with equitie: where then I pray you ſhall Purgatorie be found?

8. They fetch an argument of the ſaying of Paul, where hee affirmeth, that the knees of things in heaven, earth, and hels, ſhall bow to Chriſt. For they take it as confeſſed, that hels cannot there be meant of thoſe that are adjudged to eternall damnation. Therefore it remaineth that it muſt be ſoules lying in paine in purgatorie. They did not reaſon very evill, if the Apoſtle did by kneeling meane the true godly worſhipping. But ſuch he teacheth only, that there is dominion given to Chriſt, whereby all creatures are to be ſubdued, what prooſe is there to the contrary, but that we may by hels underſtand the Devils, that ſhall be brought before the judgement of God, to acknowledge him their judge with feare and trembling? Like as Paul himſelfe expoundeth the ſame Prophecie in another place. All (ſaith hee) ſhall be brought before the judgement ſeat of Chriſt. For it is written. So truly as I live, every knee ſhall bow to me, &c. But we may not ſo expound that which is in the Revelation: I have heard all creatures, both theſe things that are in heaven, and thoſe that are upon the earth, all theſe that are under the earth, and thoſe that are in the ſea, and all thoſe that are in them, I have heard them all ſay to him that ſitteth on the throne, and to the Lambe, Bleſſing, and honour, and glorie, and power for ever and ever. That I doe indeed eaſily grant, but what creatures doe they thinke to be here rehearſed? For it is moſt certaine, that there are contained creatures both without reaſon and without ſenſe. Whereby is affirmed nothing elſe, but that all the parts of the world, from the higheſt top of the heavens to the very middle point of the earth, doe in their maner declare the glory of their Creator. As for that which they alleadge out of the history of the Machabees, I will not vouchſafe to answer it, leſt I ſhould ſeeme to reckon that worke in the number of the holy bookes. But Auguſtine received it for Canonically. But firſt, of what ſure credit did he receive it? The Jewes (ſaith he) eſteeme not the writing of the Machabees as they doe of the Law, the Prophets, and the Pſalmes, of which the Lord himſelfe hath witneſſed as of his witneſſes, ſaying: It was neceſſary that all things ſhould be fulfilled that are written in the Law, and the Pſalmes, and Prophets concerning mee. But it hath bene received of the Church not profitably, if it bee ſoberly read or heard. And Hierome teacheth without any doubting that the authoritie thereof is of no force to proving of doctrines. And it evidently appeareth by that old booke, which is entituled under the name of Cyprian, concerning the exposition of the Creede, that it had no place at all in the old Church. But why doe I here strive without cause? As though the author himselfe doth not sufficiently shew, how much he is to be credited, when in the end he craveth pardon, if he have spoken any thing not well. Truly hee that confesseth his writings to need pardon, saith plainly that they are not the oracles of the holy Ghost. Beside that, the godlinesse of Judas is praised for none other cause, but for that he had an assured hope of the last resurrection, when he sent an offering for the dead to Hierusalem. Neither doth the writer of that historie referre that which Judas did to be a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternall life with the other faithfull, that had died for their country and religion. This doing was in deed not without superstition and prepostorous zeale, but they are more than fooles, that draw a sacrifice of the law so farre as unto us: forasmuch as wee know that things doe cease by the coming of Christ, that then were in use.

9. But they have an invincible bulwarke in Paul, which cannot so easily bee battered. If any man (saith hee) build upon this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, timber, hay, stubble, the Lord shall shew every mans worke what it is: because it shall bee revealed in fire, and the fire shall trie every mans worke what it is. If any mans worke do burne, it shall suffer losse, but he shall be safe, but as through the fire. What fire (say they) can that be, but the fire of purgatorie? by which the filthiness of sinne are cleaved away, that wee may enter pure into the kingdom of God? But the most part of the old Writers thought it to be another fire, that is to say, Trouble or the crosse, by which the Lord trieth them that be his, that they should not rest in the filthiness of the flesh: and that is much more probable, than in faining Purgatorie. Albeit I doe neither agree with these men, because I thinke I have attained a certaine and much plainer understanding of that place. But before that I utter it, I would have them answer me, whether the Apostles and all the Saints must have gone through this fire of Purgatory? I know they will say, nay. For it were too much inconvenient that they must have needed to be purged, whose merits they dreame to overflow above measure to all the members of the Church. But the Apostle affirmeth it. For he doth not say that the worke of some shall bee proved, but the worke of all. Neither is this my argument, but Augustines, which so confuteth that exposition. And (which is more absurditie) hee doth not say, that they shall passe through the fire for all works: but if they have faithfully builded the Church, they shall receive reward when their worke is examined with fire. First, we see that the Apostle used a Metaphor, when hee called the doctrines invented by mans braines, wood, hay, and stubble. And the Metaphor hath an apparant rescue: that as wood so soone as it is put in the fire, consumeth and wasteth, so cannot those doctrines continue when they come to bee examined. Now no man is ignorant that such triall commeth of the holy Ghost. Therefore to follow the true cause of his Metaphor, and match the parts together with just relation, hee called the triall of the holy Ghost, fire. For even as the neerer that gold and silver are put to the fire, so much the surer prooffe they have of their goodnesse and finenesse: so the Lords truth, the more exactly it is weighed with spiritual examination, so much the greater confirmation of credit it receiveth. As hay, wood, and stubble put to the fire, are brought to sudden consuming, so the inventions of men, not stablished by the word of God, cannot beare the triall of the holy Ghost; but they by and by fall away and perish. Finally, if forged doctrines bee compared to wood hay, and stubble, because like wood, hay, and stubble, they are burned with fire and destroyed: but they are not destroyed or driven away but by the spirit of the Lord: it followeth that the holy Ghost is the fire wherewith they shall bee proved, whose prooffe Paul according to the common use of the Scripture, calleth, The day of the Lord. For it is called the day of the Lord, whensoever hee doth any way shew his presence to men. But then his face principally shineth, when his truth shineth upon us. Now have wee proved, that Paul meaneth no other fire, but the triall of the holy Ghost. But how are they saved by the fire, that suffer losse of their worke? That shall not be hard to understand, if we consider of what kinde of men he speaketh. For hee toucheth those builders of the Church, that keeping the true foundation, doe build disagreeing matter matter upon it, that is to say, they that no: swarving from the chiefe and necessary articles of faith, doe erre in points that be smaller and lesse perillous, mingling their owne devises with the word of God. Such I say, must suffer losse of their worke, having their devises destroyed. But themselves are saved, but as by the fire: that is to say, not that their ignorance and error is allowable before the Lord, but because they are cleansed from it by the grace and power of the holy Ghost. Therefore whoscever have defiled the golden finesse of Gods word with this dung of purgatory, they must needs suffer losse of their worke.

10 But they will say, it hath bene an ancient usage of the Church. Paul answered this objection when he comprehendeth his owne time in that sentence, where hee saith, that all they must suffer losse of their worke, that in the building of the Church doe, lay any thing upon the foundation that agreeth not with it. Therefore when the adversaries object against me, that it hath bene used above a thousand and three hundred yeares, to have prayers made for the dead: I aske them againe, by what word of God, by what revelation, by what example it was done. For here they doe not onely want testimonies of Scriptures but also all the examples of holy men that there are read, do shew no such thing. Of the mourning and order and funeralls there are sometimes feaud many and long tales: but of prayers you cannot see one title. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to have bene expressly spoken. But the very old Fathers themselves that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both commandement of God, and lawfull example. Why then durst they do so? In this I say, they did suffer somewhat as men: and therefore I affirme that, that which they did, ought not to be drawne into example. For whereas the faithfull ought to enterprise the doing of nothing, but upon assured confidence, as Paul teacheth: this assurednesse is principally required in prayer. But it is likely that they were led by some reason unto it: they sought some comfort to relieve their sorrow: and it seemed unnatural not to shew before God some testimony of their love toward the dead. How mans wit is enclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also the received custome was like a burning brand to set many mens minds on fire. We know that with all nations and in all ages there were funeralls done for the dead, and their soules yearly purged. For though Sathan beguiled foolish men with these deceits: yet he tooke occasion to bring by a true principle: that death is not a destruction, but a passage out of this life into another. And it is no doubt, but that even very superstition condemneth the Gentiles before the judgement seat of God, for neglecting the care of the life to come, which they professed themselves to beleve. Now Christians, because they would not be worse than Heathen men, were ashamed to doe nothing for the dead, as though they were utterly destroyed. Hereupon came that ill advised diligence: because if they were slow in looking to the funeralls, in banquetings and offerings, they thought that they had put themselves in danger of a great reproach. And that which first proceeded from a wrongfull following of the Heathens example, was so multiplied by often new increases, that now it is the principall holinesse of Papistrie, to helpe the dead in distresse. But the Scripture ministrech another much better and perfecter comfort, when it testifieth, that the dead are blessed that die in the Lord. And it addeth a reason: because from thence forth they rest from their labours. And wee ought not so much tenderly to follow our owne affection of love, to set up a wrongfull manner of praying in the Church. Truly he that hath but meane wisdom, doth soone perceive that all that is read hercof in the old writers, was done to beare with the common usage, and the ignorance of the people. They themselves also I grant, were carried away into error even as unadvised lightnesse of believe is wont to rob mens wits of judgement. But in the meane time the very reading of them doth shew, how doubtfully they commend prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, reporteth that Monica his mother did earnestly desire, that shee might be remembered in celebrating the ministries at the Altar. An old wives request, which the sonne never examined by the rule of the Scripture, but according to his affection of nature, would have it allowed of other. As for the booke that he made of care for the dead, containeth so many doubtings, that of right it ought with the coldnes thereof to quench the heate of a foolish zeale: if any man desire to be a protector for dead men, truly with cold likelihoods it wil bring them out of care that were before carefull. For this is one pillar of it, that this doing is not to be despised, because it is a custome growne in use, that the dead should be prayed for. But though I grant to the old writers of the Church, that it is a charitable use to helpe the dead: yet wee must still hold one rule which cannot deceive: that it is not lawfull for us in our prayers to use any thing of our owne, but our requests must be made subject to the word of God: because it is in his will to appoint what he will have to be asked. Now whereas the whole law, and the Gospell do not so much as in one syllable give liberty to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuse of the invocation of God to attempt more than he commandeth us. But that our adversaries may not boast that they have the ancient Church companion of their error: I say there is great difference betweene them and it. They used a memoriall of the dead, least they should seeme to have cast away all care of them: but they did therewithall confesse that they doubted of their state. As for Purgatorie, they so affirmed nothing that they held it for a thing uncertaine. These men require to have that which they have dreamed of Purgatory, to be holden without question for an article of Faith. They slenderly and onely to passe it lightly over, did in the communion of the holy Supper commend their dead to God. These doe continually call upon the care of the dead, and with importunate praising it, do make it to be preferred above all dutifull works of charity. Yea, and it were not hard for us to bring forth some testimonies of the old writers, that do manifestly overthrow all those prayers for the dead, which then were used. As this of Augustine, when hee teacheth that all men looke for the resurrection of the flesh and the eternall glory, and that every man then receiveth the rest that followeth after death, if he be worthy when he dieth. And therefore he testifieth, that all the godly doe immediately after death enjoy the blessed rest as well as the Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs. If their estate bee such, what I beseech you shall our prayers availe them? I passe over the grosser superstitions, wherewith they have bewitched the minds of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most part so monstrous, that they can have no honest colour to excuse them. Also I let passe those most filthy buyings and sellings that they have used, while the world was in such grosse senselesse ignorance. For both I should never make an end, and also the readers shall without any rehearsall of them, have here sufficient wherupon they may stablish their consciences.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER.

Of the life of a Christian man: And first, by what argument the Scripture exhorteth us therunto.

WE have already said, that the marke whereunto regeneration tendeth, is that in the life of the faithfull there should appear an agreement and consent betweene the righteous of God and their obedience: and that so they should confirme the adoption, whereby they are received to be children. But although his law containe in it selfe that newnesse, whereby the image of God is restored in us, yet because our dullnesse hath need both of many prickings forward and helpes, therefore it shall be profitable to gather out of divers places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that have a desirous minde of amendment, may not wander out of the way in their endeavour. Now when I take upon me the framing of a Christian mans life, I am not ignorant that I enter into manifold and plenteous arguments, and such as may with the greatnesse thereof fill a long volume, if I would absolutely entreat of it in all points. For we see into what great length are stretched the exhortatorie orations of old writers, made onely every one of one severall vertue. And that is not done with too much idle babling. For whatsoever vertue a man purpose to set out in oration, the stilerunneth of it selfe into such largenesse with plenty of matter, that a man cannot seeme to have discoursed well of it, unless he have spoken much. But my minde is not to stretch so farre the institution of life, which I promise to teach, as peculiarly to goe through every speciall vertue, and wander abroad into exhortations. Let such things bee ferched out of other mens writings, and specially out of the Homilies of the old fathers.

It

Hom. in Ioan.
456.

An order of framing our lives needfull to be gathered out of Scriptures.

It shall bee enough for me to shew an orderly trade, whereby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, and shortly to appoint out a certaine universall rule, by which hee may well try what be his duties. There shall peradventure at some other season be a fit time to make declamations, or I will leave that to other, which I my selfe am not meete to doe, I doe naturally love shortnesse, and peradventure if I would speake more at large, it would not frame well with me. And if a longer manner of teaching were never to much pleasing, yet I would scarce have minde to put in prooffe. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit up a simple doctrine with as great shortnesse as I may. As the Philosophers have their certaine ends of right and honesty, from which they derive particular duties and all the company of vertues: so the Scripture is not without her order in this matter: but holdeth a most goodly well ordered disposition, and much more certaine than all the Philosophers orders. This onely is the difference, that they (as they were vaine glorious men) have diligently endeavoured to attaine an exquisite plainnesse of order, to shew forth the ready aptnesse of their wit. But the spirit of God, because he taught without curious affection, hath not so exactly nor continually kept an orderly trade: which yet when hee sometime useth, he doth sufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected of us.

2 This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, whereof we now speake, standeth chiefly upon two parts. The first, that there be powred and brought into our mindes a love of righteousness, to which otherwise we are of nature nothing inclined. The second, that there be a rule set out unto us, that may not suffer us to goe out of the way in following righteousness. In commendation of righteousness it hath both very many and very good reasons: of which we have here before in diverse places spoken of some, and other some we shall in this place briefly touch. At what foundation may it better begin, than when it putteth us in minde that wee must bee holy, because our God is holy? For when we are scattered abroad like straying sheepe, and dispersed abroad in the maze of the world, he gathereth us together againe, to joyne us in one flocke with himselfe. When we heare mention made of our joyning with God, let us remember that holiness must be the bond thereof. Not that by the merit of holiness we come into common with him: (whereas rather we must first cleave unto him, that being endued with his holiness, we may follow whether he calleth) but because it greatly pertaineth to his glory, that he have no fellowship with wickednesse and uncleannesse. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the end of our calling, which we ought always to have respect unto, if we will answer God that calleth us. For to what purpose was it, that wee should bee drawne out of the wickednesse and filthinesse of the world, if wee give our selves leave all our life long to wallow in them still? Moreover it also admonisheth us that to the end wee may bee reckoned among the people of God, wee must dwell in the holy city Hierusalem. Which as he hath hallowed to himselfe, so is it unlawfull that it be unholily prophaned by the uncleannesse of the inhabitants. From hence came these sayings, that they shall have a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and studie to follow righteousness, &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuarie whereon he dwelleth should be like a stable full of filthinesse.

3 And the better to awake us, it sheweth that God the father as hee hath joyned us to himselfe in Christ, so hath printed an image for us in him, after which he would have us to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Philosophers, that thinke that the philosophy concerning manners, is in them onely orderly framed. They when they will excellently well exhort us to vertue, bring nothing els but that wee should live agreeably unto nature. But the Scripture bringeth her exhortation from the true wellspring, when it not onely teacheth us to referre our life to God, the author of it to whom it is bound: but also when she hath taught that wee are swarved out of kinde from the true originall and state of our creation, she immediately addeth, that Christ by whom we came againe into favour with God, is set before us for an example, that wee should expresse the forme thereof in our life. What may a man require more effectually than this one thing? Yea, what may a man require more than this onely thing? For if the Lord hath by adoption made us children with this condition, that our life should resemble Christ the bond of our adoption: if wee doe not give and avow our selves to righteousnesse, we doe not onely with most wicked breach of allegiance depart from our Creator, but also we forswear him to be our Saviour. Then the Scripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the benefits of God, which she rehearseth unto us, and all the parts of our salvation. And sheweth that sith God hath shewed himselfe a Father unto us, we are worthy to be condemned of extreame unthankfulnesse, if we doe not likewise in our behalfe shew our selves children unto him. Sith Christ hath cleansed us with the washing of his blood, and hath made us partakers of this cleansing by baptism, it is not seemly that we should be spotted with new filthinesse. Sith he hath graced us into his body. We must carefully take heed that we sprinkle not any spot or blot upon us that are his members. Sith he himselfe that is our head, is ascended into heaven. It behoveth us that laying away earthly affection, we doe with all our heart aspire to heaven-ward: Sith the holy Ghost hath dedicated us temples to God, wee must endeavour that Gods glory may be honourably set out by us, and must not doe any thing whereby we may be prophaned with filthinesse of sinne? Sith both our Soule and our body are ordained to heavenly incorruption and an unperishing crowne, we must diligently trauell, that the same may be kept pure and uncorrupted unto the day of the Lord. These (I say) be the best laid foundations to build a mans life, and such as the like are not to be found among the Philosophers, which in commendation of vertue doe never climbe above the naturall dignity of man.

Another motive unto holinesse is Christ by his holinesse, which God hath set to be our patterne.

4 And here is a fit place to speake unto them, that having nothing but the title and badge of Christ, yet would bee named Christians. But with what face doe they boast of his holy name: sith none have any fellowship with Christ, but they that have received a true knowledge of him out of the word of the Gospell? But the Apostle saith, that all they have not rightly learned Christ, that are not taught that they must cast away the old man that is corrupted according to the desire of error, and have not put on Christ. Therefore it is proved that they falsely, yea and wrongfully pretend the knowledge of Christ, although they can eloquently and roundly talke of the Gospell. For it is not a doctrine of tongue, but of life: and is not conceived as other learnings be, with onely understanding and memorie, but is then onely received when it possesseth the whole soule, and findeth a seate and place to hold it in the most inward affection of the heart. Therefore either let them cease, to the slander of God, to boast of that which they are not, or let them shew themselves not unworthy Schollers for Christ their master. We have given the first place to the doctrine wherein our Religion is contained, because our salvation beginneth at it: but the same must bee powred into our heart, and passe into our manners, yea and transforme us unto it, that it be not unfruitfull unto us. If the Philosophers doe justly chafe against them, and doe with shamefull reproch drive them from their company, that professing an arte that ought to be school-masters of life, doe turne it into a Sophisticall babling: with how much better reason shall we detest these trifling Sophisters, that are contented to role the Gospell upon the top of their tongues, the effectualI working whereof ought to pearce into the innermost affections of the heart, to rest in the soule, and to alter the whole man a hundred times more, than the cold exhortation of philosophers.

5 Yet doe I not require that the manners of a christian man savour of nothing but the absolute Gospell: which nevertheless both were to bee wished and we must endeavour us toward it. But I do not so severely require a gospel-like perfection, that I would not acknowledge him for a christian, that hath not yet attained unto it: For so should all men be excluded from the Church, sith there is no man found that is not by a great space distant from it, and many have hitherto but a little way proceeded toward it, who yet should unjustly be cast away. What then? let that bee set for the marke before our eyes, to which alone all our endeavour may be directed. Let that bee appointed the gole for us to runne and travell unto. For it is not lawfull for thee so to make partition with God, to take upon thee part of these things that are commanded thee in his word, and to leave part at thine owne choise. For first of all hee every where commendeth integrity as the chiefe part of worshipping him: by which word hee meaneth a pure simplicitie of minde that is without all deceitfull colour and faigning: against which a double heart is set as contrary: as if it should be said, that the beginning of living uprightly is spiritually, when the inward affection of the minde is without faining, dedicate to God, to observe holinesse and righteoufnesse. But because no man in this earthly prison of the body hath so great strength to haste with such freshnesse of running, as he perfectly ought to doe, and the greater number are so feeble, that with staggering and halting, yea and creeping upon the ground, they advance but slowly forward. Let vs every one goe according to the measure of his little power, and proceed on our journey begun. No man shall goe so untowardly, but he shall every day get some ground, though it be but little. Therefore let us not cease to travell so, that wee may continually proceed somewhat in the way of the Lord. And let us not despaire upon the slenderesse of our going forward, for howsoever the successe answer not our desire, yet we have not lost our labour when this day passeth yesterday: so that with pure simplicity we looke unto our mark, and long toward the end of our course, not soothingly flattering our selves, nor tenderly bearing with our owne evils, but with continuall endevour travelling to this, that we may still become better than our selves, till we attaine to goodnesse it selfe: which in deed we seeke for and follow all our life long: but we shall then only attaine it, when being unclorhed of the weakenesse of the flesh, we shall be received into the full fellowship thereof.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER.

The summe of a Christian life: wherein is intrested of the forsaking of our selves.

Albeit that the law of the Lord have a most aptly well disposed order to frame a mans life, yet it seemed good to the heavenly Schoolemaster to instruct men yet with a more exact trade to the same rule that hee had set forth in his law. And the beginning of that trade, is this: that it is the duty of the faithfull to yeeld their bodies to God a living holy and acceptable sacrifice unto him: and that therein standeth the true worshipping of him. Hereupon is gathered occasion to exhort men, that they doe not apply themselves to the fashion of this world, but be transformed in renewing of their minde, that they may prove what the will of God is. Now this is a great thing, that we be consecrate and dedicate to God: that we should from thence forth thinke, speake, imagine, or doe nothing but to his glory. For the thing that is consecrate, cannot be applied to unholy uses, without great wrong done unto him. If we be not our owne, but the Lords, it appeareth what error is to be avoyded, and whereunto all the doings of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne: therefore let neither our owne reason nor our owne will beare rule in our counsels and doings. We are not our owne: therefore let vs not make this the end for us to tend unto, to seeke that which may be expedient for us according to the flesh. We are not our owne: therefore so much as we may, let us forget our selves and all things that are our owne. On the other side, we are Gods, therefore let us live and die to him. We are Gods: therefore let his wisdom and will governe all our doings. We are Gods: therefore let all the parts of our life tend toward him as their onely lawfull end. Oh how much hath he profited, that having learned that himselfe is not his owne, hath taken from himselfe the rule and goverment of himselfe to give it to God? For as this is the most strong working pestilence to destroy men, that they obey themselves: so it is the onely haven of safety, neither to know nor will any thing by himselfe, but onely to follow God going before him. Let this therefore be the first step, that man depart from himselfe, that he may apply all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lord. Obeying I call not onely that which standeth in obedience of the word, but that whereby the minde of man, void from his owne sensuality of flesh, bendeth it selfe wholly to the will of Gods spirit. Of this transformation (which Paul calleth renewing of the minde) whereas it is the first entry into life, all the Philosophers were ignorant. For they make onely reason the governess of man: they thinke the only ought to be heard: finally to her onely they give and assigne the rule of manners. But the Christian Philosophie biddeth her to give place, and to yeeld and be subject to the holy Ghost: so that man now may not live himselfe, but beare Christ living & reigning in him-

Rom. 12. 1.

Rom. 14. 8.

Eph. 4. 23.

Gal. 1. 20.

The next degree of righteousness is to seeke those things, that are of God sincerely for themselves not in any side in respect of our owne.

2 Hereupon followeth also this other point, that we seeke not the things to be our owne, but those things that be according to the will of the Lord, and that make to the advancement of his glory. This is also a prooffe of great profiting, that in a manner forgetting our selves, and altogether leaving the regard of our selves, we travaile to employ our studie of God and his Commandements. For when the Scripture biddeth us to leave privie regard of our selves, it doth not onely race out of our mindes that covetousnesse of having the greedie seeking for power and favour of men: but also rooteth out ambition and all desire of worldly glory, and other more secret pestilences. Truly a Christian man must be so fashioned and disposed, to thinke throughout all his life, that he hath to doe with God. In this sort, as he shall examine all his doings by Gods will and judgement: so he shall reverently direct unto him all the earnestly bent diligence of his minde. For he that hath learned to looke upon God in all things, that he hath to doe, is the rewithall turned a way from all vaine thoughts. This is that forsaking of our selves which Christ even from the first beginning of instruction so earnestly gave in charge to his disciples: which when it once hath gotten possession in the heart, leaveth no place at all, first neither for pride, nor disdainefulnesse, nor vaine glorious boasting, then neither for covetise, nor filthy lust, nor ryotousnesse, nor daintinesse, nor for other evils that are ingendred of the love of our selves. Contrariwise, wherefoever it reigneth not, there either most filthy vices doe rage without shame, or if there be any spice of vertue, it is corrupted with perverse desire of glory. For shew me a man, if thou canst, that unlesse he have forsaken himselfe according to the commandement of the Lord, will of his owne free will use goodnes among men. For all they that have not bene possessed with this feeling, if they have followed vertue, they have done it at the least for praise sake. And as the Philosophers that ever most of all affirmed that vertue was to be desired for it selfes sake, were puffed up with so great pride, that it appeared that they desired vertue for no other thing, but that they might have matter to be proud upon. But God is notwithstanding at all delighted, neither with those gapers for the peoples breath, nor with these swelling beastes, that he pronounceth that they have already received their reward in the world, and maketh harlots and Publicans nearer to the kingdome of heaven, than them. And yet we have not thoroughly declared with how many and how great stops man is hindered from that which is right. so long as he hath not forsaken himselfe. For it was truly said in times past, that there is a world of vices hidden in the Soule of man. And thou canst finde no other remedies, but denying thy selfe, and leaving regard of thy selfe, to bend thy minde to seeke those things that the Lord requireth of thee, and to seeke them therefore onely because they please him.

3 In another place the same Paul doth more plainly, although shortly, go through all the parts of a well ordered life, saying: The grace of God that bringeth salvation unto all men, hath appeared and teacheth us, that we should deny all ungodlinesse, and worldly lusts, and that we should live soberminded, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the mighty God, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which gave himselfe for us, to redeeme us from all unrighteousnesse, and to purge us a peculiar people unto himselfe fervently given unto good workes. For after that hee hath set forth the grace of God to encourage them, to make ready the way for us to worship God, hee taketh away two stops that doe most hinder us, that is to say, ungodlinesse, whereunto wee are naturally too much inclined, and Worldly desires, which extend further. And under the name of ungodlinesse, hee not onely meaneth superstitions, but also comprehendeth all that disagree with the earnest feare of God. And worldly lusts are in effect as much as the affections of the flesh. Therefore hee commandeth us in respect of both the tables of the law, to put off our owne wit, and to forsake all that our owne reason and will informeth us. And all the doings of our life be brought into three parts, sobriety, righteousnesse, and godlinesse: of the which, sobriety, without doubt signifieth as well chastity and temperance, as a pure and measurable sparing use of temporall things, and a patient sufferance of poverty. Righteousnesse containeth all the duties of equity, to give every man his owne. The third is Godlinesse, that severeth us from the deflings of the world, and with true holinesse joyneth us to God. These things, when they be knit together with an

unfeparable knot, make a full perfection. But for as much as nothing is more hard, than forsaking the reason of the flesh, yea subduing and renouncing her desires, to give our selves to God and our brethren, and to studie for an Angellike life in the filthy state of the earth: therefore Paul, to loose our mindes from all snares, calleth us backe to the hope of blessed immortality, admonishing us not to strive in vaine: because as Christ hath once appeared the Redeemer, so at his last comming, he shall shew the fruit of the salvation that he hath purchased. And thus he driveth away the entisements that binde us, and make us not to aspire as we ought, to the heavenly glory: yea and he teacheth that we must travell as men being from home in this world, that the heavenly inheritance be not lost or fall away from us.

4 Now in these words we perceive, that the forsaking of our selves hath partly respect to men, and partly, yea chiefly to God. For whereas the Scripture biddeth us so to behave our selves with men, that we preferre them before us in honour, that we faithfully employ our selves wholly to procure their commodities: therefore it giveth such commandements as our minde is not able to receive, but first being void of naturall sense. For (with such blindness we run all into love of our selves) every man thinketh himselfe to have a just cause to advance himselfe, and to despise all other in comparison of himselfe. If God have given us any good gift, by and by bearing our selves bold thereof, we lift up our courage, and not onely swell, but in a manner burst with pride. The vices wherewith wee abound wee doe both diligently hide from other, and to our selves we flatteringly faigne them light and slender, and sometime embrace them for vertues. And if the same good gifts, which wee praise in our selves, or better doe appear in other, least we should be compelled to give place to them, we doe with our envioufnesse deface them and finde fault with them. If there bee any faults in them, we are not contented severely and sharply to marke it, but we also odiously amplify it. Hereupon groweth that insolencie, that every one of us, as though he were privileged from the common estate, would bee higher than the rest, and carelessly and proudly set light by every man, or despise them as inferiours. The poore yeeld to the rich, base people to gentlemen, servants to their masters, unlearned to the learned: but there is no man that doth not mourish with himselfe some opinion of excellency. So every man in flattering himselfe, beareth a certaine kingdom in his breast. For presumptuously taking upon them somewhat whereby to please themselves, they judge upon the wits and manners of other men. But if they come to contention, there burleth out their poison. For many doe make a shew of great meekenesse, so long as they finde all things gentle and lovely: but how many a one is there that keepeth that continuall course of modestie, when he is pricked and stirred to anger? And there is no remedie hereof, but that the most hurtfull pestilence of love, of soveraignty and selfelove be rooted out of the bottome of their hearts, as it is rooted out by the doctrine of the Scripture. For their we were so taught, that we must remember that the good gifts that God hath given us, are not our owne good things, but the free gifts of God, whereof if any be proud, they bewray their owne unthankfullnesse. Who maketh thee to excell? Paul saith, if thou hast received all things, why dost thou boast as if they were not given thee: Then, that we must with reknowledging of our faults, call our selves backe to humilicie. So shall remaine in us nothing to be proud upon, but there shall bee much matter to abase our selves. Again, we are commanded, whatsoever gifts of God we see in other men, so to reverence and esteeme those gifts, that we also honour those men in whom they be. For it were a great lewdnesse for us, to take from them that honour, that God hath vouchsafed to give them. As for their faults, wee are taught to winke at them, not to cherish them with flattering, but that wee should not by reason of those faults triumph against them, to whom we ought to beare good will and honour. So shall it come to passe, that with what man soever we have to doe, we shall behave our selves not onely temperately and modestly, but also gently and friendly. As a man shall never come any other way to true meekenesse, but if hee have a heart endued with abasing of himselfe, and reverencing of other.

5. Now how hard it is, for thee to doe thy dutie in seeking the profit of thy neighbour? Thou shalt herein labour in vaine, unlesse thou depart from regard of thy selfe, and in a manner put off thy selfe. For how canst thou performe these things that Paul teacheth to bee the workes of charity, unlesse thou forsake thy selfe to give thy selfe wholly to other? Charity (saith he) is patient and gentle, not proud, not disdainfull, envieth not, swelleth not, seeketh not her owne, is not angry, &c. If this one thing be required, that we seeke not the things that are our owne, we shall doe no small violence to nature, which so bendeth us to the onely love of our selves, that it doth not easily suffer us negligently to passe over our selves and our owne things, to watch for other mens commodities, yea to depart with our owne right to resigne it to another. But the Scripture, to lead us thither as it were by the hand, warneth us that whatsoever gracious gifts wee obtaine of the Lord, they are committed unto us upon this condition, that they should bee bestowed to the common benefit of the Church: and that therefore the true use of all Gods grace, is a liberall bountifull and communicating of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortation could be devised for the keeping of the same, than when we be taught that all the good gifts that we have, are things of God delivered, committed to our trust upon this condition, that they should bee disposed to the benefit of our neighbour. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it compareth them to the powers wherewith the members of mans body are endued. No member hath his power for himselfe, nor applyeth it to his private use, but powreth it a broad into the other members of the same body, and taketh no profit thereof, but such as proceedeth from the common commodity of the whole bodie. So whatsoever a godly man is able to doe, he ought to be able to doe it for his brethren, in providing none otherwise privately for himselfe, but so that his mind be bent to the common edification of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindnesse and doing good: that whatsoever God hath bestowed upon us, whereby we may helpe our neighbour, wee are the Bailiffes thereof, and bound to render account of the disposing of it. And that the onely right disposing is, that which is tryed by the rule of love. So shall it come to passe, that wee shall alway not onely joyne the travaile of other mens commodity with the care of our owne profit, but also set it before the care of our owne. And that we should not happen to be ignorant, that this is the true law of disposing all the gifts that we receive of God, he hath in the old time set the same law even in the smallest gifts of his liberality. For he commanded the first fruits of corne to bee offered unto him, by which the people might testify that it was unlawfull for them to take any fruit of the goods that were not first consecrate to him. If the gifts of God be so only then sanctified unto us, when wee have with our owne hand dedicated them to the author thereof, it is evident that it is an untrue abuse thereof that doth not favour of such dedication, but it shall be vaine for thee to goe about to enrich the Lord with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore sith thy liberality cannot extend unto him, as the Prophet saith, thou must use it toward his Saints that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy oblations, that they may now be correspondent to these of the law.

6 But that we should not bee weary with doing good (which otherwise must needs come quickly to passe) that other thing must be joyned which the Apostle speaketh of, that charity is patient and not moved to anger. The Lord Commandeth to do good to all univiersally, of whom a great part are most unworthy if they bee considered by their owne deserving. But here the Scripture helpeth with a very good meane, when it teacheth that we must not have respect what men deserve of themselves, but that the image of God is to be considered in all men, to which we owe all honour and love. But the same is most diligent to bee marked in them of the household of faith, inso much as it is in them renewed and restored by the spirit of Christ. Therefore whatsoever man thou light upon, that needeth thy helpe, thou hast no cause to withdraw thy selfe from doing him good. If thou say that he is a stranger: but the Lord hath given him a marke, that ought to be familiar unto thee, by the reason that hee forbiddeth thee to despise thine owne flesh. If thou say that he is base and naught worth: but the Lord sheweth him to be such a one, to whom he hath vouchsafed to give the beauty of his image. If thou say that thou owest him nothing for any thing that hee hath done for thee: but God hath set him as it were in his place in respect of whom, thou knowest so many and so great benefits wherewith he hath bound thee unto him. If thou say that he is unworthy that thou shouldst labour any thing at all for his sake: but the image of God whereby he is commended unto thee, too worthy that thou shouldst give thy selfe and all that thou hast unto it. But if he have not onely deserved no good at thy hand, but also provoked thee with wrongs and evill doings: even this is no just cause why thou shouldst cease both to love him and to doe for him the dutifull workes of love. Thou wilt say, he hath farre otherwise deserved of me. But what hath the Lord deserved? Which when he commandeth thee to forgive all wherein hee hath offended thee, truly hee willeth the same to be imputed to himselfe. Truly this is that onely way come to that which is utterly against the nature of man; much more is it hard for man, I meane, to love them that hate us, to recompence evill with doing good, to render blessings for reproches: if we remember that we must not consider the malice of men, but looke upon the image of God in the n, which defacing and blotting out their faults, doe with the beauty and dignity of it selfe allure us to embrace it.

7 Therefore this mortification shall then onely take place in us, when we performe the duties of charity. But it is not he that performeth them, that onely doth all the dutifull workes of charity, although he leave none of them undone, but he doth them of a sincere affection of love. For it may happen, that a man may fully performe to all men all that he oweth, so much as concerneth outward duties: and yet he may be farre from the true performing of it. For you may see some that would seeme very liberrall, which yet doe give nothing but either with pride of looke, or with churlishnesse of words they upbraide it. And we be come to such wretchednesse in this unhappy world, that almost no almes are given of any men, or at least of the most part of men, without reproaching, Which perversnesse should not have bene tolerable among the very heathen. For of Christians is somewhat more required then to shew a cheerefulnesse in countenance, and make their doings lovely with gentlenesse of words. First they must take upon them the personage of him whom they see to neede their helpe, and then so pity their case, as if themselves did feele and suffer it: so that they may be carried with feeling of mercy and gentlenesse, even as they would be to helpe themselves. He that shall come so minded to helpe his brethren, will not onely not defile his doings with any arrogancy or upbraiding, but also neither will despise his brother to whom he doth good as one needing his helpe, nor tread him under foote as one bound unto him: no more then we use to reproch a sicke member, for easing whereof the whole body laboureth, or to thinke it specially bound to the other members, because it hath drawne more helpe unto it than it hath recompensed. For it is thought that the common interpartning of duties betweene members of one body, hath no free kinde of gift, but rather that it is a payment of that which being due by the law of nature, it were monstrous to deny. And by this reason it shall follow, that he may not thinke himselfe discharged that hath performed one kinde of dutie, as it is commonly used, that when a rich man hath given any thing of his owne, he leaveth other charges to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather every man shall thinke thus with himselfe, that he is altogether debter to his neighbours, and that he must determine none other end of using his liberality, but when ability faileth, which how large soever it be, must be measured by the rule of charity.

8 Now let us more fully declare the principall part of forsaking our selves, which wee said to have respect to God. We have said much of it already, which it were superfluous to rehearse againe: it shall bee sufficient to intreat of it so farre, as it frameth us to quietnesse of minde and sufferance. First therefore in seeking the commoditie or quietnesse of this present life, the Scripture calleth us hereunto, that resigning us and our things to the Lords will, wee would yeeld unto him the affections of our heart to bee tamed and subdued. To cover wealth and honours, to compasse authority, to heape up riches, to gather together all such follies as serve for royalty and pompe, our lust is outrageous, and our greedinesse infinite. On the other side of poverty, ignobility, and base estate, we have a marvellous feare and marvellous hatred, that move us to travell by all meanes to eschue them. Hereby a man may see, how unquiet a minde they have, how many shifts they attempt, with what studies they wearie their life, that

of Charity it is nothing, except they be done

that frame their life after their owne devise : to attaine those things that their affection of ambition or covetousnesse requireth, and on the other side to escape poverty and basenesse. Therefore the godly must keepe this way, that they be not entangled with such snares. First let them not either desire, or hope for, or thinke upon any other meane of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lord : and therefore let them safely and boldly rest themselves upon it. For howsoever the flesh sufficient of her selfe, when she either travelleth by her owne diligence, or endeavoureth with her owne studie, or is holpen by the favour of men, to the attayning of honour and wealth, yet it is certaine: that al these things are nothing, and that we shall nothing prevaile with wit or travaile, but in so much as the Lord shall prosper both. But on the other side his onely blessing findeth a way through all stops, to make all things proceede with us to a joyfull and luckie end. Then howsoever wee may most of all obtaine any glory or wealth without it (as we daily see the wicked to get heapes of great honours and riches) yet forasmuch as they upon whom resteth the curse, doe feele no parcell of felicity, we can obtaine nothing without his blessing that shall not turne us to evill. And it is not at all to be covered, that maketh men more miserable.

9 Therefore if we beleve that all the meane of prosperous successe and such as is to bee wished, consisteth in the onely blessing of God, which being absent, all kinds of misery and calamity must happen unto us: this remaineth also: that we doe not greedily endeavour to wealth and honours standing upon our owne finenesse of wit or diligence, not leaning to the favour of men, nor trusting upon a vaine imagination of fortune, but that we alway looke unto the Lord, to be led by his guiding to whatsoever lot he hath provided. So first it shall come to passe, that we shall not violently rush to the catching of riches and invading of honours, by wrong, by guile and evill crafty meanes, or extortion with doing injurie to our neighbours, but shall only follow those fortunes that may not lead us from innocency. For who may hope for the helpe of Gods blessing among frauds, extortions, and other subtile meanes of wickednesse? For as Gods blessing followeth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doth rightly, so it calleth backe all them of whom it is desired, from crooked thoughts, and corrupt doings. Then we shall be brided that we burne not with unmeasurable desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honours. For with what face may a man trust to be holpen of God, to obtaine those things that he desireth against his word? For God forbid that God should give the helpe of his blessing to that which he curseth with his owne mouth. Last of all, if it succeede not according to our wish and hope, yet wee shall bee restrained from impatience, and from cursing our state whatsoever it be : because we know that that is to murmur against God, at whose will riches and poverty, basenesse and honors are disposed. Briefly, he that resteth himselfe in such sort as is aforesaid upon the blessing of God, neither will by evill subtilties, hunt for those things that men are wont outrageously to covet, by which crafty meanes hee thinketh that he shall nothing prevaile : nor if any thing happen prosperously will impute it to himselfe, and to his owne diligence, endeavour or to fortune, but will assigne it to God the Author. But if while other mens estates doe flourish, he goe but slenderly forward, yea or slide backward, yet he will beare his ill fortune, but with greater quietnesse and moderation of minde, than a prophane man will beare a meanely good successe, which is not altogether so good as he desired : because he hath a comfort wherin he may more quietly rest, than upon the highest top of wealth and authority: because he accounteth that his things are ordered by God as is available for his salvation. So we see that David was minded, and yeeldeth himselfe to be ruled by God, he declarerth himselfe to be like to a weined child, and that hee walketh not in high things marvellous above himselfe.

10. And the godly minds ought to have that quietnesse and sufferance not onely consisting in this behalfe : but also it must extend to all chances wheraunto our present life is subject. Therefore no man hath rightly forsaken himselfe, but hee hath so resigned himselfe up wholly to the Lord, that he suffereth all the parts of his life to be governed by his will. He that is so framed in minde, whatsoever happen, will neither thinke himselfe miserable, nor will with enviousnesse against God complaine of his fortune. How necessary this affection is, shall hereby appeare, if you consider to how

He which knoweth himselfe and his estate to depend wholly upon the blessing of God, will neither seeke to advance himselfe by evill meanes, nor immoderately desire to be advanced, nor impatiently murmur at any thing which happeneth.

The quiet contentment of mind which groweth unto men in the manifold casual miseries of this life, if they be many chances we be subject. Divers kinds of diseases doe trouble us, sometime the pestilence cruelly reigneth, sometime wee are sharply vexed with calamities of warre, sometime frost or haile devouring the hope of the year, bringeth barrenesse, that driueth us to death: sometimes our wife, parents, children, or kinsfolke are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fire: these bee the things, at chancing whereof men curse their life, detest the day of their birth, haue Heaven and Light in execration, murmur against God, and (as they be eloquent in blasphemies) accuse him of unjustice and cruelty: But a faithfull man must even in these chances behold the mercifull kindnesse and fatherly tendernesse of God. Therefore whether hee see his house destroyed, his kinsfolke slaine, yet he will not therefore cease to praise God, but rather will turne himselfe to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lord that dwelleth in my house will not leave it desolate. Or if when his corne is blasted or birten, or consumed with frosts, or beaten downe with haile, he see famine at hand, yet he will not despaire, nor speake hatefully of God, but will remaine in this confidence. We are yet in the Lords protection; and sheepe brought up in his pastures: he therefore will finde us food even in the extremest barrenesse. Or if hee be troubled with sicknesse, even then he will not be discouraged with bitterness of sorrow to burst out into impatience and quarrell thus with God: but considering the righteousnesse and lenity in Gods correction, he will call himselfe backe to patience. Finally whatsoever shall happen, because hee knoweth it ordained by the hand of God, hee will take it with a well pleased and thankfull minde, least hee should stubbornly resist his authority, into whose power he hath yeelded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that foolish and most miserable comfort of the heathen be far from a Christian mans heart, which to strengthen their mindes against aduersities, did impure the sancto fortune, with whom they counted it foolish to be angry, because she was blinde and unadvised, that blindly wounded both the deserving and undeserving. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlinesse, that the onely hand of God is the iudge and gouernesse of both fortunes; and that it runneth not forward with unadvised sudden rage, but with most orderly justice dealeth among us both good things and euill.

THE EIGHT CHAPTER.

BUt a godly minde must yett climbe up higher, even to that whereunto Christ calleth his disciples, that euery one take up his crosse. For all whom the Lord hath chosen and vouchsafed to receive into his company, must prepare themselves to a hard, travelsome and unquiet life, and full of many and diuers kinds of incommodities. So it is the will of the heavenly Father, to exercise them in such sort, that he may haue a true prooffe of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten Sonne, he proceedeth with this order toward all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloved sonne above the rest, and in whom the Fathers minde was fully pleased, yet we see how he was not tenderly and daintily handled: so that it may be truly said, that he was not onely exercised with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelleth in earth, but that all his life was nothing else but a kinde of continuall crosse. The Apostle sheweth the cause thereof to be, that it behoued that hee should learne obedience by those things that hee suffered. Why then should wee priuiledge our selves from that estate, whereunto it behooued Christ our head to be subject, specially sith hee became subject thereunto for our cause, to shew us an example of patience in himselfe? Therefore the Apostle saith, that this is the appointed end of all the children of God, to bee fashioned like unto him. Whereupon also in hard and sharpe chances, which are reckoned aduersities and euils, ariseth a great comfort unto us, that we communicate with the sufferings of Christ: that as hee entered out of a maze of all troubles into the heavenly glory, so we may by diuers tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so saith Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicating of his afflictions, wee doe also conceive the power of his resurrection: and when we are fashioned like unto death, wee are so prepared to the fellowship of his his glorious rising againe. How much may this availle to aswage all the painefullnesse of the crosse, that the more wee are afflicted with adversities, so much the more sure is our fellowship with Christ confirmed? by communicating whereof, our sufferings are not onely made blessed unto us, but also doe much helpe us to the furtherance of our salvation.

2 Beside that, our Lord had no need to take upon him to beare the crosse, but to testifie and prove his obedience to his Father: but wee for divers causes have neede to leade our life under a continuall crosse. First (as wee be naturally bent to attribute all things to our flesh) unlessse our weaknesse be shewed us a it were before our eyes, wee doe easily esteeme our owne strength above due measure, and doubt not that whatsoever happen, it will continue unbroken and unovercome against all hard assaults. Whereby we are carried into a foolish and vaine confidence of flesh, and then trusting thereupon, wee stubbornly wax proud against God himselfe, as though our owne powers without his grace did suffice us. This arrogancy hee can no way better beate downe, than when he proveth unto us by experience, not onely how feeble, but also how fraile we be. Therefore he afflicteth us either with shame, or poverty, or losse of children, or sicknesse, or other calamities, which we being unable to beare in respect of our selves, doe by and by sinke downe under them. Being so humbled wee learne to call upon his strength, which onely maketh us to stand upright under the heavey burden of afflictions. Yea the most holy, how well soever they know that they stand by the grace of God and not by their owne force, yet are too much assured of their owne strength and constancy, unlessse by the trial of the crosse, he bring them into a more inward knowledge of themselves. The slothfulnessse crept into David: I said in my rest, I shall never be moved, Lord, thou hast stablished in thy good pleasure a strength to my hill, thou hiddest away thy face, I was stricken. For he confesseth that with sluggishnesse in prosperity his senses were dulled, that not regarding the grace of God, upon which he should have hanged, he leaned unto himselfe, to promise himselfe perpetual continuance. It this chanced to so great a Prophet: which of us ought not to be carefulfull, that wee may be heedfull? Therefore whereas in prosperity they flatter themselves with opinion of a greater constancie and patience, when they are once humbled with adversity, they learne that their former opinion was but hypocrisie. The faithfull (I say) being admonished by such examples of their diseases, doe thereby profit to humilitie, that being unclothed of the wrongfull confidence of the flesh, they may resort to the grace of God. And where they are once come to his grace, they feele the presence of Gods strength, wherein is abundantly sufficient succour for them.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth, that by troubles is engendered patience, by patience proove. For whereas God hath promised the faithfull that hee will be present with them in troubles, they bele the same to be true, when they stand patiently being upholden by his hand, which by their owne strength they were not able to doe. Patience therefore bringeth a proove by experience to the holy ones, that God when neede requireth will indeed performe that helpe that hee hath promised. And thereby also their hope is confirmed: forasmuch as it were too much unthankfulnessse not to looke for in time to come, the same truth of God that they had already by experience proved to be constant and sure. We see now how many good things doe come unto us in one knot by the crosse. For overthrowing the opinion that wee falsely presume of our owne strength and disclosing our hypocrisie that delighted us, it shaketh away the hurtfull confidence of the flesh, and teacheth us being so humbled, to rest upon God onely, by which it cometh to passe, that wee neither bee oppressed nor fall downe. And after victorie followeth hope, inasmuch as the Lord in performing that which he hath promised, established the credit of his truth for time to come. Truly; although there were no more reasons but these, it appeareth how much the exercise of the crosse is necessary for us. For it is a matter of no small importance, to have the blinde love of thy selfe wiped away, that thou mayest well know thine owne weaknesse. To feele thy owne weaknesse, that thou mayest learne to distrust thy selfe, to distrust thy selfe, that thou mayest remove thy confidence from thy selfe unto God, to rest with confidence of hart upon God, that being upholden by his helpe, thou mayest continue unovercome to the last end : to stand fast by his grace, that thou mayest understand that hee is true in his promises : to know by proefe the truth of his promises, that thy hope may bee strengthened thereby.

4. The Lord hath also another end of afflicting his, to trieth their patience, and instruct us to obedience. Not that they can use any obedience toward him, other than the same that hee giveth them : but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approved by witness, and to set forth the graces that hee hath bestowed upon his holy ones, that they should not lie idly hid within them. And therefore in bringing forth into open shew the strength of sufferance and constancie, wherewith hee hath furnished his servants, it is fit that he trieth their patience. And from hence came these sayings: that God tempted Abraham, and had proefe of his godlinesse, by this, that hee refused not to offer up in sacrifice his owne and onely Sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth, that our faith is so proved in troubles, as gold is tried in a furnace. And who can say that it is not expedient, that the most noble gift of patience, which a faithfull man hath received of his God, should bee brought forth in use, that it may bee made certainly knowne and manifest? For otherwise men will not esteeme it as it is worthie. Now if God himselfe doth rightfully when he ministrereth matter to stir up the vertues that hee hath given to his faithfull, that they should not lie hidden, yea lie unprofitable and perish : then is there good reason of the afflictions of the holy ones, without which their patience should be nothing. I say also that by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, because they are so taught to live not after their owne wish, but after the will of God. Truly if all things should flow unto them after their owne minde, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was and old Proverbe, when they exhorted any man to suffer adversities, Follow God. By which they declared, that then onely man truly entred under the yoke of God, when he yielded his hand and backe to Gods correction. Now if it bee most righteous, that wee should shew our selves in all things obedient to the heavenly Father, then wee ought not to refuse, that he should by all meanes accustom us to yeeld obedience unto him.

5. But yet we perceive not how necessarie this obedience is for us, unlesse wee doe also consider, how wanton our flesh is to shake off the yoke of God, so soone as it hath bene but a little while daintily and tenderly handled. The same happeneth unto it that chanceth to stubbornne horses, which if they bee a few daies pampered idly, they cannot afterward for fearcenesse be tamed, neither doe know the rider, to whose government they somewhat before obeyed. And this is continnall in us that God complaineth to have been in the people of Israell, that being well fed and covered with fatnesse, wee kicke against him that fed and nourished us. The liberality of God should indeed have allured us to consider and love his goodnesse, but forasmuch as our evil nature is such, that we are alway corrupted with his tender usage, it is more than necessarie for us, to be restrained by some discipline, that wee run not outrageously into such a stubbornne wantonnesse. So that we should not grow fierce with unmeasurable abundance of riches, that we should not wax proud being lifted up with honours, that we should not become insolent, being puffed up with other good gifts, either of the soule, bodie or fortune, the Lord himselfe, as he foreseeth it to bee expedient, preventeth it, and with the remedie of the crosse subdueth and bridleth the fiercenesse of our flesh, and that divers waies, so much as is healthfull for every man. For all are not alike sicke of all one diseases, or do alike need of hard dealing. And thereupon is to bee seene how some are exercised with one kinde of crosse, and some with another. But whereas the heavenly Physician handleth some more gently, and purgeth some with sharper remedies, when he meaneth to provide for the health of all : yet he leaveth none free or untouched, because he knoweth all with out exception to be diseased.

Moreover, the most mercifull father needeth not onely to prevent our weaknesse, but many times to correct our passed offences. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, the remembrance of our forepassed life ought by and by to enter into our minde : so without doubt we shall finde that we have done somewhat worthy of chastisement. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our exhortation to patience upon the acknowledging of sinne. For the Scripture ministrereth us a faire better consideration, when it faith, that the Lord correcteth us with adversities, that wee should not be damned with this world. Therefore we ought even in the very sharpnesse of tribulations to acknowledge the kindnesse and goodnesse of our father toward us, so far much as even then hee ceaseth not to further our salvation. For he doth afflict, not to destroy or kill us, but rather to deliver us from the damnation of the world. That thought shall leade us to that which the Scripture teacheth in another place: My sonne, refuse not the Lords correction, nor be wearie when thou shalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loveth, he correcteth, and embraceth him as a father doth his child. When we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our duty rather to shew our selves obedient children and willing to learne, than with obstinacie to doe like desperate men, that are hardened with evill doings? The Lord leaseth us, unless he call us backe by correction when wee are fallen away from him: so that the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes rightly saith that we are bastards, and not children if we be out of correction. Therefore we are most forward, if we cannot suffer him when he declareth his good will, and the care that he hath for our salvation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference between the unbelievers and the faithfull, that the unbelievers as the bondslaves of a rooted and hardened wickednesse, are made the worse and more obstinate with whipping: the faithfull, like children having an honest freedome of nature, doe thereby profit to repentance. Now must thou choosē of whether number thou wilt be. But because I have spoken of this matter in another place, I am contented to touch it briefly and so will make an end.

7. Moreover it is a singular comfort, when we suffer persecution for righteousnesse. For then we ought to thinke, how great an honour God vouchsafeth to grant us, that he garnisheth us with the peculiar marke of his souldiers. I meane that they suffer persecution for righteousnesse, not onely that suffer for defense of the Gospel, but also that are troubled for any defense of righteousnesse. Whether therefore in maintaining the truth of God against the lies of Sathan, or in taking in hand the defense of good men and innocents against the wrongs of the wicked, wee be driven to runne into the displeasure and hatred of the world, whereby our life or goods, or estimation, may come in danger: let it not bee grievous or loathsome unto us to employ our selves for God, or let us not thinke our selves miserable in those things in which hee hath with his owne mouth pronounced us blessed. Poverty indeed, if it be considered in it selfe, is miserable: likewise banishment, contemptuous estate, prisonment, shame: Finally, death is the uttermost of all calamities. But when the favour of our God breatheth upon us, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicitie. Therefore let us rather bee content with the testimonie of Christ, than with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that wee shall rejoyce as the Apostles did, when God shall account us worthise to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If wee being innocent, and knowing our selves cleere in our consciences, are by the naughty dealing of wicked men spoyled of our goods: wee are indeed brought to poverty thereby among men, but so riches truly doe grow unto us in heaven before God. If we be thrust out of our houses, wee are the more inwardly received into the household of God. If we bee vexed and despised, we take so much the deeper rootes in Christ. If wee be noted with reproches and shame, we are in so much the more honorable place in the kingdom of God. If we be slaine, so is the entrie made open for us unto blessed life. Let us bee ashamed to esteeme lesse these things, upon which the Lord hath set so great a price, than shadowish and fickle enticing pleasures of present life.

8. * Such therefore the Scripture doth with these and like admonitions give sufficient comfort for the flames or calamities that we suffer for defense of righteousnesse, we are too much unthankfull if we doe not gladly and cheerefully receive them at the Lords hand, specially sith this is the kinde of crosse, most properly belonging to the faithfull, whereby Christ will be glorified in us. As also Peter teacheth. But it is more grievous to gentle natures to suffer shame than a hundred deaths: therefore Paul expressly admonisheth that we shall not onely suffer persecutions, but also reproches, because wee trust in the living God. As in another place hee teacheth us after his example to walke through slander and good report. Yet there is not required of us such a cheere-

a cheerefulnesse as may take away all feeling of bitterness and sorrow, or else the patience of the holy ones in the crosse were no patience, unlesse they should bee both tormented with sorrow, and vexed with griefe. If there were no hardnesse in poverty, no paine in sickness, no griefe in shame, no horrour in death, what valiantnesse or temperance were it to beare them indifferently? But when every one of these doth with the naturall bitterness thereof bite the hearts of us all, herein doth the valiantnesse of a faithfull man shew it selfe, if being assaied with the feeling of such bitterness, how grievously soever hee be troubled with it, yet with valiantly resisting he overcommeth it, his patience uttereth it selfe herein, if being sharply provoked, he is yet so bridled with the feare of God, that he bursteth not out into any dis temper. His cheerefulnesse appeareth herein, if being wounded with sadness and sorrow, he resteth upon the spirituall comfort of God.

9. This conflict, which the faithfull doe sustaine against the naturall feeling of sorrow, while they studie for patience and temperance, Paul hath very well described in these words. Wee are put to distresse in all things but we are not made sorrowfull: wee labour, but we are not left destitute: we suffer persecution, but we are not forsaken in it: we are throwne downe, but we perish not, You see how to beare the crosse patiently, is not to be altogether astonished, and without all feeling of sorrow: as the Stoickes in old time did foolishly describe a valiant hearted man, to be such a one, as putting off all nature of man, was alike moved in prosperitie and in adversitie, in sorrowfull and joyfull estate, yea such a one as like a stone was moved with nothing: and what have they profited with this high wisdom? Forsooth they have painted out such an image of wisdom as never was found, and never can hereafter bee among men: But rather while they coveted to have too exact and precise a patience, they have taken away all the use of patience out of mans life. And at this day also among Christians there are new Stoickes, that reckon it a fault not onely to grone and weepe, but also to be sad and carefull. But these strange conclusions doe commonly proceed from idleness, which busying themselves rather in speculation than doing, can doe nothing but breed us such new found doctrines. But wee have nothing to doe with that stonie Philosophie, which our Master and Lord hath condemned not onely by his word but also by his example. For hee mourned and wept both at his owne and other mens adversities. The world (sith he) shall rejoyce, but you shall mourne and weepe. And because no man should finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them blessed that mourne. And no marvell. For if all weeping be blamed, what shall we judge of the Lord himselfe, out of whose bodie dropped bloody teares? If every feare be noted of infidelity, what shall we judge of that quaking feare wherewith we read that he was not slenderly stricken? If all sadness be misliked, how shall we like this, that he confesseth his soule to be sad even to the death.

10. This I thought good to speake to this end, to call godly mindes from despaire that they should not therefore altogether forsake the studie of patience, because, they cannot put off the naturall affection of sorrow: which must needs happen to them that make of patience a senselesse dulnes, and of a valiant and constant man, a stocke. For the Scripture giveth to the holy ones the praise of patience, when they are so troubled with hardnes of adversities, that yet they be not overcome nor throwne downe with it: when they be so pricked with bitterness, that they be also delighted with spirituall joy: when they be so distressed with griefe, that yet they receive courage againe being cheered with the comfort of God. Yet in the meane time that repugnance abideth still in their hearts, that naturall sense escheweth and dreadeth those things that it knoweth to be against it: but the affection of godlinesse travelleth even through all those difficulties to the obeying of Gods will. This repugnance the Lord expressed when hee said thus to Peter: When thou wast young thou didst gird thy selfe and didst walke whether thou wouldest: But when thou art old, an other shall gird thee and lead thee whether thou shalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that hee must glorifie God by his death, was drawne unwillingly and resisting unto it. Else his martyrdom should have but small praise. But howsoever he did with great cheerefulness of hart obey the ordinance of God, yet because he had not put off the nature of man, he was doubly strained with two sorts of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloody death that he should suffer, being stricken with horror thereof, hee would gladly have escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that he was called unto it by the commandement of God, then conquering and treading downe feare, he gladly, yea and cheerefully tooke it upon him. This therefore we must endeavour if we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our minds be inwardly filled with so great a reverence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinance all contrarie affections. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoever kind of crosse we be vexed, even in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly keepe patience. For adversities shall have their sharpnesse, wherewith we shall be bitten: so when wee are afflicted with sicknesse, we shall both grone and bee disquieted and desire health: so being pressed with povertie, we shall be pricked with the stings of carefulnesse and sorrow: so shall we be stricken with griefe of shame, contempt and injury: so shall we yeeld due teares to nature at the buriall of our friends: but this alway shall be the conclusion. But the Lord willed so. Therefore let us follow his will. Yea even in the midst of the prickings of sorrow, in the midst of mourning and teares, this thought must needs come betwene, to encline our heart to take cheerefully the very same things, by reason whereof it is so moved.

The difference between Christian and Philoso-phicall patience.

II. But forasmuch as wee have taken the chiefe cause of bearing the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in few words define what difference is betwene Philosophicall and Christian patience. Truly very few of the Philosophers climbed to so high a reason, to understand that the hand of God doth exercise us by afflictions, and to thinke that God is in this behalfe to be obeyed. But they bring no other reason, but because we must so doe of necessitie. What is this else, but to say that thou must yeeld unto God, because thou shalt travaile in vaine to wrastle against him? For if we obey God, only because we so must of necessitie: then if we might escape, we would cease to obey. But the Scripture biddeth us to considera farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, first justice and equitie, then the care of our salvation. These therefore be the Christian exhortations to patience, whether poverty, or banishment, or prisonment, or shame, or sicknesse, or losse of parents, or children, or any other like thing doe grieve us, wee must thinke that none of these things doth happen, but by the will and providence of God, and that hee doth nothing but by most just order? For why? doe not our innumerable and daily offences deserve to be chastised more sharplie; and with more grievous correction, than such as the mercifull kindnesse of God laieth upon us? Is it not most great equitie, that our flesh bee tamed, and as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that hee doe not wantonly grow wilde according to her nature? Is not the righteousnesse and truth of God worthy, that wee should take paine for it? But if there appeare an undoubted righteousnesse in our afflictions, wee cannot without unrighteousnesse either murmure or wrastle against it. We heare not now that cold song: We must give place, because we so must of necessitie, but we heare a lively lesson and full of effectualnesse. We must obey, because it is unlawfull to resist: wee must suffer patiently, because impatience is a stubbornnesse against the righteousnesse of God. But now, because that thing onely is worthie to be loved of us, which we know to be to our safety and benefit, the good father doth this way also comfort us, when hee affirmeth that even in this that he afflicteth us with the crosse, he providedh for our safetie. But if it bee certaine that troubles are healthfull for us, why should we not receive them with a thankfull and well pleased minde? Therefore in patiently suffering them, we doe not forcibly yeeld to necessitie, but quietly agree to our owne benefit. These thoughts (I say) doe make that how much our minds are grieved in the crosse with naturall feeling of bitternesse, so much they be cheered with spirituall gladnesse. Whereupon also followeth thanksgiving, which cannot bee without joy. But if the praise of the Lord and thanksgiving proceedeth of nothing but of a cheerefull and joyfull heart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the same praising of God and thanksgiving in us: hereby appeareth how necessarie it is that the bitternesse of the crosse, bee tempered with spirituall joy.

THE NINTH CHAPTER.

BUt with whatsoever kinde of trouble wee bee distressed, wee must alway looke to this end, to use our selves to the contempt of this present life, and thereby be stirred to the meditation of the life to come. For, because God knoweth well how much wee bee by nature inclined to the beastly love of this world, hee useth a most fit meane to draw us backe, and to shake off our sluggishnesse, that we should not sticke too fast in that love. There is none of us that desireth not to seeme to aspire and endeavour all their life long to heavenly immortalitie. For wee are ashamed to excell bruit beasts in nothing: whose state should be nothing inferiour to ours, unlesse there remaine to us a hope of eternitie after death. But if you examine the devises, studies, and doings of every man, you shall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon groweth that senselesnesse, that our minde being dazeled with vaine glistering of riches, power, and honors, is so dulle that it cannot see farre. Our heart also being possessed with covetousnesse, ambition, and lust, is so weighed downe, that it cannot rise up higher. Finally, all our soule entangled with entisements of the flesh seeketh her felicity in earth. The Lord to remedie this evill, doth with continuall examples of miseries teach this, of the vanitie of this present life. Therefore that they should not promise themselves in this life a sound and quiet peace, hee suffereth them to bee many times disquieted and troubled either with warres, or uprores, or robberies, or other injuries. That they should not with too much greedinesse, gape for fraile and transitorie riches, or rest in the riches that they already possess, sometime with banishment, sometime with barrennesse of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes he bringeth them to poverty, or at least holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much ease take pleasure in the benefits of Marriage, hee either maketh them to be vexed with the frowardnesse of their wives, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punisheth them with want of issue. But if in all these things he tenderly beareth with them, yet least they should either swell with foolish glorie, or immeasurably rejoyce with vaine confidence, hee doth by diseases and dangers set before their eyes, how unstable, and vanishing bee all the goods that are subject to mortalitie. Then onely therefore we rightly profit in the discipline of the crosse when we learne that this life, when it is considered in it selfe, is unquiet, troublesome, and innumerable waies miserable, and in no point fully blessed: and that all those that are reckoned the good things thereof are uncertaine, sickle, vaine, and uncorrupted, with many evils mixed with them. And hereupon wee doe determine, that here is nothing to bee sought or hoped for but strife: and that when we thinke of our crowne, then wee must lift up our eyes to heaven. For thus we must believe. That our minde is never truly raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, unlesse it have first conceived a contempt of this present life.

2. For betweene these two there is no meane, the earth must either become vile in our sight, or hold us bound with intemperate love of it. Therefore if we have any care of eternitie, we must diligently endeavour to loose our selves from these fetters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure us, a great shew of pleasantnesse, grace, and sweetnesse, wherewith to delight us: it is much behoovefull for us to be now and then called away, that wee bee not bewitched with such allurements. For what, I pray you, would be done, if wee did here enjoy a continuall concurrence of good things and felicitie, such we cannot with continuall spurres of evils be sufficiently awaked to consider the misery thereof? Not onely the learned doe know, but also the common people have no Proverbe more common than this, that mans life is like a smoke or shadow: and because they saw it to be a thing verie profitablie to bee knowne, they have set it out with many notable sentences. But there is nothing that we do either more negligently consider, or lesse remember. For we goe about all things as though we would frame to our selves an immortalitie in earth. If there bee a corps carried to buriall, or if wee walke among graves, then, because there is an image of death before our eyes, I grant wee doe marvellously well discourse like Philosophers upon the vanitie of this life. Albeit wee doe not that continually, for many times all these things doe nothing move us. But when it happeneth our Philosophy lasteth but a while, which so soone as we turne our backs, vanisheth away, and leaveth no step at all of remembrance behinde it: finally, it passeth away, as clapping of hands upon a stage at any pleasant sight. And we forgetting not onely death, but also that wee be subject to death, as though we had never heard of any report thereof, fall to a carelesse affluence of earthly immortalitie. If any man in the meane time tell us of the Proverbe, that man is a creature of a daies continuance, wee grant it indeed: but so heedlesly that still the thought of everlasting continuance resteth in our minde. Who therefore can denie that it is a great profit to us all, not onely to be admonished in words, but by all the examples of experience that may be, to be convinced of the miserable estate of earthly life? forasmuch as even when wee are convinced wee scarcely cease to stand amazed with perverse and foolish admiration of it, as though it contained the uttermost end of good things. But if it bee necessary that God instruct us, it is our dutie likewise on our behalfe to harken to him when he calleth and awaketh our dulnesse, that despising the world, we may with all our harts endeavor to the meditation of the life to come.

3. But let the faithfull accustom themselves to such a despising of present life, as may neither engender a hatred thereof, nor any unthankfulnesse toward God. For this life, howsoever it is full of infinit miseries, is yet worthily reckoned among the not slender blessings of God. Therefore if we acknowledge no benefit of God in it, we are guiltie of no small unthankfulnesse toward God himselfe. But specially it ought to be to the faithfull a testimonie of Gods good will, forasmuch as it is wholly directed to the furtherance of their salvation. For before that hee openly deliver unto us the inheritance of eternall glorie, his will is to shew himselfe a Father unto us by smaller examples: and these be the benefits that are daily bestowed upon us. Sith therefore this life serveth us to understand the goodnesse of God, shall wee disdain it as though it had not a crum of goodnesse in it? Wee must therefore put on this feeling and affection, to reckon it among the gifts of goodnesse that are not to bee refused. For though there wanted testimonies of Scripture, of which there are both many most evident, very nature it selfe doth exhort us to give thanks to the Lord, for that he hath brought us into the light of it, that hee granteth us the use of it, that hee giveth us all necessarie succours for the preservation of it. And this is a much greater reason, if we consider that we are in it after a certaine manner prepared to the glory of the heavenly kingdome. For so the Lord hath ordained, that they which in time to come shall be crowned in heaven, must fight certaine battels in earth, that they should not triumph, till they had overcome the hard adventures of the battell, and obtained the victorie. Then another reason is, that we doe by divers benefits begin therein to taste the sweetnesse of Gods liberalitie, that our hope and desire should be whetted, to Long for the revealing thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gift of Gods clemencie, that we live this earthly life, for which as we be bound unto him, so we ought to be mindefull and thankfull: then wee shall in fit order come to consider the most miserable estate thereof, to this end that we may bee delivered from too much greedinesse of it, whereunto as I have before said, we are of our selves naturally inclined.

4. Now whatsoever is taken from the wrongfull desire of this life, ought to bee added to the desire of a better life. I grant indeed that they thought truly, that thought it best not to be borne, and the next to die quickly. For what could they being destitute of the light of God and true religion, see therein but unhappie and miserable? And they did not without reason, that mourned and wept at the births of their friends, and solemnly joyced at their burials, but they did it without profit, because being without the right doctrine of Faith, they did not see how that may turne to good to the godly, which is of it selfe neither blessed nor to bee desired: and so they ended their judgement with desperation. Let this therefore be the marke of the faithfull in judging of mortall life, that when they understand it to be of it selfe nothing but miserie, they may resort wholly the more freshly and readily to the eternall life to come. When we come to this comparison, then this present life may not onely bee safely neglected, but also utterly despised and loathed in comparison of the other. For if Heaven bee our

Country

We may not so despise the life which we enjoy in the world that the estimation of those good things which God doth bestow upon us be unthankfully diminished.

This life is not simply to be loathed but in comparison of the life to come.

Country, what is the earth else but a place of banishment? If the departing out of the world be an entering into life, what is the world but a grave? to abide in it, what is it else but to be drowned in death? If to be delivered from the bodie, is to be set in perfect libertie, what is the bodie else but a prison? If to enjoy the presence of God is the highest summe of felicitie, is it not miserable to lacke it? But till we be escaped out of the world, we wander abroad from the Lord. Therefore if the earthly life be compared with the heavenly life, doubtlesse it ought to be despised and troden under foote. But it is never to be hated, but in respect that it holdeth us in subjection to sinne, and yet that hatred is not properly to be laid upon our life. But howsoever it be, yet we must bee so moved either with wearinesse or hatred of it, that desiring the end of it, we may be also ready at the will of the Lord to abide in it, so that our wearinesse may be far from all grudging and impatience. For it is like a place in battell array, wherein the Lord hath placed us, which we ought to keepe till hee call us away. Paul indeed lamenteth his state, that he is holden bound in the bonds of the bodie longer than hee wished, and sigheth with fervent desire of his redemption: nevertheless to obey the Commandement of the Lord, hee professed himselfe readie to both, because hee acknowledgedgeeth himselfe to owe this unto God, to glorifie his name, either by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is most expedient for his glorie. Therefore if we must live and die to the Lord, let us leave to his will the time of our life and death, but so that wee be still fervent in desire of death, and bee continually occupied in meditation thereof, and despite this life in comparison of the immortalitie to come, and with to forsake it when it shall please the Lord, because of the bondage of sinne.

5. But this is monstrous, that in steed of that desire of death, many that boast themselves to be Christians, are so afraid of it, that they tremble at every mention of it, as of a thing betokening unluckily and unhappie. Truly it is no marvell, if naturall sense in us doe quake for feare when we heare of the dissolving of us. But this is in no wise tollerable, that there be not in a Christian mans breast the light of godlinesse, that should with greater comfort overcome and suppress that feare, how great soever it be. For if we consider that this unstedfast, faultie, corruptible, fraile, withering and rotten tabernacle of our bodie, is therefore dissolved, that it may afterward be restored againe into a stedfast, perfect, uncorruptible and heavenly glorie: shall not faith compell us fervently to desire that which nature feareth? If we consider that by death wee are called home out of banishment, to inhabit our countrie, as a heavenly countrie, shall we obtaine no comfort thereby? but there is nothing that desireth not to abide continually. I grant, and therefore I affirme, that we ought to looke unto the immortalitie to come, where we may attaine a stedfast state that no where appeareth in earth. For Paul doth very well teach, that the faithfull ought to goe cheerefully to death: not because they would be unclorhed, but because they desire to be newly clothed. Shall braut beasts, yea and livelesse creatures, even stockes and stones, knowing their present vanitie, be earnestly bent to looking for the last day of the resurrection, that they may with the children of God be delivered from vanitie, and shall we that are endued with the light of wit, and above wit enlightned with the spirit of God, when it standeth upon our being, not lift up our mindes beyond this rottenesse of earth? But it pertaieth not to my present purpose, nor to this place, to speake againt this perversenese. And in the beginning I have already professed, that I would not here take upon me the large handling of common places. I would counsell such fearefull mindes to read Cyprians booke of mortalitie, unlesse they were meete to bee sent to the Philosophers, that they may begin to be ashamed, when they see the contempt of death that those doe shew. But this let us hold for certainly determined, that no man hath well profited in Christ his schoole, but he that doth joyfully looke for the day both of death and of the last resurrection. For both Paul describeth all the faithfull by this marke, and also it is common in the Scripture, to call us thither as oft as it will set forth a ground of perfect gladnesse. Rejoyce (saith the Lord) and lift up your heads, for your redemption cometh neere at hand. Is it reasonable I pray you, that the thing which he willed to bee of so great force to raise up joy and cheerefulnesse in us, should breed nothing but sorrow and discouragement? If it be so, why doe wee still boast of him as of our schoolemaster?

Let

Let us therefore get a sounder minde, and howsoever the blinde and senselesse desire of the flesh doe strive against it, let us not doubt to wish for the coming of the Lord, not only with wishing, but also with groning and sighing, as a thing most happy of all other. For he shall come a redeemer to us, to draw us out of the infinite gulfe of evils and miseries, and to lead us into that blessed inheritance of his life and glory.

6. This is certainly true: all the nations of the faithfull, so long as they dwell in earth, must be as sheep appointed to slaughter, that they may be fashioned like Christ their head. Therefore they were in most lamentable case, unlesse they had their minde raised up into heaven, and surmounted all that is in the world, and passed over the present face of things. Contrariwise when they have once lifted their heads above all earthly things, although they see the wealth and honors of the wicked flourishing, if they see them enjoying quiet peace, if they see them proud in gorgiousnesse and sumptuousnesse of all things, if they see them to flow in plentiful store of all delights, beside that, if they be spoiled by their wickednesse, if they sustaine reprochfull dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their covetousnesse, if they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they will easily uphold themselves in such adversities. For that day shall be before their eyes, when the Lord shall receive his faithfull into the quiet of his kingdome when he shall wipe all teares from their eyes, when he shall clothe them with the robe of glory and gladnesse, when hee shall feed them with the unspeakeable sweetnesse of his dainties, when hee shall advance them to the fellowship of his high estate, finally when hee shall vouchsafe to interpart his felicitie with them. But these wicked ones that have flourished in the earth, hee shall throw into extreme shame, hee shall change their delights into torments, their laughing and myrth into weeping and gasping of teeth, hee shall disquiet their peace with terrible torments of conscience, hee shall punish their daintinesse with unquenchable fire, and put their heads in subjection to those godly men, whose patience they have abused. For this is righteousnesse (as Paul testifieth) to give release to the miserable and to them that are unjustly afflicted, and to render affliction to the wicked that doe assist the godly, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven. This truly is our onely comfort, which if it be taken away, we must of necessitie either despaire, or flatteringly delight our selves with the vaine comforts of the world to our owne destruction. For even the Prophet confesseth that his feet staggered, when he carried too long upon considering the present prosperitie of the wicked: and that he could not otherwise stand stedfast, but when hee entered into the sanctuary of God, and bended his eyes to the last end of the godly and the wicked. To conclude in one word, then onely the crosse of Christ triumpheth in the hearts of the faithfull upon the Divell, flesh, sinne, add the wicked, when our eyes are turned to the power of the resurrection.

THE TENTH CHAPTER.

BY such introductions the Scripture doth also well informe us what is the right use of earthly benefits: which is a thing not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if we must live, we must also use the necessarie helps of life: neither can wee eschew even those things that seeme rather to serve for delight than for necessitie. Therefore we must keepe a measure that we may use them with a pure conscience, either for necessitie or for delight. That measure, the Lord appointeth by his word, when he teacheth that this life is to them that be his, a certaine journey through a strange country, by which they travell toward the kingdome of heaven. If we must but passe through the earth, doublelesse we ought so farre to use the good things of the earth, as they may rather further then hinder our journey. Therefore Paul doth not unprofitably counsell us so to use this world, as though wee used it not: and to buy possessions with such a minde as they use to be sold. But because this place is slippery, and so slope on both sides, that it quickly maketh us to fall, let us labour to fasten our foote there, where we may stand safely. For there have beene some, that otherwise were good and holy men, which when they saw intemperance and riot continually to range with unbridled

unbridled lust, unlesse it be sharply restrained, and were desirous to correct so great a mischief, they could finde none other way, but suffered man to use the benefits of the earth, so farre as necessitie required. This was indeed a godly counsell, but they were too severe. For (which is a very perillous thing) they did put streighter bonds upon consciences, than those wherewith they were bound by the word of God. And they expound necessitie, to abstaine from all things that a man may be without. And so by their opinion, a man might scarcely take any more food than bread and water. And some bee yet more severe: as it is read of Crates the Theban, that did throw his goods into the Sea, because if they were not destroyed, he thought that hee should bee destroyed by them. Many at this day, while they seeke a pretence whereby the intemperance of the flesh in use of outward things may be excused, and while they goe about to prepare a way for the flesh raging in wantonnesse, doe take that as a thing confessed, which I doe not grant them, that this libertie is not to be restrained with any limitation of measure, but that it is to be left to every mans conscience to use as much as hee seeth to be lawfull for him. Truly I confesse that consciences neither ought nor can in this point be bound by certaine and precise formes of Lawes. But forasmuch as the Scripture teacheth general rules of lawfull use, we must surely measure the use according to these rules.

2. Let this be a principle: that the use of Gods gift swarveth not out of the way, when it is referred to that end, wherunto the Author himselfe hath created and appointed them for us, forasmuch as he hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keepe a righter way than he that shall diligently looke unto this end. Now if we consider to what end he hath created meates, we shall finde that he meant to make provision not onely for necessitie; but also for delight and pleasure. So in apparell, beside necessitie hee appointed another end, which is comeliness and honestie. In herbs, trees, and fruits, beside diverse profitable uses, there is also a pleasantnesse of sight, and sweetness of smell. For if this were not true, the Prophet would not reckon among the benefits of God, that Wine maketh glad the heart of man, and that Oile maketh his face to shine; the Scripture would not each where, to set forth his liberalitie, rehearse that he hath given all such things to men. And the very naturall qualitie of things doe sufficiently shew to what end and how farre wee may use them. Shall the Lord have set in flowers so great a beautie, as presenteth it selfe to our eyes: shall he have given so great a sweetness of savour as naturally floweth into our smelling: and shall it be unlawfull either for our eyes to take the use of that beauty, or for our smelling to feele that sweetness of savour? What? Hath he not so made difference of colours, that he hath made some more acceptable than other? What? Hath hee not given to gold and silver, to ivorie and marble, a speciall grace whereby they might bee made more precious than other metals or stones? Finally, hath hee not made many things commendable unto us without necessary use?

3. Therefore away with that unnatural Philosophie, which in granting us of the creatures no use but of necessitie, not only doth niggardly bereave us of the lawfull use of Gods liberalitie, but also cannot take place, unlesse it first have spoiled man of all his senses and made him a blocke. But on the other side we must with no lesse diligence provide a stay for the lust of the flesh, which if it be not brought into order, overfloweth without measure: and it hath (as I have said) defenders of it, which under pretence of allowed libertie, do grant unto it all things. First there is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all things are created for us to this end, that we should know the author of them, and give him thanks for his tender kinnesse toward us. Where is thy thanksgiving, if thou so gluttonously fill thy selfe with daintie meates or with wine, that thou either be made senselesse, or unfit to doe the duties of godlinesse and of thy calling? Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy flesh by too great abundance boyling in filthy lust, doth with her uncleannesse ineste thy minde, that thou canst not see any thing that is right or honest? In apparell, where is thankfulness to God, if with costly gorgeousnesse thereof we both fall in admiration of our selves and disdaine other? If with the trimmes and cleanlines of it, we prepare our selves to unchastity? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixed upon the gaynesse of our apparell? For many so give all their senses to bodily delights, that the minde lieth overwhelmed.

Many

God having made things not onely for necessitie but also for delight, there is no cause why men for whom they are made, may not use them as well to the one as the other.
Plal. 104. 15.

Our acknowledging with thankfulness that all good things are received at the hands of God, bridleth the excessive abuse of meate, apparell, furniture, and all things needfull unto life.

Many are so delighted with marble, gold, and paintings, that they become as it were men made of marble, that they be as it were turned into metals, and bee like unto painted images. The smell of the kitchen, or sweetnesse of savour so dulleth some, that they can smell nothing that is spirituall. And the same is also to be seene in the rest. Therefore it is certaine that hereby the licentiousnesse of abusing is somewhat restrained, and that rule of Paul confirmed, that we be not too carefull of the flesh, for the lusts thereof, to which if we grant too much, they boile out above measure and temper.

Rom. 13. 14.

The light estimation of this present life, and the earnest meditation of immortality cutteth off the over great care which men have of outward things.

1 Cor. 7. 3.

4. But there is no surer nor readier way, than that which is made us by the contempt of this present life, and the meditation of heavenly immortality. For thereupon follow two rules: the one, that they which use this world, should be so minded as though they used it not, they that marrie wives, as though they did not marrie: they that buy, as though they did not buy, as Paul teacheth. The other, that they should learne, as well to beare povertie, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderately. Hee that biddeth thee use this world as though thou didst not use it, doth cut away not onely the intemperance of gluttonie in meat and drinke, and too much daintinesse, sumptuousnesse, pride, haucinesse, and nicenesse, in fare, building, and apparell, but also all care and affection that may either withdraw thee or hinder thee from thinking of the heavenly life, or from studie to garnish thy soule. But this was long agoe truly said of Cato: that there is great carefulnesse of trimming our bodie, and great carelesnesse of vertue. And it is an old proverbe, that they which are much busied in care of their bodie, are commonly carelesse of their soule. Therefore, although the liberty of the faithfull in outward things is not to be restrained to a certaine forme, yet truly it must be subject to this law, to beare verie little with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call upon themselves with continually bent minde, to cut off all shew of superfluous plentie, much more to restraine riotous excessse, and to take diligent heed, that they doe not of helpes, make to themselves hinderances.

A minde contented to want, and persuaded that it standeth accountable to God for things received, will easily moderate it selfe in the use of carthy things.

5. The other rule shall bee, that they that have but small and slender riches, may learne to lacke patiently, that they be not carefully moved with immeasurable desire of them: which patience they that keepe, have not a little profited in the Lords schoole: as he that hath not at least somewhat profited in this behalte, can scarcely have any thing whereby to prove himselfe the scholler of Christ. For beside this that the most part of other vices doe accompanie the desire of the earthly things, hee that beareth povertie impatiently, doth for the most part bewray the contrarie disease in abundance. I meane hereby that hee which will bee ashamed of a poore coate, will be proud of a costly coate, he that will not be content with a hungry supper, will be disquieted with desire of a daintier, and would also intemperately abuse those dainties if he had them: he that hardly and unquietly beareth a private and base estate, will not abstaine from pride if hee climbe to honours. Therefore let all them that have an unfained zeale of godlinesse, endeavour to learne by the Apostles example, to be full and hungrie, to have store, and suffer want. The Scripture hath also a third rule, whereby it tempereth the use of earthly things, of which wee have spoken somewhat when wee entreated of the precepts of charitie. For the Scripture decreeth that all earthly things are so given us by the bonnifullnesse of God, and appointed for our commoditie, that they may bee as things delivered us to keepe, whereof wee must one day yeeld an account. Wee must therefore so dispose them, that this saying may continually found in our eares, Yeeld an account of thy bailiwike. Therewithall let this also come in our minde. Who it is that asketh such an account even he that hath so much commended abstinence, sobriety, honest sparing, and modestie, and abhorreth riotous sumptuousnesse, pride, ostentation and vanitie, which alloweth no other disposing of goods, but such as is joynd with charitie: which hath alreadie with his owne mouth condemned all those delightful things that doe withdraw a mans minde from chastitie and cleannesse, or doe dull his wit with darknesse.

Philip. 4. 12.

The consideration of that whereunto God hath called us, is

6. Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord knoweth every one of us in all the doings of his life, to have an eie to his calling. For he knoweth with how great unquietnesse mans wit boileth, with how skipping lightnesse it is carried hither and thither, how greedie his ambition is to hold divers things at once. Therefore that all things should should not be confounded with our folly and rashnesse, he hath appointed to every man his ducie in severall kindes of life. And that no man rashly run beyond his bounds, hee hath named all such kinds of life, vocations. Therefore every mans severall kind of life is unto him as it were his standing appointed him by God, that they should not all their life uncertainly wander about. And this division is so necessarie, that all our doings are measured thereby in his sight, and oftentimes, contrarie to the judgement of mans reason and Philosophie. There is no deed accounted more noble, even among the Philosophers, than for a man to deliver his countrey from tyrannie: by the voice of Gods judgement, the private man is openly condemned that layeth hand upon a tyrant. But I will not carrie upon the rehearsing of examples. It is sufficient if we know that the calling of the Lord is in every thing the beginning and foundation of well doing: to which he that doth not direct himselfe, shall never keepe a right way in his doings. He may peradventure sometime doe somewhat seeming worthy of praise: but whatsoever that be in the sight of men, before the throne of God it shall be rejected: moreover there shall be no convenient agreement in the parts of his life. Therefore our life shall then be best framed, when it shall be directed to this marke: For then, no man carried with his owne rashnesse will attempt more than his calling may beare, because hee knoweth that it is not lawfull to passe beyond his bounds. He that shall bee a man of base estate, shall contentedly live a private life, lest he should forsake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Again this shall be no small reliefe to cares, labours, griefes and other burdens, when a man shall know that in all these things, God is his guide. The more willingly the magistrate will execute his office: the householder will binde himselfe to his duty: every man in his kinde of life will beare and passe through the discomforts, cares, tediousnesse, and anguishes thereof: when they are perswaded that every mans burden is laid upon him by God. Hereupon also shall grow singular comfort, forasmuch as there shall be no worke so filthie and vile, (if it be such a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it shineth and is most precious in the sight of God.

the last rule and the best direction for the guidance of all Christians who are incident into this life.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

Of the justification of Faith, and first of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I thinke I have already sufficiently declared before, how there remaineth for men being accursed by the law only one helpe to recover salvation: againe, what Faith is, and what benefits of God it bestoweth upon man, and what fruits it bringeth forth in him. The summe of all was this, that Christ is given us by the goodnesse of God and conceived and possessed of us by Faith, by partaking of whom we receive principally two graces: the first, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie, we may now in steed of a Judge have a mercifull Father in heaven: the second, that being sanctified by his spirit, we may give our selves to innocencie, and purenesse of life. As for regeneration, which is the second grace, we have already spoken of it as much as seemed to be sufficient. The manner of justification was therefore lesse touched, because it served well for our purpose, first to understand both how the Faith by which alone we receive freely given righteousness by the mercie of God, is not idle from good workes: and also what be the good workes of the holy ones, whereupon part of this question entreateth. Therefore they are first to be thoroughly discussed, and so discussed that we must remember that this is the chiefe stay of upholding religion, that wee may bee the more careful and heedfull about it. For unless thou first know, in what state thou art with God, and what his judgement is of thee: as thou hast no ground to stablish thy salvation, so hast thou also none to raise thy reverent feare toward God. But the necessity of this knowledge shall better appear by knowledge of it selfe.

2. But that we stumble not at the first entrie, (which wee should doe if wee should enter disputation of a thing unknowen) let us first declare what is meant by these speeches, Man to be justified before God. To be justified by Faith or by workes. Hee is said to bee justified afore God, that is pronounced by the judgement of God both just and accepted for his owne righteousness sake. For as wickednesse is abominable before God

God, so a sinner cannot finde favour in his eyes, in respect that he is a sinner, or so long as he is accounted such a one. Therefore wheresoever sinner is, there also appeareth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is justified that is not accounted in the place of a sinner, but of a just man, and by reason thereof he standeth fast before the Judgement seat of God, when all sinners fall. As if an Innocent be brought to be arraigned before the seat of a righteous Judge, when judgment is given according to his innocencie, he is said to be justified before the Judge: so hee is justified before God, that being exempt out of the number of sinners, hath God a witness and affirmer of his righteousness. Therefore after the same manner a man shall be said to be justified by works, in whose life there is found such cleanness and holinesse, as may deserve the testimonie of righteousness before the throne of God: or he that with the uprightnesse of his works is able to answer and satisfie Gods judgement. Contrariwise, he shall be said to be justified by faith, that being excluded from the righteousness of works, doth by faith take hold of the righteousness of Christ: wherewith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the sight of God, not as a sinner, but as righteous. So we simply expound justification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiving us into favour, taketh us for righteous. And we say that the same consisteth in forgiveness of finnes, and imputation of the righteousness of Christ.

3. For confirmation hereof there are many and evident testimonies of Scripture. First it cannot be denied, that this is the proper and most used signification of the word. But because it is too long to gather all the places and compare them together, it shall be enough to put the Readers in minde of them, for they may of themselves easily marke them. But I will bring forth some, where this justification that wee speake of is expressly entreated of by name. First, where Luke saith, that the people when they had heard Christ, did justifie God: And where Christ pronounceth, that wisdome is justified by her children: he doth not meane there, that they doe give righteousness, which alway remaineth perfect with God, although all the world goe about to take it away from him: nor in this place also to make the doctrine of salvation righteous, which hath ever that of it selfe. But both these speeches are as much in effect, as to give to God and his doctrine the praise that they deserve. Again, when Christ reproacheth the Pharisees, that they justifie themselves, he doth not meane that they obtaine righteousness by well doing, but doe vaine-gloriously seeke for the fame of righteousness, whereof indeed they be void. They that are skilfull of the Hebrew tongue doe better understand the sense of this phrase: in which tongue they are not onely called wicked doers, that are guilty in their conscience of any wicked doing, but also they that come in danger of judgement or condemnation. For when Berabe saith that she and Salomon shall be wicked doers, she doth not therein acknowledge any offence, but complaineth that she and her sonne shall be put to shame, to be numbred among the reprobate and condemned. But by the processe of the text it easily appeareth, that the same word in Latine also, cannot otherwise be taken but by way of relation, and not to signifie any qualitie. But as concerning the matter that wee are now in hand with: where Paul saith, that the Scripture did fore-see, that God justifieth the Gentiles by faith, what may a man understand thereby but that God doth impute righteousness by faith: Again when he saith, that God justifieth the wicked man that is of the faith of Christ, what meaning can be thereof, but by the benefit of faith to deliver them from the damnation which their wickednesse deserved? And yet he speaketh more plainly in the conclusion, when he crieth out thus; Who shall accuse Gods elect? It is God that justifieth, who shall condemne? It is Christ that died, yea that rose againe, and now maketh intercession for us. It is as much in effect as if hee should say, Who shall accuse them whora God acquiteth? Who shall condemne them whose Patron Christ is, and defendeth them? To justifie therefore is nothing else, than to acquit him that was accused, from guiltinesse, as allowing his innocencie. Sith therefore God doth justifie us by the intercession of Christ, he doth acquit us, not by allowance of our owne innocencie, but by imputation of righteousness, that we may be counted for righteous in Christ, which are not righteous in our selves. So in the 13. Chapter of the Acts, in Pauls Sermon: by him is forgiveness of finnes preached unto you, and every one that beleeveeth in him is justified from all those things, from which you could not be justified in the Law of Moser. You see that after forgiveness of finnes, justification is added in place of an exposition. You see plainly that it is taken for absolution, you see that it is taken away from the workes of the Law, you see that it is the meere beneficiall gift of Christ, you see that it is received by Faith. Finally, you see that there is a satisfaction spoken of, where he saith that we are justified from finnes by Christ. So when it is said that the Publicane came justified out of the Temple, we cannot say that he obtained righteousness by any deserving of works. This therefore is said, that after pardon of his finnes obtained, he was counted for righteous before God. He was therefore righteous, not by approving of works, but by Gods free absolution. Wherefore Ambrose sayeth very well, that calleth the confession of finnes a lawfull justification.

Justification expressed in Scripture by acceptation into favour, defined by pardon, opposite unto guiltines, contemned in the name of reconciliation.
Rom 3. 24.
Rom. 4. 6.

4 But to leave striving about the word: if we looke upon the thing it selfe, as it is described unto us, there shall remaine no more doubt. For truly Paul doth expresse justification by the name of acceptation, when he saith (Ephes. 1. 5.) we are appointed unto adoption by Christ, according to the good pleasure of God, unto the praise of his glorious favour, whereby he hath accounted us acceptable or in favour. For the same is meant by it that is said in another place, that God doth freely justify. In the 4. Chapter to the Romanes, he first calleth it an imputation of righteousness, and sticketh not to say that it consisteth in forgiveness of finnes. That man (said he) is called of David a blessed man, to whom God accounteth or imputeth righteousness without works, as it is written: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, &c. Truly he there doth in-treat not of one part of justification, but of all justification wholly. And he testifieth that David in that place maketh a definition of justification, when he pronounceth that they are blessed to whom is given free forgiveness of finnes. Whereby appeareth that this righteousness: whereof he speaketh, is in comparison simply set as contrarie to guiltinesse. But for this purpose, that is the best place where he teacheth that this is the summe of the message of the Gospell, that we should be reconciled to God: because it is his will to receive us into favor through Christ, in not imputing sins unto us. Le: the Readers diligently weigh all the whole proceffe of the text. For by & by after, where he addeth by way of exposition, that Christ which was without sinne was made sinne for us, to expresse the maner of reconciliation, doubtlesse he meaneth nothing else by the word reconciling but justifying. And that which he saith in another place, that we are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, could not stand together, unlesse we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without our selves.

2. Cor. 5. 18.

Rom. 5. 19.

Osiander opinion concerning justification.

5 But where as Osiander hath brought in, I wote not what monster of essentiall righteousness, whereby, although his will was not to destroy free righteousness, yet he hath wrapped it within such a mist, as darkeneth godly mindes, and bereaveth them of the earnest feeling of the grace of Christ: therefore ere I passe further to other things, it is worth the labour to confute this doting error. First this speculation is but of meere & hungry curiositie. He doth in deede heape together many testimonies of Scripture, to proove that Christ is one with us, and we one with him, which needeth no proove: but because he keepeth not this bond of unitie, he suareth himselfe. But we which hold that we are made all one with Christ by the power of his spirit, may easily undoe all his knots. He had conceived a certaine thing very neare to the opinion of Manicheus, to desire to convey the substance of God into men. Hereupon riseth another invention of his that Adam was fashioned after the Image of God, because even before the fall Christ was ordained the paterne of the nature of man. But because I would be short, I will carry upon the matter that I have presently in hand. He saith that we are one with Christ. We graunt. But we deny that the substance of Christ is mingled with ours. Moreover wee say that this principle, that Christ is righteousness to us, because hee is an eternall God, the fountaine of righteousness and the very selfe righteousness of God, is wrongfully drawn to defend his deceites. The Readers shall pardon me, if I doe now but touch these things that the order of teaching requireth to be deferred unto another place. But although he excuse himselfe from meaning nothing else by the name of essentiall righteousness, but to resist this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Christs sake: yet he plainly expresseth that he is not contented with that righteousnesse that is purchased for us by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, but saigneth that we are substantially righteous in God, as well by substance as by qualitie powred into us. For this is the reason why he so earnestly affirmeth, that not onely Christ, but also the Father & the holy Ghost do dwell in us. Which although I grant to be true, yet I say that he wrongfully wresteth it. For he should have considered the manner of dwelling, that is, that the Father and the holy Ghost are in Christ, and as the fullnesse of the Godhead dwelleth in him, so do we possess whole God in him. Therefore all that he saith severally of the Father and the holy Ghost, tendeth to no other end but to draw the simple from Christ. And then he thrusteth in a mixture of substances, whereby God powring himselfe into us, doth make us as it were a part of himselfe. For he reckoneth it almost a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost, that we grow into one with Christ, and that he is our head and we his members, unless his very substance be mingled with us. But in the Father and the holy Ghost (as I have said) he doth more openly bewray what he thinketh, even this, that we be justified not by the onely grace of the Mediator, and that righteousnesse is not simply or perfectly offered us in his person, but that we are made partakers of the righteousnesse of God, when God is essentially made one with us.

6 If he did say no more, but that Christ in justifying us, is by essentiall conjoyning made ours: and that not onely he is our head, in that he is man, but also that the substance of the divine nature is powred into us: He should wish lesse hurt feede himselfe daintily, and peradventure so great a contention should not have bene raised for this doting error. But such this beginning is like a cuttle that with casting out of blacke and thicke blood hideth her many tail'es, we must needes earnestly resist unless we will wittingly and willingly suffer that righteousnesse to be taken from us, which only bringeth us confidence to glory of salvation. For in all this discourse, the name of righteousnesse, and this word justifying, extend to two parts: that to be justified is not only to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to be made righteous, that righteousnes is not a free imputation but a holinesse and uprightnesse, which the substance of God remaining in us doth breath into us. Then he stoutly denieth, that Christ is our righteousnesse in respect that being a Priest he did with sacerdotally purging sinnes appease his Father toward us; but in respect that he is eternall God and life. To prove that first point, that God doth justifie not onely by forgiving but also by regenerating, he asketh whether God doth leave them whom he doth justifie, such as they were by nature, chaunging nothing of their vices. The answer hereof is very easie: that as Christ cannot be torne in parts, so these two things which we together and joyndly receive in him, that is to say righteousnesse and sanctification, are inseparable. Therefore whomsoever God receiveth into favour, he doth also therewithall give them the spirit of adoption, by the power whereof he newly fashioeneth them after his image. But if the brightnesse of the Sunne cannot be severed from the heate thereof, shall we therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heate? There is nothing more fit for this purpose, than this similitude, The Sunne with his heate giveth life and fruitfulnessse to the earth, with his beames he giveth light and brightnesse. Here is a mutuall and inseparable conjoyning: yet reason forbiddeth to convey to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurditie is in this confusion of two sortes of graces, that Oslander trusteth in. For because God doth in deed renew them to the observing of righteousnesse whom he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore Oslander confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptation, and affirmeth that they be all one and the selfe same thing. But the Scripture joyning them both together, yet doth distinctly reckon them, that the manifold grace of God may the better appeare unto us. For that saying of Paul is not superfluous, that Christ was given us unto righteousnesse and sanctification. And whensoever he reasoneth to prove by the salvation purchased for us by the fatherly love of God, and by the grace of Christ, that we are called to holinesse and cleannesse, he plainly declareth, that it is one thing to be justified, and another to be made new creatures. But when Oslander commeth to the Scripture, he corrupteth as many places as he alleadgeth. Where Paul saith that Faith is accounted for righteousnesse to him that worketh not, but beleeueth in him that iustifieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With like rashnesse, he depraveth all the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, and sticketh not with like false colour to corrupt that place, which I even now alledged, Who shall accuse the elects of God? it is God that iustifieth: where it is plaine that he speaketh simply of guiltines & acquiting, and the meaning of the Apostle hangeth upon a comparing of contraries. Therefore Osiander is found too fond a babler, as well in that reason as in alledging the testimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doth he speake of the name of righteousnes, in saying that Faith was accounted to Abraham for righteousnes, after that embracing Christ (which is the righteousnes of God and God himselfe) he excelled in singular vertues, whereby appeareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteousnes that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole course of his calling: but rather the holy Ghost testified, that although the vertues of Abraham were singularly excellent, & that with long continuance he at length had encreased them: yet he did no other way please God, but by this, that he received by faith the grace offered in the promise. Whereupon followeth, that in justification there is no place for workes, as Paul very well affirmeth.

7 As for this that Osiander objecteth, that the power of justifying is not in Faith of it selfe, but in respect that it receiveth Christ, I willingly graunt it. For if Faith did iustifie of it selfe, or by inward force, as they call it, and as it is alway feeble and imperfect, it could not worke justification but in part; so should the justification be raymed, that should give us but a piece of salvation. As for us, we imagine no such thing, but in proper speaking do say that God onely iustifieth: and then we give the same to Christ, because he was given us unto righteousnesse: and Faith we compare as it were to a vessel. For except we came emptie with open mouth of our Soule to crave the grace of Christ, we cannot be able to receive Christ. Whereupon we gather that we doe not take from Christ the power of justifying, when we teach that he is first received by Faith, before that his righteousnesse be received. But yet I doe not admit the crooked figures of this Sophister, when he saith that faith is Christ: as if an earthen pot were a treasure, because gold is hidden in it. For the reason is not unlike, but that Faith although it be by it selfe of no worthinesse or price, may iustifie us in bringing Christ, as a pot full of money maketh a man rich. Therefore I say that Faith, which is onely the instrument to receive righteousnes, is unfitly mingled with Christ which is the materiall cause and both Author and Minister of so great a benefit. Now is this doubt also dissolved. How this word Faith ought to be understood when we entreat of justification.

8 In the receiving of Christ he goeth further: for he saith, that the inward word is received by the ministration of the outward word, thereby to draw us from the priesthood of Christ, and the person of the Mediatour to his outward Godhead. As for us, we divide not Christ, but we say that he is the same eternall word of God, which reconciling us to God in his flesh, gave us righteousnes: and we confesse that other wise he could not have fulfilled the office of Mediator, and purchased us righteousnesse, unless he had bene eternall God. But this is Osianders doctrine, whereas Christ is both God and man, that he was made righteousnesse to us, in respect of his nature of Godhead, and not of manhood. But if this properly belong to the Godhead, then it shall not be peculiar to Christ, but common with the Father and the holy Ghost, for as much as there is not one righteousnesse of the one, and another of the other. Moreover, that which was naturally from eternitie, could not be conveniently said to be made to us. But although we grant this, that God was made righteousnes for us: how shall it agree, that that which is set betweene, is made of God? Truly that properly belongeth to the person of the Mediator: which though he containe in himselfe the nature of Godhead, yet here he is specially signified by his proper title, by which he is severally discerned from the Father and the holy Ghost. But he foolishly triumpheth in that one word of Hieremie, where he promiseth that the Lord Jehovah shall be our righteousnesse, but out of that he shall gather nothing, but that Christ which is righteousnesse, is God openly shewed in the flesh. In another place we have rehearsed out of Pauls sermon, that God purchased to himselfe the Church with his blood, if any man gather thereupon, that the blood wherewith sins were purged was divine, and of the nature of Godhead, who can abide so foule an error? But Oslander thinketh that with this so childish a cavillation he hath gotten all things, he swelleth, he leapeth for joy, and stuffeth many leaves full with his bigge words: when yet there is a plaine and readie solution for it, in saying that the word Jehovah, indeed when he is made the issue of David, shall be the righteousness of the godly: But Esay teacheth in what sense, saying: My just servant shall with knowledge of himselfe justifie many. Let us note that the Father speaketh: that he giveth to the Sonne the office of justifying: he addeth a cause, for that he is just, and setteth the manner or meane as they call it in the doctrine whereby Christ is known. For it is a more commodious exposition to take this word Daab knowledge passively. Hereupon I gather first that Christ was made righteousness when he did put on the forme of a servant: secondly, that he did justifie us in respect that he shewed himselfe obedient to his Father: and that therefore he doth not this for us according to his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of dispensation committed unto him. For although God alone is the fountaine of righteousness, and we be made righteous by no other meanes but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by unhappie disagreement estranged from his righteousness, we must needs come downe to this lower remedy, that Christ may justifie us with the force of his death and resurrection.

9 If he object that this is a worke of such excellencie, that it is above the nature of man, and therefore cannot be ascribed but to the nature of God, the first I grant: but in the second I say that he is unwisely deceived. For although Christ could neither cleanse our Soules with his blood, nor appease his Father with his sacrifice, nor acquite us from guiltinesse, nor doe the office of a Priest, unlesse he had bene true God, because the strength of the flesh had bene too weake for so great a burden: yet it is certaine that he performed all these things according to his nature of manhood. For if it be demanded how we be justified, Paul answereth, by the obedience of Christ. But did he any otherwise obey than by taking upon him the shape of a servant? whereupon we gather that righteousness was given us in his flesh. Likewise in the other words (which I marvell that Oslander is not ashamed to alleadge so often) he appointeth the fountaine of righteousness no where else but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knew no sinne he made sinne for us, that we might be the righteousness of God in him. Oslander with full mouth advanceth the righteousness of God, and triumpheth as though he had proved that it is his imaginative ghost of essentiall righteousness: when the words sound farre otherwise, that we be righteous by the cleansing made by Christ. Very young beginners should not have bene ignorant that the righteousness of God is taken for the righteousness that God alloweth, as in John, where the glory of God is compared with the glory of men. I know that sometime it is called the righteousness of God, whereof God is the Authour and which God giveth us: but though I say nothing, the Readers that have their sound wit, doe perceive that nothing else is meant in this place, but that we stand upright before the judgement seate of God, being vpholden by the cleansing sacrifice of Christs death. And there is not so great importance in the word, so that Oslander doe agree with us in this point, that we are justified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propitiatorie sacrifice for us, which cannot agree with his nature of Godhead. After which sort, when Christ meaneth to seale the righteousness and salvation that he hath brought us, he setteth before us an assured pledge thereof in his flesh. He doth in deede call himselfe the lively bread, but expressing the manner here, he addeth that his flesh is verily meate, and his bloud is verily drinke. Which manner of teaching is seene in the Sacraments, which although they direct our Faith to whole Christ, and not to halfe Christ, yet they doe therewithall teach that the matter of righteousness and salvation remaineth in his flesh: Not in that that he is only man, he either justifieth or quickeneth himselfe, but because it pleased God to shew openly in the Mediator that which was hidden and incomprehensible in himselfe. Whereupon I am wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountaine set open for us, out of which we may draw that which otherwise should without fruite lie hidden in that close and deepe spring that riseth up unto us in the person of the Mediator. In this manner and meaning, I doe not deny that Christ as he is God and man doth justifie us, and that this is also the worke of the Father and the

the holy Ghost as well as his. Finally, that the righteousnesse whereof Christ maketh us partakers, is the eternall righteousnesse of the eternall God, so that he yeeld to the sure and plaine reasons that I have alleadged.

10 Now that he should not with his cavillations deceive the unskilfull, I grant that we want this incomparable benefice, till Christ be made ours. Therefore we see that conjoyning of the head and the members, the dwelling of Christ in our hearts, and that mysticall union, in the highest degree: that Christ being made ours, may make us partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endued. Therefore we doe not behold him a farre off out of our selves, that righteousnesse may be imputed unto us, but because we have put on him, and are grafted into his body: finally because he hath vouchsafed to make us one with him, therefore we glory that we have a fellowship of righteousnesse with him. So is *Osfander*s slanderous cavillation confuted, where he saith that we count Faith righteousnesse, as though we spoiled Christ of his right, when we say that we come by Faith empiric to him, to give roome to his grace, that he onely may fill us. But Osfander refusing this spirituall conjoyning, enforceth a grosse mingling with the faithfull, and therefore he odiously calleth all them Zwinglians that subscribe not to his fantasticall error, concerning essentiall righteousnesse: because they doe not thinke that Christ is substantially eaten in the Lords Supper. As for me, I count it a great glory to be so reproched of a proud man and given to his owne errors. Albeit he touched not me onely, but also other writers well known to the world, whom he ought to have modestly revered. It moveth me nothing, which meddle not with mine own private cause: and so much the more sincerely I handle this cause, being free from all corrupt affection. Whereas therefore he so importunately requireth essentiall righteousnesse, and the essentiall dwelling of Christ in us, it tendeth to this end: first that God should with a grosse mixture poure himselfe into us, as he feigned a fleshly eating of Christ in the Supper: secondly that God should breath his righteousnesse into us, whereby we may be really righteous with him: for by his opinion, this righteousnesse is as well God himselfe, as the goodnesse or holinesse, or purenesse of God. I will not spend much labour in wiping away the testimonies that he bringeth, which he wrongfully wresteth from the heavenly life unto this present state. Through Christ (saith Peter) are given us the precious and most great promises, that we should be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we were now such as the Gospell promised that we shall be at the last coming of Christ: yea John telleth us, that we shall then see God as he is, because we shall be like unto him. Onely I thought good to give a small tast to the readers, that I doe of purpose passe over these trifles: not for that it is hard to confute them, but because I will not be tedious in a superfluous worke.

11 But in the second point lurketh more poison, where he teacheth that we are righteous together with God. I thinke I have already sufficiently proved, that although this doctrine were not so pestilent, yet because it is cold and fruitlesse, and of it selfe so vaine that it melteth away, it ought worthily to be unfavoury to sound and godly Readers. But this is an intolerable wickednesse, under pretence of double righteousnesse, to enfeeble the earnest assurance of salvation, and to carie us above the cloudes, that we should not embrace by Faith the grace of propitiation, and call upon God with quiet mindes. Osfander scorneth them, that teach that this word Justifying is a law terme: because, we must be righteous indeede. And he abhorreth nothing more than to say, that we be justified by free imputation. But, if God do not justifie us by acquiting and pardoning, what meaneth that saying of Paul, God was in Christ reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes? For, him that had done no sinne, he made sinne for us, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. First I winne thus much, that they be judged righteous that be reconciled to God. The manner how is declared, for that God justifieth by forgiving, as in another place justification is set as contrarie to accusation, which comparing of them as contraries, doth clearly shew that it is a phrase borrowed from the use of the law. And there is no man being but meanely practised in the Hebrew tongue, if he have a sober braine, that is ignorant that this phrase came from thence, and whereunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Now where Paul saith that David deseribed the righteousnesse without works, in these words, Blessed are those whose finnes are forgiven: Let Osiander answer me whether this be a full definition or but halfe a one. Truly Paul bringeth not in the Prophet for a witnesse, as though he taught that forgivenesse of finnes is but a part of righteousnesse; or a thing that joyneth with other to the justifying of man: But he includeth whole righteousnesse in free forgivenesse, pronouncing the man blessed, whose finnes are covered, to whom God hath forgiven iniquities, and to whom he imputeth no transgressions. He doth measure and judge such a mans felicitie thereby, because he is not this way righteous indeede, but by imputation. Osiander taketh exception and saith, that this should be slanderous to God, and contrary to his nature, if he should justifie them that indeede remaine still wicked. But we must remember, as I have already said, that the grace of justifying is not severed from regeneration although they be severall things. But because it is more than sufficiently known by experience, that there abide alwaies in the righteous some remnants of sinne, it must needs be that they be far otherwise justified than they be reformed into newnesse of life. For this latter point of reformation; God so beginneth in his elect, and throughout the whole course of their life, by little and little, and sometime slowly proceedeth in it, that they be alway before his seate in danger of death: But he justifieth them not by part-meale, but so that they may freely, as clothed with the purenesse of Christ, appeare in heaven. For no portion of righteousnesse could appease our consciences, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with us, because we be righteous in his sight without exception. Whereupon followeth, that the doctrine of justification is misturned, yea, overturned from the very foundation, when doubting is cast into mens mindes, when the assurance of salvation is shaken, when the free and dreadlesse invocation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquillitie with spirituall joy is not established. Whereupon Paul gathereth an argument by contraries, to prove, that the inheritance is not by the law. For by this meane faith should be made voide, which if it have respect to workes, is overchrowen, because none of the most holie shall therein finde whereupon to trust. This difference of justifying and regenerating (which two things Osiander confounding together, calleth two sorts of righteousnesse) is very well expressed by Paul: for speaking of his reall righteousnesse indeede, or of the uprightnesse wherewith he was endued (which Osiander nameth essentiall righteousnesse) he lamentably crieth out: Wretch that I am: who shall deliver me from the bodie of this death? But flying to the righteousnesse which is grounded upon the onely mercie of God, he gloriously triumpheth over both life, death, reproches, hunger, sword, and all adversities. Who shall accuse the elects of God whom he justifieth? For I am surely perswaded, that nothing shall sever us from his love in Christ. He plainly publisheth, that he hath the righteousnesse which alone fully sufficeth to salvation before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himselfe, did a little before bewaile his estate, may not minish nor any way hinder his boldnesse to glorie. This diversities sufficiently knowen, and so familiar to all the holie ones, that grone under the burden of iniquities, and yet with victorious confidence, do mount up above all feares. As for this that Osiander objecteth, that it disagreeeth with the nature of God, it falleth upon himselfe. For although he clotheth the holie ones with a double righteousnesse as it were with a furred garment, yet he is compelled to confesse that without forgivenesse of finnes, they never pleased God. If that be true, then at least let him graunt, that they which are not righteous indeed, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But how far shall a sinner extend this free acceptation that is put in place of righteousnesse; shall he measure it by the pound or by the ounce? Truly he shall hang doubtfull and wavering to this side and that side, because he may not take unto him so much righteousnesse as shall be necessarie to stablish confidence. It is happie that he that would binde God to a law, is not judge of this cause. But this shall stand stedfast, that thou maiest be justified in thy sayings and overcome when thou art judged. But how great presumption is it to condemne the chiefe judge when he freely acquiteth, that this answer he may not be in force, I will have mercie upon whom I will have mercie. And yet the intercession of Moses which God did put to silence with this saying, tended not to this end that he should should spare none, but that he should acquite together, taking away their condemnation although they were guiltie of offence. And we doe say that they which were lost, have their finnes buried and so are justified before God: because, as God hateth sinne, so he can love none but them whom he justifieth. But this is a marvellous manner of justifying, that they being covered with the righteousness of Christ, stand not in feare of the judgement which they have deserved, and when they worthily condemne themselves, are accounted righteous without themselves.

12 But the Readers are to be warned, that they take good hæede to the myserie which he braggeth that he will not hide from them. For after that he hath long and largely travailed to prove, that we doe not obtaine favour with God by the onely imputation of the righteousness of Christ, because this should be impossible for him to count them for righteous that are not righteous, (I use his owne words) at length he concludeth that Christ was given us unto righteousness, not in respect of his nature of manhood, but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteousness cannot be found but in the person of the Mediatour, yet it is the righteousness not of man but of God, he doth now binde his rope made of two righteousnesses, but he plainly taketh away the office of justifying from Christs nature of manhood. But it is good to see how he disagreeeth. It is said in the same place, that Christ was made unto us wisdom, which belongeth to none but to the eternall word. Therefore Christ in that he is man is not wisdom. I answer that the onely begotten sonne of God was indeede his eternall wisdom, but in Pauls writings that name is given him in divers wise, because all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are laid up in him. That therefore which he had with his Father, he disclosed unto us: and so that which Paul saith is not referred unto the essence of the Sonne of God, but to our use, and is rightly applied to Christs nature of manhood: because although he shined a light in darkness, before that he did put on flesh, yet it was a hidden light till the same Christ came forth in the nature of man, the shining Sonne of righteousness, which therefore calleth himselfe the light of the world. Also it is foolishly objected of him, that the power of justifying is far above both Angels and men: for as much as this hangeth not upon the worthinesse of any creature, but upon the ordinance of God. If Angels will take upon them to satisfie God, they can nothing prevaile, because they are not appointed thereunto. But this singularly belonged to Christ being man, which was made subject to the law, to redeeme us from the curse of the law. Also he doth slanderously cavill, that they which denie that Christ is our righteousness according to his nature of Godhead, doe leave but one part of Christ, and (which is worse) doe make two Gods, because although they confesse, that God dwelleth in us, yet they say againe that we are not righteous by the righteousness of God. For although we call Christ the author of life, in respect that he suffered death to destroy him that had the power of death, we do not by and by take away that honour from whole Christ as he was openly shewed God in the flesh, but we onely make a distinction how the righteousness of God is conveyed unto us, that we may enjoy it. In which point Oslander hath too fowly erred. Neither doe we denie that that which is openly given us in Christ, proceedeth from the secret grace and power of God: and we strive not against this, that the righteousness which Christ giveth us is the righteousness of God that proceedeth from God: but we hold this stedfastly, that we have righteousness and life in the death and resurrection of Christ. I overpasse that heaping together of places whereof he may well be ashamed, wherewith he hath tediously combred the Readers without choise and without common reason, to prove that wherefoever is made mention of righteousness, there ought to be understood this essentiall righteousness. As where David calleth upon the righteousness of God to helpe him: whereas he doth in summe above an hundred times, Oslander sticketh not to corrupt so many sentences. And nothing stronger is the other objection, that that is properly and rightly called righteousness, whereby we be moved to do rightly, but that God only worketh in us both to will and to performe. For we doe also not denie, but that God reformeth us with his spirit unto holinesse of life and righteousness: but we must first see whether he doe this by himselfe and immediately, or by the hand of his Sonne, with whom he hath left all the fulnesse of his holy spirit, that with his abundant store he should supply the neede of his members. Moreover, although righteousnesse come unto us out of the secret fountaine of the Godhead, yet it followeth not that Christ which sanctified himselfe in the flesh for our sakes, was righteousnesse unto us according to his nature of Godhead. No lesse fond is that which he saith, that Christ himselfe was righteous by the righteousnesse of God. Because unlesse the will of his Father had moved him, he could not himselfe have satisfied the office committed unto him. For though we have in another place said, that all the deservings of Christ himselfe doe procede from the meere good will of God, yet that maketh nothing to that fantastical thing, wherewith Oslander bewitcheth both his owne and simple mens eies. For who would suffer a man to gather this conclusion, that because God is the fountaine and beginning of our righteousnesse, therefore we be essentially righteous, and the essence of Gods righteousnesse dwelleth in us? In redeeming the Church (saith Esay) God did put on his righteousnesse as a harnesse: but did he so to spoyle Christ of his armour which he had given him, to make him to be no perfect redeemer? But the Prophet meant nothing else but that God borrowed nothing out of himselfe, nor was holpen by any aid to redeeme us. Which thing Paul briefly expressed in other words, saying, that he gave us salvation to the shewing of his righteousnesse. But this doeth not overthrow that which he teacheth in another place, that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally, whosoever wrappeth up a double righteousnesse, that poore soules may not rest in the meere onely mercie of God, he doeth in a mockerie crowne Christ with thornes.

13 But sofarre as a great part of men imagineth righteousnesse to be made of faith and works, let us first shew this also, that the righteousnesse of faith and works doe so differ, that when the one is established, the other must needs be overthrowen. The Apostle saith, that he esteemed all things as dung, that he might win Christ, and finde in him the righteousnesse that is of God by faith, counting not his righteousnesse that which is by the law, but that which is by the faith of Jesus Christ. You see that here is also a comparison of contraries, and that here is declared that he which will obtaine the righteousnesse of Christ, must forsake his owne righteousnesse. Therefore in another place he saith, that this was the cause of fall to the Jewes, that going about to establish their owne righteousnesse, they were not subject to the righteousnesse of God. In stablishing our owne righteousnesse we shake away the righteousnesse of God, therefore to obtaine Gods righteousnesse, our owne must be utterly abolished. And he sheweth the same thing, when he saith, that our glorying is not excluded by the law, but by faith. Whereupon followeth, that so long as there remaineth any righteousnesse of works, how little soever it be, there still remaineth to us some matter to glorie upon. Now if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteousnesse of works can no wise be coupled with the righteousnesse of faith. To this effect he speaketh so plainly in the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, that he leaveth no roome for cavillations or shifts: If (sayeth he) Abraham was justified by works, he hath glorie. And immediately he addeth: but he hath no glorie in the sight of God. It followeth therefore that he was not justified by works. Then he bringeth another argument by contraries, when reward is rendered to works, that is done of debt and not of grace. Therefore it is not of the deservings of works. Wherefore farewell their dreame, that imagine a righteousnesse made of faith and workes mingled together.

14 The Sophisters thinke that they have a subtle shift, that make to themselves sport and pastime with wresting of Scripture, and with vaine cavillations. For they expound worke in that place, to be those which men not yet regenerate do only literally, and by the endeavour of free will without the grace of Christ: and do say that it belongeth not to spirituall workes. So by their opinion a man is justified both by faith and by workes. So that the workes be not his owne, but the gifts of Christ and the fruites of regeneration. For they say that Paul spake so for none other cause, but to convince the Jewes, trusting upon their owne workes, that they did foolishly presume to claime righteousnesse to themselves, such the onely spirit of Christ doeth give it us, and not any endeavour by our owne motion of nature. But they do not marke that in the comparison of the righteousnesse of the law and the righteousnesse of the Gospell which

Paul bringeth in in another place, all workes are excluded with what title soever they be adorned. For he teacheth that this is the righteousnesse of the law, that he should obtaine salvation that hath performed that which the law commandeth: and that this is the righteousnesse of faith, if we belevee that Christ died and is risen againe. Moreover we shall hereafter shew in place fit for it, that sanctification and righteousnesse are severall benefites of Christ. Whereupon followeth, that the very spirituall workes comenot into the account, when the power of justifying is ascribed to Faith. And where Paul denieth (as I even now alledged) that Abraham had any thing whereupon to glory before God, because he was not made righteous by works: this ought not to be restrained to the literall and outward kind of vertues, or to the endeavour of free will. But although the life of the Patriarch Abraham were spirituall and in manner Angelike, yet he had not sufficient deservings of works to purchase him righteousnesse before God.

15 The Schoolemen teach a little more grossly that mingle their preparations: but these doe lesse infect the simple and unskilfull with corrupt doctrine; under pretence of Spirit and grace hiding the mercie of God which onely is able to appease trembling consciences. But we confesse with Paul, that the doers of the Law are justified before God: but because we are all farre from the keeping of the Law, hereupon we gather, that the workes which should most of all have availed to righteousnesse, doe nothing help us because we lacke them. As for the common Papists or Schoolemen, they are in this point doubly deceived: both because they call Faith an assurednesse of conscience in looking for reward at the hand of God for deservings, and also because they expound the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteousnesse, but the Holy Ghost helping to the endeavour of holinesse. They reade in the Apostle that he which commeth to God, must first belevee that there is a God, and then that he is a renderer of reward to them that seeke him. But they marke not what is the manner of seeking. And that they are deceived in the name of grace, is plainly proved by their owne writings. For Lombard expoundeth, that justification by Christ is given us two waies, First (saith he) the death of Christ doth justifie us, when by it charitie is stirred up in our hearts, by which we are made righteous. Secondly, that by the same death sinne is destroyed, whereby Satan held us captive, so that now he hath not whereby to condemne us. You see how he considereth the grace of God principally in justification, to be so far as we are directed to good workes by the grace of the Holy Ghost. He would forsooth have followed the opinion of Augustine: but he followeth him a far off, and goeth far out of the way from rightly following him: because if Augustine have spoken any thing plainly, he darkeneth it: if there be any thing in Augustine not very unpure, he corrupteth it. The Schoolemen have still strayed from worse to worse, till with headlong fall, at length they be rolled downe into a Pelagian error. And the very sentence of Augustine, or at least his manner of speaking is not altogether to be received. For though he singularly well taketh from man all praise of righteousnesse, and assigneth it wholly to the grace of God, yet he referreth grace to sanctification, whereby we are renewed into newnesse of life by the holy Ghost.

16 But the Scripture, when it speaketh of the righteousnesse of Faith, leadeth us to a far other end, that is to say, that turning away from the looking upon our owne workes, we should onely looke unto the mercie of God and perfection of Christ. For it teacheth this order of justification, that first God vouchsafeth to embrace man being a sinner with his meere and free goodnesse, considering nothing in him but miserie, whereby he may be moved to mercy, forasmuch as he seeth him altogether naked and void of good workes, fetching from himselfe the cause to do him good: then, that he moveth the sinner himselfe with feeling of his goodnesse, which despairing upon his owne works casteth all the summe of his salvation upon Gods mercy. This is the feeling of Faith, by which feeling the sinner commeth into possession of his salvation, when he acknowledgeth by the doctrine of the Gospell that he is reconciled to God: that obtaining forgiveness of finnes by meanes of the righteousnesse of Christ, he is justified: and although he be regenerate by the spirit of God, he thinketh upon continuall righteousness laid up for him, not in the good works to which he applieth himselfe, but in the onely righteousnesse of Christ. When these things shall be every one particularly weighed, they shall give a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in another order than they are set forth. But it maketh little matter, so that they hang together in such sort, that we may have the whole matter truly declared and surely proved.

The righteousnesse of Faith spoken of in Scripture turneth mens eyes from their owne workes to the free goodnes of God, which pardoneth sinne, and causeth sinners to seele the mercie whereby they are pardoned, and in Christ made righteous.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that wee have before said to be betwene faith and the Gospell: because it is said for this cause that faith justifieth, for that it receiveth and embraceth the righteousnesse offered in the Gospell. And whereas it is said to be offered by the Gospell, thereby all consideration of workes is excluded. Which thing Paul declareth many times elsewhere, but most plainly in two places. For, to the Romanes, comparing the law and the Gospell together he saith: the righteousnesse that is by the law is thus, The man that doth these things shall live in them. But the righteousnesse that is of faith offereth salvation, if thou beleeve in thy heart and confesse with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and that the father hath raised him up from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law and the Gospell, that the law giveth righteousnesse to workes, and the Gospell giveth free righteousnesse without helpe of workes? it is a notable place, and that may deliver us out of many hard doubts, if we understand that the same righteousnesse that is given us by the Gospell is free from all conditions of the law. This is the reason, why he doth more than once with great seeming of contrarietie, set the promise by way of opposition against the law, as if the inheritance be of the law, then it is not of the promise: and all the rest in the same chapter to the same effect. Truly the law it selfe hath also her promises. Therefore there must needs be in the promises of the Gospell, something different and divers from the promises of the law, unlesse we will confesse that the comparision is very fond. But what diversitie shall this be, unlesse it be that they are freely given, and upholden by the onely mercie of God, whereas the promises of the law hang upon the condition of workes? Neither let any man here carpe against me, and say, that in this place the righteousnesse is rejected, which men of their owne force and free will, would compell God to receive? for as much as Paul without exception teacheth that the law in commanding, profiteth nothing: because there is none not onely of the common multitude, but also of the perfectest, that fulfilleth it. Love undoubtedly is the chiefe point of the law: when the spirit of God frameth us unto it, why is it not to us a cause of righteousnesse, but for that even in the holie ones it is imperfect, and therefore of it selfe deserueth no reward.

18 The second place is this. It is manifest that no man is justified by the law before God: because the righteous man shall live by faith. But the law is not of faith: but the man that doth these things shall live in them. How could this argument otherwise stand together, unlesse we agree upon this point, that workes come nor into the account of faith, but are utterly to be severed from it? The law (saith he) differeth from faith. Why so? because workes are required to the righteousnesse thereof. Therefore it followeth that workes are not required to the righteousnesse of faith. By this relation it appeareth that they which are justified by faith, are justified beside the deserving of workes, yea without the deserving of workes, because faith receiveth that righteousnesse which the Gospell giveth. And the Gospell differeth from the law in this point, that it bindeth not righteousnesse to workes, but setteth it in the onely mercie of God. Like hereunto is that which he affirmeth to the Romanes, that Abraham had nothing to glorie upon, because faith was imputed to him unto righteousnesse, and he addeth a confirmation, because then there is place for the righteousnesse of faith, when there are no workes to which a reward is due. Where be workes (saith he) due reward is rendred unto them: that which is given to faith is freely given. For the very meaning of the words that he useth in that place serve to prove the same. Whereas he adjoyneth within a little after, that therefore we obtaine the inheritance by faith as according to grace, hereupon he gathered that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is received by faith: and how cometh that, but because faith without any helpe of workes leaneth wholly upon the mercy of God? And in the same meaning without doubt he teacheth in another place, that the righteousnesse of God was openly shewed without the law, although it hath witnesse borne of it by the law and the Prophets : because excluding the law, he saith, that it is not holpen by works, and that we obtaine it not by working, but come empirie that we may receive it.

19 By this time the Reader perceiveth with what equitie the Sophisters doe at this day cavill at our doctrine, when we say, that man is justified by faith onely. They dare not denie that man is justified by faith, because it is so often found in Scripture : but because this word, Onely, is never expressed, they cannot abide to have such an addition made. Is it so? But what will they answer to these words of Paul, where he affirmeth that righteousness is not of faith except it be freely given? How can free gift agree with works? And with what cavillations will they mock out, that which he saith in another place, that the righteousness of God is manifestly shewed in the Gospel? If righteousness be manifestly shewed in the Gospell, surely therein is contained not a torne or halfe righteousness, but full and perfect. Therefore the law hath no place therein. And they stand upon not onely a false but also a foolish shift about this exclusive word, Onely. Doeth not he perfectly enough give all things to onely faith, that taketh all things from works? What, I pray you meane these sayings, that righteousness was manifestly shewed without the law : that man is justified freely and without the works of the law? Heere they have a wittie shift to escape withall, which although they devise it not themselves, but borrowed it of Origen and certaine of the old writers, yet is very foolish. They prate that the ceremoniall works of the law, not the morall, are excluded. They profite so with continual brawling, that they know not the very first rules of Logike. Doe they thinke that the Apostle doted when he alleaged these places to prove his saying? The man that shall doe these things shall live in them : and, Cursed is every one that fulfilleth not all things that are written in the volume of the law. Unless they be mad, they will not say that life was promised to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curse threatned onely to the breakers of them. If these places be to be understood of the morall law, it is no doubt that the morall workes also are excluded from the power of justifying. To the same purpose serve these arguments that he useth : because the knowledge of sinne was by the law, therefore righteousness is not by the law. Because the law worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteousness. Because the law cannot make conscience assured, therefore also it cannot give righteousness. Because faith is imputed unto righteousness, therefore righteousness is not a reward of worke, but is given being not due. Because we are justified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off. If there had bin a law given that might give life, then righteousness were truly by the law : but God hath shut up all under sinne that the promise might be given to the beleivers. Let them now fondly say if they dare, that these things are spoken of ceremonies and not of maners : but very children would hisse out so great shamelesse. Therefore let us hold this for certaine, that the whole law is spoken of, when the power of justifying is taken away from the law.

20 But if any man marvaile why the Apostle useth such an addition, not being content with onely naming works : the reason is readie to be shewed for it. For, although works be so highly esteemed, yet they have that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast unto God of any righteousness of workes, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claime any reward as due unto them, but such as he hath promised? They have therefore this of the bountifullnesse of God, that they are counted worthie both of the name and reward of righteousness : and they be of value onely for this cause, when the purpose of him that doth them, is by them to shew his obedience to God. Wherefore the Apostle in another place, to prove that Abraham could not be justified by works, alleageth that the law was given almost foure hundred & thirty yeeres after the covenant made. Unlearned men would laugh at such an argument, because there might be righteous workes before the publishing of the law. But because he knew that there was no such value in works, but by the testimonie and vouchsafing of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confessed, that before the law they had no power to justifie. We understand why he namely expresseth the worke of the law, when he meaneth to take away justification from any workes because controversie may be mooved of those and none other.

Galat. 3. 7.

Albeit sometime he excepteth all works without any addition, as when he saith that by the testimonie of David, blessednes is assigned to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteousness without works. Therefore they can with no cavillations bring to passe, but that we shall get this generall exclusive only. And they do in vaine seeke that trifling subtletie, that we are justified by that only faith which worketh by love, so that righteousness must stand upon love. We graunt in deed with Paul, that no other faith justifieth, but that which is effectually working with charitie: but that faith taketh not her power of justifying from that effectualnesse of charitie. Yea it doth by no other meane justifie, but because it bringeth us into the communicating of the righteousness of Christ. Or else all that which the Apostle so earnestly presseth, should fall to nought. To him that worketh (saith he) the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to debt. But to him that worketh not, but beleeveth in him that justifieth the unrighteous, his faith is imputed unto righteousness. Could he speake more evidently than in so saying? that there is no righteousness of faith but where there are no works to which any reward is due: and that only then faith is imputed unto righteousness, when righteousness is given by grace that is not due.

21 Now let us examine how true that is, which is said in the definition, that the righteousness of faith is the reconciliation with God, which consisteth upon the only forgiveness of finnes. We must alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God resteth upon all men, so long as they continue to be sinners. That hath Ejaj excellently well set out in these words: The hand of the Lord is not shortned, that he is not able to save: nor his eare dilled that he cannot heare: but your iniquities have made disagreement betweene you and your God, and your finnes have hidden his face from you that he heareth you not. We heare that sinne is the division betweene man and God, and the turning away of Gods face from the sinner. Neither can it otherwise be. For it is disagreeing from his righteousness to have any fellowship with sinne. Wherefore the Apostle teacheth that man is enemy to God till he be restored into favour by Christ. Whom therefore the Lord receiveth into joining with him, him he is said to justifie: because he can neither receive him into favour, nor joyne him with himselfe, but he must of a sinner make him righteous. And we further say, that this is done by the forgiveness of finnes. For if they whom the Lord hath reconciled to himselfe be judged by their works, they shall be found still sinners in deede, who yet must be free and cleane from sinne. It is certaine therefore that they whom God embraceth, are no otherwise made righteous, but because they are cleansed by having the spots of their finnes wiped away by forgiveness, that such a righteousness may in one word be called the forgiveness of finnes.

22 Both these are most cleerely to be seene by these words of Paul, which I have already alleaged: God was in Christ reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing their finnes to man, and he hath left with us the word of reconciliation. And then he addeth the summe of his message, that him which knew no sinne he made sinne for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Here he nameth righteousness and reconciliation without difference, that we may perceive that the one is mutually contained under the other. And he teacheth the manner to ataine this righteousness to be, when our finnes are not imputed unto us. Wherefore doubt thou not hereafter how God doth justifie us, when thou hearest that he doth reconcile us to himselfe by not imputing finnes. So to the Rom.ines he prooveth by the testimonie of David, that righteousness is imputed to man without works, because David pronounceth the man blessed whose iniquities are forgiven, whose finnes are covered, to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without doubt by blessednesse he there meaneth righteousness. As sith he affirmeth the same to stand in the forgiveness of finnes, there is no cause why we should otherwise define it. Therefore Zacharie the father of John the Baptist singeth, that the knowledge of salvation consisteth in the forgiveness of finnes.

Which rule Paul following in his Sermon which he made to the Antiochians concerning the summe of salvation, as Luke reporteth it, concluded in this maner: By him forgiveness of finnes is preached unto you, and every one that beleeveth in him is justified from all these things, from which ye could not be justified in the lawe of Moses.

The Apostle so knitteth the forgivenesse of finnes with righteousnesse, that he sheweth that they be both all one. Whereupon he rightfully reasoneth that the righteousnesse is freely given unto us, which wee obtaine by the loving kindnesse of God. Neither ought it to seeme a strange unufed speech, that the faithfull are righteous before God, not by works, but by free acceptation: sith both it is so oft found in the Scripture, and the old Authors doe also sometime so speak. For Augustine saith thus in one place; The righteousnesse of the Saints in this world standeth rather in forgiveness of sins, than in perfection of vertues. Wherewith agreeth the notable sentence of Bernard: Not to sin is the righteousnesse of God: but the righteousnesse of man, is the mercifull kindnesse of God. He had before affirmed, that Christ is to us righteousnesse in absolution, and therefore that they only are righteous that have obtained pardon by mercy.

23. Hereupon also followeth this, that by the onely meane of Christs righteousnesse, we obtaine to be justified before God. Which is asmuch in effect as if it were said, that man is not righteous in himselfe, but because the righteousnesse of Christ is by imputation enterpartened with him, which thing is worthy to bee heedfully marked. For that trifling error vanisheth away, to say that man is therefore justified by faith, because faith taketh part of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is so contrary to the doctrine above taught, that they can never be made to agree together. For it is no doubt that he is void of his owne righteousnesse, that is taught to seeke righteousnesse without himselfe. This the Apostle affirmeth most plainly when he writeth that he which knew no sinne, was made for us a propitiatory sacrifice to cleanse away sinne, that we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. You see that our righteousnesse is not in us but in Christ, and that it belongeth to us onely by this title, because we be partakers of Christ, because we possesse all his riches with him. And it maketh nothing to the contrary that in another place he teacheth, that sinne was condemned of sinne in the flesh of Christ, that the righteousnesse of the Law might be fulfilled in us: where he meaneth no other fulfilling, but that which we obtaine by imputation. For the Lord Christ doth in such sort communicate his righteousnesse with us, that after a certaine marvellous manner, he powreth the force thereof into us, so much as pertaineth to the judgement of God. It appeareth that he did no otherwise meane, by the other sentence which he had spoken a little before. As by the disobedience of one man we were made sinners, so by the obedience of one man we are justified. What is it else to set our righteousnesse in the obedience of Christ, but to affirme that hereby onely we are accounted righteous, because the obedience of Christ is imputed unto us as if it were our owne? Therefore me thinkes that Ambrose hath excellently well shewed how there is an example of this righteousnesse in the blessing of Jacob. For Jacob having not of himselfe deserved the preeminence of the first begotten sonne, hid himselfe in the apparell of his brother, and being clothed with his brothers coate that favoured of a most sweete smell, he crept into the favour of his father, and received the blessing to his owne commoditie under the person of another: so we doe lie hidden vnder the precious purenesse of Christ our elder brother, that we may get a testimonie of righteousnesse in the sight of God. The words of Ambrose are these. Whereas Isaac smelt the favour of the garments, peradventure this is meant thereby, that we are not justified by workes but by faith: because fleshly weaknesse hindreth workes, but the brightnesse of faith which merith forgiveness of sins, overshadoweth the error of deeds. And truly so it is. For, that we may appeare before the face of God unto saluation, it is necessarie for us to smell sweetly with his odour, and to have our faults covered and barred with his perfection.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER.

That to the end we may be fully perswaded of the free justification, we must lift up our minds to the Judgement seat of God.

Although it appeareth by most evident testimonies, that all these things are true, yet we shall not clearly perceive how necessary they be, untill wee have set before our eyes those things that ought to be the grounds of all this disputation. First there-therefore let us remember this, that we purpose not to speake of the righteousness of a worldly iudiciall Court, but of the heavenly Judgement seat: that we should not measure by our owne small portion, by what uprightnesse of works Gods judgements may be satisfied. But it is marvellous to see with what rashnesse and boldnesse it is commonly debated. Yea and it isto be seene how none doe more boldly, or with fuller mouths (as the saying is) prate of the righteousness of works, than they that are either monstrously sicke of open outward diseases, or be ready to burst with inward vices. That commeth to passe because they thinke not upon the righteousness of God, whereof if they had never so little feeling, they would never make so great a mockery of it. And truly it is out of measure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be such and so perfect, that nothing be imputed unto it, but every way whole and absolute, and defiled with no uncleannesse: such as never was, and never shall bee able to be found in man. It is indeed easie and ready for every man in Schooles to talke vainly upon the worthinesse of works to justifie men: But when they come unto the sight of God, such dalliance must avoid, because there is earnest doing used, and no trifling strife about words. To this, to this I say, we must apply our minde, if we will profitably enquire of true righteousness, how may we answer the heavenly Judge when he calleth us to account. Let us thinke him to be a Judge, not such a one as our owne understandings doe of themselves imagine: but such a one as is painted out in the Scripture, with whose brightnesse the starres shall be darkned, by whose strength the hills doe melt away, by whose wrath the earth is shaken, by whose wisdom the wise are taken in their subtiltie, by whose purenesse all things are proved unpure, whose righteousness the Angels are notable to beare, which maketh the innocent not innocent, whose vengeance when it is once kindled, pierceth to the bottome of hell. If he (I say) sit to examine mens doings, who shall appeare assured before his throne? who shall dwell with a devouring fire? such the Prophet. Who shall abide with continuall burnings? he that walketh in righteousnesses, and speaketh truth, &c. But let such a one come forth, whatsoever hee be. But that answer maketh that none commeth forth. For this terrible saying foundeth to the contrary: Lord if thou marke iniquities, Lord, who shall abide it? truly all must needs immediatly perish, as it is written in another place: Shall man be justified if he be compared with God, or shall he be purer than his Maker? Behold, they that serve him are not faithfull, and he hath found perversnesse in his Angels. How much more shall they that dwell in houses of clay, and that have an earthly foundation, be consumed with moths: they shall bee cut downe from the morning to the evening. Behold among his Saints there is none faithfull, and the heavens are not cleane in his sight: how much more is man abominable and unprofitable, which drinketh iniquitie as water? I grant indeed that in the booke of Job is mention made of a righteousness that is higher than the keeping of the Law. And it is good to understand this distinction: because although a man did satisfie the law, yet he could not so stand to the triall of that righteousness that passeth all senses. Therefore although Job bee cleare in his owne conscience, yet he is amazed, and not able to speake, because he seeth that very Angell-like holinesse cannot appease God, if he exactly weigh their works. But I therefore will at this time overpasse that righteousness which I have spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but onely this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written Law, we are more than senselesse, if so many curses wherewith the Lord hath willed us to be awaked, doe not torment us with horrible feare, and among other this generall curse, Cursed is every one that doth not abide in all the things that are written in the Booke. Finally, all this discourse shall be but unavouiry and cold, unless every man yeeld himselfe guilty before the heavenly Judge, and willingly throw downe and abate himselfe, being carefull how he may be acquitted.

2. To this, to this I say, we should have lift up our eyes, to learne rather to tremble for feare, than vainly to rejoyce. It is indeed easie, so long as the comparison extendeth no further than men, for every man to thinke himselfe to have somewhat, which other ought not to despise. But when we rise up to have respect unto God; then suddenly that confidence falleth to the ground, and commeth to nought. And in the same case altogether is our soule in respect of God, as mans body is in respect of heaven. For the

the sight of the eye, so long as it continueth in veiwing things that lie neere unto it, doth shew of what piercing force it is, but if it bee once directed up to the Sunne, then being dazeled & dilled with the too great brightnesse thereof, it feeleth no lesse feeble-nesse of it selfe in beholding of the Sun, than it perceiveth strength in beholding inferiour things. Therefore let us not deceive our selves with vaine confidence, although we count our selves either equal or superiour to other men: but that is nothing to God by whose will this knowledg is to be tried. But if our wildenesse cannot be tamed with these admonitions, he will answer to us as he said to the Pharisees: you be they that iustifie your selves before men: but that which is high to men is abominable to God. Now goe thy way and proudly boast, of thy righteousnesse among men, while God from heaven abhorreth it. But what say the servants of God that are truly instructed with his Spirit? Enter not into judgement with thy servant, because every living man shall not be justified in thy sight. Another saith, although in somewhat divers meaning: Man cannot be righteous with God: if he will contend with him, he shall not be able to answer one for a thousand. Here we now plainly heare what is the righteousnesse of God, even such as can be satisfied with no works of men, to whom when it examineth us of a thousand offences, we cannot purge our selves of one. Such a righteousnesse had that same chosen instrument of God Paul conceived, when he professed that he knew himselfe guiltie in nothing, but that he was not thereby justified.

3. And not onely such examples are in the holy Scriptures, but also all godly writers doe shew that they were alway of this minde. So Augustine saith, All the godly that groane under this burden of corruptible flesh, and in this weaknesse of life have this onely hope, that we have one Mediator, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the appeasement for our finnes. What saith he? If this be their onely hope, where is the confidence of works? For when he calleth it only, he leaveth none other. And Bernard saith. And indeed where is life and stedfast rest and assurednesse for the weake, but in the wounds of our Saviour? and so much the surer I dwell therein as he is mightier to save. The world rageth, the body burdeneth, the devill lieth in wait: I fall not, because I am builded upon the sure rocke: I have sinned a grievous sinne, my conscience is troubled, but it shall not be overtroubled, because I shall remember the wounds of the Lord. And hereupon afterward he concludeth, Therefore my merit is the Lords taking of mercy, I am not utterly without merit, so long as he is not without mercies. But if the mercies of the Lord be many, then I also have as many merits. Shall I sing mine owne righteousnesse? Lord I will remember onely thy righteousnesse. For that is also my righteousnesse, for heis made unto me righteousnesse of God. Again in another place, This is the whole merit of man, if he put his whole hope in him that saveth whole man. Likewise where retaining peace to himselfe he leaveth the glory to God. To thee (saith he) let glory remaine undiminished: it shall be well with me if I have peace, I forswear glory altogether, lest I wrongfully take upon me that which is not mine own, I lose also that which is offered me. And more plainly in another place he saith: Why should the Church be carefull of merits, which hath a surer and a safer way to glory upon the purpose of God? So there is no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merits we hope for good things, specially when thou hearest in the Prophet, I will doe it not for your sakes, but for mine owne sake, saith the Lord. It sufficeth for merit, to know what merits suffice not. But as it sufficeth for merit not to presume of merits, so to be without merits sufficeth to judgement. Whereas he freely useth this word, merits, for good works, we must therein beare with the custome. But In the end his purpose was to make hypocrites afraid, that wildly range with licentiousnesse of sinning against the grace of God. As afterward he expoundeth himselfe, saying: Happy is the Church, that neither wanteth merits without presumption, nor presumption without merits. It hath whereupon to presume, but not merits. It hath merits, but to deserve, not to presume. Is not the very not presuming a deserving? Therefore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, having large matter to glory upon, even the many mercies of the Lord.

4. This is the truth. The exercised consciences perceive this to bee the onely sanctuarie of safety, wherein they may safely rest themselves when they have to do with the judgement of God. For if the starres that seemed most bright in the night season, doe lose their brightnesse with sight of the Sunne, what thinke we shall become even of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shall be compared with the purenesse of God? For that shall be a most severe examination, that shall pierce into the most hidden thoughts of the heart, and (as Paul saith) shall reveale the secrets of darknesse, and disclose the hidden things of the heart, which shall compell the lurking and unwilling conscience to utter all things that now are fallen out of remembrance. The devill our accuser will presse us, which is privie to all the wicked deeds that he hath moved us to doe. There the outward pompous shewes of good works which now onely are esteemed, shall nothing profit us. Onely the purenesse of will shall be required. Wherefore the hypocrisie, not onely whereby every man knowing himselfe guilty before God, desireth to goe off himselfe before men, but also wherewith every man deceiveth himselfe before God (as wee be all inclined to stroke and flatter our selves) shall fall downe confounded, howsoever it now be proud with more than drunken boldnesse. They that bend not their wits to such a sight, may indeed for a short time sweetly and pleasantly frame a righteousnesse to themselves, but it is such a righteousnesse as shall be by and by shaken away from them at the judgement of God: like as great riches heaped up in a dreame, doe vanish away from men when they awake. But they that shall earnestly as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of righteousnesse, shall certainly finde that all the works of men, if they be judged by their owne worthinesse, are nothing but desilings and filthinesse: that that which among the common people is accounted righteousnesse, is before God meere wickednesse: that that which is judged purity, is uncleannesse: that that which is reckoned glory, is but shame.

5. From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not grieve us to descend to look upon our selves without flatterie or blind affection of love. For it is no marvel if we be all so blinde in this behalfe, forasmuch as none of us doth beware of the pestilent tendernesse toward himselfe, which as the Scripture crieth out, naturally sticketh fast in us all. To every man (saith Salomon) his owne way is right in his owne eyes. Againe, All the wayes of man seeme cleane in his owne eyes. But what? Is he acquitted by this blindoesse? No, but (as hee further saith in the same place) the Lord weigheth the hearts, that is to say, while man flattereth himselfe by reason of the outward vifor or righteousnesse that he beareth in resemblance, in the meane time the Lord with his balance examineth the hidden uncleannesse of the heart. Therefore sith we so nothing profit with such flatteries, let us not willfully mocke our selves to our owne destruction. But that we may try our selves rightly, we must necessarily call back our conscience to the judgement seat of God. For we doe altogether need his light to disclose the secret foldings of our perversnesse, which otherwise lie too deeply hidden. For then, and never till then we shall clearely perceive what is meant hereby: that man being rottennesse and a worme, abominable and vaine, which drinketh wickednesse as water, is far from being justified before God. For who should make that cleane that is conceived of uncleane seed, not one man. Then shall we also finde that by experience, which Job said of himselfe? If I will goe about to shew my selfe innocent, mine owne mouth shall condemne me: If I will shew my selfe righteous: it will prove me wicked. For that is not meant of one age onely, but of all ages, which the Prophet in old time complained of Israel, that all went astray like sheepe, that every one turned aside to his owne way. For he there comprehendeth all them, to whom the grace of redemption should come. And the rigoroussnesse of this examination ought to proceed so farre till it subdue us, so that we be fully throwne downe withall, and by that meane prepare us to receive the grace of Christ. For he is deceived that thinketh himselfe able to receive the enjoying of this grace, untill we have first throwne downe all haughtinesse of minde. This is a knowne saying: that God confoundeth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

6. * But what way is there to humble our selves, but that we being altogether needy and empie, should give place to the mercy of God? For I doe not call it humblenesse, if wee thinke that wee have any thing remaining with us. And hitherto they have taught a very hurtfull hypocrisie that have joynd these two things together, that we must thinke humbly of our selves before God, and that we must make some account of our owne righteouſneſſe. For if we confeſſe to God contrarie to our owne thinking, we do wickedly lie unto him: but we cannot thinke as we ought, but that by and by all that ſeemeth glorious in us muſt be troden under foote. Therefore when thou heareſt in the Prophet, that there is prepared ſalvation for the humble people, and abaſement for the eies of the wicked: Firſt thinke, that there is no eartie open to ſalvation, untill thou have laid away all pride and taken to thee perfect humbleneſſe: then, that the ſame humbleneſſe is not a certaine modeſtie, whereby thou givelt over to the Lord a faire breadth of thine owne right, as they are called humble before men that do neither preſumptuoſly advance themſelves, nor reprochfully triumph over other, although they ſtand upon ſome eſtimation of their owne excellencie: but an unfaigned ſubmiſſion of a mind thrown downe with feeling of his owne miſerie and needineſſe. For it is ſo each where deſcribed in the word of God. When the Lord ſith thus in Zephania: I will take away out of thee him that outrageoſly rejoyceth, and I will leave in the mids of thee, the afflicted man, and the poore man, and they ſhall truſt in the Lord: doth he not there plainly ſhew who be humble? even they that lie afflicted with knowledge of their own povertie. On the other ſide he calleth the proude, outrageoſly rejoycers, becauſe men joying in proſperitie are wont to rejoyce without meature. But to the humble whom he purpoſeth to ſave, he leaveth nothing but to truſt in the Lord. And likewiſe it is ſaid in Eſay: Whom ſhall I looke unto, but to the poore and contrite in ſpirit, and him that feareth my words? Again: The high and excellent, that inhabiteth eternitie, his name is holy, that dwelleth on high, and in the holic place, and with the contrite and humble ſpirit, to quicken the ſpirit of the humble and the hart of the contrite. When thou ſo oft heareſt the name of contrition, underſtand thereby the wound of the hart, that ſifferech not a man thrown downe on the ground to riſe againe. With ſuch contrition ought thy hart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the ſaying of God be advanced with the humble: If that be not done, thou ſhalt be brought low with the mightie hand of God to thy ſhame and diſgracemēt.

7 And our beſt Schoolemaſter thinking it not enough to ſhew it out in words, hath alſo ſet out unto us in a parable the image of true humilitie as in a painted table. For he bringeth forth a Publicane that ſtanding a ſtarrē off, not daring to liſe up his eies to Heaven, with much knocking his breaſt, prayeth in this wiſe: Lord be mercifull to me a ſinner. Let us not thinke theſe to be tokens of fained modeſtie, that he dare not looke up to Heaven, nor to come neerer, that with knocking his breaſt he confeſſeth himſelfe a ſinner: but let us know that they be teſtimonies of inward affliction. On the other ſide he ſetteth the Phariſee, which thanketh God that he is not of the common ſort of men, either an oppreſſor, or an unrighteous man, or an adulterer, becauſe he faſted twiſe on the Sabbath, and gave riches of all that he poſſeſſed. He doth with open confeſſion acknowledge that the righteousneſſe which he hath, is the gift of God: but becauſe he ſtandeth in confidence that he is righteous, he departeth from God unfavoured and in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his owne wickedneſſe is juſtified. Hereby we may ſee, how great is the eſtimation of our humbling us before God: ſo that the hart cannot be open to receive his mercie, unleſſe it be firſt void of all opinion of his owne worthineſſe. When this opinion hath poſſeſſed the place, it ſhuttech up the way for Gods mercie to enter. And that no man ſhould doubt hereof, Chriſt was ſent of his Father into the earth with this commiſſion, to bring glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in hart, to preach libertie to the captive, and deliverance to them that were ſhut up in priſon, and to comfort them that mourne: to give them glory for aſhes, oyle for mourning, the robe of praife for the ſpirit of ſorrow. According to this commiſſion, he calleth none but them that labour and are laden to take part of his liberalitie. And in another place he ſith: I came not to call the righteous, but ſinners.

8 Therefore if we will give place to the calling of Chriſt, let all arrogancie and careleſſe depart far away from us. Arrogancie groweth of a fooliſh perſwaſion of our owne righteousneſſe, when a man thinketh himſelfe to have ſomewhat, by the deſerving whereof he may be commended before God, careleſſe may be even without any perſwaſion of workes. For many ſinners, becauſe being drunke with ſweetneſſe of vices, they thinke not upon the judgement of God, lie as it were ſenſeleſly amaſed with a disease of drouinesse, that they aspire not to the mercy offered them. But we must no lesse shake off such dull sluggishnesse, than we must cast away all vaine confidence of our selves, that we may without encombrance hasten to Christ, that we being empty and hungrie may be filled with his good things. For we shall never sufficiently have trust in him, unlesse we utterly distrust our selves, we shall never sufficiently raise up our courages in him, unlesse they be first throwne downe in our selves. We shall never sufficiently have consolation in him, unlesse we be first desolate in our selves. Therefore we be then meete to take hold of and obtaine the favour of God, casting away all trust of our selves, but trusting upon the onely assurednesse of his goodnesse, when (as Augustine saith) forgetting our owne deservings, we embrace the gifts of Christ. Because if he sought deservings in us, we should not come to his gifts. Wherewith Bernard very well accordeth, comparing proud men to unfaithfull servants, that arrogantly claime any thing, be it never so little, to their owne deservings: because they doe wrongfully keepe to themselves the praise of grace passing by them, as if a wall would say that it bringeth forth the sun-beame which it receiveth through a window. But, let us take a short but a generall and sure rule, that he is prepared to take part of the fruits of Gods mercy, that hath utterly emptied himselfe, I will not say of righteounesse, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windie image of righteounesse. Because every man so much hindereth his receiving of the liberality of God as he resteth in himselfe.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

AND here are alway two things to be principally looked unto: that is to say, that there may remaine to the Lord his glorie unminished, and as it were wholly and perfectly maintained, and to our consciences an untroubled quietnesse and calme tranquillitie before his judgement. We see how oft and how earnestly the Scripture exhorteth us, to give onely to God a confession of praise, when we entreat of righteounesse. And the Apostle testifieth, that this was the Lords principal purpose of giving us righteounesse in Christ, that he might shew his owne righteounesse. And what a shewing that should be, he declared immediately after: that is, if he alone be knowne to be righteous, and that justified him that is of the faith of Jesus Christ: Thou seekest that the righteounesse of God is not sufficiently set out, unlesse he alone be accounted righteous, and doe communicate the grace of righteounesse to them that deserve it not. By this meane he will have every mouth to be stopped, and the whole world to be made subject to him. For while man hath any thing to speake in his owne defence, so long there is somewhat taken away from the glorie of God. So in Ezechiel he teacheth how much we glorifie his name by reknowledging of our owne wickednesse. You shall remember (saith he) the waies and all the wicked doings wherewith ye have beene defiled. And ye shall be displeas'd with your selves in your owne sight, in all the evils that ye have committed. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall doe good to you for mine owne names sake, & not according to your most wicked offences. If these things be contained in the true knowledge of God, that we being bruised with knowledge of our owne iniquitie, should consider that he doth good to us whereas we be unworthy thereof: why then doe we to our great hurt attempt to steale away from the Lord any parcell, be it never so small, of the praise of his free goodnesse? Likewise Jeremie when he crieth out, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, or the rich man in his riches, or the strong man in his strength, but let him that glorifieth, glory in the Lord: doth he not there declare that somewhat is diminished from Gods glory, if man glory in himselfe? To this purpose truly doth Paul apply those words, when he teacheth that all the parts of our salvation are reposed in Christ, that we should not glorie but in the Lord. For his meaning is, that he riseth up against God and darkeneth his glorie, whosoever thinketh that he hath any thing be it never so little of his owne.

2 This is the truth, we never truly glory in him, unlesse we be utterly put from our owne glory. On the other side, this is to be holden for a catholike principle, that all they

they glory against God that glory in themselves. For Paul judgeth that onely by this meane the world is made subject to God, when all matter to glory upon is utterly taken from men. Therefore Esay, when he declareth that Israell shall have their justification in God, saith also that they shall there also have their praise: as though he should say, that the Lord to this end justified the elect that they should glorie in him and in nothing else. But how we ought to be praised in the Lord, he had taught in the verse next before: that is, that we should sweare that our righteousnesses and strength are in the Lord. Note that there is not required a bare confession, but confirmed with an oath, that a man should not thinke that he shall be discharged with I wor not what signed humilitie. And let no man here alleadge for excuse that he doth not glorie, when without arrogancie he reknowledgeth his owne righteousness: for there can be no such estimation but it engendreth confidence, nor confidence but it breedeth glorie. Therefore let us remember that in all the disputation of righteousnesse, we must have regard to this end, that the praise thereof remaine with the Lord whole and perfect. Forasmuch as for declaration of his righteousnesse (as the Apostle testifieth) he hath powdered out his grace upon us, that he might be just and justifying him, that is, of the faith of Christ. Wherefore in another place, when he had taught that the Lord gave us salvation, to set out the glorie of his name, afterward as it were repeating the same thing he addeth: ye are saved by grace, and by the gift of God, not by workes, that none should glory. And when Peter telleth that we are called unto hope of salvation, that we should declare the powers of him that hath called us out of darknesse into his marvellous light, without doubt his meaning is so to make the onely praises of God to sound in the eares of the faithfull, that they should with deepe silence oppresse all arrogancie of the flesh. In summe, man cannot without robbrie of God challenge to himselfe any one crum of righteousnesse: because even so much is plucked and taken away from the glorie of Gods righteousnesse.

3 Now if we aske by what meane the conscience may be quieted before God, we shall finde no other meane but if free righteousnesse be given us by the gift of God: Let us alway thinke upon this saying of Solomon, Who shall say, I have clesed my heart, I am made cleane from my sinne? Truly there is no man that shall not be overwhelmed with infinite filthinesse. Therefore let even the perfectest man descend into his owne conscience, and call his doings to account: what end shall he have? Shall he sweetly rest as though all things were in good order betweene him and God? and shall he not rather be vexed with terrible torments, when he shall feele matter of damnation abiding in himselfe, if he be judged according to his workes? The conscience if it looke upon God, must of necessitie either have assured peace with his judgement, or be besieged with the terrors of hell. Therefore we profit nothing in disputing of righteousnesse, unless we stablish such a righteousnesse, with the steadfastnesse whereof our soule may be staid in the judgement of God. When our soule shall have whereby it may both without feare appeare before the face of God, and receive his judgement, unshaken, then, and not till then let us know that we have found an unfaigned righteousness. Therefore not without cause the Apostle standeth so much upon this point, with whose wordes I had rather expresse it than with mine owne. If (saith he) the promise of inheritance be of the law, faith is made void, the promise is made abolished. He first inferreth that faith is disannulled and made void, if the promise of righteousnesse have respect to the deservings of our workes, or doe hang upon the keeping of the law. For so could every man assuredly rest in it: because it could never come to passe that any man might assuredly determine with himselfe that he had satisfied the law, as indeede never any man doth by workes fully satisfie it. Whereof, that we should not neede to seeke far for testimonies to prove it, every man may be a witness to himselfe that will with a right eye behold himselfe. And hereby appeareth, in how deepe and darke corners hypocrisie buried the mindes of men, while they so carelesly beare with themselves, that they sticke not to set their owne flatteries against the judgement of God, as though they would binde to a stay his judiciall proceeding. But the faithfull that doe sincerely examine themselves, are grieved and tormented with a far other manner of carefulnesse. Therefore there should so enter into all mindes a doubting, and at length a very despaire where each man for himselfe should make account, with how great a burden of debt he is still overpressed, and how far he is from the condition wherewith he is charged. Lo, how Faith is by this meane already expressed and extinguished. For to waver, to varie, to be carried up and downe, to sticke fast in doubting, to be holden in suspence, to stagger, and at length to despaire, is not to trust: but to strengthen thy minde with constant certaintie and perfect assurednesse, and to have whereupon to rest and fasten thy foote.

4 He adjoyneth also another thing, that is, that the promise shall thereby be made of no effect and void. For if the fulfilling thereof doe hang upon our deserving, when shall we come thus farre as to deserve the bountifullnesse of God? Also this second point hangeth upon the former: For the promise shall not be fulfilled, but to them that believe it. Therefore if Faith be fallen, there shall remaine no force of the promise. Therefore the inheritance is of Faith, that it may be according to grace, to stablish the promise. For it is abundantly well stablished when it resteth upon the onely mercie of God: because his mercie and truth are with a perpetuall knot joyed together, that is to say, whatsoever God mercifully promiseth, he also faithfully performeth. So David before that he required salvation by the word of God, first determineth the cause thereof to be in his mercy. Let thy mercies (saith he) come unto me, thy salvation according to thy word. And rightly: because God is by no other meane perswaded to make the promise but of his owne meere mercie. Therefore we must herein stay, and deeply fasten all our hope and not to look to our owne workes, to seeke any helpe of them. And that you should not thinke that I herein speake any new thing: Augustine doth also teach that we ought so to doe. Christ (saith he) shall reigne for ever in his servants, God hath promised it, God hath said it, & if that be not enough, God hath sworne it. Therefore forasmuch as the promise is stablished, not according to our deservings, but according to his mercie, no man ought to speake fearefully of that, of which he cannot doubt. Bernard also saith: The Disciples of Christ say, Who can be saved? But he answered, this is impossible with men, but it is not impossible with God. This is all our confidence, this is our onely comfort, this is the whole ground of our hope, but being assured of the possibilitie, what say we of his will? Who knoweth whether he be worthy of love or hatred? Who hath knowne the Lords meaning? Or who hath bene his counsellor? Here now Faith must of necessitie helpe us, here must his truth succour us, that that which is hidden from us in the hart of the Father, may be revealed by the Spirit, and his Spirit testifying it may perswade our hearts that we are the Sonnes of God. And it may perswade us by calling and justifying us freely by Faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meane passage from the eternall predestination to the glorie that is to come. Briefly let us thus conclude. The Scripture declareth that the promises of God are not stablished; unlesse they be taken hold of with assured assurance of conscience: and wheresoever, there is any doubting or uncertaintie, it pronounceth that they be void. Againe it pronounceth that they doe nothing but stagger and waver, if they rest upon our own workes. Therefore we must needs either lose righteousness, or we must not consider our owne workes, but onely Faith must take place, whose nature is this, to lift up her eares and shut her eyes, that is to say, to be heedfully bent to the promise onely, and to turne away her thought from all mans worthinesse or deserving. So is that notable prophetic of Zacharie fulfilled, that when the wickednesse of the land shall be done away, a man shall call his friend under his vine & under his fig-tree, where the Prophet declareth that the faithfull doe no otherwise enjoy true peace, but after obtaining of the forgiveness of sins. For this cavillation is to be remembered in the Prophets, that when they speake of the kingdome of Christ, they set out the outward blessings of God, as figures of the spirituall things. Whereupon Christ is called both the king of peace and our peace, because he appeareth all the troublesome motions of conscience. If we seeke by what meane he doth it, we must needs come to the sacrifice by which God is appeased. For he shall never cease to tremble for feare that shall not determine that God is appeased by the onely satisfactorie cleansing wherein Christ hath sustained his wrath. Finally peace is no where else to be sought for, but in the terrors of Christ our redeemer.

To rest upon the worthines of
is to make the

5. But why doe I use so darke a testimonie? Paul every where denieth that there is peace or quiet joy left to consciences, unlesse it be determined that we be justified by faith. And hee therewithall declareth whence that assurednesse commeth, namely, when the love of God is powred into our hearts by the holy Ghost: as if he had said, that our consciences cannot be otherwise quieted, unlesse we be certainly perswaded that we please God. Whereupon also in another place he crieth out in the person of all the godly, Who shall sever us from the love of God which is in Christ? because we shall tremble even at every little breath, till we be arrived into the haven: but we shall be without care even in the darknesse of death, so long as the Lord shall shew himselfe a Pastor to us. Therefore whosoever prate that we are justified by faith, because being regenerate we are just by living spiritually: they never tasted of the sweetnesse of grace, to consider that God will be mercifull unto them. Whereupon also followeth, that they doe no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turks, and whatsoever other prophane Nations. For (as Paul witnesseth) it is no true faith unlesse it reach and put us in minde of that most sweet name of Father, yea, unlesse it open our mouth freely to cry out Abba Father. Which in another place he more plainly expresseth, where he saith, that in Christ wee have boldnesse and entry in confidence by the faith of him. Truly this cometh not to passe by the gift of regeneration, which as it is alway imperfect in the flesh, so it containeth in it selfe manifold matter of doubting. Wherefore we must of necessity come to this remedie, that the faithfull should determine, that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heavenly Kingdome, but because being grafted into the body of Christ, they are freely accounted righteous. For as touching justification, faith is a thing meerly passive, bringing nothing of our owne to the recovering of the favour of God, but receiving of Christ that which we want.

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

What is the beginning of justification, and continuall proceedings thereof.

THAT the matter may be made more plaine, let us search, what may be the righteousness of man in the whole course of his life: and let us make foure degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned in idolatry: or being entred into profession by Sacraments, denying God with uncleannes of life, whom they confesse with mouth, they are Christs no further than in name: or they be hypocrites which cover the wickednesse of their hearts, with vaine deceitfull colours: or being regenerate by the spirit of God, they endeavour themselves to true holinesse. Specially when they are to be judged by their naturall gifts, from the crowne of their head to the sole of the foot, there shall not be found one sparkle of goodnesse, unlesse peradventure we will accuse the Scripture of falshood, when it setteth out all the Sonnes of Adam with these titles, that they be of froward and stubborne heart, that all the imagination of their heart is evill from their infancy, that their thoughts be vaine, that they have not the feare of God before their eyes, that none of them understandeth or seeketh God, briefly, that they be flesh, by which word are understood all those works which Paul rehearseth, fornication, uncleannesse, unchastity, riotousnesse, worshipping of idols, witchcrafts, enmities, contentions, emulations, angers, dissentions, sects, envies, man-slaughters, and whatsoever filthinesse and abomination may be devised. This forsooth is the worthinesse, with confidence whereof they must be proud. But if any among them excell with such honesty of manners as may have some shew of holinesse among men: yet because we know that God regardeth not the outward glittering, we must search the very fountaine of works, if we will have them to avails any thing to righteousnesse. We must (I say) thoroughly looke into them, from what affection of heart these works proceed. But although here lieth open a most large field to discourse in, yet because the matter may be declared in very few words, I will follow as much as I may, a briefnesse in teaching.

2. * First I deny not that whatsoever excellent gifts appeare in the unbelievers, they are the gifts of God. Neither doe I so differ from common judgement, that I would

Upon these two promises that were ought to ascribe all glory unto God, and seeke the assurance of our owne hearts which we cannot doe as long as we seeke righteousnesse in our owne works, it followeth that to be justified by faith, is not as some imagine to be just by living according to that spirit which the faithfull have received.

affirme that there is no difference betweene the justice, temperance and equity of Titus and Trijanus, and the rage, intemperance, and cruelty of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betweene the filthy lusts of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continencie of Vespasian: and (that we may not tarry upon some speciall vertues or vices) betweene the observing and despising of right and lawes. For there is so great difference of right and wrong, that it appeareth even in the dead image thereof. For what thing shall there remaine well ordered in the world, if we confound these together? Therefore such a difference betweene honest and dishonest doings, the Lord hath not onely engraven in the mindes of all men, but also doth oft confirme it with the dispensation of his providence. For we see how he extendeth many blessings of this present life to them that among men doe follow vertue. Not because that outward image of vertue deserveth so much as the least benefit of his: but so it pleaseth him to declare by prooffe how much true righteousnesse pleaseth him, when he suffereth even outward and feigned righteousnesse not to be without reward. Whereupon followeth that which we even now confessed, that these vertues, such as they be, or rather images of vertues are the gifts of God, for as much as there is nothing in any wise praise-worthy, which proceedeth not from him.

3. But neverthelesse it is true which Augustine writeth, that all they that are strangers from the true Religion of the one God, howsoever they be accountd worthy of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely worthy of no reward, but rather are worthy of punishment, because they doe with defiling of their heart, bespot the pure good things of God. For though they be the instruments of God to preserve, the fellowship of men with justice, continencie, temperance of minde, valiantnesse, and wisdom: yet they doe very evilly execute those good works of God: because they are restrained from evil doing, not by sincere love of goodnesse, but either by onely ambition, or by love of themselves, or by some other crooked affection. Whereas therefore they are corrupt by the very uncleannesse of heart, as by their beginning, they are no more to be reckoned among vertues, than those vices which are wont to deceive by reason of neernesse and likenesse of vertue. Finally, when we remember that the end of that which is right, ever is that God be served: whatsoever tendeth to any other end, forthwith worthily loseth the name of right. Because therefore they have not respect to the marke which the wisdom of God appointeth, although the thing that they doe, seeme good in doing, yet by a wrongfull end it is sinne. He concludeth therefore that all the Fabricii, Scipios, and Catoes, in all those excellent acts of theirs: yet sinned in this behalfe, that whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the end which they ought to have applied them: and that for that cause true righteousnesse was not in them: for as much as duties are not weighed by the doings, but by the ends.

4. Moreover if it be true which John saith; that there is no life without the Sonne of God: who so have set no part in Christ, what manner of men soever they be, whatsoever they doe or goe about, yet they runne forward with their whole course into destruction, and the judgement of eternall death. After this reason, is that said of Augustine: Our Religion discerneth the righteous from the unrighteous; not by law of works: but by the very law of faith, without which, those that seeme good works are turned into finnes. Wherefore the same Augustine saith very well in another place, when hee compareth the endeavour of such men to running out of the way. For how much faster a man runneth out of the way, so much further he is from the marke, and therefore is made so much more miserable. Wherefore hee affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, than to runne out of the way. Finally, it is certaine that they are evil trees, forasmuch as without the communication of Christ there is no sanctification. They may therefore beare faire fruits, and beautifull to the eye, yea, and sweet in taste, but in no wise good fruit. Hereby we easily perceive that whatsoever man thinketh, purposeth or doth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not onely of no value to righteousnesse, but of certaine deserving to damnation. And why dispute wee hereof as of a doubtfull thing, sith it is already proved by the witnessse of the Apostle, that it is impossible that any man may please God without faith.

5. But there shall yet appeare a plainer prooffe, if the grace of God be in comparison, directly set against the naturall state of man. For the Scripture crieth out every where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby he may be provoked to doe good to him, but with his owne free goodnesse preventeth him. For what can a dead man doe to attaine life? But when he lightneth us with the knowledge of himselfe, he is said to raise us from death, and to make us a new creature. For we see that oftentimes, specially of the Apostle, the goodnesse of God is set forth unto us by this title, God (saith he) which is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead by sinnes, hath made us alive together in Christ, &c. In another place, where under the figure of Abraham he entreateth of the generall calling of the faithfull, hee saith; it is God that giveth life to the dead, and calleth those things that are not, as though they were. If we be nothing, what (I beseech you) can we doe? Wherefore the Lord strongly beatech downe this arrogancie, in the Historie of Job, in these words, who preventeth me and I shall render it him? for all things are mine; Which sentence Paul expounding applieth it to this, that wee should not thinke that wee bring any thing to the Lord but mere shame of needinesse and emptinesse. Wherefore in the place above cited, to prove that we are come into the hope of salvation by his grace alone, not by works, he allegeth that we are his creatures, because we are new begotten in Christ Iesus, to the good works which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. As if he had said; Which of us may boast that he hath with his righteousnesse provoked God, sith our first power to doe good proceedeth out of regeneration? For as we are made by nature, oyle shall sooner be wrung out of a stone, than a good work out of us. Truly it is wonderfull, if man being condemned of so great a shame, dare yet say that there remaineth any thing with him. Therefore let us confesse with this noble instrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose and grace: and that the kindnesse and love of God our Saviour toward us hath appeared, because he hath saved us, not by the works of righteousnesse which we have done, but according to his owne mercie: that being justified by his grace, we might be made the heires of eternall life. By this confession we dispoile man of all righteousnesse, even to the least little peece thereof, till he be by onely mercie regenerate into the hope of eternall life: forasmuch as if the righteousnesse of works doe bring any thing toward the justifying of us, it is fallily said that we are justified by grace. Truly the Apostle had not forgotten himselfe, when he affirmed justification to be of free gift, which in another place reasoneth that grace is now not grace, if works doe any thing availe. And what other thing doth the Lord meane, when he saith, that he came not to call righteous men but sinners? If onely sinners are received, why seeke we an entry by feigned righteousnesse?

6. Still this same thought hath now and then recourse to my minde, that it is perill least I should doe wrong to the mercies of God, which doe so carefully travell in proving of this thing as though it were doubtfull or darke. But because our enviousnesse is such, as unlesse it be most straitly thrust out of place, it never yeeldeth to God that which is his, I am compelled to tarry somewhat the longer upon it. Yet forasmuch as the Scripture is cleere enough in this matter, I will in fighting rather use the words thereof than mine owne. Ejays, when he hath described the universall destruction of mankinde, doth immediately after very fitly adjoyne the order of restoring. The Lord hath seene, and it seemed evill in his eyes. And he saw that there is no man: and he marvelled that there is none that offreth himselfe: and he hath set salvation in his own arme, and hath strengthened himselfe with his owne righteousnesse. Where are our righteousnesse, if it be true as the Prophet doth say: that there is no man that helpeth the Lord in recovering his salvation? So another Prophet, where he bringeth in the Lord, discoursing of the reconciling of sinners to himselfe, saith; I will espouse thee to mee for ever, in righteousnesse, judgement, grace and mercie. I will say to her that hath not obtained mercie, thou hast obtained mercy. If such covenant, which it is certaine to be the first conjoyning that we have with God, standeth upon the mercie of God, there is left no foundation of our owne righteousnesse. And I would faine learne of those men which feigne that man meeteth God with some righteousnesse of works, whether they thinke that there is any righteousness at all, but that which is acceptable to God. If it be madnesse to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can proceed from his eninies, whom he wholly abhorreth with all their doings? That all we, I say, are the deadly and professed enemies of our God, the truth it selfe testifieth, till being justified, we are received into friendship. If Justification be the beginning of love, what righteousness of works shall goe before it. So John, to turne away that pestilent arrogancie, doth diligently put us in minde how we did not first love him. And the selfe same thing the Lord had long before taught by the Prophets: I will love them, saith he, with a free love, because mine anger is turned. Certainly his love is not prokoved by works, if it hath of his owne accord inclined it selfe unto us. But the rude common sort of men thinke it to be nothing else, but that no man hath deserved that Christ should performe our redemption: yet that to the entering into the possession of redemption, wee be holden by our owne works. Yea, but howsoever we be redeemed of Christ, yet till we be by the calling of the Father grafted into the communion of him, we are both heires of darknesse and death, and the enemies of God. For Paul teacheth, that we are not cleansed and washed from our uncleannes by the blood of Christ, untill the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in us. Which same thing Peter minding to teach, declareth that the sanctifying of the spirit availeth unto obedience, and the sprinkling of the blood of Christ. If we be by the spirit sprinkled with the blood of Christ unto cleansing, let us not thinke that before such watering we be any other than a sinner in without Christ. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that the beginning of our salvation is as it were a certaine resurrection from death to life: Because when for Christs sake it is given to us to beleve in him, then we first begin to passe from death to life.

7. Under this sort are comprehended they which have in the division above set, beene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the uncleannes of conscience proveth that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spirit of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this proveth the want of faith. Whereby appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet justified in his sight: forasmuch as these good things are not attained to but by faith. What can sinners, being estranged from God, bring forth, but that which is accursed in his judgement? With this foolish boldnesse in deed, both all wicked men are puffed up, and specially hypocrites, because howsoever they know that their whole heart swarmeth full of filthinesse, yet if they doe any works that have a shew of goodness, they thinke them worthy that God should not despise them. Hereof groweth that pernicious error, that being proved guiltie of a wicked and mischievous mind, yet they cannot be driven to confesse themselves void of righteousness: but even when they acknowledge themselves unrighteous, because they cannot deny it, yet they arrogantly claime some righteousness unto them. This vanitie the Lord excellently well confuteth by the Propheer, Aske (saith he) the Priests, saying: if a man carry sanctified flesh in the hem of his garment, and putteth to it bread or other meat, shall it be sanctified? The Priests answered: No. And Haggee said. If a defiled man in soule touch any of these things, shall it be defiled? The Priests answered: it shall be defiled. Haggee said: So is this people before my face, saith the Lord: and so all the workes of their hands: and all things that they offer to me shall be defiled. I would to God that this saying might either get full credit with us, or well be setled in our remembrance. For there is no man, though he be other wise in his whole life never so hainous a wicked doer, that can abide to be perswaded, that which the Lord here plainly pronounceth. The naughtiest man, so soone as he hath performed one or two doubtfull deeds of the law, doubteth not that it shall be accounted to him for righteousness. But the Lord cryeth to the contrary, that there is no sanctification gotten thereby, unless the hart be first well cleansed. And not contented therewith, he affirmeth that all the works whatsoever they be that proceed from sinners, are as defiled with uncleannes of the heart. Therefore let the name of righteousness departe from these works which are by the Lords own mouth condemned of filthinesse. And with how fit a similitude doth he shew the same? For it might have been objected, that whatsoever the Lord had commanded, was inviolably holy. But he on the contrary side setteth against them, that it is no marvell, if those things that are hal-

 as an unclean hand prophaneth a holy thing with touching it.

8. The same matter he excellently well handleth in Esay, Offer not (saith hee) sacrifices in vaine : incense is abomination to mee : my Soule hateth your Calends and solemnities. They are become tedious to mee, and I have bene wearye with bearing them : when you shall hold up your hands I will turne away mine eyes from you : when you shall multiply prayer I will not heare : for your hands are full of blood. Be washed, be cleane, take away the evill of your thoughts. What meaneth this that the Lord so loatheth the obeying of his owne Law? Yea, but hee here refuseth nothing that is of the naturall observing of the Law, the beginning whereof hee every where teacheth to be the unfained teare of his name. When that is taken away, whatsoever things are offered him are not onely trifles, but stinking and abominable in filthinesse. Now let the hypocrites goe, and keeping perversesse wrapped up in their heart, endeavour to deserve the favour of God with workes. But by this meane, they shall more and more provoke him to wrath. For to him the sacrifices of the wicked are abominable, and the onely prayer of upright men pleaseth him. Therefore we hold that out of doubt, which ought to be most commonly knowne to him, that is even but meanelly exercised in the Scriptures, that even those workes that glister most gloriously in men not yet truly sanctified, are so farre from the righteousnesse in the sight of the Lord, that they be judged finnes. And therefore they have said most truly that have taught, that favour with God is not procured to any person by workes : but contrariwise that workes doe then please, and never till then, when the person hath first found grace in the sight of God. And this order is religiously to be kept, to which the Scripture leadeth us by the hand. Moses writeth that the Lord had respect to Abel and to his workes. See you not how he declareth that God is favourable to the men, before that he had respect to their workes? Wherefore the cleansing of the heart must goe before, that the workes which come from us, may be lovingly received of God : because this saying of Jeremie is alway in force, that the workes of God have respect unto truth. And that it is onely Faith by which the hearts of men are cleansed, the holy Ghost hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter : whereby it is certaine, that the first foundation is in true and lively Faith.

9. Now let us looke what righteousnesse they have, whom wee have set in the fourth degree. We grant that when God by the meane of the righteousnesse of Christ, reconcileth us to himselfe, and giving us free forgivenesse of finnes, accounteth us for righteous, with such mercy is also conjoynded that his beneficiall doing, that by his holy spirit he dwelleth in us, by the power whereof the lusts of our flesh are daily more and more mortified, but wee are sanctified : that is to say, hallowed to the Lord unto true purenesse of life, when our hearts are framed to the obedience of the law : that this may be our chiefe will, to serve his will, and by all meanes to advance onely his glory. But even while by the guiding of the holy Ghost we walke in the waies of the Lord, least we yet forgetting our selves should wax proud, there are left certaine remnant, of imperfection, which may minister us matter of humilitie. There is none righteous, (saith the Scripture) that doth good and sinneth not. What manner of righteousnesse therefore will they yet get by their workes? First, I say, that the best worke that can be brought forth of them, is yet alway sprinkled and corrupted with some uncleannesse of the flesh, and hath as it were some dregs mingled with it. I say, let a holy servant of God chooseth out of all his life the most excellent thing that hee shall thinke that he hath done in the whole course thereof, and let him well consider all the parts of it, without doubt hee shall finde somewhere somewhat favouring of the rottennesse of the flesh, forasmuch as to doing well, our cheerefull quicknesse is never such as it ought to bee, but in slackning our course, our weaknesse is much. Although wee see that there are evident foule blots wherewith the workes of the holy are bespred, yet grant that they bee nothing but most little spots : shall they nothing offend the eyes of God, before whom even the starres are not cleane? Thus have we shewed that there cometh not so much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be judged in it selfe, deser-

10. Secondly I say, that if it were possible that wee should have some throughly pure and perfect workes, yet one sinne is enough to blot out and quench all the remembrance of the former righteousness, as the Prophet saith, With whom also Iames agreeth: He that offendeth (saith he) in one, is made guiltie of all. Now sith this mortall life is never pure or void from sinne, whatsoever righteousness we should purchase, being from time to time with sinnes following corrupted, oppressed and lost, it should not come into the sight of God, nor be accounted to us for righteousness. Finally when the righteousness of workes is intreated of, we must not have respect to the workes of the Law, but to the commandement. Therefore if we seeke righteousness by the Law, we shall in vaine bring forth one or two workes: but a perpetuall obedience of the Law is there necessarie. Wherefore the Lord doth not but once (as many foolishly thinke) impute to us for righteousness that same forgiveness of sins whereof we have spoken, that having once obtained pardon of our life past, we should after ward seeke righteousness in the law, because he should so do nothing else but bring us into a false hope, and mocke and laugh us to scorne. For sith no perfection could come to us so long as wee are clothed with this flesh, and sith the Law threatneth death and judgement to all them that performe not full righteousness in worke: it shall alway have whereof it may accuse and condemne us, unless the mercy of God on the other side did withstand it, to acquire us from time to time with continuall forgiveness of sinnes. Wherefore this standeth alway certaine which we said at the beginning, that if we be weighed by our owne worthinesse, whatsoever we purpose or goe about, yet we with all our travells and endeavours are worthy of death and destruction.

11. Upon these two points wee must strongly stand fast: that there was never any worke of a godly man, which if it were examined by the severe judgement of God, was not damnable. Again, if there bee any such shew, (which is not possible for Man) yet being corrupted and defiled with the sinnes, wherewith it is certaine that the doer of it is laden, it looseth the grace. And this is the chiefe point of our disputation. For about the beginning of justification there is no strife betwene us and the sounder sort of schoolemen, but that a sinner being freely delivered from damnation obtaineth righteousness, and that by the forgiveness of sinnes: saving that they under the word of justification comprehend the renewing, wherewith we are newly formed by the spirit of God unto the obedience of the Law, and thus they describe the righteousness of a man regenerate, that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is by good workes judged righteous before God, and by their deserving is accepted. But the Lord contrariwise pronounceth that hee imputed to Abraham faith for righteousness, not at the time when he yet served idols, but when he had already many yeeres excelled in holinesse of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshipped God from a pure heart, and had performed the obedience of the law which may bee performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteousness reposed in faith. Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paul, that it was not of workes. Likewise when it is said in the Prophet: The righteous man shall live by faith, it is not spoken of wicked and prophane men, whom the Lord justifieth by converting them to the faith, but the speech is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promised life by faith. Paul also taketh away all doubt, when for confirming of that sentence, he taketh this verse of David: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. But it is certaine, that David speaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull; such as himselfe was: because hee spake out of the feeling of his owne conscience. Therefore this blessednesse wee must not have once in our life, but hold it throughout all our life. Last of all he testifieth that the embassage concerning the free reconciliation with God is not published for one or two daies, but is perpetuall in the Church. Therefore the faithfull have even to the end of their life no other righteousness than that which is there set forth. For Christ everlastingly remaineth the Mediator to reconcile the father to us, and the effectualnesse of his death is everlasting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, wherewithall our iniquities are covered. Neither doth Paul to the Ephesians say, that we have the beginning of salvation out of grace, but that wee are saved by grace, not of workes, that no man should glorie.

12. The starting holes which the Scholemen doe here seeke to escape by, doe not deliver them. They say that good works are not by inward worthinesse in themselves of so great value, that they be sufficient to purchase righteoussesse, but this, that they be of so great value, is of grace accepting them. Then, because they be driven to confesse that the righteoussesse of works is in this life alway imperfect, they grant that we, so long as wee live, doe need forgivenessse of sinnes, whereby the want of works may be supplied: but that the defaults which are committed, are recompenced with works of supererogation. For I answer, that the accepting grace as they call it, is none other than is free goodnesse wherewith the Father embraceth us in Christ, when he clotheh us with the innocencie of Christ, and accounteth the same ours, that by the beneficiall meane thereof hee may take us for holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteoussesse of Christ (which as it onely is perfect, so onely can abide the sight of God) must be set in our steed, and bee presented at the barre as a suretie. Here with we being furnished, doe obtaine continuall forgivenessse of sinnes in Faith. With the purenesse hereof our filthinesse and uncleannesse of imperfections being covered are not imputed: but are hidden as if they were buried, that they may not come into the judgement of God, untill the hower come, when the old man being shaine and utterly destroyed in us, the goodnesse of God shall receive us into blessed peace with the new Adam, where let us looke for the day of the Lord, in which in receiving uncorrupt bodies, we shall bee removed into the glory of the heavenly kingdome.

13. If these things be true, verily no works of ours can of themselves make us acceptable and pleasing to God: neither can the works themselves please, but in respect that man being covered with the righteoussesse of Christ, pleaseth God, and obtaineth forgivenessse of his sinnes. For God hath not promised the reward of eternall life to some certaine works, but only pronounceth that he which doth these things shall live: setting the notable curse against all them that continue not in all things. Whereby the devise of righteoussesse in part is largely confuted, sith no other righteoussesse is admitted into heaven, but a whole observing of the Law. And no whit sounder is that which they are wont to babble of supplying of recompence by works of Supererogation. For why? Doe they not still returne to the same place from whence they are already shat out: that hee which keepeth the law in part, is by works so farre righteous? That which no man of sound judgement will grant them, they doe too shamelesly take for confessed. So oft the Lord testifieth that hee acknowledgeth no righteoussesse of works, but in the perfect observing of his law. What obstinacy is it, that we when we are destitute of that observing, least we should seeme spoyled of all glorie, that is, to have altogether given place to God, doe boast our selves of I wot not what small pieces of a few works, and goe about by satisfactions to redeeme that which wanteth. Satisfactions have already before beene sufficiently overthrowne, that we ought not now so much as to dreame of them. Onely this I say, that they which so play the fooles, do not weigh how detestable a thing sin is before God: for truly they should understand that the whole righteoussesse of men being laid upon a heape, is not sufficient to make recompence for one sinne. For we see that man was by one offence so cast away and abandoned of God, that he therewithall lost all meane to recover salvation. Therefore the power of satisfaction is taken away, wherewith they flatter themselves, but surely shall never satisfie God, to whom nothing is pleasant or acceptable that proceedeth from his enemies. And his enemies are all they to whom hee purposeth to impute sinnes. Therefore our sinnes must be covered and forgiven, before that the Lord have respect to any worke of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgivenessse of sins is of free grace which they doe wickedly blaspheme that trust in any satisfactions. Let us therefore, after the example of the Apostle, forgetting those things that are behinde us, and hastning forward to those things that are before us, runne in our race, endeavouring to the price of the high calling.

14. But how doth the boasting of the works of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught us, that when we have done all things that are commanded us, we should say that we are unprofitable servants, and that we have done no more than wee ought? To say before God, is not to faine or to lie, but to determine with thy selfe, that which thou art assured of. The Lord therefore commanded us unfeignedly to thinke and consider with our selves, that we doe not any free beneficiall doings to him, but to render due service. And worthily. For we are servants indebted in so many services, as we are not able to discharge, although all our thoughts and all our members, were turned into dutifull deeds of the law. And therefore that which he saith, When ye have done all things that are commanded you, &c. is as much in effect, as if the righteousnesse of one man were more than all the righteousnesse of men. How therefore may wee (of whom there is none that is not most farre distant from this marke) be so bold as to boast that we have added a heape to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exception and say, that nothing withstandeth but that his endeavour may proceed beyond necessarie duties, which in some behalfe ceaseth those that be from necessarie. For this we must altogether hold, that wee can imagine nothing that availeth either to the worship or the love of God, which is not comprehended under the Law of God. If it be a part of the law, let us not boast of voluntary liberality, where we are bound to necessitie.

15. And for this purpose that glorying of Paul is out of season alleaged. That among the Corinthians he did of his owne will yeeld of his right, which other wise hee might have used if he had would, and that he hath employed upon them not only so much as he ought of dutie, but also hath given them his free travell beyond the bounds of duties. But they should have marked the reason there expressed, that he did this least hee should be an offence to the weake. For false and deceitfull workemen did boast themselves with this alluring shew of liberality, whereby they might both procure favour to their poisonous doctrines, and raise up hatred to the Gospell, so that Paul was driven of necessitie either to bring the doctrine of Christ into danger, or to meete with such crafts. Go to: if it be to a Christian man an indifferent thing, to run into offence, when he may refraine it, then I grant that the Apostle did something of supererogation for the Lord. But if this were by right required of a wise distributor of the Gospell, then I say that he did that which was his dutie to doe. Finally, although there appeare no such cause, yet this saying of Chrysostome is alway true, that all our things are in the same case wherein are the proper possessions of bondmen, which it is certaine by the law to be due to their Lord. And Christ hath uttered the same in the Parable. For he asked what thanke we will give to a bondservant when having been all the day travailed with sundry labours he returneth home to us in the evening. But it is possible, that he hath laboured with greater diligence than we durst have required. Be it so: yet he hath done nothing but that which by his state of bondage he ought, for hee with his whole abilitie is ours. I speake not of what fort their Supererogations are which these men will boast of to God: for they be trifles, such as hee neither hath at any time commanded, nor doth approve them, nor will allow them when account shall be made before him. In this signification onely wee will grant that they are works of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: who hath required these things at your hands: But let them remember what is in another place spoken of these things: Wherefore doe yee weigh your silver and not in bread? Yee spend your labour and not in being satisfied. It is indeed not very hard for these idle Rabbines to dispute under the shadow in a soft chaire: but when the soveraigne judge shall sit in his judgement seat, such windie decrees shall of necessitie vanish away. This, was to be sought what affiance of defence we may bring to his judgement seat, not what we may talke of in schooles and corners.

16. In this behalfe there are chiefly two pestilences to be driven out of our mindes: that we put no affiance in the righteousnesse of works. And that we ascribe no part of glorie to them. The Scriptures doe every where thrust us from all manner of affiance, when they teach that our righteousnesse doe stinke in the sight of God, unlesse they receive a good favour from the innocencie of Christ, and that they can doe nothing but provoke the vengeance of God, unlesse they be sustained by the tendernesse of his mercy. Moreover they so leave nothing to us, but that wee should crave the mercy of our judge with that confession of David, that none shall be justified before him, if hee require account of his servants. But where Job saith: If I have done wickedly, woe to me:

but if I doe righteously, yet I will not so lift up my head: though he meane of that most high righteoufnesse of God, whereunto the very Angels answer not: yet he therewithall sheweth that when they come to the judgement of God, there remaineth nothing for all mortall men, but to hold their peace as dumb. For it tendeth not only to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeeld, than dangerously strive with the rigoroufnesse of God: but he meaneth that he felt no other righteoufnesse in himselfe, than such as at the first moment should fall before the sight of God. When affiance is driven away, all glorying must also necessarily depart. For who can give the praise of righteoufnesse to these works, the affiance wherof trembleth before the sight of God? We must therefore come whether Esay calleth us, that all the seed of Israel may be praised and glory in God: because it is most true which hee saith in another place, that we are the planting of the glory of God. Our minde therefore shall then rightly be purged, when it shall neither in any behalfe rest upon the confidence of works, nor joyce in the glory of them. But this error encouraged foolish men to the puffing up of this false and lying affiance, that they alway set the cause of their saluation in works.

17. But if we looke to the foure kinds of causes, which the Philosophers teach us to consider in the effect of things, wee shall finde that none of them doth accord with works in the stablishing of our saluation. For the Scripture doth every where report that the cause of procuring the eternall life to us, is the mercie of the heavenly Father and his free love toward us: the materiall cause is Christ with his obedience, by which he purchased righteoufnesse for us. What also shall wee say to be the formall or instrumentall cause but faith? And these three causes Iohn comprehendeth together in one sentence, when he saith. God so loved the world, that he gave his onely begotten Son, that every one which beleeveth in him may not perish, but may have everlasting life. Now the finall cause the Apostle testifieth to bee both the shewing of the righteoufnesse of God and the praise of his goodnesse: where hee rehearseth also the other three in expresse words. For he saith thus to the Romanes: all have sinned and doe need the glorie of God: but they are justified freely by his grace. Here thou hast the head and first fountaine, namely that God embraced us with his free mercie. Then followeth: by the redemption which is in Christ Jesu. Heere thou hast as it were the matter whereof righteoufnesse is made for us through faith in his blood. Here is shewed the instrumentall cause, whereby the righteoufnesse of Christ is applied to us. Last of all he joyneth the end, when he saith, unto the shewing of his righteoufnesse, that he may be righteous and the righteous maker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the way that this righteoufnesse standeth of reconciliation) he setteth expressly by name, that Christ was given to us for reconciliation. So in the first chapter also to the Ephesians he teacheth that we are received of God into favour by mere mercie: that the same is wrought by the intercession of Christ: received by faith: all to this end, that the glorie of the goodnesse of God may fully shine. When we see that all the parts of our saluation are so without us, what cause is there that we should now either have affiance or glorie in works? Neither can even the most sworne enemies of the grace of God moove any controvercie with us about the efficient or finall cause, unless they will denie the whole Scripture. In the Materiall and formall cause they cast a false colour, as though our works have a halfe place with faith and righteoufnesse of Christ. But this also they teach, the Scripture crying out against them, which simply affirmeth both that Christ is to us for righteoufnesse and life, and that this benefit of righteoufnesse is possessed by onely faith,

18. But whereas the holy men doe oftentimes strengthen and comfort themselves with remembrance of their owne innocencie and uprightnesse, and sometime also forbear not to report of it with praise, that is done two waies: either that in comparing their good cause with the evill cause of the wicked, they conceive thereby assured trust of victorie, not so much for commending of their owne righteoufnesse, as for the just and deserved condemning of their adversaries: or that even without comparison other while they record themselves before God, the purenesse of their owne conscience bringeth to them both some comfort and affiance. Of the first of these two waies, wee shall see hereafter: Now let us briefly declare of the latter, how it agreeth with that

themselves in the conscience of their owne up-

which we have abovesaid, that in the judgement of God we must rest upon no assistance of works, and glorie upon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding and stablishing of their salvation, doe without respect of works bend their eies to the onely goodnesse of God. And they doe not onely bend themselves to it afore all things as to the beginning of blessednesse, but doe rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and stablished, is also stablished with consideration of works: namely so far as they are the witnessings of God, dwelling and reigning in us. Sith therefore this assistance of works hath no place, unlesse thou have first cast the whole assistance of thy minde upon the mercie of God: it ought not to seeme contrarie to that whereupon it hangeth. Wherefore when we exclude the assistance of works, we meane only this, that a Christian minde may not bow to the merit of works, as to the succour of salvation, but should throughly rest in the free promise of righteousnesse. But wee forbid not to underprop and strengthen this faith with the signes of the good will of God toward it selfe. For if all the good gifts which God hath bestowed upon us, when they be recorded in remembrance, are to us after a certaine manner as it were beames of the face of God, by which we are enlightened to behold that soveraigne light of goodnesse: much more is the grace of good works, which sheweth that the Spirit of adoption is given us.

19. When therefore the holy ones doe by innocencie of conscience confirme their Faith, and gather matter of rejoycing, they doe nothing but call to minde by the fruit of their calling, that they are adopted of the Lord into the place of children. This therefore that is taught by Salomon, that in the feare of the Lord is stedfast assurednesse: and this that sometime the holy ones use this protestation, to the intent that they may bee heard of the Lord, that they have walked before his face in uprightness and simplicitie: have no place in laying the foundation of stablishing of conscience: but are then onely of value, if they bee taken of the ensuing effect: because both that feare is no where which may stablish a full assurednesse, and the holy ones are privie in their conscience of such an uprightness, where with are yet mingled many remnants of the flesh. But forasmuch as of the fruits of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwelling in them, they doe thereby not slenderly strengthen themselves to looke for the helpe of God in all their necessities, when they by experience finde him their Father in so great a matter. And even this also they cannot doe, unlesse they have first conceived the goodnesse of God, sealed with no other assurednesse, than of the promise. For if they begin to weigh it by good works, nothing shall be more uncertein nor more weake: forasmuch as if works bee considered by themselves, they shall no lesse by their imperfection shew proofe of the wrath of God, than they doe with howsoever imperfect purenesse testifie his good will. Finally they doe so set out the benefits of God, that yet they turne not away from the free favour of God, in which Paul testifieth that there is the length, bredth, depth, and height of them: as if hee should say: Whethersoever the senses of the godly doe turne themselves, how high soever they climbe, how far and wide soever they extend them, yet they ought not to goe out of the love of Christ, but hold themselves wholly in the meditation thereof, because it comprehendeth all kinde of measures in it. And therefore he saith that it excelleth and surmounteth above all knowledge: and that when we acknowledge how much Christ hath loved us, we are fulfilled into all the fulnesse of God. As in another place, when he glorieth that all the godly are vanquishers in battell, he by and by addeth a reason, because of him that loved us.

20. Wee see now that there is not in the holy ones that assistance of works, which either giveth any thing to the merit of them (forasmuch as they regard them none other wise than as the gifts of God, whereby they reknowlege his goodnesse, none other wise than as signes of their calling, whereby they may thinke upon their election) or which withdraweth nor any thing from the free righteousnesse which wee obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth upon it, and standeth not without it. The same thing doth Augustine in few words, but very well set out where he writeth, I doe not say to the Lord, despise not the works of my hands, or I have sought the Lord with my hands and have not bene deceived. But I doe not commend the works of my hands: for I feare fear, lest thou hast looked upon them, thou shalt finde moe sus than Merits: onely this I say, this I aske, this I desire, despise not the works of thy hands, behold in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdest mine, thou damnest me, if thou beholdest thine, thou crownest me. For also whatsoever good works I have, they are of thee. He setteth two causes, why he dare not boast of his works to God, because if hee have any good works, he seeth therein nothing his owne: secondly, because the same is also overwhelmed with multitude of sinnes. Whereupon commeth to passe that the conscience seeleth thereby more feare and dismayng than assurednesse. Therefore he would have God no otherwise to looke on his well doings, than that reknewledging in them the grace of his calling, he may make an end of the worke which he hath begun.

21. But furthermore whereas the Scripture sheweth that the good workes of the faithfull, are causes why the Lord doth good to them, that is so to be understood, that that which we have before set may stand unshaken, that the effect of our salvation consisteth in the love of God the Father: the matter, in the obedience of the Sonne: the instrument, in the enlightening of the holy Ghost, that is to say, in Faith: that the end is the glory of the so great kindnesse of God. These things withstand not, but that the Lord may embrace workes as inferiour causes. But whence commeth that? Namely, whom the Lord of his mercie hath appointed to the inheritance of eternall life, them with his ordinary dispensation he doth by good workes bring into the possession thereof. That which goeth before in order of dispensation, he calleth the cause of that which followeth. After this manner he sometime deriveth eternall life from workes: nor for that it is to be ascribed to them: but because whom he hath chosn, them hee doth justifie, that he may at length glorifie them, he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a step toward that which followeth after a certaine manner the cause of it. But so oft as he hath occasion to assigne the true cause, he biddeth us not to flee to workes, but holdeth us in the onely thinking upon the mercy of God. For what manner of thing is this which he teacheth by the Apostle: The reward of sin is death: the grace of the Lord, is life everlasting? Why doth he not set righteousness in comparison against sin, as he setteth life against death? Why doth he not make righteousness the cause of life, as hee maketh sin the cause of death? For should the comparison of contraries have stood well together, which is much broken by this turning. But the Apostle meant by this comparison to expresse that which was truth, that death is due to the deservings of men: that life is repoled in the onely mercy of God. Finally in these manners of speaking is rather expressed the order than the cause: because God in heaping graces upon graces, taketh cause of the first to adde the second, that he may leave nothing undone to the enriching of his servants: and he so continually extendeth his liberalitie, that yet hee would have us alway to looke unto the free election which is the fountaine and beginning of it. For although he loveth the gifts that he daily giveth, in so much as they spring out of that fountaine: yet it is our part to hold fast that free acceptation, which alone is able to uphold our soules: as for such gifts of his Spirit as he after ward giveth us, so to adjoyne them to the first cause, that they minist'r nothing of it.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

That those things that are commonly boasted concerning the merits of works, doe overthrow as well the praise of God in giving of righteousness, as also the assurednesse of salvation.

NOW wee have declared that which is the chiefe point in this matter: that because if righteousness be upholden with workes, it must needs by and by fall downe before the sight of God, it is contained in the onely mercie of God, the onely communicating of Christ, and therefore in onely faith. But, let us diligently marke that this is the chiefe stay of the matter, lest we be entangled with that generall error, not onely of the common people, but also of learned men. For so soone as question is mooved of the justification of faith and workes, they flee to those places which seeme to give to workes some merit in the sight of God: as though the justification of workes were fully wonne, if it be once proved that they be of any value with God. But wee have

Rom. 8. 20.

Rom. 6. 13.

above plainly shewed that the righteousness of workes consisteth onely in the perfect keeping of the Law. Whereupon followeth that no man is justified by workes, but he that having climbed up to the highest top of perfection, cannot be proved guilty of any offence it never so little. Therefore it is another and a severall question: Howsoever workes suffice not to justify a man, whether yet doe they not deserve favour with God?

2. First of the name of Merit I must needs say this aforehand, that whosoever first applied it to workes of men compared to the judgement of God, he did very ill provide for the purenesse of Faith. Truly I doe by my good will abstaine from strives about words, but I would wish that this sobriety had always beene used among Christian writers, that they would not have found in their hearts to use words strange from the Scriptures, which ingendred much offence and no fruit. For whereto, I beseech you, was it needfull to have the name of merit brought in, when the price of good workes might bee fully expressed by another name without offence? But how much offence that word containeth in it, is evident with the great hurt of the world. Surely as it is most proud it can doe nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with froward pride. The old writers of the Church, I grant, have commonly used it, and I would to God they had not with the abusing of one little word, given to posteritie matter of error. Howbeit they themselves also doe in many places testifie, how in no case they meant to give any prejudice against the truth. For thus saith Augustine in one place. Let Merits of men here hold their peace, which have perished by Adam: and let the grace of God raigne, by Jesus Christ. Againe, the Saints give nothing to their owne Merits: they will give all to none but to thy mercy, O God. In another place. When man seeth that whatsoever good, hee hath: he hath it not from himselfe, but from his God, hee seeth that all that which is praised in him, is not of his owne merits, but of the mercy of God. You see how taking from men the power of well doing, hee also throweth downe the dignitie of merit. And Chrysostome saith, Our workes, if there bee any, which follow the free calling of God, are repaime and debt: but the gifts of God are grace and bountifullnesse, and the greatnesse of liberall giving: but leaving the name, let us rather looke upon the thing, I have verily before alleaged a sentence out of Bernard. As it sufficeth to merit, not to presume of merits: so to want merits, sufficeth to judgement. But by adding forth with an exposition, hee sufficiently mitigated the hardnesse of the word, where he saith: Therefore care thou to have merits: when thou hast them, know that they are given hope for fruit, the mercy of God; and so thou hast escaped all danger, of povertie, unthankfulness, and presumption. Happy is the Church which neither wanteth merits without presumption, nor presumption without merits. And a little before he had largely shewed, how godly a meaning hee used. For of merits (saith he) why should the Church be carefull, which hath a stedfaster and surer cause to glory of the purpose of God? God cannot denie himselfe, he will do that which he hath promised. If there be no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merits may we hope for good things? specially sith thou hearest it said, Not for your sakes, but for my sake: it sufficeth to merit, to know that merits suffice not.

3. What all our workes deserve, the Scripture sheweth, when it saith that they cannot abide the sight of God, because they are full of uncleannesse: then, what the perfect observing of the law (if any such could be found) shall deserve, when it teacheth that we should thinke our selves unprofitable servants, when we have done all things that are commanded us? because we shall have given nothing freely to the Lord, but onely have performed our due services, to which there is no thanks to be given. But those good workes which he himselfe hath given us, the Lord both calleth ours, and testifieth that they are not onely acceptable to him, but also that they shall have reward. It is our dutie againe for our part, to be encouraged with so great a promise, and to gather up our hearts, that we be not wearied with well doing, and to yeeld true thankfulness to so great bountifullnesse of God. It is undoubted that it is the grace of God, whatsoever there is in workes that deserveth praise: that there is not one drop, which we ought properly to ascribe to our selves. This if we doe truly and earnestly acknowledge, there vanisheth away not only all affiance, but also opinion of merit. Wee (I say)

doe not part the praise of good works (as the Sophisters doe) betweene God and man : but we reserve it whole, perfect, and unminished to the Lord. Onely this wee alligne to man, that even the selfe-same works that were good, hee by his uncleanesse corrupteth and defileth. For nothing commeth out of man, how perfect soever hee be, that is not defiled with some spot. Therefore, let the Lord call into judgement even these things that are best in the works of men, hee shall verily espie in them his owne righteousness, but mans dishonestie and shame. Good works theretore doe please God and are not unprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receive for reward the most large benefits of God : not because they so deserve, but because the goodnesse of God hath of it selfe appointed this price unto them, But what spitefulnesse is this, that men not contented with that liberalitie of God, which giveth undue rewards to works that deserve no such thing, doe with ambition full of sacriledge endeavour further, that that which is wholly of the liberalitie of God, may seeme to be rendred to the merits of men. Heere I appeale to the common judgement of every man. If any man that hath a taking of profit in a piece of ground by another mans liberall grant, doe also claime to himselfe the title of proprietie : doth he not by such unthankfulnesse deserve to looke the very selfe possession which he had ? Likewise, if a bond-slave being made free of his Lord, doe hide the basenesse of the estate of a Libertine, and boast himselfe to be a free-man borne : is hee not worthy to be brought backe into his former bondage ? For this is the right use of enjoying a benefit, if wee neither claime to our selves more than is given, nor doe defraud the author of the benefit of his praise : but rather doe so behave our selves, that that which he hath given from himselfe to us, may seeme after a certaine manner to remaine with him. If this moderation be to be kept toward men, let all men looke and consider what manner of moderation is due to God.

4. I know that the Sophisters doe abuse certaine places, to prove thereby that the name of Merit toward God is found in the Scriptures. They alleage a sentence out of Ecclesiasticus, Mercy shall make place to every man, according to the Merit of his works. And out of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with such sacrifices men merit of God. As for my might in resisting the authoritie of Ecclesiasticus, I do now release it. Yet I deny that they faithfully alleage that which Ecclesiasticus, whatsoever writer yee were, hath written. For the Greeke copie is thus : ωσθη δὲ ἀνευμασίῃ προσέειπεν τῷ πᾶσι, ἕξαστε γὰρ ἑστὴ τὸ ἔργα αὐτῶ ἐπιπέσει. He shall make place to every mercy, and every man shall finde according to his works. And that this is the true text, which is corrupted in the Latine translation, appeareth both by the framing of these words, and by a longer joyning together of the sentence going before. In the Epistle to the Hebrewes, there is no cause why they should share us in one little word, when in the Greeke words of the Apostle is nothing else but that such sacrifices doe please and are acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to suffice to subdue and beate downe the outrageousnesse of our pride, that wee saine not any worthinesse to works beyond the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that all our good works are continually besprinkled with many filthy spots, wherewith God may be worthily offended and be angry with us : so farre is it off, that they bee able to win him to us, or to provoke his liberalitie toward us : Yet because hee of his tender kindnesse noth not examine them by extremitie of law, he taketh them as if they were most pure, and therefore though without merit, hee rewardeth them with infinite benefits both of this present life and of the life to come. For I do not allow the distinction set by men other wise learned and godly : that good works deserve the graces that are given us in this life, and that eternall life is the reward of Faith alone. For the Lord doth commonly alway set in heaven the reward of labours and the crowne of battel. Again to give it so to the merit of works, that it be taken away from grace, that the Lord heapeth us with graces upon graces, is against the doctrine of the Scripture. For though Christ saith that to him that hath, shall be given, and that the faithfull and good servant which hath shewed himselfe faithfull in few things, shall be set over many : yet he also sheweth in another place, that the increases of the faithfull are the gifts of his free goodnesse. All yee that thirst (saith he) come to the waters : and yee that have not money, come and buy milke and honie without mony and without any exchange. Whatsoever therefore is now given to the faithfull for helpe of saluation, yea and blessednesse it selfe, is the meere liberalitie of God: yet both in this and in those he testifieth that he hath consideration of works: because to testifie the greatnesse of his love toward us, hee vouchsafeth to grant such honour not onely to us, but also to the gifts which he hath given us.

5. If these things had in the ages past bene handled and disposed in such order as they ought to have bene, there had never risen so many troubles and dissentions. Paul saith, that in the building of Christian doctrine, wee must keepe still that foundation which he had laid among the Corinthians, beside which no other can bee laid: and that the same foundation is Jesus Christ. What manner of foundation have we in Christ? is it that he was to us the beginning of saluation: that the fulfilling thereof should follow of our selves? and hath he but onely opened the way, by which wee should goe forward of our owne strength? Not so but as he said a litle before, when we acknowledge him, he is to us righteousnesse. No man therefore is well founded in Christ, but he that hath full righteousnesse in him: forasmuch as the Apostle saith not that he was sent to helpe us to obtaine righteousnesse, but that he himselfe might be our righteousnesse. Namely, that we are chosen in him from eternitie before the making of the world, by no deserving of ours, but according to the purpose of the good pleasure of God: that by his death we are redeemed from the damnation of death, and delivered from destruction: that in him we are adopted of the heavenly father into children and heires: that by his bloud we are reconciled to the Father: that being given to him to be kept we are delivered from perill of perishing and of being lost: that being so engrafted in him, we are alreadie after a certaine manner partakers of eternall life, being eated into the kingdome of God by hope: and yet more: that having obtained such partaking of him, howsoever wee bee yet fooles in our selves, hee is wisdom for us before God, howsoever we be sinners, he is righteousnesse for us: howsoever we be uncleane, he is cleannesse for us: howsoever we be weake, howsoever unarmed and lying open in danger of Satan, yet ours is the power which is given him in heaven and earth, whereby he may tread downe Satan for us, and breake the gates of hels: howsoever we still carrie about with us the body of death, yet he is life for us: briefly that all his things are ours, and we in him have all things, in our selves nothing. Vpon this foundation, I say, it behoveth that we be builded, if we will encrease into a holy temple to the Lord.

6. But the world hath a long time bene otherwise taught. For there hath bene found out I wot not what morall good works, by which men may bee made acceptable to God before that they be grafted in Christ. As though the Scripture lieth, when it saith, that they are all in death which have not possessed the sonne. If they bee in death, how should they bring forth matter of life? As though it were of no more force, that whatsoever is done without faith, is sinne: as though there may be good fruits of an evill tree. But what have these most pestilent Sophisters left to Christ wherein hee may shew forth his power? They say that he hath deserved for us the first grace, namely the occasion of deserving: that it is now our part not to faile the occasion offered. O desperate shamelesnesse of ungodlinesse. Who would have thought that men professing the name of Christ, durst so strip him naked of his power, and in a manner tread him under foote? This testimonie is each where spoken of him, that all they are justified that beleeve in him; these fellowes teach, that there cometh from him no other benefit but this, that the way is opened to every man to justifie himselfe. But I would to God they talked with these sayings meane: that all they have life that have the Son of God: that whatsoever beleeve, is already passed from death into life, that wee are justified by his grace, that we might be made heires of eternall life: that the faithfull have Christ abiding in them, by whom they cleave fast to God: that they which are partakers of his life, doe sit with him in heavenly places: that they are transfused into the kingdome of God, and have obtained saluation and innumerable other such: For they doe not declare, that there cometh by the faith of Christ nothing but the power to obtaine righteousnesse or saluation, but that they are both given to us. Therefore so soone as thou art by faith engrafted into Christ, thou art already made the son of God, the heire of heaven, partaker of righteousnesse, possessor of life, and (that their lies
